LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1969

The House met at 2.30 o'clock p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Our guests today in the east gallery are students from Applewood Heights Secondary School, Cooksville, and St. Jerome Separate School in Downsview; and in the west gallery from Glenview Public School in Toronto.

I would remind our visitors that any applause from the galleries is not in order. The members are glad to see you and they welcome you, and we are sure you are glad to be here or you would not be here.

Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Mr. Henderson, from the standing orders and printing committee, presented the committee's fifth report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee has carefully examined the following petitions and finds the notices, as published in each case, sufficient:

Of the corporation of the borough of East York praying that an Act may pass fixing a standard of fitness to which all non residential property shall conform; and for other purposes.

Of Harry J. Botnick, Abraham Bleeman, Yaakov S. Weinberg, Sandor Hofstedter, Wilferd Gordon, Mark A. Levy, Alex Rubin, Gedalyah Felder, Nachum L. Rabinovitch and Nota Schiller praying that an Act may pass incorporating Maimonides Schools for Jewish Studies having university powers.

Of the Corporation of the town of Whitby praying that an Act may pass permitting it to require applicants desiring the use of town streets for cable television purposes to enter into agreements with the town for the use thereof.

Of the corporation of the city of Peterborough praying that an Act may pass authorizing the corporation to enter into agreements with Border Transit Limited with respect to the operation of a bus line within the limits of the corporation.

Of the corporation of the county of Welland praying that an Act may pass permitting it to amend the agreement authorized by Chapter 182 of the Statutes of Ontario, 17 Elizabeth II, 1968.

Of the corporation of the city of Windsor praying that an Act may pass permitting the council to charge the cost of municipal drainage work against all the rateable property in the municipality; and for other purposes.

Of the corporation of the town of Mississauga praying that an Act may pass permitting it to provide public transportation by agreement without the necessity of a referendum.

Of the corporation of the University of Windsor praying that an Act may pass modifying the composition and numbers of the board of governors and senate; and for other purposes.

Of the corporation of the city of Ottawa praying that an Act may pass authorizing a bylaw controlling the occupancy of all types of buildings; and for other purposes.

Mr. E. Dunlop (York-Forest Hill): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present the first report of the Select Committee on Election Law.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

BOROUGH OF EAST YORK

Mr. A. K. Meen (York East) moves first reading of a bill intituled, An Act respecting the borough of East York.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

TOWN OF MISSISSAUGA

Mr. R. D. Kennedy (Peel South) moves first reading of a bill intituled, An Act respecting the town of Mississauga.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Before the orders of the day I would like to advise the hon. members that the opening prayers today are the result of assistance from leading clergy of several denominations and the work of the House committee. In succeeding days I shall endeavour to use certain others which have been drafted. Then I would like to have the consensus of the House as to the most appropriate form, so that it may be adopted. Everyone will have the opportunity of making his or her own decision with respect to this important part of our ceremony in the House each day.

The other day I undertook, at the request of the member for Humber (Mr. Ben), to look into the matter of questions placed on the notice paper directed to private members. The relevant part of rule 37(a) reads:

Questions may be put to Ministers of the Crown relating to public affairs; and to other members relating to any bill, motion, or other public matter connected with the business of the House with which such member may be concerned.

It is, therefore, my view that such questions can be asked of private members, subject to the Speaker's ruling in each case as to whether or not it pertains to a public matter connected with the business of the House, in which the member is concerned.

With respect to private notice questions asked orally before the orders of the day, it was my understanding last session that the custom of the House is that such questions must be directed only to the ministry.

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to rise on a point of privilege.

I have, on my desk today, two notices of committee meetings tomorrow; the resources and tourism committee at 10.30 o'clock and the committee on education and university affairs tomorrow at 10.45 o'clock.

Now we on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, have repeatedly asked that these committees be co-ordinated, so that no two committees, as far as is possible, come on the same day at the same time.

As I am a member of both committees, interested in both subjects, I find it physically impossible to be in two places at once. I would ask that the government take some action to make sure that these committee hearings are held on different days, staggered somehow, so that members are able to attend the committees of which they are members.

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member is a sound one and it has been raised on many occasions. I am sure the Clerk of the Assembly and the party whips, who I believe are responsible for assisting and advising as to this, will endeavour to see if something cannot be done. I realize the situation and I think every member does; and yet there is so much to do and so little time, it seems, to do it.

I will be most pleased to endeavour to see that it is followed up.

The hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

Can the Minister report to the House on the progress of negotiations with the Canadian Union of Public Employees, CLC, Ontario Hydro Employees' Union, Local 1000?

Hon. D. A. Bales (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question. The department has been providing mediation services to the parties to help them find common ground and hopefully, to settle the dispute. Meetings were held throughout last week and have been adjourned until Wednesday.

Meanwhile, the parties themselves are reviewing their positions in the light of the discussions of last week.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this is a supplementary question.

I might ask the Minister if he is aware that both parties have contacted their members over the last few days and the reason for my question was really to elucidate the role played by the government's mediation services.

We are to understand, then, that on Wednesday of this week, the parties will come together again. Is it the responsibility of the department, through its conciliation staff, to offer terms of a proposed settlement or simply to listen to both sides?

Hon. Mr. Bales: Mr. Speaker, the meetings take a variety of forms. I think for the moment I would prefer to leave it at that.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Development how many jobs will be available in London for employees of Kelvinator when the plant closes down? What companies will be providing the work and will salaries for the new positions be competitive?

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Mr. Speaker, I might say to the hon. member that officers of my department have been constantly in contact with the Canadian Manpower Centre in London.

They have been advised that ample employment opportunities will be available to the employees of Kelvinator Canada Limited.

It is not possible to estimate the exact number of jobs which will be available but the industrial growth that is taking place in the London area should present more than enough work opportunities. I might say I was talking to one of my former employees and he said that his company had already hired some of the Kelvinator employees to work in its appliance plant.

On parts two and three of the question: We are unable to divulge the names, and, consequently, the wage rates of the companies which will be providing the work, but continuous contact is being maintained with the Canada Manpower Centre.

I would also say that the manpower consultive service, a branch of the federal Department of Manpower and Immigration, have made a proposal to the company and the union that a joint manpower planning committee be established, under the auspices of the manpower consultive service, to develop an orderly plan for the adjustment of the employees. So far the union has expressed willingness to participate in such a programme, but the company has not as yet given its answer.

Mr. Nixon: May I ask the Minister a supplementary question—if, in fact, he is in a position to guarantee that a like number of jobs of similar technology requirements would be made available?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I am in no position to guarantee anything. It is a free society; these people can go to work in London or anywhere else.

I think I said the other day that some of these people have gone to work in another plant. The office employees are going to be maintained under a distributor set up and the Ford Motor Company of Canada, whom I contacted myself, are going to go from 1,500 to 2,700 employees around the first of May. I thought that many of these people, being UAW employees, would go to work with the Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited when that new shift begins in Talbotville.

Mr. Nixon: We have every reason to expect that there will be plenty of buoyancy as far as the job situation is concerned?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I would think so—from what we see now.

Mr. Nixon: Right!

I would like to further ask the Minister of Trade and Development if he will report to the House the progress of his talks with Transport Minister Paul Hellyer over the weekend, on the subject of housing.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Speaker, it is a little early to give a progress report. The Minister went back to Ottawa with a number of recommendations that I think all the Ministers attending the conference gave to him.

As I understand it, the Minister's parting remarks were that he would take these back and talk to his staff—talk to his colleagues—and see if some of these amendments could be implemented in this session of the Legislature. We agreed, as I said earlier, with many of the recommendations: I think there were 44 points. We had gone over all 44—many we agreed with; many we have recommended over the last two years. It was not new to us that the task force would make these recommendations, so we concurred with him without too much difficulty. If there was any difficulty at all, it was possibly in the holdup at the present time of public housing projects that have been up in the Minister's office since about December 19. We suggested to the Minister, with the building season upon us, that we would like to see those projects approved and down here so we can get under way.

Now I think if members reads the report they will see that somebody says public housing units should not be any more than 100 here or 100 there. Well, I think if you are going to have dispersal of public housing units in a city like Toronto, it will be a long time before we house our people. So, perhaps one of the interesting parts of the discussion was how big is large. What may be large in British Columbia or large in Kingston would not be large in the city of Toronto. So this is, I would think, the major issue at the present time, as far as the province of Ontario is concerned, is how quickly those projects that are now in Ottawa can be put through so we can get on with the job and carry on with our programme of building the units that we have scheduled for this year. Already we figure we have lost 60 days of very valuable time. I offered to go to Ottawa this morning and pick up the projects and the money at 8 o'clock. Mr. Hellyer said he would not be there at 8 o'clock; I said, "How about 8.30?" He said he would not be there at 8.30. "Well," I said, "You name the hour and I will be there."

However, all joking aside, I think Mr. Hellyer is going to expedite those projects and we should have them down here very shortly.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question, and I should say before I put the question that I saw the Minister of Trade and Development on television making this very point. As a matter of fact, I thought he made it considerably more harshly on television than he did in the Legislature, that there seemed to be some delay in approval, but the thing that surprised me—and that I would like to put to the Minister—is why he did not raise the delay in having a standard building code for this province. Surely this is a matter of some concern over which the Minister has some specific responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, I think the committee on standard building codes has already been set up by the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. Nixon: That was the one set up a year ago.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well it was set up here in the last six months or so, if I recall it. They already were working on that, but I do not think that is the problem. We are not having as much difficulty there, as we are getting sufficient funds through to complete the projects we already have on hand. I think that the building codes certainly need to be changed, but they are not the major problem. As far as I can see the major problem is perhaps the shortage of NHA money and, secondly, the length of time it takes to get these projects approved up in Ottawa after we put them through here, and I believe they are going to expedite those, as I said earlier, after discussion with the Minister on Saturday.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I have a question—

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member for York South has a question and then the hon. member for Downsview will have the floor.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a question for the Minister of Labour, in two parts.

1. With 25 licensed stationary engineers on strike since January 6, 1969, at the Welland plant of Cyanamid of Canada Ltd., with no qualified person to replace them, can the Minister assure the House that this plant is operating in conformity with the regulations of The Operating Engineers Act?

2. In the Beachville plant of Cyanamid of Canada Limited, how many accidents have been reported to the workmen's compensation board since December 9, 1968? How many workmen have been retained on payroll following an accident, without reporting to the workmen's compensation board?

Hon. Mr. Bales: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for York South, it will be necessary to have an inspection made of the plant in order that I may answer the first part of the question. As soon as I receive the latest report, I will answer that portion of it.

In reference to the second part of the question concerning the Beachville plant, I am advised that 12 accidents have been reported to the workmen's compensation board since December 9, 1968. Five involved lost time and seven medical aid only. Both employers and employees are required to report all accidents under the Act to the workmen's compensation board, and hence I can only assume that this has been done. I have no knowledge of any accidents that have not been reported.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, by way of a supplementary question, I asked a question in connection with Cyanamid last week and I have had no reply. Is that still under study?

Hon. Mr. Bales: In that case, I will see that the report is given to the member as soon as I receive it.

Mr. MacDonald: Thank you.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Downsview has two questions.

Mr. Singer: I have a question of the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

1. How many complaints has his department received to date, concerning the refusal of landlords to pay to tenants the rebates provided by the provisions of The Residential Property Tax Reduction Act, 1968?

2. What has been the disposition of these complaints?

3. How many of these complaints have not yet been processed?

4. How soon is it anticipated that the balance of these complaints will be dealt with?

5. (a) Have any justices of the peace in Metropolitan Toronto or anywhere else in the province of Ontario been instructed not to accept information concerning offences alleged to have taken place under the provisions of this Act unless the acceptance of such information is first approved by your department?

(b) If so, on what authority?

(c) If not, why should a Mr. Stephens of the Minister's department have so advised an inquiring solicitor on February 20, 1969?

6. (a) Is it correct that no charges can be laid alleging breaches of this Act after June 30, 1969?

(b) If so, on what basis?

(c) If not, why should a Mr. Stephens of the Minister's department have so advised an inquiring solicitor on February 20, 1969?

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a rather long involved question and I would request that it be transferred to the order paper.

Mr. Singer: Shame! I have a second question, Mr. Speaker. I am a little surprised the Minister is not on top of his department, but that is his privilege if he wants to avoid the answers to these things.

The second question is to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the Minister's officials have stated that there are presently about one million citizens of Ontario who have not, as yet, obtained their 1969 motor vehicle registrations and, in view of the fact that after February 28, 1969 it will be an offence to drive a motor vehicle in Ontario without such registration, can the Minister advise whether instructions have been given to motor vehicle licence issuers throughout the province that they should remain open in the evenings during the week of February 23 to 28 in order to make it easier for our citizens to comply with these laws?

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, our issuers have been given no special direction respecting extra night hours this week.

This hon. member's question is timely since it gives me the opportunity to repeat what I said in this House on February 17, namely that motorists are given three full months in which to obtain their new plates.

With five days to go, our latest count shows that 1,470,800 sets of the new 1969 plates have been issued as against 1,430,400 at the same time last year. There is no evidence that our facilities are inadequate to handle the remaining issue.

Mr. Singer: The Minister does not want to help the people?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: We are doing a good job, a good job!

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Motorists do not have to wait till the last minute.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Huron-Bruce has a question of the Minister of Health.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): A question of the Minister of Health. Would the Minister inform the House as to what steps are being taken to ensure that proper inspection is given store handled barbecued meats and poultry, in view of the article in this morning's Globe and Mail?

I have a second question of the Minister; of you want me to put it at this point, Mr. Speaker, I will do so.

What was the cost of optometric services for the first six months, July 1968, to December 31, 1968 in Ontario; and second, did the first few months show heaviest utilization?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's first question:

Regulations to The Public Health Act lay down the procedures we follow for the safe storage and handling of such foods. The enforcement of the food premises regulation is the responsibility of the local board of health, medical officer of health and his inspectors.

This is the normal machinery for the inspection of all food cases. It is up to them to have carried out the regular inspection of places where such meat, poultry, and so on, are sold, to ensure that the regulations are being followed.

Considerable educational material concerning the handling of these meats has been presented to public health officials in this province in various public health journals.

In answer to the hon. member's second question: Cash payment by OMSIP for optometric services for the period July 1, 1968 to January 31, 1969, was $490,972. There was a steady increase until November and a very slight decrease since then.

The answer to the second part of his question is, "no"; there was no unusually heavy utilization.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for High Park has a question.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Speaker, before I ask my questions, I have a matter of privilege which I wish to raise before the orders of the day.

One of the privileges of the members of this House is to introduce public bills and we have the privilege of attempting to persuade the members of this House that our bills are in the public interest. Presumably if we do persuade those members we will have them passed, into law. If, on the other hand, we are unable to persuade the members, they will, of course, be rejected.

There are certain written rules governing the method by which such bills may be brought to a vote. The written rules in this House, sir, may be abrogated only by consent. In an earlier Legislature, it is my understanding that there was a so-called agreement which removed the system which many members complained of at that time, by which the government could call bills brought in by Opposition members at their convenience. This proved very inconvenient for many of the Opposition members who happened to be absent on the day the bills were called, by a strange coincidence.

An agreement was worked out at that time whereby regular hours were set for private members to bring in public bills and at that time the two Opposition leaders—and may I express again this was not in this Legislature—were forced to agree that they would not request a vote at that time. Let me say this was not an agreement as such. I have had an opportunity to speak to one of those leaders and he said this was literally a "take it or leave it" matter.

Now, sir, in any case this was in a previous Legislature and I certainly know that a large number of the members on this side of the House do not agree to this earlier so-called agreement.

In addition to this matter, sir, this House, in addition to written rules, works on a matter of precedent and I have had an opportunity in the last few days to go back over the precedents and I found the last precedent involved the member for St. Andrew, not the present member for St. Andrew-St. Patrick (Mr. Grossman), but his predecessor, who at a certain point in the proceedings was bringing up matters which were not palatable to the Conservative majority.

A Conservative member at that time rose and moved that the question be put. This is the last precedent I have. The Speaker at the time accepted that motion, in effect silencing the Opposition and taking the vote. I think it is rather inappropriate, sir, that we do not follow precedents.

May I also say that the Speaker should only intervene in a case like that to protect the minority and in this case—this was an earlier

Speaker some years ago—he acted in effect to suppress the minority. We have a more recent incident where all members were agreed, there was no question of suppressing the minority, and the Speaker of the day followed a quite different rule.

I would like also to point out, sir that in our neighbouring province of Manitoba, which has a Conservative government, there is ample time given to Opposition members to bring in public bills. These bills are brought to a vote and if the government does not wish to carry the bill they have a majority and they vote the bill down. But they do not attempt to oppress the minority by refusing them the right to follow the rules of democracy.

Now, sir, I am not appealing the ruling of last Friday, I am quite content to let that go by, nor I am debating it. I bring this matter up, sir, because it will come before this House on a number of occasions in the future. Certainly I have been working on a lot of public bills, many of which I feel are not only for the benefit of a limited group of this province but of benefit to everyone. I think, therefore, that these bills could be agreed to by members on all sides of this House.

Many of these bills are of a completely non-controversial nature and should be passed. When any of these bills come up in the future, sir, I hope that you will follow the written rules of the House, particularly if the situation is such that all three parties have spoken in favour of such a bill, and allow the matter to come to a vote.

Mr. Speaker: I would say to the hon. member that I am not now, nor was I on Friday, unaware of the precedents that he quoted. Were the matter to come up again before this House when I was in the Chair, the ruling that I would make would be similar, allowing the members the opportunity to deal with it as they see fit.

I trust that if there is any strong feeling in that regard the hon. member would have sufficient influence with his party leader to have the matter discussed and dealt with on a friendly and amicable basis, because that is the only way that there can be any progress made with these matters in this House.

I thank the hon. member for the work he has gone to and the explanation he has given today—because I know it entailed considerable work. It is very good that he should put the energy and research that he has into introducing these bills and stimulating discussion. There is no question about it. Whether it should stimulate more than discussion or not I would not care to say, because after all the Speaker is only human and he hopes to hold, as the member said, an even hand.

I could hope that this matter could be adjusted properly without the necessity of it being raised again as a point of privilege, a point of order, a free discussion or an appeal of the Speaker's ruling. I would strongly suggest that those concerned, take the cue and meet with me if they wish, or deal with it themselves.

The hon. member has a number of questions now, if he is prepared to put them while the Minister is still in the House.

Mr. Shulman: Sir, may I, on a point of order now, away from the point of privilege . . . I have the preliminary answer here for last Friday. When I first attempted to put this matter, you replied—I hope you are not misquoted—that you did not wish to cut off any member. Then you go on:

The member for Hamilton Mountain was next on the list. If, at that time, there is a motion to be made, that is fine. But I would not cut off discussion by members of the House. If the motion is put, that is fine, but I do think that every member should have the opportunity to be heard on this as long as there is time for him to be heard.

I then waited, sir, following your ruling, until the other members had been heard and had time to put the motion again.

I will leave it at the moment, sir. I hope some amicable way will be found to solve it without it being necessary to bring it up in the House again in this form.

I have a question for the Minister of Correctional Services:

1. In the transfer of Mr. Stanley W. from Burwash to the Sudbury Jail, did the criminal charges mentioned by the Minister on Friday refer to criminal acts committed inside Burwash?

2. How many of the 24 prisoners transferred from Burwash were transferred because of detected homosexuality?

3. Why were these prisoners not transferred to Millbrook or some other institutions capable of handling homosexuals?

4. Does the Minister think that district jails are better places to confine homosexuals?

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Mr. Speaker, I will take these questions as notice.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, I have a three-part question of Minister of Health:

1. How many patients have been discharged from the Ontario Hospital School at Orillia during the past three months?

2. How many patients have been admitted to the Ontario Hospital School at Orillia during the past three months?

3. Since there are now so many empty beds at the Ontario Hospital School at Orillia, why is admittance still refused such urgent cases as Susan K., who was brought to this Legislature last December and who has been on the waiting list for over five years?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I will take the questions as notice.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Transport.

1. Has the department made the study of safety factors involved in gas fuel heaters, which he promised in letters dated January 13, 1968, and April 29, 1968?

2. What were the results of that study?

3. What action has been taken?

Hon. Mr. Haskett: Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge we have had only one complaint about gasoline fuel heaters. My department officials have established that this was apparently an isolated instance and there is no indication that a general problem exists with this equipment.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The first order; resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the Speech of the Honourable, the Lieutenant-Governor at the opening of the session.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I outlined to the House some ideas which we in this group hold in respect to the establishing of regional governments in Ontario and at the time of the estimates I presume there will be more detailed discussions of the point of view which we hold.

I also pointed out our suggested plan for municipal taxation in the new regional governments and spoke on the support the province could give to these governments and suggested to this government some sources of revenue which are available today if certain tax changes take place.

Now I would like to digress from this main theme and caution the Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough), as he enters this next phase of municipal government in Ontario, as he faces the whole problem of setting up regional municipalities. If he is going to succeed, Mr. Speaker, in meaningful, planning for the new regional governments, he had better do something more than he has done so far to curb the tendency of the genial Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall) to fly off in all directions at once without knowing or caring what he is doing to mess up the work of his colleagues in the Cabinet.

Mr. Speaker, it is reliably reported around Queen's Park that on the morning of August 28 last, an explosion of mammoth proportions occurred in the office of the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton). This was followed a few minutes later by a thundering crash as the Minister of Municipal Affairs went right through the ceiling of his plush quarters showering debris on a startled staff which scattered in all directions. It seems that both men had about the same time picked up a copy of the morning paper and read the account of a speech the Minister of Trade and Development made the night before at Waterloo University.

And no wonder the Treasurer, responsible as he is for regional development, and the Minister of Municipal Affairs, responsible for municipal planning, reacted as they did. And I understand that mutterings came too from the Minister of Highways (Mr. Gomme) and the Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) after someone had explained to them what it all meant.

For some years now these departments have been involved in intensive studies in Waterloo county. As a matter of fact, the Waterloo area has seen over 80 studies of one kind or another all designed to find out what the future of that part of the province might be. Recently this study process has intensified. Local planning boards are busy and a regional planning board has been set up and is operating.

During the immediate past, three main studies have been going on in the Kitchener, Galt, Guelph area. I list them, because it is rather important for us to thoroughly understand just what is happening up there.

1. The area economic base study—looking into land use, population trends, employment patterns, and designed to outline population projections and land use requirements for the future.

2. The area planning and development study—designed to outline a series of alternative area development plans, evaluate their feasibility, and recommend an area plan to the respective agencies.

3. The area transportation study—to look into area transportation needs and to evolve an area transportation plan. This plan is now looking toward the MTARTS study with a view to harmonizing with it.

Several other related studies are also going on, looking at the potential water supply, the ability of area streams to handle sewage effluent, greenbelt areas, and urban renewal areas.

In addition to all this, The Department of Municipal Affairs appointed Dr. Stewart Fyfe of Queen's University to head up the Waterloo area local government review commission to make recommendations about the future form local government should take in the area. This commission held hearings, gathered together all the wisdom available, and is now writing its report.

So, for a number of years—and intensively for the past few—the local people, assisted by provincial departmental personnel and outside consultants, have been deciding where their cities should expand, what kind of housing should go where to best serve the expected population, what transportation would be needed, what parkland should be preserved, what lands should be held to serve expanding air traffic, where industry and high rise should go, and all the other facets of good regional planning.

And Dr. Fyfe was tying all this together and was ready to recommend what type of government should handle the region with some degree of efficiency and humanity.

Then, on August 27, at the housing conference at Waterloo, the Minister of Trade and Development, completely ignoring all this local and provincial study, proudly announced that he had bought land and was going to build a new city right smack in the centre of Waterloo county.

What this meant can be understood when it is realized that the land in question is completely outside the proposed Kitchener annexation area, nor is it in the Kitchener, Preston or Hespeler servicing area. The proposed use does not conform with the planning policy of Waterloo township, where it is located, nor was it considered urban land in the Kitchener-Waterloo and in the Galt-Preston traffic studies.

The fact is that the genial Minister, either in complete ignorance of the planning process, or with utter contempt for it, made his land acquisitions and announced his plans without consulting local planners, planning boards, or municipal councils. Nor did he consult his Cabinet colleagues whose departments were so deeply involved in planning the area.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): How can he do that!

Mr. Young: The Minister of Trade and Development, by his action, showed his complete indifference to all the planning going on. He set himself above the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) in his "Design for Development". He overrode the Cabinet committee and the interdepartmental committee on regional government.

He ignored the Minister of Municipal Affairs, the Minister of Highways, the Minister of Energy and Resources Management, the Provincial Treasurer, and the Ontario Water Resources Commission. He spurned the advice of the local people living in the area and wrestling with its problems, and he took unilateral action in deciding what is best for the region and what its future ought to be.

No wonder the Minister of Municipal Affairs exploded as he did. No wonder the Provincial Treasurer nearly had apoplexy! The Cabinet meeting following the Waterloo announcement must have been a beaut! Too bad some of us had not been there to find out.

But it doesn't appear to have had any lasting effect. Dr. Fyfe was so concerned about the matter that he recalled his commission specifically to explore what impact the land acquisition and the plans of the Minister would have on the planning which had been done to date. But the Minister didn't bother to attend. That didn't do anything to help the blood pressure of the Minister of Municipal Affairs, under whose wing the Fyfe commission is operating.

Then, as if to prove that like the Bourbon kings, he learns nothing, the Minister goes merrily on deciding the future of the province. He hands out grants and loans to industry without looking to see if expansion of that industry is in harmony with good planning principles or if it will have a severe impact upon the community in which it is located.

If the Minister is going to add several hundred people to the workforce of a town, he should also look at the problems of water, sewage, housing and parks in that area. Perhaps his grants to industry ought to be matched with grants to the municipality which has to service the expanded workforce.

The statement by the Minister at Trenton last fall, coupled with his answer to a question by the hon. member for Peterborough, is typical of this Minister's contempt for the planning process.

The MTARTS study set out four alternative plans for development of the area surrounding Metropolitan Toronto. Plan one is a series of cities with open spaces between them stretching from Hamilton to Oshawa. Evidently the Minister has decided that this is the plan which is to be accepted with modifications. He has eliminated the open spaces, so abhorrent to the commercial mind fixed on land values, and has extended the plan to Cornwall with wall to wall factories along the whole complex.

But if the Minister has decided on MTARTS plan one, then where does he fit in the large scale acquisition by Revenue Properties in the Uxbridge area as announced by that firm on December 9? Private firms are planning too, as well as the genial Minister and the whole result can be a pretty thorough hodge podge if the Minister of Municipal Affairs does not move pretty quickly to some fundamental decisions in this field.

It may well be that the reason for the recent willingness of the government to act more decisively in setting up new regional governments is that they have to act now before the genial Minister of Trade and Development messes up all hopes for orderly development. He should be fired, of course, but with all the fanfare which attended his entry into the Cabinet, that course might be a bit embarrassing. So the Prime Minister seems to be trying with one hand to keep the Minister in check, while with the other he's urging the Minister of Municipal Affairs to get on speedily with the job of reorganization before too much damage is done.

But to return to the Kitchener land acquisition. I don't know how much the Cabinet knows about what happened there. I doubt if any of us except the Minister himself, know the full story. But what we do know raises some very interesting questions.

The first question is this: Why did the Minister buy the land where he did?

Already I have pointed out that this land was not in the development area of any of the surrounding towns. It was adjacent to an airport which holds 600 acres and controls another 1,000. If this land is developed, there's bound to be a repetition of what is now happening around Malton.

As a matter of fact, a company called Granite Investments acquired two farms totalling 284 acres in this area. When enquiries were made about development prospects here, the township concerned discouraged such development with the result that interest was turned to the north of Highway 7 in the vicinity of Maryhill, where the township gave encouragement and co-operation since this was an area which seemed ripe for the next building thrust.

It would seem, then, that the natural place for the Minister to look would be to the Maryhill environs for land acquisition since this seemed to be the direction of development. But he did not. He chose rather one of the most unlikely areas in the county. Why?

Well, it is difficult to answer that question with any degree of accuracy, but let me relate a few events which may have some bearing upon it.

Capital Building Industries Ltd. of London, Ontario, originally was in the construction business in several cities including Montreal. Its directors are mainly from London, although people from Toronto, Oakville and Windsor sit on the board. It now builds mainly in Windsor, I understand.

I mention this company only because three of its former employees played a prominent role in the land acquisition in the Waterloo area. These three—Messrs. Renaud, McDonald and Sutherland—along with a couple of others, one a contractor from Windsor, formed Renmore Developments Ltd., of Windsor, Ontario, for the purpose of purchasing, leasing, holding, renting, operating, managing, developing land and sundry other items as set forth in its application for a charter.

The company applied for incorporation on May 6, 1966. It took over the land held by Granite, which I mentioned, and bought some further acreage.

Rumour has it that the company ran into rough weather for some reason and the Windsor partner became convinced that it had no future and he got out. Shortly after he did the dawn broke in the shape of the Minister's smile. The Minister paid cash for the land held by the company. The Windsor partner was justifiably annoyed and wanted his share of the cut. He is now back as an officer of the company, according to latest reports.

But meantime something else happened which may have had some bearing on the Renmore situation. McDonald and Sutherland—maybe sensing a good thing and not wanting to share it too far—set up their own company. It was called McDonald, Sutherland Industries Limited, 494 Queenston road, Hamilton. It was incorporated on November 30, 1967. Its officers are listed as:

President, Mr. William Joseph McDonald, 171 East avenue, Kitchener; secretary-treasurer, Kenneth Hunter Sutherland, 494 Queenston road, Hamilton; director, Audrey Katharine McDonald, 171 East avenue, Kitchener.

The first returns for the company were filed July 16, 1968. The Minister, as he informed me in the House, bought 345.8 acres of land from Renmore and 2,432 acres from McDonald, Sutherland. It would seem that Renmore faded out in the land business as McDonald, Sutherland moved in.

A couple of questions are left hanging here: Did Renmore shrewdly guess that the Minister was interested in land in this unlikely part of Waterloo county? Or having bought land in an area outside the direction of development, was Renmore rescued from financial disaster by the Minister who bought this land in an area where the township had no intention whatsoever of developing? More than this, why did the Minister buy in this particular location when land was available in the Maryhill area right in the path of logical development? In any case, Renmore got rid of its land and the new company—McDonald, Sutherland—moved in to corner the adjacent 2,400 acres and resell it to the Minister.

But there's another interesting facet to this strange deal. Renmore applied for incorporation in the name of a Windsor lawyer and what appears to be his office staff. But no returns were filed with the Provincial Secretary. The land purchases from Renmore were made on June 30 and July 10, 1968.

I checked up on Renmore and found that certain things were missing in the information and I wrote a letter to the Provincial Secretary (Mr. Welch), on October 29, 1968:

DEAR MR. WELCH:

I am writing you to request information in respect of Renmore Developments Ltd., Windsor, Ontario. This company was incorporated on May 6, 1966, but no returns have been filed yet, according to information from your department.

I am anxious to learn who are the present responsible parties for the corporation and hereby request that the filing of the annual return be insisted upon.

I would appreciate if you would advise me, when the information is available.

On November 7, I had a letter from the Minister to this effect:

Thank you for your letter of October 29. Our file indicates that Messrs. Bartlet, Richards, Knight and Wilson, 1002 Canada Building, Windsor, Ontario, are the solicitors of record for the company.

In August, 1967, and September, 1968, the department wrote to the company indicating the arrears of annual returns under The Corporations Information Act. I have requested an official of the companies' branch to follow this matter up and, for your information, I am enclosing herewith copies of the two most recent letters in this matter.

I might add, if the company fails to respond by filing the annual returns required, following a normal course of events cancellation proceedings will be instituted under section 326, subsection 2 of The Corporations Act.

I am appreciative of the fact that you have taken the time out to bring this matter to my attention.

(Signed)

ROBERT WELCH Minister.

Enclosed with this were copies of letters written to Renmore Developments from the executive officer of the companies branch and the statement that returns had not been filed and the fees had not been paid for the years 1967 and 1968.

In other words, the company had not been heard from since the original application in 1966.

Then, on December 11—after I might normally have made this speech in the House, Mr. Speaker—because of other developments it was not made at that time—on December 11, 1968, I had this letter:

DEAR MR. YOUNG:

Re: Renmore Developments Ltd. from The Department of the Provincial Secretary.

In October last you wrote to the Hon. Robert Welch concerning annual returns of the above mentioned corporation. Please be advised that the corporation has now filed its 1968 annual return and this return is now available for examination in the public office of the companies' branch, room 101 in the north wing.

And inquiries there gave the following officers of the company: President, Abel E. Renaud, 2690 Askin Boulevard, Windsor; secretary-treasurer, J. William McDonald, 171 East avenue, Kitchener; and vice-president, Patrick D'Amore, 898 Parent avenue, Windsor.

Directors on the 1968 return were the same as above.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my next question then is: Why did the Minister do business with a company which did not exist—or which refused to comply with the laws of the province? The purchases from Renmore took place in 1968, after the company had failed for two years to file its returns. Instead of doing business with the company the government would have been better advised to be prosecuting it for failing to comply with the law. If it had not been for my enquiry the chances are that Renmore would not have filed returns at all.

It all leads to the interesting query as to whether Renmore was simply set up to do business with the Minister and then disappear. Or did it have too many partners to share the spoils and so faded as the streamlined new two partner company appeared to do the lion's share of the dealing? And did the company file its returns three years late only because I raised the issue with the Provincial Secretary?

Another question is bound to arise here: why did the Minister not buy the land directly from the farmers, using an agent, thus saving a considerable amount of the taxpayers' money? Since he bought from the land companies which assembled the land, how much profit did these companies romp away with? Even if they made only $200 an acre the profit would be $600,000. If the spread was $500 an acre it would be $1.5 million.

The farmers were paid from about $1,200 an acre to something like $2,700, with the majority near the bottom figure. What did the Minister pay? This answer should be forthcoming, and we hope that this information will be available when his estimates come up. If he wants to table it before that, we would welcome it.

I can understand the wisdom of keeping such figures secret while negotiations for the purchase of land are going on. But now that the land assembly is complete there is no good reason for withholding such information from the Legislature. We have a right to know if public funds are properly used, or if they are going in part to enrich fast working operators who get in on the ground floor in a deal of this kind.

But there is more. At the Waterloo conference the Minister of Trade and Development said that the land in question would be the site of Ontario's first new town. But he has already leased the land back to the farmers for five years unconditionally, and for another five years with conditions.

Is this the measure of this Minister's concern for speed in housing our people? We need homes now and we need them desperately.

Is this Cabinet policy that the very first new town in Ontario is to start in from five to ten years? Or is the Minister again setting policy with which his Cabinet colleagues disagree? How long can this Minister stay, even though he was trumpeted as the white hope of the Tory party?

In the light of these circumstances—in the light of what this Minister has done—then certainly this government should give him his walking ticket. However, having offered that bit of advice, I would simply say to the government, that he is their problem and they are going to have to deal with it.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a very brief word about the event which happened last week in Metropolitan Toronto. It was decided by Metro council at that time that the Spadina Expressway should be built with priority over another expressway to the east of Metro.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): And the member is opposed?

Mr. Young: I am not opposed at all, Mr. Speaker. I was delighted to see that decision. But what disappoints me most is that the decision having been made, the deadline for the finish of the Spadina Expressway is put at 1975—far, far too late.

Today I would plead with this government, and with the Minister of Highways in particular, that some plan be worked out so that the completion of the Spadina Expressway can be pushed forward by several years.

The increased assessment along that highway and the rapid transit line which we also hoped would be built immediately along with that expressway, will bring in greatly added assessment. That assessment in the long run will more than pay for the roadway. I think that this is something this government has to understand—that the Spadina Expressway and the transportation facilities for rapid transit along it is not a cost, it is an investment. And that investment will bring very great returns very quickly in increased assessment, in ease of travel, in the cutting down of frustration of the people coming from that area downtown and returning.

Mr. Speaker, I point out to you that this is the one area in Metro Toronto which is so far unserved with adequate transportation of this kind. This government should see to it that funds are made available to build that rapid transit line and build the Spadina Expressway, and to cut down the time factor dramatically, so that the development that is taking place in that very great area of Metropolitan Toronto can take place with facility. So that the people who are living and working in that area will have the same benefits that are accruing to many other residents in many other parts of Metropolitan Toronto.

So, Mr. Speaker, I urge upon the Minister of Highways—and I urge upon the Minister of Correctional Services (Mr. Grossman) too, that they speak to their conferees on the benches and that they get quick action on the Spadina Expressway and the rapid transit line that eventually must go into that area.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Singer: It goes into the Minister's riding too!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We like to know where it is going before we can give them the money for it.

Mr. Singer: All they have to do is look at the plans.

An hon. member: Do not confuse him with the facts.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I know where I am going—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville has the floor.

Mr. B. Newman: Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the reply to the Speech from the Throne, may I at the outset extend my congratulations to you in the fair manner in which you tend to your responsibilities. I would also like to congratulate the deputy speaker and chairman of the committee of the whole House on the excellent job he has done in the past and is continuing to do this year. We have a most capable deputy speaker in this Legislature.

I would also like to extend to the mover and seconder of the Speech from the Throne my commendations on the excellent manner in which they presented their comments. We knew that they were going to present a very one-sided point of view. However, that was their responsibility; they could have done nothing else when they had certain things pointing in their backs.

May I also extend to the new Minister of Revenue (Mr. White) my congratulations; he is a most capable man and I know he will take care of his responsibilities very ably.

I would like to start my comments by mentioning electronic voting. Mr. Speaker, I keep bringing this topic up practically every year, and I will continue to do so as long as I am given that privilege. Is it not about time that voting in this Chamber was brought into the 20th century, into the electronic age? Let us not waste our time by time-honoured, old-fashioned, archaic ways of having our names called, rising, bowing to you, Mr. Speaker, and then sitting down. Let us install push buttons on our desks with an electronic recorder on the wall and a miniature recorder for the clerk of the House so that the time consumed in voting could be reduced to a minimum.

Mr. Speaker, the second topic that I wish to discuss is the topic of parity in fringe benefits. Wages and fringe benefits are two items that should be left to the discretion of the bargainer—be that bargainer a person, union or federation—and the employer to negotiate.

Both The Department of Municipal Affairs and The Department of Education have written into legislation the amount of fringe benefits that may be paid by a municipality. Today, if my power of recall is correct, a municipality may not contribute more than 66 per cent of the cost of these fringe benefits, be they medical services, Ontario hospitalization, life insurance, drug coverage, weekly indemnity benefits or any others that I may not have mentioned. Some municipalities now pay more than they are permitted to do under the present legislation. The department must be aware of this. May I, Mr. Speaker, respectfully suggest that both the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough) and the Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) bring in amendments to eliminate this restrictive paragraph so that employer and employee may collectively bargain as is their right.

If, in the course of their bargaining, 100 per cent of the benefits must be paid for by the municipality, then this would put the civil servant on the same basis as members of many of the unions in the automotive and allied fields. At least the civil servant would get parity of fringe benefits with his brother member in other unions. At the same time, may I suggest that The Municipal Act be further amended to allow municipalities to extend Green Shield, prescription services, or other drug coverage, to retired employees. As the Act is now, it provides for the extension of hospital and medical services to retirees, and it would be consistent to include drug coverage. Today's retirees have made their contributions to their employer—the municipality—and worked at substantially lower salaries or wages than today's civil servants. Surely they deserve this consideration; once again, parity in fringe benefits.

In turning to minimum wages, the minimum wage rate in Ontario has been raised from $1 per hour to $1.30 per hour this year. In the construction trades, it went up from $1.25 to $1.55 per hour. The 30 cent per hour increase may seem substantial for, in the first instance, it means a 30 per cent increase in the minimum, but Mr. Speaker, the minimum, at $1 per hour was much too low and was not realistic in the first place. The average work year, in round figures, consists of approximately 2,000 hours. This meant that an individual, were he or she to work steadily, could earn only approximately $2,000 a year, a figure below the poverty line. This employed person this year will be able to pick up $2,600. How anyone can keep himself, let alone a family, on such an absurdly low annual income, is unimaginable in these days of high prices.

This means that there will have to be more than one wage earner in the family. This generally means that the mother must also go out to work, and this means that the family with the larger number of children does not—or is not able to—share in our growing economy. The poor now simply become a little less poor with the increase in the minimum wage. A more realistic figure, Mr. Speaker, would be $2 per hour. I understand the contracts for the building trades are up for renewal this year; I have it indirectly that some of the skilled trades in the building industry are asking for approximately $7.50 per hour and six weeks vacation pay. This, Mr. Speaker, would mean an annual pay, if that person works a full year—and I do not know if he does—of about $18,000. Compare the $2,600 income with the $18,000 income. Such contrast speaks for itself. Both parties must buy in the same local market. Both require housing; one just cannot make it. The earning gap keeps widening, and as it does, so do our social problems.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to turn my thoughts towards revision of pensions. I could go on at some length on the topic of pensions. I could read into the record the article written by Mr. Ronald Anderson, in the February 18 issue of the Globe and Mail, concerning the fact that the old age pensions are not keeping pace with the cost of living despite automatic indexing.

I could make mention that living costs had risen in two years by 8.5 per cent, while, in that same period, old age pensions were raised by four per cent. To maintain the purchasing power of two years ago, the pensioner would require $113.92, rather than the $109.20 he now receives. In other words, we have short-changed the old age pensioner by $4.72 per month.

Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware that the old age pension is a federal responsibility, but I bring this up to show how inflation has affected—and it looks as though it will continue to affect—all pensioners. Think of the many pensioners who at one time worked for the civil service—municipal, provincial, federal—or boards of education. Their pensions were based on the last or the best three, five, six or seven years, even the last 10 years of service. The economy has grown. Inflation has deteriorated the value of their pension just as it has that of the old age pensioner. They do not have a strong labour union to negotiate pension increases for them. They are left to the whims of the elected officials—the politicians who are always supposedly striving to keep costs down.

Mr. Speaker, it is said that we can not change pension calculations of the retired, those now receiving a pension. What do you mean, we cannot? Almost every contract negotiated by the UAW—or should I say—every contract negotiated by the UAW—contains improvement factors to the pensions now received by former active UAW members. These pension increases are paid for by the public, paid for by increasing the selling price of the automobile or auto part. In other words, these pensions will continue to be increased as wage earners' incomes increase.

Mr. Speaker, why not apply that same principle to civil service pensions? Why not calculate their pensions, not on the years of service when they retired, but on the same years of service as if they were retiring from their employment each year. In other words, a person whose pension was based on the last five years of service and who retired in 1960, had his pension based on his earnings in 1956, 1957, 1958, 1959 and 1960. That person would—using the principle I suggest and having retired in 1960—have his pension based on the pay his classification would have received in 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969. Under such consideration, there would never be need for indexing, or for a cost of living increase. The pensioner would not have to worry about the ever-increasing costs. He or she would be able to live out his or her years in dignity and with peace of mind.

Such consideration would end, once and for all, the need to supplement persons receiving pension benefits. It would be a sort of a guaranteed annual income, ever increasing as wages increase, and as the economy and/or productivity improved.

Mr. Speaker, workmen's compensation board pensions and benefits should likewise be based on today's wages, not on those earned ten, 20, yes, even 30 years ago. There should be no need for periodic adjustments, as compensation payments would always be in tune with the times.

Mr. Speaker, may I turn my thoughts towards subsidized senior citizens' transportation. Too many of our senior citizens are incarcerated in their one-room boarding house, one-room flat or normal dwelling simply because they cannot afford the cost of transportation to visit either the downtown, their church, a social centre, a senior citizens' drop-in centre or their own friends in another part of the community. These citizens have asked for free transportation during the off-peak hours; they have asked for special rates. They have asked for a special consideration in this regard. However, transportation systems are having a most difficult time financially; some have hesitated to give in to these requests. In my own community, the city council has asked the Sandwich, Windsor and Amherstburg Railway to see if they would not consider providing lower rates for senior citizens during off-peak hours. However, the company turned this down stating that the loss experienced in reducing rates would not be offset by the added use of the transportation system. Yet, in Montreal on October 30, 1968, I read a press clipping which says, "Cut Fares for Elderly said Feasible."

I respectfully suggest, Mr. Speaker, that The Department of Social and Family Services, provide, as a starter, as a project, all senior citizens now receiving free OMSIP and free Ontario Hospital Services with a transportation pass, if requested, good for 100 round trips a year on the local transportation system. This would be the equivalent of two round trips per week. Coming as I do from Windsor, I would naturally wish my community to be singled out to conduct this pilot project. However, I would not be averse to leaving the selection of the community to the discretion of the hon. Minister concerned.

I know, Mr. Speaker, some may criticize me and say that carrying such a pass would be degrading and would mark the recipient of the pass. Were this so, Mr. Speaker, I would sincerely hope that the hon. Minister would consider some other method, possibly the provision of tickets that the individual may obtain from the local Department of Social and Family Services.

The Senior Citizens Association of Greater Windsor wrote me just over the weekend, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to read some of the areas that today provide transportation at a special rate for senior citizens.

I am quoting from the letter sent to me by Mr. Howard E. White, of the Greater Windsor Senior Citizens Centre Association.

North Bay: They recently reduced fares as follows. There are ten rides for $1.25 or 20 rides for $2.25. Tickets are obtained at the city hall, showing proof of age of 60 or over. Ottawa, last summer, began a sale of eight tickets for $1 to senior citizens. Kingston, on April 1, began to issue a pass for one year, purchased at the public utilities office for $3.50. Hamilton and St. Catharines both reduced fares to ten cents plus a senior citizen's card. The Lakehead, Port Arthur and Fort William, reduced fares but the tickets are purchased from the welfare office because the privilege has been abused in the past. Winnipeg completed a deal last fall for reduced fares, we believe one half the normal fare. Calgary and Edmonton provide free passes between rush hours. Vancouver and Victoria are making some provision.

But they could not provide we with details.

Regina and Saskatoon have made some concessions.

But likewise they could not provide me with the details. This is a plea from the Greater Windsor Senior Citizens Centre Association for some type of consideration regarding transportation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, failing to consider the reduced rate for the senior citizens, I suggest then as a pilot project that buses owned and operated by local school boards be used to provide free transportation to senior citizens just as they do now for school children. The number of buses used would depend on the community involved in the pilot project. This transportation would have to be during off-hours—times when the buses are not being used for the transportation of school children. This could be an answer to the much needed transportation concern of the senior citizens.

I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) is not in the House at this time because the next 15 or 20 minutes of my comments were going to be directed to him. And this is concerning pollution. I read from an editorial dated Friday, January 24, 1969, in the Windsor Star, and the headline simply says, "Time to be Tough on Water Pollution".

Well, Mr. Speaker, on February 13 this year I had asked the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), what legislation the Minister was planning to regulate United States pleasure craft on Ontario waterways to prevent pollution by wastes from such pleasure craft.

The Minister gave a fairly lengthy answer. However, I will not read all of the comments he made, but simply the last paragraph. I will read my question to him and then his reply. This, by the way, is found on page 1246 of this year's edition of Hansard. I asked the Minister:

Is the Minister aware of the effect this may have on the tourist industry throughout the province of Ontario?

And the hon. Minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, we are faced with the matter of cleaning up pollution or the tourist industry, and I think anyone who wants to come in here badly enough this year with his cruiser will have a macerator chlorinator. In fact, many of them have them now in their craft.

In other words, the Minister was more concerned with eliminating pollution, rather than being worried about the tourist business.

And I was extremely pleased, Mr. Speaker, to find that the Minister has placed such high priority on the elimination of water pollution by pleasure craft over the economic concern of his own colleague, the Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld)—the health of our citizenry over the tourist dollar.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us look at the air pollution problem. Rather than to talk about it generally, I am going to be specific and I will refer to the Chrysler, Windsor foundry in the heart of my riding, Windsor-Walker-ville.

With the signing of the Auto Trade Pact, Chrysler (Canada) Limited decided to acquire the former Walker Metal foundry, as management could see the need for substantially-increased amounts of metal castings. This purchase was completed in 1964. The foundry was old then. Its production was small by today's standards. It was a real source of irritation, annoyance, discomfort and a potential health hazard to the residents in that neighbourhood prior to 1964.

As chairman of the city of Windsor smoke abatement committee for one year, in the 1950s, I can recall criticisms concerning this foundry. However, in those days the red herring used was: "Would you rather have smoke or unemployment?"

With the Chrysler take-over of the Walker Metal foundry, new, more efficient procedures were implemented. Production was substantially increased, extra shifts were taken on. It was only natural that, if there was atmospheric pollution before the Chrysler take-over, there would be an even more pronounced pollution of the air after the take-over.

The residents of the area complained and complained to the city of Windsor, whose responsibility this problem was, up until this year. They complained to the city council, they met with city council, they received a sympathetic hearing but that was all. The pollution continued.

The Chrysler people did pay heed to the residents. The building commissioner of the city or his representative did complain to Chrysler. Chrysler did start a programme to attempt to reduce emissions. But, Mr. Speaker, one only works as hard as he is pushed, be that a person or a corporation. Chrysler's claim they have spent substantial amounts of money to eliminate or to reduce the air pollutants. However, I will refer to this a little later in my remarks.

Up until The Air Pollution Control Act of 1967 was passed, the residents dealt with the city of Windsor in an attempt to get a remedy to their problem. Early in September, 1968, I was driving past the Chrysler foundry at about eight o'clock in the morning. The emissions from the foundry were so heavy and so irritating and cough-provoking that I had to close all the windows in my car and speed by.

I immediately wondered why the residents in the area did not complain. However, I contacted The Department of Health by telephone and asked for a status report concerning the Chrysler Windsor foundry. On September 27, I received the following, and this is a memorandum from The Department of Health to Mr. W. B. Drowley, chief air pollution control service from Mr. C. B. Martin, head of the approval section of the air pollution control service. The following is a status report concerning the matters requested:

Chrysler Corporation foundry, Windsor:

During the last year Chrysler Corporation has taken a large step forward in controlling air pollutants from their foundry operation at Walker Metal Products in Windsor.

They have installed the very latest in modern equipment to control the iron cupola emissions. While this effort has been a major step in improving the quality of the air in the immediate neighbourhood, it has uncovered odours and some particulate whose presence were heretofore overshadowed by cupola emissions. The effect of these residual emissions has been brought to the attention of Chrysler's, and our engineers are currently working with them to minimize these effects.

This was September, 1968.

I mailed a copy of the memorandum of The Department of Health to the news media, who kindly publicized the contents. After this publicity, Mr. Harry Horton of 1951 Dakota Drive in Windsor, telephoned me. The date was October 15. Mr. Horton and I discussed the problem and at that time I told him to give me some assurance that the people were really concerned.

On Thursday, October 17, Mr. Horton telephoned me once again as I was leaving my home. On my return home, I contacted him. This was 10.30 in the evening. Within ten minutes he was in my dining room with a Mrs. Minnie Arend, and from 10.40 to 11.30 we discussed the situation. I was presented with a petition signed by 193 people in the area. And I would like to read the petition, Mr. Speaker. It is not lengthy, but it will show the extent to which the residents in the area have been attempting to have the pollution solved, all to no avail. Addressed to me, dated October 15, 1968:

DEAR SIR:

Whereas we, the undersigned, feel that with the official endorsement of air pollution control as a part of modern living we are entitled to have the provisions of by-law 32 enforced at the Chrysler Canada Limited foundry. This bylaw became effective June 30, 1967, and although further extensions were granted at Chrysler Canada Limited, the emission from the foundry has increased instead of diminished and the illegal old style cupola continues to operate.

Now this is contrary to the report submitted by Mr. Martin, head of the approval section concerning air pollution at the Chrysler Limited plant. The City of Windsor Inspector, Mr. Costello, will not accept responsibility for the enforcement, suggesting that complaints be lodged with the provincial Department of Health Toronto—

Now notice, Mr. Speaker, the enforcement was a municipal responsibility, but the municipality says it is a provincial responsibility.

Correspondence with Mr. Drowley, chief air pollution control services in Toronto, resulted in a visit to Windsor by two of his representatives to listen to complaints. The outcome of this visit is a letter from his office stating briefly that the situation is under review.

This, after all these years of reviewing. We respectfully request that you use the authority of your office to insist that air pollution control bylaw 32 be enforced at once.

And that is the completion of the comments. The balance is 193 individuals seriously concerned with the elimination of the pollution caused by the Chrysler Windsor foundry.

I was astounded. Inside of less than 24 hours 193 people were sufficiently concerned to sign their names to a petition.

On the same day—that is Friday, October 18—I had discussed this matter with a Mr. G. S. Trivett of the air pollution control service. I had also visited the city hall and discussed with Mr. Winters, of the city solicitor's office, the responsibility of the city concerning the enforcement of the air pollution bylaw.

I visited with Mayor John Wheelton in his office and discussed the city's responsibility. I also dropped in to discuss the matter with Mr. Costello, who is responsible for the enforcement of air pollution; however, Mr. Costello was not in and I had to leave without being able to discuss it with him.

On Saturday, October 19—the following day—at 11 a.m., I met with Mr. Trivett, who is from the air pollution control service of The Department of Health, and we went to Mr. Horton's home where we further discussed the situation for about one and a half hours. It was here where I suggested a public meeting at the nearby King George junior vocational school for Friday, October 25, at 8 p.m. Present, were to be representatives from the city, the province, the company, myself and the residents. There were to be no press releases, no newspaper publicity. We were interested in breaking new ground by having a fact-finding discussion.

On Monday, October 21, I asked the Windsor Board of Education for the use of the cafetorium at the King George school. I contacted—and get this, Mr. Speaker—I contacted Mr. Derek Barlow, the building commissioner of the city of Windsor, so that he would be present. Chrysler's returned my call and I understood, in no uncertain terms, that they would be present.

On Tuesday, October 22, the use of the school was confirmed. Mr. Trivett called me back and said he would be present. I contacted Mr. Horton to tell him that everything was set for a Friday, October 25, meeting.

On Friday, October 25, something told me to contact Chrysler's. This I did at 3.30 p.m. and was told at that time that Chrysler's would not have a representative present. This is 3.30 p.m.; the meeting was scheduled for 8 o'clock.

Not one of all the parties involved received a letter, an engraved invitation, or anything like that, to be present. The invitations were verbal; a gentleman's way of doing things. I thought that I, as the elected member to the Legislature of Ontario from the Windsor-Walkerville area would act as a go-between to bring two parties together in an attempt to get dialogue between them.

This was to be an eyeball to eyeball communication. We were going to close the communications gap. We were looking to find out just what was what. The meeting did take place and 101 people by actual count were present. Of these 91 stayed for the full two hours of the meeting. It was informative, but it was all one-sided.

Questions were asked from the floor. It was brought out that the enforcing of the air pollution was the city of Windsor's responsibility up until the province set up offices in Windsor, some time in December. It was also pointed out that the Chrysler company is violating provincial regulations.

I regret very much that Chrysler did not see fit to take this opportunity to explain to the residents what they have done, what they are doing, what they plan on doing, how long it will take them to reach their goal, and even, if they wish, the financial cost of the programme. By refusing, Chrysler's has shown an arrogant, contemptuous, callous attitude toward their neighbours. Public relations wise they goofed.

This meeting was no witch hunt. It was an attempt to obtain facts and an answer for an extremely irritating problem. Chrysler's cannot hide behind the press comment that no Chrysler representative attended the meeting because the company officials said the invitation was received late Friday, on an informal basis. This statement is contrary to the facts, as on Monday, October 21, I was led to believe that a representative or representatives would be present.

Must I write to the head office of Chrysler's in Detroit? I hope Chrysler does not say, "We will close the plant if the residents keep complaining." I hope they do not resort to this type of blackmail. The day the plant becomes an economic liability to Chrysler's, it will be phased out.

I was going to read into the record the report and recommendations of the air pollution control service of The Ontario Department of Health, concerning the Chrysler Windsor foundry, but for the sake of brevity I will refrain from doing so.

Just out of curiosity's sake allow me, Mr. Speaker, to bring this to your attention.

A headline in the Windsor paper, October, 1968:

SALE PROFIT RECORDS BROKEN BY CHRYSLER

Chrysler reported net earnings of $178.5 million, equal to $3.83 per share of common stock, in the three quarters ending September 30. This compared with $93.4 million, or $2.03 per share, in the same span in 1967. These are combined figures for the Chrysler operations and include Canada's contribution, which was very substantial.

A second headline dated January 7, from the Windsor Star—that is January 7 of this year:

RECORD YEAR FOR CHRYSLER CANADA

Chrysler Canada has just concluded the best sales record in its history, Ron W. Todgham, president, announced this morning. A combined total of 235,724 cars and trucks were assembled by Chrysler Canada in 1968. An all time record and an increase of 16.2 per cent over the previous combined record of vehicles built a year ago.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Chrysler Corporation can put a few more of these dollars into an accelerated programme for the elimination of air pollution?

I know the foundry is now under orders from the Minister of Health to clean up this problem. I hope the Minister will keep pressing the Chrysler people, as I will him and his department.

Chrysler's have had since 1964 to solve the problem; that is now going on to six years. Does it really take that long? I do hope that the Chrysler Windsor foundry does become a good neighbour and does eliminate this health hazard and nuisance.

Anti-smoking ads on television use a slogan, "it is a matter of life and breath." Chrysler Windsor foundry, your neighbours are telling you, through me, it is a matter of life and breath with them also.

I invite the management of this plant, at a time of their choice, to meet with their neighbours and give them the whole story. I will call a meeting whenever I get the say so from Chrysler—or should I say, from you, Mr. Ron Todgham.

At the same time, I do hope that the Minister of Health, if he or someone in his department reads this comment, continues their inspection of the Ford Motor Company plant in Windsor, because substantial changes are being undertaken there. There will be a large increase in castings manufactured by the Ford Motor Company, and the air pollution problem, even today, is a vexing one. If they triple or quadruple their production, that problem may be aggravated three or four fold.

A headline on November 28, 1968, is most à propos of this whole discussion. It reads: "Fuses Lit, Pollution Timebomb, Blame Put on Society".

While I am discussing the pollution problem, may I ask the hon. Minister to keep a very very close eye on the city of Detroit's plan to put up an incinerator directly across from a residential section in the city of Windsor. It would leave the residents approximately one mile away from a pollution problem that could be extremely grave and serious. I hope the Minister has his representative at all of the meetings in Detroit and voices, and adds to the objections of the city of Windsor, the objections of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to turn to the topic of noise abatement, I make mention of this in my speech hoping that the hon. Ministers of Health, Transport (Mr. Haskett), and Labour (Mr. Bales), jointly or individually, have representatives attend the seminar on noise abatement to be held in Washington, D.C., this Friday. This seminar is sponsored by the National Council on Noise Abatement, a new forum for development in exchange of innovative approaches to noise control. Noise pollution is taking on an ever-increasing importance in today's environment and I think the province should have representation down there to see just in what ways we can eliminate the problem of noise pollution.

I would like at this time, Mr. Speaker, to turn to a topic concerning the restructuring of the Ontario Hospital Services Commission. The combining or annexing or taking over of health services into the one structure is nothing new. OMSIP and OHS should be integrated. Now by joining federal Medicare,

I think this could be more readily accomplished.

Joining federal Medicare we could save the taxpayers of Ontario about $170 million—that is the Ontario share of the cost of operation of Medicare. But also, joining Medicare, federal Medicare it would be, it would either enable Ontario to provide wider or broader health services or coverage, or it could lower premium payments. Or it could extend subsidies to a greater segment of our population. By having an all-inclusive health care service, only one premium payment would be required.

When that day does come, I hope the premium payments are on a monthly basis or at the most every two months, because in some instances they would be very substantial.

Knowing this government's attitude towards Medicare, I can't foresee them taking any action concerning integration. However, I would like to suggest that OMSIP and OHS be set up on a parallel basis. OMSIP pays the entire cost of services of those on low income, and gives graduated assistance to people with limited incomes.

Ontario Hospital Services should do the same. OMSIP has a three-tiered structure, has a separate fee: (1) For married couples; (2) for single people; and (3) for families. Ontario Hospital Services should do the same. It should rearrange the present single and family subscriptions and bring it into line with OMSIP.

Think of the many pensioners living on limited incomes who have to pay their own full Ontario Hospital Services premiums that could and would benefit from such a change. How can the Minister of Health reconcile his heartless attitude towards these pensioners? Have a heart!

My next topic, Mr. Speaker, concerns detention home facilities in the city of Windsor. For several years now I have asked for consideration of a juvenile detention home, in the Windsor area. Years ago it was the responsibility of the municipality to provide one.

But with the Ontario Water Resources Commission pressuring the municipality to stop dumping raw sewage into the Detroit river, and with the added financial burdens of annexation, the rising cost of education, and the limitation placed on capital works by the Ontario Municipal Board, it was just not possible for the city to undertake this added burden.

With its limited source of revenue compared with that of the province, it was only fitting and proper that the provincial government undertake the providing of a juvenile detention centre. I say to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Wishart)—through you, Mr. Speaker—look our way. Look west. Look towards Windsor and its needs.

Windsor is the largest centre in Ontario without a juvenile detention home. A juvenile home is not a costly venture. In fact, it is not an expense, it is an investment—an investment in the rehabilitation of many young people. An investment in their future, a protection for the child and the public.

Today, juveniles coming before the court for various reasons require temporary confinement, both for their own protection and that of the public. Such a short period of detention while their cases are before the court, enable them to calm down and to think of their problems objectively. When a juvenile offender is judged guilty, the court has but four avenues:

1. To let the child go with a warning.
2. To put the child on probation.
3. To commit the child to the care of a society.
4. To commit the child to a training school.

To be able to make the proper decision, the court must have information as to the child's home environment, his school, his social life and its personal structure. If the child could be detained until this information was recorded, it would protect the child as well as the public. Come on, I urge the Attorney General, invest a few dollars in the youth of Windsor.

And, Mr. Speaker, separate schools; the problem of separate schools must be resolved in the not-too-distant future and I predict it will be before the next provincial election.

If you were really to put into practice the Human Rights Code, and not discriminate because of creed, and if you really believe in the proposition of the equality of educational opportunity, how can you not consider the problems and needs of separate schools?

With the advent of a more liberal approach to education, with the advent of a non-graded school, with the rapid acceptance of promotion by subjects rather than by year, how do you say where Grade 10 stops and Grade 11 begins? You just cannot.

Britain, Alberta, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island recognize and support separate schools. In Alberta, separate schools supporters can direct their education property taxes to support their school system for grade one onward if they desire.

Mr. Speaker, section 93 of The British North America Act protects the rights of the separate schools or the Catholic schools. Either you support equality of education or opportunity from grade one onward, and that is up to and including Grade 13, or many Catholic high schools will cease to operate, and you will have to support the education of these pupils anyway. You save nothing.

In fact, the Catholic high schools today save the public school supporters millions of dollars that would have to be provided by public school supporters to house and educate the transferees from the Catholic school system.

Mr. Speaker, students of Catholic high schools have decided to present logical, neat arguments for their case rather to indulge in mass demonstrations. The students are to be commended for their restraint, but restraint can only last for a period of time, then frustration and reaction set in.

There are only a handful of universities in Ontario compared to Catholic high schools. If this limited number of universities can cause such public concern, just think of the concern the large numbers of Catholic high schools could cause.

They, however, are not interested in mass demonstrations. They are interested in logic, equality of educational opportunity. At a recent meeting held in my city, a 16-year-old—Donna Shannahan, of St. Mary's Academy—made the following comment, and I am quoting:

We are not out for more tax money. We just want the money our dads gave to be rerouted to the schools we go to.

How fitting a comment from a 16-year-old young lady.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk for a minute on drug prices. Some idea of how the public was gouged by price fixing, combines, restraint of trade, and so forth, was recently proved by the court case in New York when five large drug firms agreed to pay $120 million to settle civil suits against them.

Three of the five firms had been convicted on anti-trust charges, but all five were included in the civil suit. The fact that they were willing to pay out such a large amount of money rather than allow the case to go to trial is significant, as it proves these drugs firms' sense of guilt and shows how large their illegal operations were.

The larger Canadian firms are affiliated with those in the United States, and the extent of their imports from their parent companies must have been substantial enough to say that we in Canada, yes, we in Ontario, were taken for a ride, or should I say, given a pharmaceutical dose to tranquilize us so that we do not ask the hon. Minister of Health how such action in the United States has affected us.

The largest purchaser of drugs in Ontario, I would assume, would be The Ontario Department of Health. I just wonder how much of that action, that $120 million, really should be returned to Ontario residents.

If we compare our two countries, Canada and the United States, by population, and project this comparison into the $120 million, then ten per cent of that $120 million represents Canada's fair share. That is, $12 million, that Canadian subsidiaries or affiliates, should be returning to the people of Canada.

As Ontario represents one third of Canada, population wise, then $4 million is our rightful share of this settlement. I hope that the Minister of Health, or someone in his department, looks into the rightful claim of the people of Ontario, the rightful claim that they have against the price fixing policies of these drug firms and gets back for us our share of this $4 million.

Just to use one example of the rigging of prices and its astronomical costs in excessive price fixing, let me cite the case in point of tetracycline, produced for as little as 1.6 cents per capsule, and sold for 51 cents.

This is 33 times its cost price. Think of the many people especially senior citizens, who in many cases deprive themselves of food and nourishment because of their need for medication, being forced, yes, compelled, to pay up to 33 times the production value of medication, just so that they may be able to better enjoy the remaining days of their lives. The hon. Minister of Health, or the hon. Attorney General, or both hon. Ministers should get after these boys and get some part of our money back.

I would like to turn to the topic of rent subsidies, a topic that has been discussed in this House at times in the past. With the acute shortage of housing throughout the metropolitan areas in the province, yes, even in some smaller communities, the plight of the person with a large family, or the one on limited income, is more acute than ever.

Some are fortunate enough to get Ontario housing units, that is, some of the geared-to-income units. The Department of Trade and Development's analysis says that rent income should not go beyond 30 per cent, or, in rough figures, one-third of the total income of the family.

Social scientists say that not more than 25 per cent of one's income should be spent on housing.

Canadians pay out in rent proportionately more of their consumer expenditures than people in most countries of the world. Many, yes, far too many people pay more than 50 per cent of their total income solely for housing.

The minimum wage earner is one example. The under-employed is another. The part-time employee is a third. The limited income individual is a fourth. I would dare say that many other categories could be listed.

Those who are fortunate enough to get geared-to-income were really being subsidized. Those who were not fortunate enough, were being punished. If one fortunate group can be subsidized by living in Ontario Housing Corporation geared-to-income homes, then why should not those who are not so fortunate and who are paying a disproportionate amount of their already too meagre incomes, be likewise subsidized.

A limited income senior citizen or pensioner, for example, should not have to pay more than 25 per cent of his pension for housing. The balance of the tab should be picked up by The Department of Social and Family Services.

I am reading a headline dated May 1, 1966, from the Detroit Free Press, that even makes mention of rent subsidies for middle class people being predicted. I only ask this for the senior citizen, the limited income person, the pensioner.

Mr. Speaker, one of the last topics in my comments concerns housing. Now, I am reading a quote:

A major programme for providing low and moderate cost housing was forecast in Windsor Thursday night. The comprehensive programme will result from the recent establishment of the Ontario Housing Corporation which will break through the red tape that has strangled housing in the past.

Do you know who said that, Mr. Speaker? It was none other than the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) of Ontario, in Windsor on September 4, 1964. Four and a half years ago.

The problem of housing was going to be solved. Red tape was going to turn into red ribbon. Would the fact that this was just two or so weeks before a by-election have anything to do with the reason for making this statement.

To illustrate the acuteness of the situation, here is an ad, four years ago, Tuesday, May 4, 1965:

West side, near Assumption University, clean, three-bedroom brick, fireplace, basement, two-car garage, clean residential neighbourhood. $175 monthly, payable two months in advance, $500 deposit required.

Another headline reads: "House Shortage Dangerous". Another headline, "They Sit Close To The Telephone, Desperately Waiting". May 22, 1965, concerning a lady with six children attempting to get housing, sitting in the corner of a room close to the telephone just anxiously waiting for the telephone to ring.

Another headline, May 29, 1965, reads: "Lack of Housing, Number One Area Problem". The next says, "Serious Housing Shortage Windsor's Worse Problem", January 4, 1966.

Here is a letter sent to me March 17, 1966, by Mr. Wilfred Cazalais, 2665 Charles St.:

My wife and I are both on sick pensions. We are 64 years old and up to last June I was able to manage. I was paying $40 a month rent, but my rent is now $90 a month.

From $40 to $90 in one jump.

Here is another headline—I should not say headline but an advertisement in the "homes wanted" column of the Windsor Star Thursday, May 12, 1966:

Responsible party wants to rent 3-bedroom home. Will pay year's rent in advance.

An individual willing to pay rent for one year in advance. Surely all of these advertisements and headlines, Mr. Speaker, would indicate the acuteness of the problem. I could probably read 50 other advertisements and headlines pointing out the shortage of housing of all types in my city alone. This same situation exists in all urban areas the length and breadth of Ontario.

Speakers have given all kinds of answers to ease the shortage. In fact, there are about as many answers as there are people looking for housing. Some suggest the elimination of the five per cent sales tax; the 11 per cent federal tax; longer term low interest loans; incentives to fix old homes; urban renewal to be used to produce a gain, not a loss of homes; a uniform building code; the province to supply services and to open up vast tracts of land; to develop a surplus of serviced land; to utilize new building methods; use new materials in construction; pre-fabricate homes; modularize homes; develop many homes; mass produce disposable homes; use the German idea developed in West Germany just recently called pre-engineered homes.

All of the suggestions take time and are not an immediate answer. Even the recommendations of the Hellyer task force report on housing and urban development will take two to five years to achieve.

Instant change is needed to provide home ownership and the technique for this is not in the report. The need for rental housing projects and public housing has also been completely overlooked. We all agree that all persons should have access to some specified, minimum, desirable standard of accommodation, and that governments should facilitate the creation and maintenance of adequate housing stock.

The time is long past that governments use home building to create jobs linking housing with unemployment. Unfortunately today, Mr. Speaker, loans to build houses do little directly to provide accommodation for low-income families. For example, in 1957, borrowers in the lowest third of the family income scale accounted for one-ninth of the national housing loans for house ownership in large urban areas. Eight out of nine houses were for the middle class and the rich.

In the address to the city council at the beginning of this year, Mayor John Wheelton of Windsor made mention that:

No new construction of low-rental family housing has been begun during the course of 1968. As a result, there is a backlog of over 1,000 applications for such housing in my community—and almost every application represents a desperate housing situation from some hard-pressed family.

Only Friday I received four different phone calls from people requesting housing assistance, and one came from a mother with four young children.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to give you a complete answer to the catastrophe, but I would like to mention, as I have for several years, part of the answer—something that may ease some of the housing problems in a very short period of time. Why not consider portable houses? Not campers, not trailers, but mobile homes. These are fully equipped, fully furnished, ready-to-move-into portable homes. These are not eyesores—run-down, beat-up shacks on wheels—these are excellent prebuilt houses.

One sixth of the new homes built in the United States today are mobile or portable homes. Portable homes could become an answer to Canada's biggest problem—low-cost housing.

Experts say one of the answers to the housing shortage is to build houses in factories on efficient production lines instead of on the site. But, Mr. Speaker, this is being done today by the mobile home industry. In fact, Fleetwood Industries Incorporated, of Riverside, California, one of the largest of 200 or so mobile home builders in the United States, constructs a mobile home from start to finish in two days. California and Florida have been leaders in this field. In Michigan, a group in one local community is working secretly towards making it possible for mobile homes to be put on conventional housing sites instead of in parks. The plan is to let local contractors prepare the site and then to put the additions, like the porch and other gingerbread, on the outside of the mobile home to improve both the appearance and to help ease municipal officials' opposition to such houses.

Portable home manufacturers in the United States in 1967 produced 80 per cent of all of the single-family housing that sold for under $12,500. All over both the United States and Canada a greater awareness of the potential of this industry in assisting to lessen a vexing problem is being more and more evident. It is estimated that by 1973 well over 500,000 mobile homes will be manufactured annually in the United States.

Prince George, which not long ago was only a small community in B.C., some 500 miles north of Vancouver, and had a population of about 13,871, in 1966 had a population of 24,471; it has 3,000 mobile homes worth well over $50 million. The cost of these portable homes ranged from $6,000 upward, and this is with all of the furniture and appliances in place. The units come up to 12 feet wide and 50 to 60 feet long and in area contain about 80 per cent as much space as in many small tract homes. For example a 12 by 50-foot portable home has as much floor area as a 24 by 25-foot home, and a 12 by 60-foot portable has as much as a 24 by 30-foot home.

Average retail price works out to about $8 a square foot, roughly half of the cost of a conventional home. One of the biggest drawbacks to the more rapid development of mobile home living in Canada and in Ontario specifically is community resistance to zoning choice property and, in some instances, just property for mobile park use. Another is the outward appearance of the homes, too often referred to as sheet-metal-sided, oversized shoe boxes.

Another is that only transients, wanderers, drifters, second-class citizens live in such accommodations. Another is that mobile-home occupiers do not pay their fair share of the educational cost burden. However, Mr. Speaker, recent studies have shown that mobile-home parks, because of the greater density of homes, have residents with fewer children and tend to produce more revenue for a community and use less of its educational and other services than a comparable sized conventional housing tract.

All the world is a stage—yes, three stages. The newly married cannot afford regular housing; their accommodation needs are minimal. The family man needs to have his roots firmly established and thus needs conventional housing. The retirees' accommodation needs, once again, are minimal. Portable housing could be an assist in the first and third stages of living. Not everyone wants to live, or can afford to live, in a rug-carpeted concrete box. Not everyone wants to live, or can afford to live, in suburbia. Not everyone wants to live, or can afford to live, in conventional housing. Portable or mobile housing can be a partial answer to that person's problem.

Mobile or portable accommodations are now used in the construction industry as engineering offices; banking institutions make use of them. In my own community, St. Clair College has two mobile units, one that acts as a guidance centre—good enough for The Department of Education, but not good enough for the Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall) to look into.

The Department of Tourism and Information used a mobile unit for over three years in the city of Windsor. Practically all government departments have at one time or another used them. Mobile home sites are not gypsy parks. They are not itinerant farm worker areas; they are not crowded, run-down places for the disadvantaged. The chairman of the board of the Bank of America, North America's biggest bank, a man by the name of Mr. Louis Lundborg, lives in one with his family. Mr. Al Hoyt, the vice-president of the Bank of America, lives with his wife in a mobile home—not only on weekends but all the time. The middleclass to wealthy now seeking a second home or an alternative to apartment living are turning to mobile homes. Many of us here are looking forward to the day when we may be able to hitch a mobile home to a car and travel for months on end.

Mr. Speaker, I do not suggest that mobile housing is the only answer to our present housing crisis, but it sure can go a long way toward reducing the crisis.

This method of housing relief would have many advantages:

One, it would enable small municipalities, especially in slow-growth areas, to attract and hold industry.

Two, it would enable municipalities to plan in a more leisurely and economic fashion instead of being stampeded into housing development.

Three, it would assure housing to persons moving from one area to another.

Four, it would be one way that a housing surplus could be provided in a community, thus easing the disastrous rent spiral.

Five, it would force owners of substandard housing to bring that housing up to an acceptable level, especially if there were large numbers of mobile homes in that community.

Six, it could be used as housing for farm labour.

Seven, when the housing crises in any municipality were overcome, these units could be transported to another problem area.

Eight, when these mobile homes have served their purpose or their master, they could be sold as summer cottages.

There are many other advantages that could be mentioned in making a case for portable housing. And I say that the hon. Minister of Trade and Development has been negligent in the responsibilities of his office by not having thoroughly looked into the place that mobile or portable housing has to play in this most serious problem Ontario has been confronted with since the days of the depression.

Mr. Speaker, it is over three years now since I first brought this to the Minister's attention. I hope when he presents his estimates, he has an answer for me. Mr. Speaker, the last topic that I would like to discuss is the one—

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Would the hon. member permit me to tell him what has been happening on mobile homes?

Mr. B. Newman: Yes, I would be glad to hear.

Hon. Mr. Randall: We have been discussing with Central Mortgage and Housing for the last two years. The difficulty is getting anybody to give a mortgage on mobile homes, including a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation guarantee.

However, one of the discussions we had last Saturday was on how soon it could be brought about. But it has not been for any lack of pushing on our part. We have also had The Municipal Act changed here in order to accommodate mobile homes.

Mr. B. Newman: Well, may I ask the Minister then, has he gone into the United States to see how they have solved their problem?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Sure!

Mr. B. Newman: They did not have any problem whatsoever. Banks were more than willing to come along and provide them with the funds to enable them to get into the mobile homes financing.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, I say we have already had them up here, including the Bank of America, the people the member talked about. They came up here, made a presentation and we passed that on to Ottawa.

Mr. B. Newman: Well, I am glad to hear that the Minister has at least started. But, Mr. Speaker, three years for that answer—it has been way, way too long. He should have had that answer for us three years ago. In the United States they can build about 300,000 a year. Here it is one-tenth of that, 30,000. We could have accommodated 100,000 or built 100,000 mobile homes in that period of time. You see, Mr. Speaker, we still do not have homes.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Talk to Ottawa, come on now, talk to Ottawa.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. B. Newman: If we do not have homes there is no one else to blame in this House but the Minister.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): After three years he has a conversation.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Randall: The member should call his friends in Ottawa!

Mr. B. Newman: Well, it is a good thing the Minister has someone there to talk to.

Mr. Speaker, I was going to talk on probably the greatest fraud ever perpetrated on the people of Ontario. In fact it was Machiavellian. This was the property tax rebate. When the Prime Minister was talking on television the other day, he did not have Medicare in mind. Back in his mind was the property tax rebate and that is what he was really referring to.

Mr. Speaker, because of the time, I am going to curtail my remarks and bring one example—I would like to complete this by 5 o'clock—just one case to the attention of the House. A piece of property in my riding just changed hands during the latter part of last year.

Immediately the 10 tenants in the building had their rents raised an average of $40 a month, in some cases a 70 per cent increase. The complex in 1969 now collects $5,000 more rental annually than it did in 1968, yet the tax rebate by the landlord was only approximately $500. And the alibi used? They have to give this rebate back to the individual living in the accommodation.

One of these tenants occupies 280 square feet in what is called a one-room apartment. He has his rent raised to $85 for what he had formerly paid $50. That is a 70 per cent increase in rental. He now pays 35 cents a square foot a month.

This would be the equivalent of a person living in a 40 by 25-foot home, paying $350 a month for accommodations. And the alibi that the individual that owns the home always gives is: "Well, I have to give you this property tax rebate so I have to collect from you." He will give you a tax rebate of $5 and he will increase your rent by $10 to $25 a month.

Mr. Speaker, the nightmares caused by this programme and the bureaucratic set-up and the added cost of operation makes this a Machiavellian scheme and also makes this one of the greatest frauds perpetrated on the people of Ontario.

The idea of assisting the municipalities and the property taxpayer in lowering his taxes is a good one, but there should be a simpler and better way. Could not an unconditional grant on a per capita basis have been implemented—one that would require the municipality to decrease its taxes by a given amount? The programme, as it is today, does not levy any restraint on municipal councils.

Mr. Speaker, I have occupied more time than I had intended to. I wish to thank the members of the House who were present even though they may not have paid attention to what I had to say.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

NOTICE OF MOTION

Clerk of the House: Notice of motion No. 22 by Mr. Gaunt.

RESOLUTION: That the Ontario government immediately include chiropractors and other paramedical groups under OMSIP.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) Resolution No. 22 standing in my name, which has just been read.

Mr. Speaker, this is another one of the subjects which is dealt with year after year by the House because the government fails to recognize an obvious need. Mind you some progress has been made insofar as the optometrists are concerned, because eye refractions are now covered under OMSIP as of last year.

I was interested, when I asked the Minister today about the costs of this particular programme for the first six months, he indicated to me that the costs involved were some $490,000. That is for the six-month period from July 1, 1968, until December 31, 1968.

However, in my opinion there are still a few gaps in the OMSIP programme and I wish to take up a few moments of the House, this afternoon to set out in some detail the purport of my particular resolution.

It is my feeling that a number of paramedical groups should be covered under OMSIP in some way to provide basic coverage for those who seek to, or need to, use their services. Those that come to mind immediately are chiropractors and dentists, with provision to cover drugs as well. To do otherwise is to discriminate.

Let us take a look at some of the other health schemes in other Canadian provinces in relation to paramedical coverage.

For instance, as we work from west to east, we find chiropractic coverage offered in the B.C. basic plan; chiropractic included under the Alberta health plan as an option; Saskatchewan has approved chiropractic for inclusion under its Medicare programme; and Manitoba has included chiropractic in the basic plan beginning July 1 of this year.

Then to Ontario, the so-called leader in almost everything. What do we find? Ontario has nothing in regard to chiropractic coverage. The excuse is that these things cost money and money is hard to come by these days.

Let me recite to the House some figures that were produced by an actuary in relation to the Alberta health plan for the first six months of operation—July 1, 1967 to December 31, 1967. The figures relate directly to the section called option C—chiropractic and natureopathy.

Premiums received under option C were $368,000, based on the following rates: single, $12 per year; family of two, $24 per year; and family of three or more, $36 per year.

Claims paid under option C were $213,000, thus leaving a surplus, or credit balance, of $155,000.

In other words, the profit to the Alberta health plan on option C for its first six months was approximately one-third of the total premiums received.

We must bear in mind two or three things in relation to the coverage provided under the Alberta health plan.

This plan, much like OMSIP, was set up to benefit particularly those in the lower income range. Insurance experience has proven that, the lower the income level, the poorer the health of the people in that income range. Consequently, there would be greater usage when the plan is confined more to the lower income brackets than would be the case if it were spread over the entire economic range of the province.

Insurance experience also has proven that usage is apt to be higher at the outset on an option service and that is why I asked the Minister today to indicate to the House whether the optometric service was heaviest in the first few months of operation. He indicated to me that there was a steady increase right up until November of last year and that it has fallen off since that time. So this would seem to bear out what I am saying.

In other words, people tend to sign up for an option—in this case option C—who normally utilize the services of chiropractors—they then rush to take advantage of the new coverage they have obtained.

Therefore, one would assume that the first six to twelve months would show a greater overall usage of the benefits under a specific option, such as option C, than would be the case when viewed over a three, five, or ten-year period.

It is an established fact, although it is disputed from time to time by the medical profession, that a patient normally only goes to one practitioner at one time. In other words, one might consider that the majority of the $213,000 spent on chiropractic care during the six-month period is a transfer of costs from the total cost of health services during this same period.

To put it another way, the cost of medical services during this six-month period could be considered to have been lowered by most of this $213,000. Therefore, not only did option C show a profit of $155,000, but it also was responsible for a reduction in total claims which would have otherwise been paid out for medical services.

Let us, as a matter of interest, relate the Alberta plan and the figures I have just cited to the situation in Ontario.

In the Alberta plan, chiropractic services are provided on the basis of a charge not exceeding $4 per visit and an amount not exceeding $10 for X-rays for a particular disability. Naturopathic services are also provided on the basis of a charge not exceeding $4 per visit. The combined services under option C of the plan are subject to a maximum of $100 per plan year for all persons covered under the contract.

The cost to OMSIP, according to actuarial figures, to include this same level of coverage would be $1.11 per month per policy holder. A policy holder is defined as a family or, based on the Alberta figures, 2.8 persons. This $1.11 figure would likely be somewhat lower should the total policy holder enrollment currently in OMSIP take advantage of this option. Current OMSIP premiums are $16.39 per family per month. Therefore, by adding $1.11, it means 3 to 4 per cent on the cost of health services provided by OMSIP.

In the case of the Alberta option C benefits, it is purely and simply a case of a fund being established by approximately 40,000 people to cover chiropractic and naturopathic services, with a consequent surplus being shown.

Taking Ontario policy holders at 800,000, which was the figure a few months ago, multiplying this by twelve months and by $1.11, we arrive at a figure of $10,656,000. My guess is that this amount would more than cover the claims against OMSIP for chiropractic services and would, according to Alberta's experience, mean that the plan would remain in a surplus position for that service. To put it differently, the addition of chiropractic service would not cost the government any money because the additional cost would be more than made up through increased premiums.

The chiropractic profession—I am sure this holds true for other groups as well—has come a long way in improving their services to their patients the past number of years.

I also point out to the House—and I think this has been mentioned time and time again—that the chiropractors have received no government money for their new college, nor did they for their old one, but have carried on to the extent of providing a real service to the public in the health service field.

The validity of chiropractic has been reinforced by the medical profession, which is now seeking to adopt some of the practices of chiropractic, but are doing so without the benefit of the four-year course at the chiropractic college. This is the required course for anyone wishing to become a chiropractor.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I urge the government to accept this resolution. I suggest we have talked about it long enough. People are waiting for action.

An hon. member: Put the question.

Mr. A. Carruthers (Durham): Mr. Speaker, the proposal as outlined—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please! The hon. member for Peterborough is next on my list.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I want to state immediately that, not only as a private member, but as a member of the New Democratic Party, I support this resolution placed once again by the member for Huron-Bruce. I have taken the trouble to read the debate that has gone on in this House, over the past four years I guess it is now, and during which this member has presented this particular resolution.

I have been impressed by the weight of evidence which he has placed on the record, the weight of evidence which refers to Royal commissions which have taken place, not only in this country but in other countries—in Australia, for example—the evidence which was placed before the workmen's compensation board. And, of course, today, the evidence which he has placed before us in relation to the Medicare programmes already in operation in other provinces. I think he should be congratulated. I am certain he receives the full support of this group.

I do not wish, at this time, to add any statistical evidence. Rather I wish to deal with this in a very simple—some may perhaps say simplistic—but, I hope, a very candid way, in dealing with what I would suggest are the two arguments which have been used against the inclusion of chiropractic and other paramedical services as part of the OMSIP arrangements in this province.

I think that all the arguments boil down to these two arguments. The first argument is that there are healing arts, and there are pseudo-healing arts. It is suggested that chiropractors—and, in the past, optometrists, and certainly many of the other groups that have been mentioned during this debate—are just not quite up to being the fully accepted healing arts level which should be subsidized, or supported, by the OMSIP arrangements of this province.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a spurious argument. The chiropractors and many of these paramedical groups have raised their academic requirements. They have raised the standards of the kind of training which has been given. They have, however, been restricted—and seriously restricted—from improving themselves by the lack of coverage which has been afforded to them, particularly in this province.

I would suggest to you, sir, that the acceptance by this government of these paramedical groups as part of a total health services pyramid would enable these groups to provide the kind of services, which are desperately needed among many of the people in this province.

I suggest to you, sir, that at this time, when we are considering the various professions in this province—indeed when we are bringing bills before this Legislature to deal effectively with these professions—we should consider each of the groups as in the paramedical and medical field and bring them all up to the necessary standard to protect the public, as the McRuer report suggested. I think it is totally unacceptable to argue that these are not respectable groups providing services in this province. If this is so, then the government has another responsibility—and that is to protect the public against them.

They either have to accept them as providing a health service; or they have a responsibility to protect the people against these services.

I suggest to you, sir, that is a totally unacceptable alternative, even to this government. We know these people are providing services. We know they are alleviating sufferings. And we know as well that there are some who are under the umbrella, of certain paramedical groups, which are possibly doing some disservice to the province. It is the responsibility of this province to deal effectively with these professions. It can only be done effectively when they are brought within the total umbrella of the health services in this province.

The second argument, sir, is I think the argument of gradualism. It is an argument which states we only have a certain amount of money to spend. We can only provide a certain amount of health services. We will begin by providing what are really "respectable" medical services and then over a period of years—perhaps five, perhaps 10, perhaps 50 years—we will bring other groups gradually under the plan.

Well I suggest to you, sir, that this is an entirely spurious argument.

I would suggest that if this session is dealing with anything, it is dealing with the all-important question of taxation. Now, there are some areas where costs rise automatically. We cannot stop the rise of cost. But I think that the taxes which the people of Ontario resent most are taxes which seem to go to a misallocation of services. Where services are being used ineffectively, inefficiently and in an extremely costly manner, it is obvious that realignment of services is necessary.

Now I think health services are a perfect example of this situation. I think that here we have a situation where the financing of health services forces people to go to highly-trained, specialized services people who are performing, in many cases, lower echelon services.

We force them to go to costly facilities in hospitals, and—as has already been stated by members of the government's side—they force people to go into hospitals at very high cost when they could easily have been looked after at much less cost and in much less-costly facilities. If we only had the wit to provide these facilities. In other words, what we are doing is charging the people of Ontario more for services simply because we have not got the wit to provide a whole pyramid of services with various levels into which these people could fit.

I know the Minister is going to say: "Well, no one is going to place a person who only needs very minimal care in a hospital." But it is the doctor's responsibility to place that person in. It is the doctor's responsibility to take that person out. But I suggest to you, that doctors are people. They realize that in many cases the person who is in the hospital at a cost of $60 or $70 a day has nowhere else to go. If he is not in that hospital, there is no way in which the province can support that individual.

I suggest that it is the same for a chiropractor, the same for all the other para-medical groups. People do not go to people who can provide less costly, lower-echelon services because they are forced to seek the services which are possibly higher priced. That is the only way they can get any support from the government of Ontario.

I suggest that this is a criminal misuse of human resources, a criminal misuse of facilities. It is the people of Ontario who are paying the taxes who are suffering—and they realize they are suffering. There are people across this province who are receiving services for which they would be very happy to pay less, but they cannot get those services unless they pay for it directly.

When this province recognizes that this is now the 20th century, that every profession, including the medical profession, including the teaching profession, is itself a pyramid rather than a single line, or rather a double line—one which is respectable and one below which is not respectable and therefore not acceptable by the government for some form of subsidization—the better off we will all be. And we will be able to make better use of our taxes, rather than continually trying to secure more taxes.

But this is not unexpected, Mr. Speaker. We saw, at the constitutional conference, the exhibition when the Prime Minister tried to use health services as a kind of a lever to get money from the federal government in place of health services. He really suggested that the people of Ontario do not want any kind of full Medicare programme. They want the OMSIP, OHS chaos we have at the present time, the Prime Minister stated.

Health services somehow are still a part of a market place. We see it as some kind of a privilege. Not a right on the part of the people of Ontario, but a privilege which is being doled out, bit by bit to the people of Ontario over the years, possibly until the next election, when a few more para-medical groups will be brought in bit by bit.

And he sees, apparently, the whole health field as fragmented rather than a team, a unit. Well Mr. Speaker this, I think, is a totally inadequate and unacceptable way to provide service for the people of this province. Not only are the people not receiving services and being deprived of services, they are being over-charged for services. Their tax money is being misallocated. In short, I do not think anyone who could look at the entire health service field in Ontario can be very proud of the way in which this province has handled its people.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Durham.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): Now for some soft soap!

Mr. Carruthers: The proposal, as outlined in the resolution presented by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, to extend benefits provided under the Ontario Medical Service Insurance Plan, is indeed worthy of consideration. I am sure the matter has been, and continues to be under review by the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) and his departmental officials.

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, the fact that the services referred to in resolution No. 22 are not at present included as benefits under OMSIP. This is not to be construed as discrimination. OMSIP is in itself an additional step forward in the provision of health services insurance for the people of this province and the plan is continually being expanded to include extended services.

At the present time OMSIP provides:

1. Physicians' services at the doctor's office, home or hospital and includes the services of specialists.

2. Certain dental services where surgery is involved and as detailed in the regulations.

3. Refractions, either by physicians or optometrists, are covered under the plan.

4. Ambulance services have recently been included.

Mr. Sargent: Same speech as he gave last year.

Mr. Carruthers: No, it is not; it is entirely different.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Yes, it is different. I read it; it is weaker.

An hon. member: He did not write it.

Mr. Carruthers: No, I did write it myself this time, friend.

It should be pointed out that the federal Medicare programme does not include any of the services referred to in the resolution. The basic federal Medicare standard simply requires that a plan approved for federal financial assistance will provide all physicians' services.

The extension of services under OMSIP is a favourable move, Mr. Speaker, that meets general approval. I want it to be known that, although I support the resolution of the hon. member, I do so with certain reservations. First, the extensions should be based on a priority of need, availability of service and funds available. And, second, the word "immediately" should be changed to read "at the earliest practical time".

Mr. Trotter: The fullness of time.

Mr. Carruthers: After all, the government has to assume the responsibility.

In establishing priorities, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the inclusion of chiropractic services be given primary consideration, and I do so for a number of reasons.

1. Chiropractic services in general replace those provided by a physician, which at present are covered under OMSIP. The inclusion of chiropractic services in many instances would not involve new costs, but would simply be the transfer of costs from one service to another.

2. The general public is making increasing use of chiropractic services, and in many instances there is now full co-operation between physicians and chiropractors in the treatment of patients. These services should, therefore, be placed on a basis of greater equality, and in many respects are equally entitled to coverage.

3. Although chiropractic services are not included in the basic programme provided by the Alberta government, it is one of the optional benefits. As an insuring body, the Alberta Department of Health is prepared to cover these services, and it is reasonable to conclude that actually the services are part of the Alberta plan.

4. Chiropractic services are included as a benefit under the British Columbia basic programme and, although there are certain exclusions and limitations, the cost has proven to be reasonable. And the service provides an excellent model for a similar programme in Ontario.

5. It does seem rather unreasonable that the major benefits under the OMSIP programme should be limited to the services provided by physicians. An examination of the broad spectrum of paramedical services reveals the extensive use of other groups within the field. Chiropractic services in particular, because of their extensive use and their importance, should have priority.

6. What might be termed the first medical insurance provided by this government, namely workmen's compensation, does include chiropractic services in its programme. It seems logical, therefore, that in setting priorities the services of chiropractors should merit priority in extending the OMSIP programme.

The British Columbia plan shows a cost factor of 3.3 per cent for chiropractic care over a 12-month period. According to the figures made available to me through the Ontario Chiropractic Association, the total dollars paid out in British Columbia for chiropractic care over a 12-month period amount to $388,000. British Columbia shows a total policy-holder figure of $486,000. On an average, if these figures are correct, the cost per policy holder to the plan in British Columbia is 80 cents per year.

Applying these figures to OMSIP, which has some 800,000 policy holders, the projected cost would be 800,000 x 80 cents or $640,000 for a 12-month period—a fairly reasonable figure when one considers the total budget of this province.

It should be pointed out, however, that the British Columbia plan is limited in that it provides for a payment of $100 per family per year or $50 per individual per year at $5 per visit, and no additional fee can be charged the patient.

Even with these limitations, however, the fact remains that British Columbia has recognized the need for and the importance of including chiropractic services in a medical care programme.

In light of these facts, Mr. Speaker, I urge this government to give every consideration to include paramedical groups within OMSIP and that top priority be given to chiropractors, who should be included in the OMSIP programme at the earliest date.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parkdale.

Mr. Trotter: Mr. Speaker, I want to join in with the other members of this House who support the resolution. The unfortunate part about this is that so often, on so many occasions in so many years, this resolution has been supported by almost everyone who has ever spoken about it. But, as is so typical of the House that is dominated by a Conservative government, nothing has been done about it.

One of the major things that is wrong with our neglect of the paramedical fields is the fact that we are denying the public of Ontario freedom of choice, I know of many a Tory who likes to stand up and talk about free enterprise and the importance of freedom of choice. Slightly under two million people in the province of Ontario use chiropractic treatment. Yet they are simply cut out by this government, which has shown no interest whatsoever. I think it is about time the government had its political vertebrae straightened and got around to treating the chiropractors as they should be treated, and that is as a very responsible profession in the province of Ontario.

One of the main reasons why the chiropractors have been kept out of the OMSIP scheme and have been kept out of the purview of the present Conservative government is simply because the college of physicians and surgeons is one of the most powerful lobbies, not only in the province of Ontario, but in the entire country. In 1950, when Mr. Justice Roach was presiding over a Royal commission investigating workmen's compensation, the college of physicians and surgeons said that the chiropractors should not be allowed to treat men who came under The Workmen's Compensation Act. Despite that Mr. Justice Roach, in his report, was most complimentary to the chiropractic profession and since that time, since 1950, literally millions of dollars have been spent and paid to the chiropractic profession to help men who have been suffering mainly from injuries to their backs.

The truth of it is that such treatments are less expensive than if they are treated by a doctor. But I use this as an example that one of our major provincial agencies, the workmen's compensation board, has been using the services of the chiropractic profession.

Well, then, why is it that slightly under two million people are denied services from this group? It seems to me unfair and it is certainly denying a freedom of choice.

Now, I have no particular axe to grind for the chiropractors. I may have been to one on one or two occasions in my life. Mainly I go to a medical doctor, and my own opinion of the medical profession in the province of Ontario as doctors is that they are probably the finest group of doctors anywhere in the world. There is no question in my mind that they are highly trained and they are good men. But when it comes to medical economics—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): They are the richest.

Mr. Trotter: When it comes to medical economics they are pre-Victorian. For us, in this House, to stand in the way of the well-being of many hundreds of thousands of people is utterly and completely wrong. The responsibility of this is with the government and, Mr. Speaker, more particularly with the Minister of Health. Why he seems to want to protect the medical profession in the economic-political area is more than I can understand. I know on one occasion, when the medical profession raised their fees without giving the government any warning, they led our Minister of Health up the garden path. And I tell you that today they are leading all of us, including all the people in the province of Ontario, up the garden path and they are certainly not treating us in the way that we could be treated.

So I emphasize again and again, Mr. Speaker, that the medical profession is simply a lobby that is far too strong.

Now the medical profession, Mr. Speaker, tell us that they are overworked, that there are too few doctors to go around, that it is very hard to reach a doctor on the telephone. It is impossible almost to get a doctor to call at the home.

Why in the world they do not use the other services that are available, that where a chiropractor or an osteopath can be of service to a patient and especially when the patient wants his services, why should these various groups not be included in any particular scheme?

The chiropractors and the osteopaths, they are recognized by statutes of this Legislature as a profession that is considered qualified to practice and I say that they should not be discriminated against. If we recognize them as a proper paramedical group in the province of Ontario then, they should be treated fairly and they are simply not being treated fairly.

Now I know there are other groups, other than the chiropractors and the osteopaths, but certainly these are the major paramedical groups in the province—particularly the chiropractors. Bear in mind that other provinces like Saskatchewan and British Columbia and Alberta have recognized their services in their schemes, and certainly the major insurance companies have recognized their services, and for one very particular reason—it simply does not cost as much and they can do the work just as well.

As the hon. member for Huron Bruce has pointed out that despite the fact that over the years the medical profession have said that chiropractors are all wrong, now the doctors themselves are trying to learn some of the treatments that are given by the chiropractors.

So I emphasize that where the services of a chiropractor are required and it is the proper way and the patient wants those services, then their services should be used.

Mr. Speaker, there is just one further item that I would like to emphasize and this is the importance of dental health.

The argument is often put forward that if dentists were included under OMSIP there simply would not be enough dentists in order to give the services that would be required. There is this one suggestion, however, that I would like to make. Even if the government, under OMSIP, in supplying the paramedical services, said that all children 12 and under were included at least it would be a beginning because you can give the children in their younger years good dental health throughout their life.

I would like to underline the importance of this, Mr. Speaker, because the proper dental care and the prevention of the dental decay starts in treating the young. I would hope that this government, at some future date, and believe me it is almost a dream and it is a long future date, at the speed that this government moves, but it is an idea that I put forward that I would hope that this government would certainly include dental services beginning with the children and, of course, eventually expanding that programme to cover the whole population here in the province of Ontario.

So with the other members who spoke, Mr. Speaker, I join in the forlorn hope that something will be done in the immediate future but I am quite certain of this, that these changes will come in the not too distant future, in 1971, when we have a Liberal government to do things over there.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough West.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, piling forlorn hope upon forlorn hope, as it were, I want to express a dreary weariness with this repetitious ritual we go through year after year on a number of resolutions that come before the House. The refusal of the government to allow them to come to a vote is perhaps the most reprehensible feature of it because, of course, if the government permitted a vote on an issue of this kind, then the resolution would pass and willy-nilly the coverage of chiropractic care would be included in OMSIP as obviously it should be.

A number of speakers in this House have mentioned earlier in the session the feeling of irrelevance that some of them hold during the Parliamentary debates. No more, Mr. Speaker, than at this point in time is a member's irrelevance brought home to him rather poignantly in debating a resolution over which he has no control, entirely dictated by autocratic and immovable government policy.

I, as one member, register my resentment about the nature of the democratic process which humbles private members of the Legislature in this fashion. There is no particular reason for it and if anyone takes exception to it on the government side of the House, Mr. Speaker, then simply let them put it to a vote and let us see what the gist of the House is, a pretty simple way of drawing one's conclusions.

I would like to congratulate, as with others, the member for Huron-Bruce for his relentless tenacity in bringing the resolution forward year after year. One day when it is fulfilled he will take some pride in its authorship along with the once not so bemoaned confidante of Mike Walton and others, he can share in the pleasure. When—if the member for Huron-Bruce will permit me—when his back is thrown out of joint by the NDP juggernaut in 1971, there will be many in the province who will rise to his defence not least the entire chiropractic profession and he may—

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Like to hear the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Shulman) on the subject of chiropractors. Where is he this afternoon?

Mr. Lewis: The member for High Park is not present at the moment, and the member for Huron-Bruce will doubtless be immortalized in the hall of fame.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it has been demonstrated on this occasion and on previous occasions that the cost factor related to the inclusion of chiropractors is no longer a matter of anxiety or concern, that it is in fact a plus factor in the distribution of medical costs, not a negative one.

The numbers of people that would benefit has equally been demonstrated. There is an obvious social need. It is therefore very difficult even in the presence of the chief conspirator, who has just departed, to understand why it is—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): That is unparliamentary!

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Pretty true, though.

Mr. Lewis: Nothing unparliamentary compared to what I would like to say.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Oh?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, one has to ask one's self why it is that so obvious a social need, so urgent a social issue, is not acted upon speedily in this Legislature. I want to give you what I believe to be a fairly simple answer. All these other things having been dealt with, it is an answer which echoes other observations in this House, and I think it has to be made and made firmly, and it is a compelling and uncomplicated fact.

There is, Mr. Speaker, a medical conspiracy in the province of Ontario directed against the auxiliary medical professions, and there has been for a considerable number of years. There is an absolute refusal on the part of the medical profession to concede the viability and the legitimacy of these auxiliary healing arts. The medical profession retreats, in its own antediluvian fashion, into a kind of savage defence of what once was, deeming every other auxiliary group a sorcerer's apprentice and in the process dismembering the practice of medicine in the province; dismembering the healing arts, and throwing into disarray, not to say serious discrimination, the spectrum of medical services in the province of Ontario.

One only needs to look in the case of the chiropractor, at the evidence which is everywhere around us.

In this very Legislature where chiropractors are concerned, they are governed, not by a Chiropractic Act as in the majority of provinces in this country, but by a Drugless Practitioners Act, which immediately impugns their integrity as a healing art, which it is obviously the intention of government to do.

The college of physicians and surgeons falls over itself to construct absurd and sophistic arguments about why chiropractors should not be included, and rejects—although on the record there is no greater study—rejects the Lacroix commission in Quebec, which looked at every conceivable jurisdiction and came to the conclusion that chiropractic was a legitimate medical practice worthy of inclusion in a medical scheme.

As a matter of fact, quoting from the brief of the college of physicians and surgeons to the committee on the healing arts, they themselves describe the Lacroix commission and its intent. I would like to read it into the record, Mr. Speaker, because it could not be more aptly described:

Mr. Justice Lacroix delved thoroughly into the origin and philosophy of chiropractic, its present educational establishments in Canada and the United States, the curriculum of these schools and the educational background of their teachers.

He explored, with the assistance of competent biochemists, physiologists, and urologists, the validity of the theory of chiropractic; the deficiencies in the training of chiropractors; and the role of manipulative therapy in the treatment of human ailments. The study ranged, not only to all parts of this continent where information could be obtained, but included visits to several European centres where manipulative therapy is practised.

Having made that statement about a report which supports the resolution put before us today, the college of physicians and surgeons then gave forth with a paragraph which I challenge anyone in this House to interpret. Since we are now speaking of professional groups, perhaps there is a legal member of the House who would explain to me the meaning of the following paragraph that came from the college of physicians and surgeons to explain their point of view.

It is submitted, with respect, that we cannot support all of the conclusions the learned justice has drawn from these facts, but the facts themselves, assembled by scientific teachers and commissioners of integrity, are beyond question and we support the validity of their conclusions.

Now, physicians, sir, have a certain casuistry of their own. It exceeds that of the mediocre minds of legislators.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): It would make the lawyers blush.

Mr. Lewis: It should indeed make the lawyers blush. They might give up their professional mystique—let me read it just once again, because it is a magnificent exposé of the medical mind when dealing with chiropractic:

It is submitted, with respect, that we cannot support all of the conclusions the learned justice has drawn from these facts, but the facts themselves, assembled by scientific teachers and commissioners of integrity, are beyond question and we support the validity of their conclusions.

There is, one must admit, a certain Alice in Wonderland quality about the college of physicians and surgeons, not to mention the savage discrimination to which I alluded earlier.

Mr. Speaker, to draw this together, one should not forget that one of the doctors in this House, who now occupies the position of Minister of Health—and I make that point without any hesitation—one of the doctors in this House, was pressed about chiropractics three or four years ago. I guess it is longer than that now, it was March of 1963, when the issue became a sort of cause célèbre during the Health estimates. When pressed on it by the House, he said that though he had no opposition to these various professions, he would not give them bursaries, and quoting from Hansard, March 4, 1963, page 1312:

the optometrists, pediatricists, hypnotists, and a whole host of other people who are practising on the fringes, or at least are impinging upon, the practice of medicine.

Now, if the House wants to understand the resistance on the part of government, then let them understand that the Minister of Health lumps chiropractors with hypnotists in the healing arts. In that way he confirms the view of the entire medical profession, or a great many within the medical profession. Indeed, he goes on to confirm it at some considerable length later on during the estimates debate.

But it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we again pay the price of the Minister of Health and of the medical profession. We again pay the price for the fact that the medical profession is run as a cabal, whether it consists in the exclusion of foreign doctors from practice in this province, or whether it consists in the exclusion of chiropractors from OMSIP. It is a simple policy of exclusion and it motivates their every object.

As a final aside, Mr. Speaker, if the member for Huron-Bruce will permit me; I trust he will not mind my saying to him that there are certain pleasures in being to speak in dual directions simultaneously.

While he applauds the inclusion of chiropractors in OMSIP, the hon. Minister of Health in Ottawa has, as recently as last month, categorically rejected the inclusion of chiropractors in the national Medicare scheme in response to a question from Stanley Knowles. So that while one asks for Medicare here from the Liberal Party and asks for inclusion, the exclusion principle persists at the federal level. If the Liberal Party were not itself so out of joint, Mr. Speaker, I suppose the chiropractors' future would be better in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Gaunt: I will talk to him.

Mr. MacDonald: No more use talking to him than to the Minister of Health here.

Mr. Lewis: But in either event, Mr. Speaker, we in this House resent profoundly the autocracy and indifference of government to a very obvious social need and I suppose we will continue to persist in raising it in this Legislature until such time as the revolution dawns and the government takes action.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Armourdale.

Mr. G. R. Carton (Armourdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this resolution unequivocally—

Mr. MacDonald: We should have a vote. Everybody is in favour of it.

Mr. Carton: I, too, compliment the member for Huron-Bruce on his persistence, his continuing, well-researched and well-documented pleas on behalf of the chiropractors over the past two years. I read every word pro and con in Hansard yesterday on this subject and I must say that I have been impressed by most of the affirmative arguments and I am appalled by many of the negative ones.

I take issue with the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the majority of the debates on this subject have been to establish the status quo on the standing of chiropractors. This is in spite of general, worldwide acceptance, in spite of favourable recognition by the Royal commissions in Canada—nine of them—in spite of government acceptance in most of the provinces and in spite of acceptance here in Ontario through the workmen's compensation board, and most importantly and most emphatically, in spite of the acceptance by virtue of the personal experiences of over one and a half million people in our great province—and they are the jury in this matter.

Mr. MacDonald: How can the hon. member remain in that Party?

Mr. Carton: It is incredible and, yes, it is astounding to me that we have to spend so much time in defending their professional status. Were I a chiropractor, I would feel humiliated, ashamed and yet indignant at this necessity to prove my status in the Legislature of our own province.

So, Mr. Speaker, let us abandon once and for all these defensive arguments and let us start with the positive assertion that this Legislature needs no further debating on the merits of a chiropractor.

The next logical step, Mr. Speaker, is to look at cost. As I say, yesterday I read Hansard completely on this topic and nowhere have I been able to find any computation to show that this would be a significant increase. If, as its opponents say, cost is the important factor, then I would suggest it is incumbent on the opponents to explain and to document these additional costs. I, for one, am not impressed by members carelessly saying it will cost millions. I recall on a prior occasion I was damned by saying, "It will cost millions; you will bankrupt the government," when in point of fact the government made money on that particular occasion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it does not faze me to slough off recommendations by the bogeyman cost, and really, if you look back in Hansard three years, you will see that I made a speech on taxation. It received no attention whatsoever at that time, but if you took time to read it you would find that this is what has been preached by the government leaders today. It was a good half hour on taxation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make my point abundantly clear, and that is: if costs are indeed a factor—and we are all interested in costs—then we need documented proof on these, for I have read in Hansard some of the arguments put forth by the member for Huron-Bruce, some of them by the member for York South, and they went unchallenged.

I must confess that, at first flush, and until shown to the contrary, they appear to have made the point as far as I am concerned. So, a fatherly pat on the head or a remark by the powers that be, that he does not know what he is talking about is insufficient. Let us put our facts on the table.

I notice from the debates in Hansard that there is support on all sides of the House on this matter. The member for Hamilton Mountain made a very eloquent speech last year; the member for Renfrew-South; the former member for Lakeshore; and, today, the member for Durham, have all recorded their support in Hansard. And I am of the opinion that the majority of the members on all sides of the House are in accord with this resolution, and, Mr. Speaker, the weakness of this Legislature is that most members express their views privately.

I trust that the hon. Minister of Health will make a review of the matter, and I sincerely hope that action in the affirmative will be taken. If there are costs, I sincerely hope and trust that it would be in line with the new policy on priority spending.

In closing, just to make my point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw a picture, because one picture does more than a thousand words.

If you can let your imagination run wild for a moment—everyone in this House—you can imagine a magnificent edifice. Over the top it has "Ontario Medical Services Insurance Plan"—OMSIP—and down the road comes this man, limping with a back problem.

He walks through the door—he walks through the portals, and he finds himself in a room. There are two doors in this room. Over the one door it says, "Injuries below the waist," and the other door says, "Injuries above the waist." So he walks through the door marked "Above the waist."

He finds himself in another room, and there are two doors. One says, "Acute" and one says "Chronic." It is acute, so he goes through that one.

Once again he finds himself in a room with two doors, and the one says, "Back injury," and the other says, "Other injury." So he goes through the door saying "Back injury."

And he finds himself once more in a room with two doors. On the one door it says, "Physicians"; on the other door it says, "Chiropractors." He goes through the door marked "Chiropractors" and he finds himself out on the street again.

I need make no further remarks, at least on that particular topic, and, with your approval, I now move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the House, may I say that tomorrow we will go to the order paper for some legislation and continue the Throne Speech debate. I would remind the members that Thursday has been designated as the day on which the second order—the constitutional debate—will be called, and also that we are having evening sessions tomorrow and Thursday.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Has the government decided what will come up on the order paper?

Hon. Mr. Welch: No, I think that we will just take anything that is ready on the order paper.

An hon. member: Including committee?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Welch moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.00 o'clock p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1969

The House met at 2.30 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Today we have as our guests in the east gallery, students from Applewood Heights Secondary School in Cooksville, and, in the west gallery, students from Blessed Trinity Separate School in Willowdale and the Young Progressive Conservative group from the Lutheran University at Waterloo.

Some days ago, certain members of the House rose with enquiries concerning the powers and duties and responsibilities of committees of the House, particularly with respect to the committees' powers and procedures to pursue matters whether referred expressly to the committee by the House or not, and with respect to the summoning of witnesses to give evidence before the committee. There would appear to be little difficulty in this regard with respect to select committees, as normally the exact powers and terms of reference of such a committee are set out in a resolution to establish the committee.

Committees of the House are, of course, only emanations of the House and have only such powers and duties as are given them by the House. Their terms of reference, that is to say the matters with which they are entitled to deal, are only those which are referred to them by the House.

Standing committees are set up by an order early in the session which clearly states, and I quote from the rules:

—which said committees shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Standing committees, therefore, are established only to deal with those matters referred to them by the House.

However, for the past decade or more, it has been the practice for such standing committees to institute programmes for the information or instruction of their members by hearing from departmental officials and other persons having specialized knowledge. Moreover, such committees have often heard deputations and delegations from various groups who have asked to appear before such committees.

These programmes are for the purpose of enlarging the knowledge of the members in various fields related to government and public affairs of the province. All these matters are, of course, outside the committees' strict legal functions and terms of reference, and do not entail any obligation to report thereon to the House.

Any person appearing before the committee in connection with such programme does so voluntarily on the invitation of the committee. The instigation and carrying on of such a programme does not, however, give the committee any right to initiate inquiries or investigations unless specifically ordered by the House.

With respect to the question of calling witnesses to give evidence before a standing committee, the order of the House above quoted gives the committee "power to send for persons, papers and records". This power, of course, relates strictly only to "all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House".

The procedure under this order is for the clerk of the committee to write to the witness, summoning him to appear before the committee at a stated time and, if necessary, to bring with him any documents in his possession relating to the matter with which the committee has been charged by the House.

Should the witness not reply to the invitation of the clerk to appear before the committee, the committee informs the House of the refusal or neglect, and the House may, if it sees fit, order the attendance of such witness. In this case, the Speaker is empowered by subsection 2 of section 35 to issue his warrant directed to the witness. Such warrants are only issued, however, by order of the House.

In the case of a select committee, as mentioned, which is given authority to sit in the interval between sessions, it is the practice in the order establishing the committee for the House to give Mr. Speaker blanket authority to issue his warrant or warrants for the purpose of summoning witnesses, so that recourse may be taken to this procedure if it becomes necessary, even though the House is not sitting to make the necessary order.

I am sure that with this guidance and the assistance of the Clerk of the assembly, standing committees of the Legislature will have little difficulty in formulating and following proper practices and procedures with respect to their duties, responsibilities and powers.

Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence, from the standing private bills committee, presented the committee's fifth report, which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills without amendment:

Bill Pr14, An Act respecting the County of Ontario.

Bill Pr17, An Act respecting the County of Peel.

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill Pr32, An Act respecting McMaster University.

Mr. Speaker: Motions:

Mr. R. T. Potter moves, seconded by Mr. Belanger, that pursuant to section 35 of The Legislative Assembly Act, R.S.O. 1960, chapter 208, Dr. J. W. Mullner of the Ontario Hospital, Brockville, be ordered to attend before the standing health committee to give evidence with respect to allegations made by him concerning the staff at the hospital, and to produce all such papers and things as may be relevant thereto, and that, for this purpose, the Speaker do issue his warrant. Also, that the committee be authorized to sit while the House is sitting to hear the above-mentioned evidence, if the committee finds it necessary so to do.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Premier if he would care to comment on the story in the morning's Toronto Daily Star concerning the Ontario acceptance of Medicare. He responded quite vociferously to a similar comment last week. Perhaps he would indicate whether there is any veracity in this or not.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I believe the question as put to me is:

That the Prime Minister indicate that the story in the morning Toronto Daily Star is correct concerning Ontario acceptance of Medicare.

I would simply say that I do not choose to comment on that question. My answer to the question is no.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Premier.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rainy River has a question of the Premier.

An hon. member: Why does he get preference?

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): In view of the statement made by the Premier in the Legislature last Wednesday that Medicare is unconstitutional, is he prepared to take this question to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I did not make such a statement about Medicare; I did not say that Medicare was unconstitutional. There is a vast difference between a bill such as that being unconstitutional. The effect of the bill is that it amounts to a federal intrusion into an area of constitutional responsibility that belongs to the province.

We have, in any event, an answer to the question. I would simply say that we have no intention of challenging the constitutionality of the bill. However, I have no hesitation in repeating what I said—that I considered it a deliberate attempt by the federal government to use a federal fiscal policy to intrude into areas that are the constitutional responsibility of the province.

I would like to add I hope the hon. members will not take the position I see some of my critics have taken that I am opposed to national Medicare, because I am not. If the hon. members will go back—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The member's foggy thinking is interpreted as riding both sides of the fence. I will have an opportunity in due course, Mr. Speaker, to document my position in these matters. But if anyone is sufficiently interested—and I know the members over there probably won't be that interested—if they were to check back on various statements I have made in this House, in their hearing and on the official records of this House, I am not opposed to national Medicare, nor am I opposed to the fullest possible health care that we can give our people. But I must say I am violently opposed to the way in which the federal government is trying to ram this down our throats.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, would the Premier accept a supplementary question?

Would he not agree that this programme, according to him, is going to cost the people of Ontario around $225 million, for which they will get no benefit? Is it not incumbent upon him to take this to the highest court in the land to save the taxpayers that money if it is unconstitutional?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I see no purpose in taking it to the highest court in the land. I do not think it is a matter that will ever be settled legally in any event.

I think it is a political matter and I do not see that there is any virtue in involving ourselves in a long course of litigation when we have some doubts as to whether we would even be successful. I cannot say that I believe this particular bill is ultra vires of the federal government because of the provisions of the Constitution. It is not the bill I object to; it is the intent. The purpose and the underlying philosophy.

If you want to change the Constitution, if you want to change the whole life of this country and the way we operate, there are various ways of doing it. One way is to sit down and rewrite the Constitution in terms of people and the effect that Constitution is going to have on how the people in the country live. Another way is to use fiscal leverage to change the Constitution in fact, if not in word, and thereby change how our country functions as well.

Now these are our objections; they are very simple to those who want to understand them, but I suppose if the hon. members opposite want to be apologists for their friends in Ottawa forever, you will always take this attitude.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order! The hon. member for Grey-Bruce will understand why I gave the floor to his colleague because it was an allied question. The hon. member for Rainy River had an allied question to the one previously asked of the Prime Minister; that is why I gave him the floor. You now have the floor, sir.

Mr. Sargent: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. T. P. Reid: And because of a more important speaker.

Mr. Sargent: Everybody is out of step but the Prime Minister.

1. Would the Premier advise why the government will not consider forming a commission to investigate the exorbitantly high insurance rates on automobiles being charged in the province of Ontario?

2. Is the Premier aware that the Ontario rates are approximately 100 per cent more than those in the province of Saskatchewan?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree, of course, with the basic principle inherent in this question put forward by the hon. member. I would simply say that any statistical comparison will reveal that the insurance rates in Ontario compare favourably with those really in effect any place on the continent.

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): How about Saskatchewan?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Saskatchewan does not have the same number of motor cars. They do not have the same—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The hon. member either wants an answer to the question or he does not. If he does not agree with me, he will have his opportunity to speak, but he might at least listen to what I have to say.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, it is rather fruitless for these interjections to be made as far as I am concerned because I cannot hear them. I am always interested in listening to any reasonable contribution the hon. members on the other side may make, but they might do it at a time when I can hear it. Then I will be able to evaluate it and see whether it is worthy of recognition and listening to.

It is really very pointless to attempt to compare insurance rates between the province of Saskatchewan and the province of Ontario. They have not the same number of automobiles, they have not the same congestion of population; they have not the same geographic conditions; they have not the same weather conditions and you can attempt to make a point by doing this but I suggest to hon. members that it is like comparing apples and oranges, as the old expression goes; it is not valid.

If we do look at some comparative figures, the member might be interested in this. If we take, for instance, the city of Toronto, we take an owner with a three-year, no-claim record providing coverage of $100,000 for property damage with $100 deductible collision, $25 deductible comprehensive (that covers fire and theft and other hazards). In 1968, this coverage would cost $121 in Toronto; it would cost $202 in Buffalo; it would cost $239 in San Francisco; it would cost $369 in Boston.

In our own country, this policy would cost $121 in Toronto; it would cost $211 in Montreal; it would cost $207 in Quebec City; it would cost $102 in Kingston—which is the best—and Peterborough; and it would cost $108 in Winnipeg. So members can see that—

Mr. Sargent: It is $59 in Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: But the member is not comparing the same thing. There is no basis of comparison in coverage nor in the method of payment. I suggest that the comparisons I am offering are much more valid in terms of a meaningful comparison than just to simply say Saskatchewan and Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for High Park has a question of the Prime Minister.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

When will the committee on government commissions be invited to visit the Niagara Parks system and examine the minutes, as stated by the Prime Minister in this House on May 28, 1968?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I do not control the affairs or the destiny of this committee, therefore I cannot answer the question.

However, the chairman of that committee informs me there has been no discussion of this matter in the deliberations of the committee. But I am assured by him that he would be quite happy to arrange a visit to the commission if the committee so requests and requires. The chairman of the commission has assured me that if the committee chooses to visit the parks commission, he will give them a proper welcome and make the minutes available to them, so as always it rests in the hands of the committee itself.

Mr. Shulman: Will the Prime Minister accept a supplementary question?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes.

Mr. Shulman: At the last meeting of the committee where this particular commission was present, the chairman at that time said that I could come down personally and examine the minutes. Furthermore, inasmuch as on May 28 it was apparently overruled by the Prime Minister who said this could only be done when the committee as a whole went down there; and further, inasmuch as the Prime Minister has taken this personal interest in this matter, for which I am grateful, perhaps he could intervene and see that we do actually get—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not asking a question.

Mr. Shulman: The question is: Will the Prime Minister intervene to see that we get to visit the commission and see the minutes?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I certainly will not intervene in the affairs of that committee or any other committee of the House. It is set up by this House—given its being and its powers from the Legislature. If it chooses to do it, it is free to do so. If it does not choose to do so, I am not going to say that it has to.

The chairman of the committee tells me the matter has never even been discussed at this session. The member had better sort it out with him. All I am pointing out to the member is the commission is prepared to receive him and prepared to make the minutes available to the committee.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wentworth.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, to the Prime Minister:

Will the Prime Minister make the necessary policy change to transfer inspection of hotel fire safety from the liquor licence board to the fire marshal of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, no, I will not make that policy decision for this reason: The inspection staff of the liquor licence board does many things other than perform fire inspections. In other words, they inspect other matters in addition to those dealing with fire. If we were to make this change, it would be necessary to add staff to the fire marshal's office because they have not sufficient field staff to inspect all the hotels.

So the inspector for the liquor licence board, who is inspecting many other things to do with the sale of liquor in the province, does the fire inspection at the same time.

I would point out that there is very close co-operation between these inspectors and the fire marshal and we think that we have a satisfactory system of looking after these inspections.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, may I, by way of supplementary question, ask the Prime Minister if he would not agree that the present inspection by liquor licence board employees is not adequate and that it should be in the hands of those people who are trained professionally to look for the proper and immediate dangers in a structure?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, Mr. Speaker, I would not agree to that. The inspectors are trained in fire prevention just as they are trained in various other aspects of their work. It is only one part of their job.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Makarchuk) has a question of the Minister of Social and Family Services (Mr. Yaremko). He is not here. I am sorry.

The hon. Minister of Correctional Services has some answers from another day. Is the member here who posed them?

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was asked some questions by the hon. member for High Park. The first part of the question was:

In the transfer of Mr. Stanley W. from Burwash to Sudbury Jail, did the criminal charges mentioned by the Minister on Friday refer to criminal acts committed inside Burwash?

The answer to that is, yes. Second part of the question:

How many of the 24 prisoners transferred from Burwash were transferred because of detected homosexuality?

The answer is, four other prisoners were transferred from Burwash to face criminal charges of a homosexual nature. The third part of the question:

Why were these prisoners not transferred to Millbrook or some other institution capable of handling homosexuals?

The answer is, it is necessary for men facing criminal charges to be held in the local jail. Question four:

Does the Minister think that district jails are better places to confine homosexuals?

The answer, Mr. Speaker, is that we normally hold the homosexuals in Millbrook and, of course, there are exceptions such as when a man is facing a criminal charge.

Mr. Shulman: Will the Minister accept a supplementary question?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned yesterday—in view of the fact that there are some criminal charges pending here it would be inadvisable to discuss this matter.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Puts the Minister in the vanguard to be—

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, so that there will be no misunderstanding, I did not intend to ask any question, about the criminal charges. Perhaps then the Minister would accept a supplementary question.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to put myself in a position—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Say no, say no.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The answer is no. I do not want to put myself in the position of making a decision as to whether what the hon. member raises is a proper subject for discussion. I am no more a lawyer than the hon. member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Far less!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of Health has the answer to a question. Is the member present?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for High Park asked me a question which I took as notice yesterday. The question is number 736 and since it is recorded in Hansard I shall not repeat it. The answers:

1. For the three months ending January 31, 1969, 34 patients have been discharged from the Ontario Hospital School at Orillia.

2. 31 patients have been admitted during the past three months.

3. On the date of enquiry there were nine vacancies in the hospital. Arrangements are made to admit patients as soon as a bed becomes available on the basis of urgency of need for institutional care.

With reference to the specific patient identified by first name and initial, I do not believe that any matters specifically pertaining to patients or any single patient should be discussed in the public record, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, will the Minister accept a supplementary question?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I will hear it.

Mr. Shulman: Will the Minister give me a private answer then as to when this family could expect to get their child admitted to the hospital?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: If the hon. member is the family physician, yes. Otherwise, I do not think it is his concern unless the family specifically direct me so to do.

Mr. Shulman: I am the family physician and I am their representative in this Legislature; may I get such an answer?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: As the family physician, yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Algoma has a question of the Minister of Agriculture and Food.

Order! Order!

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Does it mean that those in the Legislature who are not physicians are not subject to such information?

An hon. member: Not that information.

Mr. Lewis: Is this a little club which the Minister is setting up?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, there is no club. It is traditionally accepted and I—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I put it to the hon. member himself. Does he want me discussing his, or anybody else's, family affairs and medical affairs in the House? This, in my view, sir, is confidential information and is available to those who are—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! Has the hon. member for Scarborough West finished?

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If a member of this House seeks information privately from the Cabinet, I think it is incumbent on the Minister to exchange that information with him.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, again I must insist that there is certain privileged information which is not the concern or the right of any member of the Legislature—

Mr. Lewis: What about admissions to government institutions?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: If I have the permission of those concerned, either the patient or those acting in his behalf to give that information, then I shall give it, but I feel that I cannot give it publicly, without prior consent.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin might try again.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. A question to the Minister of Agriculture and Food.

Would the Minister provide the House with the details of the proposed community pastures project on the Wikwemikong Indian reserve on Manitoulin Island, particularly with respect to the following information: The total amount of acreage involved; the total cost; how is this cost shared between the Indian band, ARDA and The Department of Indian Affairs; and what arrangements are made for supervisory personnel for the operation of the project?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture and Food): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to provide the hon. member and the House with the information which is requested in this question.

The Wikwemikong Indian reserve comprises about 100,000 acres, 10,000 of which will form a part of the community pasture. The total cost is estimated at $30,000 with $10,000 being provided by ARDA, which the federal and provincial governments will share in the cost, $10,000 by The Department of Indian Affairs and $10,000 by the local Indian band who will provide local materials and labour. It is estimated that of that $30,000 cost, about $15,000 will accrue to the local Indian band.

The arrangements for supervisory management of the project will rest with the Indian band itself and with the local Manitoulin island ARDA committee as well as with the local ARDA community pasture board on the island. It will be a co-ordinated project and I would assume, although I do not have the specific information at hand, that there will be someone appointed to act as a supervisor of the pasture itself.

Mr. Farquhar: May I ask a further question of the Minister? Has the Minister given any particular thought to the possibility of encouraging the Indians themselves to grow and raise more cattle to be taken care of on this pasture rather than having cattle taken care of from other parts of the island close to the reserve? In other words, has he given thought to encouraging the Indians—in some way to raise cattle on their own, more than they are doing at the moment?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Well, Mr. Speaker, we certainly would be very much prepared to do that and would welcome the opportunity. Quite frankly, as I mentioned in my remarks, there are at least 90,000 acres left in this reserve which is a sizable area, which could be used to vastly expand the beef cattle production of the Manitoulin islands and we would welcome any participation by the Indians along this particular line.

I would point out, sir, that in some provinces of Canada the Indian population, through its reserves, does contribute substantially to the development of the beef cattle industry and we would welcome the opportunity to participate with them.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wentworth has a question of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Deans: Pardon me, I could not see him.

To the Minister of Transport: Will the Minister consider changing The Highway Traffic Act to allow fire trucks to proceed through red stop lights?

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is not thought that the hon. member's proposal would be in the interest of safety. Section 79 of The Highway Traffic Act now requires the driver of a motor vehicle to pull his car to the right of a road and come to a stop clear of an intersection on the approach of a fire truck sounding its siren. To do as the hon. member suggests would have the effect of removing—

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. This is not a suggestion or a proposal. It is a question.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would allow the Minister to complete his answer and then, if he had a point of order or a supplementary question I am sure that the floor would be his. However, it would only be a matter of courtesy to allow the Minister to answer the question in the form he wishes as the hon. member has asked in the form he wishes.

Hon. Mr. Haskett: To do as the hon. member's question suggests, would have the effect of removing from the operator of the fire truck any responsibility for ascertaining that it is safe to proceed through the intersection against the red light.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member now wish to place any supplementary question, or any question with respect to the answer?

Mr. Deans: No, Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to point out by way of a point of order that I was not suggesting or proposing; I was inquiring!

Mr. Speaker: There is no point of order here in that matter. The hon. member has asked a question in the terms he wished and the hon. Minister has answered it. The hon. Minister is quite entitled to take what meaning he wishes out of the question, and if not correct, by supplementary question the hon. member may correct the impression.

The hon. member for Rainy River has a question of the Minister of Tourism and Information.

Mr. T. P. Reid: Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Tourism and Information. Who was Arnold Olsen? What department is he with? Why was a picture taken by Karsh instead of either a Tourism or Lands and Forests' photographer, which appeared in the Saturday Review of February 15, 1969? How much did the photograph cost? Who was responsible for the writing of the advertisement? How much did the total advertisement cost? Will the same advertisement be run again in the same magazine or any other publication? Why is he depicted wearing a Lands and Forests' uniform, and yet the public is asked to write him c/o The Department of Tourism and Information?

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that that question be put on the order paper and I will have all the detailed answers to put forward in the usual way. I simply say this, though, that the answer to some of the questions of the hon. member will be found in the debates of last year at the time of my estimates, and also the year before.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management has an answer, I believe. Is the hon. member in the House?

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Yes, is it mine?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, I have the answer to question 526, asked by the leader of the Opposition. His question was:

What was the cost of purchased electrical energy to meet Hydro's load commitments during December, 1968, and January, 1969?

Answer: The cost of purchased electric energy to meet Hydro's load commitments during the month of December, 1968, was $2,023,050.52. This includes purchases from Canadian sources. At this date, processing of costs for the month of January, 1969, has been delayed.

I also have an answer, Mr. Speaker, to question 715, asked by the hon. member for Sudbury East. His question was:

In view of the Minister's reply to the House regarding the cyanide spillage that, "the spill of cyanide was at the tailings area serving the Levack Mill of INCO and not directly to Moose Creek", how does the Minister explain the fact that men who cleaned the area of cyanide are willing to give evidence, and have in fact given evidence, that they were instructed to flush out the area through a sump and that the cyanide was flushed directly into Moose Creek?

What action does the Ontario Water Resources Commission intend to take against INCO because the company did not advise them immediately that the spillage occurred, so that tests could be taken to ensure the water was safe, or warn the people if it was dangerous?

The answer, with regard to the statement that:

Men who cleaned the area of cyanide are willing to give evidence, and have in fact given evidence that they were instructed to flush out the area through a sump, and that the cyanide was flushed directly into Moose Creek.

No one has submitted any such evidence to the Ontario Water Resources Commission. Since the spill was accidental and confined to the tailings area, and since no discernible impairment of downstream waters has been observed, no legal action is contemplated. The commission's investigation of this matter is continuing.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have a supplementary?

Mr. Martel: No, I guess not, because the evidence was given, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Wentworth have a question for this Minister?

Mr. Deans: Yes, Mr. Speaker. To the Minister of Energy and Resources Management. Will the Minister investigate a report that the Steel Company of Canada dumped 150,000 gallons of hydrochloric acid into Hamilton Bay during the week of February 14?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, this matter is now under investigation. The Ontario Water Resources Commission has been in contact with the Steel Company of Canada Limited regarding the recent loss of about 150,000 gallons of hydrochloric acid to Burlington Bay. The company is being required to submit a report to the commission setting forth the details of the occurrence.

Mr. Deans: A supplementary question. May I ask if the Minister will make the report available to the House?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, I would doubt that very much. It is not customary to make internal reports available to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming has a question of this Minister.

Mr. D. Jackson (Timiskaming): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister table the Ontario Water Resources Commission report regarding Larder Lake and Kerr-Addison Gold Mines Ltd.?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, the answer is, no. If the hon. member would like to come to my office I would be pleased to answer any question he might have regarding this report.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wentworth has a question of the Minister of Lands and Forests.

Mr. Deans: Yes, Mr. Speaker, of the Minister of Lands and Forests. Has the government abandoned its plans for development of the area of Saltfleet known as Fifty Point Park?

Hon. R. Brunelle (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member, the government is still prepared to acquire and develop a possible park site in this area, as soon as land acquisition at recommendable prices can be negotiated.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Before the orders of the day, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture and Food if he has an answer to my question of February 18?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: I will get that answer. As a matter of fact, I was asking about it today and there is a piece of correspondence that I am trying to define that I have not been able to lay my hands on, but I hope to have it for the hon. member tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The first order; resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the amendment of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech of the Honourable, the Lieutenant-Governor at the opening of the session.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, if I may, I would like to follow tradition by paying tribute to you, as the Speaker, for the manner in which you handle the affairs of this House. I think that you do a very effective job and I congratulate you on it. It is not always easy because there are differences of opinion from time to time, and one has to—

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): Not too far!

Mr. Gaunt: One has to view with confidence the role of the Speaker, and I am sure that all of us in this House accord you that tribute, sir.

Before I go any further, I want to say that my preliminary remarks will deal with a subject which I feel very strongly about. I have had a great deal of mail concerning this matter. It is of great concern to the municipalities across the province of Ontario, and I would just like to express my concern on their behalf in this particular area.

I am referring to the withdrawal of the ARDA grant insofar as municipal drains are concerned. This has caused a great deal of difficulty. It came very suddenly. As I understand it, the ARDA agreement was in the normal course to extend to March, 1970. Suddenly The Department of Agriculture and Food decided that in view of the federal government's withdrawal on the cost sharing programme, the province would withdraw their support as well.

This has left the municipalities in a very difficult position in connection with the drains that were actually started, where the engineers had become involved—where the petitions were in the hands of the engineers. I have had a number of examples drawn to my attention. Farmers were assessed anywhere from $2,000 to $7,000 for a drain going through their property and these figures were based on the fact that ARDA was going to participate.

Then suddenly the agreement was withdrawn. This means, in effect, that a farmer or person whose property is affected by a drain, and who was figuring on the ARDA agreement to pick up one-third of the cost, is now faced with an assessment of $14,000. It was previously $7,000. And in some cases this is perhaps more than the property itself is worth.

So this is a very important point, and I urge the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Stewart) and the Treasury Board of this province to reconsider this particular decision. I think the very least that could be done in this regard is for the department to honour in this way all the municipal schemes that were in the hands of the engineers when the ARDA withdrawal announcement was made.

I think this is the very least the department could do. They could go much further, but I recognize that one of the big problems at the moment is the fact that the province is short of money, as is the federal government, and indeed the municipal governments. Having said that, I realize that money is the problem. But perhaps, in order to accomplish what I suggested, some of the money could be taken from some other areas of the ARDA programme and applied to this area to the extent that this grant could be taken on all of the drainage schemes that were in the hands of the engineers prior to the announcement of withdrawals.

I want to make a few comments about the federal-provincial conference, and before I get into that I think we were astonished to see some of the statements that were made at that time. Ottawa has rejected Ontario's desperate demand for a bigger share of the tax revenues. It is interesting to note the change of attitude of the province in relation to the federal government. It is reflected of the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) of this province. At the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference the Premier said:

We, in Ontario, do not intend to bring in the question of the primacy of the federal government.

However, before the constitutional conference was postponed last fall, the Premier of the province said:

If co-operation and co-ordination are to work, there cannot be an assumption of that superior power which upset the priorities and decisions of the other governments. There cannot be an automatic assumption that the federal government is the superior power and it is this unsaid assumption that leads to most of our difficulties in the field of federal-provincial relations at the present time.

The Premier, in my opinion, has always been a strong federalist. He has always been a strong centralist. He has always believed in a strong federal government—that is, until he got one, and now he does not like it, apparently. This, in my view, is a complete turn-about. I know the Prime Minister has made other statements since then which would seem to revert to his former position.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Federalism and centralism are the same thing.

Mr. Gaunt: May I make the point that the Prime Minister of the province is a strong federalist? Would that be a fairer statement? The Premier is nodding so I presume that we can go on from that assumption. He wants lots of power in Ottawa, but does that mean that he is a weak centralist?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Not necessarily, not as strong as some!

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Speaker, formerly there was a constant erosion of the federal position because of a succession of minority governments and because the provincial Premiers were a very impressive group. Now that Canada has a majority government, many of the provincial Premiers are suffering from diminished stature; many of the Premiers have changed and basically they do not represent the formidable group they once did, particularly during the Pearson years.

The Prime Minister of Canada is in a position to take on not only the separatists in Quebec, but also any provincial nationalists that happen to be around. Consequently, the pendulum is going the other way.

I am not trying to defend the federal position in regard to tax sharing. I do think that their position has to be judged against the background of the unsettled world monetary conditions which saw three major crises within the past years. The governor of the Bank of Canada put it: "You cannot take a quart out of a pint jug."

Individuals or a nation cannot continue indefinitely to spend more than they make. Having said that, it is obvious that governments can stimulate their economies by running budget deficits from time to time which, I suggest, are essential as long as they are not allowed to get out of hand.

The federal government is determined to put its own financial house in order and the province should determine to do the same thing. Surely, a provincial-federal fiscal conference should not mean that a federal government hands more money over to the provinces simply to cover up overspending and bad planning, which is the case in Ontario?

If Ontario assumes the full responsibility for hospitalization, health and welfare and the Canada Assistance Plan, as Ottawa wants, this would give Ontario, as I understand it, another 17 points of income tax which would mean that Ontario would be spending close to 50 per cent of the income tax. Under those circumstances, Ontario should have a role in determining the national income tax base and should have the right to renegotiate the tax base. No one can produce any division of tax money which will satisfy everyone. It is impossible.

Governments all like to spend money and blame taxes on someone else, yet the responsibility for raising taxes is the only real limitation on spending. I think it is about time we considered the taxpayers in the province for once. Governments are so wrapped up in the game of trying to score political points that they forget. It really does not matter whether the taxpayers pay higher taxes to Ottawa or Toronto—we are stuck either way. Yet from the taxpayer's point of view, he is interested in getting value for his dollar and keeping taxes as low as possible, bearing in mind the services which he expects and requires.

Consequently, from this point of view, he who spends, should raise, because this is the only limitation and check a taxpayer has over his government's spending. This is the fundamental crux of democracy. However, we do live in a federated country and there are over-riding fiscal responsibilities as far as the levels of government are concerned. The fact is that today all levels of government—municipal, provincial and federal—are facing equally difficult problems in trying to balance revenues against expenditures.

It is even more important today than previously that these vexing and pressing problems be hammered out in a spirit of co-operation during these rapidly changing times of escalating costs. It is imperative that there be consultation and discussion over the whole field of government expenditure so that the greatest possible value is squeezed out of every tax dollar.

The next matter I want to touch on is essentially a federal matter, but since this happens to be the only form available to me, sir, I am going to take the opportunity to make a few observations about the personal income tax exemptions.

I presume that what I have to say in this regard will be compatible with what the Treasurer said in his Throne Speech on Monday, December 16, when he said:

We are convinced that the burden of taxation must be lifted from those families with low income, especially those on fixed incomes which have shrunk by inflation.

I have felt for some while, sir—and I have had many representations from people who have held the same view—that the basic income tax exemptions should be raised to reflect more accurately today's cost of living. Certainly the $1,000 basic personal exemption, and the $2,000 exemption claim for those claiming marital status, are not very realistic today.

I asked The Department of Finance in Ottawa for some information about the loss of revenue resulting from an increase in income tax exemptions. One calculation assumes that the basic personal exemption is raised to $1,400 from $1,000 for a single person, and to $2,800 from $2,000 for the individual eligible to claim married status.

A further assumption is that the existing $300 deduction for a dependent is raised to $400 and the $550 deduction to $660. If these exemptions and deductions were in effect for the 1968 taxation year, the estimated aggregate loss of (a) federal personal income tax revenue; (b) federal old age security personal income tax revenue; (c) the value of the provincial share of basic tax, would be slightly in excess of $1 billion. Of this amount about three-quarters would represent the loss in federal revenue.

There would have to be an increase of approximately 14 per cent in tax liability for those who still would be taxable under the new exemptions, to make up the difference in lost revenue.

The loss of revenue based on a $1,400 exemption for a single person and $2,800 for a marital status is substantial.

But I say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is just about time the poor people in this country got a break, and they certainly have not been getting it. I think it is asinine in the extreme for a married couple 67 years of age with no income other than the old age security—both drawing the maximum—$109.20—to have to pay $320.80 at the end of the year. It is playing musical chairs with the taxpayers' money and is morally wrong.

The very least that should be done is for the exemption to be raised to $1,200 as a first step, an amount which would at least cover the amount of the old age security pension, plus the full supplement for anyone under the age of 70.

The last matter I would like to deal with is one which is causing great concern and anxiety in many parts of Ontario—regional government.

Municipal government may be on the bottom of the rung of the political ladder, but it provides the essential underpinning for much of Ontario's economic and social life. The Prime Minister said on November 28, 1968, and it is recorded in Hansard.

The establishment of regional government will be as major a change in our day as was The Baldwin Act of 1849 which set up the basic municipal structure we now know.

Any change of this magnitude is bound to create hardship, resentment in some cases, and out and out opposition in others. I happen to represent a rural riding which I think is essentially opposed to regional government as proposed by the government.

I suspect most, if not all, rural areas across the province are opposed to any move towards regional government, yet the report of the select committee on The Municipal Act and related Acts; the report of the Ontario committee on taxation; the select committee on taxation; all expressed a need for larger units of local government. This means that rural areas generally are determined to fight a rear-guard action, and this attitude is essentially different. I submit, from that of the urban counterpart.

However, I think there is basic agreement in both urban centres and rural areas that the system of municipal government has to be changed in some way in order to function effectively for the last half of the 20th century. Yet I cannot help but feel that the opposition to regional government is valid because the government seems to be preoccupied with creating larger units of administration and has not given enough study to the financing of the municipal services.

This was best put by the Ontario Economic Council in its recent report when it said:

To create a new level of government to transfer added responsibilities to it without ensuring an adequate tax base is indefensible.

Regional government will improve the current situation in the assessment and the collection of property taxes, but the financial position of the local government will not be basically changed, and will still depend on the property tax and on financial transfers from the province.

The other point which raises fear among rural people is the fact that regional government will mean that municipal government will become very remote to the average voter and elector. The reeve or the council in any municipality across Ontario is "Mr. Fixit" to the average citizen. If this relationship is disturbed, democracy has indeed lost some of its meaning.

The government has been very dictatorial in its attitude and approach I feel. Surely we can have orderly progress without complete dictatorship. The purpose of regional government will not be achieved if the government persists in its present course of action, because one important ingredient has been left out, and that is local acceptance.

Local acceptance has to be evident if the plan is going to work. Regional government must justify its coming in the minds of the local people. Then, and only then, can it be said the Minister has fulfilled his responsibilities.

Mr. R. G. Hodgson (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join other members who have spoken in this debate in their remarks about the responsible way you conduct your duties to this House.

May I refer briefly to remarks made here recently and found on page 156 of Hansard, and read into the record a report printed in the Lindsay Post of November 6, 1968, under the heading, "Praise Given PC Leaders," and I quote:

John Alton had words of praise for Progressive Conservative Premiers in Ontario and Canada, and the progress the party has made in the province, but he was critical Wednesday of the Liberal government in Ottawa.

He praised George Drew, Leslie Frost and John Diefenbaker as men who "gave us great government.

"Under these men we had a government serving the people," Mr. Alton told the annual meeting of the Victoria-Haliburton Progressive Conservative Association, but "I feel the government in Ottawa now has us serving them."

All three men, who were mentioned by the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) on page 156 of Hansard, have been, and continue to be, fine public servants. Their remarks should be heeded by everyone, not taken lightly or used in any way other than in the way they were meant, in the sincere, constructive interpretation given to the association.

Mr. Speaker, I make no excuse to this House for remarks attributed to me in quotation by the hon. member for York South. I simply state they were perhaps the most newsworthy among words given in my report to my people on that occasion in the opinion of that reporter. It is a concern of each and every member here, all the direct involvement in private or other affairs forsaken, in order to do the responsibility undertaken here.

The hon. member for York South referred to remarks made by Mr. Wilbert Worsley, reeve of Fenelon township, who expressed grave concern with the tax burden of municipalities in regard to local welfare assistance administered by the Victoria county system. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that this federal-provincial-municipal programme is of concern to other members of Victoria county council and a committee was established to meet with our Minister on this very important matter at the recent meeting of the Victoria county council in session.

The Lindsay Post newspaper, about the same time, carried a Canadian Press article on the recent NDP leadership rivalry between the member for Riverdale (Mr. J. Renwick) and the member for York South.

Very serious charges were made by the member for Riverdale about power-broker manipulation of their party in regard to certain support and representation. The member for York South is quoted as saying the matter was one which should be discussed in private by the party, not "washed in public like linen".

Mr. Speaker, what a difference of viewpoint on how democracy should work in political parties.

Perhaps on this occasion it would be appropriate to describe the kind of liberty which our administration has sought, and continues to seek, by reading to you the simple words of a great President of the United States who believed in the kind of liberty that we believe in. The words are from the speech made by President Abraham Lincoln at the sanitary fair in Baltimore in 1864, and I ask that you good people give heed to these words, for although they are a century old, I think you will find that they apply to 1969.

Mr. Lincoln said this:

The world has never had a good definition of the word liberty, and the American people just now are much in want of one. We all declare for liberty, but in using the same word we do not all mean the same thing. With some, the word liberty may mean for each man to do as he pleases with himself and the product of his labour, while with others, the same word may mean for some men to do as they please with other men and the product of other men's labour.

Here are two, not only different, but incompatible things called by the same name liberty, and it follows that each of the things is, by the respective parties, called by two different and incompatible names—liberty and tyranny.

And then, Abraham Lincoln used this homely example. He said:

The shepherd drives the wolf from the sheep's throat, for which the sheep thanks the shepherd as his liberator while the wolf denounces him for the same act as the destroyer of liberty. Plainly the sheep and the wolf were not agreed upon a definition of the word liberty, and precisely the same difference prevails today among us human creatures and all professing to love liberty. Hence we behold the process by which thousands are daily passing from under the yolk of bondage hailed by some as the advance of liberty, and bewailed by others as the destruction of all liberty.

And in closing, Mr. Lincoln said this:

Recently, as it seems, the people have been doing something to define liberty, and thanks to them that, in what they have done, the wolf's dictionary has been repudiated.

My friends, today in 1969 the people have been doing something to define liberty through this province's government, and the wolf's dictionary has again been repudiated. What Abraham Lincoln said a century ago applies today as it did then. The people, the men and women of this province, will, I think, appreciate their significance in the same measure as men and women in every part of the United States did those many years ago.

Mr. Speaker, after listening for some five years to the socialist representatives in this House, I have come to the weary conclusion that they represent the most reactionary forces in our province. By any definition, a reactionary is assumed to be among other things a person who is reluctant to change. In my experience, the NDP members of this House are the true reactionaries. They never change. They resist change among themselves. They sit before us now, bearing the scars of their self-inflicted wounds acquired in Kitchener. Whatever progressive element there may have been among them was driven underground at that cannibalistic Kitchener festival.

No, Mr. Speaker, there is never anything fresh or constructive in the NDP's approaches to the business of government. Mind you, they do have one guiding principle, "We build ourselves up when we tear someone else down." They are the wolf who bitterly complains about the shepherd and his concern for the flock. They are indeed the party of the wolf.

Turning to the official Opposition, we find a different situation of almost extreme contrast. No sign of the wolf over there. Far from it. The Grits resemble a pet, perhaps a poodle. Though the poodle traces its ancestry back to a long line of hunting dogs, it has now fallen upon lesser ways and days. Now it is a mere lapdog, wagging its tail in happy ignorance while it awaits the whistle of its Ottawa master before performing.

Mr. Speaker, the party of the poodle and the party of the wolf deserve each other, because for 25 years the Ontario electorate has forcefully indicated that it does not deserve them. Perhaps a merger is the solution. A poodle and a wolf might give us a woodle, an animal that gnashes its teeth in complaint while it wags its tail in ignorant bliss.

It is my opinion that since yellow lines have proved successful in marking the shoulders of highways with a solid painted line, perhaps we should consider marking the centre lines in yellow paint. I believe it is much more noticeable in snow, snow storms, and fog conditions. This is my experience and perhaps should have serious consideration by our Department of Highways in Ontario.

Some of our greatest concentrated populations of this world have now found it vital to control the term of individual lifetime building use. This could be the answer to our cities' prevention of slum areas and the need of urban renewal programmes which take funds needed from other service projects.

We could set aside our historic buildings that should be retained and establish a life-time term of use on others. This would mean new buildings on our land every so often, establishing rehabilitation of our problems on a basis of planning and new concepts without crash programmes by government. Private enterprise would, and could, do the job under such a scheme of scheduled progress.

Now, may I say one or two things about our system of welfare in my locality. I believe the fears expressed to me by my people have a basis in a concern for the individuals who, for one reason or another, are accepted as meeting the requirements of our laws that govern the assistance provided. These individuals find that tax payers are, by our laws, responsible to them, but that the recipients are in only a minor way responsible to the tax payer who provides the resources for the assistance.

We have families who receive assistance from our local authorities that have had their moving charges paid by cities and agencies of government in another area who had responsibilities to that family, and discharged them simply by moving the family to our area. Often this means the new authority has neither the methods nor the opportunity to provide the rehabilitation into society for their new responsibility.

This is wrong, because often it means a family receives more in assistance than one across the street who have the tax-paying responsibility to provide for the recipients, thus too often ending incentive in society to work.

In my area, with below provincial average income and high personal home ownership, it applies a tax burden on home owners that prevents development, restricts funds, kills incentive and emphasizes a base of need for help from government.

I believe we could do much to improve our area in economic straits by providing all welfare by provincial administration and expenditure with direct relieving on a local tax base. I really believe this is the best way the province can relieve burdens at this time on local government.

Otherwise, we will, if we don't require more responsibility of those receiving welfare, create a greater load of recipients without rehabilitation into a useful position in society.

This government must design methods to provide assistance for municipalities undertaking measures of water and sewage programmes. Only so much can be afforded in many of these centres of population collection.

Places of under average income levels, with a high percentage of home ownership, cannot provide these services as we now know them.

We must have assistance and a programme of help designed at once. Average incomes per family under $4,000 yearly cannot afford water and sewage of $50 monthly. It should be at least assisted to a degree of approximately $35 monthly off these charges over the 40-year period of financing.

Mr. Speaker, may I add one or two comments on Algonquin Park that can be considered in addition to those made by my colleagues of this House.

Many regional economic areas of our province need the incentive to have private interests develop winter facilities and utilize the resources available in most of our low economic problem regions. Therefore, it is, in my opinion not a priority for Algonquin to be developed into a winter recreation activity field.

Also, if we are to provide facilities of comfort for those who wish to partake of the park, we should give all encouragement to those who wish to establish outside accommodation and other facilities in order to resolve the financing problems associated with the tourist industry of this province.

A good part of this financial problem arises, and is present, a short distance outside Algonquin Park. There is a tremendous area around the boundaries of this park where operators wish to expand and enlarge their operations. They can only do so by a longer tourist season on which to apply capital costs.

In Algonquin, we also should limit concessions to some extent in that they provide only the type of articles that are after-thoughts, and in no way allow entry into the major fields of merchandising provided by private enterprise outside the park entrances who do not have captive consumers.

Why, for instance, should concessionaires advertise and keep trailers for rent in the park when we have very active trailer sales and rental agencies now over almost all Ontario?

These thoughts are a part of my wish that I never see the day when Algonquin becomes nothing more than a Coney Island type of recreation along Highway 60.

For instance, we see future proposals of snowmobile trails where presently we have 2,500 acres of cleared hydro line facility able to accommodate on a 400-ft.-wide strip 20 miles long almost all the machines on a given day we now have in Ontario. All that is needed here is to have some major land smoothing features undertaken to allow full use of this terrain, along with the presently wide-spaced towers. This is multiple use. There is no present need to develop trails in the park as I see it.

The Department of Lands and Forests is to be commended for the assistance provided to the Peterson trail committee that has done a tremendous work toward establishing a riding-walking-snowmobile facility from Muskoka through Haliburton and well into the Hastings northern region. Much better for the department to give special grants toward these economic developments than to expend finances in duplication of facilities.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, may I leave this thought with you, and it will be a comfortable thought. I am sure in this province where so many people need so many things, the people's government is moving forward constantly with measures to assist expanding growth. Ontario's people are making a steady upward climb in their standard of living.

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): Despite the government!

Mr. R. G. Hodgson: Our cities are cleaning up their slums, improving their transportation. Engineers are applying the development and findings of our scientists. Our educators are exploring concepts of advanced learning so that everyone, even the disadvantaged, can develop at their best individual rate of progress.

I don't mean to imply that growth is the only game there is.

And, Mr. Speaker, in expressing, through you, my thanks for a fair hearing, may I make an observation about this House over which you guide affairs, and that is that very little change has taken place in one major field and principle from the last Parliament in that the most effective reform suggestions continue to come from my colleagues on this side of the House. I thank you very much.

Mr. D. M. DeMonte (Dovercourt): At the outset I would like to quote from a remark made by H. D. Woods, the noted industrial relations expert who is dean of the faculty of arts and sciences at McGill University. Speaking to the Canadian Chamber of Commerce manpower seminar in Calgary, he said:

Whatever you may feel about unions, collective bargaining, and therefore unionism, is a natural feature of the free enterprise system, and perhaps an essential feature.

I doubt if public policy makers would be wise if they attempted to replace the present system. If, under public pressure, governments in Canada introduce compulsion in settling labour and management disputes, it is not merely the industrial relations system that would be radically altered, but the enterprise system itself.

He went on to warn that the main danger now "is that an impatient public and harassed politicians will lose faith in private wisdom and replace it by public authority".

I think, Mr. Speaker, this is the essential point of this whole issue which has been brought to the fore again by the publication of the Rand report. Trade unionism is part and parcel of the free enterprise system. Therefore, unions and management must be allowed—and encouraged—to solve their differences in the free play of collective bargaining. The action must occur across the bargaining table, directly between the parties concerned.

As Liberals, we attack the central concept of the Rand report—the imposition of another tribunal in the labour-management field. This, in our submission, cannot contribute to industrial peace. This idea, incidentally, has been used in Australia and New Zealand, and has been found to be wanting. It is far too rigid to have any validity or usefulness in this province and in the Canadian industrial context. Tremendous power would be vested in a tribunal whose whole ethos is steeped in the Conservative view of life in 19th-century terms of master and servant. The proposals do not make any provision for labour representation on the tribunal, nor is there any appeal from its rulings.

Justice Rand apparently saw little usefulness in the right to picket. Again, his approach seems steeped in a conception of law which raises property above people, and the right of enjoyment of privacy over the right of freedom of association. Most picketing is peaceful, and when it is not, the violence is usually the result of the employer bringing in strike-breakers and scabs.

We believe that the police should keep order and that breaches of the peace should be prosecuted in the normal way. We therefore do not believe in ex parte injunctions, and support their being done away with in connection with picketing. But beyond this, as Liberals, we are disturbed by the report's appearing to give legal status to strike-breakers. This is unconscionable.

If a strike-breaker goes into a plant and gets a job, the Rand report starts to give the strike-breaker legal status in the report. To our party, to the Liberal Party, this is completely and utterly objectionable.

The report appears to want to put unions in a strait-jacket while allowing employers continued freedom to go their merry way.

The tribunal envisaged by Justice Rand would have power to impose settlements and to declare a strike illegal if it wants to. This would place the tribunal in the position of imposing an agreement upon a union and upon management, or perhaps in the position of a strike-breaker.

A very disturbing aspect of the whole report is the power given to the tribunal to ask for an order of the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council that, because a specific industry or service is deemed essential, it must submit to arbitration. The thing in question here is: Who decides what is essential? The tribunal? Management? The Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council? Who decides? This is a very wide provision that certainly cannot be allowed to stand, particularly since there is no provision of appeal from any of the decisions in the Act or from the decisions of the Lieutenant-Governor-in-Council.

The whole proposal represents an inefficient and impracticable system which, quite apart from its judicial and moral implications, is demonstrably unworkable.

The laws that we have today are, in my opinion, and the opinion of this party quite adequate to protect all parties to a dispute, provided that they act in a reasonable and prudent manner. I cannot see what purpose would be served by requiring a union to become a legal entity. Certainly this proposal, if implemented, would leave trade unions open to all kinds of lawsuits and could very well destroy trade unionism entirely.

I notice that no mention is made in the report as to who suffers and who can collect in the case of an illegal shutout. Can the union sue, then, for lost wages?

Surely the essence of this is that making a union liable to suit would in no way assist in settling any given labour dispute.

The fact that the union is a legal entity is not going to make management settle any quicker, or make unions settle any quicker. I cannot see the purpose in Mr. Justice Rand's concept of making a union a legal entity.

In summary, then, let me say that these points I have mentioned form the nub of the Liberal caucus opposition to the Rand report, a document which we find puts the clock back many years.

In our opinion, the only way to settle labour disputes is to encourage a climate in which both labour and management can negotiate in peace and, subject to our existing laws, without infringement from outside parties. No one relishes a strike, and no one wants to see strikes going on and on. But, above all, we place above everything the continued right to free collective bargaining untrammelled by outside interference from third parties. That right seems to us as Liberals so fundamental as to transcend the inconveniences which its continuance sometimes imposes on the public. Better by far the temporary inconvenience than the permanent loss of liberty and fundamental human rights that would be implied in the acceptance of the Rand report and its translation into retrograde legislation more fitted to the Middle Ages than to today.

Today, the threat of personal oppression is being replaced by the threat of the inhuman depersonalization of industry and commerce. In this age of computers and technology, we have to start thinking again about putting people first, and this the Rand report does not do. Its legalistic approach seems devoid of all heart. It has perhaps served a useful purpose in sharpening our awareness that the price of liberty is eternal vigilance. So let us keep vigilant in these matters which affect all our freedoms.

I want now, Mr. Speaker, to turn to something which has been concerning me for some time, and that is the apparent casual indifference of this government to a disease which is going to confront us more and more as tunnelling under high pressure is extended for sewers and conduits, for subways and for rapid transit. I refer to the disease known as caisson disease. In its extreme form it can be a killer.

The dramatic suspension of the operations of the Sealab following the death of an aquanaut from what was temporarily classified as cardiac arrest, but which is freely admitted, even by the doctors, to be an affliction of this new frontier of high pressure, serves as a reminder that the conditions of work are always changing and bringing with them new hazards for which enlightened approaches must be prepared.

It is part of our duty as legislators to see that laws do not lag behind the actual advance into new territory of working conditions themselves. Industrial safety, like industry, cannot stand still. It is a dynamic thing, constantly changing, constantly faced by new perils and challenges. Caisson disease, while not new, is with us now and will be with us in the future to an ever-increasing extent, simply because larger numbers of workers will be expected to take this risk as part of the price of earning a livelihood in construction.

Tunnelling in caissons, Mr. Speaker, is carried out under pressure, and the air pressure in which the men work is sufficiently higher than that in the surrounding area to keep out water and to allow work to proceed expeditiously. But the human body was designed to function in an air pressure of around 17 lb. per square inch at sea level. For many of us, even a change in the weather resulting in an increase or drop of less than a pound per square inch, or a slow walk or aerial ride to the summit of a peak, can cause real discomfort. Our bodies are just not very tolerant of such changes.

Yet the men who must toil in construction under pressure must undergo compression and decompression to the point where they leave this world—this natural environment—in a very real sense, and return to it with great caution at the end of their shift. That's how it should be—a return with caution. Unfortunately, that is the element that is so often missing.

When we ask men to work under such conditions, Mr. Speaker, it is essential that their physical condition be known, and this is where we are falling short, in Ontario, of the steps taken by more forward-looking jurisdictions.

Decompression sickness proper is produced by the sudden reduction in pressure of the atmosphere, as when a diver comes up from the depths too quickly from more than 33 feet—that's the depth at which atmospheric pressure is doubled already, and that's about the limit of our freedom of movement in water—or when a flier ascends rapidly to somewhere in excess of 18,000 feet, which produces a halving of atmospheric pressure. Our jet planes are pressurized so that they don't have to take hours to reach economical working heights in the stratosphere. When that pressurization fails, passengers' blood boils, literally.

What happens in all these cases of decompression sickness, either mildly or severely, is that nitrogen bubbles are formed in body fluids and tissues faster than they can be carried by the blood to the alveolar membrane where they are normally diffused from the body. Now it is a fairly common thing for the "partial pressure" of this dissolved nitrogen to exceed the "partial pressure" of the nitrogen in the lungs. Where things get severe is in rapid transition to circumstances of more than two atmospheres or less than half an atmosphere. That is when divers get the bends. That's decompression sickness.

Caisson disease is the chronic, cumulative form of disability that comes from working regularly under pressure, and coming out at the end of a shift each day into normal atmospheric conditions. It can cripple and it can kill.

I have literally seen men who cannot even walk with crutches, the pain is so bad. And when you get bone necrosis in the joints, the joints literally rot, I understand—the blood circulation in the joints stops and the bones literally rot. That is what I understand from a layman's point of view, and I think it is called necrosis of the bone.

It needs laws with teeth to ensure that workers who have to make their living under these very unreal conditions are adequately protected against employer exploitation due to unreasonably short decompression times being allowed in the shift—and probably, to some extent, from the men's own desire to be out and washed up, perhaps unwisely driving them to seek shorter decompression from one of their mates operating the airlock. This human factor must not be lost sight of. Whatever the pretext, adequate decompression times must be stringently enforced.

Let me take members back to November 24, and the important programme on this topic aired on W5, CTV's national public affairs programme. One of the guests on this programme was Mr. McNair, an officer in the construction safety branch of The Department of Labour, Ontario. Also on the programme was his boss, the highest civil servant in the department, Mr. T. M. Eberlee. I think he is the Deputy Minister. Now, here's what Mr. Eberlee said on that programme.

In this area we are referring to at this point, the underground regulations, the caisson regulations, we certainly have plenty of scope, and there are no restrictions on it at all.

Mr. Speaker, what an admission for the Deputy Minister to make on the air!

Then came Mr. Pike, safety director for local 183, the Labourer's Union, whose men work under these conditions. He said it was the men of his union who did all the underground work. When asked if there were any major gaps in the regulations, and was he satisfied that enough people were available for enforcement, he replied:

Well, I am not at all satisfied, and we are not at all satisfied. First of all it is absolutely necessary that we have a more comprehensive medical examination spelled out in the tunnel regulations.

Mr. Pike went on to say that it was presently up to the project physician to determine what type of medical examination is to be given. In his own experience, he said—five years of practical experience of working in compressed air—the medical examination consists of a blood pressure check, a check on the sound of a man's heart, and a urine test.

They look in your ears and down your throat, give you a pat on the back and away you go, which takes about two minutes. They put about 35 to 40 men through a medical examination in one hour.

At this point, the interviewer interjected in the programme, Mr. Speaker, to suggest that Mr. Pike was exaggerating, and that some men had said they had had examinations lasting up to 15 minutes each.

Mr. Pike then made the telling remark that, because of the adverse publicity that had occurred in the few weeks preceding the broadcast, the men had started to get 15-minute examinations, something quite new. And the union had affidavits to this effect from men who had had the longer examinations as a result of the fuss.

However, as he pointed out, they were still the same kind of examination, just more thorough. What the union was quite rightly asking for was the x-raying of all joints: ankle, knee, hip, shoulder. The reason for this, he explained to the lay interviewer, was because it is at these points that the decompression bubbles get into the blood stream, and this is where the caisson disease gets its start.

At this point, Mr. McNair made an incredible observation. He said that The Department of Labour sought the advice of The Department of Health on the advisability of giving x-rays, and then he went on, and I quote:

I am not aware that anyone—x-rays by themselves would stop them from going into the compressed air project.

That is ungrammatical because I am reading a direct quote as he thought aloud. Then he thought some more and came up with this gem for the records:

In other words, what is the importance of x-rays? The purpose of the examination is to see if the man is fit to get into the project, to be allowed to work in compressed air. As a suggestion that this will prevent him from having this disease, I've never seen any information, nor have I heard any suggestions.

The interviewer then pointed out the obvious fact that routinely repeated x-rays would show up developing bone necrosis, and ultimately would lead to the doctor's warning the man off the job, off that type of work entirely. Getting a woolly, non-committal reply from Mr. McNair, he turned to the Deputy Minister for some enlightenment. He did not do much better.

"Have you ever had any advice that x-rays should be made a routine matter for men working in compressed air?" the Deputy Minister was asked. He replied:

I don't believe so. I think the first advice came, as Mr. Pike said, about six weeks ago.

So The Department of Health, to which The Department of Labour was supposedly turning for advice, had obviously been remiss in this matter.

The interviewer then asked about contact with the people in San Francisco, who had recommended this kind of thing a couple of years ago, and the Deputy Minister replied:

Our doctors in The Department of Health, as I understand it, are familiar with the San Francisco project.

It is touching to realize The Department of Labour still has faith in The Department of Health. Or is it that no subject is too serious to avoid buck-passing tactics? Then he went on:

Of course, that—San Francisco—is a project under very, very elevated air pressure.

The W5 interviewer then made the obvious point that a lot of the San Francisco findings relate to men working under 35 lb. of air pressure—that is, under two atmospheres, the critical doubling of pressure where the acute form of the disease occurs in divers on return to normal atmospheric conditions—and added "You've had men in Canada certainly working under 35 and 40 lb. of pressure".

Said Mr. Eberlee:

Oh yes, that's true, that's true, but the great range of the projects in Ontario each year for the last five years, at any rate—Mr. McNair and I aren't too familiar with things prior to '63—were in much lower air pressure.

Mr. Speaker, how long does it take? More than six years of daily contact with construction for a rapidly-growing city such as Metro, with which both Mr. Eberlee and Mr. McNair must rub shoulders every day, and yet they take refuge in the fact that most of the jobs—out of a very large number—are being worked at lowish pressures. That still leaves the possibility of the chronic form of the disease unwatched. And of course, it still leaves plenty of real high-pressure jobs.

The Deputy Minister then went on to resist the idea of continuing x-rays of the bones and joints on a periodic basis, on the grounds of over-exposure to radiation, although it was said that new techniques expose only small areas. At the same time, Mr. Eberlee admitted that proof of increasing bone necrosis on the job would probably be excellent grounds for workmen's compensation, particularly if a man was ordered out of high-pressure work on these grounds.

And there, Mr. Speaker, I think we may have one clue to the reluctance of the government to get into this field in any serious way. Is it that, in the straitened financial circumstances of today, they would prefer that workmen's compensation were not saddled with what might prove to be an embarrassingly large number of claims in a wholly new category? Do they think that this would open up the proverbial can of worms?

The next speaker in the interview was a Mr. Ferici, who had suffered bone death after working in 44 lb. per square inch of pressure in Ontario. That is well over double normal atmospheric pressure; well over 2.5 times normal air pressure, in fact. In other words, every day this man was being subjected to much greater stress than Hillary on Everest, but the other way round. And instead of a leisurely month ascending through Nepal, this is a transformation that takes place, both ways, in the course of a single shift.

Unbelievably, after Mr. Ferici got the bends, he was put on workmen's compensation for two weeks, and then sent back like a kamikazi pilot, into the high-pressure tunnel! He said:

When I went back to the tunnel to start, I can't stand any more, because it was worse than before, so the doctor take me right out. He say, "You can't go any more"—air pressure—so I ask [supervisor] if he had any job for me outside, out of the pressure.

Mr. Ferici then went on to describe a typical instance of man's inhumanity to man:

Supervisor say, "We no got anything you to do", so I had to quit the job. I apply for unemployment insurance at that time, and unemployment insurance refuse me to pay, because they not got anything to do with whatever you call, because I can't go any more in air pressure.

Surely it is part of our obligation, when we ask men to work in these literally inhuman conditions, to make sure that they not suffer financially as a result of having suffered physically on our behalf? Let us not shrug this off by saying: "That is federal." Let us admit our moral obligation, regardless of the level of government. Morality is indivisible.

We are not finished yet with this remarkable W5 programme because the representative of local 183 of the Labourer's Union, the safety director, Mr. Pike, then pointed out that although new regulations had come into effect in 1963, they were not being strictly enforced. He said:

For instance, a man is supposed to be examined and tested going on shift. This is never done. He is supposed to be examined half-way through his shift. This is never done. He is supposed to be examined at the end of his shift. This is never done.

To this, the Deputy Minister replied that the regulations place the responsibility on the doctor appointed to a project to carry out certain medical examinations. It is his responsibility as a professional man to carry out those duties. Mr. Eberlee went on to say that the department required the doctor to write a letter saying the duties he had been appointed to perform on a particular project were, in fact, those laid out in the regulations. Now, is that enforcement, I ask you, Mr. Speaker? Pressed to be more specific, Mr. Eberlee said:

They are to be placed in the medical tank by the project physician at his direction, and their reaction to exposure to the pressure is to be examined. Now there are only some nine doctors involved, so this is a very specific challenge that has been on these nine men.

Immediately, a Mr. Tully, a tunnel worker, demonstrated that enforcement is one symptom of the current malaise. He said that he had been working only under pressure for two months. He was examined the day he started, and then not under pressure, and he had not been examined since, under pressure, ever. He just got a cursory once-over before going on shift, and that in normal atmospheric conditions.

Mr. Eberlee and Mr. McNair said they wanted names and cases so that they could follow up on the possible delinquent doctors. Mr. Pike said that he had brought all this up, admittedly in general terms, as long as 18 months ago.

Why could not the department go out and get this information? Nevertheless, having done the work himself, he produced six affidavits signed respectively by: Cully O'Donnell, John McRossen, James Sayes, William Farrow, Andy Burns and James Gallacher. These men all swore that they were not medically examined under pressure before, during, or after their first shift, working under pressure.

And then, in exasperation, Mr. Pike blew up and expostulated that it was not up to the labourers' union to enforce the regulations but to the Ontario government, and he was right. The Department of Labour, he added, was supposed to have people out on the road, watching for this kind of infringement. Surely it was enough to bring the matter to the government's attention in general terms?

But, even with the specific initiative brought forward, the Deputy Minister admitted that the department could not write stop work orders. So there was revealed a weakness in the Ontario legislation itself, quite apart from its enforcement.

Suppose, and I have heard of this, I am a solicitor and a lawyer in this city and I have had these people come to me with caisson's disease, and do you know what—in some cases the people were required to work under pressure double the time required by the Act, double the time required by the Act, without any physical examination either before, during, or after their work period.

A little later in the programme, Mr. McNair resisted attempts to approach the problem on the basis of a general survey of the under-pressure construction projects, of which it was stated there had been 45 in the past five years. His attitude was: "give me individual cases, and I will pinpoint the responsibility to a particular doctor failing to carry out his agreement and replace him with one who will enforce the regulations."

Now is that not a silly statement? Who is to enforce the regulations? Is it a doctor—do we not set down certain regulations that a doctor must follow in examining the people that work under pressure? I have here before me, Mr. Speaker, the Compressed Air Safety Orders of the state of California Department of Industrial Relations, and may I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I have never seen such complete and specific orders that set out what has to be done by the doctor, by the foreman, by the supervisor where the tanks are supposed to be; it provides for a man who works under pressure to carry a card in case he is suddenly attacked with the bends when he is out somewhere so they can rush him back to the tank and he can be depressurized.

It is a completely logical system, and under this system, Mr. Speaker, the pre-examination before they allow a person to work under pressure takes three hours. They examine the joints, they do blood tests, they do urine tests, they examine the joints under x-ray, under pressure, and the man is given a complete physical examination.

The other point, Mr. Speaker, is that there are certain diseases a person has that prevent him from working under pressure. For instance, an arthritic. It would be ridiculous for him to go under pressure because it would probably destroy his joints.

There are many people that are afflicted with certain diseases that would not normally cause any problems in normal atmospheric pressure but would cause serious problems when the men worked under pressure. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Labour or the Workmen's Compensation Board can get this report and study it and implement it.

Surely if somebody else has done the research, has had the experience, why not adopt the research and the experience and save many men from that crippling, killing disease of caisson?

Now it is quite clear that, so far as enforcement is concerned, the department is looking more and more to the avenue of complaints, apparently supported by individual affidavits. I submit that this represents a laissez-faire attitude, and a negative approach to the whole matter. The Department of Labour is not taking any initiatives at all in this.

Now it might be that the Workmen's Compensation Board should take issue here because they are ultimately the people that are going to pay for this. If too many men are afflicted with the disease it is going to cost them a great deal of money.

Perhaps this research and these regulations should not be in the hands of The Department of Labour, perhaps we should place it under the jurisdiction of the Workmen's Compensation Board. Perhaps only the research should be under the Workmen's Compensation Board. They are the ultimate payers, they should probably do the research, and look into this type of legislation and see how we can adopt it.

Moving on, the regulations say that an attendant may look after more than one airlock if he may safely do so. That is the kind of woolly, subjective qualification that is wide open to abuse, and the programme showed, in fact, that it had been abused, that airlocks were often to far apart to be reached by one man in an emergency.

They say, Mr. Speaker, that the compression safety orders of the state of California set out that there be automatic devices on air locks; that there be devices on the inside and devices on the outside, so that in case of an emergency it can be controlled either automatically by the person in the air lock and by the person watching the air lock. In California the decompression system is on a tape, it is in a small computer which allows the pressure to drop at a given rate so that no man is dropped or raised up too quickly, which of course causes compression sickness.

Mr. Pike, of the union staff, himself had an eardrum ruptured in circumstances where the pressure buildup could not be stopped in time; because the attendant was out of reach of the controls. He said:

I gave the bell, the one bell to stop the compression. The lock tender was attending two locks, and before he got back to the lock that I was being compressed in, my eardrum was bursted, and as a result I lost the hearing in my right ear.

Mr. Pike said that he complained to Mr. McNair at the time, in fact they had quite an argument about what a safe distance might be. But nobody in their right mind would suggest that fifty feet apart was a working distance to be encompassed by one man, he added. At the time of his eardrum burst, both locks were in simultaneous use, with twelve men in each one, being compressed at the same time. "While he was over attending to me, there could have been an accident in the other one, another eardrum bursted", he said.

Mr. Ferici, the victim of the inhumanity earlier referred to, is now an airlock attendant, since he can no longer work inside. He gave cogent reasons in support of the common sense position that there should be one attendant for each airlock. I think that we ought to endorse this simple change in the regulations here and now, as a very first step, regardless of what comes later. I say this simple regulation ought to be published immediately.

Dr. Gamarra of the East General Hospital, Mr. Speaker, who has specialized in decompression sickness, says that a man can be exposed to compressed air for several months without showing any signs or symptoms. Then, in a moment, he might develop the tell-tale signs of the illness: the pain in the joints, the itching skin, the difficulty in breathing and the tiredness, possibly even a bleeding from the nose or ears. Furthermore, these symptoms might be delayed for as much as up to two years after a man leaves the tunnel. How, then, does a lay workman prove his case in the absence of back-up medical opinion in this new field?

This medical specialist is vociferous in his call for a complete set of X-rays before a man enters caisson work. Otherwise, there can be no basis for future comparison. The cause of new lesions cannot be pinned down. He says:

Hardly a man working under compressed air in Toronto has had previous X-rays. I don't recall anyone having been examined radiologically. This creates a problem, not only for the compensation board, but also for the worker, because there are several other factors which can resemble the same type of lesion.

Dr. Gamarra also subscribes to the view that the amount of radiation a man will experience would be minimal by taking these X-rays.

The doctor cites cases to show what happens in the case of a man who has been decompressed too quickly, as might easily happen at the end of a shift, if the supervision is lax and all are over-eager to get home. Within ten minutes after this so-called "explosive" decompression—that's the medical term, it does not mean there is a bang—the man will experience pain in his joints.

He must then move quickly to be re-compressed, and then decompressed slowly. Unfortunately, by this time he may well be on the streetcar or bus, or, as has happened right here in the city, he may be overcome while driving home in his car, while actually at the wheel. In this instance, he is obviously a severe hazard to everyone in the vicinity. In one case, a man was stricken, shot through a red light, and had to be rushed to the compression chamber by the police, who fortunately were able to understand the situation.

Other instances have found men stricken at home. Not understanding the medical aspects of the situation, they have sought relief in hot or cold baths, which have not improved matters, and finally the police or other emergency service have been called and the affected man has been hurried to compression.

One specific worry is that obese men are apparently being allowed into this kind of work, although it is known that in the event of a decompression accident it is extremely difficult to get the nitrogen bubbles out of fatty tissue. They then cause agonizing pain because of the mechanical distention of the blood vessel walls. The nerves in these walls are sensitized to detect and react to events at a much lower threshold, so these gross shocks result in an overloading of the nervous system and most severe pain.

Dr. Gamarra has medical slides showing heart and lung sections infiltrated with nitrogen gas bubbles which have displaced the blood. They are quite shocking, and make us ask what we expect of our fellow men in pushing ahead with construction progress, towards what goal?

Furthermore, when we ask men to work in these conditions we also subject them to drill and other machine noise which, uncomfortable as it is at normal atmospheric pressure, passes the threshold of pain in the more solid medium of air compressed to two or 2½ times normal atmospheric pressure. A noise level of 120 decibels, the kind of level you get on the tarmac right behind a jet engine at an airport is common and continuous. The pain level is generally set at 115 decibels. So these men are actually working in conditions of pain for a great part of the time.

Again, the question of compensation arises, for delayed effects. Studies show that these men have a much better-than-average chance of deafness in middle age, yet how does one prove that this is compensable? No wonder that so many men leave pressurized jobs, never to return. Attempting to survey the situation, Dr. Gamarra says that he had great difficulty in locating the men, since no one will long remain on the job under such conditions. "The great majority of men are frightened—markedly frightened—by seeing their friends being hospitalized by the effects of high pressure", he says. They have started the job without any knowledge of caisson disease. They are going into a situation blind.

Dr. Gamarra believes that the 1963 regulations are good as far as they go, and recognizes that work under pressure is going on all over the world. However, he lays great stress on the education of all concerned, both as to the nature and incidence of the disease, and also the enforcement of the regulations. If the foreman or safety inspector does not know the nature of the problem, then we are bound to have more cases than if there is a thorough understanding by all concerned. The doctor also believes that the regulations must be constantly updated to keep pace with our fuller understanding of the compression working situation and its effects. This is a book which must be kept open at a page marked action.

We ought to have observers over at the Bay area rapid transit operation, where the medical examination practices are so much ahead of our own, and we ought to copy all that is good from them. I notice we are trying out carpeting for the Bay area system in our TTC subway cars. I am sure that this co-operation can be even closer and more meaningful, particularly as we are faced with engineering some of our subway extension tunnels by means of these high-pressure caisson techniques.

There ought to be a booklet distributed among construction workers, through all the outlets available to us, and through the National Employment Service. This booklet, which might be called, working under compressed air conditions, would tell a man what to expect. There must be many cases where men have wrongfully been cut off from unemployment pay because they could not take this kind of work, or because the unemployment benefit officer did not appreciate the genuineness of their complaint. I think these are things that cut right through all levels of government, and we must not use this as an excuse to fob off responsibility.

Such a pamphlet would certainly tell a man how to check if he can equalize pressure. If his ears pop in the elevator, it's a sign his auditory tube is normally blocked or subject to blockage, and he ought not to be seeking that kind of work. Similarly, the man with sinus trouble, the man with recurrent toothache and cavity problems. It should also be stressed that this is no job for the older man—40 being an absolute cut-off point—and that older, fat men should stay right away from the site.

The danger of excess alcohol in this kind of living, especially in view of the temptation that comes with a higher hourly rate, should also be mentioned, since after-work beer drinking has proved a problem on the West Coast where it has led to dehydration and heat prostration. In this job hard liquor is taboo.

The brochure would also explain, in simple terms, exactly what the symptoms were. I can see that my friends across the aisle are smiling, thinking that this would be an open door to malingering and to further compensation claims. But I say we have to do this, because it is all working the other way at the moment. Today, we can cause bone death without symptoms or pain, and we can take away that part of a man without his knowledge.

Only if the bone death occurs at the articulated joints does he feel it. On the shank, we just destroy his being silently, because the bone just rots and just goes away, and he will not even know he has a claim against society for it. Who is to say that any pay cheque is sufficient compensation for this kind of assault, for that is what it is. There has also to be an iron-clad social obligation to those who do this for us.

We must be prepared to face up to the cost of a thorough X-ray examination, running in the Bay area rapid transit operation at $75 per man. The way BART approached this high cost is interesting. They argued that just the compensation of one aggravated pathological lesion condition would cost more than perhaps hundreds of such examinations, and so they went ahead. Perhaps if the Ontario union can get a few men to press compensation cases and break some new compensation ground, then the whole attitude of The Department of Labour will change from one of passive reaction to individual complaints, to one of aggressive involvement in the total situation.

We must have a stepped-up medical qualification for everyone working under pressure, and it must include the following, as it does at BART:

1. Identification photographs and personal data form, copy available to examining doctor;
2. Overall physical examination (as for insurance);
3. Balance, agility and co-ordination test;
4. Audiometer test (first of a continuing series to detect incipient deafness);
5. Cardiopulmonary fitness test;
6. Dorsal flexibility test;
7. Electrocardiogram;
8. Comprehensive X-rays (set of 16);
9. Chamber pressure equalization test.

We must have two or three emergency recompression chambers in the east, north and west of Metro, with facility for oxygen inhalation while the subject is being recompressed. This flushing technique seems not to be easy here at the moment, yet we must have it as the subways expand.

Again, it is a special new expense, requiring trained doctors who can detect when the oxygen ceases its action of flushing out the nitrogen and starts to become toxic and irritating of itself. How many doctors in and around Toronto can undertake this therapy now? Certainly not enough to man these chambers round the clock, although work will go on round the clock, and off-duty people are more likely to be smitten in the night.

In San Francisco there is a charge against the contractor for the emergency therapy, and that is how it should be here. It should be built into the cost of the contract.

We have to educate contractors themselves to budget for longer and longer periods of decompression as the pressure in the caisson increases. In the really high-pressure areas of 40 or more pounds per square inch, in San Francisco, it now takes up to three hours out of every shift just to bring a man down. There's a hope that men will settle to live in the caissons for up to a week at a time, but so far no progress has been made. The men want out every day, and there's no cheap way of doing this if their health is to be preserved.

Another proposal has been advanced that men should work breathing oxygen. The disastrous Apollo fire has set back that idea, if it has not thrown it out the window entirely, and this is as it should be, since with power drills and other machinery making sparks, the possibility of catastrophe would be immeasurably increased, under these circumstances.

Nor would workmen take easily to wearing scuba-diving type mouthpieces. Furthermore, when pure oxygen is being inhaled, the muscles will not function, so the work pattern would have to be alternate periods of work, breathing ordinary air, and rest, breathing oxygen.

I make no apology for going into such detail on caisson work, because it is important that members of the Legislature be familiar with the strange new frontiers we are facing today; the working conditions that more and more people will be asked to endure. This Legislature must not always be looking backward. It must be fully conversant with today's problems and those of tomorrow. It must make laws for the future and not for the past.

As I speak, there are nine projects going on in Toronto under the conditions I have described, and I want to name them for the record, because I intend to be asking questions before the orders of the day, on the conditions at each job, and whether the doctors are enforcing existing regulations.

I regard it as most important that the Legislature and the department be alerted to the fact that we of the Opposition are on our toes in this matter, and that we do not intend to let the subject drop with this speech. Hence, the enquiry of the Ministry I have tabled for the Order Paper today, as a beginning.

Here then, are the current jobs we are watching:

McNulty and Sons—at Bayview and Bloor; at Greenwood and South Danforth; and at Woodfield and Dundas.

First Line Contracting—at Bathurst and St. Clair; at Don Mills and York Mills.

Scott Jackson—at Hillsdale Avenue and Collin Avenue.

Sansone Construction—at Gerrard Street, off Greenwood.

Keystone Contracting—at Dundas Street West and Highway 27.

Robert McAlpine—Mount Pleasant and Mount Pleasant Avenue.

I want to serve notice upon the Minister of Labour to be ready with some specific answers, either to questions before the orders of the day, or at the time of his departmental estimates. In particular, we want to know about those affidavits, and the extent to which the complaints have been followed up. Who was responsible? If the responsibility lies with the doctors, who were they? Are they still on the job?

We certainly do not like naming Deputy Ministers or departmental heads in the Legislature, but a peculiar situation is arising these days, which others have remarked on as well as myself.

More and more, these gentlemen appear and are identified by name on television and in the press, usually in commendable response to enquiries.

I am all for the free flow of information in the frankest terms. But here is one example where the communications revolution is altering the traditional anonymity of the Deputy Minister and the public servant. Whether or not we approve of this development, we have to note it as a fact that along with this exposure comes more vulnerability for the public servant concerned.

But what I want to emphasize in all this is that, in the last analysis, it is the Minister who is responsible. That is what responsible government is all about. And the Minister of Labour must be ready with his answers in the House, even for the commissions and omissions of those who serve him.

I have in my hand the current California legislation for caisson workers. I should like to offer it as a model. I want to see a government bill on this matter, better than the present regulations made under section 10 of The Department of Labour Act, 1960 and the 1963 amendment.

This new bill must be more specialized and based on the latest advice. I do not intend to rest, and neither do my colleagues, until we get it. And along with the new law, or even preceding it, must come enforcement by people who have been educated to an understanding of what the caisson problem is all about.

We used to be recognized in this province, in the field of workmen's compensation, as a jurisdiction which paid more attention to a humane approach, to benefitting the workman, than to the legalistic approach of the workman proving his claim.

When the State of New York did its survey, around 1956-57, they seemed to drain off the humanity from the Ontario situation and import it into the State of New York, so that our attitudes have been reversed. Now they are very humane in their approach, and we are very legalistic in our approach.

The head of the Workmen's Compensation Board has, unfortunately, taken a legalistic approach to the claims of the workmen. As far back as 1914, it was stated that this should be a workman-oriented plan, that we should assist the workman to prove his claim, not make the workman prove his own claim and set up legalistic barriers that he must hurdle in order to prove that he was injured on the job and has a right to compensation.

Today, the atmosphere is overwhelming for the ordinary claimant—I might use the word "traumatic". The claimant is sworn, having been led into the room. He is confronted by a great big panel of people. He is brought before a big table to give his evidence. Sometimes the employer is there to fight his case and everything is heard in extremely formal circumstances. And I might say, Mr. Speaker, that more and more workmen have to go to free legal aid to hire lawyers to go to the Workmen's Compensation Board. This was not intended in the original legislation, not intended at all.

And I might cite, Mr. Speaker, other boards and commissions. The Immigration Appeal Board there is one hearing and one appeal; two protecting the right of a man who might be deported.

Now, in summary, it is my submission that the whole atmosphere is one of a trial. I am quite sure that this atmosphere is far removed from the original intention of the far-sighted proponents of workmen's compensation as originally conceived.

We are sure that this province has been in the forefront of the workmen's compensation laws, but within the last three or four years, we are slowly falling behind workmen's compensation laws. We are setting up barriers, Mr. Speaker, to the right of the workman to prove his claim in the simplest and best way he knows. The workman knows how; not some lawyer, not some adviser, but the workman in his informal, simple language that he can use before some officer of the board can say, "Look, I got hurt; I cannot work because of this".

Oh no, they want reports. It is worse than an accident claim. I do many accident claims and many workmen's compensation claims, and in some cases the accident claim is easier to settle than the workmen's compensation claim.

An hon. member: Do it much faster, too.

Mr. De Monte: Sure. The original intention was that a workman who was hurt got decent compensation for his injury. It was never intended that there should be a long legalistic series of tribunals preceding an award.

In other words, a workman gets hurt, no question about it, on a certain job. He makes his formal claim; he goes to the workmen's compensation board; he is paid. Suppose this injury prevents him from working? Suppose some officer says, "Why, you are not hurt, you had better get back to work," and the man goes to work and cannot work? He has to go to the appeal tribunal, to the full board, and to whatever board they are going to dream up in the future.

Now, today, it takes six or seven months to complete the whole ritual, and there is less and less concern for how the injured workman is going to make out in the interim. He could starve or wilt away through frustration and exhaustion before anyone would lift a finger by way of an award, until the tedious pattern has been fully followed through. Prove your claim and we will pay, says the board, or you have the right to appeal to the next higher step. So the man has to go to legal aid and get a lawyer. The board sits back, smug and fat. The workman is the all-time loser in this set-up, and it has got to be changed.

Three or four weeks ago I asked the Minister to answer certain questions. These I regarded as urgent, so I asked them before the orders of the day. The Minister decided they were technical in nature and required research, so he transferred them to the order paper, where they remain to this day, unanswered. You will find them listed as question 15 on the order paper.

Now I suspect that the real reason the Minister resorted to this delaying tactic was that he found that the questions were extremely embarrassing, and was hopeful that the act of transferring them to the order paper would somehow cause the whole thing to blow away. It has not, because I intend to bring the questions on to the plane of urgency again by reading them now:

15. Mr. De Monte—Enquiry of the Ministry—

1. (a) How many claims were appealed by claimants to the review committee of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968;

(b) How many claims were appealed by claimants to the appeal tribunals of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968;

(c) How many claims were appealed by claimants to the full board of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968?

2. (a) How many appeals were allowed by the review committee of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968;

(b) How many appeals were allowed by the appeal tribunals of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968;

(c) How many appeals were allowed by the full board of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968?

3. What is the average waiting time of the claimant to proceed through the full appeal structure of the Workmen's Compensation Board?

4. What is the percentage relationship between administrative cost and compensation paid by the Workmen's Compensation Board?

My point is that the statisticians on the workmen's compensation board staff or in The Department of Labour could quite easily have come forward with this information by now. They do not want us to know how many appeals are allowed, how many disallowed, and how long it takes for a workman to go through this procedure. With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, we should have these answers quickly and the answers should be precise. Two or three days is ample for the research needed for an answer to current and topical questions of this kind. We are not interested in what I might call the year book approach, but rather in the viva voce approach, the answer as it applies today in this House.

In this instance, it is very much in line with the new star chamber atmosphere in workmen's compensation that I have alluded to this whole approach. It betrays the same mental set on the part of the Minister and his staff and those who are running things at the board these days.

There is no doubt that certain workmen may be labelled as an extortionist minority and malingerers, but the vast majority of claims are genuine. All that most people want are their just desserts. That is all. No trickery, no bamboozling, just a fair share. And most workmen are only too eager to get back to work as soon as they are able. In short, most people are decent. Let us approach the whole field on this and respect this fact.

I feel that the workmen's compensation procedure should be simple, efficient and speedy. Delay in considering claims is itself an injustice perpetrated on the weak. The workman who is unable to work in the interim is placed in a very precarious position. He is thrown on the mercy of welfare, which sometimes advances money on the likelihood of a claim being settled, and then, when the claim is settled ultimately, the money from welfare comes back from the claim.

Until we come to a guaranteed annual income concept, it is inevitable that welfare will carry a stigma. That is the result of decades of conditioning to a suggestion that the poor are shiftless. It is wrong; we know it is wrong but it is a fact that that is the current connotation of welfare, and until that image is changed, I do not think it right that that stigma should also be allowed to attach itself to legitimate claimants for workmen's compensation pending the hearing of their claims.

I am impressed by the hearing procedure and the appeal procedure in immigration cases. As I said before, it is simple, efficient and workable. I think that the workmen's compensation board officers would do well to go along and observe this simple procedure in operation and copy those aspects that apply and are appropriate. I am sure that this would result in a speeding up of the process.

I am also concerned about the possible abuse of legal aid machinery in connection with compensation claims. It seems to me that if we go back to the original kitchen-table approach and away from the present formality that a great deal of money would be saved. I know that there are technical cases which need professionals to argue them, but surely not on the scale we have today? Let us use legal aid where it is more efficient and effective and not squander public money on cases that might well be settled by common sense.

I spoke earlier about caisson disease, and this is a perfect example of what I might call a "new frontier" disease. There will be more and more diseases as industrial expansion enters new, strange territories, using exotic processes and materials not found in nature. The only way for a board to know whether a claim is legitimate is to be aware of all these new developments, and this means an adequate research staff of people trained to read and abstract from the learned journals, and orally advise the board members where to look for specialists and authorities.

It is just not sufficient to say, as the Deputy Minister of Labour has said, "we rely on The Department of Health". The Department of Labour and the Workmen's Compensation Board should have their own research in this area. Anything less is insufficient and must inevitably lead to long delays and injustices to genuine claimants who happen to be working on the frontier of technology when they are stricken.

I am also very concerned with another development and that is the necessity for the use of the media before a fair settlement can be negotiated. The best example of someone who was all set for a raw deal concerns Mrs. Pat McMurrich, the widow of the policeman who was shot on Hamilton Mountain in a gun battle on December 22 last.

When Sgt. McMurrich was felled, initially the outlook was black, and the Workmen's Compensation Board, aside from giving out an automatic $500 burial cheque, was by no means the inspiration and support it might have been in the circumstances. To the board, there were legal obstacles in the way of an award. It didn't matter that Jim, 11; Susan, 7; Theresa, 6; and Sandra, 3, as well as their mother, might go hungry in the interim.

What motivated the board to sit and wait was the fact that Sgt. McMurrich had not completed his vesting period of 15 years paying in 5½ per cent of his salary to the Hamilton municipal retirement fund. He had only paid in seven years so the City of Hamilton, if the legalistic niceties of the plan were to be observed, would have to disallow the seven years at 6½ per cent of salary that the municipality had paid into the fund, and just pay the widow the few hundred dollars that would have accrued on the employee's side.

At the same time, the bureaucracy of the Canada Pension Plan was such that although there would be a retroactive payment to January 1, 1969, the first cheque would not come until March 31.

Now the board said, until all these matters are settled, we can give you no award. At least, that's what they said to begin with. And then public opinion began to build against this monstrous state of affairs, and quite suddenly the picture changed and Mrs. McMurrich was awarded $125 a month for herself and $50 a month each for her four children, giving a total of $325 a month. There is also a four-week salary payment coming from the City of Hamilton, and the pension fund regulations are going to be bent to accommodate her, at least to some extent.

Mrs. McMurrich has also inherited the family home in Dundas, and a trust fund has been set up for the education of her four children, totalling over $13,000 all from public contributions.

Mr. J. R. Smith (Hamilton Mountain): $27,000 now.

Mr. De Monte: Is it? Very good. I am glad. Now the point is this. Because of the extraordinary circumstances in which she was left a widow, the publicity and the use of the media assured her the kind of fair treatment that every widow with children should get, but doesn't. Apart from the trust fund, there was nothing extraordinary about this settlement. But she is one of the very few people who will be able to maintain her former standard of living as a result of a compensation settlement.

For the great majority of cases, which must inevitably remain anonymous because they are not news, there is a sharp drop in living standards and real hardship because of the inadequate settlements and the long delays. Only if public opinion is aroused and the workmen's compensation board has to operate in a goldfish bowl do we see the kind of settlement that ought to be the norm.

I say here and now that these dramatic drops in living standards for widows and children are immoral. They are a slur on society as a whole. We are building and breeding poverty instead of eliminating it. We have to alter our whole approach. Present awards are grossly inadequate to maintain decency and dignity for those left behind. The present delays in beginning procedures, directly contrary to section 72 of the Act, which says that a board must begin an enquiry as soon as a claim is filed, wreak havoc among the distraught families of lost workers.

I also believe that a totally disabled workman ought not to have to suffer a calamitous drop in living standards because of the inadequacy of the awards made. Who are we fooling? We are only building up another social problem that is going to have to be met through some other machinery in the long run.

We are making trouble for ourselves by being unfair to start with. Let's make the awards at the legitimate moment, when the claim is made and not years later come face to face with a welfare case, the result of injustice many years ago.

The poor workman goes out, loses an arm and gets $66 a month. That is not even reasonable and yet we persist in carrying on this Act as it was framed about ten years ago with the new amounts, but it is not sufficient to pay a man when he loses an arm.

The man cannot get a job. He is making $66 a month from workmen's compensation and goes out and works and because of his arm can only earn another $20 or $30 a week. It is not sufficient. It simply is not sufficient and we should realize the fact.

All we are doing is creating a welfare case for the future, and workmen's compensation is not welfare—it is a legitimate right that a workman obtains under The Workmen's Compensation Act for having suffered a loss to his body, to his work time and sometimes his pride.

I also want to see a review of all existing awards in the light of the inflation we have seen rampant in the last few years. All future awards and all revised awards of more than the most limited period should have an escalation clause locked in to the rise in the cost of living, so that we do not create poverty by the back door, through devaluation of our currency and the reduction in the purchasing power of awards. A man who has been hurt at work can so easily become a second-class citizen otherwise.

The McGillivray Royal Commission was rightly critical of many aspects of Workmen's Compensation Board procedures, and we shall have the opportunity to go into greater detail when we come to debate the board's operation and estimates in due course. For the moment, let me say that the intricate procedures that have evolved in the last few years are spiralling the costs of workmen's compensation claims as more of the wrong kind of staff is hired—bureaucratic, administrative types, rather than the forward-looking research staff I have advocated earlier.

In summary then, let me just say this. Let us put the humanity back into the workmen's compensation board; let us speed up the claims procedure; let us have awards move with the cost of living; let us cut out the legalistic atmosphere, and let us have the technical knowledge to enable the board to understand the legitimacy of some of the newer claims. Let us have a system that will not breed poverty, but which will uphold decency and dignity among those afflicted and their kin.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to make a few comments about the statements made by the member for Dovercourt in regard to the workmen's compensation board.

I have to because I just cannot agree with him in two main areas. First, I hope that he does not suggest that we bring about many of the suggestions of Justice McGillivray, because most of them would be more restrictive in regards to the claimants' benefits. The other is the hon. member's condemnation of the tribunal procedure under the board. After the tribunal procedure had been instituted for a year there was a survey made by the trade union movement and the large majority of those people.

The compensation committee chairman, who was working at it regularly, felt that the tribunal stage was an improvement, that they were able to get justice that they could not find before; that it was a regulatory system where there was a recorder who took words verbatim.

They always make interpreters available for different languages, and I do not know where he received his information to base his opinions in condemning the tribunal procedures of the workmen's compensation board. I do agree with him in some areas of his concern, but I would be very weary of asking for the implementation of many of the McGillivray commission report, because they would be more restrictive upon the claimant.

Mr. Speaker, for the past few days, anticipating that I would take part in the traditional Throne Speech debate, I have wondered what could be a timely issue or issues to speak about.

Air and water pollution, land use and conservation urban renewal, the increasing urbanization of our province, adequate housing—these are all the inherent problems that reflect the kind of environment we are now living in and must live in within the future. And finding that these problems are still with us, I reflected back over the years. And my observations of progress made in this province show little, if any—at least, on the surface.

Admittedly, we have had increased economic growth, increased population growth, increased industrialization, but we still have many problems with us. The latest report of the Ontario Economic Review, January and February, 1969, tells us that the gross provincial product has increased by 8 per cent to $26.9 billion from $24.9 billion. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that there will be two distinct reactions to this. Those in commerce and trade will be saying, "How can we grab a bigger piece of this pie?" Those on fixed and low incomes, the aged, the unemployed, unemployable, and those on social and family benefits are going to say, "How do we get a little bit of the pie?"

With that I reflect back to October 17, 1967, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that all the hon. members remember that date. That date reminded me of how this government will stoop to retain power after a long term in office, and that was the hoax they pulled upon the people of the province at that time by promising them a return in 1968 of the money that they had already taken away from them, without any further increase in taxes.

We all know what happened, but I think it should be put back on the record. The Ontario hospital premiums, of course, were increased by $27 per year for a single person, and $54 per year for a family. PSI and other private insurance plan premiums also increased. And as we understand it—and it was verified by the hon. doctor on the other side of the House—we will have a 10 per cent increase in doctors' fee effective April, 1969.

The OMSIP premiums increased by $10.80 per year for a single person, and by $21.60 for a couple, and $27 for a family. We also are aware right at this particular time of the automobile licence fee increases. For a four-cylinder vehicle to the increase is $15 to $20.

For a six-cylinder from $20 to $27.50; for an eight-cylinder from $25 to $35. The gasoline tax increased 18 cents per gallon, and plus the 2 per cent federal tax, this is equivalent to about $12 per year increase for the average driver. This makes the Ontario gasoline tax one of the highest in Canada, and the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the 1968 property tax rebate amounted to an average of $48 for each tenant and property owner. And this is the Hamilton average; it varied across the province. However, if we look at figures as to the number of dwellings in the province and the $150 million that was spent, we find that it should have been closer to an average of $78, which points out very well in effect—that there was a disproportion of distribution of that $150 million.

This rebate was more than offset by increases when the budget was brought down during the same session. It was obvious that the government promises of no tax increases and the benefits of the property tax rebates were shortlived. The budget contained tax increases affecting the high and low income people.

And the question, Mr. Speaker, that the people in the province are going to continue to ask is, why does the government take so much out of our pockets and put so little back? Then, to add salt to the wound, following the end of the session the government committee recommended the extension of the 5 per cent sales tax on food and children's clothing.

The New Democratic Party and others across the province felt this would be an unjust tax and would more affect those on low incomes than those with the extra disposable moneys to spend. We opposed this vigorously across the province, and in face of a strong public outcry the government was forced to abandon this proposition for the time being at least.

Even with the basic shelter tax credit scheme, there is still a great need to transfer the burden of property taxation from those least able to pay to those most able to pay. For example, a family with a $15,000 house a $100 per week income pays about eight per cent of its income in property tax. A $24,000 house with $200 per week income pays only a 6 per cent tax. And that varies and reduces as the income rises with a better type of a house.

I want to assure the government, Mr. Speaker, that this party will continue to press for a prices review board to justify or stop the ever spiralling cost of food and other commodities. It seems that the marketplace in our free enterprise society has always been where men deceive one another and demand all they can get. I strongly reject that idea and believe that a market can be made a place of fair dealing if adequate laws are made to eliminate the minority who consider it fair game to prey on their fellow man.

Mr. Speaker, I want to deal to some extent with the so-called basic shelter tax credit programme. First, I want to put on record three of the many letters I received in regard to this tax rebate, and the subsequent rent increases that followed the first words that were said about the programme. I know that other members have done the same, but I think that to illustrate what I am going to say in continuation of my speech, they should be on record.

This one says:

In the month of May, 1968, my rent advanced $5. The explanation given was the same as is recorded in the letter of November 1, which is enclosed. This now makes an increase for the last six months of $14. My wife, who had a conversation on the phone with the owner's wife, and was informed that the apartment owners' association held a meeting and decided to increase the rents for the reason that the provincial government has placed a tax on them and this last raise is to compensate for it.

In speaking to the owner of 2205 King Street East, who does not belong to the association, he tells me he is not raising his rents until next year—1969, and only if the city taxes advance. He also informed me that his city taxes increased $300 in 1968 and that he only increased the rent $3 to $5 to compensate for the increase in city taxes, which he said was sufficient to carry this.

This apartment is composed of 11 units and the apartment I am living in is 32 units, approximately three times the size. And three times $300 is $900 in extra taxes. The owner of this apartment collected $1,800 in extra rent on May 1, 1968, to May 1, 1969.

To digress from the letter, Mr. Speaker, I know that the writer was contemplating the rent being collected to the middle of 1969. I quote further:

And now this latest raise of an average of $7 a month gives him $2,000 for the year ending November 1, 1969. I am told that if the city taxes increase next year, so will the rents. This does not include parking of cars, which is $3 outside and $10 inside underground, which has no door. There are several tenants who are on fixed incomes. This looks like a squeeze play to me and I think something should be done about it.

Attached to the letter, Mr. Speaker, is one of several typewritten letters sent out to tenants from apartment owners and this is one from the Eastbury Properties Limited, 150 Bay Street South, Hamilton, Ontario.

Dear Tenant:

Due to an increase in municipal taxes and operating expenses, there will be a monthly rental increase of $9 effective December 1, 1968.

We will continue to try to provide you with the best of services and policies to make your living accommodation pleasant and enjoyable.

Added to that letter from the same writer is:

Dear Tenant:

Our new policy will be to have private parking for all tenants with numbered parking spaces to be assigned effective December 1, 1968. Outside parking lot one-space charge will be $3 monthly; garage parking one-space charge will be $10 monthly.

Please make the necessary arrangements with your building superintendent as soon as possible.

Now, I understand from these particular tenants they never paid any parking fee heretofore.

The second letter I would like to put on record, Mr. Speaker, is an illustration:

Dear Sir:

I have been a tenant for four years of a small one bedroom apartment at the above address which is owned by Mr. Michael Hennaway, Eastbury Properties Limited, 150 Bay Street South, Hamilton.

On October 1, 1968, I received an increase in my rent of $5, making a monthly rental of $125 per month.

On November 1, 1968, another notice was received of a rental increase of $5, stating increases were due to municipal taxes and due to the unexpected tax rebate law, this making the monthly rental $130 per month.

I am a widow with only a pension as my income. I am amazed at these extraordinary increases that are allowed in one year. I have been informed that the tax rebate due to each tenant was $48, but to date no tenant in this apartment has received this rebate.

As you are MLA for our district, I think you should be informed of this situation.

Now, the third letter, Mr. Speaker, I am going to send over to the House leader after I have read it and ask him to forward it to the appropriate department head for whatever action be necessary in regards to its contents:

Dr. Mr. Gisborn:

Further to our telephone conversation of last week, the following is an outline of the circumstances regarding my attempts to obtain the tax rebate granted by the Ontario government.

I was a tenant at 110 Mary Street in Hamilton for a three-year period ending August 1, 1968. As I understood it, I am entitled to seven-twelfths of the rebate granted to this address, and that it was the responsibility of the landlord to seek me out and pass on the rebate.

Following publication in the Hamilton Spectator that the rebates were mailed to the property owners, I checked and found that the landlord had sold the property about September 15. I then contacted the city tax office and was informed that the rebate cheque had been forwarded to the original owner, Mr. Alfred Pasternak of 100 Inverness Court in Hamilton. By checking with the real estate agent who handled the sale and Mr. Pasternak's lawyer, I obtained his address which is 1911 Lee Street, Hollywood, Florida.

Early in December I wrote Mr. Pasternak requesting a rebate. To date I have received no reply.

On January 6, 1969, following published instructions, I contacted a Justice of the Peace at city magistrate's court to lay a charge against Mr. Pasternak. When I gave Mr. Pasternak's address the secretary called the Justice of the Peace who informed me they could not accept the charge. When I explained all the circumstances and asked for advice, his words were "You're stuck".

Mr. Pasternak held considerable property in Hamilton, all rental, and I explained the amount. It was likely $700 to $1,000 that was not being turned over to the tenants. I then asked if a man could take this much money, move across the line and be free from prosecution. His words were, "He has already done it". Without further discourse I left the office.

My anger is not so much at not receiving the rebate, but the dead end I reached, inability to obtain advice and the indifferent attitude of the Justice of the Peace. The situation would never arise with proper administration of this tax relief.

I would appreciate your pursuing this matter as far as possible and being advised of your findings.

Thank you,

Yours very truly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this points out the Conservative government's inability to cope with some of the serious problems facing the province of Ontario in a sound way. It was explicit in the hasty way they decided to bribe the electorate with their own money by announcing just prior to the October, 1967, election that they would implement the 1968 Smith committee's suggestion of the basic shelter tax credit scheme.

But they changed the name of the game and came up with An Act to Provide for the Reduction of Municipal Taxes on Residential Property. I guess, Mr. Speaker, this title made it more palatable to the many havers in the province who needed the rebate as much as one would need two heads.

In the debate on the bill on second reading last April, and again in committee, fears were expressed about this; about the complications of possible conflict between landlord and tenant, and the difficulties of enforcing payments through the courts. These fears have been realized without a doubt in the past few months, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, if we just reflect on the amount of press that was received in regards to this programme.

I have just taken a few, maybe one out of six that appeared in the press.

Payments to tenants of shelter allowances proposed by Bales, Globe and Mail, January 22, 1968; Landlords warned on tax rebates. Telegram, April 11; Getting your Interest. Globe and Mail, April 2, 1968; Tax rise taken off rebate O.K., Toronto Star, April 21; Landlords attempting to get rebates, officials say. Globe and Mail, May 2, 1968; Shelter grant gives Pickering 63 headaches. Globe and Mail, April 20, 1968; A hundred tenants plan to sue landlords for rebates, rent increases came with rebates. Rebate deductions protest. Toronto Star, January 9, 1969; Late rebating landlords fined in Hamilton. Toronto Star, February 15, 1969.

Globe and Mail, December 18, 1968—Ontario pays Romney $50 on his cottage.

Court is not a collection agency, Windsor judge says in rebate case.

Hold out tenants risk suit, Wishart warns. Toronto Star, January 18, 1969; Landlords squeeze tenants for rebate. Toronto Star, May 1, 1968; Tenants plan appeal to province, claim landlord withholding funds. Globe and Mail, January 2, 1969. And so on. Apartment tax rebate should go to tenants. Toronto Star, January 8, 1968.

Never have I remembered a programme of this government causing so much confusion and having so little intent and purpose in it. The utter stupidity of the scheme is beyond me, Mr. Speaker. The government goes in for blatant bribery of the electorate with their own money in the same year as they dug it out of their pockets for increased taxes and increased health premiums. The kind of increases, which, instead of leading us towards a more progressive tax system based on ability to pay, are making it more regressive.

It was reported in the press that George Romney, Governor of the State of Michigan, received a $50 rebate on his cottage tax in Ontario. How many thousands of other Romneys got a share of the $150 million, and considered it as only one more night out on the town.

I raised this point, Mr. Speaker, on a TV panel last Sunday afternoon and the hon. member for Hamilton West replied in the sense that you cannot discriminate against taxpayers.

It pointed out the philosophy of this government, that you treat everyone equal. Equal opportunity are the words they use. Now, equal opportunity, Mr. Speaker, is not available to a great segment of our society. Those on fixed incomes, the aged, the ill, the unemployable unemployed, the uneducated. They cannot take advantage of the opportunities and get their fair share in the rat race in this province. It is just not possible, and these regressive methods that the government uses are just shameful.

There has been a fraudulent smell about the scheme from the start. It was originally known as the Basic Shelter tax credit plan. A summer cottage is for pleasure and is a luxury, not for basic shelter. Thousands received the tax rebate who did not need it. Many who spend weeks in living in hotel rooms on fat expense accounts received it. Americans who own about ten per cent of the summer cottages in Ontario, and those with cottages valued at $2,000 or less got back 100 per cent of the property tax. What a shameful disposition of the taxpayers money in this province.

The brochure sent out across the province and signed by the Minister of Municipal Affairs, states on the back of the third fold and I quote:

The system of tax reduction will transfer $150 million to the local governments in 1968. Added to Ontario's subsidies for education, roadways, social services and other purposes, this amount increases Ontario's contribution to 48 cents out of every dollar of the expenditures of the local governments.

How come, Mr. Speaker? How do you explain that?

This money went to the owner and the tenant, not to the municipalities.

The fact is that the municipalities, already strapped for funds, were put to added expenses to administer this scheme.

For example, the borough of York claims a cost of $67,000 according to the Globe and Mail of February 3, 1969. It cost the city of Hamilton $51,012—$30,074 lost in interest and $20,938 for permanent and temporary help and supplies according to the Hamilton Spectator February 3, 1969.

We will not know what the real cost has been for some time. All of the municipalities must have had extra costs and many headaches.

According to the Globe and Mail of April 11, 1968, at a press conference, the Minister laid down the law that the municipalities must inform each tenant of the amount of his grant. I cannot find, Mr. Speaker, any such order in the Act or in the regulation. How was this imposed upon the municipalities?

The quick-thinking Minister stated that tenants could withhold part of their rent if they could not get their rebate, but the Attorney General said, "Now, now my boy. Do not say that or someone will get into trouble." That was squashed very quickly.

The Minister of Municipal Affairs last July estimated the cost of his department for administration of the scheme, at $800,000. Time will only tell something closer to a realistic figure.

When we add the cost to all municipalities across the province, plus hundreds of cases taken to court, and we do not have to repeat the problem that the government's service department, established to receive complaints, ran into. I had my secretary call the officer in charge two days ago, and I believe the answer she got back was that they had 4,000 complaints up to date.

How many have been answered and rectified? I have not the least idea. Surely there must be a more sensible way to spend $150 million to assist those in this province who need assistance; those on low and fixed incomes caught in the ever-spiralling tax and cost of living squeeze; those on social and family benefits; those on low incomes caught in the poverty gap.

These problems are before us. Surely this government must have the knowledge to approach the problem.

If we retain the present system and I hope not, Mr. Speaker, we can estimate that the rebate will cost 10 to 15 per cent more in 1969 due to mill rate increases and additional new properties.

This could mean a cost of $165 to $175 million, plus $1 million administration costs by the province and, of course, to the municipalities.

Right now we know that the city of Hamilton's budget, if not sliced drastically, will demand an 18 mill increase, nine for education and nine for municipal needs, an average cost of about $77 per homeowner. This will mean the tax rebate will go up about only $10.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to relate some of the alternatives I think this government, with their philosophy, might consider.

We, as the New Democratic Party, have explained at conventions and in previous presentations to this House, how we would develop a progressive tax in this province so that we do have an equitable and just distribution of income. But we are not the government, and in making suggestions we have to keep them confined to the known philosophy of the present government.

If we retain the present system, it is estimated that the rebate will cost at least ten per cent more in 1969 due to mill rate increases and the addition of new properties to the tax role. The estimated cost, of course, $165 million plus $1 million administration cost by the province and municipalities.

The government could convert to the income tax credit. This would require the consent of the federal government to alter tax forms and adoption of the principle of negative income tax so that refunds would go to persons whose tax liability was less than the amount of the property tax rebate, but it is doubtful, Mr. Speaker, that consent would ever be given to this.

If we do not find a new way to develop some federal co-operativism between the Premier of this province and the Prime Minister of Canada, we are never going to get consent of a sensible programme.

This programme, of course, would also require thousands of people who do not have to submit tax returns to do so. Alternatively, the province could set up its own income tax collection system, and from what they tell me, if the government decides to do this, we may hear something about it next week in the Budget. It would take one or two years to implement it, and its implementation would run into a cost of between $7 and $8 million.

If the amount of the rebate continues to be tied to the mill rate, the municipalities would have just as much work as now in calculating the rebate and notifying owners, and would in addition have to apply to the income tax authorities for verification of the amounts claimed.

The income tax credit would solve the problem of rebates going to foreigners and would be limited to individuals, but it would not solve the problem of routing the rebate to tenants. Municipalities do not have sufficient data on tenants, length of tenure and forwarding addresses to either notify them of their claims or verify claims submitted by tenants to the income tax authorities. A flat rate tax credit to every householder would overcome these problems but it would bear no relation, Mr. Speaker, to property tax relief and would simply be a social credit type of hand-out which we abhor.

We could perhaps pay the present rebate only to the municipalities and we might consider two calculations (a) we could pay the same amount in 1969 as municipalities collected and disbursed under the scheme in 1968. This would be unfair, of course, to municipalities with substantial increases in mill rate or new property, as I have mentioned before. But this would save the work of recalculating the rebates. It would also freeze the province's outlay at $150 million.

And (b) we might calculate the 1968 rebates under the present formula but pay them only to the local government and not the property owners. Or the government could use these funds to take over a greater share of education costs.

I understand that each additional point of education costs assumed by the province would cost about $11 million, so the province could move from the present 46 per cent to 60 per cent with the $150 million now being spent on the rebate. The money could be distributed in an equalizing way under the present Ontario education foundation tax plan. This would be a large step towards the 80 per cent takeover of education costs which we in this party advocate.

We could also use the funds to take over all health and welfare costs, since the federal and provincial governments now pay 80 per cent of welfare payments. Of course, the province has assumed the cost of the health field—that costly portion of the health field, air pollution control. The amount needed to transfer full responsibility for these functions of the province would be less than the $150 million available and it would be in the neighbourhood, I understand, of about $75 million.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, the provincial financial responsibility for these fields does not preclude some decentralization of decision-making in the more local administration by municipalities or regional governments with their budgets, of course, subject to provincial supervision.

We could use the funds, Mr. Speaker, to ease the transition to regional government. The entire amount could be offered as a special grant to offset the sharp tax rise in areas being amalgamated, or it could be made available to new second-tier governments on an equalization footing to keep regional mill rates uniform and at a reasonable level. Of course, this proposal would discriminate against local governments in areas not slated for regional government, at present, or amalgamations or enlargement.

The funds, of course, could also be used at the first stage in a municipal foundation plan. Since our proposed municipal foundation plan is designed to equalize the tax burden among the local governments and to provide for a gradual shift of financial load from the property tax to the broader revenue sources of the provincial government, it would seem logical to replace the cumbersome and inefficient rebate plan.

Our municipal foundation plan can be adapted to both regional governments and individual municipalities. Moreover, the amount of the province's contribution can be adjusted by varying either the standard mill rate or the standard cost in the phasing. So, it can be introduced in stages.

If the $150 million were used for the first stage, we would be on the way to equalizing municipal tax burdens and services instead of giving handouts to many who do not need them.

Mr. Speaker, it is evident from recent government statements that continuation of this foolish rebate system is under review by the government. Hints are being dropped that it might be replaced by an income tax credit. As long as the provincial income tax is collected by Ottawa, this would require the co-operation of the federal government and they may not be willing to go along. Moreover, a tax credit does not solve the problem of getting rebates to tenants nor to pensioners or other low income persons who do not pay income tax.

The government has already ruled out the possibility of direct payments by cheque to each person eligible on the grounds of prohibitive administrative costs.

A more sensible change would be to pay the rebates only to the municipalities and not to the owners and tenants, so that the municipalities would get some direct help in meeting their growing responsibilities. I mentioned the situation in Hamilton right now, and I expect that our newspapers will be full of the same thing, rising taxes right across the province.

Now, many will say that this would not work because the municipalities would only spend it to develop their many needed work programmes. But certainly there must be some co-operation, some understanding and some faith in the municipal politicians and leaders, that if they got grants they would be used in the proper manner, and that they would not abuse this kind of thing if it was given in good faith. They would try to keep down the tax rate.

The most useful way in which this $150 million could be spent would be the first step toward provincial assumption of 80 per cent of the cost of education. This would do a great deal to end municipal reluctance to accept moderate price housing.

We know that in many municipalities they have shunned away from the low cost public HOME programme because this would mean larger families, larger education costs. This has been explicit in many of the briefs presented by municipalities and, of course, if you remove the high cost of education from the municipalities, they would not have this kind of restriction in mind.

Alternatively, the funds could play an important role in efforts to modernize our horse and buggy municipal system. Regional government alone will not produce more money.

As much as it is needed and as much as it will do the job has to be done in orderly planning and development in growth, it will not produce more money.

We have pressing local needs and this will not produce more money for pressing local needs nor will it succeed unless teamed with a new system of provincial equalization grants.

Our municipal foundation plan is the answer to the problem of equalizing local tax burdens and services, and can be applied to regional governments. The $150 million for rebates, which of course may rise to $175 million in 1969, could be a first instalment on the implementation of a municipal foundation plan.

A different approach, Mr. Speaker, would be to divert the $150 or $175 million to the war on poverty. This province has not even fired the first gun in that war, despite the disturbing picture of poverty in Ontario painted by the Economic Council of Canada in its latest report.

The funds would go a long way to helping our Indian population, breaking the poverty cycle for welfare families and providing more equal education opportunities throughout the province.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the government will give consideration to a new programme, a progressive programme for all the province. Many of the people in my riding remember the promises made by this government in October, 1967, that there would be no tax increase.

They ask why did they promise no tax increase and then immediately take more than $100 from our pockets with added taxes. Then when their conscience was pricked by realization that the tax squeeze was on them they bribed the people with their own money, and came out with the basic shelter tax credit programme.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that we want no more of this foolishness, no more of this misuse of the province's money. We are looking forward to a sensible, reasonable approach in the next Budget, and I hope that we do get that kind of recognition from this government.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): I have several items that I would like to speak about in this House. But first of all I would like to say that nothing pleases me better than to see the Speaker sitting in his chair. He has made me feel good because I was wondering how I was going to open my discussion if the Speaker had not been there.

I sometimes think there are two types of people in this House—those who say, “If I were to say complimentary things about him, I would not be telling the whole truth,” and those who say, “If I said nasty things about him, I would be a nasty politician and I do not want to do that.”

Having said that, may I say that no one in this House has more respect for this Chair and the assembly and the people in it than I have. Every man here was elected by the constituents in his riding, every man here I believe is here conscientiously to do a good job for his riding. I respect you all, and in 10 years' time I have found that if nothing else has come of my being in the Legislature, it has given me an opportunity to meet with people from every corner of this province, who I believe are sincerely trying to do a good job for the people they represent and for the province of Ontario.

I was going to prepare my speech this evening and tell you what I thought of each department, but an individual would have to be somewhat lacking in his make-up and in his memory if he could not speak to the departments of this government without notes.

I look across the floor to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett), for instance, and I think what that fine man did when he raised your licence plates by $10. There are some who can afford it. But there are thousands who cannot.

I remember the legislation that he brought into this House when he decided that the youngsters who ride motorcycles should wear helmets. What a fine piece of legislation that was. But he did not consult the people who ride the motorcycles.

As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, this helmet has the tendency to deflect the sound, which makes it much more dangerous to ride a motorcycle than if the rider did not have one of those things on.

It seems to make sense to me now after these youngsters came to me with a petition and said, “We who ride the motorcycles ought to know what the dangers on the road are. And because we know, we feel the Minister should have taken it up with people who are expert in the field and said: ‘How do you think it should be designed, if you think it should be at all, and if it should, we will agree, providing you come up with a sensible kind of headgear.’”

Every individual on a motorcycle that goes by you has on a different type of headgear, and if he finds his headgear uncomfortable, it is not worn at all but attached to the seat.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): The Liberal Party again!

Mr. V. M. Singer: (Downsview): That is not what he said.

Mr. Bukator: That was an exceptionally good contribution from the minister from lord knows where—Yorkview. He has studied this thing but he too did not sit down and discuss the things with the individuals affected.

I believe that if I were riding a motorcycle, I would at least expect someone in the government to determine what type of thing would do the job of safety for us. This would have been the proper approach. Now I was asked by many of my constituents who ride motorcycles to bring this before the hon. Minister to try to tell him their side of the story because they were not afforded that opportunity. I thought that made sense to the point where I decided, “Gentlemen, you have come to me with a delegation. I will take this up with the people in authority and I will see whether they might not sit down and decide, at least, to have a transparent type.” It should be one that may be open at the back, so that they can hear the oncoming vehicle. Because they claim that with this soundproof helmet that deflects sound, they cannot hear; therefore, they are more dangerous than they would be riding the motorcycle without them.

An hon. member: The Minister should have one like that.

Mr. Bukator: That makes sense. So much so that I think maybe I should touch on another point or two. In my neighbourhood—I see the Minister of Correctional Services (Mr. Grossman) looking at the clock and I was just getting wound up as I was coming to his department. I was wondering when Lincoln and Welland are going to get that lovely jail that we talked about at a lovely dinner about two years ago.

An hon. member: Give him a chance to have his supper.

Mr. Bukator: Shall I move adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: If the member has reached an appropriate point in his remarks.

Mr. Bukator moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

SPEECH FROM THE THONE

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is good to see you back.

I was speaking on the licence plates and helmets that are used by the people in the province who ride motorcycles. I think that many of the good citizens of this province who ride a machine of that type are often condemned because of the few in that particular group that do not behave themselves.

They get into trouble, they ride around in groups, and there was a tendency to smear every individual who owned a motorcycle. And then this government decided to protect these people against themselves, by deciding to pass a statute to protect them with a helmet. Well some of those who have to wear these helmets—because of the type of people that they are—do not need helmets. They would never hurt their heads, but there are many citizens who should have protection—

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Too thick!

Mr. Bukator: As far as he is concerned, the Minister of whatever he is, should just keep his seat and keep quiet and I will tell him all about his department too. I am making the rounds. I am glad he came back again. It is nice to see him in the House.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): He needs a little advice.

Mr. Bukator: So, getting back to the helmets. If the government would have sat down with people who know that industry, and who would have designed a unit of a type that does not act as blinkers, something with which they could hear the vehicle coming from behind, then it would have been a safety measure.

Now, why I brought this up again, Mr. Speaker, is that someone spoke to me during the dinner hour and said: "I understand you are against helmets on the riders of motorcycles."

I am not. I think a proper unit, a proper type, properly thought out, would have been the bright thing to do and I think the right place to get that kind of information is to go to the experts, the people who ride the motorcycles. Having said that, I know a word to the wise is sufficient and I will quit there.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: The member is not ahead.

Mr. Bukator: I thought I was ahead.

Mr. Nixon: Of course you are ahead.

Mr. Bukator: You will find as time goes on who is ahead because you know, Mr. Speaker, you know what defeats a government? It is not the Opposition that beats them, it is the people who have constantly, for 25 years, been kind of taken for granted by this government. They decided: "We know all and the public knows nothing." So this is what is going to defeat them.

I would think that the increase in licence plates alone—can you imagine a person owning a Volkswagen that takes up about a quarter of the road having to pay $20 for licence plates.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Ken Bryden owned one.

Mr. Nixon: Now he has a turtle neck and sideburns.

Mr. Bukator: $20 for a licence. Those of you on that side of the House who can afford an eight-cylinder car have to pay $35.

Now I understand this, that the government—the Ministers—can afford the $35, but there are many people outside of this Chamber—yes, and many here in the audience—who have eight-cylinder cars and they ought not to be paying that kind of money.

It is the cost. An old codger said to me many years ago—he was a kind of peculiar nut and this is where I get some of my ideas—he said it is not the high cost of anything, it is the high cost of mismanagement. And he hit the nail right on the head. We, the people of the province, really cannot afford you people!

An hon. member: Why is the member here then?

Mr. Bukator: We are here in the Opposition telling you of your faults on the government side of the House, and you know some of these back benchers might add something to them if they come up to date, Mr. Speaker. Having said that, I would like to get to the Minister of Correctional Institutions.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Services.

Mr. Bukator: Correctional Services.

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): Not much service, but a lot of correction.

Mr. Bukator: In 1950 I was honoured by the county council—I was a member of the county council at that time—to come to this fine building here, with hat in hand, to speak to the Attorney General of that day, the hon. Dana Porter, a very fine man. We decided to tell him that the cost of county buildings because of where they are situated, and the type of service that they rendered as a court house, ought not to be borne by the taxpayers of that particular area and it makes sense. I see the Attorney General is an interested and reasonable man, and he may do something about this, with his colleague sitting next to him.

We came here and said: "Mr. Porter, we do not believe that this cost should be borne by the taxpayers of the county on their local taxes, because that is not a just type of taxation on the people in that area. The province should bear the whole cost of this."

At that time, there was a peculiar formula used; 33 1/3 per cent paid by the province and 66 2/3 paid by the county. And also, if a man did go to jail and needed a toothbrush, they decided—no matter how bad you were, or whether you had any teeth at all—if you went to jail for 30 days, you had a toothbrush, toothpaste and a pillow.

Now, I am talking for an improvement over the county jail that we had at that time. So we came back from that particular meeting thinking that this Minister was an honourable and reasonable man—that he would do something for us. Well, it took many years.

Finally, this fine gentleman who represents that institution now—with a new name instead of prison and reform and many others—when he was here, I don't remember what they called that institution.

Now, Correctional Services is what we have, but the trouble is we don't have the services. I was in St. Catharines when Lincoln county and Welland county, which now will become the larger region, thinking you were going to invite me to this dinner. I did not get in on the picture. There is a funny thing about the members of the Opposition, they are invited to eat—they are invited to be seen, but are not indeed in the picture, and are not given an opportunity to say anything because they might say something that might not be too complimentary.

However, I was pleased because now it is going to be a 50-50 cost. The province is going to pay 50 per cent Lincoln county is going to pay 25 and Welland 25. We are now moving towards the plan on which everybody shook hands. The pictures were taken and I went home and I said: "That's one gimmick I will not be able to use in the House any more, because they are going to build a new sub-unit, farm—regional detention services centre." And would the Minister of Mines and Resources believe it, that place has not been built yet. I do not think they have the land for it.

I thought maybe I would talk to him, because Hydro or the department that he represents—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator:—Hydro that he represents is going to build a $25 million or $30 million building at the corner of College street and University avenue here in Toronto on a lot that is not big enough to put the building on. Now, boy, that is an accomplishment!

An hon. member: How much is that going to cost?

Mr. Bukator: You know what I like about speaking in the Throne debate, you can go all over the province, talk about many issues, and you can be wrong as often as you are right, and no one can call you out of order.

An hon. member: You are right every time. You have not been wrong yet.

Mr. Bukator: Now you have not been here that long.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator: However, I am an optimist. I believe that building will one day be built.

I was hoping the Minister of Municipal Affairs would be here. We hear a lot about regional government lately, so I am going to file this matter until he comes in.

An hon. member: Do not hurry back!

Mr. Bukator: I would like to speak to my friend from water resources. It is going to be a kind of a friendly get together. But as I speak to him about some of the issues with which we have to contend, I think you would have to multiply that many times because most municipalities in the province have similar problems.

Not too long ago, the general manager came to the Falls, to the Brock Hotel, and he spoke to the industrial management group there. He went on to say that pollution is a problem that we have to contend with. Now I can paraphrase only, I do not remember his exact words, and I am sure that members would not want me to read his speech. And he feels that we, in Canada, have done much more to clean up the pollution of our waters than the United States has.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator: We in Canada, have done more than they have in the United States.

Now, if you drive along our border, or if you are fortunate to have a plane—such as that of the Minister who is interjecting—to travel along our water boundary you will find in many of the areas nothing but bush. There is nobody there to pollute them for hundreds—yes, thousands—of miles, except where the international waters meet, and where there is the odd bridge. We have American and Canadian people living along these borders, and, as luck would have it, in the area where I come from, and that is between Buffalo and Niagara-on-the-Lake, on the Niagara river—

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey South): Because of pressure!

Mr. Bukator: Not because of the pressure, but because of the common sense and reasoning of those fine people, the village of Chippawa decided to build the necessary disposal units. In the village of Chippawa where I live, they built both the primary and secondary treatment plant, long before I ever came to this particular House. Because as reeve at that particular date I thought this was the proper thing to do.

The city of Niagara Falls built a $5 million plant, but only primary treatment. And I criticized my good friend for the great county of Welland because the city of Welland, from time to time, was saying they would do something, but they never did, until about two years ago.

Can you imagine the county seat without disposal units at an intersection of waters, the Welland river and the Canal? My friends, you ought to have walked along those waters in the summer time, as I did. When we sat in county council, it was in terrible condition.

Finally, Ontario water resources and the city of Welland got their heads together, and they did something about it, so they tell me.

I have not been invited, by the way, my good friend for Dufferin-Wellington, to the opening of that particular plant. I doubt very much whether it is working yet. You usually invite me to all of these things, to take these bullets out of my gun. This particular spot I have not been invited to, and until I see for myself, like Thomas—I must feel the print—I do not believe.

But let me tell you the most recent bit of good political manoeuvring.

An hon. member: Oh, oh. They have got lots of it over there.

Mr. Bukator: They did come into the township of Willoughby, a township that I represent, and this gentleman and a man by the name of Moody—

An hon. member: Well, it was like Moody.

Mr. Bukator: Well, that was the gentleman who was working on a different problem altogether. I think he did a good job, much better maybe than this particular group is doing. I have a brief here on the pollution of Welland county, and the problems there for many years. I must give this committee credit, because when they invited me to that meeting a few months ago, they decided to do something about the pollution of a little place called Douglastown.

An American gentleman claimed he was not notified about the meeting. That man came across the border—and in some instances they figure they are in the wilderness and this is a good place to make money—found they decided to put the lagoon on his farm, after he decided to buy his land. He raised the roof, as I understand. He raised the roof with me I know and I understand he contacted you people also. So you are going to meet with him again.

But I say to this committee—and it will be the first time I have ever complimented them—when you get on with that job, and the sooner the better, I will be the first to say to you the same as I said to the Niagara parks commission recently. I made a statement in the Brock Hotel, and I said: “If there are international waters that are polluted, one of the worst offenders is the Niagara parks commission themselves!"

The Table Rock House has a beautiful restaurant, and all of the sewage which runs through the NPC system runs into the Niagara River—raw—right at the foot of the Horseshoe Falls!

I was talking to the chairman—and I am sorry he is not here, he was this afternoon—and I told him when the NPC connects that to the city system, I would be the first to compliment him. The machines are working there—Mr. Chairman of water resources, vice-chairman—the machines are working there. As soon as they make that connection I will be the first to say: "Congratulations, you have finally cleaned up your mess. The government has set an example."

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Was that happening when you were on that commission?

Mr. Bukator: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Why did you not say something then?

Mr. Bukator: Oh, yes. I was on that commission for six consecutive years and with some of the finest men that ever sat on a commission. We paid off a $6 million debt while I was on the commission, from 1951 to 1956.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Better record than you have got over there.

Mr. W. Newman (Ontario South): Good leadership!

Mr. Bukator: Oh, yes. They had to bring in the Liberals to put the Conservative house right.

An hon. member: That is always the case.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): Where did the member get the grants?

Mr. Bukator: Pardon?

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Where did they get the grants?

Mr. Bukator: We are going to come to that. I am glad you opened up another subject, my friend.

Mr. Sopha: That commission has not worked right since George Drew fired—

Mr. Bukator: Yes! Have fun gentlemen, I am not going any place. I was told that after I have a good dinner I make a better after dinner speaker than I do before—and boys, I have got lots of time, so have fun.

An hon. member: And with a good Speaker in the Chair we are away!

Mr. Bukator: Yes. As a matter of fact, no matter who would be sitting there now, they cannot rule you out of order when you speak on the Throne debate unless you are insulting somebody. And I have been a gentleman to this point. I have insulted no one. I am just putting the record straight.

Now, where did the money come from to clean up this mess in the parks commission? Very simple! From water rentals, away back when.

As a matter of fact, the Liberal government had something to do with that when they were in, long before 1934, as a matter of fact—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: Yes, water rentals from everywhere.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator: Ah, my friend, it will take a little more than that to trap me.

Mr. Speaker, I will tell you where the money comes from—$1.25 per horsepower generated is what the parks commission collects from Hydro.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): One million dollars per year.

Mr. Bukator: As a matter of fact, it was more than that. Who is that member and where does he come from?

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Right from Thunder Bay!

Mr. Bukator: Coming from Thunder Bay, that distance? I did not think he knew where Niagara Falls was, let alone who pays for the water and where it comes from. According to the way I understand it, it comes from Lake Michigan, Lake Erie and Lake St. Clair, I believe, does it not?

Mr. Stokes: It comes from Lake Nipigon and the Nipigon river.

Mr. Bukator: That is what he thinks. He had better come down and visit with me. I will show him where it comes from and where it goes, and how badly it is polluted when it gets there, and how much money this government collects and on which they do not pay taxes. How simple!

As a matter of fact, when Sir Adam Beck No. 2 was opened not too long ago, there was so much money collected by the parks commission that, finally, the silver fox, as they called him, the former Premier, said to the parks commission, "Gentlemen, you have too much money", and so $625,000 a year of that money was diverted into the parks integration board.

And then they decided to kind of cover it up. Now it goes into the consolidated revenue fund—$625,000! About $800,000 is collected now and the parks commission maintains the loveliest park system that can be found anywhere in Canada. And we are proud of it and we are glad to have you come visit with us. You can relax after a gruelling few hours like you are getting here tonight. Come to the commissioners' quarters—

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): It certainly is gruelling!

An hon. member: Did he say drooling?

Mr. Bukator: If the member thinks this is gruelling, he is in for a pleasant surprise, because it is going to go on and on. I have heard some of his members speak here for days and say absolutely nothing. At least I base my arguments on facts.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: Now, where was I, was I picking on the parks commission or the Hydro?

All I can say for the parks commission—and I want to put this on the record as accurately as I know how—is that the men of that particular board are very decent citizens—good men doing a good job. And I say this, that the high cost of mismanagement has also been in that park. We have a new man there now in the name of Wilson who may put the record straight and do a good job for us. But that remains to be seen. So I am willing to wait another season to find out how this thing works out.

But, in the meantime, where the parks commission has its units of business, doing business in direct opposition to private enterprise, it ought to be taxed as you and I. Is that not right? Does that not make sense? It does not pay any taxes.

In units where it does business, such as souvenir stores and restaurants, in direct opposition to private enterprise, it is carried, in my opinion, by the city of Niagara Falls. Now, it is not because they do not have the money; the money is there. And I say it ought to pay as any other taxpayer does. Having said that, I will leave the parks commission alone until the member for Haldimand-Norfolk returns.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, do the Treasurer. I can hardly wait.

Mr. Bukator: The Treasurer—I will come to him a little later. I wonder where he is getting his money now?

An hon. member: From Niagara Falls.

Mr. Bukator: The Hydro has become a monster that cannot be controlled by this Legislature. It has been handled like a dictatorship would be in another country. These men have the right to run a kingdom within a country and they are not responsible to anyone.

I asked in this House, just last week, if I could not ask the vice-chairman of Hydro a question about Hydro here, and the Speaker of that day said, "Not now. You cannot ask him because you must go through a Minister". So I have to ask the second vice-chairman of Hydro the question through the Minister of Management and Resources who knows absolutely nothing about Hydro, because when the question was asked, the vice-chairman handed the—

Hon. Mr. Simonett: You have got it wrong again, it is Energy and Resources.

Mr. Bukator: There is no energy there, my friend. And it would not have been too bad if you could read well—you could not even read it, and when you read it you did not know what you were reading about.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: How can you? I do not recall in the ten years—as a matter of fact I may say something nice about you if I can think about it.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the Hydro ought to be responsible to this Legislature the same as any other department of government. I think it ought to come here with the problems that it has to deal with—with its construction programme, such as The Department of Highways, and I believe that I ought to be able to question it to find out what it is doing with its money.

Now that is not asking too much. This is not being done in this House. My friends, you have had your sport, why do you not sit back and learn something? I was just handed a sheet of paper with a lot of red figures on it, and when that is in my office, it is somebody that is in red.

We were talking about water rentals. I might say that the government, the parks commission, collected $923,000 in water rentals last year. They can maintain their parks with that money, and they also, Mr. Speaker, can pay their taxes—at least they should.

Again, they are a commision that works under The Niagara Parks Commission Act and no one can get at them. So we have the Parks Commission water resources. At least we can take you apart once in a while. But I do believe this particular body of men means well. I will give them that much leeway, my experience of them has been good.

I would like to touch on the homes for the aged, and I am sorry that the Minister of Family Services—Family and Social Services. I have trouble with this department, they keep changing their name. We are going to Port Colborne on Friday of this week, so if you miss me, gentlemen, it is not because I want to skip school. I am going to see them open a 91-unit home for the aged, long overdue. It should have been built years ago, because surely, Mr. Speaker, it does not require too much foresight to be able to see that the population has grown and that people are living longer, and I think they ought to have homes provided for them.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Anyone who doubts it only has to look at the Liberal benches.

Mr. Bukator: Well, I am going to tell you something. I prefer some of the grey-haired men we have on our benches to some of the curly-haired ones you have on yours.

Mr. Winkler: They need a different kind of home.

Mr. Bukator: When the home for the aged in Welland was built—one of the finest in the province of Ontario—my friend from Welland, that great county, who has stepped out of the House, and I were on the sub-division of the home farm committee. What a proud day that was for me. I decided after that to go into the real estate business! We subdivided the home farm and we made a net of $155,000 after sub-dividing this farm.

We came to this government, and we said: "We have $155,000, now you match it dollar for dollar." And we wound up with $310,000. And we built the first addition to that beautiful home in the county of Welland. And it is one of the finest, and is equal to any hotel I have been in—such wonderful service. And I am sure that this Minister who just interjected, can find no better in the province.

As a matter of fact, let me tell you a little story that was most interesting to me. The young man who runs this place came to the county committee to be interviewed for the job. He was not quite 21 years of age yet, but I knew the boy. He came from my home town and, as we were interviewing these people—I know the government does the same thing—I decided that he should be the last one to speak and tell us his story.

When he was finished and had walked out of that particular meeting that evening, Mr. Nissen, now the mayor of Port Colborne, said: "He is a young boy, but he is well coached, someone told him what to say." He not only took the job, but without a doubt there is no equal in this province when it comes to maintaining and administering a business of that type. Doug Rapelje is doing an excellent job. And we have a beautiful home.

Now then, we are building and opening a 91-unit home in Port Colborne, and the Dorchester Manor in Niagara Falls has been in the process of being built. I will read the letter dated 1937 when they agreed this site should be bought.

There is a 91-unit bed to go there also; a 91-unit institution that will be part of the larger portion, and there are 300 people ready to go into a home that will house 91 when, and if, it is built.

Now, I would say to you, that this government is not sincere about housing the aged who are not being properly taken care of, because, on one hand, it is not building much-needed institutions and, on the other hand, is closing some of the homes that ought not to be closed until something better is built. So, you are kind of working at cross purposes.

Tell me, Mr. Speaker, what is wrong with my reasoning here. I would like someone to tell me why this government cannot, tomorrow morning, go out and rent, or purchase many of the motels that are sitting idle many months of the year—buildings that have inner corridors with the finest equipment, when it comes to restaurants and fine dining rooms that could be purchased tomorrow morning. There are many of them that could be bought, and, if you don't want to buy them, rent them. You could house 300 people in that area and 1,000 throughout the province tomorrow morning.

That is too simple. That is much too simple, because many of these units have, yes, the king-size bed with the finest of equipment, with bathrooms built right in, with adjoining units. Couples could be housed in these buildings, and they could walk in these inner corridors. They even have swimming pools. Are you interested, gentlemen, and if you are, why do you not buy, and can you tell me that it is not cheaper?

I happen to be in that type of business myself. You can easily build them for less than $6,000 a room, complete, and you can rent them for less than $10 a day year-round. This is no problem in my book. I would house those people immediately because they have rendered a service to this country. These old people have done a job for us. We owe them something and in their last few years on this earth, they are entitled to better quarters than those in which they have to live now.

We owe them that. We can provide it immediately and I think it makes good sense. I would like any Minister, when I get through or any other time, to tell me why this would not work. To my mind it is the answer to a very serious problem.

Mr. R. F. Ruston (Essex-Kent): They are all quiet. You have got them on the fence.

Mr. Bukator: You have had representation from the city of Niagara Falls, from the sunset haven. The petition was sent to this Minister and I am sorry he is not here. I do not like to talk about a man's department when he is not here to help me, because I am sure we are all working to one end and that is to the betterment of the people of this province. No one is trying to embarrass anybody.

On June 13, 1967, they were talking about the proposed site for Niagara Falls—mind you, this is 1967: "If the site is agreeable to your committee I would be pleased to make recommendations for the approval of the hon. Minister on receipt of the legal description of the property." Not too long after that, on August 9, they agreed to an expenditure of $38,800 to buy land. They approved of the architect's design to build this unit. The county of Welland spent $100,000.

The government, when they were approached by a committee from the county of Welland, said: "We are sorry, but we have some kind of an austerity programme where we are spending more than we are making. We must pull in our horns quite a little bit." I said that ten years ago when I came into this House, you just cannot go on spending

$2 million a week more than you make for ten consecutive years and stay out of trouble.

And this year they are going to spend something like $570 million more than they have taken in, and they have never before taken in more money.

Mr. Sopha: Well, they are getting $175 million from Mr. Trudeau.

Mr. Ruston: Is that right?

Mr. Sopha: He will send a cheque.

Mr. Bukator: Should we talk about Medicare? What is to be said about Medicare after the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) himself got up in the House this afternoon and said he had nothing against it. We are going into the system. "I have never said we would not go along with it," that is what the man said, or again I paraphrase, and if he said that—that he is going on with it—then there is no problem. Everybody is in agreement.

Mr. De Monte: He said it was not pointed out.

Mr. Bukator: Oh, well.

Mr. Sopha: There it comes out—he follows that $175 million.

Mr. Bukator: It is nice to see the doctor back. I might say this about this Minister who just came in, he is one of the few I see here every day. Have you heard about the tax rebate?

An hon. member: Try pollution.

Mr. Bukator: Oh, I can go back to that. There are many areas there that are polluted, both politically and in the water. Pollution is a problem that we have had to deal with ever since we started in politics 100 and some odd years ago.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Ever since the hon. member was born.

Mr. Bukator: That is about 100—well not quite, about 56 years ago.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: The hon. member does not look it.

Mr. Bukator: Well, I will tell you why? It is this kind of work that keeps me young. Fighting constantly with this government, who will not move an inch. However, I figure that one day I will persuade you.

By the way, I am glad you are here, Mr. Minister. Bill 73 and Bill 74. Why did you not consult with these people who are so directly involved and interested in this problem? Could you not have taken five minutes to talk to them, to the humane society, and ask them? Now you know what is going to happen, and I know we cannot talk about a bill in this House while it is pending, or going through whatever it is going through, but surely you will not mind. You, Mr. Minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, must do one thing—at least let that go in the committee stage and let these people make their representations to him directly. That is not asking too much.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture and Food): We never expected to do anything else.

Mr. Bukator: Is not that wonderful? This is democracy at work.

Mr. Speaker, I will get back to rent control. I received a letter from a gentleman in Hamilton, I believe—I wish I knew where to look in this mass of notes that I have.

Mr. Shulman: The member is better organized than most of us.

Mr. Bukator: Thank you. Here is a gentleman who happens to be an auditor. They are men who know what they are doing with figures, anyhow. And he happens to be a landlord also. He was approached, as everyone should be, if he is a landlord, for the rebate. Now this man wanted to be fair, apparently, from the little note I have here. Just a few lines, and I think I had better read that into the record. He said: "Fine, if you want me to give you your rebate, I will. I will do it because the law says so." But let me tell you how he put it.

Enclosed please find your provincial tax rebate for 1968. I wish to advise that, commencing January, 1969, your rent will be increased by the amount equivalent to the 1969 provincial tax rebate. However, we will not require payment until 1969.

In other words, we will apply your 1969 rebate against the rent increase so that there will be no balance owing either way.

Mr. Ruston: There he is—the Minister of Municipal Affairs has just come in.

Mr. Bukator: Well then, I can get into the file. Can you imagine that? The auditor said: If you have a rebate I will give it to you, but I will increase your rent that much, so no one will owe anybody anything. And, my friend, you the tenant will get absolutely nothing.

And that applies across the board, time and time again. This government did not accomplish what they wanted to do with that statute, and so this Minister, while he had a real hot potato in his hand at that time, gets into regional government and, heavenly days, when he gets through with that mess his hair will be as white as mine.

An hon. member: I do not think he is listening very much.

Mr. Bukator: No, I do not think he is either.

The gentleman who bought his home from Hydro—the Minister has gone and I was not through with him. I am sure he will read everything I say in Hansard. He is that type of fellow—he bought a house from Hydro after Hydro got through with the construction of that area. They bought many houses and built a few.

Well, this man working for Hydro bought the house and is paying them a payment, as you and I would do—a blended payment of taxes, principal and interest.

So when the time came for the rebate, he asked for it—and I wish the Minister of Municipal Affairs would listen to this because he advised me what happened—he was told by Hydro that he could not get a rebate because Hydro does not pay taxes. "You are not going to get your money because we do not pay taxes, we pay grants in lieu of taxes"—and so the vice-chairman of Hydro has said in this House, "we pay the equivalent, grants in lieu of taxes like anyone else does on our property." If they do, why did these people not get their rebate?

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): That is a very good question.

Mr. Bukator: And you can take that same idea with the Ontario Housing Corporation if you will. There are many areas where it has houses which they rent, in which it has not yet paid the rebate.

Was my friend wrong when he said the "high cost of mismanagement?" No, he knew what he was talking about.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: Nice to see such a nice turnout, on both sides of the House. It encourages one.

To get into the regional government problem—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator: Oh, I could talk on and on, but I like the way the auditor handled it. He says, "Fine I will give you your money and then I will raise your rent," and the tenant went without, as he always does.

This government could not see that. If it wanted to give anything it could have very well said, "Alright, half of your tax dollars is for school purposes anyhow, so we will give you a larger grant on that end. The people on fixed incomes and on pensions, the elderly people, would get a break there because they do not need the schools anymore, they have already paid the shot. We will cut their taxes down for school purposes." Again, this is much too simple.

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): The Minister really just came in.

Mr. Bukator: Where did I put that big book?

Mr. Sopha: Well, he and the Attorney General are going to prosecute. Give him his name.

Mr. Bukator: I think my friends have them over a barrel.

An hon. member: They are coming up with something now over there.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: I was trying to further justice, to get that fellow prosecuted.

An hon. member: I think he should lay a charge.

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Speaker, I have before me a very small document that I intend to read now. This was prepared by Deacon, Arnett and Murray, a firm of architects and planning consultants here in Toronto. They were the people who helped assemble your metropolitan government.

And so the city of Niagara Falls, the township of Stamford and the village of Chippawa decided that they ought to have some information on the possibility of a merger of the three municipalities. And can you imagine, this was assembled and completed by 1958 and they found that by becoming a larger unit it would cost too much money. So the township and the city became one and the village stayed out by itself because of its tax base.

At that time at least the people of that area, Mr. Speaker, did a proper and thorough survey. I found, much to my surprise, that when regional government came into this area they decided that this particular area, including Willoughby township, would become one city, and this government, and this Minister—who is having a lot of fun meeting with his colleagues, he does not see them very often, you will notice he is having his private conversation—

An hon. member: He is not listening.

Mr. Bukator: —they met with the mayors of Niagara Falls, Welland—a good Conservative —Port Colborne—a good Liberal—

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs): The mayor of Port Colborne?

Mr. Bukator: A good Liberal.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Oh, no!

Mr. Bukator: Well, I will tell you what, Mr. Nissen was a warden of Welland county on the Liberal ticket, so I do not know what his politics are.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No longer.

Mr. Bukator: And Max Chown of St. Catharines—

An hon. member: Good Liberal.

Mr. Bukator: And there we have you, three to one.

So we assembled in 1958 and we came up with the facts, the same way that this Minister and this government should have come up with the facts before they started to impose this type of government on those people without giving them the details of what it was going to cost. Nobody buys a suit of clothes without asking what it is going to cost. Yet here the Minister is eliminating 14 municipalities in one full sweep because he thinks regional government is going to be the answer to our problem in the two counties. Yet, he tells us nothing about what the cost will be or how this is going to be assembled.

I say that regional government may be the answer to the problem if our professor at Brock University is right. But I say that we ought to know what it is going to cost. The Minister agrees with me. You know, he reminds me—I am as bad as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce at this point of the game, but I must tell you—I was told the difference between rape and romance was salesmanship! This Minister is trying to sell us a bill of goods and if we do not buy it by September it is not going to be romance.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Bukator: The mayor of Niagara Falls said this, and talked about sound common sense and reasoning.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I want to go along—

Mr. Bukator: I did not think you would consider that even for a moment. Thank you very much for the compliment. I can tell you that that would be no problem. At least we would have peace among those people, and maybe I could bring them together and maybe it would be romance, but I will tell you—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You could—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: There goes another Liberal seat.

Mr. Bukator: I will tell you what, I do not want the job. Let us put the record straight. I am happy where I am.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: But you are willing to listen to a proposition.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, my mind is greatly relieved.

Mr. Bukator: I care not what your mind is made up of, my friend. If there was ever a Minister in this House confused, you are confused on this issue now.

They have got you walking a tight rope.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You are adding to my knowledge.

Mr. Bukator: Oh, absolutely. If you would listen. This document of Deacon, Arnett and Murray could have put you on the right track at least in 1958, for that very region.

Mr. R. Haggerty (Welland South): Too simple for them!

Mr. Bukator: It was no problem. We paid the experts to tell us what it was all about, and when you tell us what it is going to cost and how it is going to be assembled, believe me I may buy it myself.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: What is the date of that?

Mr. Bukator: 1958; it was assembled by Deacon, Arnett and Murray, for that very region. We talked about it and we hired these men at that time because we knew something better ought to come about.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You can hardly say we were rushing then.

Mr. Bukator: Oh, you never do in this government. You never do. Talk about putting the cart before the horse, if I was a cartoonist, everytime I talked about you the horse would be behind the cart pushing it. But let me get down to the facts of this particular issue.

I believe that the people of that region, call it what you like, ought to know what it is going to cost. How you are going to assemble the different departments before you cram this down their throats? If you do the same thing with this as you did with the Ottawa Eastview Carleton bill—you did cram that down their throats and they are not happy about it, and if you want the other one, the Port Arthur and Fort William bill, they, too, are not at all pleased with you. You cannot go any place today without being booed—not cheered, jeered.

Mr. Ruston: Not number one any more.

Mr. Bukator: Surely the taxpayers of this province are entitled to the facts before they have anything like this imposed on them? If the Minister does not understand it now he never will. I do not want to object; I do not want to oppose. I only want to know what it will cost before we accept. That, in my opinion, makes sense.

I promised an hon. gentleman before dinner that I would keep the ball rolling until he came in the House. He said he would be here at about 9.30 p.m. It is nice to see the hon. Minister without Portfolio in. It was a pleasure talking to the members and I hope they got something out of it.

Hon. T. L. Wells (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate, I think it is the first time I have taken part in a Throne Debate in this new Legislature since your election as Deputy Speaker and chairman of the committee of the whole House. I would like to offer my congratulations to you and also to the hon. Speaker of the House on his election to that position, and to commend him on the way he has been carrying on the business of this House.

I have been most interested in listening to various members on the opposite side talk about our municipal tax rebate programme. I get the impression that perhaps we should have a little adult education programme for them on how this programme works, because for a programme that has found favour with, I would say, about 95 per cent of the people of this province, they certainly do not understand it.

We have here a programme for a rebate to property tax owners that represents the first time in Canada, and perhaps in North America, that anyone has been able to get at the regressivity of the property tax. We have done it here, and it has not been done in any other area, including the areas where they send out the $50 cheques. It has been done at a minimum of expense, in a very economical manner.

Mr. R. F. Ruston (Essex-Kent): About $6 million?

Hon. Mr. Wells: About $.5 million. Now, listen, I would like to—

An hon. member: What are you defending it for?

Hon. Mr. Wells: I am defending it because it has been a good thing for the people of my municipality and it has been a good thing for most of the people of your municipalities including Owen Sound and Sarnia and all the rest.

I would like to just show you the difference between how various governments can approach this problem of taxation. The government of Canada, in proclaiming that they were bringing in a just society to this country, last fall announced a social development tax in the form of a two per cent surcharge on income tax.

Very, very commendable, so they said, but what did they do in Ottawa? They brought in this two per cent surcharge, in itself a bit of a—perhaps you might say—a Machiavellian scheme also, in that it very conveniently circumvented, Mr. Speaker, any need to share any of that tax with the provinces under the normal tax arrangements in effect if they had come in and changed the general rates of income tax.

However, let that be as it may, they still, in bringing this tax in, placed a limit on the income on which it could be applied. In other words, they placed a ceiling on it. They suggested that the poor could pay it, but not the rich—they could pay at a standard amount.

Let us take a real close look at that, Mr. Speaker. What does this mean? This meant that, for a married taxpayer with two children, who is eligible for family allowances, and earns a gross income of $3,500 the two per cent surcharge means an increase in his taxes of 15.7 per cent.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Now, take a taxpayer in this province—same category, married taxpayer with two children eligible for family allowances with a gross income of $25,000. This tax amounted to a 1.6 per cent increase in his taxes. Now, if that is not a tax that soaks the poor, I do not know what it is.

Let us contrast that; let us take a look at this—a look in the municipality of Scarborough. In Scarborough the municipal tax rebate was $58.55 in the area in which I live. We all got it and we were all happy to get it. It was there on our tax bills and it meant that we paid that much less property tax.

Now, out in our area there lives a couple who are old age pensioners and they pay total property taxes of about $200. They got the $58.55 tax rebate—this meant a 29 per cent reduction in their municipal property tax.

Now, compare that with someone in our same municipality living not very far from this couple who pay $1,500 in municipal property tax. They can afford to pay it, and they got a $58.55 tax rebate the same as the couple in the small home with the $200 tax and their municipal tax rebate amounted to 3½ per cent reduction in their tax.

Just contrast that with the federal legislation which soaks the poor, small-income person for 15.7 per cent and only charged 1.6 per cent for the man making $25,000.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the vast majority of the people of this province are happy with the municipal tax rebate system because it finally attacked the regressivity of the property tax. Now what are some of the alternatives that our friends across the way have come up with?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wells: All right, listen to this. Pay more of the school tax, you say; pay more of the school tax. That, in effect, is the same as giving more grants to the municipalities, whether it be to school boards or to municipal councils. What does that mean? Half of that money or so goes to reduce the commercial assessment—it never gets to the home owners, it does not attack the regressivity feature.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Mr. Speaker, any of these other systems that have been suggested do not begin to come to grips with this regressivity feature. They would be filtered away on reducing commercial property taxes, which are not going to help the home owner. They are not going to help the home owner and I just think my friends across the way could not care less because they do not want to know about this programme.

As long as they do not want to know about it we will let them be happy. We will let them preach programmes like the two per cent social development tax from Ottawa. I just ask you, where is the just society? Is it here in Ontario or is it in Ottawa?

I just want to say that in my own municipality of Scarborough, $4.5 million was transferred through the municipal tax rebate and it got to people who were really happy and it helped to reduce their property taxes. And $33.5 million came to the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. If this had been paid in grants to any of the municipal councils, it would not have reduced property taxes by $58, I can tell you that. The people of Scarborough are very happy with the municipal tax rebate.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): They are not happy.

Hon. Mr. Wells: They are just as happy as the people of Downsview are with their member.

Mr. Singer: Oh, that is very happy.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wells: The next time the supporters of the member for Downsview hold a meeting in a telephone booth, invite me along.

Mr. Speaker, I just conclude by saying, or reiterating, that I think that this municipal tax rebate system has been much maligned. It has probably been maligned because we attempted to do something with an area that most other jurisdictions did not even have the guts to attack and that is to try and pass something on to the tenants—

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): And the Minister fouled it up.

Hon. Mr. Wells: We did not foul it up. There is about one and a half or one per cent of the people in this province who are making all the complaints.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wells: For a variety of reasons—and I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the staff which the Minister of Municipal Affairs has in his department has handled most of these in a very excellent manner and obtained a lot of the rebates.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Well, we will be living with this and I think it is a good programme.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to change to another subject, I would like to—

Mr. Singer: The Minister had better. That one was not so good.

Hon. Mr. Wells: Oh, we will leave it to the people of Ontario and the people of our constituencies to decide whether this was good or not. I am sure they will see where the just society is.

I would like to turn to another subject, Mr. Speaker, and bring this House up to date on the action that this government has been taking in regard to the report of the select committee on youth.

As you know, this committee was appointed in May, 1964, and was re-appointed in 1965 and 1966. After a total of 162 days of meetings and visits and after receiving and considering 698 briefs, the committee tabled in the Legislature its final report in March, 1967.

The report contains a total of 276 recommendations dealing with the special needs of youth and the steps that can be taken to ensure a wider participation by youth in the life of their community and this province.

The major subject headings of the report give a good indication of the scope of the committee's interest and study: organization within the government, education, health, welfare, recreation, employment, sports, guidance and counselling, cultural arts, physical fitness and delinquency.

I say this, Mr. Speaker, that under the able chairmanship of the member for Kingston and the Islands, the youth committee was able to produce a report that is thought to be the most intensive focus on youth ever undertaken in this province.

As I mentioned, the work of the committee continued over a period of nearly three years. One result of this was that a number of recommendations that were formulated in the minds of the members, as the committee meetings went on, our deliberations, many of these had already been acted upon by the time the report was completed. I think this gives a very positive and good indication of the fact that when people set their minds to a common set of problems they often come to similar conclusions. The action taken on these problems by the government, both before the completion of the report and since its release, give a clear demonstration of the seriousness and depth of the government's concern for the young people of this province.

Before dealing in greater detail with the government programmes concerning youth, I would like to tell hon. members about the way the select committee's report has been handled by the government.

The first step was the establishment of a Cabinet committee to analyze the report. Each recommendation was assessed and discussed in relation to the rest of the report and the work of the departments most directly concerned.

It was immediately apparent that a number of recommendations are restatements of suggestions made elsewhere in the report, some, as I have mentioned had already been acted upon and still others did not call for any action by this government but were directed to other bodies and agencies.

Each of the remaining recommendations in the report was referred for comment to the departments which would be involved in its implementation or affected by it. The departmental replies and suggestions were then discussed to see which recommendations could be implemented. Mr. Speaker, as a result of this review, work is going forward in a number of areas in keeping with our priorities and budgetary constraints.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose today to try to review all the programmes of the government that affect our youth or go over each recommendation of the select committee and outline the government's position or the action taken.

Not only would that take more of the time of this House than I would expect or ask, but it would lead on into a discussion of the details of some departmental programmes that would be much better left to my colleagues who are responsible for the programmes and these, of course, can be discussed fully during the estimates of the various departments. I would, however, like to mention what has been done in some areas that will, I think, be of general interest to all.

It is, of course, very obvious from information in the select committee's report and many other sources that the composition of the total population of this province is becoming increasingly younger. In 1961, 45 per cent of the population in Ontario was under 25; by 1971, over 50 per cent of our province's population will be under 25 years of age. What this means is that now, more than ever, young people—our youth—are going to have to play a greater role in the total life of their community and their province and this country.

Indeed, I find from personal talks with the young people I know, that they want to accept this responsibility; they want to become involved. This has been the underlying basis of many of the actions that have been taken in respect to the recommendations of the select committee on youth.

The government was impressed with the reasoning of the select committee that there was a lack of any formal structure for co-ordinating the work of the various departments of government concerned with youth. A number of the recommendations of the select committee were designed to overcome this problem, recognizing that the informal channels of communication are not always sufficient to provide the desired amount of co-ordination.

In addition, the government recognized that our services in regard to youth are so important that there would be an advantage to having a body that could meet at regular intervals to discuss youth matters specifically and co-ordinate the total approach of the government.

Accordingly, the Prime Minister has established an interdepartmental committee on youth, made up of representatives of a number of departments whose programmes directly affect the young people of this province. With the exception of myself, as chairman of the committee and a member of the Prime Minister's staff who acts as secretary, all the members of this interdepartmental committee are drawn from the operating branches of the various departments of government.

This means that the members have intimate knowledge and day to day experience with the programme and with the problems of our young people. The advantages of this choice of membership have been readily apparent at our meetings that have been held to date already.

Although the committee is still very new, it has already been of considerable value as a vehicle for communication and a sounding board for ideas and problems brought forward by the individual members and it shows great promise of bringing about a greater degree of co-ordination among the various departments.

I am sure, sir, that this committee will prove its worth and will fulfill the expectation of the select committee.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): What is the average age?

Hon. Mr. Wells: The average age of the members on the committee? I am afraid I cannot answer that now, but there are many young people, or people who, I would say, would be in their 30s or 40s.

Mr. Singer: Does the member for Kingston and the Islands (Mr. Apps) sit on that committee?

Hon. Mr. Wells: No, he does not.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Wells: As I said, Mr. Speaker, this committee, although it is very new, is a group that has been a valuable vehicle for communicating. It will be a sounding board for many new ideas and problems brought forward by the members from the various departments.

Another action step of great significance is the formation of the youth and recreation branch. Announced last June 1 by the Minister of Education in this House, it was formed by consolidating, within The Department of Education, the youth branch and the community programmes section.

This amalgamation, as hon. members will appreciate, is very much in keeping with the spirit and thinking underlying the recommendations of the select committee. The effect of this reorganization has been to mobilize the established and effective staff and field organization of the community programme section and the research facilities of the youth branch to serve the young people of this province. As a result, the thinking and policies regarding youth programmes now have a decentralized organization through which their implementation is greatly facilitated. Another beneficial effect is to ensure that our extensive recreation programmes fully serve the needs of young people. This aspect is particularly important in view of the need seen by the select committee for greater emphasis in this direction.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say here that as a member of this select committee on youth I travelled to all these other provinces in Canada and saw the organizations that they have. And in my own mind I am convinced that our youth and recreation branch, as it now stands organized, and as it will develop, is the equal or better of any department of youth in any other government in this country.

Mr. Singer: Does the member for Kingston and the Islands share that view?

Hon. Mr. Wells: I am sure he would, Mr. Speaker, if he comes up and sees the functions of the youth and recreation branch. The facilities and the staff that are there, I would say, are the equal of any complete department of government in any other province where it might be in operation.

I would like to spend a few moments outlining some of the activities that the youth and recreation branch is currently engaged in and which have a direct relationship to the report of the select committee. This new branch now provides a focus for the escalation of present programmes for youth and for the introduction of new programmes as they may become necessary.

One of the most important projects now being undertaken is the formation of a provincial youth council along the lines so strongly suggested by the select committee.

Initially, this council will be composed of one young person under 25 years of age from each of the 19 areas of the province, presently covered by the field staff of the youth and recreation branch. The primary function of this council will be one of involvement. It will assist and advise the branch on the programmes and services required by the young people of the province so that these programmes and services will be appropriate, meaningful and timely.

The provincial youth council will meet at different times with the interdepartmental committee on youth to discuss common concerns of youth and to resolve these concerns through face-to-face dialogue. We feel that this will be extremely useful to both groups and will involve young people under 25 years of age in a meaningful way with the government of this province. The inaugural meeting of the provincial youth council will be held in April.

While the initial appointment of this council will be the responsibility of the youth and recreation branch through their field staff, long range plans call for the establishment of local community and regional youth councils. The regional councils would be composed of representatives from the local community youth councils and each regional council, in turn, would select its representative to the Provincial Council. One can appreciate, therefore, that on a long-range basis, grass roots involvement and development is assured.

I want to comment on the function of the local community youth councils for a minute and these are in operation in at least half a dozen or more communities in this province already. We hear from every side about the “generation gap” and the “alienation of youth.” In an experiment done last summer, the youth and recreation branch sent 35 university and college young people into the communities of this province to determine the concerns of youth and to ascertain their needs.

Significant documentation of the results of this study have now been made. In brief, the study showed that youth, generally, have ideas, attitudes and opinions about their communities that require consideration. One of the identified problems the study emphasized is that there is no organized way in which the concerns and needs of youth can be articulated to the decision-makers in the community. Youth are anxious to become involved in community life and not in a superficial way. They have ideas for community development and betterment they have opinions on the need for youth programmes and services and they are interested in being given responsibility for implementing these ideas and suggestions.

The survey showed that youth wants to become involved in helping make decisions that affect them and in developing programmes planned for them. They are receptive to adult guidance, direction and expertise but they want a part in the decision-making process, if for no other reason than to eliminate that long-held feeling that they are simply carrying out some other person's orders. Local youth councils will give our youth this sort of involvement.

It should be noted that these youth councils, as they develop, should reflect all youth in the community—the radical, the reactionary and those “in between.” The youth councils can co-ordinate the existing community activities of youth, develop programmes for youth, provide services to youth and share with others in the community the concerns of youth.

The survey programme conducted by the youth and recreation branch—and this is the branch that is helping to form these youth councils in communities across this province—was called “Ontario Youth in Action” and will be continued again this summer in communities not reached last year—and I emphasize again, last year Ontario Youth in Action went into 35 communities, many of them with populations of 15,000 and less.

Mr. Speaker, automation, and in general the cybernetic revolution, is increasing the amount of leisure time available to an increasing number of people in this province. Research studies clearly show that this leisure time will continue to increase as the automated potential is harnessed. The youth and recreation branch will, therefore, have an ever-increasing role to play in providing advice, resources and programmes to meet these demands—not only for youth but for all our people. Through the work of the branch, the citizens of the community become involved in making decisions about their leisure and in taking action to provide leisure programmes and services.

On January 1, 1969, the field staff or extension staff as it is called, of the youth and recreation branch joined the regional offices of The Department of Education.

This means that the field man of the youth and recreation branch is now housed in the offices and works out of the local regional offices of The Department of Education.

In addition to their ongoing responsibilities for community development, these consultants of the youth and recreation branch will use their expertise to help advise and make their advice available to boards of education on such diverse subjects as the optimum community use of schools, leadership training courses for teachers of adult avocational programmes, the development of continuing education programmes offered by boards and by community colleges, and resources of the branch will be available for leisure-oriented subjects within the school programme.

To meet the ever-increasing demand for leadership for recreation programmes, an Ontario recreation society is in the planning stages. This society will include all professional recreationists, both in public and private practice of their profession and who have responsibility for the development of leisure programmes across this province. Not only will the society provide training opportunities for its membership, but it will encourage co-operation between recreation agencies at the local level so that maximum opportunities for the creative use of leisure will be available to the citizens of this province.

One of the recommendations in the report of the select committee on youth stated the need for research into recreation and youth programmes. The Ontario recreation research committee has now been established to provide this function. It is chaired by Dr. Roby Kidd. Initially, the committee will consolidate the existing research and then will identify areas in which research is required so that appropriate agencies and institutions can become involved in determining the answers to the many pressing questions of the day related to youth and to recreation.

The information collecting and distributing services of the youth and recreation branch is now well advanced. This very important resource centre will loan material to any community organization and will provide information to them on successful programmes and activities in any jurisdiction where they may want to initiate new services or expand their present services. They are sending out newsletters and information sheets and bulletins to bring details of successful recreation and youth programmes to a wide readership of interested and concerned people in this province.

I want to identify one particular programme for the members today because of the involvement of youth in this particular study. About one year ago, a group of young people in the Newcastle area suggested, through their English teacher, that a series of dramatic productions might be developed during the summer. From this idea was born the Great Pine Ridge festival of the arts with headquarters at the Massey Building in Newcastle, Ontario. The primary programme offered was a series of three high quality dramatic productions which alternated for six nights a week for a period of five weeks. Somewhere close to 10,000 people came to see the productions. I explain this programme in some detail because it was a programme by youth for youth.

Over 150 young people were involved in all aspects of the productions from actors to ushers, from stage hands to ticket sellers and from make-up artists to lighting technicians. Thus throughout the summer these young people were part of a new programme in Ontario, a cultural activity in which their creative talents were used and developed and from which a greater appreciation of the theatre emerged. It is expected that this programme will continue again this summer in an expanded form and we are hopeful that through the youth and recreation branch and with the help of this branch it may be the forerunner of an Ontario youth theatre programme.

While it is recognized that "recreation" is more than sports and includes social, cultural and intellectual activities as well, one cannot overestimate the value of fitness and amateur sport programmes. The federal government has established a "task force" to look into this whole area from the federal viewpoint. Here in Ontario, the problems and needs were identified at the Ontario sports conference held last November 1, 2 and 3, in Scarborough.

This conference brought together two representatives from each of 56 of Ontario's sports governing bodies, as well as physical education specialists and representatives of associations concerned with amateur sport programmes. The conference was planned on a discussion group format in which the participants analyzed the following four subjects: leadership and coaching; programmes and facilities; administration and communication; and the government's role.

Following these discussions priorities for action were established by the delegates. The following significant action was recommended at the conference for implementation by the youth and recreation branch.

The first was the development of a provincial sports council which is now going ahead and which is representative of all amateur sport groups in the province. Its purpose will be to provide mutual assistance and development. The council will provide the opportunity for the sports groups to share concerns, solve mutual problems and chart a common course of action to develop greater participation in sports programmes and to improve the quality of performance and leadership.

Second, one of the significant concerns was the development of local sports councils in every community to ensure co-ordination between sports groups, hockey, baseball, and so on, and to prevent overlapping in the individual communities.

The third concern was the development of community and regional competitions in non-team sports such as swimming and track and field and eventually the development of an Ontario junior olympic programme. I think we recognize that the main emphasis in sports today, and certainly, I feel this should be at the mass participation level where anyone of any age has the opportunity to take part for the recreational satisfaction that participation in the sport of his choice brings. But having said this, Mr. Speaker, we must also recognize that opportunities for the attainment of excellence of individual performance must also be provided for those who have the ability and desire to achieve this excellence and we hope that an Ontario olympic programme will help in some small way to serve this need.

Many other equally important recommendations were identified at this sports conference.

The Ontario sports conference was actually the first time in the history of the province that Ontario's sports governing bodies have met together and discussed mutual problems and this is very significant. Through this conference and through the development of the Ontario sports councils, I am sure that we will see a considerable expansion of fitness and amateur sports programmes in this province for our young people and indeed for people of all ages.

Now to turn to another area of the select committee on youth and the recommendations contained in the report. I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that today, there are many who tend to isolate our schools from the community, to built chain-link fences around them and lock them up at 5.00 o'clock in the evening. Occasionally a gym, an auditorium or, if the community is lucky, a swimming pool, is open to the public.

A few youth groups can be allowed to use the building regularly but, unfortunately, all too rarely is an integrated attempt made to use the whole school plant as a community facility. This should not be and I am equally certain that it is not what the majority of our citizens intend be done. At the conference on leisure called by my colleague, the Minister of Education in November, 1966, the hon. Minister said:

Co-operation between the school and recreation authorities in a community needs to be continuous so that the best and most dynamic programme of recreation and continuing education is available to the citizens. All publicly-owned buildings must be used for programme development. Facilities are of little consequence unless they are used to the maximum.

Here tonight, I would like to re-state this again and say that we believe that there must be maximum community use of school facilities in this province for the benefit of all the citizens of the community.

Under our existing legislation, this means that there must be a high degree of co-operation and co-ordination in both the planning of facilities and in their utilization between the school boards and the municipal recreation departments. Without this any real community school programme will fall flat.

In 1964, a committee was set up in The Department of Education to study community activities in school buildings. This committee studied this problem from two different approaches: (1) The use of existing facilities by community agencies and (2) the provision of community facilities as part of a school complex. In the course of their studies, Mr. Speaker, the committee came up with a list of what they called "barriers" to community use of schools.

The list is as follows and I can certainly attest to the relevancy of this list, based on my experience as chairman of the Scarborough board of education, and this is the list of things that they said prevented full community use of schools:

The grant structure; liability, in the case of an accident; high rental fees caused by union agreements; the difficulty of disciplining adult groups; the ban on smoking; interference with books, blackboards and cupboards; equipment not returned to its proper place; maintenance and operational control.

When we look at this list, however, we see that these are really not major barriers to community use of the school facility. Certainly, I agree, that is what some people think, but these are not really barriers to the community use of school facilities. They are merely administrative and mechanical matters that can be annoying from time to time but that can really be resolved in a rational and easy way with the kind of co-operation and co-ordination which I say must exist.

One of the important recommendations of the youth committee was as follows:

When new schools are designed, their recreation and leisure time facilities should be planned jointly with community recreation authorities in order that such facilities will be easily available for both school and public recreation purposes.

This recommendation again suggests a high degree of co-operation and co-ordination between on one hand school boards and on the other municipal recreation authorities. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that this kind of co-ordination does exist in communities in this province and exists to a high degree and great things have been done in the development of the community school concept.

We are hopeful that this ideal state will be reached in most of the other areas and communities of this province—particularly as the new county boards become fully operational. Certainly it can be done on a voluntary basis without government interference. It is being done now in communities and we hope that it will be extended to most of the communities in this province. From a recreational point of view and from the point of view of continuing education, and adult education if you will, the community use of schools and of other public facilities is essential if the recreational needs and total education needs of our youth and indeed of the public are to be met and if we are to avoid needless and unnecessary duplication.

Sir, I know hon. members will realize that a large number of the recommendations of the select committee on youth pertain to the activities of other departments, perhaps most of them to The Department of Education. For a moment I am just going to give a brief summary of some of the actions taken and as I said all of these can be dealt with in a much fuller manner when the estimates of these various departments come up.

The curriculum branch in The Department of Education now provides a series of courses throughout many grades on the use and effects of tobacco, alcohol and drugs and is currently working on improved courses in these areas and in family life. Great strides have been made in improved training for guidance teachers, particularly at eight Ontario centres. The department is in full agreement with the select committee's recommendations about upgrading the training of elementary school teachers and has introduced steps to achieve this end. Extensive changes have been made in the grant structure for capital construction, many of them in line with the committee's recommendations.

Legislation is now in effect to bring—and in fact, Mr. Speaker, I guess already has brought—most of the schools for retarded children under the regular grant structure and incorporated them in the local boards of education, and the new county boards. This, of course, was a step that was recommended by the select committee on youth and which has been acted upon. A number of correspondence courses are now available in braille for blind students.

There is, of course, much in the select committee's report about community colleges and, as the members all know, there are now 19 colleges of applied arts and technology in operation. They provide two and three year courses as well as evening courses and they offer diplomas to students who graduate from them.

Students taking some three year courses receive credit for entrance into second year of university in a related course.

Seven colleges of applied arts and technology are now offering two year programmes for recreation leadership and beginning this fall two Ontario universities offer programmes in recreation.

The certification of full time recreation staff is being provided for and the standardization of the qualifications of part time and voluntary recreation leaders is now being undertaken by the youth and recreation branch through the provincial leadership development programme. A formal structure is now in operation to ensure the close co-ordination of the departments whose programmes relate to apprenticeship training.

That is, between The Department of Education, Department of Labour and Department of Correctional Services.

The province is now using all the money available to it through the federal-provincial physical fitness agreements. An escalated programme has been introduced to give courses for sports leadership personnel interested in such fields as coaching, refereeing, teaching of sports skills and administrations. An increasing number of sports groups are now using the facilities on Lake Couchiching for athletic training, coaches' training, executive member training and for competitive purposes.

The Department of Labour, Mr. Speaker, maintains a constant liaison with employers and management of major trades to determine where new apprenticeship programmes might most beneficially be introduced. This department also works in close conjunction with The Department of Education to ensure that apprenticeship training and other vocational training is as effective and beneficial for the students as possible.

A statistical and research branch was established in the Labour Department in 1965 and it operates under terms of reference encompassing those recommended by the select committee.

In The Department of Correctional Services a large number of the research projects suggested by the select committee have been undertaken. By arrangement with the centre of criminology at the University of Ottawa, studies concerning the Ontario training centres are being undertaken. The trades and training programme of The Department of Correctional Services has always been designed to assist the inmates and their rehabilitation upon release. Very close co-operation is maintained, Mr. Speaker, with The Department of Labour and The Department of Education, as I said earlier, to assure that the training programmes in all our institutions particularly those where young people are concerned is as effective as possible.

The Attorney General's department, along with other representatives of course, Mr. Speaker, has been participating in federal-provincial discussions over the last year and a half, concerning the age for juveniles. This question is, of course, one that has very great implications for many areas of government, particularly our correctional system and discussions on this matter are still continuing.

As funds become available, the Attorney General's department is proceeding with a programme whereby fulltime judges will be available for family and juvenile court work. A number of the select committee recommendations involved, of course, Mr. Speaker, attitudes and approach to the treatment of juveniles who are brought to court. Although they are not of a nature where specific action could be taken, the Attorney General's department is in broad agreement with these overall policies and is doing its utmost to ensure their implementation where possible. The recommendation that youth bureaus be established in police departments has been commended to the Ontario police commission for their study and this type of programme is being proceeded with of course, in some of our urban police departments.

A large number of recommendations of the select committee fall under the purview of The Department of Health, and many of these have already been implemented.

The services provided by mental health clinics throughout the province are fully available to our young people and in most instances an excellent relationship exists between these institutions and the schools, whereby referrals can be made with great ease. The clinics supplement the guidance services of course, Mr. Speaker, available within the school system.

Grant programmes for the training of such clinical personnel, psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers have been undertaken for some time by the Department. In recognition of the need for research regarding the manpower needs in the fields of social work, psychology and psychiatry, there has been established, within the Ontario council of health, a manpower committee which is directing its energy to this very pressing problem.

Extensive use is now being made of local mental health services in assisting the courts. The Alcoholism and Drug Addiction Research Foundation has, for some time, had a programme of research to determine the effects of alcohol on the social and economic welfare of youths.

Under The Rehabilitation Services Act, both capital and operating grants are now available for sheltered workshops of the type recommended by the select committee on youth.

The Department of Transport tells us that driver instruction courses are now being given in about 300 of our high schools throughout the province. It is hoped that, in due course, such training will be available in all our secondary schools. I am sure that the hon. members are aware of the action that was taken by The Department of Transport in making crash helmets mandatory for motor cyclists in accord with the recommendations of the select committee on youth.

Finally, as the hon. members will recall, legislation was introduced in the last session—and it is certainly not one of the more important recommendations of the report, in fact perhaps one of the least important—but anyway, it also has been implemented. That is the recommendation calling for the removal of the age restriction in regard to playing billiards, in public billiard halls. That has been done.

Mr. Speaker, although the list of actions taken by a number of government departments that I have just given is fairly long, it is, of course, in no way exhaustive in terms of the study and implementation that has gone on by the departments of this government of the report of the select committee on youth.

As a former member of that committee, I can only say tonight how pleased I am to have been able to bring to the hon. members this brief summary—a summary which, surely, must be an indication of the stress that this government puts on the needs of youth, an indication of the involvement of our youth, and our desire as a government to help them take their place and play their part with us as partners in the full development of the life of the community of this province and of this great country.

Mr. J. R. Breithaupt (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and enter this Throne Debate. First, sir, I would like to congratulate you on your continuing function as Speaker of this House.

I note that on occasion members are wont to start a comment they might make by saying: "In my time in this House, such-and-so has happened". Well, sir, a third of the members can, I think, with good reason say that in our time in this House you, as Speaker, have proven to be most competent, most fair and indeed, most efficient.

And so I would also add my appreciation to the comments that have been made with respect to the continuing appointment of the hon. member for Waterloo South as Deputy Speaker and Chairman of the whole House.

In the operations of the estimates committee, and of the dealing with the estimates in our last session, he was most efficient in his work and, sir, we presume that once again the estimates of the various departments will be handled with efficiency and dispatch by him when the time comes for that order of business to be with us.

I would this evening, sir, like to preface my comments with a discussion of some of the problems which face the citizens of Kitchener with respect to their urban renewal programmes. As members of this House are well aware, in many of the cities of our province there are requirements for substantial programmes of urban renewal.

At the present time we have a project to the value of some $16 million which has been developed over a period of years. We had, of course, the difficulty of facing the proposal made by the federal government with respect to a holdover of all types of urban renewal programmes as the federal housing study continued and as we faced the various problems of finances at the federal level of government. And there was, sir, some presumption that we might lose several large projects in our city. However, fortunately, that presumption seems to have been surpassed.

The federal Minister of Transport, the Hon. Paul Hellyer, has expressed interest in meeting with the city officials in Kitchener. We certainly hope that the proposals that have been made for urban renewal have not met any firm cut-off, but rather only a deferment as the housing requirements and urban requirements generally across our nation have themselves been sorted out in various priorities.

In Kitchener, five years of work have now gone into the programmes of urban renewal which were first begun in 1963. And I would say to you, sir, that in this approach to the problem which we have, the Minister of Municipal Affairs has been most helpful in attempting to ensure that we are able to resolve our problems. In a letter which went out generally over his signature on December 16 last, he said as follows:

It is my full intention to attempt to be involved in any change in policy developed, and to bring the province's point of view fully to the attention of the federal government before any change is made.

In the interim, I would suggest that each municipality examine its current position in urban renewal to determine whether it should continue as previously scheduled, or defer further action until a new policy is announced or the previous policy confirmed.

And I think, sir, that the comments of the Minister have in this area been most sound. We are certainly prepared to continue with the scheme of urban renewal and we are most pleased to see that the provincial authorities have approved a commitment of 25 per cent of the projects' costs, or some $4 million. We now require approval from the Ontario Municipal Board and then as well, hopefully, approval from the federal authorities so that the additional 50 per cent of the costs may be obtained.

We are quite prepared to continue with our commitment of 25 per cent of the costs. We intend to pay our share and we certainly appreciate the Minister's approval and assistance in encouraging the provincial authorities to pay the $4 million to which they have committed themselves.

Now, of course, as a result of the waiting which we are presently undergoing, there have been some comments to the effect that we may be losing certain kinds of redevelopment projects within our city; these certain projects which could cost our city missed opportunities or possibly even threaten the collapse of the present urban renewal scheme. However, I believe that such is not going to be the case. After five years of detailed studies and planning, the programme which has been developed so far should certainly receive the approval of the federal authorities. Normally, of course, the 50 per cent grant given at this level is almost automatic once provincial approval has been given.

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Is it five years? I told Mr. Hellyer on Saturday you had been waiting four years.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Oh, the Minister is just a name dropper.

Mr. Breithaupt: I thank the hon. Minister. In fact, the original project was first conceived in 1963. Our city planner, Mr. William E. Thomson, has, of course, referred to the situation and the problem which we might face because of the change in interest in the development in the downtown area. Several developers are certainly waiting in the wings to deal with certain urban renewal problems and I note with great interest that two major projects have been announced in the last week. These are two large hotel developments, which will certainly go a long way to assist in the future development and redevelopment of the city.

Mr. Speaker, I was most interested in listening to the comments of the hon. member for Yorkview yesterday, as he referred to the land development project in the Kitchener area. As hon. members are well aware, the Ontario Housing Corporation has taken options on approximately 3,000 acres of land between the boundaries of Kitchener, Hespeler and Guelph, and the intention has been expressed that a new city will be developed in this area. No prices have been given to us as to the assembly cost of these lands, but it is estimated that an average price might well be about $2,000 an acre, or an approximate total cost of some $6 million.

Mr. Sopha: Eighty per cent paid by taxpayers.

Mr. Breithaupt: Now, sir, I think it is important to us, as we look into the views which we should have in attempting to develop an efficient control of our financial expenditures with this province, to review the comments of Mr. Roy P. Drachman, who is the second vice president of the United States Urban Land Institute. Mr. Drachman is of the opinion that holding land in advance of large-scale community developments has been the nemesis of a number of ambitious and highly desirable projects for many years. In his opinion, we must have a commitment financially so, as when land may double in price every six years, we justify the holding of it.

Many developments of any size, of course, will have to be properly land planned, and this is especially true of the new towns and the large-scale housing projects. Proper designation and location of commercial areas, school and church sites, other community facilities and various residential types are very important financially to any large project. Only proper land planning can achieve the sorts of things which we wish to achieve.

I would, sir, refer you to several of the conclusions which Mr. Drachman made in a recent article, and they are as follows:

To summarize; developers of new towns can solve their land problems by first associating themselves with strong financial institutions which provide them with the necessary staying power to carry the project through the formulative period, into the phase when the cash flow begins in a substantial stream. Carrying costs such as interest and taxes can be added to the principal of the loan from financial institutions.

Secondly, following a plan for "new town" development using land for the development which will produce enough income from such lower uses as agriculture, mining, gravel operation, timbering or oil production, so the burden of carrying such land does not fall on the residential or industrial developer.

Thirdly, employing assistance from a federal government programme of long term low interest for the assemblage of large land parcels, with a portion of the increase in value to be paid to the government later in addition to the interest and principal repayments.

All of the foregoing comments confirm what the dean of twentieth century real estate developers, whom Mr. Drachman refers to as Mr. J. C. Nichols of Kansas City, says:

I remember well hearing him say that he had learned the hard way during the early '30s that he could not own all the land adjacent to his developments.

Since that time, his company has followed the policy of buying land to meet current needs, even if it meant paying considerably higher prices for it.

He has learned that he could better afford to pay more for land that he could put to immediate use than he could to buy it for less and hold it for several years.

Perhaps this is the answer that most community developers must come to.

Well, we are at the situation, sir, where land is now being held, and indeed, withheld from the market, in Waterloo county, to an extent where additional areas of land are having their prices inflated whether or not value is there.

We have seen two examples of this same approach within Ontario. The first one is in Scarborough's new town. And during the time that this new project was announced in Waterloo county, there were several articles in our local paper dealing with the situation in Scarborough and in the second area of development, namely, Saltfleet township.

This first area in Scarborough is known at least, locally within that area, as "the Malvern mystery." These are lands which were purchased in 1953 by a federal-provincial partnership long before the advent of the Ontario Housing Corporation.

The provincial government promised to have some 9,000 families living there by 1964. Unfortunately, there is not a home there as yet. We are now told that by 1970, next year, there will be, at long last, some development in this area.

But if this development does come to the fore, it will seemingly be in spite of the lack of co-operation which has existed between this government, through the Minister in charge of the Ontario Housing Corporation, and through the municipal authorities of the borough of Scarborough.

Supposedly the Ontario Housing Corporation has hired a staff of planners to design this project, but according to the mayor of the borough, Mr. Albert Campbell, they have not seen any of the proposals that have come to the fore as yet.

When they come in with their plans, the planning department of the borough will, of course, have to look at them, and consider them to some extent.

During the last provincial election campaign, the hon. Minister of Trade and Development said that the Ontario Housing Corporation would be prepared to begin offering lots to the public in 1969. But, of course, at that point no mention was made of the $2.5 million in services which Scarborough would normally have to pay before the development could proceed.

And it is indeed on the costs of these services that the whole project is now hanging—services that will have to be provided before the land can be effectively used, services which the borough cannot afford, and, apparently, services which the provincial government is not prepared to provide.

Now we are told that the project is suddenly ripe for development, and the Minister said that the first step would be a meeting with the Scarborough department heads to establish certain basic land use guidelines.

This may well be the case, and it may well be that the Malvern project will fit into the plans for the development of the borough of Scarborough. But it has taken 15 years. During that time the land has been tied up, and it may well be that the cost of maintaining this type of development will have seriously interfered with the market for lands, and also with the future development within this area.

The second area, of course, is that in Saltfleet township. And once again, the problem resolves itself along the lines of payment for services. Again, the Ontario Housing Corporation developed a project to assemble land for some $3 million during 1967, but the site at the present time is not serviced either by water or by sewers.

The services that Saltfleet township does have below Hamilton Mountain, I am informed, are purchased under agreement from Hamilton. And the city of Hamilton is, of course, the only municipality capable of servicing the area.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): When did they get the agreement? They have not got the agreement for Saltfleet, as far as I know.

Mr. Breithaupt: Not for the servicing, no. Well, I would be quite happy to put the question as to when this servicing agreement will in fact be developed, and possibly we will hear from the Minister to some extent as he attempts to put this project into fruition once the land has been assembled.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): Wait until the developer snaps his fingers.

Mr. Breithaupt: Well, if the first buildings are going to be put up without the servicing agreement, they may well be in some difficulty.

Well, sir, I put it to you that the two projects here are facing the same problems as the project within Waterloo county. One of these examples that I might put to you is a development which was to have taken place for the creation of a joint industrial park with the city of Kitchener and the township of Waterloo within the county of Waterloo.

Efforts were made on both sides of these two municipal organizations to develop an industrial area across the Grand river into a certain acreage, some 8,000 acres that were to have been annexed by the city of Kitchener. But this annexation has since been held up pending the result of the local government review within our county.

Land prices, of course, have soared in this area. As the Ontario Housing Corporation has developed its project, so the owners of every other acre of land in the adjacent area have expected that the same prices would be given for the land no matter what its use would be. The end result of the purchase of this land has been that this industrial park will not be proceeded with.

The Ontario Housing Corporation has had to bear some of the blame and, indeed, the major part of the blame for the inflated land values that have resulted from this hastily announced and surprisingly-quickly-conceived project. It is a project which created headlines at the time, but I am quite certain has created serious problems within this administration, problems that the member for Yorkview referred to, dealing with the lack of communication and the lack of common planning, and problems which I shall not repeat at this time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in addition to the problems of land development, we also have problems in our area concerning the obtaining of sufficient water so that the municipal growth within our country may continue at the same pace that it has so far.

For those members who are not familiar with our area, there are five possible sources for water development. First of all a pipeline from Lake Erie. Secondly, a pipeline from Georgian Bay, which is used in conjunction with the Grand river. Thirdly, a direct pipeline from Georgian Bay. Fourth, a pipeline from Lake Huron, Fifth, a pipeline from Lake Ontario.

We are suddenly faced in Waterloo county with the requirement for a study to be performed as to the comparative costs for the provision of water to our municipal areas. The water commission of the city of Kitchener, and Waterloo public utilities commission, have agreed to hire an engineering firm so that a detailed cost study of potential water resources and sources can be conducted.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Ontario Water Resources Commission is most capable to conduct this kind of study. Certainly the decision which has been made by the Ontario Water Resources Commission has been one given without the full facts that we believe we are entitled to have.

Our authorities have been told by the commission that the costs on some of these possible sources are prohibitive, but no one has come up with a positive figure. Certainly the elected, or appointed, officials within our county cannot take an intelligent stand on these problems, they cannot know what sort of decisions they have to make, unless the costs of these various projects are clearly set out.

We, at the present time, have had recommended to us a pipeline situation from either Lake Ontario or Lake Erie. However, the local authorities who are charged with the responsibility of ensuring that our citizens have sufficient water resources available to them, are not satisfied with this programme. The possibilities of the Grand river as a source of water supply should not be dismissed lightly.

Similarly, there is a great feeling that with the sewers developing down to the Lake Erie area, it seems rather curious that we should pump the water, once it reaches the lake, back to our communities as drinking water. Now this, of course, is an oversimplification, but the point is surely that the cost structure of these various projects should be known to us before we are forced to make any decision.

The Ontario Water Resources Commission has seemingly not been prepared to allow a full and free flow of information between itself and the local bodies to which I have referred. The commission has evidently made up its mind that either Lake Erie or Lake Ontario should be the future supply sources for this area. They are not prepared to discuss the alternatives. Now I am sure they must have been following some sort of advice from the engineering staff they have. I am told that they have some 300 engineers on their staff.

I should think that it would not take that number of engineers to create a craft that would go to the moon, much less solve the water resources problem within Ontario. Lake Erie, as a source of water, alarms many who are aware of its degree of pollution.

Either Lake Huron or Georgian Bay may well be more preferable to the persons within our area. Indeed, as I have said, there are some who believe that a redevelopment of the Grand River itself, with the proper results from conservation programmes, and, to a degree, supplemented with Georgian Bay water, is a source of adequate potential for the growth which we may well expect. We have had a somewhat highhanded way from the Ontario Water Resources Commission of trying to settle this kind of question at its Toronto headquarters, certainly leaving many local doubts unanswered. The result of not answering these doubts has caused some resentment and finally, of course, this independent study decision, the cost of which will have to be borne by the municipalities.

Now I think, sir, that the Ontario Water Resources Commission must have its entire role reviewed. Energy and Resources Management and the OWRC involvement, and the interest of the Highways Department, as well as in the development of programmes of growth within our area, have to be conveyed to Queen's Park in the first instance through some forms of channels of communication and leadership, which apparently do not now exist.

I recall on the select committee on taxation this summer, my colleagues were dealing with the development of an increased staff, a small staff, but one which could deal in depth with the problems of redevelopment within the province which might be directly under the control of the Premier's office.

Now, if this staff were provided, we, of course, would presume that the water resources commission would be reorganized so that it would be selling its services wholesale to the regional government or borough utility commissions. The implication of the proposals are that the regional governments would be financing their water and sewage services in the same way that municipalities are doing now, but the implication given through the Minister of Municipal Affairs does not appear to be satisfactory.

I suggest that the services provided by the OWRC are not something that can be localized. They indeed depend on drainage areas, which may, or may not, be otherwise ideal regions for government. Of course they usually will not be, since other considerations will predominate over the drainage patterns, I am certain, for the development of viable, economic regional growth within the province.

The Ontario Water Resources Commission, I suggest, should become an operation like Ontario Hydro, financed with provincial backing, as a provincial body, not restricted by local government limitations.

With our community we have difficulties in the development of housing projects, certainly for the lower income groups. Not only in Kitchener, but I am certain within the downtown areas of other cities across our province, the prospect of owning one's own home becomes less and less a possibility. Indeed, dark days may well loom for the persons who wish to break out of a rental accommodation situation, either by apartments or by living in converted portions of homes, unless additional funds can be provided through federal or provincial sources.

We now have a commitment from the Ontario Housing Corporation which will build some 250 units within this year and this, of course, will lease to some extent the need for those requiring rent-geared-to-income accommodation. There is, of course, no problem for those who can afford homes at the $25,000 level and above and, indeed, there is seldom a problem in this area.

There is always an available market, providing that the down payments can be scraped up. The real problem, of course, lies for those who wish to obtain homes say in the $16,000 to $20,000 bracket, and the high interest rates which now exist are not helping them.

The costs continue to rise for housing and there are, of course, some provincial regulations, to which I would like to refer, which assist these increases. Let me, sir, refer you to a recent problem in the housing field which our builders have had to face, as sales tax was to be applied to prefabricated structures but not applied if those same items were framed or were built on the building site.

I would like to review with you a letter which Mr. Russell Howald sent to The Department of Revenue on October 2 last and the reply which he got on October 10.

Mr. Howald had written as president of the Kitchener-Waterloo House Builders Association to Mr. G. W. Prowse, the district director of The Department of Revenue in Kitchener. This letter was in turn answered by Mr. Stewart Garland, the director of the retail sales tax branch on October 10, last.

The first question that Mr. Howald asked was:

Will the sales tax still be applicable if the builder stops his in-shop fabricating operations and builds the component such as walls and trusses at the housing site, and will the builder still be required to obtain a retail sales tax license?

Mr. Prowse in his reply said that if the builder did stop he would not be regarded as a manufacturer and under those circumstances he would not be required to obtain a retail sales tax license.

The second question raised was:

If the builder continues to fabricate in his own shop, does the sales tax apply to the labour used in erecting these components at the house site as well as to the labour involved in making the components at the shop?

This was answered in that the sales tax would not apply to labour erecting the items at the housing site if the builder continued to fabricate in his own shop.

The third question put was:

If the builders using these in-shop methods have already paid sales tax on materials used since the components made in the shop would be liable for sales tax, would the material used for in-shop fabricating qualify for sales tax exemption on the basis that double taxation would apply?

The answer was that the builders using these methods would be required to obtain a vendor's permit and would be thus enabled to purchase all materials and equipment used exempt from tax so that double taxation would be avoided.

Now, the final question referred to the fact that the letter was dated September 30, 1968, and that the tax would apply from October 1, 1968, which would, of course, leave many members of the association in the position of having contracts signed and commitments made on the basis of components which had been built and which were not taxable.

The question dealt with who in fact would absorb this additional amount of money and the answer was that if the contracts were signed, or some other firm price commitments had been entered into, prior to the date of notification, they would be exempted from sales tax and the manufactured cost of any shop-manufactured components of such contracts. However, tax would have to be calculated and applied correctly on all contracts entered into thereafter.

Well, Mr. Howald then went on to review the general structure of prices and problems facing the house building industry, and suggested that the benefit of in-shop fabricating of various component parts was an excellent way of maintaining a high level in employment and of allowing stock of items to be manufactured at times of inclement weather and especially throughout the winter months. This would, of course, lower the general cost of many items and it would be a benefit both to the home builder and to the purchaser of the home who eventually must pay the price for all of these items and must pay, of course, all the total taxes which are shifted along to him in the purchase price of the home.

In addition, overtime work and payments which are also added to the overall cost of the homes could be kept to the minimum and the waste which would be occasioned on the site, as one or two items are made, would also be kept to a minimum if items were prefabricated from the builder's own shop. As well, there would be additional costs for bookkeeping and other supervisory services which would also have to be passed on to the person who buys the house.

Mr. Garland replied that he was of the opinion that the different tax treatment of in-shop and on-site fabrications contributed to greater overall equity in that the economies and benefits resulting from in-shop fabrication more than offset any additional tax which might be involved.

He then went on to state that this was not a recent ruling and in fact had come from a revision of the Retail Sales Tax on April 30, 1963. Apparently, the Act was changed at that time to supposedly ensure comparable equity as between the contractor who might buy some prefabricated items from a lumber building supply dealer and thereby have to pay the full tax on the purchase price, and the contractor on the other side who might, himself, prefabricate and assemble such sections at his own shop.

The latter contractor is required to pay tax on his manufactured cost just as the lumber dealer would collect tax if he sold component parts to another builder and the difference between the taxes paid and required to be paid if he had purchased the prefabricated sections is, of course, much closer than it would be if the tax was not collected at all from the house builder who prefabricates in his own shop.

As the Kitchener-Waterloo Record reported, in an editorial on October 7, 1968:

It is supposed to be government policy to cut housing costs. Cutting costs is what the builders are trying to do when they do some prefabricating. Then the government moves into penalize them for trying to follow government policy. No one should have to pay a sales tax for moving his own work from one work place to another.

And it is with this editorial comment that the Liberal party is in accord. On October 11th, the leader of the Opposition and leader of the Liberal party in Ontario, sent out a news release for what he called a "priority task for Mr. White". In this release he referred, of course, to our new Minister of Provincial Revenue who had, at that time, just been appointed.

In our leader's view, the situation shows that the new Minister of Revenue must get down immediately to the business of running the province's tax system on socially equitable and progressive lines. I, as the Opposition critic of this Department, share this view. It is apparent that the present tax system is going completely against the ready provision of homes for the people of this province. The imposition of this kind of a tax and the collection of it from house builders is only a nuisance to the house builder and a cost which, of course, will be fully passed on to the consumer who buys the home.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: And drop the 11 per cent?

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey South): Go to your Liberal friends.

Mr. Breithaupt: The regulations now show that sales tax is imposed on house components such as windows and kitchen units which are assembled efficiently in factories and workshops and brought to the building site in prefabricated form. In order to qualify for tax exemption, Mr. Speaker, they have made into a kind of stone age manner of construction the approach for development of these component parts. The parts must be created on the site themselves because only in this way can they be said to be regarded as real property.

In this day and age, of course, this kind of an approach to taxation is nonsense. We have called upon the hon. Minister, as one of the first things he does in his department, to resolve this problem.

Of course, it should be stressed that the civil servants of the Revenue Department are correctly interpreting the policy with which they have to work. There is no evidence of double taxation. The research which has been done does not suggest that there is any discrimination in our area with respect to other areas. Rather that a late audit of this situation only brought this matter to light when the tax really should have been added since April of 1963.

The criticism which the Liberal Party makes, and which I make, against the operation of the department is that it is up to the Minister to change this point of view and to change the rules in this area so that house building can be encouraged and this intermediate stage of taxation avoided. To do otherwise, is to penalize the efficient house builders who are attempting to spread employment throughout the year and fabricate items with as little waste as possible and with the best efficiency in which they can operate.

This whole approach should be encouraged so as to lower, as far as possible, the general overall cost of house building. I certainly look forward to having the Minister change these regulations so that house builders in our area and throughout the rest of the province can pass on these definite savings to the eventual purchaser of the home.

Mr. Speaker, within our province there have been many persons involved recently in discussions dealing with the problems of pollution. We have had, of course, the report brought in to this House concerning the situation with the Electric Reduction Company at Port Maitland. This report and the public enquiry into this problem of pollution may well prove to be a milestone as it sets out the approach which this government has taken to attempt to resolve these problems.

There seems to be much difficulty within this government as it attempts to decide just who is responsible for what. One of the prime causes of confusion and concern to the residents of the polluted area, for example, was a 1965 analysis by the Ontario Water Resources Commission of water samples, which showed a high fluoride content. This was sent to the local medical officer of health but the environmental health branch of the provincial Department of Health did not seem to get it.

At one time or another the commission found six departments of government, plus assorted divisions and agencies, were involved in the Port Maitland problem. The health of the fertilizer plant workers was the responsibility of the Labour Department while they were in the plant and of the Health Department while they were at home. The main plant came under The Department of Health and an associated operation a few hundred yards away was considered a metallurgical plant and came under The Department of Mines. No wonder the problems of pollution face difficulty and indeed well nigh impossibility of solution. We talk of pollution but who in fact really does anything about it?

A recent book by Professor J. H. Dales of the University of Toronto is entitled "Pollution, Property and Prices". And Professor Dales points out that pollution is a human problem and not a natural one. He says that pollution is a problem for much the same reason, and efforts to solve the problem are frustrated because pollution, like the weather, is one of those problems that being everybody's business ends up as being nobody's business.

There is, however, this difference between the weather and pollution. Pollution has become an acute problem because of the ways humans exercise their property rights.

And the whole approach to pollution, if we intend to resolve the problems which now face us, must be an approach which will resolve the problems by looking at them as a collective problem. They must be solved collectively and not through the approach of choosing individual scapegoats who will take the blame for this small area or that small area.

If everyone can be made to be involved in settling everybody's business, which pollution is, instead of waiting for a democratic government to establish a bureaucracy in order to settle it, we shall be that much better off.

There are, of course, various effects that face us, not only in the damage that is done to our persons, to our animals and to our property by pollution. Indeed, within this province as it develops even further, damage results to the various forms of recreation that we face.

Professor Norman Pearson is an associate professor in the department of geography, and chairman for the centre for resources development at the University of Guelph. In a paper which he delivered to the Ontario pollution control conference in Toronto, December 5, 1967, he set out briefly some of the problems which we have to face in the pollution area and some of the solutions which he sees available to us. He said:

The mega problem of pollution as it affects recreation is already complicated enough without worsening it by actions which can only be called shortsighted, if we want to be charitable, and stupid, if we want to be blunt. It is stupid to let septic tanks be built on totally unsuitable soils, or cottages to be built on very small lots when any competent engineer can forecast what will happen. It is evident that if we cannot bring ourselves to prevent the wholly obvious, then the more complex problems which need research and action will only be compounded and will worsen. We could, in fact, begin to ameliorate the most evident effects of pollution affecting that kind of recreation by having sensible building and zoning regulations and by enforcing them. In just the same way we could insist on suppressors for automobiles and begin to ease the decay of city environments. This would begin to take some of the pressures off the recreational areas.

You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that earlier in the session I had asked certain questions with respect to development in the Niagara region concerning, especially, the ownership of the public beaches on the Lake Erie shoreline. I referred at that time to studies completed by Professor John N. Jackson, head of the geography department at Brock University, which were done at the request of the Niagara regional development council. These studies concluded that the beaches were public now.

I think, sir, it is important for us to spend just a moment to review some of the comments which were made concerning the development of this recreational area. This area was a playground for persons in southern Ontario 50 years ago, but has now been dealt a series of almost mortal blows by those who have wasted these resources. With luck and a lot of money and better management than we have seen so far, we may be able to reverse this problem. I sincerely hope we can.

But the matter of owning these beaches in Ontario has been dealt with at some length and I certainly invite the study of the hon. members to the July 1968 issue of the Ontario Naturalist and to an article written by Professor Jackson. This deals with what he believes to be the effective rules that concern the ownership of these beaches.

His conclusions and recommendations are there for the hon. members to look at and I will not add them to the record of the House at this time. But he does say this:

In encouraging the greater use of land for outdoor recreation, many difficult problems will arise, particularly in the more densely settled regions such as along the Lake Erie shore. It is important in this provision to provide not only for the recreation but also to protect the legitimate rights of the neighbouring landowners.

A code of recreational law and behaviour should be concerned with both aspects and a certain amount of research and experimentation to help in devising better and fairer arrangements will be necessary.

We, sir, have managed to pollute many areas within our province. One of them happens to be the northerly shores of the Lakes Erie and Ontario. I certainly hope that this government will give more study than it has to date to attempt to resolve these problems while they are still soluble.

I would like to refer, sir, to an anniversary which took place within Kitchener in this last year. It was the twentieth anniversary of a programme which had its development in Kitchener-Waterloo collegiate. This programme dealt with proper classroom and vehicle training for student drivers within our community.

The establishment of the first driver instruction course in Canada took place in Kitchener in October of 1948. At that point, some 8,000 schools were giving driver instruction in the United States but this programme had not as yet been developed to any extent within Canada. And I would, sir, like to praise a number of men who were instrumental in developing this programme which has now spread throughout the province and, indeed to other provinces within Canada as the hon. Minister of Transport can well attest.

The strongest supporter, of course, was Mr. Arthur Sandrock, former head of the Ontario Motor League and a past president of the Waterloo County Automobile Club. As a resident of Kitchener, a city which we have always considered to be a pioneer area in many fields within our province, Mr. Sandrock was instrumental in developing the initiative which got this programme under way.

Those of you who have seen the November, 1968 issue of "Ontario Traffic Safety" might well be interested in the picture that appears on the last page of that item. Very fortunately for us, the seven men who were instrumental in the developing of this programme were there, present and well, to see the results of their handiwork on this twentieth anniversary. We were joined by the Minister, who graced the gathering and brought the greetings of the government, which were much appreciated by those who received them.

The first driving instructor, Mr. Joseph St. Amand; the co-ordinator of the first driver instruction course, Mr. Gordon House; the high school board member whom Mr. Sandrock encouraged to get involved, Mr. Max Euler; Mr. Sandrock to whom I have referred; Mr. Walter Ziegler, the former principal of the Kitchener-Waterloo collegiate and vocational school; Mr. Vince Scherer, who was the representative for the automobile company that donated the first car; and the present police chief, Mr. Wilfred Henrich, who was formerly a traffic sergeant and instrumental in the development of this course.

And it may well be of interest to the members of this House that of the nine students who graduated from this course 20 years ago, a check by The Ontario Department of Transport was able to locate seven of them as residents of this province. Every one of these graduates had a perfect driving record, so the programme must be of some merit.

This programme which has now spread to some 350, or two-thirds of the high schools within Ontario, is a programme of which we are very proud. I was most pleased to see these men be present because this instruction has become accepted and developed within the province.

Mr. Speaker, last year an important new educational report was published in Ontario and it is now being widely read and discussed. It has the title "Living and Learning." Now you have all heard of it, of course, as members of this House, but the title, I suggest, can also be applied to the present financial situation in which we are living. The more the people of Ontario live within the shadow of the present administration, the more they learn what it is costing to do so. We are now beginning to appreciate the price that we have to pay for the flagrant bad management of the province's affairs we believe we have seen, especially over these last few years of the quarter century that the Conservatives have been in power.

Now, in what attempts to be a last fling, we are witnessing the development of regional government programmes within the province. These programmes have been referred to by hon. members of this House in the Niagara region and the Halton-Peel region, and, of course, we are faced with the same sort of programme development within Waterloo county.

There is much uncertainty as we approach the day when the report will be presented to the citizens of our area by Professor Stewart Fyfe, of Queen's University. There is much uncertainty that we are now facing, as various city projects are being postponed or defrayed against the day when this report may be forthcoming.

Now it would appear that the report which we had hoped for this year, in fact, will not be received so that it can be implemented much before 1971. The delay has upset our local officials and people who have been involved in attempts to live with the growth that is facing us in Waterloo county.

Despite the promises that we had received to the contrary, we, I am afraid, will have to forget regional government in our area, at least until 1971. There are problems which result from this kind of a delay and I might, Mr. Speaker, just briefly refer to a few.

We have the problems of our registry office situation where the building is inadequate for the amount of business that has to be transacted. The grand jury recently has been told that, even with three extra microfilm machines, it will take some 22 years to catch up on the backlog of work which has to be done in that office.

We have, of course, the problem common to many other counties within Ontario—that of a jail that has existed since some years before Confederation. The 35 ancient county jails which we have in Ontario are slated, no doubt, for replacement eventually. That replacement, of course, will have to be something that will have to wait until we are in some scheme of regional government.

The longer we have to wait for regional government, the more problems we have of creating good forms of detentional centres that will replace these ancient dungeons that dot our landscape.

We have problems, of course, with increases in crime because the police forces within our area have not as yet had the ability to fully integrate themselves. Again we are waiting until regional government may set up new patterns of growth for the future, and the kind of boundaries which we face in our county set out nine separate municipal police forces.

It is very difficult to decide who should go where on what emergency. While the departments do attempt to co-operate, again the fact that regional government has been delayed adds a certain burden to the authorities within the county. This same burden we have, as a final example, in the kind of traffic problems which we are facing in the downtown areas of Kitchener.

Again we expect an approximate ten per cent increase in this kind of traffic in 1969. While we now have a new expressway which is under construction, the problems which will result from its being available may well be more impressive than the problems which could otherwise be solved.

But we have, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that our regional government study has not been made available to us, attempted to co-operate as fully as we can with the development of regional government. Our new county school board has been well organized and I should refer to its newly-elected chairman, Mr. John Darling.

The trustees of these new county school boards are facing different kinds of problems. They will certainly no longer be administering schools, but they will be involved in the planning and establishing of policy and will be available to provide additional educational services for the children within our county.

They have a difficult job, a job which they did not seek initially, a job which was imposed upon them, but a job which I believe they have grown into and a job which they are prepared to deal with. The same situation exists with the development of health services as we approach the situation of regional government.

We have now a project for the development of a boys' village within our area, a centre that will deal with making home-life facilities available to adolescent boys, and one which we hope will be the most progressive in Canada. We hope that this year will see the start of this project; a project which will accept boys from 12 to 18 years of age, and perhaps outside this range if necessary.

It will be more of a permanent home for them, not just a place for them to stay. This kind of a project, which is being developed through several officers in the Kitchener-Waterloo social planning council, is something which again will benefit through the final and eventual implementation of regional government.

As well, we have a new development for health and psychiatric care, a development which will co-ordinate the services for children in the schools within the county.

We have a recent announcement as to the development locally of the Addiction Research Foundation for alcoholism and drugs, which will set up an intensified alcoholism and drug dependence programme within our metropolitan area.

These sort of projects show the growth and the pattern of development which Waterloo county is facing, patterns which have been referred to by the hon. member for Waterloo North — when he spoke — patterns which are becoming increasingly involved, and patterns which will have to be developed rapidly if we are able at all to keep a balance of control over the forms of growth within our province.

Mr. Speaker, politics like many other human activities, involves an interaction of myths and realities. The clash of opinions among parties and governments, pressure groups, and the public, is the democratic method of flushing out the realities from the myths. The system works well most of the time.

Human prejudices, biases, and lack of knowledge, indeed, the impossibility of determining truths or actions that are right for all time, makes the system imperfect. But since parliamentary democracy is the best device which so far we have discovered to handle people's affairs for the common good, I certainly make no apology for talking about some of these myths as seen by one practising provincial politician.

In Ontario and throughout Canada, a series of myths has hampered all of us in conducting ourselves so as not to demand more than we can produce. One myth is that inflation does not really hurt anybody, since a little extra pressure of demand and resources acts as a stimulant to business. It has taken some time for the so-called man on the street to recognize what inflation can do to his standard of living, to his ability to borrow funds to build a house, and to his willingness to invest his savings in a profitable way.

I hope that this myth has been largely destroyed, but one still hears echoes of it from those who claim that inflation is the price which we have to and should pay for employment. I believe that we cannot for long sustain high levels of employment in an inflationary environment.

The second myth with which we have to live is one which has arisen out of the destruction of an ancient view of economics. It took many years in the recent past to convince the citizens, not only in Canada, but in the rest of the western nations of the world, that deficit financing was not immoral — indeed, that this kind of financing could prove highly beneficial when a great deal of economic slack exists in the country.

However, as a concept that was fathered by that great economist, John Maynard Keynes, began to be understood, balancing the economy rather than balancing any one annual budget became more and more fashionable, and for good reason. However, once the myth of the eternally balanced budget was destroyed, many people also seemed to have forgotten the lesson that balancing the economy must frequently imply balancing the budget, or even running a surplus during some periods of excessive pressure.

Those of us who, in today's conditions, talk of the necessity of the balanced budget, are attacked by some of being totally ignorant of modern economics. I, however, suggest to you strongly that it is these critics who are fighting the last war, and in my view it is they who are losing it.

I know that if Keynes was still alive today he would endorse any positive approaches that exist for balancing budgets in Canada today.

The third myth has been that we could somehow, all of us, get more out of the economy than we were putting into it by way of production. We have all read articles and arguments about how beneficial it would be to have incomes rise substantially in excess of productivity, so that in some mysterious manner we could all become rich.

This is a myth which responsible economists and politicians are still fighting against, and one would hope that useful instruments will eventually be devised to cope with this particular problem. Essentially it must well be the role of the federal government to re-establish an environment in which price levels will generally remain stable, employment remains high, productivity increases steadily and people are induced to save and channel their savings into productive investment.

This is what we should look for as well in our provincial economy, and this is what the government of the province of Ontario must achieve in its own budgetary, economic and financial policies.

In these areas, the provincial government must follow the approach of the federal government as it attempts to bring under better control its own expenditures.

Over the past year or so, provincial expenditures have been one factor pushing up the level of demand within our economy. In addition, of course, this government must endeavour to bring about an improvement in the climate of the market for capital securities of the province.

The federal government has attempted to make some improvement in the control of its own expenditures. It may be noted in the area of university and post-secondary education, as well as in a number of welfare fields, there have been a number of cost-sharing agreements.

It may further be noted that the cost of these programmes, administered by the provinces, but paid for in part by the federal government, have risen considerably beyond early forecasts. As a result, expenditures at the federal and provincial levels have consistently increased so that year after year, deficits have developed in current financing, in spite of the pronouncements of the federal finance ministers and provincial treasurers, that their own budgets would be placed in balance.

The present federal Minister of Finance stated that he is determined over the next fiscal year to bring federal expenditures under better control. It seems that there is a credibility gap between the annual proposals of persons of authority, regarding our economy on the one hand and the actual results on the other.

This gap cannot certainly be allowed to remain. It seems apparent, however, that only performance and careful scrutiny of expenditures on behalf of both federal and provincial authorities can make it disappear.

While 1968 was certainly a good year for the economy of Ontario and of Canada, our general expansion continued without significant interruption, and the demand for Canadian goods and services has been firm, with our exports substantially increased.

The monetary policies being followed by the Bank of Canada are motivated by the objectives which are designed to strike at inflation and to overcome those financial difficulties which will exist until the expectations of inflation are broken. Now that a year has passed since the provincial election of 1967, we, in Ontario, are down to the rock bottom problems of how to run this province within the bounds that reasonable taxation affords.

As the official Opposition, we Liberals say that the Conservative government of Queen's Park, the government of this House, which has been in office for a quarter of a century, has become moribund and is now incapable of running Ontario efficiently.

Some of our best evidence comes from the Cabinet Ministers themselves. Particularly the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton), the hon. member for Huron, and the new Minister of Revenue (Mr. White), the hon. member for London South.

New taxes, of course, are something that will be distasteful to all of us, but they are the situation that appears to be inevitable because the Treasurer seems to have regarded the Revenue post as an excuse for his own relaxing a little in the surveillance of the expense side of the ledger. In this connection, borrowing is no substitute for good house-keeping.

Today's voters are, apparently, more sophisticated and more wise to the world than those who returned the previous administration to power only some 18 months ago. Such is the accelerated pace of living that they now have only—with the reality of the lunar mission, perhaps, as the trigger—awakened to a world of high-rise buildings, urban problems, endless noise, housing and transportation difficulties, bureaucracy at every turn, a polluted environment of air and water, and that hopeless feeling that goes by the name of alienation.

Certainly it took the astronauts to bring home the idea of the "the spaceship Earth." This is a planet of quite limited size, and we are eating away at its thin armour of atmosphere through poor conservation practices and using up its irreplaceable defences against the hostile universe.

Mr. Speaker, I was interested to have the comments of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Wells), concerning the basic shelter exemption grant programme in this province. The plan was accepted by the Conservative Party within this province as it approached the most recent election, along with the other item that was pulled out of the Smith committee report, namely that of the taking over of the total cost of the administration of justice.

Both these ideas were pulled like plums out of a pudding, and the rebates, of course, in cost, will probably have reached the sum of $150 million in cost this year. This is certainly an expensive, wasteful and inaccurate method of giving civic taxpayers some assistance from the cost of education and other burdens upon them.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): Their thumbs are still stuck in the plums.

Mr. Breithaupt: If the Minister without Portfolio equates his task to being the Minister of nothing, then I assure him that his comments with respect to the presumed success of this programme means that he is continuing to be the Minister of nothing, who is going nowhere.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): That is very uncharacteristic of the hon. member.

Mr. Breithaupt: The approach given by the present government has been to back into any attempts at reform within this system, something like the butcher backing into the meat grinder and getting a little behind in his work.

And this whole situation has developed consistently to the point in which we now find ourselves. The Minister of Municipal Affairs seems to recognize now that a direct grant to the municipalities is a much better way of handling provincial assistance to civic taxpayers. He, of course, has to accept the fact that every taxpayer does not then share in the largesse of the provincial government.

However, this is more than balanced by the view of any intelligent person that the taxpayers are no longer prepared to be bribed with their own money, that they realize that they are only receiving in repayments moneys which have been taken from them.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I do not seem to recall the hon. member voting against this legislation.

Mr. Breithaupt: Well, Mr. Speaker, we are quite prepared to accept a little reform when we cannot get a lot.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You should not have voted for it.

Mr. Breithaupt: Well, Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are in favour of any reform we can get, whether it is well conducted or not.

Mr. Speaker, during the last provincial election campaign we were assured by the leader of the government that his party had authored in Ontario the kind of prosperity that had not been seen since the golden days of Rome.

Nothing much has happened to change anything and yet we are now faced with the contradictory comments that we have heard from time to time with respect to the financial crisis, of a sort that even Aristotle Onassis would not figure was small change. It certainly came on very swiftly.

The little stopover in Frankfurt that the Provincial Treasurer and his friends made has given us some temporary relief, at a price—a loan in Deutschmarks, of course, at six and a half per cent, unless the mark is revalued.

If it is, then calculating the true rate of interest will be quite an exercise. Interest compound on interest by the time it is paid off. This, of course, if only the first of any future borrowing that we are now told of which will have to be dealt with by someone; if not the members of this House, by their children and their grandchildren.

And, this, of course, is the government that is not prepared to take away $175 million available under the federal Medicare programme on one hand, and yet is prepared to throw away $150 million on the basic shelter exemption. No wonder we are in trouble.

It makes one wonder, Mr. Speaker, as to the activities of the economists employed by the Treasury at Queen's Park. Apparently they can tell you what will happen next week, and next month, and next year, and then they can explain afterwards why it did not happen that way at all.

The hon. Premier and the Provincial Treasurer have been attempting to condition Ontario residents for likely tax increases, in order to offset the province's worsening expenditure revenue gap. They have, as well, been conditioning the public to blame the federal authorities when these increases are upon us. I would certainly make it clear to you, Mr. Speaker, that we are not intent—in spite of what the Treasury benches may think—on bailing out our federal colleagues, the present government or the present Cabinet.

We are not apologists for the activities of Mr. Benson or of his colleagues in the Cabinet. We certainly did not visit Ottawa as a group to receive any instructions, in spite of what was said, but rather to attempt in a spirit of co-operation to explain our points of view and our ultimate responsibilities to the people of this province.

We believe that both the provincial and federal governments have been too rigid in their approach to financial matters. We believe that Ontario should demand a greater role with the federal government in attempting to determine the income tax base, rather than simply arguing about increasing the tax points which provinces receive in rebates from Ottawa.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the present administration is always prepared to accept the credit. They are always prepared to take any advantage they can from programmes which have been developed and to take any benefit which has been bestowed upon them by the people of Ontario.

I suggest to you, sir, that it is difficult to come up with a programme of taxation which is going to be satisfactory. In spite of the fact that various economic outlooks have been made, we, of course, well realize that none of the outlooks or none of the predictions which have been given to us may at all be accurate because of a variety of reasons.

No one knows better than those who make the forecasts annually just how audacious they really are since they presume predictability that is simply non-existent.

So many organizations or individuals crank numbers into budgets and forecasts each year. But the laws of probability ensure that a few will correctly predict a peak and a trough a year ahead.

However, economic literature is conspicuously lacking in examples of any one or any organization that has demonstrated consistent ability to predict one turn of the cycle six months ahead, not to mention the turn ahead following that.

There are simply too many factors which are involved in the domestic market.

In the Christmas letter of the chairman of the Ontario Economic Council, Mr. W. H. Cranston quoted a recent issue of The Wall Street Journal as follows:

After all, a lot of people enjoy being frightened. Some people like to go to horror movies and some people hire economists. What is the use of keeping an economist around if he cannot scare you?

Well, it would certainly seem, Mr. Speaker, that the economists hired by The Department of Treasury and at work at other civil service posts across our province are certainly earning their salaries. They are, without question, causing the Provincial Treasurer to remain white-lipped and trembling if no one else, and I suggest they are scaring all of us more often than we would like to believe.

I would refer briefly, sir, to the recommendations of the report of the economic council which called for government reform within this province only in this past month. The concept of regional government, we are told, should be expanded to include consideration of the reform of the total system of government in Ontario. We are further told that the basic operating principles should be that insofar as possible, the elector is able to assign responsibility for provision of services to a specific level of government and that he is capable of understanding the real cost of each service as well as the direct and indirect benefits received.

The recommendations of this report deserve careful study by all of the members of this House, because unless we get a viable form of economic reform within this province, we will only be continuing to compound our problems. As Plato says in The Republic:

The just man sets his house in order, gaining the mastery over himself; and becoming on good terms with himself through discipline, he joins in harmony those different elements; and binding all these elements he moulds the many within him into one, temperate and harmonious. In this spirit he lives, whether he is money making or attending to the wants of his body, whether he is engaged in politics or on business transactions of his own, throughout he considers and calls just and beautiful, all conduct which pursues and helps to create this attitude of mind.

Mr. Speaker, if we are able to develop our own economy and our own approach to the future of Ontario by following these rules set out for us thousands of years ago, then we can approach through responsible reform, a just society in Ontario.

Mr. Reilly moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with the Throne debate and other matters on the order paper.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the House leader whether the Ontario College of Arts bill will be likely to come up?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am afraid I could not give you that information. I would doubt it.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): But you do intend to do bills?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: If there is time after we have completed the Throne debate speakers.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Grossman moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1969

The House met at 2.30 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Today we have a great many visitors. In the Speaker's gallery, we have members of the Queen Victoria Rebekah Lodge No. 225, from Ridgeway; in the east gallery, students from the Western Technical and Commercial School in Toronto, and from the York Humber High School in Toronto; in the west gallery, students from St. Clair Junior High School, in Toronto; and members of the field services branch of The Department of Social and Family Services. And in both galleries, we have students from Applewood Heights Secondary School in Cooksville. Later this afternoon, the students from McKay Senior Public School in Port Colborne will be with us.

Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Orders of the day.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have questions for the Minister of Trade and the Minister of Education. Neither of those gentlemen are with us as yet, but perhaps the question period might proceed.

Mr. Speaker: If the question period extends until their arrival I will be delighted to put the questions. The hon. member for York South, I think, is in the same position—his Ministers are also absent.

The hon. member for Welland South, though, has a question of the Minister of Transport if he wishes to place it.

Mr. R. Haggerty (Welland South): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a question for the Minister of Transport. As a result of the statement by E. M. Taylor, manager of the outdoor recreation department of the Ontario Safety League, in this month's issue of the Ontario Safety League report, that 21 deaths this winter involved snowmobiles, what action is the Minister now prepared to take to revise the safety regulations concerning snowmobiles on public thoroughfares in the province?

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, our staff is under direction to carry on a continuous and detailed examination of the operation of the Motorized Snow Vehicles Act for a full season, and in light of that experience, to review the legislation to ascertain if practical improvements can be made. It is felt that a full year's operation is desirable before changes are contemplated.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. leader of the Opposition might now place his question.

Mr. Nixon: Some questions for the Minister of Education, notice of which has been given to him several days ago. The first one: Does the Minister agree with the statement of the Etobicoke secondary school supervisor, Jack Baker, that Ontario will have a shortage of 2,000 high school teachers this year? Secondly, would the Minister approve of municipal summer training courses, as suggested by Mr. Baker, and last, when will the department's expansion plan compensate for this continuing shortage?

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, the member for Peterborough has a shorter, but very similiar question. If he would like to place that, I will answer both at the same time.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister agree that there will be a shortage of some 2,000 qualified secondary school teachers during the coming year? What steps does the Minister intend to take to alleviate that shortage?

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): Put a teachers' college in northern Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The member for Sudbury East has a partial answer, in his view at least, Mr. Speaker. Dealing with the leader of the Opposition's question—and I think contained in that, will be an answer for the member for Peterborough—I have to say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that I really do not know the basis for Mr. Baker's estimate. Mr.

Baker of course is associated with one large board here in the Metro area, and I think he is perhaps basing his estimate on the situation that it anticipates.

Mr. Nixon: What is your guess?

Hon. Mr. Davis: We do not know yet. We do know this though—there has been an increase of some 77 per cent in the full year enrolment in the colleges of education, from 1,195 to 2,116 in 1968-69, so that there will be an increase in the full time personnel available from this particular source.

From the summer course—and I will have to refer back to the statement I believe I made here in the House some months ago—there will be mature students who will provide another group available to begin teaching in September 1969. This is estimated at roughly 600, although it is difficult at this time to know whether it will be 590 or 610, but it will be in the neighbourhood of 600.

The discontinuance of the former summer school programme is where we will have the difficulty this year and, I would think, for another two or three years. It comes about because the former summer school programme was terminated at the request of the Ontario Teachers' Federation, the other professional groups, the superintendents, and the directors.

In all of these discussions, Mr. Speaker, it was made abundantly clear by the department that there would be this shortage of personnel and it was acknowledged there would be. There was an indication that the profession itself would make a very real effort to take up the slack, because of the elimination of the summer course programme. In my view they are prepared to do this.

At the same time, I think one must expect that there will be, during this transition period, a shortage of teachers. There is no question about it. We cannot determine—and will not be able to for perhaps another two or three months—the extent of this shortage.

I also am somewhat interested in the second part of the leader of the Opposition's question—Mr. Baker's reference, if you like. This is very important to the local board putting on a summer course.

Some of the boards have done this. We do not discourage it. I expect there will be more this coming summer. But, as I understand it, these summer courses really are to assist the teachers who are moving in more than likely, on letters of permission in September, 1969.

The point that I made and I make it again today, and I will continue to make it, is that they should not hold out hope to these teachers that because there may be a two, or three, or four week summer course offered by the local municipality, that this will in any way be the foot in the door to reintroduce the summer course two years from now. I think, Mr. Speaker, it must be made abundantly clear that this decision must stand if we are to maintain the validity of what we are attempting to do.

So that, as far as we are concerned, as a department, the question of a municipal course to assist teachers to move in this September on letters of permission is fine. But it should not be held out as the beginnings of another build-up for another summer course programme. I am sure the members opposite would agree with this.

I think it should also be pointed out, looking to the future, Mr. Speaker, that McArthur College, at Queens, is now in operation and we are in the process of developing a new college of education at the University of Ottawa. Perhaps sometime in the not too distant future I will have some reference to, shall we say, the northern part of the province of Ontario. It is also our intention to expand the facilities in the Metropolitan area and perhaps in some other locations as well.

As the greater numbers moving through the universities reach the graduating year, we think there will be more candidates available for the teaching profession. We have seen this in the teachers' colleges this year, where the enrolment last September increased to 9,300 from 6,700 in the previous year. In other words, we have reached a point at the elementary level—and I think one must recognize it will not be necessarily a permanent situation—where we have really a very good supply of elementary school teachers.

But I think, Mr. Speaker, one must recognize, as I said at the outset, that when the decision was made to terminate the summer course programme, all of those involved knew there would be a shortage of teachers. Frankly, I think it will last for a two-, three- or perhaps a four-year period.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question; I am attempting to find from the Minister some means of estimating how large this shortage might be.

I would ask the Minister if, in fact, he does not know how many students will be requiring instruction in September? He can surely read the 20 pages of advertisements for teachers in the morning Globe and Mail on the first day of advertising—

Mr. Speaker: Order! The—

Mr. Nixon: —but I would ask, Mr. Speaker, if in fact he could not give the House now an estimate of how short the teacher supply would be for this coming September?

Now, he has referred to letters of permission. It appears that looming on the horizon is going to be the requirement to issue many hundreds of letters of permission, and that the municipalities are given the—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. Minister will now answer the question which was asked?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the leader of the Opposition an accurate estimate as to how many letters of permission there will be.

There are several hundred teachers now in the secondary school system, as the hon. member knows I am sure, who are teaching on letters of permission. We anticipate this number will be extended this year, because of the change in policy.

We think that Mr. Baker's estimate of 2,000 is too high. You cannot determine these from the numerous ads that appear in the paper and will appear over the next few weeks. We know, with great respect, Mr. Speaker, it is not quite as simple as that. I should hope that, Mr. Speaker, we might give the hon. member more specific, detailed information but I think it will be another two months before we are in a position to do this.

As I have pointed out, the municipalities, or local school boards, are not obliged to provide upgrading courses at all. They will provide, perhaps, some form of indoctrination or familiarization course for those who will be moving in on letters of permission. Nothing wrong with this, as long as it is not held out that this is a foot in the door towards another summer course programme.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me. Could not the department give a better indoctrination course for those who are going to be granted letters of permission without opening the door to the possibility of the reintroduction of the full-fledged summer course, ending in a certificate?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker, we think that a number of the boards are in a position to offer this type of instruction, this type of programme, really on a much better basis than the department.

Mr. Nixon: What about the ones who are not?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peterborough has a supplementary question.

Mr. Pitman: In view of the possibility of this great shortage, would the Minister not consider the possibility of relaxing some of the maturity regulations or allowing certain categories to enter the summer course? Thereby, you will at least have people there who have taken training before letters of permission. As it happens a great many of those with letters of permission will have no training whatsoever.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, of course this was considered at the time the decision was made to terminate the summer course. If we now tend to back away from that position, to make exceptions, and to establish other routes, and so on, we will never reach the point which we are all trying to achieve—and that is for most students to have a full year of teacher education before they move into the secondary school system.

Obviously the suggestion by the member for Peterborough was considered, and considered in some depth. But then you defeat the purpose of what we are attempting to achieve.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. leader of the Opposition has a further question.

Mr. Nixon: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister of Education support the Brock University experimental programme which admits students without grade 13 after a post-grade 12 summer course? If so, why is he withholding $120,000 from Brock University that should go to support the institution?

Mr. T. Reid (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that is directly related to this. May I also place it?

Mr. Speaker: That might be sound; the hon. member might do so.

Mr. T. Reid: The question is in three parts, Mr. Speaker.

a) What is the Minister's policy concerning provincial government grants to Ontario universities for students who have been duly admitted by these universities from grade 12 in Ontario secondary schools?

b) Are such first-year university students eligible for the Ontario student award programme?

c) Is the Minister in favour of the abolition of grade 13 as recommended by the Hall-Dennis report?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think the member for Peterborough has really a very similar question, so once again we will try to deal with them all at the same time.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, in view of the decision that Brock University will not be given grants under the formula to support the attendance of 59 students who did not attain grade 13 standards, would the Minister indicate:

1. Whether any grants were given to support their attendance at the summer session?
2. Whether students admitted to the spring semester at Guelph are supported under the formula financing?
3. When will the 59 Brock students be acceptable under the formula financing system?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, may I trace very briefly the principle upon which the committee on university affairs—and as a result, the department and the government—operates. That is that the province, in respect to these situations, does not determine new programmes that are introduced by the universities.

This is their decision, but whether or not they will receive public support for these programmes is a matter of concern to the government. Through the committee on university affairs we receive recommendations as to what programmes should have public support.

I should point out that this was made clear in letters to Dr. Gibson on September 5, 1968; to Dr. Mayer on September 23, 1968, and it was suggested to Brock University that they bring this to the committee on university affairs in the hearings in November and December. This was not done. It was made clear that the committee and the government were not going to pay grants to grade 12 students who were admitted into university on some form of experimental programme or otherwise.

This decision was based on a very simple principle—and that is that there are adequate student places in grade 13, there are adequate teachers, and it would not be appropriate to have further funds allocated to some universities to provide an educational experience that is available to students in the secondary school system, and this—

Mr. Nixon: Not on an experimental basis.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Whether it is experimental or not the same applies—one university could move to the entrance requirements say for grade 12 in total, not restricting it to a select number of students.

I should also point out—I am not sure where the figures come from but if one is referring to the news report and if it is 59 students as suggested in the questions—our calculation is really that this would account for a $57,230 grant, not $120,000. I think the figures themselves were out of line somewhat. But I think, Mr. Speaker, there is really a fairly fundamental principle involved here and that is: to what extent public support should be available for courses that are being suggested by some institutions where a comparable course is available in some other institution receiving public money? Where do you draw the line?

I do not want to call upon, shall we say, a comparison or a parallel that was used by the former Minister of Education in the province of Nova Scotia, who has since moved on to a very important position in the political life of this country, but I think he made a speech once saying, and it is relevant, that if a university—and he was not referring to any particular university—wishes to put on a course in Egyptology, be my guest, but at the same time you cannot anticipate that there will necessarily be public funds to support it.

Mr. Nixon: You are paying for one in astrology.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, it is paying for itself. I thought I pointed that out. It is a dividend producing course. This is the point. This information was made known to Brock University and we are not saying they should not do it, it is up to them. All we are saying is, there are not public funds for this type of course and, Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very valid position to maintain.

Now, dealing with two or three of the other questions: Are such first year university students eligible for the Ontario Student Awards programme? The answer is yes, they are.

Are students admitted to the spring semester at the University of Guelph supported under the formula financing? Yes they are, when they come in under the semester basis. They have been into grade 13 up until April and then move into the universities. This was recognized—not only recognized, it was encouraged—by the committee on university affairs as perhaps one valid way of getting greater utilization out of capital plant at that particular institution. Thus they come within the formula calculations.

The third part of the question from the member for Peterborough I cannot answer. When will the 59 Brock students be accepted under the formula financing system? If he means as part of this programme, they will obviously be accepted next year in the allocations; no question about this. When they get into the second year of the programme at Brock they then become part of the total formula financing arrangement.

In respect to the third part of the question asked by the member for Scarborough East, really I think this is a question that we should discuss at much greater length during the estimates. You cannot give a yes or no. I think there are a lot of things that need to be said on this particular part and I am sure he will understand if I suggest we discuss this at some length during the estimates.

Mr. T. Reid: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister would permit a supplementary question: In view of the Minister's remarks that Brock University would not be receiving these grants and the reason he gave for that, would the Minister say therefore that the government and himself in particular are directly interfering with the admission policy and the curriculum policies of the university?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker, I thought I made this abundantly clear. We are not saying to Brock University "You may not do this". If this is their desire, they can do so and they are doing so—but they will have to finance this in some other fashion. That is all there is to it.

Mr. Pitman: Really this is not a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, but I think the first question—the Minister may have answered it but I am not sure—whether these students receive any grants as part-time students or on any other basis for their attendance during that summer session?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No.

Mr. Pitman: None for the programme at all?

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, none at all, not on this type of programme—at least, Brock University does not receive any support under the formula for this type of course.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Welland South has a question?

Mr. Haggerty: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Education. How many foreign students are at medical institutions studying for doctorates this year? Does the Minister have projected figures for 1969 and 1970? What will be the minimum requirements for entrance to medical school in September of 1969?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer all three together. We do not have, in the department, the birthplace of students who are attending our universities in this province. I cannot tell the hon. member how many foreign students—whether they come from outside the province or outside the country—are attending the medical faculties at universities of Ontario.

As a result I have no projected figure for him for 1969 or 1970. We do not determine the place of origin of the students in our institutions of higher learning.

I should also point out with respect to the third part of the question—and I am sure the member for Scarborough East would support this—we do not determine, of course, the admission standards for the medical faculties at universities; they vary from one university to another to some degree. It should be pointed out, however, that the requirements are such, with the numbers of students who wish to enter the faculties of medicine, that the majority of students who do enter, probably enter with marks that are in excess of the minimum requirement established by the universities for admission to those courses.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the member for Scarborough East, since this is members' day, would finish his questions.

Mr. T. Reid: A question to the Minister of Education: Since a superior type of information retrieval ETV for schools and institutions has now become practical in Metro, will the Minister make initial comments as follows?

a. Does the Minister recognize that early action would secure the lower ten channels on the 27-channel cable, and thus result in large savings in that standard ETV receivers could be used?

b. Are we to accept the Bell cable monopoly as a fact of life, or will the government challenge it in the courts?

c. Recognizing that channel 19 would serve adult and community needs better, but that the closed-circuit retrieval system is better for school and instructional uses, how does the Minister propose to proceed?

d. Recognizing that the limited federal communications effort is now being channelled in directions other than ETV, what are seen as the provincial ETV prior calls on the taxpayers' dollar?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, as I informed the hon. member a few minutes ago by telephone, this is a fairly detailed answer. There is a fair amount of technical information that I think should be made available and I hope to have this in the next day or so.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Peterborough would complete his questions also.

Mr. Pitman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is one more question: Has the Minister decided against the provision of transfer review boards within the county boards' jurisdictions, as reported in the press?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I did not see a report of this in the press. Obviously we are at a point where a decision will have to be made and I shall have a statement for the House within the week or ten days, I would think.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sandwich-Riverside.

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich-Riverside): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Education: Does the Minister intend to sit idly by while new top administrative posts proliferate under the new county school boards?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I like to think that the department never sits idly by. Our efforts may be misdirected on occasion. I would say this, that in our survey to date, there is only one top administrative post within the county unit—that is the director of education.

So there cannot be a proliferation of the top post itself. Below the director our information so far would indicate that if one totalled those who are already part of the municipal organization—if there happened to be one within the country area—plus the personnel who were available from the department, our former inspectors, programme consultants, and so on, there is really a very minor variation.

Some cases would be perhaps ten per cent less, some perhaps ten per cent more, but very close to the total number that were involved in the educational administration whether from the local municipal inspectorate, or from the department itself.

Mr. Burr: A supplementary question. Am I correct in assuming that the Minister is discouraging any proliferation?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would like, I will send him two addresses I have made; one to—I forget the name of the first organization—the other to the trustees' council. Do not read it all; there are about three relevant paragraphs on this matter where I have suggested very strongly that there not be a proliferation, as you call it, of administrative positions; that there not be an overload of supervision, etc. We have put it all, I hope, in sort of black and white so they will understand. I will send it to the hon. member.

Mr. Burr: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am not sure which volume.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wentworth.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Agriculture and Food.

Will the Minister assure the House that an opportunity will be afforded to the humane society to voice its objections to Bill 73, prior to second reading?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture and Food): The normal custom of the House is to have a bill dealt with in principle, Mr. Speaker, on second reading, and then refer it to committee. It is our intent to proceed that way with this bill.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, by way of a supplementary question, may I enquire whether or not the Minister intends to invite the humane society and representatives of the various clinics using these animals to appear before the committee?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, the standing committee on agriculture and food is always open to anyone to come and make representations. I would suppose that anyone who wants to oppose the bill, as the hon. member suggests, is just as welcome as those who will come and support it.

Mr. Deans: To the Minister of Energy and Resources Management.

Will the Minister advise the House whether he will consider an amendment to The Ontario Water Resources Commission Act, empowering the commission to subpoena witnesses for hearings regarding sewage treatment plants under Section 32, or 32(a) of the Act?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario Water Resources Commission does not propose any such amendment to the Act, as it has not experienced any difficulty in obtaining witnesses in connection with hearings on sewage treatment plants.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sudbury East has a question of the Minister of Education.

Mr. Martel: Question of the Minister of Education:

What action does the Minister intend to take with respect to the turmoil, firings and unrest amongst staff members of some community colleges in Ontario? And, does the Minister agree with the Civil Service Association of Ontario that much of the difficulty in the colleges arises (a) from the fact that local boards of governors are attempting to establish complete autonomy, and (b) from the direct influence exercised by local boards of governors over local faculty associations?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. member would indicate for me those community colleges where he suggests there is great turmoil amongst the faculty I would be quite prepared to take a look. We do not know of any great turmoil amongst the faculties of the community colleges, and I have been to several in recent months.

If he is prepared to do this, I am prepared to find out for him any information I can.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I have a reply to a question that was asked of me some time ago, and which I took as notice, from the member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Gaunt).

Mr. Speaker: What is the number?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: No. 674.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: That question asked of me reads:

Will the Minister of Agriculture and Food table correspondence with the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, as follows: a letter of August 27, 1967, recommending Mr. George Closser, M.A., economist, a farmer with experience in preparing reports, to chair the inquiry into the pollution of air, soil and water in the townships of Dunn, Moulton, and Sherbrooke in Haldimand county?

Mr. Speaker, I received no such letter from the federation of agriculture. I received a letter which simply brought this gentleman's name to our attention as one proposed by the federation of agriculture as a member of the committee.

There was no indication or suggestion that this man be named chairman of the committee. So I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the reply which I made to the federation of agriculture—I have a copy of it right here; I simply acknowledged their letter, and said as follows:

I regret that Mr. Klosler is not known to me personally. However, I am sure that, judging from his special qualifications, his appointment should warrant special consideration.

And I let it go at that. Now that recommendation was passed on.

The reference that is made by the hon. member is to the date, August 24. Indeed, on that date the Cabinet did give approval to the appointment of Dr. Hall as chairman of the committee, and the establishment of the committee. But the members of the committee were not appointed until a later date, when there had been contacts made with those who would serve on the committee.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, am I to take it from the Minister's reply that the federation of agriculture did not send him a letter requesting that this man be given consideration?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: As chairman?

Mr. Gaunt: As chairman, but as a member of the inquiry committee.

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Yes, I acknowledged that. I said they did send me a letter, but not asking that he be made chairman, only that he be considered as an appointee to the committee. This is all. There is quite a difference.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Brantford has a question from the other day.

Mr. M. Makarchuk (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, a question of the Minister of Social and Family Services.

Does the Minister intend to approve, under Section 5 (1) of The General Welfare Assistance Act, the appointment of former Victoria county warden, Everett Cameron, as social investigator for the county, bearing in mind Mr. Cameron's references to welfare recipients, referring to them as nothing more than "bums", and "leeches on society", as reported in a news story in the Telegram on February 22?

Hon. J. Yaremko (Minister of Social and Family Services): Mr. Speaker, I must say that references such as mentioned in connection with persons in need of assistance are reprehensible.

While The General Welfare Assistance Act only permits me to rule on the appointment of general welfare administrators, and not at the level referred to, I am sure no administrator would be willing to engage any person on his staff which does not meet requirements. I am, however, looking into the situation, and if it has any validity I will consult with county authorities on the matter.

Mr. Makarchuk: By way of a supplementary, could you indicate to the House when we would have a reply on this—when your investigation would be completed?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, I asked that the matter be checked into on receipt of the question yesterday, and those consultations are going on at the moment, I believe.

Mr. Speaker, while I am on my feet I wonder if I may have the privilege of answering question No. 669, placed by the hon. member for Etobicoke. He asked the question as follows:

In view of the recommendations of the coroner's jury investigating the death of five-month-old William Frederick Ambling, (a) is the Minister prepared to introduce legislation to allow for protection of children of mentally ill parents, and (b) to establish a central communication system where all welfare agencies would provide information on their services?

The answer, Mr. Speaker, is as follows. Children in need of protection for any reason, including problems relating to mental health, are covered in the present Child Welfare Act, under part 2 of the Act. This deals with the protection and care of neglected children and defines a child in need of protection.

One of the definitions of a child in need is, I quote:

A child with a person in whose charge he is cannot, by reason of disease, or infirmity, or misfortune, or incompetence, or imprisonment, or any combination thereof, care properly for him.

As for the second part of the question: a central communications system is not as simple a method as it would first appear to be.

I am told that a social service index, which attempted to perform this task, existed in the city of Toronto for more than 20 years. It was supported by both the city and the United Appeal but it was abandoned several years ago for a combination of reasons. Paramount among them was the reluctance of various agencies—doctors, psychiatrists and social workers and others—to violate the confidences of their clients.

This question of professional ethics and the civil rights of the clients would still persist and cause concern. An example of the questions which bother them is whether it would be ethical to have the name of an unmarried mother in a central file long after she has repaired any damage to her life caused by this one mistake.

The same could hold true of a man or woman with a criminal record. Professionals questioned whether this information should be made available to organizations which happened to become involved with them for completely unrelated reasons, when they have otherwise rehabilitated themselves.

I am told one of the reasons for the setting up of the index in the first place was the fact that policies of various organizations working in this area in the early days were often unclear and there was a possibility of duplication. But as government, both municipal and provincial, became more involved in various programmes, legislation removed a great deal of this duplication by setting down the responsibilities and fields of activity different groups should concern themselves with. This made it more obvious to those in the field, which organizations had the facilities to deal with a particular case and as a result the index was not used.

Apparently, the workers preferred direct contact with the organization involved and considered the index an unnecessary extra piece of machinery which slowed down the handling of a situation.

I might add that where it is merely a case of providing a member of the public with information on the programmes of different agencies, the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto already operates such a service. I am told that they deal with many requests for information each year. Metropolitan Toronto welfare offices also maintain a 24-hour information service.

I would also like to stress that there is a complete willingness on behalf of those in my department to deal with requests for assistance. I would conclude by saying that we are always concerned with communications and continuously impress on those in the field, the need to keep each other informed in order to provide the most enlightened help possible.

In the case under discussion I would suggest the evidence reveals communications did exist. Everyone who needed to be alerted to the situation were notified.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister would be good enough to send me a copy of that statement?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough West has a question.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): A question for the Provincial Secretary, Mr. Speaker: Would the Minister indicate to the House the reason for refusing a grant of incorporation to the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto, and the argument which underlies that reason?

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised to get this question, because this application is pending within the department. There is some correspondence going on now with the solicitors for the applicants over one of the clauses in the application. As far as I am concerned, this application is proceeding in the regular way. So I really do not see what more I can say at the moment.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I will re-direct my question toward the particular clause on another day.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Thunder Bay.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I have three questions of the Minister of Mines:

Will the department undertake to make a comprehensive survey of the Geraldton, Nakina, Beardmore areas in an effort to ascertain the mining potential in these areas?

Will pressure be put on mining companies, such as Anaconda, to develop known ore reserves rather than have them lay idle?

Should mining properties that are not developed within a reasonable period of time revert to the Crown?

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, due to my own absence from my office, I just received this question as I came into the House. All three questions in general relate to future government policy or suggestions relating to government policy, so I can only say that at the proper time and in the proper place government policy will be made known to the members. But in respect to his particular reference to the Anaconda Ore Company Limited and what we hope to be a very large potential development in that area, I can only say that it is certainly not the desire either of the company or of the government that this particular property should lay idle very much longer, as he puts it. I, myself, have been travelling around the continent and speaking to the actual principals concerned with the company and we are attempting to bring all the pressures to bear that we can upon them.

At this particular time, due to certain doubts that exist in the minds of people in other countries respecting Canadian tax policy and even provincial policy, respecting resources in this province, that particular company is having a very hard time obtaining the large mass of capital financing that would be required to develop that particular development.

But we are attempting to assist. We are attempting to make known the needs of that particular company and I have hopes, that before long something will come out of it. But at the moment there is simply no hope due to the doubtful atmosphere that does exist, especially in respect of the federal government's attitude regarding the recommendations in the Carter report, which I think the hon. gentleman and his colleagues support.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Do not let them blackmail you.

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Speaker, could I ask a supplementary question?

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Sure.

Mr. Stokes: With reference to the first part of the question, I understand from the circulars that come out from your office that detailed surveys are being made of most parts of Ontario. Will the Minister indicate or take on a commitment to have a detailed survey of the areas that I have mentioned? It seems that they have been neglected.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Well, Mr. Speaker, we can discuss this perhaps a little bit more fully during the estimates when the policy respecting this re-surveying of the geological areas can be more fully discussed. But the whole of the province has already been covered by geological surveying and mapping and it is quite true that in some areas we are going back and doing a more intensified re-survey. But the specific areas will have to await the Budget, to be presented next Tuesday, and the discussion of the estimates in this House. We need the money.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I wonder if I might raise a point of order. I had hoped to do it before the Prime Minister left but perhaps I can present it to you now and through you, to the assistant House leader.

It is in reference to standing committees and membership thereof. There is no particular problem for a member in deciding what standing committee he wants to sit on, or for his caucus making the kind of division in assignments, with most committees because they focus on one department or perhaps two departments. However, with one of the committees—namely the committee on government commissions—it literally spans the whole gamut of government departments—commissions that may relate to various government departments—and therefore you find that when a certain commission comes up the members who are most interested in it are not on that committee for those particular meetings.

I was wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether the government would give consideration to an alternative which I think would be feasible and would meet this particular need, namely that each party should have "x" number of members and that the membership might change from meeting to meeting depending on which commission comes up, because of the particular interests and work and preparation that has been done by members?

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Surely they have to choose in advance which of them is to create the main disturbance.

Mr. MacDonald: Well I think that is irrelevant, that interjection from the minister of obstruction.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear any interjection but I heard the leader of the Opposition. Does he wish to speak to it?

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I find the proposal a very good one. We have been concerned with the same problem, settling it this way; realizing that any member of this House might attend any committee meeting, take part in the questioning but be excluded from the vote. Now since the committee on commissions does not normally find itself in division it has not been a problem to such an extent in the past. But it would be a very worthwhile solution to the situation which might come up at any time and certainly we would support the proposal that has been put forward.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, if I might speak for a moment, we tried on Monday to have questions from the members of the Legislature but we ran out of time. An hour and a half does not seem to be enough time to hold these meetings and to give everyone a chance to speak, and I think the members of the committee should be considered first, and this is what we tried to do. Several members wanted to speak from the Legislature who were not on the committee, and I ran out of time and was not able to include them at that particular time, but I think we should consider a longer time in order that we could accommodate all the members who wish to speak.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Opposition has raised the point, and the hon. member for Simcoe Centre who is chairman of the committee this year, has commented on it, and I think something more should be said. It is true that there has been an acknowledged practice that any member of the House can go to any committee and have voice but not vote.

Mr. Nixon: Is that not in the rules?

Mr. MacDonald: It may well be in the rules, but the procedure that has been adopted—and I am not saying this critically—is that the regular members of the committee have the first say and time runs out and therefore those members of the House who may be most knowledgeable and most interested in the particular committee which is before the standing committee on government commissions at any given time, literally do not get a chance to participate at all, so that the spirit of the rule, so to speak, does not get implemented.

So I revert to my original proposal. It seems to me that—in our instance, for example, I think we are entitled to four or five members—what difference would it make if in any given meeting the names of the four or five members—it would be the original names or any substitute that might be made—were handed to the secretary of the committee? I think it would give an opportunity for all members to participate in the hearings of commissions with which they are normally interested, studying, working, and speaking in this House when the estimates come up.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: It might help the hon. member with his deplorable attendance record too.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House leader wish to speak to this matter?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, just to speak to the point of order, I would be very happy to undertake to bring this to the attention of the Prime Minister and I am sure that he, in his anxiety to assist in the efficient operation of these standing committees, will perhaps want to meet with the other two leaders and discuss some procedures along this line.

Mr. Speaker: I would think that the leaders of the two parties might keep that in mind when today's meeting is reconvened.

Mr. MacDonald: When is that meeting to be reconvened?

Mr. Speaker: I have had no message except the one you received today. I am sorry, but that is all.

Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The first order, resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the Speech of the Honourable, the Lieutenant-Governor at the opening of the session.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. H. Edighoffer (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to take part in the Throne debate in this, the second session of the twenty-eighth Parliament. I would like, of course, to once again add my word of congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, and also to the deputy Speaker. In my judgment you, sirs, are fulfilling your duties in this House in a most purposeful way.

Now while on the subject of worthwhile contributions, I must make a comment about our leader, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Nixon). I feel, Mr. Speaker, that he is, without a doubt, making an outstanding contribution to the operation of the affairs of the province in a constructive manner. I know that in the not too distant future, the Nixon name will be better known, because on the North American continent, the people will hear and read about both President Nixon and Premier Nixon.

Mr. Speaker, I feel I must be very blunt. Perth is the constituency the Premier (Mr.

Robarts) has forgotten. There can surely be no more representative cross section in all Ontario of those sterling qualities which have made Ontario great, but the Robarts' government has a failing memory. The Premier himself, and his Ministers, conveniently forget that here, in the rich heartland of the province, lies the source of much work and wealth.

It is from Perth that fathers have raised families who have gone to the big cities and the industrial centres to make Ontario what it is today. Yet as I said in my Throne Speech last year, it is fair to call Perth the neglected county. So I want to once again, if I may, to advertise to the government the pride that is in Perth.

Perth is noted for its well organized farms which are diversified in their production. We have one of the most active county milk committees in the province and we have the largest number of milking cows in any county of Ontario. Thanks to the Stratford industrial commission and municipality representatives who have all been alert to every practical possibility, we also have a well diversified industrial base in Perth.

One of the largest tourist attractions in Ontario is, of course, the Stratford Shakespearean festival, the happy result of early collaboration between Tom Patterson and local authorities, who quickly appreciated the depth of his vision and co-operated with him to the full.

Today, all Ontario can see the result of that effort and the tourist dollars benefit not only Stratford, not only Perth county, but every stopping place on the journey to and from the place of pilgrimage. I hope that is not too strong a phrase.

Now it is right and proper that the tourists who contribute so much to the income, not only of Perth county, but all along the way, should be well served. A recent survey showed that 91 per cent of these tourists used passenger automobiles, so that while rail and rapid transit systems are appropriate for metropolitan areas, we still have to rely on cars, and that means on highways, for our activities and our prosperity.

We have tourist traffic, normal local traffic, farm traffic, and industrial traffic, all seeking better roads. I am glad the good roads convention is still in session. I would like the good people who came to Toronto expecting to hear from the Minister of Highways (Mr. Gomme) that they were at last being considered, to note that I share their concern at the tone of the Minister's remarks at the Royal York Hotel yesterday. This showed, if anything can, that the Tories are at the end of their tether; the last bend in the long Tory road is approaching; their horses are weary.

"Take a short term view" said the Minister, "do not plan too far ahead". Now what kind of talk is this? It is the talk of a government on the way out. "Afraid to look ahead" the Minister cried, "nothing else will have any chance of approval in the present economic situation". I wonder if he has read the Smith report? Does he not know where to put money by way of investment? The trouble with this government is that it cannot see where money is doing good and where it is being wasted. It is as simple as that.

Mr. Speaker, Perth needs a better link with Highway 401 to survive and thrive. Such a link was foreshadowed in last year's departmental estimates, but nothing has happened in the past year. There has been no start on project 190-63-3, the clearing project for a link with the Kitchener-Waterloo Expressway. No wonder I say that we are forgotten in our part of Ontario.

I would like to remind the government of another promise, the promise of relocating the Stratford teachers' college in Perth county. The present college, built in 1908, is presently overtaxed with students, and the atmosphere is not conducive to the modern approach to teaching and learning, as expressed in the Hall-Dennis report.

This building echoes the old approach. No wonder the teachers cannot appreciate what the new report is getting at if they are trained in the atmosphere of Charles Dickens. A new college is needed in our area. So that teachers will remain in their own community as long as they realize that Perth has everything to make the Hall-Dennis way of education come true.

It is the best natural learning laboratory in Ontario, and if I were a teacher, and had fully grasped what the report was getting at in terms of a discovery approach and experience learning, then I certainly would want to be leading this kind of learning adventure in one of Perth's schools, rather than moving away to the cities to be swamped.

However, the lead for this has got to come in a modern teachers' college. The land has been purchased, now the building must begin. We have over 400 future teachers enrolled this year, and there could be many more, given this initiative. We are extremely well equipped to deal with a greater student body, since many homes take in tourists during the summer, and student-teachers during term, and we have more accommodation available for expansion. This means that costs can be concentrated on the learning areas rather than on dormitory accommodation in new student residences.

Mr. Speaker, I am blessed with constituents who are not easily fooled by high-pressure sales and advertising agency techniques. They see through the sham and the smoke screen very quickly.

I have a very good example of this skepticism at work. I sent out a questionnaire at the end of 1968 to my Perth constituents. And of those returning the form, 82 per cent answered with a resounding "no," to the question of whether or not the province should collect its own income tax. They just could not see the sense in setting up double collection machinery, double bureaucracy, just so that the Premier and the Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton), could stand on a higher pedestal.

In letters that came with their replies, they indicated that we, as taxpayers, cannot afford to set up more departments and that rather, than standing on a pedestal, the Premier and the Treasurer would be standing on the shoulders of the people. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Perth have 20-20 vision.

Also, 91 per cent of the returns called for meetings between municipal representatives and the Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough), face-to-face before further steps are taken to implement regional government. I know that my colleague from Welland is going to develop this idea further, so I will not belabour it, except to underline that the feeling is pretty general, that the Minister is riding roughshod over the locally-elected representatives of the people, and that sooner or later, there will be a back-lash that will topple this government from power.

As one man put it, Darcy may win the Tory leadership, but he will never be Premier of Ontario."

Another group of letters accompanying the returned questionnaires had as a common theme—the fact that the writers knew little or nothing about regional government, as is envisaged by Queen's Park. They could not believe that a scheme could be pushed through in any area with so little information about what it would cost, and who would pay.

One man asked: "Will it consolidate and not multiply?" And another asked: "Is the county school board experience any guide with officials being paid 5 or 6 times the average per capita income for the area? How is this justified?"

One correspondent asked me especially to condemn the "Darcy-knows-best" attitude.

That would force regional government upon an unwilling electorate. I am pleased to place this catch phrase on the record.

It sums everything up so neatly—all the frustrations of those who have to deal with this Minister—"Darcy knows best." It means the exact opposite of democracy. If the government would come out with a really sensible master plan for regional government in each area, then John Q. Public would know how to weigh it in the balance. He would know what was going on. Now, he knows nothing, nothing at all.

Even though I come from a predominantly rural area, my filing cabinet still smoulders with letters condemning the basic shelter grants. Most people felt it was unnecessary, to say the least.

A resolution was sent from Perth county council to other county councils right across the province. The resolution asked that the Minister be petitioned to repeal the Act, and it has found favour with over half of those replying; and the replies are still coming in.

I think the opinion of Perth county council should carry some weight here, particularly with the Treasurer. I would remind him that Perth, has handled its finances so well that it has had no debenture debts in the last 20 years.

An editorial dated December 12, 1968, in the Stratford Beacon-Herald is headed: "Ontario Heads For Trouble." It comes from a paper—similar to most others—which in the past has looked with some favour on the activities of the Robarts government, but now it is beginning to be highly critical of the present administration.

The government should take measures to get a grip on its expenditures—

It says:

—instead of behaving like an administration on the verge of defeat and desperately scattering grants which it must first collect from the taxpayers.

So everyone is now beginning to see that this government is bribing the people with their own money. Next week, the Budget will tell the tale.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about the young people who are contributing so much to Ontario these days. I hold no brief for violence of extremism. I think that only a very few are making a lot of noise. But I do know that a great many moderate young people are very disturbed that they do not have an effective way of helping shape the future.

They feel cut off from the main stream of power, which they sense is directing them without a full appreciation of what today's life is all about. They want to be part of the democratic process, and for them essentially, this means to right to vote at 18.

They point out that increased educational opportunity and a better chance to grasp world affairs through radio and TV means that they are probably as ready at 18 as their elders were at 21.

Now, I know that some members are opposed to lowering the voting age to 18, and some want to see it brought about. But all of the people I talked to are honest about it. So it was with shock and dismay that I read the remark of the Premier as reported in the London Free Press on Feb. 4, 1969.

I said then to myself, just as on the subject of Medicare, "Is he really speaking for anyone but himself? Has he lost all touch with the people's feelings on this, and with the rank and file of his own caucus and party?" What he said is this:

A reduction in voting age may follow a full-scale reorganization of the Conservative Party to increase its appeal to youth.

What cynicism that statement carries! The Premier does not care a hoot for the people any more. He is doing too much damage for his successor to repair, and at least two of his three possible heirs are also doing considerable damage on their own.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word about the brainwash Budget. Let me advise the Treasurer to move into Medicare on the strength of the following London Free Press comment. It is always best to take criticism from the home team, so here is what the London Free Press says about Medicare; February 24, 1969:

In spite of the fuss over Medicare, it might be pointed out that British Columbia and Saskatchewan were the first two provinces to come into the national scheme. It apparently has not been an insuperable financial burden on them.

Need I say more, Mr. Speaker? I think not. It is pretty obvious that in spite of all the noise, the Treasurer has come to grips with reality and decided to go into the scheme as the Liberals have been telling him to do for two years.

He stayed out for the wrong reasons and now he feels he is going in under duress. What he really means is loss of face. Well, the voters have a very kind way with bruised egos, they are very ready to forgive. Fortunately, they are also equally ready to forget. They will forgive you now and forget you at the polls.

And that is what will happen to this government in 1971 as regional government problems, county school board problems, the memory of the basic shelter exemption fiasco, the memory of the delayed entry into Medicare, all add up to a rejection of the Robarts government at the polls.

Mr. Speaker, we are out to win in '71 and when that happens Perth will take a rightful place in the scheme of things in Ontario.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in your presence, sir, distinguishing the chair as you do in your subsidiary, but nonetheless important post.

I appreciate the opportunity to enter the Throne Debate and the flexibility which has characterized the arrangements which were made by the various Whips. I appreciate the opportunity to reflect, perhaps in brief—since the burden of my remarks are better saved for the constitutional debate tomorrow—upon certain legislative aspects of the functioning of this House and of its direction. "This House"—this Romanesque mausoleum, in order to make the comparison with the "neo-Gothic monstrosity," as Westminster was once called.

There comes a time, I think, Mr. Speaker, to appraise or re-appraise the legislative processes under Tory rule. I make that point because I think it is an important distinction to draw, in order to recognize that social change can be effected in a very considerable variety of ways. Many of them are outside the Legislature, in legitimate areas, in the present, I think, justified preoccupation with extra-parliamentary vehicles and other forms of direct action. But in the process of recognizing the legitimacy of those avenues it is important to take a pretty hard-headed look at the functioning of the legislative process and the disabilities—and they are indeed disabilities—under which a great many members of this House—perhaps the majority of members of this House—function within a Tory framework.

I suppose then, Mr. Speaker, that for a socialist that brings the additional dilemma of working in a—without meaning it in a perjorative sense—in a capitalist framework. In the very considerable rigidity to which the members opposite adhere, none more firmly and more vigorously than the new Minister of Revenue—

Hon. J. H. White (Minister of Revenue): Are these the reasons why the member is never in his place?

Mr. Lewis:—whose ascension to a Cabinet post may perhaps be justified when he winds up this debate. It has not yet been justified, but doubtless will be.

There are, Mr. Speaker, moments of intense discomfort for some—I know it is true for myself—regarding the relevance of what is done, not so much in terms of the social philosophy—I do not think any of us in this party ever had any qualms on that score—but certainly in the context of how one effects social change. The very great limitation; the recognition that one should not or would not wish to spend one's life tampering at the periphery forever of social issues. That is not radicalism, Mr. Speaker, that is playing the game in a Conservative government and in a Conservative dominated Legislature.

Radicalism which effects real social change is usually a tough and pretty unpopular set of propositions. It is disconcerting for a member like myself to accept the irony that certain propositions are viewed as contentious in many levels of government—some that I would not have viewed as contentious at all. It seems ironic that amendments to the Criminal Code in Ottawa, halting and unprogressive as they are, should be considered by so many in this country as disputatious and terribly radical in their implication.

It is perhaps, at least for me, ironic that the student unrest should evoke such a backlash from so many respectable elements in society, if one puts it that way. Not so much the student unrest that results in what occurred in Sir George Williams, because everyone in his right mind deploras that kind of extremity to which some people feel compelled to be driven on occasion. But certainly in this province, as, interestingly the Minister of Education and University Affairs (Mr. Davis) seems to realize, there has been no particular demonstration of extremity which would merit from some individuals, some papers, some political parties, that kind of backlash response.

One is sad, Mr. Speaker, that in this society it is still difficult to talk about the public ownership of urban land as a response to altering the housing crisis, something that the federal Liberals eschew and the Ontario Housing Corporation eschews. It is a pity, I suppose, when one has a debate on Indians in this Legislature, that some remarks however well-meant in themselves, from the member for Kenora (Mr. Bernier) show such an incredible gap in comprehension of what the problem consists. Despite that, when another member in this Legislature puts the proposition that the only way one solves the question around Indians is to grant full power and financial rights to the Indians themselves to solve it—even that raises eyebrows and brings questions and impugns motives. For a great many I would have thought it would seem to be a patently obvious kind of proposition.

But, again, we work under a Tory aegis where even the most hesitant twitches in the direction of social progress are characterized by great anxiety. That makes the position of some in the Legislature, sometimes this party, ever more vigorously expressed, ever more militant.

Above all, Mr. Speaker, I object to the Legislature itself, because it is far too often a sort of fossilized relic of club-like debate, always reverting to parliamentary language—let us not be real in the expression of our discontents, but let us couch them in parliamentary language, so often contrived—

Hon. Mr. White: Everybody is out of step but the member.

Mr. Lewis: —so often artificial and very often predetermined, Mr. Speaker.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, even the fourth estate—one marvels at their capacity for self-flagellation in covering some of the Legislature, time and time again, although they, too, obviously, have felt a certain discontent—would be wise to look to the quality of what is reported about the Legislature, however much the Legislature may not measure up to what their expectations pose.

We have become, I suspect, in some ways computerized automata enacting this drama. You have a lot of Pavlovian hoots, Mr. Speaker; desk thumping; rally 'round the flag boys; 117 mature adults in the ritual emasculation of the parliamentary process.

And that happens all too frequently in this legislative chamber.

Again I suggest to you, sir, that it is very much a product of the way in which a Conservative government looks at this Chamber, and at the workings of the process. So much that is trivial predominates; so much that is destructive irritates, eating away at the relevance and the enthusiasm of the democratic assembly.

And, like those of a great many members in this House, these are not in any sense distinctly personal views. There are many who would support aspects of this kind of criticism.

So I repudiate all the petty, unconscionable obstacles which demean private members and the Legislature they serve, because it need not be.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that government rests upon consent, but we do not consent to be governed. We grow up in a world in which we are governed, and it is intolerable that the governors should suffer such frustrations and indignities as is placed upon them by the malfunctioning of the parliamentary process.

There are a great many areas, and some of them have been alluded to far more eloquently—no question in my mind—than I can bring to bear at this point, but I want to repeat some of them. I reject the condition of indemnities, and of expenses, and of working conditions, and of research facilities in this Legislature for the vast majority of members. I echo with all the strength at my command the statement before the orders of the day which the member for Sudbury made some little time ago.

I ask why, Mr. Speaker. I ask the government, I ask the Ministers now occupying the front benches—why, why it is necessary for members to occupy more than an individual job on a full time basis with a budget of $2 billion to be considered? I ask why it is necessary for members to petition leaders of their parties—it is true of the government party—about the state of indemnities and expenses? I ask why, Mr. Speaker, members of this House have contemplated resignation, because they cannot survive the economic straits to which they are subjected—of maintaining homes in two cities?

I ask why members from all over the province, particularly those in the north, are restricted to 15 round trips throughout the entire legislative year, when it is fairly obvious even to the most modest of minds that there are at least 52 weeks, and that members like to maintain that number of contacts with their constituencies?

I ask why, Mr. Speaker, members of this Legislature have to submit to the most degrading spectacle of public life, which is to set their own level of indemnity and expenses and why the Prime Minister, with even an ounce of maturity and intelligence, cannot establish the independent commission which has been talked about in order that that invidious role to which members are subject be removed from this House; so that there is some kind of comparable financial equivalent to all those areas of private service, civil service and public service at which level, salaries, expenses and travelling, and all the other accoutrements of legislative life, can be set?

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lewis: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has said that he will not permit a question.

Mr. Lewis: Not because I could not deal with it, but the member follows this debate and, therefore, can obviously intervene appropriately. I want to know, Mr. Speaker, why only an individual secretary is granted sometimes to three, four or five members of the Legislature—or seven? I want to know why members are unnecessarily trapped in the vortex of constituency work without the kind of assistance they require in order to serve their constituents?

Hon. Mr. White: Oh, really you have such a difficult time.

Mr. Lewis: I want to know why—

An hon. member: He has forgotten his origins already.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Lewis: As a matter of fact, I would not engender plans in the hon. member opposite. There are other emotions that I would hope to reach. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, why there is such a paucity of research facilities for the members in this House? What kind of contempt does this government hold for the backbenchers of this House that they view the services as so dispensable, so inconsequential, so that even the most minimal of research and secretarial facilities are not provided in order to do the kind of work which has to be done?

Hon. Mr. White: How would the hon. member know?

Mr. Lewis: I want to know, Mr. Speaker, why the derogatory parsimony that so characterizes the government in all of this, even the lack of private offices, as the description of the member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) indicated—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): How would the hon. member know? He has the worst attendance record of anybody in the House. The NDP ran their last provincial campaign from their third floor suite of offices in this building.

Mr. Lewis: If one wants to talk about campaigning from private offices, then we will get to one of the Ministers without Portfolio in time, but I will stick with my text for the moment.

Why, Mr. Speaker, do members have to be subjected to such undignified and humiliating cubicles, if such they are called?

I recall a quote from one of the members from the British House of Commons, who, in describing his facilities, back in 1950, and I trust they have improved, said:

I have now in addition to my locker, a little desk, with another seven members in a room the size of the average dining room in the average council house. The room is ideal for a suicide. If I could squeeze out of the window I could throw myself, and sometimes feel like doing so, into the Thames. The room is wholly inadequate for an effective member.

I do not commend the analogy to any members of the House, Mr. Speaker, but I do point out that other jurisdictions, having suffered the same ignominy, 18 or 19 years ago, have taken steps to alter it, and I think it would be well within the government's command to take steps to alter the condition of private members, Opposition and government, in the present Legislature.

The regal majesty with which the Ministers of the Crown, and the Deputy Ministers and the senior civil servants, comport themselves, looking in a "prince and the pauper" fashion upon this two-nation theory in the Legislature.

The simple matter is, Mr. Speaker, that one need not suffer this perpetual humiliation, this inability to function. I would like to ask the Prime Minister, or any other member of the Cabinet, at some time to explain what twisted, detached, mocking view of a member's work and contribution this government has, that in the matters of indemnities, and salaries, and round trips, and research facilities, and secretaries, and office accommodation and all the paraphernalia of a good functioning member of the assembly, they are willing to rest in totally discriminatory and unworthy circumstances.

If they really want to raise the calibre of the legislative assembly, Mr. Speaker, as has been expressed from Conservative ranks, then there are ways to do it.

Even in the narrow, functional definition of this Legislature, to scrutinize, to publicize, to criticize, as well as to support the government and to pass legislation—even in that narrow functional definition, our roles are very circumscribed.

Then too, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask about the question period in this House, because all of these aspects add together to emasculate the effectiveness of members; an inflexible, sterile, shadow-boxing process, the Opposition either playing the role of straight man to the government monolith, or stand-up comic as the court jester to the establishment.

And the Minister either takes as notice, or the Minister refuses to answer a supplementary, or the Minister puts the question on the order paper, confining himself to those which are most felicitous in reply. And Mr. Speaker, in the role of schoolmaster, he vetoes material—our own board of censors—to assure that nothing controversial or argumentative disturbs the diffusing of cut and thrust which would otherwise be desirable in this Legislature, in what could well be, before the orders of the day, the most productive part of the legislative session.

Now, what a commentary on the Cabinet Ministers, Mr. Speaker. I feel for the Cabinet Ministers; the position in which they are thus placed. Trembling and ashen in their offices till noon, waiting for that final phone call about a question, and then a high level conference with all the appropriate civil servants, and a number of written drafts until finally the ultimate vehicle is inscribed on the answer form. Then there is a rehearsal of voice inflection, and dramatic pause before one of the mirrors in the Ministerial offices, and then, Mr. Speaker, with the help of a parliamentary assistant, there is a dry run of all possible supplementaries and finally, shifting through the shadows, the Minister returns to the House to face the ugly rabble opposite.

Hon. Mr. White: We are terrified of the hon. member.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, it is in fact, for the government, an appropriate kind of analogy. Although this government suffers irrationality and inconsistency with ease, I would not have thought they would suffer indignity with so much apparent comfort. Why no spontaneity in the question period? What is wrong with these Ministers of the Crown? Is the Prime Minister suggesting that the entire Cabinet is without wit, is without grasp, is without policy?

Admittedly, Mr. Speaker, there are one or two who have a sort of marginal grasp of their department, but this is the stuff of politics and we would deal with it.

What does it do to the House in the most important hour of the day, and to the level of debate, and to the freedom and directness of exchange in the democratic process generally? Again, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker; it is an abuse of the system and a rejuvenation lies in store when the change comes. But at the moment, fear and timidity prevail and the Premier defends those who cannot defend themselves. But one would hope that that might, in fact, be altered.

Mr. Speaker, there is, too, the current practice of private members' hours; the so-called gentleman's agreement—not akin to the film of that name—where the coercive apparatus of the state in the Prime Minister's office, delivered to the Opposition parties an ultimatum which said, in effect, "If you want to have private members' hours at all, there will be no votes. If you insist on votes, no private members' hours!"

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, that description is certainly not what happened when the arrangement was agreed to.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): It certainly is!

Hon. Mr. White: Absolutely incorrect. It was pointed out sir, it was pointed out—no—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. White: On a point of order, sir.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order. Perhaps the House would permit the hon. Minister to state his point of order.

Hon. Mr. White: Well the point of order—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. White: The point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker is trying to determine whether or not he does have a point of order and I could not hear him.

Hon. Mr. White: The hon. member has misled this House, deliberately or accidentally, which is directly contrary of the rules. The facts, as his own leader and Whip will confirm, were that it was pointed out in a series of meetings several years ago that most private members' public bills and resolutions are of a nature that make it impossible for other members of the House to vote against them. The solution of some Parliaments, including Ottawa, is for that order to be talked out and therefore, the members are not embarrassed—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): That is not a point of order at all.

Hon. Mr. White: —are not embarrassed, not having to vote against it—let me finish please. We have the alternative between talking out the measure for the hour or to adopt an alternative method which was to adjourn the debate and—

An hon. member: It is a speech.

Hon. Mr. White: —and on those occasions, where possible, to handle two or more orders during the course of the private members' period—

Mr. Singer: Completely out of order.

Hon. Mr. White: The second method was decided upon because it is more efficient and because it keeps the debate more interesting. There was no forcing involved at all, and the contention from the NDP now that that agreement of four or five years' standing—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Hon. Mr. White: —that it was forced is a complete and deliberate untruth.

Mr. MacDonald: I rise on the point of order. I happen to be a part of those decisions and it was clearly indicated when the Opposition sought to have a vote accorded, that if they wanted to have the regularized private members' hours it would be without a vote.

Mr. Singer: Or else they would not have—

Mr. MacDonald: In other words, it was a gentlemen's agreement and we had to accept it.

Hon. Mr. White: All right, quite right—

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order!

Hon. Mr. White: —right, the private members, the members of this Legislature cannot be forced into voting against the pious platitudes contained—

Mr. MacDonald: They do it in Manitoba all the time.

Hon. Mr. White: —contained on Opposition members' public orders.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order, please.

Hon. Mr. White: The choice was whether to talk them out or adjourn the debate without—

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will you not—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, will you not let me speak to this point of order that has been going on for ten minutes?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I should like to deal with the matter brought up by the hon. Minister. In my view the hon. member of the New Democratic Party who was speaking did not suggest anything different than has been mentioned by the hon. Minister from London South and the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party. I do not think there is any point of order at all. The hon. member for Scarborough West may continue.

Mr. Lewis: That being the case—

Hon. Mr. White: Why did you wait five years?

Mr. Lewis: Well, frankly, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacDonald: We have complained every time we met.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, your antennae, your perception, being dead on, the fact that London South agrees wholeheartedly, I will remind him just once again to what it was he agreed. The Prime Minister, and his party, said to the Opposition in categorical terms, using the big stick as they were powerful enough to do at the time but could no longer do, either you allow it to go through without vote or you do not have private members' resolutions in this House at all.

Hon. Mr. White: That is not true!

Mr. Lewis: That is the way in which it took place and with that trembling affliction that is characteristic of Tories when they are in a difficult kind of battle.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Completely untrue.

Hon. Mr. White: Why is your leader still not complaining?

Mr. MacDonald: We have complained at every meeting.

Interjections by hon. members:

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order please. Perhaps the hon. member may be permitted to continue his speech.

Mr. Lewis: The hon. member is enjoying this, Mr. Speaker. The government as usual, terrified by a grain of incipient autonomy that might appear occasionally in the ranks, then confined the bills to two hours a week, to two hours a week so that they could effectively, in terms of time, also emasculate the contributions of back bench members in this Legislature. No suggestion as to why we should not have a full day. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Revenue was so persuasive before, I am almost inclined to let him speak again.

Why not extend the session if necessary to accommodate private members' contributions, Mr. Speaker, and why not vote on those contributions? Are there such—

Hon. Mr. White: Why do you not attend this House if you want to make a contribution?

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): Because he does not make the money you make.

Mr. Lewis: Are there such fratricidal splits in the Tory party, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. member: He would have a nervous breakdown if he was here much more often.

Mr. Lewis: Is there such total fragmentation of the Tory party that the Prime Minister cannot risk a vote? And wherein lies this fear of autonomy, this necessity to whip every single Tory member into line, however modest or minor the issue? Why invoke such ferocious party discipline? What are the Conservatives afraid of? Would there be a back bench revolt? Is that what is in fact being said? Has the Tory party perhaps a left wing or a right wing or even a middle?

Is that what the Prime Minister is concerned about; that they should retreat from the proposition of a vote on whether or not you lower the voting age to 18 years old—everyone in the House supported it from all parties, on the inclusion of chiropractors in OMSIP, when all parties supported it—on the inclusion of nursing home care in OHSC when all parties supported it? Why can the government not, via the private members' contributions—some of them from their own members—give support?

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Can you imagine that back row in revolt?

Mr. Lewis: Well, Mr. Speaker, it is not—

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): That is why we are here.

Mr. Lewis: Now, Mr. Speaker, the members, I suggest—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, it is true, it is true. The Minister of Finance is right. The government is of one opinion, never more than a sole opinion, on any single issue, unlike Opposition members and some back bench members who take private members' contributions seriously, who invest them with a good deal of time.

In addition to which, Mr. Speaker, the written rules permit it, so it is not only a flagrant disregard for the rights of members but it is an equally flagrant violation of the rules. And it is a real abuse of the private member, it delimits the exercise of independence, it reinforces a jaundiced view of the inconsequentiality of much of what is presented here when that in fact need not be the case. It is an obvious area which needs real reform. But then, Mr. Speaker, one could go on at a great many aspects of this but I shall choose only one or two others.

It is necessary to reject the committee system because there is nothing quite so fraudulent in this Legislature as the committee system under the aegis of a Tory mentality. So you have a public accounts committee which, when times are fortuitous, might review the estimates of three or four out of twenty departments in a year, and then, more than a year out of date.

You have government commissions which subject the individual corporations to scrutiny for all of an hour and twenty minutes, unless they can somehow be held over for another session. All the rest, with the exception of friendly field trips, as was true yesterday in the committee on education to ETV, simply exists to act as ciphers in the rubber stamping of legislation which comes through this House and goes to committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what the Tories have done to the committee process in this legislative assembly is the final perversion of the democratic process, because with the committee system lies in considerable measure the answer to our problems.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. White: Once again the hon. member is misleading the House and with your permission, sir, I will describe in some detail the improvements that have been made during my ten years' experience to strengthen the select and standing committee system around here.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, surely you will allow me to make a comment on the point of order that has been raised. I think it is generally accepted—you are not going to permit it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. leader of the Opposition wishes to speak to the point of order? I was just going to rule there was no point of order, but if the hon. leader of the Opposition makes one—

Mr. Nixon: My own point of order is that we cannot suffer the continuing intrusion of the counter arguments from the Minister across the way. He has no point of order and he has to get up on his feet whenever he disagrees and I would submit to you, sir, on a point of order that he should be restrained.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. It seems to me that any hon. member may rise at any time when he feels he has a point of order. The Speaker or the Chairman has the responsibility of determining whether or not, in fact, it is a point of order.

The hon. member for Scarborough West did not indicate in the remarks he had made that there was anything upon which a point of order could be raised. I think the hon. member for Scarborough West should be permitted to continue without any further points of order in this respect.

Mr. J. L. Brown (Beaches-Woodbine): It is a typical example of how the government treats parliamentary procedure.

Mr. Lewis: Precisely.

Mr. Sopha: I will be right back.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am going to mark time until the member for Sudbury returns.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Scarborough West has the floor.

Mr. Lewis: I am enjoying it, Mr. Speaker. I am not routed by the counter arguments, counter productive as they are, and I must state to the House with absolutely explicit validity that it is a quintessential corruption of the whole committee process what the Tories have done to the committee system.

The last refuge of much of the usefulness of the private member in this House has been excised from effective exploitation. Constantly the government finds other recourse to do further damage.

It is a very, very unfortunate thing, Mr. Speaker, that we then have to fall back purely on the legislative apparatus as such, because, of course, the fact of the matter is that there are committee systems in other parts of the world, as in other Legislatures—other Tory Legislatures, like that of Manitoba—where they vote on all private members' bills and resolutions. There are other Legislatures and jurisdictions in the world, Mr. Speaker, where committees are at the very heart, the very centre of the process.

In the United Kingdom some of the standing committees—many of them for an explicit, though emergency purpose—have served very useful functions in giving individual members a new adrenalin in terms of the job they are about to perform.

Even the American congressional committees, some of which we deplore, have had enormously useful functions in the subpoenaing of people and opening the subject to the public—whether it was Kefauver's committee on drug costs, or the committee on price fixing, or on foreign relations, or on car safety, or, indeed, on crime.

It is a simple matter, Mr. Speaker, that when you destroy the work of a committee by having it deal purely with legislation which is already a fait accompli, or the taking of field trips, or the submission of briefs, then you denude the committee structure of any consequential contribution.

Now the revelations that would come from a worthwhile committee system would revolutionize the policy of this government. In fact, the reason the committee system is so fiercely resisted is because the government would, in fact, fall, if there were reasonable committees.

Can you imagine what would happen to this government if there were committees which could bring witnesses from all walks of life as well as civil servants to discuss areas like urban renewal, or rent structure, or what happens in our mental hospitals, or the auto trade agreement, or farm income, or drug prices, or teacher education, or sources of election funds, or the facilities for children in the province, or any of these areas?

Mr. Speaker, we would have one cause célèbre after another until this shaking and tottering edifice would tumble into the ground once and for all, because you cannot withstand a conscious, relentless type of public scrutiny. In order to avoid it, one resorts to a modest palliative, a pleasant little format, which encourages everyone to a fairly non-descript behaviour.

What we would do, Mr. Speaker, is to focus dramatically many times in explosive ways, but at least in useful public ways, the major, social issues of this province which cannot effectively be discussed in this House for reasons I will allude to in a moment.

As it is now, our committee system is in some ways too embarrassing to keep alive. Compassion dictates a quick and painless end. The world would survive its passing, Mr. Speaker. I realize that the members of the Legislature will see its continuance in the hope that it alters, but there will be few protest demonstrations in the event of its demise.

Of course, this extends, Mr. Speaker—as all members know—to the autocratic and unregulated boards and commissions, and commissions in which this government indulges; the use of regulations, tremendously important and significant regulations, which impringe directly on the lives—economic, social and cultural—of individuals across the province, but never come before the House for scrutiny, and are never given so much as a passing nod by the members as a whole, which regulations frequently alter the substantive content of the legislation itself in the process of their enactment.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the impotence, the sheer impotence, of committee scrutiny means that much legislation, particularly in the financial areas of this Legislature, is simply a matter of accomplished fact usurping the privileges of the members, rendering them appendages to a machine that seems to be irreversible.

And the Minister of Finance is, perhaps more than any, responsible for what has happened to this Legislature. I suppose it is a cry in Legislatures in many other jurisdictions, Mr. Speaker, but the fact of the matter is that in our capacity to scrutinize the finances of the province, and the expenditure of public funds, we have been more severely restricted than in any other area.

The budget dictates taxes, as it probably will next Tuesday, before any of the bills are submitted to this House for discussion. There is no way, Mr. Speaker, of participating in a detailed discussion of financial expenditures in the current terms in this Legislature—none at all, none at all.

The material that we got in the public accounts committee is almost two years old. The government makes liberal use of the financial warrant. The Minister of University Affairs and Education—I see him fleetingly under the gallery—wants to increase the money spent on the Centennial Centre for Science and Technology 5, 6 or 10-fold. He simply signed some financial warrants.

If the Minister of Trade and Development wants to hand out EIO loans indiscriminately to companies whose objects are to destroy the economic fibre of this province, then signs the financial warrants and exceeds the amount of money which is allocated for the expenditures, there is absolutely no way of controlling, no way of discerning, no way of scrupulously examining the current financial expenditure in this Legislature.

It is inaccessible, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes it is so complex, but we necessarily resort to the broader issue, missing the fine details. I don't know an occasion in this House when an estimate had actually been altered in a fundamental way. I know that the last occasion was our great Westminster protest in the year 1919, when a second bathroom for the Lord Chancellor was at this point excised from the budget.

But since that time, and in this Legislature, there has not been a noticeable alteration of the materials which are given to us. Behind every estimate debate is the resonance of many sleeping dogs, Mr. Speaker, whose activities we cannot discern or have access to.

Indeed, animal husbandry is not a bad analogy, Mr. Speaker. We are so enmeshed and ill-informed that we cannot get at the contents. The procedures themselves fail to grip the subject matter. I am reminded of a little limerick that I came across and I quote what is wrong with Parliament:

The bits and the reins are very well looked after and the stable door is double locked but no one looks inside. You praise the firm restraint with which they work. I am with you there, of course, they use the snaffle and the curb all right, but where is the bloody horse?

Well, Mr. Speaker, the "bloody horse," has escaped through the cavernous gap provided by that charade behind which Ministers and deputy Ministers, sitting as lackeys and sycophants in front of them, go through the various estimate procedures.

And the financial affairs of this province fall into the breach. Whether we will see the redemption of television by virtue of the performances of the Provincial Treasurer is something that only time will tell.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that this House has largely lost control over the expenditures of money, and one can think of few other rationales which could justify a legislative assembly—that, too, is worthy of total restructuring. There is little meeting of minds on issues and that includes the question of bills. Indeed there are many bodies that wonder whether the government, as a government, should continue to try to legislate at all; whether there should not be some kind of devolution of power, which vests a great deal more strength in those who ultimately make the decisions, which at least would be a more legitimate way of running the government.

The vote on most bills, on all bills, is predictable; the divisions are predictable; a good whip knows what lies in store on any issue; the persuasive arguments are seldom trotted out any longer because who is one persuading? They are not levelled at their opponents. A few eccentrics continue to revel in the world of ideas but mostly one talks to the public. I suppose that is why we are going to have television debate, so that one can get over the masquerade and communicate directly with those whom one hopes to impress.

Finally then, to the demagogic process to influence the electorate deeply. Olis pointed this out in his book and suggested that it would be simpler and certainly more economical if a flock of tame sheep kept conveniently at hand were guided through division lobbies, then appropriate numbers have an agreed time. And that view, I may say, is concurred in by less spectacular observers of the various legislative scenes, among them McKenzie and Bulmer-Thomas.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, this is what has happened. If I may revert to Richard Crossman, the good British Labour Party political analyst, the executive and the Legislature, the government and the Parliament, are a constitutional façade; in reality, the party alone exercises power, and the dictates of this Legislature are put by the Conservative Party, modestly supported by the Cabinet—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Lewis: —and laid down in an enviable pattern, Mr. Speaker, by the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is fair to say that the Prime Minister exercises considerable power indeed, a kind of constitutional dictatorship. The Prime Minister of this Legislature is not loath to exercise that power; he supports Churchillian doctrine—"all I wanted was compliance in my wishes after reasonable discussion"—and that is basically the motto under which the current Prime Minister exercises power.

He leaves his impression on all government policy; he whips his Cabinet into line; he removes some of them retroactively when it is required—the first essential of the Prime Minister is to be a good butcher—I think that was a Gladstone comment in the days of yore; and I think this Prime Minister, as charming and ingenious as he is on occasion, has recognized that there is a hierarchy in the parliamentary system in the province of Ontario, and it consists of the Tory Party with a Cabinet shakily at the top, presided over by the Prime Minister himself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to put it to you that it is no accident that there is much disenchantment abroad when one looks at the way in which this Legislature approaches its functions. Perhaps I can add, two very brief asides to all of this, because I think they need to be said. Quite apart from deterioration of the role and participation and usefulness of the contribution the government permits members to make, this could be a most excellent Legislature if the government would permit certain areas to be exploited and expanded. And let no one be concerned about its possibility, only the limitations under the present regime.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are some forces even beyond the government's control, and they must be alluded to in any reflection on the nature of the legislative process. The civil servant, of course, dictates more of what occasions the interests of this House, than do the members or the Cabinet Ministers themselves.

We all submit to that happy technocracy; we give in. We submit in a supine way; I suppose there are no other responses to the technocracy. And, of course, the decisions which are made, as other members have pointed out, by corporate institutions based outside this Legislature, with inanimate resources, but governing, none the less, the animated behaviour of people all over this province.

And more and more, the Legislature becomes an obedient echo, Mr. Speaker, to the designs of others. Let us have no self-deception here. Any Cabinet Minister who thinks that he acts with independent power and autonomy in the face of many of the corporate decisions, is acting in total self-delusion. The Minister of Mines above all.

If Texas Gulf Sulphur says to the Minister of Mines, "I will not build, or we will not build our smelter," the Minister of Mines salutes, bows and scrapes, humbles himself, prostrates himself, occupies an obsequious posture and runs snivelling off to the Cabinet room.

Well, the fact of the matter is—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: I don't prostrate myself before anyone! The hon. member's hypothesis is completely wrong.

Mr. Lewis: Well, if that is the hypothesis, I would hate to hear the conclusion. Only, Mr. Speaker, by placing pretty fierce limits on all these incidental forces, and I think we will come to that as the Legislature continues through the rest of this session, only by placing pretty fierce limits—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Why does he not ask his colleagues in the NDP about their conflict of interest?

Mr. Lewis: No, no, I do not want to. Can the Minister of Mines subside for just a moment into his usual tranquility, sir, and I will continue. Mr. Speaker, I look round me and I take pride in what I see. I even take pride in what I do not see. Now, Mr. Speaker, it has about it certain elements of poignancy; the Cabinet acting as a dreary chorus to handle the continuity between the decisions imposed from outside. Until this Cabinet stops its complicity in accepting outside dictation on the Legislature on bill after bill, on policy after policy, on issue after issue, by even one of the examples such as the one which I gave, then of course we will have no useful parliamentary function again under Tory aegis. But those days have their withering away like other states do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the alienation itself in the body politic about the behaviour of government and about the abuse of the Legislature by government, expresses itself in alternative routes. Some say—I do not—that the Legislature itself is a withering process. I would think that the Legislature might conceivably be rejuvenated, but not when the individual members of the House, in Opposition and government, are subject to such gross indignity and such obvious inequality as they are on a variety of fronts; not so long as debate is structured and regimented; not so long as forces from outside dictate the context of this Legislature.

I am not suggesting a Guy Fawkes solution, but I am suggesting a pretty radical overhaul. And it is a real challenge to penetrate the cynicism of this government, Mr. Speaker, and the apathy of this government. I want to suggest to you that it can be done. The Minister of Mines is a great devotee of Winnie the Pooh and A. A. Milne, and I want to read a little quote from A. A. Milne:

Here is Edward Bear coming downstairs now, bump, bump, bump on the back of his head behind Christopher Robin. It is, as far as he knows the only way of coming downstairs, but sometimes he feels there really is another way, if only he could stop bumping for a moment and think of it. And then he feels that perhaps there is not another way.

Now the purpose, Mr. Speaker, is to suggest that there are other ways, that it is inherent in a parliamentary apparatus run by a Tory party, that they are in collusion with it, they are defeated by it. Not a conscious plot, it is just a willingness to watch the assembly emasculated and trifled with by forces which they do not appear to wish to resist.

There is the ultimate authority, if I may be forgiven an excess of quotations, of Bernard Crick, who wrote his little study on the reform of Parliament, and said in the process:

But governments have grown to feel that they are neither representative, nor in any real sense themselves members of Parliament, but simply remote and all-powerful trustees for the electorate, only answerable to anyone at general elections. Indicative of the Tory party, the prejudice grows that proceedings in Parliament are a waste of ministerial time.

There are a great many Ministers who treat this Legislature with considerable indifference.

It is this prejudice which has to be met. Party leaders talk of Parliamentary reform only when they face the facts of life as an Opposition. The ministerial mind is not much moved by demonstrations that there is public disquiet with Parliament. For the ministry shares this view, indeed is in part responsible for it.

And the critiques continues.

I guess, Mr. Speaker, to wind it up, reflecting soberly, one learns the limitations of this assembly and one deals with them, but as on all issues of social policy, so on Parliamentary policy it becomes necessary to deal with them by bringing the government down. There seems no other conceivable alternative. And then it is necessary to reconstitute the Parliamentary protest. And if you will, a totally radical overhaul, some of which I have alluded to this afternoon.

The reforms have to be sweeping, not just in terms of times on speeches, and rules and a few of the obeisances to efficiency in administration, but root and branch so you destroy the endemic power structures which in their terms undermine the Parliamentary process. And then you make Parliament a flamboyant vehicle, Mr. Speaker, for the democratic process and for the exercise of that process, rather than an encrusted kind of forum to be used and abused at whim by the servants in the Treasury Board, servants of dubious power.

And in this caucus, Mr. Speaker, we see that reassertion of the legislative autonomy of private members. Of the dignity which might be afforded the nature of debates, of the re-analysis of those things which are relevant, rather than the preoccupation with those things which are irrelevant, by a return to things which are substantial and qualitatively important rather than constantly denegrating that which is of significance.

I notice, because I think it is the appropriate way to end, Mr. Speaker, the quote from de Tocqueville:

It is both necessary and desirable that the government of a democratic people should be both active and powerful, and our object should not be to render it weak, or indolent, but solely to prevent it from abusing its aptitude and strength.

Mr. L. A. Braithwaite (Etobicoke): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in joining this Throne Debate. I would like to take a moment to say that having watched the Speaker handle ministerial statements I feel that, at long last, the Opposition has been getting very fair treatment. I commend the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker on the way that the affairs of this House are running, and I feel that we in the Opposition—although we may not always feel that way—we are happy to have the Speaker and Deputy Speaker that we do have.

Before embarking on the main part of my speech, I want to begin on a personal, and perhaps a very sensitive note. However, this is something that has to be said, and, for reasons which will emerge as I make this remark, I am in a unique position in this House to make it. I refer to the criteria by which Queen's Counsel are appointed. Traditionally, the title QC is recognized by the public as a reward for service to profession and community, and a recognition of skill in the calling.

Service to community is underlined by the mandate of the electorate, when a lawyer also holds public office. I am proud to have the provincial welfare of some 60,000 constituents in my trust. I like to think that I serve the people of Etobicoke, in my own way and at my own level, as well as Edward Brooke serves in the U.S. Senate, as well as Ralph Bunche served in the United Nations and as well as Lincoln Alexander serves in our own House of Commons.

I am glad to see that the Smith Committee has recommended the abolition of the poll tax, and that the government has acted upon this recommendation. I am glad that literacy and property ownership do not give the advantage to some that they once did in the franchise. In fact, the electors are perhaps more fairly dealt with today than those in whom they have placed their trust. Often as I sit here in this House and hear the talk about the people of northern Ontario, the Indians, the Franco-Ontarians, sooner or later someone asks: "What do these people want?" That question, Mr. Speaker, is the cry of bigotry and ignorance. It is a question asked out of a vacuum and into the void. The very act of asking the question marks the man who asks it.

In asking for fairness and equity in the apportionment of recognition and honour, I hope that these few words will mark the end of the age of the subtle silence, the covert rejection. I know the Premier to be a fair-minded man, and I am sorry he is not in his seat at this moment, Mr. Speaker, and I end this heartfelt paragraph with my own question to him: What are the rules of the game?

You know, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent) quite often refers to "the rules of the game". We sit here and we sometimes see different rules applied at different times to different circumstances. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, just what are the rules of the game when this Cabinet meets and discussion takes place as to who shall be and who shall not be appointed as a QC? I wonder, Mr. Speaker, are these rules changed from time to time to keep some member of the Cabinet, or some other member of this House, happy?

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): Such as whom?

Mr. Braithwaite: I bring this matter up only—the Minister will get his chance—Mr. Speaker, I bring this matter up only because I feel that it is something that has to be said. I hope I do not have to refer to it again.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Detail it now.

Mr. Braithwaite: The Minister will have his opportunity to speak later.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Who is the member talking about?

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Speaker, we have heard wide-ranging and high-flown topics in the Throne debate this year, but I want to bring the debate right back to earth and localize it in Etobicoke—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: That is chicken. That is just chicken.

Mr. Braithwaite: —because I believe this particular debate should serve the purpose of a member constituency.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: This is absentee member's day.

Mr. Braithwaite: It is too bad we do not have the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Shulman) here. He might have a few quotations on these interruptions. He might be able to pinpoint the reason for them.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Why can the hon. member not pinpoint the reasons himself?

Mr. Braithwaite: In bringing to the attention of the government some of the matters which are engaging—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Who is the member talking about?

Mr. Braithwaite: —a member's electors as they go about their daily business in this increasingly complex world.

One of the things I am going to talk about is solid waste disposal, and why we can no longer allow this to go unplanned. I am particularly critical of sanitary landfill projects. In my view, Metro garbage should be burnt and the steam sold; the latest apparatus should be installed for this purpose all over the greater Metro area—equipment should be purchased that will not pollute the air, because the stack gases will be scrubbed and filtered of fly-ash and noxious components.

Garbage disposal methods should be moved into the 21st century, and I am convinced that, more than anything, this represents an attitude of mind on the part of the people who must make these decisions. I am told that the whole tone of the garbage disposal approach centres on the personal views of Ross Clark, Metro commissioner of public works, and that he is against incineration. However, we cannot allow matters to rest like this. Mr. Speaker, let me take the members of this House back a couple of years to the beginning of the present crisis—and crisis, let me assure the House, is not too strong a word for the landfill chaos we now face.

The long hot summer of 1967 has come and gone, and Metropolitan Toronto has won its case at the Ontario Municipal Board, and is now proceeding to dump garbage in the north of Etobicoke and in southern Vaughan township and is laying up trouble for the future.

It is worthwhile reviewing the history of what may well become a nightmare in the future, Mr. Speaker. Metro notified Vaughan township on October 27, 1966, that it was making an application under the provisions of Bill 81 to use the 150-acre Thackeray site and a small portion of north Rexdale in the vicinity of Steeles Avenue, for land-fill operations. Originally, there was no objection to this proposal from Vaughan, even though the land had a high potential value, due to its proximity to Etobicoke. However, Metro then requested that 600 acres immediately north—known as the North Thackeray site—be incorporated in the request, and Vaughan township objected. I might add, I appeared before the OMB on July 24, 1967, during its hearings, to object on behalf of the constituents whom I represent in this Legislature.

My objections were concerned with considerations of traffic, pollution, expansion, displacement of homeowners, pollution of water resources at the headwaters of the Humber, destruction of recreation areas, the proximity of the proposed site to residential Etobicoke and to Woodbridge and the availability of alternative sites or techniques of garbage disposal.

But the case of Metro found favour in the eyes of the Ontario Municipal Board because of the urgent need for more dumping areas and so disposal trucks are now rumbling along Albion road and up Kipling avenue, creating a serious hazard for children in Etobicoke in the daytime, distressing noise, and dust all around the clock. When the summer of 1969 rolls around, there will be added the problem of odour.

Mr. Speaker, a major hazard in all this is that of methane gas seepage. This is a real danger since the gas is odourless and heavier than air, and seeps into basements where it forms pools of explosive gas as it mixes with air. The result is an explosion, often claimed to be of unknown origin, or mistakenly blamed on natural gas. In fact, the gas already causing trouble is the product of earlier attempts to bury garbage and cover up the traces. Methane is the will-o'-the-wisp gas, the jack-o'-lantern gas, and it moves mysteriously in the ground.

What is about to compound the problem is the proposal to build several high-rise apartments, five or six units, 5,000 suites in all, housing some ten to fifteen thousand people, within a year or so on 100 acres which lie east of Kipling, north of Finch, south of Steeles, and directly south of where the dumping is now taking place. This proposal was approved at the Etobicoke council meeting of Monday, February 24, 1969.

Now I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to these plans, as I feel these units will be of assistance in easing the desperate housing shortage we have here in Metro. Yet the experience of the events at Edenbridge drive in Etobicoke ought to be enough to give pause to all who are contemplating amplifying this nuisance and danger connected with methane gas, as Metro continues to do. At the Edenbridge site, none of the three municipal authorities involved can decide what to do about the gas problem, although engineers say the problem of continuing gas generation underground could last for 100 years.

The Metro Toronto and Region Conservation Authority has refused to pay the costs of getting rid of the gas. They own the site, but say they did not do the dumping or create the problem. The Metro parks department, as agent for the authority, shares this view. Etobicoke says: We sold the conservation authority the site for a dollar, and with that goes all the liabilities as well as the benefits. The big liability, of course, is that Etobicoke dumped its garbage on the site some ten years ago. So who is responsible?

Mr. Speaker, I might point out that the methane travels underground mainly in winter under the frozen layer of ground which effectively seals off all escape holes. It seeks out underground hollows and porous ground in attempting to reach the atmosphere and often the most effective ducts are service trenches of all kinds, carrying pipes, cables, conduits, and what have you. Branches of these conduits run to neighbourhood basements, carrying water, gas, electricity, telephone service, even cable television, and carrying away waste water and sewage.

Mr. William Swan, Etobicoke's borough engineer, by continuous testing and other means, is trying to minimize the danger, but, under these conditions, it is very much present and very real. For example, in the basement of one Anthony Abela, of 236 Edenbridge drive in Etobicoke, the saturation level of methane stood at 30 per cent on Wednesday, February 5, 1969. The house was one of the many built in the immediate vicinity of the landfill development located at Edenbridge and Scarlett road, in Etobicoke.

Meanwhile, this winter, as every winter, work crews are drilling escape holes so that the gas may vent through the frozen topsoil. In 1963, the construction of a $20,000 gas interceptor trench was authorized by the Etobicoke works committee and by the board of control. However, it was turned down by full council, which had referred the matter already to the conservation authority.

The authority advised the council that it had no funds for the project and that the gas was generated by Etobicoke's garbage. It limited its liability to an offer to donate easements for an interceptor trench. Metro parks department washed its hands of the whole mess. Then Etobicoke went to both bodies calling for a subsidy for the interceptor trench construction, and there the matter, Mr. Speaker, today sits, unresolved.

The procedural wrangle is stymied, but the gas is still being generated, relentlessly, and so it will be with the much graver problem that will arise on the new land fill site unless action is taken in advance of construction. The plan must recognize the reality of the situation.

And this brings me to my point, the point of my raising this matter here in the Legislature—this is a problem for regional government, and for inter-regional planning, and it underlines the Liberal approach to the problems of regional government in the areas immediately surrounding Metropolitan Toronto, which we are holding up to view as a special case.

This is the reason why our municipal affairs critic, the member for Waterloo North (Mr. Good), in outlining the Liberal caucus position on regional government in his statement of Thursday, February 6, made quite clear our desire for a supra-regional, or joint planning authority for the special area from Oakville to Lake Simcoe to Cobourg.

Incidentally, it is useful to compare the Minister's statements on regional government, both inside the Legislature and, increasingly, and with increasing exasperation, outside this House; with the Liberal position and the NDP position.

It is an interesting evening's homework, and it demonstrates that the Liberals are the only ones who have thought regional government right through to its detailed implications in matters such as garbage disposal. Mr. Speaker, I ask you to look at the Minister's statement on garbage disposal and ask him how it would work in the specific case I am outlining now.

He could not possibly have an answer at this stage, and that, surely, is the test. It demonstrates the unreality of his force-feeding in the absence of a master plan for Ontario. He cracks the whip, but the cart is empty.

Whenever I look at the Humber, that once-clear river where children used to swim and one could go fishing, two things come to mind. A plan for Ontario and fully thought-through regional government would have kept the Humber pure. And the second thought that comes to mind is that seepage from this large dump at the head waters of the Humber will pollute it even worse, if we continue to bury garbage rather than burn it.

We have to move eastward, to the Don Valley Parkway, on the east side, just before the Don Mills Road interchange, to see what so-called sanitary landfill is really like. A century from now, the earth there will stop bubbling.

Engineers say it will be over 500 years before all the gas pockets are out of the earth, which at the moment has the texture of an Aero chocolate bar. Inspecting that particular site in October, 1966, the late controller Herbert Orloff and city streets commissioner Harold Atyeo expressed themselves as disgusted with the way the sanitary landfill operation was working out in practice, and put forward a strong plea that all garbage be burned.

However, as of January 1, 1967, Metro took over responsibility for garbage disposal, and the "expansion of incineration" idea died, as so many good ideas die at Queen and Bay. Mr. Atyeo's comment that allowing sanitary landfill is like allowing a city-dweller to build a privy in his backyard, has more force today than ever.

We are setting up these communal privies with their methane gas, rather than incinerating garbage, and we are making a great deal of trouble for ourselves. At the moment, Toronto burns garbage at four sites: Don Valley, Wellington Street, Commissioners Street and Symes Road. This approach must now become total, and the latest model incinerators must be used, so that all ash and noxious gases are scrubbed out of the exhaust.

It can be done, Mr. Speaker. Forest Hill operates an incinerator with a water-wash smoke filtration process right in the middle of a residential area, and there are no complaints, after eleven years of continuous operation.

The impression one gains is that Metro works commissioner Ross Clark had his mind set against incineration and blocked all attempts to employ this method, rather than landfill. If this is not so, I apologize to the gentleman, but that is the general impression I get in talking at length to people about why this approach was never pushed with vigour at Metro.

Meanwhile, out in Scarborough, a works crew makes its morning coffee on a flame from a methane gas seepage!

Mr. Speaker, let me look back again briefly to that infamous Ontario municipal board decision of two years ago. I predicted the traffic problem of the Steeles and Kipling landfill site and my forecast of massive congestion is coming true. I predicted the increased pollution of the Humber River, and this, too, is happening. I speculated on the loss of recreation lands close by Metro high-density areas, and this has been borne out.

I commented on the great potential loss for development purposes of rolling ravine type lots, and now Vaughan township recognizes that it has, indeed lost valuable assessment to Metro, for which it has not been adequately compensated.

I protested the removal of some twenty families by expropriation of their homes, and I painted a picture of the typical homeowner at the Thackeray site, who had fled the noise of Metro for the peace of what was formerly a haven.

As he looked out on the river, the woods, the farmland, the wildlife, he wondered about the mentality of Metro officials who would erase all this beauty to make room for a garbage dump. I remember, Mr. Speaker, saying: "It is wanton destruction, and I sincerely hope this board will not allow it to occur".

But, in its wisdom, the Ontario municipal board did allow it to occur, which leaves us where we are today, with garbage beginning to pile up, and the summer ahead. The underground water and the proximity of the river will cause the production of methane gas on a scale quite unlike anything we have seen in this end of Metro, and at least as bad as the Don Valley Parkway situation.

In the summer, the gas will bubble up and be dispersed in the atmosphere, but in the winter it will creep underground towards the new construction and homes south of Steeles Ave. in Etobicoke that the Globe and Mail has so proudly announced only this week. And there we will be, with a neatly-predicted hazard all built in.

Do we ever walk into these things with our eyes open! At least, some of us have our eyes open. It is a pity that others are so shortsighted when it comes to the future. They certainly need guidance about the consequences of their actions. We have only one atmosphere protecting us on this earth from all the hostile elements of the universe. We are poisoning it. We have only so much renewable water. We are getting to the point where we are polluting it faster than the sun can recycle it. We are killing ourselves off, Mr. Speaker.

And so I want to join the swelling chorus of my colleagues who are calling for widespread pollution control of air and water, and a consolidation of all effort under one Minister, at the same time as the government brings forward a master plan for Ontario.

Pollution is no respecter of boundaries, nor does it recognize tiers of jurisdiction. We have to have similar flexibility in the way we deal with the problem. It makes me sick to see the Ministers on the government benches passing the buck from one to another while the situation worsens. This cannot go on. Time is running out on us.

Now let me turn to another aspect of human welfare, which I think the government, through the Ontario Housing Corporation, ought to be doing more about. I refer to the provision of space and accommodation for thrift stores, manned by volunteers, in public housing projects. In the case of the Thistleton development, I think that we should now be considering thrift stores and other social services in the context of a balanced community.

Thistleton has over-reached itself, and the provision of human amenities has not kept pace with the raw provision of shelter. Now we have to turn shelter into community. We must work toward total integration so that no one need be ashamed to live in an Ontario Housing development.

Let me tell you first of the Rexdale experience with a thrift store, and then go on to tie this in to the larger picture of the greater Rexdale community.

It took the churches and other interested groups almost a year to obtain permission from Ontario Housing for the setting up of a thrift store in Braeburn Woods in the Braeburn Woods housing development in Rexdale.

They are able to use what was the caretaker's hallway, and a very, very, small utility room for a thrift store, which is now open.

I am told by the Rev. Bruce Roberts and Mr. Reynolds, and other members of the Rexdale ecumenical social action group that the Braeburn Woods thrift store is a huge success, although the quarters are very cramped.

The service rendered has been of particular use to the residents of the housing project of Braeburn Woods. People are flocking there. It is open one day a week.

Material is supplied by churches, interested groups, and housing agencies. Most of it is used clothing and shoes. It is sorted and the various items are sold very reasonably. For example, a pair of pants might go for 25c.

All proceeds are used to purchase new children's underclothing, which is either sold or given away in needy cases. It should be pointed out that because of the shortage of space, no adult clothing can be handled, although there is a definite need for good, used, adult clothing within the programme.

Now how does this activity fit into the larger community picture? Assuming that the noise from the airport is going to increase in North Rexdale, it is possible that the existing 279 HOME lots will remain unsold. I want to use this land to develop the North Rexdale area into a true community, not just a housing site.

This land on the west side of Martingrove Road and Thistleton, which the Telegram tells us will be withdrawn from the HOME market, can now be used to give vital living room. The OHA is always saying: "We have the space in our public housing for shelter, but we do not have the space for social facilities."

Well, now they have the space, since the potential noise has made the area undesirable for residence, but not untenable as a place to enrich life with nursing centres, properly-insulated community halls, facilities for social services and the like.

The social need is so great in North Rexdale that social workers do not advertise their facilities. They let people find out. Let's dilute this high-density housing pressure by ventilating actual shelter with social facilities and service centres to fulfil human needs.

This brings me back to the thrift store concept, and in particular the enterprise of Rexdale ecumenical social action. I want Ontario Housing to donate one house in the Thistle-town development as a thrift store and warehouse for this deserving group, which does not give clothing away, but which sells it for a nominal amount, so that people's pride is not bruised by charity.

The real need is right in the Thistle-town project and there is no reason why we could not set up a store there given OHA co-operation in the matter of accommodation.

Of course, I do not want the services to stop with the thrift store concept, valuable though this is. Just having to pay a small amount for an item does a great deal for a person's pride and self-respect. No value is attached to outright gifts, but great value can accrue where this symbolic sharing takes place. And of course, the money goes to purchase baby things and other necessities.

There is no profit and no overhead in a thrift store. But there are other services, too, that might be accommodated in a settlement house of the kind I have in mind. I am thinking particularly of budget counselling, showing people how to stay out of the clutches of the finance companies, help in coping with their new environment, family counselling, children's aid workers, and so on.

This elementary instruction is still very much needed on an individual basis in Thistle-town in particular.

I think, too, we might lick the hole-and-corner approach to welfare information by being straightforward about what is available to indigent and needy persons. This is best done by individual counselling in conditions of privacy. The approach ought to be: you have the need. What can we do to help you?

I want to bring up the question of stoves and refrigerators, and their availability in low-income housing. People who move out of apartments into row housing find that these necessities are missing. Because this kind of move is nearly always made in a climate of crisis or emergency, the lack of stove and 'fridge can be serious and traumatic, particularly if it is a week-end evening move and the family has young children.

Now there is a depot where the OHA keeps these things, but they will not say where it is. There is an extraordinary run-around which the unfortunate people are subject to. It's apparently all part of the cat-and-mouse game that some welfare types get a kick out of in their dealings with other human beings. It's a kind of sadism, I suppose, kicking the underdog, giving him a hard time.

In this vein, some bureaucrat has devised this circuitous scheme. First, the intended recipient of a stove and 'fridge has to go to the Salvation Army or to some other service organization which then tells him to send a letter to the member of the Legislature. The member must then write to the Ontario Housing, who will eventually write back, saying they will provide a stove and 'fridge, renting them for a dollar a month each.

About twice a month I get letters from people who have had to move in quickly, sometimes on Saturday to take advantage of a vacancy in public housing, and who have found on arrival in row housing from an apartment that they have neither stove nor 'fridge.

They have children. They have nowhere to cook a meal. They have to go down to the St. Vincent de Paul Society or some other kind person and borrow a hotplate. It's all terribly degrading, and what it does for the self-respect of those involved is hard to imagine.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to pause for a moment here and read into the record a few letters from some of these unfortunate people to make my point. The first letter I have is from a man on Orpington Crescent. In part he says:

I have just moved into the above address which is owned by Ontario Housing. These units are not equipped with any appliances. I have got a stove and washer which was very difficult for me as I am on welfare.

I borrowed a refrigerator from a friend. The difficulty with this appliance is that the freezer space was not made for meat. I have to buy my meat daily and this is a most expensive way to buy. I would therefore like to know if it is possible for Ontario Housing to supply this one appliance that I so desperately need?

And another letter, Mr. Speaker:

I am writing in regard to a fridge. We are unable to get one. It takes all the money my husband makes to pay the rent, hydro, some food, and very little clothes.

His take-home pay is approximately $105 to $110 a week. We pay $143 a month for rent. It costs us about $45 to $50 a week for groceries and there is not that much. The fridge we have is years old. There is a small freezer in the middle. Any meat we might have usually starts to taste bad, or go bad in about three or four days.

I understand Ontario Housing has to supply one for a family—if they are unable to get one—for a dollar a month. Please answer and let me know.

This letter, Mr. Speaker, is from a lady on Mount Olive Drive in Rexdale.

My last letter, Mr. Speaker, is from a lady who lives on Jameson Crescent, right in the middle of the Thistle town project and she says:

Dear Sir:

I have just spoken to Father — and he told me to write to you and tell you that he told me to do so. I am in bad need of a fridge and electric range. My husband is not working and we are on welfare at the present and we have four children. I find it hard enough to keep enough food in the house, for now I am losing quite an amount since my fridge gave out.

My stove has one burner left working and no oven working, which means I cannot bake or make bread for my family anymore.

We had a man in to see how much it would cost to get them both working and he said it would cost quite an amount and that they were both too old and worn out to bother being fixed and we don't have any money to pay to get them fixed.

So father told me to write to you and you would be able to get me a fridge and stove. I pray to God that you can help us for I don't know of anyone else to turn to.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the point I make is, why should the member have to involve himself in this circuitous way of doing things? Why should the member become a party to dragging people down from dignity to abject supplication? Why does the government allow this to happen? I will tell you why—it does not care.

The settlement centre approach would mean there would be someone on duty round the clock and the stove and fridge would be forthcoming without all this fuss. Better still, I wonder, Mr. Speaker, why they just could not simply supply a stove and fridge for this row of houses just the same as an apartment or any apartment rented these days is supplied.

My file is full of individual cases. Some of them are heartrending. Most of them show just how soulless bureaucracy can be. As with the thrift store, on which I have met with the Minister several times, nothing has been done to lift the people up. I am told that these matters are passed down the line by the Minister of Trade and Development, and by his deputy, until they reach a level in the hierarchy where the public servant can legitimately turn round and say: "In this matter I do not have the authority to act."

That, Mr. Speaker, is the final refinement in the buck-passing technique of which this government is master.

I cannot end without pointing out the need for balanced growth, and the relating of available school capacity to the provision of new shelter. Co-ordination between different levels of government is essential here. The Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) must know what is going on, his architects must be aware. All of which brings us back to that basic Liberal plank—a plan for Ontario. It is missing, and, Mr. Speaker, do we feel it!

Ontario needs a Nixon government now. We might have to wait until 1971, but as sure as I am standing here, we will have one.

Now, let me say a few words on the subject of rent control. My remarks conform with the statements of my leader, made on November 22, 1968, on the subject.

The government's bungling of the basic shelter exemption has resulted in large and unwarranted rent increases in the private sector, whenever the vacancy rate has dropped to about 1.5 per cent of accommodation, and it is clear that there are local urban areas in Ontario where a free market in housing no longer exists. True, this may only be a temporary phenomenon. Yet it is heartening to note that newspaper advertisements are inducing tenants to sign up for certain luxury—and I emphasize that, Mr. Speaker—apartment developments by offering a month's free rent and other blandishments, so it is clear that the supply of luxury apartments, at least, has pushed the market to its limit and therefore prices could be backtracking somewhat.

However, there are still areas in Metro, and Etobicoke is one of them, where more modest types of apartments are yielding returns to their owners of a magnitude that suggest the famine is not over. In other words, Mr. Speaker, some landlords are gouging their tenants. This continuing crisis has occurred through the present government's failure to provide serviced land in a planned fashion; adequate rapid transit to relieve "close-in" urban pressures; a proper balance of industrial and residential growth; and sufficient subsidized housing in the proper density and dispersion, through OHA.

And so the middle income groups are forced to raise families in apartments while yearning for detached homes of their own and the way of life that home ownership will bring. At the same time, recent increases have forced hundreds to move around, looking for still cheaper accommodation than that they have recently occupied.

In these exceptional, and I re-emphasize, government-created, circumstances, the time has come for a rent control statute which will allow those municipalities where the local conditions demand it, to constitute rent control boards for a limited period of time and subject to the regular renewal of the over-riding statute by the Legislature. These boards must have the power to take measures appropriate to their areas of jurisdiction. In this way, local initiative, know-how and ingenuity will be applied to the pressing urgency of putting a roof over people's heads.

You know, Mr. Speaker, tenants should have some place to go for help, some place to get back their security deposits. There should be no need for tenants' strikes, as we have right here in Metro now.

Once more it is appropriate to remind this House, Mr. Speaker, that rent control applied in Ontario until 1953, when the housing emergency was considered over. Thanks to Conservative maladministration, we are once more in such an emergency.

However, in the Liberal view, rent control is a temporary palliative to a crisis created by the Robarts government. If it must remain in operation for an extended period, it will be a constant condemnation of the failure of Conservative policies in the shelter field—a constant goad to destroy the complacency that still insists that all is well.

Will the government settle for less? We shall see. It is clear that this issue can no longer be avoided, as we enter the 17th month of the final mandate of the Robarts administration.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I just want to point out that in the first session, when I was first elected, and for several years after, I remember distinctly when the member for Grey-Bruce and others on this side, would twit the government. The government would be so secure. They would laugh and say, "There is not a chance, nothing to worry about."

But you know, the odd time, Mr. Speaker, we find that the member for Grey-Bruce, in particular, lands one of his haymakers. I notice that the government does not laugh so loud: I notice that there is quiet over there sometimes. I truly believe that they have come to fear some of these questions that the member for Grey-Bruce, and the member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) and others have been asking.

In my view, Mr. Speaker—there is no need for us here to trumpet it—this government is going to fall and it is going to fall of its own volition. It is going to fall because of its own sins of omission—not by anything that it has done, but by what it has not done. I am not going to go into all of the various things that I feel this government should do and ought to have done.

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Go ahead.

Mr. Braithwaite: I will let the hon. member do that.

But what I will say, Mr. Speaker, is that it will not be long. I do not care if the government calls a snap election in 1969, or a snap election in 1970. It does not matter who gets into the hockey finals. It does not matter a darn who wins the Grey cup.

In 1971, if the election is called, Robert Nixon will be the next Premier of this province. We will be sitting on that side of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question please?

Mr. Braithwaite: The debate is over. The Minister will have his opportunity.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: It is in relation to the hon. member's charges of discrimination—

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order, please!

The hon. member has indicated he will not permit a question.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Well then on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I hope I am mistaken, but it appeared to me that there was an innuendo or an impression, deliberately left by the hon. member, in relation to the appointment of Queen's Counsel in the New Year's list and that, somehow or other, the appointment of QCs on that New Year's list, sir, bears some relation to discrimination in respect of one's colour or one's race. I would like to have the hon. member document this, Mr. Speaker, one way or the other, or to indicate to me that I am wrong in my impression of what he indicated.

Mr. Speaker: I must say, that as far as I can determine there is no point of order. Actually, the hon. member who was speaking made certain remarks which were his opinions, his views of the situation.

I do not see that there is any point of order. It was simply his opinion.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: With all due respect, sir. I am a member of the executive council of the province of Ontario and this is a serious matter.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): The Minister does not act it.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: I am a member of the executive council which approved certain names, sir, at the beginning of this year for the appointment, within its discretion, of certain people within this province to be Queen's Counsel and to hold that title thereafter.

Within my ears this afternoon it appeared to me that a member of this House attempted to leave the impression that certain factors relating to one's race and one's colour came in into discussion relating to those matters. I am asking the hon. member right now if this was the intent of his remark, because, sir, it bears very much on my own feelings and my own reputation.

Mr. Speaker: Well it seems to me that for this properly to be a point of order, something must be out of order. Now—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: If this reflects upon one's own integrity and one's own reputation, sir, it affects me and I have certainly the right to bring that before this House as a matter of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Well, the hon. Minister, with great respect, simply rose on what he called a point of order—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: A point of privilege, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw that innuendo.

An hon. member: No!

Mr. Speaker: I just say that I did not happen to be in the Chair when the alleged remark was made and, even though I was not in the Chair, the allegation made by the hon. Minister did not seem to me to be a point of order.

Now, if the hon. member made any such allegation to which the hon. Minister has taken offence, perhaps he would like to comment upon it at this time. I take it that the hon. Minister is rising on a point of personal privilege?

An hon. member: One or the other.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member for Etobicoke care to comment upon—

An hon. member: No!

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: The hon. member's actions today are despicable!

Mr. Braithwaite: Mr. Speaker, Hansard will record what I have said.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: I think the records will indicate what the hon. member said in the absence of myself. At the moment I am not in a real position to indicate what he did say, therefore if there is some point of privilege, it may be raised again, I would think, another time.

Mr. R. Haggerty (Welland South): Mr. Speaker I rise with pleasure at the opportunity to speak on the Throne debate today. I commend you, Mr. Speaker, and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker on the manner in which you administer your responsibilities.

I would agree that you have treated all 117 members in a fair, just manner. I would also like to commend the Speaker for providing much better facilities for the page boys, for this is long overdue, and I would like to congratulate the hon. Minister of Revenue (Mr. White) on his appointment. What his position is, is one of question.

The people of this province, as well as the government, know that they are in a financial nightmare, travelling to many countries, trying to raise enough money to keep their heads above water. For surely, this government is sinking.

Mr. Speaker, some nine months ago, questions were raised by myself and other members on this side of the House as to what position and action were to be taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and the Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Brunelle) as to the question of ownership of the lake shores and the right of access to the beaches in the Welland South riding.

The Minister's replies are noted on page 4721 in the Legislature debate of June 19, 1968, and I quote:

The departmental study of between the 1400 and 1500 township plots and some 76 townships fronting the Great Lakes had been completed. A legal opinion is presently being prepared by our department on the extent of the beachland in these townships which may be in public ownership. The wording used in the grants from the Crown for these lots varies in terminology. And may I say that some of these grants are quite old; some are over 100 years old and they vary considerably.

Approximately 40 per cent of the lots were granted by reference to the lot concessions only and about 25 per cent were granted on the basis of description of land, including the lot and concession number, but in addition, they described the exterior boundary of lots as along such line as the water's edge, the lake, the shore, the bank, and the high water mark in the front. The remaining 35 per cent of the lots were described by various combinations of the above.

Until this date, Mr. Speaker, nothing has come forth on the decision of the government itself, as to what action is being taken. The arrangements are now being made, sir, to have a hearing of a court case before Osgoode Hall. As a layman, I would presume that the application is similar to a quit claim deed. And that the province would be relinquishing all the rights or claims to the property involved.

I know that Mr. T. Laine from The Attorney General's Department is gathering all possible information from area residents of Bertie township to show proof that the area residents used the lakeshore and beaches previous to the American ownership of the property and control of the lake. This is not a new problem for it has existed some 24 years, and beyond that, perhaps when many properties along the lake were first sold in the early 1900's to the Americans.

Many of the lakefront property owners have tried in many conceivable ways to obtain possession and control of the beaches along the shore of Lake Erie. Application before the court today still remains the same as of the past with Walker, Stockton, Stockton and Letenworth.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to report this on the record. This goes back to 1945, and pertains to a bylaw in the county of Welland—bylaw number 1538, a bylaw to confirm bylaw No. 1385, 1944, the corporation of the township of Bertie passed October 18, 1944, for stopping a part of the road allowance and highway as described in the said bylaw:

A bylaw number 1385 in the municipal corporation of Bertie township passed by the said township on the 18th of October, providing the stopping up of that part of road allowance and highway between lots 16 and 17, broken front concession, Lake Erie in the said township, and more particularly described as set out in the said bylaw, a duplicate of the original of which is hereunto annexed. And the same is hereby confirmed and enacted this 18th day of January, 1945 by the warden of the county of that time, Mr. I. E. Michener, in the county of Welland.

This brings up the same question today as to what action today that is going to be taking place at this court hearing. The reason of the closing of this road at that time, Mr. Speaker, was that the Americans, the property owners of that area at that time, had built houses upon a road allowance; even at that time they had tried to obtain possession of every access to the lakes. The council at that time became aware of such a situation and made an agreement with the property owners of that time that they would deed that part of the road allowance to them for the part of land they owned next to it. That conveyance of land, the transfer of land—even at that time they tried to obtain ownership.

I have a letter here from residents in the township of Bertie, and this again is one of the questions that the staff of the Attorney General is enquiring about throughout the area. It is asking for help to fight the case before the courts. And it is as follows:

Mr. Haggerty, M.P.P., R.R. 1, Sherston, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Haggerty:

In reply to your request regarding Lake Erie beach information of the past years, I can recall about 1905 when the farmers took their sheep out to the lake to clean the wool before shearing them, and the cattle out to water them during the dry weather.

Before houses were built along the lake front the township roads were supposed to have access to the lakes and rivers. Many years, I have teamed gravel and sand for houses being built along the lakefront, and in the park and our own homes. I have cleaned driftwood, seaweed, algae for years. I have ploughed beaches, levelled sand, and cut down small poplar trees and brush that had grown wild for the American people. Later they put up fences on the beach, and even out in the water several feet to keep people off the beaches in front of their houses, which was torn down by others on many occasions.

I think what the writer is trying to inform me is that in many cases fences have been put up; signs have been put up and they have been removed for the past 50 years.

I teamed for the Furry Company at Erie Beach when they built their big dock, hauling sand and gravel almost 60 years ago. About 50 years ago, I worked for Mr. Dan Good when he built his dock to the left of the Crescent Road, hauling gravel again to the big dock. Later, three or four teams were hauling gravel for their own use about 55 years ago, from the Rosehill area which we were arrested for hauling gravel at the time. Mr. Hersey was reeve of Bertie. As "private beach" was painted on one of the many big stones in the area, we settled out of court for a fine of $7.00 each.

About 15 years ago when I worked for the former lawyer, Mr. Flynn, on the lake-front at Crescent, he told me that the Crescent Beach association got the best lawyer in Canada to do their legal work in securing water lots and deeds.

And I might confirm this. I have been told on many occasions that there are certain lawyers in that vicinity of Bertie township that have all the power and connections to get anything they want from this government.

Fences were put up by someone blocking off the Crescent Road entrance to the lake, causing a lot of trouble and inconvenience a few years ago, stopping me from working on the beach. Guards or police have patrolled the lake front for years to keep people off the beaches. Whoever pay them I do not know. Things have surely changed in the last 40 years, as Americans want to take over everything beyond their own lot, and surely receive help from someone in authority of our country.

Sincerely yours,

Albert Bonner.

And one would raise the question today, why this certain group of people are taking such a court action? Perhaps it is for greed, perhaps it is for concern, and perhaps there is a possibility of a quarter mile, or a half mile of beach that is public land. And I go back to September 1964, and this is always known in my area as the Battle of Ridgeway and the Beaches.

Ridgeway: In the face of strong protest from ratepayers, Bertie township council last night tabled for a further study of a by-law authorizing sale of another unopened road allowance in return for 100 feet of beach adjoining another 66 foot public beach.

The controversial proposal which would deed the Central Avenue road allowance running down to Lake Erie to three United States residents with summer homes in the area has been the subject of recurrent protests, picketing, and hot exchanges in council since it was first suggested by council early in July. The three property owners have agreed to pay full costs of expropriating 100 feet of beach adjoining the Bernard Road allowance. Three petitions presented to council last night listed nearly 1,200 names of Bertie township residents who protested the sale of Central Avenue.

The most forceful opposition, however, was the submission of a Welland solicitor, S. S. MacInnes, QC, who argued that far from trading 66 feet of inaccessible beach for 100 feet of beach readily available, the by-law, in fact, robbed the township residents of over 2,000 feet of public beach. Mr. MacInnes appeared on behalf of three property owners whose land adjoined Central Avenue and who claimed that their lands would be adversely affected by the sale of the road allowance, and on behalf of several ratepayers associations.

The search of deeds. The solicitor explained that the search of the original Crown patents granted for lot 16, 240 acres east of Central Avenue in 1798, and for lot 17, 330 acres west of Central Avenue in 1802, showed that the measurements were taken from the Crown surveyed post. He told council that he had discussed this with the surveyor general, and others who agreed that the only logical place for the survey post was the edge of vegetation or high water mark.

A further Crown patent granted in 1891 gave John McLeod the water rights for the west half of lot 17, Mr. MacInnes pointed out, leaving all the beach, some 2,040 feet of it, as Crown land.

Mr. MacInnes agreed with Councillor Wilfred Cook when he noted that the law had ruled that for Lake Erie, the wording "banks and shores" referred to the actual water's edge. He went on to explain that in this case no reference was made to a bank or shore, but only to a Crown survey post.

Mr. MacInnes said that in view of the fact that over 2,000 feet of public beach existed at the end of Central Avenue, it was not surprising that the three property owners were prepared to write almost a blank cheque to get the road allowance closed for all time. The solicitor suggested to the council that in view of this information, they would be justified in withdrawing their by-laws.

"Ratepayers do not become disturbed unnecessarily," he said. "It would be almost impossible to replace this amount of beach," he added.

And as I have said, Mr. Speaker, the same property owners some 20 years ago, and again today, are still trying to obtain ownership of the beach rights to this area.

The Welland Tribune of February 19, 1969, supports Bertie on the beach issue. Welland county council has thrown its support behind Bertie township in protest of transfer of lakefront property. The township is protesting the transferral of any Lake Erie beach property from Crown lands to private ownership, through quit claim deeds.

When one questions the methods of the department that is handling this matter, one can only go back to the Niagara River and some of the early deeds of that time—the early settlers from Pennsylvania, the Pennsylvania Dutch United Empire Loyalists first settled in this area.

The deeds at that time of the Niagara River only went to the bank of the river. Sixty-six feet was left open for a military road. We come to the question of the old fort at Fort Erie, which has been an old fort for a number of years, one of the original French forts in this area. We find that along the lakeshore, and maps will tell you that there is a road there. What the road is I do not know, but I can tell you that in many cases sitting on local council, Bertie township, we have had solicitors come in to our council meetings, and ask council to give a quit claim deed to this land along this lakeshore.

Now, there must be some question of ownership, whether the municipality owns it or the Crown owns it, when many lawyers and solicitors would come in for their clients and ask for a quit claim deed because there is a question of a road.

Back in the early stages of Crystal Beach, when it was first incorporated as a village and as a park, going back to the horse and buggy days and the trains, the trains used to travel from Buffalo to the area of Point Albino. From there, they used to be transferred by bus down the Point Albino road and along the shores of Lake Erie to Crystal Beach. We can go back further than this—I do not have the attention of the Minister of Lands and Forests yet; I hope I am getting through to him.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Lands and Forests, did the member say?

Mr. Haggerty: Yes. Many years ago, there used to be a grist mill built upon the shores of Lake Erie within this vicinity of Central Avenue where farmers at that time years ago used to travel the lakeshore by horseback, by horse and buggy, to take their grain to have it ground for flour. There is still a landmark there yet from this old windmill. So once again I bring to the attention of this House that this was public land; for years ago settlers used to travel this lake shore, it was the only way they could travel because there were no roads in the area.

There was some question about the Crystal Beach company when they built their amusement park, I understand there is supposed to be a tunnel underneath there that is supposed to be kept open for the purpose of the public, a thoroughfare for the public to have use and access to the lakefront.

Now, this government for 24 years has sat idle. This question has been raised, protests have taken place in the past four or five years, protests to bring to the attention of this government that action is needed now.

For if this land is ever lost, precedent will be set that all the land along the lakeshore will go to a certain few property owners along the shore. And in many cases these are Americans. This land is part of our Canadian heritage and some place along the line we, as members of this House, must decide to say that this is Crown land, that this is public land.

The Act was repealed in 1951 because of the pressure on the government from certain riparian property owners and interests and because of the difficulties of surveying in certain instances. But the appeal and definition of the high-water mark, which existed from 1940 to 1951, is removed completely, and there is a return to The Beds of Navigable Waters Act.

Resumption for the purpose of the administration is that the riparian rights of lots extends to the property boundary to the water. The Department of Lands and Forests on many occasions would like to assume that the high-water mark, which has been established under the departmental survey instructions, is a permanent immovable boundary. Again, the question is, upon whose instructions? Whose instructions?

Mr. Speaker, I feel this is a very important matter to me, not only to me but Canadians here today, to our Canadian heritage. And I plead to the Minister of Lands and Forests, to the Prime Minister of this province, let us get this matter settled, let us put it back into Crown land and let us give it back to the public where it belongs.

An hon. member: What is the member doing about it?

Mr. Haggerty: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see I do raise some interest from the NDP party over here. I have been carrying on this battle for a number of years.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Haggerty: Just a minute now. You know I was born and raised on a farm and one of the first things my dad told me was: "Son, I am going to buy you an animal, a donkey. I want you to look after this animal. Take the very best care of it. Every day I want you to go out to take care of this animal, feed it, water it and clean the stable out. Son, this is only a donkey, this is an animal, but it has human values too. Whatever you do, make sure that that barn door is closed at night."

So one night I was not paying attention, just like the member is here right now and I left the barn door open. The next day I walked out to the barn and the donkey was gone.

Sure enough, we went out looking for the donkey and we found it down the road. It had been hit by an automobile. It was too sad the animal was dead, but my father said, "Son, let that be a lesson to you; that animal, that donkey, or that jackass, is going to haunt you the rest of your life." And sure enough he is sitting over there right now.

But to go back to this matter of beaches, I have sat on local councils for the last ten or 12 years—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): We can still hear him braying; they are still braying over there.

Mr. Haggerty: That is right. I have sat on councils the last 10 or 12 years and I have fought this battle at that level.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): That is socialism, watch out.

Mr. Haggerty: I have never seen an NDP nor anybody else come into this picture until they thought they were on the gravy train and this is what you are hoping for.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Haggerty: Well, Mr. Speaker, now that we have got off that subject, it is my duty to pick up the loose ends that the Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough) has left hanging all over the province in the matter of regional government implementation.

To begin at the beginning, the Minister has not defined regional government; it seems to be all things to all men, and to mean something different to each person with whom I talk. For some it is a vast type of government, for others a neat way of consolidating local districts into a two tier arrangement something like our present counties with a little different name. In between, all the shades of opinion into what regional government should be and no guidance at all from Queen's Park to shed some light on the darkness. Consequently a lot of money is going to be wasted in just getting to first base.

In a sense Welland county is a regional government already appropriate to its functions and I think that those who wish to change and enlarge it have the duty to demonstrate to the people of the area just to what advantage further consolidation might be. When the Minister takes the initiative, as he did coming down to Niagara-on-the-Lake and laying down the law, then it is incumbent upon him to spell out all the details of what an essential and an alternative proposal to one that is already in existence and working. The incumbent administration had the mandate of the people and this gives them the advantage over all challengers who must prove to the people that they can do better. What the Minister is doing is not offering any kind of proof that his enlarged domain will be workable and efficient. Rather he is waving his big stick. This not good enough.

Quite frankly, Welland is not Metro Toronto and we can afford to move with less haste than might be the case of the big city. Niagara Falls, Welland, Port Colborne and Welland county, already share certain services and one could see the trend toward larger units of administration. For example, the homes for the aged, the children's aid society, the hospitals, the suburban roads, the county roads, Brock University, the county health unit, and the adult centre for retarded children, mutual fire aid services, welfare and the conservation authority. This seems to work well and most of my constituents do not want change just for the sake of change.

The Minister of Municipal Affairs' principles of reorganization are by no means consistent with the thinking of the Minister of Education, who on April 3, 1968, on page 1599 of Hansard, said with regard to the Mayo report proposal for regional boards of education for the entire peninsula:

When you look at the Mayo report, it does not talk about one county, it talks about a Metro board with almost absolute control of finance, determining the educational programme of the two counties. Of the two counties. Surely what we are suggesting is more responsive to the needs of the people in that part of the province of Ontario, than the recommendations of the Mayo report. I do not think that there is any question about it, Mr. Speaker.

Sure, some of the situations continue to exist in boroughs. They have certain responsibilities, but the fiscal or financial control lies, as I read the report at least, in the hands of the Metro board. This control of both counties involves education situations as well, and I think that the approach that we are taking—and I say this most sincerely with respect to the Niagara Peninsula—really is more responsive to the needs of the people within those communities. It is not perfect, I can see that, but I think, Mr. Speaker, it probably will serve the needs better than the recommendations of the Mayo committee report.

What the Minister is saying is that a region must justify its own size and function in terms of citizens involved in the special circumstances of obtaining the particular locality.

Now let me read from the Globe and Mail on August 8, 1968, in view of the very interesting person, someone who was pushed around by the land consolidation plans of the Minister of Trade and Development, acting in isolation from the report that was being prepared for the Kitchener-Waterloo area. No wonder this gentleman threw up his hands and went back to teaching at Kingston for the balance of the academic year. I refer, of course, to Doctor Fyfe. Here is what the Globe and Mail says:

Kingston: Another important voice has been added to the chorus of academics and planners who disapprove of the suggestions on regional government made by the Ontario committee on taxation.

"The reasons they give in the Smith report for regional government are pretty flimsy," Stewart Fyfe said yesterday, following a hearing of the Legislature's select committee that is studying the report.

Mr. Fyfe is a professor at Queens University local government institute and has been appointed by the province as the commissioner of the Waterloo area local government review. His report is expected this fall.

Certainly there should be enlargement in municipal areas, Mr. Fyfe said. But it should be done for different reasons than those expressed in the Smith report and should be done according to a different set of criteria. The report says that the Smith committee found it necessary to consider regional government for four reasons, most of which dealt with financial problems. They were that regional government:

1. Would provide a more efficient system of raising tax revenue;
2. Is the only means by which equitable tax treatment can be ensured;
3. Would give municipalities greater scope in developing non-property sources of tax revenue;
4. Is at the heart of the debate over municipal reforms, which it calls "the greatest ferment, both practical and theoretical, in the recent history of local government in Ontario."

Mr. Fyfe's immediate reply to the initial question on regional government was: "What is regional government?"

His reaction was similar to that of a large number of academics, including Norman Pearson, chairman of the Centre for Resources Development at Guelph University.

In a variety of speeches since the publication of the report last fall, Mr. Pearson has condemned both it and the government for failing to define what is meant by regional government.

Today, the Minister has not defined that. Under The Municipal Act, cities can pass annual by-laws to keep from payment of taxes those taxpayers who are now benefiting from inter-city services—for example in recently annexed fringes without enjoyment of those services. The Minister has been silent on the division of similar benefits to the rural taxpayers coming under regional government. Are we going to end up paying for city skating rinks and municipal bowling alleys and whatever use there is of them?

There are many questions that arise here, Mr. Speaker. In the counties of Lincoln and Welland, the cities of Niagara Falls, Port Colborne, Welland, and St. Catharines, the debenture debt is some $80 million. One could almost say, accepting this report of the Minister's, are we going to saddle the smaller municipalities with city debts?

Mr. R. M. Johnston (St. Catharines): No.

Mr. Haggerty: Who said that? Oh—this is the first reply we got from the member for St. Catharines.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. R. M. Johnston: You are away out in left field.

Mr. Haggerty: Away out in left field, eh? He was just telling me the other day—he said regional government will work but you have to give it 15 or 20 years and then it will even things out.

Mr. R. M. Johnston: It will serve everybody better.

Mr. Haggerty: In 15 or 20 years everybody will be in the poorhouse on welfare.

Mr. Haggerty moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary) moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.00 o'clock p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1969

The House met at 2.30 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Today we have as our guests, in the Speaker's gallery, members of the Windsor-Walkerville Liberal Ladies Association from Windsor. In the east gallery, again from Windsor, are students from Bellewood public school and from Prince of Wales public school in Hamilton; in the west gallery, are students from King Edward public school, Toronto, and in both galleries, students from Applewood Heights secondary school in Cooksville.

Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer) presented the 19th annual report of the Ontario Racing Commission.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary) presented the following reports:

1. The 1968 annual report of The Department of Tourism and Information and The Department of Public Records and Archives.

2. The annual report of the office of the Registrar General for the year ending December 31, 1968.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East) from the standing private bills committee, presented the committee's sixth report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee would recommend that the following bill be not reported:

Bill Pr1, An Act respecting the City of Ottawa.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education and University Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I indicated some weeks ago to the members of the House that when we received the report of the committee on French-language schools in the province I would make it available to all members. It might be somewhat relevant for some of the discussions this afternoon and evening.

This committee was named in November 1967, Mr. Speaker, and its first task was to prepare legislation for the establishment of French-language secondary schools. Similar legislation was also prepared for French-language elementary schools. The members will recall that it was in the latter part of May last year that I presented this legislation and it was approved by this House on July 3.

I think, Mr. Speaker, one can clearly state that the legislation presented then and referred to in this report, perhaps provides some example for other jurisdictions as it relates to this particular situation.

Since last spring, the committee has been considering other matters such as courses of study, teacher training, educational television, financing and structures at the departmental, regional and local levels. These subjects are discussed in this final report as is the legislation itself.

In the weeks to come, Mr. Speaker, I would hope that all members in the House would have some observations to make on these particular recommendations, which are presently under study by the department. I should also like to take this opportunity to express, on behalf of the government and all members, our appreciation to the committee, which did such an outstanding job in the preparation of this report.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Education. What plans does The Department of Education have to put the findings of the special Toronto committee on school construction into application across Ontario?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the SEF programme, as I guess it is called, was brought about really with some co-operation from The Department of Education. The Department has made a financial contribution to this study, and the officials of the department have been in constant touch with those responsible.

Mr. Nixon: A minimal contribution!

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well, of course, Mr. Speaker, it all depends on what the leader of the Opposition means by minimal, it was not—

Mr. Nixon: In the estimates last year, it did not amount to much.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It was not as much as those contributed, I believe, by the Ford foundation or the experimental laboratories in New York, but nonetheless it was a contribution from the government. All I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that we made a contribution. I shall leave it up to the leader of the Opposition to determine whether it was relevant, significant or not. And, Mr. Speaker, the officials of the department, as I say, are in very close touch with the Metropolitan Toronto school board group who are working with this, and as the results come in from the actual practical implementation of this we shall assess these to see if they can have some province-wide application.

Mr. Nixon: Might I ask the Minister, Mr. Speaker, if he believes, since Metro Toronto has estimated it will save the cost of one full $4 million school in the application of its plans, that it would have immediate application for what we want to do across the province?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to provide the member with a copy of the report if he has not read it. It obviously, I think, relates to the number of schools being built in any geographical location, and the availability of the components. It is a modular type of construction as I am sure he is well aware.

I will leave it for him to assess whether there should not be some practical, should we say, application here in the Metro area to see whether it can be done before isolated school construction begins in other areas of the province. If it can, we are delighted. But at the same time, I think he must realize there has to be a certain amount of further information before this can be determined.

Mr. Nixon: I might just point out, Mr. Speaker, that we have had a policy of wait and see in this matter for some years.

Mr. Speaker: Order! order!

Mr. Nixon: To the Minister of Revenue: Are there any compelling reasons why the Queen's Park branch of the Ontario savings office cannot open at an earlier time on government pay days? How many additional staff members are required in that branch for the operation to be run at maximum efficiency? To what extent are Ontario savings office branches in Metropolitan Toronto understaffed at present? How many additional employees were hired following the last job recruitment programme by the Ontario savings office in Metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. J. H. White (Minister of Revenue): The reasons, and my hon. friend can tell me whether they are compelling or not, are that in the interest of maximizing efficiency and economy, in this as in other branches of government, we have established a staff limit which provides good service nearly all of the time. Of course, we can increase the level of service by engaging more people but I question if the additional cost warrants this change, having in mind that a rush comes on for very short periods during the day, and more particularly, a couple of days a month.

In assessing this, Mr. Speaker, we have to attempt to maximize the efficiency, not only internally so far as the branch is concerned, but externally, so far as lost time for other civil servants is concerned. If I thought that the external diseconomies exceeded the internal economies, I would be very glad to consider an increase of the staff of that branch, but I have no reason at the moment to think so.

Mr. Nixon: I find that compelling.

Hon. Mr. White: Oh yes. Now, point two: An increase of three or four employees would reduce these delays but it would not eliminate them because there does come this sudden surge for a very restricted time, and so there would be some delays even with an increase in staff. Point three: At the present time we are five under complement for all the Metropolitan Toronto branches. In answer to point four: None. Recruitment has been designed to fill vacancies as they develop. There have been three employees hired since the last newspaper advertisement on January 7, this year.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Minister would be prepared to answer this question as a supplementary question, but has he abandoned the thought that there might be a sub-branch opened in this building for the convenience of those working here?

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, I am most reluctant to do that although I recognize that, having moved the branch across the street, there may be some slight inconvenience.

I myself over the years have simply written a cheque and given it to one of the attendants, or sent one of the pages for it. I expect Mr. Speaker would permit this practice to continue, so that the hon. members here would not be inconvenienced in any way. I think that would be a suitable solution if Mr. Speaker were to agree.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. leader of the Opposition has a further question from the other day of the Minister of Trade and Development.

Mr. Nixon: It was two days ago I guess. I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Development, Mr. Speaker, the following questions.

1. Will the Minister give further information on the part played by his department in assisting the relocation of the workers displaced by the closing of Kelvinator in London?

2. When did the Minister contact the London Manpower authorities with regard to the placement of Kelvinator employees?

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party has a similar question for us; perhaps I can hear about them?

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Yes, I have a question for the peregrinating Minister. The Minister stated yesterday that officers of his department have been in constant contact with the Canada Manpower Centre. What is his explanation of the statement of C. L. Wallbridge, in the London Free Press, February 25, that neither the Minister nor any member of his departmental staff has been in touch with the manpower centre during the past three weeks?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer for what the London Free Press has to say except to give you the facts as I have them. Officers of my department have been in touch with the manpower centre in London twice during the last three weeks. The first contact on the matter of Kelvinator Canada Ltd. was made on February 10, 1969. They were then informed that the manpower centre would register workers who would fill in the unemployment insurance forms.

On February 24, 1969, my department was informed by Mr. A. Bates, a centre official, that work opportunities would be available to the displaced Kelvinator employees with certain companies expanding in the London area.

We were also informed on February 24, 1969, that Mr. R. E. Blois, an official of manpower consultative service, a branch of The Department of Manpower and Immigration, Ontario region, Toronto Dominion Centre, had made a proposal to the company and the union for the establishment of a joint manpower planning committee to develop a plan for the adjustment of employees.

He stated that the union had expressed their willingness to participate in such a programme, but the company as of that date had not given an answer. It seems that the statement of Mr. C. L. Wallbridge in the London Free Press, dated February 25, 1969, must be the result of some misunderstanding.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for York South have a further question of the Minister of Highways?

Mr. MacDonald: I have a question of the Minister of Education:

1. Are the education administrative centres, planned for the Toronto area boroughs in this year's capital budget of the Metropolitan Toronto School Board, eligible for provincial grants?

2. If so, is the Minister taking any steps to prevent unnecessary duplication of costly facilities?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there is no grant payable on these administrative facilities.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South has a question of February 20, of the Minister of Highways which has not been asked, with respect to Pelee Island and Hovercraft.

Mr. MacDonald: I think I asked that question.

Mr. Speaker: This was supplementary to the original question, I believe, which was answered. This was put in the next day, I believe.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, my question to the Minister of Highways. I am informed by municipal officials on Pelee Island that no feasibility study has been made by the federal government on the use of Hovercraft to meet the all-year transport needs of the island. The federal authorities have now indicated their willingness to sit down with the province and discuss the whole problem. Two questions:

1. How does the Minister reconcile his earlier answer with this information?

2. Why is the province unwilling to sit down with the federal authorities and discuss the transportation needs of an island which is indisputably part of the province of Ontario?

Hon. G. E. Gomme (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, approximately two years ago, I spoke with the then Minister of Transport, Mr. J. W. Pickersgill, who advised me that officials of his department had considered the matter of Hovercraft generally, and in particular as a possible means of transportation to Pelee Island. My statement in the House on February 18 was based on that conversation.

The officials of The Ontario Department of Highways have investigated the possibility of utilizing this type of transportation generally and, when requested by the residents of Pelee Island, the feasibility of such a service between the mainland and the island.

We find, at least at its present state of development, the Hovercraft is not an economic solution to this particular transportation problem.

Question two is answered already.

In answer to the third question: We are, of course, willing at any time to discuss the technical aspects of transportation to Pelee Island with the federal authorities. But I point out for the information of the hon. member that the matter of subsidizing transportation to this island has been traditionally the responsibility of the government of Canada.

Mr. MacDonald: Like the Indians, you have sloughed it off.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister of Correctional Services has advised me that he has a statement which may also be an answer.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have an announcement which I am sure will be of interest to all hon. members.

Arrangements have been completed by The Department of Correctional Services, The Department of Education, and Sheridan College of Applied Arts and Technology, for part-time use by Sheridan College students of the vocational welding shop facilities at the Ontario Training Centre in Brampton.

This centre provides full time academic and vocational training for young offenders in an open setting. On Monday, March 3, 1969, a number of Sheridan students will begin attending evening classes at the centre in phases of welding related to highway bridge construction. The actual title of the course is Highway Structure Erectors. This course has been set up by Sheridan College in co-operation with The Ontario Department of Labour and the Ontario Roadbuilders Association.

Mr. Speaker, while this particular project may, of itself, appear to be small, it has very wide and important implications. The multiple use of existing facilities is in keeping with the Ontario government's desire to assure the widest possible use of available facilities. Obviously such usage is in the interests of the taxpayer because it avoids costly duplication of facilities and additional expenditures for equipment. This type of programme also helps to expand community involvement with our correctional system.

It is hoped that, when enabling legislation is approved by the federal government, The Department of Correctional Services will be able to arrange for similar sharing of Sheridan College facilities by the young men from our training centre. As hon. members will recall, a pilot project was launched last September in which young men from the training centres attended classes at a local high school during the day and returned to the centre at night. We feel, sir, that these are progressive steps and would hope similar projects can be initiated in the near future at other institutions, where feasible.

Mr. H. Peacock (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, a question of the Minister, by way of clarification. Would the Minister say why he is waiting for Ottawa to fund the reciprocity part of the programme by which the offenders will make use of the college's facilities?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, we have not at present the legal right to permit these students out of our institutions. We have an arrangement presently whereby we can do it by agreement with the federal parole board. It is a clumsy arrangement and we have asked the federal government to provide for this in the new amendments to the Criminal Code presently before the House of Commons which, I understand, received second reading yesterday. Just as soon as it gets final approval and becomes law, that portion of our Correctional Services Act which applies to this particular programme, will come into effect.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Thunder Bay has two questions placed by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Pilkey) to the Prime Minister. Perhaps he would ask them?

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): Yes.

1. Is the Prime Minister scheduled to meet with the mayor of London and other city officials regarding the Kelvinator layoff, and has the Prime Minister offered any provincial assistance to alleviate this situation?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I sent a wire to the mayor of London last week when I learned he had established a sub-committee of the city council to deal with this matter and together with the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Stewart), and the Minister of Revenue, I will be meeting with the mayor tomorrow afternoon. Of course we have not examined the problem yet so I am in no position to answer the second part of the question.

Mr. Stokes: The second question, Mr. Speaker, of the Prime Minister: Would the Prime Minister consider enacting legislation on behalf of tenants similar to The Labour Relations Act enabling tenants to be organized and certified and giving them bargaining powers?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, Mr. Speaker, we have given no consideration to that particular line of action and we have no legislation in view that would accomplish the ends the hon. member mentions, although tenants are free to associate themselves if they so wish to deal with it, as long as they do not do it for some illegal purpose, and get themselves drawn into a conspiracy. They are completely free to band together to take what action they may wish as a group in regards to their landlords.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sandwich-Riverside has a question of the Minister of Health, from the other day?

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich-Riverside): A question of the Minister of Health: Is the Minister giving favourable consideration to the request of the Windsor and Essex county council for exceptional children that modern facilities be provided locally for children with emotional and mental disorders?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are. This question was answered on February 4, Question No. 490.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Parkdale has a question of this Minister.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Health, as follows: Are regulations in effect to govern the sale and distribution of hearing aids? If not, why not? If not, when?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: No. We ran into some legal difficulties, Mr. Speaker, and find that an amendment to the Act would be necessary. Rather than do that, the matter will be covered under The Health Protection Act, which will be presented to the Legislature at this session. The regulations will be ready and will then go into effect as soon as the bill gets Royal assent.

Mr. Trotter: May I ask a supplementary question? I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, why has it taken two and a half years? We were promised this about two and a half years ago.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, the amendment was made a year ago but we found, as I stated, that we did not have the legal right to do what we had intended to do.

Mr. Speaker: I am advised that the ministry is now ready with answers to questions directed to the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs. There is a question from the member for Windsor West and one from the member for Sudbury East. Perhaps they would place them.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my colleague, the hon. Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the questions might be placed first. They have not been asked.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): The Minister is not tuned in—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am trying hard.

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. Minister take his seat until the member asks the question?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sudbury East might please place his question.

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): Mr. Speaker, I do not have my question with me. It was so long in coming I just ignored to bring it down with me.

An hon. member: It was not important anyway, was it?

Mr. Martel: I thought it was.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Martel: It was February 7; you can see why it was so long in arriving.

A question to the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs: At a meeting between the Minister's department and Superior Auto Association approximately two years ago, Superior Auto Association was told that within two weeks of the date of the meeting they would be advised as to whether or not an investigation in gas pricing in Ontario would be held. To date they have not been advised. Why the delay? Has a decision been made to hold an investigation into the pricing practices of the major oil companies?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I am advised that continuing dialogue has taken place and is taking place between The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs and any groups, such as Superior Auto Association, who have a vested interest in gasoline price and policies. Preliminary studies indicate that an investigation into present practices of major oil companies is not warranted at this time.

Mr. Martel: Would the Minister accept a supplementary question?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would appreciate that I am not in a position to answer a supplementary question for the department involved.

Mr. Martel: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Might I enquire of the Minister if he has also the answer to question 775? Perhaps the hon. member for Windsor West would then place his question?

Mr. Peacock: Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister is: Will the Minister give consideration to amending The Ontario Credit Union Act in this session to permit the Ontario Credit Union League to sponsor and construct co-operative and limited-dividend housing, without awaiting the report of the select committee on company law?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I am advised that the implications of a proposal parallel to that which has been suggested in the hon. member's question are currently being studied by The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs staff. Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, I am also informed, that existing legislation covers the contingency raised.

For this purpose, I would refer the hon. member to section 35(1)(b) of The Credit Unions Act which states, and I quote:

The funds of a credit union may be invested in any investment where such investment is approved by a resolution passed by a two-thirds majority of those present at a meeting of the members called for the purpose. But in no case shall a resolution under this clause affect more than ten per cent of the share capital and deposits of the credit union and in no case shall the aggregate of all investments of the credit union under this clause exceed 25 per cent of its share capital and deposits.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough West has a question which has been directed to this Minister.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): For the Minister of Correctional Services, Mr. Speaker: In light of the Minister's answers to the member for High Park (Mr. Shulman) about the laying of charges against men allegedly involved in homosexual activities in the correction system, is it the department's policy that treatment for sexual deviation consists of criminal prosecution?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is, of course, "no". The hon. member is probably confused as to the source of the laying of the criminal charges in these cases. The charges were laid by the police and, of course, it is our duty to assure the appearance in court of the accused to face those charges.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the Minister a supplementary, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate again to say, no, but for the same reason as I gave to the hon. member for High Park, I do not want to get involved in something which may be sub judice. There are certain—

Mr. MacDonald: Would you listen to the question?

Mr. Lewis: This is purely a matter of clarification, Mr. Speaker. May I ask it? The Minister can then choose to consider it if he wishes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister has stated that he would not answer. So far as Mr. Speaker is concerned it can be asked.

Mr. Lewis: What I wanted to ask the Minister, Mr. Speaker, was whether the charge arose from incidents which occurred within the Minister's correctional services institutions?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The answer is, yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: Fine.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa has a question of the Treasurer which the member for Thunder Bay will place.

Mr. Stokes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Does the Treasurer anticipate the inclusion in the retail sales tax, a tax on services, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of February 25? Is the Treasurer aware of the position taken by the select committee on taxation: "We caution the Legislature against the wholesale adoption of the list provided in the Smith committee report"?

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, my answer to part one of the question, in reply to the hon. member and indeed, to all members, is that his question and associated questions will be answered in this Legislature on March 4.

The answer to part two of the question is, yes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkview has a question of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): The question is this, Mr. Speaker, in three parts:

1. What were the specific defects which caused the recent recall of General Motors cars?

2. Is the Minister satisfied that all defective cars in Ontario will be recalled for checking?

3. Will the Minister call officials of General Motors before the standing committee on highways and transport to establish whether the defects were caused by faulty engineering, careless construction, or some other factor?

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, General Motors service inspection programme announced yesterday, involved two groups of cars. The first group numbered about 135,000. These were vehicles equipped with a quadra-jet carburettor having a cam device that, on fracturing, could enable a displaced portion to jam the throttle barrel and hold the valve in a partly open position. There are two cases reported in Canada in which the cam device was found to be cracked.

The second group involved some 400,000 vehicles and related to the exhaust line assembly and mounting. In these cars, if the exhaust line had been moved substantially from its original design position or had deteriorated, it could affect a nearby body plug that, on failure, would permit the intraining of exhaust fumes into the vehicle body.

In reply to the second part: yes, I am satisfied that the procedures now being followed by General Motors Corporation in recalls is thorough and that endeavour will be made to reach every last vehicle owner in Ontario.

The answer to part three is: I think this is the prerogative of the chairman of the standing committee.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Thunder Bay has a question of the Minister of Trade and Development on behalf of the member for Oshawa.

Mr. Stokes: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Minister aware that 350 Ford workers were laid off from the Windsor plant with an additional 450 workers to be laid off some time this year, and that the UAW has made representations to Ford Motor Company to have laid-off workers transferred to the Talbotville plant?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the situation at the Windsor plant of Ford Motor Company of Canada. The operations at this plant are being changed from the manufacture of transmissions and chassis to the production of engines. In the process, 322 workers were laidoff in November last year, and an additional 430 employees are due to be laidoff next month. Since some of the workers laidoff in November have already been recalled or placed elsewhere, there will be a total of about 700 workers on layoff by the end of March this year. About half of these 700 men will receive supplementary unemployment benefits under the collective agreement between the company and the United Auto Workers.

The company hopes that a majority of the laidoff workers will be recalled by the end of the year. In the meantime on the union's representations, the company is exploring possibilities of transferring the laidoff workers to its Talbotville plant. Canada Manpower Centre at Windsor is working closely with the company on the transfer, placement, relocation, retraining and other matters affecting the employees.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wentworth has a question of this Minister?

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Trade and Development: Have arrangements been made to provide sewage and water facilities for the Saltfleet Mountain Housing Development? If so, what are they? If not, when will they be completed and with whom?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, the land-use plan of our holdings in Saltfleet is well underway in co-operation with the township of Saltfleet, the township of Binbrook, the city of Hamilton and the county of Wentworth.

The provision of sewage and water facilities will depend upon agreements between the township of Saltfleet and the city of Hamilton. The proposed agreements are currently before the Hamilton board of control. As soon as these agreements are executed, Ontario Housing Corporation will then negotiate a subdivider's agreement with the municipalities involved.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming has a question of this Minister from the other day?

Mr. D. Jackson (Timiskaming): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a question to the Minister of Trade and Development: When will the Minister answer the question regarding the HOME programme which I asked on December 9, 1968, Hansard page 461?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to give the hon. member some information on this. I do not think it will be as much as I would like to give him but there are certain things that I cannot discuss at the present time.

However, in March, 1967, I was pleased to announce an extension to the HOME plan: the development of lots on a leasehold basis as a means of reducing downpayments for families in Ontario who wish to build their own homes. In answer to an enquiry I indicated it was our intention to assemble some 600,000 lots within one year.

In January last year, at the opening of a prefabricated HOME plan in Woodstock, I again repeated that the Ontario Housing Corporation had plans for putting some 6,000 HOME lots on the market in 30 communities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Ontario Housing Corporation, I believe, is making good progress towards achieving this objective. By November 1968, as the member for Timiskaming has mentioned, 3,316 lots were offered to potential home owners and this figure increased to 3,374 at the year's end. During the same time land was developed to provide 5,896 housing units. Sale of these lots is to be announced as soon as details of final registrations, zoning changes and title transfers are completed. I anticipate this should take place over the next few months.

Land for an additional 8,000 dwelling units in municipalities is in the active planning stage and should be ready when it can be registered and serviced. This will mean that we are now operating in 36 municipalities and we are investigating in a further 14 communities. I believe our progress is very much in line with the plans as we announced them.

Mr. Speaker, I might add a word here about projections of the kind I have just made. Any members who are knowledgeable in land development will know that forecasting the actual time it takes to transform raw land into lots for sale is indeed a very difficult occupation. For example, the proposed expansion of the Toronto International Airport caused us to defer some developments pending clarification of matters pertaining to noise levels in that area. Other aspects of the development, such as negotiations of subdivision agreements with the municipalities concerned, planning considerations and even certain title matters, all may present intangible considerations. Although unforeseen originally, these may have the effect of postponing developments well beyond the anticipated completion date.

Whenever I have replied to a question concerning our future housing programme, I have done so in good faith and have endeavoured, to the best of my ability, to provide useful information for the hon. members. If, for unforeseen reasons, these forecasts do not meet our projections, I can assure the hon. members it is not for want of trying on the part of OHC or myself, it is always my intention to answer the members' questions as accurately as I can forecast with the information available at the time. However, OHC has no more privileges than any other developer. If a municipality or an individual interferes or delays their plans, we have to keep trying and dispose of these difficulties with, I hope, patience and understanding of the other man's position.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sandwich-Riverside has a question of the Attorney General.

Mr. Burr: Will the Attorney General take whatever steps are necessary to protect the interests of the city of Windsor, the Windsor utilities commission, and those citizens who have had to place liens against the Sirrah Company which is now planning to put Peche Island up for auction in Detroit on May 27?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, all I know of this matter is what I have read in the newspapers, and it would appear to be entirely a civil matter. I know of no law or statute which would enable the Attorney General to interfere in such matters or take any part. The question indicates that liens have been filed against the property. If this is so the property could not be disposed of without disposition of those lien claims.

I would expect that, as I feel certain this is a civil matter, the parties will consult their own solicitors and obtain advice. It is not a field in which the Attorney General can, I think, interfere.

Mr. Burr: A supplementary question: Is there any danger that at this auction in New York an American purchaser or an American company might acquire the property without discharging the liens in full?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, this verges very close to asking for legal opinion. While I am quite glad to do the best I can, I would suggest, of course, that the parties get legal advice from their own solicitors. If liens have been registered, as the question indicates, and the proper action is taken to follow them up and they are pursued to proof of the claim and to judgement, then whoever acquires the property would take it subject to those claims, properly proven and recorded. That is the protection for the individual.

Mr. Burr: A supplementary: Would the Minister mean at full value, necessarily?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I cannot guarantee that the property would be sufficient in any event to satisfy all the claims. No one could do that. It may be worth ten times the claims against it or it may be worth less than the amount.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lakeshore.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. To the Attorney General:

Can the Attorney General advise the House why the presiding judge excluded the press and radio media from a recent three-day hearing in Hamilton concerning five men jointly charged with capital murder? Does such action by the presiding judge not interfere with the freedom of press media?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, section 451, subsection J, of the Criminal Code provides that a judge, or a justice, presiding at a preliminary enquiry, may exclude the public from the hearing if he feels it to be in the interests of justice to do so, or in the interests of the public. He may exclude the public and I would take it that includes the press. The question asks why. I do not know why; I have not discussed it with anyone concerned with the hearing. But I would take it that the justice decided that it was in the interests of the administration of justice and in the interest of the public in the particular function he was carrying out, and under that section he exercised his discretion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wentworth has a question of the Minister of Highways.

Mr. Deans: Yes, Mr. Speaker. To the Minister of Highways:

Have all the negotiations and/or expropriations been completed for accesses and overpasses presently being constructed on the Queen Elizabeth Way in Saltfleet?

Hon. Mr. Gomme: Mr. Speaker, I assume that the hon. member is referring to DHO contract 68-05, which covers that portion of the Queen Elizabeth Way between Lake Street east to the Glover Road. This contract is under way and all property acquisitions have been completed with the exception of 11, and negotiations are continuing with the owners of these properties.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Port Arthur has a question of the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. R. H. Knight (Port Arthur): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This question is for the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Will the Minister reconsider the matter of a plebiscite on a proposed incorporation of a new Lakehead city, in view of the following recent developments: Unions representing over 6,000 men have passed resolutions requesting a vote. The mayor of Fort William, Ernest Reid, representing 49,000 citizens, has changed his earlier position and now demands a vote. The distinguished MP for Fort William, Hubert Badanai, has stated publicly he will ask the Premier to intercede on behalf of the people for a vote. Reeve Tom Tronson and his council of Neebing have launched a hue and cry for a vote. Both Lakehead newspapers have demanded a vote, in editorials. A petition now being circulated has been signed by more than 10,000 Lakehead taxpayers requesting a vote.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order! The hon. member is not asking a question now. He is either stating a fact, if it is a fact, or it is a preamble.

Mr. Knight: I have said "the following", Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: That is quite out of order. The Speaker was not in his office this morning unfortunately. He must take responsibility for it, but he was not there this morning, and consequently the whole of the question after the word "developments" is out of order. Now, if the hon. member wishes to place his question again and stop at the word "developments", then I would agree that the question is in order.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I find this extremely embarrassing. Perhaps I should make it a point of personal privilege. In due respect, I took the time to submit this question early enough today so that it would be checked by your office. It was returned to me with the idea that it was all right. And now my entire question, my manner of asking it, my purpose for asking it, has been completely—

Mr. Speaker: Undoubtedly, because the purpose in asking it and the question in its entirety is out of order, and unquestionably so. Therefore, the member's purpose has been frustrated—

Mr. Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knight: I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you—

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. leader and the hon. member will wait until I have finished, please. Actually, I have no fault to find with the members of my staff who passed this question through, because we have been in the habit of allowing these. I have now looked over the question, and I find that it becomes not a question, not a statement of fact, but a debate, an argument. Therefore, I would suggest that the only part of the question that is in order is as follows:

Will the Minister reconsider the matter of a plebiscite on the proposed incorporation of a new Lakehead city in view of recent developments?

If that were asked then I think there is no question that it is in order. Now, I will be glad to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition who has a point.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to accept your ruling. I would just draw to your attention that it is often the prerogative of government Ministers in giving background information that substantiates the importance of the question being asked.

I submit to you, sir, that the list of pieces of information that have been presented before us by the hon. member for Port Arthur now does just that and, in fact, would put the answer that is presented by the Minister in a context that is much more meaningful than the restrictions than you are placing on it.

Mr. Speaker: One of the unfortunate things, of course, as the hon. leader of the Opposition will realize, is once we depart from the written rules, which we have done in order to have this question period, then we are always in the position where neither the member asking the question, nor Mr. Speaker, knows whether the question as worded is in order or not and certainly the rules as laid down, the rules of the House, would not allow such a question. In my own personal opinion, the question would be sufficient leaving out "following" after the word "development."

The hon. member has now read all his question except the last three parts; I would think that any publicity which he wished to obtain he has now obtained, and I would think that—

Mr. Nixon: I do not think that is required.

Mr. Speaker: Well, the hon. member said that this was destroying his purpose and, if his purpose is to obtain information, then he asked the hon. Minister a question. It is the hon. Minister's prerogative then to answer the question, if that is all the question is for.

If the question is for some other purpose—whether I have misinterpreted it or not—then, of course, I could understand why it was so worded. If it is to obtain information, then it is a perfectly good question, it has been asked, and the Minister can reply.

Now I was about to say that he probably has obtained the purpose of his question, but since it did go through my office and since he has been able to ask the greater part of it, I would have no objection to the hon. member completing his question. But if so, and there are any outcries from the hon. member for Fort William, I would suspect that we might have another problem on our hands. I will leave that to the House when the time comes, because I can see quotations here from the constituency of another hon. member; therefore, I anticipate we would have some difficulty.

Mr. Nixon: There are no rules.

Mr. Speaker: We have customs. We have customs.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! We have customs which have broadened and in some cases supplanted our rules, and they work very well. Therefore, I would suggest that if the hon. member wishes to complete his question, he has the permission of the Chair to do so and I would ask that he be allowed to complete it.

Mr. Nixon: Well, with great respect, sir, if you will permit me on a point of order: I would submit to the Speaker, and as I say with great respect, that it is hardly incumbent upon him to comment on the motives that may be in the mind of the hon. member when he puts his question. I think surely it is incumbent upon us all to accept the fact that the question is put for information and I hope that we can proceed to that point soon.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. leader is quite correct. I apologize and withdraw any remarks which I may have made that may seem offensive to the hon. member or his leader. I suspect, though, that the reaction would indicate that the ordinary person's reading of this would indicate that it was not a request for information or it would have stopped at the word "developments". That would have been my ruling if I had dealt with it carefully in view of the rules.

Now I have suggested that the House might have allowed the hon. member to proceed to read his question and then we will deal with what arises out of it in due course. Perhaps the hon. member would wish to go on. He had finished number four, I think, when the outcry arose.

Mr. Knight: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, and I accept the apology. We were up to number six, Mr. Speaker.

6. A petition now being circulated has been signed by more than 10,000 Lakehead taxpayers requesting a vote—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I will have to go on the record as objecting to this. This is where the business of this House breaks down; the member is being permitted to do something when he is out of order, and if we are to conduct a question period in this fashion, I would suggest to you that we will destroy its effect.

Now here we are at half past three and we have spent ten or 15 minutes wrangling over a procedural matter when I think we all know what the rule and the custom is. If there is a question it should be asked and answered; speeches are not allowed during the putting of a question.

Mr. Nixon: Again, if I may, Mr. Speaker.

We are quite prepared on this side to abide by your ruling, which was that the question be truncated after the word "developments". I am sure my colleague from Port Arthur will accept that as long as the hon. Minister is prepared to give us a reasonable answer—a thoughtful, reasonable answer.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. Minister, then, would take the question as ending at "developments" and answer it. The hon. member for Port Arthur has a point of order.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, in connection with the point of order of the hon. Premier, I sat here and waited for almost an hour listening to questions from other members of this House; I did not complain about their questions. The other point, Mr. Speaker, is that you yourself had this question in hand for 45 minutes before I began reading it.

Mr. Speaker: Unfortunately Mr. Speaker has other things to do, when he reaches the Chair and the House opens, than to check over the questions. I have already admitted that it was Mr. Speaker's difficulty today in not being in his office that caused this problem now instead of earlier, but I suspect that we would have had the same discussion in any event if I had ruled the question as out of order prior to its being put in the House. So it is just as well that it should have been dealt with on the floor of the House.

With respect to the hon. member's point of personal privilege—it was not a point of order—as to his waiting. He will realize, of course, that business in the House must be conducted in an orderly manner, and on Tuesdays and Thursdays I have been taking the course that we should ask them of the ministries in the order of seniority; it has worked very well. The hon. member happened to ask his question of one of the less senior members of the ministry, and therefore, he was obliged to wait until we reached that point in the proceedings.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister answered "no" as far as I can understand.

Mr. Lewis: What is the meaning of less senior?

Mr. Speaker: That is good parliamentary language; less senior in order of appointment. Has the hon. member for Fort William a point of order?

Mr. J. Jessiman (Fort William): As all these questions were directed to Fort William, I would like to inform the member for Port Arthur that Port Arthur voted for amalgamation—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Jessiman: The Liberal associations voted for amalgamation—

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member will take his seat when the Speaker is on his feet. The hon. member for Fort William is quite out of order and I anticipated that this would arise from this.

Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The second order, consideration of the propositions of the government of Ontario submitted to the continuing committee of officials on the Constitution as of December 1968, sessional paper number 83.

CONSTITUTION DEBATE

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this order was put on the order paper so that we might have an opportunity to discuss the events of two weeks ago, the last federal-provincial constitutional conference. In opening the debate, I would like to make what may prove to be some rather extended remarks about that conference.

The members will recall that it is the third constitutional conference of the last 18 months. In November 1967, we in Ontario were privileged to play host to the Premiers of the other provinces, together with some observers from the federal government, where we initiated this debate and discussion about constitutional matters in our country.

This was followed by a conference in February 1968, which in turn was followed by this conference of February 1969. The question most often asked me since those days of two weeks ago is, in fact, what did we accomplish? I think if anyone expects us to rewrite the Constitution of this country in a relatively short time they are bound to have some feelings of disappointment at what was accomplished at this conference. On the other hand, if you look at it in the proper context and as the third in a series of conferences in which we are laying the groundwork for amendments should they be necessary—to our constitution, I think we can all take heart that we did have some really quite extensive success in this conference. It was another step towards the development of some new kind of federalism in Canada. I think the atmosphere that came out of the conference was good. The discussion took place in an atmosphere of desire for co-operation—certainly wide participation by everyone there—and the real difficulty, of course, when you start out to do such a thing as amending a constitution, is to find the means whereby you are going to do it.

We started a year ago in February in Ottawa from what might be termed a standing start, and certain mechanics were developed, which I will speak about as I go along, and this conference two weeks ago was nothing but a continuation of that process.

We might take a look at the machinery we have established during the last year. At the conference in February 1968, I would say the greatest accomplishment was that the conference took place and that there was an agreement among those present that the task which the conference set itself was meaningful and one that was accepted by all the participants.

The next thing we had to do at that meeting was, as I say, to devise the technical and mechanical means by which we would achieve our end. A continuing committee of officials on the Constitution was created and, of course, the first task that committee was given, when the leaders of the various governments broke up, was to devise a suitable method of tackling the whole question of constitutional review. After a good deal of discussion among themselves, those officials from all governments in Canada, and I came to the conclusion that the proposition method which I have mentioned before in this House would be perhaps a good place to start.

The propositions forming the basis of this debate this afternoon are those submitted by the government of Ontario to the continuing committee of officials. I can only repeat what I said here when I tabled those propositions:

They do not necessarily represent the government's position at this stage of the game when the debate and the dialogue are just commencing. It would be extremely difficult, I think, to take a firm position because inevitably our thoughts in connection with constitutional change are bound to be altered by the ideas and the arguments put forth by various other people who are participating in the conference and in the whole process. I think the idea of the proposition basically is to stimulate discussion, to get out on the table various matters that might be considered. Some, of course, will be of much more importance to certain people than others, but nonetheless they will stimulate discussion, they will stimulate free expression of views and ideas about those matters that might be changed either slightly or completely, or those matters in our present constitution that might simply be left alone.

So, as the propositions were received, the committee was able to take them as submitted. It divided them into groups so that they could carry on a general discussion on such topics as the object of a constitutional review, why we are conducting it; the objective of Confederation; what we are after in our federated system of government, and what are the basic principles of our confederation; what about the position of the official languages in Canada; what about the very important matter of fundamental human rights; the Constitution of the central government; the Constitution of the provincial government; there was some preliminary discussion concerning the judicial system and also that very important matter, the distribution of powers.

We as a government will have a good deal to say as time goes on on this subject. So, this was the point at which we had arrived just prior to the meeting two weeks ago. During the past year I would say very valuable groundwork was laid by that continuing committee of officials. The initial stage of what might be termed a broad analysis of the problem had been completed and we are now moving ahead into the areas that are going to require much deeper study, and a much greater examination in very fine detail. So, at this last conference and for the purpose of moving the whole process along, there were several committees of Ministers established, and I will deal with what has been referred to these as I go through my impressions of what we were able to do at this last conference.

I would point out to you that the establishment of the ministerial committee does not in any way detract from the function of the continuing committee of officials. Those men will continue their studies and the work they have begun. On the other hand, there was the feeling by some of the provincial leaders at any rate that we should not leave too much of this detailed work to non-elected officials. In other words, the actual work that is being done should be undertaken to the greatest possible degree by those who represent our people directly. We accept that point of view, we think there is a place for both, and I agree personally with the idea. I like the idea of the ministerial committees in order that we may have a close scrutiny on a continuing base. In other words, if we meet only once, twice or three times a year and receive reports only from officials, it does seem to me that we do not have the close contact we want with the development, or the ideas for change that are bound to be brought forward.

I might table the agenda, I do not know whether the agenda for this conference has ever been made an official document of this House.

From the agenda it will be seen just how complex some of these things are. It started with opening statements. I might say that it was suggested that in future conferences, we might dispose of those opening statements. I do not know whether I necessarily agree with that or not, it all depends how frequent are the meetings. If you are meeting with frequency, yes, I would say, dispose of them. If not, there is a time when one likes an opportunity to present the broad picture of what one is thinking.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am sorry, I did not get that comment from the hon. member.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I do not entirely agree. You can see, Mr. Speaker, why we should have a debate. Obviously there is a wide range of opinion on how these conferences should be conducted.

In any event I would say this, if we are to meet with any degree of frequency I would dispense with the opening statement. I have gone to so many of these conferences. I remember days when the opening statements were supposed to be restricted and secret until delivered, and yet they all went out the back door on Sunday night if the conference opened on Monday. It became pretty farcical. I must say that is precisely why I wanted the conference to be opened to television and the press and radio, because over the years, the control of the release of information has been one of the great games of federal-provincial conferences, which really had nothing to do with the conference itself—just one-upmanship at its worst, as far as I am concerned. If you move in the cameras, the press and the radio microphones, then you remove all necessity for this eternal desire to get one step ahead of your colleagues at the conference.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): The Prime Minister might do that for the Legislature on a permanent basis.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I do not think we have much trouble, Mr. Speaker, on that subject in this House.

But in any event, I will not go through this, other than to mention just one or two other things. The objects of Confederation are basic principles; official languages; fundamental rights; distribution of powers including constitutional aspects, taxation and spending powers; reform of institutions linked with federalism—that includes the Supreme Court and the Senate; regional disparities, amending procedures and provisional arrangements; and mechanism of federal-provincial relationships.

When you read that list and you consider that this is a three-day conference, you can well understand that it became very, very difficult to do anything that might be termed meaningful as far as depth of approach to any one subject was concerned. That, I think, basically is the reason why the conference turned to the method of establishing ministerial committees to deal with these matters in some depth.

I have mentioned the fact that it was open to the public through television. I was very interested in the coverage we got and the people who were interested enough to watch and take some interest. After all, the people who watched on television are the people who are going to be ultimately affected by whatever we do or whatever we do not do, for our errors of commission or omission. I was delighted that so many people were interested and did watch what was going on and took advantage of the opportunity to make up their own minds as to what they think the direction of their country should be.

I think one of the interesting things in the days leading up to the conference was the obvious difference in approach of various parts of the country. In certain parts of Canada it seemed the important item was such matters as linguistic rights, fundamental rights, the Bill of Rights, the formalities, perhaps, if I might put it that way, of our constitution. Other parts of the country wanted to deal with economic disparities and various economic matters.

Our approach as a province was simply that we had to discuss constitutional matters, linguistic matters, fiscal and monetary matters simultaneously, if we were ever to achieve the objective we were after. We take the position that it is impossible to separate these matters out and to deal with them individually and apart from one another. Basically, we must decide what Canada really means to us, what we want it to be. If we are to make changes, we must have an objective in mind as to what the result of the changes we make, will be.

I think we all agree that we are looking for a stronger Canada but the particulars of how that is to be brought about and what it is, in fact, to be is not exactly clear and I would suggest to the hon. members that there is a wide variance of opinion in our country and I think this was made obvious at this conference.

I would just say in regard to this, that despite the fact that there are so many conflicting points of view, the one course of action it seems to me that is not open to us is to do nothing. Even though it may appear difficult and even though we are unable to get agreement, that is no reason for us to overlook some of the difficulties in the country. We must respond to the tasks that lie ahead of us.

These are really our great national priorities today; where we are going fiscally and economically, linguistic rights across the country and constitutional change. These are the major national problems facing the country today and they must be faced and they must be treated and solved together, they cannot be separated and dealt with, apart from one another.

I think too we must recognize—and I think this also was borne out by the conference—that constitutional change is a matter that has to be dealt with in a very deliberate and thoughtful manner. You must be able to assess the ultimate effect of everything you do before you do it. It is not something you can rush into lightly because the side effects are many and varied and often not all completely thought about. It is not a question of simply tampering with our constitution, we must make changes that will stand the tests of time. At the same time, while it is necessary to proceed with some deliberation, I would suggest the one thing we cannot do, is to take forever.

There are elements in our country that are looking for change, they are looking for redress from what they consider to be wrongs done them over the years. You just simply cannot temporize with that either and take an undue length of time to recognize, to meet and to cure these things.

Perhaps too, it is important that our people should understand that as we enter this second century of our life as a country, we are prepared, that the leaders of the governments, the leaders of the parties in the governments are prepared to meet these problems and take them on regardless of their difficulty.

I think we will need a very high degree of political skill and political sense, if we are to achieve our ends, because we are embarking upon the age-old political problem of squaring the circle or reconciling the irreconcilable points of view, and this, of course, does require a reasonably delicate touch.

We feel that such changes as we make may, very well be made and may be easier to make, particularly in the constitutional field, if we can do it against the background of security for our people. That is why we advocate that some of the immediate problems must be dealt with as well as some of the long-range problems.

I would suggest to the hon. members that a man who cannot get proper housing for his wife and his children has very little interest at this stage of the game in what might happen to the Supreme Court of Canada or what the representation in the Senate may be.

On the other hand, if we do meet the immediate problems that face our country, then against that background we will produce an atmosphere and a climate in which we will be able to attack these other very delicate questions and come up with the proper answers.

So, this is the approach that we took, Mr. Speaker, as a government. Some of these matters that are on the agenda were put there at our request. In the beginning we really were not going to discuss anything concerning taxation, spending powers, things of that nature, but we asked for it. Some other provinces did as well, of course. Thus we were able to deal with all these things together.

Now, what really are we after, to get at this objective? I think the basic question in its most simple form is, "what kind of federalism do we want in this country. What kind of a federal system do we want?" This is the basic question to which we are addressing ourselves.

In commenting specifically on this point, I would like to mention three of the subjects which were raised at the conference; the first concerns the distribution of powers and fiscal responsibility; the second concerns fundamental rights and the third concerns the place of the two languages in Canada.

If we look back to the beginning, I think we all realize why the Fathers of Confederation chose the federal system as opposed to the unitary system. It is based on the physical size of the country, on the enormous regional differences there are which must be recognized; widely varying local traditions and interests across Canada; the country itself and its people does not lend itself to the unitary form of government, even though perhaps that is the most efficient.

I suppose, the most efficient government in the world is a dictatorship where eventually all decisions reach one spot and then you can get decisions in a hurry. But that is not what we want. Federalism is not the easiest form of government to devise, from an operational point of view, and I think we are all aware of this when we just watch what happens in our country, a federal country.

However, I think we all agree that federalism is indisputably the only type of political organization that would be acceptable to the people of this country, so, if you make that basic premise you move on from there inevitably to the point of what type of federalism it is that we want.

I would say, at the outset, any country that is organized federally must decide what powers, or perhaps a better term would be responsibilities, are to be allocated to the central government, and to the regional governments which make up the federation.

In addition, there are mutual responsibilities which do not necessarily belong to one area of government or the other, and which must be shared, or, in terms of the constitutional lawyer, those powers that are concurrent.

In 1867 this country was put together at a time of national crisis. It was a threat from outside the country that made the Fathers of Confederation gather together to create one unit which would be strong enough to stand external pressure. Of course those pressures came from the United States, the civil war was just completed, and there were various rumblings going on. If you read the press of those days it is interesting to see how great the threat was as reported in the local press, not only from a straight military point of view but also from an economic point of view.

Therefore, the existence of the country itself was threatened from outside and the federation was formed in order to resist those threats. But it is interesting to see, even though those stresses were there, that they still decided in their wisdom to have a federated form of government which recognized the regional differences in the country.

Now, today, we are not subjected to the same external strains as were our forefathers. We have other problems, and I think that in this change of circumstance lie some of the problems that we face in Canada today. We do not have the external pressures upon us that existed a hundred years ago. We are, perhaps, much more secure as a unified nation or country now. I have made it a standard rule not to use that word, nation. It has been so widely misunderstood in this country in the last few years. In any event, we do rightly, of course, worry about preserving our country. But it seems to me that the great problem we face today and that we must look at in thinking where our country is going and what it will become, is what we are able to do to build a better society within the country. This is our endeavour now, this is the root objective of our federalism—to create a better society, a better place for people to live.

Essentially, this shift in emphasis from national preservation to the development of, and the improvement in the quality of our own lives and the lives of our people, is really at the root of some of our problems. It makes it easier for me, at least, to understand some of the things that are going on in the country when I think in these terms.

When we look at The British North America Act we must be driven to the point of view that the Fathers of Confederation showed very great foresight in their division of powers and responsibilities between the various levels of government. These responsibilities are still with us; they have not changed.

What has changed in this period of time, and what our forefathers could not possibly anticipate, is the weight of responsibilities and the priorities of these responsibilities. So, what we must do at the present time is to recognize and respect the existing constitutional obligations we have. We must make sure that each government has sufficient money to meet the constitutional responsibility it has to its own people, and to get on with the job of living and running the country.

We have to make this present Constitution work in order that we may have time to change it if we think it must be changed. Therefore, we cannot cast aside the difficulties that are presently arising in the interpretation of our Constitution simply because there is some form of change in the air.

The hon. member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Gaunt), who is not in the House, yesterday made some comments in the Throne Debate concerning my own approach to federalism. I can only say that I personally am absolutely certain that Canada cannot survive her function without a very strong central government. I am also equally certain that the country cannot survive without strong and vigorous provincial governments which recognize the wide diversity of life and economic circumstance and tradition in our country.

We must divide our powers so that both governments can know what their responsibilities are, and discharge them, and any effective distribution of powers must take into account several other particular points. I have about six of them here which I would like to deal with.

I think powers must be allocated according to the functional criterion that the government most capable of doing the job efficiently should have the responsibility. Now that is a broad statement and, of course, there might be certain times when it would not be 100 per cent applicable, but as a basic principle I think it is sound.

Secondly, I think we must respect in our country the regional differences and the regional preferences. We suffer from an enormous amount of geography in Canada. We have great regional differences, and as we allocate power between the various levels of government we must take into account that there are real variations in structure. There are real variations in need from one part of the country to another, and I would suggest that unilaterally imposed take it or leave it attitudes, will never be successful in Canada.

Thirdly, when delineating responsibilities I think we must be careful not to give too much weight to some vague, but perhaps appealing, activities of a national nature, such as scientific research, and defence, at the expense of what may appear to be more pedestrian but, nevertheless, very important matters, such as social services and the relief of poverty.

In other words, we must keep our eyes on the bread and butter issues as well as cloud nine, if I can put it that way. We must ensure that we do permit funds to be available to each order of government so that it may carry out its responsibility. This has been a point I have been stating for some considerable time; I think it is worth talking about.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): About the only one the Premier talked about in Ottawa as far as I can discern.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, if that is all the hon. member discerned he was not watching very carefully.

Mr. Sopha: The Premier talked about money for three days.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Then you did not hear. As I go along, I will repeat for you exactly the position we took on fundamental rights and a whole series of things. The Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) will speak on it later and I am quite sure the Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) will also have something to say.

Mr. Sopha: The Toronto Daily Star called you a money grubber.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The Toronto Daily Star has called me quite a few things in a period of years, and maybe it will again. But they are entitled to their opinion, just as you are.

Now, I would like to expand on this fourth point. You can use these terms, "money grubbers", and you can push off to one side one of the most important factors for the change in this country today by trying to sweep this point under the rug. I claim that by the use of fiscal spending power you can do more to change the face of this country—what it is like, how it will function. You can do more with that weapon than you will ever do by sitting down, writing words on a piece of paper and enshrining them in a constitution.

It is the practical aspect of constitution-changing, that is what fiscal spending power is. That is why we think it is very fundamental, that this particular point should not be downgraded by calling it money grubbing, making it not very respectable as a part of the debate on what is happening to our country. I would just reiterate that in our opinion it is one of the most important weapons that can be used. I will not use the word weapons, I will use the word instrument. It is one of the most important instruments that can be used in changing our country from what it is to what somebody else might want it to be. And I think we all want to be in on those discussions, and we want it aired fully so that at least we understand and know what is happening.

Mr. Sopha: Are you mostly nettled by the fact that you have to pay your own bills for a change?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, I am not in the least bit nettled, by that or anything else. In any event, I will go on to point out that we must also bear in mind that there is only one taxpayer. If you want a grade nine statement, it is that statement of, "Well, you go and raise your money and I will go and raise mine." That has got to be the most puerile thing I have ever heard.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): We will see what kind of puerile response we get on March 4 with the Budget.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, wait for it. It will be here on Tuesday.

Mr. Sopha: You are going to grab $175 million—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Wait for it.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): The hon. member would not want us to money grub, would he?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Despite the efforts to reduce this very important matter to something that should not even be talked about, we feel it is very necessary that we match revenues with responsibilities. If you want one level of government and if it wants all the revenues maybe it should take over all the services in certain areas.

But I do not think that in 1969 we can go along any longer saying, you operate behind your brick wall and I will operate behind my brick wall, but we will both get our hands into the same pockets for revenue," because I do not think the people of this country, as taxpayers, will put up with it and this is the point we make.

Mr. Nixon: There is a $700 million hole in the brick wall—that is what is coming to the government from Ottawa this year.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: What is the $700 million?

Mr. Sopha: That is what you get every year.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, all right, if you want to discuss that, I know one province getting—about 22 per cent of the revenue this province spends comes from Ottawa. Another province derives 62 per cent of its revenue from the federal government.

Mr. Nixon: And unfortunately a higher tax rate—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: That is all right. The hon. leader of the Opposition raised the point about the $700 million—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, it might be interesting if we put the $700 million that comes back to Ontario up against what the taxpayers of Ontario pay into Ottawa. Then—

Mr. Nixon: The Prime Minister is disclaiming his responsibilities.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am not disclaiming any responsibilities. I am just not allowing this red herring to be thrown into this debate. The leader of the Opposition is going to say $700 million—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Nixon: The Prime Minister should not forget that he is a Canadian first.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Speaker, being a Canadian first does not mean that I was not elected by the people of Ontario to look after them, and I propose to do that. We will discharge our responsibilities as Canadians—

Mr. Sopha: So will we.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: —and we will also discharge our responsibilities to the people who put us here.

Mr. Sopha: So will we, to 60 per cent of the electorate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: In any event, Mr. Speaker, I would simply say that a great deal of the trouble we have had and the difficulties we have been in during the last few years have been caused by disparities in the distribution of taxing powers. Personally, I do not think that the spending responsibilities, the distribution of powers in The British North America Act of 1867, require any very large change. I think that we could live very nicely with it. There are charges, of course, and there are positions other parts of the country take, but by and large we have not any great quarrel with the distribution of powers in The British North America Act.

But we do say that those responsibilities that are given to us—whether you are responsible for governing this province or whether we are, it matters not—whoever does it has to have the sinews of war. He has to have the muscle to carry out the responsibilities he is given under the Constitution. And if you have any hope of ever getting across on this side of the House, I should think you would join us in this argument so that you would be in a position to run the show properly when you got here.

Mr. Nixon: We make our own decisions in our party.

An hon. member: They do not care; they will never be here.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: In any event I am rather interested in this subject and we will go on—if the leader of the Opposition just will not mention any more $700 million figures we will not maybe have as many diversions, but since we are—

Mr. Sopha: Next Tuesday it will be $875 million.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: They are very impatient, Mr. Speaker, to hear the Treasurer's Budget, but in the fullness of time we will lay the affairs of the Treasury before this House.

Since World War II there have been several devices developed to distribute tax revenue. The bulk of the revenue being distributed comes from personal income tax. We have developed a very complex system of equalization payments to which Ontario, I might say, has always subscribed. Equalization payments simply mean that you collect from the wealthier provinces and you distribute it to the less wealthy provinces in order that you may have some standard across our country. Of course, this is absolutely necessary if to be a Canadian is to have meaning, regardless of what part of the country you inhabit. We have always agreed with this. We do not agree with some of the forms that equalization takes. We think equalization should be all in a lump sum so we all know what we are doing and so we will not get into some of the anomalies of equalization or paying, for instance, to national averages where you have high-cost provinces and low-cost provinces, and one province may be making money on a plan where it is costing another province. Those sort of things we do not agree with. That is built-in equalization in certain plans; but the principle of equalization we have always supported and always agreed with.

Shared cost programmes, conditional grants, block grants—all these methods of distributing tax have been developed since World War II. All of them, I might say, include a high element of federal control, and they are very, very difficult for provinces to resist. In the first place, the province's residents have supplied the money that is being distributed and therefore there is a pressure as the Opposition is trying to exert on this government today, to go into the programme whether you want it or not because your residents are paying for it and therefore, you had better get in and get your money back.

Now this is not really a very rational basis on which to go into a programme.

An hon. member: Not a good way to run—

Mr. Sopha: It is certainly not a reflection—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Pardon?

Mr. Sopha: It is certainly not a reflection of our views.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The member keeps talking about this $175 million. We will hear what he has to say in the Budget debate.

Mr. Sopha: Will the Prime Minister wait?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Oh, I will be here. I will be here. And I will do my best to listen. But as I say, these programmes are very hard for the provinces to resist because if you refuse to participate in the programme you may be denying and refusing the benefits which you are in fact paying for. So with pressures like that you may take on a programme that you really do not believe is the proper one for you or your people. But you take it on because—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Against one's better judgment.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Against one's better judgment.

Mr. H. Peacock (Windsor West): The Prime Minister might as well tell us why—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: However, the other point is this—

Mr. MacDonald: Why does the Prime Minister not announce the introduction of Medicare?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Just a minute. I am speaking theoretically. The Budget will come. I am giving the background of why this government took the positions it did at the federal-provincial conference. We wanted a debate about that conference and I am trying to play my small and insignificant part in that debate. If one accepts all these programmes without reservation when they are offered by the federal government, of course, it leads to complete disruption of provincial planning and it leads to complete disruption of the provincial priority setting. Because always you have to put up so much of the money in order to share in what the federal government offers. Then if you haven't sufficient revenue to do everything you have to establish a priority according to someone else's dictate—and not your own. You have to stop going ahead on one programme in order to take advantage of another when it might not be what you wanted to do at all.

This has been referred to in some circles as Ottawa using its spending power to buy jurisdiction. It buys its way into the area of constitutional jurisdiction that is not, that does not, belong to them. This approach I am mentioning, and this sort of provincial financial relationship conflicts with the principle I tried to enunciate, that revenue should match standing responsibilities. Then we would reach the position where a government would be completely responsible for what it did because it would be its own decision and nobody else's. Some of our decisions really are not ours at all. The principle I am expounding—namely revenues corresponding to responsibilities—implies in the federal system, a degree of equality and partnership, but when you get into the other aspect of shared-cost programmes, you get into really a master-servant relationship and you destroy the partnership which must be the true estimate of a proper federal system.

I think that we all agree that the federal government should have as one of its powers, the right to raise money across the province and then across the country and then to distribute that unconditionally in order to equalize living conditions and opportunities and the standard of living across the country. I think that we would agree too, that the position taken by the federal government presently that well established shared programmes which had been established in the field of provincial jurisdiction, perhaps should be turned over to the provinces and phased out. We would put a condition on that, of course. We would want to know when they are phased out that we have tax sources to support them, and not what is considered to be adequate. We do not want the federal government to phase out just to get rid of the responsibility of the programme and to build up a little surplus so it can start another one.

If the federal government is to phase out of these shared cost programmes, well, we will agree with this if they are mature programmes and have been built up to the point where they are functioning properly. But we want to see the tax or see what will come with them as well. Then, of course, if we look into the future, I hope that we will never have the creation of any more tax sharing, cost sharing, shared cost programmes unless there is clear agreement and clear consultation—and by consultation I do not mean a visit where you are told what is going to happen. I mean consultation in the pure sense of the word where you state your objections, which can vary from region to region, from province to province, and where you reach a mutually, agreeable position even though it may require some compromise on both sides.

Much of our consultations in the past—and I throw no stone today when I merely state it as fact—have not been, in fact, consultations at all. It has been a question of this is what we are going to do, take or leave it, and because you happen to meet in the same room that is termed a consultation.

Now, in the past, I think I have advocated at some provincial conferences that I would like to see the shared cost programmes replaced by block grants. That is, a grant which would be limited to a certain function such as health. Whether you spend it on medical education, whether it is spent on medical services, whether it is spent on hospitalization or hospital construction, would be up to the individual government concerned, as long as it was spent in the area of health.

Now it seems to me that with a block grant, the federal government might achieve its national purpose and yet would allow sufficient freedom within the individual provinces to meet the varying conditions that exist in each province, and between provinces. But more recently I have sort of given up the block grant concept. I think we must go to the tax source or base, because when times get a little tough and there is financial stringency it is too easy with a block grant programme to simply say, "Well, we will cut the grants back 25 per cent for this year to meet our immediate needs or commitments or difficulties." Then, of course, whoever is responsible for administering the programme has to deal with that situation. Such has happened to this province on several occasions in recent years.

It would not happen if we had a tax source given and allotted to us at the same time we were asked to accept the responsibilities of the programmes. I am just giving some of my own experiences in these matters, but I would say that what we need to do is work out a means of distributing our tax revenues in line with our responsibilities. Now, what the final answer to this would be, of course, I do not know. I think it will be thrashed out in these conferences as we go on. I hope I make my point that it is not money grubbing to discuss these matters, it simply is not money grubbing; I think it hits the heart and core of our federal system. It is not the only thing in our federal system, of course; there are all the institutions we choose to deal with.

So these matters were widely discussed, I thought, at that conference. The consensus we came to on the distribution of powers—and this was a consensus subscribed to by all the participating governments in the conference—and if you will excuse me I will read this:

The conference recognizes as a matter of priority the study of the distribution of powers, in particular the taxing and spending powers, and directs the continuing committee of officials to give immediate attention to this aspect of the constitution.

So you see, it may be money grubbing to some, but at the conference it was taken to be a constitutional matter. To continue:

The Constitutional conference, recognizing the urgency of the matter, agrees that the tax structure committee should be convened for the purpose of examining and reporting at the earliest opportunity to first Ministers on (1) the occupancy of available tax fields by each of the provincial governments and the government of Canada, and (2) federal-provincial shared cost programme arrangements. To this end, the tax structure committee would consider the aggregate of government expenditures and their rate of growth, the tax sources available for financing these expenditures, and the potential of the total tax system, level of borrowing by governments and its effect upon the Canadian economy.

You see we cannot operate in a vacuum any more. We must tie all these functions together and the balance of fiscal responsibilities and resources within each of the provinces and the government of Canada.

So, to return to a discussion of the basic prerequisite for a functional federalism, there is a fifth point I would like to make, and it is simply this: While discussing fiscal matters, the government must retain the power and the responsibility to operate an effective economic stabilization policy in the country and it must have the power to combat the very serious regional disparities that exist in Canada. Regardless of what we do in these areas of division of tax revenue, the federal government must have the motive and the power to deal with the overall financial and fiscal position of the country.

It is very interesting to note that, in November, 1967, and at both conferences in Ottawa, there are certain areas of the country that place regional disparity as the number one problem, as far as they are concerned, in any discussion of constitutional problems. It is a very understandable point of view, with which I might say I am in complete—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Oh, you mean that fat sow?

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It did not bother me. I know Mr. Smallwood quite well. He invited me to go fishing in Newfoundland last summer and I accepted his invitation. He is a very colourful man. I might have been able to say that Newfoundland lives rather high off that fat sow, but I did not think that it was quite the proper thing to say at that conference. But that did not bother me, I assure you, Mr. Speaker. I do not think Mr. Smallwood meant it to bother me either.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Is the Premier not gradually whittling away the powers of the federal government in overall control?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether we are going to get into a debate across the floor of this House, but I would be delighted to hear the hon. member's comments in this regard as this debate develops. I do not think we are whittling away at the powers of the federal government in any way, shape or form. We are asking for a degree of co-operation. We only hope that we will get it so that we will not be forced to take certain courses of action that might not just be what we would want them to be.

Mr. Lawlor: Does the Premier want a plenary transfer of these tax sources?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, as I say, this is a very intriguing matter for discussion and it will require the ingenuity of man to find an answer, but I think we have the ingenuity. Certainly if you go back and look at personal income tax, of course, you know this—the original Income Tax Act was called the War Income Tax Act, and that was taken from the provinces in order to finance World War I. But it was never given back when the war ended, and it developed to where it is today.

The whole field of succession duties was a purely provincial jurisdiction until World War II, and it was taken over by the federal government to finance World War II. But World War II ended and we never got that back either. So, while there has been whittling one way, there has been lots of whittling the other way, and all we are suggesting—

Mr. Sopha: If there is World War III, we are finished.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, that could be, but all I am saying is that it is time in 1969 that we sat down and started to sort some of these things out, and I do not think it will be too difficult.

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): That is a reasonable approach.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Thank you very much. I have been trying to get this point across to some of your confreres in another place for some considerable length of time, but I am told, "Go away and raise your own taxes, regardless of what we may do between us to the poor benighted taxpayer of Canada."

That is a position we do not accept. We are looking for this opportunity to sit down together, line up our responsibilities, put a price tag on them, and then line up some sources of revenue that are reasonable to approach the whole question of borrowing on a combination basis.

After all, when we get a few more regional governments set up in Ontario and we start to add together what they will be doing in the money markets, what we are doing in the money markets, and what the Hydro is doing in the money markets, it will be impossible to run Canada in an orderly fashion unless this is all co-ordinated. I think this lies ahead of us. September 1, 1969, is bound to come, and I think that this situation will come upon us and we are trying to anticipate these things.

I suppose everyone has forgotten the numbers of these points—I am just reaching six. I am just finishing up number five, but I would like to make my fifth point very clear: that we do recognize the responsibilities that the federal government has, and I say that whatever arrangements we make must not impinge upon their power to do these national things.

It is a very fine line that will have to be drawn, because we all know, in this House particularly, what the requirements of our cities are going to be in the years that lie ahead. A new and very expensive element is coming up very quickly in this whole equation and it has got to be fitted in here some place, and it will be.

The sixth point that I would make in dealing with distribution of powers and concomitant allocation of resources, is the very rapid rate of change in the world in which we live today. I think whatever we do we must build into it a very high degree of flexibility and not try too hard to have everything 100 per cent perfect before we do it. Who knows what this country will be like 10 or 15 years from now and what changes will be required, so we need that degree of flexibility.

I think this will involve some constitutional change which will permit the delegation of powers back and forth between governments. There is a whole area of constitutional change here which is really quite fascinating to think about. For instance, it may be that the province of Ontario would want to have its own securities commission. It may be that three other provinces some place might be very willing to delegate this situation to some arm of the federal government simply as a matter of administrative efficiency.

Once again this has to come to a recognition of regional disparity, and not only regional disparity, but regional difference—the fact that all areas of the country cannot be treated the same way. If we are to have a flexible system of functioning I think that we need some by which through agreements the powers can be exchanged and delegated. There was a certain amount of this built into the Fulton-Favreau formula, if you recall that ill-fated document.

These are just some of the matters that we think will come up for discussion in the future in this area of constitutional change. I might say that we think the federal government in a very broad way should have responsibility for national defence, tariffs, monetary policy, fiscal policy; it must ensure free market for all the factors of production, airlines, communication, railways, national transportation, which affect the whole country, external affairs, with some arrangement made to protect those areas that are the constitutional responsibility of the provinces. I do not think there is any great difficulty, at least from our point of view, in separating these powers out on this basis.

We think, too, that the provincial government should retain their traditional responsibilities for economic growth and for the growth of social capital, if I can put it that way—highways, education, health, resource development, and language and culture insofar as these matters affect the residents of the province. This is a very brief sketch of distribution of powers. It will be clear and it will never be completely applicable in a simple way for all purposes. Nonetheless, it seems to me that there is lots of scope for us to solve some of our problems in this area.

Mr. Lawlor: Where does the Premier place social security?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Social security?

Mr. Sopha: Social legislation.

Mr. MacDonald: What the Prime Minister said is, the status quo is acceptable and therefore nothing need be transferred to the federal government—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I said in the beginning that I was not really looking for any enormous changes. We feel confident to deal with some of these matters as long as we can match up the necessary revenues to discharge the responsibility. We are not looking for change just for the sake of change. I do not want to rewrite the constitution just because it happens to be the exercise of the day. If these things have worked well over the years why would we not leave them as they are?

In any event there are the grey areas of concurrent authority; that is, where there is overlapping of authority between the two levels of government. I think we should try not to create any more of these than are necessary. We recognize that some are, of course, necessary in the functioning of a federal system, but we do think, too, you can use certain techniques to ensure that the exercise of power in this area is not too irritating one way or the other when you are both exercising a concurrent authority.

I might say in that regard that the whole question of Medicare is one of these areas that has caused this government a good deal of concern, and I want to make a few remarks about Medicare. I presented to the Prime Minister of Canada during the course of this constitutional conference a request that this province be provided the fiscal equivalent.

Mr. Nixon: I think it was a demand.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, a demand or a request, I was—

Mr. Sopha: You called it a formal demand.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: A formal demand? I said that very deliberately because I thought perhaps a formal demand would bring a formal answer.

Mr. Sopha: I had my eyes glued to the television.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We will see as we go along how much the member saw and heard. On behalf of the people of this province, I did make a formal demand or request. I might say that I was not speaking from a text, so perhaps some of my phrases were a little more colourful than they might have been if I had sat down and written them all out in dull, grey English. But in any event, I seemed to get my point across, which was really the object of the exercise.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): The Premier thinks it is a fraud, eh?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I think I could demonstrate. I do not think the plan itself is a fraud, but I think the way it is being imposed on the people, it could very well be. Otherwise I would not have said it. And I will go ahead and develop this and you may agree or disagree, as you see fit. I know you will in any event.

This is the type of thing that we hope will not happen again, but we are presently contributing in this province to this plan. In some of the matters I pointed out, the pressures are at work, because our people are paying for something they are not getting, or that they are not sharing in. And I asked for the fiscal equivalent and I made a formal demand. I believe I got my answer in a press conference out in the hall. I do not think I really accept that as a formal answer to a formal demand, or a formal request. However, I will pursue that as time goes on. But we would like to think that we would be able to get the money that is being taken from Ontario residents to finance this plan—and let us be very clear about this, there is no national Medicare plan, there is no federal Medicare plan, there is just an arrangement whereby “if you do it our way, we will pay for half of it on a nationally equated cost basis”.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): The Liberals never did intend to provide us with a health insurance plan.

Mr. Nixon: Very much like the hospital plan.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am talking about Medicare at the moment. In any event, on we go. We think that we would like to get these funds that are being taken from the people in this province to deal with some of the matters we think have priority. I am thinking in terms of such things as housing; I am thinking in terms of education; there is a whole host of matters that we think have priority as far as this province is concerned. My reason in asking for the fiscal equivalent was to get those funds so that we could use them for the benefit of the people of this province. I felt I was discharging my constitutional responsibilities as the leader of the government of this province in making this demand and I do not at all apologize for having done it. I did it on behalf of the people of this province. I think we could take this money and put it to good use, I think we could do a lot of things for a lot of our people who are quite happy with the status quo as far as medical care is concerned.

Now, I will set forth as briefly as I can the views of the government about the federal Medicare plan as it has come to be called. I do not think it is a plan. I would like to talk about some of the costs and why we have not rushed wildly into embracing the propositions that the federal government has made. There is one aspect of the whole matter that I would like to deal with first. There was some laughter the other day, Mr. Speaker, when I stood in this place and said that we did not oppose national Medicare. I do not think anybody in this House can doubt or would cast any doubt on the support of myself personally or of this government for the principle of providing protection against the financial calamity of illness, injury or large and difficult medical costs for the people of Ontario and Canada. We have supported the principle inherent in Medicare many times over. We have enunciated our support in this House on many occasions. We are the government that introduced OMSIP into Ontario, let us not forget that. And this is an outstanding plan, it expresses the support of this government for the principle of health care and protection against illness and health problems.

OMSIP, in concert with private and group plans ensures that virtually every resident of Ontario, more than 97 per cent of our population can, and obviously do, obtain complete medical care without fear of financial disaster or denial because of limited income. No one will ever be denied medical care in Ontario and no one in this province is unable to obtain medical insurance if they wish it. No one is barred from medical insurance in this province because of the state of their health or the state of their finances, it is available to all our people. So let us not have an attempt to say that I and this government oppose the principles of medical care for our people, because we have been instrumental in making it possible in this province. What we do oppose is the method by which the federal government is trying to force us to do what they want us to do when it does not suit us. That is what we object to.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Now, sir, there are many members in this House, now, and there are many, I suppose, who were not when our medical care programme was discussed here in some detail, some years ago. We had many long, long debates when that legislation was introduced and I think it might be interesting if we reviewed that, because I want to set to rest once and for all—and I know that the attack will be made on me, I know it as well as I am standing here; the attack is going to be that Robarts does not care about the health of his people. This is the obvious political ploy. But I am going to make it very clear that such is not so.

Now then, we go back to 1963. At that time we were determined as a government and as government policy that medical services insurance would be available to all the people of Ontario regardless of age, regardless of their state of health and regardless of their capacity to pay. Those are the three criteria we set up as far back as 1963. These principles are basic to OMSIP and I think they are also basic to the success of that plan. We also determined that in Ontario the most satisfactory medical services programme would encompass existing private and group plans and a government-operated plan, and they would operate side by side and that is what we did.

Mr. MacDonald: The government established OMSIP because the insurance companies would not provide coverage to those in the low income groups.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, the member says I am trotting out old stuff, I am told you heard all this before; I certainly have heard all that before. And I have not heard a thing here this afternoon that I have not heard ad nauseam for about five years.

In 1965 we were engaged in the approval in this House of the legislation designed to establish OMSIP. It was a very bitter debate on the part of the Opposition parties, in which every attempt was made, just as it is now being made, to mislead the people of Ontario. Speaking on second and third readings I made a few remarks. These are some things that I said in 1965:

What we are proposing is another part and another piece of a total health plan that has been developed over some long period of time in this province. Taken in conjunction with other progressive steps we have taken in the government in the provision of hospital beds, training of medical practitioners, nurses, paramedical personnel, this bill and these steps taken as a whole, not separated out and looked at one at a time, conform very closely with the objectives set out in the report of the Royal commission on health services. The Hall commission looked towards a programme to be worked out jointly by the federal government and the provinces with planned staging of various programmes which would culminate in a programme that could then, if properly implemented, culminate in a total health care programme for our country.

That is the end of my quote. Those remarks I made in this House in 1965.

And through OMSIP, Mr. Speaker, we took the lead by developing within Ontario an overall health programme with staging as set out at least in some degree in the Hall commission report. We recognize it as essential that Ontario develop a flexible position in the field of health services to facilitate the development of a national plan, and not to commit ourselves to any scheme which would hinder the co-operative development of a national health services plan in the future.

During that debate I said as follows:

This bill will fill certain gaps, and we do not feel that it will in any way prevent us from co-operating and working with any other jurisdiction in Canada, if it is possible to work these things out. I hope that I will never have such a closed mind that I will not be able to make a change if I think it is necessary for better legislation.

So, these were debates for 1965. It is very difficult to say that we are opposing national medical care, when you go back and read these statements. There should be no confusion, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, on the part of any member of this House about the support of the government for the proposal of medical care.

Now, there was a federal provincial tax structure meeting in Ottawa on September 14, 1966. I was there and I made a statement. I have extracted an item from this too, and I think it is necessary—I am not given to quoting myself, but this will put the position that we took as a government in those days in 1966 when some of the present members of the House were not here:

The Ontario government supports the principle of universal, public Medicare and is in sympathy with the objectives of the federal government's Medicare bill.

Now, this is a statement that we put before a federal-provincial conference in September of 1966.

We welcome the decision of the federal government announced last Thursday to postpone the introduction of its Medicare proposal, we already have Medicare universally available in Ontario, through OMSIP and various private insurance schemes, but we do not have sufficient facilities and personnel to accommodate and teach the students who are already in their final years of high school. While Ontario believes fully in the desirability of universal Medicare schemes for Canadians, we are convinced that in the immediate future, expenditures on higher education deserve the greatest priority.

The Ontario government believes that the question of Medicare should be treated in the broad context of federal-provincial financial arrangements. Furthermore, the federal government has announced the Medicare offer, which is in the nature of a cost sharing proposition. We maintain that it should be discussed in the light of the general principles which we would like to see followed for cost sharing proposals.

In particular, we feel strongly that the federal Medicare proposals should be amended to remove the implicit equilization contained in it. The current proposal to pay each province only half the national average per capita cost of participating provinces, under-compensates those provinces with high costs.

Of course, of which Ontario is one, and it over-compensates those provinces with low costs. Mr. Smallwood, in fact informed me that he thought that they could probably make money on Medicare on every unit of their population, or at least for a year or two until the inevitable escalation costs had caught up with them.

In any event—and I go on quoting:

We believe that the federal government's assistance should be based on half the actual cost incurred by each province.

Now the next one:

We are confident that if agreement can be reached on an acceptable package of federal-provincial financial arrangements, and on a formula for sharing the cost of Medicare, a way can be found for Ontario to participate in a universal scheme.

Now this we put before a federal-provincial conference. How can anyone say that we are opposed to universal Medicare?

Mr. Gisborn: The Premier never agreed to the government agency.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Still quoting:

We can arrive at this goal in much the same manner as we did when the Hospital Services Insurance scheme was introduced a decade ago, and thereby achieved a more satisfactory long-run arrangement.

Now, that is the end of that particular quote and I presented it myself, to that conference in Ottawa in 1966, and that states, in pretty forthright language, the support of this government for the principle of Medicare. It states our objection to the federal proposal, and I might say that our views have not changed.

I would remind the hon. members only that the decision of the government of Ontario not to participate up to the present time in the federal Medicare programme, was further enunciated on January 24, 1968:

When one considers the federal government's so-called social development tax and statements that without Ontario's participation the federal government will be able to come closer to balancing its budget, one might believe there have been developments which would tend to further discourage participation by Ontario.

In other words, their budget will be balanced well in any event. You can work that out for yourself.

But in any discussion of Medicare, Mr. Speaker, there are two basic facts which must be taken into consideration. First, and I have mentioned this before, a national Medicare plan, as such, does not exist, nor can there be one under our constitution.

What, in fact, does exist, is federal legislation which makes certain financial proposals to the provinces which will become effective if the provinces meet a specific set of conditions laid down by the federal government. In other words, the federal government cannot do it themselves—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): What would the Premier call a plan?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: —so they say, “You do it our way or we will not give you that money.”

Mr. Singer: What a semantic waste of time.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It is neither semantic nor a waste of time. Mr. Speaker, we were getting along quite nicely until my hon. friend took off. I am ready for the hon. member, there is a short break here if the hon. member wants to break in.

Mr. Singer: No, no, I am just amazed at the hon. Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, that in itself is something. If I can develop a sense of amazement in the hon. member I must feel I have been quite successful in what I have been saying.

Now, sir, these conditions require that to be eligible for federal assistance, the programme must provide comprehensive physicians' services, universal coverage, be publicly administered and provide for the transfer of benefits throughout Canada.

Second, we must decide what Medicare really is. In Canada we have come to regard Medicare as being a physicians' services insurance programme, whereas, at its ultimate, it might be regarded as a description of a total health services insurance programme, and let me again emphasize that the government of Ontario believes in the principle of a sound scheme of publicly financed medical care.

Indeed, we believe that every responsible government must assume responsibility for essential social services, including the provision of these services when and where necessary. However, the government of Ontario insists that any publicly financed Medicare programme must be flexible, capable of implementation in an orderly manner. It must meet the expressed needs and priorities of people to whom it is responsible, and it must be within the scope and the ability of the people to pay for it.

We must keep in mind at all times that even the most desirable social programmes will not succeed if their cost is such that people cannot afford the programme. Bread, butter and a roof over one's head are also matters of importance, to the average man.

Now then, we have looked askance at the current federal proposals for these reasons. Firstly, they are excessively expensive, they are not consistent with our priorities in this province, they tamper improperly with matters that are constitutionally the direct responsibility of the provinces, and they are unfair to the people of those provinces which are unable to afford to participate. And believe me, there are some provinces, the leaders of whose governments have told me they simply cannot do it.

Now I do not think that any of the hon. members would admit that this is a proper national scheme, if it is only to be available to those provinces who are financially able to participate in it. These are largely questions of conscience, if you will. Social questions that one must consider before one takes a position.

There is ample and dramatic demonstration of the serious concern throughout Canada about the ability of our economy to finance the cost of Medicare as now defined. We have repeatedly urged and asked the federal government to reassess the inflexible position that it has adopted on the four criteria for the qualification of provincial plans.

If it will not do this, and to date it seems apparent that it will not, then we claim that we should be given the fiscal equivalent so that we may meet legitimate needs and priorities of our people, including the support and extension of our own OMSIP programme.

Now we are certain that the majority of our people here, for whom we are directly and primarily responsible, already enjoy protection against the financial difficulties of illness. Of the residents of Ontario, 93.7 per cent have insurance for physicians' services, supplied through a combination of private programmes and the government of Ontario's OMSIP programme. In addition, more than 99 per cent of our population is covered by the Ontario Hospital Insurance Plan. OMSIP is extremely successful. It meets the requirements of the people of this province, with a range of benefits, financial assistance to those who need it; it is available to all.

It is one of the most comprehensive medical services insurance plans offered in Canada. When it began functioning in 1966, the maximum participation in the plan was estimated to be somewhere in excess of about 3,075,000 people. This number, it was forecast, would include approximately one million people in each of three categories.

The first category would be those who receive completely subsidized premium payments, including those receiving social assistance and their eligible dependants. Those are the people who would be looked after in their entirety. Another million who would be partially assisted in meeting their premiums and another million who would pay the complete premium for medical services protection from their own resources.

The government was aware that this maximum of three million participants represented approximately 45 per cent of the population of the province. We were also aware at that time that all but about 17 per cent of the population of Ontario enjoyed some form of medical services insurance, largely through group plans put into effect at their place of employment.

For this reason, OMSIP was offered initially on an individual and a family basis only. On January 1, 1968, OMSIP began offering coverage to groups, and to what are called collector groups, on an actuarially sound basis. This was done because many small groups were finding it increasingly difficult to purchase from private companies comprehensive coverage at a reasonable cost.

While there has been no vigorous campaign to attract groups to OMSIP, group enrolment is becoming very substantial. Some 439 groups encompassing 22,500 people have been enrolled to date. In other words, we are not seeking them out but we provide them with coverage when they want it.

To illustrate the success of OMSIP, at the end of December, 1968, an estimated two million people were enrolled in this plan. The following is a categorical listing of the current enrolment of OMSIP.

Social assistance recipients and their eligible dependents, 409,600; fully assisted recipients, 618,200; partially assisted 118,100; full premium pay 831,600; under group contracts 22,500.

We estimate that only about ten per cent of 1,045,000 who were estimated to be eligible for partial assistance actually have enrolled in OMSIP. The explanation for this is not that they are not getting medical coverage, but the great majority of these people are already covered under a group coverage provided in some other form.

For example, many employers absorb anywhere from 25 per cent to 100 per cent of the contribution required of their employees in the medical care plans. Of course, all these arrangements would have to be just simply scrapped and thrown out if we were to accede to the demand of the federal government in this regard. They just simply say, these arrangements must disappear.

Mr. Singer: Is that bad?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We think so.

Mr. Singer: Why?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Because we think that these are agreements freely reached between bargaining parties and that the people involved are satisfied with what they are getting. We would rather have the money, for instance, to create a few more doctors. Do we not need them? Certainly we do.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Premier would permit a question, since he has taken a slight pause?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Certainly.

Mr. Nixon: Would he not agree that it would be possible and, in fact, desirable if over a period that would be stated in new legislation that these agreements arrived at, as you have described, in free bargaining, could be replaced by other agreements that would be equally advantageous to both parties if, in fact, the government were to take over the responsibility for the provision of medical care, as I believe they should?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: If I understand, you are suggesting that all these present plans—

Mr. Nixon: What is sacred about these agreements?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Just a minute. Let me try to understand. Are you suggesting that the present plans would all be phased out of their present set-up and phased into something else?

Mr. Nixon: Yes, right.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: You cannot do this under the present provisions.

Mr. Nixon: The Prime Minister does not know the facts.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, you tell me. You get Mr. Munro to let me know if we can do this. I would be delighted to take a look at it.

Mr. Nixon: I often wonder if you are in communication—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We do our best, we do our best.

Mr. Nixon: I have no doubt at all that the government could pass legislation to accomplish Medicare now.

Mr. Singer: The Premier is going to announce it on March 4, anyway.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I have a sneaking suspicion that these members know more about the budget than I do. They keep telling me what is in it all the time. I have heard about four different comments—

Mr. Singer: There has been a leak.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: —four different comments about what we are going to hear on March 4.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, sir, in the 1968-1969 Budget of Ontario, to get at the OMSIP costs, it was stated with clarity that our existing hospital and medical plans are making a very heavy claim on provincial funds. The costs have been rising quite steeply so that the expenditures for the hospital plan in 1969-70, fiscal year, will be about $729 million. The cost of operating OMSIP will increase to about $143 million.

The government has made it clear, of course, that it will continue to subsidize both plans by an estimated $59 million for the hospital plan and $37 million for OMSIP during the 1969-70 year and these funds will, of course, be in addition to the premiums that are paid by those who use the service.

We feel that it is essential that the participants in any programme make a contribution toward the operation of the programme and the premiums must bear some reasonable relationship to the cost of the services that are being provided.

However, and I think all the Legislature agrees with this point of view, a person unable to meet costs from his own resources must, of course, receive assistance from the province so that he is assured adequate physician's care. But nobody, and I make this point finally, nobody in this province need be presently without medical care, and OMSIP ensures this.

Mr. Peacock: How does the Premier tie all this in with the Constitution?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I might put it this way: I would stop talking about it if I could get an agreement that none of you would talk about it. But I just have an idea that I am going to hear a little bit about this before this debate is completed.

Mr. MacDonald: I just got an idea—this is a weary record.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite an interesting story, in any event, whether I put it before the House at this time or some other time. It is a matter of topical interest and—

Mr. Trotter: We have had to live with it now—

An hon. member: Well, live it again. Live a little.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Live a little, yes. However, there have been suggestions made, and made here this afternoon, that Ontario is in a position to enter immediately into agreement with the federal government. And I think that these suggestions indicate a certain lack of understanding of the true rigidity that exists in the federal Act.

Mr. Nixon: The only people that would be disturbed would be the—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Oh, come off it, come off it.

Mr. Trotter: The insurance companies are going to get—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Sure, sure. I remember one of your predecessors tagging all the insurance companies in this wild and woolly manner and—

Mr. Nixon: I am not attacking them.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: —accusing us of all sorts of things. What happened to him?

Mr. MacDonald: The companies Wintermeyer sponsored in his time.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We have been told that because 97 per cent of the population of Ontario now enjoys some form of medical services insurance coverage, Ontario can qualify for the federal government contribution. Well, that is not so. Section 4, subsection 1, subsection (a) of The Medical Care Act, which is the national Act, states:

The plan is administered and operated on a non-profit basis by a public authority appointed or designated by the government of the province.

The term "non-profit" used in this section applies in the exclusion of insurance companies which currently cover one-third of our population in this province. The definition also—

Mr. Trotter: And they insure health.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The definition also excludes doctor-sponsored plans. It excludes the county co-operatives which has done a tremendous job of providing medical coverage in the rural parts of Ontario unless, of course, they become publicly administered.

Mr. Nixon: I ask you whether you have got a specific decision that those were excluded too.

Is the Premier aware that at least one provincial plan has a statute that says the payments into those organizations are designated as in fact being paid to the Minister of Health or his agent?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I presume you are referring to British Columbia. We checked into that very, very carefully. And for the technical aspect of it, I would ask the—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: What has happened is this, of course the insurance companies are becoming nothing but post office drops, nothing more—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: These are the rigidities and I think we can document it in correspondence. The correspondence is taking place between the Minister of Health and the various Ministers of National Health and Welfare we have had in Ottawa during the last few years.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: But, perhaps the most rigorous debate with regard to Medicare revolves around the cost involved. People want to know whether it will be less costly to participate in a government operated universal medicare plan, than to continue the selected systems of OMSIP and private coverages which we now have in Ontario. Under compulsory universal medicare, the entire cost would be met through a combination of tax revenues and premiums with the provincial government operating the entire plan.

Under our present selective system both private and government plans function side by side. Coverage under the government OMSIP plan is voluntary, the premiums are actuarially sound. At the same time, financial assistance, either partial, full or temporary is available. The government of Ontario is convinced that the selective system best meets the requirements of the people of Ontario. Our studies also show that the selective system is less costly on a per capita basis than under the federal Medicare scheme as now constituted, and generally provides a greater range of medical services than the proposed national plan of basic coverage.

I would like to underline the factors which we have considered in reaching this conclusion. The total cost of the universal medical care programme, if all provinces were ready to participate, if all provinces were in, is estimated at approximately $1 billion annually or $4.2 billion for the period 1969-1973. Of this amount 50 per cent would have to be raised by the federal government through increased taxation; the provinces would raise the other 50 per cent. The Hon. Mitchell Sharp when he was Minister of Finance, suggested that it would require the equivalent of 12 per cent of personal income tax to obtain sufficient funds for the first full year of operation, April, 1969 to March 31, 1970, at a total cost of $1 billion. Since the people of Ontario contribute 46 per cent of the total taxes collected by the federal government, it follows that Ontario would have to contribute 46 per cent of the federal share or $230 million annually to the cost of the universal Medicare programme.

Our calculations indicate that, based on an average of the first two years of operation and assuming that 90 per cent of the population would be enrolled, universal Medicare would cover about 6,600,000 people. The average per capita cost for the two years would be $54.15 based on $53.25 for the first year, and $54.95 in the second. The annual cost of Medicare in Ontario would be an average of $357.4 million. Administrative costs based on a conservative 5 per cent of services would be an additional $18 million. And incidentally, I do not think those administrative costs are included in cost to be shared by the federal government.

Therefore our calculation indicates the total cost of operating Medicare, as defined by the Federal Act, would be $375.4 million for each of the first two years of operation. I use this figure with the realization that medical costs are rapidly increasing, and I am also aware and indeed extremely concerned that the federal government has announced that it will step out of Medicare after five years, leaving us to finance what undoubtedly will be a rapidly escalating cost programme. Because the federal cost contribution is based on 50 per cent of the national per capita cost, exclusive of administration, rather than the provincial per capita cost, Ontario would receive about 44 per cent of the cost of providing a Medicare plan for the people of this province. Somebody else would get the additional six per cent because they would be over the 50 per cent, and because we are a high cost province.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Oh, no we will carry this debate on until everyone who wants to speak has spoken.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Of course it has, it has everything to do with the Constitution—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, you are going to hear the rest of it right now, so—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am actually enjoying it. This would mean—the member does not want to hear. That is the problem, he does not want to hear.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: This would mean, Mr. Speaker, a return to Ontario by the federal government of $157 million. Assuming that the provincial contributions to subsidize or fully pay premiums for certain groups remain at an average of $60 million for the two year period. The province would need to raise, through premiums, $158 million a year to finance the plan. In order to obtain the $158 million, premiums would have to be charged at the approximate rate of $1 per month, excuse me, $8 for a couple, and $10 for a family. It would be said of course that these rates are lower than those now in effect under OMSIP, but it must be remembered that these rates represent only a part of the true cost of universal medical care. There are other costs which would have to be paid through taxes. For example, these would include operating costs which are not shareable with the federal government. Increased taxation to provide the 46 per cent share which the people of Ontario will pay to the federal government to finance its part in Medicare must be considered. In terms of monthly premiums this taxation which would be required would represent an additional burden of $4.16 per month for a single person, $8.32 per month for a couple, and $10.40 per month per family.

To illustrate more fully, the net effect of universal Medicare on the people of Ontario I should like to summarize the anticipated cost figures in terms of monthly premiums, comparing these premiums with the new rates for OMSIP which went into effect on July 1, 1968.

Now, the approximate Medicare premiums: single, $4.00; the estimated additional taxation, $4.16 for a total of $8.16—as opposed presently to an OMSIP premium of $5.90. A couple would pay the Medicare premium of $8.00; then they would pay $8.32 in additional taxes, to finance Ontario's share of the total cost, for a total of $16.32—as opposed to $11.80 that they presently would pay for OMSIP. For a family, a Medicare premium would be $10.00; the additional taxation would be $10.40, for a total of $20.40—and their OMSIP premium is $14.75.

I must also point out that the $230 million a year which the people of Ontario would pay in taxes—which I suppose might be termed hidden premiums to the federal government to finance universal Medicare—includes an annual subsidy of $74 million to the operation of universal Medicare in other provinces, from which the people of Ontario would receive no direct benefit. I should like to make it perfectly clear that the government of Ontario is, and always has been, a firm believer in and a supporter of the principle of equalization. I think I made that clear this afternoon. However, we think it is improper to embody equalization in the national programme of this type. If we are to have equalization payments let us have equalization payments; we all know what they are; they work out on the basis of the tax revenues of the provinces involved.

What we have here is what I might term implicit equalization. We have objected to this element of the federal Medicare legislation for a long time and we should continue to object to it. We in Ontario do not think the people of the province will receive as fair treatment as some provinces because the Medicare Act makes money on the deal while the people of Ontario lose money. Now this is not equalization, this is subsidization.

So we get to the constitutional aspects of Medicare and I would like to deal with those for a while. I have taken time to outline in some detail the developments to date in the formulation of a universal Medicare programme, and the objections the government of Ontario has found to that programme.

In summary these are the positions held by this government:

1. The government of Ontario is not opposed to any sound scheme of publicly financed medical care. We insist, however, that such a programme be flexible and within the express needs and priorities of the people and within their ability to pay for it.

2. The government of Ontario is convinced that the economy of Canada and of this province cannot afford at this time a publicly financed medical care plan as defined in the federal legislation. Taxation has already reached the point where it is biting into our capacity to produce. Further increases in the proportion required to support Medicare would further restrict our economic ability and greatly impede other urgent government activities. This will be compounded when after five years the federal government vacates this field and abandons the programme to us.

3. The government of Ontario—

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): The Premier is living in a dream world.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We like it this way. We like it this way. The member will have his turn; he sounds off all over the place. He should sit and listen quietly for an afternoon.

Mr. J. Renwick: We wanted to have a realistic discussion, not the dream world that the Premier lives in.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Look who is talking about a dream world.

3. The government of Ontario is opposed at the present time to wiping out with a single stroke of a pen the medical care plans and benefits now existing in employment contracts and other labour agreements. Any change in these benefits on the part of government must be given very careful consideration.

4. The government of Ontario believes it would be inopportune to introduce compulsory Medicare at a time when our universities are only beginning to increase the number of graduate health personnel. Surely there is an obligation to be able to provide sufficient medical and other health care staff before a compulsory programme is introduced. This, of course, is being seriously deterred by the federal government's reduction in the health resources fund. That is another area that I will not get into this afternoon.

An entirely new concept must be evolved for a national medical care programme, and it must be a fresh concept in universality. A plan must be devised to allow for phased implementation such as you are discussing and was mentioned this afternoon. The economic base for Medicare must be reappraised. Any such plan must form part of a programme of priorities of the people of the individual provinces in which it is to be introduced and put into effect.

At the moment I would submit the federal medical care programme has given an artificial priority which it does not deserve. Indeed, it is being shoved down our throats, as I have said before, and this priority must be reviewed before the economy of Canada is further imperilled.

As a government, Mr. Speaker, we have no power to dictate to the federal government what it can or cannot do. However, I suggest that as a government we have a constitutional responsibility, and within the means of the people of Ontario we shall continue to exercise that responsibility just as we did at the conference earlier this month.

In Ottawa we discussed Medicare within the context of the constitution. Medicare is very much a constitutional problem. As I have stated over and over again it is an outstanding example of the federal government invading a clearly defined area of provincial jurisdiction; of using its financial muscle to alter the intent and the provisions of The British North America Act.

There is very much a double standard involved. Would the federal government not object strenuously if this Legislature was to pass legislation invading its jurisdictional territory? Would it not take every means at its disposal to exercise its constitutional sovereignty if, as a hypothetical example, we were to pass legislation to have Canada withdraw from NATO or to form some unit of the Canadian military?

Mr. Singer: Oh, come off it.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Oh, come on it.

Mr. Sopha: You stood there the other day and said there was nothing unconstitutional about it.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, the question was raised in this House earlier this week whether Ontario should test in the courts the constitutionality of the federal Medicare bill, and there would be no purpose in this. The government of Ontario does not oppose the basic principle of medical care services for the people of Ontario.

Mr. Singer: As unconstitutional as it may be.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes, and that is true. You do not want to believe it, but that is true. Mr. Speaker, these people will do everything in their power to distort the position of this government, but you cannot get around the fact. This government objects to the method by which this is achieved and the coercion with which the federal government is forcing the provinces to change their priorities to accept the federal plan. It must be remembered that to get the federal share of the Medicare funds the provinces must also raise an additional large sum from the people of the province in taxes and premiums.

Mr. Sopha: Do you have to keep repeating these things?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes, to convince people like you.

As the federal government has pointed out many times the Medicare legislation is a statute of Parliament. In other words, their answer to us is, a fact is a fact. Of more importance is our support for the recognition of the desirability of the federal government encouraging national standards in areas of national application.

There are some other things I might say but I think I might just leave this question of Medicare. I think I have made my point. From the comments I have received from the other side of the House I feel I may have reached through and got some comprehension to you of what the position is.

Now, sir, there was another matter we dealt with at this conference that—

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): How about a few words on the Constitution?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: You will find out in due course, Mr. Speaker, that the matters I have been discussing today, in my humble opinion, in terms of what is happening to the Constitution in this country could not be more important and could not be more to the point.

Mr. Bullbrook: Are you saying that is a significant aspect of the constitutional problem?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: There are a thousand ways to change a constitution and we are not going to just talk about the one way of doing it where you sit down and change the words.

I would like to speak for a moment on our approach at this conference to the subject of fundamental rights. If you recall at last year's conference we stated—

Mr. Singer: Which position is that, last year's or this year's?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I will get to that. At last year's conference we stated that our attitude toward the entrenchment of fundamental rights would be conditioned by four factors:

1. We said that any proposal concerning a constitutionally entrenched bill of rights should be considered in the light of constitutional reform, viewed as a whole. In other words, it could not be dealt with separately.

2. We said that such a bill should be dealt with in the light of provincial situations with consideration for the existing powers of the provinces, and what the provinces may have done themselves in this area.

3. We said that a declaratory or other nature of such a bill should be reviewed in the context of the existing constitution and the important relationship between a bill of rights and a constitution.

4. We emphasized a year ago this month that this government was awaiting the recommendation of the Hon. J. C. McRuer on this subject.

The observation has been made recently, and I believe that this is what the hon. member for Downsview is getting at in his interjections, that we have done an about face on the question of fundamental rights over the past year.

Mr. Singer: That is exactly what I meant.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It has been said that in the conference in February, 1968, we were not in favour of entrenchment of rights and that this year we have reversed our position. These interpretations do not coincide with the facts.

Mr. Singer: Quite wrong; I recognize that.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I will now set the record straight, Mr. Speaker, and tell you exactly what happened.

Mr. Singer: I am sorry that such a thought ever entered my mind.

Mr. MacDonald: There are certainly a lot of records that need to be straightened out.

Mr. Sopha: It is like a skill artist at a carnival.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Last year, if you recall, the federal government proposed—

Mr. MacDonald: The Premier reverses his position so often a long explanation is needed.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: If the member wants to hear he had better listen. When we approached that conference a year ago, the federal government's charter of human rights had arrived at my desk—five days before the conference opened. And, of course, in the period of time available to us before this was presented to the conference—

Mr. Sopha: That is more notice than we get around here.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: That is not so. But you can understand it was not possible, nor would it have been proper for us or responsible for us to advance a final opinion on a matter of this type on such short notice.

Mr. MacDonald: So you invent a false opinion.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We had not been given any reasonable amount of time to study the question. This does not worry me particularly because, as I said before, we are not going to achieve these things overnight, and I knew we would never entrench a bill of rights in the Constitution at that conference in February, 1968. But we did need the time that we took between February, 1968, and February, 1969, to go pretty carefully into what the proposition was that was advanced by the federal government.

Our position then could only have been a tentative one predicated on the four conditions that I mentioned. We said at that conference we would examine their proposal in the light of those four positions I have mentioned to you.

During the intervening year we studied the whole question of fundamental rights very carefully and we examined the proposed charter the federal government put forward. We made some suggestions of our own in the continuing committee of officials and I do not intend to comment in detail our recent stand on this subject. It was pretty well completely reported in the Toronto Telegram and it may be that the Attorney General will feel that he would like to say something about it in the course of this debate.

Mr. Singer: Will he tell us about the compact theory of the Constitution?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: However, I do wish most emphatically to point out that what we said we would do a year ago at the conference, we have done. We studied the various proposals put forward concerning fundamental rights and we favour the entrenchment of some of these rights—not all of them—as being in the best interests of the Canadian people. I might say that this is far from our last word on this subject. Our continuing views will be aided by further recommendations which we expect in the second volume of Mr. McRuer's report, in which he is going to deal with the whole question of the bill of rights. I rather doubt from what I saw at the conference that we will be impeding the ultimate progress of this matter very much by waiting, because there—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The member can ask his leader the attitude of some of the other provinces at that conference.

Mr. Nixon: That is right, but last year—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Sure, he will remember that. We examined it a little more carefully and came to the conclusion that there were certain aspects of it that were very sound, and with those we agree. What is the matter with that?

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Then the member should stop yakking if there is nothing wrong with it.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): Why does not the member go on signing those letters?

Mr. Sopha: Has the Attorney General given up the compact theory?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: In any event, that is what happened and we are continuing our studies. It may be that we will find after another year when we listen to the ideas advanced by the Opposition, as they take part in this debate and when we hear what people from other province will have to say, it may be that our position will change again. But eventually we will come down to what we all agree will be, I hope, the right and proper thing to do; that is the whole process in which we are engaged.

The House might be interested in the consensus of the conference on this point. The conference of first Ministers, noting the various views and the general interest that has been expressed in regard to guarantees of human rights, including those views brought before the continuing committee of officials, agreed that a committee of Ministers should be established to study all matters relating to fundamental rights, including the question of entrenchment of such rights in the constitutional charter. Now, that was the consensus reached in the final document issued by the conference, and I can assure the House that we will play our full part in those deliberations as they take place in the ensuing months.

I would like to turn to our position on the question of Canada's official languages and the propositions which we tabled here on February 5. There were three propositions that set out the principles as far as Ontario is concerned, but we, I would like to say too, have taken some firm action to translate principles into action. We think that the most effective means of insuring the protection of linguistic rights probably is by means of the legislative processes available to individual governments. That is why we did not object to the federal language bill. This is the federal government's method of dealing with this matter within its own powers, and we have no objection to that whatsoever. We hope the discussions that are going to take place between Mr. Turner, the federal Minister of Justice and the Attorneys General across the country, will resolve some of these difficulties in order that the bill may be enacted in the very near future. And then, of course, when it is enacted, there will be some areas on which we will have to confer with the federal government, matters of mutual concern, dealt with in that bill, and this we will do.

We have come some distance in the recognition of linguistic rights in this province in the past year and I do not intend to go into these at any length. I think all members are aware of what we have done in the field of education, the bills that we have passed and debated here. I think these matters have been dealt with in a very practical way. And I am personally quite happy about what we have done, and particularly I think we can all be happy at the reception it has had among our people. It has been accepted, and I think we have done something that needed to be done, whether we got into a constitutional discussion or not. It is something that needed to be done for our own Franco-

Ontarians and we are very happy about that. We really are attempting—

Mr. Sopha: The Prime Minister should keep his voice down low so Johnson cannot hear—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It that right?

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Are they? Well, I do not need to turn around if those two are protecting my back.

We believe what we have done in this regard is in accord with the recommendations of the B and B commission and also in accord with some undertakings that we gave to the federal-provincial conference in February of 1968. Now, sir, we have been studying what we might do in other areas. You know, of course, and we all know, that we have had bilingual civil servants working for this government for many, many years but what we are in effect doing is stepping up our recruitment of bilingual civil servants. We also are stepping up our courses of training for those who wish to learn French, to achieve the basic idea that we would provide government services to the people of the province in those areas where French is predominantly spoken so that no citizen would be deprived of his communication with his own government because of language.

Mr. R. Haggerty (Welland South): How about the other ethnic groups?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, once again, I do not want to enter into a debate across the floor here, but there are all kinds of answers to the question that the member has raised, and we are talking about the two predominant languages in this country.

Mr. Haggerty: Canada is a nation of many tongues.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We are bilingual and multi-cultural. Now, sir, I might deal very briefly with what we have done. I have mentioned the public service, municipal administration—and here once again upon investigation we find that in the natural course of events in simply dealing with people, many municipal administrations in this province have been providing services in both languages for some considerable time. We are pursuing this as an active policy. It really amounts to recognizing what has already been done and insuring that action in this area is accelerated and that we make a conscious effort to see that it is developed and increased.

The administration of justice is another matter and a very difficult one indeed. We simply do not have bilingual judges in this province, nor do we have many bilingual practitioners of the law. In addition, we have our statutes written completely in English. I am informed that this is one of the major problems—that is, to translate all types of precedents, and so on, into another language. But, of course, in this province, we have always provided free translation services in our courts, not only for French, but all languages, and we intend to press on with that programme to ensure that nobody appearing in any of our courts of any kind, regardless of what his language may be, will be without the services of a translator who can make his speech understood. We propose to continue, once again, to recruit bilingual personnel into this area, but I would not minimize for a moment the difficulties that one faces in this particular area of administration of justice.

Mr. MacDonald: The Premier wants to be carefree like Joey and establish bilingualism by a wave of the hand covering everything.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes, that was it too. It all ended right there.

Now in regard to the Legislature, of course, we recognize once again what has been the practice here for many years—to formalize the right of anyone to speak in this Legislature in either language. We are examining where we may go from here and what we might do, but I do not think it would be practicable to try to have all the proceedings of this House in both languages; it just simply is not a practicable proposition. On the other hand, there are various degrees that might be explored, and we are looking at these things at the moment.

In regard to bilingual districts, there was a recommendation in the B and B report that bilingual districts should be established. We have examined in some detail the question of whether we should establish bilingual districts in the province, and we have come to the conclusion that we really do not need to. The main areas, of course, in which there are significant concentrations of French-speaking Ontarians are in eastern and north-eastern Ontario, and in southwestern Ontario, down in the Niagara Peninsula and part of the county of Essex. These regions have not been declared bilingual districts, and we do not think it is necessary so to do. We will, of course, place special emphasis on these French-speaking areas in terms of what government services are offered there and the provision of bilingual personnel in whatever government offices there may be, but we have a reluctance to delineate bilingual districts. We think, in the first place, wherever you put the boundary it is bound to have a certain degree of artificiality about it; we do not think it would achieve anything to delineate such districts. And there is the possibility and the difficulty that it might develop some frame of mind that we do not think would be healthy or necessary as we go about making sure that our French-speaking citizens in Ontario are properly served.

The federal government has decided for its purposes that its bilingual districts are necessary or proper or needed. We will co-operate with them, but we do not feel we need follow their lead in this regard.

No, sir, we think that what is being done by the subcommittee on official languages—that is, the subcommittee of the committee of officials—is really quite important. There was a statement on the official languages in the consensus, which I might just put on the record.

The conference recognizes that important steps have been taken by governments in the past year to encourage a fuller role for the French language throughout Canada, and it affirms study of linguistic matters should continue. In particular the first Ministers agree that:

(a) The recommendations of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, together with reports of linguistic matters from the continuing committee of officials and the subcommittee on official languages, should be referred to a committee of Ministers, which should consider both the constitutional aspects of the linguistic matters, and the method of implementation of language policies, including the nature of possible federal assistance for this purpose.

(b) The Royal commission's reports, together with other aspects of the subject of official languages, should receive such further consideration by the continuing committee of officials and its subcommittee on official languages as may be required to assist the committee of Ministers in its task.

So, once again, the study of this whole problem will go on at the official level and be transmitted to a committee of Ministers.

Now, sir, before completing, I probably should table a copy of this consensus; I think this should become part of the record of this House. I have quoted certain parts of this, but I will table it so it is available for any of the members who would like to see it, because that is the final official consensus.

Now, I think it is interesting to look ahead to see where we will go from here, this conference having been completed. It is clear, I think, to everyone that what we have started in the last 18 months must be continued, and in all probability we are in a position to accelerate it a great deal. These early meetings have really established the acceptability of the idea of doing what we are doing, in everyone's mind. We have made the first steps towards the creation of the necessary organization, and now, it seems to me, we are in the position to go ahead at a somewhat faster pace.

With the establishment of these various ministerial committees, it does bring what is being done to the decision-making level, because the continuing committee of officials, of course, has no decision-making power; all they can do is make their recommendations to leaders of the government. It was felt that by the establishment of ministerial committees we would have those who are going to be responsible for the decisions dealing with these matters as they were developed. And with this idea I am in complete accord. It is going to make an awful lot of work for a good many Ministers, but that is all right.

Now, sir, I might just quote from the consensus that I have tabled the general objectives of the constitutional conference, because I think this is important if one is to understand what we have done and the acceptance we have among all us.

The continuing constitutional conference reaffirms its intent to complete a comprehensive review of the constitution of Canada, to assess its adequacy for present and future requirements, and to determine the extent to which constitutional change is desirable, either through amendment of the existing constitution, or through promulgation of an entirely new constitution.

Now, procedure.

The conference expresses its intent that the review should proceed at an accelerated pace now that the basic organizational background work has been carried out. In this connection, the first Ministers will endeavour to hold more frequent sessions of the constitutional conference and, in addition, will have informal working sessions with the continuing committee of officials to provide more continuous direction to the process of constitutional review. In order to maintain effective co-ordination of the constitutional review, the conference agrees that (1) all special committees of Ministers set up by the constitutional conference, (2) the continuing committee of officials should assist other ministerial committees as required, (3) all special committees of officials should be constituted as subcommittees of the continuing committee of officials, (4) the continuing committee of officials is authorized to establish such subcommittees, working groups or task forces as seem to be required for the purpose, and (5) the secretariat of the conference should also serve all such ministerial committees and committees of officials.

I realize that it is very boring when one just reads these things, but there is the basic organization that was established at this conference to provide for what will be done in the future. When you see the scope of that organization and the objectives it set for itself, I do not think there can be any doubt in anyone's mind that this whole task is going to move ahead, and that is what I think we have been able to achieve. The question is asked, "Well, what did you achieve in the time that you were there?" I have already noted, of course, the tax structure committee will resume its activities. The Senate and the Supreme Court also will be examined by committees of Ministers. I do not really think that these two matters had been given enough study prior to this conference, that they could be dealt with in any meaningful manner at all. That is not remarkable because a tremendous amount of work was put before this continuing committee to do in the short period of one year.

Mr. Singer: Does the Premier presently have any views on the Senate or the Supreme Court?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We will have. Yes, we will have.

Mr. Singer: Presently?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: At the moment, I have not any views that I am going to express in this debate. But I would simply say that one is bound to have some views on the Constitution and reform of the Senate and the Supreme Court of Canada—

Mr. Singer: Views are very good to have.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: —but the reason that I read the agenda to you was to get the idea across that you just do not have well-thought-out opinions on all these matters in a hurry. They are very complex. In my humble opinion, it is going to take literally years of study and examination. We can only do first things first, and what I am attempting to point out here today is that we have got some first things done.

So, Mr. Speaker, to get back to the original question and the beginning of my remarks, what we are really seeking or what we are doing is to develop a federalism that we think is what we want for the future. We think that we must attempt to get a federalism that will truly reflect the spirit of partnership. I hope that we will be able to get rid of the attitude of oneupmanship that sometimes exists between various levels of government. We must develop a federalism that will recognize the very fine and very delicate balance that exists between the national interest and regional interests. We must match up responsibilities and revenues, and we must develop means for it to function in a way that the differing needs and requirements and positions of the component parts will be recognized and dealt with. It must, of course, be flexible and functional. All of which is quite a good deal to attempt to achieve, but this is the goal and I would suggest that we are well started down the road to achieve what we are after. In my opinion, nothing but good for our country and our people can come from these deliberations.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would begin by saying that I am deeply disappointed in the Premier's remarks this afternoon on two counts. The first one, and surely the most important one, has to do with the matter of Medicare, which he drew into this debate at such length. I can only assume that this lengthy and statistical attack on the federal programme must simply reflect a decision that has been taken by his administration largely and perhaps exclusively at his direction and behest, that the Budget next week will not include an announcement that we are taking part in federal Medicare. Even this government, which has a history of changing its mind on constitutional matters, is not capable of that much of a flip-flop, even though the arguments can be put and have been put in this Legislature before, which if carefully considered, would surely lead a reasonable administration to accept the federal programme as it is offered and for the good of this province.

I am sure that the Premier has had his advisors go over the accommodations that have been entered into by the provinces that have already accepted the federal programme—British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Nova Scotia. The point that the Premier misses, Mr. Speaker, is that this is a national programme. It cannot be tailored for Ontario. It will require accommodation on our part in order to take part in it, and this is what he personally is unable to do.

The inflexibility in his position shows through particularly when he lists his objections and lists among them those which can easily be overcome by an Act of this Legislature or by reasonable accommodation.

I would be quick to say to you, sir, that I am not a gradualist in Medicare. I believe that it is possible to accomplish the four minimum requirements that have been before us in the federal plan for many years now and to bring Ontario into Medicare—not only so that we can receive the $170 million that is properly ours to support medical insurance and medical facilities here, but so that our citizens can have the adequate coverage that they do not presently enjoy.

Now, it seems to me that the real roadblock in the establishment of Medicare in Ontario is the Premier himself. He has the power to bring with him his supporters, who would be just as enthusiastic about the other side of the opinion if he espoused it as they are now in sitting gloomily behind him as he has decided that Ontario will hold up progress in Canada in this particular way.

Alberta had this same problem. They had a Premier and an administration, which were in principle opposed to this particular programme. At times, both the Alberta and Ontario administrations have referred to it as socialistic and opposed it on some sort of warped Tory basis, which does not come through in the list of difficulties that the Premier has put before us this afternoon.

Alberta cannot be considered to have a progressive administration. Nevertheless, they have accepted the federal programme, but they were able to do it only by replacing the Premier, Mr. Manning, with someone with a more progressive attitude. I would say this is what faces the Conservative party and the people of Ontario. We can wait until 1971, when this in fact will become a political issue again. But surely there is another option. And that is to replace the leader of the government as has occurred in Alberta.

I would say this would not be too serious a matter for the present incumbent, if he is opposed to the implementation of this national programme, that he should step aside and let someone else do it, who could certainly bring this into the realism that we must have in the province of Ontario. As a matter of fact, Manning hasn't done too badly about. I notice today that he has taken a position on the board of the Steel Company of Canada and probably this is not the worst fate that could befall anyone. But I would say to you that I was deeply impressed as the Premier recounted his objection which we heard in this House in 1963, that he, and he alone is the repository of that Tory concept that Medicare is, in fact, evil, and in fact we cannot afford to have it here.

I regret secondly, that in this debate on the constitution the Premier has undertaken to spend one hour and a half dealing in minute statistical detail with this particular matter. This is one occasion when I believe we can share our views on the future of our province and of our nation on a basis that is broader, that does see us setting aside many partisan differences in order to at least have a say in the chart that lies before us as citizens of Canada.

I am glad to have the opportunity to respond to the order that is before us—the propositions that have been put forward by Ontario, for the reform and development of our constitutional matters, and I would say that there should be many more opportunities in this House for this particular type of debate. I, for one, am a strong proponent of a select or standing committee of the Legislature which could undertake an investigation of these matters, in a somewhat more informal atmosphere, one in which we could call before us those experts, some of whom perhaps are now sitting under the gallery, listening to the words of the Premier and others taking part in the debate. I feel, beyond that, that such a committee could assess the views of the people of this province, meet with the similar committee that has been constituted in the Legislature of Quebec, and share, I think, in a much more effective way the attitudes that have been expressed by that committee in months and perhaps years gone by.

Surely this is a vehicle that would bring the members of this Legislature into a much more meaningful involvement in constitutional affairs.

I think it is essential that we have a committee of this type. The objections of the government have already been expressed but I think that the main objection is that they want to continue giving us an opportunity to discuss, without any restrictions in length but in a very formal atmosphere, what has already been accomplished and the positions that the government has already irrevocably taken up. I do not believe this is good enough. I believe we must take a more progressive attitude in this connection and I would certainly hope that we would have this sort of deeper involvement in what has got to be one of the chief issues of the day, and one that must concern all of us as citizens of Ontario.

Before discussing in specific detail, the propositions, or some of them that have been put before us, I would say to you, sir, that I had the honour to be an observer at the conference. I did not see it on television. I am sure a different conference came over the tube from the one we saw when we were present in the flesh to see everything that was taking place, and perhaps some of the side issues as they were discussed as well. But I was there at the expense of the people of Ontario and I intend to indicate this afternoon, in the few minutes that remain to me, and this evening, for a short period of time, that the sending of observers there representing the Opposition is something which I hope I can convince the government is of value.

I felt it was an important conference, but one however that failed to make as much progress as the Premier has indicated. It was surely a great success as far as involving the citizens of Canada in our continuing public affairs. In the last two years there have been five incidents in which this has been of great importance. The three conferences that have been discussed, and the two leadership conventions, the federal leadership conventions, one in Toronto in September, 1967, and the one in Ottawa last spring.

I think as a result of those television happenings that the people of Canada no longer look to American politics for their interest in these affairs, but they think of Mr. Bennett and Mr. Smallwood almost as uncles who have come into their home to give them their views at length and for a very entertaining visit. They, I think, have a better appreciation of the problems that face the Premiers and the Prime Ministers.

And more than anything else, there is surely the realization that around that conference table, without regard to partisan differences, there is a body of men which represents the goodwill that is the strength of our nation—and I do not hesitate to use the word—and which has, let us say, a sharing of goals which shows through. Particularly when those members in the front rows around that table set aside their prepared positions—often prepared weeks in advance, with all the irrelevancy that sometimes creeps into them under those circumstances—and state their views in response to positions and propositions put by their fellow members of the conference.

This surely is where the great value of television coverage comes in. That citizens everywhere can see this natural reaction which shows the varying priorities that leaders of provincial delegations must put on their discussions, if in fact the regionalism of Canada is going to have a form in which it can be properly expressed.

But I was an observer. I went into the Confederation room, a very grand hall indeed, on the Monday morning and was much struck with the fact that we were almost coming into a situation similar to Versailles—was it 1815, Elmer? You are the expert in these matters. All the publicity leading up to the conference was based on attitudes of confrontation and crisis. There were those there who were prepared to make demands, often unreasonable demands. But in fact, there was the attitude of independent powers sitting together around the table on one of those rare occasions when heads of state would come together to solve the problems of the world.

This is the sort of attitude which I think can be softened and in fact destroyed if the conference meets on a regular basis, four times a year at least. And I was glad in the Premier's closing remarks that he indicated that he favoured the continuation of this conference on a regular basis. This is surely its strength when it becomes much more apparent that something other than heads of state are there. In fact, a group of Canadians with similar goals and similar problems are sitting around that table with a real effort of co-operation based on co-operation to solve these problems.

Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me, I would appreciate it if you would regard this a suitable time to recess.

Mr. Nixon moves adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the spirit and hospitality of your dinner tendered as president of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association has somewhat cut into the interest in constitutional affairs. Nevertheless I felt it might be useful if I recounted to you, sir, some of my impressions as an observer at the constitutional conference held in Ottawa a few weeks ago, and I thought I should remark on something the Premier (Mr. Robarts) said with regard to opening statements.

The first day of the conference was wholly used for that purpose, and in most cases, Ontario's representative excepted, the statements were based on carefully worded and prepared positions that were then put formally before the conference. I felt, frankly, if the hon. member or Renfrew South (Mr. Yakabuski) will permit, that the Premier of Ontario was very wise indeed in not undertaking to present to the conference a statement that was prepared verbatim. Too often in the past—and I have felt that the leader of the Ontario delegation has himself been guilty in this regard—these views were put down very carefully with every “t” crossed and every “i” dotted many weeks before the presentation, and often they seemed to be completely out of step with the spirit of the conference when the time came for their presentation.

I felt, really, that the leader of the Ontario delegation was feeling his position of seniority, which, in fact, he has earned by virtue of having outlived in office many of those who have been present in these conferences over the years. I suppose the decision of the former Premier of Alberta, Mr. Manning, to relinquish his post after so many years, was the key decision that put the Premier of Ontario in a position where, in fact, it was his responsibility to carry a couple of bottles of oil with him wherever he went to pour on troubled waters—if, in fact, that developed—and in many respects take up the position of the “honest broker”, so that from his position of seniority, and having established a reasonable attitude in conferences held previously, he could hold himself back a bit, particularly on the opening day, so that if there were serious difficulties—particularly in language rights, which had been predicted by the press—he would be in a position, perhaps, to assist.

I think he did that admirably on the opening day. I did not think there was much in his comment that was new, nevertheless it was well delivered, and certainly in my interjections in his remarks I was most sincere when I said it was a good speech. But I had the impression as a parliamentarian, Mr. Speaker, that the other members sitting in the front row around that table were reacting as parliamentarians. They were delivering speeches that were general in nature and well-mulled in their content for consumption by the folks back home.

In many ways this detracted from the effectiveness of the first day, but certainly if the conferences are going to be held only once a year, it is necessary to undergo that procedure, in order even to stay in the position that was achieved the year before, without even moving ahead. Frankly, I had the same impression that I sometimes get in this House, sir, during the Throne debate, with the feeling that although some of the ideas are interesting, in fact little progress, if any, is made. So I would heartily concur with anyone who might suggest that the opening statements—particularly if these conferences are going to come on a regular basis, as I believe they must—be done away with, and the conference participants get down to business in a serious way right off the bat. This is one way that something more effective might be achieved.

Having just given, let us say, an objective judgment of the Premier of Ontario's contribution on the opening day—I know he will feel very badly that he was not here to hear me give that judgment—I would like to say something about some of the other participants. I felt that Premier Bennett of B.C. was the only person who did give some new concept for consideration of the delegates on that opening day. He came out of the conference with a new nickname, The Green Giant, because he presented for our interest a new map of Canada in which British Columbia, painted in green, extended right up to the Arctic Ocean. But his concept, or let us say new drawing, of the boundaries of the provinces had a great deal of interest and gathered a great deal of interest and merited a great deal of attention.

My feeling, however, is that we in Ontario can only damage the concept by saying very much about it at all, because it is purely the responsibility of those provinces immediately concerned to undertake the discussions which might, in fact, result in, let us say, a redrawing of these boundaries which, from our point of view here in Ontario, may not be correct, but should lead to efficiencies in government, and this is something which we might all favour.

I suppose in many households now Premier Bennett and Premier Smallwood are referred to as the bookends of Confederation; they usually drag out that old simile themselves. But Smallwood was the only one who seemed to contribute a certain spirit associated with his own personality that had a great deal of significance. I think it is interesting to note that the opening statements of the other premiers were so long that Mr. Smallwood's time at the end of the day was considerably restricted. While he may have contemplated a longer statement, and I do not know what was in his mind (I suppose it is only a coincidence that the live time on CBC ran out at five o'clock), Mr. Smallwood stopped his remarks shortly after.

But certainly his approach emphasizing regional disparities and the need for the recognition in our Constitution of these disparities and the requirements that all of us, as Canadians, do what we can in a most altruistic manner to relieve these disparities; is something that he always brings home to the delegates in a most effective way.

I have got to say that I have heard his speech two or three times, particularly that classic reference to, and I quote:

Somewhere tonight, in one of the outports, a little baby will be born, and that little baby will be consigned to third-class citizenship simply because he happens to be born in a certain part of Canada.

And while we may have heard it before, he always presents the case most effectively. I must say that the Premier of Ontario who, many have said has a face for many seasons, always reacts well to it. There was a time, and I can remember hearing of this with great interest, when the Premier of Ontario proposed a $1 billion development fund which would be assigned for the development of those areas less fortunate than our own.

It was drawn to the attention of the conference by Premier Smallwood himself that he presumed that Ontario became less enthusiastic when our Premier realized that, as usual, being the richest province we would pay the largest share toward the funding of this particular $1 billion. Perhaps it was not precisely fair on his part to do that; nevertheless, he was the one person at the conference who did present to us from the wealthy parts of Canada, a realization of what life is like for those of us in Canada who are fellow-citizens but who have a different type of life, indeed.

It was brought home to me most succinctly when Mr. Smallwood turned to Premier Robarts and said, "If you were to tax your province as heavily as I am forced to tax mine, you would have an extra $600 million to deal with in your Budget." I felt at the time that Ontario's response, having to do with equalization payments, was considerably beside the point and as a matter of fact added about as much to that debate as the member for Renfrew South is adding to this. In some respects I suppose that comment is unfair as well but maybe there is someone present who could help me in this connection.

Mr. Speaker, besides the comments that came from Bennett—besides the comments that came from the bookend Premiers—we, of course, always pay special attention to the views put before the conference by the Prime Minister of Quebec. Mr. Bertrand, of course, was suffering from special political pressures. It was interesting to compare these pressures at this particular session of the conference with the one held a year before. As you recall, sir, the federal government and the federal Liberal Party was, under those former circumstances, very much subject to the pressures. Those of us who were present and everybody who watched it on television remarked at that time and we think of it still—the confrontation between the then Minister of Justice (and now Prime Minister) and the late Prime Minister of Quebec—and the very fact that Prime Minister Pearson was facing a change in the leadership in the federal party. Within a few months it was a possibility which came, in fact, to pass that there would be a federal election.

But this year the pressures were considerably different and I had the feeling that the positions expressed by Mr. Bertrand on behalf of Quebec were in response to those pressures. Not only did he have to maintain the traditional arm's-length, sometimes almost offensive attitude toward the central government for provincial consumption, but as we all know, and I think this is generally accepted, the real constituency to which he was talking was perhaps his colleagues in his caucus back in the Legislature. There is no doubt he is facing a challenge to his leadership and his position reflected that.

I think that both he and the Prime Minister and the Premier of Manitoba—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Surely, Mr. Speaker, you can keep that racket down over there.

Mr. Speaker: There are times when the racket from either side of the House is very unnecessary and unbearable, and I would ask, in this instance, if the hon. members on my right would please give the courtesy of a fair hearing to the hon. leader.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your interjecting in the debate in that connection but I would assure you, sir, that as an observer at the particular conference I was quite interested in some of the ironies of the political changes in pressure. I think that we would have to go back almost to—

Mr. J. Jessiman (Fort William): His dogs were barking all afternoon.

Mr. P. T. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): We all know—

Mr. Nixon: Look, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to stand intelligent interjections of the type that sometimes come from the member for Port Arthur—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member for Renfrew South was not listening when I suggested a short time ago that the hon. leader of the Opposition be given a fair hearing. Interjections are quite acceptable, but not continuous interjections, and I would ask the hon. member to observe this.

Mr. Yakabuski: May I have the floor for a moment?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member does not have the floor unless he has a point of personal privilege or a point of order. If so, he will state it.

Mr. Yakabuski: Yes, but Mr. Speaker, this afternoon when this debate went on, the hon. leader of the Opposition found time and felt—

Mr. Speaker: Yes, but what is the point of order?

Mr. Yakabuski: —he felt that he had the authority to interject at times, so we should be accorded the same privileges.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is as much out of order as were those this afternoon. I pointed out a short time ago that we do have interjections from both sides of the House, and it is unfortunate because it does spoil the effect of the discussion and it does hinder us from hearing what has been said. I have no objection to the hon. member objecting now and again, but continuous interjections will not be tolerated and if the hon. member persists I will have to find some way of requesting him to desist.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I have already made some comment on the opening statement by the leader of the delegation from Ontario. I will recall one phrase that I thought befitted his particular argument very well. He called upon everyone around the table to participate in the discussion in a spirit of—I think he called it—a participatory federalism. That seemed to catch everyone's attention, and I thought that it was a point that was well made, particularly from his particular standpoint.

I think perhaps he was proud of his position as expressed on that first day, but perhaps the successes carried him into a situation at the opening of the second day which surely he will live to regret, both as a politician and as a person who is leading this province towards the kind of community that we all hope for. I would like to recount it to you rather specifically. At the beginning of the second day's discussions we were supposed to be discussing fiscal matters. This had been put forward by the Premier of Ontario and the Premiers from some of the western provinces. It was recounted in the newspapers as a great breakthrough and victory for the provincial forces, because in fact fiscal matters were going to be discussed before some others. Certainly the chairman did not seem to have any particular difficulties in permitting that. He seemed to be ready to go along with any reasonable request.

I had the impression, Mr. Speaker, that we were going to be treated at that time to the carefully prepared statistical presentation of all that was the matter with the federal medical insurance plan, a discussion of how it came into being, perhaps some criticism as to the lack of what the Premier of Ontario would call consultation.

I even had the distinct impression that this was going to be a carefully scripted approach, unlike its presentation the day before, that there may have even been a point in it where the marginal notes would say "yell like hell here".

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, he got to that page within the first two or three minutes of his presentation, and the force in it, if any there was, was lost because of that.

I felt that if we are going to have open conferences where any Premier or any delegate sitting around that table can slant his position toward those who might be watching on television, it seemed to be a peculiar attitude indeed when the Premier of Ontario would look up into the glassy eye of the television camera and say, "I am speaking to you people back in Ontario when I say that is a fraud, the worst fraud perpetrated in Canadian political history."

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Nixon: That is a Machiavellian fraud as well.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Look me right in the eye in the television.

Mr. Nixon: No. I submit to you—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Nixon: Well, Mr. Speaker, in response to this, I certainly remember him looking up into the handiest camera, right into its eye, and saying, "I am speaking to you people out there."

I would say that if those people back in London town saw the side of his face, then his judgement in picking the cameras is similar to his judgment in decision on Medicare.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Nixon: I do not want to lose this point because I think it is an important one. If I can make a judgment over the noise.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Nixon: If I can make any judgment as an observer who was in the room at that particular time, I felt that the best-laid plan of the Premier of Ontario had gone awry.

Mr. Singer: Here we go again.

Mr. Speaker: May I point out to the hon. members that a minute or two ago there was as much noise from one side of the House as from the other side, and if the hon. members wish their leader to have the courtesy of a hearing, then, of course, they should accord it to him themselves.

The hon. member for Renfrew South will please desist.

Mr. Nixon: I would certainly like to make the point as carefully as I can, that if the Premier's presentation at the conference—not this afternoon in this debate, but at the conference—was designed to lead the other Premiers and Prime Ministers into a support for his position and against federal Medicare, then it was a dead loss and a dreary failure. It fact, it was only the Prime Minister or the Premier of Nova Scotia sitting beside the Premier of Ontario who was able, after a rather embarrassing pause, to come along and say: "You're right, the consultation wasn't very good", and try very lamely to explain why he had taken his province into federal Medicare.

Now, it may possibly be that even after the outburst at the conference and the rather peculiar contribution to the debate this afternoon which the leader of the government turned into a Medicare debate, that he is even prepared to reverse that situation on Budget day next Tuesday or some time within the next two years. Frankly, I have my doubts.

But I would say again that when he looks into the cameras and says he speaks for the people of Ontario, that he is wrong. He speaks for the government of Ontario and his supporters, including the member for Renfrew South, but no one else.

If we are going to put a political balance to this, surely, Mr. Speaker, you must realize that many more voted for the Liberal federal candidate just a few months ago than voted for the Conservative candidates who were supporting the position that was taken by the Premier of Ontario then and now.

So surely his confrontation politics expressed in the second day at Ottawa were really in the nature of either a childish outburst or the nature of a mistake, because he could have put forward many of the orderly arguments—I would not say that they carried much weight, but orderly arguments—that he put before this House today at such length, but he did not choose to do that.

Now, if we are going to have a federal-provincial conference, when in fact someone's arguments and ideas are going to impress those who do not at that time agree, then how can the Premier of Ontario turn to the Prime Minister of Canada and accuse him of perpetrating a Machiavellian fraud? Surely he is not expecting the Prime Minister of Canada to turn to him and say, "You are right, we will change this."

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I did not accuse the present Prime Minister of Canada, and I made it very clear that I did not consider him to be responsible for anything that had happened prior to June 25, 1968.

Mr. Nixon: As a matter of fact, I recall the Premier saying at the time that surely the Prime Minister of Canada, with the mandate he received in June of 1968, could ignore completely all those things that had been undertaken previously. This is precisely the matter that the Premier of Ontario objects to—that the government of Canada does not fulfil its commitments in an orderly and precise way.

Surely his advice to the Prime Minister of Canada was the height of irresponsibility and I think it was certainly proper and responsible that it did not even evince a response from the chairman of the meeting. As a matter of fact, I have heard some people say that the chairman, Trudeau, did not react, perhaps with as much flair, perhaps with as many new ideas as he had demonstrated at the conference the year before.

I would say myself that he was exemplary in his role as chairman. He did not intrude his ideas into the general debate, as was very proper. I could not help but think that he was sensitive to the fact that his predecessor, the chairman of the conference the year before, was sitting in the gallery. Not that he would be in any way, let us say, sensitive to him being there, but he would think back to the prime ability of Lester Pearson in conducting matters of that type. But I think Trudeau was able to conduct the affairs in a very fair and equitable way and surely there is no one here present, or who was sitting around that table, who would say otherwise.

So leaving the point relating to Medicare for a moment and coming to one area where there was some progress, a change of heart on the part of Ontario, I would go on to a contribution made to the conference by our Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), who also had spoken on behalf of Ontario a year before when the proposition of the charter of human rights was put before the conference.

The Attorney General has heard me on this matter before. He has objected to a statement that I made when I said that, in my impression, he, speaking for Ontario, scuttled the possibility of a charter of human rights, basic rights, that was presented in 1968 and which might very well be further along the way to implementation if it had not been for the very negative contribution that our Attorney General made at that time. Prince Edward Island was the only provincial government that took exception to his stand then, which shows, I suppose, the force of argument that the Attorney General was able to marshal. And I would congratulate him and the administration opposite for relenting in the negative attitude that they expressed a year ago.

They took a position that was entirely different this year and the Premier—I thought rather awkwardly—tried to justify that position by saying that they did not have time to think about it before they took a negative stand.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Just five days.

Mr. Nixon: All right. So in other words, he is saying that five days is sufficient reason for him to take a wrong stand. If, in fact, he was not prepared to give a judgment, why did he not say so, rather than marshaling the arguments which, in fact, tended to put the whole thing almost underground until it was resurrected again in the federal position papers this year?

Unfortunately the skill and argumentation of our Attorney General was not strong enough this time to convince all of his colleagues around the table to agree with him. There are still those—and I am not prepared to list their partisan background right now—who are not prepared to whole-heartedly embrace the principle of the entrenchment of such a charter.

Nevertheless, I believe that progress was made and this time because Ontario moved—Ontario was not inflexible in this particular area—and I agree with the position that was taken, I believe it did not go far enough in that we could have very well given stronger support to the concept of the entrenchment of the charter of human rights.

I do want to say something more about the contribution of the Premier of Ontario and his major supporters at the conference, the Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) and the Attorney General. Because, you know, they tend to think of themselves as humble men—men who are prepared to react to situations in, let us say, an informed, but basically human sort of way. I was amazed and really shocked to hear the Attorney General get up for Canada and say, "We in Ontario have a method of safeguarding the individual rights of our citizens that is unsurpassed in the world."

I am glad the Attorney General has a few people in the world who would agree with him, but I would say that only those who were beating their hands on the desks would find themselves in that number. What help is there in such an argument when the condescending, rich province comes in and says, "We are the best in the world. You might consider doing what we have done," taken in the light of a speech read for the Premier in this very House just a few weeks ago. It was a speech read by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Bales), in which he accused the government of Canada of grandstanding in this particular matter of using the entrenchment of a charter of civil rights for public relations purposes. It was the sort of a statement which, for one thing, had no place in its particular order in the debate here, and which was grossly unfair in its formation and its presentation. It had nothing whatsoever to do—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: What you say is defending the federal government.

Mr. Nixon: I am not defending them, I am attacking you because I feel that your approach has been inadequate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: You are a front for the federal government.

Mr. Nixon: Your leadership has been non-existent in matters of import that were put before this conference.

I would like to pursue this point just a bit. The Attorney General told the assembled delegates that we had the best in the world as far as certain aspects of his legal responsibilities are concerned. Following that, the Minister of Education was brought up into the place of honour beside the Premier and he repeated the speech that he heard at the Confederation of Tomorrow conference about the dramatic steps that we have taken in language instruction here.

I agree with that, but once again we were preaching to the other premiers, saying all you have to do is look at our marvellous example and you, too, will have something approaching the best in the world. It went on with the offer made by the Premier to give advice and technical assistance to those Atlantic provinces that are having a bit of difficulty because when they get up in the morning they find that they have slept on a mattress made in Ontario. When they wash their hands they find that the sink was made in Ontario, and so on.

There was an air of condescension that did not sit well with the delegates in the approach taken before the conference under these circumstances. Now I do not think humility is a particularly useful trait at the conference or in any other circumstances. Nevertheless I felt that the position that was taken did not enhance Ontario's situation as one of the leaders in these discussions, and in fact detracted from it severely.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal specifically with some of the propositions that have been put before us by the advisory committee to the government having to do with constitutional changes. I am not going to deal with them all by any means, but the first one I want to deal with specifically is number 7 in the blue book that has been made available, I guess, to some of us but not all. In it we are told that it is recommended by the advisory committee that the written Constitution of Canada must be flexible enough to be adaptable to fundamental social and economic changes.

This was strangely absent from the comments made by the Premier this afternoon. He seems to forget that these great disparities that are put so much to the fore by some of his fellow Premiers at these conferences, can only be removed by the flexibility that is recommended in proposition number 7. In his comments, he said little or nothing about a programme that would, in fact, undertake a change in the social development of Canada.

In his perfunctory listing of the separation and division of powers, I do not think it figured prominently at all. In my view, this is surely one of the most important areas and I concur wholeheartedly with the recommended flexibility in this connection.

I suppose I am a bit of an idealist in that I firmly believe that we, in Canada, should set as our goal in this matter the scrapping of The British North America Act and the development of a constitutional vehicle that is wholly our own. I will deal with this in a bit more detail later in my remarks, but I am further convinced that we here in this House have got to be practical politicians. We have to do what is possible, and frankly I do not think that approach is possible at the present time.

Although not a student of The British North America Act but one, I submit, who has examined its ramifications, I am convinced that the flexibility that has been found there for a century by politicians and judges, can serve us for a good long time in the future, as long as there is this atmosphere of co-operation that everyone calls for but very few people seem to be able to undertake on their own part. Lack of co-operation seems to always be the other person's shortcoming.

It is always from the standpoint of Ontario that the federal people are not prepared to co-operate. From the standpoint of the Premier of Newfoundland, it is sometimes Ontario that is not prepared to co-operate. From those Premiers who are prepared to co-operate in a federal Medicare system and who have, in fact, adapted their own circumstances to what is recognized as a national plan, Ontario is very much the unco-operative partner in this particular matter.

I would say, as far as proposition 7 is concerned, the flexibility in the present British North America Act is there only if the participants in Confederation—the people that the Premier of Ontario is talking about, the people at the top who must make the Constitution operate—have this spirit of give as well as take, which is the basis of the kind of co-operation that we require and which we are looking for.

Proposition 8 is very closely associated with it—the central and provincial governments must respect each other's constitutional jurisdictions. This, I suppose, was one of the recommendations of the advisory committee, perhaps framed in response to some of the objections that have been stated in present constitutional matters by the administration of Ontario, the government of Ontario, but I think it has a much more far-reaching involvement.

The Premier, this afternoon, was talking about not wanting Canada partitioned with brick walls separating our fiscal and, I presume, other responsibilities. Now this I believe in most strongly. There are those at all levels who are saying that shared-cost programmes have no place at all in the future of our nation. I cannot conceive of our Confederation lasting long, if it is not at the centre governed with enough power and imagination so that those programmes which are designed and which, in fact, are required to cement unity and do away with these regional disparities, cannot be entered into.

While the Premier of Ontario objects to the brick wall separation with regard to fiscal transfers, I have the distinct impression that he wants all of the power to operate his own province without any infringements on what he decides are his own constitutional prerogatives. The matter has come before the House in the question from the member for Rainy River (Mr. T. P. Reid). While the Premier is prepared to accuse the government of Canada of infringing these constitutional prerogatives, he will not follow it up with a test in court. He says that is not the point; the decision is his and he believes that if they are infringing then they are infringing and he is not going to co-operate nor adapt.

I feel this is a position that is not in the best interests of the co-operation that all call for. Certainly, as it is applied to Medicare, the one shared-cost programme that seems to be so very much in our minds this afternoon and tonight, it is entirely irresponsible. In fact, when we look at the situation, it is difficult to comprehend why one man leading this government can obstruct the progress of a nation. That is, in fact, what he is doing.

Mr. Singer. Hear, hear!

Mr. Nixon: That is right, one third of the population. Now this gets down to the old argument as to whether the man sitting opposite thinks of himself only as Premier of Ontario or does, from time to time, accept his responsibility as a citizen of Canada. I have heard the old stuff about "I am going to speak for Ontario". This sounds great, and yet in the other face, the fact for the other season, we hear the leader of the government talk about his strong support for equalization programmes, and the fact that he is one who is prepared to put forward the dollars from his people in Ontario toward such a programme. When his people in Ontario pay those taxes, they are paying them as citizens of Canada, and I say to you, Mr. Speaker, none of us should forget that.

Mr. Singer: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nixon: Well, Medicare is not the only shared-cost programme that has given us some concern, and those who pay the bills at Ottawa—and that means all of us as taxpayers—some concern. I do not know if I have the full list in front of me or not, but hospitalization is one that is well established. We are concerned about its cost, but it is established and we will never do without it. The argument that we are free to join it or not, and this was raised this afternoon with regard to Medicare, is a specious argument. You cannot do without hospitalization.

Heaven help you if you get sick and have to go to the hospital. If you are there for two days the bill is more than you can handle. Nobody in this province can get along without hospitalization. Just as I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that no one should be in a position where they have to get along without medical insurance.

ARDA is another shared-cost programme, and this, of course, is the subject of recurrent troubles—I would say recurrent difficulties at both levels. The Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Stewart), sitting opposite, is much too quick to blame his counterpart in the federal administration, or, in this particular case, the hon. Jean Marchand, for closing down the money in support, for example, of certain ARDA programmes. In fact, these limitations have been set for a considerable length of time, and the administration of the funds is entirely in the hands of the Minister sitting opposite.

Going on, we have a shared-cost programme in welfare, and in many respects the government of Canada picks up 80 per cent of the tab. The same is true of housing, in the assembly of land; 90 per cent of the cost of the land. Yet this Minister opposite—

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Would the hon. member permit a question? We borrow 90 per cent from the federal government and pay them 6.75 per cent interest, and they never had a better creditor than the province of Ontario. They get every dime back with full interest, and the only thing they pick up is 50 per cent of any losses. We pick up 42.5 and we do all the work. We buy the land, we service it, we put the buildings on it, we manage it. Now tell me what the federal government does.

Mr. Nixon: Let us take a case in point. Let us take the land that was assembled around Kitchener, and one of the members to my left was talking about this in detail the other day. You are the person, you are the Minister who makes the brave announcement that you are assembling land for a new town. You are the Minister who decides without reference to any planning board where that land is going to be established and settled. You are the Minister who decides how much is to be paid for it, who is going to conduct the business, and you get all the credit there is, yet the Minister who signs the cheque for 90 per cent of the cost is Paul Hellyer. That is what I am talking about.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will not mind me correcting him. In the first place he gets his 90 per cent back at 6.75 per cent, and let me just point out to you, sir—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Okay. Let me just correct this statement when you say I run roughshod over every other Minister. We have a task force at the housing corporation—a man from Treasury Board, a man from water resources, and they all—

Mr. Nixon: I did not say he rode roughshod over every Minister; that may be the fact but I did not say so. I tell you I could ask him about what he is doing with the Malvern development.

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is a good question.

Mr. Nixon: But surely the point is this—

Mr. Singer: All he does is make noise.

Mr. Nixon: When we are talking about shared-cost programmes I think every one of them has given rise to some difficulty. We start with Medicare and we go on to hospitalization, which is becoming such a problem for the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), as if he didn't have enough trouble along the line. On ARDA, the Minister of Agriculture complains constantly that there is not enough federal money to support his view of what should be available. The Minister of Social and Family Services is concerned that there is not enough money to support his plans for, say, Indians, and so on—telling only one side of the argument, and never getting around to the point, even in his estimates.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Minister of Social and Family Services): I always tell both sides.

Mr. Nixon: Not even in his estimates.

The Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) is not here; he may be in later, I know he is on the list to speak. We will hear the old stuff about French education again for the fifth time, but you know, half the cost of post-secondary education is met from the government of Canada. All of these shared-cost programmes are a part of Canadian life. You could not get along without them, and no other province could either. Now I speak for Ontario, too.

Mr. Singer: And also for Canada.

Mr. Nixon: Yes, right. And speaking for Ontario, I would say that the serious lack that I see in the present administration is a lack of leadership, other than complaining, in the approach to the Constitution. The main complaint, other than from Minister after Minister that they do not get enough money from Ottawa, is that in general there is not a spirit of co-operation in reapportioning powers, fiscal or otherwise. The Premier and the Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton) have been fulminating about this for the last six months. I will not go into the speech, which you have heard before, about no increases in taxation in election year and all of a sudden we find ourselves faced with this deeply serious financial problem—a deeply serious problem that has led us into the largest deficits in the history of our province.

Yet what is the result of this when we come to the one forum where something might be achieved—where the Premier of Ontario is sitting at one side of the table, the Prime Minister of Canada right beside him, the Prime Minister of Quebec right across? All their chief advisors are there in this beautiful room. They look at the propositions put forward by Ontario, and they say, "What does Ontario say we should do about the reapportionment of these powers, fiscal and otherwise?" Well, they say nothing. The advisory committee draws a blank. The Prime Minister, in his statement, simply says Medicare is no good. There is no leadership from this Premier, and who else is it going to come from? Certainly not the Prime Minister of Canada no less.

His advisory committee perhaps let him down, I do not know. But that page is a blank, other than the statement that in the division of powers there must be sufficient fiscal depth to support the responsibility, or something innocuous and meaningless like that. We have heard that from across the way for a long time.

If they are not prepared as the government of Ontario to come to grips with some meaningful reassessment of these powers, then nobody is and it cannot be done. So I would say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to hear these Ministers complaining as long as they are there, and it will not be much longer. They are going to complain this way, just like some frustrated housewives who simply can see no solution to their problems. I would say to you, sir, that if the government of Ontario believes in the redistribution of powers, fiscal and otherwise, it had better bring forward some definite and concrete proposals rather than the generalities for home consumption it has been guilty of up until now.

Mr. Sopha: Just like a bunch of highway-men when they move into Ottawa.

Mr. Nixon: So the point is this, we have these shared-cost programmes, and you think they are giving you problems. All we have to do is see the embarrassingly huge federal deficits that have been entered into to pay the other half, or the other part—usually far more than half of these shared-cost programmes—to see why, I suppose, from the other side of the argument there is some considerable concern as well. Yet none of you make any headway toward even a semblance of solution or the background work that must go toward the accomplishment of such a solution.

I believe that shared-cost programmes are going to be a part of Canadian nationhood as long as we exist.

I would hope that these programmes are going to change in an orderly and gradual way, and I would believe that there would be all of the consultation that everyone would wish, the sort of consultation that we would wish this government would enter into, with let us say, last year's school boards and this year's counties and townships before they undertake the unilateral changes that they are quite prepared to impose on those levels of government under them.

Mr. Singer: Very good point.

Mr. Nixon: But the fact is this, if the government of Canada is going to have the powers that the Premier of Ontario piously hopes for them, and on most occasions when he talks about these matters, they must, using the mandate of the majority and the Parliament of Canada, reach the sort of decisions that lead them to bring forward a Medicare programme, trusting that the provinces in Canada will adapt themselves to it, as they should, or perhaps opt out. That is the word to use, opt out, that has been the decision, apparently, of the government of Ontario this afternoon.

They have responsibility across Canada. We have a responsibility here in Ontario. But I would say there will be a panel of shared-cost programmes that will be with us as long as we are a nation, and that we in Ontario will pay, as taxpayers in Canada, the major portion of these shared-cost programmes. That is our responsibility as Canadian citizens.

Who knows what the new programme will be? I would think that we in Ontario, in the near future, maybe we will do it on Tuesday, maybe we will do it next year, maybe we will do it after the election in 1971. We will in fact take full responsibility, with fiscal equivalents supporting them, for the programmes that have been offered by the federal government and which we are already sharing.

The Premier is very much afraid that the government of Canada will relinquish these, only to build up a surplus which will lead them into some other chicanery, some other Machiavellian fraud, such as a new look at welfare leading to a guaranteed minimum income. I have heard even Conservatives advocate that.

I would think that there would be a shared-cost programme associated with the establishment of fuller support in education, particularly in the light of the need to approach equality of opportunity in this particular regard, and we must not expect to be more than consulted.

We must not have a veto or even expect a veto when we consider ourselves citizens of Canada. This is where I feel the attitude of the men opposite me in our Constitution lacks the depth that we must have if our nationhood is to grow and strengthen.

Mr. Sopha: Well, that is an Arthur Meighen statement.

Mr. Singer: What other reaction would you expect from London Centre? What other reaction would you expect from London? Go ahead. Go ahead, you will run out your strength. Defend the London Life.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, one of the other propositions I want to refer to briefly is number 10 which states as follows: "The relationships of the provinces with the federal government need not be uniform in all respects."

I suppose that could have been left with the proposition calling for flexibility. You may call this a sort of a "ready, aye ready" approach. But I for one, and I speak for my colleagues of this side, supported the Liberal Party a few months ago when their policy was, in the best sense of the word, one Canada.

I believe this is an essential ingredient in any Constitution that is going to unify our country. I would like you to consider the fact that this proposition, if I may call it that, was a part of the campaign last spring. It was put forward across Canada, and certainly very strongly in Quebec, and received a surprising amount of support there.

I do not believe in any regard that there is a narrowness in this view, because our present Constitution has within it a great deal of flexibility that will permit Quebec even now to levy its own income tax, just as this right, and, in fact, in some circumstances the responsibility is available to any province, that Quebec has seized upon the flexibilities in our present Constitution, as well they should, to adapt to their own particular needs.

But believe me, if we are to revert to some of that old hocus pocus having to do with that word that the Premier does not like to use for this very reason, deux nation, or even the approach taken by the NDP which calls for special status for Quebec, surely we are not serving the long range goals of our nation.

No one is calling for a rigid enforcement of a Constitution that sets out in chapter and verse every responsibility on every fiscal back-ground.

We are looking at our present Constitution, and we see there the flexibilities that have permitted Quebec to opt out of certain federal programmes, and certainly the Premier of Ontario was most upset when that took place. It has permitted Quebec to bring about their own tax system when they saw fit to do so, and I would say that the flexibility is in that Constitution and must be maintained in that Constitution without its setting itself definitely along the lines to make Canada deux nation.

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): They are so flexible they do not know where they are.

Mr. Nixon: Not at all. We are putting forward a programme that is a Liberal programme. It is a programme that has been put forward across our nation, and has been accepted in all parts of Canada. And we are saying the flexibility is there—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Did you listen to Molgat in Manitoba the day before yesterday?

Mr. Nixon: Yes, I was listening.

Mr. E. Dunlop (York-Forest Hill): Are you supposing that the constitutional relationships be identical to all provinces?

Mr. Nixon: I would say in answer to the question put by the hon. member for York-Forest Hill that the flexibility in the present Constitution does not in itself select any part of Canada, nor any province for special responsibilities, nor for special favours.

It does however, permit any part of Canada—and Quebec has seized upon this and very properly so—to keep itself out of certain programmes as it has chosen to do; to adjust its own tax system, as it has chosen to do. I am referring to the proposition that has been put before us by this government saying that the Constitution should have some division within it allowing for this.

My contention is only this; that the flexibility of our present Constitution has been found to be sufficient to encompass cultural differences, differences in aspirations which we will have for another 100 years and which should not be further divided by being enshrined in the Constitution.

Mr. Dunlop: Proposition 10, which you are debating, of course does not refer to flexibility. It is the one that refers to the nature and this would also include, naturally, the very special status for Quebec which has got an entirely different body of civil law, that you voted out.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I would hasten to assure the hon. member for York-Forest Hill that I spoke of the two propositions; the one calling for flexibility and the one for differences in application together. I thought that they should be considered together and he makes a point there that is a very useful one in drawing this to my attention.

Certainly I believe in the flexibility of the Constitution that we have. I believe in its ability to accommodate differences that are presently in our nation. But I would be against a new Constitution which would set out those differences in such a way that would, let us say, underline or emphasize what they already are.

Hon. J. H. White (Minister of Revenue): It is what you might call—

Mr. Nixon: Yes, perhaps you would.

Mr. Singer: The troisième one being the London Life.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Singer: Yes.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East): Mr. Speaker, while interruptions are taking place might I ask a question?

I notice that the leader of the Opposition mentioned the possibility of expanded cost-sharing activities in the field of education, but I also note that Mr. Trudeau has mentioned in his writings very clearly and very sharply, that this is a field in which the federal government should not intrude.

Mr. Nixon: Perhaps you should discuss that matter with the leader of the government, since he considers me an apologist for Mr. Trudeau. If my view in this connection is different from his—and you are right, it is—then I am prepared to accept it, if you are. But I will tell you this, Mr. Speaker, that as a Canadian I can see that, in the next 25 years, the area where equality of opportunity must mean more than anything else is in the area of education opportunity. In my view, the involvement of the federal government in this matter is one that has got to grow and not recede.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: May I ask if there is any voice in the province of Quebec—Liberal, NDP, or separatist—that agrees with you?

Mr. Sopha: In where?

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: In the province of Quebec.

Mr. Sopha: Well, what does it matter?

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we—

Mr. MacDonald: Because it represents reality.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, we are talking about the same sort of programmes which have enabled the government of Canada to pay half the costs of post-secondary education in this province right now. They do not direct the money to pay the teachers' salaries, nor to build the buildings. The money is directed to the government of the province, which then applies it as, I suppose, what the Premier of Ontario would call a block grant, for the purposes that they see fit.

Certainly, I do not want the government of Canada to operate our schools. But the only way we can have equality of opportunity is with dollars; dollars buy equality.

Mr. Speaker, I would say much has been said about leadership in determining the course of our constitutional affairs and specifically, the relationships between the provinces and the federal government. But while setting the stage for the past five months for a confrontation on fiscal matters, Ontario was sadly lacking in providing the sort of leadership which might in fact have taken the conference into a meaningful discussion of the allocation of the powers, fiscal and otherwise.

The fulminations of both the Treasurer and the Premier would have led any reasonable observer to expect that this conference would have seen Ontario lead the provinces in the kind of discussion which might have brought about the sort of solutions Ontario has called for. Yet we see that Ontario has failed in that regard.

The greatest disappointment was the failure of Ontario to lead the provinces into this discussion. It seems that even that special private committee that advises the Premier, and which is unavailable to a committee of this House, was unable to force itself to come to grips with the knotty problem of this type.

Perhaps if Ontario cannot do the research from the provincial end of this discussion it cannot be done and it may be a long time before an occasion is presented when as much urgency in this particular area of constitutional reform is felt by all participants.

I have never agreed with those in high places, in government or journalism, who have repeated, one after the other, that fiscal affairs cannot be divorced from all constitutional affairs. Perhaps the member for Carleton would like to point out to me what Mr. Trudeau has said and that I, therefore, disagree with him.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: And he also said, as I believe, that fiscal policies should not be used to intrude into Quebec's educational jurisdiction.

Mr. Nixon: Right. Right. There are many areas of meaningful reform which have no fiscal overtones at all. Even these were not dealt with effectively by the conference. I refer specifically to the entrenchment of a charter of human rights, which I have discussed already. The reform of the Senate which Ontario deals with in proposition number 25, and, of course, the Supreme Court.

Perhaps I should say something about the Senate. I have already said, outside the House, that I believe its usefulness is at an end. I believe that if this conference of Premiers and Prime Ministers can be constituted on a regular and frequent basis, there is every way for the reasonable aspirations of provinces and regions to be put before the other government and before the people of Canada. I, for that reason, would recommend that if this continuing conference does in fact become an effective adjunct to the regular processes of government, that the Senate would become an anachronism and should be abolished.

Mr. MacDonald: It has been policy for 30 years.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly the allocation of responsibilities that cost money to support must be considered at the same time as the allocation of tax sources. This is easily understood. But the platitude of the indivisibility of fiscal and constitutional matters in many respect was a block of meaningful progress in areas where it might otherwise have been expected.

When it comes to leadership and the real problems of our nation, I want to take a moment to quote from an article written by Stan McDowell in the Winnipeg Free Press:

Throughout the June election campaign, Mr. Trudeau persuaded the voters to make promises to one another and to him by winning applause in Quebec for his "one nation" stand and applause in English-speaking Canada for the proposition that the French-speaking should enjoy equality throughout the whole country. The Prime Minister has continued, since the election, to seize every opportunity to communicate to the people his belief in the need for a bill of rights, accompanied especially by a guarantee of linguistic equality.

These are surely two matters of great importance that have been put before the nation and before the conference by the Prime Minister of Canada. Progress has been made in both of these areas. Certainly not the least of which was Ontario. But no progress has been made in the realignment of responsibilities, largely because the Premier of Ontario failed at the conference to provide the leadership expected.

Now I want to talk about some solutions. The ideal solution for our constitutional difficulties would surely be to have seized on the mood of the public in our Centennial year and undertaken the full responsibility for a new, modern Constitution meeting the needs for our second century. This possibility seems more remote now than it did a year ago, when even Ontario cannot bring itself to do the hard thinking needed to specifically reallocate powers and fiscal responsibilities.

The time may come when we see fit to throw The British North America Act in the waste basket and start fresh with a document or a constitutional vehicle which is completely our own and which reflects—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? I did not know whether that reference to me personally was his or is that in the article he was quoting from some paper?

Mr. Nixon: No, I think I indicated the—if I did not, it was before that particular reference. The reference to the Premier of Ontario is mine.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Thank you.

Mr. Sopha: He will accept responsibility for it.

Mr. Nixon: Now I am talking about a goal which eventually must come to pass, whether in our time or someone else's, that we have a Constitution arrived at in our own nation, and which reflects the aspirations of what has become an independent nation with a proud history and a hopeful future.

But we, I suppose, practise the politics of practicality. There are short-term responsibilities that we must not lose sight of. As a politician and a Canadian, I demand that our delegation take every step possible to see that our Constitution is patriated and that the requirement that we petition the Parliament of Great Britain is eliminated for all time. The procedures for amendment must, of course, be a part of this solution.

But while we wait for time and opportunity to accomplish this goal, I am convinced that the continuing federal-provincial conference must meet on a regular and frequent basis to eliminate the formality and time-wasting of restating old positions. If the continuing conference becomes a new level of government in fact, then so be it; and it will be in Parliament and in the Legislature, and eventually at the ballot boxes, that the democratic controls will be exerted.

I have no doubt that men of goodwill, and that includes all of us I am sure, can use the flexibility that has been found already by the courts and parliamentarians in The British North America Act, to meet our continuing and changing requirements. While we have the long-range goals that I have already stated, this continuing conference must get down to finding solutions for problems that have plagued us far too long. At the head of the list must be positions of understanding on the fiscal situation, which has already been discussed on other occasions and will no doubt be a part of our Budget debate in the immediate future. The long-range sniping between the provincial capitals and Ottawa cannot be used as a political tool to fool the taxpayers any longer.

The conference as well must deal with the shared responsibility for many other practical and immediate matters, such as Indian affairs. It can come to some agreement on off-shore mineral rights; the revamping of old-fashioned welfare into a truly effective modern programme of a guaranteed minimum income. It must consider and solve our continuing problems of financial disparity that are so much a real part of constitutional problems.

Taken all in all, the conference under discussion was a failure in its decisions—which too often relied on that old gimmick of committee referral—but a resounding success as an educational vehicle for all Canadians to hear their politicians in action, and to share with them the problems that are inherent in Canadian nationhood. Our Constitution must make us not rivals for power but partners for progress. The people of Ontario expect it of us and we must not fail them.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the Prime Minister this afternoon, it occurred to me that any record that has to be defended at such length as he defended the Medicare record is certainly a very, very vulnerable one.

We have listened to this Medicare story so many times, yet for reasons that still escape me, it was injected to a degree that was really out of order during the constitutional debate this afternoon. Obviously, the government is engaged in laying the groundwork for the Budget or some tactic beyond it—I am not going to attempt to engage in the game of speculating exactly what the government is up to. I noticed at one point, when the leader of the Opposition was speaking and expressing some wonderment as to whether the Prime Minister's statement this afternoon meant that the government was going into Medicare or staying out, the Prime Minister interjected sotto voce, "Well, I've got you guessing".

He may have a lot of people guessing, but I do not think at this stage of the game that that is the point of debate with regard to Medicare. The Prime Minister contends, for example, that Medicare has been given "an artificial priority", Mr. Speaker, can you think of anything more preposterous! Fifty years after Medicare became a major issue in the politics in this country, a Prime Minister should rise in the largest Legislature in this country and say that it has been given an artificial priority because we are on the eve of implementing it? Only from a Tory could that kind of a comment come.

As a matter of fact, exactly what this party believes, and whether its members all believe the same thing—notwithstanding the firm assertions of the Prime Minister this afternoon—I invite you to consider by going back to last year. Believe it or not, the seconder of the motion in reply to the Speech from the Throne—and therefore he was something of a spokesman for the party because I think it is generally recognized that the mover and seconder are speaking for the party—the hon. member for York East (Mr. Meen) rose and delivered himself of a stinging attack against the principle of universality in Medicare. In commenting on it, to be found on page 220 in Hansard, I made this statement:

Already, in this Legislature, the Tory colours have been nailed firmly to the mast. In seconding the address, the member for York East proudly proclaimed his party's opposition to the principle of universality. He called Medicare a socialist measure . . . and implied his party would never countenance its implementation.

I am continuing the quote, and I repeat it this year:

I have news for the member. I predict that two years from now, in response to the public pressure, his party will have taken Ontario into the national Medicare plan and, what is more, this Tory government will be taking credit for the whole idea.

I repeat that prediction right here, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister simply is not going to persist—in whatever the kind of tactics he is engaged in and whatever be the motive and the objective in the short term—in refusing to take $175 millions, from Ottawa and continue to lament that they are denying us the money that we already paid into the federal treasury. It is a case of taking the money and using it, and I would add, incidentally, without chiselling on it, by charging the same level or higher, as he attempted to argue this afternoon, in premiums, so that he can direct the money elsewhere though it has originally been given for Medicare itself.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, if I may lower my voice and just say to the Prime Minister that in this issue, I think his statement and his conduct are demeaning; demeaning of the province and, in fact, demeaning of the stature which he has built as a leader among those reshaping Confederation at the present time.

It is this kind of attitude, with all of the vagaries and the inconsistencies in his presentation, that evokes a response that was so magnificently illustrated at one stage during the conference when Joey Smallwood referred to it as "feeding the fat sow". That is the kind of attitude, rightly or wrongly, that is evoked in the mind of other Canadians. To say that you are in favour of a social measure, as this government does, and then continue to object in the most vigorous fashion to the manner in which it is going to be implemented, is the last refuge of a person who is, in fact, opposed to that social measure.

The record of opposition by the Tory government has been too long to be erased by a few words today from an existing Tory government which does everything possible to frustrate its implementation to assist people across the country. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the thing that makes it even more demeaning—and surely this must have struck the Prime Minister—is that as the Prime Minister of the richest province in this country, he continues to rail against Medicare and the manner in which it is being handled, when two of his fellow Conservative Prime Ministers in "have-not" or "have-less" provinces, namely Manitoba and Nova Scotia, are going into it because their people have desperate need for this social measure that should have come a generation, or two or three generations, ago.

The simple fact of the matter is that the Tory government in the province of Ontario was dragged in by events, was pushed in by events, kicking and squealing, into the Canada Pension Plan, making all manner of excuses for the reason it could not get in at an earlier date.

On the evidence of its basic doctrine, ideological objection and opposition to the plan, it is going to be dragged kicking and squealing into the national Medicare plan.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take the time tonight to discuss the Prime Minister's new figures on the cost of Medicare. I would like to read the figures and attempt to absorb them, because they are so bizarre as to be unrelated to any other set of figures on Medicare that one might have read elsewhere. He is trying to conjure up the image that Medicare, with his chiselling on the money he gets from Ottawa, is going to cost more than it is now with OMSIP.

This, again, is the last refuge of a person who is opposed to the measure and is trying to discredit it in the minds of the public. But I just want to make this basic point, and I do it in terms which I have used in the Legislature before because the figures are obviously generally accurate because they coincide with what the Prime Minister himself used this afternoon.

I was fascinated last spring to see the Canadian Press survey that had been made across the country indicating what the cost of the Medicare plan would be in each province if that province moved in to the national plan, and secondly, what is now being spent in each of those provinces, through either public or private plans. If the province of Ontario were to move into Medicare through the national plan, the cost to the province would be $350 million. The figures the Prime Minister gave this afternoon—even on per capita averages as high as $54—were $358 million plus $18 million for administration, a total of $375 million. So the figure is essentially the same as the $350 million. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the thing we must not forget, yet this government will never face up to, is that the cost now for Medicare in the province of Ontario through private plans and through OMSIP is $365 million—$15 million more than it would cost to enter the plan.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can quite see the Minister of Revenue being perplexed by that because it appears to contradict what everybody—

Hon. J. H. White (Minister of Revenue): I am not perplexed at all. I am just astonished that you accept this comparison as valid.

Mr. MacDonald: I will tell you why it is valid. The normal argument has been that if you move into a universal plan it will cost more, not less.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Would the member like to listen for a moment instead of just opening his mouth and letting all that noise flow out? He might learn something.

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey South): Toujours la politesse.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Oui.

Mr. MacDonald: The Prime Minister should know that politesse has no effect upon the hon. Minister of Revenue. He does not know it, and he does not hand it out.

However, what I was saying before I was rudely interrupted, Mr. Speaker, is that everybody has contended in the past—those who were opposed as well as those who were in favour of a public, universal medical insurance plan—that if you implemented it, Medicare would cost more than existing expenditures because of the fact that everybody would have complete coverage instead of partial coverage—90 or 95 per cent—with coverage that had loopholes in it.

Hon. Mr. White: Cannot misuse.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, let us not get into the misuse because that is another question.

Therefore, why would it cost less today if we had a national plan?

I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Minister will listen for a moment. Already, through OMSIP we are covering all of those who normally would not be covered and would have to be subsidized of the public treasury. We are spending some $75 million for those in low income groups, on pensions and for others, so that we are now subsidizing what normally is done through universal coverage. In addition, there is the fact that a significant percentage of the coverage is handled through the private insurance companies who are creaming their profits out of it.

Therefore, we are subsidizing those who are a high risk and cannot meet their own premiums, and we are subsidizing those who are a low risk through the profits of the private insurance companies.

Hon. Mr. White: Would the leader of the NDP permit one simple question?

Mr. MacDonald: Coming from you I accept that description of the question, yes.

Hon. Mr. White: In those jurisdictions where this particular expense has been shifted from the private sector to the public sector, can he show any instance where costs were decreased in any way, or, in fact, can he show any instance in which costs did not balloon immediately after the shift took place?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, you know, Mr. Speaker, I was being a bit sarcastic and unfair when I said that was a simple question, but that really is a simple question.

Hon. Mr. White: All right, let us talk about the differences in costs—

Mr. MacDonald: Costs are going up whether it is public or private, so let us not drag in a red herring that costs are going up because of Medicare. The point I just made—and if the member had been listening instead of talking while I was making it, he would have grasped it—is that I conceded in every—

Hon. Mr. White: I was not talking at all.

Mr. MacDonald: He is still not listening. I conceded that in every instance where you move from private to public coverage, costs went up, so I was addressing us to the question of why this particular survey suggested we are now spending $365 million in Ontario, yet the national Medicare plan would cost only $350 million.

My answer is not that the figures are wrong. My answer is that the subsidy that would be required in universal coverage to give everybody complete coverage is already being made through OMSIP because we are now subsidizing that sector of society.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, we are also subsidizing the life insurance friends of this Tory government, and that is the reason why this government is going to go down kicking and squealing before it will accept public Medicare. I hope that the Liberals in Ottawa are not going to weaken; that they will maintain the particular requirements of the plan so that this government will have to have a public plan which will be non-profit. I hope in the process of the argument somebody does not tell me that the private insurance companies are going to stay in the picture as benevolent organizations, not taking a profit. That is hogwash.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Well, you know what a terrible man you are to—

Mr. MacDonald: We will get back to that. I do not know who did the mathematics for the Provincial Treasurer, but we will get back to it, we will find out that he and his whole corps of advisors had better get a new adding machine.

Mr. Speaker, I want to turn to the issue that I thought we were debating today, the Constitution, though we have been rather badly derailed through the lead of the Prime Minister on to this extensive and out-of-order debate on Medicare. I want to say in advance, Mr. Speaker, that I am not going to attempt to deal with many of the propositions—those 40 propositions that the government presented to the continuing committee—because there are a half a dozen of my colleagues intending to engage in this debate and they will deal with them.

I want to focus my remarks on the constitutional conference itself, because, as is known, I, along with the leader of the Opposition, had the opportunity as official observers, to watch that conference at first hand.

Let me comment first on the waffling in the assessment as to what this conference achieved. I was interested in the Prime Minister this afternoon attempting to achieve a delightful balance. "We did not achieve too much," he suggested, but by the time he was finished, he was contending that it was an "extensive success".

Now, I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what an "extensive success" is, but what I do know is that it is nothing in relation to the conference that was held in Ottawa February 10 to 13. Let us not kid ourselves that there was any extensive success.

It is only when, as the Prime Minister rather skillfully did, you put the conference in context—when you borrow from the success of the conference a year ago, and you borrow hopefully from the success of the "Future Conferences", that you can say that this conference was in any way a success, let alone an "extensive success".

In fact, Mr. Speaker, it was little more than a holding operation. It was little more than that because of the lack of leadership that was given by the two people upon whom leadership must come if we are going to be able to move forward in reshaping our constitution, namely the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of the province of Ontario.

Let us just pause for a moment, Mr. Speaker, and remind ourselves that a year has elapsed since the first meeting of the constitutional conference that was held in February, 1968. Federal-provincial relationships in this country deteriorated very, very badly. And they did so, I suggest, for three reasons. There were many reasons, but I am going to pick three.

The first one is that the Prime Minister of Ontario stepped down from his role of being the honest broker between the provinces and Ottawa. He lined up with the provincial governments in an all-out attack upon the federal government. On occasion, indeed, that attack degenerated into a verbal slugging match that could not help but harm federal-provincial relationships in this country.

Secondly, Ottawa's position, under Trudeau's leadership, is one of stubborn unyielding. Its inflexibility is not, I suggest to you, a viable posture for constitutional negotiations. It is highly provocative. It creates a sense of frustration that is not conducive to the kind of compromises that are going to be necessary in re-shaping the constitution in this country.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): A very shallow comment. A majority government after six years of minority government. That is what it is. It is a majority government.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Speaker, if my comment was shallow, that interjection is irrelevant, because the fact that it is a majority government has nothing to do with its inflexibility.

Mr. Sopha: The Premier of Ontario could push them around as long as they were a minority. He cannot do that now.

Mr. MacDonald: I wish we had minority governments so that we could be pushed around closer to reality.

However, Mr. Speaker, let me proceed. I come to my third reason. As the conference approached, an atmosphere of crisis developed in this country. It was created in part by the public repudiation of The Official Languages Act by the four western provinces. Prime Minister Trudeau completed that atmosphere of crisis by television statements on the eve of the conference that nothing less than the survival of the nation was at stake. He even implied in a taped interview—taped so that it could not be denied, although an effort was made to deny it—with the Toronto Daily Star, that if a bilingual Canada was not possible then he did not have any continuing interest in being Prime Minister.

Mr. Sopha: He said there would be no Canada, and he is right.

Mr. MacDonald: Now, under these circumstances, perhaps the most progress that we could expect was to halt the deterioration in government relationships in this country—the deterioration that had gone on in the past year.

Admittedly there were some successes. I am not going to dwell at length on them because I think we want to take a look at the lack of achievement, and why, so that we can improve prospects, if this government will heed, for the future. But there were some successes. Proposals were advanced, for example, for Senate reform and the establishment of a national capital. They were good in themselves, though I note with interest and welcome the fact that the leader of the Liberal Party has now come to support the proposition of eliminating the Senate as an anachronism.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): What do you mean, now come?

Mr. MacDonald: The Liberal Party has never opposed the Senate except by saying it is going to reform it, and not doing anything about it. Now it is the chief refuge of their bag men, as evidenced by the appointment of the Prime Minister who was going to bring new politics into vogue in this country. All of these items, Mr. Speaker, with regard to Senate reform and with regard to a national capital are good in themselves, but they are peripheral matters.

The prospect for entrenching fundamental political rights in the Constitution was much improved. Ontario's position has changed over the past year. The Attorney General told us that he had done his homework in the interval, and in doing his homework, as has been pointed out earlier in the debate, he virtually reversed the position of the Ontario Government. He certainly reversed it in terms of the validity of entrenching some of the fundamental rights in the Constitution, instead of going into an elaborate and extraneous argument that fundamental rights would not be protected any more with entrenchment.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Never opposed it.

Mr. MacDonald: I would have to concede to the Attorney General that he talked on both sides of the issue so that now he could say he has not changed his position. But the whole impact of his presentation a year ago was to say that he was not in favour of entrenchment and, as has been pointed out, most Premiers across the table tended to go along. It threw a shadow over the prospect of achieving what we have always felt to be a very worthy objective. And, when you couple Ontario's new position with the fact that during this conference the Prime Minister of Quebec indicated that they are open-minded on the proposition of entrenching of these fundamental rights, I think one can conclude that agreement for a charter of human rights is now a real possibility, with the continuing work of the working committee. Even, Mr. Speaker—and here I may sound as though I am out of step with the current wisdom—

Mr. Sopha: Conventional wisdom.

Mr. MacDonald: Current wisdom, because it has not been around enough to become conventional. Even on the question of The Official Languages Act, it is my impression that the opposition of the four western provinces may resolve itself into a face-saving device of a reference to the Supreme Court to confirm whether or not the bill lies within the federal jurisdiction.

I think the tragedy of all this, Mr. Speaker, lies in the misunderstanding which one has to acknowledge as being very deep-seated throughout western Canada, indeed in many other places in Canada. It was a pretty tragic failure on the part of the federal government to explain what their bill was.

People had a grossly exaggerated idea of the application of The Official Languages Act—a picture of all the courts having judges who must be bilingual, and court clerks who must be bilingual, and so on. When it was finally explained to those who presumably should have been in a position to know, namely the Premiers of the provinces, it was interesting to note the greater acceptance. As the Premier of Alberta put it:

Well, if it does not make any more difference to the present situation than you now suggest, I do not think we would have any continuing opposition, but we still think it would be a good idea to send it to the Supreme Court.

There is no particular problem in reference to the Supreme Court, because the overwhelming consensus is that it will be confirmed as intra vires by the Supreme Court because it is strictly within the federal jurisdiction. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, on this issue, because of the educational achievement of the conference—among those who were at it, to say nothing of the public—I think we have broken through to the possibility of acceptance of The Official Languages Act.

However, having said that, on the basic issue of taxation and fiscal policy which is fundamental to government relations in Canada, and therefore to constitutional review, nothing of significance was accomplished. Whether or not the deterioration in this basic area has even been halted, is a very debatable question. There is reason to wonder, for example, whether sufficient consensus was achieved at the level of the first Ministers so that you can have meaningful work in the continuing committee to try to reconcile the sharp divergencies that we have at the present time on the question of taxation and related divisions of power.

Mr. Speaker, why was no progress made on this fundamental issue? On the federal side—

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East): Do you not know?

Mr. MacDonald: If I do know, I am going to tell you, because that is precisely what I am addressing myself to. On the federal side, the Liberal government's position was intransigent. "If the province needs more money, raise your taxes," Trudeau says. Very simple. The consequences, Mr. Speaker, of that dictate are appalling to contemplate. Some provinces, including the province of Ontario, let us admit it, relatively speaking, could go out and raise the money that is needed, because we have the tax base, we have the basic wealth. But the result would be a tax jungle that would destroy the possibility of building one Canada.

More important, other provinces simply cannot go out and raise the necessary revenues. The disparities in living standards and services would become even greater; equality of opportunity among Canadians would become a myth. A severe blow would be struck at the unity of this country; ironically, it would be struck by the man who was elected because he contended that he was going to build one country.

But let us recognize, Mr. Speaker, the Trudeau dictate, "go raise your own taxes" is not an isolated slogan. It is part and parcel of his concept of federalism. It is the Prime Minister's personal credo that the federal government should get out of the shared-cost programmes which fall in our 100-year-old Constitution within the provincial jurisdiction. He believes that these responsibilities should be handed back to the provinces. Indeed, he has already warned that, even on such a major share-cost programme as Medicare, five years hence it is his intention to hand it back to the provinces.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Including education, as the Liberal leader would not admit it.

Mr. MacDonald: Right. These basic beliefs, Mr. Speaker, were set forth in his writings—

Mr. Singer: Good. You two fellows have a common umbrella—

Mr. MacDonald: —writings on federalism before he entered politics. Now, as Prime Minister, he is proceeding to implement it.

Mr. R. G. Hodgson (Victoria-Haliburton): This is not completely a negative presentation.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, when the provinces forced a reordering of the agenda to give top priority to fiscal and taxation matters, Prime Minister Trudeau's disarming ploy was to state that this was really a constitutional matter. Tell us, he said, where you want the federal government to exercise its spending powers and we will be glad to consider your proposals.

Well, as was to be expected, Mr. Speaker, the provinces responded with a Babel of voices, reflecting the varying interests of the provinces in the particular shared-cost programmes to which they give top priority.

After two hours of debate there was no alternative but to shunt the whole question for further study out into the tax structure committee.

That, of course, was precisely what Trudeau wanted. All the provinces had agreed that fiscal and taxation matters were of immediate urgent concern, but Prime Minister Trudeau achieved his purpose of submerging them in the broad consideration of constitutional review.

Now in my view, Mr. Speaker, the man who is responsible for the collapse of the province's hopes, on this particularly critical, basic, fundamental issue, was the Prime Minister of the province of Ontario. Nobody was more insistent and nobody was more strident in his demands, prior to the conference, than our Prime Minister. Yet he failed at the critical moment to give leadership to the provinces, and, by his failure, he conceded the field to the federal government.

I have no particular objection to our Prime Minister stepping down from his position of "honest broker" between the provinces and the federal government. Ottawa's inflexibility may well have made that inevitable. But my objection is that in forsaking the leadership role of "honest broker" in reshaping Confederation, he failed to assume a leadership role among the provinces to achieve the immediate consideration of urgent fiscal matters—so urgent that he, himself, had been responsible for the crescendo of the build-up to the conference itself throughout last fall and the earlier part of this year.

At the critical moment the Prime Minister was content, once again, to play the old broken record regarding Medicare; to resort to exaggerated language about a "fraud" and "the Machiavellian scheme"; to indulge in a straight piece of grandstanding to the television audience. The whole thing was a gigantic bluff—a diversionary tactic to soften the public in preparation for whatever this government has in mind. God knows what that is; quite frankly, I am not certain that the government knows at this point, because I think it is playing it by ear in a game which is confusing the whole effort to reshape the Constitution and keep a direction on it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all of this is a little sad. A little sad if it were not so very serious. In the years that led up to Canada's Centennial, this nation drifted in face of the wide range of problems involved in constitutional review, including taxation, because the federal government used the sharp divisions among the provinces to justify their lack of leadership and initiative. The whole period was characterized by what came to be known as the "Pearson drift".

It was the Prime Minister of Ontario who halted that drift.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Came to be known by what name?

An hon. member: First time I heard of it.

Mr. MacDonald: Never heard of Pearson drifting?

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): No, never.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, how immune can Liberals be to the reality of the day if they never heard of Pearson drifting?

Mr. Trotter: More of your current wisdom.

Mr. Sopha: Tell us about that speech in Ottawa on special statutes.

Mr. MacDonald: Just a minute, we will get to that. Do not get ahead of yourself—or do not get ahead of me. You will have a chance to speak a little later.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, it was the Prime Minister of Ontario who halted that drift with his Confederation of Tomorrow Conference. Let us remind ourselves that the federal government refused even to send observers to the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference. I heard with my own ears from one Liberal spokesman in a discussion on the issue; they did so because they were convinced that the conference was going to fail—that the provinces could not achieve a consensus, and, therefore, they would be able to say, "Well, you see the normal difficulties we have to contend with; perhaps you will have more sympathy for us now. Perhaps you will understand why we do not take the kind of vigorous leadership that our critics said we should be taking." But, Mr. Speaker—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: But, Mr. Speaker, the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference proved that the provinces could resolve their differences. At least, to the point of arriving at a consensus which would permit the detailed work of the continuing committee. That consensus carried through and was responsible in good part for the success of the first meeting of the constitutional conference held in February of 1968.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that consensus has dissolved. It dissolved during the last year. But the basis for a new and perhaps an even more solid consensus—at least, among the provinces—has emerged in the growing unanimity among the provinces that there must be more money made available from the growth taxes to meet their budgetary deficits.

The impasse developed into a sloganeering from both sides. "Give us more money," the provinces chorused. "If you need more money, raise your own taxes," was the federal retort. It was patently obvious, Mr. Speaker, to everybody—including, I am sure, even the Prime Minister of the province of Ontario—that Ottawa was not going to budge from its position.

That being the case, what could, or should, have been the approach of the Prime Minister of Ontario in the constitutional conference? Surely, Mr. Speaker, the constructive approach was to tackle the problem from the other side.

If Ottawa was firm in its refusal to provide the provinces through shared taxes, raised equitably on a national basis, with the financial resources to meet their constitutional responsibility, then the obvious solution lies in the re-division of some of those responsibilities to the federal government which has national access to the taxes to meet them.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Not so obviously.

Mr. MacDonald: What was that interjection?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I say it is not such an obvious solution as you present.

Mr. MacDonald: It is not?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: It is not.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, you know, I was rather interested as I was listening to the Prime Minister this afternoon—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Oh, I recognize the possibility.

Mr. MacDonald: —this afternoon and I jotted it down. He said: "The government most capable of doing the job efficiently should have the responsibility," and, "very necessary to match revenues with responsibilities".

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, my interjection simply means, Mr. Speaker, that I recognize the point he makes, but I do not think it is quite as simple a solution as he says. I mean, if the federal government simply says: "We will give you no more money," I do not think the obvious solution for the provinces is to say, "Well, then, we will immediately surrender responsibility."

This is my point. I do not think it is that obvious.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We would not surrender responsibilities rapidly—nor do I think any of the other provinces would—for instance, in the field of education, or in many areas of provincial responsibility just because the federal government said, "No more money."

Mr. MacDonald: I want to get to that in a moment, because I was rather interested, not only in what happened at the constitutional conference, but also what happened in some of the comments of the Prime Minister this afternoon.

But the point I am making is the Prime Minister of the province of Ontario and his colleagues were calling upon the federal government to make more money available. They knew they were not going to get it, but they said it was an absolute and urgent necessity. The four western provinces were saying the same thing. Indeed, let us recognize you had unanimity on this issue.

That is why you had the possibility of the kind of consensus among the provincial Premiers, the potential consensus, which, at the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference, the Prime Minister of Ontario succeeded in evoking so that you laid the basis for the kind of progress that was possible in the first meeting of the constitutional conference. I suggest that there was no area in which there was again unanimity among the provinces and a possibility for a consensus, more than this particular area with regard to the urgency of getting more money to be able to meet the budgetary deficits at the provincial level.

And what did the Prime Minister of Ontario do on that particular issue? I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, other than his fraudulent intervention on Medicare—perhaps that is a more appropriate use of the term "fraudulent"—he did nothing. He said nothing on this to seek a re-division of powers. In spite of the fact, as he told us this afternoon, we have talked about this, not only outside of the House but in this House, down through the years. We got nothing more than the old refrain with regard to Medicare.

Mr. Speaker, if the needs of the Canadian people are going to be met in the second century, and if the Constitution is to help, rather than to hinder, the fulfillment of those needs, there must be a more realistic equation of responsibilities and financial capacity to meet them on the part of all levels of government. In my view, the Prime Minister of Ontario abdicated Ontario's historic role in giving leadership to the provinces in grappling with that basic problem. He left it to the new boy of the group, the Premier of Manitoba, to intervene persistently and vigorously in attempting to come to grips with the issue. Little wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister of Quebec lamented at the close of the conference:

I was disappointed that the other provinces didn't show more interest in the question of the redistribution of powers after all the work that had been done by the continuing committee of civil servants.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: What powers?

Mr. MacDonald: We will come to that in a moment. Why did Ontario's leadership, Mr. Speaker, fail so completely at this critical point? Now I come back to the Prime Minister's comment this afternoon. Is it because Ontario and other provinces are reluctant to give up traditional powers, even though they do not have the financial capacity to meet them? Is it a case that Ontario—and I am not going to suggest Ontario alone, but other provinces—simply do not want to dismantle the empire they have?

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): That is right.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: It is not an empire. It is part of our Constitution.

Mr. MacDonald: All right, if that word offends the member—do not want to dismantle the jurisdiction they have. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, once again the only man who at any point during the course of the conference said something on this point was Premier Weir of Manitoba. When he was arguing—not at great length, because they have fixed a date for going into Medicare—but when he was arguing about the shared cost, at one point he said to the Prime Minister of Canada:

If you are so convinced that Medicare should be given this priority, take it over; take the whole thing, pay for it 100 per cent.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there has to be leadership on this issue. That leadership has to come from nowhere more than the Prime Minister of the province of Ontario, in Ontario's interests and as a Canadian statesman in the interests of the rest of the nation.

We have to face up to which of the powers we are willing to hand back to Ottawa, because surely it is obvious, in the year 1967, 100 years after Confederation that, because of the growth of government services, too much of the burden of government responsibility now rests at the provincial level?

Hon. Mr. White: Not necessarily.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, unless you are going to get an acceptance to hand over the tax base to the provincial governments to a degree that conflicts with another one of your major objectives, namely, that we must have a strong federal government. You simply cannot whittle away at the role of the federal government—if this is what the Minister of Revenue is arguing—to finance all the services that the province now has. You will end up with a federal government which is gradually having its national capacity eroded.

Hon. Mr. White: Not at all.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, we will see.

Hon. Mr. White: If they have all the mandatory powers, most of the fiscal powers, all foreign affairs powers, and so forth—do not be so silly. They would have more power as a central government if they did their own duties well, instead of infringing on the provinces all the time.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lawlor: The Minister can make a speech on the subject.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: He just did.

Mr. MacDonald: As a matter of fact, he usually does it on other people's time—that is the problem—when he is seated and someone is standing, in violation of the rules of the House.

I was interested, Mr. Speaker, in the re-statement of the Ontario government's case this afternoon when the Prime Minister objected to the proposition of sort of under-the-table equalization through the financing of Medicare costs, that we get less than it costs us and some other province is going to get more than it costs them. Why is the Prime Minister of the wealthiest province in this country objecting to that?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I said equalization, yes, but equalization in an equalization formula where we see it all, not buried in a whole host of programmes, hidden here, hidden there. Put it all into one so we know what we are doing.

Mr. MacDonald: Right.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: That is all—

Mr. MacDonald: Right, and the point that I was making is: Why does the leader of the wealthiest province in this country object to the proposition that the financial formula for a major social measure should have involved in it some equalization factor? What is the Prime Minister's objection—he is in favour of equalization in principle—this is the great merit of the constitution as we have had it.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: But do not bury it in a thousand different places.

Mr. MacDonald: Sure, a thousand different places—

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Equalization as we have it in one equalization arrangement which we make periodically with the federal government. We take the tax basis of the provinces and equate them all to a common level and then make the payment to bring it to the common level. Why not do it that way instead of burying equalization in all these odd programmes, so that you have to be really an accountant to find out what the equalization is?

Mr. MacDonald: Let me say to the Prime Minister, I do not care a damn how many places they equalize.

Hon. Mr. Roberts: But I did.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, if we had achieved something of equality of opportunity and living standards across this country, then there might be some validity in the Prime Minister of the richest province in this country arguing that he objects to hidden equalization. But the problem in this country today is that the disparity between the "have" and the "have-not" provinces is getting wider instead of narrowing. Therefore why does he persist in the theoretical, legalistic objection to it?

Hon. Mr. Roberts: Because it is the wrong way.

Mr. MacDonald: I am suggesting to him—and this is echoing and joining with part of the argument that was advanced in the latter part of the remarks by the leader of the Opposition—that one of the factors in building Canada in the future, as it has been in the past, is going to be measures that can strengthen Canadian unity—measures like national medical insurance. Involved in them, you are going to have some degree of equalization in the financing of it; what is wrong with it? That is Canada.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, in my comment and analysis of the conference I want to turn to a related but somewhat different matter, and that is the whole question of the position of Quebec. I think I am not exaggerating when I say that the popular impression created by the media, electronic and traditional media, was that the position taken by Prime Minister Bertrand at the constitutional conference was a rigid intransigent position—to a greater extent than was the case of Daniel Johnson a year ago.

It is my view that this is not an accurate reflection of the reality of the situation. If you take all of the tough statements that were made by Prime Minister Bertrand, you will discover that they were to be found in one or another of the speeches of Daniel Johnson a year ago. There was no change in substance; I will agree that there was a change in atmosphere.

One man, the late Daniel Johnson, made his case bluntly and then he smiled and he withdrew and there would be the diplomatic gesture. In the instance of Prime Minister Bertrand, he makes his case bluntly. There it is on the table, and there is no qualification. But in fact it is the same case. Indeed, Mr. Speaker—here I begin to relate to some of the comments that were made by the leader of the Opposition—we have got to face the fact that in the province of Quebec, no matter who speaks for the province of Quebec, they have said essentially the same thing—whether it was Lesage, a Liberal, or whether it was Daniel Johnson, or whether it was Jean Jacques Bertrand. We must face that fact and not evade it, as was implied by an interjection earlier in the debate by the hon. member for Sudbury. That is one of the facts of Canadian life.

Now that presents us in English Canada with a choice. We can either accommodate ourselves to that fact or we can split this nation. We can opt either for a federalism—with the concession in that federalism of a somewhat different relationship between the federal government and the province of Quebec—or for separatism.

I go back, Mr. Speaker, to the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference a year ago last November. I recall two comments that were made during that conference by the two leading Prime Ministers at it. On one occasion Prime Minister Robarts made the comment:

Well, maybe the approach that we should take is that we, the provinces, who agree that there must be a strong federal government, all of us—with the exception of Quebec of course—should decide what are the inviolable rights the federal government must have. Perhaps when we have done that we will have guidelines for the reshaping of the Constitution.

Daniel Johnson's approach was different. His proposal, in a very detailed study that was presented and is available in the continuing way for the committees, was that the powers which are now shared to some degree by the federal government should, in total, revert to the provincial government, so that the provinces would be on an equal basis to start with. Then the provinces would have the right to delegate such of those powers as they wish back to the federal government. The contention is that because the English-speaking provinces want a strong central government, and they need the co-operation of the fiscal and monetary policy of the federal government to achieve equality of standards and to remove some of the disparities, the English-speaking provinces would be willing to delegate some, or many of those powers, back to the federal government.

When you take the approach of Prime Minister Robarts—whatever inviolable rights the federal government must have so that we can have a strong federal government—and you take the approach of Daniel Johnson—of theoretically restoring all the powers to the provinces, but giving them the right to delegate them back in the belief that all of the provinces with the exception of Quebec would delegate most of them back to the central government—then you sit down, as one day we are going to have to sit in the constitutional conference and narrow the gap between the two positions, so that the difference between Quebec and the rest of the country is as narrow as possible.

But I am firmly convinced we are going to end with something of a gap, and that gap will represent the special relationship of Quebec with the Ottawa government. I think it is idle—it is inflexible, it is simplistic—to have the kind of approach of Prime Minister Trudeau today—apparently supported by the provincial Liberal Party—if I interpreted correctly the comments of the leader of the Opposition this afternoon.

Mr. Trotter: He has got you worried.

Mr. MacDonald: He has not got me worried, Mr. Speaker, I will pick up that interjection, he has got me worried, worried for the future of this country, because you are not going to be able to achieve the kind of compromise and the kind of flexibility by this rather simplistic approach. In fact, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Nixon: You will admit you are in the minority.

Mr. MacDonald: I am not in the minority. As a matter of fact, the overwhelming majority of the people in the province of Quebec support this, and if you want to delude yourself for the moment that the vote that Trudeau got for a complex of reasons that have no relationship to this issue, proves to the contrary, then you will have to wait until future events prove otherwise.

Trudeau's direction, Mr. Speaker, is clear. He wants to see federal and provincial power divided into neat watertight compartments. He wants Ottawa to withdraw from the joint programmes and abandon that approach as a future federal device. In doing so, he is going to make a strong central government less and less possible in this country. He is dismantling the national capacity to shape Canada's future.

And, Mr. Speaker, when I say that the reason for the limited success, if not the failure, of the constitutional conference, was the failure of the leadership of Prime Minister Trudeau and the Prime Minister of Ontario, I do not present it as my own words. Indeed, I want to back it up from a source that one would normally think—as far as Trudeau was concerned—would be a friendly source. On February 13—

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, I am not interrupting to interfere with the presentation—

Mr. MacDonald: That is a change, I will be delighted.

Hon. Mr. White: There would seem to be an inconsistency here, the federal government having said, "No, we will not give the provinces any more tax room" leaves an alternative—

Mr. MacDonald: They have not?

Hon. Mr. White: The federal government having said, "We will not provide any more tax room or enlarge our grants to the provinces," offers an obvious alternative, as the member mentioned earlier, although not an obvious solution, there being a difference, and that obvious alternative is that the provinces automatically shift these responsibilities from the provincial level to the federal level.

Now, I think we can all agree with this as being a proposition and one that has certain advantages and disadvantages, but now the hon. member says something different. He says the federal government, in attempting to compartmentalize both responsibilities and revenues, is weakening the central government.

The question occurs to me, is the federal government doing these two things concurrently in an attempt to force a shift of responsibilities from the provinces to the federal government, thereby increasing the power of the central government, thereby enhancing the centralization of political power in Canada?

If they are using that particular device in the hope of that particular consequence, I think they are playing a very, very dangerous game, because I think Quebec will find it impossible to accede to that progression of events, and I think some other provinces will find it very difficult.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I am not going to attempt to speculate on what the federal government thinks or what its motives are in doing two things at the same time, but my point is simply this, that in taking a stand in favour of this neat compartmentalization and saying that the federal government is going to withdraw from these fields that are constitutionally provincial fields, the federal government's role is weakened. It is eroding a national capacity to play a role in building one country.

Hon. Mr. White: We do not know yet exactly what is in their heart of hearts.

Mr. MacDonald: Well okay. But why do we need to speculate on what is in their heart of hearts. Prime Minister Trudeau, when he was a private citizen, elaborated his concept of federalism. Today, as Prime Minister, he is implementing it. So you do not have to speculate.

Hon. Mr. White: Those are the two party systems which are completely inconsistent one with the other.

Mr. MacDonald: I am sorry, I missed the alleged inconsistency of it, but let me make my basic point. As far as I am concerned, the federal government, in its neat compartmentalization of power, combined with its refusal to provide the provinces with an adequate share of the growth taxes, is going to make it impossible for the people of Canada to be served as they should be served by their senior levels of government. It is going to weaken the federal government.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: You have stated the process. You have stated the problem.

Mr. MacDonald: Okay. Now, we come back to the problem of exactly what powers are going to be handed over. Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. member from Carleton East tonight, I am not going to attempt to spell them out.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Why do you attack the Premier of Ontario?

Mr. MacDonald: Because if the provinces have powers far beyond their fiscal capacity, in its leadership this province should be taking a vigorous step towards finding out which of those powers, as a consensus among the provinces, can be handed back, and should be handed back—

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: To whom?

Mr. MacDonald: To the federal government. All right?

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: I asked you if you will put those—

Mr. MacDonald: I told you that I am not going to attempt tonight to define them.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: Just a minute. I am not going to attempt to define them, Mr. Speaker, and I do not want to get into an idle argument. I quote what the Prime Minister—

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Why should you not do it?

Mr. MacDonald: The Prime Minister this afternoon made this comment.

An hon. member: You are the government, you define it.

Mr. MacDonald: The Prime Minister said, "The government most capable of doing the job efficiently should have the responsibility." All right, there is a very good guide. Instead of not grappling with this fundamental issue, as this government did not at the constitutional conference this time, they should have been leading in grappling with it. They should have been saying, "Now, look, what are the powers which we now have that should be handed back so that our responsibilities can be equated with our financial capacities?" But the Prime Minister said this afternoon, in effect, "We are happy with the status quo."

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: He would not give them any.

Mr. MacDonald: "We are happy with the status quo." I do not want to argue with the hon. member for Carleton East any further because I want to have a quiet word with the Prime Minister.

Ontario can handle its own position. Let us not forget we are the fat sow. We have the capacities, we can hang on to the status quo of provincial powers.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I did not describe it as such.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, there were quotation marks around that.

Mr. Sopha: I did not see them.

Mr. MacDonald: But the "have-not" provinces across this country simply cannot do it. And I suggest to the Prime Minister that one of the functions of his leadership, as the head of the largest English-speaking province, is to sit down with the other provinces and to thrash out among them a consensus, that can be presented to the federal government.

Indeed, on this issue, I think that there is a place for calling the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference once again. The Prime Minister said a week or two ago in answer to a question that since we are proceeding in Ottawa with the constitutional conference, and we are going to be meeting quarterly, we do not need to have the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference.

I want to suggest to the Prime Minister that I think there is a very urgent need for the provinces sitting down and thinking through this problem which was not thought through at the Ottawa conference a week or so ago, so that you can achieve a consensus. Then we can sit down with Ottawa, and work out that consensus in terms of a new statement of the Constitution.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Do you not run the risk—this is a decent debate, I only throw it in—but do you not run the risk then of being accused of this thing that we have worried about so long, and that is that the provinces are ganging up on the federal government. Our detractors would be the first to say that this was what we were doing. I am quite sure.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Prime Minister used that argument, because the Prime Minister was the man who rightly, and I congratulate him for it, dismissed the argument when he called the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I did not call it with that idea in mind.

Mr. MacDonald: I know you did not call it with that idea in mind. And I am not suggesting that you should now call it with that idea in mind. All I am suggesting is that if we are going to get a meaningful equation of powers with financial capacity, the provinces have got to sit down and work it out. The province which must give some leadership is the province of Ontario. The province of Ontario can get along by keeping all its present powers. It can, if it wants to, tax its basis of wealth, meet those powers, at least relatively better than any other province across this country, with the possible exception of British Columbia.

But most of the provinces of Canada, whom we have got to help to get into a position of equality in this nation, cannot do it. Therefore, I think it is the historic role of the province of Ontario, in this kind of a situation, to try to achieve that consensus. That is why I am saddened by the failure of the Prime Minister at this conference. Instead of giving a lead, and zeroing in on this issue—the heart of the whole of the constitutional review.

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, this is most important—

Mr. MacDonald: Not at the moment, if I may, please.

Hon. Mr. White: This is most important.

Mr. MacDonald: I know it is.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South has the floor. If he does not wish to be interrupted then he has that right—

Mr. Sopha: But we are debating about it.

Hon. Mr. White: There is a very important defect in this line of criticism that is leading him very far astray.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, just let me wrap up this point and if there is an important defect I suggest this is important enough that I do not entertain any interjection. But my point is simply this—

Hon. Mr. White: May I say a word, though.

Mr. MacDonald: No, not for a moment. This government has got to take the lead in achieving that consensus among the provinces on what powers it is willing to hand over to the federal government.

Mr. Sopha: None at all. He said this afternoon—

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: What did he say this afternoon?

Mr. MacDonald: He said it, and I know he said it, and that is why I am berating him because he said it. You cannot reshape the Constitution meaningfully to get your equation of powers and fiscal capacities, if you are not willing to give some of them up.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Suggest one.

Mr. Sopha: In ten years I have a list of four that should be given up.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I would not like to be put in the position that I said none, in the way it has been put. I said, we did not see any enormous reason to change the Constitution, but that we were quite prepared to consider changes that might be required or wanted by other provinces. So, do not paint the picture that I slammed the door and said we will not, because when you read Hansard you will find that is not really what I said.

Mr. Sopha: It is just what you said, status quo.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I said that we did not see any reason why, and I have said this many times before. This is not an original remark this afternoon, but I have also always followed it up by saying that we would be quite prepared to discuss changes that might be required by some other part of the country. Now, there is quite a difference. You have got to put the two remarks together. You cannot take one without the other, that is all.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, my point is this, and I think I can make it in a new way. The Prime Minister said this afternoon that Ontario is not anxious to consider those things that have been working well, but what he forgot to add is, "for us". They are not working well for the so-called have-not provinces in the country. They are not working well for them, and I submit that in advance of the third meeting of the constitutional conference—in my view it might even be preferable to be done in another meeting of the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference—you should achieve that consensus.

In other words, it is a variation of the proposition that the Ontario Prime Minister put to the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference, when he said: "Maybe we should sit down and decide what should be inviolable rights of a strong federal government".

Maybe he should couple that with another question: What are the powers that the provinces now have that should be handed back to the federal government so that we can achieve more easily the necessary balance between responsibilities and the fiscal capacities to meet them?

I am convinced, in view of what has happened in the last 100 years of the growth of services in the provincial jurisdiction, that there must be some sort of a re-division, otherwise every ten years you are going to get into the same kind of bind we are in now. The provinces are going to be forced to badger Ottawa to get more money to meet their fiscal responsibility.

However, Mr. Speaker, let me try to bring my remarks to a close and, by way of summary, set forth what I think are the guide lines for action.

First, Ontario should firmly assert its support for an extensive rewriting of the Constitution, involving the elimination of the obsolete sections such as were listed in the second proposition presented by the Ontario government, and including a preamble, as suggested in proposition 3, setting forth the aims of the Canadian people and their reasons for preserving a federal union.

Second, Ontario should pursue with all possible haste the implementation of linguistic rights which lie within the provincial jurisdiction, and extend full support for such actions within the federal jurisdiction as is represented by The Official Languages Act.

Third, Ontario should give a vigorous lead in seeking support by all provinces for a charter of human rights through the entrenchment of basic civil rights.

Fourth, there is virtual unanimity that the provinces must have more revenue to meet their current constitutional responsibilities. Ontario should lead the provinces towards a consensus as to the modern methods for achieving this. If the federal government persists in its determination to grant no more tax room, Ontario should move constructively to solve the impasse by proposing a new allocation of powers between the provinces and Ottawa.

Fifth, any rigid division of powers will inevitably become outdated as the needs of modern society undergo dynamic change. Flexibility in any rewritten constitution, therefore become highly desirable. Ontario should withstand the federal efforts sharply to compartmentalize respective responsibilities. Rather she should press to clarify procedures under which a shared-cost programme can jointly be initiated—or discussed as the Prime Minister stressed; consultation in advance—and under what conditions the federal government may later withdraw from them. Only in this way can adaptability to fundamental social and economic change, as espoused in proposition 7, be guaranteed.

Sixth, it may be desirable, and inevitable, that Quebec's eventual relationship with the federal government will be different from that of the other provinces. When we reach the crunch in negotiations even Trudeau is going to have to face reality on this point. Ontario should recognize this herself, and persuade the other provinces to accept it.

Such a development not only may be the touchstone of Quebec's continued role in Confederation. It may also make it possible for other provinces to co-operate more fully with Ottawa, to build a national capacity and a government which is strong, yet recognizes the constitutional sovereignty of its provincial counterparts.

Seventh, this Legislature—and I come back to a plea that I reiterate fervently to the Prime Minister because surely after this debate, its validity becomes increasingly obvious—this Legislature should establish a standing committee on the Constitution to permit continuing discussion and evaluation of the material which will be emanating from now on, quarterly, from the federal-provincial secretariat.

This committee would permit consideration by members of the Ontario Legislature of three crucial areas which so far have not imprinted upon the top-level talks. I hasten to add, Mr. Speaker, that these three are not exclusive of many others which, obviously, could be mentioned.

First, there is the matter of the agreed-upon process of decentralizing responsibility for Indian affairs to the provinces. As the Hawthorne and Tremblay commission has pointed out, the current piecemeal approach to decentralization is unsatisfactory and far too slow. It would be preferable, within the context of an overall constitutional review, for agreement to be reached on complete and simultaneous decentralization, along with the appropriate financial adjustments.

Second, there is the future economic and political sovereignty of Canada, and how the new Confederation must be structured so as to ensure the strengthening and the preservation of our independent decision-making powers—surely, a matter of vital and basic concern for the future of this nation, and appropriate for discussions within the constitutional conference.

Finally, I refer to the equity of the whole tax structure through which the Canadian people provide the funds with which our country's future will be built. I was interested, once again, to listen to the discussions at Ottawa—the demand for more money—and not hear a single whisper in the constitutional conference of something that we hear down here periodically—though there has never been a lead by this government—about reform of the tax structure at Ottawa. Not only because it will bring equity to the people who have to pay the taxes but because it will raise more money and this government is going to share in any increase of the corporate and personal income taxes.

Surely, once again, this is part and parcel of the fiscal and taxation issues which are the warp and woof of the Constitution in Canada ever since Confederation. I plead with the Prime Minister that on this issue of constitutional review—where conciliation and consultation and involvement of all the people is desirable rather than an open and sharp confrontation—we need a legislative committee such as has been suggested by the Opposition. It could play a very important role here, just as involvement in the constitutional conference in Ottawa, as an observer, has made it possible for us to comment more intelligently—and I hope more effectively—on the conference, for the future guidance of the government.

Hon. J. Yaremko (Minister of Social and Family Services): Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to have been invited by the Prime Minister of Ontario to be a member of the official delegation in—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: No, I was not—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I may say that of my Confederation documents—and I have a stack of them 2½-feet high as most members of this House would have—I have already told the Prime Minister that to me one of the most important Confederation documents will be the notes that he sent me inviting me to be a member of the delegation.

It was a privilege indeed, and we of that number who were able to be there as part of the official delegation, really should count it as one of the significant moments in our lives. I am sure that the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party felt privileged to be there as observers, because I gather that this was an invitation which other provinces had not given out as extensively as this province did. I am sure that the delight of these two gentlemen sitting as observers was only spoilt by the fact that they wished that they had been either in the front row or in the second row. I say this in all humility because it is a privilege, indeed, that at the end of 100 years of Confederation, some men should have that special privilege of participating right in the middle of the action.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Just to give a little further information to the hon. Minister now speaking, I believe the leaders of the Opposition from Nova Scotia and from New Brunswick were in attendance, and one of us had the intention of moving, not to the second row, but the front row.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I think it was Prince Edward Island which invited the leader of the Opposition to sit in the second row. I thought that was "la politesse suprême".

I will not be touching upon those aspects of the agenda of the conference which will be touched upon by other members—such matters as distribution of powers, the reform of institutions, regional disparities, the amending procedure, the mechanisms of federal-provincial relations—because it seems to be my destiny (much as I would like to be an academic in these other matters) to speak on one particular type of subject.

I take this opportunity of doing this at this time, Mr. Speaker. I will direct myself to the propositions immediately following the last one touched upon by the leader of the Opposition, that is proposition 11, which, of the 40, to me is one of the more significant propositions, although it may not take up as much time of this House or in the rest of Canada. I will read it into the record.

Proposition number 11—the title—Canada Should Be A Bilingual Country While Retaining Its Multi-Cultural Heritage.

I read it as follows:

The historical and linguistic heritage of Canada has developed from two predominant communities, one French-speaking, the other English-speaking. Together with the many immigrants from other language groups, these two communities have moulded the shape and character of Canada.

Canadians whose mother tongue is neither French nor English are aware that they must learn one or both to participate fully in the life of the country. This fact does not detract from the quality of Canadian citizenship they can acquire. All Canadians must enjoy the same rights and privileges as any Canadian whose ancestors have been here for generations.

The bilingual nature of Canada includes the dimension of the country's multi-cultural character. Today, the English-speaking community in Canada is a heterogeneous one, continually changing with the infusion of many cultural influences. As more immigrants join the French-speaking community, this concept may also come to apply to that community.

To speak of our bilingual, multi-cultural heritage simply reflects the dual-faceted character of Canada, a country whose working languages are English and French and whose cultures are the product of many lands.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that this particular proposition will meet with favour with all members of the House. This is a proposition which has been developed in this Legislature and by the government and evolves directly from the statements which the Prime Minister has given in this House and elsewhere, through the years.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): It is a pretty contentious proposition—

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): What has the hon. member got against the other people?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I come to—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): The Prime Minister calls it "two nations". Does the hon. Minister agree with that?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of this province has never called it the "two nations".

Mr. Sopha: Has the hon. Minister ever read this book?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Sudbury's gift to the comedy stage.

Mr. Sopha:—well on page 14—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes.

Mr. Sopha:—well on page 14 that is precisely what the hon. Prime Minister calls it. Has the hon. Minister ever read it?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I have read it three times.

Mr. Nixon: If not, there are 40,000 copies of it on the fourth floor, the hon. Minister can get one.

Mr. Sopha:—we were going to read it to the hon. Minister to refresh his memory.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): In French and English.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Sopha: I am a Prime Minister-watcher.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I am a Sopha-watcher.

Mr. Speaker, this is one subject in which the intrusion of partisan politics can do nothing but harm. I will read into the record, for the member for Sudbury—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Have you forgotten what your Prime Minister did in the last election campaign—this is the one issue in which he introduced partisanship?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko:—from the Throne Speech of two years ago:

My government also recognizes the existence of two linguistic communities and many cultures within Canada and appreciates that this diversity is the source of much of our strength and the enrichment of our life. My government is committed to the assurance of full and equal citizenship for all residents of Canada regardless of their national or linguistic origin. Nowhere in this broad country is the diversity of our people more obvious than in Ontario.

And in the Throne Speech debate, he said:

Our concern in Canada is to ensure the existence of Canada as a viable nation. We believe that Canada is the national home and single voice of every Canadian citizen. Within this concept of a single nation there is room for the richness of diversity and culture, language and ethnic backgrounds which is nowhere more evident than in Ontario.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): The hon. members cannot go wrong on that.

Mr. Singer: We agree with the proposition—

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, we want to get it on the record, do you mind?

Mr. Sopha: The hon. Minister has two Union Jacks in the joint.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I quote, Mr. Speaker, from the February 27 debate in the House of 1968:

I would also like to make it quite clear that while the government of Ontario has accepted bilingualism we have not accepted biculturalism. It is a fact of life that Canada is a multi-cultural mosaic and this is nowhere more apparent than in our province here of Ontario. Of this, we are very proud and we think the multi-cultural aspects of our country are really a part of the true Canadian heritage.

Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that in Ottawa, which is the centre of the nation, this proposition will be accepted.

Mr. Singer: It is accepted—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I would like to see in Ottawa a statement by the Prime Minister of Canada in these terms.

Mr. H. Peacock (Windsor West): Good Lord, he has said it.

Mr. Lewis: He would not reduce himself to those terms.

Mr. Sopha: He is fastidious in his speech.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, nowhere is this more exemplified than in a book produced in Ottawa which I commend to the attention of all members of this House who may not have had occasion to read it. "The Canadian Family Tree".

This book was produced by the citizenship branch of the citizenship branch of the federal Department of the Secretary of State. It should, I think, be read not only by all provincial members but by all federal members, in the 11 jurisdictions, because, Mr. Speaker, the table of contents list 47 different backgrounds—all the way from Americans through to the West Indians. In the course of the second reprint, from 1960 to 1967, that list grew from 23 to 47.

Mr. Speaker, I mention this because as a participant, as an observer, and as a spectator in Ottawa, I am convinced that there was a great deal of accomplishment. Certainly, if one were to be handed a foolscap sheet and asked to tick off the things which were accomplished, it might not produce a long list, but I am convinced that on the heels of the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference, the first constitutional conference in Ottawa and now the second, that we are on the verge of a major breakthrough.

Mr. Lewis: A multi-cultural mosaic.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: A multi-cultural society.

Mr. MacDonald: You have put the Minister of Citizenship (Mr. Welch) to sleep.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, I say this because what has been going on in Canada has been a dialogue. There has been going on, a dialogue and a third member of the family, or a third sector of the family, has been very patiently and very quietly, in a general way, been listening to what has been going on, aware of the fact that the stresses and strains of the last few years were difficult enough without putting into being new and further thoughts which might require a great deal of discussion back and forth.

Mr. Speaker, the reason why I am so pleased to see this as a proposition of the government which can be accepted by all members of the House, is that when the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission—that is the way I will refer to that commission—was set up, the terms of reference hurt a great many people in Canada.

I voice the concern that was expressed by them for I would direct the members opposite to the terms of reference which govern that commission:

To inquire into and report upon the existing state of bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada and to recommend what steps should be taken to develop the Canadian confederation on the basis of an equal partnership between the two founding races.

And when I read that I said, "Where do I fit in, where does the hon. member for Dovercourt, fit in?"

Mr. D. M. De Monte (Dovercourt): I consider myself a Canadian.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes. And so do I.

Mr. De Monte: Well, do not make an issue of it then.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: And which of the "biculturals" would the hon. member belong to?

Mr. De Monte: The Minister is building up a false issue.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I would like to draw the attention of the leader of the NDP party—

Mr. MacDonald: Do not be a professional "New Canadian".

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: —to a statement he made in this House.

Mr. MacDonald: And I will make it again.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I am going to do the leader of the NDP the honour, I trust, of reading into the record a statement that he made.

Hon. Mr. Randall: He will not be here in 1971 so read it well.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It was during the Confederation for Tomorrow debate in this House.

However a constitutional preamble or declaration of purpose must recognize—and there is a word here which I think is a misprint:

—the so-called third Canada. I refer to the nearly one-third of the Canadian people, and it is a growing third, who come from that host of backgrounds that are neither French nor English. In most cases these people are Canadians by choice, not by birth. Their loyalty to their chosen homeland is as strong as a native-born. Often, in the great Confederation debate, they found themselves standing on the sideline. They have protested that their existence, their interest and contribution should not be ignored, or appear to be ignored, in the discussions which will shape our national course for the years ahead.

Mr. Speaker, it was the Prime Minister of this province, it was the government that he leads, that set within official documentation this recognition. It was the first government—and remains one of the few governments, at any level—which has accepted, in Throne speeches, in statements by the leader, in documents, that this is not a dialogue but this is a matter in which there is discussion in which everyone is entitled to participate.

Mr. Sopha: Could I ask the Minister a question?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes.

Mr. Sopha: Would he do me the courtesy of reading into the record the third paragraph on page 14 of that book? And then tell me if he agrees with that.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, I brought in with me the quote from the leader of the NDP group. I have read—

Mr. Sopha: Well, this is the Prime Minister.

Mr. Lewis: Do your leader the honour.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I have read into the record the position, as I understand it, of the leader—the Prime Minister of Ontario, and this government.

And, Mr. Speaker, the concept of biculturalism as set up in that commission—the member for Sudbury will have the opportunity of making his position on that basis. Because he, too, is aware of the fact—and he has referred to it—that within that great riding of Sudbury he is aware of the third element.

Mr. Sopha: That is why I voted against the adoption of that thing.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: And, Mr. Speaker, the difference between the member for Sudbury and myself is this—and here we do differ. I ask others to respect and hold dear that which I respect and hold dear, and I will respect and hold dear that which others respect and hold dear. That is a very simple proposition. It may be over his head. He may want only those things to which he subscribes to be respected and be revered, I do not subscribe to that theory. The Maple Leaf flag that flies over Canada is my flag and the flag that flies over this province is my provincial flag.

Mr. Speaker: I want to make perfectly clear what I believe in: it is the flag that has the Union Jack in it, either in toto or in part, that has permitted me to occupy this seat. If I owe a debt—

Mr. Sopha: What a thing to say about 60,000 Canadians.

Mr. MacDonald: The establishment has conceded to the hon. Minister a small niche, and now the hon. Minister is their most ardent champion.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: This is no niche—the establishment has conceded me no niche. I hold a rightful place.

Mr. Sopha: You are a bon venue.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I hold a rightful place.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It is this government—this Conservative administration that has been in power for 25 years that has created the climate, Mr. Speaker—which has permitted the leader of the Opposition to have sitting on his side as his supporters members of the third element, and which has permitted the leader of the NDP to have them sitting on his side. Nowhere, and here again—

Mr. Trotter: We are just Canadian Liberals.

Mr. Sopha: Thank you for allowing us to breathe the polluted air.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I bring this to the attention of the member for Downsview who does not like this expression, but I say this with the fullest of conviction, nowhere in the world—and I direct the attention of the member for Scarborough West to it, so he will not groan and laugh at it that I say this with the greatest belief and conviction—nowhere in the world is there an environment which has been developed within which those who are of the third element have found for themselves as rightful a spot as right here in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That is the most utter nonsense—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member has no point of order.

Mr. Lewis: What is this conspiratorial third element?

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member will resume his seat.

If the hon. member has a point of order, he will state it. What he has said is not a point of order.

An hon. member: A loud mouth, that is all.

Mr. Sopha: It is just impertinence to call Canadians by such a name.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, it can be documented, in fact, in figures, that the potential of the third element has found scope in this province as nowhere else. I invite the member for Sudbury to list for me the other jurisdictions.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Lewis: What is "third element"?

Mr. Sopha: What is the third element?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is so completely out of order and disrupting things so much tonight, that I am disappointed. I would ask that you let the hon. Minister complete his remarks.

An hon. member: He is out of his element.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not in order. The hon. member will make his speech and have probably as many interjections and I hope he will enjoy them as much as he is enjoying interjecting at this time, but there is no point of order.

Mr. Lewis: Why is there no point of order? I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: State your point of order.

Mr. Lewis: My point of order is that I find the use of the term "the third element" a denigrating and abusive term.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order and I so rule.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: There is nothing denigrating in it at all. That is a term. One of the great difficulties in this debate which is taking place as to the development of life in Canada is language itself: "bicultural"; "Canadian duality"; "two societies"; "two majorities"; "two dominant cultures"; "two founding communities"; "two founding races"; "two nations"; "two main peoples"; "two peoples"; "two official peoples";—somebody said that! I hope he said it with tongue in cheek—two language groups, two solitudes, two large linguistic and cultural communities, both Canadian cultural communities, two existing cultural communities.

Bicultural: This is the language which is being used on the streets every day and not only on the streets. McGill University in its presentation to the Laurendeau-Dunton commission refers continuously to biculturalism.

Mr. Peacock: There is a conspiracy of silence against you and you should join it.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The chamber of commerce, in its most recent report, refers to the matter of biculturalism. Recently the Financial Times used this word, Mr. Speaker, which, in the face of the reality of Canada today, no longer has meaning.

All I do is invite the support of the members opposite to join with me in making sure that the word that will be used to typify Canada is multiculturalism. We need it for the purpose of discussion, to give effect to those who are not French-speaking by descent, those whose language is not English by descent, to those who are neither of those two—who are the third element. All elements can be very powerful forces, and they are a very necessary item in the building of a strong unit.

Mr. Lewis: Are they Canadian?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: They are Canadian, and this is exactly where I will make my point. Mr. Speaker, I am a Canadian. I am one of those who from now on will not only subscribe to decry the use of hyphenated Canadians, I will no longer use that term in respect of myself. I will tell the world that I am a Canadian of Ukrainian background, or Ukrainian heritage.

I trust and I hope that the member for Dovercourt will be a Canadian, as I am, but he will be a Canadian of Italian descent and origin. There will be in Canada by this list, by this family tree, 47 types of people in their many thousands who will say, "I am a Canadian of such and such an origin? It is that word "Canadian" that will bind us all. If someone should inject into the discussion "biculturalism", that is a divisive term. For I would suggest to the members of this House that the use of the figure two in respect of anything except the official languages, cannot be but divisive because it is misunderstood.

It is not what the speaker says that is important, it is what the hearer hears that is important, and unless the speaker knows that the term that he is using will bring the right reception in his hearers' ears, he should not use it.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debate in this House. I am pleased at this proposition, because this proposition has emerged over a period of years as men in this Legislature have gotten to know Canada. The member for Sudbury is fortunate that he is from Sudbury because he got a very quick and an early insight into a microcosm of Canada.

That is why it was wise that the four western provinces should come to Ottawa. If they learned nothing but the explanation that was given to them of certain aspects of the official languages bill, that was a measure of success, because I know that there was a great deal of misapprehension on their part.

You see this is important because, Mr. Speaker, there have been technically three constitutional conferences at the official level—the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference, the two conferences in Ottawa, but there was—

An hon. member: How about the one in 1865?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I am talking about the present ones. I am glad that the hon. member raised 1867, 1864 and 1867 because we have to look at Canada in the light of 1967, 1968, 1969 and 2067, because the Laurendeau-Dunton Report points out that even though today it may be permissible to talk about the majority, or the two dominant majorities, they point out that at the rate of growth, it will be surely less than 1980 by which these three elements—if I may use that term as a word of communication—will almost be equal and by 2067, because of the fact that it is to Canada that people from other lands and other cultures will come, that this proportion may be considerably changed. Those who are in the majority today may be but one of the minorities in Canada, as they are now in certain provinces.

Three constitutional conferences. There was in Toronto in the middle of December a thinkers conference on cultural rights. The participants—some 200 of them—who participated in that, I think permitted themselves the luxury, if not in public then in private, of thinking they were having a constitutional conference, if not as a whole, perhaps then as a sub-committee of the constitutional conference of the technacommittee of experts.

I attended that conference and there were others and there were learned people who attended. I was pleased that the hon. Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) participated. Claude Ryan came from Quebec and delivered what was to my mind one of the most scholarly addresses on the matter. He has a mind which is refined to the nth degree—

Mr. Sopha: He believes in biculturalism.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: His mind, as I listened there with the greatest of respect, was trying to cope with this problem of bilingualism and biculturalism which he felt within his depths, and with the concept of multi-culturalism. I will send to the member for Sudbury the remarks of Claude Ryan; he talks about multi-culturalism.

In the course of the luncheon which was tendered by this government to the people attending that conference on the close of the conference, I paid my respects to him because, though we differ on certain issues, I respond to the way his mind is trying to grasp this unique situation of Canada.

I suggest to you in all sincerity—and I am not propounding any political cause—I say again with the fullest of conviction, that the unique contribution that Canada will make to the world is not the products that the Minister of Trade and Development will be shipping across the world, it will not be—with all due deference—to any contribution that Mr. Sharp may make to the world conferences, great though that may be. But what we can do and what we have in our grasp in Canada is to demonstrate to the world how 47 different peoples drawn from the four corners of the world can find for themselves a rightful place within the community.

I am hopeful that the leadership that this administration has been given by its predecessors in office, by its incumbent in office, will be taken to heart across Canada and recognized, as decisions will be made, that this is the great contribution that can be made.

The question of language really presents no problem. Languages are a wonderful thing. It is interesting that—

Mr. MacDonald: Speak to Mr. Weir.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Weir will be aware of the problems. Mr. Weir published, prior to the conference, the newspapers of that province, and I read into the records: “Scho zavtra, Canado?” which means “What tomorrow Canada?”

I can tell you that just as this is being asked in English and in French—what tomorrow, is being asked in all the languages. Here again is a great force, a great potential that Canada has within its midst.

Recognizing the two official languages, I suggest that there is a place for this Legislature to give support, as this government has done, in the evolvement of the French language and co-incidentally with it, that culture, because the two will go hand in hand in that instance, to those who wish to preserve their culture and their traditions.

I note, that, for example, here in the city of Toronto, there were groups; the Greeks, the Portuguese, the Italians, who approached the school board to use the facilities after school hours for teaching their language at their own expense.

I think this is something that we will go into, and I recall that the leader of the Opposition, in a passing phrase, lent credence to that support or to the support that within our schools, if it is feasible, that this be permissible. I bring to your attention that in Bloor Collegiate, 22 per cent of the students, almost one-quarter, have as their background, the Ukrainian language. Parkdale Collegiate, I think, has the highest, as I think the member for Parkdale will recognize—25 per cent, one in every four.

I see no reason why consideration should not be given, in those instances, of permitting, as an elective option, the opportunity of those languages.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the book, "What History? What Heritage?" applies to everybody. That is something that I am hopeful of, that when we come to the grips of writing the history of Canada to be learned by our students, they will learn all of those things that I see by the quizzical expression on the member for Sudbury, he has learned from first-hand experience.

Mr. Sopha: The Minister gave the wrong title of the book—

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: "What Culture? What Heritage?" And that is exactly what I am hopeful that the books, in our schools and across Canada—

Mr. Sopha: Has the Minister read it?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I have.

Mr. Sopha: It portrays the dismal failure of history teaching in our schools.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes, and it points the fault in many places. Much can be done in this regard, I think that this is one of the great emerging benefits, the accomplishments of this constitutional discussion that is going on; because it has directed our attention into this regard.

I would hope, for example, that perhaps somehow, somebody will find some place, the dollars for the publication of the deliberations of the Thinkers Conference on Cultural Rights to which I draw the attention of all members of the House. There were very vociferous participants from all parties. It was in December 1968, after the publication of two of the reports of the Laurendeau-Dunton commission, rejecting biculturalism and asking for the recognition of multiculturalism. It is within the province of Ontario that they have that and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister pointed this out to the chairman of the conference in correspondence. This is what I ask.

I refer back to the words of the leader of the NDP, that in this constitutional conference, all voices be heard—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes, because unfortunately the Laurendeau-Dunton commission was given terms of reference, which they are pursuing and which are impossible—impossible, I suggest to the hon. member for Sudbury. Does he subscribe to the terms, may I ask him? Does he subscribe to this:

To inquire into and report upon the existing state of bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada and to recommend what steps should be taken to develop the Canadian Confederation on the basis of an equal partnership between the two founding races.

Because you see I do not. You see, Mr. Speaker, I do not belong to one of the "two founding races."

An hon. member: What about the founding races in Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for Sudbury, this is not the sense in which the terms of reference were given, and you know at this—

Mr. Sopha: He is too sensitive.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I am not too sensitive. I have, Mr. Speaker, no sensitivity about myself. I will not be here in 2067 but I will tell you, I would like to be around.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for Sudbury, one of the men at the thinkers conference was a man for whom I have a great deal of regard and respect, Senator Norman A. M. MacKenzie, former president of UBC, who taught me international law at the University of Toronto some 30 years ago. He said this:

One other comment: I urge that the use of the term "founding races" be abandoned, for this inevitably gives the impression that there are first-class and second-class citizens in Canada and one can never achieve a good society on that base.

Incidentally, he put in a PS:

The Scots came to Nova Scotia in 1621. My people have been here for some 200 years. I am not a founding father nor do I believe in the doctrine of founding races.

He went on to say:

The fact of the matter is, of course, that none of us were here when this land we live in was empty and waiting for occupation. All of us, regardless of our origins, are personally on very much the same basis in that through the accident of birth we were born here, came here of our own volition or were brought here by our parents. When citizenship has been obtained, or acquired as a result of birth, we are all in fact Canadian. We should all be given the same consideration and treatment and we should all feel that we have the same rights and privileges.

If the member for Sudbury subscribes to the latter part, he must of necessity subscribe to the first part. I say this: that it is not what you mean by the two founding races that is important, it is what the hearer hears when he hears that phrase that is important. I say the same in the use of such terms as 'basic' or any other similar term except in a historical context.

This country was founded initially by two founding races. When you talk about 1867 or 1759, then you have to include the Indians and the Eskimos, who are listed as two of the 47.

Mr. Speaker, I belong to a very interesting family. There are nine children. Five of them are married to Canadians who are of Ukrainian origin; three who were born in Canada, two who came to Canada. One, the eldest, is married to a Canadian, French by descent, who, when she married him could barely speak a word of English, and she visited with a family in Hamilton.

Mr. Sopha: That is your brother-in-law.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is my brother, my eldest brother. My eldest brother is married to a sixth generation.

Mr. Sopha: Does she tell you she is a member of the founding race?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: She has never used that expression. I want to tell you the interesting thing about languages. The grandchildren speak to the grandmother in Ukrainian, to the mother in French, and to their cousins in English, and it is a delightful scene to behold. Mr. Speaker, I repeat again, with the member for Dovercourt, "I am Canadian," and I am hopeful that out of the discussions that will be taking place in the years ahead, that term will emerge with the fact that there are many cultures in our mosaic.

Mr. Trotter moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will resume this debate at a time to be agreed upon. I think tomorrow we will go to the Throne debate. I would like to conclude that debate on Monday. This might necessitate a night session. We will see the length of the contributions from the remaining speakers in that debate. Tomorrow we will deal with the normal order of business, private members' hour from twelve to one, and the Throne debate as soon as we have reached the orders of the day.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.20 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1969

The House met at 10.30 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to draw to the attention of the members that this morning the tour of duty of the 22 legislative pages from all over the province of Ontario, who have been with us for the past nine weeks of the session, ends. On Monday we will have new pages. I thought perhaps the members would like to indicate to the boys, who are all here this morning, their appreciation of their services.

Applause.

Thank you. May I also at this time, because I think this is the appropriate time, say that I have had distributed copies of the three prayers, the first one of which has been already amended a bit. I would ask that the party caucuses look them over and let me have their comments. If there are any others which the caucuses would like to have used, by way of trial, I would most certainly be glad to do so. Eventually, we will perhaps have our traditional prayer reinvigorated for the opening of the House each day.

Today, in the east gallery, we have students from Lourdes Senior School in Guelph; and later this morning in the same gallery, there will be students from Thistleton Middle School; and still later, in the west gallery, from the John G. Althouse Public School in Islington.

Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

The hon. Minister of Correctional Services.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Mr. Speaker, as everyone knows today is the date on which the citizens of the state of Israel are laying to rest the remains of the late Prime Minister of that great state. The world mourns the passing of one of its most distinguished citizens, a world statesman and a leader, whose counsel will be sorely missed—the late Prime Minister of Israel, Levi Eshkol.

Levi Eshkol led Israel through some of that nation's most perilous and finest hours with wisdom, courage and humanitarian statesmanship. He was the embodiment of pragmatic realism. His career gave testimony to that statement. As a man of action, he displayed a strong dislike for bureaucracy. As a man of peace, he was willing to negotiate and compromise for the common good. As a negotiator, he belonged to the persuasion-by-stages school, acquainting himself thoroughly with the other side's case, probing through, until he reached a common principle of agreement, then striving to build mutual compromise upon that principle.

One of the founders of the state of Israel, he served his country in many capacities, including the leadership of a number of ministries of that government, and in 1963, assumed the duties of his highest office, that of Prime Minister. Levi Eshkol was a pioneer in the colonization of Israel and in the founding of over 500 settlements; a leader in its agricultural development projects and the architect of the Histadrut, the powerful federation of labour of that country.

His dynamic leadership was an inspiration to the people of his own country as well as to Jews throughout the world. As we pay tribute to one of the great men of our time, who was admired and revered at home and abroad, I, on my own behalf and on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and his government, pray that God may bless his memory as he joins his ancestors, who have for so many millenia been in the forefront of those who seek a peaceful world.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my leader, my colleagues and myself, I join in the remarks just made by the Minister of Correctional Services and would say that the passing of Levi Eshkol leaves a great gap in the councils of world government.

He stood for the assertion of rights of people to enjoy their own way of life, to practice their religion as they saw best and to remain undisturbed in a very troubled world. It was from the work done by such as himself that the world began to grow and to mature, and throughout the world some of the lessons that were taught to us by the horrible events of 1939 and later began to have some effect in changing the conduct of men. The idea of a "gentleman's agreement" to suppress minority groups became harder and harder to justify in the mores of the world community.

Levi Eshkol served well and leaves a mark behind him which will enure to the benefit of all free citizens of our community.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the feelings of our group associated with those views expressed by the Minister of Correctional Services and the hon. member for Downsview.

Prime Minister Eshkol was in a succession of people who in recent years have epitomized that indomitable spirit of the people of Israel as they struggled to establish a state and to build freedom in a part of the world that is surely in travail. One can only hope that this sudden death is not going to complicate the situation, but having viewed the history of Israel to this date, I think there will be a worthy successor, and that we can move towards the building of peace, which would be surely the best monument to his memory.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oxford has a question of the Minister of Highways.

Mr. G. W. Innes (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Highways: What steps are being taken to avoid repetition of the GO-Transit tragedy in Scarborough a few days ago?

Hon. G. E. Gomme (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, the right of way used by GO-Transit is, of course, owned by the Canadian National railroad and the operation of the commuter trains is supervised by that railroad. The appropriate officials of Canadian National have promised us a complete report in respect to the accident referred to by the hon. member, and when this is received it will be tabled in the Legislature.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peterborough has a question of the Minister of Trade and Development.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, a very simple question to the Minister of Trade and Development.

Is the town of Trenton still receiving aid under the EIO programme?

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): A very simple answer to the question also, Mr. Speaker. We have no immediate prospects for new plants for Trenton. We are letting them digest what they have, and if they get them digested we may come back a little later on if they need more plants, or take a look at it.

Mr. Pitman: If I may ask a supplementary question: Is the town of Trenton still designated for assistance under the EIO programme, in view of the fact that officials in the town have shown that they no longer regard The Municipal Act of Ontario as being of any matter of concern to them? They have flagrantly—

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member has asked his question.

Hon. Mr. Randall: All the towns that are designated stay designated until the end of June, 1969, and then they are de-designated; we hope at that time there will be a review.

Mr. Pitman: Even when they are breaking the law?

Hon. Mr. Randall: Insofar as the difficulties they are experiencing down there, this is in the hands of the Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough). I think he is investigating the things that they were doing with which other municipalities disagreed.

Mr. Pitman: Well, they admitted it.

Hon. Mr. Randall: So what?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would rise on a question of personal privilege. In view of the somewhat personal remarks made by the leader of the Opposition about myself in this House yesterday, and in view of the somewhat personal remarks made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in London last night in my own riding, I just wondered whether the leader of the Opposition wrote Mr. Munro's speech, or did Mr. Munro write the leader of the Opposition's speech?

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps to answer the question I would simply say that great minds think alike.

Mr. MacDonald: Was that exchange in order, really?

Mr. Speaker: Whether it is in order or not it is a delightful way to start off a morning's proceedings.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I shall put my mind, Mr. Speaker, to delightful ways of beginning the business of the House, whether or not they are in order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has over the years been able to do that quite satisfactorily.

Mr. MacDonald: If it is within the rules of the House I shall pursue it, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I can only say in regard to this whole matter, that this is the first time in my entire career in this House that I have ever found it necessary to rise on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MacDonald: And it was not one, really.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No, it really was not.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The first order, resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the Speech by the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor at the opening of the session.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. R. Haggerty (Welland South): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

To continue with my speech on regional government in the province of Ontario, Mr. Speaker, regional government has been in existence since The Baldwin Act of 1849. Welland county government has been regional since 1856, after a division on policy that split the previous districts into the two counties, Welland and Lincoln. The reason for the division was the neglect of the people in the services required for the southern part of the Niagara peninsula. One hundred and thirteen years ago the government was accepted as the centralized control—and it was a government that would not recognize the problems beyond the centre core.

One could read between the lines of the report of the Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough) on regional government, that St. Catharines would be the hub of activity. It is rather odd that Penn Central at St. Catharines should locate in the vicinity of Highway 406, before its completion south to the city of Welland and then on to the city of Port Colborne. One can only visualize that industries tend to be located in the centre of a region, creating many transportation problems, so that at this point the government should be providing the region with a GO-Transit system of communications in the Niagara region.

The centre core of St. Catharines creates market regions where people will travel long distances to purchase goods. Many firms have already relocated in St. Catharines, Consumers' Gas for one. All in all, the centre is created mainly to suit the convenience of the computer. One can foresee that there will be many disparities in the larger proposed regions; many local businesses in Port Colborne, Ridgeway and Fort Erie cannot compete with larger markets in that centre, and eventually close their doors.

A region must justify its own size and shape in terms of people and those who are involved. Welland county represents a natural region of social and economic activities, since reorganization of the county school board boundaries, which is a natural region, recognized by the Minister of Education and the school boards. And the people have a common interest. Welland county has always had a measure of community interest. My own view is that the special problems of the Niagara region could have been solved simply by taking away the annexation privileges of the cities and putting them back into the regional county form of organization. Today there is no guarantee that annexation will not occur in five or ten years.

This spreading of the load to the non-users or the shifting of the city taxes debenture debt is no doubt justified in the Minister's mind as one of the urgent reasons why, according to his statement, regional government cannot wait for the slow and largely voluntary strengthening of the county.

Put bluntly, he is looking to the rural area municipalities to pick up the tab for city services they can never hope to enjoy. He knows very well that the ideas of differential taxation he has tentatively groped for already will not begin to equalize the burden. That is why he says so little about it.

But, of course, as is apparent from page 18 of the Minister's Niagara announcement where he says that the province will appoint the first chairman of the whole region for a period of three years, a sensible approach is far from the Minister's mind. This is a glorious opportunity for patronage on the grand scale. It will suit the early need of government for complete control, and hopefully assist things in 1971.

The absence of a rural weighting formula in the representation of the regional government, as shown on page 19 of that same statement, will assure city control of the entire region. The rural areas will, in effect, lose the franchise at this level. Their affairs and their interests will not be presented, and control will slip out of their hands.

Last Monday the re-organization committee of the cities and some of the towns in the Niagara peninsula were meeting the Minister and his staff on problems of reorganization. Yet at this meeting there was not a single representative from the rural area, and in this report Wainfleet township is a single municipality, the only rural municipality in this whole region of Welland county, and yet no representation.

I see that got the eye of the hon. Provincial Secretary (Mr. Welch). He probably has the same problem in Lincoln county where very few rural municipalities have any say on the matter of re-organization. Small wonder they are suspicious and want to take a second look. But they do not have a chance. They are rushed into voting in October of 1969.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): They are represented through their county council.

Mr. Haggerty: Perhaps I can get the Minister involved in this. Maybe I can have his comments on it. What are his views?

What are the rural areas of Niagara being sold in this bill of goods? They are being asked to take on and shoulder an unfair part of the debenture debt of four cities—Niagara Falls, St. Catharines, Welland and Port Colborne—the staggering total for them of $80 million. The people of Welland county look also with alarm at the debenture debt of Lincoln county, amounting to $8 million. Further, the debenture debt of the municipalities within the county of Welland itself, including the county, totals some $12 million.

So the sewerless and waterless rural residents will smilingly pick up the urban tab, the Minister thinks. Who does he think he is kidding?

But that is not all. In the Niagara plan, big brother moves in. Listen to this on page 21:

The regional government will further have the authority to control the capital budgets of the lower-tier municipalities in order that a rational setting of priorities may be achieved.

How is that for interference on a grand scale in the lives of the people who want the minimum of government, and who only want to be left alone to live their lives?

I expect the cost of land ownership to rise steeply in rural areas because of a crushing burden of taxation that will be out of all proportion to rural incomes. Rural people will lose their independence, and the effect will be loss of many small estates and the return of a kind of feudal system.

Instead of owing an obligation to the lord of the manor, however, today's serfs will be in thrall to the regional government, whose officers will live at the $30,000-a-year-rate set by example of the county school boards. That is the new rule of thumb. Officials get six times the average annual income of the people who foot the bill. Let us not forget this.

Questions have been asked by elected representatives of municipalities on numerous occasions—and this dates back to 1966, the first offering of the Mayo report presented by the former Minister of Municipal Affairs, the hon. Mr. Spooner, what are the per capita grants going to be in the larger regions? Will they be the same as the rate set by the Metro government, or set at the Metro rate, $7.50, compared to an average now of $5.50 within the region of Welland and Lincoln?

If the little estates crumble, the roads around them will crumble, too. There has been no clarification to date as to what the grant structure will be for road construction or maintenance. The paragraph on page 23 of the Minister's Niagara statement conveys nothing.

At the present time, grants for roads are 33½ per cent to cities, and 50 per cent to towns and township villages. Bridge construction grants are 80 per cent for town and township villages, and 33½ per cent for most cities. Yet Metro grants to boroughs with a large population remain at 50 per cent for roads and at 80 per cent for bridges and culverts. So it is all a jumble, and the Minister is giving no guidance as to what the future holds.

For example, the town of Fort Erie, which has a population the same as the city of Port Colborne, that town will receive 50 per cent for road subsidies. The city of Port Colborne today under the present programme will receive 33½ per cent. There is no justice whatsoever.

Who will take over the responsibility of Queen's highways within a region? The regional government? The statement is not clear on this at all.

When one talks about entering into a region, the township of Humberstone, which is part of the city of Port Colborne, their telephone rates will remain 100 per cent higher per private phone, than what it is within the city of Port Colborne. In the long term they are going to be part of this city.

The question of hydro rates has never been answered by the Minister or by anyone in his department, or by the government. In cases of annexation in the past, in Welland County, for example, the city of Port Colborne annexed part of Humberstone township. They had to buy all the service from the rural hydro, which is Ontario hydro.

Is Ontario hydro going to come in and say, this is part of the larger region now, that you have to buy all of these services to further feather their nests, to put more capital debt onto the people of the region?

On page 24, the appointments to the board of health are upon the recommendations of the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), another vehicle for patronage.

The Niagara Parks system ought to be taken over by the regional government. Obviously Queen's Park wants to retain the plus. The profit from the tourist areas could be used to provide recreational facilities for the residents of the region. Furthermore, the representatives would be elected and not appointed, as they are now, to the Niagara Parks Commission.

Again, the Niagara Parks Commission could take over the park in Wainfleet township, which is under the authority of the conservation authority at the present time, in Ball's Falls. This could be all part of a regional park system within this region if this government wanted to enact legislation to provide this.

Page 25 is just a laugh. All the priority expenditures have gone to the upper tier of government. Certainly, there are enough responsibilities left to the lower tier, but where is the tax base to pay for them? The people are already bled dry by the inflated salaries and overhead expenses of the upper tier.

Then there is the last, and perhaps, the final question of the overlapping of governments as such. An editorial on Friday, November 8, 1968:

IN DARKEST METRO

Metropolitan Toronto is so widely over-governed by a multiplicity of bodies that it doesn't even know how many of them exist or what they do. Forty-two per cent of them should be abolished.

That, said hard and honest, is the sum of a bulletin issued this week by the Bureau of Municipal Research, a non-partisan, non-profit research agency financed by voluntary subscriptions from non-governmental sources.

The dimensions of the problem were delicately underlined by the bureau when it said, "We list in tabular form all boards and commissions which we have been able to uncover." Discounting what other beasts may lurk in the underbrush, the bureau found that Metro citizens are burdened by 101 units of local government—seven municipalities, 54 boards, 11 commissions, 11 committees, five authorities, four councils, two societies, two companies, one bureau, one association, one corporation, one court and one foundation.

These bodies often duplicate each other's efforts, conflict with each other, leave gaping voids in public service and in general cross the citizens up. Or, as the bureau put it more formally, "The prospects for success become an inverse function of the number of players . . . The whole becomes considerably less than the sum of its parts."

The 101 players have a few other defects too. Because an excessive number of them are appointed, they remove large areas of our lives from democratic control, and serve as cushions between the people and those they elected to govern them (get the politicians off the hook, in other words).

Because they are naturally dedicated to their own survival, they sometimes stand between efficient and economic service to the public. The insistence, for instance, on maintaining a separate board of health for each area municipality means that some Metro citizens get poor services and pay 75 per cent of the cost of them instead of 25 per cent, which is all they'd have to pay if their local governors did what Queen's Park wants and established a single good district health unit.

Because some of them—the Metro Licensing Board, for example—not only write some of their own bylaws but judge the people who appear under these bylaws, there is a wholly unjust mixture of the legislative and judicial functions.

Because there are so many bodies having to coordinate their activities if Metro is to progress and because they don't co-ordinate very well, Metro progresses—when it does at all—at a snail's pace, and it costs the taxpayers more to creep thus than to leap.

It was evident that the bureau, in its reticent way, felt that only total amalgamation was likely to cure most of these ills, but that for the time being (that is, until Queen's Park overcomes its fear of the political rival amalgamation would produce) we would have to stagger along with two-level government. Under this decided handicap, however, it made a number of very sensible recommendations.

It would reduce the number of governing bodies from 101 to 55. It would introduce a single Metro Hydro Commission to establish uniform rates and services (how many Metro citizens know that crossing a municipal boundary may push up their rates?). It would establish a single Metro health district (actually descending from its almost invariably gentle phrasing to blame the present mishmash on "parochialism").

Where members of governing bodies are appointed by elected councils, it would give the councils the power, also, of recall. This would mean that councillors would no longer be able to claim (when the Toronto Transit Commission cut services or raised fares, say) that this was no business of theirs.

When tax bills were sent out a list of the boards and commissions they support, with an indication of the amount of support in each case, would be included for the citizen's information. He would at least know whom he was paying for what.

That he doesn't know now was perhaps the most shocking of the bureau's discoveries. Conducting a poll among 30 individuals carefully selected because they were highly educated and well informed on local politics, it found that only one of them could name as many as 15 of the 101 bodies that help to govern their lives. Which can only mean that the vast proportion of Metro citizens don't know what services are available to them, what duties are expected of them, or whom to ask about it all.

Arrayed against their finding out, moreover, are not only all the elected council members, but 1,012 board members of special bodies, few of whom wish to see their little empires dismantled. They can hardly be blamed; but the Ontario Government can. It is the Ontario Government which holds Metro in this state of paralysis.

Mr. Speaker, to continue with the course of the Royal Commission on Dominion and Provincial Relations of 1939. Just a week or two ago, this government was in Ottawa on the same basis, on the same programme of obtaining more assistance and funds from the federal government. We have heard the debate last night on constitutional change.

This report says that the federal government has tried to secure sufficient control over the administration of the particular activities by the provinces to enforce the maintenance of the desired standards. The need of Canadian citizens would be satisfied only if all the provincial governments in Canada are in a position to supply those services which the citizen of today demands.

The ability of the provincial governments to meet the demands of the citizens depends, in part, upon their financial capacity to perform a recognized function. The government expenditures are increased by overlapping and duplication of services between province and federal governments.

In the past the difficulties were surmounted by delegation of power, but they are now either embarrassed or being abandoned owing to the dubious constitutionality of the device. Generally, therefore, the power to deal with the pressing social question rests with the province. Federal government has made grants available to the province for special purposes on condition that the province undertake the work and maintain certain standards designed to serve a fair degree of uniformity across the country.

The federal government has made money grants to the province to assist in the maintenance of such services, hoping to ensure a nationwide maintenance of certain minimum standards. The federal and provincial supervision has grown up, causing duplication of government machinery and unnecessary expense and inconvenience. Federal government imposes certain standards, conditions, periodic inspection of the services given by them. This agreement at this level may prejudice federal and provincial relations.

Creating regional governments must not end up as just adding one more tier of government. It must justify itself. In the end, it must stand for less government and this implies the clarification of function at both municipal and provincial levels. I can see a case for the regional government and federal government, but I cannot for the life of me see the need for regional, provincial and federal level.

I think that the regional government could well mean the end of provincial government in Canada. Because the people will not stand to be overgoverned and when they see that they are getting what they want from Ottawa and from their regions, they will say, "why are we throwing money away at Queen's Park?" I think that, in the half-baked form of regional government that the Minister of Municipal Affairs is pushing, they are writing their own death warrant and at the same time doing a grave disservice to the people of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, before I go on with the balance of my remarks on the Throne debate, I want to say this. All of us know the score on pollution, and what it is doing to large areas of Haldimand county. I believe the Haldimand county and my own constituency have been shocked by the cavalier way in which the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Stewart) treated the nomination of the Ontario federation of agriculture to the committee on pollution of air, soil and water in the townships of Dunn, Molton and Sherbrooke in Haldimand county.

The federation wanted Mr. George Klosser, MA, Economics, a farmer with recent experience in preparing reports on agriculture matters, to serve on the committee. They wrote to the Minister to this effect on August 27, 1967. The Minister wrote back on August 31, 1967, stating that the recommendations would be given serious consideration.

However it was not to be. In the background was a former Ontario Federation of Agriculture president, Alec McKinney, a Conservative stalwart in Brampton, who was deemed more suitable to bring in the kind of whitewash report the government wanted. So he got the job over the OFA nominee.

It was as simple as that. With Dr. Hall committed to a previous position on fluoride, and with Alec McKinney to do as the government bid him, there was a two-to-one majority against anything Dr. Weingard said or did, and a whitewash report was a foregone conclusion.

They were directed to get the CBC and the Order-in-Council setting up the inquiry was not signed until after the broadcast.

This was the most shameful abuse of the Royal commission procedure that has ever been perpetrated in the Commonwealth or in any area of responsible government.

Many times in this House, Mr. Speaker, questions have been raised to the different Ministers, especially to the Minister of Agriculture—he is not here today—questions pertaining to agriculture problems. The reply, often in a rather lengthy debate, a political debate, said the matter had become a federal matter, not a provincial matter.

This goes back to what I have said before on regional government. There is too much government in this province. The small man gets caught between the two governments and nothing is done. Not a thing! It is time that we did away with all our provincial boundaries and had complete assimilation of all people in Canada for a true Canada and for unity.

In closing, may I commend the Liberal approach in regional governments, in which the people set the pace of reform, the more adventurous regions leading the way and the rest following. Guided by an expert staff in the Premier's office which should stand above departmental rivalries, the people of the regions could write their own reports and sign them.

That is the Liberal way; democracy in action. Not the sad situation we have before us now, but a positive approach, within a framework of a well thought out master plan for Ontario. That is Liberal leadership in action, and the hon. members will see it after 1971.

Mrs. M. Renwick (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I join my fellow colleagues in the congratulations at finding ourselves in the good hands of yourself, and your able deputy. I realize that this compliment has come many times now from the floor of the legislative assembly, but I would simply like to say that it does not come any less sincerely.

I would like to deal first of all, Mr. Speaker, and I hope shortly, with the problem that is so flagrant in my riding of Scarborough Centre, of rent increases in the hope that the isolation of three or four cases, as I did in the last session, will draw the attention of the appropriate Ministers concerned.

At the address of 1340 Danforth Road, in apartment 1211, in Scarborough, I had an application for Ontario housing, the reason being that the rent was going up. I asked the tenant if he would send a letter from the landlord indicating the size of rent increase and the purpose of the increase.

The tenant had such a letter, Mr. Speaker, and I would like briefly to put it into the record. It is addressed to the tenant of 1211, at 1340 Danforth Road in Scarborough. I cannot use his name, Mr. Speaker because this tenant has now slipped from contact of my files and the regular mail delivery.

Re your lease:

Dear sir:

Your lease respecting the above noted apartment expires on the date mentioned below. Will you please let me know by return mail if you wish to renew your lease with us, and for what term, one or two years.

Due to increased costs, it has been found necessary to increase the rent in your building. The new rent for your apartment is shown below and is due on the date specified. This increase does not include decorating.

Your lease expires July 31, 1968, present rent $173 plus one free outside parking; new rent $198 plus $5 outside parking, due August 1, 1968.

Signed D. K. Bishop, Property Manager—and dated May 27, 1968.

So, Mr. Speaker, another family unable to cope with the rent increase, in this particular case of $30 a month by the time they included their parking, and they filed an application with the Ontario Housing Corporation, No. 0833E.

I talked to the municipality of Scarborough and asked them what sort of tax increase this building had incurred? What sort of expenses could we perhaps define of this particular owner, that felt he had to put up his rents $30 a month?

I learned from the municipal offices in Scarborough that 1340 Danforth Road is called Danforth Park Apartments Limited, care of Canborough Corporation, 7-12 King Street East, Toronto. In 1967, the building did not receive full assessment for taxation as a part of the building was incomplete and so, the difference in taxation between 1967 and 1968 was really, Mr. Speaker, a full assessment in 1968 instead of a partial in 1967.

But even if we would like to treat the difference of that tax change—it is not a tax increase necessarily—as the 1969 taxes Mr. Speaker, which are identical with 1968, if we treat that particular change of taxation, the owner had to put out an additional $12,-627.15 in taxes in 1968—that tax he escaped really in 1967 on his unfinished building.

The tax change of $12,000 he offsets that, plus any cost which he might incur in the care of the building, with a rent increase of $30 a month. On the numbers of suites in his building, which are 172 suites, his total increase of income for that building would amount to $61,920 at $30 a suite.

Now, I asked the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs (Mr. Rowntree) during the last session if he perhaps would take an interest in this problem, if perhaps the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) did not feel that there was some form of the Act that we could expand to give a rent review board or give some protection to these persons. I have respect for the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I believe he has a very strong antenna in this House for sensing the mood of the House or the important nuances. I do hope that he will take an interest in these two or three cases.

I turn now to a case of an individual rather than a family, Miss Leonora Holgate. Miss Holgate is pleased if I use her name because she feels that the problem of housing is so severe that we must do this sort of thing to draw the attention of the people concerned. Miss Holgate lives at 135 Rose Avenue in apartment 104. She lives in a bachelor apartment. She pays $90 per month rent. Her lease is up—this was at the end of August 1968, Mr. Speaker.

Miss Holgate is 74 years young. She is an ex-schoolteacher. She is a bright and able person and a delight to speak to. She was very concerned about the fact that when she called the owner to see if the rent was going up she was notified it would be increased to $112 per month. We told her she should get this in writing because this is rather a flagrant increase. It is $22 per month. She receives $97 a month from old age pension and supplementary, and has a little bit of money on her own. She was quite concerned—my secretary wrote on this comment when she talked to her at intervals, about the increase.

Miss Holgate spent a great deal of time trying to get through to the Ontario Housing Corporation, she explained to me. So, one day she put on her hat and she just went down to see them and then, she started going down dozens of times. Then one day she said to me, "I have very different politics than you, Mrs. Renwick, but I know that if I talk to you, you might take an interest in my housing." And I said that the difference in our politics did not matter a bit, because I too am quite interested that she would wake up one day and find that she had a $22 increase on her apartment.

Then she mentioned that she knew people in our government, and I said, "Go to them, by all means go, and please take to them the message which you have left with me." So Miss Holgate talked to the Attorney General and he talked to the Ontario Housing Corporation. I only hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Ontario Housing Corporation officials were seriously listening, because I am sure that Miss Holgate and the Attorney General were very serious about the problem.

I would like to talk now about a family. The details will take but a moment to describe, and yet it is so similar to many, many files that I have in my particular department. My department, Mr. Speaker, is not Housing. My department is Social and Family Services, as critic for the New Democratic Party. But I do have a riding where one-third of my constituents live in apartments and I am bound to have this kind of case brought to my attention. In spite of the Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall) insisting that I seek publicity from these cases, I would not know what to do if I got any more than I have now. And, I do not go out and find them. But I do not turn them away, whether they are in my riding or not. Certainly, Miss Holgate is not, and certainly this next case is not. They are so indicative of the problem in my riding, Mr. Speaker, that I use this as an example.

Apartment B1 at 880 Pharmacy Avenue is occupied by Vernon and Geraldine Cunningham. They also applied to Ontario Housing. Their file number is 8522D. And if you would like to know the happy end of this story; first, Mr. Speaker, they were accommodated by OHC, I am delighted to say. This was a two-bedroom apartment. The rent was $110. It was going up April 1, 1969, to $130. There is a boy nine years old, a girl eight years old and a boy four years old. The wife was not working because of the age of the children. The husband's earnings in 1968 were approximately $3,500. The husband had an accident at work, November 16, 1967. He chipped his spine and had to finish work at the end of January, 1968, and was on workmen's compensation. He resumed work about July but he was not able to do heavy construction because of the spine injury. Because of this, he was only able to get intermittent work through the union.

Things have become very bad and appear to be getting worse, not only because of the rent increase which they cannot afford, but also because there is a strong possibility that they will get their notice since they have a two-bedroom apartment and should have, Mr. Speaker, a three-bedroom apartment because of the children. As you can see, this $130 rent is for a two-bedroom apartment and is going up to $130 on April 1, 1969, so it is quite current. They applied to the housing authority in May, 1968. They have had a visitor and were placed on the emergency housing list for medical as well as monetary grounds.

Mr. Speaker, my notice on the end of this file was, "Now have notice to vacate by April 30", and I am very pleased that that family is settled.

I just wish I could see some way in which I could settle all the families in our files, Mr. Speaker, especially those who are dealing with multiple problems. This is a family already dealing with rehabilitating the father. It is already dealing with our extremely high cost of living and with rearing three children.

I spoke, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs briefly and he evinced some interest in poor business practice by apartment owners. I have drawn one case from the file, and only one, to show this, although there are many, Mr. Speaker, where the tenants, as I am sure you know from previous comments from other members, have to fight tooth and nail—and have to get free legal assistance from people in the communities, in Metro Toronto, who will provide such service—to get back their rent deposits.

Mr. Jerry Rushlow was an applicant to OHC and he lived at 544 Birchmount Road in apartment 303. The apartment was quite unsatisfactory. It was not a clean building. It was not a place, he said, that was fit to bring up children and he was fighting the new rent increase, which was not as flagrant as some of the others, Mr. Speaker. However, I would like to draw attention to the poor business operation of many of these buildings.

Mr. Rushlow was given notice, and he was given notice in the manner that I see time and time again, where second-rate superintendents in apartments, presumably because of low wages, Mr. Speaker, often use the affairs of children in order to evict the parents. They use some sort of scheme that the children have done something which they object to under the multiple clauses in their lease. And so Mr. Rushlow received a letter dated November 29, 1968, saying:

Mr. Rushlow,
Apartment 303.

Dear Mr. Rushlow:

Not long ago we wrote asking you to instill upon your children to behave themselves in the halls or strict action would be taken. On Monday night when the superintendent approached you regarding your son, instead of listening to her complaint you closed the door in her face. Your son was in the laundry room again, locked the door, inconveniencing the tenants and jumping all over the machines. He was also holding up the elevator so that tenants had to walk from the sixth floor. He pushed all the intercom buttons, disturbing everyone.

Due to the above, let this be your notice to vacate your apartment by December 30, 1968.

Your truly,

But, Mr. Speaker, there is no name. It is typed, "Management".

Now, to take this family to court and prove that some of these things are not right, or that this gentleman, the tenant, is entitled to his full rebate of his deposit, is an absolute impossibility, Mr. Speaker, on that piece of paper. I could have typed it upstairs myself. And I think this is of interest to the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs—that this type of fraudulent business operation is going on. I think we have to ask what quality of operation is prevailing itself upon unsuspecting families.

I would like to add that Mr. Rushlow sent this notice to the Ontario Housing Corporation because he had to prove to them that he had been given notice. The fact that it was not true did not bother him nearly as much as the fact that he had to have a place to live.

When he came to Queen's Park and spoke to me because of the financial position he found himself in with this particular owner, regarding his rent deposit, he said, "This isn't true, you know. I never did get a letter. I never did get a letter and when the superintendent did come to our door, we pooh-poohed her away, because she was coming every other day with some sort of complaint. She, too, had an eight-year old son and we complained sometimes about the fact that he was smoking in the building. We tried to make her balance it out that it was a problem of children and not necessarily of the parents."

So Mr. Rushlow, Mr. Speaker, has filed a signed statement with OHC saying: 1. that he never did receive written notice; and 2. that the superintendent, a lady, was always running to their door with petty squabbles.

But Mr. Rushlow is not a man of private means, Mr. Speaker, and he had a security deposit with this particular management. The security deposit was to the amount of $158, and when he came to see me, he had a cheque for his security deposit for $28. So I photostated the once more unsigned document which was sent to him along with the cheque and it says:

Mr. Rushlow;
544 Birchmount Road,
Apartment 303,
Scarborough, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Rushlow:

Re: Security deposit, Apartment 303.

Since your lease was terminated as breaking the terms of our lease from paragraph 5(b) and 7-IV, rules and regulations 12, 13, 15, 20, 21 and 41, security amount $158.

And these are the amounts, Mr. Speaker, which have been deducted from the security deposit:

Cleaning costs $25.00; paint $65.00.

Mr. Rushlow has stated that he will swear to it that the apartment was never painted when he moved in.

Sub-lease charge—

In other words, that the tenant had broken his lease, rather than the landlord gave notice—

$40.00.

So Mr. Rushlow was sent a cheque, which, I hope, from the legal advice we got for him, he has probably been advised not to cash. With it he was sent a letter, quote:

Enclosed please find a cheque in the amount of $28.00, covering the balance owing on your security deposit.

Yours truly,
Management.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to spend too long, but I felt that with two or three cases of that kind it was absolutely essential. We must look at the fact that more than 50 per cent of our families earn less than $7,000 a year. You heard the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Deans) in his remarks earlier, comment on the expenses of a family of four earning $5,200, and a family of four earning $7,000.

I am not going to go through the item by item statement again, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to point out the fact that the family earning $5,200, when they pay total taxes—exclusive of indirect taxes and motor vehicle taxes—their hospital insurance, their unemployment insurance, the Canada Pension plan, OMSIP, social development tax, the provincial income tax, their $5,200 earnings come down to $4,337. And this is $361 a month.

When people are having to pay $150, $170, $180 a month, they are paying almost 50 per cent of their income, Mr. Speaker. And even the family earning the $7,000, if we take their net income—which, with the same deductions, is $5,723—then end up where they cannot possibly cope with the inflated rents that we are dealing with here today.

Now, Mr. Speaker, turning to the department of which I am critic, The Department of Social and Family Services, the whole community was shocked, when, on January 17 of this year, it read of the infant death of Carol Ann Young. Ralph Hyman in the Toronto Globe and Mail, January 17, 1969, wrote of an aroused jury and I quote:

—described the death of a five months old infant by asphyxiation as having been unnecessary, and protested again what it called the obvious lack of communication amongst welfare agencies 'particularly in areas falling outside the main jurisdictions'.

In the Toronto Daily Star, January 19, 1969, the jury is reported to have stated:

We urge that the administrative heads of the welfare agencies be instructed to recommend and take whatever steps are necessary to improve the communication and resultant action of the agencies to achieve results more in keeping with the true needs of an individual.

On January 20, 1969, Mr. Speaker, the following comments were an editorial comment of the Globe and Mail:

THE MAKING OF A MONSTER

A five-month-old child is dead because somewhere along the string of social welfare agencies operating in Toronto, there was a failure to communicate. Carol Ann Young was accidentally smothered a month ago as she slept in a bed between her mother and her mother's sister in a two-room flat on Queen Street east. She had no crib. Her mother didn't ask visiting welfare workers for a crib and they in turn didn't suggest that she should have one.

Evidence at a coroner's inquest disclosed that the mother desperately needed counselling in child care and homemaking. She never received it. Yet she was visited by welfare workers from the Metro welfare department who carefully scrutinize the affairs of welfare recipients and insure that they are receiving the proper amount and kind of welfare assistance.

Gordon Smith, a department district administrator, explained that it was not the duty of welfare workers to counsel mothers. It was the duty of social workers. And he said he had notified the Children's Aid Society.

How does an expert witness, Barbara Chisholm, executive director of Victoria Day Care Services, attack this division of function? As artificial, and in quotes she says: "What we have built because of short-sighted policies is a monster."

We agreed.

Now Barbara Chisholm was called, Mr. Speaker, as an expert witness, and she is truly an expert in the areas of social and family services. She said:

The most important impression I have gained from listening to the evidence is that the death of the child was an unnecessary one. It occurred, not because of tragic accident of being smothered, but because the community failed.

Now in the text here, Mr. Speaker, it says "community services", but I talked to Miss Chisholm the next day and she said she had stated it was the community—the total community—which had failed to prevent the death.

I would like to put on record, Mr. Speaker, that Miss Chisholm is deeply committed, exceptionally well informed, totally dedicated to administering alleviation and guidance in areas of human misery.

About six years ago, Mr. Speaker, Miss Chisholm lectured to a class of day nursery students when I was in attendance at that class at the University of Toronto. She stood out above all other lecturers as having brought before us the ability to look at the child as a whole package—the environment it had come from; the problems of the family—not just where the child fell in the area of categorical provision.

She brought before us, shockingly enough, a small story of a four-year-old child—the youngest ever to be charged. This four-year-old had been charged with having beaten up and severely damaged a couple of babies in carriages. Miss Chisholm was asked to take this child into the day nursery—this is about six to seven years ago, Mr. Speaker—and in taking the child into the day nursery in her fashion, she did not simply take in the child and counsel and assist the child. She brought in the father and the mother and the sister; and the father had a drink problem and she got him to Alcoholics Anonymous. She got him to the alcohol and drug addiction clinic.

At the three-month interval, when she addressed the students, the father had been dry for three months and had had a promotion in his work.

The mother was suffering from mental illness. The mental illness was easily understood because she had lived for a number of years with the husband's mother, who obviously must have been suffering from a form of mental illness which could be quite a burden for a wife to bear in that type of domestic environment. Because when the mother of the four-year-old sent for her clothes from the east coast, the mother-in-law sent them cut up in two-inch pieces, including shoes, packed in two suitcases.

Barbara Chisholm got the mother to two days a week counselling for her psychiatric disturbances. She put a visiting homemaker into the home for two or three days a week, and at this three-month interval the family was doing fine. I have only spoken to Miss Chisholm once or twice in that eight-year interval. When I saw her yesterday I asked her if she recalled this case and she said a four-year-old child who had been formally charged could hardly have escaped her memory. She said, "I would just like you to know that the father is now a permanent employee of the city of Toronto. They have a down payment on a house, and they are all functioning." It would appear quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that the ability to look at the whole family is very, very important.

I said during the last session that we have welfare workers going out making sure people have not any money and then we give them some, and that this is not sufficient. The structure must be overhauled, Mr. Speaker, and I think that the time to do it is now. It is going to take some time to overhaul this kind of structure.

I want to point out that infant deaths should not be considered as an isolated incident. Such cases are symptomatic, as all extreme cases are. Barbara Chisholm has stated to me personally that in her work she has seen literally hundreds, if not thousands, of girls like the mother of Carol Anne Young.

I am going to turn to a report, Mr. Speaker. I would like to point out the broadness of the report. I know the Minister will note it is a British report. Mr. Speaker, it is the report of The Committee on Local Authority and Allied Personal Services. It is a command report which was presented to Parliament by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Secretary of State for Education and Science, the Minister of Housing and Local Government and the Minister of Health, by command of Her Majesty, July, 1968. There is not much point in anyone saying that this is a British report and that it is different here in Canada, because indications of this report pretty clearly show us that it is not necessarily any different in Canada.

The report took two and a half years to prepare, Mr. Speaker. The committee was appointed to review the organization and the responsibilities of the local authority personal social services in England and Wales, and to consider what changes are desirable to secure an effective family service. I would like to refer to a few sections without taking undue time of the House, Mr. Speaker.

I cannot emphasize strongly enough that the broadness of this report is a revelation in itself. I know that there will be some comments saying that we have the PPBS—the programme planning budgetary systems—and that we are doing it, but we are not doing it, Mr. Speaker, because in the programme planning and the budgetary system, we are talking about the systems as they are at present and we should be talking about them, Mr. Speaker, on a total programme basis.

The background of this particular report states:

Although we were anxious to consider the personal social services in the broadest possible way and as a whole, we took the following present services as our starting point: the whole of the work of children's departments, the whole of the work of welfare departments, the social work element in health, education and housing departments, although we recognized that these could not be considered in isolation from the rest of the work of the departments concerned.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to draw to the attention of the Minister of Social and Family Services (Mr. Yaremko) that although this report, it states, is concerned only with the situation in England and Wales, events in Scotland have been moving on parallel lines with some difference in procedure and timing following the submission of the Kilbrandon Report on Children and Young Persons (Scotland) 1964. A working group was set up in Scotland resulting in the presentation of the Secretary of State in October, 1966, of the white paper, Social Work and the Community: Proposals for re-organizing local authority Services in Scotland, Command Number 3608.

This covered a somewhat wider field than those defined by our terms of reference. In particular, it included the probation service. Legislation has now been introduced in the shape of the Social Work (Scotland) Bill.

I am reading now from item 38 of this report—the previous one, Mr. Speaker, was 37:

Similar developments and the acknowledgement of similar problems have been described in both Europe and the United States in recent years. In several countries, notably Norway, the Netherlands, Sweden, Denmark and France, administrative re-organization has recently occurred or is contemplated. Although each national situation is administratively, politically and geographically different, it is remarkable that the problems in organizing personal social services are described in such similar terms.

There appear to be two common features. First, co-ordination between the various social agencies is considered deficient with the result that families and individuals have received less than adequate services and scarce resources have been inefficiently deployed.

Second, the point at which these various services are provided is frequently considered to be too remote and both communities and recipients insufficiently involved.

Now when they did this report, Mr. Speaker, they were sufficiently concerned with the broadness of the problem. I would like to draw to your attention that they call heavily on experts and they have expressed special gratitude to:

Mr. Alvin Schorr, deputy assistant secretary for individual and family services at the Department of Health Education and Welfare, Washington, D.C., who flew over for a few days in order to give us the benefits of his advice which proved invaluable. We are grateful to the hon. Lyle C. Carter for releasing him.

You see the relevancy, Mr. Speaker, of this report is the fact that it is so current. It was received in the legislative library here, January 3 of this year and much of the work for this debate that I put together between Christmas and New Year is covered in exemplary fashion in this report, far greater than anyone not associated deeply in the areas of social and family services could ever begin to do.

There were three main lines, Mr. Speaker, to the enquiry. It was decided; one, to discover the opinions of all those concerned with the services; two, to find out which local authorities have been making or considering material changes in organization and responsibility and to benefit from their thoughts and experience; three, to draw on what information could be made available by central and local governments and by research workers in the universities and elsewhere on the working of the services.

Mr. Speaker, it seems in gathering that type of information from the local authorities in the line of possible change, there are many minds working seriously at these problems at the local level. I have talked to such people in Metro Toronto, where, it must be said, there are many people who are intensely interested in improving the organizational structure at the local level.

To make a case for organizational change, the following questions were asked in section 71:

Our terms of reference require answers to three main questions:

(a) What is wrong with the present local authority's personal social services and can improvements be made?

(b) If improvements are needed, how far are these dependent upon organizational change and changes in the distribution of responsibility?

(c) If there is a case for altering the present organization and distribution of responsibility, what new patterns shall be recommended?

On section 79, dealing with poor co-ordination, which seems to be the problem that we are plagued with here in Ontario, Mr. Speaker:

Section 79: Our knowledge and understanding of social need have steadily grown, and this has underlined its complexities and the desirability of meeting it in comprehensive fashion. In consequence, the problems of co-ordination and collaboration within the personal social services and between them and other services have loomed increasingly large. The present structure of the personal social services and the division of responsibilities between them is based upon the definition of certain kinds of problems (mental illness, homelessness or physical handicap for instance); upon age groupings (the elderly or school children) and upon legal and administrative classifications (delinquency or maladjustment).

Such divisions do not reflect the fact that families comprise members falling into a variety of these categories and that individuals may face a combination of inter-related problems for which different services (or none) are responsible. Under these circumstances, the growing desire to treat both the individual and the family as a whole and to see them in their wider context creates accentuated difficulties of co-ordination, both at policy and field levels.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would find a suitable place in her address to adjourn the debate so that we may proceed with the private members' hour.

Mrs. M. Renwick: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. M. Renwick moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

NOTICE OF MOTION

Clerk of the House: Private member's notice of motion No. 20, by Mr. Kerr:

RESOLUTION: That (a) the record of people convicted of an offence while a minor under any statute in Ontario, except The Highway Traffic Act, be expunged if no further conviction has been recorded against such person for a period of five years; (b) the Ontario government make representation to the federal Minister of Justice to have similar amendments made to the Criminal Code to erase criminal records incurred by minors who, upon reaching their majority, have become respectable members of society.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton West): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Meen) resolution No. 20 standing in my name which has just been read.

In dealing with this resolution, I wish first of all to emphasize what the erasing or expunging or records can mean to the young man or woman who is convicted of an offence while a minor and has to live with that conviction as an adult. Our law has focused particularly recently on the rehabilitation of the individual offender. It must fulfill a number of functions pointed toward a single ultimate goal; the ordering of society in such a manner that each member has the fullest opportunity to realize his or her dignity through community life. There has been surprisingly little recognition of the fact that our system of penal law is largely flawed in one of its most basic aspects; it fails to provide assessable or effective means of fully restoring the social status of the reformed offender.

We sentence, we coerce, we incarcerate, we counsel, we grant probation and parole and we treat—but we never forgive. The offender who has paid his so-called debt to society really neither receives a receipt nor is free of his account. The fact is that the failure of our criminal law to clarify the status of a reformed offender impedes the objective of reintegrating him with the society from which he has become estranged. The more heavily he bears the mark of his former offence, the more likely he is to reoffend.

I have, Mr. Speaker, in this resolution referred to minors and the period of five years. It is quite valid to say that such provisions and rights should apply to adults and also that the period should be varied for different offences. However, I wish to restrict my remarks to the resolution, mainly because I think the complete rehabilitation of the teenager who intends to reform is absolutely essential. A young man or woman should not be marked for life for committing an offence which might be nothing more than a juvenile indiscretion in an isolated incident. It is not necessary for me to say that where there is a provision in a law to eliminate or expunge records, a young first offender, knowing the consequences of a record, would be greatly encouraged to take advantage of such a provision.

By expungement, I mean a legal provision for the eradication of a record upon fulfillment of prescribed conditions, usually the successful discharge of the offender from probation and the passage of a period of time without further offence. It is a redefinition of status, a process of erasing the legal event of conviction or adjudication and thereby restoring the offender to his previous status or status-quo ante. This is more than a pardon, because a pardon does not erase the legal event affecting status.

Expungement should be automatic upon application by the offender who has met the conditions set out in the resolution, or any other conditions under such rehabilitation that the state may require. Application could be made to the Minister of Justice or a board within The Department of Justice so that official notification should be given whereby the offender could now say he has no record. This right should not be discretionary, not judicial rehabilitation, but legal rehabilitation. There should be no prolonged investigation by the police or by social service workers. If this is done it would vitiate the very object and spirit of such legislation. An applicant would need only prove that the period of time had elapsed and that there was no subsequent conviction.

I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, to learn in researching this subject how much more advanced the law is in many European countries in respect to the reformation and rehabilitation of the offender compared to our system on this continent.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): They are more advanced in a lot of things.

Mr. Kerr: Even Spain has a provision in its criminal code whereby records of offenders are erased, although the crimes to which this applies are mainly of a minor nature.

To return to my original statement, Mr. Speaker, I might ask what does it mean to have "a record" in this country? In many cases, employment in the public service, enlistment in the armed forces, employment where bonding is required, and licensed employment such as taxi driving, is refused absolutely or seriously curtailed. Persons may be deprived of political and civil rights upon conviction of a certain class of crime, rights to hold any public office or trust, to serve as a juryman and to practise a profession are, in many cases, prohibited, or as I mentioned, seriously curtailed.

Mr. Speaker, I have raised the subject matter of this resolution on previous occasions in this Legislature, usually during the Throne Speech debate, and I might say before it became a popular topic of concern. However, the importance of this resolution was very dramatically impressed upon me when a young man, whom I had unsuccessfully defended in magistrate's court four years ago, recently attended at my office in Burlington. He was completing an application for a surety or bond and wanted to use my name as a reference. This young man had only the one conviction and has since completed grade 13 and now was married with two small children. He had been offered a good job and the future looked bright. One of the questions on the form was, "Have you ever been convicted of a criminal offence?" This young man, who is now 22, asked what he should do. I naturally gave the obvious answer. I have since learned that he did not get the job that required the bond and he is still looking.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, legislation should be enacted which would have the effect of permitting people who have been legally rehabilitated to swear that they have never been charged or convicted of a criminal offence.

I have not dealt specifically with offences under a provincial statute. However, such statutes as The Liquor Control Act, The Minor Act, and many other Acts under the jurisdiction of a municipality, would to some degree carry a stigma for life.

Our record in Canada of recidivism or second offences is not good, and I believe adoption of this resolution would greatly improve that record and also improve the prospects of the reformed offender. Surely such persons should not be forced to bear forever the stain of immature and impulsive conduct.

One of the problems that was faced by the justice and legal affairs committee in Ottawa, which considered a bill embodying pretty well the same purpose as this resolution, was that the police had opposed the bill in the form it was presented to that committee. They were opposed, Mr. Speaker, to cancelling criminal records, mainly because many problems, in practical terms to the police, may result if there is another offence, to help identify and trace persons who may be wanted or suspected of crimes.

The gentlemen from the police force and the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police who appeared before that committee were not opposed to erasing the stigma of a record for a first offender after good behaviour, as long as they could still retain the records to facilitate their police work.

It was then considered that if these records could be locked up, or sealed for public purposes and still be available under special circumstances for investigation processes, then this would be acceptable, not only to the committee, but to the committee of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police.

I think this would be acceptable. The important thing is that the status of the reformed offender could revert to that prior, as I have mentioned, to the conviction of the offence, status quo ante. If he is able to attain that status, if his record is locked up, or sealed away, then only in the event of the re-occurrence of an offence, can it be used and used by the police only.

The committee in Ottawa, the justice and legal affairs committee, is considering a bill, I believe by D. R. Tomlie, MP, making certain recommendations, and I am in favour of those recommendations. I think in the type of resolution we are dealing with today, Mr. Speaker, there could be many amendments to it. Five years, maybe, is not a reasonable period. Maybe it should be more or less.

As I mentioned we should also have the same provisions for adults. The problem, which would include adults, is how long would the period be? Would it be for ever? In the event of a serious crime, would it be after the completion of a term of sentence in a prison? Items such as that. These are the problems you would run into, particularly in including adults in this resolution.

The committee recommended, first of all, that there should be no distinction between infants and adults in any legislation dealing with the expunging of records. The elapsed time for the erasing of records should be a period of five years after service of the sentence imposed. The process of expunging the record should be initiated by the applicant directed to a board of convictions review in The Department of Justice.

The expungement of the adjudication of guilt should be mandatory upon the petition of the offender if the board find that he has not re-offended. Unless strong affirmative reasons exist for denial, any judgement denying expungement should be made appealable by the applicant. I do not entirely agree with that provision for the reasons I have already pointed out.

Next, the statute should not only reach the officially adjudicated case, the cases of arrest, release and cases of acquittal as well, it should extend the order of sealing to all law enforcement and other agency records. Because limited inspection of the records at a later date may be necessary, the statute should provide for sealing rather than destruction of the records. Records so sealed should be required to be removed from the main, or master file and kept separately.

The recommendation then goes on to prohibit questions such as: "Have you ever been arrested for, or convicted of a crime which has not been expunged by a competent authority?"

That, in my impression, Mr. Speaker, is not a fair question. I think, as I have indicated in my previous remarks, that if there is a question to the effect "have you ever been charged or convicted of a criminal offence", upon regaining status, the answer could be no.

I think as I have mentioned, Mr. Speaker, that if we are going to improve our record of recidivism in this province, or the rehabilitation of the offender, particularly the young men or woman who is convicted of what could be nothing more than a juvenile indiscretion, or even a crime under the Criminal Code, I think something as is embodied in this resolution must be done by the law officers of the Crown, both in our provinces and in Ottawa.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, there is one thing I regret about the resolution that is before the House today and that is that it does not go far enough. I support it, as far as it goes, in that it deals with minors and I would say that the same principles should apply to adult offenders. Suppose an individual was 22 years of age and ran afoul of the law, there is no reason why the same principle as set forth in this resolution should apply to him as somebody who committed an offence when they were age 17 or 18.

I know the hon. member who introduced this resolution touched on this point at the end of his remarks. I do not agree with him that the matter would be more complicated when dealing with adults because a boy of 18 or 19 can commit just as serious an offence as the person at the age of 25 or 35. But in essence, Mr. Speaker, and for the purposes of today's argument, I support this resolution.

It is 31 years, Mr. Speaker, since the Fauteux commission made a report to the federal Minister of Justice in an attempt to have the federal government assist people who have a criminal record. I have a very short quote from the Fauteux Committee which was given in 1938, and you know this is what is so frustrating, not only to an individual in public life, but I think to people who watch the processes of government—why does it take so long.

The need of some type of assistance to people who do go straight after having some difficulty with the law has been obvious for many years. We set up a committee that costs money. They come up with a good report and yet, whether we be in provincial politics or in federal politics nothing seems to happen. But the Fauteux committee said this, Mr. Speaker:

In our opinion, consideration should be given to the establishment of a procedure for the grant of pardons, with or without conditions, on a much more liberal scale than is now the case.

Important factors should be, of course, the relatively trivial character of the offence, the nature and very limited number of past convictions, the continuity for a substantial number of years of admittedly law abiding conduct and respectable life in the community, and the undoubted assurance of its continuation.

Such a procedure would offer to a past offender, a further and powerful incentive consistent with the promotion of preventive justice, to maintain the highest standard of respectability in a community.

Well, Mr. Speaker, an individual who is convicted may or may not serve a sentence in a prison or in a reform institution. The conviction itself is the stigma that is far worse than being in a jail or reform institution, because when a man or woman applies for work and they have to fill out an application form, they are asked if they have been convicted, not if they have been in jail.

So, all their lives they suffer what is the second punishment. First, there is the conviction and the fine or possibly the imprisonment. But the second punishment is the stigma that will alter their social relationships for all their lives, their employment opportunities, bonding, immigration, automobile insurance, life insurance and even the right to hold public office.

This stigma is hanging over many hundreds of people in this province and literally thousands of people throughout the country.

Of course, in the end, Mr. Speaker, it costs the public and the taxpayer money. The individual who cannot get a job is either going to end up on welfare rolls or be back in trouble with the law. The John Howard Society, a few years ago, made an investigation as to how soon a person is a repeater, how soon after one offence does he get into trouble.

They found that if an individual has been convicted and they are apt to get in trouble again, it will be within two years of their first conviction. Nearly 98 per cent of those who are repeaters commit their second offence within two years, and nearly half of the people that do repeat do it within six months of having been convicted.

So that if we were to introduce a law that would say that an individual has the right to apply for a pardon within five years, we have excluded literally more than 98 per cent of the repeaters. As I say, there has been some reasonable scientific research done in this matter. The people who are on parole in the province of Ontario, if they are going to violate their parole, over half of them will do so within six months.

A six month period is a matter of very short duration. A five-year period, I believe, is more than sufficient because undoubtedly the public certainly deserves protection and we must have the protection.

I would say this, Mr. Speaker, that assuming that an offender was to be pardoned, and admittedly such a pardon is a fictional thing, "to deem, that they have not been convicted." Well, of course, they have been convicted so such a fiction would be a legal fiction.

But assuming we have this legal fiction, I think that there should be one protection for the public that an individual does not just get the pardon as a right. I think that if an individual, after having been convicted, goes for five years without being further convicted, I think that they should apply for that pardon, and so long as they have not been living on the fringe of crime they should be given the pardon.

One of the great difficulties that the police have in our community, Mr. Speaker, is this gray field of crime; the people who may not have been convicted for many years and yet are known to be living off the avails of crime.

This is one thing I think of when these pardons are given—that we have to protect the public.

This is a broad subject, Mr. Speaker, and in the time at my disposal I cannot go into all the details. But one thing I think that in giving pardons should particularly be kept in mind, and that is the importance of bonding. Today, because of the blanket insurance policies that some companies have, in fact a great many companies have now, not even the delivery boy or the truck driver can get his job unless he is bonded.

I feel that the government, over and above introducing any policy having to do with pardons, should set up some type of fund whereby if premiums are increased on a company that from such a fund contributions would be made in order to pay the increased premium so that the ex-con can be covered by insurance.

I think in the long run the government will serve the public, but particularly ease the demand on the public purse if it sees to it that these people who are released from our institutions have some opportunity to find work. Under our present system the discharges come out of our institutions with $10 or $20, a suit and an unemployment insurance book with no stamps in it.

But where are they going to get references? They have to account somehow for where they have been. They cannot be bonded. With one or two exceptions, discharges from our institutions have been bonded, but they are very few.

I see that my time has ended, Mr. Speaker, so that I just went to emphasize once again that this is an urgent matter concerning a good many thousands of people in this province, and I would hope that this House would support this resolution.

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Speaker, in rising to join this debate may I say prefatory thereto that while I used to be unhappy at either the blank faces or the total absences of the members opposite, I noticed that yesterday they accorded the same treatment by and large to their own leader, and who, therefore, is a mere private member to expect any great attention?

On this major point, I am not concerned with the wording of this resolution as set forth. It is, I suggest, defective in many ways. I am concerned with the principle. As has been indicated, it is a matter that has all kinds of refinements that can be gone into, but there is no question in my mind, that the records—not only juvenile records, but as my friend from Parkdale has said, other records, too—should be expunged after certain periods of time.

The question then devolves upon the classifications of the crimes involved and the periods of time and here we have a plethora of different contentions.

Lawrence Pennell, now Mr. Justice Pennell, while Solicitor-General, recommended that the record not be expunged, but shelved, or vacated, five years after a conviction for an indictable offence, and for three years after summary conviction offences. This, in other words, was somewhat in the form of pardon.

Mr. Donald Tolmie, the MP for Welland, recommended to the justice committee of the Commons that twelve years after conviction would be the general rule; and he would have the erasure of criminal records of a minor at 21, provided that only one offence had been involved.

The Apps committee wanted the records of the juvenile court to be expunged after five years of delinquent-free behaviour. Mr. Justice Hayes goes off on the wider aspects of the thing and says that there is no magic about 21; it is a certain period of time for anyone in the community.

The five-man delegation of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police who appeared before the Commons committee recommended, rather more punitively, that not less than 10 years after completion of sentence, not conviction, plus a hearing before a body somewhat of the nature of the national parole board, be the terms on which we would operate.

Though there are other methods that can be used in the overcoming of the problem involved here—although I think we should attack it forthrightly—one of them is to give a conditional discharge. That is, a judge may give a conditional discharge without registering a conviction. Or they may place an offender on probation without ever registering a conviction. Or there is the ordinary pardon, about which the member for Parkdale spoke. And finally, under The Juvenile Delinquents Act—to come right to the point—under this resolution, under section 21 (a) and (b), there is the device of the juvenile judge simply adjourning the case indefinitely so that it will never come up again. The punishment, in effect, that is inflicted on the youth is simply to have appeared before him, which I suppose, in many cases, is punishment enough.

The real problem, of course, is as the Star of April 19, 1968, mentioned in its editorial: “it has been said that a convicted man’s real punishment begins when he leaves prison.” Some of the details of that have been brought before us here with respect to the bonding situation, which is a most iniquitous one.

The police argument is that you cannot expunge a conviction in this way either from public records, newspapers, or from the minds of men, but in reply to that many answers have been given, two of which I noted. You can bring legislation in to stop a bonding company from asking whether an applicant had ever received a certificate of rehabilitation. Then magistrate L. A. Sherwood, of Ottawa, reporting on probation matters on behalf of the Ontario Magistrates' Association, stated that it should be made illegal for a company to even ask such a question after the period involved and delete that in that particular way.

I would like to revert to a contrary argument, though, just to have the fuller aspects of the debate set out from something of an authority. I refer to the report of a Department of Justice committee on juvenile delinquency, 1965, at page 189. It goes through along that page and into the next page, paragraph 340 to paragraph 343, setting forth arguments pro and con on this issue and about the stigma that attaches to the child. It mentions the Ingoldby committee, the British committee which rejected the deletion of records, goes down and speaks of employers and makes a distinction between these records being used by employers over against adult courts on subsequent convictions.

Their example is the case of someone, say 13 years of age, having been convicted of a sexual assault of some kind and then, say, at the age of 25 being similarly convicted again in an adult court. Their argument is that, this being the case, there is an inbuilt predisposition of some kind, and that the record ought not to be deleted.

In winding up my remarks I am going to cite a rather curious—for me, at least—authority on this matter. I never thought I would be brought to this, but I am rather delighted to find that this is the case—my mind broadens in this Legislature. I want to quote from the Commons Debates of June 26, 1967, pages 1946 and 1947—the remarks of the Hon. John Diefenbaker. He is speaking of the deletion of records. He says:

Every time he wants to cross the border into the United States to attend a convention he is asked whether he had ever committed a criminal offence.

Honest, straightforward and truthful as he was.

This is a client of his.

He would say "yes" and was refused admission to the United States. I believe that men in that position deserve to have their records clear.

I know this does not apply to any member of the House, but all of us have had things happen to us in our lives as a result of which, if it had not been for good fortune, or providential protection, we might have found ourselves before the courts. I know there is nobody in that position within sound of my voice, but you know these things happen.

Many people have been in penitentiaries who have not committed any worse offences, but they live to regret what they did. Punishment has been not only reformative, but has been an eye-opener to them. They are doing everything they can to have their past forgotten by changing their mode of life. To hand this matter over for consideration by the Committee on Justice will not meet this problem. We know this is so.

Then he goes on in the next paragraph, to offer this proposal that, in effect, is before the House today, as the Centennial project to the federal government. And then he finally says:

We will have to start this on an experimental basis.

I have mentioned a period of five to ten years. Some say ten years is too long, but let us try it out. We would be doing something in this parliament to elevate the hope of those Canadians who today walk about fearful that sometime, somewhere, their past will be discovered.

I followed this principle at the bar. On occasion I lost clients because I refused to cross examine a witness who, at one time, had been convicted of a crime, followed by a period of years of decent living. I was told to bring it out because it would be devastating. It may be devastating, but it destroys the souls of men to no purpose.

I urge the Minister to bring in such legislation. Let him not follow the course of saying that "we are looking into it," or "the matter is receiving consideration." This would be a very worthwhile measure and has been proven to be such.

Mr. A. K. Meen (York East): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a good deal of pleasure to speak today in support of the principle behind this resolution proposed by my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Halton West (Mr. Kerr).

The basic concept for the erasure of criminal records of men and women who appear to have rehabilitated themselves by leading exemplary lives for a period of time following their latest conviction is by no means new. In fact, it has been advocated, as has been mentioned by the speakers who have preceded me, by many groups and for many years.

The John Howard Society, mentioned by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter), to name but one, has been most active in this regard. And in another instance, also mentioned by the previous speakers, Donald Tolmie, the Liberal MP for Welland, in 1967 introduced a bill recommending this principle.

Despite a good deal of debate—we know the records indicate this, the newspapers have covered it at some length—that bill went nowhere. Mr. Tolmie's bill is probably another good example, as mentioned by the hon. member for Parkdale, of the fact that reform often comes slowly.

However, the need for further review of this matter seems to me to be no less important today than it was before. Indeed, I think it is becoming even more important as time rolls on. And with our new type of enlightened approach towards rehabilitation, I think a different concept is, hopefully, emerging.

Judging by the views expressed by the preceding speakers, we seem to be ad idem on that score. As a group, the legal fraternity ordinarily considers that when a man has served his term and has been released, he has paid his debt to society. But we all know that, this philosophy notwithstanding, there is still a bias against the man with a record. Surely, in our so-called enlightened society, inmates can benefit from rehabilitative procedure, and can do so far better if they know and they can have the hope and expectation that when they are once again returned to society, they can take their places as productive and well-adjusted citizens.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, what I am really directing my thoughts towards is the young man over 16 and under 21 who is a minor in the eyes of our law but an adult in the eyes of the court, and who, for some whim or fancy, takes off on what I choose to call a caper, and winds up in the toils of the law. Our law presently recognizes that that man is not sufficiently mature to be able to commit himself to a contract, to execute something as elementary as a will and, at present, even to vote.

But it is prepared to treat him like any other adult over 21 and attach to him for the rest of his life the stigma of a record, which will haunt him and cause him everlasting grief and embarrassment and insecurity, to say nothing of the fact that it might very well preclude him, as I have already indicated, from satisfactory rehabilitation and re-entry into productive society.

I look upon the mishap of such a young man and its inevitable consequences which flow from his conviction quite differently from that of an older person who, in other respects, our law considers to be an adult. Sober of judgement and capable of not only controlling his actions, but perhaps more accurately assessing their eventual results, and consequences. This young man with a record for a conviction, the legal price for which he has already paid, can still be refused employment by our federal and provincial civil services.

We have already heard, and we know, that an employer who requires a bond will have difficulty getting that man bonded; indeed, it is almost impossible—for something simple like driving a cab and being a cashier—and it would appear that in many cases such young people cannot even enter our armed services. And they, as also mentioned above, can be denied entry into some foreign countries. The United States is one of the prime examples in this regard.

Mr. Tolmie, whom we have all mentioned earlier speaking on the subject, observed that possibly the most glaring example, certainly in recent years, was that of the Nova Scotia citizen who, at the age of 17, was convicted of joy riding. Subsequently, he was obliged to give up his seat on municipal council down in Nova Scotia because of that record.

So, Mr. Speaker, the general basis and support for this resolution should be clear. We are talking about young people presently considered in the eyes of the law not to be adults; and consequently, in many respects, not responsible for the acts which they may perpetrate. To my mind, sir, the problem, however, goes a good deal deeper than this, and I ask you these more or less rhetorical questions.

How do you erase from the record the memory of the erstwhile friends and neighbours and relatives of the convicted person who well knew that story?

How do you erase the record when the employer asks his for his history of employment over the last five or ten years? We have talked about this one—that is to deny the employer the right to ask him a blanket question. Perhaps he could ask it on a limited basis but that really only gets to part of the question.

How do you erase from the record the newspapers that carried the report at the time? I see Mr. Speaker rising, and it appears that I am running out of time, so I will try to wind up my comments, Mr. Speaker, and let the next people have a chance.

It is really a very disquieting thing to understand because we all know that in our youth we have come very close to the kind of embroilment with the law that has been so very unfortunate for so many others, I think that there are very few of us here today who cannot have said at one time or another, in looking at a convicted young person, "There, but for the grace of God, go I."

I would suggest that what we have to do is to try to get some more enlightened view among our populace of the role to be performed by the person, the young person particularly, who has served his term, and who is now back into society, leading a productive, and filling a productive role. Hopefully, if we can do this with our people, we will have accomplished at least the other 50 per cent of this basic problem of rehabilitation.

Mr. T. Reid (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support this resolution, I would like to look at a few aspects or implications of it that have not yet been covered.

I think the question of what we might call the employment problem has been covered by other members. I think it is certainly a very serious issue. What I would like to do now, sir, is to suggest that there are some flaws in the resolution, even though the principle is correct.

Part A of the resolution says the record of people convicted of an offence while a minor, and so on, be expunged if no further conviction has been recorded against such persons for a period of five years. What I would like to do, Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes available to me, is to give the members present a case history of someone who had a record, who was not convicted and had to go to extraordinary lengths to have that record expunged from the police files.

This issue I have brought up in the past, sir. It is the case of Paul Toman in Scarborough and I would like to recall the case to the hon. members present.

At 3.35 one morning, several years ago, two policemen went to the Toman home and took 19-year-old Paul Toman to jail. A window had been pried off the house next door and the prowler had climbed into a bedroom. The young daughter screamed. The prowler grabbed her by the throat. Her father came in and fought with him but he got away. The father and daughter identified young Toman as the attacker and sent the police next door. That same afternoon, Paul Toman's 17-year-old sister noticed one of the neighbourhood boys had a cut on his arm that had required 13 stitches.

That evening, Paul Toman's father reported this to the lawyer he had retained, Mr. J. O'Driscoll, and Mr. O'Driscoll phoned the police. Within a day, the other boy was charged with the crime. He confessed and was convicted. Later on the week, Paul Toman appeared in court with Mr. O'Driscoll, and the Crown withdrew all charges against Toman.

The other aspect of this case, Mr. Speaker, is simply that he could not get legal aid. I went on a fund-raising campaign and 80 people across this province contributed over $300 to pay his bill.

Paul Toman had a bill of over $300. Mr. O'Driscoll, an extremely capable lawyer, included in his charge a fee for the following service; to call on the chief of the Metropolitan Police to get Paul Toman's record for non-conviction removed from the police files. Mr. O'Driscoll stated in his letter to Paul Toman's father that he had been successful in this and had received assurances from the chief of police that Paul Toman's record at that point would, in fact, be removed from the police files and from the RCMP files. Mr. O'Driscoll felt he had to do this. He did it, and although this has never been stated in writing either to Mr. O'Driscoll or to Paul Toman, presumably Paul Toman's file with the police has been lifted and destroyed.

The thing that interests me, sir, besides the fact that Mr. O'Driscoll charged for that service—it may have been only a minor charge of $25 or $30, of course—why did the law not require this minor's record—if you can even call it that—to be expunged from, as the resolution reads, "the record of people convicted of an offence"?

So if I quarrel with the resolution, it is that it does not consider this problem of people, particularly young people, who are charged with an offence, and who, in the case of Paul Toman, were clearly not responsible for the offence, and yet their records remain on file. So at a future date, if this resolution is brought forward again because this government does not implement a resolution like this, I would like to see it include the records of people who just have a police file, particularly if they are not convicted. I feel very strongly on that, Mr. Speaker. I think that this type of case study should make some impact on this government, and particularly on the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart).

The second aspect I would like to bring out, sir, is based on the recommendations of the report of the Ontario Legislature's select committee on youth, which every member here, I know, has read. It is on pages 272 and 273 under the title "Confidentiality Respecting Juvenile Court Records". In reading this over, I think there is another aspect to this problem that should be brought out in supporting this resolution. The said committee states:

There is no legal basis for refusing to supply adult courts with juvenile records upon request.

It continues:

Fortunately most adult courts do not make a practice of calling for juvenile records of those adults appearing before them for purposes of disposition.

Then the report goes on to say:

What difference in a man's sentence may be expected if he is convicted for car theft and the sentencing judge is made aware that, as a juvenile, the offender in the dock has had several similar convictions? Little difference in some instances, a lot in others.

The principle here, sir, is that there is a possibility of discrimination in this regard, that some legal minors who have records when they are minors may have these records brought into court upon the request of the judge or someone involved in the prosecution or defence, while other judges or other lawyers would not request this type of information. The fact is that it is a discriminatory practice. That type of discrimination, in my judgment, speaking as a non-lawyer, should not take place in our courts.

In this regard I was very interested in the hon. member for Lakeshore (Mr. Lawlor) quoting ostensibly from the Hon. John Diefenbaker.

Mr. Lawlor: Ostensibly—I thought the member said ostentatiously.

Mr. T. Reid: No, no, I am trying to get some support from the member's excellent quotation.

I believe Mr. Diefenbaker said that in some cases some older people have "the good fortune" not to have their previous record thrown at them again at a later date. This is what really worries me, because I think we really have to find out whether there is a persistent bias in this type of discretionary power in the court. I would suspect that there might well be a persistent bias in it.

I do not wish to make too much of the following point, sir, but I do think there should be further examination of this. I feel in some wealthy communities, when a son or daughter of a wealthy person in our society at the age of 16, say, breaks into a corner store to get a few extra bottles of pop or something, that if the store owner catches that young minor, that it is hushed up in some cases. I would say, sir, that if that same incident took place in a low-income area where a rough-and-ready youngster of 16 broke into a similar store, there would probably be very little hesitation in the police being called in.

I would like to speak in favour of the resolution, because it would remove any hint of discrimination against young people. It would help, too, on the basis of class. I think this is a significant step forward and I would like to support the resolution on behalf of my party.

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich-Riverside): Mr. Speaker, the resolution put forward by the hon. member for Halton West is in many ways a commendable one and we have heard a fairly full discussion of it. The first four previous speakers were lawyers. I wish to discuss this from a broader point of view.

I cannot help feeling, however, that we are trying to deal, as some physicians do, with the symptoms of a disease rather than the cause of the disease itself. We are like a doctor who tries to relieve the pain without diagnosing or worrying about the cause of the pain. If we retrace the steps taken by a young offender convicted of a criminal offence, we find in most instances a pattern such as this: At the age of 18, a criminal offence; at the age of 17, in trouble with the police; at the age of 16, dropped out of school; at the age of 15, in trouble with school authorities.

Going back further to Grade 1 and kindergarten, it is quite likely that his teacher could have identified and probably did identify him as a future delinquent. In many cases, there would be a broken home in the background or, at the least, an unhappy or insecure home. Frequently it would be discovered that his parents had married with reluctance, and it would almost certainly be a fact that his parents had had virtually no training at all for the highly difficult but most important job of raising him, their child.

The whole problem of crime prevention, Mr. Speaker, is like a battlefield on which the defending army has constructed several lines of defence. And I am convinced that the first line of defence is an effective course in family living taught with understanding and concern in our school curricula. Let us face the fact that few parents do this job properly, except by example—and I do not underestimate that in any way. The contents of such a course and the methods of presenting it I have suggested on other occasions. I shall not repeat the details, suffice to say that all children should have the advantage of this training, not just the fortunate few who happen to have A-1 parents.

The second line of defence comes after the child is born to these parents who have been exposed to schooling in family living. The child goes to kindergarten in a school which has at least one teacher—preferably a kindergarten teacher who has had enough specified training to enable him or her to recognize behaviour patterns that indicate the existence of some kind of emotional problem. At this point a psychologist or psychiatrist, associated with or co-operating with the school, would have an opportunity through family counselling to deal with the problem before it became more serious. This second line of defence would be a deep one, stretching at least through the whole elementary school system.

The third line of defence for any particular child would be his own instruction in school in the art of family living, during which he would hear and take part in discussions about parent-child relationships and responsibilities, the place of youth in the community, self-respect, respect of children for siblings, respect of parents for children, and so on.

The fourth line of defence, Mr. Speaker, if the first three failed, would be the point at which the youth eventually was convicted on a serious charge for which a prison or reformatory sentence could be imposed. Here, greater use of the probation system would provide him with an eleventh hour chance to escape the permanent label of "criminal".

During the estimates of the Minister of Correctional Services last May I spoke at considerable length on the urgent need in Ontario for rapid extension of the probation method as an alternative to incarceration. Obviously in the time allotted I can merely make mention of this, but this is a youth's fourth line of defence against a society which may be driving him—at least giving him a big push—into a hopeless life of crime.

The fifth line of defence is the one we are discussing in this afternoon's resolution—the wiping out of a criminal record after a certain period of time.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of building all five lines of defence, but it seems to me that this resolution is directing our attention and our efforts to the last and weakest and the least likely to offer lasting protection.

Personally, I would urge the hon. members to concentrate their efforts and speak out whenever they can in favour of the first four lines of defence. In fact, if the first and third lines that I have suggested were well built for each family then its children would never have any personal need of the other three.

The word "radical" is one of the many good words whose meanings have been debased in recent years. Coming from a Latin word meaning "root", radical means "getting to the root of the problem," and I suggest to the members of this Legislature that the root of the problem we have been discussing lies in the life of the family.

Although there are many other contributing factors such as religion, I suggest that the most, if not the only, effective defence against what might be called the corrupting features of today's society, lies in successful family living.

The only solution to this problem, as to any other, is a radical one, "getting to the root of the problem." Encourage your local school board to make family living a priority subject in its curriculum. Do everything possible to enrich the family life of our citizens and you will automatically reduce crime. At the same time, you will improve the quality of life for all the people of Ontario.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, before moving the adjournment of the House, we might point out that on Monday we will return to the Throne Debate in the hopes of completing it, even if it requires an evening session on Monday.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, is there going to be a private members' hour on Monday?

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken with the other Whips, and I think it is agreed that we will dispense with the private members' hour if necessary in order to complete the Throne Debate.

Hon. Mr. Welch: With that agreement, Mr. Speaker, I assume that we will proceed with the Throne Debate all day Monday.

Mr. H. J. Price (St. David): Mr. Speaker, as we will not be sitting tomorrow I would like to remind the members that Saturday is St. David's day. On this occasion I am sure all hon. members will wish to join with me in extending our very best wishes to the Welsh people on their national holiday. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Welch moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 1.00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, MARCH 3, 1969

The House met at 2.30 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Our guests this afternoon, in both galleries, are students from the Queen Alexandra Public School in Toronto.

Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Motions:

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer) moves that this House will, tomorrow, resolve itself into the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton moves that this House will, tomorrow, resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. D. A. Evans (Simcoe Centre) moves, seconded by Mr. R. D. Kennedy (Peel South), that for the meetings of the standing committee on government commissions during the balance of the session, the party caucus be authorized to substitute members up to the total membership of each party on the committee, when notice of such substitution has been given to the chairman at least two sitting days prior to the meeting.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should explain to the House that the committee on government commissions deals with a whole variety of government activities as embodied in the functions of these commissions. It was suggested to me by the leader of the New Democratic Party that there might be men who would have a particular interest in one branch of government as represented by one of the commissions and not in another, and that in this way each of the parties could rotate its membership so that those members who might be most interested in the particular commission that might be before the committee on any sitting date would be able to be present and take part in discussions.

This seemed to me to make sense in view of the rather specialized function of this particular committee. This motion will simply permit the chairman of the committee to agree to such substitution.

Motion agreed to:

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Premier (Mr. Robarts).

Is the government undertaking new discussions with the federal government regarding Ontario's entrance in the national Medicare plan as reported in this morning's Toronto Daily Star?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, there are some discussions in the offing between the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I am not able to say anything further than that. I believe they will be meeting within the next week; and as far as we are concerned we would welcome discussions about Medicare, and I am quite sure that matter will be discussed at that time.

Mr. Nixon: Might I ask as a supplementary question: If, in fact, the first time the Premier was aware it might be possible for present carriers to come under the ambit of the Act was when he was quoted as saying that was an interesting possibility in today's paper?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I had heard nothing directly, Mr. Speaker, about this suggestion of Mr. Munro's. It was not made to me, I heard it first through the news media. My reaction was just as I expressed it when it was brought to my attention.

Mr. Nixon: The Premier has heard of the possibility of such an inclusion?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: In this context, yes.

Mr. Nixon: A second question to the Premier, Mr. Speaker. Will the Premier amplify his statement made on "Provincial Affairs" television on Saturday, March 1, that regional government depends on agreement of the people concerned?

I think the Premier knows my feeling in this. The requirement of the question period would not allow as much questioning now as perhaps on another occasion, but when I saw the programme I was wishing I could phone in and ask him a bit more about it at that time.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to know that the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Nixon) follows my television appearances. I made a somewhat formal address to the Rotary Club of Aylmer on Friday, December 6, 1968, in which I dealt with this subject and I said finally, in outlining the criteria to be used I must emphasize that we seek both community participation and community acceptability in establishing regional governments.

I want to make it clear that this does not mean that any municipality will have a veto over regional government proposals. However, it is imperative in my view that all communities participate in discussions leading to the establishment of a regional government and that local initiative, wisdom, and experience be a part of regional government proposals. That is the position of the government to which I was referring on Saturday night.

Mr. Nixon: The Premier would then say it really did not depend upon local acceptance?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, I suppose, what the leader of the Opposition is really aiming at is whether we should have a plebiscite in each case—something of that nature. It all depends on what you mean by acceptance—but the point I was making, both in this address and on Saturday night, was that there is no intention on the part of this government to simply impose a whole grid of regional governments willy nilly on top of this province—I believe I used that form of expression during that interview—and we think that if it is to be successful it will require a high degree of discussion which we would hope would lead to acceptability.

We want the ideas and the initiative and wisdom of the local people. We all know that this province varies so much from district to district. It is pretty hard—in fact I would say impossible, to develop a formula for regional government that one could apply to any given area in the province. I would think regional government perforce must be adapted to the circumstances of the area in which it is to be instituted, and thus we think that full participation by the local municipalities and local people is necessary, and that is the way we propose to proceed.

Mr. Nixon: A question, if the Premier will permit, Mr. Speaker. Bearing in mind these regional differences and how extreme they are in some cases, will he say that it is possible that a referendum might be a part of government policy in some circumstances associated with regional government.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I would simply say, Mr. Speaker, that we would have to deal with each one individually and on its own merits. It is not the referendum, really, as an instrument of government, which is inherent in, or is a tradition of our way of government. I know it is an integral part of the American way of government, they have referendums on debt limits and all sorts of things. In the form of government under which we live, the referendum really does not play a large part. Governments are elected to do their task and if they do it badly then they are not re-elected.

As a matter of principle we do not continually go back to the people to have them decide some of the matters for which they have elected their government, so that, we do not adopt a referendum as an integral part of the political system of this province. On the other hand, I would not discharge it out of hand as never having any value because there may be a time when it would be. There have been a few national referendums in this country. I do not think they really ever solved anything, as you look at them historically. I just put that point of view to you because we do not really look upon a referendum as part of our governmental system.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have two question for the Minister of Health, who is not here, but I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Labour when it might be possible to expect a reply to a couple of questions I put to him with regard to Cyanamid of Canada about a week or so ago.

Hon. D. A. Bales (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have the answers for him now.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. Minister would answer those questions now and give me the number of the questions so that I can keep track of them also.

Hon. Mr. Bales: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to. The first question was number 687, and if I could just read the hon. member's question:

It states with regard to the Welland plant of Cyanamid which has been on strike since January 6, 1969:

1. Is it true that some of the new work force, involving former supervisory personnel, have been confined to the plant for weeks, without returning to their homes and families?

2. Is it true that workers, as reported on radio by the wife of one of them, receive $5 per hour while working and $2.50 per hour while sleeping on cots beside the machines?

3. Has this company permission from The Department of Labour for employees to work excessive overtime, 12 hours a day regularly, day after day?

4. In view of the fact that the work of a normal maintenance staff of 150 is now being done by a few supervisory staff, is the safety of the workers and the community being safeguarded by this explosives manufacturing plant?

In reply to the questions as previously asked by the hon. member, I would advise that, as to the first part, the statement is not true as asked. Some cots were set up in a lecture room of the personnel building, and were used by various members of the staff. Latterly they were used by three permanent firemen.

The second part: The actual wage rates being paid, as I am sure the hon. member will appreciate, are a matter between the employees and the employers. I would say to the hon. member, however, that the minimum wage rates are being paid. And I am advised that the workers have not been sleeping on cots by their machines.

The third part: The company has a permit authorizing overtime under The Employment Standards Act in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

And the fourth part: The answer is yes, we are satisfied as to the matters being done at the present time.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, were the permits for excessive overtime given after the strike began?

Hon. Mr. Bales: Mr. Speaker, I would have to enquire; I do not have the actual date. I can do so and provide it to the hon. member.

Mr. MacDonald: Has the Minister an answer to the second question that was asked on February 24, No. 740?

Hon. Mr. Bales: Yes, I have, Mr. Speaker.

In reference to that question, it involved two parts. I answered the second part initially.

In the first part of No. 740, the hon. member asked me whether the Welland plant of Cyanamid was being operated in conformity with the regulations of The Operating Engineers Act. This plant has been inspected and is being operated in accordance with The Operating Engineers Act. The company has engaged the required complement of licensed stationary engineers.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Sarnia wish to ask his question from the other day?

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

To the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett): Could the Minister advise as to whether present purchases per kilowatt hour for power from Detroit Edison are at the normal usual rate charged at other times? For the sake of clarity, I request advice from the Minister as to whether any premium payment is being paid to Detroit Edison for the purchase of power resulting from the present labour dispute in which Ontario Hydro is involved?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, rates are being paid in accordance with the terms of agreement drawn with Detroit Edison February 16, 1966. Therefore, no premium rate is being paid.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister has answers to certain questions of another day. If the member asking it is present, would he identify them and give the answers?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, I know question 713 was asked by the hon. member for Welland South. He is not in the House today. And I have answers to 716 and 717 asked by the hon. member for Sudbury East and I note he is not in the House today either.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you. The hon. member for Essex South.

Mr. D. A. Paterson (Essex South): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a question of the Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Brunelle).

Has the department hired a director of research at the fisheries research station at Wheatley? Is the department short of research staff at this particular station—or at other fishery research stations in Ontario? Will the Minister be hiring more than the usual number of students to assist on research projects this summer?

Hon. R. Brunelle (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Essex South, the department is in preliminary negotiation with two distinguished and accomplished candidates for appointment to Wheatley. We are short of research staff at Wheatley because of one resignation or educational leave.

Our other research stations are not so short staffed. The Sault Ste. Marie Lake Superior fisheries research unit is in final process of establishment. The number of summer students we will hire will depend on our budget for this year.

Mr. Paterson: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld).

Is the Minister contemplating the tightening of its censorship standards during 1969?

How many films were viewed by this department in 1968, how many were edited and how many banned?

Could the Minister indicate by classification the number of new films shown in Ontario in 1968?

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information): Mr. Speaker, our policy with regard to film censorship, I think, was made quite clear in my remarks on the estimates last year. I would refer the hon. member to pages 2883 and 2884 of Hansard on May 11, 1968.

The figures that I can give on the films reviewed last year are all for new films. For the ten-month period April 1, 1968 to January 31, 1969, the theatres branch examined 463 feature films. Of these, deletions were made in 22 and three were not approved. Ninety-four films were classified as restricted, 119 as adult entertainment and 247 as general entertainment.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The first order, resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the amendment of the motion for an address in reply to the Speech of the Honourable, the Lieutenant-Governor at the opening of the session.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mrs. M. Renwick (Scarborough Centre): On Friday, Mr. Speaker, just prior to the adjournment of the debate, I was extolling the value, the thoroughness and the broadness of British Command Report number 3703, the report of the committee on local authority and allied personal social services.

I would like to read now two paragraphs on background, four lines on procedure, Mr. Speaker, and then I will endeavour to deal, as expediently as is possible, with such a remarkable report by drawing out about 12 examples of the various ministerial departments, which might be of some interest to the Ministers of each department.

The background to the inquiry and the terms of reference, Section 30:

The appointment of the committee was foreshadowed in the white paper, The Child, The Family and The Young Offender, presented to Parliament by the Home Secretary in August, 1965. This set out, for public discussion, the government's provisional proposals for practical reforms to support the family; to forestall and reduce delinquency and to revise the law and practice relating to offenders up to the age of 21.

It noted the growing public concern at the increase in juvenile delinquency in recent years and the numerous reports and proposals by official and unofficial bodies on the prevention of crime and treatment of offenders.

It went on to discuss the work being undertaken by the different departments of local authorities under different Acts of Parliament to reduce the risk of family breakdown, stressing its inherent social value and its relevance to the prevention of delinquency. From the point of view of this committee the following paragraph in the white paper was most important:

The proposals for the reform of the law and practice relating to young offenders, emphasized the need to improve the structure of the various services connected with support of the family and the prevention of delinquency. The government believes that these services should be organized as a family service but the form and scope of such a service will need detailed consideration. The government, therefore, proposed to appoint a small independent committee to review the organization and responsibilities of the local authority personal social services and consider what changes are desirable to ensure an effective family service. This was the immediate point of origin of the committee, a concern at the increase in officially recorded delinquency, the need to concentrate resources and a belief that preventative work with families was of cardinal importance in this context. In addition, there had been a growing conviction among many of those concerned with a wide range of personal social services that if changing social needs were to be adequately met, a fresh and comprehensive examination of these services was urgently required. In particular, the problem of co-ordination between related but separately administered services was repeatedly stressed as well as the failure of services to reach all who were in need of them.

Mr. Speaker, to read just four lines or maybe eight, from a report on juvenile delinquency in Canada, a report of The Department of Justice, the committee on juvenile delinquency—I believe this is about 1966. It was received in the library here in 1966, Mr. Speaker:

“Trends in juvenile delinquency. In summary, the significance may be more readily apparent from the following tables; Percentage of increases between 1957 and 1961—general population—9.5 per cent.

“Juvenile court appearances—all cases”—once again, Mr. Speaker—“increases 17 per cent.

“Adjudging delinquents—all cases—increases 27 per cent.

“Juvenile court appearances—selected cases—increases 23 per cent.

“Adjudged delinquents—selected cases 37 per cent.”

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, the educational standing of delinquents. Table 7 summarizes the information on educational status according to age, both for the children appearing before the court and those found delinquent. According to this date, children in grades 6, 7, 8 and 9 contributed between 65 and 70 per cent of those found delinquent.

It would appear also that a large proportion of the children were a year or more behind the average grade for their age. In regard to the age groupings of the children found delinquent those 12 to 15 years, inclusive, accounted for the greatest proportion. Indeed, this age group constituted 86 to 88 per cent of the total found delinquent during the five-year period. Children under ten years of age were only a very small percentage of those found delinquent. I think the important—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask a question? If the hon. member will forgive me, I was not here during the earlier part of her speech. I am very much interested, I wonder whether the hon. member would tell me the report from which she is quoting?

Mrs. M. Renwick: The report, Mr. Speaker, from which I am making the main point of my speech is the British Command Report, number 3703, the Report of the committee on Local Authority and Allied Personal Social Services. The committee evolved from the white paper, which is also a command paper, number 2742, The Child, the Family and the Young Offender. What I am attempting to illustrate, Mr. Speaker, is that from the concern of the problem of the young offender came a whole reassessment and rejuvenation of social and family services, and the report, Mr. Speaker, I was quoting from for juvenile delinquency in Canada, was the report of the Department of Justice Committee on Juvenile Delinquency. I would imagine the Minister is familiar with that. I was not familiar with it. I wanted to find some material in our library here and Mr. Rendall Dick mentioned this particular report was available.

I have not delved into that report, Mr. Speaker, the way I have into the report on the social services.

I touched, Mr. Speaker, on the fact that this report is relevant to the problems confronting the legislators in Canada, and in Ontario in particular, through patterns of similarity shown in several countries, other than Britain, i.e. Europe and the United States, and outlined the Parliamentary departments involved, the main levels involved, and the main three questions asked. The report, as I stated, Mr. Speaker, was presented to Parliament by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Secretary of State for Education and Science, the Minister of Housing, the local government and the Minister of Health.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot say strongly enough how vital it appears to me, after a year as a legislator in the province of Ontario, that the four Ministers in the Cabinet of the government, corresponding to these four ministries, question whether this is what we need in Ontario now.

I urge the Ministers, Mr. Speaker, to glance at the report and hopefully to decide to tackle the same kind of reorganization.

Following section 79, which was on co-ordination, where I left off Friday last, I would like to deal with a paragraph or two—I have finished with the procedure, Mr.

Speaker—then make a comment on the shortcomings of the present services, and then comment on the various departments of governments concerned. Chapter 3, item 46:

Altogether written evidence was received was received from 160 organizations and 79 individuals. We also met representatives from 42 organizations and 54 individuals for discussion.

Although we were unable to meet all those who submitted written evidence, we gained a sense of the prevailing opinion on the main issue.

Under reorganization—I made the case on Friday of the need for organizational change. The shortcomings of the present personal social services, item 73, part 2:

There have been undoubted improvements in the last 20 years in the local authority personal social services, and in some areas new and exciting developments have taken place. Moreover, staff have worked conscientiously and in many cases imaginatively in situations of considerable difficulty.

There is, nevertheless, a growing sense of dissatisfaction which is focused upon several issues. We believe the following to be the most important which emerged in our evidence and during the visits we made.

The point has to be made, Mr. Speaker, that the same paragraph applies to the social services in this province.

There have been many, many people deeply dedicated and devoted, and I am sure in their inception probably fought for many of the services we have today. We are not saying that this is not what should have been done, we are simply saying it is only part way through the job at this particular instance. The chapter dealing with the inadequacy—74, said:

Local authority personal social services are not fully meeting the needs for which, on the basis of the duties placed on them by the statutes, they are clearly responsible.

Obvious examples can be derived from the waiting lists of different kinds of day and residential care for the mentally ill, the mentally subnormal, the handicapped and the aged. There is no doubt that in many areas domiciliary services like home helps or meals on wheels are falling short of meeting obvious needs which those in the services think they ought to be meeting.

I point out, Mr. Speaker, that we have not begun to think yet in Ontario of services for the aged such as meals on wheels.

Inadequacies in the range of provisions, 76:

There are some needs or certain groups of people with needs for which no service has a clearly defined responsibility. This is particularly true of newly recognized, or newly emergent problems, and ones which do not fit neatly into conventional categories. The fragmented nature of the existing services tend to produce separate spheres of responsibility with neglected areas between.

And it goes on, Mr. Speaker, to point out some British examples which are perhaps a little different than our particular scene.

On Friday last we dealt with poor co-ordination and item 80, which follows it, says:

Other closely allied developments have also exacerbated this problem. Greater emphasis has been laid upon community rather than institutional care, and there has been more movement between the two.

Good co-ordination is required to support such policies for of necessity, a person living in a community needs the services of more departments and organizations than someone with similar problems accommodated residentially.

Likewise a family which supports a handicapped or disturbed member at home often requires a variety of forms of help.

Chapter 83 on “difficult access” is one which I have raised previously in the legislative assembly, Mr. Speaker. It is my deep concern that there are numbers of people who are not aware of what services are available for them.

I believe I drew an analogy in the last session from the 300 cases in the Big Brother movement where the big brothers were actually counselling the one parent, mothers of the family, as to what rights or what services they might have available to them under our social service structure. In access, “difficult access”, Item no. 83, the report says:

Many of those submitting evidence stressed the difficulty the public and members of other services found in approaching the local authority personal social services.

People are often unclear about the pattern of services, and uncertain about the division of responsibilities between them. Initially a person's true need (sometimes a matter for expert diagnosis) may not be clearly recognized. Sometimes the person seeking help may be confused, or inarticulate and unable to make claim for the particular help he requires. In such circumstances it may be difficult for him to get straight to the right service. The delay and further referral this involves, may be discouraging, particularly if the local offices of different services are a considerable distance apart.

Furthermore, members of the public are often diffident about approaching the services, either on their own behalf or on behalf of relatives or acquaintances. They may doubt whether help is available, or they may fear officials to be remote and bureaucratic.

Section 103 might be of some interest to the Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough), in dealing with the possible administration of welfare on a regional basis. Titled "cure by the reorganization of local government", Item 103. On the case for maintaining the status quo:

It was also maintained that the present shortcomings in local authority, personal social services, are not mainly the outcome of their organization, but are due to the fact that some authorities are too small to provide adequate services, and others so large that the communication and decision-making are cumbersome and slow. The recommendations of the Royal commission on local government in England were, it was argued, expected to overcome this problem, and any other organizational change was, therefore, unnecessary. However, we believe this view oversimplifies the problem. Moreover, some of the evident weaknesses of small departments (for example, lack of flexibility in the deployment of resources, lack of opportunity for professional consultation and in-service training) could be lessened by alterations in departmental structure, quite apart from changes in the size of local authority units.

Equally, organizational changes could improve the personal social services in large local authorities, by clarifying policy, improving internal communications, and allowing more delegation.

Now, the Minister of Social and Family Services (Mr. Yaremko), Mr. Speaker, might say to me, and I am sure he perhaps will, that we do have a family services branch, but I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that in the last session, under item 2004, the family services branch had a budget of $433,000, and it is hardly a meaningful operation. At that time it did not have counselling services available. So I would like to read the final outcome of this committee to recommend the formation of a new department, a social service department. Item 138:

Finally there are the proposals to set up a new department to meet the social needs of individuals, families and communities, which would incorporate the present function of children and welfare departments, together with elements from the education, health and housing departments, with important additional responsibilities designed to ensure an effective family service. Since this is the solution we recommend we discuss it in detail in the next and subsequent chapters.

Now, in the interests of time in the House, Mr. Speaker, I have chosen what I figured were, ten to 12 items that draw a particularly strong parallel as to how the same situation may be here in Ontario.

Under Chapter 8, Social Services for Children, item 173:

Figures such as these, however, tell us little about the extent of the need for help or about what help precisely is required. But the evidence we received and the long waiting list for some kinds of education and treatment, indicated that the present level of provision was sadly inadequate. At our request, Dr. Packman and Mr. Power, calculated the number and proportion of children in different categories who are likely to be in need of special help, and the number who actually received it. Their estimates are in Appendix "Q". They are not claimed to be absolutely accurate. There is, for instance, the problem of overlapping between the groups. What is clear, however, is that even taking such factors into account, the present services are falling far short of meeting the extent of need. Packman and Power concluded that at least one child in ten in the population will need special educational, psychiatric or social help before it reaches the age of 18, but that at present, at most, one child in 22 is receiving such help.

I think that particular item should surely interest the Ministers of Health, of Education, of Social and Family Services, who will all be asked to bear the burden of this particular problem as it comes to light in the province.

The general approach used, in Chapter 8, item 186:

First there is the issue of responsibility. Clearly the primary responsibility for their children does, and should, rest with parents. Partly because of the growing complexity of society, there are now, however, a variety of circumstances in which different aspects of this responsibility are shared with public services in the community.

I would like to pause, Mr. Speaker, for just a moment, and make certain that emphasis is placed on the word "shared". Because this shared parenting and this shared responsibility is what is now totally inadequate in the cases that we are seeing every day in social and family services. Sometimes it is the children who need parenting, sometimes it is the young parents who need parenting.

This concept is widely accepted in fields of education, and medical care, but is less commonly apparent in other forms of social care for children. In the past, for instance, public authorities have tended to take full responsibility, including sometimes full parental rights for children in certain defined situations like desertion, neglect or antisocial behaviour, but have otherwise tended not to assume any responsibility whatsoever.

And that, Mr. Speaker, if I may pause there for a moment, is exactly the crux of my remarks today.

To continue, Mr. Speaker:

We believe there is need for a much wider acceptance of the idea of shared responsibility, and a greater development of mutual co-operation between parents and those social services with special responsibility for helping parents with the upbringing of their children. These services should be universal in scope in the sense that they should be readily accessible and available to all families. At present some attempt to be universal while others do not.

And in the same general approach, item 188:

Furthermore, the availability of different forms of help should not be closely defined in terms of particular kinds of behaviour or the means through which children with difficulties come to the notice of the local authority. There should, for instance, be no difference in the range of possible services available for children who are neglected or ill treated or those who commit antisocial acts or are beyond the control of their parents; nor should the latter be put in the segregated category.

The provision of assistance to children and their families on the basis of defined administrative and legal categories inhibits the use of the most appropriate services, for whether a young child commits an offence, goes out on the loose or is just unruly or naughty is purely fortuitous. The present system produces uneven standards, duplication and the reluctance on the part of some parents to seek help which they may regard as stigmatizing their child because it is associated, for instance, with delinquency or mental subnormalities. These dangers should be easier to avoid when the general principle is accepted that all forms of relevant help should be available to any child or family who needs them without the rigid and sometimes permanent classification that the present system involves.

To bring us down to earth, Mr. Speaker, to something right at hand, we recently heard from the conference of provincial Ministers that the federal government would be interested in sharing the cost of juvenile detention institutions that fall presently under the Minister of Correctional Services. The Prime Minister, with all due respect, took the attitude that because the National Health and Welfare Minister said this should be under The Department of Social and Family Services he was interfering with how the Ontario Cabinet will run this particular government.

But I would ask that perhaps in light of item 188 of this particular report some consideration would be given to the reasons why it would be wise to have the children who have committed an anti-social act or are beyond the control of their parents come under The Department of Social and Family Services. In chapter eight, item 191:

Before turning to the consideration of particular services for children we must emphasize that expenditure of time, effort, talent and money on children in need of social care is above all, an investment in the future. It makes no sense to us, either on humanitarian grounds or in terms of sheer economics, to allow young children to be neglected physically, emotionally or intellectually. By doing so we not only mortgage the happiness of thousands of children and the children they in turn will have, but also pile up future problems and expense for the society into the bargain.

I would respectfully ask, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister—whose responsibility is surely the welfare of all people of this province—would consider some of the financial decisions that have reflected in the problems related particularly to children.

On the subject of day care in item 194:

Associated with the shortage of day care provision and the decline in the number of places in local authority day nurseries, there has been an enormous growth in private day nurseries and child minding. The number of places in private day nurseries and provided by registered child-minders multiplied fivefold between 1956 and 1966. However, the actual number of child minders far exceeds the number registered and too many of the unregistered do not have the facilities or the personal qualities necessary for the care of young children. It is clear from the evidence including information from a number of medical officers of health that many children under five are being minded daily in conditions which not only endanger their health and safety but also impair their emotional and intellectual development.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there would be no point in anyone saying that this is not exactly the same situation here, and I will not attempt to deal with it today. I will deal with it at a later date. But the need for expanded nursery care and the need to go into the day care child minding type of legislated Act or amendments to the present Act as imperative to working mothers in Ontario, who number approximately one in three married women, and we will continue in more detail on that particular subject, if I may, at another time.

Somewhere in those last paragraphs of item 191 we referred to the children and the children's children. We are dealing today, Mr. Speaker, with a number of cases of children's children, where perhaps had we helped the now young parent, we might not have had the problem of the now young parent and the parent's young child.

In item 252, the report states:

Large numbers of vulnerable young people however, leave school at 15, have only the most cursory contact with the youth employment service and appointed factory doctors, do not benefit from further education and take no part in youth organizations. We do not regard any of the present services as satisfactorily meeting the needs of more than a minority of these young people. At the very least, they should have access to the same kinds of services that are provided for those who remain in full time education. Compare, for example, the amount of medical and psychiatric care, counselling, and vocational guidance which is available in most universities with that available to the great majority of young people aged 18 to 21, most of whom are helping to pay, through taxation, for the education of their more fortunate contemporaries.

And item 254:

Young people who are still at school or who have recently left school may come into contact with the social service department as volunteers to help with the work of that department. This we see as a particularly fruitful field for co-operation between the social service department, the schools and the youth service. But the social service department must also be able to recruit young volunteers who have left school and are connected with youth organizations.

Mr. Speaker, at another time in the near future I will go into the trend of early marriages, which has shown that one-quarter of the brides in Britain are under 20 years of age, well over one-third in the U.S. are 19 years of age or under and in our own Ontario Department of Labour, we had a report—"Women in Ontario Economy"—not too long ago, stating that most married women in their mid 20's had completed their families and by their early 30's their last child was in school.

And for the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) and the Minister of Correctional Services, Mr. Speaker, item 258:

In discussing the issue of departmental responsibility for services for children who are either at risk or have been found guilty of offences we have taken into account the white paper presented in April, 1968.

And that white paper, Mr. Speaker, was on children in trouble. A command paper—perhaps the Minister of Correctional Services would like that number, it is 3601. It is a different white paper on children in trouble with the law.

In general we warmly welcome the proposals in this white paper as a logical step in dealing with children and young people in trouble on predominantly social and educational rather than solely legal lines. Though we have to take account of the fact that they still have to be translated into legislation and administrative action. It is clear, however, that the government has recognized considerable changes are required in the organization of the services in order essentially to unify the approach to the problem by the different services to bring them into closer relationship with the community and to develop the possibilities of earlier diagnosis and more flexible treatment.

In speaking to a responsible member of The Attorney General's Department recently, he related that the amount of time spent on counselling in that department is astounding. He inferred that more time is being spent counselling on, I presume, probation and so on, than in pre-sentencing reports. It is good that counselling is coming from somewhere—thank heavens it is coming, Mr. Speaker—however counselling must be dispensed in a more uniform fashion throughout a broader section of our society.

Another item for the Attorney General and Minister of Correctional Services, item 265, paragraph 24 of the white paper says:

For young persons aged 14 and under 17, supervision following both criminal proceedings and care, protection and control proceedings will be by the local authority or by a probation officer. We are doubtful about the proposal to maintain a divided responsibility for this age group, as it runs counter to the general principle, discussed in paragraphs 186 and 191, that there must be a clear allocation of responsibility for the social care of children and young people. As far as children and young people under 17 are concerned, we are clear that the social service department, rather than the probation and after-care service, should carry the responsibility for providing a social work service for the courts, for supervising and assisting young people in the community, for after-care work with the young people who have left the new kinds of residential provision which are proposed.

This work would be part of the general responsibility the department would have for all other children committed to its care and for social work with those in special schools. Where necessary, this could be extended beyond the age of 18, as happens at present with some children in care. We realize, however, that if this additional work is to be performed adequately, many probation and after-care officers will have to transfer from the probation and after-care service to the social service department.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that you must wonder when this commentary is going to be completed. There are three more items. I feel very strongly that this is something which must be said.

In item 290, the need for experiment in ways of helping children.

In conclusion, in this chapter we must emphasize once more the need for a development approach to the multiple problems involved in helping children in special need. The present state of knowledge, particularly of what tends to produce persistent offenders, is not sufficient to enable anyone to say with confidence how effective particular measures are in preventing children developing obvious social needs which cannot be met. But that does not excuse the community from trying—

This, Mr. Speaker, is what I am trying to say beyond this report. It will not be easy. It will be a difficult administrative job, but it does not let us have an out. It simply must be done, and the things which are in this report must be said.

To continue, Mr. Speaker, and to repeat:

That does not excuse the community from trying by the best means available to prevent trouble arising. Some of the means may be so obviously right on general grounds of humanity, for instance the provision of better housing and better social care for the under-fives, but there is everything to be said for pressing ahead with it even though knowledge of their exact beneficial effects may be lacking. Common sense suggests that measures which look promising should be tried and systematically evaluated.

In chapter 10, items 332 and 333, we deal with one or two of many valuable comments. I hope I have selected the ones most useful and most pertinent to the problems here in Ontario. Dealing with the problem of the physically handicapped, item 332, chapter 10:

Secondly, there is the question of housing. There is generally no lack of sympathy for the special needs of the handicapped for bungalows or ground-floor flats close to shops and social facilities and for adoption and special aid. Nevertheless, many of them have to live in unsatisfactory conditions or wait for months or years before a suitable appliance is provided or adaptations made or suitable house provided. We know there are practical difficulties in many areas in the provision of ground-floor accommodation, but the social service department must take the major responsibility for securing early action in helping in the provision of adaptation.

Item 333: Thirdly, there are the multiple difficulties that arise when a middle-aged wage earner becomes incapacitated through chronic illness or accident. Here the social service department must be concerned in co-operation with the general practitioners and the hospital services, the Ministry of Social Security and perhaps the Department of Employment and Productivity. And the housing department is trying to achieve some tolerable way of living for the man and his family, remembering that the disability is likely to get worse and will last until he dies.

It often happens that the sufferer receives early warning of impending illness in his late 40s or 50s. He then generally needs retraining on the lines of training for able-bodied people made redundant by industrial change. The reasons why some people, in situations such as this, adapt to their disability and manage to lead useful lives and some do not, are not clearly understood—but the social situation is undoubtedly important in determining attitudes, and this is where the social service department should be able to help.

Now, in Toronto, Mr. Speaker, for the rehabilitation of persons on welfare we have three full-time professional social counsellors, who have three, I believe, non-professional assistants and there is a request in for three more, because of the city taking over a new group, an over-50 group. But this is a very limited effort, and it deals only with the placing of people for employment. We must look at the counselling and the re-allocation of needs of the family beyond the two that we are presently dealing with—giving them money and seeking to retrain and re-employ them—as their difficulties go much deeper than this.

Chapter 11, item 344 is the last of this section of the report, Mr. Speaker, for today—

Item 344: Further survey is necessary to estimate needs that are not even expressed in demand for services. There are some pointers in recent studies, for instance in the study of morbidity. In about 50 general practices in London, ten per cent of the patients over 15 who consulted during a year were given a psychiatric diagnosis. This represents about 7,800 persons per 100,000 population.

The source for that, Mr. Speaker, is "Morbidity in General Practice", Sheppard M. et al, 1966.

In a survey made on the Isle of Wight, the prevalence of psychiatric disorders, excluding subnormality, amongst children aged 10 to 11 was 6.3 per cent in a year. About one-third of these were severely disturbed. If this rate is applied to all school children, 319 would be expected in the severe category in a population of 100,000.

The source, Mr. Speaker, is Rutter, M. and Graham, P. Proceedings of Royal Society of Medicine, 59,382, 1966.

It is clear that there is no hope in the foreseeable future of offering conventional psychiatric or social person-to-person service to all adults or children who are seriously maladjusted. Several studies have shown that there are far more old people with serious mental disorders living in their own homes than in all institutions together—

The reference to that, Mr. Speaker, says:

—although the number of these is growing rapidly. For example, in England and Wales in 1954 there were 15,557 residents over 75 in mental hospitals who had been there more than six months. By 1963, there were 21,171.

How many of these people could be living in the community is another question. Some of them could. We are only beginning to appreciate the dimensions of the psycho-geriatric problem that its difficulties are already playing.

One could only hope, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps such a report might interest the four Ministers concerned and even extend sometimes to five and six. We used to say in nursery school work that sometimes we had to cut a child in four to serve him properly—to divide him between The Department of Social and Family Services, The Department of Health, The Department of Education and The Department of Correctional Services, if he should fall there, or the Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall) if he has a family problem of housing—and these are all related problems—and then to deal with the other members of the family we start all over again wherever their problems may fall; some under the Provincial Secretary for language, some under the Minister of Correctional Services and so on.

Mr. Speaker, somewhere along the way someone has to look at the total family, assessing the problems, the means of prevention and rehabilitation. It seems that we go along not doing anything with children except for education and public health service, with the many children who are in need of help. We are not doing anything to go to them. We wait until they have come to us as a vital statistic, needing assistance or custodial care.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I began this commentary on The Department of Social and Family Services on Friday by referring to a vital statistic, the infant death of Carol Ann Young. Her mother, an 18-year-old welfare recipient was living in two rooms on Queen Street. I said then, Mr. Speaker, and I reiterate that this is not an isolated case. I will deal briefly with at least two other deaths which have all occurred in the same three-month period.

The report of the committee on local authority and allied personal social services, presented to British Parliament, July 1968, recommended a new local authority department providing a community-based and family-oriented service available to all. They stated, Mr. Speaker:

That this new department will, we believe, reach beyond the discovery and rescue of social casualties. It will enable the greatest possible numbers of individuals to act reciprocally, giving and receiving service for the wellbeing of the whole community.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, we are not so far away from having governments use the people who are the recipients, and having them give some experience, some knowledge to the service. We saw that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I believe, stated recently in the press that he thought it was important that we include recipients of welfare in dealing with their problems on the National Welfare Council.

In the report, Mr. Speaker, they also stated:

That this department would be concerned with the well being of the whole community and it will have responsibilities that go beyond those of the existing departments but will include present services—

And they call the new department, the social services department. This is exactly what we need in Ontario, Mr. Speaker. Many of the people administering social welfare at the local level must be given broader scope to deal with the whole family, if we are to succeed in reducing the numbers of persons in need; scope beyond the generic as the welfare system is applied now, scope to apply partial preventative assistance at the local level, Mr. Speaker.

I have talked to administrators recently who are happy because they could call on the services of two visiting homemakers to go into homes, to assist and to teach home-making. But I ask, Mr. Speaker, why two visiting homemakers, when there are 30,000 to 35,000 recipients of welfare in Metro Toronto alone?

To enlarge this type of service as well as counselling services will require additional resources, needless to say. But, Mr. Speaker, it will assist in removing much of the need of welfare assistance in our midst and will be an assist to the war on poverty. Surely the goal is the important aspect, even with a five-year programme. Surely we could begin to roll back the numbers in need, the numbers now totally dependent on government in using a "rehabilitating formula."

To sum up the report, Mr. Speaker, is to say we must meet needs on the basis of the overall requirements of the individual or family rather than on the basis of a limited set of symptoms.

In the particular case of the inquest that I referred to—it was reported January 17 in the Toronto Globe and Mail and in the Toronto Daily Star.

Mr. Gordon Smith of the welfare administration in east Toronto testified, when questioned by Doctor Cranston at the inquest of Carol Ann Young, January 17, 1969, that his welfare workers' function is primarily a financial one, that welfare workers try often to counsel, but welfare workers are not social workers.

Mr. Gordon Smith, Mr. Speaker, should never have been in this position. As welfare administrator for 1,600 recipients and head over 25 welfare workers, he must have sufficient services at his disposal to virtually eliminate from public governmental dependency, the 1,600 recipients of his jurisdiction.

There are many, many dedicated people in our society administering welfare needs. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, there are many who are not so dedicated, and we must form a system to be able to isolate those from the people who have dedicated their lives to this service. I have found so far nothing but co-operation, dedication and interest and the point must certainly be made. But the Minister of Social and Family Services is failing his own administration at the local level, and I will comment on that later, Mr. Speaker.

It is sufficient to say that in the offices of welfare administration in Toronto there have been successful uses made of the system of putting a visiting homemaker into a family during some crisis, keeping the whole family from disintegrating and becoming wards of a society. And a great expense was saved in many instances by the weekly wage of a visiting homemaker—about $60 a week—in place of total institutionalized care for the individual, in the disrupted family. It can be disrupted, Mr. Speaker, for any reason: illness, death or just plain difficulties. Yet we find the staff of the municipality of Toronto has only two visiting homemakers to call on, for 35,000 recipients of welfare.

Cases such as Carol Ann Young are the failure of the social structure of social and family service in relation to the needs of society. Those needs are varied, Mr. Speaker: the need of government to cope with juvenile offenders; the focus on the family aspect of need. The focus on needs of older persons, as a thing separate and apart from other kinds of need. Carol Ann Young must not pass on simply as a statistic.

I point out to the public, to the media, to the government that whereas under special assistance of The General Welfare Assistance Act of Ontario, her mother could be allowed $150 maximum allowance for funeral and burial costs, when the child was dead, she was allowed only $25 a month for the infant for food, clothing and personal requirements when she was alive.

Carol Ann Young was by no means isolated. I have said this before, Mr. Speaker, and I say it again. The fact that we have had three cases of deaths within two months speaks for itself. Except for her death, the attention might not have been focused on this specific case, and we have public relations workers in Ontario speaking and singing about a place to stand and a place to grow, and this particular child had no place, Mr. Speaker, either to stand or to grow.

The problem is compounded by the absence of a section of government which is primarily concerned with what is happening to all children in this so-called affluent province. Of course we do it in the field of education and the health services for school children, but in this specific case the mother and the child were caught up in the monster of unwieldy welfare services that do not have to exist if the government of this province would even embrace the intent and the spirit of the Canada Assistance Plan.

This is a matter of urgent public importance. Through public enquiry the focus has been made; interest and attention has been drawn. These same persons right up to the coroner in the case, must draw action from the Social and Family Services Minister and the Cabinet at Queen's Park, who have been conspicuously silent on this case, even though editorials called for action, and the jury recommended action, from this particular level.

Hopefully, this demand for action will throw light on the problem of being a recipient of welfare under the present system in the province of Ontario today. To begin with, the government of Ontario accepted the Canada Assistance Plan. It was sold to this province as a proposition that a means test could be evaluated on an individual basis towards putting an end to poverty. That was the proposal by the federal government.

The Ontario government, by availing itself of the monies had a part to play. That was to provide what was set out by the federal government in this Act. Any expansion by the provincial government of its services, and staffs, the cost would be of a 50/50 break financially with the federal government. The Act called clearly for rehabilitative and preventative programmes.

The Canada Assistance Plan called for work activity projects, non-existent during the estimates of The Department of Social and Family Services during the last session. I said then, Mr. Speaker, and I say it again, respectfully, the Ontario government is fraudulent in accepting aid from the Canada Assistance Plan when not adopting the intent and the spirit of the Act. And they have chosen the most devious way out of their part to play in the war against poverty; by simply turning around and offering to pay 50 per cent of any municipal scheme or staff expansion to broaden services, leaving the initiative up to the municipality who cannot afford to embark on such a scheme. And so that is how we got, I am told, one professional counsellor for all Metropolitan Toronto, and his job, Mr. Speaker, is to set up a volunteer counselling service.

This is government operating on the cheap. Two teaching visiting homemakers, three professional, three non-professional counsellors for job rehabilitation and retraining—a grand total of nine persons to help in various ways to counsel and rehabilitate at least 30,000 welfare recipients in Metropolitan Toronto.

The municipality have, as I said, requested three more counsellors for their take-over of the over-50 unit as of January, 1969. Who would deny that this is the very least that the Ontario government could allow in expecting the municipality to carry a 50 per cent burden of any cost of expansion. The municipality, Mr. Speaker, finds it a strain to cope with the 20 per cent, while the provincial government takes 80 per cent of the cost of the general welfare assistance, and that is why we, in the New Democratic Party, have recommended for some time the taking over of the cost and administration of welfare by the province.

The private social agencies must have government initiative and understanding of what is happening to them, also. In Hansard, page 3140 of the last session, Mr. Speaker, I said it was imperative to appoint a commission, that the time had come when government's role and the private agencies' role had to be assessed in relationship to each other and to the community they were serving, the time to assess exactly what was happening in the field of private agencies. Volunteer agencies need some government understanding of what is happening to draw comparisons between the voluntary agencies, raising funds in their own communities for their own work. There is a large gap between what is raised and what they want. The very thing that the juries have stated in these cases, Mr. Speaker, was the lack of co-ordination and that the initiative must be taken at the provincial government level.

The private agencies are crying out in need of initiative by the Ontario government and government is wrong in not doing something about it. After all, the private social agency is one place where family counselling is done to help whole families from becoming totally dependent on government, or from staying in need of government financial assistance. And for the government not to do large scale family counselling is to say that theirs is a hopeless situation, that we cannot do anything with these people, or for the people who are welfare recipients.

This is simply not so, Mr. Speaker. The people can be helped to achieve a measure of independence and stay off welfare. The vast majority are there through desperate need, desperate inadequacy. The mother of Carol Ann Young is a good example; she is no longer on welfare.

The facts pertaining to this particular case are not uncommon, Mr. Speaker, and I will deal with them as efficiently as possible, because I know there are other members who wish to speak today. I find as a member of the legislative assembly in Metro Toronto that I run across the same problems. The faces and names change, but the problems roll on and the similarity is astounding. And this particular syndrome that I am going to point out is one which I am sure many other legislators of this assembly are also dealing with every day.

The pattern goes like this: the recipient's actual rent was $108.33 a month. The allowance for shelter under The General Welfare Assistance Act is $85 a month for one family head and one dependent, as was this particular case. The differential between the shelter allowance and the actual rent of $23.33 per month had to be made up by the recipient by using money out of the other allowance. This induces hardship. In this case, taking $23.33 for rent from their $72 a month allowance for food, clothing and personal requirements, left the mother and infant with $48.67 a month or $1.50 a day for them to live on.

Now this particular welfare administrator in this particular case—and only because she determined to do so—had allowed an amount for utilities and she allowed that amount in the maximum, which was $9. So the recipient received an additional $9 for utilities. The same administrator allowed an amount in the maximum for household supplies of $7 to the recipient. The recipient in this case did not have any utilities to pay, so she could conceivably put this $9 towards rent and if she did not buy any household supplies she could put that $7 towards rent. Is this, Mr. Speaker, what welfare recipients are expected to do?

I say this, not disrespectfully, I ask it because I was astounded during the last session when the Minister of Social and Family Services intimated to me that the administrators at the local level are bending over backwards to do all they can for welfare recipients. What he really was saying—I can see quite clearly now—he was saying they are giving them the maximum amounts wherever they can, and is this not recognition of itself from the administrators that the whole system and financial structure is inadequate? I will deal with that, Mr. Speaker, hopefully under the Budget Debate.

But, even having done that, the recipient could still not make up the rent money without taking $7.33 from her meagre allowance of $72 per month for food, clothing and personal requirements. In the final analysis, this left the mother and infant $64.67 a month to exist on or $2.12 a day, under general welfare assistance.

It is to be noted here, Mr. Speaker, that what amounts to special dispensation, the Act does allow under special assistance, any other special item or service authorized by the Deputy Minister, but the recipient did not know of this and recipients are not being advised of this particular section of the Act.

Mr. Speaker, what kind of people are these people in need; what kind of parents? Do they need parenting themselves? The chances are pretty good that the parents of these infants come from deprived backgrounds.

Maybe, Mr. Speaker, making a baby is their singular achievement. These are young parents who had no opportunity until now for challenge, for change or for choice; no opportunity to say "this is what I want".

We have children who come into the day nurseries who think everything on four feet is a dog, and yet we have people who cry out about television sets for poor people being some sort of foolish purchase. People are short-sighted in saying this, Mr. Speaker, because while the child cannot feel or touch things portrayed on the television, at least the child can see them.

If we had an educational television station such as they have running very effectively in Boston, Massachusetts, which has wide recognition, we could be doing an excellent job of assisting some of these children.

These children do not get the experience of conversation, they do not learn how to use adults in their world, to perform better. You get the little child who is just sitting and not communicating with adults and does not really use his teacher to learn.

These children in 10 or 15 years, Mr. Speaker, are adults and you cannot legislate competence, you cannot legislate a feeling of self-worth, and an appreciation of authority for its good and its purposes. But these people can be taught, they can be ordered, they can be instructed into competent roles of adult parenthood.

I will digress to the inquest into the death of Patrick Carr, one year, eight months old, by reading an editorial from the Toronto Globe and Mail, dated February 26, 1969:

TRAINING FOR PARENTHOOD

Young children cannot go for long periods without food. Yet 20-month-old Patrick Carr was harnessed in his bed from 9 p.m. until noon the next day before his 19-year-old mother found that he had tangled his neck in his harness and died.

The inquest jury recommended that greater control be exercised over the sale and advertising of restraining baby harnesses. But Barbara Chisholm, executive director of the Victorian Day Care Services, had a more important recommendation. "We have here very young parents—the first child at 16 and almost literally a child a year since then," she said. There was no indication of deliberate neglect, she said, but much time elapsed between feedings, which is bad.

"This kind of knowledge about small children and the risks involved raises questions about the kind of responsibility the community has in equipping our young parents to be parents. Accidents like this could be prevented", said Miss Chisholm, "If parents were given a course in child care, perhaps in high school".

It is a sensible suggestion. We now teach our children about sex. It would surely be a mere reasonable extension of the course to teach them what to do with the products of sex. How they must be held to give them proper support, how to bathe and feed and burp them, how to change a diaper and recognize a diaper rash, where—and perhaps this is most important—to go for advice and help that is already available.

Few human activities can have more traumatic effects upon the wide circle of humans than the raising of children. Yet many a mother is handed her infant without knowing the sheer physical facts about sterilizing his bottles, or heating his milk to blood temperature or determining how often he needs it. She doesn't even know how to pin his diaper without pinning him too.

In school she will have learned many facts which she will never need in her life after examination time. Surely the school system should be geared to teach her—and her future husband—these basic human facts which they are almost certain to need.

In Saturday's Globe and Mail, March 1, 1969, Mr. Speaker, on the same subject entitled: Schools Should Teach Teens How to be Parents Group Told:

Nursery schools should be attached to high schools so that teenagers can learn about raising and caring for children, a conference on pre-school education was told yesterday.

H. D. Dickson, an official of the Ontario teachers' conference, which sponsored the conference said schools should be teaching teenagers to be parents. He said this was brought home to him recently when he encountered a former student of his, who told him he was beating his two-year-old son whenever he did anything wrong. He had never heard that a child needs love as much as he needs food, Mr. Dickson said, "and I am guilty, because I was his teacher."

In a complementary proposal, architect John C. Parkins suggested building educational mini-cities. In a paper delivered to the conference Mr. Parkins stated that “teenage boys especially, lose all contact with pre-school and public school children.”

In an effort to bridge this gap and render the period in a young man's life more viable in respect to his future role as a father, the concept of building groups of schools is noteworthy. This really then becomes a mini-city where each group can, through observing and training, learn to understand the problems of the very young.

The further extension of this concept, Mr. Parkins said would be to include in these complexes accommodation for the senior citizens of the community. In this way a secondary purpose is served, that of providing an interest for those elderly persons so often consciously fragmented from society.

Shared parenting, Mr. Speaker, is not replacing parenting. Parenting is too important a role to leave just to parents. Society must be prepared to assist the children of the handicapped—as an example, children of the blind, the deaf, the disabled. The people I am talking about today are the people who are personality amputees, and I repeat, Mr. Speaker, parenting is too important a role to leave to parents who are not competent simply because so often the young person has become a parent.

The role of Miss Barbara Chisholm is that of a parent of the community. The Minister of Social and Family Services is deemed by an Act of the Legislature to be the good parent of the Crown wards. What I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that the role of parenting is not something that comes overnight. We must assist in this service. Competence does not come with mother's milk. Children do not just grow, they develop; it takes lots and lots of conversation, and any of us who have worked in day nurseries, Mr. Speaker, see this on a day-to-day, week-to-week, month-to-month basis. Children must be given the opportunity to learn these things rather than have the thought of meaningful conversation towards an end never cross their minds.

We have a ghetto-ized style of living—young with young, old with old—children are not getting a cultururation experience. Many have virtually no language skills; we have five years to build language; five years for infants to learn how to associate with and get used to grown ups and how to get their help. The child learns to have ideas, he sets them in motion, he puts the ideas into action, he builds a trust—and I believe it is important.

Erickson in his “Six or Eight Stages of Man” said that trust was a basic need and children must learn to rely on that trust. They have to learn that parents are predictable people. We have to look at the parenting of the child and if the parent needs parenting, Mr. Speaker, we must answer this need and break the cycle.

Having babies is not just a biological function or a phenomenon. Our society, Mr. Speaker, is hung up on the belief that only a mother can mother, and that only a parent can parent. It is not necessarily so. We cannot legislate consistent parenting unless we are willing to share in that parenting, unless we are willing to teach young people going into marriage that there will be squabbles, there will be trouble, and that we as legislators will help.

We say a child must be with its mother. What if the mother herself needs parenting? Parents are still the same people they were before the child was born, before they became parents, and many of these people are simply, Mr. Speaker, inexperienced. Many are neurotic; many will be mentally ill. The most flagrant, last of the three inquest cases, proved an atmosphere of mental illness as being the cause of death.

The biological consequences of sex do not change the person one iota. It could mean that the coming of the child is an additional burden, especially if the parents have come from homes which have already suffered deprivation. The idea of a totally demanding, dependent squalling new baby may well aggravate the incompetence. We must put into context what, in fact, first of all, small children require, Mr. Speaker. Then we will realize the community has a responsibility to share as needed in the parenting of the children—in the sharing of the parenting, Mr. Speaker, once again I say—not replacement.

Many of the children who are now young parents have come from families where there was desertion or where there was only one parent, or where the family lived on welfare, or where the mother was plagued with worry, and was incompetent herself and was unable to impart to a child good learning experiences, good guidance, when she herself needed guidance. The chances are pretty good she was shut in a house, potentially even a mentally ill person, close to giving up, unable to assess or understand the needs of the child. As an example, a worried mother with a child said recently to a social worker, “One day I will hit him and I will not be able to stop.”

This is not theory, Mr. Speaker. I am dealing right now with a lady, 46 years of age. I thought she must be at least 66 or 76 when I first spoke to her, because she is rearing one boy of 14, who is an honour student, on a $20-a-month IODE scholarship. Because he was 14 when he attained these marks he could not have, I gather from his guidance teacher, a Department of Education scholarship. Her rent has gone up and she works in a factory and she is unwell, and she said quite literally in the past two weeks, "I am almost ready to give up."

Her daughter, who is older, is an honour student also, and went through on the $30-a-month scholarship which I presume was a board of education scholarship. She has successfully reared the one child and she is at the point of almost breaking down with the other. This is a clear case, Mr. Speaker, of a woman who is remaining economically independent of government, but is in dire need of counselling service.

The point must be made strongly that current programmes both in private and public, are the result of a tremendous amount of caring by an awful lot of people, possibly many of them dead now, and from this we got our basic social service programme which must be recognized as the breakthrough of its time. In the social Darwinism of capitalism—the survival of the fittest and the weak shall perish—this was a tremendous breakthrough.

Having said that the present programmes represent far-sighted care on the part of many individuals, it is now just the first phase, the public programmes in particular, Mr. Speaker, which are bed rock services to citizens. Because the need in those programmes is to institutionalize in order to manage the programmes, we constantly fall into the trap of beaming the customer or the client to fit the procedure to keep the programme rolling. The fact that it is an administrative programme does not excuse our reluctance to take it as a problem to be solved, to bring it to a central focus on the place of the individual who in the large programmes suffers the loss of identity.

What we have done with our rigid function related to definitions of our welfare programme is to decide categorically who may receive service and to check monthly or bi-monthly that the person still qualifies. We are not fighting the real problem at all, Mr. Speaker, in our preoccupation we are obsessed with protecting the taxpayers' money. But this does not mean we are using his money efficiently. We have made a situation where goals have never been fully established except to say that all persons in need may have special assistance above and beyond those outlined. And then the client, the recipient, is not informed that this clause is in fact in The General Welfare Assistance Family Benefits Act.

The deviousness of this type of operation, Mr. Speaker, defeats the full growth of a child and a parent in the case that we have spoken about. We are simply giving about a dollar-a-day-per-person to the least educated, the least emotionally stable, the least able to cope—possibly even the least nutritionally built in the first place, from a poor family background—and we are saying, "There is your money, go to it."

Carol Ann Young's mother was one of several children whose parents lived in Ontario housing. The mother telephoned the city and asked about the pregnant daughter living at home and receiving help and understood that this was not possible. When I checked with Mr. Whaley, the managing director of OHC, Mr. Whaley telephoned the mother to say it would have been possible. This, of course, was months later when the infant child was dead. This is a good example of the need of co-ordination. The mother of the infant took two rooms and was accepted for a cash allotment from our government and was left to fend for herself.

As recently as Friday night I dealt with the same kind of situation—an 18-year-old pregnant girl. Her mother had always worked and two incomes was what supported the family. I think it is important that some of these cases, Mr. Speaker, are told just as it is. The mother was able to work when the daughter was not in difficulty, but in being harassed by the father of the pregnancy, who was living then with another girl—who was also harassing the family by telephone—the mother took sleeping pills and ended up in the hospital. Fortunately, she has survived and we can see no real serious damage at the present time.

The daughter has applied for welfare and has been told by the east end welfare office that she will be provided for if she is not at home with the mother because the mother is to look after her if she is in her home, and they are not physically or financially able to look after her. And we find this variance of social services coming back to haunt us from each of these three inquests.

In talking to the east end office of the municipal welfare services I learned of a form which has to be signed by the client, the recipient of welfare, allowing welfare workers to walk in at any time. Now I can understand, Mr. Speaker, that if a welfare worker is being kept out of a home we should be able to insist that the family having service must have some communication with the department but to have them sign a blanket statement such as this—and yet there is no trace of this form under Family Benefits Act or General Welfare Assistance Act. And in the burial of Carol Ann Young, where the allowance under the Act is up to $150, I found that the people who are doing the burial of these people in the city of Toronto were still operating on the old Metro scheme of about $100, being mindful that it could be pushed further if needed. Now I do not happen to subscribe, Mr. Speaker, to costly burial services but I do think we have to have a unanimity policy.

You add, Mr. Speaker, the problems of this particular inquest to the problems where the editorial called for training for parenthood in the other inquest, and it is shocking. I think it is important to state that in talking to Miss Barbara Chisholm at the Victorian Day Nursery, I learned that the father and mother of Patrick Carr were young. There had been three children from 16, I presume to 19 years of age. They had two other couples in that evening. There was nothing to drink in the house or in the living accommodation found by the Crown. They had apparently been drinking tea all night at 20 years of age.

I am sure that it is not hard to understand that six people having a relaxing time in the otherwise quite worried world in which they lived, obviously enjoyed their activities and began going to bed towards the early hours of morning. Patrick Carr had been forced to leave a crib to make way for the younger child—and once more, it is a sad thing, we again have a case of death where even maybe a crib might have made a difference. Because he had to be moved from the crib to accommodate the younger baby, he was put into a junior bed with the next child. But he was too small for the junior bed so the parents improvised a harness because he kept falling out of the bed. They improvised the harness for his safety. There was no lack of care. There was simply a lack of knowledge of dealing with infant babies as far as feeding and care in this particular death.

I think it is very important to say this because these young people were concerned parents. The mother went to sleep before the father—and there was a mother and young child who even slept overnight and that child woke up and that child got fed, or there might have been two deaths. It was the dehydration, no doubt, in the small infant, plus the fact that he was 20 months old and was getting himself out of the bed to go down in the morning for something to eat.

There are many things to be said in this department, Mr. Speaker, which I hope I will be able to deal with under the budget debate. But one point of information that I think is necessary to know at this time in dealing with these particular cases: Miss Chisholm of the Victorian Day Care Centre, said that her costs for the type of rehabilitation and preventative counselling and general overseeing that she provides can be $8.50 a day or can go as high as $14 a day. But as she said, compare that, Mr. Speaker, with $35 a day for residential care, $23 a day for detention home care and $20 for Clarke Institute care.

We cannot afford, Mr. Speaker, not to afford getting into a family programme, an intelligent welfare programme. This way we are doing nothing. We are doing nothing but barely keeping people alive, and because parent incompetence is not as flagrant as drug-addiction or alcoholic addiction, we have not, until recently, had editorials, we have not had public focus until these three tragic deaths. The subject allows journalists never-ending scope to tell it as it is, and it is a whole area of excursion for government who would set the goal to eliminate much of the need of welfare services.

These are chronically inadequate families, Mr. Speaker, and to negotiate is something they have never known. We can deal with them, we can rehabilitate them. The testimony in the final case which I shall be dealing with just briefly is different from the others. It was the coroner's jury recommendation February 17, 1969, that a newborn child of any mother with a history of mental illness automatically be considered "for protective care and supervision" by the children's aid society until the parents can prove their ability to care for the child properly. And in quotes, Mr. Speaker, "another contributing factor could have been the lack of communication on the part of all the agencies involved in not recognizing the situation and taking positive action."

This was the case of five month old William Ambing, whose parents had been recent patients in the Ontario Hospital, and who died from asphyxia in his crib at his home. The child was conceived while these parents were in the Ontario Hospital—but that, again,

Mr. Speaker, is a vital subject needing much broader scope than we can deal with today.

The testimony went this way; that it was not the responsibility or the concern of social administrators, or at least, of welfare administrators, as to the social situation in which their clients lived. We are operating a department of $227 million, Mr. Speaker, and if we do not willingly put into that system what we can, by way of rehabilitation, by showing clearly the parenting role for the next generation, if we do not help bring about the change, then we are leaving these people with nothing; nothing in their hearts or in their lives but a "void". They do at least one thing successfully—they do make babies—and we must meet the need on the basis of the overall requirements, the individual or the family, rather than on the basis of a limited set of systems.

I would like to deal briefly with the guaranteed annual income in the light of an editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning, entitled, "Faulty As It Is, Welfare Must Go On." And I would like to record the editorial, Mr. Speaker, and maybe spend two minutes on what I consider a good analysis of what a guaranteed annual income really is. Reading from the Globe and Mail, March 3, 1969:

There is mounting evidence that our various welfare programmes, assistance plans, family allowances and equalization grants are indeed a "patchwork". Not only are they inefficient and overlapping, but it has been shown conclusively that they are not eliminating the poverty cycle.

The response to this realization has been a growing feeling that the most prudent approach would be to clear the battlefield and start all over again in the war on poverty.

The alternative that has been receiving the most attention has been some form of guaranteed annual income which might be implemented by means of a negative income tax. A family whose income falls below a certain level would receive a grant to bring it up to that level.

Ontario Revenue Minister John White has joined those who want an investigation into the relative costs of what he calls "straight welfare" programmes and guaranteed minimum incomes. He would also restrict spending on welfare programmes for the next two years until the comparison is in.

Mr. White would do well to study the remarks of Dr. D. L. McQueen, the director of the Economic Council of Canada, made to a Glendon College seminar. He pointed out that the economic council's most recent report has been moderately successful in bringing home to Canadians the disgraceful fact that one of every five of us ekes out an existence in poverty.

But the Council has not been so effective in drawing attention to the failure of existing "conventional wisdom". We all know, for instance, that Canada's poor are to be found in the Atlantic provinces and eastern Quebec, rural areas, Indian and Eskimo communities.

They are also to be found in families headed by widows or divorcees, and families where the man of the house is unemployed. And we have designed our welfare programmes on this basis.

As Dr. McQueen puts it: "It is all too easy to draw the conclusion that strong support of regional development in the eastern extremities of Canada, plus special measures for Indians, Eskimos and Metis, plus more day care centres for small children, plus categorical welfare assistance for those too old or otherwise unable to work would just about add up to an adequate anti-poverty programme for Canada.

"But our figures indicate that, while all of the measures mentioned are highly desirable, a programme limited to them alone would leave untouched a very large part of the low-income population."

The economic council, which sets the poverty level at $1,800 a year for a single person, and $4,800 for a family of five, found when it began to count heads that most of the poor live in cities rather than rural areas, and more than half of them live west of the Ottawa River. Most poor families are headed by men under 65. Furthermore, most of those below the poverty line could be described as "working poor", not the unemployed, but at least part-time members of the labour force.

Dr. McQueen's economists have been studying guaranteed incomes and negative income tax. And they conclude that such a scheme would not be the panacea. Manpower programmes, individual improvement programmes and community improvement programmes would still be needed. They agree with Revenue Minister White, however, that more research is needed into the costs of welfare programmes as well as research into the root causes of poverty. Dr. McQueen has suggested that more use might be made of the Canada Assistance Plan (which at present covers only the aged). The council, with the help of the Vanier Institute of the Family, is exploring pre-school education as a means of giving the poor a running, instead of a limping, start into the formal educational system.

But the council never suggests, as Mr. White does, restriction of spending while new programmes are under investigation. "It may seem," said Dr. McQueen, "that our main proposals for early action mostly involve the patching, coordination and extension of existing programmes. When, you may ask, are we going to get out and to something for human beings? In answer to this question, we should bear in mind that there are already people out there doing something—welfare workers and others who have dedicated their lives to dealing with poverty and its consequences.

To leave them standing still while the research went on would be unthinkable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the hon. Minister from London South (Mr. White), we heard of his comments on guaranteed annual income when he was proposing a tax on food and children's clothing as being a form of negative income tax, a form of guaranteed income. But this is not what the guaranteed income is about. And the editorial clearly illustrates the need for continuing welfare services.

In my anxiety to embrace the guaranteed annual income concept, I believe I even made the error myself of stating it as a replacement for welfare. But it was a momentary error during the last session, because there is just no way we can suddenly replace welfare. We will still need counselling, we will still need rehabilitation, we will still need guidance, and this editorial has outlined very carefully the areas which will still have to be in operation under The Department of Social and Family Services.

This is also referred to in a review in the Commentary of January 1969, of a book called "Social Benefits: Children, Poverty and Family Allowances" by James C. Vadakin. The book was reviewed by Robert Lekachman. Family allowances are a pretty hot topic these days here and there, but since it is a federal matter, I shall leave it and go to the concept and the spectrum of the guaranteed annual income:

Guaranteed annual income has a spectrum much similar to that of our political system, of the far right, the centre and the left. The lesson to the left is clear: stress should be placed upon measures that are genuinely capable of shifting the distribution of income and wealth in the United States in the direction of diminished inequality. Of such measures, family allowances are just about the least likely to accomplish that aim. A properly designed negative income tax, on the other hand, could indeed serve as an instrument of redistribution. The words "properly designed" of course, exclude the conception of conservatives like Milton Friedman, who have in mind quite different objectives. Dr. Friedman, in an effort to minimize costs and preserve work incentives, has proposed cutting out benefits once an income is attained which is half that of the poverty level. Moreover, a negative income tax on his model would replace all welfare benefits.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the philosophies of Milton Friedman—unless I am mistaken, I believe he is a professor in Chicago who was an advisor to Mr. Goldwater—I wonder if these are the philosophies of the Minister of Revenue (Mr. White), since he wants to call for an immediate stop of the expansion of any welfare services.

There is no particular mystery, Mr. Speaker, about the workings of a radical negative income tax. One version of such a tax worked out by Professor James Tobin of Yale would confer either cash grants or tax benefits upon all families of five whose incomes fall below $8,000.

Mr. Speaker, it is to be noted here that as far two to three years ago, the level corresponding to this $8,000, the amount of money believed essential to adequately care for the family of five in a meaningful way in U.S. society was $6,700. This figure—going back to the commentary, Mr. Speaker—this figure is high enough so that a great many working class families would receive some benefit, although less than that paid to the really poor. Hence the proposal would have some of the unifying effects imputed to children's allowances. In effect, the scheme shifts income from that portion of the population which can already pay taxes to those who are at the bottom half of income distribution. Tobin's sketch is one of many possible plans but the mechanics of all of them are simple. It takes little more than basic arithmetic to design a system which greatly benefits any given segment of the population and finances the improvement by removing funds from the relatively affluent.

There is a last word to be said. I do not anticipate that any scheme as direct in its objectives and as contrary to the temper of the times as a redistributive negative income tax has any hope of success. It is however, a programme for the sort of social science research into whose design enters radical possibility and hence an investment in the kind of social action one may hope to see in the future.

Mr. L. Bernier (Kenora): Mr. Speaker, this is the third occasion that I have had to participate in the Throne debate and, of course, on these occasions I have had the honour of representing that great riding of Kenora.

Mr. Speaker, may I through you, extend our sincere good wishes, and my own personal wishes, to His Honour, the new Lieutenant Governor, our gracious Queen's representative in the second session of the 28th Parliament of this province.

To you, sir, I would again extend my compliments on the efficient, fair, and business-like manner by which you guide the affairs of this House. As many other previous speakers have pointed out, we all realize that your duties are difficult at certain times. However, we all welcome your efforts to maintain the business-like atmosphere of this Legislature on a very even keel. To the member for Waterloo South (Mr. Reuter), who handles the chairmanship of the committee of the whole, I certainly offer my congratulations on the fine work that he is doing also.

Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to extend to you, thanks and best wishes from two of your former page boys, who worked in this Legislature last spring. Danny Chikane, who wrote me a personal letter is still residing in the isolated community of Round Lake, and Eddy Peters, formerly of Pikangikum, is now going to school in Kenora. They have both asked that I express their appreciation for the thoughtfulness and the kindness that you extended to both of them while they carried out their very interesting and pleasant duties here in the Legislature. Mr. Speaker, I would also like to add my thanks and compliments to you, sir, for the guidance and concern and the interest that you have displayed in all the page boys that lend so much pleasant help and atmosphere to the everyday tasks of this Legislature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would comment briefly on the remarks made in the House last week—February 19 and 21—by the member for Rainy River (Mr. T. P. Reid). I am sorry to see he is not in his seat but I understand he had to leave. I would point out that I have many friends in the riding of Rainy River, and a large number of people write to me and phone me when they want some information as to what is happening in the Legislature, or when they want or need some assistance in connection with their dealings here at Queen's Park. I say this, not to cast reflection on the member for Rainy River or to say he is not doing his job. Rather, as a life-long resident of the northwest it would only be quite natural to meet and to know many people in the adjoining riding. Many of these people are well known Liberals.

Since the member for Rainy River made his remarks last week, I have been plagued with calls from all over his riding. Many of the calls come from many Liberals and I even received a call from an NDP supporter—all who expressed disappointment at the lack of research done and shallowness of the remarks by the member for Rainy River.

So, Mr. Speaker, instead of going into detail and passing my own judgment on his speech—

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): The member for Rainy River is the voice of northwestern Ontario.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Brain-washed by the government!

Mr. Bernier: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the leader of the Opposition what happened to Mr. Molgat in Manitoba at the last by-elections.

Mr. Speaker, instead of going into detail and passing my own judgment on his speech, although I have to admit it was a pretty sad effort, I will only say to the hon. member that his own supporters were not impressed but, in fact, very disillusioned. The NDP, you may be interested in knowing, called it another silli-talkathon.

Mr. Speaker, I would just suggest to my young friend, the present member for Rainy River, that instead of being a habitual cry-baby, and instead of going around and blaming his problems on the Conservative government, that he study the career of his predecessor, a Progressive Conservative, a distinguished, highly respected member of this Legislature—a man who stood and defended this Conservative government all across Rainy River riding—when the present member speaks so lightly of that same government—and a man, I might add, that in his time got more for his riding than many others ever got for ours, including the Noden Causeway. Perhaps this might illustrate, Mr.

Speaker, that in looking after a riding, method, reality and good common sense can be of equal importance as one's political affiliation.

Mr. Speaker, in regard to the programmes taking place in the northwest, I would like to place on record part of an editorial which appeared in the Kenora Miner and News on March 20, 1968.

At the moment, Kenora, is in the midst of another large move forward. Its total size is not yet known.

Consider these projects, either completed or well underway:

1. The $1,800,000 Holiday Inn, 11 storeys, 96 rooms, which will bring new convention business to Kenora, as well as project Kenora into a new area of the tourist industry.

2. The new provincial police headquarters, a $620,000 structure, which will bring added dollars to Kenora's total payroll. It will be officially opened this spring.

3. The community centre—a $700,000 building adding new dimensions to living.

4. The town's $250,000 warehouse—a credit to the municipality.

5. The town's new electrical distribution system, completed now at a cost of just below $1 million.

6. The town's new sewer system, nearing completion, at a cost in excess of $600,000.

7. The new school of nursing, utilizing the St. Joseph hospital building.

8. The new Lakeside Baptist Church.

9. The enlarged telephone building, with expanded facilities soon to be in operation.

10. The enlarged Lake-of-the Woods clinic.

11. The enlarged plant of Vacationland dairies.

12. The looping of the gas pipeline in Jaffray-Meckick and at Shoal Lake, and several other smaller, but vital positive moves, such as modernization of several cafes.

On the horizon:

1. The opening of the new community college in September will improve education standards.

2. Shop Easy stores.

3. Expect to see a major addition to the newly formed District General Hospital.

4. The federal government has promised a start this year on a $600,000 post office in the town of Kenora.

5. Ontario's Minister of Public Works said in Kenora this month to expect an early start on a building programme for their needs.

6. Tenders have been called for a Department of Transport wharf and building to cost over $61,000.

7. Ontario Hydro has announced participation in Manitoba's power programme, which will mean major expenditures in power lines and transformer facilities locally.

These programmes involve expenditures of some $11 million. Just as important, they show the direction Kenora is moving. The rewards for further effort are equally glittering, through property now utilized by the post office, following generally the CPR right-of-way. Some 12 acres of somewhat dormant land lie along this route; serviced property, ideal for business expansion. Discussions have taken place with the owners of the land, who are anxious to assist in its utilization. By keeping our business district in a compact area, such a development will not undermine the present investments.

So we have new hope, new incentives. We can truly say that in the realms of education, in health, in recreation, in municipal facilities and employment opportunities, we are on the march.

Mr. Speaker, in discussing the potential of the great northwest, I would like now to spend a few moments discussing our tourist industry.

It is estimated that within 20 years, our population in Canada will be nearing the 35 million mark—90 per cent will live in the urban ant hills of steel, glass, plastic and concrete. 4½ million people will occupy Metropolitan Toronto and its fringe spreading 20 miles out from the present downtown core. Beyond it the golden horseshoe embracing the north shore of Lake Ontario will be solid with people from Oshawa to Niagara and North to Barrie. Closer to Kenora, one million people will live in Winnipeg and south of us 320 million vacation hungry Americans will be surging over our borders in search of a place to play and relax.

Mr. Speaker, within 20 years there will be technological efficiency beyond our wildest dreams—the work week will be only 30 hours or less. We will be better educated and have twice as much disposable income. There will be high speed transit systems of several kinds with superb motor vehicles available to all. Thus, while our numbers will have doubled, our demand for outdoor recreation will have tripled—where will they all go to play? I can suggest to the rest of this province and indeed to this continent that the northwestern portion of this province has the elbow room to handle such recreational needs.

Mr. Speaker, our government is aware of this future need. This is evident in that just last July, the Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld), unveiled to the general public, in Kenora, a 92 page tourist industry study of the great northwest. This detailed industry study covering the districts of Rainy River, Kenora and Patricia, listed 27 recommendations which have since received the close scrutiny of all those interested in the promoting and the enlarging of this industry.

Last November, the Minister returned to Kenora to hear submissions and briefs relative to this study, and, it is interesting to note, that all were indebted to the department for taking the initiative in implementing such an important study. However, Mr. Speaker, growth exists on capital. In other words, we need money—money to further the development of our north. That is why I feel it is time for the terms of reference of the Ontario Development Corporation to be expanded whereby financial assistance could be made available to the commercial resort operators, so that they in turn could expand and improve their summer facilities to attract family vacation groups. The present terms of the ODC are not providing the financial assistance to the tourist industry whereby the job can be properly tackled.

Mr. Speaker, in this era of constant cries for additional industry, I say to you, sir, that we in northwestern Ontario possess such magnificent opportunities for recreational development on so massive a scale that its potential ranks among the most outstanding on this continent. The tourist industry study report states very clearly that the government has an opportunity to assist in the development of the tourist industry at a comparable small cost to the public purse.

While I may be critical at this time of the present terms of reference of the Ontario Development Corporation, I want to refute some of the charges of our opposition members who are quick to down-grade the entire efforts of this corporation.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that since September, 1967, the corporation has provided on-the-spot service in the area west from Manitouwadge by eight visits of a consulting team. This team spent nine weeks interviewing and travelling in the area, and the remainder of the time developing situations where assistance was possible. All the larger centres have been visited for discussions with interested persons, the Lakehead was visited on eight occasions, the area to the west on three, and the area to the east on one. During these trips, Mr. Speaker, and this is just since September, 1967, 160 potential situations were investigated and their present status is: 13 resulted in loans, 11 are being processed, 38 are expected to produce applications, and 98 were provided with advisory services. In all, approximately 350 interviews and meetings were held in the area, with applicants, municipal officials, industrial commissions, and so on.

It is interesting to note that financial assistance authorized to date in that area amounts to: $678,613 in forgivable loans, $246,000 in term loans, and $505,000 in loan guarantees. I feel confident, Mr. Speaker, that in the ODC we have the vehicle that can provide the required advisory assistance and capital that will make northern Ontario play a larger role in the future of this province. However, again their terms of reference must be altered and slanted to attracting new industries to the north. If we are to achieve our full potential, major assistance is necessary.

I have pointed out on many occasions, Mr. Speaker, that we in the Kenora area are fast becoming the capital of the northwest—and rightly so. This area is the hub for many government district offices and transportation routes. We have many provincial government district offices located in the area. I understand from my colleague from Rainy River that more are planned for the future, with the result that we have a large number of civil servants, and I would like at this time to say a few words on their behalf.

Civil servants, Mr. Speaker, carry on the day to day business of government, be it municipal, provincial or federal. I have heard it said that they are a tactless, indifferent, lustreless bunch of workers, interested only in security of employment and of course their weekly pay cheque that goes with it. The facts are not so. Most are conscientious and able employees.

In my brief period in public life, I have come to realize that civil servants are as co-operative, as reasonable and helpful as any group of citizens. Those of us who have a good deal to do with the government have learned that any reasonable request, backed and supported by logic and being economically sound, will be given every consideration. Those engaged in handling the affairs of this province and municipalities which I represent, and I am sure that all other members will join with me when I say that most of them are doing a credible job.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment briefly on certain aspects of the Speech from the Throne related to the concept of regional government. This idea is particularly stimulating to me as the member for Kenora where we are faced with the challenge of a large geographical area served by four large towns and a number of smaller communities, both organized and unorganized. These areas have been developed to a point where residents are paying their fair share of educational costs to local school boards. The other necessary services are provided by this government and are paid for by the residents through the medium of the provincial land tax.

It is my considered opinion that the people of the district of Kenora are prepared to accept the benefits and responsibilities associated with municipal organization of a regional nature.

However, I would ask my colleagues who are members of the Cabinet to review the matter in depth by consulting during every step of the way with the people in the district of Kenora on the subject of moving to regional government. Amalgamation of several communities warrants, in my opinion a thorough study along with regional economic development prior to any positive moves to regional government. In making this request, I am aware that those legal and constitutional problems related to my Indian friends on reserves will require consultation at different levels of government and it may not be possible to include them in plans for a regional government at this time.

There is a growing desire on the part of my constituents to approach regional government and the solutions to social services, housing, roads, planning, and so on, with an awareness of the advantages and the responsibilities associated with unified action.

Having dealt with regional government, Mr. Speaker, I would like to turn to another matter—one that took place just a few weeks ago when we in the Kenora area had the honour and the privilege of hosting the 41st Annual Northwestern Ontario Tourist Association convention.

From your left side, Mr. Speaker, you have heard numerous complaints that the northwestern portion of this province is being neglected by the Cabinet. In this respect, I want to read into the records for those who are here, the text of an editorial which appeared in the Kenora Miner News, following the Minister's visit to the NOTO convention. It was captioned, "Thanks For Coming", and it read, and I quote:

The Minister of Highways, the hon. George Gomme, last night produced statistics designed to refute charges that northern Ontario has been an ineffective part of the province. When the budgets of his department were drafted, his spirited defence of the government, delivered to an audience of 300 attending the 41st annual NOTO convention here, impressed visitors not so much with the logic offered, as with Mr. Gomme's obvious knowledge and ability. Those privileged to have met Mr. Gomme have a deep respect for a dedicated man, and hope that his visits will provide more people with the opportunity of offering friendship and hospitality.

The Minister is aware of course that requests for improvements to our roads are not demands, because we feel discriminated against, but real economic necessities required in our self help programme. On his return we hope that he will tell his colleagues of our conviction that this area has never enjoyed a greater report from Queen's Park than it has in the past two years.

How about that? Things are happening in the northwest!

This feeling comes from increasing frequent visits by members of Parliament to this area, and particularly because Premier Robarts has come to know our geographical problems and a great many citizens as well. We have received many changes and heard many promises of more during 1967 and 1968.

Not only have services of provincial departments been strengthened in the district, but more important, a modest start has been made to assist us to find new industry and to replace those that we have lost.

This editorial, Mr. Speaker, is indicative of the feeling of the northwest today. The people of northwestern Ontario shall be the first ones to point that out, that we in the area have a tremendous faith and respect for this government and our leaders. This was quite evident during our tour of northwestern Ontario last September, and I think most of the members will agree.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, all is not as desperate as the Opposition would have you believe. That old, tired, and badly tattered cry of "the forgotten north" has fallen by the wayside and it has fallen because this Progressive Conservative government has made it so through action. As the editorial points out, in the past several years the Ontario government has taken up an increasing interest in the needs of the north—and more, Mr. Speaker, it has taken up an active interest.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I close, I want to draw to the attention of the House two areas that I think members might be interested in. First of all in Longlac, in northwestern Ontario—we saw this during our tour—there has recently been set up a forest harvesting operation, which in my opinion places great efficiency and stress on the much talked about multiple use concept of our forest harvesting. Here in this area—and we saw it last fall—full-length trees are being directed to either a sawmill, a pulpmill, plywood plant, and even some of the harvesting is being directed to a pole-mill at the Lakehead, thereby reaching the maximum and best use from each tree cut.

In this connection it seems to me that we are relatively unsuccessful in attracting new industry to the Sioux Lookout area where, I might add, some 65,000 cords of pulpwood are harvested annually and shipped some 250 miles to the pulp mills at the Lakehead. I would say I cannot urge too strongly that the Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Brunelle) should immediately do everything within his power, and in his department's power, to encourage, to plan and promote the multiple use concept of our forest harvesting in that area also.

The second point I would bring to the members' attention is the little community of Ear Falls, where the Ontario Housing Corporation has completed the construction of 100 housing units. In addition, I would point out that when members visited the northwest during the members' tour last fall, we had an opportunity to view the Ontario Water Resources Commission's ultra-modern sewer and water system which has just recently been completed.

This is all important progress in the northwest. However, during the members' tour Ed Falghren presented the members with a full outline of the government undertaking a fuller programme for the Indian people moving into centres such as Red Lake. I would join Mr. Falghren in stressing that the government must direct its attention immediately to the construction of additional homes for these people living in the unorganized areas of northwestern Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, it was during the members' tour and our short stay in Kenora that I had the privilege to accompany the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett), the Minister of Lands and Forests, the Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton), and the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), to Minaki, a little tourist centre some 30 miles north of Kenora. We were there for an event of great significance, for there we joined the spirited citizens in the official opening ceremonies of the first provincially-assisted airstrip in this province. It is interesting to note that five months to the day from when we in this Legislature passed the new Airports Act, we were in Minaki at these opening exercises.

A 2,600-foot airstrip was truly carved out of the wilds of northwestern Ontario, one that will contribute to the progress of Minaki and of northwestern Ontario. The opening of this airstrip kicked off the commencement of a bold programme that will be of great significance to northwestern Ontario, as other airstrips are being built or planned for Dryden, Nestor Falls, Sioux Narrows, Pickle Crow, and in the isolated Indian communities of Sandy Lake, and Big Trout Lake.

Mr. Speaker, many of the airstrips being presently built and planned are being done so with the tremendous enthusiasm, vigour and co-operation of the local communities. The airstrip at Minaki became a reality because of the assistance and dedication of that community's energetic and effective leader, Rod Carey.

In Dryden we have a similar situation where a local committee headed by that sincere, aggressive, and determined individual Alex Wilson, and with the aid of municipal, provincial and federal funds, has recently completed the first stage of the development of an airstrip that will eventually be over 5,000 feet in length and play host to a regular scheduled air service linking Dryden, the hub of northwestern Ontario, with Winnipeg, Kenora and the Lakehead. This airstrip construction is more tangible evidence that this government recognizes the particular needs of communities in northern Ontario for access by air.

Earlier this afternoon each member received a small package of Hasti notes, which I hope they will use with pride, for this product, I am proud to say, is 99.9 per cent northwestern. This is a sample of the exceptionally fine quality paper produced by the workers of the Dryden Paper Company. This firm recently commenced producing communication papers of this type. The colour printing of these cards illustrates the craftsmanship of the products produced by that nationally recognized firm of Alex Wilson Publications, a firm which defied the financial experts and proved beyond a shadow of a doubt that such associated industries can perform successfully and complement the general economy.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to touch briefly on the subject of the pulp and paper industry of northern Ontario. Because of the tariff changes brought about by the Kennedy Round negotiations, the Ontario pulp and paper industry faces the serious problem of American paper flooding into Canada. Not only this, but the competition from south of the border is increasing rapidly, and combined with our less favourable geographic area in relationship to overseas markets you can understand why there is some concern at this time. Now, I am not suggesting that the new tariffs will be completely disadvantageous to Ontario. The tariff programme of course can work both ways. But I would stress that a great deal of understanding is going to be needed and required from the government.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that the Atlantic Development Board recently reports that the Maritimes enjoy lower wood fibre costs than the rest of eastern Canada. The report predicts that the Maritime output to 1975 will continue growing at an annual 6.5 per cent compared to a 2 per cent growth for that in Ontario. This, coupled with the special freight rates subsidies that the Maritimes enjoy, leaves our area of northwestern Ontario at a disadvantage.

I would point out that both these pulp and paper producing areas are equal distances from the markets. I have just raised this issue briefly because, quite frankly, there is a very large amount of uncertainty throughout the industry at this time. In any event, I will leave off at this point since I want to go into this subject in much more detail during the Budget debate.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker it is a very great honour for me to have the opportunity and responsibility of summing up the Throne Debate on behalf of the New Democratic Party.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): The member is not a leader, is he?

Mr. Pitman: Is the Minister?

We will come to that in a moment. I will be talking about leadership.

I want to pass on my congratulations along with all the others who, in this group, have expressed our good wishes to you, Mr. Speaker, and to your assistant, your Deputy Speaker, your chairman of the committee of the whole.

I think one of the things which all of us approve of and hope that you will continue, is the task of improving the role of the page boys in this Chamber. I think you have done this Legislature a service and we hope that you will now begin to concern yourself with those of us who sit in this Legislature, as other members have suggested during this debate.

I would like also to say a few words about the speeches that have been made in this debate. I notice a degree of, I think, philosophy in debating in this House which I think is of high interest to those who will be reading the words that are spoken here in the years to come. I think there has been a degree of confrontation which is healthy and yet, I think, it has been with a feeling of goodwill which has characterized this Chamber and which is one of the things which we have some reason to be proud of.

I had some close association with another Legislature and I witnessed something take place there which I hope would never take place here. And that is, a sickness developed, where the degree of exacerbation in debate, the degree of confrontation, became so heated, the loss of respect for both leaders and followers became so prominent that the Legislature virtually became incapable of fulfilling its service to the people of this country.

I think that there has been a degree of concern over this matter at the federal level and that concern, I think, has developed into a better spirit. But I think that we, in this House, have something to be proud of in the way in which the debate has been carried on over the past number of weeks.

Now, I would like to say that in this debate there has been a kind of pattern—a number of themes have been coming through. I would like to comment on these themes.

I suppose the first concern is that which we have for ourselves as party members. I would suggest that the second concern we have is as a representative of a constituency in this House. I suppose thirdly we are concerned—and I am certainly not putting them in order of importance, Mr. Speaker—we are concerned with ourselves as representatives of the people of Ontario.

I would like to turn to the first one first.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): I thought the member had them in reverse order.

Mr. Pitman: Indeed I have, sir. Indeed I have. I wish to deal with them in terms of their importance and the amount of time I am going to give to each of them will indicate my priority.

So, just a couple of moments on what, you might call, the party struggle.

We have had a number of meetings over the last number of months. It was rather interesting that the Conservatives held a—I do not know whether it was a rally, a meeting, a convention. It happened very quietly, Mr. Speaker, one almost had to read the back pages of the Toronto papers to discover that it was taking place at all. However, since then they managed to elect that prophet of gloom and doom Alan Eagleson, who has been predicting terrible catastrophies ever since he was elected president of this party, and I would wonder that the faces on the other side would not be very glum, having heard all the things he has suggested are going to happen.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pitman: Oh yes, well I was going to mention “dead from the eyeballs up and down” a few moments later but that could be placed in the same area of rhetoric.

Mr. Sopha: The member can say what he wants, but Mike Walton is scoring goals.

Mr. Pitman: I want to remind the hon. member across the way of Mr. Eagleson's comment that the provincial party organization is “so weak that the Tory government could be ousted in the 1971 election.” We on this side intend to make that prediction come true.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, you are going have to defend me from the—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Is the member saying he was right or wrong?

Mr. Pitman: I am suggesting that he is right—you are going to be ousted in the 1971 election, there is no doubt in my mind on that at all. He continues,

We have to get funds and get professional troops and “organizers” out or we lose the next election.

Then in another speech shortly after that, he went on to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the party to whom the Tories were going to lose was the New Democratic Party which I thought was an interesting comment. He simply stated that this is the party which goes out to meet the people; this is the party that is concerned and involved with their difficulties and this is the party which will replace the Tories in 1971.

Now our friends to our right had a meeting. They held their meeting in a nice quiet university town—in fact they held it at Trent University, and all I can say for that is that we certainly welcomed their presence there. Like any good academic institution which is worthy of its name we have an “academic” interest in lost causes, and I would hope they would continue to meet in university towns throughout the rest of Ontario.

I think they really did put upon the people of Ontario somewhat in the last few days when they suggested that Judy LaMarsh was going to be the leadership candidate in the coming area of excitement they expect to have in the next few weeks. I think they really could have done better than that. One wonders about the nature of leadership campaigns in the Liberal Party when really there is only one candidate as good as that candidate may be, that the rest of the party does not seem to be able to find itself able to find any successors.

Mr. J. Jessiman (Fort William): Tell us what happened in Kitchener.

Mr. Pitman: I would be very glad to tell members what happened in Kitchener. I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that historians will look back upon the Kitchener convention as a turning point in the fortunes of the New Democratic Party in Ontario.

It was at that point in Kitchener when the people in the New Democratic Party realized that they were choosing the next Prime Minister of this province, and I want to say this too, that this party owes a very great debt to the member for Riverdale (Mr. J. Renwick) who proved that a leadership contest in this party is a meaningful affair, not a facade, and this party proved it has the stuff to make a government by the way in which we returned as a united, strengthened force to this Legislature—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pitman:—ready to prove to the people of Ontario that over the next two years we will be ready to take over the government, the faltering government, of this province in 1971.

Something else happened in Kitchener, too, I might say. We realized as well out of that convention what the particular role of that party shall be, and there was, I think, a moment of insight and a clarity which came out of that leadership contest, when we recognized that our role is not only here in the Legislature, but out there in the street, and that is where we have been, and whether it means marching—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Pitman:—with the people, yes. Whether it is with the workers at Proctor-Silex, or the grape growers in California, we are going to be out there with them against the government. In that world we have made our position very clear, and I would suggest once again that the member for Riverdale has, you might say, played a very prominent role in developing that insight, that point, that emphasis, on the role of this party in the next two years.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Pitman: A comment came from my right, Mr. Speaker. It is rather interesting that our friends to the right would like to be on the street but somehow they do not feel that it is quite respectable. They do not feel that they really can walk in those picket lines and therefore they just cannot bring themselves to marching with the people in their support against the problems which these people have.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, I seem to have roused the forces slightly and I apologize to you. I want to read to you, though, a comment made by a young person in a book "Our Generation" which is very often distributed to members in this House. I think this points up in a more philosophic way the position of this party.

The issues which divide the political parties in this country are artificial—questions of management, rather than basic policy.

I disagree to some extent; I do not think that is entirely true, but this is a danger which this party for one recognizes.

Electoralism is fundamentally ritualistic. The important questions of the day, the nature of the growing liberal totalitarianism, the growing distance between government and people—

Incidentally, a problem which members on the other side are able to see, but are never able to recognize in their importance.

—the lack of content in our lives and the purposelessness of our society, racialism, the arms race, and so on, are not usually put before the people. This is a phenomenon characteristic of our type of society.

The profound crisis of our society is not, and cannot, be explained to the people by our political parties because it cannot be put within a programme for the democratic seizure of administrative power which has no room for changing the nature of power politics. Even when fundamental social questions are put, electoralism forces them to be put according to a traditional pattern, to be applauded not because they are worthy of applause, but because applause has always been accorded to them.

The electoral system in a consenting neo-capitalist society serves the purpose of creating a feeling of identification and a sense of excitement in this largely fails in what it seeks to do. Politicians and opinion makers exert strenuous efforts to affix attention on the ritual act itself, in this case the casting of a vote.

Voting, as a result, becomes an isolated magic act set apart from the rest of life and ceases to have any political or social meaning except as an instrument by which the status quo is preserved.

Electoral pageantry serves the same purpose as a circus—the beguilement of a populace. The voter is reduced to voting for dazzling smiles, clean teeth, smooth voices, and firm handshakes, playing the role of a shaking puppet manipulated by the party image makers.

Now we, Mr. Speaker, have decided that we shall create in this Legislature and beyond it the sharpness of issues, the degree of confrontation which will make democratic life in this society meaningful, and this will be our role for the next two years as we march toward the government of this province.

I would like to move now to the second concern within the pattern which has emerged in this Legislature—and that is our role as members of the provincial Parliament in this Legislature.

Now I am not going to deal with it in toto, I think that the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. T. Reid), and particularly the remarks that were made last week by the member for Scarborough West (Mr. Lewis), and although one might disagree with the ferocity of his articulation at that time, I am sure you must have agreed with what he had to say about the role of the member for the provincial Parliament in this House.

I would like to come to one particular area, and that is the role of this Legislature. I want to leave all these matters which have to do with research and office matters and secretaries and all the paraphernalia outside this Legislature to others.

One of the things which brings this to my attention is, the fact—and I think that as we sit here today we are very, very much aware of the fact—that tomorrow evening we are introducing into this Legislature the television camera. Now we have already introduced television cameras, Mr. Speaker, as our members know, in order to take part in the pageantry of the Throne opening, or at least the opening session and the Throne Speech, but this is perhaps the first time that television will be used to deal with the real cut and thrust of this Legislature—at least it should be the cut and thrust of this Legislature—but instead we are bringing it in for the set piece.

Now I think that the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton) is a handsome man who will undoubtedly make a good account of himself before the television camera, and I suspect that the show itself may—

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): We learn something every day. He is a handsome man.

Mr. Pitman: I want to say that I suspect that this show will probably receive an Emmy as a horror show sometime later in the winter with all the balloons that have gone up over the last few weeks turn out to be true. However, I suppose we will probably have a couple of educational television programmes a week later, which may be able to correct the balance in the province.

But I want to deal rather seriously on this whole question of the introduction of television into this chamber, because I think it has implications which I am not sure the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) has considered, and I am not sure that all of us have really taken account of. Right now in the country to the south of us, there is a very major debate going on about the role of television in public life. It is not just a play thing. It is not just another window on the public as some people tend to see it. It is a very, very demanding media, and right now there is the suggestion in the United States that, in essence, the television camera and the television media are moulding politics and public affairs rather than reporting public affairs.

One only has to remember the 1961 presidential election when a great many experts suggested that it was the television performance of John F. Kennedy over that of Richard M. Nixon which brought about the defeat of Mr. Nixon on that occasion.

A great many have suggested in 1968 that it was the television coverage of the events which took place, those ghastly events which took place in Chicago, which created such a hopeless situation for Hubert Humphrey that he was never able to catch up before the elections took place in November.

Indeed, the President who now occupies the White House may very well have the television media to thank for what took place at that time, but that may even be just a small part of it.

On top of that you have a debris of disillusionment, bitterness and anger among the people of the United States towards the whole political process. It is the whole political party and its role in society that I think that the people of the United States are particularly concerned about; the way in which television is indeed changing, and changing radically, what goes on within the Legislatures of the states and at the federal level.

What does that have to say to us here in this Legislature? I think it has a great deal to say. For one thing the television media is one which demands participation. It demands a high degree of involvement, and I suggest to you, sir, that bringing in television cameras and training them on the Provincial Treasurer for 30 minutes, or however long it is going to take, is just about the most unimaginative way that we could have introduced a television into this Legislature. I say, in spite of the fact that I am sure that the Provincial Treasurer will give an orderly and interesting performance, and the expectations of the Ontario public, will undoubtedly provide him with a very good audience, none the less, I suggest that this form is simply not good enough. If we are expected to use television as a means of involving the people of Ontario in the public affairs as it affects this Legislature.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Oh, they will get the member for Owen Sound.

Mr. Pitman: I suggest to you that the proper way to use television in this Chamber would be to have it here constantly, not for live shows, but constantly through the video tape recorders, so that the video tape recorders would be there to portray whatever takes place. The operators would have the same role in the editing of what took place, and went out from this Chamber, as the gentlemen of the press who sit above you at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

I think that the television medium can play a very real role in making this place an exciting, relevant Legislature. For example, I would suggest changes in a number of areas. I am sure I express the views of at least some members of this Legislature in suggesting that the long, extraneous "kitchen-sink" debates that go on regarding the Throne and Budget Debates are simply no longer relevant in this kind of a Legislature. While the members say "hear, hear," I hope they are willing to accept the other aspect of what I have to say.

I would be very happy to see the individual members in the Throne Debate limited to 30 minutes if we were able to transpose the kind of involvement which should take place in this Legislature to Item 1, the estimates. In other words, instead of having a major speaker speaking on Item One, and then the rest of us sort of nit-picking at various areas in the estimates, why could we not have Item One as a place where individuals of parties could take part in the debate with the individual Minister and have a real exchange, real involvement? I would suggest that even when we have Throne speeches they should be 30-minute Throne speeches and that it should be incumbent upon the member to inform the Minister, whose department is going to be discussed, and it should be felt to be incumbent on the part of the Minister to be present when that discussion is taking place, over the speech that is being made.

This is no criticism for the Ministers who, I would suggest to you, sir, do remain in this House with a high degree of regularity. I speak of the Minister of Correctional Institutions who is here a great deal of the time, but unfortunately when the member for Scarborough was making an extremely searching, profound commentary on The Department of Social and Family Services, it was the Minister for Correctional Services who was in his seat.

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey South): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member will permit a question. In view of the hon. member's remarks regarding rules on supply if, in conjunction with what he is saying, would he agree with a limitation on total supply?

Mr. Pitman: I think the member is suggesting that we should have some limitations. I would want to discuss it with him and with you, Mr. Speaker, before making any comment of that nature, as to what the limitation would be.

I think one of the things which limits the effect of the debate is the fact that, for example, we spent about three weeks on the estimates of The Department of Highways, and one day on The Department of Municipal Affairs. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that you put them side by side. Where are the real problems emerging in this province in an urban society? In The Department of Municipal Affairs.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, I feel it is incumbent upon myself, in view of what I am just going to say, that I yield the floor, because one of the things that I was going to suggest is that if we really want to get a debate in this place, a real interchange of opinions, let us adopt the congressional system of yielding the floor. I want to say to you that if we get on television and start to yell to each other across the floor, we will look like a bunch of lunatic yahoos.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Yes, but one never knows whether the other guy is going to cut or thrust.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): In accordance with the hon. members as to yielding, I wonder if the hon. member will yield? I suggest to him that since three weeks were taken up with the estimates of The Department of Highways and only one day with Municipal Affairs, why did not the Opposition think it was important enough to take more time on Municipal Affairs?

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): It took us three weeks for Highways because we couldn't get a sensible answer from the Minister without persistent questioning.

Mr. Pitman: One of the things that would help, I think, would be a planning of the estimates throughout the entire session. Very often, for example, Mr. Speaker, we find ourselves in the hot days of July when both government members and Opposition members are scarcely able to fulfill their roles in an effective way dealing with The Department of Municipal Affairs. The first estimate to come up was The Department of Highways, and I would suggest that being a new House there was no way of gauging just exactly how the session was going to be planned; there was no indication of any planning by the government in bringing the estimates down in an orderly fashion. So I think this is a perfectly logical way of dealing with it as things now come into this Legislature.

I return to my point, Mr. Speaker; I think it would be well if we had some trial of the system of "yielding the floor" because if we are going to have television in here in a meaningful way, let us give it some kind of meaning. By that I mean, some kind of involvement, some kind of interplay, so that the people of Ontario can see the juxtaposition of different views. So that people can see either the logic of the government, or the demands of the Opposition in some kind of a context.

I suggest to you that this kind of debate that we have here, is not a sensible context in which to introduce this medium. I would suggest, too, that it is extremely important that we do this. A moment ago I mentioned the feelings on the part of the people in the United States that television has badly distorted their political system. Well, we are an institution in this province, Mr. Speaker, and we live in an age of, what we might say is an institutional revolt.

I was rather interested to hear the remarks of Dean Smythe, of York University, who was speaking some time ago on the whole problem of discontent, particularly youthful discontent, and he mentioned the fact that some 300 or 400 years ago we had what can be called a revolt against—I suppose one could say—political institutions. Then, of course, previous to that, a revolt against religious institutions. And we have had, in this century, a revolt against economic institutions, as they suppress the will of people, and he would say that what we really find in our schools—we find this in the church, we find it in labour unions and in corporations—is a revolt against institutions themselves; all institutions.

Mr. MacDonald: Even in the Tory Party.

Mr. Pitman: Yes, it has even gone as far as the institution of the Tory Party. And this is healthy, Mr. Speaker, if this kind of ferment can be channelled. But I suggest to you that if the effect of television is to create, first, an emotional response to this chamber; if the feeling of the people is that this place is completely disoriented in expressing what they wish as the representation of their views, as a means of conveying information, as a means of conducting public business, then we can be very sure that there will be a negative response to this Legislature. And I, for one—and I feel that I am speaking for all of those in this House who have a great deal of respect for this Legislature—I would be very sorry to see this take place.

As well as that I would like to see the television medium, in a sense, perform a balance about what goes on over your head, Mr. Speaker. I have been amazed as I have come into this Legislature about the lack of concern—the lack of real concern—on the part of the press for what goes on down here—the real drama of what goes on in this Chamber, the characters that inhabit this Chamber—and I wonder about it. I wonder that the—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Did the member say character or characters?

Mr. Pitman: I am not referring to the reporters, sir, as much as the editors, who simply—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Do not chicken out now!

Mr. Pitman: I am not going to chicken out. I can assure the hon. Minister I am going right along with it. One of the problems that the press has, I think, is that they always have a fear that they may drop down from up above to over in the corner there. I think that has been a fear that has been expressed on many occasions.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): It is not a fear; it is a hope.

Mr. Pitman: One of the things which I think is most inappropriate is the degree to which the press gallery is a stepping stone to some part of the government service. We saw the oldest member of the press gallery gobbled up by the educational television department last spring, and some years ago perhaps one of the finest education writers in North America, Bascomb St. John, was gobbled up by The Department of Education. He was providing the people of Ontario with an amazing service indicating what was really going on in education in this jurisdiction. And he has gone forever; we never see him. The service became completely—

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): It is a Machiavellian scheme!

Mr. Pitman: I am not going to suggest that the government is undermining the press of the nation by gobbling up—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We recognize talent; that is all.

Mr. Pitman: Well, the problem is, if I might answer the Minister, that we are all corrupting the press. And I am going to say something now which I hope will not be regarded as a criticism of all that is being done here. But we have just got to stop reading speeches to one another. We have just got to stop it. I think we are carrying on an incredible waster of time, reading speeches back and forth. And I suggest that if we do this on television, we are gone. We will look like complete idiots if we stand here, reading speeches for hours on end, back and forth across this aisle. I would suggest—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry for having initiated this particular aspect of the debate, and it appears to me that we are getting into a degree of involvement here this afternoon which perhaps has not been properly structured.

In fact, for a moment the other night in the Confederation debate, there was a degree of back-and-forth action in this Legislature which really gave, I think, a degree of relevancy and point which I had not seen for quite some time. I think that this is what we want.

Now, as I said to the Minister a moment ago, we corrupt the press. We bury them in paper releases, just bury them. I have never seen anything like it, the amount of material which is churned out to send up to the press gallery, assuming that they cannot listen and that they cannot write. And then they corrupt us because what we do is we read our press releases to each other. So the whole thing becomes an evil circle which we do not seem to get out of and which we do not seem to be able to reform.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East): Mr. Speaker, will the member permit a question?

Following this description the member had of the television watching the Opposition—particularly, concentrating on the estimates, and those on the government front benches, I wonder if he could take a moment to describe the role of the government back bencher under such a television performance?

Mr. Pitman: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am only too delighted to have this opportunity of talking about the government back bencher and I do this in the very serious and sincere way in which the question has been asked.

I think this would encourage a degree of criticism on the part of the back benchers which would, I think be of a healthy nature and serve the interest of government in this province. I think that it would be a matter of the government back benchers putting up or shutting up and I think it would provide them with a role and a degree of relevancy which they would perhaps achieve in no other way. I think it is an excellent idea to do exactly that. Look at the coverage the member for Quinte (Mr. Potter) would have got if the television cameras had been in here on the evening on which he gave us his exposition on all the failures of the health services provided by this province.

I think, once again, it would provide—I would hope it would provide—a degree of honesty and candour about the reporting in this House, because by the time the events of this House go through the sieve of the press gallery and the editors and so on, what comes out in the newspaper, you know, is a pretty long way from what really takes place in this Legislature and—

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, the Throne Debate, as distinct from the estimates, is the only place where the government back bencher can operate.

Mr. MacDonald: Why can the member not get in on the estimates?

Mr. Pitman: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I understand the Minister's desire to see the estimates go through as quickly as possible but it seems to me that we have two functions in this Chamber, do we not? One function surely, is that of carrying out public business. And I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this function has been well served in this Legislature. We have had no flag debates. We have had no pipeline debates here, which have brought to a complete grinding stop, the work of this Legislature. I do not think the government can complain one iota about the degree of co-operation which it receives from this side of the House in getting through any legislation which is put before this Legislature.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Because it is good legislation.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Have you been receiving any letters these last few days?

Mr. Pitman: The point I think is that this would give the Opposition back bencher a role to play in the second function—informing the public. He should have a role to play during the estimates. You have local problems that have to be brought to the attention of the Minister. You surely have a philosophy of what should be done under The Department of Health and under The Department of Agriculture and The Provincial Treasurer's Department. The point is, if the hon. member for Carleton East (Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence) sees the back bencher's role simply as sitting and providing, on occasion, the votes necessary to plunge the estimate through the House then, of course, television will reveal this as well. And I think we will receive some very interesting reactions from the people outside when they see just what takes place in a Legislature like this.

Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to move into this area with quite the degree of minuteness which I seem to have done, but I do suggest to you one final point and it is one I do not want to carry too far because it has been discussed again and again, and that is the question period in this House. I do suggest to you, sir, that you would have far fewer questions and ones which, as has already been stated, would be urgent, if they were asked orally in this House and the Minister had an opportunity to answer them. With the greatest respect, sir, I want to say to you that the question period has two roles. One, of course, is to gain information. But I think it also has the role, and one which it certainly would have under the television camera, and that is to reveal the degree of competence of the Minister it concerns.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Or incompetence!

Mr. Pitman: And I think this is important, that the people of Ontario have the feeling of confidence that the people who are at the top of each department are competent. I am reminded of a recent book which describes The Peter Principle, and which says that everybody rises to its own level of incompetence. I do not want to go into that, but I do think that the people of Ontario have a right to know the degree of sensitivity and intelligence and grasp of the department in question. But I would suggest to the House that this would provide a degree of drama and would provide you with control because you would be able to decide on the spot whether that question was of sufficient urgency to make necessary that reply. Along with this, of course, would have to be a much quicker answering of questions which were put on the order paper.

I have one more point, Mr. Speaker, before the hour; I would suggest that another way by which we could set up the juxtaposition of views and make this a place of involvement would be on Ministerial statements. We have Ministerial statements taking place nearly every day, and one of the things that does not take place in this House—but I think it should take place—is that there should be a real opportunity for reaction. As the Minister makes the statement I think it should be incumbent upon the Minister to inform the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party that the statement is being made and what the statement is. And there should be an immediate opportunity on the part of each of these groups to state their position in regard to that statement. Immediately the people of Ontario would know just where each party stood—

Mr. E. Dunlop (York-Forest Hill): And this demonstrates the level of incompetence.

Mr. Pitman: Well, that might very well be revealed as well, but I think it would have a salutary effect upon this Legislature.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The member wants to be the government without getting elected.

It being 6 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, at the supper hour we were discussing our roles as members in this Legislature and the effect which the introduction of television might have.

I would like now to turn to another subject which I hope will lay the groundwork for what I have to say in a more specific way about the functions of this government. This has been called a taxation session, one at which the full question of how we raise taxes, from whom we raise taxes, and how much we shall raise, will receive a considerable amount of concern by all of us here. One of the greatest advantages of the taxation session, I think, is that it brings up the whole question of political philosophy in a very pointed way. It is very easy for a government to be all things to all men when there is no great concern over how much is being raised and where the money is being spent, but when the crunch comes, when a government has to determine priorities, when it has to search out methods to hold the line, to make sometimes unpopular decisions, that is when I think a government shows its true philosophy.

I would suggest to this government, Mr. Speaker, through you, that this session I think could be an extremely useful one in determining just exactly what kind of a government we have. We are told that we have to hold the line. What is meant by "holding the line" in this particular situation? We on this side have stated our position quite clearly. We believe in the expansion of the public sector, the necessity of that expansion. We have indicated that we are willing to raise the necessary taxes, but before this is done we have suggested that a reformation of the tax base is necessary. I am sure that all members may simply read the speech of our leader, the member for York South (Mr. MacDonald), to see exactly what we mean by changing the tax base, exactly what we mean by determining the kind of taxes which we would raise. But we also are concerned about the misuse of taxes, and throughout this debate the New Democratic Party, I think, has put forward its position on how those taxes should be spent.

I think one of the worst examples of misuse of taxation is in two areas—one in social and family services and the other in health services. I do not want to repeat that magnificent speech this afternoon by the member for Scarborough Centre (Mrs. M. Renwick), that penetrating analysis of what we are doing both to people and what we are doing in relation to the misuse of human resources, what we are doing in allowing these gaps to exist, what we are doing in giving over to the private sector, to private groups in our society, the job that should be done by government, what we are doing by unco-ordinated and wasteful system of social services. I am not going to repeat those comments at all here this evening; I simply state to you that one of the things that does anger people is when they see this kind of wastage.

I am delightful to see that the member for London South, the new Minister of Revenue (Mr. White), has turned to the guaranteed annual income as the panacea. I hope he has a little bit more success in securing this for us than he had with improving the workmen's compensation board in the speech he gave last year, which also gave, I think, an excellent indication of the direction the government should go. But this surely is a direction in which we must turn if we are going to deal with the whole question of human resources.

There is nothing which I think is more debilitating than seeing the penny-counting which goes on day after day after day. And I have the greatest sympathy for those who work as employees of The Department of Social and Family Services, who see the needs—who see how they could, if they had the time, be out consulting with people, offering them advice, providing them with counselling—but instead find themselves adding up these interminable budgets, month after month and week after week. This is what I call a misuse of human resources as well as a misuse of taxes, and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that that is an example where we could move in a massive way to deal with that kind of a problem.

We have already seen in debates that have taken place in this House, the misallocation of human resources, and particularly tax sources, in relation to health services. We have huge gaps. I am not, as well, going into the whole question of Medicare, or the position which the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) has taken in this regard which has been dealt with, I think, quite adequately—perhaps more than adequately as far as the Prime Minister is concerned, during the constitutional debate that took place last year. But there is another example of a government which is unwilling to make real decisions in the effective use of tax sources.

As well as that, of course, we have also suggested that the main problem is one of philosophy. I am not going to try to delve deeply into philosophy here. We have our resident philosopher, the member for Lakeshore (Mr. Lawlor) sitting in the back row, and he jumps easily from Aristotle to Plato. To show the level on which I am, I am clutching in my hand the latest bulletin from the Canadian Manufacturers Association. I want to read a statement here, which I think to some extent summarizes those who sit on the other side. It is a description of what capitalism and socialism are:

Capitalism is that form of economy which is based upon an awareness of the power of the profit motive in commanding the actions of the individual.

Socialist theory denies that power, or when that denial is shown to be observed, insists as an alternative, that a man's actions can be motivated just as strongly or even more strongly by a desire to benefit society at large.

I accept that. I am proud of that definition which comes from a source which one would hardly expect clearly and accurately to define the differences between those two philosophies.

For existence of the profit motive can scarcely be denied. It is so much a part of the human make-up to work for our own welfare and that of those whom we hold dear, that supporting arguments are needless. Frankly, every action from our cradle to our grave is dominated by this primary urge—

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Conditioned reflexes.

Mr. Pitman: Indeed, conditioned reflexes as the member for Lakeshore suggests.

But I want to stress this final paragraph:

That there also exists in each of us a desire to do things for the benefit of society should not be discarded either.

It certainly does exist but—and here is the rub:

Since the beginning of the world there have been few men indeed of whom it could honestly be said that they put the welfare of mankind before that of themselves and their families.

I suggest to you that if that is true, and I have a great deal of suspicion that that necessarily must be true, it is the role of this political party to educate the people of this province that the social welfare has its place, and that indeed there are more than a few people willing to put the needs of society against their own individual needs.

I meet people day by day, and when they come to talk about this government, their criticism constantly is: Why do you not follow your philosophy? You say that private incentive, individual incentive, is the thing which makes the economic system go round. Presumably they have been taught to believe that this is the philosophy of this government. And yet, Mr. Speaker, they continue to increase taxes and now the cry is heard, You are destroying individual incentive, you are destroying productivity. And because there is no overall philosophy on the part of this government, because they are unwilling to concede the needs of the public sector, this criticism is entirely valid for this government, entirely valid because certainly there has been no educational process on the part of this government to convince the people of this province that indeed our society is a fabric in which a failure or a flaw in any part will destroy the whole.

We have done nothing to indicate to the people of Ontario that the needs in this province are social needs; that indeed, for the next 20 to 25 years the happiness of the people in this province will depend far more on what happens in the public section than what happens in the private sector. Wherever you look, the areas which are causing the greatest area of distress re pollution—air and water pollution—urban chaos, and the transportation problems that we face around our cities; the urban sprawl, the need for service in order to make life even bearable in some suburban regions. We have emphasized the problem of health services, the filling in of all those gaps that have been left by this government—making this health service a dynamic thing which provides preventive opportunities instead of just being an ambulance that is trying to pick people up.

The whole idea of the educational fabric which goes right from the cradle right to the grave virtually, this is this government's greatest failure, Mr. Speaker. It has not developed a philosophy of government which will coincide with what it is doing in a taxation area.

This is why now, when the whole problem of taxation comes up, it is hold the line and dig in your heels because the people of Ontario will not accept more taxes.

Mr. Speaker, I am not convinced that the people of Ontario will not accept more taxes if they feel that these taxes are being effectively used, if they feel that human resources are being effectively allocated, and if they feel that there is an equitable tax base. I suggest that until the government does those three things, it is going to be in very serious trouble.

We want goals. This province wants goals. And these goals I suggest to you, sir, are essentially in the public sector. Until this government will accept that fact they will continue to fight these mock battles and will carry on this facade of the financial crisis.

I hope that in the next few weeks, that is directly after tomorrow night, Mr. Speaker, we will have a very real opportunity to discuss the whole question of the political philosophy as it relates to the kind of taxation situation that we find ourselves in in the next few days.

I would like now to turn to the other area which is very close to this political philosophy, dealing with the problem of youth. Youth has been talked about a great deal in this House over the last number of days. I think we are extremely concerned and extremely nervous about the way young people look at our society; the way young people are looking at institutions in that society. They have every reason to be critical and to feel this way. We have been extremely fortunate that our young people have not, I think, wrought any kind of destructive rampages as we have seen in the United States and in Montreal.

On the whole, the student leaders in this province have been responsible. I think they have attempted to be reasonable and sensible, but I suggest to you, sir, that unless our society is more responsive and we are willing to modify and change these institutions we, too, will face the same kind of situation.

I was interested to read an article on the whole question of student protest which I think are well worth our attention:

The studies made of activists at the university and at high school level reveal that they generally come from affluent middle and upper middle class families who permit free discussion and encourage liberal ideas. Surprisingly, in spite of their heavy involvement in the movement, the students are often academically talented and frequently make the honours list.

In Ontario high schools the activists are most often found among academic students. They thrive in schools with selective admission policies, and with the reputation for academic achievement. Intellectual, highly critical (especially of arbitrary regulations) and restless, they constantly irritate by seeking confrontations with authoritarian teachers and principals. Kenniston describes the activists as members of a generation raised on the corrosive scepticism of Mad magazine, taught paradoxically by television to be sceptical of commercial acclaims, reared during their pre-adolescent and adolescent years in the era of togetherness which denied but did not conceal the rifts in American life. Thoughtful, articulate, and principled young men and women, taught from an early age by most of their families that there was more to life than success and remuneration, they began in late adolescence to challenge the impersonality, dehumanization, over-organization and commercialization of American life.

The description aptly fits the Canadian scene. Dr. Corey of Queen's University suggests:

The main root of the distress is the severe shaking-up of the society in which we live, the students are responding to an unpredictable and bewildering future in which the only certainty is change. In an attempt to adapt, the students have developed new styles of living—the beats, for one style, the hippies for another, and the activists a third.

Society has compounded the problem by prolonging the learning period, developing a more sophisticated group, more vocal, more searching, less receptive to authority. At the same time, society has provided them with greater and greater leisure, because it needs them less in an increasingly automated labour market.

Fundamentally, the activists are protesting the establishment, the adult group that gives them a feeling of being put down every time they want to speak up on important issues. The establishment is perceived in bureaucracy that puts organization ahead of people, in school systems that are reducing pupils to numbers in a computer, in teachers and principals who shred student dignity in public or in private by demanding a pass to the john or denigrating teenage manners, music, and modern-day heroes.

Kenniston adds that activists are protesting hypocrisy on all sides, the hypocrisy of parents who profess to support racial equality, but who react violently when their children date those of another religion or colour.

Hypocrisy of teachers who pretend to support democracy while operating rigidly authoritarian classrooms. The hypocrisy of principals who set up toy governments from whom they accept suggestions on minor projects while continuing to run the school to suit the staff.

If the unrest that is rapidly linking the activists in the colleges and universities across Canada is any indication—

And this is what I want to bring to the attention of the Legislature:

—then the secondary schools are in for a period of upheaval. A recent survey conducted by the editors of Nation's Schools reveals that 45 per cent of school administrators fully expect student power to erupt in high school campuses this year.

“The high schools will become a special target simply because they are a common target and because they exemplify the kind of bureaucratic institution in which many students have lost faith. Teachers are the very symbols of parental domination from which young people wish to be free. Principals as agents of manipulation and control are seen as the source of irksome and sometimes dehumanizing regulations. Central office superintendents and administrators are the faceless organizers of the system that has deliberately concealed its aims, obscured the perception of stark reality, keeping students in a perpetual fog, never quite distinguishing true from false.

“Are the activists in sufficient numbers to disturb seriously our high schools? ‘We submit the proposition,’ says James Cass, writing in the August 17 issue of Saturday Review, ‘it is not the extremists, that small band of anarchists and nihilists, who present the most serious challenges to the academy. It is the non-radical student, receptive to new ideas and sensitivity to the changing world around him who has the power to bring down the academic house’.”

And there, Mr. Speaker, is the problem that we face.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Does that writer have any specific solutions? We all know the problems. We would like to have some solutions.

Mr. Pitman: He did go on to some solutions and I would be very glad to mention one or two of them. I am sorry I was not prepared to go on in this way, but he does suggest a number of areas. The extension of far more participatory democracy in the high schools is one of the solutions he suggests, and he gives an example of Gloucester high school where they develop new concepts of house government; where they develop policy cabinets involving students.

The whole question revolves around the development of structures within the high schools. I think there are people of goodwill as principals, people of goodwill as teachers, and certainly I think most of the students do not want to see disrupted high schools. At the same time they are unwilling to accept the dehumanizing process; they are unwilling to see their own personalities being undermined by something which they regard as inherently evil and wrong, and which even the adults will agree is wrong.

I am sure the hon. Minister would not want his son or daughter to have to ask for a pass to go to the john as it suggests here, or to undergo in this day and age a great many small and picayune types of regulations which exist in many high schools.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, are these changes not coming about?

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Will that Minister make some regulations like that?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: On the contrary—

Mr. Sopha: How about the phones for the visitors?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: On the contrary, we are away ahead of some of the schools; and I ask the hon. member, does he not really believe that some of these changes are taking place?

Mr. Pitman: Yes, I was going to mention this, but I was just going to suggest that here we are in an area where I think the question of change is one of relativity, and the change is not relative to the speed of the demands of the students. And this brings me to the very things I want to go on with—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Too little and too late.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): The story of this administration!

Mr. Pitman: —the whole problem is of building any structures and communications. Sure, there are schools in this province in which there will be no student unrest, usually because the principal is aware. I think in most cases the principal has the most difficult job in our educational system today, by far the most difficult.

He stands in the middle with the needs of society coming at him from one direction, and the demands of the parents, who in many cases do not know what to do with their children, coming from another direction. Above him is the administration, with all their demands upon him, and there is the staff, too, which is pushing.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is tough for the parents too.

Mr. Pitman: It is tough, it is really tough, but I would suggest to you that it is not so tough that we cannot do something about it. I would suggest that one of the major areas we must consider is some way of upgrading and retraining the secondary school principals in this province, especially at the secondary school level. I say this in no way of being over-critical of these principals. Rather, in a way of recognizing the tremendous pressures under which they operate, and the needs that we have. We recognize the need to upgrade people who are dealing with technology, of dealing with machinery. We say that an engineer cannot remain as an engineer for more than five years without being upgraded and retrained. And yet, we seem to believe that we can operate in these areas where we are dealing with people, and that no change need take place.

You know the old adage, that kids are always the same, that kids are the same as they were 20 years ago, and why cannot they treat my children in the same way that they treated me. Of course, we assume that kids do not change, and they do change, they change radically. They are living in a society in which the television set and Marshall McLuhan have all the answers, but certainly kids are very, very different. As Lester Pearson said, "It is tough being a kid today." I think we desperately need a process—

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East): Was it tough in your day?

Mr. Pitman: Was it tough in my day? I do not think it was as tough as it is today. I do not think that there were the pressures in those days that there are today on young people. I do not. I think that the maturation process is speeded up by our media, it is speeded up by the pressures now of employment which are on these kids and the tremendous number of decisions which they have to make. For example, when I went to school nobody asked me what course I had to have at grade 9, you just went through the same keyhole, you were pushed through. Okay, so you got through, and you were pushed out.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: There is too much freedom.

Mr. Pitman: Well, I do not accept the conclusion which the hon. member has made that there is too much freedom. I think rather there are responsibilities which we have not yet been able to develop young people to accept, and realize the freedoms that they have and to use these freedoms effectively. I think this is one of the major difficulties we face.

I want to go on to this whole question of training, and I think this is an area which The Department of Education surely cannot slough off, as not being one of its responsibilities. It does not choose the principals, but it does train principals, they have a principals course. Unfortunately this principals course is concerned with teaching them how to timetable, teaching them how to run a nice quiet ship and how to push a great deal of paper around. But, I suggest to you, sir, that it does not teach them enough about the kind of society which is affecting those kids that are in those schools. It does not give enough information about the structures by which this communication can take place within these schools. So often it is a matter of structural deficiency. There is good will on all sides, but there is no effective way of getting the communication to go back and forth from the administration to the students, through the councils which should be really effective and really operating. These structures simply do not exist. I suggest to you that this is a role that The Department of Education could well take in hand, because it had better be done, and it had better be done quickly, Mr. Speaker, because unless it is we will be in a very serious situation.

Although I understand all the reasons for the defence mechanism that took place last fall, it saddened me very greatly when the headmasters of Ontario decided to put that terrible ad in the newspapers. It said that student unrest in Ontario was being caused by all kinds of activists and newspaper editors and various other people. I think this was extremely unfortunate, Mr. Speaker; I think this was an over-reaction to what was essentially a problem which is found throughout the world.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pitman: I might also deal with the low calibre of teacher training. The whole area of teacher training is, I think, a crucial one. A few minutes ago we were talking about the whole question of priorities and the establishment of priorities in our society. I would suggest to you, sir, that if there is a priority in education right now, it is in the area of teacher education, and yet this is the area which is being held up, this is the area which is delayed, this is the area where certainly the crisis point seems to be at the moment.

We have just heard that there is going to be a shortfall—we have not been able to get any exact figures from the Minister—of perhaps 2,000 teachers in the coming fall at the secondary level. Now, this is a serious matter, Mr. Speaker, when you have 2,000 teachers in your secondary schools who have not had the minimum amount of training which is considered to be adequate by the standards of The Department of Education at the present time. They are on letters of permission, apparently in order to get into the summer courses. Unless we are all willing to accept the limitations of the summer course, we will simply have no course and we will have people in classrooms who have had no training whatsoever. I think this is a very serious problem today when we are talking about the tremendous pressures in education and the need to upgrade our whole system of education. Today, when we are talking about the incredible advances in numbers of subjects and choices of subjects, in timetabling patterns, and the difficulties of including all this new philosophy of education of the Hall-Dennis report into our system, at this point in time surely this is when the teacher becomes the most important person in the entire setup. And yet we have done nothing specific about teacher education, or what we are doing is being done so slowly that it is almost imperceptible.

It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is an area where one has to fault The Department of Education, and fault them, I think, very seriously. We have a situation this year where, in some of the teachers' colleges which are normally capable of accommodating 300 students, we have over 500 students. What an anachronism at a time when we are talking about individualized education—at the teachers' college level the students are getting less and less individual treatment than ever before. The teachers' colleges are all over-crowded, they are massively understaffed; at the same time that we say the teacher is the important person, we find ourselves in a situation where the teachers' college staffs do not know where they are at.

They are told they may be going into the university but they are not told whether they are going to go or not, or where they are going to fit in. At the same time their salary level, which previously has been linked with inspectors, has now gone down. They are not maintaining their pace along with those with whom they were previously linked. They find themselves hopelessly overworked. They, in many cases, are doing some very exciting experimentation but they find themselves overwhelmed by the numbers which exist in these teachers' colleges.

What are we going to do about it? Well, there is a report that came out in 1966 called the McLeod report on teacher education. We have delayed, we have hamstrung this report. I think by next fall there are going to be only two of the teachers' colleges in the universities; about the others, there is no decision as to whether they are going to be put into universities or not. There is even talk they are going to try to make bigger teacher education institutions instead of trying to individualize at this level. They are talking about making larger institutions now. I think this is a backward step. No one misconceives that there are not difficulties.

Mr. B. Gilbertson (Algoma): What suggestions has the member got?

Mr. A. Carruthers (Durham): Let us have something positive on it.

Mr. Pitman: I have already suggested—

Mr. MacDonald: Implement your own report—it is as simple as that.

Mr. Pitman: —that you read your own report. And what I am suggesting to you is that you make it a priority.

I tried to set the stage for my first remarks here, Mr. Speaker; I am sorry if I did not get through. At a time when you are dealing with the tax crunch, the problem is to set priorities, and if you cannot set priorities you have no right to govern. That is what it is all about. What I am suggesting is where you have a department which wants to build 18 colleges of applied arts and technology, which is committed to expansion of universities, and which goes into a county board system which means it has to provide services to every rural area in the province, and which has committed itself to a very expensive educational television system, it is ending up with a situation where it does not know where its priorities are. It does not put teachers in classes where they are capable of handling the problems of the Hall-Dennis report, it will ill behoove us to have the most expensive educational television system in Canada. That is the point I make.

I would suggest that as well as setting a priority for teacher education, surely it is a matter also of dealing effectively with the whole question of teacher education, the kind of teacher education they are getting. As with the principals, I suggest to you, sir, that the present course, particularly the one-year course, does not fit a young person to go into a classroom with the kind of security that he must have if he is going to carry out the kind of individualization which the Hall-Dennis report and various other reports have suggested. There is absolutely no way by which a teacher one year out of high school can feel that kind of self-assurance which allows him to deal with young people who are in ferment and would enable him to handle in a humble way the demands which young people have of him.

I suggest to you that this is a major problem in helping them to understand themselves, helping them to understand the ways of young people. All of these, I suggest, are a major priority. As we go about our work today, we are not dealing with that priority, we are sending young people into the classrooms unprepared, and here at the secondary level we are sending maybe 2,000 without even a six-week course in the summer.

What happened to the system that was suggested by the Ontario Secondary School Teachers Federation—the idea of providing interns, of letting people take a four-week course in the summer and then testing them in the school for a year. It seems to me this does a number of things. It solves the problem, first, of providing more bodies in your classrooms—trained, at least to some extent. As well as that, it provides something else, too. It provides a new recognition on the part of teachers that there must be a team concept within a school, that teachers have been badly used, their human resources have been badly misallocated, you might say, and that they have been doing jobs which are not teaching roles. They are about the highest paid teachers in the history of mankind but instead of finding a teacher role and providing interns and training them at the same time, or providing teacher aids and teacher assistants, we simply drag along and try to blunder through. I suggest it scarcely behooves a province like Ontario, this province with a place to stand, to be carrying on in this fashion with its educational system.

As well as that, we do not teach young people how to create their own curriculum. We are expecting young people, teachers, to go out and to create the educational atmosphere in the classrooms, to be able to organize their curriculum as they deal with young people in front of them. But they have no training to do it; they are not trained to do this kind of thing. They do not have the maturity which at least four years in the universities might provide them with, as the McLeod report has suggested. Again, I say, this is a priority area. I would suggest that if there has to be a cut it should not be in this area. If there is a priority in education, this should be first. Heaven only knows, this government has made cuts in some of the strangest places.

One of the things which surprises me is the belief that you can cut service areas. I see the Minister of Social and Family Services (Mr. Yaremko) sitting over in the corner and I would suggest to him that he of all people should not be the Minister of a department which is accepting cuts in personnel at this point in time. What happens is that the workers in the social and family services offices across this province have case loads, and the case loads are large. They are that less able to be of any help to the people in that particular jurisdiction. It seems to me this government should decide on where cuts can be made.

Cuts can be made in The Department of Highways. You can cut out a highway and it does not destroy the service that is already being given, but you take a cut in the social and family services field and you do destroy the service which is already being given, you destroy it in a very real way. I suggest to you that that is also the kind of decision that should be made by a government in power at this time.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Could the hon. member name a couple of other departments.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Yes, name the departments!

Mr. Pitman: I would suggest to the hon. Minister who has just spoken that his department is one where it scarcely behooves us to have a cut, but I think there are other areas. I think that The Department of Lands and Forests is one where personnel can be held back for a cut, or The Department of Highways or The Department of Public Works. I think there are a number of areas, because you would not destroy the existing service by cutting in those areas.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): A couple of those Ministers could go.

Mr. Pitman: I would certainly accept the last remark of the leader of the Opposition on that point.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Pitman: Without the Opposition there would not be any government in this province.

Mr. T. Reid (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the member a question?

Before the hon. member for Peterborough finishes his remarks on education could he let the House know whether he considers the recommendations from the Hall-Dennis report to be more expensive, or could the recommendations actually reduce costs in the education system?

Mr. Pitman: I am very pleased to have that question. I think there are many recommendations of the Hall-Dennis report which, over a long period of time, would undoubtedly be costly, if you tried to provide the kind of facilities which are suggested in the Hall-Dennis report. But I am sure the hon. member would agree with me that there are many—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is not the answer he wanted, as the member knows.

Mr. Pitman: There are many of these changes which could easily be accommodated. I would suggest, and I think he would agree, that it is the teacher education area that will have to change if they are going to change the attitudes which will enable these young people to carry out this kind of enlightened and liberal educational system—small 'l' Liberal education system—which would then allow the kind of opportunities for the young people which are provided in the Hall-Dennis report.

I would suggest to you that we have not even begun to think of how we could use teacher assistants at a much lower pay level, and teacher aids. We have got our colleges of applied arts and technology. They are turning out all kinds of para-professional people. But here again this government will not deal with that kind of a problem.

We bring forth these people from courses in our colleges of applied arts and technology. For example, we have got social workers coming out and what happens? The Department of Social and Family Services does not want to use them now. They are being denied opportunities. In fact, they are being denied opportunities by agencies which are supported by this government. At the same time that the government is producing these kinds of para-professional people, it is denying them the opportunity to carry out the work for which they are being trained. That is what I mean by a government which is unable to deal with a specific problem in an effective and useful way.

I would like to go on to another area which I would say is of top priority. That is the whole question of teacher-pupil ratio. We have just talked a bit about the whole problem of student unrest, and one of the major causes of student unrest is a feeling of disorientation on the part of the student. He does not feel that anybody really cares. He is in too big a class whether it was at the university or at the secondary elementary level. He does not feel a teacher really cares.

Yet it seems, Mr. Speaker, at this point in time, The Department of Education has some kind of a scheme whereby it is trying to raise the teacher-pupil ratio, raise the number of pupils which each teacher will be expected to deal with.

This has gone on throughout the entire province. There has even been the suggestion that the grant structure is going to be used to try and keep boards from getting those teacher-pupil ratios too high, or too low I should say.

I think this is unfortunate because of all the areas where we need a priority is this area, as well — the relationship of teacher to pupil. If we allow these ratios to rise, if we get to the point where teachers are dealing with too many students, then it becomes utterly and completely hopeless to try to implement any of the things which are found in the Hall-Dennis report.

We talked about two things, two priorities—one, the priority in the area of teacher education; and two the priority in the teacher-pupil ratio. I would hope that this might even be thought out at the university level.

How strange, how ludicrous, Mr. Speaker, that at the time when you have all this ferment at the university level because students do not feel that they have any kind of relationship with their professors and with the faculties, the very system by which this government gives its grants to universities exacerbates the problem.

The whole grant structure to universities is based on a pupil basis. The number of students you have provides the amount of money you get. That is the only criterion except for a capital expenditure which we can deal with in another point.

But it means that a university which wants to develop its programme, which wants to provide the best kind of programme, has to expand its student enrolment, and the whole emphasis and the whole problem of expanding lies in deciding where you could stop the expansion. So you have larger classes and you have less contact with professor and student.

Even worse than this is the fact that your pupil grant is the least for the student undergraduate who happens to be in an arts course. If you put your emphasis on graduate studies, it means you get six times the amount you would receive for that student if he was undergraduate.

Where your trouble centres are, where your crisis points are, where your areas of ferment are, is among your undergraduates who feel that they are not getting a fair deal; they are not getting equality in the educational system; they are not getting attention. They believe they are not really feeling a part of the university. So, they strike out against this inhumanity.

This, I suggest to you, is the problem with this grant structure. It forces the university to develop large classes. It forces them to put their emphasis on graduate students instead of upon undergraduate students.

Hon. J. H. White (Minister of Revenue): Do you know what the student-faculty ratio is?

Mr. Pitman: I am sorry.

Hon. Mr. White: Do you know what the student-faculty ratio is?

Mr. Pitman: Yes, I do know what the student-faculty ratio is and it is a good deal less than California. But I suggest to the hon. Minister that if you want the problems they have got in California you just raise it to what they have it in California.

An hon. member: Afraid you walked into that one, John.

Hon. Mr. White: It is the lowest in North America.

Mr. Pitman: I would like to turn also to the whole question of county boards. I would say that the development and the organization of county boards in Ontario was probably the most important administrative change in the educational system I guess since Egerton Ryerson.

But there are a number of fears which I think have arisen and which were indeed suggested on this side of the House when this legislation was brought forward last year. A major fear, I think, is the feeling of people across this province that they have lost all control of education, the education of their children. They do not know where it is going and I think this is best shown by the percentage of people who voted in the last election for county boards.

In some areas it was as low as 11 per cent; 11 per cent went out and voted for the people who are spending more money in this province than we are, essentially, although the money, I know, comes from this source. But they make the decisions about that money in a way in which we do not even have an opportunity to do.

How do we re-establish some kind of contact between the people who have the children and the educational system? I say it is a major problem. It is not a small problem.

It comes right back to this whole business of unrest and ferment, because I would suggest to you tonight, sir, that the educational system as it exists today is widening the generation gap. An educational system within the fabric of our society should be bringing the people together. It should be providing lines of communication, bridges of understanding—

Mr. W. Newman (Ontario South): We do, we do!

Mr. Pitman:—between parents and children, between students and teachers, between teachers and administrators in the whole educational fabric.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Pitman: —if the hon. member will just be a bit patient, I will try and get to it for him.

Mr. Speaker, we have to find a way by which we can inform the parents about what is going on in the school; provide them with an opportunity to be a part of what is going on in the school system. That is why I suggest to you, and your Hall-Dennis report suggests, an advisory committee of people at the ministerial level. I suggest there should be an advisory committee including parents at the board level. I suggest that there should be advisory boards at every school level. Every principal should have an advisory board, including parents in his district.

I suspect that eventually the school may be the only unit in which the people in a community will have any sense of orientation with the government above them, and this is, I think, a very serious problem.

Maybe the school system will be the way by which we identify. Maybe these advisory committees might be the way that we inform ourselves of the needs of the social services in that entire community. They would be the nub, the centre, the place where information could be gathered, the place where action could be taken to deal with community problems.

I suggest to you that this is the only way we are going to make the parents a part of the input. The election of the county boards —I am sorry, I did not hear the hon. member.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton West): You are over-estimating them.

Mr. Pitman: The hon. member says I am over-estimating parents, and it may be true. But I do have a feeling that the reason why parents do not go to home and school meetings, the reason they do not feel that they really are a part of the educational system, is because they have been successfully blocked off. The home and school association unfortunately has been a way of keeping parents separate from the real decisions.

What they do essentially is let them sell candy, let them buy a clock for the gymnasium, let them deal with John's teacher individually. But do not let us start having them talk about what Johnny is doing in the classroom; what is the curriculum; and what the rationale of the curriculum is, or all these silly rules that the Minister and I were talking about just a few minutes ago. In other words, home and school keeps them out of those essential areas, those critical areas. Let them play around.

I suggest to you that it is time that the parents became a part of the input; that they have to be responsible; they have to be concerned. I think the time is now. The time will be, I suggest Mr. Speaker, when they get their education bills in the next few weeks. They are going to be very concerned about education, and I may very well—

Mr. W. Newman: The schools in our area are open next week for the parents to go and see, for two weeks to—

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, we are not on the same wavelength. I am not talking about going and seeing the school; I am talking about being a part of it. The parent who walks into the school immediately feels as though he is a guest in the school. He goes in expecting to be told and to see what is going on. He is never asked what he thinks should be going on. He is never asked what he thinks the community problems are. He is never asked what kind of an administrative pattern his children might be happiest in. Is he? He is simply asked to look, see and then go home, and we will see you next year about the same time. I suggest to you that that is not good enough.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pitman: I think one of the greatest problems of the county board is that they have an opportunity to begin innovations; they also have an opportunity to frustrate progress. This is one of the things which really bothers me. We are reaching a point in our education system where teachers should be given the greatest amount of freedom possible. They should be not only given the greatest amount of freedom, they should be given the greatest amount of opportunity to be part of the input, too.

We talked about advisory boards a minute ago. Surely this is what teachers should be a part of as well? They should be making the decisions about curriculum within their school, and the administration within their school, along with the parents and along with students as well, because they have to be a part of this input.

Mr. W. Newman: What about discipline?

Mr. Pitman: Yes, I would suggest to you, sir, that the discipline question should be fought out in these committees. It is being done in high schools, across this province as it has been done in elementary schools across this province.

Young people have shown a high degree of responsibility once they have been given to believe that they are doing something which is worthwhile, as long as they are not being played with. The problem right now is that there is no structure for this. The hon. Minister is not here, but we saw this last fall when the whole question of extending the school year came up. That has been like a very small inconsequential aspect of the total, but it has many ramifications. The decision did not recognize, in terms of employment the wishes of the student. The whole administrative structure during June was ignored, and the effect this would have upon individual assessment of students and so on. But the point was this, and that is the point I am trying to get to—the students had no effective way of making their voices heard. The student councils have as their main purpose to organize the dances, buy the crêpe paper and so on. They have no effective way of channelling the views of students. Therefore, what was the only way they could express themselves out there in front of the building? I suggest to you that it is not really the most effective way that people can express themselves and be a part of the input of government of Ontario—standing out on the steps of Queen's Park.

I suggest to Mr. Speaker that this is not worthy of an educational system which is attempting to develop responsibility among young people. This is what the game is all about, isn't it? If you do not want the students burning schools down, or if you do not want students disrupting school, you had better teach them responsibility. The only way you are going to teach them responsibility is to give them responsibility.

Mr. W. Newman: Do you know what is happening in our schools toward this end.

Mr. Speaker: Order! This is an address, a speech by the hon. member from Peterborough, not the hon. member from Ontario South. While I agree with the hon. member for Peterborough that a great deal is to be gained by this type of exchange, it is not yet the custom of this House, nor permitted by the rules. I would therefore ask the hon. member to continue with his speech.

Mr. Pitman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. N. Whitney (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—the order being in regard to the motion. In my area we have the Ontario School for the Deaf and they have a sign language. I have seen so much movement of hands and one thing and another that I have this speech all confused. I think sometimes the member talked contrary to his motion.

Mr. MacDonald: That is not the reason for the member's confusion. Don't blame it on the deaf children.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peterborough has the floor and will continue.

Mr. Pitman: I am very sorry. I will try not to confuse the hon. member any more.

An hon. member: Put your hands in your pockets.

Mr. Pitman: One of the things that I did want to mention is this whole question of the administrative structure growing up within the county board. As I began to say, I think teachers most of all need freedom as well as the security within their county boards. I fear the numbers of administrators and pseudo-inspectors and pseudo-supervisors and so on which are being pyramided above the educational system.

I must say that when I was teaching, I used to think that the best thing about the inspectors was that the departmental inspector had to drive 100 miles before he got to my classroom. This always meant that his visits were infrequent, but sometimes helpful. I think the main point is that a teacher under this structure could very well find himself daily being supervised or pseudo-supervised or inspected or in some way being looked upon. I think this is a development which I see as a pernicious one and which very much bothers me.

Another thing which I have noticed is the degree of concern on the part of teachers on the number of reports that are being made and are being planned, so that everybody is reporting on everybody else. Some of these reports are made in secret sessions in the county boards and this, I think, is also an extremely dangerous development. If the whole county board system is going to work, it is going to work on the basis of some kind of faith and trust on the part of teachers and administrators and board members.

I suggest that written reports shown to the individual teacher concerned will do, and it will undermine the very best kind of work that could be done within these county boards. This comes again to the whole idea of advisory committees. The suggestion has been made by the Ontario Teachers Federation, and I think it is a wise suggestion, that teachers be included on advisory committees through the county boards. I would hope that there would be a change in legislation in this House during this year which would allow teachers to be a part of the decisions which create the kind of system in which they are going to work.

I think it is extremely important if the teachers are going to be responsible, that they be given responsibility; that teachers are going to be expected to go to the second-mile phase; that they also will have an opportunity to decide or at least influence the major decisions that are being made in these county boards.

I think this is, too, the reason for the teachers' concern over a transfer review board. They are not terrified of being sent from one school to another, but they are concerned that this may be used in an inappropriate way. They are concerned that in these large units a teacher may have to travel 60 miles to get from one school to another, and they may be transferred to a school 60 miles away by a board—which may be unwise, but more accurately may wish to use this as a means of disciplining the teacher. I think this is inappropriate in this present day, and I would hope that the Minister would move ahead on that area as well.

Bill 81, which was passed in Toronto, removed all teachers from boards within the metropolitan area. Members who were in this Chamber at that time, Mr. Speaker, will realize that many teachers did serve on these boards and provided, I think, a degree of expertise on boards outside of areas in which they live. The creation of the large Metropolitan board removed many of these teachers from this function. The creation of a large county board has the same effect. I think it is an unfortunate thing when the teachers, from whom you expect you will receive some enthusiasm for democracy and some respect for the public function, are deprived of a very important aspect of that public function, that is, of serving on trustee boards, and serving on boards of education throughout this province. Those are just some areas that I think need a good deal of thought by this government.

My final comment in the area of education—at least my final comment at this time in the area of education—is on a matter which I think is the cause of a good deal of concern in this House. I shall try to deal with it in as low-key a manner as I can, and that is the whole area of separate schools.

We have in this province, as you well know, a complete system of public separate schools. They are supported by the province to the end of grade 8 fully; they are supported to the end of grade 10 partially. It is the feeling of many of the people of the Catholic faith that separate schools should be completely supported by the province.

I think that we have to recognize first their historic right in the support of the public Roman Catholic schools. They have that right. At the same time, I think we have to recognize that if in 1867 it was their right to have these schools supported to the end of grade 8, then in 1967 that right should probably justly extend beyond grade 8. I think that we would recognize, secondly, that if the modern trends toward non-grading, toward a continuum of education, have any validity at all, this makes it impossible to cut off separate schools for Catholic young people at the end of grade 8, or particularly at the end of grade 10.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I think we are all conscious of the cost of education. It would not be justice to anyone, if, in attempting to provide justice to one group, we ended up by really removing justice from all young people in the sense that the total fabric of education might be weakened. That is, the cost of education might be so great that the programmes would have to be restricted in all schools.

Quite frankly, it would not be a great cost to the province to immediately begin the development to transfer funds from the public purse to students in secondary schools at the end of grade 13. I have heard suggested a sum of $8 million, which is a very limited amount of money. But I think hon. members of both sides realize that once the public becomes involved in the separate school system, the costs are going to rise considerably. They have to rise, because it is at the secondary level that the public Roman Catholic schools cannot provide the vocational courses and the reasonable spectrum of courses which a young person in a modern society must have access to.

So I think there are two problems here. One is the provision of justice to Roman Catholic people in this province, and the whole problem of justice in terms of the total school population. My thinking in this particular area is one which I would hope all political parties are moving toward. There are some problems which will not disappear but I suggest to you that this is not a problem which will disappear. It is one which continues to grow and continues to be an ulcer in the public process of this province, and it is one that we must do something about.

The first thing we might consider is a development within each county, because for the first time, Mr. Speaker, if nothing else, we have in our counties some kind of order in the sense that the smaller number of jurisdictions now has contiguous units, in many cases, of separate and public schools. Very often you will have a public separate school county board and a public county board. Now that is not true all over the province, but there are variations which can be found, I think, in this pattern I am suggesting.

The first thing we need to do is to set up a committee to deal with the problem of finding the areas of co-operation to assure the people of Ontario that there is not going to be a proliferation, a duplication, of services as a result of the entry of the province into the financing of the total separate school cost.

I would suggest the first thing we could do is begin co-operating on bus routes. How many times have we seen a separate school bus go by and then a public school bus go by? We could co-operate in the areas of special services. We can co-operate in administrative costs; a number of members have brought up this whole question of upper administration and its cost. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to you that this is an area which could very well be dealt with in one of these committees.

Eventually I hope we might even deal with the area of facilities and co-operative use of facilities. I see no reason why we could not leave the separate school operating as a confessional school, with students going to a public school to get some of their vocational subjects. I would suggest that some of the public school students could well go to the confessional school to get some of their subjects.

In this way you would break down any concern which some people seem to have over the separation of people in one system and another. I think we must begin to develop a rational pattern for dealing with this problem. We cannot let prejudices which are gone long ago, which are away in the past, debilitate us in our efforts to try and react in a unique and a dynamic way to this kind of problem.

It is a difficult problem, but I would remind you of all of the things which have happened in this province—the development of the larger units of administration, the development and the coming of the Hall-Dennis report and the kind of fabric of education suggested. And, of course, there is the desperate need of Roman Catholic people in this province who, in some cases, are being doubly taxed because of the system which exists now. Finally, the county board can be a cause of tremendous concern to people in this province when they hear about the taxation rise which is going to take place apparently in the education costs in the province.

When this bill came before the House last year I made the point, or I tried to make the point, that there was no way by which the creation of larger units of administration would cut down cost of education to individuals within the county system. The Minister talked about creating a more stable tax system and spreading out the cost, and so on. I think anyone who looks at the various counties will see that the costs are going to rise. The administration costs have already risen. Special services will be demanded and they will be costly. On top of that, of course, the demand for these services in all the rural areas will create a welter of demands upon every county school board.

The question becomes, how could The Department of Education really believe that by putting rural areas in with urban areas, it was going to cut down the cost of education in each county? The indication was that it was hoped that by combining these units there would be a saving in the cost of education.

Mr. Kerr: Eventually, yes.

Mr. Pitman: The government's own member says eventually, yes.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: The government has never suggested that.

An hon. member: He just indicated it.

Mr. Pitman: I am not going to raise chapter and verse here, but there was certainly indication that by creating a stable tax source, by being able to place other sources of revenue in the cities into the rural areas, that you would be able to hold back the rising cost of education to the individual person in the county.

The question becomes one of dealing with the rising mill rate in each of these rural communities. In some areas the mill rate in the rural area, which is contiguous to an urban centre, has risen two and three times. The cost of education is a terror in the hearts of some people in the rural areas because they see their taxation bill for education doubling and tripling. In some parts of Ontario this is the case.

Mr. Kerr: To you, that is.

Mr. Pitman: I can assure the hon. member I do not wander about the rural parts of Ontario giving harrowing details. They call upon me to ask why this government has done this, and I try to explain actions which are clearly inexplicable. That is the role I find myself in too often.

The hon. member asks me whether I supported this move. Certainly I have supported the larger jurisdictions. We suggested, though, that it be phased in a rational, sensible way, and that it be done over a period of time which would have allowed the development of service and the development of patterns of administration. This would have allowed the people in these county boards an opportunity to be a part of it. I can tell you right now the number one problem which the Minister of Municipal Affairs faces as he moves the province toward regional government is the concern which people have that it is going to be done in the same way as the county boards of education.

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs): No, it is not.

Mr. Pitman: I am so glad the Minister said it is not. All we suggested is that people should have been involved. What you meet everywhere is the reaction, "If regional government is coming, I hope it does not come the way the county board system came, with no—"

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You dispel that rumour, do you not?

Mr. Pitman: Indeed I do. I was in Innismore township speaking to the council this morning, telling them what a fine fellow the Minister was and that he would come and talk to them before regional government came, so you see this is a role which I happily accept.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): Obviously he does not agree with the way county boards of education came into being.

Mr. Pitman: That is the point.

Mr. Pitman: May I suggest that a rise in taxes on the separate school boards is a matter of some concern. I was talking to a member of a separate county school board whose taxes for education were based on last year's grant structure. We do not know what the grant structure is going to be this year; it may be the same, it may be different. It may help, it may not. But the point was, his taxes based on last year's grant structure was $79. This year it will be over $250. A jump from $79 to $250.

This man is a member of a separate school board in the delightful little township of Douro, and if any of you have been there, you will know what I mean when I say that his comment was, "If you think they are having troubles in North Ireland right now, you wait until these people get their bills for taxation on education in a couple of weeks. You have seen nothing yet."

All I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, to this government is, there had better be some clear thinking on a grand structure which will help these municipalities.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, you are going to have to protect me again from all the—

Mr. Sopha: I think you should withdraw the analogy, we have never been an Ulsterman.

Mr. Pitman: I am not going to get in Northern Ireland politics with the member from Sudbury.

Mr. Sopha: You amaze me!

Mr. Pitman: May I turn now to the whole question of regional development. There is probably no problem in this Legislature which is more difficult to assess than the whole problem of regional development.

I am not going to repeat what I think was the magnificent oration in this House by the member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) on the whole question of regional development and regional government. But I do want to indicate to the House my concern, and I am sure it is the concern of many other members as to exactly where we are going.

When I made my first remarks in this place a year ago, this is the subject to which I turned some of my attention. The Prime Minister's comment in his remarks on the Speech to the Throne this year was, "Much has been accomplished since design for development was outlined in this House."

Well, I would like to know just how much has been accomplished. Certainly we have seen a mass of committees; committees everywhere. What are they? Regional development councils; cabinet committees on policy; advisory committee at the deputy minister level; regional advisory boards in all the various regions; regional development branches of The Departments of Treasury and Economics. A whole mirage of committees.

But I suggest to you, sir, that it scarcely behoves us to suggest that much has been done. One only has to read the comments of Mr. Krueger and his feelings about what has been done. Mr. Ralph Krueger, is the professor and chairman of the department of geography of the University of Waterloo. Just one paragraph:

However, I regret having to say that much of this co-ordinating machinery is not working.

Well, what an understatement.

And there still seem to be overlapping responsibilities and confused jurisdiction concerning regional planning and community planning and development. The regional development branch of The Treasury Department, responsible for the planning of regional development councils, and the community planning branch of The Department of Municipal Affairs, provincially responsible for the planning done by municipalities and joint groups of municipalities do not seem to be adequately integrating their research and policy programmes.

As a result, the regional development councils are being encouraged to formulate regional development plans, which, to be implemented, require the use of The Planning Act which is under the jurisdiction of The Department of Municipal Affairs. Furthermore, the regional development branch is doing, and subsidising pre-planning research at the regional level, while at the same time, the community planning branch is doing, and subsidising pre-planning research at the community level.

Well now, what does this mean for the local municipalities, Mr. Speaker. It means utter confusion. They do not know where they are going. The local township does not know whether to go ahead with the official plan. Regional government is coming. Should it go ahead with the county plan. We do not know.

Should several townships go together and make a plan. Who knows. We do not know what the regional development branch is up to next. And as far as the regional development—

And this can come out in very unfortunate ways, Mr. Speaker. One of the most tragic things that took place in the last summer, in an area very close to my home, in Smith township—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Where?

Mr. Pitman: Smith township, I am sure you are quite aware of the existence of that township.

In this particular township a nursing home existed. It was a much-needed nursing home for older people in this community. And because there have been delays, because of not knowing exactly where we are going, this nursing home has been allowed to develop in what was an area that was not zoned for a nursing home.

All I am using this for is not as a stick to beat the municipal department, but simply as an example of what happens when something goes wrong in this area.

Well, as it turns out, the neighbour disliked having the washing on the line, and so complained and demanded that this nursing home be closed. The local council tried to spot zone and were refused by the Ontario Municipal Board. So these old people who had made a home in this nursing home were moved, were forced to move out of that nursing home, and one died very soon after being moved to another area. Others found immense difficulty in moving from one place to another.

I suggest to you that that is an example of the human suffering which results because we do not seem to know exactly where we are going in this particular area.

As far as the other comments of Mr. Krueger are concerned:

Unrelated and unco-ordinated planning activity is a needless waste of both financial and leadership resources.

This is what we on this side have asked for again and again:

What is required is a rational province-wide system of planning agencies, each planning within a framework of policies established at the next higher level. A provincial development plan is also needed to provide the overall policy framework within which the government departments, regional and local municipalities can do their planning.

I suggest to you sir, that we desperately need this overall regional plan. In fact, the great difficulty is that we do not really know what a region is. We do not know whether we are talking about regional government with its units. We are only dealing with two departments here. Thank heaven it got out of The Department of Trade and Development down there where we did not know where we were at.

So at least we are dealing with the Treasury and Municipal Affairs. But I do not know just how to get these two Ministers together to solve this problem, or their staffs. Get them in the same building, the people who are doing this, because for heaven's sake, one cannot lose the feeling that while both are on their own tracks, both going in, I will not say opposite directions, but certainly different directions in deciding—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Do not worry about it.

Mr. Pitman: Well, it is not really my responsibility to worry about it, but I would suggest that I—

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): The hon. member should not concern himself.

Mr. Pitman: Well, I simply here express the concerns of people in my area. I am sure there are people in a good many other areas. They do not know what is going on. Waterloo county has had some problems, Lakehead seems to be having some problems, and every other region seems to be having some problems. They do not seem to know where you are going.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: They are our concern.

Mr. Pitman: You have created some of the problems, and that is the very point.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Not the Minister of Correctional Services.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I correct them all.

Mr. Pitman: Here you have the statement of the Prime Minister again. In "Design for Development" it is clearly stated that the implementation of the regional development policy of the government could make a groundwork for changes of area government which might be considered appropriate.

Now, we do not know whether the regional development is guiding the municipal changes, or the municipal changes are guiding the regional development. And there is very little contact. The Minister himself admitted this last year in his estimates, that there is not enough reaction and action between the elected people and those who are dealing with the regional councils.

As well as this, there is another problem. We had a plan in each of these regions, a plan was developed last summer. I do not think these plans have come out yet, I think they are all done but they have not been released yet. But they were given $5,000 or $10,000 to develop a plan.

You could have spent $500,000 to get the data which was required on that plan. It was impossible to get the kind of information which was needed to develop a policy. It simply was impossible to carry out the statements made by this government to those who were trying to carry out these plans in the various parts of Ontario.

And this brings it right back again. For example, they talk about growth points. The Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall) and I had a great scuffle over these last year, this whole question of growth points, but there is no definition of growth points. I suspect that a growth point in one part of Ontario will be very different to the growth point in another part of Ontario. As a result, there will be no effective way of co-ordinating.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The member is right.

Mr. Pitman: I am right? The Minister evidently thinks this is a good idea to have different criteria for a growth point in one part and another part.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, I do not think one can have positive criteria.

An hon. member: They do not have any criteria.

Mr. Pitman: Well, if there are no criteria, no wonder we have the chaos that we have now, because at the same time as the Minister is talking about orderly development and the Minister of Municipal Affairs is talking about orderly paths toward regional government, you have the other Ministers going off on their own sweet way. The Minister of Trade and Development is giving grants to all sorts of people. Of course, in my particular area he designated it everywhere else but growth points. Of course, we have already heard about his manipulations up in western Ontario. It seems to me that this government does not have a very clear idea of what planning is. Surely planning starts off by getting control of the crisis points.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): It was only a year ago they dared use the term.

Mr. Pitman: And once you do control the crisis point, then you can start to develop plans. I do not think that this government really recognizes that planning is not a sort of a final point, it is a continuance. You are never going to get to the point where you simply gather data and gather data and suddenly a plan emerges from the data. It does not emerge out of the data because the data keeps coming in and coming in, and you never reach a point where you could draw a line and say now we can develop a plan. This does not happen. And that, I am afraid, is the impression which people get.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Is this NDP policy?

Mr. Pitman: Is this the NDP policy? Yes, a rational planning is getting control of the crisis point and recognizing that planning is a continuing device.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, we are all in favour of motherhood, so what is next?

Mr. Pitman: Well, I am only answering the Minister—I am only answering your colleague in the second row.

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): He is against fresh air.

Mr. Pitman: Well, I do not intend to carry this any further. I suggest that we get on one track so far as regional development and regional government are concerned. We do not know where we are going as far as the relationship of the boards of education for regional governments is concerned.

The Minister of Municipal Affairs suggested there might be a couple of county boards in a municipality but certainly he made no clear indication of just how much chaos we have created by going ahead in this area without some relationship to the regional developments in other areas.

An hon. member: The member is against county school boards, I take it?

Mr. Pitman: Oh, Mr. Speaker, really.

Mr. Lawlor: See what happens to your dialogue.

Mr. Pitman: One of the points which really bothers me in the Speech from the Throne is my final area.

Mr. Singer: That is the fifth final area.

Mr. Pitman: My final subject area. It is the comment during the session that an opportunity will be afforded the hon. members to give serious and responsible attention to the machinery of collective bargaining and related labour and management matters rising out of the recommendations contained in the report of the royal commission inquiring into labour disputes.

Perhaps I have a particular concern about this Rand report and the suggestion that this report is going to be acted upon in this session. As members will well know, this report came out of a dispute which took place in the city of Peterborough. This government found itself in the very embarrassing position of putting in jail some of the leading citizens of the city, 15 in number, and some for several weeks.

I am particularly interested in this matter because at the present time there is a strike which still goes on; it began in November and is still present in March, 1969. I am particularly concerned because of the nature of this strike, it is not even so much the union which is going to lose, it is the community. Mr. Speaker, we are losing a newspaper that was once a very good newspaper, a quality newspaper. Some rated it seventh in Canada. And now I am afraid it is going to be nothing more than a very poor newspaper in the hands of the Thomson interests.

The Rand report came from a very learned jurist but unfortunately jurists—and I hope I am not going to excite all the legal buffs here—have a tremendous respect for the status quo, have an obsession for law and order without, I think, perhaps so much concern that law and order be part of justice. I think you oversimplify the relationship of man to man, and try to put it into a set of rules. I think if there is any area of education where the legal mind does not operate quite as effectively as it should, it is in the sociological and psychological areas.

The member for Eglinton (Mr. Reilly), of course, made a number of comments on this and I am not going to answer his arguments here tonight. It is true, strikes are untidy, it is true that they do cause public discomfort, they get in the way, they are not very respectable, they are dangerous and picketing somehow seems to disturb the tenor of our lives.

In many cases, of course, we distort the concept of the strike, in many cases the strike is the one thing that creates a settlement, in 97 per cent of the cases. In some cases, of course, the strike is the only way that settlement can be gained. But I think what Mr. Justice Rand was complaining about or what he should have complained about was not this small area of picketing and small area of dispute; I think he should have done away with his obsession with law and order throughout the entire world and confined himself to the society in which this takes place, because we are dealing with a capitalist society where the creed is profit.

Unions are merely imitating what is the accepted credo within our society. They are placed in a demanding role and they have to be in a demanding role. After all, it is management which desires the status quo, it is the union which is trying to change the status quo. The conflict is built in, in other words. You cannot simply move it out by some kind of government action.

We would suggest that there are other ways of dealing with society, of planning the society, of providing guidelines for wages and profits and prices, but this was not the suggestion of Justice Rand. Rather, it was to zero in on the union and its role in society and say, we are going to restrict that union, we are going to make it more difficult, we are going to involve that union in all kinds of legal dispute which will destroy its financial viability and which will destroy its ability to protect its members. I think even the member for Eglinton will realize that the union would disappear as an agency whereby we would get better hours, decent wages, decent conditions. I think it would have well behooved the hon. member to concede that at the time his speech was being made.

I think the greatest stumbling block in the Rand report is that it has cut off what is the most important area of development, and that is, how unions can play a more effective role in participating in decision making within a modern corporate society.

Now, we are all getting hung-up in a dispute as to whether unions should be able to picket in a certain way and whether injunctions should be possible, when what we really should be talking about is, "What is the effective role of a worker in our society?" I suggest to you it is far greater than the role which has been assigned to it by this government and certainly by this report.

As I say, I have a special interest in this area because in the city where I am it is very easy to quote The Labour Relations Act and say that men have the right to join a union. But what happens when the employer, when the Thomson interests say, "We are not going to have a union. We are not going to have the union because we are not going to accept any kind of a system which allows you to restrict those coming into the paper so that we cannot bring in enough people to destroy your union"; or "We are not going to accept any system which will not allow us to transfer your members out to another paper so that we will be able to destroy your union that way."

The law becomes a façade. It certainly loses the respect of the trade unions. In fact, so far as our labour laws in total are concerned, I suggested to the union, "Why do you not bring a charge of not bargaining in good faith against the Thomson interests?" I simply had to wait five minutes while they broke into hilarious laughter, they thought it was the funniest thing they ever heard. What is the point of bringing these charges, when even Tilco, I think, beat that charge. There is absolutely no point whatsoever in bringing that kind of a charge against a company under the system we have at the present time.

I suggest to you, sir, that government intervention is not the answer. It would be the answer to the Peterborough Examiner where you have 22 people being destroyed by a newspaper. Those who are left, and many have already left and taken very good jobs in other newspapers, those who are remaining in Peterborough are still fighting on. They are hoping for some kind of justice. They are hoping to restore a newspaper. They are hoping we may have a community resource which we have had in the past and which we have lost the last five or six months. We are hoping and I suggest to you that the actions of this government are not giving us much reason to hope.

Why was it that in Oshawa they were able to beat the Thomson interests? What happened in that case? What was it that moved this government to carry out an action which brought the Thomson interest to their knees and gave those workers a chance to exist within that pattern? I do not know except I have a feeling that the member for Oshawa may have the very key, the fact that this government realizes that in the city of Oshawa the existence of the UAW would have created so many problems of embarrassment to this government that it could very well, in the long run, have been a matter of some electoral concern. I suggest to you, sir, that it is about time that they became concerned in Peterborough.

You might say, well, why do all the workers not turn up and do something about the Examiner in Peterborough? I will tell you why—because they are intimidated. The Tilco strike did one thing—it convinced the union members and many of their wives that it was not a good thing to be found on a picket line in the city of Peterborough. That is an unfortunate thing when the labour situation has reached that point.

Of course, the intimidation is not helped by having police taking pictures of everyone who is on the picket line. That is simply another aspect which I think is an unfortunate one. I do not think this encourages union members to feel that they are doing what is essentially a proper and respectable thing, and support a fellow unionist by being on a picket line in front of a company which is acting in an unfair and unreasonable way.

I am not going to give you all the reasons, all the wage settlements and so on. I simply say to you that the existence of that strike in Peterborough should be a matter of shame to this government and should be a matter of some concern to those who are supporting this government.

Finally, and this is my final comment I assure the member for Downsview, we in this party are concerned about the other Ontario. A few years ago in the United States a man wrote a book called "The Other America"—Michael Harrington—I think most of you read this book. He called it "The Other America" and he defined and designated and pointed out that a third of the people in the most affluent nation in the world were deprived and depressed. They were herded into the centre of cities and they were, in one way or another, put at a serious disadvantage in carrying out their responsibilities as citizens in the United States.

I want to suggest to you tonight that there is another Ontario and during this Throne debate, what I hoped this Legislature has seen and what is on the record of Hansard, is a description of that other Ontario. Ontario is a great place if you are not a miner. If you have to work at INCO, read the speeches of the member for High Park (Mr. Shulman) and the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) and the member for Timiskaming (Mr. Jackson). Ontario is a great place if you are not an inmate of a mental hospital. Once again, read the remarks of the member for High Park.

Ontario is a great place if you are not a person who is too ill to be working but not ill enough to be in a hospital—read the remarks of the member for Quinte. Ontario is a great place if you are not a workman who has a bad back or has lung trouble and you are trying to get some kind of compensation from the workmen's compensation board.

Ontario is a great place if you do not have to be a worker for Proctor Silex, where you have not a hope of beating a very strong and powerful company in an area where there is virtually no support for the union at all—read the remarks of the member for Oshawa, the member for Riverdale, the member for Wentworth (Mr. Deans).

Ontario is a great place as long as you are not an Indian living in the north—read the remarks of the member for Thunder Bay. Ontario is a great place as long as you are not at the mercy of a particular kind of welfare officer—read the remarks of the member for Brantford (Mr. Makarchuk).

We, in this party, are concerned that there is another Ontario that is not depicted in "A Place to Stand." There is another Ontario and we, I think, would proudly accept as our position a very simple one—it is found in the Declaration of Human Rights, United Nations. It is quoted in the social policies for Canada:

Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food and clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood and in circumstances beyond his control.

It is very easy to see an Ontario which is rich and prosperous where there are no problems. Indeed, one can read the remarks of the Speech from the Throne, the words of the Premier. He paints a picture of an Ontario which virtually has no problems at all and in which there are virtually no emotionally-disturbed children; in which there are no difficulties in regard to juveniles who have to come in contact with the law; there are no proper detention facilities; there are very very few probation officers; where training schools have to be used for purposes which I do not think anyone in the Legislature would recognize as being the best purpose. There simply are not the facilities between the training school and the home which would deal with these minor breaches.

We, Mr. Speaker, have a commitment in this party to a really just society. We have a commitment to the belief that government can play a part in creating that kind of society. We deplore and we oppose the lack of sensitivity of this government to those who are unfortunate. We abhor the attitudes that are taken toward those who are on the fringes, those who fall in the holes in the legislation which is provided by this government.

We in this party are ready; we are ready now to deal with the other Ontario and we simply ask that at the next election the people of Ontario provide us with that very opportunity.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, it seems to be the custom in this debate that I must extend congratulations to all those to whom congratulations are due. Now, let me get on with my speech.

I have listened with great interest to the pedantic remarks of the hon. member for Peterborough. I was rather impressed by the seriousness with which he put forth the first portion of his speech and the way he took the gentlemen of the press and their editors to task and suggested, at some length and, I thought, reasonably well, that perhaps the time had come in this legislature when we should no longer hand press releases to the people who work up there and we should trust to their training and intelligence to properly report the speeches. Much to my surprise, there came into my hand over the supper hour some six pages of press releases released by guess who, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peterborough. And there it is.

Mr. Pitman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I had these ready for the member for Downsview who had his assistant come to me during the supper hour and asked me especially if I would provide him with these remarks so it would better allow him to carry on his speech.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Self-righteous socialists!

Mr. Singer: There it is, Mr. Speaker, the press releases speak for themselves, as does the seriousness we must attach to the remarks of the hon. member for Peterborough and the equal seriousness to which we must attribute the remarks made by several of his colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, this is usually a most interesting debate—very interesting to hear the so-called cut and thrust as it moves from one side of the floor to the other. Very interesting to listen, Mr. Speaker, to some of the better speakers in the House. One gentleman who impresses me inevitably when he gets up to speak is the hon. member—I am sorry he is not in his seat—for Scarborough West (Mr. Lewis).

He is really a joy to listen to; he has a good voice; he has an excellent command of the English language, the words fairly flow from his mouth as he puts ideas before the House. But one would believe he was a bit more credible, Mr. Speaker, if his suggestions about the faults of this House—I think he called this place a mausoleum—if one could believe that his suggestions about this House were backed up by his greater participation in its proceedings.

It is awfully sad, Mr. Speaker, that the talent that lies with that gentleman, unfortunately, does not seem to be devoted to the activities of the government of the province of Ontario. It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, as well, that with all of the sound and fury that hailed the arrival of 20 of those fellows here, the ability to portray in opposition an alternative to government has lessened. I do not know quite what the proportion is but it has substantially lessened from the ability that eight of them were able to portray before 1967.

Mr. Speaker, these are some very sad things and it is unfortunate that they seem to have lost interest. They seem to be most concerned with making speeches in other places, with agitating in other places, but very little concern, Mr. Speaker, with forwarding the democratic process through the media that is available to us, the media of this Legislature.

Mr. Speaker, whether we like it or not, on the date of the last election—

Mr. D. Jackson (Timiskaming): Stick where the enemy is!

Mr. Singer: No, no, I know where the enemy is. It is there and there, and I am going to get to those fellows in due course. But let me deal with the hon. member first.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We can hardly wait.

Mr. Singer: Unfortunate as it may be, Mr. Speaker, in the provincial election of 1967 the voters for better or worse gave to those fellows over there—the government—a larger proportion of the vote than they gave to anybody else. Albeit that it was a decreasing proportion of the vote, they still gave them more than they gave to us, or they gave them more than they gave to the third party over there.

So, Mr. Speaker, those of us who have run for office, and those of us who have been chosen by the people, have a role to play either on that side or on this side. Surely, once the voters have spoken, and until they speak again the next time, there is a duty and responsibility on each and every one of us to continue to play that role.

I have been on this side of the House for a long period of time, but I like to think—and I know, Mr. Speaker, that this is true—that in a number of pieces of legislation that pass through the legislative process and that are now a part and parcel of our way of life, that I have played some role; that my colleagues and I from time to time have put forward suggestions that have been adopted by the House and are now part of the law of the province of Ontario. Now that is the role, Mr. Speaker, that—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I told the people in my riding you were responsible for both Bill 73 and 74.

Mr. Nixon: The Minister is backing away from both of those now.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say very much about Bills 73 and 74 at the present time, but if the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs insists, perhaps I can say a word or two about the arrogance of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Stewart) or the arrogance of those colleagues who brought these bills in without consultation, without concern, and without any real idea of what they were getting at. Perhaps we could talk about that, Mr. Speaker, but I think that can wait perhaps for another day.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: They never asked the dogs or cats.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Or the pussies.

An hon. member: That is a very popular subject right now.

Mr. Singer: Now, Mr. Speaker, let me not get detoured from my original theme. It is a pity that the fine talent of the hon. member for Scarborough West must direct itself to this feeling of frustration, and probably to his removal from an effective role that he could and should be playing in the legislative process of the people of Ontario.

It is a pity, Mr. Speaker, that these hon. members here on our left have been so ridden with internal dissension, are so unsure of themselves, that as they have the 20 members here they are unable to work as a group any longer. They are constantly in agitation, one against the other and they are so unhappy, Mr. Speaker, with their leadership that they have to have a soul searching and breast beating session every few moments or every few days in order to be able to try to present some kind of an unusual feeling to the voters that they are trying to appeal to.

Mr. Pilkey: You just made a good case for an alternative to the government.

Mr. Singer: Well now, Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the hon. member for Oshawa has said that. I am very glad that he makes this point so well, because I wanted to talk for a moment or two about the leadership in the New Democratic Party.

Mr. MacDonald: It is obvious where his worry lies.

Mr. Singer: Well, it is obvious that I am worried.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member had better talk against his real opponents when he gets a chance because his time is getting shorter and shorter.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, they are awfully sensitive to this. Let me continue to make my point. You notice, Mr. Speaker, this is the day and age of political confession. There are books like "Memoirs of a Bird in a Gilded Cage" and other things of that type.

Some of us have begun to enquire, sir, about what we have heard has been the latest book which is very shortly going to hit the newsstands and it is being produced, I gather, on behalf of the NDP.

Now, through a process I would rather not go into in any great detail, we have managed to obtain an advance proof of a book that is shortly about to be put on the newsstands. It is called "The Thoughts of Chairman Renwick," or "What I really think of DCM" whoever he might be.

The cover seems to be a pale pink and the picture on it—I do not know whether that is going to be the final picture on the dust jacket or not—but the picture on it certainly, Mr. Speaker, is recognizable by all of us who sit here in the House. At the moment, while the text is not complete, I do have available the chapter headings and the little excerpts which I believe come from speeches made by the hon. member for Riverdale which are going to be inserted at the top of each chapter.

Chapter one, I am told, is going to be called "We will not be needing you, Don" and it has, Mr. Speaker, a quotation taken from the Toronto Daily Star of November 13, 1968, where it says this:

NDP supporters had to face up to the fact that MacDonald's leadership, good as it has been, is not enough to carry the party to victory in 1971.

Now, we leaf through, Mr. Speaker, and we come to chapter 2—

Hon. J. Yaremko (Minister of Social and Family Services): Will the member read that statement again for the member for Peterborough.

Mr. Singer: Yes, there will be many copies of this available soon.

Chapter 2, Mr. Speaker, is called "What Makes Jimmie Run?" or "Labour, Us?". They seem to like the quotes from the Toronto Daily Star. This one comes from the Toronto Daily Star again in November, 1968, "Lack of party involvement with the people made me a challenger".

And from the Globe and Mail of October 14, 1968, "The party was not established to be a labour party".

Chapter 3, Mr. Speaker, is headed "Yes, We Have No Policies". This comes from the Globe and Mail of October 15, 1968, and again in quotation marks it says this:

Ontario NDP leader Donald MacDonald has made no effort to prepare a programme on which the party could win the next provincial election and then govern the province.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: All in favour, say aye.

Mr. Singer: Still quoting:

If there is ever an area in the province in which we have to have a programme, and it is going to be a socialist programme, we have to have policies. I have waited specifically since the 22nd of July for some initiative from Don MacDonald in this field. There was none.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Shame!

Mr. Singer: Chapter 4, Mr. Speaker, headed "Donald the Man", and just to show we are not partial to either the Toronto Daily Star or the Globe and Mail, this quote comes from the Telegram, Mr. Speaker, November 15, 1968:

The people of Ontario can not visualize the scrappy, determined and invariably predictable Mr. MacDonald as the head of government.

Then, Mr. Speaker, Chapter 5, which the author is going to call, "They never believed me", October 21, 1968, from the Toronto Daily Star:

Who really believes that Don will be the next Premier of this province? The public certainly does not believe and for that simple reason, it will not happen.

As I said, the title of the book is "The Thoughts of Chairman Renwick". These are all direct quotes from the various newspapers that were made by the hon. member for Riverdale during a certain period of his political career.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Give the member five minutes so he can withdraw.

Mr. Singer: Then finally, Mr. Speaker, chapter 6, and there may be some additions, but chapter 6 is the final one that I have a note of. It will be called "The Future" and it has another quote from the Toronto Daily Star of October 21, 1968, and it says this:

The New Democratic Party won't win the next provincial election with Donald MacDonald as leader because he has acquired the image of a loser.

Well, there it is, Mr. Speaker. It is not hard to understand with that kind of dissention, with that kind of disunity, with that kind of disorganization, why this party no longer presents any viable, reasonable alternative, and presents nothing more than a vacuous amount of noise in this Legislature; why the member for Scarborough West wants to opt out and we hardly ever see him; why the member for Beaches-Woodbine (Mr. Brown) is hardly ever here; why those who are here hardly ever participate in the debates, except to drone on for hours and hours in the Throne Debate, as we have heard in the last three or four days.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would say that in the official Opposition, led by the hon. member for Brant, there is one real and genuine alternative to this government.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is what we like, both as alternatives, nothing but alternatives.

Mr. Singer: Let me draw to your attention, sir, the fact that in the election of 1967 the Liberal Party elected more members to this House than it has since 1937.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Big deal

Mr. Pilkey: That is not saying too much.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: The hon. member for York South does not like to be called a born loser more than once a year, but he is and we know it and he knows it so let us forget about that aspect of it.

Mr. MacDonald: We shall see. We got 300,000 more votes in 1967 while the member's party stood still.

Mr. Singer: Well, I only refer to the member's deputy leader and the chairman of his national party and if we cannot quote him, who can we quote? I say, Mr. Speaker, that in the hon. member for Brant that we have a leader who will be the next Premier of the province of Ontario, a man whom we all support in our caucus without exception, a man whom all the people of Ontario will support and be proud of as our next Prime Minister.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Now, Mr. Speaker, let me turn to another subject. I am very concerned about the state of student unrest in our universities.

Mr. M. Makarchuk (Brantford): That is unusual, for the Liberal Party to be concerned.

Mr. Singer: If the hon. member for Brantford will just pay attention for a bit. Some of us have paid attention to some of his words throughout the province and we are concerned about those words, too.

I think most people in the province of Ontario are concerned about student unrest and the myriad reasons for this unrest. We know that the system needs much improvement, that it must be changed. But the methods now being employed for these changes have become as loathsome as the system itself. It is time for us to take a firm stand against the malaise that has infected our universities through so-called student activists, a term that has become as hackneyed as, say, "doing your own thing," a malaise that has spread to our secondary schools.

Mr. Speaker, revolution has become an end in itself to some of these student extremists. They claim to be interested in presenting their views through the democratic process, but the events we have witnessed in the past few months have clearly indicated a negation of democracy. A great deal of genuine embarrassment is spreading amongst the members of the pseudo-radical political party that has fostered student activist movement in its initial stages.

Members of the New Democratic Party have stood on the steps of this building and we have heard them urge student demonstrators on to bigger and better things, rather than meeting with them, and teaching them that there is a right way through dialogue and a wrong way through wilful destruction, to make their demands known—

Mr. J. Renwick: What wilful destruction?

Mr. Singer: —to university and school administrations.

In a few badly chosen words, they have undone whatever good was attempted by more reasonable men who have endeavoured to aid students and keep buildings intact.

Mr. J. Renwick: Has the member looked at the Ontario College of Arts bill?

Mr. Singer: I stood outside these buildings, Mr. Speaker, one afternoon and watched the NDP in full force, smiling encouragement at a group of students as it rapidly became a mob. We all read with disbelief the words of two headline-hungry men, who jumped in over their heads and said, "Demonstrations are good" but then they went further.

Their encouragement included such sage advice as sit-ins, burn-ins, chop-ins and anything else that would endear them to the irresponsible. And chaos, like a sticky snowball, rolled on, picking up whatever flotsam and jetsam was scattered along the way. All this, Mr. Speaker, in the name of reform.

The final proof of the shame felt by their colleagues is the fact that NDP apologists are now writing very learned columns in the daily newspapers, washing the hands of these architects of anarchy, because they do not have the backbone to do it themselves.

Hon. Mr. Crossman: Read that column.

Mr. Singer: And so we have come to the point where a student who witnessed the destruction of Sir George Williams University could say that the only thing that averted a bloody messy riot pitting activists against pacifist backlash, was the fact that the building had started to burn. Maybe that is why the hon. member—and the hon. members on my left know to whom I refer—maybe that is why the hon. member in question urged Ontario children to burn their schools. It is a proven way, Mr. Speaker, to avert a riot.

Hon. Mr. Crossman: Who was that?

Mr. Singer: Through you, Mr. Speaker, I advise the members of the House that it is time to put the whole picture of student unrest into prospective. We agree that the system must be changed. We feel that university administration has tried to understand the demands of the students and has met them more than half way. But this vocal minority is not satisfied to take the time to participate in meaningful dialogue. They live by a creed of intimidation mostly, I would say, because like all extremely vocal minorities, they have really made no attempt to understand the philosophy and the mechanics of the issues at stake. Any reasonable voice is very quickly stilled, and the militants blunder on, the bowers of academy laid bare in their wake.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the time has come for us, the elected representatives of the province of Ontario, to take a stand. I think it is most important that we do, and with this in mind I am going to set out six principles that I think should govern the actions of all of us.

First of all, we are not going to abandon our responsibilities merely because we are over the age of 25 years. Secondly, we must serve fair warning that we will not tolerate riots, burnings, physical violence, sit-ins and destruction of property. Thirdly, we encourage all students, Mr. Speaker, to participate in a meaningful dialogue that will bring about desired reform. We hope that the majority of students who now turn the other cheek will not continue to walk out and leave the field to a vocal and irresponsible minority who want to leave the impression that they speak for all.

We encourage, Mr. Speaker, the stands of our universities and administrators to be brave and bold, to stand up to this challenge and not cravenly to give way to these pressures merely because there seems to be an idea abroad that this is what higher education is all about today.

As politicians on the government's side, the members of the Conservative Party, must say to the people of Ontario, that since you were the people who put us here, we will accept these responsibilities. And on the Opposition side, Mr. Speaker, we must say that since we are here, our job is to watch and criticize and to suggest practical alternatives, that this is what we shall attempt to do, but that we will carry out our task with responsibility. We will not encourage chaos merely to embarrass the government. Our criticism, hopefully, will be meaningful and we will suggest, Mr. Speaker, reasonable alternatives, as is our duty.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, all of us must say to the people of Ontario that we have a responsibility and we will try to carry it out to the best of our ability; to provide the best educational system that we are able; to provide equal opportunity for all. This system must be within our collected means to pay for and it must relate to all of the other responsibilities that the government of Ontario has to all the rest of its people.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Read the book again to the member for Peterborough.

Mr. Sopha: What, is the third element back again?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes, and it is here to stay!

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, we come, as we must come, to some comments about the most Machiavellian political fraud ever perpetrated on the people of Ontario.

That is the one called the basic shelter exemption. Subsequent to the release of the Smith report and to begin the 1967 campaign the leader of the government party plucked out of that interesting volume one little goody which he thought was going to stand him in great stead. He was going to bribe the people with their own money and so, at the cost of $150 million the commitment was made. Machiavellian-like in fashion, it did fool the people and they did what they did in that election, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Sopha: Out-Machiavelliing Machiavelli.

Mr. Singer: The hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs announced in this House, on April 3, 1968, that after intensive research, his department had come up with a system of providing property owners in this province with a basic exemption of $2,000.

A system that beyond any doubt would contain these features—

And I now quote from the Minister's own words:

—that would extend its benefits in the greatest degree possible to each person who pays residential taxes—

I will continue the quote—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: That is right.

Mr. Singer: To continue:

—and beyond that, to the person who bears the impact of these taxes for each dwelling.

And get this one, Mr. Speaker:

It would make sense from an administrative point of view, being simple enough it would not require a cumbersome bureaucracy to handle it and would not require excessive costs.

That is what he said:

It would have the greatest possible degree of reliability—there would not be imposed on any individuals any red tape.

The Minister went on to say:

Since taxes are one of the cost factors that determine rent, the government has devised a guarantee that tenants would benefit. This provision assures every household in Ontario, whether owned or rented, will get the benefit of this property tax reduction.

According to the Minister, the bill required landlords to pass on to the tenants the full amount of the rebate. Now let me ask, Mr. Speaker, if there is a member in this House, be he Conservative or Liberal or NDP, whose constituency work has not quadrupled in the area of landlord and tenant problems as a result of the gaps in this legislation?

Is there a tenant in this province who will not, sooner or later, suffer from this administrative nightmare? How many unscrupulous landlords have been given a perfect out for unwarranted rent increases as a result of the department's lack of foresight?

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): What have you done for the landlords?

Mr. Singer: Quoting the Minister again:

The bill will provide about $150 million in 1968 in the form of tax credits to those who bear taxes on residential property.

And let me repeat—

—a system that would make sense from an administrative point of view, being simple enough that it would not require cumbersome bureaucracy to handle it and would not require excessive costs.

I would assume that the Minister referred in the latter quote to costs to the government in administering the plan; that an estimated average of 50 cents in cost of administration comes to about $1½ million. Remaining with the cost of administering the rebate for a few minutes, have hon. members considered the added cost to property owners who pass on the rebate to their tenants and who the Minister has ignored completely?

Let me provide him with an example in case he does not already know about it and read from a letter that I received from one property owner:

I am more than pleased to give you the details of cost I, as a small property owner, incurred through the distribution of the government-sponsored tax rebate.

We look after some 750 suites. Usually, one woman handles the office load for these. However, to make rebate cheques I employed a second person. The two ladies advise me they spent three-and-a-half to four weeks to get the rebates out to the tenants, checking the rental cards against the leases, old and new, computing the portion of tax due to each tenant, writing our cheques, filling in the cards so that a record of this is kept and mailing out the cheques. Apart from the wages paid to these people of at least $800, we have bank charges of 15 cents a cheque and postage charges of six cents a cheque.

Since in many apartments there was more than one tenant for the year 1968, we estimate we made out no less than 1,000 cheques. Add to this the cost of stationery and supplies. We must also consider that all these cheques will have to be processed by our bookkeeper and accountants.

I therefore feel that the cost of sending out each cheque has cost my company no less than $1.25 to $1.35 per cheque.

The arithmetic is fairly simple—$1,200 to $1,500, to this one apartment owner. That is one of the benefits of the simple system that the Minister of Municipal Affairs is passing on to the people.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: To 1,200 or 1,500 apartments?

Mr. Singer: No, 750. And I gather the Minister is not concerned with the man who owns 750 apartments. He has no concern at all; he has no concern with the tenants, either.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I am just asking.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, you will recall with me the date, January 2; that was the date after which those rebates should have been sent out. This must have been a terrible day for the Minister. Tenants who had not received their rebates by the December 31 deadline began taking the advice given by the Minister in July of 1968. "Call the police!" That is what the Minister said, "Any problems, call the police." So thousands of people started to call the police and the police threw up their hands in horror. The police had no authority to do anything. Had the Minister bothered to consult his colleague, the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), he would have ascertained this very quickly.

But the Minister is not a good consulter, so he did not consult the Attorney General, and he was giving out free legal advice as he had continued to do throughout the piece, and most of the free legal advice was wrong. It was worth exactly what the people were paying for it—nothing.

Mr. Speaker, the police sent them to the justices of the peace, most of whom were very indignant, and so the Minister thought everyone had better call a special number, a hotline, and he set it up. The number was 365-6881. The calls averaged some 900 a day.

In the meantime, the Minister said that it would not be unreasonable for tenants to deduct the amount of their rebate from their rent cheques, hastening to advise the public he was not advising them to do so but merely suggesting it was a reasonable thing to do.

Then the Attorney General felt that he must perforce get into the act, and I have a clipping here where it says:

HOLD-OUT TENANT RISKS, WISHART WARNS

Attorney General Wishart yesterday disputed Municipal Affairs Minister McKeough's advice to the tenants who didn't get their 1968 property tax rebates to deduct the amount from their rent. Wishart told the Legislature—

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): Why does he not resign?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The member asked me that on January 3.

Mr. Bullbrook: The Minister does not realize the significance of what he is doing.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: January 3, and I am still hanging on.

An hon. member: Just hanging, that is all.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to point out to the hon. member on my left that when he is in his own seat he is entitled to be heard in this House, and when he is not he is not so entitled and he has been very vocal just now.

Mr. Singer: I will continue quoting:

Wishart told the Legislature that such a step would not lead to court action because most tenants are bound by their leases to pay their rent in full at regular intervals. But he said landlords might be ill-advised to refuse to pay the rebates and then take the tenants to court for non-payment of rent because they would face possible counter-claims from the tenants.

Mr. Speaker, sitting on the same front bench within a few feet of each other are two Ministers, one of whom offers to give free legal advice which is invariably wrong, who has to be caught up from time to time by the Attorney General, and who adds to the confusion of the greatest Machiavellian political fraud ever perpetrated on the voters of the province of Ontario.

Employees of the information department of the Minister of Municipal Affairs were also confused by the Minister's pronouncements. They must have laughed bitterly at their Minister's promise that the scheme would be carried through without a cumbersome bureaucracy to handle it. And perhaps they smiled in tired satisfaction when the costs of installing more telephones and staff began to mount.

By January 4 the tenants were panicky. Landlords were becoming abusive, the police and justices of the peace were refusing to clean up after the Minister and the Minister himself was whining. He was whining through the piece that the department's role was to slow down landlord and tenant disputes.

Caught in the trap of his own making, he could only supply day-to-day excuses and by January 9 he decided he had better issue another press release, still insisting that 99 per cent of the tenants had received the rebate with no problem. He concluded his press release with a paragraph that subsequent events must surely have made him regret, and this is the paragraph:

This system has nothing to do with rents which are geared to supply and demand. The tax reduction allowance did not come out of the landlord's pocket; he simply passes on what he has received. The landlord has exactly the same rights as he has always had in setting rents and the tenant has exactly the same rights to accept or reject the same.

There you are, Mr. Speaker, he stirs up the storm, he gives bad advice, he tries to retreat. He does not recognize or understand what he did to the landlord-tenant relationship; the disturbance he has caused, the extra costs he has caused and the confusion that this $150 million political fraud has reaped on all the people of Ontario.

I would like the voters of this province, Mr. Speaker, particularly those who voted for the Conservatives in the last election, to be made really aware of the over-simplification of an extremely complex situation; of the diabolical twist of mind that assumes they are so gullible as to believe that the rebate really did not affect the rent.

I would like the poor people who are not property owners and have to rent apartments or flats on a month-to-month basis, to take some comfort from these words when they face the increase of up to $40 a month. Because the substantial part of it, Mr. Speaker, has to be laid at the feet of this Minister of Municipal Affairs.

It was in anticipation of just such a situation that I asked the following question the day that this bill was first introduced, and hopefully the Minister will still remember. I said to the hon. Minister, how can he ensure that the credit will be passed on to the tenants who have something less than a yearly tenancy, such as a monthly tenancy, unless he brings in rent control?

This question, of course, Mr. Speaker, went unanswered. But it was so obvious in this ill-conceived, badly administered, stupid plan, that this is what would have to happen to any tenant who was not there on the basis of anything less than a yearly lease. It had to happen. And if the Minister had thought, he would have known it, and he would not have perpetrated this fraud on the people of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Of course, a year ago the member was not for rent control. He would never have voted for it.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, this question went unanswered, as I say, but the implications of the nightmare of increased rents was imminent. It was supported by the Minister in this House on April 11, 1968, when he stated that the only way to insure that unwarranted rent increases do not take place is to have a rent control.

Hon. Mr. McKeough. That is right.

Mr. Singer: And rent control, Mr. Speaker, is something that this government has consistently refused to consider. And we do not have to look any further than at what took place in the private bills committee when the government majority shot down the efforts of the city of Ottawa to bring in rent control on a temporary basis to relieve some of the people of Ottawa from the havoc wrought by this Minister.

Thousands of tenants are afraid to seek their rebate, Mr. Speaker, because if they do not have a lease they run the risk of being thrown out of their homes or having their rents increased. The rebate itself is practically worthless. In essence, it is a stupid little amount, which is meaningless, even though in sum it cost us all $150 million.

Surely this money, if it was really intended to help those people who most need the help—the elderly, the poor, those on relief, those unemployed—could have been distributed in a meaningful way, Mr. Speaker. Surely it would not be beyond the ingenuity of all the talent that inhabits the front benches over there to devise a system whereby, if we are going to spend $150 million of our money in these days of fiscal chaos, the people who really need it will benefit, and it can be administered without all this confusion, strife and fraudulent intent.

Surely this money, Mr. Speaker, if intended to help these people, should have been distributed in a way where the help was going to be meaningful. Why could we not build some homes for elderly people; why could we not build some government assisted houses; why could not that $150 million have been put in the hands of the Minister who had the responsibility for housing so that working people who are earning something less than $12,000 a year could go into the market and reasonably hope to buy a house.

This is the kind of planning, or lack of planning, the kind of misconception, the kind of naivety, Mr. Speaker, that must make every citizen of Ontario wonder about the intelligence of those people over there who are charged with making such decisions.

I would like to read a letter, Mr. Speaker, that states beyond a shadow of a doubt that this scheme is now ending in complete and absolute chaos. This is a letter addressed to me by a practising lawyer, and if the Minister wants to know what his name is I will gladly tell him or give him a copy of the letter. It is re the tax shelter allowance and it concerns a particular tenant. He says:

Further to my telephone conversation with you in which I advised you that I act for "so and so", a former tenant of some property on Spadina Road, the tenant has occupied these premises for a period of some seven or eight years and has since vacated on February 15, 1969.

He advised the owner of the building that he had not received his tax shelter allowance for 1968, but he got no reply. I wrote to the owner of the building and I received no answer. I arranged for the tenant to speak with the proper department of the province of Ontario in order to discuss this matter and this was done some five weeks ago.

The letter, Mr. Speaker, is dated February 20, 1969, —and he was told that his complaint would be disposed of in due course.

Today I telephoned the department and spoke to a Mr. Stevens who appears to be the man in charge, and who advised me that they had some 4,000 complaints—

The hon. Minister of Correctional Institutions wondered how many thousand. Mr. Stevens is quoted—and it has not been denied—that on February 20 there were some 4,000 complaints before him—he apparently is one of the Ministers officials——from tenants who had not received the tax shelter allowance for 1968. He did not know when they could process the tenant's complaint.

He further advised me that no charges could be laid against the landlord after June 30, 1969, and that if the tenant's situation was not reached by that time—

The Minister must think this is very funny. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that when this kind of charge is being made against an apparently responsible Minister that all he does is sit there and cackle as though there was no problem, as though his administration was good, and as though this scheme was being well administered.

I am ashamed, Mr. Speaker, really of the actions of this Minister all through the piece, and particularly at this time when he is under serious criticism. The least he can do is sit there and listen and not think it is all a great joke. He further advised:

—that it would be fruitless to file a complaint with a justice of the peace since the justice of the peace would not accept any complaint without the approval of The Department of Municipal Affairs.

Further, the department was not in a position to give approval at this time so the complaint could be lodged, and we are now in the unfortunate position of just going around in circles.

It appears to me that the legislation is there, and that my client is being prevented from taking any action by reason of a lackadaisical negligent approach of the particular department handling these matters.

May I have your decision in this connection?

Well, Mr. Speaker, as a result of that I put to the Minister on February 24 this question:

How many complaints has your department received to date concerning the refusal of landlords to pay the tenants the rebate provided by the provisions of the Residential Property Tax Reduction Act, 1968? What has been the disposition of these complaints? How many of these complaints have not yet been processed? How soon is it anticipated the balance of these complaints will be dealt with? How many justices of the peace in Metropolitan Toronto or anywhere else in the province of Ontario have been instructed not to accept information concerning offences alleged to have taken place under the provisions of this Act unless the acceptance of such informations is first approved by your department? If so, on what authority? If not, why should a Mr. Stevens of your department, have so advised an enquiring solicitor on February 24, 1969? Is it correct that no charges can be laid alleging breaches of this Act after June 30, 1969? If so, on what basis? If not, why would a Mr. Stevens of your department have so advised an enquiring solicitor on February 20, 1969?

Mr. Speaker, the Minister did not answer me. He ordered that the question be tabled as an order for return. It sits today on the order paper and one must presume that by reason of his silence all the suggestions and charges made by the solicitor in his letter to me are, in fact, correct; that there are some 4,000 complaints sitting there in the Minister's office; that the staff he has employed are not able to deal with them; that time will run out on June 30, 1969—and I knew the answer to that question without asking him.

But you and I know, sir, that the provisions of The Summary Convictions Act allow six months within which an information must be laid, otherwise no information can be laid. So that if they are not laid by the end of June, 1969, the cut-off date having been made December 31 by regulation under that statute, then no charges can be laid.

But the interesting thing, Mr. Speaker, is how they were able to get to the justices of the peace and instruct them not to accept any complaints. By what colour of right does the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs have to instruct justices of the peace in the administration of the job they are charged with by the people of Ontario?

Surely, Mr. Speaker, a Minister such as this one, who sits and chuckles and guffaws in the face of charges like this, has something better to do with his time and his effort than to interfere improperly and illegally with the administration of justice in the province of Ontario.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when this Minister seriously should hand in his portfolio; that he should resign, because he is a disgrace to the people of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, this plan has been such a washout, such a failure, and everyone else is doing a little Budget predicting, let me do one too. I predict that tomorrow the Provincial Treasurer is going to say that it is abandoned. It really has achieved no useful object at all. Nobody is happy with it.

The people intended to benefit have not benefited; the criticism that is levied justifiably on the Minister's head mounts all the time; it has been an expensive, wasteful, and politically embarrassing piece of government business; it has benefited very few of the people who really need to benefit. As a political plan and as a political bribe it has served its purpose in the election of 1967. That election is gone, they achieved their purpose, now they need the money, Mr. Speaker. Hopefully that horrible plan will vanish tomorrow and hopefully with it the Minister of Municipal Affairs will go too.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: How could the member ever have voted for this?

Mr. Singer: Is that the only answer the Minister has?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: It was just a question.

Mr. Singer: Is that the only answer the Minister has? Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Minister now has launched an interjection himself: Come, get into this debate with me.

Is that the only answer you have? Have you no better justification, Mr. Minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, for such a haphazard, useless, stupid plan than to hurl a question across the House, "why did you vote for it?"

Mr. Speaker, as we said at that time—notwithstanding our grave doubts about the effectiveness of the scheme; notwithstanding our graver doubts about the Minister's competence to administer it—who really kicked Santa Claus in the teeth?

Here was this great government giving away $150 million. In the words of the Minister it was going to be wonderful, everyone was going to benefit. We took him at his word, but we expect better than that from this Minister and from the gentlemen who inhabit the front benches. They failed, and this failure will haunt them for a long time to come.

Mr. Speaker, let me turn now to another subject. We look forward with great trepidation to tomorrow's Budget. If anything we have read in the papers, or heard in this House, is meaningful, we must anticipate substantial tax hikes. After all, are we not in a tax jungle, a time of fiscal nightmare, and financial chaos?

These are the words and phrases we have heard many a time. Have we not got a large deficit behind us? And are we not looking to an even larger one ahead of us? Why, Mr. Speaker, must we anticipate that our taxes have to go up tomorrow? Why is every government to whom we pay our money spending more and more and caring less and less what these dollars do?

I do not think any government is exempt from this criticism, Mr. Speaker. I do not understand why our federal government had to increase its net expenditures by 10 per cent in its most recent budget. Can we never expect a reduction on that level of government? Do we have to have more Bonaventures or more hydrofoils with the waste of money involved in both of those?

Granted, we here at Queen's Park have no direct control over these matters, but surely we must make our voices heard about this kind of waste and extravagance.

Coming a little closer to home, Mr. Speaker, and within the control so-called of two Ministers and two departments, we have absolute authority over our municipalities and our boards of education. How long is it since anyone in Ontario has received a reduced municipal tax bill? Is it really necessary, the competition continue to build—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Right across the province!

Mr. Singer: Right across the province? The Minister has not looked at the tax bill. He may have noticed in these new computerized bills that came out—I have got one of them—that the reduction was there if he looked in the figure, but the end total went up and continued to go up in most municipalities in the province, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You are not accurate.

Mr. Singer: Well, if I am not accurate I hope the Minister will get into some of these debates and explain his folly because he has not.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, perhaps just—if I might—

Mr. Singer: Oh, please do.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: On the house with an average assessment which is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $4,000 or $5,000 right across this province last year, the average rebate was about $50. The average taxes went up $40, so the taxpayer, the average taxpayer in this province, on his property tax bill, was ahead about $10 last year. I know you would want to be fair about that.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I assure the hon. member that taxes did not go down!

Mr. Singer: Certainly I would want to be fair. In the case of the average man the level gets awfully low.

I would say that more tax bills went up in the province of Ontario than went down. When the Minister reaches his average, he is dealing with the people in the lower income bracket, so that most people did not benefit.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: That is the—

Mr. Singer: Let me say, Mr. Speaker—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: That is the people we are interested in—the people in the lower income bracket.

Mr. Singer: Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that notwithstanding all this, has the Minister ever really asked the question, whether it is necessary that the competition must continue amongst municipalities to build bigger and better and more expensive City Halls? It is going on all over the province—each one with a new architect, each one more elaborate than the last one, and each one with an addition being planned before the cornerstone really has been laid on the one that was planned the year before.

Municipal elected official salaries have been soaring beyond control. Why is it that elected councillors and aldermen seem to travel thousands of miles to technical cement conventions, which they cannot possibly understand? Why is it that they travel to Europe and to Asia and all over the world at the expense of their taxpayers and the Minister does not say nay, not even one little bit?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is up to their taxpayers, their voters.

Mr. Singer: I say, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the remark of the Minister of Correctional Services, that if there was a concern in the minds of this government about cutting costs there would be the odd direction, the odd comment from the Minister of Municipal Affairs about this kind of expenditure of money. But he does not seem to care. It is the fashion that taxes go up. It is the fashion that more money be spent. It is the fashion that bigger trips be made. It is the fashion that we go to more conventions.

This is the thing, Mr. Speaker, that puts up the tax bill that municipal taxpayers have to pay every year. Take our boards of education, for example. Does each new school have to be bigger and better and more architecturally unique than the last one? Does each one have to have a separate architect? Does each one have to pay another seven per cent in architectural costs? Do they all have to have swimming pools and multi-gymnasiums?

Is it necessary that administration buildings must be sufficiently elaborate (and that is the newest competition) to compete with the municipal buildings I talked about a moment ago?

In our county school boards, Mr. Speaker, we have created a new monster, the administrator. He, of course, must have a deputy or several of them or an executive assistant; that is a very popular phrase. It is getting endemic around here as well. He must be served by PR men and so on. The base wage for these administrators seems to be about $30,000 per year. And if one gets a little more, the one beside him gets angry and goes to his board and convinces them that his salary has to go up a bit more.

That $30,000 a year, Mr. Speaker, at last count, was $1,000 higher than the provincial deputy Minister of Education was receiving, and substantially higher than that salary paid to the Deputy Minister of University Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, can one who understands these facts not wonder about where the control lies or if there is any? Whether there is any real concern in the minds of those gentlemen who inhabit those benches about helping the person who lives in this province, who pays taxes to all these levels of government?

I say, Mr. Speaker, there is apparently no real responsibility in this government to review and control these expenditures. They do not seem to care. They do not seem to have an interest. Let us look closer to home. Let me first talk about Medicare and the $175 million that is available to the province of Ontario if we join.

I must admit I just do not understand what the Premier's approach to this subject is. He says he is not opposed to Medicare and yet, with the exception of Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, he is (today at least, who knows what tomorrow will bring), standing almost alone against the federal plan.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Nonsense, two thirds of the people of the country disagree.

Mr. Singer: The Prime Minister is getting a little testy. We have listened to his speeches about Medicare at great length and hopefully, he is going to listen to these criticisms because as long as I have to stand here, he is going to get them.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Just be right.

Mr. Singer: I am right. You are not the only one who has the right to express an opinion. We here have a duty to examine your opinions and to criticize them and this criticism, I think, is reasonable. My colleagues think it is reasonable and most people in the province of Ontario think it is reasonable.

Mr. Sopha: I was not here to hear the criticism, but I agree.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: That is the kind I like, that is the kind I understand from your benches.

Mr. Singer: He knows, Mr. Speaker, that in this time of fiscal chaos he can get $175 million by opting in and nothing if he stays out. He knows that the federal government is not backing off from its decision. He knows that the federal government is supported by—what is it—66 hon. members who were elected in the last federal election on the Liberal side; by all the members who were elected in the last election from Ontario on the NDP side; and by most of the members who were elected from the province of Ontario on the Conservative side.

In fact, if the count was taken, Mr. Speaker, I would think that only six members from the province of Ontario do not support federal Medicare. Now these people, Mr. Speaker—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Singer: Now these people, Mr. Speaker—all right, name who does not.

An hon. member: Who did not vote?

Mr. Singer: Stand up, one of you and name a federal member from the province of Ontario who does not support Medicare, no matter what party he belongs to.

Mr. R. T. Potter (Quinte): What about Trills from Hastings?

Mr. Singer: Well, there you are, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Potter: You asked for it.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, those 86 have at least as much claim to a right to speak for the people of the province of Ontario as does the Premier. After all, their mandate came a year later than his. After all, the leader of the government in Ottawa, Prime Minister Trudeau, made this an important part of his campaign and what could be more responsible than those people in Ottawa saying that they, too, have the right to speak for those Canadians who live in the province of Ontario?

We do not believe and we resent bitterly the fact that the Premier takes upon himself, only apparently, the right to speak for the people of Ontario, that he expresses all their opinions. We say he is wrong. We just do not believe that he knows what he is talking about. The Premier knows that of those presently covered by medical insurance in Ontario more than 70 per cent cannot take that coverage with them if they change their jobs, and that they could if they had federal Medicare.

He knows that two per cent of those presently covered in Ontario are covered only if the doctors come to give them treatment in hospital and that this is far from adequate and would not apply if Ontario joined the federal plan. He knows that doctors have long since ceased to object either to OMSIP or to the federal Medicare plan and that he can anticipate no trouble from them.

He knows that private plans such as those run by London Life can give better rates and more benefits because—using the Premier's own words as they appeared in Saturday's Star—they do not have to insure the lame, the halt, the blind, the poor, the unemployed, those on welfare, and so on. OMSIP does this, and he knows that OMSIP's rates could be substantially reduced if they were able to cover the healthy, the civil servants of the province of Ontario. Their rates could be lower than those offered by London Life because they do not have to take a profit out of the service that is being provided. He knows all this, Mr. Speaker, and yet he continues to object.

He says that he is not against equalization grants—and I like this little approach—provided they are identified as such, all put together in a neat little package as I understand, but that he does object to subsidizing poorer provinces under the guise of a tax for Medicare. Yet he knows that Ontario, of all the provinces of Canada, is best able to provide more in equalization help.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, he is not an advocate of the single tax theory? His budget tomorrow will again reveal that he is going to get funds wherever he can find them and in as many ways as possible. He knows that the people of the poorer provinces need more help from the wealthier provinces, and that if Ontario gives more—and in so doing raises the standard of health of other Canadians, this is not something that should be called a political fraud.

Why then the reluctance; why then the recalcitrance; why the stubbornness; what is he trying to prove; who is he trying to serve? I do not think he is trying to serve the people of Ontario at all in this stubborn, unreasoning attitude.

Mr. Speaker, since preparing these remarks last night there was an event that took place in the House this afternoon and there seems to be at least one new development in this plan.

That is the matter referred to in today's Toronto Star by my leader in his question addressed to the Premier before the orders of the day. Has something new been added? Has Ontario ever before suggested that private carriers such as PSI and London Life be allowed to carry on as if they were on a non-profit basis in a manner similar to those arrangements that have already been made in British Columbia and Alberta? If so why have we not heard about that before? Why has the Premier just discovered this?

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it at all. He is looking for a way out; he is looking for a method to save face. All of his other arguments have gone and so he stands here before us this afternoon and says, "Yes, there are some consultations going on this week".

Well if British Columbia was able to do it, and Alberta was able to do it, why has he not been able to do it long before now? And if this is all that stands between him and entering Medicare, for goodness sake, Mr. Speaker, have the Premier exercise his control and direction, back away from his stubbornness, be a big enough man to admit he has made a mistake. Let Ontario get into Medicare for the good of all of the people of Ontario; for the good of all the people of Canada; and last but not least, to give him another $175 million to put in his budget tomorrow.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me address the attention of the members of this House to the fact that the Premier of our province must surely be called the taxiest Premier in our history.

Since he became Premier there have been 17 tax increases. Each year, with the exception of three, and the three exceptions are interesting too—the year he took over as leader, that would have been a bit too soon, and the two years immediately preceding general elections in 63 and 67 there were no tax increases. Now, let me read what the tax increases were, Mr. Speaker.

In the Budget in 1964, gasoline tax up by 2 cents a gallon. Diesel fuel up by 2 cents a gallon. Succession duties up by 25 per cent.

In the Budget in 1965, tobacco tax removed from retail sales tax—average 5 per cent increase.

In the Budget of 1966, sales tax up by 2 per cent—from 3 to 5 per cent. Gasoline tax by 1 cent. Motor vehicle fuel tax up 1.5 cents. Tobacco up one tenth of a cent per cigarette. Land transfer tax from one fifth to two fifths of 1 per cent.

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, we skip 1967, election year.

Mr. Nixon: No new taxes that year.

Mr. Singer: No, sir.

Mr. Nixon: Untamed rivers that year.

Mr. Singer: That is right. That is the year we give away wastefully, exorbitantly, irresponsibly, $150 million. So by the time we come back, Mr. Speaker, in the Budget of 1968, more increases—4 per cent for cigarettes, 2 per cent for gasoline and motor vehicle fuel; 1 per cent for aviation fuel; and 1 per cent for racetracks; 100 per cent registration fee for cars; increase of 10 per cent licence fees for trucks; registration fee for buses, trailers, and other trucks raised along the same general line; increase in fees in licences in The Department of Lands and Forests and fishing licences for the first time in the province of Ontario.

I am sorry the member for Kenora (Mr. Bernier) did not mention that in his remarks this afternoon when he was taking my colleague for Rainy River (Mr. T. P. Reid) to task, but I think it is important, we do have fishing licenses.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I received a letter a few days ago from a constituent of mine who owns his own house, has no debts, but is denied most of life's luxuries because he cannot afford them. He had many interesting observations and these were just a few of them:

For years, we, as taxpayers, have watched and listened to people spend our money and we have been very placid about it. The time has come for someone to do some serious thinking, to find ways and means of saving our hard-earned money without hurting the little people.

Mr. Speaker, I agree. Surely the time has come, and perhaps it is not too late on the eve of the budget, to urge with all the sincerity at our command, that this government look to itself before it takes more money out of the pockets of the people of Ontario.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, the only years in which we do not have taxes filed upon us are those immediately preceding an election, and, of course, the year that the good premier first took office.

This year, again, we are faced with the prospect of tax increases, and I ask the Premier if it has ever occurred to him that a little house cleaning might turn up the odd million.

For example, how much of the taxpayers' money has been wasted on the Confederation of Tomorrow booklets resting on the fourth floor, carton piled upon carton, both in English and French, that he does not know what to do with; or the 7,000 copies of the economic report that were never distributed—that was even indecent enough to draw the attention of the Provincial Auditor. Our Provincial Auditor really has not been noted over the past years for drawing too much attention to government extravagance, but he did comment on that one.

And that Tory headache, Mr. Speaker, the Centennial Centre of Science Technology. I do not know what the Minister of Public Works is going to tell us when his estimates come along—the last time his arithmetic was not so good—but it was obvious that the price had moved from $5 million to $30 million at last count. The government has no idea how these things work, no control over costs. It is small wonder that we face financial chaos and a fiscal nightmare.

How about a real economy drive? In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any doubt that that Cabinet over there is far too large. There are 23 of them heading as many departments, which duplicate, in fact, sometimes triplicate services. Surely this is the height of economic inefficiency.

I noted that President Nixon, the new president of the United States, appointed a cabinet of only 12 men. If he is able to govern that country of some 250,000,000 people with a cabinet of 12 men, one wonders, Mr. Speaker, why we need 23 of those fellows over there.

Then, Mr. Speaker, we have a peculiar breed of cat amongst those 23.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, we have this peculiar breed of cat, the Minister without Portfolio. I have yet to hear the Premier or either of his Ministers without Portfolio designate what their responsibilities are. It is very nice to have them about, to have them in private offices. One of them, Mr. Speaker, even now has an executive assistant. Can somebody please tell me what an executive assistant does for a Minister who has no duties at all? Surely, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to do something about our fiscal nightmare the government must look to itself.

Mr. Speaker, in The Departments of Highways and Transport we have the most obvious waste. The government could certainly save a substantial sum of money by amalgamating these two as they once were, and provide a much more efficient and satisfactory service.

Besides, as we sit in the House we wonder why we need a Minister of Transport when his superiors will not let him do anything. He makes no decisions. All the important decisions are made in Highways or Treasury and the Minister. All he has to do is make comments about why he does not have vehicle inspection. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is the sort of reform that should be brought about.

The information branch of The Department of Education estimates its expenditures at $386,000. What do we see for that? How many useless brochures cross the desks of our teachers briefly, on the way to the wastepaper basket? What was the last estimate given to us by the Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) that his report cost $4 a copy to distribute? Surely even the words of that worthy Minister are not worth that much in expenditure on thick paper, fancy artwork, expensive printing to distribute throughout the province of Ontario. Either the quality of the publication should improve, or the practice should be dropped.

Radio broadcasts cost $65,000, and who do they get to? Have we ever heard a justification for that expenditure? We spent $25,000, one tenth of the operating costs of Lakehead Teachers' College, in recruiting teachers from other countries.

Mr. Speaker, what about the horrible cattle market of teachers that just went on a few days ago. The hundreds of thousands of dollars wasted in newspaper advertising because it does not lie within the ingenuity of the people who sit on the Treasury benches to work out a better scheme of allocating teachers to new jobs.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, there are so many avenues that could, should and must be explored whereby economies could be effected in this government. It makes one shudder to think that tomorrow, we are going to get another tax raise.

What about the central purchasing system that was supposed to be set up? You will recall with me, Mr. Speaker, the interesting article that appeared in the Financial Times a few months ago. It has been referred to in the House. I have yet to hear any denial coming from the Provincial Treasurer saying that the article was wrong, or that the system is working properly or an admission that it has failed because of the petty jealousies existing amongst the various Cabinet Ministers who will not allow a central purchasing system to work.

Mr. Speaker, we are just not convinced that those people who are Canadians and who live in Ontario are getting their money's worth. They are finding it harder and harder to live and to pay the taxes that are being levied by all levels of government. It is with a feeling, Mr. Speaker, of complete frustration that we must look forward to tomorrow's Budget. Our people are going to take it on the chin once again and this government just does not give a hoot. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to the amendment moved by my leader, which reads this way:

That the motion for an address in reply to the Speech of the Honourable, the Lieutenant-Governor now before the House, be amended by adding thereto the following words: That this House regrets that the government:

1. Has failed to conduct the province's financial affairs responsibly and neglected to cause an independent and all-embracing study of its programmes and administrative procedures to be made.

2. Has failed to protect tenants' rights and to insure adequate housing for the people of Ontario at a fair price, including a system of permissive rent control.

3. Has neglected the proper development of the northern part of the province of Ontario, and by the lack of a sound policy toward the north and its natural resources, the government has thereby failed to promote the economic well-being and prosperity of all the people of Ontario.

4. Has failed to provide educational opportunity, facilities, and financing to insure that all Ontario students have an equal access to our educational institutions, and has failed to develop an effective policy to meet the unrest on our university campuses.

5. Has failed to provide suitable programmes which allow our agricultural community to realize their fair share of the benefits available to other segments of our economy.

6. Has, by its inaction, allowed the pollution of air, water, and land to worsen.

7. Has failed to insure equal access to proper medical care for all our people.

8. Has failed to plan for the proper economic development of our province.

9. Has failed to bring about meaningful reform to our ancient and inefficient system of municipal government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would urge all members of this House to support this resolution. This amendment may be the last chance for you fellows over there to do something for the people of Ontario.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I must advise you that we will be unable to support the amendment to the amendment as was expected and was deliberately designed because we just cannot buy the last paragraph about the federal Liberal fiscal policies which will result in the dismembering of the Canadian nation.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Now, Mr. Speaker, if they had merely said, we do not like the fiscal policies of the federal government, we might have agreed with them. But, I do not believe and I do not think any one of them really believes, Mr. Speaker, that this is going to lead to the dismembering of Canada as a nation. In fact, we have in Ottawa, a government that will keep Canada together. I wish we had one in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, what a weird, wild and woolly world is that inhabited by the NDP members of this Legislature. And, what a curious contrast it offers to the quagmire occupied by the timorous beasties who call themselves Liberals here in Ontario.

But before I go into details to substantiate these allegations, let me congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on the progress which you have initiated in the rules and procedures and the effectiveness of this Chamber and indeed, of its committees. And let me thank you, sir, for the services of your office and for the stature, character and very fine attributes which you bring to this high position and which contribute so much to the effectiveness of the work of the Parliament of Ontario.

Let me congratulate also, the member for Waterloo South (Mr. Reuter) on his re-election as deputy Speaker and let me say, to him also, how much we appreciate the fairness and firmness that he brings to debates in committee.

Now I would like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. These fine members are a credit to their area, an ornament in fact, to the public life of Ontario. They have set forth in some detail, the progress which we have made and the progress which we can expect in the years to come.

Now in the woolly world of the NDP, we find these incredible, unbelievable situations. We find the poorest attender in this legislative Chamber, the member for Scarborough West, taking three quarters of an hour to demand more power, to demand more prestige and to demand more pay while he takes the hard-earned tax funds of the people of this province and spends his time trying to be the hero of Mount Royal, flitting here and there like Peter Pan all over the world and ignoring those serious responsibilities for which he was elected to this Chamber.

We see the white knight, the personification of all virtue, the member for High Park, maximizing for his own profit, ignoring ethical and moral considerations time and time again for personal profit. The most damnable of these instances, and the only one I will deal with now, is the fact that he sold the Canadian dollar short when that dollar was under pressure. He sold the Canadian dollar short and yes, bragged about it on the Merv Griffin Show and explained what he had done and urged other people to do it. Yes, most traitorous and most—

Mr. Pilkey: What about the money from West Germany?

Hon. Mr. White: —unfitting, despicable for any citizen and certainly for any legislator to do.

We find the social welfare prophet, the member for Beaches-Woodbine, restructuring his corporate organization and refining his subsidiaries to maximize his profit and to minimize the chance of loss.

Mr. Pilkey: The Minister opposes the profit system?

Hon. Mr. White: In this never-never land called socialism, in the never-never land of the NDP, we find the deputy leader calling the leader, was it Hitler, did he say that? Did he call him a Hitler? Did he say in a sneering fashion he was Messiah? Did he say that? Did he say he was a tool of the union bosses?

An hon. member: That is right.

Hon. Mr. White: A tool of the union bosses—did he say that he lacked the will to win—

Mr. J. Renwick: You are confused—

Hon. Mr. White: And so we have these strange beasts out of the never-never world—

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Now the Minister has got his beasts confused.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): Aberrations.

Hon. Mr. White: Oh yes, that is right. My colleague, the Minister of Mines, says, "aberrations". We have these strange aberrations emanating from the never-never land of the NDP.

Now, what do we find in that quaint quagmire called Ontario liberalism?

Mr. Sopha: Virtuous and outstanding.

Hon. Mr. White: We find the deputy leader from Sudbury calling a special press conference, was it only a year ago, to condemn Mr. Trudeau.

Mr. Sopha: It did not hurt him very much.

Hon. Mr. White: And now, my friends, we witness the incongruous spectacle of seeing that same member, the leader of the "Ready, Aye Ready" school, here in this Chamber so that every time the Ottawa Liberals suggest thus and so, the member for Sudbury says, "Ready, Aye Ready." He springs to attention and says, "Ready, Aye Ready."

I must admit that we were very satisfied and very well pleased, Mr. Speaker, to have the Liberals meet in convention in London a couple of weeks ago, at which time they tried to come into the 20th century. They had a large clinic to which were invited several hundred thousand people in that county. I am very glad to be able to report to you, sir, that that offer was well used, because five citizens from 300,000 came out to register complaints or to make suggestions.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: That is what you call vested interest.

Mr. Pilkey: They could have held it in a telephone booth.

Hon. Mr. White: This was a very helpful service to me because as the hon. members may know I have had a clinic in London for eight and a half years. I have had more than 400 such meetings and I have served more than 5,000 citizens.

Mr. Nixon: Those were the days when you never came to the Legislature.

Hon. Mr. White: On an average day I got 20 or 30 people and it was really most interesting that you were able to get five.

Mr. Nixon: The Minister was handling two ridings then.

Hon. Mr. White: Let me mention a curious incident that took place here a week or two ago.

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): The Minister showed up!

Hon. Mr. White: The member for Sudbury got up and scolded our Premier and scolded our government and had a small temper tantrum because of the space he had been allocated on the first floor. And did the leader of the government have anything to do with that? No, sir, he did not. And did the government itself have anything to do with that? No, sir, they did not. Did the leader of the Opposition plan that move? Yes, he did. But did he 'fess up, and say to the member for Sudbury who sits on his left, "That is my doing?" No, he let the member hurl his complaints and insults at this side of the House.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. White: But I do not want to belabour that point, as a matter of fact, because the leader of the Liberal Party has many troubles within his own caucus, and many troubles within his own party. I think it is not fitting that I should contribute to those difficulties.

I have been in here ten years and I have witnessed four changes of leadership, I think it is, which is an average of about two and a half years per leader, and I think that would mean the incumbent's time is just about up. I think so. As evidence of that fact I hold in my hand, a newspaper entitled the Scarborough Mirror of February 19, that is a week ago Wednesday. The heading is "That is no lady, that is our Premier" I would like to quote a couple of more meaningful portions:

The president of the Scarborough Centre provincial Liberals said, "It is either that or the premiership." Mr. Martin says, "You can't have it both ways." Then he adds, "It is an exciting idea, isn't it, a lady Premier." He hastens to explain, "Of course, Judy is no lady as she herself claims. She is a politician first, last and always."

Scarborough Liberals admit Judy did not say yes and she didn't say no. She didn't even say maybe, but she batted her eyelids and everyone is excited. That is charisma for you, just like Trudeau.

"Poor old Bob Nixon," the LaMarsh-Yump group says. "He has pulled the Ontario Liberal Party together, but who has ever heard of him outside of his cleaning lady at Queen's Park."

"There is a story going around," Mr. Martin says, "about the Canadian from a foreign land, Etobicoke maybe, who was asked what he thought of Nixon. "I figure he'll make a good president if they give him a chance," the man said.

That could spell disaster for the Liberal Party in the next election, Mr. Martin claims, and the Scarborough Yump group sincerely believes that Judy spells la difference.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me mention briefly the interesting and stimulating experience that 13 of us had this summer. You recall that this Legislature established the select committee on taxation at the end of May, 1968. Early in June, we started a series of meetings that took us to 12 cities in Ontario which enabled us to receive 117 delegations and 357 briefs, if I remember correctly, with the result that we turned in a report on September 17 as we were required to do.

Now, sir, I have to tell you in absolute seriousness that that was a most remarkable summer, I think I can say for all of us. We put aside our partisanship, at least until the final week or two of the exercise. We travelled together from place to place through the north country in a chartered aircraft, and through southern Ontario east and west in a chartered bus.

I remember my wife saying to me—I think this was early September—"My, this has been a warm summer" and I had to say well I do not know, that is news to me, is it? We had gone from the bus into a city hall, and from the city hall into a motel, and from the motel back on the road. I had compared it in private conversation with no experience of being on a ship in war time, and that is the kind of camaraderie we did develop.

I must say that I have tremendous affection and respect for members from both sides of the House that participated in that gruelling summer. I think the member for Ottawa said it was the long-hot summer.

Now, those recommendations as distilled by the select committee will form the foundation for tax reform in Ontario, no doubt. It would be inappropriate for me to speculate about the nature of the Treasurer's presentation tomorrow, but I hope and expect that those of us who spent that summer together can look back on those endeavours with a feeling of satisfaction and accomplishment on behalf of all of the people of this province.

I think it would have been better if the Liberal caucus and the NDP caucus had not jumped in in a partisan way in the last couple of weeks.

Mr. MacDonald: How about the Tory caucus?

Hon. Mr. White: No, the Tory caucus had absolutely nothing to do with that report—not a single word of direction was given by the Tory caucus or its leadership.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. White: I do not want to overstate the point because perhaps it was fitting that that should happen, although I must say it came as a surprise, not only to me but to some members of the opposite parties. It came as a little bit of a surprise, a little bit of a disappointment, that that partisan tack was taken. But as I say, sir, perhaps it is most appropriate that these recommendations go through the cauldron of partisan debate.

I would like to turn to the Throne Speech for a minute or two but before I do that, Mr. Speaker, and in summing up my very slight and inadequate tribute to the members of the select committee, I would like to quote a little passage from the Saturday Review of November, 1968, in which Robert Macnamara was interviewed at some length on a variety of matters.

The final question was this: why have you never tried to become a politician? Mr. Macnamara replied:

The word politician means, according to the dictionary, one actively engaged in conducting the business of government. Well, I was actively engaged in conducting the business of 50 per cent of the U.S.

government because the Defence Department, with some 4.5 million employees, and 10 per cent of the gross national product, was obviously in the business of government.

I think what people frequently do is to consider the word "politician" synonymous with the words "elected official".

This is the part I want to draw to your attention:

I have immense admiration for those who do. I think in a sense it is the highest form of political activity because it is the means of translating the diverse interests of our people into some movement toward a common goal. It is a very intricate process and requires skills of the highest type. I think if I had my life to live over again I might well want to pursue that course.

That is the way I feel about the members of that committee and that is why I am so saddened when I hear the member for Beaches-Woodbine, or the member for Scarborough West, criticize the members of this Chamber, and try to destroy the orderly, democratic, process as they do in this place and outside of it.

On the Throne Speech, Mr. Speaker, we set forth a 25-point programme for this legislative session. It is another chapter in an endless series describing Ontario's progress. We are building here a place where a person can do what he wants to do and be what he wants to be. We are pursuing this goal with a great deal of success.

I am thinking now in economic terms on the one hand and legislative terms on the other. I am thinking now of the economic progress, the strides we have made towards equity through OMSIP. What is wrong with it? I have not had a single letter saying to switch off. What is wrong with OMSIP? Who wants anything different? In point of fact, nobody except the opposition members and that is for a purely partisan reason.

Mr. Pitman: The Minister must be kidding!

Hon. Mr. Grossman: If they go out and ask for letters they will get them.

Hon. Mr. White: What is wrong with OMSIP? If you can pay for it, you pay for it. If you cannot pay for it you get it free. If an employee group over the bargaining table want to switch off a private carrier into OMSIP they can do so. What is wrong with that? If General Motors workers have 100 per cent of their premium paid for through their private carrier, why should they be forced into a government plan with the employees paying part?

Mr. J. Jessiman (Fort William): How about that, hon. member for Oshawa?

Hon. Mr. White: Do the people in Oshawa really want that change made. I do not think so. Now on this point, sir, there is some political, philosophical confusion. The day before the election in the United States, I think it was November 3, James Reston had a column in the New York Times reprinted in one of the Ontario papers, in which he said:

When the people go to the polls tomorrow they will be testing two democratic precepts. The first of the two is that people vote not because of past accomplishments, but because of future possibilities.

Point No. 2—they will go and elect the man not on the basis of the issues he has defined, which is simply symptomatic of the man and the party, but on the basis of the character of the leaders who are offering themselves.

I think this is an interesting and valid comment. And if one accepts that proposition, then one is driven to the conclusion that the vote in June, 1968, was not a vote for Medicare, and that the vote in October, 1967, was not a vote against Medicare.

Mr. MacDonald: Is that the Minister's rationalization?

Hon. Mr. White: Well, how do you explain it then? Why did the people vote in 1967 quite differently from a few months later? In spite of that they were not voting for or against Medicare. They were voting for us, the men. They were voting for the Premier of Ontario to lead this House in an appropriate fashion for the future. I see ourselves in no way bound by the results of the June election or the results of the October election, because these were not paramount issues in either of those campaigns.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, I have a very lengthy portion here dealing with efficiency in government which I think will be of interest to the members and which I propose to defer until a later date, perhaps during the Budget Debate. If you will give me just a moment I will reorganize my papers here.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend a minute or two on the idea of government revenues and the idea of the cost of these revenues imposed on the citizenry. There is quite a lot of fuzzy thinking on the subject.

It is typified by this newspaper heading in the Sudbury Star: "Income tax lament: Work for nothing first four months." The member for Peterborough will know what I am getting at, because he hinted at it earlier this evening.

Mr. MacDonald: They get more from those first four months' payments than from all their other taxes.

Hon. Mr. White: What kind of a country would this be without public services? What kind of an income would this typical worker have if it were not for the highways and the schools and the hospitals and the thousand and one public services provided by the province and the other levels of government? I think, sir, that we do our society a grave disservice if we over-simplify this complicated matter and if we seek personal popularity by perpetuating the old cry that taxes are too high.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the existing tax structure presses with undue severity on certain classes of our population, and it can be said with some justification that the taxes are too high on those groups. At the same time it might be said the taxes are too low on other groups.

I remember seeing a CBS television broadcast a week ago Sunday, I think it was, on The 21st Century. It was a very interesting programme. It dealt with the future in the urban centres and it had a number of interesting clips from science fiction movies. Of course, it was full of weird and wonderful ideas and good-looking girls and handsome-looking men and so on. One clip was from the 1937 World's Fair in New York and it portrayed the world in 1967, if I remember correctly, 30 years later.

In that world which was portrayed in that futuristic movie of 1937, there were tall clean spires, beautiful architecture, housing, residences, offices, factories. There were wonderful parks and playgrounds for the children and for the adults. There were no slums. There was no pollution. There were no transportation difficulties in that wonderful world that imaginative men pictured 30 or 32 years ago.

What happened? My guess is that in the United States in particular, and to a much lesser extent here in Canada—and by the way this is not smugness because I am quoting

John Galbraith, J. K. Galbraith, who is certainly an American through and through now, notwithstanding his early days in Elgin. At any rate, it is possible that the authorities in North America taxed too little? Is it possible that we have too many—

Mr. MacDonald: The Minister is stealing our lines.

Hon. Mr. White:—consumer goods through the private sector and not enough services through the public sector?

Mr. MacDonald: The Minister is going to be thrown out of his department.

Hon. Mr. White: No, no, do not be so silly. I will remember that member's interjections when he goes around this province crying about high taxes, because he is one of the men who does it. And so do the Liberals.

At any rate, I am going to quote from Mr. Macnamara again. My colleague reminds me we heard the Liberals again tonight on it.

Now, here is what Macnamara had to say on that and it is interesting enough, I think, to quote:

People are worried by higher taxes—of course that is what is involved.

—but people mistakenly believe that an increase in taxes moves us toward bankruptcy. It does not have anything whatsoever to do with bankruptcy.

Taxation is a transfer device which governments use when they want to make a shift in priority. We ought to have an intelligent discussion in this country of what people want to do with our national wealth. Do we want to spend it on adding to our luxury goods, many of which we don't need, or on education for the poor, or elimination of pollution in our waters, or on aid to the developing nations of the world?

In the long run, these kinds of expenditures will add far more to our personal happiness and self-fulfilment than will expenditures on luxury goods. But this is an issue for the people to face. All I ask is that they face it directly.

That is the challenge that I put to my colleagues on this side of the House and indeed to the members of the Opposition.

Interjections by many hon. members.

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker,—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Hon. members opposite may not believe it, but they did not invent thinking.

Hon. Mr. White: The prospect has been raised here by one, or several members, of having a committee of legislators to consider constitutional matters. I will not deal at length with this proposition except to say that the Premier has agreed with the merit of the idea and has wondered how it might best be utilized or what precise function it might have.

I call attention to the Globe and Mail of a couple of weeks ago—I am sorry I do not have the date—in which Mr. Trudeau dealt with the same rather perplexing idea at the federal level. Mr. Trudeau said:

I think I am inclined to agree with the Rt. Hon. member for Prince Albert. I would hope that this question may be raised in various Legislatures across the country. I do not think I would venture to answer the question, but I can say that if we do set up a parliamentary committee, I suppose it would deal in part with subjects which are of provincial and federal interest and the question might arise as to whether we are interfering with provincial affairs. I would hope that this would not be the interpretation and that such a committee could, if necessary, travel across the country. But it is a delicate subject and might require the kind of consultation which the leader of the New Democratic Party has suggested.

It is a delicate subject, Mr. Speaker, and that is the reason for the caution and the thought that is being given to it.

Reading history about the early days of this country and more particularly about the events which preceded 1867, I am quite intrigued by the idea of legislators taking full part in the negotiations and discussions—and I might even say the camaraderie—which led to the climactic event of Confederation. I am wondering if we here now, in this more sophisticated and much larger and much more complicated governmental world in which we live, might not have the wit and the wisdom to find a role for larger numbers of politicians, for the legislators in this Chamber, and indeed, for municipal politicians also. It seems to me that our success in the future is going to depend on rationalizing the present system so far as revenues and responsibilities are concerned.

This is going to be—I will not say an almost impossible job—a very, very difficult job. It is going to depend very largely on the education which is garnered by the legislators and municipal politicians and the federal politicians, too. I do not know, but it seems to me that something not unlike the select committee we had last year might be a way to approach the idea. It is my understanding in the province of Quebec they have had a constitution committee. My surmise is that they had some expert staff on that committee and I have been informed that was one of the reasons why Quebec went to some of the earlier federal-provincial conferences so well prepared. I think it behooves us here in this chamber, all of us I mean, to try to devise a way in which the talents and the energies and the dedication of our legislative members can be best used.

Mr. Speaker, this very interesting little booklet, "Government Reform in Ontario", deals with the problem which citizens have in attempting to assign responsibility and in attempting to seek redress from the appropriate politician. This is one of the large number of reasons why we should try to rationalize this division of responsibilities in revenues. That is why, if I may say so, it is so unfair for anyone to suggest to the provincial Premier that the idea of fiscal rationalization is in some way inferior.

It is an inextricable part of the re-apportioning of powers and revenues. It is absolutely impossible for one to proceed without the other, and I think it is cheap politics to suggest that the fiscal side is being introduced for inferior reasons of any kind.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, I am going to bring my remarks to a close here with some reluctance, but I will put a portion into the Confederation debate and a portion into the Budget Debate and thereby hope to edify members of the Opposition.

The amendments, Mr. Speaker, which have been offered by the Liberal leader and by the NDP leader, are an affront to the energy, ability, enthusiasm and performance of the people of this province. They have been framed by men of little faith, unaware of the progress our people have already achieved and blind their potential for even greater achievements in the decade ahead.

We say to you—discard your partisan blinkers, reject these amendments, awaken to the reality that is Ontario 1969—and our possibilities for growth and development in the decade ahead. Stand with the Progressive Conservative government. Stand with our Prime Minister, a leader who knows what the people of this province can accomplish, a leader who looks forward and upward for the greater progress of this province. Stand with us now as we stand and cast our vote for Ontario, as we vote for Ontario, its people and its future.

Mr. Speaker: The debate on the Speech from the Throne being now concluded, we shall vote on the original resolution and the amendments which I shall now read:

Mr. Belanger moved, seconded by Mr. Jessiman, that a humble address be presented to the Honourable W. Ross Macdonald, PC, CD, QC, LL.D., Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Ontario:

May it please Your Honour, we, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects in the legislative assembly of the province of Ontario now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech which Your Honour has addressed to us.

Mr. Nixon moved, seconded by Mr. Singer, the following amendment in reply to the Speech from the Throne, namely:

That this House regrets that the government:

1. Has failed to conduct the province's financial affairs responsibly and neglected to cause an independent and all-embracing study of its programmes and administrative procedures to be made;

2. Has failed to protect tenants' rights and to insure adequate housing for the people of Ontario at a fair price, including a system of permissive rent control;

Now, there has been a great deal of disturbance tonight, and I would appreciate you giving the chair the opportunity to put the motions before you as they have been made on both sides of the House.

3. Has neglected the proper development of the northern part of the province of Ontario, and by the lack of a sound policy toward the north and its natural resources, the government has thereby failed to promote the economic well-being and prosperity of all the people of Ontario;

4. Has failed to provide educational opportunity, facilities, and financing to insure that all Ontario students have an equal access to our educational institutions, and has failed to develop an effective policy to meet the unrest on our university campuses;

5. Has failed to provide suitable programmes which would allow our agricultural community to realize their fair share of the benefits available to other segments of our economy;

6. Has, by its inaction, allowed the pollution of air, water, and land to worsen;

- 7. Has failed to insure equal access to proper medical care for all our people;
- 8. Has failed to plan for the proper economic development of our province;
- 9. Has failed to bring about meaningful reform to our ancient and inefficient system of municipal government and, therefore, that your government does not enjoy the confidence of this House.

Mr. MacDonald moved, seconded by Mr. Renwick, that the amendment be further amended by adding after the words "inefficient system of municipal government" the following words:

- 10. has failed to alter the existing structure of power and wealth in our society, and to use the full powers and resources of a modern state, to
 - (a) affirm housing as a basic right, and assist this by channelling corporate surpluses and investment funds into a major, government-directed housing programme;
 - (b) establish a universal, public car insurance programme at cost, based on compensation without fault;
 - (c) set out a realistic charter for hundreds of thousands of unorganized workers, including a minimum wage of $2.25 an hour and proper overtime and holiday provisions, and laws which will facilitate organization and collective bargaining;
 - (d) set up a public development corporation to undertake policies aimed at increasing Canadian ownership of Ontario industry;
 - (e) solve the financial impasse by radical reform of the tax system, including a tax on capital gains and land speculation.
- 11. has failed to express adequate condemnation of those federal Liberal fiscal policies which will result in dismembering the Canadian nation.

I declare the original motion moved by Mr. Belanger carried. 61

Resolved, that a humble address be presented to the Honourable W. Ross Macdonald, Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Ontario:

May it please Your Honour, we, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects of the legislative assembly of the province of Ontario now assembled, beg leave to thank Your Honour for the gracious speech Your Honour has addressed to us.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow the Budget will be introduced to the House. May I point out to the members that this will be televised and we are all slaves to the medium. The bells will start to ring at 2:20 in order that we may make a time commitment. We would like to open the House on time, so that the bells will go perhaps five minutes earlier than usual. May I ask that the members assemble with dispatch.

When the Budget is completed, we will resume the constitutional debate which will run through Wednesday. Then tomorrow, I hope to be able to give you a list of the departmental estimates in the order in which the first few departments will be called and we will go to estimates on Thursday.

We will sit tomorrow night, of course, and Thursday night.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Premier, is it not his intention then to go to the order paper otherwise this week?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, not at least tomorrow. If there is legislation that needs to be dealt with on Wednesday, I will so inform the House tomorrow.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): The estimates for Thursday, has that been designated?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: The first estimate to be called will be The Department of the Treasury and Economics. That will be called on Thursday, but I will give a list of several tomorrow.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Will the Prime Minister, perhaps, be going to the question period and other material before the orders of the day after the Budget address?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes. We will start with the Budget, as soon as we assemble. When the Treasurer is finished with his presentation, we will revert to orders of the day.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): The questions are after the commercials. Why do I have to order my affairs to suit the television people? It is an invasion of my rights.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, the member might consult with his leader; this was done by agreement.

Mr. Speaker, I will tell you quite frankly this is an experiment, and if it proves to be distasteful to the members it will never be done again. But at least we thought we might try it. We have some real reactionaries here; maybe they do not want to try anything new.

But if it is the opinion of the House after we have tried this that it is distasteful to the members, then of course, we will not do it again.

An hon. member: We will let the member for Sudbury do the commercial.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! May I elaborate on what the Prime Minister has said, that it would be helpful if we could open slightly before 2:30 tomorrow afternoon. I would ask the co-operation of the members.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 12:00 o'clock, midnight.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 4, 1969

The House met at 2.30 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have here a message from the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor, signed by his own hand.

Mr. Speaker: By his own hand, W. R. Macdonald, the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor, transmits estimates of certain sums required for the services of the province for the year ending May 31, 1970, and recommends them to the legislative assembly, Toronto, March 4, 1969.

Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 20th order. House in committee of ways and means.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton moves that Mr. Speaker, do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

BUDGET ADDRESS

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario of the 1970's stands before us in a splendid array of opportunity and challenge. Although man will probably be on the moon by the time we enter that decade, we must continue to seek a good life on the earth. There is surely no part of this planet that offers more and, for that very reason, demands more responsible preparation than Ontario. Governments must, at all times, pioneer a pathway for the people. To a large degree, the engineering plan for that pathway is the government's budget. A modern budget is not simply a bookkeeping statement or a testimony to financial management. It is a deliberate instrument of social and economic guidance; it is part of the very fabric of our society and economy.

Consequently, the budget requires deliberate timing, careful selection of and balance among objectives and, above all, purposeful planning on a long-term basis. The placing of a man on the moon is a triumph of technology; the planning of a social and economic environment requires equal skill and firm judgment. Such is the underlying quality which we are seeking in our budgetary and fiscal policy as we prepare for the Ontario of the 1970's.

Nor is this an easy task as demonstrated by one particular issue. In recent years, we have been confronted in the development of public policy with a growing dilemma. I refer to the conflict between the need to provide the public services and facilities required by our society and the difficult problem of containing the tax burden in the face of increasingly restricted revenue-raising capacity. Consequently, I am daily aware of two constant refrains from my critics: those who claim that we spend too much and those who claim that we spend too little. Both cannot be served and I know that the citizens of this province will recognize the importance of maintaining a deliberate balance.

The low growth capacity of our revenues obliges us to finance essential increases in expenditures with successive increases in tax rates and a continual widening of the tax base. In the long run, an accumulation of ad hoc changes of this kind, without reference to a co-ordinated fiscal framework, runs the risk of overloading the tax system and making it economically punitive and socially burdensome. Up to the present time, it has been possible to raise revenues at the provincial level without serious economic and social effects. But, at the municipal level, the pressure to provide essential services has already led to disturbing increases and distortions in property taxation.

In planning our fiscal structure for the 1970's we have drawn on the considerable body of research undertaken in Ontario over the past six years. I refer, of course, to the impressive work done by the Ontario committee on taxation and the select committee of the Legislature on the report of the Ontario committee on taxation. The reports of these two committees provided a substantial basis for reform. During the summer and fall of 1968, the Smith and select committees' reports were studied intensively by a task force in The Department of Treasury and Economics, which worked particularly closely with the staffs of The Department of Revenue and The Department of Municipal Affairs. This task force delineated the Smith and select committees' recommendations in terms of their implications for provincial-municipal finance and operations. The task force then provided a comprehensive range of policy options for review by the government.

We are now prepared for decisive action in the best interests of the Ontario taxpayer. This budget has been specifically designed as a "Fiscal Framework for the Future"; it is a two-part plan to lay the foundations for a modernization of the public finance system in Ontario. First, it provides a budgetary basis for 1969-1970 with emphasis on the continuation of essential provincial services and municipal aid within the limits of our immediate financial manoeuvrability. The first and foremost stage in a programme of fiscal reform must be the containment of expenditures. The only way to arrest growing tax burdens and to relieve the pressure on the province's tax system and debt-raising capacity is to arrest the growth in total public spending. I can assure you that this objective has been pursued rigorously, although not, I trust, slavishly in this Budget.

The second part of the budgetary plan involves a blueprint for a longer-term programme of basic reform in provincial-municipal taxation and finance. The guiding principles are contained in Budget paper B, which is the white paper on our intentions in this area as promised to the people of this province. Simply stated, the broad objective is to provide a more equitable and viable financial basis for the development of provincial and municipal operations in future years. Concrete measures will be taken to integrate provincial-municipal tax systems and to permit a more measured and systematic control of the level and distribution of tax burdens. A series of measures will also be advanced to strengthen and modernize the financial and functional structure of the municipal sector of the Ontario governmental scene. Because of the central importance of this fiscal reform programme to the development of public policy in Ontario over the next few years, I propose to read Budget paper B immediately following my Budget statement on our expenditure and finance plans for the fiscal year 1969-1970.

According to the technique of presentation introduced in 1967, this Budget statement is supported by two other Budget papers. Budget paper A contains a review of the Ontario economy in 1968 and an evaluation of Ontario's economic prospects for 1969 as a basis for determining the appropriate form of our fiscal policy. Budget paper C presents the government's financial statements. These statements contain some additional refinements to the developing format which we have introduced over the course of the past year.

I should first like to review the financial operations of our government during the 1968-69 fiscal year. Although the results of this fiscal year are not yet complete, we are confident that our expenditure guidelines and restraint policies will result in our final expenditures falling somewhat below the total spending estimates presented in last year's Budget. At this stage, however, we are obliged to present our 1968-69 financial picture on the basis of eight months' actual spending and revenue, along with forecasts for the remaining four months as presented by individual departments and agencies. In recognition of this limitation, The Department of Treasury and Economics is preparing to introduce new and more sophisticated accounting practices throughout the government to ensure an immediate flow of financial data to the department. This should provide a continuing profile of the current financial situation and clearer guidance for cash management and investment decisions. Meanwhile, details on the estimates and our present performance for the current year are contained in Budget paper C.

The performance of the economy surpassed my expectations at the time of the 1968 Budget and our revenues clearly reflect this buoyancy. Although the federal government is expected to reduce payments under the income tax collection agreement by some $22 million as the result of an over-payment in 1967-68, our total net general revenues for the year are estimated at $2,520 million, compared with our forecast of $2,505 million in the last Budget statement.

Net general expenditures, on the basis of our present information, are expected to reach about $2,787 million compared with the 1968-69 estimate of $2,780 million. As a result, our budgetary deficit in 1968-69 should amount to approximately $267 million. This substantial deficit, notwithstanding restraint and extensive review of all government programmes, clearly illustrates the problems facing this province in its attempt to meet existing priorities and to provide relief to local governments.

In recent years, our non-budgetary transactions have been an important factor in helping us to finance budgetary deficits, largely because of the investment funds which we borrow, through debentures, from the proceeds of the Canada Pension Plan. In 1968-69, we estimate the surplus on non-budgetary transactions at almost $182 million. We can anticipate a net cash deficit of approximately $149 million compared with our forecast deficit last year of $252 million. As you know, we have been very successful in establishing a first-rate credit standing in the European capital market. As a result, we have met our financing requirements, exclusive of debt retirement, at highly favourable rates and terms in West Germany, while employing our liquid reserves to redeem the major portion of our maturing debt.

The overall result of these financial operations will have the effect of raising our net capital debt by the end of the current fiscal year to $1,718 million. This level of debt remains well within the financial capacity of this province; in fact, it could be retired with only eight months' revenue and represents a per capita debt of only $231.

In laying the groundwork for our fiscal framework for the future, I wish to discuss two factors which have been important in determining the form of our budgetary plan for 1969-70 and our long-term framework for fiscal reform: first, recent developments in federal-provincial financial relations that set the larger governmental framework within which we must work; and second, anticipated economic developments that dictate the speed and manner in which we can move towards our objectives because of the need to exert positive influence on economic activity generally.

Federal-provincial developments—You will recall that, in my last Budget statement, I devoted considerable attention to the need for securing a rational solution to the problem of federal-provincial tax sharing. The chronic imbalance in the distribution of tax capacity between the two levels of government, relative to the division of expenditure responsibilities, is well documented. I warned then that this misallocation of tax capacity must lead to intergovernmental fiscal discord and a breakdown of the Canadian tax structure, characterized by tax competition, uncoordinated tax pyramiding and increasingly oppressive methods of taxation, particularly in the form of rising municipal property tax levels. Consequently, I stressed the need for a constructive and fair-minded review of federal-provincial expenditure requirements and financial capacities, within a total framework of national priorities and taxation control, along the lines promised in the original terms of reference of the tax structure committee in 1964.

It is with considerable disappointment, therefore, that I must report that our efforts to obtain a sensible resolution of the tax-sharing problem have gone unrewarded. At the meetings of Ministers of Finance in November and December, 1968, and during the Constitutional conference in February of this year, the federal government maintained its refusal to negotiate new tax-sharing arrangements. Indeed, its insistence that each level of government develop its own expenditure priorities and tax policies has been reinforced recently by a series of unilateral expenditure decisions and pre-emptory tax moves without regard for their broader intergovernmental and economic consequences.

Foremost among these moves was the social development tax, imposed in the federal Budget of October, 1968. This contravened the spirit of intergovernmental co-operation in two ways. First, direct application of the tax to the taxable income base effectively excluded the provinces from sharing the revenues under the terms of the existing tax collection agreement even though, by common understanding and convention, the personal income tax is a shared-tax field. Second, since the social development tax was clearly designed to finance the federal government's own share of medicare, it displayed a determination to implement federal priorities with little concern for provincial priorities and financial capacities. Indeed, since the social development tax is the equivalent of an average increase of nine per cent in personal income taxes, it becomes that much more difficult for the provinces to follow responsibly the federal invitation to raise their own income tax rates, either for the purpose of financing their share of medicare or for meeting the demand of high-priority expenditure requirements.

This absence of co-operation in taxation has been underlined by other developments. For example, the new federal proposals for the taxation of gifts have effects similar to the social development tax in unilaterally securing increased tax revenues from the income-stream area. The federal proposals for changes in The Estate Tax Act were made without consultation concerning the effects on provincial succession duties or without regard for provincial views on the most effective treatment of this jointly-occupied tax field. Moreover, the federal government's new taxes on insurance companies have effectively forestalled provincial moves in that area and have ignored the question of how corporate taxation should be developed by both levels of government in order to ensure the best possible economic effects. I might also add that, in respect of taxation reform generally, the provinces have not been apprised of other federal intentions despite the obvious need for intergovernmental consultation. Consequently, we welcome the federal government's decision to revert to the presentation of a white paper on tax reform, which is the practice we are following in Budget paper B.

Finally, the federal government's otherwise laudatory concern for budgetary restraint has resulted in reduction of payments under various shared-cost programmes without regard for the effects on provincial operations. Two examples are particularly important and illustrative. First, its drastic curtailment of funds for the construction of medical training facilities is at variance with the desire to enforce Medicare. Second, its decision to delay payments due to the provinces for costs already incurred under the vocational and technical training programmes is inconsistent with the spirit of shared-cost programmes.

I mention these developments, Mr. Speaker, not out of any feeling of rancour, but simply because of their significance for the manner in which we must now attend to the problems of public finance in Ontario. At federal-provincial conferences over the past three years, we have consistently maintained that the federal, provincial and municipal governments are merely parts of the total government sector, and that the orderly development of this sector depends on an integrated approach to taxation reform. Central to co-ordinated tax reform is the establishment of a viable basis of intergovernmental tax-sharing and agreement on a common set of expenditure priorities in order that total governmental resources may be rationed and applied with maximum economic and social benefit.

The fact that we have not been successful in establishing a basic federal-provincial framework within which we can rationalize provincial-municipal financial and operational structures does not diminish the necessity and urgency for reform within our own jurisdiction. However, the short-run budgetary plan and long-run fiscal reform programme, which I am outlining for you today, has been affected by two specific factors at the federal-provincial level. First, our inability to obtain a larger share of jointly occupied growth tax fields inevitably affects the speed and means by which we can move at the provincial-municipal level. For example, given the limited range of other tax fields available to us, it directly affects our ability to provide for long-term expenditure growth at the provincial level and to increase our aid to the municipalities. Secondly, although there has not been sufficient progress in federal-provincial relations, we are still responsible for arranging the pattern of provincial-municipal tax reforms in a way that is compatible with interprovincial tax harmony and that allows scope for eventual reform at the federal-provincial level.

For these reasons, we are deliberately putting forward our proposals for tax reform in a manner designed to provide the federal government with an opportunity for co-ordination and joint implementation. Our own objective is simply to serve the best interests of the Canadian and the Ontario taxpayer. Our earnest hope is for the co-operation of the federal government in a joint and major reconstruction of taxation along the lines which I shall propose. The recent decision to revive the tax structure committee, with an urgent mandate for tax reform, is a source of satisfaction to us, particularly in view of the strong support by the Prime Minister of Canada for review of the spending and taxing powers. Our own tax reform programme will be placed in that forum in a spirit of producing tax reform on an intergovernmental basis to meet the needs of taxpayers first and governments second.

The structure of our fiscal policies must be related to the economic environment. The Ontario economy, at the present time, is prosperous and expanding. Incomes are at record levels, unemployment is relatively low and we have only a modest amount of surplus productive capacity in our industrial system.

Last year, the Ontario economy grew by 8.7 per cent and reached a total output of $27.1 billion. However, price increases accounted for about 3.5 per cent out of the total 8.7 per cent expansion, and this inflationary pressure persisted into 1969. The major sources of growth last year were a notable acceleration in the demand for consumer goods and an extraordinary 50 per cent expansion in our exports of automobiles and parts to the United States. The housing sector picked up rapidly, and investments in new dwellings went ahead by nearly 18 per cent. Most sectors of demand in the economy expanded. The exception was investment by manufacturing and primary industries, which declined for the second year in a row. However, total private and public investment in Ontario still rose by 7 per cent. I am confident that the excess capacity in the industrial sector has been reduced sufficiently in recent months to prepare the way for a new round of investment by manufacturing industries.

Productivity began to rise again during 1968 after showing little change in 1967. Real output per person was up by 2.1 per cent, and this increase no doubt helped to offset some of the strong inflationary currents in the economy. Although the number of jobs rose by 85,000, the labour force rose by 100,000 with a resulting small increase in unemployment. This increase in the labour force amounted to a 3.5 per cent growth rate—one of the largest to be found anywhere among industrial nations. Although such a condition places a constant pressure on our investment resources, both public and private, it is encouraging to see that our provincial economy has been able to meet the larger part of this extraordinary growth in job requirements and that unemployment, although still higher than we would like, has remained relatively low.

This year I am forecasting a further expansion in the provincial economy. Gross provincial product should rise by 7.8 per cent to reach a record level of $29.2 billion. The volume of goods and services produced should increase by about 4.5 per cent, and we can expect that inflationary pressures will ease, if only slightly, dropping from last year's 3.5 per cent to 3.3 per cent. Per capita personal income is expected to rise from $2,800 to just under $3,000, a growth of 6.6 per cent, and there will be a small decrease in the level of unemployment as job opportunities increase by 105,000.

In the investment sector, there is every possibility that manufacturing investment will pick up again and show a considerable improvement over last year. In housing, we can look forward to gains in outlays of about 10 per cent. The public sector will probably not be as buoyant this year in its investment requirements, mainly because of the constraints imposed by governments to bring their revenues and expenditures into line. In total, however, these events will make for a more balanced growth in investment, with more emphasis on the private and less emphasis on the public sector. The outlook for productivity is reasonably encouraging although we cannot expect to repeat last year's gain of 2.1 per cent. Output per employed person will rise by about 0.8 per cent and, if the line can be held on prices, this should help to improve our competitive position in foreign markets.

Despite this healthy condition, there are some serious financial and monetary problems in the economy, which render it particularly sensitive to expansionary spending and tax politics by any of the three levels of government. Two of the most critical problems facing us today are the pressure of serious distortions and shortages in the country's capital markets, and the persistent and eroding force of inflation.

These facts are closely interrelated. As in the past, there are serious obstacles to provincial and municipal governments wishing to float new bond issues in the Canadian capital market. International and domestic monetary conditions have pushed up interest rates. These have fluctuated to such an extent, in response to various crises, that an atmosphere of great uncertainty has prevailed concerning bond prices and yields. To this uncertainty has been added the decline of investor confidence in long-term, fixed-income investments in an inflationary climate.

In Ontario, we have been successful in finding new capital markets abroad and we intend to continue this policy as the need arises, both for our own purposes and for the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission. By doing so, we will continue to relieve the pressure on domestic capital supplies and make room for other governments and private corporations. I should mention, in particular, that the development of power—so vital to the economy of Ontario—will involve massive capital financing by Ontario Hydro throughout the next decade.

There is little evidence that higher interest rates have significantly raised the level of net personal savings. In fact, at the same time as our capital markets have been drying up, institutional innovations have allowed consumers to acquire record levels of credit for personal consumption. This factor must be acknowledged as one of the many adverse pressures on interest rates and on the supply of capital available for investment purposes. This inflationary propensity has, of course, been reinforced by the continuing rise in wage and salary rates in both the private and public sectors of the economy.

The origins of inflation at the present time are complex and diffuse. There is no indication of any real shortage of productive facilities, despite shortages of certain social services and housing which tend to force up market prices. Recent price gains appear to have contained many elements of cost pressure, such as higher interest rates, wages and salaries, profit levels, import prices, and changes in the levels of various indirect taxes. However, when inflation persists for long periods of time, there is a real risk that it will become psychologically institutionalized, and based on an erosion of monetary and financial confidence rather than on economic fact.

Expenditure and taxation policies in this Budget have been designed in the face of two factors. The first is the deadlock in federal-provincial financial relations and the consequent constraints on our short-run and long-run revenue-raising capacities. The second is the financial and the monetary distortions in the economic environment.

I have directed my efforts towards achieving a balanced budget or a small surplus, implying the sacrifice of some essential services in the short-run. In considering the economic impact of provincial taxation and spending policies, I have been aware that our gross cash outflows amount to about 12 per cent of the total level of economic activity in the province. This compels us to measure carefully the impact of our policies on the economy. If we, and other governments, chose to be over-expansionary in our fiscal policies at this time, then the provincial economy would be quickly pushed up against the limits of its productive capacity, and the problems of capital shortage, high interest rates, and inflation would be worsened and most of the expansionary impact lost.

I would strongly urge our municipal partners to follow our example in the exercise of voluntary restraint in spending programmes, particularly in the field of education. To the extent that this does not happen, the Ontario government may be obliged to consider the introduction of machinery such as a budget review board to ensure that the taxpayer is not overly burdened and to guarantee that any further financial aid from the province to the municipalities finds its way into the hands of the taxpayer.

Let me now turn to our budgetary proposals for 1969-70. On the expenditure side, our policy has been one of severe and deliberate restraint, aimed at cutting back the growth in expenditures in line with anticipated revenue growth. As I have already suggested, this policy is intended to achieve two main objectives. First, it will ensure that our government operations do not contribute to general inflationary pressure and to pressure on the capital market. Second, it will help to bring our provincial finances into a better balance in preparation for the major fiscal reform programme which we are about to undertake.

To achieve our prime objective of containing expenditure growth, we have undertaken the most extensive and intensive examination of expenditure programmes in the history of this province.

As a first stage, all departments and agencies were instructed to prepare detailed expenditure forecasts for the five-year period 1968-69 to 1972-73. These forecasts covered expenditure increases for existing programmes, qualitative improvements to existing programmes, and new programmes, given assumptions for such variables as population change and price increases. The expenditure projections were matched to a comprehensive series of revenue forecasts, on the basis of existing tax rates and various rates of economic growth. Together, these projections provided a profile of the government's fiscal position over the next five years. I should add that these projections did not include the cost of financing the massive financial transfers to the municipalities which were advocated by the Smith and the select committees. As a very conservative estimate, over $400 million would be required to implement the committees' recommendations over and above the cost of the reforms already implemented, principally, the basic shelter tax exemption and the take-over of the administration of justice.

The general result of this five-year fiscal forecast confirmed and underlined the problem revealed in the 1966 intergovernmental tax structure committee projections, the Smith committee's projections, as well as those presented in Budget paper B accompanying last year's Budget statement. Total expenditures for existing programmes and a limited range of necessary improvements were projected to increase by 74 per cent by 1972-73, while revenues would rise by 40 per cent over the same period. This would increase our budgetary deficits by more than 500 per cent over 1968-69 levels to roughly $1,225 million a year.

Such deficits could only be offset by monumental debt and tax increases. On the debt side, if we accepted the Smith committee's suggestion that total net debt should be contained within nine per cent of provincial domestic product, we would be borrowing at a rate of about $325 million a year by 1972-73. Even after increasing our borrowings to the maximum extent, we would still be faced by a residual deficit of nearly $900 million—again this figure does not include the cost of any further aid to municipalities. To clear this gap would require tax increases equivalent to 24 additional points on the personal income tax or seven additional points of the retail sales tax. Clearly, tax increases of such dimensions would be intolerable. There is simply no alternative to a severe curtailment of expenditure growth.

As a second stage, early last summer, explicit instructions were issued to all departments and agencies to review critically the objectives, priorities, performance and operational efficiency of all existing programmes, as well as new expenditure proposals. These instructions were in two parts. First, all departments were requested to achieve an efficiency improvement in general administrative costs of at least two per cent in 1969-1970. Second, a set of differential spending limits was devised to be used as guidelines in determining the allowable growth in expenditure for each department or agency. These targets were based on a system of priority rankings for the whole range of government programmes. The object of these efficiency targets and priority rankings was to restrain net general expenditures to $3 billion or below.

The severity of this target and the difficulty of achieving it deserves some comment in terms of the structure of government expenditures and the forces determining expenditure growth. As shown in last last year's Budget paper B, there are strong limitations on our expenditure flexibility in the short run. The most controllable components of government spending, administrative and operational costs, constitute only 20 per cent of our total expenditure. The remaining 80 per cent represents statutory obligations and commitments to municipalities, school boards and institutions, as well as transfers to individuals. Significant expenditure reductions, therefore, must inevitably involve restrictions in this broader area and some sacrifice of our vital social objectives.

Given these constraints to flexibility, our austerity programme has been remarkably successful. This success must largely be attributed to the skill of Treasury Board and to the cooperative effort of all departments and agencies, many of whom suffered painful restrictions on their programmes. In the four departments of Public Works, Health, Energy and Resources Management, and Provincial Secretary and Citizenship, the approved spending for 1969-1970 has been cut below last year's level. In several others, including Highways, Attorney General, Lands and Forests, and Financial and Commercial Affairs, the increase allowed for 1969-1970 will barely enable them to meet normal increases in prices and costs. Almost without exception, new programmes and programme improvements have been deferred, capital expenditures have been restrained, and large administrative reductions have been made. As a result, the expenditure package which I am presenting to you calls for total spending of $2,996 million in 1969-1970.

This net general expenditure of $2,996 million for 1969-1970 represents an increase of only $209 million or 7.5 per cent over estimated spending for the current year. Let me illustrate how this compares with our expenditure growth in previous years. In 1966-1967, our net general expenditure rose by $325 million or 22 per cent over the previous year, in 1967-1968 it increased by $473 million or 27 per cent, and in 1968-1969 we estimate that spending will rise by $533 million or 24 per cent. (See Appendix, Table A, page 1835.)

I would like to point out that our achievement in holding expenditures to a 7.5 per cent increase for 1969-70 is considerably better than the federal government's record of 9.5 per cent. Moreover, we have managed to achieve this more rigorous restraint even though our expenditure commitments are inherently faster growing than federal responsibilities and despite the fact that Ontario bears more of the total costs in such shared fields as post-secondary education and Canada Assistance Plan programmes than does the federal government. In terms of the expected growth in the economy, therefore, the federal government sector will continue to expand relatively while ours will contract.

In brief, the containment of our expenditures within the $3 billion target will have several salutary and desirable effects. First, by holding the growth in our expenditures below the anticipated growth rate in the Ontario economy, the balance between the private and provincial sectors of the economy will be stabilized for the first time in several years. Second, it represents a positive contribution by Ontario to the combating of present inflationary pressure in the economy and to relief of pressure on the capital market. Finally, it will relieve the burden on our tax system and bring our finances into better balance in preparation for the long-run reform programme ahead.

While our primary objective for 1969-70 is to contain expenditure growth, we are also determined to allocate our limited spending in the most desirable way possible. This is not an easy task. In the first place, we have already subjected our lower priority programmes to restraint over the past several years. Insofar as they have been stabilized at minimal operating levels, the scope for further savings in these areas, without jeopardizing the programmes themselves, is very limited. Secondly, our priority programmes—education, health and social services, housing and municipal aid—are the fastest-growing and largest segment of the total budget. In pursuing overall budgetary restraint, therefore, it is impossible to avoid cutting into the expansion and development of these priority areas.

First of all, let me place our spending allocations for the next year in some perspective. Over the past four years Ontario has given its high priority areas—education, health and social services, municipal aid and housing—a strong build-up. Between 1965-66 and 1968-69, our net general expenditures increased at the rate of 24 per cent per year, while annual outlays on education, health and aid to municipalities grew by 30 per cent, 25 per cent and 34 per cent respectively. The proportion of total expenditure going into these priority areas rose from 63 per cent to 71 per cent, while the proportion of spending in lower priority areas declined from 37 per cent to 29 per cent of the total budget. On the loan and investment side, this emphasis on priorities has been even more pronounced. Over the same four years our investment in housing, education and health facilities rose from 53 per cent to 83 per cent of total loans and investments. This deliberate and dramatic shift in the structure of our expenditures and investments over recent years is clearly shown in the accompanying tables. (See Appendix, Table B, page 1835.)

The emphasis on priorities has been continued in this Budget. Of the $209 million increase in net general expenditures for 1969-70, some $162 million is allocated to education, health and social services and municipal aid. At the same time, we have allowed lower priority programmes an increase of only $47 million for next year. Thus, the growth rate in our priority areas is 8.2 per cent, as compared to 5.8 per cent in other areas and 7.5 per cent for net general expenditure as a whole. On the investment side as well, we have been reasonably successful in gearing our programme towards the priority areas. Of the $37 million increase in loans and advances for next year, $27 million will go into the priority areas, particularly housing. The accompanying profile of 1969-70 spending and investment illustrates this accomplishment. (See Appendix, Table C, page 1836.)

We recognize that these are very modest increases for our high-priority areas in comparison with past increases and the urgent needs of this growing province and population. But in many areas we had to make cuts or provide no increases at all. For example, grants for the construction of hospitals were reduced by $13 million, our public works construction programme was cut by $4 million, funds for acquisition and development of park lands were cut $2.6 million, grants for construction of community centres were reduced by $250,000 and spending on tourism and information was cut by $155,000. In many other programmes spending was virtually frozen at last year's level, including: Ontario Provincial Police, Ontario Water Resources Commission, vocational school construction, and capital grants to farmers. As well, we found it necessary to defer almost all improvements and extensions in existing programmes, including some in our high-priority areas. Let me list some programme improvements which we have been forced to postpone:

- Increase from 70 per cent to 80 per cent in maintenance subsidy for homes for the aged;

- Increased capital aid to universities and post-secondary institutions;

- Expansion of educational television;

- Increased research grants to hospitals;

- New health resources fund projects;

- Extension of youth, recreation and leadership training programmes;

- Additional capital grants for psychiatric hospitals and institutions for emotionally disturbed children;

- Intensification of timber management programme.

Altogether our rationing measures eliminated approximately $400 million from expenditure estimates to come down to our final expenditure total of $2,996 million. We believe that the final expenditure package that has emerged represents a wise and responsible allocation of our limited public funds.

To conclude my remarks on expenditure policy, let me summarize the major components of our programme for 1969-70.

Education—Our programme for next year allocates an additional $149 million to education, or 71 per cent of the total increase in our 1969-70 budgetary expenditure. This includes increases of:

- $53 million in assistance to school boards;

- $53 million in support to universities, which includes an increase in the basic income unit from $1,450 to $1,530;

$11 million for colleges of applied arts and technology, and Ryerson Polytechnical Institute;

$5 million in student awards.

In addition we are budgeting for $175 million in loans to school boards and $170 million in loans to universities, the colleges of applied arts and technology, and Ryerson Polytechnical Institute.

Health and Social Services—the spending on health programmes will register a decline in 1969-70, as a result of two special factors. First, we have reduced our construction grants for hospitals and, second, we are budgeting a substantially lower amount in 1969-70 for our contribution to the Ontario Hospital Care Insurance Plan. I would point out that this reduced contribution is possible as a result of a greater measure of support in the current fiscal year under the stabilization process which we established in last year's Budget. On the other hand, spending under The Department of Social and Family Services will increase by 12 per cent to a total of $134 million to sustain our present income maintenance, rehabilitation and child care programmes.

Housing—A total of $56 million has been allocated for capital advances to the Ontario Housing Corporation and the Ontario Student Housing Corporation for 1969-70, or triple the volume of housing loans expected to materialize this year. The $19 million advanced to the housing corporations in 1968-69 is well below the amount we provided in last year's Budget. As you will appreciate, however, our accomplishments here are not always directly obvious from the dollars and cents in the Budget. Because of time lags, and the pattern of financial flows into and out of the housing corporations, the financial resources actually put to work in housing in any year may be significantly higher than indicated by treasury advances. Moreover, the funds Ontario provides draw in a vast amount of CMHC financing to produce a very large overall housing programme in this province.

During recent months, we have been active in securing a greater flow of funds for mortgage purposes from financial institutions. I would like to announce that we are now studying the appropriate means and procedures for establishing a capital fund to help fortify the supply of mortgage money for home ownership. Such a fund could assume a form similar to our present Crown corporations which administer various non-budgetary loans and advances in other sectors of the economy. We expect to describe the details of any such proposal at a later stage in this session of the Legislature.

Total general expenditures for support of municipalities will increase by some $25 million or 7 per cent over the 1968-69 level. This relatively modest increase is largely a reflection of the extraordinary increases involved last year in implementing two of the recommendations of the Smith committee. The basic shelter tax exemption payments involved some $111 million in additional expenditure in 1968-69 while the takeover of the administration of justice required $33 million.

Let me recapitulate the overall magnitude of our spending and investment programme for next year. Net general expenditures are estimated at $2,996 million, which is slightly below our $3 billion target and only 7.5 per cent above the programme for the current year. Loans and advances will amount to $520 million or $37 million higher than our capital aid programme for this year.

To allow for even these modest increases in our priority spending areas, severe pruning has been necessary in all other areas. I have already indicated that some programmes have suffered absolute cuts, some have been held to no increase and many have been allowed minimal expansion. This stringency in net general expenditure has been matched by equal restraint on the loans and advances account. Having pressed our austerity measures to the maximum tolerable limit, we expect other governments and public agencies in this province to exercise similar restraint and husbandry.

I shall now turn to our proposals for financing the government's operations and commitments in 1969-70, and for laying the foundations for our long-run programme of taxation reform at the provincial-municipal levels.

Let me repeat that our restraint policies are becoming increasingly effective. We expect our final 1968-69 results to show considerable improvement over the interim forecast; as a result, we should enter the 1969-70 fiscal year with buoyant liquid reserves.

Total net general expenditures for 1969-70 as has been mentioned, are estimated at $2,996 million, while our existing revenue sources are expected to yield $2,817 million, if we include some $30 million in delayed receipts due to us from the federal government in respect of post-secondary education adjustment payments for 1967-68. This would result in a budgetary deficit of $179 million. Our non-budgetary sources of finance, including borrowings from the Canada Pension

Plan, are expected to yield about $692 million. Total non-budgetary disbursements are estimated at $617 million, leaving a non-budgetary surplus of only $75 million, significantly less than in the three previous years. When allowance is made for net requirements for debt retirement of almost $65 million, the overall cash requirement to be financed would approximate $169 million in 1969-1970. (See Appendix, Table D, page 1836.)

In deciding how to finance our $179 million budgetary deficit and to raise net cash requirements of $169 million for 1969-1970, we have been influenced by four major considerations:

The state of economic conditions, persistent inflationary tendencies, and the need to avoid government-induced overheating of the economy;

Conditions in the capital market, including anticipated heavy demands, especially from Ontario Hydro and the federal government;

The state of our liquid reserves;

Our long-term reform plans and the need to start reform on a strong and consolidated basis.

These considerations, taken together, persuaded us to aim for a balanced budget or a small budgetary surplus to avoid the need for borrowing in the public capital market. Debt financing, of course, is appropriate under certain conditions and for certain purposes: for example, it is a means of stimulating the economy during periods of recession, or financing heavy demands for social capital formation to avoid increasing unduly the burden on present taxpayers. Our decision to stay out of the public capital market in 1969-1970 is based on two considerations. The first is the need to avoid inflationary demands on the capital markets. The second and most important consideration, however, is that borrowing is not an effective substitute for the steps we must take to strengthen our fundamental fiscal position. We feel strongly that we must immediately strengthen our tax base in order to proceed with our long-run programme of increasing the equity and productivity of our tax structure.

The objective of a balanced budget or a small budgetary surplus can only be reached by severe spending restraint as already described, combined with increased taxation. I am obliged, therefore, to introduce tax changes this year.

In determining what tax increases might best be contemplated, we had to allow for a number of important factors.

1. In its October budget, the federal government introduced some significant tax increases which will affect the people of this province during our budget year.

2. Various federal and provincial tax commissions have suggested extensive reforms in the overall tax structure of the country, including intergovernmental finance. As I will explain shortly, we are now ready to propose an extensive programme of long-run reform, which we have taken into account in designing our short-term measures.

3. In evaluating alternative tax changes, our objective was to select measures that were economically justifiable as well as equitable.

When considering tax changes it is convenient to think in terms of four different groups of taxes: personal income, corporations, commodities, and other taxation.

The personal income tax has a number of features which make it the most attractive tax to increase. As I shall indicate in my programme for long-term reform, we hope to make this tax field the core of our whole reform programme. In order to do so, it will be necessary to give greater relative weight to this particular tax field in the overall tax structure. Other important characteristics of this tax are its progressive nature and its superior growth potential. Inevitably, this tax will be the key to our ability to develop a more equitable and efficient tax structure.

The federal Minister of Finance pointed out in his October, 1968 budget that there are two provinces which have introduced a higher rate of personal income taxation by adding five more points to their 28 point abatement under the tax collection agreement. By implication, he suggests that provinces like Ontario should follow suit to solve their financial problems. Ontario has long argued that such increased provincial taxes are very much in order, not so much through an increased tax burden but rather by uniformly higher abatements. In addition, it is important to note that Saskatchewan and Manitoba introduced their higher rates in connection with the cost of hospital insurance, which in Ontario is financed through premiums—an effective drain on personal incomes.

I have rejected the idea of raising the personal income tax this year for two very important reasons. In the first place, I am very conscious of the substantial move made in this tax field by the federal government in its October Budget. As I indicated, the two per cent social development tax in Ontario alone will involve an equivalent in income tax terms of $225 million. The federal government has also imposed a temporary surtax of three per cent for the 1968 and 1969 taxation years, terminating at the end of 1969.

In the second place, I firmly believe that it is premature to contemplate rate changes in personal and corporation income tax when significant reforms are in prospect. I emphasized this point in last year's Budget statement because of my conviction of the need for co-ordinated reforms between the two levels of government. I would like to add that, in Ontario's long-term reform plans, we intend to combine major moves in the personal income tax in harmony with changes elsewhere in the tax structure. This is of the utmost importance if one of our objectives is to control the balance in our tax structure and the relative burden of individual and total taxes.

As I have already implied, I am equally reluctant to consider raising the rates on taxable corporate incomes. In this area, additional considerations such as interprovincial tax levels enter the picture, although some very limited scope might exist if one considers the many natural advantages and the progressive development programme of the province of Ontario. Furthermore, in this tax field, the federal government has also imposed a temporary three per cent surtax for the 1968 and 1969 taxation years. However, we do feel that we are fully justified in asking for a greater contribution from the corporate sector in three ways.

1. Income Tax Acceleration—The federal government has enacted a number of amendments to its legislation with the effect of speeding up payments of income tax by corporations. It is our opinion that Ontario's corporate income tax system should conform as closely as possible to that of the federal government, both for the sake of intergovernmental uniformity and corporate convenience.

We propose to introduce the necessary amendment to our Corporation Tax Act to bring us more closely into line with the federal legislation. However, we do not intend to go quite as far as the federal government. We will change our present system of four quarterly instalments to six bi-monthly instalments. This acceleration of instalment payments will apply to all corporations whose fiscal years commence after March 15, 1969. The result of this change will be a shift in liquidity between corporations and the Ontario government, boosting our revenues in 1969-1970 by about $42 million.

2. Capital and Place of Business Taxes—I propose to make a number of changes in the capital and place of business taxes. The rate of the capital tax will be raised from 1/20th to 1/10th of one per cent, with a minimum of $50 per year. These changes will apply to all corporations whose fiscal years end after March 15, 1969. For the transitional period, special provisions will apply.

The new rate will still be relatively modest. I therefore propose that the tax be made payable over and above any obligations which may be incurred for corporation income tax. I would remind you that both the Smith and select committees agreed on the removal of the existing waiver provision. In addition, the burden of the above increases in the capital tax will be mitigated because the capital tax can be deducted from taxable income.

In view of these changes, I feel that this is an excellent time to abolish the place of business taxes. The abolition will be effective at the same time as the capital tax changes.

The net effect of these changes will be an increase of about $17 million in our revenues for the coming fiscal year.

3. Sales Tax—The third contribution we will be asking from the corporate sector falls in the area of sales taxation. I will provide the details of the changes in this field under that general heading.

Another area in which we are introducing changes is the field of sales taxation. At the present time, we have a retail sales tax of five per cent on commodities, with rather generous exemptions compared to other jurisdictions. We have a 10 per cent hospitals tax relating to amusements, and to entertainment with a tax ceiling of $1. In addition and in lieu of the retail sales tax, we have such special taxes as those on tobacco, gasoline and motor vehicle fuel.

Following the recommendations of the Smith and the select committees to make greater use of the retail sales tax field, we have undertaken much research in these areas. We seriously considered, but ultimately rejected, the idea of removing the exemption for food purchases which would have significantly broadened our tax base. As the select committee suggested, this would require offsetting credits in order to remove the regressive aspects of such a change; such a credit mechanism would require a fully operational provincial personal income tax system.

We also gave consideration to the Smith proposal to increase the rate of the retail sales tax. As you know, the province of Quebec already has a rate of eight per cent, with many fewer exemptions than Ontario, while two other provinces have a rate of six per cent. However, we have decided to refrain from this option until such time as we have fully exploited other avenues in this tax area to which I will refer shortly. We also feel that a major move in the general tax rate in this field should be related directly to possible future offsetting benefits in other tax fields through our long-term reform programme.

I would like to speak now for a moment about differential tax rates. The approach to retail sales taxation that we have adopted has three parts. The first of these is possibly the most important. We will submit the necessary legislative changes to integrate the present hospitals tax and retail sales tax through the introduction of a system of differential rates under The Retail Sales Tax Act.

We already have differential rates at the present time, consisting of a zero rate for exempted transactions, a five per cent rate on all other transactions under The Retail Sales Tax Act, and a ten per cent rate under The Hospitals Tax Act. It is now our intention to recognize these distinctions more formally, and to expand the range of transactions to which the ten per cent rate will apply.

Allow me to illustrate for you how we propose to do this in practice:

a. effective April 1, 1969, The Hospitals Tax Act will be repealed and fully integrated with The Retail Sales Tax Act;

b. all transactions under The Hospitals Tax Act will become subject to the differential rate of ten per cent under The Retail Sales Tax Act;

c. The Retail Sales Tax Act will be amended to make the integration of the two taxes feasible and to introduce differential rates, thus simplifying the work for the vendors;

d. in addition to the transactions which fall presently under The Hospitals Tax Act, the differential rate of ten per cent will apply to: all consumption of liquor, wine and bottled beer, irrespective of entertainment; all retail sales of liquor, wine and bottled beer; and all meals, including take-out meals, over $2.50, again regardless of entertainment;

e. under the amended Retail Sales Tax Act, there will be no $1 limit on tax liability as is the case under the present Hospitals Tax Act;

f. in recognition of the rise in prices for meals over the past few years, we will simultaneously amend The Retail Sales Tax Act to remove the present five per cent tax on meals over $1.50. In effect, therefore, we will have two rates on meals, a zero rate up to $2.50 and a ten per cent rate for meals over $2.50.

These changes in the hospitals and retail sales tax are anticipated to yield an additional $42 million in 1969-70.

The second aspect of retail sales taxation concerns the existing schedule of exemptions. Again, we have studied this area thoroughly. We have reviewed the practices in other jurisdictions and examined the fairness of various options in terms of the overall equitable tax structure which we hope to develop. As a result I now propose to remove the existing exemptions for machinery and equipment used in the production of goods and the provision of taxable services. The existing exemption on machinery for use in farm production will be continued.

I am quite aware that the taxation of production machinery is a major move by this government, but I hope to explain why, after much consideration, we have decided to do so. We feel that the withdrawal of this exemption will remove a substantial grey area of doubt and administrative inconvenience both for the government and the private sector. We also consider this extension of the tax base a fair and equitable one. As you will realize, this additional tax on corporations will become an allowable expense under corporation income tax, which is automatically shared by the federal and provincial governments to the extent of some 40 per cent by the federal government and 12 per cent by the Ontario government. The effective date for the removal of the above exemption will be April 1, 1969. The tax will apply to all deliveries on or after that date. The expected yield in the next fiscal year is estimated at about $38 million.

Now with respect to services. The third aspect of retail sales taxation, with which we were concerned this year, was the suggestion to extend the base to include services. As you know, the Smith and select committees made a number of suggestions on this point. The major source of revenue under this potential area would be in the installing, repairing, cleaning, painting, decorating, and remodelling of tangible personal property. We have decided not to extend the base of the tax in this direction at this time. We feel that any such move must be accompanied by other moves incorporated in our long-term tax reform plans, because of the singular impact on homeowners.

However, we do propose to move into the area of services on a more modest scale by extending the five per cent sales tax to hotel and motel accommodation, effective April 1, 1969. In the taxation of transient accommodation, we expect to follow the approach of other jurisdictions. The expected yield in the 1969-70 fiscal year is estimated at $13 million.

Now with respect to other taxes, I propose to make a number of small changes to the regulations under The Retail Sales Tax Act. A new regulation will clarify that exhibitors of motion picture films and video tapes are to pay sales tax on rentals, effective April 1, 1969. There will be no limitations with respect to the period of rental. In addition, the taxation on rentals of tangible personal property will be on the basis of the full rentals. The increase in revenue in 1969-70 on account of these changes is estimated at about $2 million.

I would like to mention at this point that I propose to bring our tobacco tax rates on cigarettes directly into line with those already existing in Quebec and Manitoba. This would mean an increase in taxation of 2 cents per package of 20 cigarettes. At this time, we do not contemplate any changes in the tax on cigars and tobacco. The expected additional yield in 1969-70 will be about $16.5 million. The effective date for this change in rates will be at 12.01 tomorrow morning, March 5, 1969.

No major changes are contemplated in the gasoline tax. Our tax rates in this field compare favourably with all provinces east of this province and are only slightly above those in the western provinces. The only change that I propose to make in this tax is the removal of refunds presently allowed for boats and snowmobiles.

This change will mean that the owners of boats, which are in part responsible for polluting our lakes, will contribute to our fight against pollution. The additional cost to the owners will be relatively minimal, and it will involve some administrative savings and additional revenue of almost $1.5 million. The abolition of the rebates will be made effective with respect to gasoline on which the tax has been paid on or after April 1, 1969.

The mining tax field is the only other area in which we propose to make changes. An announcement has already been made that the processing operations of mines, previously not assessed for local taxes, will become subject to assessment and property taxation for the benefit of mining municipalities in 1970. The mining properties used mainly for obtaining minerals from the ground will remain exempt. The Province will continue to provide mining revenue payments out of the consolidated revenue fund.

My more immediate proposal is to change the present structure of rates under The Mining Tax Act. We feel that the present mining tax provides the Province with an inadequate return for the consumption of irreplaceable resources. I propose to replace the present rates, which vary up to 12 per cent, with a flat rate of 15 per cent and a total exemption if profits are less than $50,000. Every mining company obtaining a profit in excess of $50,000 will pay on the total profit, including the first $50,000. I would also point out that the burden of this tax is considerably eased since the tax can be treated as an expense in computing taxable income for the corporation income tax.

We are also considering new approaches under The Mining Tax Act to encourage our mining companies to process minerals in Canada rather than in other countries. As a first step, we are introducing incentives in the form of allowances for pre-production expenses which may be written off against mining profits before taxation.

These changes will apply to all companies whose fiscal year ends after April 1, 1969. The anticipated increase in revenues is estimated at about $8 million in 1969-70.

On balance, I believe that this package of tax adjustments is best described as a series of neutral changes in terms of equity and incidence. However, to the extent that the major impact will be felt in the corporate sector, greater balance has been achieved among the broad areas of personal income, corporation and commodity taxes.

The anticipated additional revenue from the preceding tax changes is estimated at about $181 million in the 1969-70 fiscal year. As you will recall, I estimated our budgetary deficit before tax changes at $179 million and our overall cash requirements at $169 million. In other words, the additional revenue from tax changes will more than meet our overall cash requirements and produce a small surplus of almost $2 million in our budgetary transactions.

As a result, our 1969-70 programme will be self-financing without any requirement for borrowing in the capital market. Moreover, we will finance the retirement of maturing debt issues without drawing down our liquid reserves.

Mr. Speaker, this is a budget which meets many basic requirements. It exercises spending restraint to the utmost. Within this restraint, it recognizes the special needs in our priority areas. This budget faces existing inflationary pressures with determination and exerts a positive influence in the fight to overcome inflation. It keeps the Ontario government out of the capital market, thereby improving conditions for mortgage financing and for borrowing by the Ontario Hydro, municipalities, school boards and other institutions, both governmental and corporate. Most important, it will provide the sound basis from which to launch the fiscal reform programme to which I have already referred. I would now like to make a detailed presentation to the Legislature on this long-term reform programme which appears in Budget paper B.

The government of Ontario is convinced that fundamental fiscal and structural reforms are necessary and urgent in this province. Both the Ontario committee on taxation and the select committee on taxation proposed extensive reforms. After examining the reports of these committees and studying thoroughly their recommendations, this government is now prepared to present its own views in this Budget paper. In brief, this paper sets out the government's reform objectives and its long-run plan for achieving those objectives. The plan calls for complementary and concurrent reforms on four fronts: reform of the provincial tax system, reform of provincial aid to local governments, reform of local taxation, and reform of local government structure.

The government of Ontario is planning a major redesign and reform of the provincial tax system. This is necessary because the present system is demonstrably deficient in terms of its equity, efficiency, and capacity to raise necessary provincial funds in the years ahead. The programme of provincial tax reform will seek to achieve three broad objectives:

To establish a fairer, more balanced and more revenue-productive system of provincial taxation;

To connect, in a co-ordinated manner, the provincial and municipal tax systems to allow control over the level and distribution of overall tax burdens;

To harmonize and rationalize provincial and federal taxation in Ontario to the maximum extent possible.

The reform plan, which is set out in this Budget paper, calls for extensive changes in existing provincial taxes. Some of these changes have already been implemented in this budget; others will be brought into effect over a number of years. The plan also suggests trade-offs between the province and Ottawa in the shared-tax fields. Realization of the intended realignments in the shared-tax fields will depend, of course, on positive reception and reaction by the federal government. The key element in the reform plan, however, is the establishment of a personal income tax system for Ontario. This fundamental departure from the present character of provincial taxation is the core around which Ontario's next tax system will be developed.

The Ontario government intends to establish its own personal income tax system within the next two years. This move to an independent income tax is necessary to preserve the province's fiscal integrity and to achieve meaningful tax reform in Ontario.

Three developments have led to this decision: the province's need for greater access to fast-growing revenue sources in order to maintain its existing programmes and undertake essential reforms; the impasse in federal-provincial tax sharing; and the inadequacy of the present income tax abatement system to serve Ontario's long-run finance and reform objectives.

The first two of these factors have been extensively studied and debated since 1966. Federal-provincial studies and the province's own projections provide ample documentation that Ontario needs additional tax room in the personal income tax field merely to carry on its existing programmes and existing level of support to municipalities. Ontario's responsibility to carry forward provincial programmes on the scale required and to increase municipal support magnifies this need for growth tax revenues. Similarly, the federal government's adamant refusal to contemplate a more realistic sharing of income tax revenues is now an accepted platitude. Third consideration, however, warrants more detailed explanation.

Public discussion has often appeared to suggest that the people of Ontario do not presently pay provincial income tax. In fact, the people of Ontario have been paying a provincial income tax for many years. The present provincial income tax is equal to 28 per cent of the federal basic tax, and is collected by Ottawa and returned to the province. Moreover, if the federal government were willing to accept our offer whereby the province would assume complete responsibility for certain shared-cost programmes in exchange for an additional 20 points of personal income tax, the two governments would have virtually equal occupancy of this field.

In any event, under the present income tax abatement system, Ontario is severely limited in terms of the revenues it can realistically derive from the fast-growing and progressive personal income tax field. In the first place, the federal government has effectively preempted any significantly increased provincial effort by its own heavy use of this field in recent years. Secondly, the collection agreements which govern this shared-tax field restrict the provinces to across-the-board increases when they want to increase income tax revenues.

The federal government, meanwhile, reserves to itself all the scope for raising revenues through changes in the tax base and in the progressive rate structure. At a time when overall income tax rates are already very high, these latter avenues surely are superior to further across-the-board rate increases.

The present system also denies the province any role in determining the structure and method of income taxation appropriate for Ontario. In this government's view, the present system is grossly deficient in terms of equity and simplicity. The recent imposition of the retrograde social development tax has seriously compounded these defects. Judging by the federal government's unilateral approach to tax reform, there is no assurance, moreover, that Ontario will have any more of a voice in the upcoming reform of this vital tax area. The present income tax system, therefore, is clearly not working in Ontario's interests, either present or future.

The new personal income tax system, which the government plans to establish, will have the following features:

It will aim for greater simplicity and greater progressivity than the present system;

It will be structured to produce significantly increased revenues and thereby improve the growth potential and the progressivity of Ontario's overall tax mix;

It will be designed as an integrated personal income tax-tax credit system which coordinates provincial and municipal taxes and allows control over the level and distribution of overall tax burdens;

It will be both a collection and a payments mechanism, which could eventually be adapted to replace income maintenance programmes.

Integration will be achieved through provisions for the deduction of taxes paid by individuals in other provincial and municipal fields from their tax liability under the provincial personal income tax. For example, it will be possible to replace the present basic shelter tax exemption payments by property tax credits. Such an arrangement would be superior to the present practice in two respects. First, it would channel property tax relief directly back to all taxpayers—homeowners and tenants. Second, the tax credit system offers more scope for redistributing property tax burdens. For example, the property tax credits could be designed to vary with income and family size or could have an upper income cut-off point.

Eventually, this form of integration could be extended to incorporate tax credits against payments of retail sales taxes, health insurance premiums, and other provincial taxes which are regressive in impact. An essential adjunct of this integrated personal income tax-tax credit system would be a rebate mechanism to pay refunds to those taxpayers whose total credits exceed their total personal income tax liability. Such a procedure would represent a move toward a positive income supplement or guaranteed income scheme.

To sum up on the personal income tax, Ontario has decided to establish its own system of personal income taxation rather than continuing with the present abatement system. This course of action will allow the province to raise necessary provincial funds on a fair and efficient basis. It will open up new scope for the systematic integration of overall provincial-municipal taxation in Ontario and lessen the burden of property taxes on those least able to pay. Whether the federal government is willing to continue co-operation in collection under this new system will be a matter for negotiation. Obviously, a single collection agency for both levels of government would be desirable.

Recent events in Ottawa suggest that The Department of National Revenue may be replaced by a tax-collection commission. We would suggest that consideration be given to establishing a federal-provincial tax collection commission, as a joint body to serve both levels of government. On the other hand, the absence of such co-operation certainly will not inhibit the implementation of a new income tax system in Ontario.

The Ontario government intends to tax capital gains when it introduces its provincial income tax. The government believes that capital gains must be brought into the tax system in order to achieve greater equity between taxpayers with equal incomes and among taxpayers at different income levels. It is recognized that taxation of capital gains could reduce private savings and economic growth in Ontario. However, this potential economic disadvantage is far outweighed by the positive improvement in equity and consistency to be gained by taxing capital gains.

It is Ontario's view that capital gains should be taxed on a uniform basis all across Canada. This requires either a fully integrated system of provincial capital gains taxes, a system of federal and provincial capital gains taxes or a purely federal tax, the revenue of which is shared with the provinces. Ontario is prepared to discuss these options with the federal government and the other provinces to ensure that a harmonized overall system is developed. If the federal government is not prepared to tax capital gains—either in concert with the provinces or on behalf of the provinces as well as in its own right—Ontario, nevertheless, intends to go ahead in this field. In this eventuality, Ontario's rates would have to be nominal, at least until such time as other provinces entered the field.

Ontario believes that the United States capital gains tax provides a reasonable model for designing a capital gains tax appropriate to Ontario and to Canada. Thus, the kind of tax that is envisaged would have the following features:

Taxation of gains when they are realized and upon death or emigration;

Deductibility of losses as an offset against capital gains income;

No discounting of gains to allow for inflationary effects;

Exemption of gains on homes and other specific forms of real property, up to a lifetime limit, with periodic reassessment of this limit;

Distinction between short-run speculative gains and long-run investment gains;

Concessionary rates of tax on long-run gains and, certainly, rates that are no higher than in the United States;

Fair averaging provisions, both forward and backward.

A capital gains tax structured along these lines would minimize adverse economic effects and be administratively workable, while at the same time increasing government revenues and making the overall tax system more equitable.

The new federal Estate Tax Act limits the range for modification and reform in Ontario's succession duties. Ontario strongly believes that these two taxes should remain as compatible and as harmonized as possible. If the province were to go its own way in developing the death tax field, as Ottawa already has done, the end result could be confiscatory total tax levels, capricious overall tax consequences and a disproportionate allocation of private resources devoted to compliance and evasion.

The responsible options left open to Ontario in respect of succession duties, therefore, narrow down to two: retain the provincial tax and bring it into conformity with the new federal tax, or relinquish this tax field to the federal government in exchange for equivalent revenue. Ontario proposes to relinquish its succession duties in exchange for 75 per cent of the revenues that will accrue in Ontario from full application of the new federal Estate Tax Act.

As capital gains taxation becomes fully mature in the years ahead, undue accumulations of wealth will be moderated. In Ontario's view, therefore, the need for taxation of estates will diminish and such taxation should be gradually eliminated. This could be achieved either by the federal government, through increases in its level of exemptions, or by the provinces through forgiveness or refund of their shares of estate tax revenues.

With a provincial income tax, it would be feasible for Ontario to establish a provincial gift tax. There is little rationale for such a gift tax, however, once the province moves out of the succession duties field. Moreover, a provincial gift tax on top of the new federal gift tax would push rates to punitive levels. Ontario, therefore, does not intend to establish its own gift tax.

The province strongly contends, however, that gift tax revenues should be shared with the provinces. Since the federal government views gifts primarily as reductions in the size of estates eligible for estate taxes, then it is only fair that the provinces share in gift tax revenues to the same extent that they share in estate tax revenues, which is 75 per cent.

Ontario's corporation income tax closely parallels Canada's corporation income tax in terms of structure and design. The province believes that this conformity must be maintained in future, both for reasons of neutrality and simplicity.

On the side of administration and collection, the province is considering a major change. The Carter commission, Smith committee and select committee all recommended that administration and collection of the corporation income tax be turned over to the federal government. This government is persuaded by the obvious merits of such a step. There is no question that administration and collection of corporation income taxes would be more efficient and certain if handled only by a central authority. Personnel from both the provincial corporation tax and succession duties areas would become available to launch the new provincial income tax administration. Before reaching any final decision to turn over corporation income tax collection to the federal government, however, Ontario must be assured that the interests of corporate taxpayers as well as its own interests, and particularly its revenues, will not suffer.

The sales tax on production machinery and the higher capital taxes announced in this budget will raise Ontario's overall level of taxation on corporations substantially. This increased burden was necessary because the business sector, like all other taxpayers, must carry its fair share of revenue-raising measures. Looking to the future, however, it is apparent that there is little remaining tolerance for further increases in corporate taxation, except perhaps in corporation income tax rates. It must also be recognized that Ontario's rates cannot move far out of line with those in other jurisdictions, both in Canada and abroad, if the province is to remain competitive. Moreover, various studies have supported the contention that such increases are ultimately reflected in the price paid by consumers for goods and services.

The government believes that the mining industry has been taxed too lightly in relation to the taxes borne by other industries and sectors of the Ontario economy. The increase in mining tax announced in this Budget aims to correct this defect and to secure for all the people of Ontario the revenues which should logically accrue to them from this province's natural resources.

In addition to establishing a proper level of provincial taxation on mines, the plan for reform in the field for municipal taxation of mining properties. Beginning in 1970, mining municipalities will be empowered to levy property tax on smelters and other processing facilities.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Where did the Minister hear that suggestion before?

An hon. member: Right here!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. members will please allow the Minister to continue; it is an important subject. The hon. member for Sudbury and others will have a proper time to discuss it.

Mr. Sopha: We are not on TV now.

Mr. Speaker: Whether we are on TV or not, the hon. member will please observe the rules of the House.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Assessment of these processing facilities is now under way and scheduled for completion before the end of 1969. When fully in effect, this change will add over $10 million a year to the revenues of mining municipalities. Ultimately, many municipalities in the north will share in this additional fiscal capacity through the formation of regional school boards and regional governments. In the meantime, the province will continue to make payments to mining municipalities out of its general revenue, though at a reduced level and through a revised formula which includes mining workers engaged in extraction operations only. This new approach to mining taxation will result in net benefits to mining municipalities and in broad benefits to Ontario taxpayers in general.

Ontario's long-run financial needs dictate that the retail sales tax remain a major and growing source of revenue for the province. Both the Smith committee and the select committee recognized this inescapable reality. The thrust of reform in the sales tax area, therefore, must be to ensure that this additional revenue is raised in the most efficient and equitable manner.

Additional revenue from the retail sales tax can only be obtained by broadening the base and/or raising the rate. In this Budget, the retail sales tax base was expanded to include three previously exempt areas: production machinery, hotel and motel accommodation, and movie tape and video tape rentals. This leaves little scope for further expansion of the base except in the area of services and necessities such as food. The province does not intend to tax food, children's clothing and other necessities, at least until the regressive aspects of such taxation can be deliberately offset by tax credits and refunds under the provincial income tax. Nor does the province envisage any great expansion in the area of services. The costs of proper administration and collection of the retail sales tax on many services would be high because of the number of vendors involved, while the additional revenues to be gained would be modest. To the extent that Ontario finds it necessary and desirable to derive additional revenue from sales taxation, therefore, it must come primarily through rate increases.

In the present budget the retail sales tax rate on liquor, bottled beer and wine, and meals over $2.50 has been increased to ten per cent and taxation under The Hospitals Tax Act will be incorporated into The Retail Sales Tax Act. This represents a start in the direction of differential sales tax rates for selected commodities. The province will continue to explore and develop this avenue before contemplating any general rate increase.

The 1969 Budget has introduced significant changes in other areas of provincial taxation. The tax on tobacco will be increased, gasoline tax refunds narrowed, and numerous minor changes made to remove nuisance features, reduce collection costs and streamline administration. In the years ahead, Ontario will continue to review and improve its tax policies in these and other provincial fields.

The Ontario government recognizes that the local tax base carries too much of the financing burden for the provincial-municipal sector as a whole. This undue reliance on property taxation is clearly indicated by the continuing financial squeeze on municipalities and the increasing demands for provincial relief. In 1968 the province undertook two major relief measures suggested by the Smith committee, the basic shelter tax exemption payments and the takeover of the administration of justice, shifting approximately $150 million of financing from the local tax base to the provincial tax base. These measures have relieved the pressure on mill rates but do not constitute adequate long-run support. A major reform objective of the province, therefore, is to increase its financial support for local governments in order to reduce the burden of financing which falls upon the slow-growing and oppressive property tax.

As a first step, Ontario intends to raise its average level of support for elementary and secondary education to 60 per cent over a three-year period, beginning in 1970-71. Presently, the province's legislative grants provide about 45 per cent of school board finances. This increase in provincial support of education from 45 to 60 per cent will represent a permanent shift in financing from the local tax base to the provincial tax base. The cost of this shift is estimated to run from $175 million to $250 million annually, by the end of the phase-in period.

The primary purpose of the province in assuming this increased share of education financing is to permit some compensating reduction in school board levies. In other words, the increase in provincial taxation for school support is expected to be offset substantially by reduced local taxation for school financing. To realize this desirable reduction in local levies, it is imperative that the higher provincial grants be accompanied by restraint in school board spending. In the past, increased provincial grants have been translated almost entirely into higher total expenditures on schools. This need not be the end result in future, however, because enrolments will level off over the next few years. If school boards do not, as I mentioned in my budget statement, exercise voluntary restraint in spending, this government will consider establishing machinery, such as a budget review board, to ensure that increased financial aid from the province is passed on to the local taxpayer.

With increased provincial support of school board costs, there is the concomitant requirement of allocating the aggregate grant among the various school boards. Under present arrangements this is handled by the Ontario foundation tax plan formula. This formula will have to be revised in order to generate and distribute the higher level of provincial grants among the new school board units which were established this year.

The long-run goal of the province is to assume a larger share of the financing for other local services as well. This cannot be achieved immediately because the province simply does not have the financial resources to make increased transfers. As the new provincial tax system begins to produce additional revenues, however, some of these revenues will be transferred to local governments in the form of increased grants and payments. Again, if the end result is simply increased local spending, this will necessitate central review and control measures.

The government is undertaking a comprehensive review of its grants and aid policies. As the Smith committee pointed out, some grants are obsolete and others deserve new emphasis, while in aggregate the present system lacks co-ordination. The province hopes to correct these imperfections and to develop a rationalized overall support policy. Two changes already mentioned are examples of the kind of improvements that will be sought. The basic shelter tax exemption payments will be replaced by some form of tax credits and refunds under the provincial personal income tax, and mining revenue payments will be reduced as some mining municipalities begin to collect their own revenues from mines. In redesigning its grants policies, the province also will seek to provide more of its total support in the form of unconditional grants, thereby allowing local governments greater autonomy in their budgetary allocations.

Reform of the provincial grants system must inevitably be a long-run process. This is particularly so when the province is working towards fundamental reforms in other related areas such as property assessment and regional government. The regional government programme will simplify and assist the reform of provincial grants in two main ways. First, it will reduce the number of grant-receiving units. Second, the equalization which will occur within regions will reduce the need for equalization components in particular provincial grants. Assessment reform will also have a major bearing on the development of an improved grants system. At present the Ontario government pays out to local governments approximately $1 billion in grants which in one way or another are based on local assessment figures. Uniform and accurate assessment is vital, therefore, for an equitable distribution of these grants among local governments. Given these inter-relationships, some time will be required before a fully adequate and co-ordinated grants policy can be formulated.

Property taxation in Ontario stands in need of fundamental reform, perhaps more so than any other area. As the Smith committee and the select committee so clearly showed, the present property tax is grossly unfair and inefficient. The proposed provincial actions to reduce the burden of financing that falls on the property tax and to offset its regressivity via personal income tax credits will substantially ameliorate these shortcomings. But reform of property taxation is still necessary and desirable, both in its own right and in order to facilitate and complement reforms in government structure and provincial grants. Therefore, the government is determined to overhaul the entire system of property taxation and make it as equitable and efficient as possible.

There are four main trusts to the province's plan for reform:

Reassessing all real property at current value;

Broadening of the local tax base by removing exemptions;

Achieving a more neutral business assessment rate; and Determining an appropriate distribution of tax burdens among classes of real property.

Of these, reform of assessment is the most crucial for it is the foundation upon which subsequent reforms in these other areas must be based.

Current property assessment in Ontario is riddled with inconsistencies and inequities. Many properties are underassessed, some are overassessed and some are not assessed at all. Like properties are assessed at different values both within the same municipality and between municipalities. Moreover, there is no consistency among municipalities in the assessment treatment of particular classes of property. A class of property which enjoys low assessment and therefore a tax advantage relative to other properties in one municipality may be at a relative disadvantage in another municipality. The Ontario government is convinced that the only way to remove these anomalies and inequities is to reassess all properties in Ontario at current value. It is the province's aim to bring about uniformity of assessment all across Ontario in order to achieve equity among property owners, among property categories and among municipalities.

To remedy the serious existing problems in assessment, the Smith committee recommended that Ontario provide more aid and incentives to the municipalities to improve their assessment practices. The government has doubts that this approach would succeed without a complete change in management practices. It also believes that province-wide reassessment can be achieved much sooner under provincial management than under local administration. Therefore, the Ontario government has decided to assume full responsibility for the administration of property assessment. This will be done in two stages. On July 1 of this year, the province will take over the assessment function in northern Ontario with the exception of the districts of Kenora, Rainy River and Sudbury and the cities of Sault Ste. Marie and Fort William. On January 1, 1970 the remainder of the province will come under provincial jurisdiction.

This changeover will mean the absorption of present municipal assessment personnel by The Department of Municipal Affairs and assumption of present assessment costs by the province. This will represent a saving to municipalities of approximately $15 million, allowing a corresponding reduction in provincial grants. Following this immediate step, the province intends to devote increased resources to the assessment function in order to ensure that the administration and quality of assessment is brought up to a proper level by the end of 1975.

Apart from the equity and efficiency considerations, this assessment reform will produce one major benefit to local governments themselves. Proper and systematic assessment will bring onto the rolls many properties that at present are not assessed at all or assessed on only part of their value. This will increase the revenues of the municipal sector and broaden the tax base against which future levies can be raised.

As the process of reassessment proceeds, the province will consider the need for measures to cushion its impact. Present practices vary so widely that the move to a modern and equitable base is bound to involve financial hardships in some instances. While such hardships must eventually be borne if equality is to be achieved, temporary cushioning would smooth and ease these painful adjustments.

The government recognizes the desirability of broadening the property tax base by removing present exemptions and partial exemptions. Reform along these lines would have three very beneficial impacts on local finance. First, it would increase the revenue-raising capacity of the local government sector as a whole. Second, it would reduce intermunicipal fiscal disparities. Removal of exemptions would increase the assessment base of municipalities which presently have a high proportion of tax exempt properties much more than it would for municipalities with a low proportion of tax exempt properties. Third, it would shift some of the tax burden within each municipality from presently taxable to presently exempt properties.

The major classes of property that are presently exempt or partially exempt are private properties such as churches and YMCA's, institutional properties such as universities and hospitals, and government properties at the municipal, provincial and federal levels. The province has already announced that it does not intend to remove the exemption for churches. The status of other private properties is currently under review.

As for the other categories of exempt properties, the province believes it would be premature to eliminate exemptions before proper assessment of these properties has been undertaken all across the province.

In the long run, this government hopes to be able to pay full local taxes on all the properties of the province, its agencies and the institutions it supports. The province's recent move to pay full grants in lieu of taxes on senior citizen housing units represents a modest start in this direction. However, full realization of this objective will not be feasible until revenues become available to finance such reform. This delay, moreover, will permit the province to consider any relevant findings by the federal-provincial subcommittee on intergovernmental taxation.

At present, commercial and industrial properties pay a supplementary business tax as well as a realty tax on their assessed value. This business tax applies different rates of business assessment—that is, different proportions of taxable assessment to total assessment—against different kinds of business; hence, it penalizes some businesses and favours others. As well, the present schedule of rates is replete with categories and definitions which may have been relevant fifty years ago but are totally obsolete and inappropriate today. The government of Ontario believes that this discriminatory feature of local taxation should be removed. A major reform objective of the province, therefore, is to establish a more neutral business tax on all commercial and industrial property.

This long-run goal cannot be achieved until all properties, residential as well as commercial-industrial, have been reassessed at current value. Only then will the province be in a position to measure and evaluate the impact of business assessment rates on different businesses, on different municipalities and on municipal revenues in aggregate. As an interim measure, however, the province is considering a reduction in the present number of business assessment rates, a narrowing in the present range of rates and a general modernization of the business tax legislation. A transitional reform along these lines would maintain an adequate business tax base during the reassessment period and, at the same time, reduce discrimination between different kinds of business.

The local tax reforms already mentioned will work to redistribute property tax burdens in Ontario. For example:

Reassessment will generate major shifts in tax burdens among individual properties, among classes of property and among municipalities;

To the extent that exemptions from property tax are narrowed, tax burdens will shift from presently taxed to presently exempt properties;

Movement towards a more neutral business tax will redistribute tax burdens among businesses, on a more equitable basis.

In addition, a number of the basic reforms in other areas will have significant impact on property tax burdens. Mine processing facilities will begin to bear property taxes. The increased provincial grants for education will reduce the tax burden on all properties. Regional school boards and regional governments will tend to even out property tax burdens within their respective boundaries. Finally, any personal income tax credits or refunds for property taxes paid will tend to reduce the ultimate burden of residential property taxes on those families and individuals who are least able to pay.

One remaining element of local taxation which affects the weight of tax between residential and commercial-industrial properties is the split mill rate. In principle, the government favours the abolition of the split mill rate, as was recommended by both the Smith committee and the select committee on taxation. The province is not contemplating such a change, however, until reassessment has been completed and the impact on municipal finances can be carefully examined.

Redistribution of property tax burdens could be brought about, of course, by prescribing new norms for various classes of property right from the outset. This is essentially what the Smith committee and the select committee did in setting out new ratios of taxable assessment to total assessment for various classes of property. The government is convinced, however, that such a policy would be premature and inappropriate. Given the chaotic and discriminatory state of assessment in this province, there can be no reasonable degree of certainty that any desired distribution among property classes would in fact work out in practice. Moreover, the effects in individual municipalities of applying prescribed ratios of taxable assessment to total assessment must be substantially different than the effects for the province as a whole. The province intends to push on with assessment reform, therefore, before attempting to establish any final distribution of tax burdens.

Within the overall field of property taxation there are some classes of property which merit special tax treatment. Transportation and communication properties, for example, must be considered separately from properties in general. The tax treatment of these special properties is still under review by the province. Farm properties also require special treatment. Generally, the government believes that the property tax on working farms should be considerably lower than on non-farm properties, because of the limited ability of working farms to pay taxes out of current income. Therefore, if property taxes on working farms show any significant increase when reassessment is introduced, the province will consider interim measures to hold the line on farm tax burdens. This does not imply that the government favours continuous tax concessions to all farms. It simply reflects the government's view that a capital gains tax is a better means of deriving the appropriate taxation from such farms rather than penalizing working farms with impossible property tax burdens.

Ontario has embarked on a long-run programme to reorganize and reform its local government structure. This reform programme seeks to achieve five major objectives:

1. A strengthened and modernized system of local government;
2. Greater efficiency in the planning, administration and provision of local services;
3. Reduction of disparities among local governments in the level of services and taxation;
4. Return of powers to local governments from special-purpose boards and commissions;
5. Decentralization and regionalization of provincial programmes wherever feasible.

The province is working to realize these objectives by means of three interrelated and complementary policies: the creation of larger school board units, the consolidation of existing local municipalities, and the establishment of a comprehensive system of regional governments.

The school board policy has already been legislated and implemented. As the new county boards of education become fully operational, some very positive results should begin to emerge. Education services in poorer and more remote areas will be upgraded; the property tax burden of school financing will tend to equalize within counties; and there will be a gradual improvement in the planning and provision of elementary and secondary education across the province as a whole.

The province is also pursuing an active policy of municipal consolidation in order to reduce the total number of municipalities. A large number of local municipalities in Ontario are far too small to be viable units, either on their own, or within the lower tier of a regional system. Therefore, the government is working towards a target of larger municipalities. This policy in itself will reduce tax imbalances and improve the efficiency of local governments. Normally, municipal consolidation will occur among lower-tier municipalities at the time of the establishment of a regional government. In areas where regional governments are not imminently planned, however, municipal consolidation will be encouraged on its own merits.

The key element in the structural reform programme is the establishment of a system of regional governments. These new units will be urban-based in character, to enable local government to cope more effectively with the problems and needs of Ontario's increasingly urban and urbanizing society and to provide a broader range of benefits to our rural areas. The new regional units will also operate on a much broader scale, thereby providing the strength and cohesion which is lacking in the present municipal structure. This strength of the new regional units has three dimensions:

A geographic area large enough for proper physical and economic planning;

A population large enough to achieve economies of scale in the provision of public services;

A financial base adequate and diversified enough to support a reasonable level and range of services.

As regional governments are established, the province expects to see major progress towards its structural reform objectives. Powers presently in the hands of special-purpose bodies can be turned over to the new regional governments or to constituent local municipalities. The overall efficiency of local government should improve. Intermunicipal fiscal disparities, both in terms of the level of services and of taxation, should tend to even out. This equalization will occur because each regional government will provide a standard level of required services within its boundaries and will draw upon the tax base of the region as a whole for its financing.

The regional government policy will complement and support Ontario's other reform programmes. Creation of regional governments and reduction in the number of municipalities, for example, will facilitate the development of a rationalized system of provincial aid to local government. Reform of local taxation and the regional government programme will be mutually reinforcing; province-wide reassessment will ensure that regional governments are developed from a sound fiscal footing, while the improved assessment balance achieved through regionalization will allow a more equitable distribution of tax burdens among classes of property. In addition, the province intends to work towards common boundaries for school boards and regional governments.

Regional government will also assume growing significance for the achievement of Ontario's regional economic development policies. The Department of Treasury and Economics and The Department of Municipal Affairs are working closely together to ensure that the two programmes are coordinated, complementary, and mutually supporting. The broad provincial plans for orderly growth and development in all regions of the province will provide an umbrella for the land use and environmental planning responsibilities of regional governments. Regional government boundaries will be used as basic "building blocks" in drawing up more uniform administrative boundaries for provincial departments, which is one of the objectives of Ontario's "Design for Development".

Both the regional government and regional development programmes are based, essentially, on the concept of urban growth points. The concentration of provincial expenditures at these growth points as a means of encouraging economic growth and development in each region will result in an expansion of the local tax base of these growth centres. Regional governments will perform the key role of distributing these fiscal dividends throughout the region as a whole, thereby benefitting the rural areas as well as the urban centres. In addition, inter-regional equalization will occur through the discretionary regional allocation of the province's budgetary expenditures and the programme activities of provincial departments and agencies, under the regional development programme.

This government intends to implement the regional government programme on a staged basis, giving priority to those areas of the province where the need for regional government is most immediate. The first full-fledged regional government came into existence in Ottawa-Carleton on January 1, 1969. The second regional government will be established in Lincoln-Welland, effective January

1, 1970. Other areas where attention is being concentrated are: Halton-Peel; East and North of Metro Toronto; Kitchener-Waterloo; Hamilton; Sudbury; and Muskoka. The timing schedule for Ontario's regional development programme calls for definition of the growth points in all ten economic regions by the end of 1969 and the formulation of economic development plans throughout 1969 and 1970.

The four reform programmes set out in this paper constitute a complete restructuring of provincial and municipal finance in Ontario. The various reform thrusts are interdependent and complementary; they must be regarded as parts of a total plan, a total "fiscal framework for the future". The changes involved in moving towards Ontario's long-term objectives will be far-reaching and pervasive. The province intends to implement its reforms, therefore, in measured and co-ordinated steps, all the while retaining maximum flexibility to consider alternative methods and means.

The province is convinced that major benefits and improvements will result from its package of fiscal and structural reforms. Provincial and municipal taxation will become more equitable, more efficient and more capable of producing the revenues Ontario will need for development and expansion of essential public services in the years ahead. A major burden of financing will be lifted from the slow-growing and oppressive property tax. The strengthening and modernization of local governments will enable them to meet their present problems and to cope more effectively with the emerging needs of Ontario's urban society. Finally, existing disparities in levels of public services and taxation across the province should gradually be levelled out.

This white paper represents the framework of Ontario's reform programme. A large number of less prominent recommendations in the reports of the Smith and select committees have yet to be fully considered before all the details of the reform programme can be completed. These recommendations will continue to be reviewed by the taxation and fiscal policy branch of The Department of Treasury and Economics for possible implementation.

It must be recognized that this reform programme will not be costless or painless. As this Budget shows, the first step in the programme of fiscal reform must be to contain the growth in public expenditures. But even with continuing restraint, total taxation in Ontario must inevitably increase in the years ahead, unless the fiscal mismatch between the federal and the provincial-municipal sectors is corrected. Redistribution of tax burdens also means additional taxes on some individuals, some properties and some businesses. The province is convinced, however, that the social and economic costs of maintaining our present system, with all its inequities and defects, would be higher still. Ontario must proceed with fundamental reforms, both because of the intrinsic merits of such reforms themselves, and to provide the basis for constructive and rational development of public finance in this province.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the Treasurer—at least on his stamina—in presenting this lengthy Budget and its backing up White Paper, and I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side listened intently to his words and his ideas.

The interjections, I suppose, were more than anything else to add a certain sparkle to his presentation which I sensed somehow was lacking, but certainly the opportunity will come upon most of us in this House in the near future to discuss the many ideas that have been put before us this afternoon.

Mr. Nixon moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): If the Minister is going to bury the people, this shovel will help.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I suppose it is fair to say there is a continuing need for shovels in certain areas now and maybe the hon. member is familiar with those. Maybe that is where he got this—from that stock. Thank you, I needed a shovel.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. members will recall that the suggestion was that after the Budget address we should return to the ordinary business of the afternoon. I think the members would like to know that during this presentation we did have present here in the galleries, in addition to the many visitors who are still with us, students from St. Theresa's Separate School, Kitchener; from Upper Canada College in Toronto; from Glenview Senior Public School, in Toronto; and from St. Jerome High School in Kitchener. They, of course, have departed.

Presenting reports.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East) from the standing private bills committee, presented the committee's seventh report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bill without amendment: Bill Pr26, An Act respecting The Tilbury Public School Board.

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments: Bill Pr28, An Act respecting the City of Sarnia.

Mr. Speaker: Presenting reports.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE TOBACCO TAX ACT, 1965

Hon. J. H. White (Minister of Revenue) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Tobacco Tax Act, 1965.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE RETAIL SALES TAX ACT, 1960-1961

Hon. Mr. White moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Retail Sales Tax Act, 1960-1961.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

THE HOSPITAL TAX ACT

Hon. Mr. White moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to repeal The Hospital Tax Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

The hon. Attorney General has a statement.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, I have now received from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force a copy of the report of The Department of National Health and Welfare respecting the chemical MACE.

I am satisfied from my perusal of this report that chemical MACE is a substance which, if improperly and carelessly used, may cause permanent injury to the eyes of the victim. This type of injury could possibly arise from the chemical reaction of the components of the substance with human tissues if it is discharged at a very close range, with excessive concentration and without thorough washing of the affected areas of the body.

As far as I am concerned, chemical MACE is a weapon that must be treated like a revolver or any other weapon and it will require the same degree of education and training in the police profession before it may be properly utilized by them. It is my personal opinion that chemical MACE should not be used unless those using it fully understand its nature and effect, unless they are fully trained in the proper use of the substance and unless they have all the necessary facilities available for immediate remedial action after its use.

Since a report was provided to me through the facilities of the RCMP, I am not at liberty to make copies of the report immediately available without the permission of that force. However, I have asked the Ontario Police Commission to discuss the matter further with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in order that copies of the report may be made available, if this meets with the approval of those who prepared the report for us.

I have also asked the Ontario Police Commission to consider, in further detail, the information which it has now on this substance, in order that it may pursue with the representatives of the police forces throughout Ontario the significance of the information and its relationship with the present views of some police forces. It is possible that, as with many other pieces of equipment, there is some useful purpose for this chemical substance which may be arrived at after appropriate consideration of the various factors which I have mentioned.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, on a point of clarification. In view of what the Attorney General has said, is he not going to take any steps immediately to control its use?

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of clarification, does the Attorney General intend to seek legislative authority in order that he can instruct the police boards throughout the province as to either the banning of its use, or at least, a severe restriction of its use?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of policy and I would only say that the matter is being considered by the department, and in our legislation which we will be presenting.

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): A question by way of clarification. Would the Attorney General consider that when the new Department of Justice Act is implemented and becomes law he would then have the power to direct the use of this substance?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think, Mr. Speaker, it is altogether likely that the necessary power will be either in that Act, or in The Police Act.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, may I, by way of clarification, ask the Attorney General whether or not he is familiar with the report that was made available in Washington just last week, indicating that chemical MACE has an adverse effect on the internal organs of the human body, other than the eyes, and whether he will take the steps to ban its sale altogether in the province?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have received at the moment, Mr. Speaker, only the material which the RCMP has furnished to us, and there is a considerable amount in that report. As I have just stated to the House, we are seeking permission to distribute that so hon. members will know what it does contain.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, on another point of clarification. Does not the Attorney General agree that by his own remarks this afternoon he is sanctioning permanent physical damage by the refusal to ban it outright? That, in effect, is what he prefaces his statement with.

An hon. member: The member is always like that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member misinterprets very badly what I have said.

Mr. Lewis: He misinterprets very well.

Mr. Speaker: There have been a considerable number of questions by way of clarification and I think that the matter should rest. Further questions should be placed in a proper way tomorrow. The hon. leader of the Opposition had two questions, and the hon. deputy leader will ask them.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my leader, I have a question in his name for the Minister of Labour. Can the Minister report any progress in negotiations with the Canadian Union of Public Employees, CLC, Ontario Hydro employees union local 1000?

Hon. D. A. Bales (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question I would advise that the meetings proceeded yesterday and are continuing today—

Mr. Singer: I am sorry, I did not hear the hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Bales: The meetings continued all day yesterday and continued this morning, and I cannot give any further information at this time.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, I have a further question standing in the name of my leader. This is for the Minister of Municipal Affairs. Has the Minister received any requests or inquiries from municipalities around the province for the abolition of their boards of control following his announced agreement with the abolition of Toronto's board of control? And part 2, will the abolition be a model for other areas?

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first part of the question, since my letter of February 27, we have not received any enquiries or requests. Perhaps we have received enquiries as to procedure, but certainly not since my letter.

In reply to the second part of the question, I would say the answer is, not necessarily.

Mr. Singer: As a supplementary question, does the Minister envisage bringing in legislation that will only apply to Metropolitan Toronto, to the city of Toronto or to all municipalities in the province?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I think the member is aware, that my letter of February 27 dealt with the private bill which the city of Toronto is bringing before the private bills committee. It is not in the form of general legislation.

Mr. Singer: It could be if the Minister wanted.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Well, everything could be.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nipissing has a question of the Premier.

Mr. R. S. Smith (Nipissing): I have a question of the Premier. What approval has the Cabinet given to the proposed application of the Abitibi Paper Company to extend its hardboard operations in Sturgeon Falls under the assistance of EIO's grants? Secondly, how many of the recently laid-off employees will be re-employed if the application is finally approved and accepted by the Ontario Development Corporation under the EIO programme?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: This matter is presently being considered by the Ontario Development Corporation. It has not yet made a recommendation to the Cabinet, therefore I am not in a position to give you a final answer to either the first or the second part of the question. As soon as it has been dealt with by the ODC this information will be available.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Scarborough West has a question for the Minister of Correctional Services. We are going down the ministerial list today.

Mr. Lewis: I am pleased, on the Minister's behalf, that he has had this assent. Why did the supervisory officers of Burwash industrial farm call in the Ontario police detachment from Sudbury to investigate incidents at Burwash and to lay charges arising from those incidents? Second, when alleged deviant sexual behaviour in institutions occurs, does the department feel that police investigation is a desirable rehabilitation tool?

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question, the police were called in because an inmate alleged that he had been assaulted and wished to lay charges. I do not know whether this satisfies the hon. member in respect of the balance of the question, because actually I have already answered that part of the question. The answer to it is the same as that given the other day, on February 27, as recorded in Hansard on page 1616. The answer is the same, if the hon. member would look that up it would satisfy his question.

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary question, if it is not sub judice; if the Minister will allow it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Go ahead.

Mr. Lewis: I simply want to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the Minister realizes that it is usually the institutions which engender this sexual acting out and that the charges should be laid against the department instead of the offenders?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Speaker, that is a complete abuse of the rules of the question period. It is a perfect example of why I hesitate to answer supplementary questions of certain members.

Mr. Lewis: If the Minister wants to answer, he is entitled to answer. I am putting it to him seriously.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member will be able to discuss this during my estimates.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister is quite in order to decline to answer the question and that will end the matter.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville has a question of the Minister of Energy and Resources Management.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, the question of the Minister of Energy and Resources Management is as follows:

In view of the most recent natural gas explosion in the Windsor area over the weekend, is the Minister satisfied that the regulations concerning the supply and use of this product were properly enforced?

Will the Minister undertake a review of the regulations to see what can be done to eliminate or prevent such explosions in the future?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, a preliminary investigation would indicate failure of a connection in the vicinity of the range. The exact location of this failure has not yet been pinpointed and likewise no contravention of regulations has been found.

And the second part of the question: There has been, in effect, a continuing review of regulations and new products relating to the natural gas industry.

Mr. B. Newman: Mr. Speaker, if I may ask of the Minister a supplementary question. Is the Minister aware that this is the third natural gas explosion in the area within recent years? If he is, is he satisfied that there are enough safety inspectors in the area to enforce the regulations?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are satisfied that we have enough inspectors but it is very difficult to go and inspect every range or every heater, every hour in the day. Accidents can happen when you are dealing with very dangerous materials and we would have to find out what the problem was before we could say that it was inspection at fault.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming has a question of the Attorney General?

Mr. D. Jackson (Timiskaming): A question of the Attorney General.

In the case of John Sheeley, who was acquitted of a charge of possession of marijuana by Judge Gardhouse, as reported by the Telegram, February 28, can the Attorney General assure the House that marijuana was not "planted" in Mr. Sheeley's home by the police while searching the premises?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, this particular prosecution was conducted by the federal government and not through the office of the Attorney General or The Department of the Attorney General. The question does not relate to any prosecution which would carry forward through The Department of the Attorney General. However, I did make enquiries from the Crown attorney and asked him to review the matter and the reports relating to it.

There is nothing to indicate the suggestion that the marijuana was placed in the premises in order to commence a prosecution. The indication is that the marijuana was discovered by chance when another examination was taking place for a separate, different purpose.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nipissing has a question of this Minister?

Mr. R. S. Smith: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

As stated by the Attorney General last year, will all areas of the province be serviced by a full-time judge in the provincial family courts on April 1 of this year?

When will the appointment for a full-time provincial family court judge be made in the Nipissing district?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, most areas of the province will be shortly served, I think, by full-time judges. There is a transitional period. It was our purpose to try to seek and obtain judges to serve full time in the short period of time we allowed. We hope we may accomplish this. I have not at the moment been able to obtain a full-time judge for the Nipissing district.

Mr. R. S. Smith: As a supplementary, would the Attorney General consider the appointment of a full-time judge to serve not only Nipissing but some of the adjoining districts where it is evident that a full-time judge is not needed in one district?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is our policy, Mr. Speaker. I think I outlined this very fully when we were introducing and debating the legislation of The Provincial Courts Act, to have particularly the judges of the juvenile and family courts serve more than one county or more than one area, perhaps two, three or more, depending on the amount of the work. This part of our policy and we have it always before us in seeking appointments.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming has a question for the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Jackson: Mr. Speaker, a question of the Minister of Labour:

Can the Minister explain the reason for the drastic increase in industrial injuries in 1968, as stated by a workmen's compensation board spokesman to the Globe and Mail, March 4, in spite of the much-publicized and costly programme of the accident prevention association?

Hon. Mr. Bales: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question, there has not been a drastic increase in industrial accidents in Ontario. Claims reported to the workmen's compensation board in 1968 totalled 379,228 compared with 374,670 in 1967. That is an increase of 1.2 per cent. The employed Ontario labour force covered by The Workmen's Compensation Act increased by 3.4 per cent during that same period.

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have an answer to a question from the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent), that I have had for about a week. I wonder if he has returned?

Mr. Speaker: Provided the member is in the House, there is no problem. What is the number?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Number 581, Mr. Speaker. The question was in two parts. The first part was: what are the terms of the contract of the new director of the centennial project? The answer to that is the new director general of the centennial centre of science and technology, Mr. Douglas Omand, is a member of the civil service of Ontario and the terms of his employment are governed by The Public Service Act and the regulations thereunder.

In answer to the second part, the salary for the position is established by the civil service commission with the approval of Treasury board. They have not as yet completed that process.

The second question: Why is it necessary to have a continuing consulting contract with the retiring director, who is now living in England, and what are the terms of his contract?

The retiring director general, Mr. O'Dea, has agreed to join the centre's staff as senior scientific advisor because of his long experience in this field, his intimate knowledge of the development of the centre and a special knowledge of the international aspects of the science museum field.

At present, the centre has orders for artifacts and exhibits placed overseas in the following numbers: United Kingdom, 25; Netherlands, 19; Germany, 4. The services of the senior scientific advisor will be required in these countries for direct attention to the quality and specifications of this material and in addition he will travel elsewhere in Europe on special assignments, primarily to other scientific museums to consider the future adoption and acquisition of exhibits for the centre.

The terms of his contract provide for attendance at my direction either in Ontario, the United Kingdom or elsewhere and provides that during the term of the contract, he is an employee of the government of Ontario and will accept no other employment. Other arrangements, travelling expenses and so on, are the same as those of any member of the civil service.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, am I permitted to ask a supplementary question?

Hon. Mr. Auld: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to answer it in my estimates.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister has said he will answer in the estimates, which means he declines the question now.

Mr. Sargent: Thank you.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I should like to direct an inquiry to you most courteously in the light of your special and peculiar responsibilities for conduct of affairs in this House. And I should like to ask you because I genuinely would like to know from you what was the basis upon which the CBC came in to this Chamber today?

I have only rumour to go on and as far as I was made aware by rumour bouncing off the walls, they were to come here for a one-hour period. I observed that when the Treasurer sat down he had been on the camera for two hours and 15 minutes and I had assumed the reason they came in was to broadcast the Budget address throughout the length and breadth of Ontario. But then I carefully took note that even after he sat down the cameras ground away for quite an extensive period of time after that until you finally managed to get them to turn off the lights, under which we had suffered for a protracted period of time.

I take it that following the Budget address the further photography of the proceedings of the House is meant for replay at some later time.

Very genuinely and very courteously, I direct this enquiry to you as the guardian of the affairs of this House. I only want to add that for a long time I have looked, with a very jaundiced eye, on their intrusion into the precincts of the House, into these lobbies out here which are set aside for the use of members, and their television cables and cameras, the portable machines can be found almost any day.

A library was set aside, a reading room right out here, and I point to this section of the appurtenances for the benefit of members. They have sequestered that room, day after day, for their television recording. Not only the CBC, but all sorts of electronic reproduction devices have been used. Their cables can be found a great personal risk in the lobbies on this side most days as they interview the member for High Park, on that side, the Attorney General on the other, at the same time, for two channels. And now, they have come into the House.

As I say, in addition to the original hour that they were to be in here to televise the address of the Treasurer, they were here a good deal longer. I would judge at an estimate, something like two hours and 30 or 45 minutes.

I am one, and I have no embarrassment in saying it whatsoever, who is very, very jealous of the rights, privileges and prerogatives of this House. I do not think, really, I extend or exaggerate my role as an elected member here, in saying to you that before drastic changes are made in the conduct of the business of the House, I would say most courteously, I am owed some explanation or some preview by you, as a member, as to just what is the basis for the change of the conduct of the affairs. Although I want to add finally, that—

Mr. Speaker: I am ruling that the hon. member has now made his point.

Mr. Sopha: In other words, you are going to interrupt me before I am finished?

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon member—

Mr. Sopha: I want you to know I treat that as consummate rudeness, and I will sit down.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member does not display towards the Speaker and other members of this House those attributes which he expects us to express.

Mr. Sopha: May I rise on a point of order? What right have you got to get up—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was on a point of order.

Mr. Sopha: To get up and predetermine my remarks made to you? By what right do you do that before I have finished my point? I am not going to go on for an hour.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: By what right does the hon. member get up when the Speaker is on his feet?

Mr. Sopha: I am not going to go on for an hour, but I was merely making my point to you, courteously asking you for an explanation to let me know under what basis this change was made.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

The hon. Minister is quite correct and the hon. member for Sudbury has, this afternoon, indicated that the rules of the House really do not apply in some places from my observations.

I would say to the hon. member that this would appear to be another case similar to the space matter in which the hon. member was so involved. If the hon. member would discuss the matter with his leader and perhaps with his caucus—I have only discussed it with his leader—he would know the basis upon which this arrangement was made and by agreement between the leaders of the three parties.

Now, if the hon. member does not wish to accept the arrangements made by his leader then, of course, I will be glad to protect his personal rights—his separate rights as a member of this Assembly. But until I am otherwise advised, I am certainly of the opinion that I have the right and duty to follow the determination of matters as made by the leaders of the three parties in this House. And that, I may say to the hon. member for Sudbury, is the answer to his question and to his point of order.

Mr. Bullbrook: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order? Am I correct in understanding then, in your reply to my colleague, that the leaders of the three parties of this House will dictate the actions and functions of this House? If so, I take strong issue with that.

Mr. Speaker: Well, it is obvious we are not talking about the same thing, or the same way.

What Mr. Speaker has been trying to say is, that this House is run in accordance with the rules of the House which can be changed any time by the members, and in accordance with the arrangements made by the members, which normally are made in their own caucuses and communicated in certain instances with respect to speeches to Mr. Speaker by the whips; in certain other instances to Mr. Speaker by the party leader.

Now, so far as Mr. Speaker is concerned, if it is not the desire to have the House operate on that basis then, of course, I suspect that we might have a considerable amount of chaos as is evidenced by what has been occurring this afternoon. On the other hand, it might be well that every member should be able to have the House operate in accordance with his wish, although 116 wishes would make it very difficult for Mr. Speaker or anyone else to operate the House or have it operated.

Now, I would say to the hon. member for Sarnia that certainly, so far as Mr. Speaker is concerned, he has no desire to operate the House on the basis of the agreement of the leaders of the parties if he has any reason to believe that the leaders of the parties do not represent their party caucus in these matters.

Mr. Deans: Maybe they need a change of leadership.

Mr. Sopha: I want to rise on another point of order, and I will make this one briefer than the last one.

As I understand, the operation of the mother of Parliaments at Westminster, one of the most sacred principles inhering in that great institution is that many things governing the conduct of affairs are done by unanimous consent of the members.

Because that takes account of the high prestige, the great respect shown for individual members of the House, I say to you, with great respect, sir, that if you change drastically as occurred this afternoon in the conduct of affairs in our House, then it is something of a distortion of your function if you do not do it from your Throne there, by making at clear and didactic statement of the nature of the change, so that we are all aware, and the approval of each and every one of us is in a position to be given at that time.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, on that point of order—

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough West had my eye first.

Mr. Lewis: I would like to second one aspect of those remarks in terms of your own prerogatives, sir. I have no doubt that the leaders met and came to a certain conclusion which was communicated to you, and I also have no doubt that the leaders had very little manoeuvrability as to the conclusion to which they could come. As one member of this House, I do not like to be dictated to by technology. I have no objection in the world to the television cameras being in this Chamber on a perpetual basis, or viewing the events in this House at various times and those events take place, whatever they may be.

But I do object to the fact that the House rearranges its business precisely to facilitate the requirements of the media. I do not want to, in any sense, jeopardize the experiment because I think it was important and I am glad it took place, and it took a great deal to have it intervened. I think the Provincial Treasurer, within the limitations of reading of the address, performed admirably. I think that we may have finally our foot in the door.

But I do not think, sir, that we should have our affairs ordered by external forces to this Legislature, and in that the members for Sudbury and Sarnia are entirely correct, that the members of this House might hereafter be collectively approached.

Hon. Mr. White: Well, they were, they were.

Mr. Lewis: Hereafter I said.

Hon. Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order, I think it should be said that the leader of our party speaks for our party, although that apparently is not the case for the parties opposite.

Mr. Sopha: Here is the trouble maker—

Hon. Mr. White: Now, this has been a most interesting experiment, sir, and I think it is entirely fitting that the people of Ontario should have the opportunity to enter into this Chamber and to participate, shall we say, in the deliberations and the considerations that take place here on a variety of issues. This was the first and perhaps imperfect experiment and one I hope that will be continued.

I am wondering, sir, if you yourself, or perhaps you with some member or representative from each party could not confer with the CBC to see if there is not a better way of handling it. I observed last night that there were 70 lights positioned around this room. I notice four cameras. It contrasts so vividly with the most modern television technology which we see in operation on other settings.

I am just wondering if there is not a better and easier way to do it, where the mechanics would not intrude on the behaviour and the exchange of communication that is actually taking place here.

Another thing I would like to suggest to you, sir, is that some attempt be made to analyze this on a cost benefit relationship. I noticed in the Canadian magazine, the day before yesterday that it cost $160,000 to send Canada's Olympic team to Mexico, and $930,000 to send the CBC technicians and reporters.

I talked to a couple of those reporters, as a matter of fact, a couple of those newsmen, and they informed me that the 115 people sent by CBC constituted one of the largest delegations there, notwithstanding the—

Mr. E. R. Good (Waterloo North): That still does not make it a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order! It is very hard for me to determine whether they are points of order or whether they are speeches, whether they come from this side of the House or that side of the House and I do my best.

May I say to the hon. members that I bow to their wishes as expressed, though presumably it is a wish of a small number of the members but their rights are just as important as anyone else's. While we are on the subject, I would like to ask whether it is the view of those in the House or whether we should wait until we have a full group here—and how we can be sure that 116 members will be here I do not know—but do the members wish Mr. Speaker to allow a continuation of the televising of the budget debate in order that the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the NDP have time on the CBC?

Now, if you do then that is fine. If the members do not, then I will certainly take steps to see that the cameras do not appear until we have a unanimous decision of the House as suggested.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, sir, I do not know whether the Speaker is being marginally facetious, I will take him at his word. There was not any suggestion in what was said that the televising should not go on. Obviously it should go on in terms that had been agreed to.

What one is saying that hereafter, in the televising process of this House, that it is not to be a series of set pieces.

Mr. Speaker: That was not the argument placed before Mr. Speaker by the member for Sudbury.

Mr. Lewis: I am not sure that it was not the argument of the member for Sudbury. I think the member for Sudbury can well explain himself, but I think he was saying that if—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member is on a point of order.

Mr. Lewis: I am on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think in terms of the point I wanted to make, that what the member for Sudbury is alluding to is that if one is going to have media in this Chamber, one that catches the flavour of the Chamber, the nature of the Chamber, without impeding the members and without intruding on the legislative process that that is entirely appropriate. A series of set piece mechanisms is not an accurate reflection of this Chamber. That hereafter, we hope, in the televising process that it might be done on a rather enlarged basis which would convey what occurs in this parliamentary chamber rather than a distortion of it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, Mr. Speaker, I really do not think this was the point that was raised by the hon. member for Sudbury. He spoke quite properly on the rights of an individual member, to speak up independently, and I recognize that right as I am sure every other member does. But, I do not know, sir, how else you could run a parliamentary system except by the method in which we are doing it and that is, the three leaders getting together and arriving at a conclusion, at a decision.

Now if any one of these leaders at such a meeting feels he does not have the complete support of his caucus when he sits down together with his counterparts, the other leaders, all he has to do is say, "I cannot give you the guarantee that my caucus will follow this agreement." Then we will follow from that to whatever agreement or disagreement will be arrived at. But, I do not know how else, Mr. Speaker, you could ever run the parliamentary system, under the method of parliament system that we operate, because obviously as you have said, sir, you cannot on every particular subject ask the view of 117 members. It would be impossible to operate.

Mr. Speaker: I was not, as the hon. member for Scarborough West claims, trying to be slightly facetious. I was merely trying to find out, following what the hon. member for Sudbury said—and I, as well as the Minister and the others—recognize his point whether under the circumstances particularly set out by the Minister of Correctional Services, Mr. Speaker is entirely as wrong as would appear. In any event I do wish to be sure that we do not have any repetition of this unfortunate aftermath. If there should be, as has been planned by the leaders of the parties, a further set piece TV Budget debate broadcast, then I would like to have the views of the hon. member for Sudbury on that.

Mr. Sopha: Well I can give them to you very briefly. Nothing I said this afternoon ought to be taken in any way as being any inhibition on any plans that have been made, and my question remains. I am still waiting to hear from you as a result of my courteous request as to what the basis is upon which this change is made in the conduct of the business of the House, and I still have not heard from you.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: It is all right if you do not choose to tell me.

Mr. Speaker: I will be glad to take the hon. member's question, which I do not quite understand, under advisement. I will be in touch with him, because this seems to be no place for it as there is not the necessary communication to enable me to know exactly what he is asking. I thought I had covered it, and perhaps now—have we done with this point?

Mr. Sargent: Would the Speaker advise who approached who? Did the government approach CBC or did the CBC approach the government?

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid it is not either a point of order nor is this question one that—

Mr. Sargent: But it is very important that we know this—what was the motivation behind it?

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member please allow me to complete the answer? I said in the first place that in my opinion it is not a point of order and in the second place—as I was about to say—I do not know. That was not communicated to me. My communications were with the leaders of the parties and thereafter with the technicians of the CBC and the local people who look after things here as to the arrangements.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Speaker, I think it is associated with the hon. member for Sudbury's point of order. An observation would seem to me to be appropriate in that you will have to be put in a position, Mr. Speaker, to determine whether or not in these circumstances the leaders, in fact, speak for their caucuses.

Mr. Bullbrook: The Minister has missed the point.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No I have not, Mr. Speaker. Let me complete it. If that can be determined in each instance, presumably the problem is resolved but I suggest in deference to your own position, Mr. Speaker, if I may, that at that point in time when you cannot assume that the leaders are speaking for their caucuses, then I suggest you are put in a very difficult position.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Downsview has the floor.

Mr. Singer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was going to rise a few moments ago in reply to the hon. member for London South (Mr. White), but now that the Treasurer has made exactly the same point, I want to state just as firmly and as forcefully as I can that we will not stand for this kind of perversion from a logical and reasonable point of order raised by the hon. member for Sudbury and the member for Sarnia.

They were expressing certain questions that had arisen in their minds as is their right and by no right whatsoever, Mr. Speaker, can either the Treasurer or the hon. member for London South, pervert that into the kind of perversion that they are now perpetrating. I object most strenuously to that, Mr. Speaker, and if there is any doubt in the Treasurer's mind, I continue to say it is a deliberate perversion.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member for Sudbury, the hon. member for Sarnia, and the hon. member for Scarborough West, have all made the same point directed to Mr. Speaker, one that Mr. Speaker has not answered or dealt with yet. I have merely said that I would have to take it under advisement, in view of the situation, and deal with it as I deem best after I consider it because it is an important point.

I agree—the hon. member for Sarnia was quite right, because he elucidated it in a manner that I could understand. I am afraid I was a little lost before that. So that matter, as far as I can see, is closed for the moment, it will not be forgotten and I have the views of the hon. members. I will, in the future of course, be very chary about making any arrangement by any agreement about anything no matter how it is made. Is there anything further on this point of order?

Mr. Sopha: I want to say one last thing so that you, sir, will be absolutely clear. There would not be a person in this House who would disagree with me in the enunciation of the principle that just nothing in relation to the conduct of the affairs of this House, the alteration of its business, can be done without your approval. No person in this chamber, be he Prime Minister, Minister, or member of the Opposition, has any jurisdiction in any way concerning the character of what goes on in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will realize that there is a rule against repetition. He is now repeating his original point. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce has a point?

Mr. Sargent: I just wanted to establish a point, Mr. Speaker, with the Treasurer, but he has left now so I will leave it.

Mr. Speaker: Is there anything further before we proceed to the orders of the day?

Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The first order, resuming consideration of the propositions of the government of Ontario submitted to the continuing committee of officials on the constitution as of December, 1968, sessional paper number 83.

CONSTITUTION DEBATE

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, in February of 1968 I had the good fortune of being one of the three observers in the Opposition to attend the federal-provincial conference in Ottawa. I note that the other day when the hon. Minister of Family and Social Services was speaking in this debate, he said that when he attended the recent federal provincial Conference that he was overwhelmed with the idea of being there.

I was not overwhelmed; but it was certainly an occasion that I enjoyed and it has sharpened my interest in Canadian constitutional problems. Unquestionably, Mr. Speaker, the last number of years Canada has been in a cultural and in a constitutional crisis. It may well be said that throughout our entire history, we have always had some kind of a crisis involving our constitutional background and differences in our culture that exist in this country.

No doubt the quiet revolution in the province of Quebec has given a greater urgency to these problems. The quiet revolution in Quebec, Mr. Speaker, I believe, has been good, not only for the province of Quebec, but it has been good for Canada as a whole. Whatever differences may exist between Quebec on the one hand, and the rest of Canada on the other, I believe can be solved through goodwill and co-operation.

It is highly debatable whether Canada would have ever existed as a nation if Quebec was not a part of this country. We might very easily have been swallowed by that great giant to the south of us, and if it had not been for the determination of the people of Quebec to retain their own language, and institutions it is unlikely that we could have continued over the past 100 years.

Mr. Speaker, no matter what complaints the province may make about les anglais, as they call us, whether we are English or not, there is no doubt that in the fabric of what we call Canada, the people of Quebec have had far more opportunities to use their language and to use their culture than if they had been part of the United States.

In turn Canada, today as in the past, protects itself. The very fact that we have Quebec in Canada is a major reason why we are able to remain an independent country.

When I attended the federal-provincial conference in February 1968, I was very perturbed as to what the future might hold for this country, but the good luck that we have had over the years, continued to hold out. Many feared that Premier Daniel Johnson would be too extreme in his demands for the province of Quebec, and quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I was greatly impressed with Premier Johnson. Having the opportunity to sit there and observe the various politicians from across Canada who attended, I must admit that Premier Johnson, even though I disagreed with him on many occasions, and Prime Minister Lester Pearson impressed me as being the two ablest politicians in that room in the Parliament Buildings in Ottawa.

However, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I was favourably impressed. In fact, at that time, and mind you this was February of 1968, I was almost enthusiastic about the excellent performance of the Premier of the province of Ontario. Mind you, he has done some backsliding since that time, but in February 1968, at least in dealing with the so-called French fact in Canada, he was cool, calm and he spoke common sense.

The province of Ontario, simply because of its size, the numbers of its people and the tremendous industrial and agricultural wealth, wields a tremendous influence in the affairs of Canada. Had the province of Ontario been represented by an Oliver Mowat or a Mitchell Hepburn or a George Drew or a Leslie Frost, it would have been a national disaster.

These men, in my view, represent a very narrow parochial viewpoint. In fact, Mr. Speaker, when one of your predecessors would hold the annual Speaker's dinner, he would have Mr. Frost (at that time the Premier) speak to the members of the Legislature at the Speaker's dinner. He would like to go on at length about what Oliver Mowat thought of the so-called constitution of Canada, and about the federation of the various provinces of Canada. It seems one of the surprising things in the history of this country that so many of us who are now Liberals and representing the Liberal Party, tend to repeat what Sir John A. Macdonald said and a man like Mr. Leslie Frost seemed to repeat, and often many of the Conservative members repeat what Oliver Mowat said. Oliver Mowat, as you know, in those days was probably the most successful Liberal in the history of the province of Ontario.

I, basically, and this is what I base my remarks on, would accept the viewpoint of Sir John A. Macdonald on confederation. I will let the Conservatives have Oliver Mowat. You can have all of him.

There is no doubt in my mind that the present Premier of Ontario, by sponsoring the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference, and by his reasonable and co-operative approach at the federal provincial conference in February, 1968, made a very worthwhile and credible contribution to the history of this country. No doubt in the career of the present Premier of Ontario, it was a high-water mark. After having had the pleasure of witnessing the credible performance of our Premier in Ottawa, in February, 1968, Mr. Speaker, I was absolutely dumbfounded by his incredible performance at the recent Federal Provincial Constitutional Conference.

What a stupid and ridiculous remark to call Medicare, as advocated by the present federal administration, a Machiavellian fraud. Medical insurance has been a political issue for years. Surely, it is no secret that the endless years—in fact, it seems to me for the better part of the 20th century—the Liberal Party has been promising medical insurance.

In recent federal election campaigns it has been a major election promise. Finally, at long last and despite all the lobbying of the various colleges of physicians and surgeons across Canada; despite the combined efforts and lobbying of insurance companies and just about every mossback in the country, the Pearson government hammered through the medical insurance scheme, just as it had a few years previously hammered through a hospital insurance scheme. I might add to that, they also brought through the Canada Pension Plan, and if the election results of the last federal election are any indication, particularly in the province of Ontario, medical insurance is heartily endorsed by the people of this province.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken on the subject of health insurance on many occasions, and no doubt I will be speaking on the subject on many more occasions as I, along with others, attempted to drag the Tory Mule into the 20th century. So I do not intend to dwell on the subject in this debate. But let me say this, that medical insurance, or if you prefer to call it Medicare, is a much needed and long overdue reform.

No doubt OMSIP has helped a number of our citizens. It has also been very kind to the insurance companies and there is no question in my mind and in that of the public as a whole, that what we need in this country is a public plan that favours nobody, that we take the profit out of health insurance. This government has continued to drag its heels on this question. In fact, at one time, before the recent conference in Ottawa started, I gathered the impression from the Premier's speeches that he intended to do what he could and cause as much trouble as he could, unless there was a settlement of what he called the fiscal arrangements.

Neither the Premier of Ontario, nor Mr. Johnson have ever gone to the extremes that they were going to go to or that they hinted at. This is why I am grateful that at least common sense has prevailed.

Mr. Speaker, in closing on the medical insurance, believe me, this House is going to hear more about this subject in the not-too-distant future. Unquestionably, Mr. Speaker, the medical scheme as advocated by the federal government is far superior to any of the provincial schemes enforced by the province of Ontario or any other provincial government with the exception of the province of Saskatchewan. I have said before whether or not we agree with some of the legislation of the Douglas administration in Saskatchewan, there is no doubt that the medical insurance that they introduced in that province was a pilot project that has been copied literally across the country. There is no question that what happened in the 1940's in Saskatchewan has become law from coast to coast, and I give his administration full credit for that.

Mr. Speaker, no matter how much I disagree with the Premier of this province and his attitude towards medical insurance and on some other matters, I am indeed grateful that there has been no backsliding on his part on the use of the French language. We have created political institutions in Canada of which we may well be proud. No doubt our institutions can be improved like almost anything else these days; they can certainly be updated. But in comparison with the rest of the world, we have been extremely fortunate in this country.

I think we can credit this good fortune in large part to English common law and political institutions which have been transplanted to this country, an aid to all of North America, at least the United States and Canada.

As I understand our democratic system, Mr. Speaker, I believe that our political institutions should create as much freedom as possible, and that our cultural institutions should use freedom as fully as possible. Freedom cannot be used as fully as possible in this country unless we respect and encourage the dual linguistic parentage of our country, one French-speaking and the other English-speaking. I unhesitatingly support propositions 11, 12 and 13 as set forth in a book entitled "Propositions of the Ontario government submitted to the continuing committee of officials on the constitution as of December, 1968. I am pleased that in proposition 11, the government mentions that although Canada is a bilingual country, it is of a multi-cultural character.

Too often in the major dialogue concerning English Canada and French Canada, the millions who are not of French or British extraction have not been given their due credit for their contribution to this country.

Proposition 12 of the government proposal states that all governments should provide, wherever practical, public services in English and French languages. If Ontario and the rest of Canada is to live up to any hope for a Canadian Charter of Human Rights, this proposal is essential.

Just as essential is proposition 13, where it is stated all Canadian parents should, as a matter of equity, be able to have their children educated in either or both the official languages of this country. And for those of us who are English-speaking, it is not only an act of goodwill, but an endeavour in self improvement to learn to speak French.

Occasionally you will still hear the odd person who seems to be outraged because those children of other than French background may be taught French. To me such an attitude is asinine. Not only is an individual's knowledge of French helpful insofar as contributing to the unity of the country, but even in enjoying the world as it is today, it is a tremendous asset. And when we consider the ever-growing potential of tourism, the opportunities we have to travel, and even greater opportunities our children will have to travel, a knowledge of the French language is a tremendous asset.

Mr. Speaker, I belong to and I believe in a strong central government in this country. There is no question in my mind as I read Canadian history that Sir John A. Macdonald and the other Fathers of Confederation meant to have the central government as the real power in this country. In fact, one would gather, particularly from reading biographies of Sir John A. Macdonald and reading his personal papers, that he envisioned provincial legislatures as glorified county councils.

If this had happened, perhaps it would not have been in the best interests of Canada as a whole. Certainly, the Fathers of Confederation gave no thought to any two nations theory, or special status for anybody. I do not hold—

Mr. E. Dunlop (York-Forest Hill): Why did they give a separate civil law to Quebec? They must have thought of it.

Mr. Trotter: They acknowledge that. But certainly, if I may take up that interjection, Mr. Speaker, there was no intention—this is my interpretation—that these provinces were virtually sovereignties unto themselves, almost what you might call a compact theory. I believe the Hon. Attorney General of this province at one time held what they call the compact theory, that four sovereign states got together and created something, a fifth entity, almost out of themselves.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): That is what he said.

Mr. Trotter: Now, there is no doubt that in various sections of The British North America Act we have allowed for the special privilege of the French language, and for the French civil law. We might say it is looked at not as a separate state, but as a different culture, and we are respecting that culture, but not two nations. It is one nation, and this is where there may be a cultural difference as to a nationalistic difference. I am not questioning for a moment that we should respect the differences in language. We should respect the differences in our culture, but in one nation.

I do not hold to the theory that the four original provinces entered into an irrevocable contract. In other words, "We may have a Canada today, I do not like it, let us quit, let us go home." I think that once that nation was formed it was here to stay. Lord Caernarvon, the British politician responsible for introducing The British North America Act into the House of Lords, said in the second reading of The British North America Act, on February 19, 1867, "We are laying the foundation of a great state, perhaps one which at a future date may even overshadow this country."

That was a pretty wild thing to say at that time, Mr. Speaker, when you compare Great Britain to what we now know as Canada. But, whatever differences we may have amongst ourselves, Mr. Speaker, I believe that Canada is one and indivisible. And perhaps when Lord Caernarvon said that they were laying the foundation of a great state that would overshadow Great Britain, he was just trying to please some of the colonial boys who were watching him up in the gallery. But it is a real possibility, Mr. Speaker, that with our land and with our resources, he spoke more truth than he realized.

Mr. Speaker, the world is yet young, and I think that this is a real possibility that this part of North America known as Canada will become a great power in the sense of having tremendous influence. I do not think that we may become a great power. In fact, I hope it will never be necessary nor do not think the possibility is there that we become a great power in what is known in a military sense. It is because I believe that Canada is one and indivisible, Mr. Speaker, that I am opposed to anything that will encourage regionalism in this country.

Because of economic and cultural differences there is bound to be a certain amount of regionalism, but why entrench it? Why entrench it, Mr. Speaker, by permitting the provinces to appoint senators and justices of the Supreme Court of Canada.

This is one major instance where I disagree with Mr. Trudeau and the federal Liberal Party, because this seems to be their policy. The power for such appointments should remain with the federal government. The Tower of Babel would be a monastery garden compared to a Canadian Senate that was loaded with appointees by Bible Bill Aberhart, W. A. C. Bennett, Ross Thatcher, Mitch Hepburn, Maurice Deplessis.

If any changes are to be made in the Senate there is only one reasonable change. Do away with it.

In recent years the Canadian Senate has done some good work. Its committee on aging has made possible better pensions for senior citizens. Its leadership on divorce reform has made possible far more liberal divorce laws. Its defence of James Coyne did much to protect the integrity of the Bank of Canada. Its committee on manpower has done much to improve the cause of retraining of adults and the improvement of wages.

All these things can be credited to two men. Senator Arthur W. Roebuck and Senator David Croll, both from Toronto and both former members of this House, and incidentally both members of the Liberal Party.

In spite of their tremendous personal efforts, it is very difficult to justify the indefinite existence of an institution that is essentially moribund. For the most part, the general public does not listen to what Canadian senators say, and, what is more, they do not care. But I would far rather see the Senate as it is and pray that we have a few Roebucks and Crolls, rather than turn it into a forum to intensify regional differences in this country.

And since Canada has done away with the appeal to the British Privy Council, our Supreme Court in Canada has become an increasingly outstanding institution in this country. At the present time when appointments are made, consideration is given to the French vs. the English-speaking backgrounds of this country. And please, Mr. Speaker, let us not move the court with some joker who may represent the way out views of some passing fancy of a provincial government.

Do you remember the days of Bible Bill Aberhart of Alberta and his funny money ideas? Had The Alberta Bank Act ever become law, the credit of this country and the international money markets could have been greatly harmed. You may recall that Bible Bill even thought that it was a poor idea to pay interest on Alberta bonds until the federal government had to straighten him out. People outside of—

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit me? If he is speaking of changing the personnel of the court, would he express a view as to the thought of creating another court to deal with constitutional matters? That idea has been put forward.

Mr. Trotter: What is wrong with the Supreme Court?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I wanted the hon. member's views.

Mr. Trotter: In fact, I have been impressed, Mr. Speaker, with the individuals who have received appointments. I think they are of excellent calibre and independent minds. I will just give you an example.

You may have one man from Saskatchewan. We may have thought Mr. Justice Emmett Hall would be a conservative man, and yet his judgments and what he has done even outside the court, he is an outstanding man. Mr. Justice Cartwright we always believed may have a very conservative view of life in general. He again has turned out to be an outstanding justice.

These men are capable of dealing with constitutional problems. The American Supreme Court handles all types of cases that literally come within their jurisdiction. I for one would like to see a strong court built up, which we are now doing, but I think it would be a disaster if we encouraged regional differences. Then there is going to be a certain amount probably of political influence no matter what happens. They will always say they are the political strength of the party in power. The personal ideas and prejudices of anyone making the appointment are going to be reflected, in my view.

Mr. Speaker, this may be a good point for me to call it 6.00 o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: In order that the privileges of the members of the House are not impinged upon, it being 6.00 of the clock will be declared by the Speaker. I hope that meets with the approval of the hon. member.

It being 6.00 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, MARCH 4, 1969

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

CONSTITUTIONAL DEBATE

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, before we rose at 6.00 of the clock this evening, I was speaking in regard to the constitutional debate that we have had in this House, and I was emphasizing that I was very much opposed to any changes in the Supreme Court of Canada or in the Senate of Canada, whereby regional differences would be emphasized.

I know that many of the provinces, and I understand the present government of Ontario and even the federal government in Ottawa—Mr. Trudeau's administration—are in favour of the proposal that Senators should be appointed on a regional basis, and also appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada should be made after consulting the various provincial governments across the country.

I think in my mind it would be a very grave error to emphasize, to underline the obvious regional differences that already exist in Canada; and therefore I think it of utmost importance that the federal government continue to make the appointments of the Senate. If they are going to reform the Senate—do away with it.

I am not going to repeat what I said earlier, before we left, but I think that really the public are not listening to what the Senators say, they pay no attention to the Senate. The obvious solution to any senatorial problems that we have in this country is to do away with it.

But most certainly I would not want to emphasize—

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): What is the Tory government going to do if they want to kick half the Cabinet members over there upstairs?

Mr. Trotter: That is their problem. I think they may have to run government more on a business basis then, and quit kicking people upstairs.

But in any event, whether the Senate exists or not, the appointments should not be made at the provincial level where regional differences would be emphasized and underlined. Even more important, I think it is of the utmost importance that we see to it that the federal government does appoint the members of the Supreme Court of Canada.

As I mentioned earlier, can you imagine a strong provincial government being in a position where they could wield the influence to appoint an individual to the bench—let us say such as Bible Bill Aberhart from Alberta—who had a particular idea he wanted to emphasize, such as The Alberta Bank Act, which at one time was a very major item in the politics of Canada. Because such legislation through which Mr. Aberhart wanted to create provincial banks and do away with paying the interest on Alberta bonds—this type of thing would hurt the credit of Canada. A screwball any place, in any province of Canada, could hurt the credit of the country abroad.

Just as a practical example of what could happen to the government of a country if a federal government has no control or is hampered by the supreme court of a country: A number of years ago, back in 1934—and I am using what happened in the United States as an example, which could happen here, I am giving you this as an example—in 1934 when the Roosevelt administration was elected they introduced many reforms. But the members of the Supreme Court of the United States were men of a very conservative bent and they said that many of the laws—in fact such a law as that declaring any child over the age of 14 should not be allowed to work—the Supreme Court of the United States said this is interfering with free enterprise and so; and that law was declared invalid.

A whole procedure developed through which Mr. Roosevelt tried to change the make-up of the supreme court—it was what was called packing the supreme court. He wanted more appointments made. There was a great uproar in the United States; he could not change the legislation. Fortunately, in many respects, the older members of the bench died off and he was able to make new appointments.

You may say, Mr. Speaker, here is a government being able to influence legislation by making appointments to a supreme court. Well in truth they do. But is it not far more democratic that a government that is elected by the people to introduce certain reforms can carry out those reforms? And I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if today in Canada we had a government elected to carry out certain reforms hamstrung by the Supreme Court that depended on provincial politics for its administration—and if you look across the myriad of regions and differences across this country you could have one joker or two jokers on the Supreme Court of Canada that could really hamstring a federal administration—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Trotter: I admit this, Mr. Speaker, there is no question in my mind that there is a certain amount of partisan politics in appointments to the bench. I am not denying that for one moment. But—

Mr. J. Jessiman (Fort William): Old Liberals never die, they put them in the Senate.

Mr. Trotter: No, no! There is no question about it.

But what happens, Mr. Speaker, if you allow what so many of the provincial administrations are asking for today in this country, and what the Trudeau administration seems to favour at this time, is that they listen to what the various provincial governments want in the Supreme Court.

If you get the Duplessis', the Mitch Hepburns, the Aberharts, the W. A. C. Bennetts—

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey South): They are all dead!

Mr. Trotter: Well W. A. C. Bennett is not dead and you would get Conservative men no matter what their party label like Ross Thatcher. You just do not know what will be appointed.

So that I say to the hon. members.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): I agree with that.

Mr. Trotter: I do not care what you call them, but I think when a government is elected in Ottawa from across this country, that the unity of the country will be protected if the power of appointment rests with that administration, both in the Supreme Court of Canada and the Senate.

Certainly there should be consultation, but if you let all these various groups, these pressure groups across this country—and certainly they have existed from time to time—then there is danger to the unity of the country if we make the changes that are now suggested.

Mr. Winkler: The hon. member is wrong.

Mr. Trotter: The hon. member may think so; but I do not expect to convert any old-time Tories over there.

Mr. Speaker, in this book of propositions of the government of Ontario submitted to the continuing committee of officials on the Constitution as of December, 1968, there is a proposal, No. 19 on page 25 of the propositions, that simply astounds me. The first part of it says this:

The Monarch's representative should be appointed for ten years.

Well now by way of explanation, Mr. Speaker, the government says this:

At present, the Monarch's representative is appointed for five years with the option of a renewable term, and since the five-year period gives the holder of the office a transient character, and since renewals have been the practice, a ten-year term is suggested.

They state, Mr. Speaker, that the Monarch's representative is a transient character. In my mind this is quite true. I think, and I am quite concerned and certainly believe, that the Monarch's representative is a transient character.

Why in the world should we saddle ourselves with an individual who at best is a distinguished patron of the arts, like Vincent Massey; or a gracious and kindly man like the late Governor General Vanier, who no doubt did much to foster goodwill between English and French-speaking segments of the Canadian population. But why should we put them there legally for ten years.

When you look at the record of Governors General you may point with pride at men like Vincent Massey or Governor General Vanier; or at the time of Confederation, Lord Monck, a very outstanding individual. We had Lord Alexander after World War II, a distinguished soldier. We had Lord Tweedsmuir, the literary genius of his time.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): I am glad that he passed over Bessborough.

Mr. Trotter: But if you look at the rest of them you will find, sir, if you look at the record, that, literally, the appointments to the position of Governor General has been used by the British government as a dignified dumping ground for royalty's relatives and for high born aristocrats who had nothing particularly worthwhile to offer. Now that is the history of that office.

Mr. Sopha: They sent some pretty bad people.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): What about Lord Alexander?

Mr. Trotter: I mentioned Lord Alexander; I mentioned Lord Tweedsmuir, unquestionably a distinguished man; and Lord Monck.

Mr. Sopha: How about Sir Francis Bond Head?

Mr. Trotter: Or Roy Willingdon or Athlone or Bessborough; let us not go into details of those. The office of the Governor General, Mr. Speaker, for all practical purposes is the same as that of the Lieutenant-Governor. He is there, primarily, to go to work on the tea and cookie circuit. When I read proposal 19, that the Monarch's representative should be appointed for ten years, when I read that I just stare in disbelief. This Tory government is even more antidiluvian than I thought it was!

Now Mr. Speaker, I well realize that under The British North America Act vast powers are given to the Governor General; which powers in fact are given to the Prime Minister and the Cabinet. We all know that the Prime Minister is not even mentioned in The British North America Act. But despite the fact that the Governor General is prominently mentioned in The British North America Act he is, in truth, a glorified social convenor. To put him there arbitrarily for ten years is ridiculous.

In my mind his main function is to save the time of the Prime Minister and the major federal Cabinet Ministers so that they do not need to go about the country, except at election time, patting little children on the head and shaking hands with senior citizens. The PM's time, and the Cabinet Ministers' time, are better spent looking after the government of the country. Why in the world the province of Ontario should want to make it arbitrary that a Governor General should be appointed for ten years is utterly beyond belief.

Mr. Speaker, proposition 28 of the provincial government's proposal concerns the Lieutenant-Governor. That proposal says:

The titular head of the executive branch of the provincial government should be appointed by the Monarch's representative on the advice of the Prime Minister of the province and the name of the office changed to conform with this new situation.

But as you know, Mr. Speaker, the Lieutenant-Governor is now appointed by the federal government, and not on the advice of the Prime Minister of Ontario. What the Lieutenant-Governor was supposed to do when his job was originally conceived has aroused a great deal of debate. My understanding was that the Lieutenant-Governor was to represent the federal government in the province. Others say that he is to represent the Monarch when the Governor General is not available. In my view, the office today is utterly redundant.

Surely the Chief Justice of Ontario could attend the opening of the Legislature and nod his head and say: "Pray be seated". It is just as easy for him to do it.

Most certainly, Mr. Speaker, such individuals as Mr. Keiller Mackay, a man with an outstanding legal and literary background as well as having almost as much personal charm as his wife; or again the present incumbent, the Hon. Ross Macdonald, who has a very distinguished public career as member of Parliament, a Cabinet Minister, a Senator; these men saved the office of Lieutenant-Governor from falling into completely low estate.

But the office of Lieutenant-Governor, in my view, serves no real useful purpose in modern democratic government in this country. If such an office relieves government leaders of onerous tasks on the tea and cookie circuit, then possibly the office is worth retaining; but if any change is to be made—do not reform it, do away with it.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with proposition 9 of the provincial government's brief, wherein it recommends that the reservation of provincial legislation by the Lieutenant-Governor and its disallowance by the Governor General-in-Council are incompatible with the principles and practices of contemporary federalism. These powers should be removed from the constitution. This is what the provincial government said and this I certainly agree with. But in my mind, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt about it; the office of Governor General and that of the Lieutenant-Governor, represent the dried, shrivelled husks of an outworn tradition and in our day and age inhibit the development of a meaningful Canadian nationalism.

Mr. Speaker, just about everybody in Canada agrees with proposition 39 of the provincial government's proposals, and that is, an amending formula for a constitution must be a written part of Canada's constitution and that any amendments, or anything else having to do with the government of Canada, should be completely taken out of the hands of the Parliament of Great Britain.

You know, it is a fantastic thing, Mr. Speaker, that we have been able to go for 100 years and yet even at this late date, if we want to change our constitution, or change The British North America Act, we still have to take a trip over to England.

Mind you, we cannot blame the Parliament of Westminster for this, it is simply because we ourselves have not requested any change. And the members of Parliament at Westminster must think that we are really a strange people that, after all this period of time, despite the accomplishments of the Canadian people in numerous fields of endeavour, we are still unable to amend our own constitution.

Mr. Lawlor: The member skated over that disallowance part. Is he serious about that, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Trotter: In answer to the question of the hon. member for Lakeshore, Mr. Speaker, I think in practice the power of disallowance of the federal government has really become outmoded. I think it has been used only a total of 112 times, 100 times before 1924. Even since 1924 it has been used only 12 times.

For practical politics, a federal government today does not disallow provincial legislation, it usually challenges it in the Supreme Court of Canada. I would rather take something like The Alberta Bank Act, which seemed to be completely ultra vires to The BNA Act. I would rather, instead of disallowing it, even as a matter of practical politics, I would give it to the Supreme Court of Canada in order for it to be decided.

So that I really would take away from both the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor any power of disallowance. And I would agree with the provincial government in their proposals in that matter.

But, Mr. Speaker, because we have been so unsuccessful in agreeing among ourselves on the simple point of being able to amend our own constitution, I hold little hope in the immediate future—I emphasize the immediate future—that we are going to be able to rewrite The British North America Act.

I would agree with a number of the propositions of the provincial government—such as proposition number 2, where it is advocated that the language in terms of The British North America Act should be changed and obsolete clauses repealed. You know, Mr. Speaker, if you go through that Act it is obvious that so many of the sections are completely obsolete. They do not mention the word Cabinet, or the Prime Minister.

The real administrative and political power in this country is with your Prime Minister and your Cabinet, and yet it is not even mentioned in The British North America Act. This may seem ridiculous, but the only thing I can say, Mr. Speaker, as a practical politician, is that it works. It is very obvious that a great many sections of the Act are completely inconsistent with the character of Canadian democracy as it is today, but at this point in our history, I would be opposed to scrapping The British North America Act and attempting to rewrite it completely.

During the 20th century there have been a number of revolutions in Latin American republics and, after each revolution, a glorious new constitution is written giving rights and freedom to everybody. To read some of these constitutions you would think that the banana republics in Latin America were lands of milk and honey. But when you read what actually goes on in some of these countries, you are mighty glad to be able to live in Canada, and more particularly in the province of Ontario.

One of the guiding principles in democratic politics is to work with what one has and, at the same time, work for what one hopes to have. Despite all the criticisms that may be made of Canadian politics and Canadian politicians, and despite all the problems, arguments, dialogues and debates that we may have with each other and among ourselves, our ingrained traditions and customs have taught us that we profit both economically and in the quality of our living by harmony rather than by conflict.

I would like to see our constitution brought up to date, Mr. Speaker, and I would hope that some Canadian politician or civil servant would have the inspiration of a Thomas Jefferson, or a Tom Payne, to write an inspiring preamble to our constitution. I know the provincial government, in one of their proposals, said we should have a preamble to our constitution.

This I would agree with, and I hope this is your aim; for this is our aim and the sooner it is done the better. But my own personal opinion, as of this moment, is that the present breed of politician in Canada, although able and practical in many ways, will not produce it. Too many provincial politicians in Canada want to be big frogs in small puddles.

Mr. Speaker, I support a Canadian charter of human rights. I think the vast majority of Canadians do. In fact, Mr. Speaker, to be against a bill of rights, as I have said on a number of occasions before, is to be against motherhood; and frankly, I think that the rights, probably with the exception of linguistic rights under Mr. Trudeau's proposed bill of rights, are really entrenched in the English common law.

There is, Mr. Speaker, a great difference, in some respects, between the history of our law in Canada and that in the United States. When the Americans started back in 1776, or after they had had their various pre-constitutional meetings—I believe it would be in 1783 when they actually got under way—they had literally broken away from the past completely and had started anew, and as a result they wrote their bill of rights.

We, in this country, have more or less evolved; we have taken the laws of England as of 1792, and, of course, with those laws of 1792 we took habeas corpus and freedom of speech and many of the other laws and traditions and moves that had been part of the history of the British Isles.

Mr. Speaker, I support a charter of human rights—I think the vast majority of Canadians do—and I think that in this day and age, even though we may feel that we have inherited a bill of rights, that our freedom of speech, our freedom of expression, trial by jury, the freedom of the secret vote—these are all with us—but in this day and age, everything we can do to emphasize these vital rights is of importance, because we must be vigilant in order to protect them.

In too many countries in the world today, the rights and freedoms that have been taken for granted, have disappeared or have been severely hampered.

John Diefenbaker's much touted Bill of Rights has little practical use in our courts of law, but it most certainly is a most useful document from the point of view of attempting to propagate and instill the great principles of freedom in oncoming generations.

All that Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights has said is that it helped to advertise and instill in the general public the rights that we already have. To my mind, a bill such as that introducing legal aid into the province of Ontario, sponsored by the present Attorney General, has more practical effect in protecting the freedom of the individual in his equality before the law, than Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Trotter: Surely.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am interested to hear him say that he supports the Bill of Rights, the charter of rights, but what I would like him to indicate is his view as to protecting those rights. I am thinking of many constitutions of various countries, many of them outside the western world, as well as emerging colonies of the Commonwealth—formerly the British Commonwealth—who have charters of human rights. But is this an effective way to protect rights or is something like our legal aid programme or the expropriation bill or other particular Acts? Is this the better method to make those rights effective and enforceable and useful to the people you are trying to protect? That is the question.

Mr. Trotter: In my view, looking at this practically and considering our situation in Canada, and what we have, I feel that the practical legislation, such as the legal aid bill, protects the individual more than this thing, the Bill of Rights. I do not think a Bill of Rights as proposed by Mr. Trudeau will get much more effective, insofar as the law is concerned than the Bill of Rights that Mr. John Diefenbaker brought down.

I do not oppose it. I think there are good things in this, and for two reasons. You must be eternally vigilant over what we take for granted—for example, for maybe having the advantage of going to law school. I take for granted some of the things done back in the reign of Charles II, or which go back into the various Toleration Acts that have been passed in Britain and improved upon here. I think of the giving of women the right to vote, which was passed in Manitoba—one of the first Acts in the British Empire.

These things we take for granted, and it does no harm at all to emphasize the Bill of Rights.

Then, going abroad—I will be shortly at the end of my address, Mr. Speaker, but what I want to emphasize is the importance of Canada in the world today. What we take for granted, the rest of the world does not. It is good for us to have a Bill of Rights, because it is very important to so many other people. In their country it is the law.

There is no question in this country. The tradition, the custom, the mores, are almost more important than the law. We just take these things for granted. So that I think they should be emphasized in a Bill of Rights, whether or not they are necessarily arguable in a court of law today.

I do not think John Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights means much in front of the magistrate, or a provincial judge, or any judge, today. It is more or less a statement of what we believe in. But it does no harm, and so I would hope that the Attorney General, who I thought, kind of sloughed this off back in February, 1968—he gave that impression—that we really should emphasize this, more or less, on the basis of the principle and the importance of it.

Mr. Speaker, I think it most unfortunate that Mr. Trudeau, in his Bill of Rights, does not go further and include economic rights, and unfortunately the province of Ontario shows even less interest in economic rights. Now I know that when they drew up the Bill of Rights, it was suggested, in discussing the matter before the federal-provincial conference, that this matter be mentioned and they said it was too involved. But, Mr. Speaker, today people are concerned with their economic rights.

The universal declaration of human rights in the United Nations included such rights as the right to work, the right to protection against unemployment, the right to social security, the right to education, and the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, and there are many rights in this field.

It may be that the right to vote, the right to trial by jury and all these things we take for granted, are in many respects, repetitious. The right to our economic rights really is a thrust forward, and I think that this should be ingrained in any constitution or in any Bill of Rights that we are going to rewrite, or propose, in this province.

It is of prime importance, Mr. Speaker, to protect the hard earned rights, such as the freedom of expression, and the freedom from arbitrary arrest, that were won for us many years ago. These must be retained, but at the same time we cannot jump into the future unless we see to it that the mass of the people in this country have minimum social security. It is a small comfort to an individual standing in a bread line, or to a family without a roof over its head, if they are told when they are 21 they have the right to vote.

Abstract rights are small comfort in the face of concrete wrongs, and this is something that we in this country have failed to measure up to and to come up with the answers that we should have.

Mr. Speaker, I would in conclusion, like to say this. Years ago, back in 1889—now that is when the Canadian confederation would be only 21 years old; it would have just become a man. John A. Macdonald wrote in a private letter to a gentleman in England, and he said this:

A great opportunity was lost in 1867 where the Dominion was formed out of the several provinces. This remarkable event in the history of the British Empire passed all those without notice.

And this is the truth; this is what happened. It really changed the British Empire. In many respects it made a contribution in changing the governments throughout the world, because we, in Canada, for the most part go unnoticed. We cause little trouble. We tend to analyze ourselves, find fault with ourselves, and perhaps ignore the tremendous contribution that this country has made for the people that have been able to live in peace and quiet for 100 years, and have also made contributions throughout the world.

I think, Mr. Speaker, when we discuss our problems among ourselves—the federal-provincial struggle that we seem to have, and have been going on for 100 years—I think we should be optimistic, for the simple reason that we have been able to exist throughout the 100 years.

I think we should be grateful for the fact that this country has been free of war. It has been free of violence. I think it is an example that we should keep in mind that other people will learn from us. And, as our debate goes on about what our federalism should be, or what the rights of the provinces should be, I believe, as time goes by, what has happened in this country will be an example to the many nations that are forming abroad, and will largely depend on the contribution that we make to world peace.

There is no question in my mind Mr. Speaker, that the theory of federalism is going to spread, and that, if Canada is going to be able to live at peace with the world, and the world is going to be able to live at peace with itself, you are going to see world government spread. And I would hope in the long run that what we now call the United Nations will some day become a federal union of the people throughout the world.

Now this may be some long way in the future. I hope it is not so far in the future, because events happen more quickly than we anticipate. I know a number of years ago, during World War II, a man named Clarence Drake was discussing the question of union with the United States, and Great Britain. But these principles that we discuss between the federal government and the provincial government are certainly going to involve any type of federalism that will take place in the world in the future.

As we have grown from the British Empire, and as the United States has grown through the British Empire and made tremendous contributions, we, in Canada, are in a unique position, because we have grown to a wealthy country, to a prosperous country. We have had the good fortune that we have never been an empire. We have been part of an empire; we have been a colony that has grown to be a nation.

As a result, nobody has any reason to fear us, only respect us and to learn from us. And I think that from what we can learn from ourselves, and what other people can learn from us, that the debate that goes on in this country can be of tremendous importance to us and to the world in the years that lie ahead.

I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Premier of this province would keep calm and cool, as I said earlier, and speak common sense, all he has done on many occasions. Because we have had the good luck in this country—no matter how difficult or how conflicting the various quarrels and dialogues seem to have been—we have always come through.

We do not have, in our legislation, such as The British North America Act, everything set out as maybe I, for one, would like to see it set out—but I would rather have an atmosphere of goodwill and co-operation than just have an airtight statute that has become too rigid. It would seem to me that our success, as a nation, has been that we have had mutual respect, not only for French Canadians, as those of us who are English speaking have respect for French speaking, but for many people that have come to Canada. They have been able to feel part of Canada without completely losing their identity of background. We have had this flexibility, this atmosphere of co-operation, which is far more important than a rigid statute.

I think that as long as we continue to carry on in the traditions that we have, there is a tremendous future for this country, not only for ourselves, but for the contribution that our example can be throughout the world.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, it is with some sadness that I enter this debate this evening, because I think that something has happened over the past number of months in regard to the thrust and direction that the province of Ontario has given to the formulation of some new relationship between both English and French speaking people in this country.

Two years ago, the Prime Minister of Ontario (Mr. Robarts), I think, took an important role. At that time, both English and French speaking people in this country were deeply concerned. It looked as though we were heading for the chasm of disunity. And at a time when the federal government refused to provide any real leadership, the Prime Minister of Ontario grasped the nettle, and called the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference.

He gathered together a committee of scholars, an advisory committee. That committee produced a number of important papers which provided channels through which men of good will of both English and French speaking origin, could find means by which they could come closer together. And then, of course, perhaps one of the most important conferences in the history of this country took place on the top floors of the Toronto-Dominion Centre.

I think the people of Canada were greatly heartened by what took place in those few days. They saw for the first time a degree of involvement, and as I said before, a degree of thrust towards some kind of resolution.

That is why I was somewhat disconcerted by the Prime Minister's remarks in this Legislature a few days ago. Because, certainly as he began his remarks, he indicated that there seemed to be lots of time, in fact, he used the term—that there was "lots of time." He commented on the "good atmosphere" which emanated from the conference at Ottawa a few weeks ago.

He certainly gave, in his opening remarks, the feeling that there really was no great urgency in these matters; that we could wait, five, seven, ten years until a new constitution might be written; that we would have intermittent meetings; and that eventually we would either blunder or stagger to some kind of a resolution.

Now, I must be honest, and I must be fair, Mr. Speaker, because in the last few paragraphs, I think, of this speech he did recover his ground somewhat, and I did get the feeling in those last few moments of his comments, that, indeed, he was conscious of the need for structure, of the need for committees, and for the continuing emphasis of finding some path to future Canadian unity.

Nonetheless, the total mountain of his comments, I think, were not particularly hopeful. And I could not help feeling that it was somewhat ironic that 102 years ago, the Fathers of Confederation, whom the Prime Minister mentioned, were able to create a constitution in two short months. It was really all over in Canada very early in the fall of 1867.

They met, I think, in July, and John A. Macdonald, of course, and the group from Canada west, went down to Charlottetown; they imposed themselves on the Maritime Conference; they convinced the Maritimers that they really did not want Maritime union at all; that they should listen to the Canadians.

They were carried off on the Victoria, on the boat which the Canadians had brought to Halifax and St. John's and, as the member for London South (Mr. White) mentioned last night, there was a camaraderie. Out of this camaraderie came the decision to go to Quebec, and at Quebec the major resolutions were hammered out. Now, all members will realize that this was not the end of the constitutional story.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): I was wondering though, it was not the beginning either.

Mr. Pitman: It was not the beginning either, the hon. Minister is quite right. But I think it is fair to say that most of the decisions that were to become the constitution of this nation were hammered out in a very short time in the year 1864. The London conference did not add, immeasurably, I think, to what was done at the Quebec conference, and I think it is only fair to say that in spite of the fact that, in those days, things moved much more slowly, politicians apparently were able to move much more quickly.

The Prime Minister, of course, indicated the reason for this when he said that there was a very important matter of urgency before the Fathers of Confederation in the year 1864. There was every possibility that there might be American soldiers marching across the border, and that the Canadians of Upper and Lower Canada, I should say, Canada East and Canada West, and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, might very well have to defend themselves. It was this kind of urgency that convinced the Fathers that something drastic had to be accomplished. And it was this sense of urgency which created the kind of constitution that we have.

I do suggest to you, sir, that we do have a measure of urgency in the affairs of Canada today, and this was what I thought was missing from most of the remarks of the Prime Minister in this Legislature a few days ago.

I think that what we have in place of the involvement and the concern of two years ago is a kind of almost dilettantism. We shall throw in a few propositions and then, of course, most important of all, we shall try and worry the federal government about financial matters. I think this has taken the place of the very real pathway to progress which was exhibited just a few years ago.

The Prime Minister did come to the point in his speech that what we are really talking about here is the nature of the federal system and I do feel though, that he tried to avoid the main point which is what the role of Quebec will be within that federal system, and what Ontario's views are as to what that role can and should be.

Because this constitution is the result of circumstance, I want to suggest to the hon. members tonight that circumstances have tremendous power in relation to federal constitutions because federal constitutions are very fluid documents and power goes from the centre to the parts and back to the centre again, as the Prime Minister himself intimated.

The Fathers of Confederation were concerned that it should be a very strong central union. They made sure of this by placing virtually all the real power in the hands of the central government. In fact, John A. Macdonald said that the provinces would be mere municipalities. John A. Macdonald would have been quite happy having a unitary form of government; in fact, if it had not been for the fact of Quebec at that time or, at least, Canada east at that time, he would have been quite willing to see a single government.

They made sure that the powers of taxation which were recounted at that time—that is the indirect taxes because, of course, income taxes and the direct taxes that we talked about so much this afternoon were not a part of the fabric of taxation in those days—and largely it was customs duties and indirect taxes which counted—were placed along with direct taxes in the hands of the federal government.

Every effort was made to ensure that the federal government would have control over the province—the power of disallowance; the fact that the Lieutenant-Governor was appointed by the federal government; the fact, indeed, that the Senate did not represent the provinces but rather represented regions. At no point does the compact theory which was mentioned this afternoon hold any water in the constitutional development of this country.

The most obvious point is that the provinces had no right to form a union. They were mere British colonies, and as British colonies, the only one which could create a union was the British parliament at Westminster. The men who sat in Charlottetown and in Quebec and in London realized that fact as well as we should here, as we talk about it at this time.

But the power of circumstances changed this constitution. By the 1880s and 1890s, the power was moving from the centre out to the parts. They were moving out to the parts essentially because the great national objective had been achieved. The CPR had been built.

The national policy had created some degree of national economic unity and, because we in Canada could not deal with the interpretation of our constitution, the Privy Council at Westminster decided on the kind of constitution we should have.

We found ourselves losing control at the centre as power went from the centre to the parts. But circumstances again took over and the first world war came along and the power flowed back once again to the centre, as it became obvious that the nation could not carry on the war effort unless it had these powers of taxation and these powers of carrying out certain activities which were necessary if the full weight of the Canadian people was to be mobilized in that heroic struggle of 1914-1918.

But the power of circumstance again took over in 1920, because here again the power or regionalism, which is so strong in this country, which is made strong indeed by geographic factors and by many other factors, came into play. It came into play so strongly, that by 1930 we found ourselves facing the national horror of a depression, unable to deal with the needs of the people.

We had the strange dichotomy of the provinces having the power to deal with such matters as unemployment and social welfare needs and dealing with municipalities, while the federal government was the only government which had the financial power. We saw those terrible number of years, which eventually resulted, of course, in the Rowell Sirois report, perhaps the most profound and searching analysis of the Canadian constitution and the problems of that constitution which have never been undertaken in this country.

Then, of course, the second world war solved that problem for us. It ended the need for the Rowell Sirois report and the rather drastic measures suggested by that document. We had, once again, the power centering at the Ottawa level.

In the years following the war, from 1945 to 1950, the force of circumstances took hold, with the great national projects of the Seaway, and the post-war difficulties we faced of putting men to work and, of course, the effect of the cold war itself and the emphasis on our defence.

Once again, circumstance created a very strong and viable central government. But then, in 1960 and since 1960, the powers of circumstance have been ones of disruption rather than one of centralization. I suppose there are a number of factors—the factor of the weak central government, the disillusionment of the Diefenbaker years, the minority governments in Ottawa, the fact that so many areas, because of the rather strange patterns of electoral success at the federal level, meant that a number of regions were unrepresented in the government.

At some points in time Quebec was unrepresented and, at other points, western provinces were unrepresented and of course, perhaps most of all, you have a development of nationalism among the French-speaking people of this country.

The reason for this, of course, is well known. We saw the development of a quiet revolution and out of the desire of the French-Canadian people to be, you might say, a “modern” people there came as well the desire to have control over their destiny—to be masters in their own house.

It was at this point in time, Mr. Speaker, that I thought the Prime Minister of Ontario took circumstances into his hands and decided that circumstances were not going to direct what was taking place in this country, that men would have some role to play.

And this is why I find it unfortunate at this point of time, in 1969, that that direction has been lost, that we no longer have that sense of urgency. Because indeed we can become a part of circumstance. We may very well lose the mastery of our own affairs. And it is not, I do not think, within us to know that we may very well be facing the last few years of Canadian unity.

I do say to you, sir, that circumstances in the twentieth century move much more quickly than they have ever done in the past and they move with a ferocity which perhaps is unknown in the past.

I think that today we stand on the threshold of the decision whether this is to be one country, whether this is to be a single Canada which we can pass on to our children, or whether we will spend the next half century trying to heal the breaches which have been created by the circumstances of the 1960s.

It is an unfortunate and sad thing that the Prime Minister of Ontario became so obsessed with financial affairs. One cannot, and one would not wish to, divorce the financial problems of the province of Ontario from the constitutional matters—but one would suggest that this was not the only thing that mattered, that there was something even more important in that conference in Ottawa, that the Prime Minister of Ontario had a higher calling than simply the defence of the financial viability of the province of Ontario.

We saw the rather distressing picture of the Prime Minister of Ontario seeming to appear as the "fat cat" trying to ward off the appeals for assistance of other regions. In place of the leadership of English Canada, one could not help but feel there was a degree of divisiveness created by this particular kind of obsession. I am not going to place all the blame on the—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): The hon. member does not believe that.

An hon. member: Absolute rot.

Mr. Pitman: Indeed I do believe that. I believe in a very real way that we have seen the Prime Minister of Ontario lose the kind of inner concern and the real concern that he had for the needs of this nation when he became so concerned when we talked about finances here this afternoon.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member is a majority of one who believes that.

Mr. Pitman: Well that is not a very intelligent comment, Mr. Speaker, from the other side, but I do want to get down to the aspect of circumstances under which we operate in this country. You know we really do pay for elections, do we not?

An hon. member: What are you suggesting?

Mr. Pitman: I am suggesting at this point in time that we may very well be in an area of drift in which we may very well lose the kind of unity which we hope to retain and, indeed, to strengthen during this period of the 1960s.

I do not think this is a very difficult concept to suggest to you. You may have a different opinion. You are welcome to that opinion. I am simply stating it as I see it at this point in time. I suggest to you, sir, that a part of this emanates out of the election that took place last June, when one of the most important things took place—when the now Prime Minister of this country used the election campaign to exacerbate the situation.

I would say that he misrepresented the interests of French Canada before the people of this nation. He provided a simplistic view of the desires of French Canadians. There is not a single French Canadian leader leading a single French Canadian party in the province of Quebec who could possibly view, with any sympathy, the interpretation of the Canadian constitution which is put forward by the Prime Minister of Canada.

An hon. member: Including Lesage.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton West): He should have talked about a special status like Douglas did.

Mr. Pitman: I think if we are going to get into a discussion on special status, the suggestions of the leader of the Opposition in the federal House for the Conservative Party were attempting to find some kind of a reasonable relationship and I congratulate him for this—but the people of Canada did not give him very many votes for it. Nonetheless, I think that there was there an attempt to find what was a rational, reasonable and acceptable kind of Canada for the Quebec people.

I would suggest, sir, on this question of the Prime Minister of Ontario's responsibility, that since the last election in June, the Prime Minister of Ontario had an opportunity; it was an opportunity to give new leadership at a point in time when English-speaking Canada needed that leadership to give purpose to English Canadians within this country and to give them some idea of what they wanted as a nation.

So often one feels that the French-speaking people of this nation know what they want, but it is very weakly and poorly articulated as to what English-speaking Canada wants, and I think that is the special role which the Prime Minister of Ontario, who is the leader of the largest, richest and most prosperous province in this nation, can properly provide.

This, I think, was an opportunity to show that we have imagination, that we have wit, that we have an ability to find innovations in describing and analyzing and determining what shall be the relationship of Quebec to the federal government of vis-à-vis English-speaking Canadian provinces to the federal government.

I do not care what you want to call it; I call it the need for recognizing a special relationship on the part of French-speaking Canadians. But the recognition that English-speaking Canadians should have some forum of opinions of what their relationship should be with English-speaking provinces I think was lost, and I am very sorry that it was.

I think that the Prime Minister of Ontario gave very real leadership in his development of French-speaking schools, in his efforts to find a place for French-speaking people in this province, and in his efforts to find ways of making French-speaking people at home in the province of Ontario. I think it must have been very debilitating for the Prime Minister of Canada to find that a French-Canadian leader would say that this did not matter any more; that, so far as leadership in the province of Quebec was concerned, they did not care whether there was any French-speaking schools for the minorities in other provinces.

I appeal to the Prime Minister at this time that perhaps it is now an opportunity to change the emphasis.

We are not providing the French-speaking schools in Ontario as a sop, as some kind of a means to keep French-speaking people in Canada. We are providing them because it is necessary; it is a need for Ontario; because we as English Canadians are richer, because French-speaking Canadians feel at home in this province.

I would hope that that position would find some acceptance on those benches and that the Prime Minister of Ontario will not begin to back up on that particular emphasis which, indeed, he has continued throughout these significant months.

Might I get down to some of the specifics that I would like to comment on in relation to this debate. The real crunch comes in dealing with the powers in sections 91 and 92. This is the crunch and this is where I think the Prime Minister could have provided that kind of leadership. French-speaking people are concerned about preserving French culture in North America, and that is no mean task.

It is no mean task, without the tremendous power of the media which you have on every side, to be able to preserve this minority, this language, this culture, and I think that we have nothing but the greatest honour to pay to those French Canadians who are so concerned. Could we, as English Canadians, have that same kind of concern about preserving ourselves as Canadians with that same kind of pressure?

I am going to bring up a particular matter to perhaps illustrate what I mean in the kind of difficulty which we have on this side of the fence, so to speak, Mr. Speaker. We went to give the French-speaking people of the province of Quebec an opportunity to, as young people say, "do their own thing." I would hope that Ontario would begin to find a pattern whereby English-speaking people and all other provinces could find a way to "do their own thing" within that same pattern.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East):
Dean Cohen.

Mr. Pitman: Well, I am very flattered if Dean Cohen has made these comments before. I am sorry I have not read Dean Cohen's speech but if the hon. member would send it over to me—I would be most happy to read it. He is a very intelligent man who is saying a great many important things and I would be very delighted.

Mr. Trotter: He is a Liberal.

Mr. Pitman: Well, that does not ingratiate him to me, but nonetheless—

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: At least he says something convincing.

Mr. Pitman: I would like to suggest that there are three or four things I would like to put forward. There have been matters that have been put forward by other members in the House.

The first thing I think we have to recognize is that the rewriting of sections 91 and 92 is simply not enough. I think we have to begin with a preamble, a preamble to our constitution which gives us these goals; which sets these goals; which shows what both we, as English-speaking Canadians and as French-speaking Canadians, want to remain as the essence of the Canadian fact, the Canadian "thing".

I think both Andrew Brewin and Claude Ryan have made this point. I think Claude Ryan has stated he wished to see a preamble which "states clearly a Canadian political society's pattern, the principle of cultural duality".

Secondly we need a constitution which is set out in modern language. I was very pleased to see in these propositions that the government of Ontario does not rule out the necessity for a newly written constitution. It does not set itself up as being the only way by which we can maintain unity, or can strengthen that unity, but at least there is a recognition that we need some rewriting of parts of this constitution. Surely that is an obvious need.

One only has to read The British North America Act—it would be good for all of us if we were to reread The British North America Act—to see just how far out of touch this document is with the twentieth century. After all, it is the oldest constitution in the world which has, as a part of it, the system of responsible government. That is no mean thing, I think, to say about a constitution, but nonetheless, we live in an age when being old does not necessarily mean being relevant.

I think it is desperately important that we rephrase, that we revise, indeed that we rewrite, section 91 and 92 to bring the constitution out of its obsolete and meaningless phraseology, put it into the twentieth century, and ensure within those two sections that the safeguards of the French-Canadian minority's wish—

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: What powers does the member want to change?

Mr. Pitman: All right, let us get down to the nub—the powers I would like to see changed. I would like to see English-speaking Canada and French-speaking Canada have those things they feel are necessary for maintaining themselves as cultures. Now, for the French-speaking people it may be important to them that housing, for example, should be provincial in order that a certain kind of urban development takes place—also with education.

Section 93, you would agree, is an area which has a special significance and where loans to universities and where federal activity in education at the university level, in the manpower level, may very well be quite acceptable to us as English Canadians but is not acceptable to French Canadians in the province of Quebec. Is that an acceptable proposition?

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: What powers is the hon. member going to change?

Mr. Pitman: I am trying to suggest that housing may very well be one thing that we in English-speaking Canada would be quite happy to turn over to the federal government. Perhaps the Minister in the corner may not be too happy with that proposition, but I would suggest that that is something which we would certainly consider as a viable position, which would not be considered as viable by any responsible political party in French-speaking Canada today. Those are two examples. Universities are another example.

There are many areas in the cultural field, in the arts, where I think we need a national thrust, and we in English-speaking Canada are quite happy to have that kind of development.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): The hon. member has mentioned three things, just as an example. They were housing, education and what was the other one?

Mr. Pitman: University affairs and education.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, but I think there was a third field he covered.

Mr. Pitman: Culture.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, all right. All of these things, I presume, are part of property and civil rights.

Mr. Pitman: This is in one of these areas.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am interested to know why he thinks—assuming provincial attitudes where housing might be a federal field—why would it not be available to Quebec as well as to the English oriented province? I wonder why the difference in that particular field? I can see it in education; I can see it particularly in education, certainly, because of the language; but why housing, why would that be a distinction?

Mr. Pitman: I am very pleased to have this discussion with the Attorney General. I think that housing is so closely related to the kind of society and to urban renewal and to urban development, to industrialization, that there are very particular patterns of urban renewal and particular reactions to industrialization in the new Quebec. Let us take, for example, Mr. Hellyer who has been saying a great deal about housing and indeed, I think it has very greatly worried the hon. Minister, and rightly so, about some of the things that he suggested about housing as it affects Ontario's culture.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is because we think that power, which is now provincial, should be left provincial and the means to implement that power should be given to the province.

Mr. Pitman: But I would suggest that it might very well be that we in English-speaking Canada could consider the possibility of a certain kind of urban development which suits English-Canadian culture. I would hope that it would be different from American culture, I would hope we would find new patterns. But nevertheless it would be different.

I would suggest that it might very well be true, for the people of the province of Quebec, that you might say, "pulling apart the city orientation would be the only way they could effectively defend their culture." They may well feel that this continuing urbanization and the whole effect of industrialization—this kind of industrial development—should be decentralized.

If Mr. Hellyer's views are to prevail, it might very well be a matter of some concern to the people in Quebec, if this power was left at the centre. But that does not mean that we in English-speaking Canada could not see some viability in handing over a function such as that to the federal government.

What I am suggesting is the assumption of leadership on the part of the province of Ontario to find those things, which we in English-speaking Canada feel should be a part of the federal fabric.

Now, let us take the guaranteed annual income—

Mr. Kerr: But the member will not criticize us if we agree with Quebec—if we insist on exercising our provincial responsibility in Ontario—

Mr. Pitman: I would have no concern. It is not a matter of agreeing with Quebec, it is a matter of deciding—I am sorry, go ahead.

Mr. Kerr: —as a provincial right, provincial responsibility and jurisdiction. If Ontario says and Quebec says, "We should have that power and that responsibility." The member will not criticize that, I hope.

Mr. Pitman: I would say no. If the province of Ontario—and I would hope, as I say, giving leadership to all other English-speaking provinces—feels that this is important for us as our means, as a province, of expressing ourselves as English Canadians, yes.

Let us take the guaranteed annual income; now there has been a good deal of talk about this in this Legislature in the last day or two.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Well, it is a Conservative device.

Mr. Kerr: He is agreeing with it.

Mr. Pitman: I want to suggest to you that this might be something which we English-speaking Canadians might find as a way by which we can provide equality and equity throughout English-speaking Canada. And we might decide rather than having the province of Ontario and The Department of Social and Family Services trying to provide that kind of a thrust, we might find it better to place this at the federal level, in the department—

Mr. Kerr: Like we did with the pension plan.

Mr. Pitman: Could I just finish my point and I would be very pleased to give the member the floor.

I would suggest that this might very well be something that we as English-speaking Canadians could accept at the federal level; but for the French-speaking Canadian that would not be acceptable. He would feel that this is an area of jurisdiction which very closely relates to the French-speaking culture and the way he wants to provide help and to provide equalization might be a very different pattern.

Now, you see, we should not say, "no," that "we in Ontario are going to look after a guaranteed annual income in Ontario because Quebec is going to look after it in Quebec." Surely we can give leadership to English-speaking Canadians in English-speaking provinces; to find a way of dividing these functions in a way which provides an opportunity for both to be viable; to do their own thing.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: If I might ask a question of the hon. member? Am I correct in understanding that the burden of his argument is that the shift in powers, as it might involve amendments in sections 91 and 92, relate only to the province of Quebec?

Mr. Pitman: No, I am sorry if I have given that impression, I did not mean to. I would suggest that looking at this constitution again in 1969 we might very well find that there are powers which would be better, functions which would be better to move to the higher level, that as English Canadians it would be better to move to the higher level.

Now, I think there is one area which we have to be very conscious of—

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Oh, the member is kidding us if he thinks that Quebec is going to give up the powers it has now.

Mr. Pitman: That does not necessarily mean that Ontario has to hold all of its powers, does it?

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: No, but therefore the member's argument on powers comes back to nine provinces and one province, insofar as a change in powers is concerned under 91 and 92.

Mr. Pitman: That may happen. I am willing to concede that point, but I am suggesting to you that it may very well be that some of the powers which Quebec has now, under The British North America Act, it might be willing to pass to the federal level. It may not be a financial power, it might seem like a peripheral power, but it might not be one which particularly relates to the existence and the strengthening of the French Canadian culture in Canada.

Mr. Sopha: The member might name one. He might help us by hinting at one.

Mr. Pitman: Well, I do not think this is a matter that an English Canadian should comment on but I shall try to comment on it. In fact I would like to comment on it. I would suggest, sir, that at present, at this point in time, Quebec is very much concerned about education. It is these educational and cultural terms. It might very well find that if our economy does begin to slow down, if unemployment rates do begin to rise, and if it appears that a very necessary definition of education includes the manpower, then it might be better to have manpower, that one particular area, in the hands of the federal government. As I say, it might. You see, the hon. member is cooking the books. He is suggesting that as things are right now, is the only way that they may be. I suggest to you that there may be other ways. One of the most obvious ways—

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Even your succession duties this afternoon, why should not they?

Mr. Pitman: Well I would like to go on, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Sopha: This is a very cynical view of the relationship of Quebec—

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: It is a very practical view.

Mr. Sopha: It is a very hardened view.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Who are you kidding. What are they going to give up anyhow?

Mr. Pitman: The third area I would like to discuss is the whole area of our unwritten constitution. The member for Parkdale talked about the whole question of putting into the constitution the question of the Cabinet and the way in which we actually operate. But I think it would be a very dangerous thing to do, Mr. Speaker. I think this part of the unwritten constitution is valuable in the sense that we cannot change this part of the constitution very easily. However I do agree with him very much that we should get rid of some of the anachronisms.

Any individual reading The British North America Act comes away with the most completely distorted view of how things really take place in this country. The continuous mention of the Queen; the fact that the Queen does this and the Queen does that, I think, gives an area of distortion and an area of real concern to anyone reading the document. I think this is one aspect of our unwritten constitution that should be clarified.

I have already spoken in my discussion with the member for Ottawa of this other question, but I would like to comment on the words of Marceau Ferribeau who, I think, outlined the degree to which The British North America Act is completely out of date.

As he pointed out, it has been changed by 22 Acts in the British Parliament, 4 orders-in-council, 52 federal Acts which involved provincial matters, 27 federal laws on constitutional matters, 11 laws on the Governor-General and a couple on the Lieutenant-Governor. There are 105 consolidated Acts or orders-in-council. There are 60 amendments which are unconsolidated and his comment, which I think we can accept tonight, is this:

In this day and age there is no other government, public institution, or private company, able to afford the luxury of such a proliferation and such a jungle.

And I would agree with that point in relation to this constitution.

I think the constitution that we need is one which shows that within a national fabric there can be diversity. Now we can find new patterns of government relationship, for we have the wit and the imagination, and this is what I am appealing to the Prime Minister of Ontario to provide—that kind of leadership, which provides these new patterns. We can do it; other countries are doing it. There are other countries who have different kinds of federal systems and I think that this is the kind of unique thinking which we would come to expect from this government in this area.

In closing, I would like to deal with one particular aspect of the constitution. That is to remind the hon. members that is not just a matter of writing a constitution. It is a matter of making sure there is something to write a constitution for. Other members of this party are going to deal with other aspects of this problem, but I want to deal with one particular aspect. That aspect is one which I think this government should be concerned about as it worries about the writing of the constitution because if this kind of development continues, the constitution will no longer represent the interests, desires and the will of the people. It will represent something which no longer exists if it is a constitution for a free and united Canada.

I refer to one area—the Americanization of our universities which has taken place over the last number of years. I would like just to read one or two paragraphs from the article by Pauline Jewett in Maclean's Magazine for March, 1969:

In recent years though the emphasis seems to have shifted to sheer numbers of non-Canadians, our universities have reached the point where close to three-quarters of their new recruits each year are non-Canadians. The proportion has gone up from approximately 45 per cent in 1961-1963, to 58 per cent in 1963-1965, to 72 per cent in 1965-1967, with the figures for 1967-1969 not available, but probably even higher. Now how can we talk about having a Canadian nation when we are putting the guidance of the young people who are going into the leadership roles of our nation continually in the hands of American minds?

Furthermore, increasing numbers each year are drawn not from many lands, but from just one, the United States. The explanation usually given for this ever increasing reliance on outsiders, particularly on Americans, to staff and run our universities, is that the supply of qualified Canadians simply has not kept pace with the demand.

The supply of qualified Americans, on the other hand, or at any rate that part of the supply available to us, has grown very rapidly.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): How about American unions?

Mr. Pitman: Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member over here asked about American unions. I wish he would read the report which is written by his own leadership candidate, Walter Gordon, about American unions, and we could settle that problem and get it out of this Chamber.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): You did not learn anything from it then.

Mr. Pitman: Oh, Mr. Speaker, Walter Gordon said exactly the opposite to what the member for Humber is discussing here tonight.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Do not allow yourself to be distorted—

Mr. Pitman: To continue:

These statistics show that though the supply of qualified Canadians has not grown as rapidly as it would have with greater governmental assistance, it has nevertheless grown substantially in recent years.

Indeed it has grown much more than the use that has been made of it by Canadian universities. Between 1963 and 1965 and 1965-1967, Steel and Matthews—these are two individuals who were doing a study at Carleton University:

Steel and Matthews estimate the number of Canadians taking higher degrees—MA's and PhD's in Canada and abroad, rose from 9,785 to 14,151, a sizeable increase in the pool of Canadian talent. Between the same two periods, the additional faculty taken on by Canadian universities rose from 3,040 to 4,716.

Now one might have expected that at least in the last year a fair number of this additional faculty would have been Canadian. This was as far from being the case as to be ludicrous. The increase in the number of Canadians taken on in our universities in 1965-1967 was exactly 36—36 across the whole Dominion. The figures show 1,284 Canadians recruited in 1963-1965, 1,320 in 1965-1967, a growth of three per cent. The non-Canadians recruited on the other hand went up from 1,756 in 1963-1965 to 3,000 in 1965-1967, a growth rate of 93 per cent.

This is going on when we are talking about writing a new constitution for Canada.

Mr. Ben: Is that the end of the quote?

Mr. Pitman: That is the end of my quotation, Mr. Speaker.

If I might go on to another area, Mr. Speaker this is an article which was in the Ottawa Citizen, November 13, 1968. I will quote very briefly from it and it shows I think in stark reality what we face:

There are 15 Americans on York University sociology faculty and one Canadian.

Many departments at York are 30 to 50 per cent American staff. The political economy, or political science departments at Glendon College, York, McMaster, and University of Toronto all have American chairmen.

Now I think that there is something very significant about these figures because it means that the young people who are taking courses in sociology are doing so largely from an American point of view. Those who are taking politics are seeing it from an American point of view. What is the point of us writing a constitution for a unique kind of Canada when the young people who will take over the leadership will have a completely different attitude towards the institutions which we hold so dear?

Glendon College does not have a single Canadian teacher full time in its political science department and McMaster has only one. The University of Western Ontario's economics department, 19 staff members who have ranks of assistant professor and above, have 27 U.S. degrees and only 13 Canadian degrees. Of 13 fully qualified professors hired by the Loyola College in Montreal English department during the past three years, 11 were Americans, one was a Canadian with a degree from the United States, and one was a European.

Mr. Ben: This has all been recorded, what does the member suggest be done about it now?

Mr. Pitman: If I might go on with this—

Mr. Ben: What does he suggest be done about it?

Mr. Pitman: May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Humber make his own speech at the appropriate time in this debate?

Mr. Ben: Well, this is not the appropriate time to discuss education unless it—

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member for Humber is quite out of order and the hon. member for Peterborough is quite correct and will please carry on.

Mr. Pitman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to suggest to you that some of the main reasons for this are quite obvious. Americans have been brought up from major universities which have a tremendous prestige. What takes place, of course, is very simple. Those who come up from these prestigious universities tend to go back to those universities to find their colleagues. There is nothing evil or pernicious about what takes place, but I suggest it is something which we as a Legislature should be particularly concerned about.

The hon. member for Humber asked me what suggestions I would make. Possibly there are ways by which we might support Canadian studies, taught by Canadians, in Ontario universities which would encourage Canadian universities to hire Canadian staff. There are many ways to encourage universities to do what we think are socially acceptable things in this province and that may very well be one of the things that we must do.

I think we have to be concerned about the fact that the textbooks that are brought by these American professors into the classrooms are simply American textbooks. So, once again, you have another dimension of the Americanization of young people in our universities. I think that in many cases you have a situation where new studies, computer instruction, packaged materials, or many subjects, are coming directly from the United States. Many of the teachers in Ontario high schools find that they have to go to American sources to get the kind of materials which will allow them to carry on the kind of studies in a modern manner in the Ontario of 1969. Even the Ontario Institute for Studies and Education—which surely is a body responsible to this Legislature—is heavily, very heavily staffed with Americans. Up to 50 per cent at one point come from American sources. In the beginning this perhaps was necessary because in many cases graduates in the subjects taught at the OISE were not to be found in Canada. It was a new direction to be found in our thinking, but I suggest that this is the kind of a problem which has particular relevance.

I want to suggest to you just one or two areas by which we might maintain a Canada for which we can probably write a constitution. Two weeks ago, there gathered in a hotel of this city, 100 scholars from the universities across this country. They gathered to discuss a report which was prepared by the Ontario Institute for Studies and Education, called "What culture? What heritage?"

I would suggest to any member in this House who has not read this document—and I know the member for Sudbury has read it, and I am sure there are others who have read it—that it should be almost necessary reading for those of us who sit here. It indicates the level at which we have taught Canadian history in the high schools in this country. It is not a critique of Ontario high schools; it is a critique of the teaching of Canadian history right across this country, from Vancouver to Saint John. And it is a devastating document.

It was done, however—and this is an area in which Ontario has provided some service—it was done by an Ontario teacher, Mr. A. B. Hodges from Trinity College.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Is that printed by OISE?

Mr. Pitman: I am sorry, it is printed by the Ontario Institute for Studies and Education.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why do they not provide us all with a copy?

Mr. Sopha: It is $2 a copy.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): It is your institute, why do you not ask them?

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, I would hope that, perhaps at the next Cabinet meeting, this might be a subject of concern by those on the front benches across the other side.

Mr. Singer: It is not really an underground NDP group.

Mr. Sopha: Have you got change for a five?

Mr. Pitman: I want to complete my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by just reading one or two of the suggestions—one or two things that were said in this document. Perhaps this reveals some of the reasons for the mess we are in, because what it states, what Mr. Hodges and his assistants discovered, was that we have really been teaching the history of two countries in this Canada of ours. That if one read the textbooks and worked and sat in the classrooms in Quebec, one would get the history of a completely different country than if one sat in the classrooms and read the textbooks here in the province of Ontario.

There you have, I think, the dichotomy; the problem we face now. We wonder why we have different views as to what kind of Canada we support, and want to see in the future. But not only have we created that kind of a situation, we have also managed to completely bore the young people of our country by the way we have taught Canadian history.

The men who carried out this study not only read the texts; they not only read the examination papers and read the courses and looked at the classrooms; they went into the classrooms and sat at the back of those classrooms and saw what happened to the young people who are taking Canadian history.

I will just read you a few lines:

Granted that the difficulties are great. The findings of the national history project suggests that most administrators, inspectors and far too many teachers have not given serious consideration to the teaching of Canadian studies, nor do they have a philosophical frame of reference on which to base their thinking. It is understandable, therefore, that answers pulled off the cuff should fail to yield any coherent pattern. Yet, despite this continuing criticism, and despite this evidence of deep dissatisfaction with the state of Canadian studies in our schools, no major reforms have been introduced in many, many years.

Some provinces—Imagine, this is the twentieth century. We have moved ahead so quickly in so many other subject areas, and yet we teach Canadian history the same way as we taught it 20 years ago—in some cases from the same books.

We have provided no indication of the drama, no indication of the colour, of Canadian history. No indication that there are people and Canadians who are just as exciting—the Louis Riels and so on—as the American heroes we hear so much about.

Some provinces have changed the scope and sequence of their history courses and introduced new textbooks. Many schools have provided generous supplies of audio-visual equipment, Some faculties of education have climbed aboard various bandwagons rolling up from the United States. And some professors of Canadian history are beginning to write no longer as chroniclers, but as historians. Yet, none of these reforms, as will be shown later, has made any fundamental change in what goes on in the Canadian studies classroom.

And I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we can talk a great deal about writing a constitution, but if we allow this to continue we are in serious trouble.

Those scholars, who came from all across Canada, agreed with the statements that were made in this book. Strangely enough, they have not gone to the government asking for money. This may come as quite a surprise to those on the other side. They have gone out asking for support from other sources. They are going out to try to find money.

They have set up—what did they call it—a Canadian studies foundation. They are going to try to encourage every province to support this foundation. They want private enterprise to support this foundation. They hope that it will be able to remain independent of government resources for the first stage.

They want to try to provide materials for teachers across this whole nation to teach Canadian history in an exciting and a relevant fashion. They want to provide strategies, they want to provide means, by which English literature, English art, as well as English history, can become a part of the living tissue of Canadians in this country.

To my way of thinking, Mr. Speaker—and this may not seem to be a relevant thing to be talking about in a constitutional debate, and I intend to sit down in just a moment, but I would suggest that, by supporting a project such as this, we in Canada can ensure that there is a Canada to provide a constitution for within the next few years.

And so, in closing, I would say that the Prime Minister of Ontario and his government have a number of responsibilities. First, to provide leadership for English Canadians to find their way to exhibit themselves as English Canadians in the future. To provide the guidelines within the constitution which allow for both sides to find their place in this society of ours. To continue the policies they have already begun of providing French schools and the French language in various parts of Ontario, and to take a stand, Mr. Speaker, against this growing Americanization of our universities and the growing boredom among young people in regard to Canadian history.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): Mr. Speaker, this evening it was not my intention to rise, frankly, because I felt that the whole debate had been kind of overdone. I think that when we continue to cry that our nation is in dire jeopardy, we are not giving enough credit to the people in Quebec, the majority of whom are just as anxious if not more anxious than we in English-speaking Canada, to maintain Canada. We have paid too much—

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): When did Nostradamus discover that?

Mr. Ben: We have paid too much attention to the separatists, or those who are called separatists, and not enough to the people who feel that their roots are so deep in French Canada that they could not call it any land that did not have Canada in it.

Now it is true, that the cries of the people in Quebec for a greater interest, a greater share, in the resources of this country should not go unheeded. One of the justifiable complaints that they do have is one of regional or economic disparity. There is no doubt that the land to the east of Ontario—and I use that phrase advisedly—has not shared in the growth of Canada as have provinces like Ontario, British Columbia, and now, even the Prairies. I use the expression “east of Ontario” because the same could apply to the Maritimes, to Newfoundland, as it can to Quebec.

A lot of it is, perhaps, the fault of those who led Quebec during the greater part of the first half of this century, but a great deal has also been the fault of the rest of Canada. Insofar as Quebec is concerned, for a long time she was very insular.

I recall, as a youngster, glancing through international magazines, such as the National Geographic, and finding therein advertisements published by the province of Quebec, La Belle Province, inviting people to come to La Belle Province, to rural Quebec. The inducements they offered were photographs of those one-horse chaises, and the view of bread being baked in an outdoor oven. This was the way that Quebec was sold—as the land of Madeleine Champlain.

While the rest of Canada, English-speaking Canada, was producing professors and engineers and chemists, Quebec was also producing professors—but not of engineering—and priests and notary publics. Their education was geared towards the arts, while the rest of Canada's education was geared towards technology. This is the way the leaders, especially as typified by Duplessis, chose to lead the French of that time.

But I do not, Mr. Speaker, believe that the sins of the parents should devolve on the children. I do not believe the present generation should be compelled to pay for what their ancestors, or their parents, chose to impose upon them. Just as I do not think that Indians on reservations have a right to compel their children to live on the reservation and to make their living by hunting and fishing.

I do not believe that anyone had the right in Quebec to compel their offspring to lead an agrarian existence.

They are right in asking to catch up with the rest of Canada and join the twentieth century; to fall into it with both feet, and stand on those feet. It is our duty as brothers, as fellow citizens, to give them an opportunity to do that; to be standing by to make sure that they do land on their feet and that they do not fall. And if they fall, to pick them up and offer them assistance. This is what we must do.

One of the troubles in English-speaking Canada, and it is a trait that is universal, Mr. Speaker, is that if we have a reluctance to do something, we pick on any excuse that is to hand to justify our not doing it. Now many claims that are made by French-speaking Canadians in the eyes of the English-speaking Canadians are not legitimate. But many other claims, the majority of them, are legitimate.

There is too great a tendency on the part of too many English speakers to find some claim made by the French speakers, which perhaps does not hold as much water as it should—it is not as solid as it could be—and say, “This is not so, you are making this claim and it is not justified, it is wrong. Your facts are wrong, and therefore, accordingly, everything else that you claim, everything else that you say, is also wrong”. And that, to me, is a lot of nonsense.

This could apply insofar as culture is concerned. There are certain people in French-speaking Canada, a minority, who claim that the English speakers are trying to wipe out either the French language or French culture. Well, in many areas in English-speaking Canada, the residents have never heard a word of French spoken, and the last thing in their mind is to wipe out the French language.

As far as French culture is concerned, to those people French culture consists of a flat-chested, skinny wench, in a distorted posture, displaying some dress by Dior. That, to them, is French culture, and just try to convince them that they are trying to wipe out that type of French culture. So, naturally, they say, “They are wrong in saying I am trying to wipe out their culture. They are wrong in saying I am trying to wipe out their language, and per se, they are wrong in everything else that they say.” And this is too bad, but it is a natural trait as I say.

I am reminded of a little anecdote, Mr. Speaker. A man knocked on the door of his neighbour and he said, “Joe, can I borrow your axe”. And Joe said, “No, I am sorry, Pete, but I need my axe to shave with.” So after Pete leaves, Joe’s wife says to him, “Joe, how could you tell Pete such a nasty lie? You have never shaved with your axe in your life.” He said, “I know I haven’t, and so does Pete, but when you don’t want to do something, one excuse is as good as another.”

And I imagine this is the excuse that they offer with reference to this matter, by saying that, “everything the French desire is not justified because we have found them making an unfounded claim here.” And it is unfortunate that we have not spent more time in the past trying to let each other know something about our own past.

I think we, this generation at least, have been fortunate, in that we have been living, or have been around, on our Centennial, because I doubt very much, Mr. Speaker, that we would have been any more aware today of the habits and the traditions or the customs of the people, say, in Quebec, or New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, or elsewhere in this country, than we were five years ago, or three years ago, had Centennial and Expo not intervened. So I say again, Mr. Speaker, that we have indeed been fortunate to have been living at precisely this period of time.

Now we can perhaps pass on to our children something that they cannot pick up in books and they cannot pick up in the schools—the knowledge gained from our own participation in the celebration of the Centennial of this country. And we would be foolish, Mr. Speaker, if we did not try to learn more about each other, if we did not try to continuously accentuate the positive, stress the good parts, the great contributions that have been made to the advancement of this country.

I do not quarrel with what the hon. member for Peterborough had to say, except that perhaps I am a little more consistent than he is. I am against American ownership of our resources. I am against Americans coming into our schools and indoctrinating our children. But, sir, to maintain that consistency, as I am against American ownership of Canadian capital, I am against American ownership of Canadian labour.

An hon. member: Right.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): They do not own them.

Mr. Ben: That is what is said over there. And I can see what is meant by these teachers coming in. My older boy came to me and he was quite enthused. He wanted my help on the project that he wanted to engage in, and I regret to say that, in the first instance, this project was going to involve American history, namely, the war of the revolution.

I suggested to him that there were sufficient factors in our own history that would make a wonderful research project, and I am happy to say he decided to do just that.

But he himself had been brainwashed, not just by textbooks, but by radio and television, to the American point of view. And this is another consideration that we must give insofar as protecting and safeguarding our entity is concerned. It is about time that we started giving consideration to giving more money—to developing and broadcasting and showing Canadian talent on our television. When you think of 50 per cent Canadian content, it is almost an insult to Canada. Why cannot it be 99.4 per cent, with 60 per cent consisting of news items?

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): How about bringing Juliette back? Would the member go for that?

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): How about Don Messer?

Mr. Ben: Blonde or brunette?

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): How about the Robarts-MacNaughton Laugh-in?

Mr. Ben: You know, I daresay that this House will indeed be honoured if, for all the time that those three or four cameras stayed in here this afternoon filming the Budget presentation, it will result in five minutes on any one television programme.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The whole thing was broadcast. It was broadcast live.

Mr. T. P. Reid: A lot of cameras were on that side.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: They were behind me on my bald spot.

Mr. Ben: The point is there are many things we have to do to preserve a Canadian entity. Most of them we have to do hand-in-hand with our brothers in Quebec, otherwise we cannot succeed. We cannot pull in different directions.

Mr. Speaker, I say I apologize to the House for getting up and speaking extemporaneously like this, but I was moved to do so because I do think perhaps we may be treating the whole matter a little too frivolously. Thank you.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I might say at the outset that I resent the manner in which the Tory Ministers have opted out of this debate. It appears to me that they have decided that today being Budget day, the opportunity for press coverage at this time is not in their best interests and they feel that it would be better to wait until a more suitable time in order to ensure—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What has this to do with debate on Constitution?

Mr. Deans: The Minister is about to find out if he will sit and listen for a change.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): As usual, we are talking in a vacuum.

Mr. Deans: It might be very interesting if the Minister would just listen instead of talking. He does a lot of talking and very little listening,

So in view of the poor attendance in the House at the moment, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, we will continue this debate tomorrow.

At this time I should like to indicate to the House the order of the estimates as the Prime Minister said yesterday he would. We will commence estimates on Thursday, starting with the estimates of the Treasurer.

Estimate No. 2 will be The Department of Correctional Services; No. 3 will be The Department of Tourism and Information; next, The Department of Mines; next The Department of Provincial Secretary and Citizenship and then The Department of Social and Family Services. Those will be the first six.

Hon. Mr. Welch moves the adjournment of the House.

Mr. T Reid: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the House leader when bills might be coming in?

Hon. Mr. Welch: I do not imagine that we will do many bills until the first of the week.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10.00 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 5, 1969

The House met at 2.30 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Our guests this afternoon in the east gallery are students from Emery Junior High School in Weston and Lyndwood Public School in Port Credit. In the west gallery we have students from Glenview Senior Public School in Toronto and from Strathroy District Collegiate Institute in Strathroy.

Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Before the orders of the day Mr. Speaker has a statement.

Yesterday the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) raised what in effect were several points of privilege in which he was joined by the hon. members for Sarnia (Mr. Bullbrook) and Scarborough West (Mr. Lewis). Since then, the hon. member for Sudbury has clarified in writing to me his point of privilege as follows:

You alone are the custodian of this House and its appointments and appurtenances and you cannot surrender them to leaders of parties or anyone else. You determine the conditions under which the CBC comes in here and with respect, you must do so with the consent of the members.

However, the hon. member's submission was originally in much wider terms and I would propose to deal with both the general proposition originally expounded by him in the House and with his specific submission quoted above.

As the hon. members have rightfully pointed out, the position in the British Parliamentary institution upon which our Ontario Parliament is patterned has changed, even been reversed, as the centuries have passed. From his first position as the Sovereign's appointed "watch dog," Mr. Speaker has now become Parliament's elected chairman and the arbiter and defender of the rights and privileges of the members, being also charged with ensuring that the members' responsibilities are by them properly accepted. In this latter capacity, he acts with the consent and approval of the members or a majority of them and it is interesting to note here that in such capacity his responsibility also extends to protecting either individual members or the majority of the members from improper exercise or abuse of privileges and rights by any individual member. The reverse, of course, is also his duty.

In the performance of his duties as chairman of the assembly, Mr. Speaker necessarily follows the rules and precedents of the House and rulings of previous Speakers. The arrangement of the government business on any day is governed by the House leader. When a radical departure from the existing practice of the House is announced by the government House leader, Mr. Speaker is entitled to assume that such arrangement has been discussed with the party leaders or party caucus leaders and represents the view of the members or a majority thereof. It is, of course, open to any member to question the House leader or to urge another course of action.

This brings me to the written submission of the hon. member for Sudbury quoted above.

A perusal of the record of the proceedings of this House on Monday evening last indicates that the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), then acting as government House leader, advised the House of arrangements for televising the Budget address of the Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton) on the following afternoon.

At that time, of course, it would have been quite proper for the hon. member for Sudbury, who I believe was then in the House, to rise on the point of privilege raised by him yesterday. At that time the matter could have been settled by the members. No such point was raised by any member, and Mr. Speaker, therefore, was then, and still remains, of the opinion that the members or a majority of them were agreeable to this radical change in the proceedings of the House.

Finally, it is my opinion that the rearrangement of which the hon. member complains did not infringe or interfere with the rights and privileges, as such member, of any member of this assembly.

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Treasurer announced yesterday in that great Budget which he brought down for the benefit of all the people of Ontario, that the government will assume responsibility for the administration of assessment, and this vital function will come under the jurisdiction of The Department of Municipal Affairs. In a change such as this, Mr. Speaker, we are aware that the attitudes of the people directly involved are of paramount importance and their support is essential in achieving our long-range goals.

I would like to take this opportunity to assure all assessment employees at this time that their needs and well-being are receiving the fullest consideration in our planning. Surveys are now under way on personnel, equipment and accommodation in the various municipalities. Until these surveys are complete, we will not know just how each individual will fit into the new assessment organization.

However, I assure you that the participation of all assessment staff will be needed in order to put the new measures into effect. To illustrate, I need only point out that the total number of licenced assessors in this province is 1,250. To bring assessment to what we consider the proper level and maintain it, we require at least 1,900 assessors.

Therefore, not only do we expect to employ all of our present full-time personnel, but also we will through our programmes attract additional competent, qualified people into this field to fill our requirements.

I cannot deny, Mr. Speaker, that there will be changes. When a new organization is being built, when operations are being redefined, when more than 160 assessment jurisdictions are being merged into a third of that number, there are bound to be changes.

Officials of my department are working with representatives of Treasury Board and The Department of Civil Service to build a sound organizational structure that will provide career progression for professional staff and greater opportunities for all employees.

All persons presently employed full-time in the assessment offices will be given the opportunity of appointment to staff and assignment to classified positions within the Ontario public service, commensurate with their qualifications, experience and competence. Appointments to such positions will be at existing salaries, exclusive of premiums, bonuses and allowances, which employees are actually receiving on March 4, 1969. Where this rate is less than the minimum for the classification to which they are appointed in the Ontario public service, the rate will be raised to that minimum, effective as of the date of their appointment. In no case will salaries for persons appointed to such positions be less than that at March 4, 1969.

Fringe benefits will be in accordance with The Public Service Act with recognition of previous service in their present employment. With respect to each group of employees affected, every effort will be made to ensure that over-all compensation, including fringe benefits, will be equitable in relation to existing conditions of employment.

On the question of premises, The Department of Public Works has a survey under way to determine our requirements. In some instances, the municipalities may need the space presently occupied by assessment personnel, which will necessitate relocation to other quarters.

On the other hand, some municipalities may not need the space, in which case agreements can be negotiated for the rental of those quarters. Compensation will be paid to the municipalities for equipment and furniture in use in assessment offices on March 4, based on market value of the items.

Throughout this undertaking, Mr. Speaker, we are trying to be as fair as possible to the assessment personnel and to the municipalities involved, bearing in mind the overall objective of creating the most efficient assessment system possible.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): Would the Minister answer a question in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: The only questions that are to be asked at this time are for clarification.

Mr. Sargent: Do I take it, Mr. Speaker, that every employee in assessment in Ontario will be a civil servant from here on?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I think if the hon. member will refer to the Treasurer's Budget statement of yesterday—

Mr. Sargent: I am asking the Minister the question; does he know the answer?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, read yesterday's Budget.

That is not clarifying what I said today.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Minister has answered it in the terms of—

Mr. Sargent: That shows their incompetence, when he does not even know the answer to that question.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Education, left over from two or three days ago.

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could have a point of clarification from the hon. Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Indeed, yes.

Mr. Pilkey: Would not the proposal that the employees in the assessment department will become part of the civil service mean an erosion of the bargaining unit, as far as the Canadian Union of Public Employees are concerned?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I think if the hon. member would check he will find that his leader has a question of the Prime Minister along the same lines. Perhaps it would be answered then.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Of the Minister of Education, Mr. Speaker. How many teachers entered the profession in Ontario in September, 1968? If a similar number of teachers were to be required in September, 1969, and only 2,000 are presently in the colleges of education, why is the Minister not responding to plans for secondary school teacher training put forward by the Ontario Secondary School Teachers Federation in January of 1968?

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, the member for Peterborough has a question that is not unrelated. If he would like to ask that I will endeavour to answer both of them at the same time.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Would the Minister indicate the reasons behind his decision to reject the OSSTF's internship scheme to alleviate the teacher shortage in the secondary schools, and the decision to enlarge the college of education of the University of Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, in reply to this question. I apologize at the outset that the answer is fairly lengthy, but I thought we might touch all the bases while we do this so that there will be no misunderstanding.

The total number of teachers entering the profession in September of 1968 was 12,280. It is assumed from the remainder of the question that particular reference to the secondary school level is intended and the total in this area was 4,792.

It will be recalled that, in 1967, the Department received representations from a committee under the chairmanship of Mr. T. D. Boone, the director of education for the Etobicoke board, which had on it members from various organizations interested in teacher education. That committee recommended the discontinuance of the summer courses for the training of secondary school teachers, and the recommendation was adopted in 1967. The Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation had also conducted some studies under its teacher training supply committee, of which Mr. N. J. Hill was the chairman.

The first report was dated April, 1967, and was received at the department in January of 1968. The second report was dated November, 1967. Under the date of June 21, 1968, Mr. Robb, who was then the general secretary of OSSTF, wrote to me and set out certain recommendations of his own organization. I replied to that letter under date of July 3, 1968, acknowledging his letter and stating that the recommendations had been sent to the committee studying this particular area.

The latter reference was to a committee which I appointed in the summer of 1968 to consider various ways in which provision could be made for new and additional programmes for the training of secondary school teachers. Because of his earlier involvement and knowledge of the situation, Mr. Boone was invited to chair the new committee. This committee included representatives of the Ontario Secondary School Headmasters' Council, the Ontario School Trustees' Council, the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, and the then association of Ontario Directors of Education, the deans of the three colleges, the department itself and the Ontario Teachers Federation, which was represented by Mr. Hill, chairman, teacher training and supply committee, OSSTF, whose report on programmes for internship training were referred to earlier.

Mr. Boone's committee, in its report to me, stated that it had access to the following reports and proposals previously submitted by various organizations interested in teacher education in Ontario.

1. Resolutions re teacher training, prepared by the Ontario Secondary Schools Headmasters' Council.

2. The report of the study of internship in the training of secondary school teachers in Ontario, prepared by the OSSTF.

3. Proposals for the early termination of the emergency programme for the preparation of secondary school teachers in Ontario. This was prepared by an ad hoc committee of educators concerned with the education and engagement of qualified teachers for provincial schools.

It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, from this, shall we say, chronological order, that these suggestions were considered by the committee who made their final recommendations to me.

In its report, Mr. Boone's committee made a number of recommendations, but the report did not include an endorsement of the internship programme. It said, in part:

The committee gave full consideration to a number of the teacher training programmes. Several interested groups advocated the introduction of a variety of internship plans, some of which do have considerable merit, but certain major difficulties were anticipated by the committee. The committee was not prepared to recommend them at this time, although they should be considered in the future.

The reasons were spelled out in the report itself.

After the receipt of the report from Mr. Boone, the recommendations were discussed in detail with the deans of the colleges in the fall of 1968. I think for the interest of the members of the House I will just, very briefly, give some of the recommendations and just what has happened to them.

The first recommendation: Retain for a period of time the summer courses of teacher training for mature students. This recommendation was accepted.

Second: Maintain the existing regular session of teacher training in the colleges of education, September to May. This recommendation was accepted.

Third: Maintain admission requirements of forty-five university credits, with a minimum of six credits for each of two subjects taught in the secondary schools. This was also accepted.

Fourth: Appoint additional staff to colleges of education to meet the increased programmes and enrolments. This recommendation, Mr. Speaker, will be implemented to the extent that the enrolments justify.

Fifth: Give recognition to the full year of professional training in the form of a second degree, such as a bachelor of education. Queen's University, Mr. Speaker, has adopted this recommendation; that is the students going to McArthur College will move through that institution and receive a bachelor of education from Queen's. It is a matter, Mr. Speaker, that comes within the jurisdiction of each university and senate, so that the other universities will have to decide whether they wish to adopt this recommendation.

Sixth: Stabilize, during the period of teacher shortage, the pupil-teacher ratio at its present provincial average of 17.1. Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out here that a number of studies have been conducted in this area and there are presently others underway, and over the last few years a very favourable student-staff ratio has been developing. It is felt unnecessary to lower the figure at the present time, and indeed some reversal in certain areas, and I emphasize certain areas, might be justified in the light of the present supply of teachers.

Seventh: Endorse the appointment of lay and technical assistants as administrative staff. The department has sent out a memorandum endorsing the use of teachers' aides in certain areas.

Eighth: Renovate and enlarge the college of education, Toronto. Endorsement has been given to the renovation and the enlargement of the college of education, at the University of Toronto; but there are still some unresolved problems in the terms of specific size, because it relates to the total programme of development here in the Metro area for both elementary and secondary schools. We cannot treat them in isolation.

That leads, of course, to the ninth recommendation: To establish a second college of education in this area, preferably at York University. The acceptance of this recommendation is contingent on the development of an overall provision for the education of teachers at both the elementary and secondary levels. Mr. Speaker, we have made significant progress in the elementary area in the past few days, and I anticipate I will have more to say about this, hopefully in the next two weeks.

Tenth: Establish residential facilities to accommodate the growing enrolment. Special provision is being made for a residence for McArthur College at Queen's, and the plans are well advanced. The residence is to be built by the Ontario Student Housing Corporation. Residences at the other institutions are open to students enrolled in the colleges.

The 11th recommendation: Proceed with negotiations at the University of Ottawa for the training of French-speaking teachers. Negotiations have proceeded for the establishment of a college of education at the University of Ottawa to train secondary school teachers for the French schools within the public system. The university has a committee under the chairmanship of Dr. Harry Pullen, the former superintendent of secondary schools for the collegiate institute board, working on the development of a functional plan for a new college of education which will also incorporate the present University of Ottawa teachers' college. We are trying to build the two in together, which will also incorporate, as I say, the teachers' college that trains teachers for the bilingual elementary schools of the province.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am just endeavouring to give the hon. members—because it is a very important subject at this particular time of the year—a clear picture. It is my understanding that an associate dean has been selected and that it is planned to begin operation in September of this year, that is this coming September.

12th: To encourage universities to open negotiations leading to provisions for teacher training.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Davis: The negotiations, as I said just a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, to transfer the teachers' colleges to the universities, have been conducted now for some months and I hope to have something further to say on this within the next two or three weeks.

13th: Proceed immediately to set up a programme of teacher recruitment under the leadership of the Minister and the prestige of his office—which some across the way might debate, Mr. Speaker—using all media of communication. The recruitment practice has assisted in the substantial increase in enrolment in 1968 and it is our intention to intensify this programme for 1969.

14th: Appoint to the staffs of the colleges of education, on a full-time basis, special personnel to carry out the recruitment programme. This recommendation, Mr. Speaker, is under the control of the universities where the colleges of education are located and it is my understanding that visits are being made by representatives of the colleges to the universities to meet with graduates who are prospective recruits to the profession.

15th: To appoint persons familiar with Ontario certification standards to provide information to prospective immigrant teachers. Encouragement here, Mr. Speaker, is given to persons who are qualified as teachers in other jurisdictions. Each college of education has staff knowledgeable in this area and, of course, the department adds some service in this regard as well.

16th: To encourage colleges of education to admit as special students in selected courses, those whose teacher education is deficient by Ontario standards.

The department, Mr. Speaker, is willing to grant certification to special students in selected courses providing the university is willing to admit such students, and provided there is no lowering of certification standards for those who teach in our school system.

17th: To inaugurate, at one or more colleges of education, a teacher training course from January to August equivalent to the present full-year course. There was consideration given to this, Mr. Speaker, but there are uncertainties at the present time about whether there will be an adequate number of persons wishing to enroll in such a course at the time indicated. It has not been rejected but there will have to be further consideration of this recommendation.

18th (which is tied into it): To inaugurate a similar type of course from May to December equivalent to the full year course—and the same suggestion applies to that.

19th: Permit boards to offer a two-year contract to university graduates, one year at a college of education and one year in the classroom. This recommendation, Mr. Speaker, has a number of difficulties which boards may not wish to accept, since it involves payment of salary for a year where no service is received. There has been no specific action taken on this proposal to date.

20th: Extend to teachers holding the EST 3 certificate and 30 university credits, the provision of a two-year contract as outlined above.

I should point out, Mr. Speaker, that teachers who hold these qualifications can be engaged by letter of permission, but the limitations referred to in the previous recommendation also apply here insofar as the two-year contract is concerned.

21st: Introduce if necessary a shift arrangement for the September-to-May session at colleges of education. Consideration will be given by the colleges to shift arrangements, if necessary, but we are hopeful, Mr. Speaker, that this can be avoided.

It is possible that a college might decide to conduct a programme for two groups of students, one in the college while the other is out doing practice teaching in the schools. All possible alternatives will be considered.

22nd—We are near the end of the recommendations, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Thank God.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is regrettable that the member for Sudbury is not particularly interested in teacher education, because the northern areas of the province have some very real problems—

Mr. Sopha: That is not the point. I am more bothered about the Minister's gross abuse of this House—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I really do not want to get into a debate with the hon. member for Sudbury—

Mr. Sopha: Apparently if the Prime Minister says it is all right, it is okay.

Hon. Mr. Davis: —about the rules of the House, because I have sensed certain abuses on his part over the past number of years.

22nd: Encourage colleges of education to make arrangements whereby the full teacher-training programme may be taken over the period of more than one year. Now if the dean of a college recommends this procedure for a student, the department is willing to accept it for certification requirements. This is another change taking place in teacher education.

23rd: Adhere strictly to the present regulations and limitations on granting letters of permission. These are being continued.

24th: Require persons employed on the letter of permission to complete an orientation programme offered by a local board or the regional office of The Department of Education. As I indicated a few days ago, Mr. Speaker, the department has no objection to local boards conducting an orientation programme for persons employed on letters of permission, as long as it is clearly understood—and this must be emphasized—that such courses are not in lieu of the regular certification requirements.

25th: Remove Canadian citizenship restriction as a requirement for certification. This recommendation has also been adopted.

26th: Encourage boards to employ teachers on the regular staff on less than a full time basis. The boards, Mr. Speaker, are free to employ teachers on less than a full time basis and the department endorses this action.

27th—there are only 30 and the member for Sudbury will realize we only have three more to go after the 27th—Request the super-annuation commission to allow retired teachers on type "A" pension to teach for one full school year without reduction of pension. The number of days a teacher on a type "A" pension can be employed in one school year has now been extended to 100 days.

28th: Remove, during the present emergency, the existing restrictions relating to the dates of engaging qualified teachers or persons who are proceeding to qualifications under one of the plans recommended in this report. If it is found necessary to make this change, Mr. Speaker, consideration will be given to it.

29th and 30th relate to economic recommendations—to extend the Ontario government fellowship programme to $1,500 for graduates taking a full year teacher training course at a college of education. As the members know, an enrolled student is entitled now to a bursary of $500. We have determined that, because of economic limitations, we cannot extend this to the $1,500. The final recommendation is to provide an amount of $1,000 for mature students to attend the initial summer course. Once again, because of economic limitations—and I would think perhaps other reasons as well, which I will not burden the House with at this particular moment—this recommendation was not accepted either.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, the question was asked on a matter of considerable urgency. I do not believe the answer, which reviews government policy in the training of teachers, answers the question. If I might put it again, Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question if the Minister will permit.

By his own figures we are going to require 4,792 teachers this September. His colleges of education have enrolled this year about 2,100. It appears then that the prediction of a 2,000 teacher shortage is conservative and we can expect it to be 2,700. I cannot see how his answer is going to accommodate the serious nature of this shortage when school time rolls around next September.

Now I am concerned as to the possibility of the Minister issuing letters of permission to some 2,700 applicants without endeavouring to give them even the rudiments of teacher training that could be provided if in fact, along with the letter of permission, some sort of indoctrination course at the departmental level were offered.

I would ask the Minister if he is considering this as an emergency situation and a possible accommodation?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I answered this question some three or four days ago on this specific point. I indicated very clearly that the department supports, or does not object to, local boards offering the orientation courses. I referred to it in the answer, if the hon. leader of the Opposition was listening carefully today, when I said—

Mr. Nixon: I was listening.

Hon. Mr. Davis: —we do not object to this. If the boards wish to develop an orientation course of three or four weeks during the summer months for those who will be going on letters of permission in September, we have no objection to this whatsoever.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister will permit a further supplementary question.

He was unwilling a week ago to predict what the teacher shortage would be. His own figures that he put before us now would indicate that the shortage, at the secondary level, is going to be in excess of 2,000 teachers and not less than that.

Hon. Mr. Davis: No, it does not. With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I did not say this. The hon. leader of the Opposition has asked either two or three questions relating to the shortage of secondary school teachers. There is a reference made, as I recall his question, as I read it here: "Why did the Minister not respond to plans for secondary school teachers put forward by the OSSTF?"

I have related, in my answer, the recommendations from the OSSTF, how they were considered by the committee chaired by Mr. Boone—

Mr. Nixon: I did not ask that. It is quite all right for the Minister to give us that information; I asked him about the internship programme. He did not deal with that at all.

Hon. Mr. Davis: That is right. And I have indicated the reasons for not accepting and the alternatives that have been accepted. We think they will come very close to resolving the problem. The hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

I think we should get this in perspective. The hon. leader's question says:

Why has the Minister not responded to plans for secondary school teacher training put forward by the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation in January of 1968?

My understanding of the answer is that the hon. Minister has been answering this question by setting out the recommendations by this federation and what has happened to them, just as the hon. leader has asked. And, therefore, the question and answer, although long, were right on the point of the question as asked by the hon. leader.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask a supplementary question?

First I would say that I am delighted to see that my Throne Debate remarks had such immediate effect upon the Minister in regards to this priority teacher education. But there was one comment he made which I would like to have clarified. He mentioned that Ontario had moved to a very favourable teacher-student ratio.

Hon. Mr. Davis: In some areas.

Mr. Pitman: The Minister also mentioned, Mr. Speaker, that there was to be a reversal of this trend in certain areas. I wonder if he would clarify in what areas he feels there might be a reversal of the favourable trend.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, this is very complicated and I do not want it to be misunderstood. Our studies indicate—and some of the studies being undertaken by the new county board would indicate—that there are certain areas where the teacher-student ratio is substantially lower than in other areas.

All I am saying is that where it is lower obviously there is no need to lower it further, and some consideration must be given to increasing that student-teacher ratio.

For instance, if you have it at 12 to 1 or 13 to 1, then I think with the concept of the regional board they can bring this up to 16 or 17 to 1, which in itself could help resolve the problem of the number of teachers that are required. This was not possible under the multitude of educational jurisdiction we had prior to January 1.

We think this is now possible in some geographic areas at least; and this is why, Mr. Speaker, one cannot identify specifically for the leader of the Opposition as yet, what the total shortage will be, because we do not know just what effect this type of programme will have on the needs for teachers in the secondary school field in the province.

Mr. Nixon: Waiting for September will be too late.

Mr. Pitman: Would the Minister accept a short supplementary question?

Would the Minister not agree that implementing the Hall-Dennis report would indeed demand a lower student-teacher ratio than we have at the present time?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong these discussions. I do not think there is anything inherent in the Hall-Dennis report that makes it necessary to reduce the student-teacher ratio. I think there is a relocation of total resource, no question about this; but with the possibility of team teaching, and other matters that I will be discussing over the next two or three weeks. I think that the student-teacher ratio can remain relatively constant and we can still implement many of the recommendations within the report.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South has a question.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of questions from previous days.

First, from Monday of this week, questions 794 and 795 to the Minister of Health.

I have a question of the Minister designed to reconcile conflicting figures with regard to the percentage of our population whose medical insurance does not cover them for home and office calls.

The 1967 survey of voluntary health insurance in Canada indicates that 194,000 of Ontario's population have no coverage at all. The Minister's reply earlier in this session revealed that there were 103,000 people in the PSI Brown Plan, and some 7.1 per cent, or 168,000, have private insurance that provides no coverage for home and office calls. Finally, there are 154,000 with surgical coverage alone.

These figures add up to 619,000 persons with no coverage for home and office calls, which represent 8.5 per cent of our total population. How does the Minister reconcile this figure with his reply to my question on December 20, 1968, that 95 per cent of the population is covered for home and office calls?

Mr. Speaker: Before the Minister replies to that question, I would just like to point out to the members the difficulty of asking questions and of the Speaker dealing with them. The rules of the House state that no facts are to be stated in a question.

This question is replete with facts, as are most of them. I would urge the hon. members that if we are to follow the rules in some respects, we endeavour to ask questions and not state facts other than those that are absolutely essential, even though the rules say we may not state facts for the asking of the question.

The hon. Minister has the floor.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Without going into a lengthy detailed answer, I can only say that I have submitted this again to my statistical experts and they state to me that 6,747,000 persons, or 95.6 per cent of the 7,015,000 covered population have coverage for home and office calls.

Mr. MacDonald: Well Mr. Speaker, the Minister's own figures at varying times are in conflict.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that I agree with you. I was painfully aware of the problem of that question but I thought in terms of your final comments that only those facts that were necessary to ask the question were relevant. I tried to reduce it, but could not.

Mr. Speaker: And I accepted it on that basis, but I thought it should be called to the attention of the House.

Mr. MacDonald: Thank you.

My second question to the Minister of Health. Has the Minister received a request from the international vice-president of the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphide and Paper Workers for an investigation of the 46 per cent in rate increase by PSI? If so, will the Minister act on the request?

I notice the word "increase" has been dropped there but I am sure the import of the question was conveyed to the Minister.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. I have replied to the letter which I received, but I pointed out several things to the correspondents: That I have neither power nor authority to conduct or order such an investigation; and that PSI is an organization chartered under the laws of the province of Ontario and is subject to the law administered by the insurance branch of The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs. I have recommended that their request be directed to PSI or that I would be prepared to do so for them as soon as I have the consent so to do.

Mr. MacDonald: Two questions from yesterday, Mr. Speaker, numbers 802 and 811. The first is to the Minister of Agriculture and Food.

Has the Minister received a request for an interview from representatives of the affiliated societies of the Ontario Humane Society regarding Bills 73 and 74?

Second, would the Minister meet with representatives of these affiliated bodies from outside the Toronto area prior to the second reading of the bills?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture and Food): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I have received such a request. I have a letter from one of the affiliated organizations suggesting that they would like to meet with me but the letter does not specifically say that the group wants to come in and meet. I would welcome the opportunity to meet with them and if they decide to ask to come in and send a representative from each group I would be more than pleased to see them.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Treasurer.

The November-December issue of the Co-Ordinator, official publication of the regional development branch, arrived at my office today and carried beside the postage meter stamp the words: "Peas Are Plentiful".

Would the Minister explain what this message means? Is it a successor to the slogan "Province of Opportunity"? And what relationship it has to regional development?

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, the "Peas Are Plentiful" message is part of a campaign sponsored by the Ontario Food Council to encourage the sale of frozen canned peas. There is a surplus in Canada. The regional development branch is pleased to co-operate in any promotional programme which will benefit the farm community in Ontario, and consequently was happy to use the postage meter imprint provided by the food council. This is an example of how the departments of the government are co-operating to ensure that Ontario will continue to be the "Province of Opportunity".

Mr. MacDonald: I am sure, Mr. Speaker, this little vignette of our political life is going to be greeted with great acclaim across the province.

I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister give assurance of full consultation with those unions through which municipal assessment personnel now have collective bargaining rights so that in the process of the proposed provincial takeover of assessment we may avoid the kind of difficulties experienced at the Don Jail and elsewhere during the switch of the administration of justice to the province?

Second, in view of the government's decision to take over municipal assessment, can the Prime Minister advise the House when Judge Little's report might be expected?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): The Minister of Municipal Affairs dealt with at least some aspects of this in his statement, and I can assure the member we will examine the status of these people. It is difficult to know at this stage of the game just what their status is. There are unions in some areas, I suppose, and not in others, but a survey is being made of the personnel involved and we will see that they are dealt with fairly and equitably when the time comes. It is a little premature to say what we are going to do, but the point the member makes is well taken. I can assure him that it will be given consideration.

Mr. Sargent: As long as we have complete control of the province, that is what counts.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: That is right! That is precisely right.

Now, sir, the member mentioned Judge Little's report. Any statement of mine would be pure speculation, although I understand that the work connected with the report has been completed and the report is presently being written. I am as interested in seeing it as the hon. member is, and as soon as it is available we will have a look at it and see where it leads.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, by way of a supplementary question, could I ask the Prime Minister if the survey will cover personnel in the broad sense, not just assessment officers but all other office staff who work with assessment officers?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I can not answer that. I do not know whether the member is now referring to stenographic help and things of that nature.

Mr. MacDonald: Right!

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I believe The Department of Municipal Affairs is asking various municipalities — the present employers of people engaged in assessment—who they are, what their status is and who is on their staff. I would not know, they may be people out of a general pool of stenographers. There is a lot of detail involved in this that will come along as we develop the programme.

Mr. Speaker: This might be an appropriate place for the member for Huron-Bruce to deal with his question which has been transferred to the Minister of Municipal Affairs and which perhaps was answered by the Minister's statement earlier today. If not, and he feels he should place it again, now would be a good time.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, if I may, my question has been partly answered by the statement of the Minister, but perhaps the Minister would like to have the opportunity to make a further statement. In that case I will read my question.

In view of the Treasurer's statement yesterday concerning the takeover by the province of assessment, will the Minister give assurance that municipalities which have embarked upon the county system will be fully compensated for money expended on the programme?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I am a little bit uncertain as to what the hon. member is aiming at. It is obviously impractical to fully compensate the municipalities for their efforts in this area when assessment until now has traditionally been a municipal responsibility.

We have, in fact, already reimbursed municipalities operating under the county and district assessment system. Subsidies have been paid since the inception of these centralized systems. The subsidies ranged up to $12,500 towards the salary of the assessment commissioner and his staff, 50 per cent of the cost of office equipment used in processing assessment data up to $2,500, and 50 per cent of the rental costs for such equipment.

Now, if that is the sort of thing that the member is referring to, I indicated in my statement that we are prepared to purchase the interest of any municipality in such property at the currently appraised value.

Mr. Gaunt: Mr. Speaker, if I may, on a point of clarification—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Right!

Mr. Gaunt: I had Huron in mind in putting the question, sir. Huron has built a brand new assessment building and I think it is fair to say that they are concerned about what will happen to that building. Will they be paid off at a dollar per square foot as happened in the case of the take over of administration of justice and so on?

This is very important to them and they are concerned about it. The Minister says market value—well, this certainly would not compensate them for the costs involved in building that building.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I think it is a little different situation than the administration of justice. This is a building which is owned, presumably, by the county of Huron. We are not taking over that physical asset. We tried to make it clear. The first thing we have to determine is whether the municipality wants that building for any other purpose. Many of the county buildings and city halls throughout the province are crowded. I think they would be quite happy to get the assessors out—some will, some will not.

Now in the case of Huron, if they do not have another use for that building, presumably we will enter into an equitable rental arrangement with them. But it is different from the administration of justice, because we are not taking over the assets. It will be a matter of negotiation on a fair rental price—if we want to rent there, and they want to rent to us.

Mr. Gaunt: The Minister just opened the building two months ago.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: They did not ask me to cut the ribbon.

Mr. Nixon: If the Minister was there he would have thought about that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. R. H. Knight (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to the Treasurer. Why has the tobacco counter at the Royal York Hotel increased the price of a pack of cigarettes overnight by five cents?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I would almost have to propose to the hon. member that he ask the Royal York Hotel. We have no control over the prices charged by vendors. The additional tax is two cents, but what merchants charge for a package of cigarettes is entirely their own business.

Mr. Knight: Would the Minister accept a supplementary question?

Mr. T. Reid (Scarborough East): It's competition! Does the member want price control?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Does the member want price control?

Mr. Sargent: Talk about rent controls—they have complete control.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member for Port Arthur is endeavouring to address a supplementary question.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to know whether private business and private industry would be allowed by this government to take advantage of yesterday's tax increases in order to increase their own prices over and above the tax increase.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Speaker, the obvious answer is that there is no price control. There is no question about the fact that the market places take care of this situation in due course. Nobody is going to pay an excessive price for cigarettes if they can get them for less elsewhere. Competition will take care of it.

Mr. R. F. Ruston (Essex-Kent): I have a question I placed with the Minister of Agriculture and Food last Friday, and I wonder if he would answer it now. The question I placed last Friday was number 787.

Mr. Speaker: As far as my records are concerned, it has not been asked yet, so perhaps the hon. member would ask it now.

Mr. Ruston: To the hon. Minister of Agriculture and Food: Has the federal government carried out its ARDA agreement with the province as to its maximum commitment in the amount of $5,058,000 a year?

If it has not, how much money did it cancel or withdraw from the ARDA funds in the past year?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question reached me some time ago. I do not have it with me. Speaking completely from memory, I have to advise the House, and I am pleased to do this, through you Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Mr. Marchand addressed a letter to me which arrived just recently, in which he agreed to make good the total amount of the ARDA agreement drafted for 1965-1970. We would receive the full amount of the $25 million, plus whatever number of thousands the hon. member referred to but it would be spread out over a period of time, in which in no year would we receive more than $5 million and a few thousand.

Now this means that, contrary to the agreement that had been reached with his predecessor in which it was agreed that we would reach a greater amount of expenditure as the agreement progressed towards the final date of 1970, and would receive more than the $5 million a year during that time, we will now have to wait beyond 1970 to get the full amount of the agreement. But we have been promised that.

It will mean that, to use as an illustration, for the fiscal year 1968-1969, where we spent $14 million in ARDA in the province of Ontario, we will only be able to recover, under what he has agreed to, the $5 million. I believe about $1 million or more was paid on accounts that had been carried over from previous years. Now the Treasurer of Ontario will have to carry that account forward to the time when the federal department will reimburse the province.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Beaches-Woodbine has a question.

Mr. J. L. Brown (Beaches-Woodbine): Yes. From time to time, Mr. Speaker, in a fit of weakness I address a question to the Minister of Education.

What is the department doing to provide proper educational facilities for the Indian children in Armstrong? Would the Minister outline the difference between the educational facilities provided by his department for Indian children and non-Indian children in the Armstrong area?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the public school board of SS No. 1, Armstrong, is a locally elected body which, under The School Acts, is responsible for the provision of education for the children within its jurisdiction. The board has operated a three-room school for some time, present enrolment roughly 109 students, of which only a few are Indians.

This accommodation is adequate for the responsibility of the board for its own particular students. There are, in addition, to the people within the school section of SS No. 1, Armstrong, a number of Indian families who live on Crown land, outside the jurisdiction of the local board. These are registered Indians, Indians who are not on a reservation.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development of the federal government is responsible for the provision of education for the children of these families. That department has made provision for a number of these children to attend a residential school in the Lakehead and elsewhere. Negotiations have been going on between the trustees of the board of SS No. 1, Armstrong, and the federal Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, whereby additional accommodation would be provided by the local board with financial assistance from the federal authority.

A proposal was put forward by the board in 1968, and I am advised that considerable progress has been made towards agreement this year. Officials of The Department of Education have assisted in the negotiations between the two groups, and it is hoped that by next fall new accommodation will be available in Armstrong.

Mr. Brown: In the meantime, is it true that the treaty Indian children living on Crown land will not be able to attend school in their home community?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if the hon. member wishes to pursue this with The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development he would get a more appropriate answer. As I say, they have made arrangements for some of the students to have facilities available to them in the Lakehead and elsewhere, and I am sure these arrangements could be extended.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cochrane South.

Mr. W. Ferrier (Cochrane South): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Highways. Can the Minister assure the House that there will be no curtailment of the construction programme on Highway 144, between Timmins and Sudbury? When will Highway 144 be opened to through traffic between Timmins and Sudbury?

Hon. G. E. Gomme (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is yes; and to the second part, we hope in the fall of 1970.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Some of the member's people think they should.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): In the south!

Mr. Ferrier: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Mines. Will the Minister table the map dividing Hudson and James Bay for underwater mineral rights among Ontario, Manitoba, Quebec and the Northwest Territories?

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not table the map. If it is the map that was referred to in the press today or yesterday, in the news despatches from Ottawa, I cannot table it, I have not seen it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kent.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask the Minister of Social and Family Services, which comes in two parts:

1. Does The Department of Social and Family Services set the admission policy to the homes for the aged?

2. Is an individual refused admission to homes for the aged, if he has a convalescent hip fracture, heart disease, or diagnosis of cancer?

Hon. J. Yaremko (Minister of Social and Family Services): Mr. Speaker, I had the question yesterday, and I am looking into the matter so that I may have a proper answer. I will have it in due course.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. G. W. Innes (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Highways. Could the Minister inform the House how many accidents have been reported on the Governors Road between Woodstock and Thamesford in the last two years? How many fatalities were there?

Hon. Mr. Gomme: Mr. Speaker, the answer to part one is that this road is under the jurisdiction of the county and we will contact the county and ascertain whether they have these statistics. And the answer to the second part will be the same as above.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for High Park has a question from the other day.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a question to the Minister of Education, in three parts.

Did the London Township School Board privately sell Fanshaw Public School for $5,000 to the Salem United Church, even though the school had cost $45,000 and there is still $23,000 owing on that?

2. Is it true that the secretary treasurer of the school board, and one other school board member, are also members of Salem United Church?

3. Does the department intend to intervene in this transaction?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the board sold the school for $5,000 to the church mentioned in the question from the hon. member, and that the former secretary treasurer, who is a member of the church, had no part in the sale of the building.

One board member was a member; but the five-man board, in total, agreed to sell the building. Of course under The Schools Administration Act, the board had the right to dispose of property no longer required for school purposes without authorization from the department.

In response to question three, I am referring this to The Department of the Attorney General for some legal guidance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Thunder Bay.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): A question of the Minister of Health: Is the Minister aware that the town of Schreiber, with a population of over 2,200, will be without a physician after April 1, 1969?

Will the Minister prevail upon graduating medical students to spend some time in northern Ontario communities before setting up permanent practice in urban areas?

And will the Minister attempt to prevail upon the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons to provide medical services for northern Ontario communities, and seek the services of retiring doctors from the armed services?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, officers from my department have been advised by the Thunder Bay health unit that there is a shortage of physicians in the area; we are aware of it. We have actively under consideration a variety of plans aimed at trying to provide a better distribution of health manpower throughout the province. The Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons has absolutely no power or authority to allocate doctors, to order them to practise in certain areas.

All of us are doing all we can to encourage the young graduates to take a tour of duty in the distant reaches of our province. Retiring doctors, those particularly from the armed services, are constantly being contacted and being encouraged to settle in these various areas and serve where their services can be utilized.

Mr. Stokes: Would the Minister indicate if there has been any favourable response to the kind of programme that has been initiated by his department in this regard?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: To the one that has been in vogue for some years now, Mr. Speaker, I can only report a very limited favourable response. That is the bursary system where we provide a bursary to undergraduates on the understanding that they will give a return in service for a stated period of time in a designated area.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grey-Bruce has a question from another day of the Minister of Highways and two questions today.

Mr. Sargent: A question to the Attorney General, Mr. Speaker:

According to the Journal of Corrections, it was stated that Canada was imprisoning 240 people per 100,000 population—20 per cent more than the United States and 500 per cent more than Norway.

Will the Minister advise:

1. What the Ontario average is per 100,000 population?
2. Why a work release programme cannot be instituted in Ontario?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, this question was asked some months ago and partially answered, I think, by my colleague, the Minister of Correctional Services (Mr. Grossman).

I have a fairly complete answer today: In Ontario in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1968, a total of 33,062 sentences of imprisonment were handed down by the courts, which works out to 462 per 100,000 of population.

This, of course, does not involve 33,062 different people. Many receive a number of short sentences during the course of a year. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the ratio is lower than 462 and cannot be calculated accurately because we do not fingerprint non-indictable offenders and some of these use different aliases.

If the hon. member is actually referring to prisoners transferred to correctional institutions, which incidentally, accounts by and large for those serving sentences of over 30 days, then the rate is 145 per 100,000 of population.

And I would warn the hon. member that it is very difficult to arrive at figures which accurately reflect crime related to population in different countries due to different customs, different laws and different methods of compiling and securing statistics.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the second part of the question, I would refer the hon. member to Hansard, May 27, 1968, pages 3385 and 3386; also to July 3, 1968, pages 5119, 5120, where the statements of the hon. Minister of Correctional Services, have been recorded regarding the work release programme.

Mr. Sargent: A question of the hon. Minister of Health. This was asked before but never answered. Mr. Speaker.

What consents are sought before electric shock treatment is administered to patients in provincially-operated hospitals? What observation procedures apply in the recovery room and wards after such treatment?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I have to correct the hon. member: The question was asked and it was answered. The answer and the question will be found on page 769 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has a question of the Minister of Highways from February 20? Has he it there?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sargent: A question of the Minister of Highways: Will the Minister advise how many millions of dollars the city of Toronto will receive from the province in the $136 million Spadina Expressway approved by the Ontario municipal board?

Hon. Mr. Gomme: Mr. Speaker, the Spadina Expressway will be built by the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto and the total approval by the Ontario municipal board received and pending of $136 million for the period ending 1975. The expenditure to date has been $46 million and The Department of Highways subsidy to date has been $23 million. The balance to the end of 1975 would be $90 million, and our estimated subsidy at 50 per cent would be $45 million.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lakeshore has two questions from yesterday.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): My question to the Minister of Health:

Is the Minister aware that the air pollution problem directly attributable to the Ontario Building Material Limited plant on Grand Avenue, Etobicoke, has not only not been rectified, despite my protests of over a year ago, but of recent date has actually worsened?

Will the Minister investigate immediately and put the screws on the offender and see that action is taken?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the things that the hon. member has stated. Indeed those of my staff who are constantly in contact with this are impressed with the amount of progress that has been made by this company in their attempts to improve their operation.

A very great deal has been accomplished in the last month and other improvements are presently under way with a scheduled completion time of three months. During our investigation of recent complaints, we were impressed by the number of residents who felt there was very great improvement in the area.

Mr. Lawlor: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Yes.

Mr. Lawlor: When was the last date on which an inspector of the department attended?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give him an exact date, but it was very recent because they are in contact with this programme which is going on and, as I have stated, is scheduled for completion in three months.

Mr. Lawlor: A question to the Minister of Highways:

What is the policy of The Department of Highways as to laying down white guidelines on the public highways during the winter, particularly at and in the environs of hazardous construction sites such as the junction of Highway 27 and the Queen Elizabeth Way?

Hon. Mr. Gomme: Mr. Speaker, weather conditions allow very little opportunity for winter painting. Experience has shown that paint applied in cold winter temperatures has an extremely short life, making an expensive winter painting programme impractical.

However, the department has, over the past few years, applied paint during the winter on the more heavily travelled sections of the freeway system, particularly areas under construction. Sections of Highway 27 and the Queen Elizabeth area have been painted several times this winter. However, in some cases the paint only lasted a matter of a few days.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brantford has a question from the other day.

Mr. M. Makarchuk (Brantford): It is a question of the Minister of Municipal Affairs:

Will the Minister consider appointing, under section 320 of The Municipal Act, a commission to investigate the allegations regarding the operations of the municipal welfare department at Brantford as requested by 50 ratepayers?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I think the answer would probably be no, inasmuch as the judge of Haldimand county, Judge W. W. Leach has been requested to conduct an inquiry into the matter under section 241 of The Municipal Act.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough East.

Mr. T. Reid: A question of the Minister of Education:

Will the Minister now state, in general terms, his view of the future of the educational television branch of his department:

(a) In view of the Budget comment that capital expenditures for ETV have been deferred indefinitely.

(b) In view of the strong switch in interest of the federal government's communications task force from educational television to a broader, "unifying" concept for the Canadian communications satellite.

(c) In view of the fact that electronic video tape recording will now be available before a broadcast network is established.

(d) Since this will demand a rationalization of the ETV and audio-visual functions now operating separately and quite independently to the taxpayer's disadvantage.

(e) Since the public accounts committee lacks this perspective in its current attempt to evaluate the past expenditures of the ETV branch.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Minister answers that question, I would like to draw to the attention of the House again that this is the type of question which causes difficulty and which, in future, will not be accepted.

The question itself should have ended at the beginning—at the end of the question. It should have ended thus: "Will the Minister now state, in general terms, his view of the future of the educational television branch?"

All the member is doing after that is stating facts which are not proper and not applicable. And I would draw to the attention of all members that in future I shall endeavour to confine the questions to questions, and not lengthy statements of fact.

We had this difficulty with the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Knight), with a question the other day and it has been my practice to allow these to be so asked because I feel a certain amount of explanation is necessary.

But in this case as well as in the former one, there was far too much statement of fact. The hon. Minister has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I would go one step further and say that not only are they statements of fact, they are not necessarily accurate statements of fact.

Mr. Sopha: How many pages has the Minister got?

An hon. member: Does the hon. member want a long answer or short one on this?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer this question as briefly as I can. Obviously it is the kind of question that to answer in detail would take a very substantial length of time. I shall try to confine my observations.

As I recall the statement yesterday of the Treasurer of the province of Ontario, he made reference to a number of capital projects that were postponed. I do not recall the term "deferred", nor do I recall the term "indefinitely". There was, however, the term "postponement". This related, of course, to the economic resources or the lack of availability for capital purposes.

But with respect to ETV, there are also other considerations. These relate to: (a) the possibility of what federal participation there will be with respect to the provision of capital for transmission and what form this may take and what charges, if any, will be incurred by the provinces. This relates very directly to the amount of capital that the provincial jurisdiction may or may not need.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we could really deal with this question more appropriately under the consideration of the estimates or perhaps upon the introduction of the bill related to the establishment of a communications authority for the province of Ontario.

I was somewhat confused by the enumerated facts in the question. Fact (e) I consider to be a non-sequitur, the way it is related.

And about, (b), we had some discussions with the task force from the federal government some very few days ago. My impression from those discussions, the same group that I think the hon. member is referring to here, would indicate that our plans in this province really were "on all fours" or certainly very close to it with respect to the task force consideration. Therefore, I find the (b) part of the factual part of the question somewhat confusing.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Lewis) also asked a question, No. 765, which he has already read to the House so there is no need to repeat it. I have the answer available for him now.

I think one can assume that the question was asked—

Mr. T. Reid: Does the Minister mean the member for Scarborough West or for Scarborough East?

Hon. Mr. Davis: I am sorry, Scarborough East.

One can assume that the questions relate to the recently announced feasibility study conducted by the META association of Toronto with the support of The Department of Education. This report examined the cost of multi-channel redistribution systems in schools in Metro Toronto and in Peel county using various methods of distribution such as cable and, of course, the 2500 megahertz system. The report recommended the use of this cable system as being the most economic and flexible, considering the channel capacity required.

It is assumed that the word "superior", and I am taking this from the hon. member's question, refers to channel capacity alone and not to the proposal to use UHF television for educational broadcasts. There is a distinction. It should also be noted that the proposal for an educational UHF television station would serve an area of approximately 60 miles in radius. I am sure this is known to the hon. member and would be available to all homes and schools, not just confined to schools within that area.

The proposed cable system, as we understand it, would be limited to schools and other institutions in the Metropolitan Toronto area. In other words, shall we say, the scope or area it can cover would be somewhat less than through the use of the UHF transmitter.

Now dealing with one or two of the specifics. The proposal of META is based on the use of standard VHF channels as is outlined in the feasibility study which was announced some seven or eight days ago. I think there are copies of this report available. Perhaps the hon. member already has one. The proposal is to use ten standard UHF channels requiring no modification of ETV receivers. There would not have to be any modification of the existing receivers.

With respect to the second part of the question which said: "Are we to accept the Bell Cable monopoly as a fact of life or will the government challenge it in the courts?"

As I try to interpret this as concisely as I can, there are two aspects to ETV; that is the production and the availability of material; and second, the transmission, whether it takes form in cable, megahertz, UHF, VHF, or what have you. The Bell Telephone Company, as I understand it, really can be classified as a common carrier not involved in production, quality or anything else. It transmits through cable the programmes that are available.

I think really, Mr. Speaker, this should be a matter of federal interest, if the hon. member feels there is, in fact, a monopoly here. As I understand it, there is nothing to prevent anybody else becoming a common carrier related to the transmission in this form of ETV or other types of programming.

I think Mr. Speaker, there might be some reaction from the general public if there were several firms involved digging up sidewalks and peoples' front lawns and so on, to provide this type of cable service. But I think, in fairness, this really must relate to any federal responsibility with respect to any monopoly situation.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the proposal for educational television in our own jurisdiction really, and I have said this many times in the House, is based on the most efficient and economical combination of distribution facilities available. Once again, you break them down into the two areas; production or the material that is available; and the transmission whether it is cable, UHF, VHF, megahertz or what have you.

In the case of the Toronto area it is proposed to use UHF television as a primary means of distribution to both the homes and to the schools. The use of local multiple channel redistribution systems in the schools will greatly enhance utilization of ETV, no question about it. Consequently, UHF TV and local redistribution systems are complementary. In no sense is either of them redundant?

With respect to section (d): The subject of ETV is presently being studied by a special federal task force under the chairmanship of the Under-Secretary of State which is the group we met with just a few days ago. Legislation in this area has been promised by the federal government in the relatively near future. Discussions have taken place between the task force and our own officials; in fact I was involved very briefly in some of the discussions myself. I think out of this will flow the type of system that will make the greatest sense with respect to ETV.

Mr. T. Reid: Will the Minister accept a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Would he take as notice, the questions implied in parts (c) and (d) of the question I placed to him today, and answer them as soon as possible?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to take anything as notice. However, I do not really see the implications in (c) and (d) cannot be discussed elsewhere. I see no reason why we cannot discuss them with respect to the legislation on the broadcasting authority or during the estimates. I do not think they need relate to notice; it is a matter, I think, that requires some discussion. I do not think you can answer it in a specific situation.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough West has a question.

Mr. Lewis: Thank you for retrieving my integrity, Mr. Speaker.

I have a question for the Attorney General. Respecting the Minister's statement yesterday on the chemical, Mace, and his assertion that he is satisfied that it:

Is a substance which if improperly and carelessly used may cause permanent injury to the eyes of the victim.

Under what circumstances can the Minister envisage its use by the police where they would have, again to quote the Minister,

All the necessary facilities available for immediate remedial action after its use?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, after the skin or other tissue has come in contact with Mace, it should be washed promptly and thoroughly with quantities of water. That is the treatment which is effective. Therefore any facilities which will provide thorough and prompt washing will be generally considered adequate.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): Like a watering can.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If exposure had been severe I should think that one would expect that the subject would be treated by a doctor or at the facilities of a hospital. That would be what I would consider as being reasonably adequate. As I say facilities to give prompt and thorough washing with quantities of water and where there had been severe exposure, treatment from a doctor or in a hospital.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker?

Does the Minister contend that a civil disturbance sufficient to engender the use of Mace would be conducted in a laboratory environment and that one would always be certain that facilities were available given the dangers that he sees inherent in its use?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows the views I have expressed about the use of Mace, which were pretty firm and pretty definite. I think the question is somewhat facetious, put in that form of language—

Mr. Lewis: Why does the Minister not ban it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I could perhaps answer in the same tone, but I do not propose to do so.

Mace, as I think I have indicated throughout my statements with respect to it, was not to be used first of all, in my view, until it had been established beyond all doubt that it did not cause serious permanent effects. The reports which we have so far received indicate that it is a weapon which can have quite serious effects; it indicates the treatment which can be used to nullify, modify or reduce the discomfort, and prevent permanent ill effects. We are doing further studies, as I indicated yesterday, and getting further reports. I think I also indicated yesterday that we are contemplating legislation to control or prevent its use if that becomes necessary. That is as full an answer as I could give at the moment.

Mr. Nixon: Has the Minister given any orders to the police force not to use it?

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Health has a statement or the answer to a question, or something?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct an error on page 1434 of Hansard. I quoted a figure 18,000. It should have been 1,800. This may very well have been a slip of my tongue, which I did not catch on correcting Hansard. Will you therefore direct, sir, that where the error is published this will be noted?

I would like to bring to your attention, sir, a matter of very great interest to me and I believe it will be to you and to the hon. members of the House. It concerns a member of the staff of the Department of Health, Dr. John L. Johnson, the chief claims officer in OMSIP. I have just learned that Dr. Johnson has been named as Colonel Commandant of the Dominion of Canada Rifle Association Bisley team for 1969.

This is indeed a signal honour bestowed on very few men, and the opportunity occurs only once in any man's lifetime to accept this honour of taking the Canadian team to the oldest of the British Empire—I believe it still goes under that name—sporting events held annually at the Bisley ranges in England.

The event takes place in July and the team consisting of Dr. Johnson and 21 members will be transported to the United Kingdom in Canadian Forces aircraft from the Canadian Forces Base in Trenton.

I am sure, sir, that you would join with me and all members of the House would join with me in congratulating one of my staff members being so selected and so singled out. The good wishes of the House, I am sure, will go with him and his team on this outstanding annual event.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to table answers to questions 815 and 816. (See appendix page 1900).

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, sir—it is not a terribly serious matter—but it has to do with Hansard and it could save, I believe, considerable money this year. I have received a report from a constituent at the post office with reference to the mailing of Hansard. It presently is being mailed under third class mail at the rate of five cents for the first two ounces and three cents for the next two ounces. I am informed it could be mailed under a second class label with a permit, which would cost only one cent for the first two ounces and one cent for the next two ounces. I believe it would save some thousands of dollars.

Mr. Speaker: I am pleased to have that, but it is the type of thing I think should be dealt with directly between the hon. member and the Speaker rather than taking up the time of the House. I will be glad to look into it.

Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The first order; resuming consideration of the propositions of the government of Ontario submitted to the continuing committee of officials on the Constitution as of December, 1968, sessional paper number 83.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I want first to say that I do not intend to dig into the history of the Constitution of Canada. I think that those who spoke prior to me in this debate have indicated quite clearly those people who are responsible for the document and the manner in which they are to be lauded by those of us who are still here.

I do believe, though, that the matter of the Constitution of this country is not something that is of such great concern to the people of this country as one in this House might tend to believe. I sense in the people of this country—and particularly the people of my riding and in this province—a frustration because they feel we are ignoring the real issues of today. They feel we are inflicting or injecting into the debates—between the federal and provincial governments—superficial issues that really do not do anything at all to ease the lot of the average individual as he attempts to go about providing a living for himself and his family.

We have heard much discussion in the past number of years about the need to look into the matter of French-English relations. Much has been done to assure that the French and English tongues are available in all quarters of this land. We have heard much said about the relationship between Ontario and Quebec and Quebec and the rest of Canada. Much has been said about the need to take a look at some method of dealing directly with the problems of Quebec and the problems of other portions of this country—perhaps one apart from the other. The unfortunate part is that we could spend many weeks, months or years perhaps, debating whether or not we ought to speak French, debating whether or not we should have some kind of special consideration for this or that area—without ever coming to grips with the immediate problems that confront our people.

In my opinion, if the people of this country were to be properly fed, properly housed, and were to have medical coverage available to them at the cost they could afford—and in areas of this province certainly there is no medical coverage available—we would go a long way toward eliminating the need to continue this dialogue between the various provinces and the federal government. There is no question in my mind that the matter of the Constitution of this country is related directly to the constitution of the people who live in it. At the moment neither the federal nor the provincial governments are taking any of the necessary actions to ensure that housing, cost of living and health are properly and adequately taken care of.

One need only look at the recent report of the federal government—the report that was handed down by the travelling circus of Paul Hellyer—in order to understand that in actual fact the Liberal government in Ottawa is totally incapable of meeting the problems of housing. And they are not alone, not nearly alone, because the government here in Ontario has shown that it has exactly the same abilities—and perhaps even less. The unfortunate thing is that we seem to use the conflict between province and federal government as a wedge, as a lever, to deny the people of this country those things which they must have out of necessity.

We seem continually to be attempting to place the onus of responsibility that we have abdicated as a provincial government on another level of government.

In the field of housing it is not uncommon to hear the provincial government cry that while they would love to build more homes, while they would like to meet the needs of the people of this country, they cannot, because the federal government will not provide the money. We hear the federal government cry that they would like to provide the money but the municipalities have to do the servicing for this, and the municipalities tell us that they cannot possibly raise that type of revenue from their tax sources. We thereby leave the whole problem of housing up in the air continuously. We never come to grips with the basic problem of making sure that every person in this country is afforded a decent place to live—at a cost that he can afford.

It seems to me that one of the main areas of concern is to put the necessities of life within the ambit of responsibility of one level of government. It seems to me that we must get away from this type of buck passing that has gone on over the years and in order to do this, we have got to ensure that one or other level of government has the full responsibility for looking after whatever this particular problem may be.

At the moment, since the matter of raising capital seems to be the main problem in providing accommodation for the people of this country, it seems necessary that we should transfer the responsibility for building and developing from the provincial to the federal government. I would suggest that one thing that might be done to meet the problem of providing accommodation would be that this government might be prepared to say today that they will give over the responsibility of the building and providing of accommodation for people to the federal government in order that they get on with the job. We will then eliminate this continuous buck passing. We will then eliminate the housing shortage, hopefully.

Another area of deep concern is, of course, the cost of living. We have raised in this House, on a number of occasions, the need to have a cost of living review board in order to ensure that every person in this country can, out of the meagre allowance that he has left after his payment of taxes, provide for himself adequate food and other amenities that are required in order to sustain life.

Unfortunately, again we come on the same hang-up. When you start to discuss this matter in this House it is quickly pointed out that in actual fact for the most part it is a federal responsibility—and it is. It is much easier, much more economical and much more practical for the federal government to ensure that the cost of living is maintained because they have the resources and the facilities to do this. As in the case of housing, it is a necessity of life; it is a necessity to every person right across this country, not only to those living in Ontario. Therefore, we should, with great haste, move towards assuring that the federal government will take over the entire responsibility for assuring that the people of the province, and the people of the country, can afford to purchase what they must have in order to live.

The third area, and an area that I intend to take a little more time on, concerns health services. I listened, with great interest, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts)—and, I might say, I read with some considerable interest after he had finished—all his remarks about Ontario moving, or not moving, into the government Medicare programme.

It seems to me that there is no question that the reason that the Premier has used to stay out of Medicare is based on a false premise. The Premier of this province has indicated that it is not that he does not want the people of Ontario in Medicare; it is not that he is trying to keep for the insurance companies, the great profits they make out of gouging the public in the field of medical services; it is not for those reasons—or so he says. You can believe that if you like. It is because it is economically impractical for this province to be involved.

Yesterday, we listened to the Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton) bring down a Budget in which something in the neighbourhood of $178 million needed to be raised, and we raised it by changing the taxes on some of the things that the average individual in this province happens to enjoy. It is indeed unfortunate that the Prime Minister of this province did not take it upon himself to enter Medicare. Had he done so, he would have had, at his fingertips, $170 million which would have offset—or almost, at least—offset the increase in expenditures for the province of Ontario in this coming fiscal year. But then again, he chose not to do that for some reason that is known only to himself. It is certainly not obvious to anyone else.

I would say that had the Treasurer just taken his scissors one more time and clipped $80 million out of the Highways budget, instead of a small surplus, we could have come out of this with a much larger surplus in this province and thereby we would not have to have raised the taxes at all.

Mr. S. Lewis (Scarborough West): There is not a Cabinet Minister in the House.

Mr. Deans: The member is right.

Now I want to take a look, a rather critical look, at the statements of the Prime Minister in regard to the cost of Medicare. The Prime Minister indicated in his constitutional speech that it would cost $54.15 per capita if Ontario were to be part of the federal Medicare scheme. This was for the year 1970-71, not 1969. This is twice what it costs in the province of Saskatchewan to operate the plan that is operating extremely well in that province.

This is 52 per cent higher than the figure of $35.50 which was published in August of 1968 and was applicable to the year 1966. It allows for a ten per cent increase for each year from 1966 to 1969, an increase which I suggest is considerably higher than that which actually took place. And if it is not considerably higher then we need an investigation into the fees of doctors in this province.

The Prime Minister indicated that there were 97 per cent of the people in this province covered by comprehensive medical coverage and yet we, in our investigations, discover that there are 154,000 people who have only surgical coverage. There are 103,000 people who have only the PSI brown plan which covers only those in hospital care services. There are 169,000 people who are under private insurance plans and are not covered for home or office calls. There are many, many thousands more who have deductibles and who have limitations and exclusions placed upon them by the insurance company who happens to be the carrier for the plan which they are in.

And there is one other area, an area that the Prime Minister does not assume to take into consideration. There are a great many people who are covered only at their place of work. If, for some reason or other they are no longer able to be employed there, their coverage terminates—which means in actual fact that their coverage is only for as long as they are able to be employed. When they retire coverage stops. When they are laid off, coverage stops and if they should, for some reason or other, be forced to leave their employment, coverage stops. So when the Premier says, as he did, that more than 97 per cent of our population can and obviously do obtain complete medical care, this is not true. It is not true here at all.

The Premier also stated during the discussion in the House that the government policy—and he is talking about his friends over there—is that medical services insurance would be available to all the people of Ontario, regardless of age, state of health and their capacity to pay. Again, this is just not true.

PSI and hospitalization for a family with children will cost $365 a year after April 1 of this year. And I ask anyone in this House if they believe that a family earning $5,000 a year, and that happens to be about 29 per cent of the families in Ontario, can afford to pay this kind of premium—$365 out of $5,000 a year? Right there, you eliminate a great many people from the category of medical coverage within their ability to pay.

I also wanted to say that OMSIP and hospitalization now cost $309 a year for a family, and even at that level it is not possible for people earning $5,000 or below to make those kind of payments out of what they have left after taxation. A family of four, and this is about the norm in this province, gets no premium assistance under OMSIP unless the income is below $4,000; and then he can only get $106 a year maximum payment by the province out of the $309 cost, if he has absolutely no taxable income at all. And I might say that if he has $1 taxable income, it costs him $10, which is a ludicrous situation.

I must point out that a person earning $1,600 a year, if he is single, does not qualify for any type of subsidy at all, and it bursts the myth, in my opinion, of the Premier's statement that every one in Ontario can receive medical coverage at a cost that he can afford within his ability to pay. It is not true.

I would also point out that as incomes creep up to keep pace with the cost of living, more and more people become ineligible for premium assistance. Despite this fact, they still do not change the basis for assistance.

Incomes rise but, generally speaking, they only rise in accordance with the increased cost of living, and while an income may rise to the allotted amount of $4,000 at which level you can collect premium assistance, it is not reflected in the amount of money that is left for those families that are earning that kind of money to pay for hospital or medical coverage.

It is eaten up by the increases in taxes at the municipal, provincial and federal level. It is eaten up by the increases in the cost of accommodation and the cost of food, and the cost of all of the necessary commodities.

The Premier has tried, in the way that only he can, and I think that that is fair to say because he has that uncanny ability of making it appear that everything he says must truly be the gospel truth. He has tried to prove that Medicare would cost more than the present hodge-podge of plans in this province.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): The member does not question that the Prime Minister tells the truth, does he?

Mr. Deans: He compares the present OMSIP premiums established June 1, 1968, with the cost estimates of 1970 to 1971.

I am sure that members would agree if he had used the new PSI rates, which become effective on April 1 of this year, the case that he put forward to stay out of Medicare would have been considerably weaker. Because those particular increases account for a 31.5 per cent increase over the present cost of OMSIP.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Deans: I think he has.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Put it to all those empty seats over there.

Mr. Deans: I am doing that. My colleague suggests that I put it to the empty seats.

Mr. Lawlor: Maybe the member can move their hearts.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East): On a point of order!

Mr. Speaker: The member for Carleton East has a point of order.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Is not the speaker out of order completely? Has he not been out of order for a considerable time? I thought we were dealing with proposals put forward in the book.

Mr. Speaker: Well, after listening to the lead-off speech in this particular debate some days ago, I do not think that the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. Lewis: In fact, nothing is out of order in this debate.

Mr. J. Jessiman (Fort William): I think he is referring to his front row.

Mr. Deans: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate your interjection on my behalf.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): There is not one Cabinet Minister in the House.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Well, who would want to listen to this anyway?

Mr. Lewis: That is a little unfair—just a little unfair. The member should enter the debate himself.

Mr. Jessiman: His deputy leader gave up in disgust.

Mrs. M. Renwick (Scarborough Centre): The deputy is in the library.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Lewis: —as tabled by the Prime Minister in this House.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member will please proceed with his discourse.

Mr. Gisborn: Complete arrogance on this subject is obvious by the absence of government members.

Mr. Deans: I am amused, Mr. Speaker, by the interjections of the few members from the other side of the House. When one stands to answer to the statements from their leader, it appears you are always out of order, while the statements of their leader, even on the same subject are in order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will please continue with the address.

Mr. Deans: The Prime Minister stated in his address that the employers of this province would not be able to contribute premiums under the federal plan. Now, I would suggest to anyone that this is at least a false premise—that there is absolutely no prohibition in the Act.

The only difference between what now exists and what would exist then is that contributions would not be considered as tax free benefits to the employee, as they are now. Even this is somewhat vague. They would likely be treated the same as the employer payment of hospital insurance, which is considered an addition to the employees' income.

I would also suggest, for the Prime Minister's edification, that he does not understand the purposes and the ways of collective bargaining, if he thinks that, were employers forced to pay into this programme at federal level, the employee would suffer in some way. I am quite sure that the collective bargaining process would assure that that money would go back into the employee's pocket.

The Prime Minister ignores the potential savings in the universal government-operated plan which could come if group practice, community clinics and other cost-saving approaches were adopted. No doubt under a Tory government they would not be, but with a little bit of effort they could be.

The Prime Minister does not deal, in any place in his remarks, although he ought to have done, with the question of whether the medical profession should be made to justify fee increases to a public body. It seems to me, as we view the increases that have taken place over the past number of years, and the cost of medical services, that we definitely need some kind of an investigation into the cost of medical services to the average individual in this province.

If I may, for a moment, just take the calculations put forward by the Prime Minister on the day that he opened this particular debate; the Prime Minister has suggested a per capita cost of $54.15, in this province.

I question that this is even close to the actual per capita cost—that it is grossly inflated and that it has no foundation.

He suggested that 90 per cent of the people in this province—in excess of 90 per cent—were covered. This is just not true.

He has indicated, in his programme, that it would be cheaper to remain in OMSIP, or PSI, than go into a federal Medicare scheme. He justifies it by saying that it would cost, for a family, $244.80 inclusive of the taxes that were paid, and he stated that PSI would be considerably cheaper, which is not true.

The present programme would cost $232.80, plus the $120 social development tax, which would be $352.80. This is over $100 more per year than would be paid by anyone participating in the federal Medicare programme. And at the present rate of OMSIP—at $177 per year for a family—plus the $120 development tax, we have a sum of $297 per year, which is considerably more than the cost of a Medicare programme.

Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much if the Prime Minister's objection to Ontario's inclusion in federal Medicare is based at all on the cost to the people in this province. I personally believe that it is based on a close working relationship with a group of people who benefit considerably from the sale of medical coverage to the people in this province. It would take more than just a statement in this House, indicating figures, which I do not find to jibe with the figures that I have, to convince me otherwise.

So if I may reiterate, I would say that yesterday's Budget would have been unnecessary, in terms that the taxation increases would have been unnecessary for this province had the Prime Minister decided, at that time, to enter the federal Medicare scheme, and take full benefit of the taxes which the people of this province are paying to the federal government, in order to pay their share of the cost of federal Medicare.

I would turn for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to the matter of the Senate, if I may. It was stated in this House by my friend, the member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter), that the provincial Liberal Party—and I assume he is speaking for the provincial Liberal Party—would agree with the elimination of the Senate in this country. This is certainly in conflict with the statements of the federal Liberal Party.

It must be very pleasant to be able to speak out of both sides of one's mouth and to confuse the Canadian electorate on a continuous basis as to where one really stands in terms of the elimination of the Senate and anything else that comes up at the federal level.

We, in the New Democratic Party, have long fought for the elimination of the Senate. We have done so at the federal level on a continuous basis and the hon. member of the party, Stanley Knowles, has raised in the House of Commons almost every year over the last ten years the need to abolish this archaic and unnecessary body.

If we are going to have truly democratic representative government, we surely cannot have a body sitting which is appointed by the governments in power, either provincial or federal, and who are, in effect, party bagmen, party hacks, party supporters, and who are not there serving the best interests of the people.

As I look at the Senate, I see nothing but people who have for a long time had an association with the two major political parties in this country and who are there strictly because of their service to those parties and not because of their service to the public, who are there only to ensure that the legislation, good or bad, passed by their parties or adopted by their parties, gets a hearing publicly.

As was stated in the Confederation of Tomorrow conference papers, in which this government stated that, whatever the role the Fathers of Confederation envisaged for the Senate, critics today argue that this body does little useful work and asks what role an upper House can play in a modern, democratic parliamentary Cabinet system of government, in which power is concentrated in the lower House.

I suggest respectfully it has no role to play, that the Trudeau government has indicated that they may undertake some Senate reform—Senate reform which will not play any meaningful part in assuring a truly democratic society in this country.

If we had undertaken many years ago the suggestions of the hon. member I referred to earlier, Stanley Knowles, we would not now be forced to debate the matter of whether or not the Senate is of any value.

And it is not only in this country that this is being debated. In Great Britain they are debating the value of the House of Lords; Quebec has eliminated their Upper House. It does not appear to me there is any justification whatsoever for an appointed group of people to sit and pass judgement on the efforts of the elected representatives of a country, a province or a state.

I would say that we in this House should take the position that the Senate should be eliminated. We should accept no other role for it. It has played no useful part in the democratic process of this country. We should not accept any change, any reform. It must be total elimination, if the interests of the people are to be served.

Mr. T. Reid (Scarborough East): In rising to talk on the constitution issue and issues of Confederation, I would like to restrict my remarks to one aspect of constitutional change or consideration of change. That is the area of education and manpower training, and retraining, as well as adult educa-

And who should finance it? How should the definition of education, as well as the definition of training, best be looked at to make sure that the national priorities in education and our provincial priorities in education and manpower training are in fact met?

I believe, sir, that today there is a conflict of opinion concerning the priorities in education in Canada. It is a conflict of opinion that has now hardened by the October, 1966, federal-provincial "entente" that adult manpower training and retraining is a federal government responsibility while education, sir, defined as the imparting of knowledge through a standard curriculum during the period of childhood, adolescence and youth, is a provincial government responsibility.

The federal government, then, has reasserted its concern with national and regional manpower requirements and is giving this concern priority by backing it up with large expenditures.

What has happened, in my opinion sir, since 1965, is that the federal government has shifted upwards to an entirely new level in its manpower programmes such as initiative was essential if Canada was serious about maintaining its place in the world as a highly-productive and competitive economic system.

Now the provincial governments continue to state that one of the most important goals of their formal education system is the provision of full opportunity for the development of individual potential. Yet since 1965, they have not matched the federal shift in the federal government's financing of manpower retraining programmes.

As a result, we have a new structure of national priorities in education and training. This has been established by independent decisions at the federal and provincial government levels.

And it may also set the pattern for the rest of the 1960s and for the 1970s and, indeed, into the 1980s.

The new national priorities are these, sir: First of all, adult training and retraining for the world of work has been given a much higher value relative to child and youth education for the development of the individual as an individual rather than as a factor of production.

Second, adult training and retraining for the world of work has been given a new higher value relative to adult education for the sake of continuing to learn—that is, as an end in itself and a contribution to how we live as civilized human beings.

I would simply note here, sir, that this latter shift in national priorities in education and manpower training has taken place. My basic concern is with the first shift in priorities.

It is my opinion that the dichotomy between the definitions of education, which is a provincial government responsibility and manpower training, which has been defined to be a federal government responsibility, is a false dichotomy, when judged in terms of the crisis in education and manpower training in Canada today.

I would like to isolate my remarks to make this point by discussing primary and pre-primary school education and ought to be responsible for that type of education, particularly with what I call pre-primary school education.

It is my opinion that pre-primary and primary school education is the area in which a substantial upward shift in expenditures could have the greatest long-run individual, social, economic and political return in Canada.

On the one hand, there is the question of preparing individuals for the world of work and of maximizing their contribution to economic growth in this era of a permanent scientific and technological revolution, commonly called the age of automation.

For this goal, which is both a provincial and a national goal, an additional $1 million invested today in pre-primary school education could reduce by at least several million dollars the expenditures that will be necessary to train and retrain many of today's four and five year olds 15 years from now for the radically different world of work of 1984.

If, in other words, the approach to preparing individuals for the world of work had a deeper and longer-run perspective in decision-making than it has at present, Canada would have a much more rational and efficient allocation of funds today in the field of education.

On the other hand, there is the belief that it is good for an individual, however gifted, to be able to develop and use the gifts with which he was born. Related to this is the belief that social and economic barriers which stand between a child and the development of his inherited, creative, intellectual and physical gifts, ought to be eliminated.

For this second goal, sir—an additional $1 million spent today in pre-primary and primary school education could reduce by several million dollars the amount that will be spent in programmes to counteract alienated teenagers ten years from now in 1979.

The conclusion regarding these two goals is that there is no valid dichotomy between training individuals to be productive factors of production, and their education as unique human beings with unique gifts at the pre-primary school level.

There is, therefore, sir, no valid dichotomy between federal and provincial institutional and financial responsibilities for the financing of pre-primary school education. This, sir, as some members of the House know, is a constitutional justification for the federal government becoming involved in the financing and the programmes of pre-primary school education, particularly of a type known as "Head-Start" programmes.

Just to underline my point, sir, in that area, in the area of training children before they enter the primary school system to use the English language, to have communication skills—that that type of training is a type of manpower training. It also coincides with the need for education. One must have "words" to be successful in the educational field and, therefore, education and training for the world-of-work come together, I believe, at the pre-primary school education level. Constitutionally, therefore, I think it is an area of joint federal-provincial responsibility that must be recognized if we are to have a meaningful "War on Poverty" on a national scale in Canada.

If, sir, for reasons of national unity, Canada cannot have a federal Minister of Education, the least that can be done now is for the federal and provincial governments to recognize that adult manpower training for jobs in 1985 has a basic relationship with, and is highly dependent on, the need for pre-primary school education.

To put that another way, sir, training people to work in the labour force in 1985 depends fundamentally on what happens to those young people by the way of training and education at the pre-primary school level today. What is then needed is a federal ministry of manpower and anti-poverty, which would have, as one of its cornerstones, a massive programme of pre-primary school training for disadvantaged children in our society—children which number, I believe, over 20 per cent of all the children of any given age group.

A real, combined War on Poverty and a manpower training programme in Canada would have many other objectives but the pre-primary school front would be the major one and would have the greatest effect on economic and social benefits.

In summary of this argument, it is my opinion that the first public policy principle that must be accepted in Canada jointly between the federal government and the provincial governments, is that of universal accessibility to education. The first programme to achieve genuine accessibility to education is one that makes it possible for children born into low income homes to have as good a set of initial communications skills as children of equal inherited ability from homes of the well-to-do. And Canada's kindergartens are certainly not even attempting this.

Many children from low income homes have been born into a poverty syndrome and they need preferential treatment in education, not simply equal treatment. This is not happening, particularly in the rural areas of Canada and in the downtown core slums of the cities of Canada.

Furthermore, Canada's nursery schools have children who are mainly from well-to-do homes where the exact opposite ought to be true. Quite simply, without universal opportunity before kindergarten and grade I, it is impossible to have universal accessibility to education that will enable a child to develop the gifts with which he was born. The hard fact, which has been recognized in the United States as national policy, but not in Canada, is that five years old is too late for the underprivileged child to begin schooling.

Therefore, sir, I believe that one of the items on the agenda of this government with the federal government, ought to be the question of the relationship of education and manpower training before grade 1 and formal kindergarten in our education system.

I suggest that the federal government would have to accept the logic of my argument because without a heavier relative investment at the pre-primary school level in education, it is impossible to train people for the world of work of 1985. If the federal government really believes in the War on Poverty, and if the government of this province of so-called "opportunity and a place to stand" really believe in creating that opportunity, then I suggest, sir, that at the top of its agenda must be a consideration of a national programme of anti-poverty, combining federal and provincial resources and responsibilities under a constitution that would make it possible for the children of the poor to begin grade 1 in competition with the kids from the middle classes of Canada so that they, too, can have their chance to have a place to stand and a place to grow in this province.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, in rising to join this debate under a good deal of jockeying among the whips, I would like to renew a plea I made a couple of weeks ago in an afternoon in which the discussions between the Prime Ministers were going on in Ottawa. At that time, I sought to prevail upon the Premier of the province (Mr. Robarts) to set up in this body a constitutional committee. The Premier has seen fit thus far not to accede to that request.

I am not quite sure of his grounds; I listened carefully. He seemed to indicate he did not quite know what we would do. Well, for a single member who perhaps would sit on that committee, let me assure him there is a good deal to do among the documents that have been distributed to members of this Legislature over the past year and a half.

There is at least pile two feet high at this time on my study floor, just emanating from this source apart from anything else one might have dug up over the years—touching constitutional matters; the articles from Le Devoir; the administrative committee's various recommendations; Lord help me, there is a plethora of material, there is no difficulty there.

Secondly, if this debate is to take on any great meaning and purpose, Mr. Speaker, after the experience I had two weeks ago in discussing it, it is impossible, in my opinion, in the atmosphere of this Chamber—curiously enough—to really get to the tricky problems, to the guts of the debate.

What you can do in a Chamber this size with as many members as we contend with, is deal with broad outlines and sweeping policies, as I hope to do today, but when you seek to get down to—and this is where constitutional issues become really interesting and vital—the niceties of the situation, you simply cannot convey that sort of thing in this atmosphere and in this House.

It falls like a dead hand on the House, and everybody tunes himself off; so you do not have to be too sensitive to the House in order to recognize that. In other words my contention is that the only place in which we can come to grips with this issue in a reasonable and solid way, and in a way which will lead to some kind of consequences and the education of the members in this area, is through the committee system.

That is where the vitality comes, you can give and take there; you can set forth positions and counter-positions. Here you cannot do that, and certainly this is the wrong medium in which to really come to grips with the areas of the constitution where we simply have to get down to it if we are not to lose the lure of this country, and to see the country disintegrate around us.

As I say, in the assembly here a debate on the level that I want to conduct, or the kind of subject that I want to discuss, is deadly dull. And curiously, it often takes on life and becomes interesting in committee. This would be as true about this as about the taxation committee. If the members of this House went through the niceties and subtleties and whatnot that are involved in coming out with a policy on taxation, they would all die of asphyxiation, if it had to do it in this particular medium. It is a curious thing, but it is a question of the sensibility of the House.

In recommending, therefore, that we call expert witnesses before us—and there are certainly enough men in various areas, particularly of university life, and in the legal profession to give us real insights—I think it is the only way in which to establish an immediacy of insight. You can learn more in half an hour listening to a learned man than you could possibly do reading for weeks on end, because he can take you to the heart of the matter. He can give you guidance as to the possibilities, pro and con, touching the situation. And you can ask questions, quite informally and bring out the highlights.

And in this way, gradually there will form in our minds a decisive and determinate policy with respect to what we feel would be the best thing for this country in the role that Ontario really should play in fitting into the picture.

I am sure that from the Premier down at the present time, there are the most illusory, the most inchoate concepts as to precisely what consideration the shape and size of it ought to be. This is evident from the ambivalence displayed by the Premier and other members of this Cabinet in the House where they come down on one emphasis on one matter which is divisive, which is destructive to our constitutional unity, and on the other hand they make overtures and open-handed gestures—and bless them for it—towards an overall sense of that unity.

They are men who have not resolved, or even begun in any great measure to resolve; the issues that we face and must resolve—and must resolve with alacrity if we are to save the situation. The Premier himself indicated that in his speech of a few days ago.

I want to put an extra spoke in the wheel in this regard. I am going to suggest that—instead of a committee of this Legislature studying the Constitution—some thought be given to establishing a select committee of the Legislature to study the Constitution, so that these studies may be ongoing after this Legislature rises.

They could get going in a tentative way while we are sitting, without burdening the members. Lord knows we have enough committees already, but nevertheless this is of vital import. It is such a necessity for us to know what we are talking about in this area, with any great degree of assurance, that it seems to me that a select committee is very much in order.

In this Legislature it is fortunate that we have enough skilled, and I am sure, interested people coming from all sides of the House to constitute such a committee.

We would hear experts. We would hold discussions among ourselves on propositions. We would wrangle about the possibilities of each consequence and alternative. We would also act in a better capacity.

To my mind, this would be an extension of goodwill and a gesture towards, not just Quebec, but to the federal government, to this this whole country. It would be an added quiver in our arsenal to have such a committee, that we would act as ambassadors plenipotentiary to the rest of the country—the province so vitally concerned about this matter that it set up, in this Legislature, a group of interested, elected representatives who would appear, for instance, in Quebec as a body.

We come from Ontario. We come, not bearing gifts. We come to learn, and we want to know what your stand on these various issues are by word of mouth and in the living context of Quebec.

We would possibly even go to British Columbia and find out what the climate of opinion was there. We would study other constitutions. I think this country has an enormous amount to learn from the constitution of Australia, which has faced the same problems, although not the same aggravation. Basically, regional jealousies are the same all the world over, and they have been able to resolve through their inter-relationship with the ministerial level, a number of areas which we have not even begun to really tackle yet.

In their loans programme—there is an area that we might very well inspect as to the interdelegation of monetary and fiscal policies. I cannot seek to prevail too much upon the government, and upon the Treasury benches, to give these possibilities of a committee—either in the alternative or in continual—some role to play here.

And under this heading, Mr. Speaker, may I take a moment to quote from the hon. Prime Minister the other day, he says:

On the other hand, there was the feeling by some of the provincial leaders at any rate that we should not leave too much of this detailed work to non-elected officials. In other words the actual work that is being done should be undertaken to the greatest possible degree by those who represent our people directly.

I accord with that and I say, in order to give that meaning, that a select committee, or a committee, is crucial and necessary. At the present time we have delegated to a group of officials, the whole task of arriving at some kind of accommodation—some kind of insight into our future constitutional structure.

That, so far as it goes, is, I suppose, beneficial. But if the fruit of that are the proposals that sit before us today, then I am thankful that the task has not been well carried out.

In any event, it has not been carried out—certainly not in the area where the whole weight of this debate must eventually fall. My intention does not involve areas like the Senate and the Supreme Court—all these peripheral matters.

The real problem here and one the province utterly fails to deal with, is in the area of the division of powers, under 91 and 92 obviously.

Whatever contribution anybody can make to that solution, would seem to be a palm leaf given to this country—something upon which we can try our strength. People who are in public life are simply under an obligation to throw out as many sparks and ideas into this head as possible, because on that depends the whole future of this country. It's the way that we will be sitting here in the legislative assembly ten years hence, which under the present insouciance I rather doubt.

So I do call upon the Prime Minister, in his own wording, to initiate this committee. He goes on in another column to say:

The initial stage of what might be termed a broad analysis of the problems have been completed, and we are now moving ahead.

Well, of course, that does not apply to the crucial points in the whole problem, a very broad analysis that leaves out the assets, you know. We are then moving ahead into the areas that are going to require much deeper study and a much greater examination in very fine detail.

Again, I agree. But where are you going to do it? Not of the floor of this assembly. If you are not going to delegate it off to a group of people who are not beholden directly to us, I can suggest that the only other place must be a committee of some kind.

Now in this business of the Constitution; since it is not possible, I claim, to discuss the nitty-gritty in this Legislature, let us take a pervasive view of what constitutions—federal or unitary—are doing in the modern world. Let us take a look first at what might be called a paradigm case that always has been the nub up against which we rub in this country—the whole case of the United States.

As everyone knows, in the history of that country, they set their residual powers in the states. The curious reversals of history—irrespective of how they may thump on the desk—have been such as to cause the residual power and the paramountcy to fall into the hands of the federal government.

There are many reasons for this—but in any case, a reversal has taken place. Now they have emerged on to a new plateau in the United States, into a new relationship among federal, state and municipal governments. The federal government has found out that it cannot administer all the programmes adequately, efficiently or to the good of the overall population without the instant and necessary co-operation of both the state—and particularly—local or municipal governments.

I would like to read one paragraph from the Time essay of May, 1968, titled: "The Marble Cake Government—Washington's New Partnership With the States". This is one possibility as to the direction in which we might go:

In Lydon Johnson's Washington there is a growing awareness that such problems can be solved only by fostering more creative interplay among the different levels of government. Usually, government is compared to a neatly tiered three-layer cake composed of national, state and local levels. In fact, as the late University of Chicago professor, Morton Gradschens, put it in a 1960 report of the President's commission on national goals: "It is more like a marble cake, full of unexpected whirls and inescapable blendings, as colours are mixed in the marble cake, so functions are mixed in the American federal systems," said Gradschens. From abattoirs and accounting, through zoning and zoo administration, any government activity is almost certain to involve the influence, if not the formal administration of all three planes of government.

I would ask that this marble cake theory be taken very much into account because, curiously enough, the drive of economics is precisely that. It is precisely that in every federal administration in the world and not least in our own country. More and more—some people may regret it, some people may applaud it—the federal government is penetrating into areas of municipal concern and the interest of the municipality seems to penetrate into levels which have been administered under the head of the federal government.

But, somewhere in between, the provincial government is dabbling in by way of subversion. Our taxation powers—strictly speaking under our constitution—are only direct. But on any analysis, economic or otherwise, we are taxing indirectly all the time. It is quite wrong. Our provincial court judges have not got the jurisdiction under The British North America Act to perform the functions they do perform. They have no authority. They just exercise it at the present time. Someone, somewhere along the road, is going to question this and call some judgments very seriously into question.

In the United States, because of the smallness of the state and because of the division of powers that the various states have, the federal government has been able to make this penetration in a very overt and honest way. In Canada—for a number of reasons which have come to your mind—because the potency of the Ontario government is very great and particularly because of the French fact, we are simply not going to be able to bring about the marble cake theory. But we cannot bide or live with the three-layer cake, either. Therefore, you cannot eat your cake and have it too, I suppose.

But ours is certain to be an unique experiment in federal structure which has only begun. The intransigence at the present time in Ontario of the Ontario government vis-à-vis the French fact is what I am talking about. The political fact runs counter to the economic fact and I am trying to believe that in the long run the economics will conquer. But in the long run, as somebody said, we are all dead.

We cannot be prepared to abide by the event.

Mr. E. W. Sôpha (Sudbury): That was John Maynard Keynes.

Mr. Lawlor: John Maynard Keynes. In the area of electronics for instance—hardly known, if at all, in 1867—and the whole area of communications policy, transportation policy and the national level of housing and welfare and how they are administered locally, the internal relationships and external relationships, should be handled this way: we must accept a far more subtle and suave interpretation of the constitution than anything we have had up to now.

It is a far more inter-related and interpenetrated thing that we are prepared to accept. It comes to this: there is no head of government that is sacrosanct to any jurisdiction. This we already have the basis for arguing on. Deep in our interpretation of our Constitution is a Privy Council judgment—one of the few that had any sense and the Supreme Court judgments on constitutional matters that have come since the Privy Council deserted the field, have not been much better. I am thinking of delegate legislation. But we will come to that. In any case, we have already, in the Hodges case of 1894, a theory on our constitution—the idea of what is called "aspects". Within a whole group of subjects it said, one aspect belongs to this government but the same subject matter and the same head of power, has another aspect which belongs to the federal government. This has occurred over and over again in marketing legislation, where the Criminal Code comes in against civil rights in the provincial area and in liquor legislation.

All the way along we have this double or triple aspect theory and it is the aspect theory that has to be developed. It is the aspect theory in development that will meet the contemporary needs of the Canadian people and weld us together or, at least, hold us together.

Any other theory—the divisive theory, the heads of power theory, the unilateral theory, the theory that we have exclusive jurisdiction—will divide us, whatever the area might be. Arising out of this, too, the concept of special status takes on a provocative aspect. It is not just special status for Quebec. Other regions may find it just as important because of regional differentiations, peculiarities or idiosyncrasies. For one reason or another, they would want special status, or want to exercise powers that others do not exercise in a particular regard, in a particular sphere.

In working into this marble cake theory, I say we cannot completely have our cake here because of our historical and sociological situation. My contention is that our drive and our intent ought to be in that direction—complete inter-penetration of powers. Nobody has any special status but everybody may have a special status. It comes to this in terms of the delegation of powers: Under our constitutional law the federal government may not delegate legislation to the provincial government or vice versa. But, there may be an inter-delegation of power of an administrative nature.

They have used this device in the Prince Edward Island potato case and a number of other cases in order to get around the business of delegation. But why on earth is delegation not written directly into our Constitution, to take care of crucial situations where a particular problem calls out for the administration other than where the administration happens to lie in that archaic statute?

Now, the difficulty in this country at this moment in time is that most influential people seem to be thinking unimaginatively with respect to our constitution. They are going to have to become somewhat more visionary if they are going to maintain any sort of constitution at all.

In this regard, I would again like to cite the words of the Premier of this province the other day. The fault with all these men, the fault with Lederman, a professor of constitutional affairs, whom I will quote in a moment, the fault, in my opinion, with Trudeau is precisely the same as that of the Premier of the province.

They are all heads-of-power men. They all say that you can divide this thing up neatly in the modern times, you can isolate one from the other, and that the pie is a three-layer cake.

That simply will not work. It will lead to the gravest disruption in the next three or four years if it continues to go on. They are going to have to reverse themselves and approach the whole issue anew, with new tenets, as the Americans have been forced to do under the impact of their own internal growth and expansion of power that goes on in that very dynamic country.

I just want to give some evidence. Of course, all three men, Lederman, Trudeau and Robarts, are ambivalent about this thing.

I mean they are in states of doubt, so that while the great weight of their argument falls one way, there is always a little arcanum over here and they can always point to the moment of truth or the moment of doubt—they are sometimes the same thing—and say: “Oh, no, but I didn’t say that we must have two heads of power, I always left room in there for co-operation, for the utmost inter-weaving of powers.”

They can always say that, but let us look at the text and, seeking to reverse the mind of the Prime Minister in this matter as the best hope for this country, let us see what he himself says.

I do not think he said the other day that the spending responsibility, the distribution of powers in The British North America Act of 1867, require any very large change. “I think that we could live very nicely with it.” Well, I do not. You are not living very nicely with it now. You spend your whole time hectoring about it because of the division as it is.

It is because the division is as it is, that problems have arisen with Quebec. They had better make up their minds to change it. You cannot live with it.

And curiously enough, Trudeau—I should not say curious enough, because he is a small “c” conservative in many ways and has throughout his book on federalism, abided by and held for the same policy time after time. And I would like particularly to substantiate that by reference to an article some years ago called “Quebec and Constitutional Power”. He says:

If we look at all aspects of the problem, therefore I think we shall find the general spirit of Canadian federalism quite acceptable.

I mean, a mixture of complacency and insouciance, I suppose. Yet you would be very surprised if real statesmen, given the facts of the problem, arrived at the conclusion that our constitution needs drastic revision.

If you continue to read on through the thing and see what is happening in our midst, if you continue to read on, I say, through the book here, he gives instance after instance in which drastic revision is necessary and he himself then swings to a different argument, which I think is a conflicting position, contradictory to what he is saying there. The words are detached and pragmatic. By detached and pragmatic, he means you undo the Constitution without saying so. You turn the whole thing inside out to bring about the disposition of powers and where the weight in modern economic theory falls, and who has the functional aspect in this matter.

And this is where our own Premier seems to swing around for a moment, as I said. I hope it is a moment of strength and not his moment of weakness, because it is in contradiction to what he says all the rest of the time.

The other day again he said:

I think powers must be allocated according to the functional criteria, that the government most capable of doing the job efficiently should have the responsibility.

That is fine. That is exactly what the criterion ought to be, and any particular power, nevertheless, may have a whole host of functions to be exercised by different jurisdictions in different ways. And just that little expansion of mind might be our salvation, I suggest.

Let me quote from Lederman on this, too, because it shows how deeply entrenched the acceptance of the existing state of affairs is, and we cannot crash the ice on this particular thing, bring in a bit of a thaw. Spring time will never come.

Lederman says: "Ideally the federal and provincial list of powers should be crystal clear and mutually exclusive."

Ideally! Well, in all the platonic heavens anybody would want to inhabit, I cannot think that would be an ideal at all. Quite the contrary. That is not the nature of the beast. The animal has spots and it has stripes and the sooner that you do not get this pure-bred creature threatening to throw you around the country, the sooner we get rid of it, the more close we will come to attaining a constitution meeting the viable needs.

He goes on, he wants them crystal clear, is that not professional now? Does that not meet the logical mentality perfectly? But the more you are strong and logical in these things, the weaker you are in imagination. And being weak in imagination means that you are weak in the actual constitution, the actual ongoing life of the citizenry of the country. They do not live by logic.

But as we shall see later, such perfection is not attainable in power distribution systems. And he weeps. I can see the tears on the page. And the exigencies of imperfection are the roots of many of the problems of federal-provincial relations. You are telling me! This is a total failure to face up to the actual issues we are confronted with.

I am saying that Trudeau and Robarts and Lederman are all tarred with the same brush. And by being so incarcerated in their own thinking, of being so addicted to the watertight compartment theory of the constitution, of talking and thinking in terms of exclusive powers, I can almost forgive the Premier if he is actually in his office and day-to-day has to deal with frustrating problems where personalities enter into it and a Minister like Benson will say: "Go collect your own dough."

That sort of aggravation somewhat blinds you to the more sovereign issues involved in a case of this kind. And I think maybe it is the habituation of day-to-day life. He does not stand back far enough from the issue to see in which direction Ontario ought to be going and give that leadership, as no one can possibly do it in this time of our history, in the direction in which I am suggesting in these remarks.

What it comes down to is this—that they are holding two contradictory concepts in their minds at the same time. When they are thinking of the day-to-day running of government and of getting the money to do so, they think in terms of a watertight compartment: "Give me the dough to run this particular area and I will be utterly happy"—irrespective of whether or not that undermines the whole basis of the federal structure or irrespective of it recognizing the functional.

The Prime Minister's own words, "the functional necessities of contemporary government" as to where the weight of power falls. Who has offered the power in certain areas? It is a total failure to recognize that particular dimension of the problem. It is simply latching on to the Act of 1867, saying that it has some kind of eternal rectitude when the thing is so outmoded and has to be completely revamped. Otherwise, we will not have anything to revamp.

Trudeau, in his book, quotes from the Rowell-Sirois report and it is too bad that we did not latch on to this years ago when we had the opportunity. Our history passes us by like an express train.

Under the Rowell-Sirois report, that was the golden day, and the golden opportunity. We would not be talking about provincial income taxes today. But Trudeau, I say, quotes from this document to this intent.

Insofar as matters requiring concerted action can be dealt with by co-operation among the provinces, and between the dominion and the provinces, the case for additional centralization to promote efficiency or uniformity will not arise.

And in the matters of taxation, the text goes on as follows—and there is a good deal of truth in this which is seldom mentioned in this House:

Finally, the financing of the respective administrations was established as an area of indispensable co-operation.

I wish the man would speak to Benson today.

By confederation, the provinces gave up the bulk of their sources of revenue, retaining only direct taxes and various fees. In exchange, the federal government pledged itself to make the four different types of payment referred to in 111, 118 and 119 of The British North America Act.

That is where we stood at Confederation. Oh, what an advance was there, after listening to yesterday's Budget. That Budget may be, you know, detrimental to our ongoing future interests. I am sure the Minister of Revenue (Mr. White) and others headed into that course only with the utmost reluctance. A most unhappy eventuality that you should have your hands forced, and I do accord with you that their hands were forced in this matter. I hope that however regrettable it is to impose your own personal income tax, that the federal government will now see the light and will pull back from their former categorical position, in the interests of the overall unity of this country. They might even adopt a credit policy by way of tax rebates. Such has been suggested.

I will not give the Minister of Revenue full credit for all of that. If there is credit there, let us spread it around a bit. In any event, Trudeau goes on at page 144, setting nostrums which I wish he would follow now that he has the power to follow them.

Mr. Sopha: He is in town tonight, do you not want to go and dine with him?

Mr. Lawlor: I would not mind.

Mr. Sopha: $50 a plate.

Mr. Lawlor: $50 a plate? I cannot even afford that for Tommy Douglas.

It is quite conceivable that Canadian fiscal policy could be considered from month to month, and year to year by a joint continuing committee of federal and provincial officials and experts. Confronted with comprehensive sets of statistical material and forecasting data, such a committee—if it were immunized against all forms of political interference—could make policy recommendations as well as any body of purely central officials.

Perhaps they could do even better because they would take greater cognizance of problems such as regional bottlenecks, local unemployment and immobility of labour. The hitherto purely federal control over money and banking would then be examined in the light of provincial budgetary needs. That is what the Treasurer has been calling for day after day, for months, to the complete purblind insouciance of the federal government under this head which has brought about this present situation.

But there are Trudeau's own words—quote them back to him on occasion and see what kind of response you get.

So, what has happened with all three men—but particularly with the Prime Minister of this province and he with Trudeau himself—under their present construction or what they have offered us in interpretation or as their dream child touching the constitution, has been a continuation of old outworn nostrums. They will not solve the difficulty—but aggravate and exacerbate it—because it is precisely these clauses of the constitution, these exclusive heads of power concept, that have brought us to our present pass. And that must be seen, obviated and overcome. The way to do it is to launch along the paths which we have been trying to outline.

It falls into the status quo completely, and the status quo will no longer do after 102 years. This miasma even permeates through to the areas where the province is somewhat openhanded and has a certain generosity: They turn into equalization payments. There is a smell even there because they say that these equalization payments must be handled in a particular way. They must be done by lump sum, they must not be taken off averages. We want supervision over these things, we want to direct it away into determined areas.

That is all niggling. That seems to me to pull back from the full intent of what equalization can do and support. We ought not to take that grudging attitude. It is this grudging attitude that enters into the heart of the debate on Confederation, instead of an attitude of splendid co-operation—the only thing that will save us.

I will not dwell on the attitude on medicare. I have had it ad nauseam. But in this particular instance, just one word. Here is a man who has the possibilities in his hands and is looked up to by the people in this province and the whole country, I am sure, as possibly being the curer of our ills—to the degree that any man can do that. He had the expanse of mind, he had the bearing, he had the objectivity and the kind of wisdom that goes into these things—and he then allows his reasoning to be so coloured, and so twisted by a single issue that it colours the whole sky of his intent.

If this has any strength, if the thrust of the Ontario government is to carry leadership and is to preserve the union—and I say that it is in our hands largely—in my opinion it will emanate from here. Quebec has her position to defend. Her position is not a leading one. Her position is not one of seeking accommodation. Her position is to preserve a certain cultural value—that is her intent and her right.

It is up to us, the only people who seem to be able to transcend the narrowness of issues throughout the country, and then we fail in a crux situation so to do. What a lamentation is there. What a dereliction from our own duty. Medicare will pass; it will be here in five years, ten years, you name it. These things are in the veins of the times. But the Constitution will not pass. You face up to it, or you do not face up to it at all.

The time is now, and it would do a great disservice to get off on some cloudy secondary or tertiary issue, like Medicare, and destroy the whole image—destroy the whole crust so he can no longer concentrate his mind on the big issues, but is down here grubbling about some money over here in a particular programme. I said so the other day. I cannot oversay that enough.

Hon. J. H. White (Minister of Revenue): That is symptomatic.

Mr. Lawlor: Well, it is only to his own hurt that he really does it, as far as I can see, but whatever the Prime Minister does at this level hurts every citizen of his province. He must rise above the peculiar political and narrow intents of provincialism which beggar them all.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): His interest is the London Life.

Mr. Lawlor: I have said a word or two on the income tax situation, that it is a regrettable step, but intrinsic to that step too, I would want to say just a word or two further. The people of this country, or this province, ought not to be taken in by the shibboleth or public relations text that says we are actually guaranteed an actual annual wage in this regard. This is the usual use of language thoroughly designed to mislead. If the kind of thing that is in the back of the minds of the gentlemen over there is a guaranteed annual wage in the manner of Professor Friedman of Chicago, the friend of Mr. Barry Goldwater—and we have no reason to think otherwise—it was a Republican manoeuvre to undermine the whole welfare situation in the United States. That was one of the most vicious pieces of business masquerading under the guise of virtue that man has ever seen.

I hope that you are not falling into that trap. I would like to be assured some day, when you are on this budget debate that such would not be the case. I would want to know precisely what you do have in mind with respect to the credit policy, the rebate policy. These are all to the good. All these things depend upon what their intent is—what are you really trying to do—and secondly, how you do it. You can do as much harm, you can undermine as many social welfare schemes as easily as you can benefit the population at large. I would ask you very seriously, to give consideration on that head.

I had a number of general principles written out which should guide us on the Constitution and I think you can work out what those principles are in terms of utmost flexibility. One is that no head of power belongs to any one sector and that each one applies to defence, applies within the realms of expedition, getting things done and reaching decisions to the realm of monetary and fiscal policy.

We have to prevail upon the federal government to recognize, even as I am seeking to prevail upon you now, their mutual benefit and their mutual responsibility in this on-going disclosure—this on-going almost day-to-day contact. Somewhere in this book, Trudeau goes as far as to say that one of the things that really may be necessary to have this whole thing work at all is to implement a secretary of state for the provinces at the federal level and a Department of Federal Relations in each province. In this way, the consultation, the degree of unanimity, degree of understanding, degree of participation will be given accord, he says. I think there is and I think the members can understand from the Cabinet Ministers over there, constant breakdowns in communication at this time that, I suppose, are partially based on the men who are seeking to speak to each other, but they cannot be wholly so. If it were written right into the constitution that ongoing certain bodies, etc. were instructed, and given the power to continue the most vital relationships at all times, in a multitude of areas—that is what the constitution lacks.

The constitution, as it originally was set up, was to divide, separate off, to segregate away, to keep them in their separate cubby-holes. I say the new world has brought an intertwining, and an inter-relationship, and a sense of communication and that we are living in global villages and what not. If we do not recognize that degree of inter-relationship and the need for ongoing discourse in communication, then the whole thing is going to fall apart anyway. But it is the intent of a new constitution which must be brought into being to obviate those difficulties, to give full accord to the kind of communications that men accord each other in the modern world. Only in this way will our country be saved.

Just to finish up, in order to explore and to clarify what appears to be conflicting and seemingly incompatible positions, it is necessary to have a constitutional committee of this Legislature and if the Prime Minister would so consider it, a select committee, a la White if you will, a task force, a group that will sit down together.

The purposes would be totally different but what would be arrived at under the "White" light of continued discussion and debate, hearing experts, consulting with them, cross examining, getting all the possible information before it, would be the committee emerging next fall with a list of recommendations which, of course, are not binding upon the government.

But in terms of education; in terms of knowing what we have been talking about; in terms of being able to make a single and salutary contribution to the life of this country among a group of legislators who would be more aware of the problems of Confederation than any in the country and to give leadership in this regard and to have an ambassadorial staff at our immediate hand, this government, they will say, is so interested in the affairs of the country and in holding this country together, that it appointed a select committee that is going about the country seeking the way to salve up our wounds and to regress the ills of the past.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East): Well, Mr. Speaker, I had not planned on intervening in this debate and my intervention, in fact, today will be ad hoc and very brief. And in no way would I challenge the bulk of the remarks that have been made by the member for Lakeshore (Mr. Lawlor).

In particular, I have been intrigued, as many of us have been, by the switchover in residual powers that occurred in practice in the United States—from the states to the federal government—and the converse which occurred in Canada, wherein we found the central power being pulled away, or endeavours being made to pull it away to the provinces.

To me, and I suggest this, as I say, quite briefly, the two problems or the basis of the problem is that nine out of our ten provinces organically, I feel, in this day and age, desire to co-operate with one another and co-ordinate their activities in a vast number of fields—in education, particularly in higher education, with regard to such matters as pensions and in the field of medicine and health care. I feel I could also include the field of welfare, perhaps transportation and certainly in the field of law enforcement.

In nine of the provinces, there is a very special kind of dream of Canada and when all these considerations are put together, I think that you can find in Canada today, certain centripetal forces which have, as I have suggested, been referred to by the last speaker.

On the other hand, we have the province of Quebec. Quite understandably, when one reads its history and tries to understand its people, you have a period of assertion—not only culturally but financially—and in the total field of its self respect. Here, we have something which I think must be recognized—from a constitutional point of view, as being centrifugal in its application.

It then seems to me that the Liberal Party federally, and we have not had the benefit yet of hearing from the Liberal Party provincially on this subject in this debate, really is endeavouring to do nothing more than paper over the cracks without coming to any forthright offers or proposals as to solutions.

I really feel that the Trudeau campaign of last year, certainly insofar as the manner in which he conducted it in the western provinces, was essentially fraudulent. I think also, Mr. Speaker, that a problem arises if we wish to contemplate in detail the NDP proposals with regard to associate statehood. The fundamental problem with either opting out, or the permission to opt out proposed by Liberal policy, or the NDP associated statehood policies is, I would suggest, this—

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): That is Rene Levesque.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Well this is another argument. I will not assume to interpret your policies.

Mr. Lawlor: If the member prevails upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) to set up a committee, he and I will argue.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: The point is still the same I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, and it is that to the extent that either the province of Quebec opts out or assumes some position of associate statehood, it cannot be denied that, to that extent, the role, and the moral right of the members of the federal Parliament from the province of Quebec to influence policy, is diminished and undermined.

Now in these brief remarks the only point I wish to make, and it is not dogmatic, nor is it spoken by one who is an expert in this field, is that I do feel the Prime Minister of this province, the government of this province, should particularly direct its attention to what I would call a dynamic inter-provincialism.

The Confederation of Tomorrow Conference has been referred to in this debate, and generally by the public, in glowing terms. The atmosphere has been spoken of as being "healthy, invigorating and hopeful", and Quebec as you will recall, was a full, useful participant in that particular conference.

Such a conference does not in any way conflict, whether we agree with it or not, with the theory being expounded in Quebec that they are, so long as they stay within their jurisdiction, a sovereign state.

Therefore, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we should canvass—

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Well that does not apply to Quebec only.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: This is the point I am making; that essentially the other matters of regional interest are minor, capable of compromise, negotiation, and of acceptance. And in no way, I feel strongly, in no way of the magnitude involved in the fundamental assertions and purposes of the people of the province of Quebec.

I think that it takes us off on a sidetrack to suggest for one minute that the "essential thrust" of the differences that we find, whether it be in Newfoundland or B.C. is of anything like the range or in any degree of the quality or importance of the problems for Confederation that arise out of the hopes and aspirations of the people of the province of Quebec.

Therefore, I would suggest—and this is, as I said earlier, only a suggestion—we should canvass more fully and with more dynamism, the possibility of interprovincial co-operation. I do not think this need be negative. I do not think it need be jealous. I do not think it need be destructive, insofar as it relates to the proper application and future uses of the federal powers.

I do think, though, from a practical point of view, that we have room in the inter-provincial field to do things, I feel, at this particular time, we should not wait for all the legal drafting to be done. Drafting that will be required by the constitutional approach, as brought forward by the present federal Liberal administration. Nor should we be bogged down by waiting, and I think we must wait, if a total constitution is to be written, for the political winds, the political direction and the political decisions that are required and will be made, during the next few years in the province of Quebec.

That is my suggestion, Mr. Speaker—that the spirit, not necessarily the pomp and circumstance, but certainly the spirit, of the Confederation for Tomorrow conference be carried forward, either as a conference or as a conference plus ministerial committees, at the provincial level.

Hon. J. H. White (Minister of Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in his book, "Man and People", Ortega Y. Gasset concludes chapter I with these words:

It is the root of these concepts—state, nation, law, freedom, authority, collectivity, justice and the rest—that today put mortals into a frenzy. Without light on this theme, all these words represent nothing but myths. We are going to look for a little of that light. You must expect nothing more, of course. I can only give what I have. Let others who can do more, do their more, as I do my little.

Now that idea appeals to me, and I think it is rather appropriate here, because we are engaged in this debate on this very important subject. Speakers have confessed, as I do now, that we do not bring infinite wisdom to the complexities of the matter. Nonetheless, we exchange these ideas, and in the process we shed a little light on the problem.

I cannot bring very much expertise to the matter, but I have a couple of tentative ideas which I should like to express, in the hope that those members of this Legislature who are deeply concerned, and who are, perhaps, more knowledgeable than I am in this area, can give the ideas some thought, and perhaps take those ideas forward.

The other night, when I was having trouble going to sleep, I wondered if we could not present this proposition with more rigorousness. Then I wondered if we could not formulate it in a mathematical presentation in an effort to eliminate the emotional overtones, and in an effort to maximise the intellectual consideration the existing situation—

Mr. H. Peacock (Windsor West): It is all those numbers going through the Minister's head which are keeping him awake.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): I do not wonder you have difficulty sleeping.

Hon. Mr. White: —and of possible alternatives.

I did, I must say, come up with a series of equations to express the division of power between the public sector and the private sector, and within the public sector between the federal government on the one hand, and the provincial governments on the other.

If, in this series of equations, the amount of political power now in the hands of, and entrusted to the care of the provincial government of Quebec were expressed by the mathematical symbol "Q", I am going to suggest that this amount, "Q", will be in no way diminished after whatever number of conferences or discussions, or negotiations take place during the next year, or the next decade.

I think that the government of the province of Quebec will find it impossible to diminish in aggregate the power which they themselves now have, and the power which they think is essential to the perpetuation of their language and their culture.

This being the case, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we should turn our attention to a rationalization of the responsibilities and revenues apportioned to these levels of government in The British North America Act, and that we should attempt to come up with a new division of responsibilities on the one hand, and with some re-arrangement, shall I say, of revenues on the other hand.

Mr. Sopha: The Premier (Mr. Robarts) never talks that way, as far as I can—

Hon. Mr. White: I will go a little farther on this and say, if we recognize this quantity "Q" is not going to be diminished, and that the province of Quebec will retain at least the power it has today, would the provinces other than Quebec, not be wise to equate themselves with that particular level of power, vis-à-vis the federal government, as an alternative to opting into a variety of programmes —co-operating in a variety of undertakings—in a way that Quebec finds impossible? In other words, are we in danger of making Quebec progressively more unique, and in the process progressively more isolated if we do things that Quebec finds impossible to do?

I am not worried, as a matter of fact, about leaving substantial amounts of power at the provincial level. I am not an expert on the subject, as is my friend from Lakeshore, but it seems to me that this does tie in with the Jeffersonian concept of democracy. It seems to me that, in a technological age with enormous governmental responsibilities and power the freedom of our people—thinking not about next year, not about 1984, but thinking about 50 or 100 years from now—I am wondering if the freedom and the liberty of our people might not best be ensured, for as far as we can see, by diversifying power throughout the ten provincial governments.

Mr. Sopha: The Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) has found an ally—centralists.

Hon. Mr. White: I do not know if I understood the hon. member for Lakeshore properly or not, but I interpreted his remarks to mean that we are oversimplifying the function of government if we attempt to compartmentalize responsibilities. I quite understand that idea, and, as a matter of fact, it relates to the changes in budgeting that we are attempting here, going from a structural presentation of the estimates to a functional or programme approach to the estimates. This is de facto recognition that we, on this side, are aware of that aspect of the problem.

On the other hand, it must be confessed that certain of these responsibilities do fall into a vertical structure. I could give a number of examples, but let us take parks, for instance. Let us take parks, which is a relatively simple function of government. We have parks at the municipal level; parks at the provincial level; parks at the federal level. So that is a compartment, even though we recognize the imperfections of that particular approach.

In looking at that particular compartment, it may be entirely appropriate for each level of government to be providing this particular service, or it may be that this particular function should be attempted, not by three governments, but by one or two. It does seem to me to be foolish to turn Victoria park in London over to the federal government and I am not suggesting that. So my illustration probably is not well chosen.

But one must wonder if it is necessary to have provincial parks and national parks. And if it is necessary for both of these levels of government to be in this particular, very simple, provision of service. Perhaps while maintaining the aggregate amount we should shift certain responsibilities from the provincial level to the federal level and certain other federal responsibilities downwards to the provincial level.

Mr. Sopha: Which one? Name us some!

Hon. Mr. White: I am glad the member asked me that, because that brings me the second of the two ideas that I want to put before the members now.

Sorting out these responsibilities is going to be a very intricate and very complicated matter. It is one to which I think we should bring all of the ideas and all of the intellect that we can muster. That is why I join with other speakers in supporting the idea that the legislative members here be utilized in the future in a way that perhaps they have not been used in the past.

I do not know whether it should be a standing committee or a select committee, or a task force including civil servants. I just do not know what form that should take, but I do think that we legislators should be giving a great deal of thought to this and that we should attempt to make a decision before this House prorogues.

If such a committee were established, certainly those serving on it would have the opportunity of educating themselves in the legislative area in a way not unlike the educational process that took place in the select committee on taxation. And those members in turn—

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): A sort of cum laude.

An hon. member: Very laude.

Mr. Sopha: The Minister wants to be chairman.

Hon. Mr. White: No, I do not, I was hoping you might take that on. The members of the committee could, in turn, educate the rest of the members of the Legislature, and, indeed, the members of the public at large.

I am wondering if we should not go a step farther and try to engage the wisdom available to us from municipal councillors. I am going back once again to my imperfect illustration. I wonder if they should not be asked to express their views to us, or with us, or with us to the federal government—

Mr. B. Gilbertson (Algoma): Let the member do that on the local level.

Hon. Mr. White: —as to whether parks should be administered by the three levels of government, or by one or by two.

Mr. Sopha: Well, the Premier might get that advisory committee to even speak to us.

Hon. Mr. White: That idea crossed through my mind. I think it would be a tremendous source of strength to a legislative committee if one can be created.

Mr. Sopha: It is the only source he draws on.

Hon. Mr. White: But I point out, Mr. Speaker, that it cannot be done quickly, and it cannot be done without being done well. Mr. Trudeau expressed the same idea exactly in the House of Commons just a week or two ago.

Mr. Sopha: Back then it took them three years, 1864 to 1867.

Hon. Mr. White: We do run the risk of giving offence to the federal and municipal levels of government if we try to assess the role that they should be playing. This is Mr. Trudeau's concern about such a committee at the federal level—that in dealing with provincial matters they may do more harm than good.

Now here is the final thing I want to say, Mr. Speaker. We have had a continuing debate for an extended period of time, not just in this Legislature, but on podiums and platforms all over the country, and in this debate there has been some feeling of rancour develop. I think that was unavoidable, and, as a matter of fact, may have been very wise, because it has sharpened the issues and it has brought the problem to the attention—I think one could say—of every thinking Canadian. So the heat in the debate to date may have been very worth while.

We are living in a world very different from 1867 and it may be that we are going to have to adapt our attitudes to this modern world, with its instantaneous communication and enormous mobility.

I remember very well Tom Kennedy saying that politics was ever so much easier in the old days because you could tell different lies in every village in your riding. Now if the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) gives a speech in London we know right away when he says something offensive, and if I say something rude now in my place, our federal counterparts will know this evening, no doubt, that these rude remarks have been said.

Mr. Sopha: The Minister should not give himself airs. They would never take notice of him.

Hon. Mr. White: Well, I do not know. I think I am not exalting myself. I am simply saying that, with communications so instantaneous, and with the impact of television so great, I think that we in politics should exercise great personal restraint in this very difficult and very dangerous matter.

It may be that my remarks, if they were rude, would never come to the attention of the federal people. On the other hand, I think we understate our own importance in the scheme of things if we do not recognize that we have some influence and that we can do some damage if we speak thoughtlessly, or if we express antagonism which we may not feel in our heart of hearts.

At any rate, Mr. Speaker, I confessed when I started these brief remarks that I have not got any particular special knowledge in the field, but these are a few of the ideas that have come to me in recent months. It may be that some of the other members will be able to move those thoughts forward.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, I have a question.

Does the rudeness you were talking about contemplate such phrases as "political fraud" and "Machiavellian scheme?"

Hon. Mr. White: I was thinking, Mr. Speaker, of a more recent rudeness which Mr. Munro expressed in London the day before yesterday.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Oh, I see. It all depends on which side it comes from whether it is rude or not.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): What difference does it make; the member says they do not want it?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, the present Prime Minister of Canada, when he was Minister of Justice, speaking to the Canadian Bar Association on September 4, 1967, on "The Constitutional Declaration of Rights", used these words as the opening part of his address. He said:

Of all the problems that Canadian public opinion is currently concerned with, the one that is most frequently debated, the one that brings forth the strongest expressions of view, is that of constitutional reform.

Those remarks were true then. They are just as true today. In offering a few thoughts on the matter of constitutional reform, I should like to devote my comments particularly to the entrenchment of a Bill of Rights, or a charter of human rights—a subject on which I had the privilege of speaking at the federal-provincial conference this year and last year. Perhaps I might be allowed, in opening these remarks, to set the record straight as to—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Was the Minister confused or was I?

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): We are well aware of—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well the members do not have it straight apparently, from some of the comments they have made.

Mr. Sopha: I heard him too, read him in the paper.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Then the member seems to be very confused about it.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well perhaps it will fill some of the vacuum that seems to exist.

Mr. Sopha: The monkeys bang their desks, but the Minister was wrong a year ago and he is wrong now.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, the hon. member is always right.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Great guy to debate with.

Mr. Sopha: I am not always right but I am never wrong.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Shades—

Mr. Sopha: Figure of speech.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Shades of Lord Haldane, I think.

In February 1968, Mr. Speaker, in my remarks on that occasion and I would like to quote them very briefly, or at least a portion of them; I said:

The problems inherent in the consideration of a bill of rights for a federal system are not adapted to ease solutions. The definition and enforcement of the rights of man have been a responsibility of democratic government in every organized society known to history and the manners of definition and enforcement are as varied as the forms of government which develop them. There are principles however, which must be considered in any analysis of any proposal for a bill of rights.

After discussing the various kinds of rights and pointing out that there were certain rights which are fundamental, which all societies, all civilized societies accept, we did go on to point out that in considering the entrenchment of rights in the constitution as an entrenched basic part of our federal in the constitution as an entrenched basic part of our federal constitution, our attitude was expressed this way:

A proposed bill of rights must be considered in the light of our system of jurisprudence and we have two in Canada, and the principles that have been demonstrated. If an entrenched bill then seems necessary and desirable, there are specific effects upon Ontario and indeed, on all provinces which must be considered.

Then, we concluded by saying:

The soul searching question of an entrenched Bill of Rights is one of the most fundamental matters which may be served to the greater advantage of Canada within the perimeter of the dialogue to which I refer, that is, the discussion of our constitution, and we look forward to pursuing a Bill of Rights by such a process, a full discussion.

And we ended by saying:

In considering a Bill of Rights it might therefore be submitted that, such a bill should be considered in the light of constitutional reform generally. Such a bill should be dealt with in the light of provincial situations with consideration for existing powers. The declaratory or other nature of such a bill should be revised in the context of the existing constitution and the important relationship between a Bill of Rights and the constitution.

And I would like to point out that gentleman, whose opening remarks in 1967 were my opening remarks today, had said something very similar to that in his discussion of the constitutional Bill of Rights. I am reading from his text entitled "Federalism and the French-Canadians" and the remarks he made about the constitution and the entrenched Bill of Rights apply not only to the province of Quebec and the French-Canadians but to all of Canada and this is what he said on that occasion when he addressed the Canadian Bar Association:

If we agree on the general content of a constitutional Bill of Rights, a number of important questions will remain to be resolved. These will be important for everyone, but from a technical point of view, they will be of special concern to those who are trained in the law.

He was speaking to lawyers.

Should the rights be declared generally, or defined precisely with exceptions clearly specified. For example, if we guarantee freedom of speech, without qualification will this invalidate some of our laws which deal with obscenity, sedition, defamation or film censorship.

Surely one can see immediately that to simply spell out in a general statement every citizen, every person is entitled to freedom of speech, and to say nothing more, makes no provision for restraint upon defamation, slander, obscenity, the putting forward of the idea of violent destruction of systems of government, so that Mr. Trudeau, Prime Minister—then the Minister of Justice—has said, and was quite definite in saying:

You just cannot simply set forth rights without taking into account, and giving some consideration to the restraint you put upon them—

And he went on to say:

—is freedom of religion compatible with compulsory Sunday closing legislation?

That is a simple example of there being complete freedom of conscience, freedom of religion, freedom of worship. If someone chooses not to observe any restrictions on a Sunday or a sabbath, does that mean that none of our Sunday laws have any effect?

Can you put that in the charter of the constitution and say that all citizens are free to observe their religion, even to the extent of no observance of any day of rest, of any sabbath or any Sunday?

What of a constitutional guarantee of due process of law? That would be a fundamental freedom perhaps. Mr. Trudeau says that in the United States—and they have this in their constitution:

This phrase has, in the past, created many problems because of its vagueness. At times the courts have construed it so broadly as to invalidate some social legislation which we would now accept as essential. Should we avoid the possibility of such an interpretation of due process in Canada by using a more precise term to guarantee the rule of law.

What of the right to counsel? Should the individual have a right to counsel when he is brought before the courts, before the bar of justice—is that a fundamental right? Should that be entrenched in our constitution?

Mr. Trudeau asked the question, should this right impose a duty on the government to provide counsel for those who cannot afford it? I note, from a newspaper article that I read recently, that the present Minister of Justice is considering the question as to whether the federal government should undertake to provide a right of counsel to all citizens, something which I think we may say we have largely done through our legal aid programme in Ontario for the citizens of this province.

Mr. Sopha: That is not what he means.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well it is not exactly, but it is very close to what he says.

Mr. Speaker, I observe that it is the hour of six, and I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Mr. Speaker, we will resume this debate and I am anxious that any member of the House wishing to speak in this debate has an opportunity. I think there are several other speakers who will not be called until next week, but we will pick a convenient time, and give the members notice of when it will be resumed.

Tomorrow I want to deal with the estimates of The Department of Treasury, and if they are completed in one day we have certain bills on the order paper which I would like to turn to. Perhaps we can do some legislation, too, on Friday.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 6.00 o'clock, p.m.

Answers to questions were tabled as follows:

Question No. 8. Mr. Reid (Scarborough East)—Enquiry of the Ministry—(a) Who were the 20 persons with the highest salaries (or highest monthly payments) in the educational television branch of The Department of Education, as of May 1, 1968. What were their "titles". What was the salary of each of these persons. What were the academic, educational, and professional qualifications of each of these persons. Were the positions each of these persons occupied, advertised publicly. How many were classified as "casual employees" and who were they and how long had they been employed by The Department of Education prior to May 1, 1968. (b) Who were the 20 persons with the highest salaries (or highest monthly payments) in the curriculum division of the programme branch of The Department of Education, as of May 1, 1968. What were their "titles". What was the salary of each of these persons. What were the academic, educational and professional qualifications of each of these persons. Were the positions each of these persons occupied, advertised publicly. How many were classified as "casual employees" and who were they and how long had they been employed by The Department of Education, prior to May 1, 1968?

N.B. "Position not advertised"

Prior to October, 1967, the department adhered to a policy of selecting officers from among qualified educationists teaching in the Province. This procedure provided that professional educators in Ontario were considered for positions for which they were eligible. Beginning in October 1967 it was decided that the growing complexity and number of specialties in the education system might cause suitable candidates to be overlooked, and the policy was changed to provide for public advertisement of all opportunities.

Question No. 15. Mr. De Monte—Enquiry of the Ministry—1, (a) How many claims were appealed by claimants to the Review Committee of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968; (b) How many claims were appealed by claimants to the Appeal Tribunals of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968; (c) How many claims were appealed by claimants to the Full Board of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968. 2. (a) How many appeals were allowed by the Review Committee of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968; (b) How many appeals were allowed by the Appeal Tribunals of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968; (c) How many appeals were allowed by the Full Board of the Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968. 3. What is the average waiting time of the claimant to proceed through the full appeal structure of the Workmen's Compensation Board. 4. What is the percentage relationship between administrative cost and compensation paid by the Workmen's Compensation Board.

Answer by the Minister of Labour:—There were 379,227 claims reported to The Workmen's Compensation Board in 1968.

1. (a) During 1968 the review committee of the Workmen's Compensation Board considered 4,757 appeals.

It must be pointed out that less than 50 per cent of the appeals before the review committee were appeals with respect to the original allowance of a claim.

(b) During the same period the appeal tribunal dealt with 1,381 cases.

(c) The board during 1968 held 301 hearings.

2. (a) The review committee wholly allowed 1,020 appeals, and partially allowed 66.

(b) The appeal tribunal wholly allowed 561 and partially allowed 50.

(c) The board wholly allowed 133; partially allowed 15.

3. To proceed through the appeal structure of the board, providing nothing intervened such as postponements at the request of the parties appealing, it would take on the average approximately eight weeks; one week for the Review Committee, three weeks for the Appeal Tribunal to hear the further appeal, and four weeks for the Board.

4. The administrative cost of the Workmen's Compensation Board according to our latest figures was 7 per cent. The injured workman in compensation and medical aid costs received 89.2 per cent of every dollar received by the Board; 3.8 per cent was spent on safety education, and 7 per cent on administration.

Question No. 16. Mr. Shulman—Enquiry of the Ministry—How many aluminum poles have been erected by The Department of Highways since April 23, 1968. How many concrete poles have been erected by The Department of Highways since April 23, 1968.

Answer by the Minister of Highways:—Since April 23, 1968, The Department of Highways has erected 268 aluminum poles and 215 steel poles. All the steel and aluminum poles have break-away base designs.

Since the same date 745 concrete poles have been erected. Of this number, 412 are located well away from traffic or are in urban areas with low speeds. 307 of the concrete poles are protected by a flex-beam guard rail system. 26 poles have been placed with no protection in such areas as channelizations and are to be protected during the coming summer.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

THURSDAY, MARCH 6, 1969

The House met today at 2.30 o'clock, p.m.
Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Our guests in the galleries today are, in the east gallery, students from Norwood Park Public School, Hamilton; and in both galleries, from Weston Collegiate Institute, Weston.

Mr. Speaker: Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer) presented the reports of the ten regional development councils.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary) presented the following reports:

1. The annual report for 1968 of the Ontario Energy Board.
2. The annual report for 1968 of The Ontario Department of Public Works.
3. The report of the Minister of The Department of Correctional Services for the year ending March 31, 1968.
4. The annual report of 1968 of the St. Lawrence Parks Commission.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East), from the standing private bills committee, presented the committee's eighth report, which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills without amendment:

Bill Pr25, An Act respecting Carlton University.

Bill Pr30, An Act respecting Banks Alignment Limited.

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill Pr27, An Act respecting Co-ordinated Arts Services.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE RESIDENTIAL PROPERTY TAX REDUCTION ACT, 1968

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intitled, An Act to amend The Residential Property Tax Reduction Act, 1968.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton) announced in his most progressive and forward-looking Budget—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: —that residential property tax reduction would be continued in 1969, as a short-run measure to relieve the pressure of local taxation on the individual shareholder—

Mr. T. Reid (Scarborough East): That is right, shareholder!

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The system will continue in the same manner—

An hon. member: Shareholder in Ontario!

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, that is the way we look at it—shareholders in Ontario.

The system will continue in the same manner as in 1968, with the exception of the amendments I am proposing today. There are two main amendments. One confirms the eligibility of Crown properties, and the other introduces a requirement for a minimum payment of 50 per cent of the taxes on each eligible property.

The amendment concerning Crown properties covers eligibility for 1968 as well as for 1969. This follows consultation with the Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall) and with the federal Minister of Finance. The eligibility of these properties is in accord with their wishes as well as my own.

Ontario Housing Corporation tenants were given the benefit of tax reduction at the end of 1968, in conjunction with the decision to introduce this amendment.

Throughout Ontario, there are about 20,000 households under provincial ownership and about 10,000 under federal ownership. The amendment to provide a minimum payment of 50 per cent is in accord with the suggestions of the Ontario committee on taxation which report read as follows:

A residence of any value does create demands for local services. Although we want to prevent undue taxation on modest properties, we would not like to give anyone complete tax relief.

It did not seem practical to consider this qualification at the time the tax reduction system was introduced in the spring of 1968. We were proposing then a completely new system without precedent anywhere, and we were asking the co-operation of municipalities in passing the benefits of the system from the province to the individual taxpayer.

In our view, it would have been unreasonable at that stage—and probably detrimental to the system as a whole—to require municipalities to take on the task of administering a 50 per cent minimum.

Once the system became operative, however, it was practical to consider a minimum. We endorse the principle of participation by every household in paying for local services. Therefore, since it is now feasible to administer a minimum, I am proposing this amendment. It means that no property will be totally exempt from local taxation on account of the tax reduction system.

On the other hand, the principle is maintained of providing a substantial measure of relief from the regressive burden of the property tax. In each case, the tax reduction shall not exceed 50 per cent of the tax levied. To cite an obvious example, this will apply to a large number of summer cottages some of which were totally exempted in 1968.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Including Governor Romney?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The same equalization factor will be used in 1969 as in 1968, with certain exceptions such as municipalities that have just been reassessed. In other words, if a municipality were to have the same mill rate in 1969 as it had last year, the amount of tax reduction applying to an individual household will be the same. If the mill rate goes up, the amount of tax reduction will also go up.

A thorough examination of the operation of the tax reduction system in 1968 has demonstrated that its other provisions should continue without changes.

The difficulties that were encountered by a number of tenants and landlords at the end of the year have been widely publicized, and some individuals have tended to exaggerate the significance of these cases in the overall picture. These complications were anticipated from the beginning, and I would be totally irresponsible as a Minister of the Crown if I permitted them to overshadow the fact that more than $100 million is being provided to some two million Ontario householders in order to ease the burden of property taxation.

The system has proved in practice to be what we intended it to be—the best available method of easing the burden of property taxes on both owned and rented households, and of attacking the regressive nature of the property tax.

There were bound to be a number of misunderstandings and difficulties in the first year. There will be fewer in 1969. No other method now available could do the job as well as this system. In the future, as the Treasurer has indicated, another method will become available. It will be possible to achieve the desired benefits in a more direct manner.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): It is available now.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The new personal income tax system, which the provincial government plans to establish, will have the flexibility to channel property tax relief directly back to all taxpayers, including both home owners and tenants.

Mr. Nixon: I wonder, since you have permitted the Minister to give us an introductory statement considerably beyond explaining the provisions of the bill, if you would permit me to ask, by way of clarification, whether or not the Minister considered abolishing the second payment to those people who are receiving the payment on summer properties, as well as their basic shelter.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The leader of the Opposition is referring to cottages, and I think we have explained this on a number of occasions. If he would go to his county of Brant and consult with the local assessment commissioner, he will find that the local assessment roll, which is the most practical vehicle that can be used, both last year and this year, does not indicate that your house, for example, is your permanent residence or whether your permanent residence is at the Royal York Hotel. Or in my case, that my permanent residence is in Chatham or here, or at some cottage which I do not own.

That vehicle, that method of administration of deciding what is a cottage, what is a permanent residence, what is your primary residence, is simply not available. I explained that to the hon. leader of the Opposition last year, but perhaps he has forgotten.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. Minister would permit me, by way of further clarification, to draw to his attention that the method is available if in fact, we were going to do it by way of tax credit.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is entitled to ask for clarification from the Minister, not endeavour himself to clarify the Minister's statement.

Mr. Nixon: Might I ask, Mr. Speaker, would you not say in your judgment that his statement on first reading was considerably more than just a clarification of the principles introduced?

Mr. T. Reid: Right, let us have equal fair play.

Mr. Speaker: I would say this, that I believe it is in the interests of all the members to have a proper statement from a member or a Minister introducing a bill. At the moment I must say that while some of the statements included in the Minister's statement might have been unnecessary, by and large I think the statement was a good one for the information of the members, even if it did not clear up the controversial parts which will be debated, I presume, on second reading and later this session.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. Minister a question? Did he say this 50 per cent applied to hunting lodges on Crown land as well?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: If the property were on Crown land they would not be paying municipal taxes. Presumably that is the burden of the member's question I think what the member is driving at is properties in unorganized territories, which do not pay municipal taxes.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): He is number four now, he does not try at all. If he were number three—

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, will the amendment provide the grant to the owners of properties that were purchased from Hydro, which they did not receive last year? Will this amendment encompass that property?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Yes, I believe so.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. Minister has answered the member.

Before the orders of the day I would like to draw to the members' attention that we have further guests, of whose presence I was not previously advised, and we are always delighted to welcome the ladies. We have ladies from the Scarborough East Provincial Liberal Association in Mr. Speaker's gallery, and I am sure we are glad to see the girls here.

Before the orders of the day, I regret to advise the members that the chairman of the committee of the whole House has been suddenly taken ill and he has requested, and I have concurred in it, that with the concurrence of the members of the House, the hon. member for Carleton East (Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence) take his place as chairman of the committee for today or until the hon. member returns; to be spelled as usual by some other member. Would this receive the approval of the members of the House?

Thank you.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Attorney General:

Is the Attorney General going to institute an investigation into charges made by Metro Police Chief James Mackey concerning a local construction union, allegedly headed by criminals, using arson and sabotage to force contractors to sign agreements and compel their employees to join the union?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I have a related question.

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: It is a two-part question:

Can the Attorney General report to the House on the allegation made yesterday by Police Chief Mackey regarding alleged arson and sabotage against building contractors by an unnamed union?

What explanation, or justification, is there for the chief law enforcement officer of Metro Toronto sounding off in this fashion instead of laying charges against those whom he believes to be responsible for illegal acts?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Eglinton has a similar question, which he will now place please.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have actually addressed it to the Minister of Labour.

Is the Minister of Labour aware of the conditions reported by Wilfred List in the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning, involving a local construction union, reportedly headed by criminals who use arson and sabotage to force contractors to sign collective agreements and compel their employees to join the union? If so, is he planning to take necessary action to prevent these violations of law? Does he plan a formal investigation or enquiry into these allegations?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. Attorney General might answer, so far as he can, the questions directed to him and then the Minister of Labour might perhaps wish to comment.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there were several questions, I prepared one answer, which I think may cover them all.

Chief Mackey made his comments upon information which is known to him but which had not been drawn to my attention. From his public comment, it is obvious that this is a matter which is under a thorough investigation in Metropolitan Toronto by his own police force. If it has any implication to areas outside the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Toronto police force, I am sure that the appropriate law enforcement agency will be fully informed by police officers in the usual way in order that exhaustive police investigations may be pursued.

The Crown Attorney for Metropolitan Toronto is available to Chief Mackey and his force, for any assistance and advice that may be required.

I do not propose instituting any further investigations at this time because I have every confidence that the Metropolitan force is entirely competent to pursue the investigation in Toronto.

If the ramifications of the subject matter extend beyond that force, and require some intervention by my department, then the local force will certainly notify my advisors so that we may take any necessary action at that time.

I should say, Mr. Speaker, that I have made arrangements through my department to ensure that I will be advised on the matter as it progresses, although I am not instituting any special investigation.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Attorney General if in fact he is aware that this matter is under careful investigation, or is he just assuming that it is?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am aware that it is.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Attorney General could be persuaded to reply to my second question, as to what explanation or justification there is for the chief law officer sounding off in this fashion, rather than laying charges in the normal way?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well I did not discuss the matter with Chief Mackey. I would not propose to give his reasons for giving such publicity to this matter as he did. I have noticed, however, that since this publicity, since his announcement and information which he gave as published, a good many people have started to talk. Perhaps he had reasons. But I do not think it is for me to say what those reasons were. Certainly a good number of people have started to talk about this matter and perhaps there is some merit in that.

Mr. MacDonald: May I ask the Attorney General, if this is the way the police normally get the evidence in a case?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The hon. member is awfully sensitive.

Mr. MacDonald: No, I am not sensitive. If I may preface my comments, Mr. Speaker. Many times we have had it decried in this House about innuendoes—

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. MacDonald: Instead of specific charges—

Mr. Speaker: Order! The hon. member has asked a supplementary question.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The question, as I recall, was: "Is this the normal way the police get their information?" No one has suggested that that is all the information that is at hand or that the chief of police has. I would not say that this is a normal way to get information but perhaps this is one way that some information may come to light.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order! Would the hon. Minister of Labour care to enlarge on the question addressed to him in connection with this matter?

Hon. D. A. Bales (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think this matter has been properly dealt with by the Attorney General. I had prepared a simple statement along the same line, that the information had apparently been reported to the police since it involved matters that came under The Criminal Code. This is the appropriate procedure and their investigation properly lies within the jurisdiction of the police. I would not want to say anything further at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South has further questions?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Was the recent decision of Prime Minister Trudeau regarding offshore mineral resources administration lines, the result of consultation with the provinces or unilateral action by the federal government?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, these proposals for administrative lines were put forward by the federal government last November. It is just recently that we have received the detailed information of what is involved. These details are presently under study by the province and by the provinces concerned, so that it was not a unilateral action, but we will make our comments about them in due course.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sandwich-Riverside has a question of the Prime Minister?

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich-Riverside): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Prime Minister.

Who pays the costs involved in the annual helicopter rescues of fishermen stranded on ice in Ontario lakes and rivers?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, I do not have any detailed information as to who pays these costs. I do not know how many annual helicopter rescues there are. I think it would be fair to say that the first reaction is to do the rescue and then I suppose the payment comes after that.

Very often the air rescue crews are used from Trenton. These are aircraft and helicopters supplied by The Department of National Defence and I really could not tell you whether or not the costs are charged to those people involved. We do not operate helicopters other than by charter in The Department of Lands and Forests and I do not think they have ever been used for winter operations. They have occasionally in the summer time.

If the provincial police request a helicopter from a commercial service, then they would assume that cost themselves. My information is that they would deal with it in terms of what use was made of the machine. If there was an opportunity to charge it back they would do so. In some cases there might not be an opportunity so to do.

Sometimes these helicopters are provided by news services and how they charge them, or who eventually pays for them under those circumstances, I do not know. There is a wide variety of circumstances under which these rescues are handled. As there is no fixed procedure by this government to take part in such rescues, it is rather difficult to give any more precise answer than that.

Mr. Burr: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary? I wonder if the Prime Minister is aware that on Monday afternoon for about five hours near Point Pelee there were 40 fishermen stranded. Eventually, aircraft came from about 200 miles away in Michigan and helped, Trenton too was considering sending help. Would the aircraft from Michigan perhaps bill the OPP? Is that possible?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I am not aware of this incident. If the member had asked me about it specifically I could have got some information. But I cannot see any responsibility on the OPP to pay for the aircraft. I do not know who ordered them, how they got there, or under what circumstances they were there—whether they were chartered or who took the responsibility in asking them to take part. I simply do not have any information. But as a matter of course, I cannot see that the OPP would accept any responsibility for it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa.

Mr. Pilkey: Mr. Speaker, a question of the Treasurer.

What are the salary scales applicable to assessors working for the Ontario government?

Two, what fringe benefits do the assessors employed by the provincial government receive?

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario government does not at present employ anyone in the position of assessor. Qualified assessors working for the government are employed in a supervisory capacity and do not perform general assessment duties.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Port Arthur has a question of the Minister of Lands and Forests.

Mr. R. H. Knight (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Lands and Forests.

Is a licence required for smelt fishing in the province?

Second, if so, what is the cost of the licence and third, how much revenue does the Minister expect to receive from the cost of the licences during 1969?

Hon. R. Brunelle (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member, yes a licence is required. The present $3 angling licence covers fishing for smelts, provided the net used is less than 6 ft. by 6 ft. If a net is larger than 6 ft. by 6 ft., the licence fee is $1 for residents and $5 for non-residents.

A person who is fishing for smelts only and has one of the special licences does not require the $3 angling licence.

It is assumed that the revenue from these special licences will be about the same as last year—$21,766.50 for the non-resident licence and $3,493.50 for the resident's licence.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Thunder Bay has a question of this Minister.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): Yes, thank you, Mr. Speaker.

How many suspensions of timber licences have been imposed during the period 1900 to 1969, under the legislation enacted in the year 1900 and continued to date in The Crown Timber Act providing for the embargo on export of raw materials?

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member, our department has no record of any breach of the requirements of that legislation.

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary?

In view of the legislation that was passed in 1900, it seems that any shipment of raw material out of the country was in violation of this Act until 1952, when it could have been permitted by an Order in Council. Would the Minister not agree that any shipment of raw material from the forest products industries up to the year 1952 was in violation of this statute?

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: Mr. Speaker, we have checked our records and for the last 20 years we have no knowledge, as I just mentioned, of any breach or violations. Prior to that time, we have not been able to find anything in our records.

Mr. Stokes: As a supplementary then, it is quite obvious that there were some violations. Would the Minister not agree that from the year 1900, at which time this legislation was passed, until the change in 1952, that there were violations under this Act?

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: Mr. Speaker, as I have just told the hon. member, we have no record of any breach or violations.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peterborough has a question of the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Mr. W. A. Pitman (Peterborough): Yes, Mr. Speaker, a question of the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs.

Has the Minister decided what appropriate action he will take in regard to the purported legal actions by the town of Trenton under section 248 (a) of The Municipal Act, as described by the Minister on December 20, 1968, Hansard, page 942, and admitted in the press by responsible officials?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, no, I have not decided. I hope to be able to make a statement in the House in the next couple of weeks.

Mr. Pitman: In view of the statement of the mayor that, "what we have been doing to attract industry has been illegal"; and in the same statement, "I would do the same thing tomorrow"; would the Minister not agree that indeed illegal actions are taking place, have been taking place and that some action is probably appropriate?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, it is a shame that the hon. member is not a rate-payer in Trenton because then he could lay charges rather than just make accusations.

Mr. Pitman: They are self-accused.

Mr. MacDonald: They are waiting for yet another violation.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 23rd order; House in committee of supply, Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence in the chair.

ESTIMATES, THE DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND ECONOMICS

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, during the discussion of the estimates of The Department of Treasury and Economics in the last session of the Legislature, less than eight months ago, we spent a considerable part of the first day debating the momentous question as to whether the traditions of the House permitted

hon. members to shed their jackets. Today I am pleased that our discussion will take place in a decorous atmosphere with conventional dress and without television lights to add heat to our surroundings.

I would also imagine that the presentation of the budget this week will have clarified for the hon. members the heavy programme that will face my department and the Treasury board secretariat in implementing our fiscal framework for the future. These estimates reflect the professional requirements to carry out this programme.

I will forego the opportunity of commenting today on the economic situation and outlook which I believe has been dealt with adequately in Budget paper "A" among the papers tabled earlier. Similarly, I believe that I need say little about the government's overall financial situation and programme of tax structure reform. Rather, I should like to speak briefly about the organization and some of the recent major activities of The Department of Treasury and Economics. I will then deal with the activities of the Treasury board and its secretariat.

The Department of Treasury and Economics was created only seven and one half months ago on July 23, 1968, when Royal assent was given to An Act to amend The Financial Administration Act. This legislation formally joined, in a single department, the central finance and economics functions of the Ontario government. Since that time, we have exerted great efforts towards making this marriage a fruitful one. One of the results to date has been the Budget statement papers for 1969.

The preparation of this Budget was the result of the new department functioning as it should, with other departments of government providing valuable contributions to the total budgetary process. The prior decisions taken, which were essential to the major outlines of the Budget, were in a very real sense the product of the new organization and its input to the Cabinet committee on policy development.

During the late summer and the autumn, the Cabinet committee put in long hours discussing the aggregate constraints and guidelines for budgetary expenditures, in a global and a particular sense, and the options available for taxation reform. The statement of the Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough) on regional government in December was one result of this process, the approach taken by the government during the federal-provincial fiscal discussions in the autumn was another, the contributions of Ontario to the federal-provincial constitutional review yet another, and this year's Budget statement and papers a fourth result.

During the coming year, the Cabinet committee will be kept increasingly busy by the activities of my department as position papers are sent to it regarding economic policy, priorities and guidelines—matters which are inter-related with the work of virtually every department of government—regional development plans, and approaches to the complex world of federal-provincial-municipal relationships, particularly as they concern the distribution of powers. Increasingly, in the years to come, the Budget and the expenditures which it portrays will be the instrument, both in timing and location, through which a co-ordinated government programme for the economic and social development of the province will be translated into specific action.

Presiding over the pre-natal period and, more recently, the first months in the development of a new organization has been an enormously stimulating experience for me. I have watched the intellectual interaction and contrasting approaches in method of the economists and social scientists who came to us from The Department of Economics and Development, the accountants and financial management staff from the former Treasury Department, and the systems and programme analysts and others who form the staff of the Treasury board secretariat.

I have been extremely happy about the creative manner in which relationships have developed. In the sphere of financial information and management, we have been developing accounting systems which are geared to the needs of the planning-programming-budgeting system, the financial community, and the economists.

Proposals have arisen from a series of meetings which will enable us to arrive at a system combining the long-range requirements of "programme budgeting and management by objective" with the need to maintain short-run flexibility, in order that our financial affairs can be sensitive to the changing requirements of the economic situation and the federal-provincial framework.

At times, it is not always easy to separate my responsibilities as Treasurer and Minister of Economics with those as chairman of the Treasury board. This, however, merely confirms the close relationship that should exist between those functions and, I am happy to say, we are heading in the same direction in both realms.

Since the appointment of the Minister of Revenue, an effective set of relationships has been worked out between The Department of Revenue, responsible for tax administration, and The Department of Treasury and Economics, responsible for tax policy. The technical expertise and knowledge of tax collection and tax administration in The Department of Revenue have resulted in many valuable proposals for tax changes, which have then been evaluated in The Department of Treasury and Economics and brought in, where desirable, to the overall taxation policy package.

Similarly, close relations have been developed with other departments in dealing with problems affecting economic or budgetary policy. During the course of the year, there have been countless meetings with The Department of Municipal Affairs on such varied subjects as provincial-municipal relations, municipal finance, assessment procedures, regional government, community planning and regional development, bilingualism in the municipalities, federal-provincial relations on matters of urban planning and housing, the designation of growth points and many other subjects.

At one point during the year, certain members of the staff of Municipal Affairs were heard to say that they spent more time in the offices of The Department of Treasury and Economics than they did in their own building.

Turning more specifically to the estimates, may I sketch, very briefly, for the hon. members the organization of the department. Traditionally, the broad term "Treasury" in the Ontario government has referred to the tax collection operations of the government, expenditure control and co-ordinating functions of the Treasury board and Treasury board secretariat, and overall financial policy, taxation policy, money management and central accounting.

With The Department of Revenue assuming responsibility for tax collection and tax administration, the economic research and planning function, federal-provincial affairs, the regional development programmes, and statistical affairs were brought together with the responsibilities of the former Treasury Department for taxation policy, management of debt and finances, and accounting policy and practice.

Meanwhile, the Treasury board continued its responsibility for expenditure control, administrative policy, programme co-ordination and employer-staff relations. Four divisions were created in the department as follows:

The policy planning division; the finance division; the government accounts division; and, the economic and statistical services division.

In essence, the functional role of the department can best be described in terms of the first three divisions with the economic and statistical services division designed to provide basic services to the other divisions and other departments. Attached administratively to the department, as a ministerial agency, is the computer services centre which provides, under the policy guidance of an interdepartmental computer services board chaired by the deputy Treasurer, computer services to five government departments and several other agencies, including Treasury and Economics and Revenue.

The basic administrative services for the department, as well as for the Treasury board secretariat, are provided by the administrative division of The Department of Revenue.

I need say nothing about the vote for general departmental administration, other than to mention that the grant to the St. John Ambulance Association has been increased by $10,000 in recognition of the great voluntary services rendered to the people of the province. The overall vote for departmental administration has been decreased somewhat because of a phasing out of funds for the Royal commission on civil rights, which is expected to publish its final report this year.

Under economic and statistical research and policy planning, provision is made for the continuing implementation of the new organization, particularly in the regional development, economic planning and taxation and fiscal policy branches.

Some of these changes took place during the year on the authority of a Treasury board order, as the initial allotment in last year's estimates was clearly insufficient to handle the increased responsibilities resulting from the changes in departmental structure. The apparent increase in charges for data processing services is due to a transfer of costs for the computerization of the provincial government payroll from the administrative division to the systems and programming branch.

There has been a substantial decrease in the amount allotted under publications due to the fact that the Ontario Economic Atlas, which has been financially supported by the province, will be published in June of this year. In fact, it is expected that revenue from sales of the atlas will approach $100,000 during the coming year.

An increase has been provided under federal-provincial conferences and committees to permit the Ontario government to pay a share of the expenses of the secretariat to the constitutional conference in Ottawa, which is becoming a genuine servant of all 11 governments.

In the field of regional development, the year 1969-70 will largely be devoted to the preparation of meaningful development plans for each economic region, as I indicated recently in Budget paper "B".

The first two stages of the regional development process—inventory of all existing regional development programmes and evaluation of 63 different indicators of economic activity by county and, where possible by township—have been almost completed so that projects and plans can be based on a solid foundation of information.

During this last year, particular effort was devoted to the northwestern economic region, where a special ARDA-financed study of the economic potential of the region is being carried out. Special attention has also been devoted to the central Ontario economic region as a result of the Goals Plan, which was produced as a part of the Metropolitan Toronto and Region Transportation Study. A report is expected shortly from the advisory committee on regional development in this region.

As an input to the planning operation, each of the regional development councils and the regional advisory boards has submitted proposals for recommended solutions to regional problems over the next five years. I have already taken the opportunity today of tabling a copy of each of the reports of the councils. I will arrange to have copies available in the regional development branch for the members, on request. They will also be released publicly today by each of the regional development councils.

These reports represent the results of a massive grass roots approach to regional development during 1968 whereby, through a series of public meetings in each economic region and with the assistance of a professional consultant, each regional development council has come up with its own approach to regional development. Some of the work in these reports is truly first-rate and all of them, taken together, represent the arrival of a new stage in the regional development process.

I shall also be tabling, later in the session, several of the university research studies completed during the last year. Studies on various aspects of regional development in Ontario in this series have now been contracted to each of Ontario's 14 provincially supported universities.

Under Vote 2403, the major change is our intention to strengthen the finance management branch. At the present time, we are actively seeking a director for this branch, who will be responsible for maintaining a sophisticated information system on the evolving cash position of the government. Under the supervision of the comptroller of finances, he will also be responsible for the administration and accounting of the Ontario Education Capital Aid Corporation, the Ontario Municipal Improvement Corporation, the Universities Capital Aid Corporation and other such agencies.

Under Vote 2404, government accounting, I might mention that an item for $80,000 appears for the first time. This represents an insurance premium paid to Fidelity Insurance of Canada in respect of all the employees of the government of Ontario for bonding purposes. This item has been transferred from the administrative division of The Department of Revenue. The Government Accounts Division is working towards the development of an accounting service, providing a centralized source of accounting expertise and directed towards the establishment of new forms of financial accounting for the government as a whole and as a support and advisory service to operating departments in accounting matters. This is the particular responsibility of the government accounting methods branch.

Under Vote 2405, the main increases are due to an increase in the maximum contribution payable on behalf of Ontario civil servants to the Canada Pension Plan and an increase in the contribution to the employees' insurance plan, resulting from growth in the numbers in the civil service and an increase in the Ontario Medical Association fee schedules.

The shared computer facilities have been operating well since I reported last. The computer service centre is currently equipped with two IBM 360 Model 40 computers. The centre reports to a board comprising the five deputy Ministers representing the main departments which share the facility. In 1969-70, it is expected that The Department of Treasury and Economics and The Department of Revenue will account for slightly over one-third of the computer work, with the remaining activity being spread among eight other departments. It is estimated that, as a result of a recently completed purchase-leaseback arrangement, $194,000 will be saved in the operations of the computer facility this coming year.

The Pension Commission of Ontario has registered 2,289 new pension plans since its inception in 1965, as opposed to 1,708 that have been terminated. New plans have been submitted at the rate of about three a day. This year an economist is being added to the staff of the commission to assist in the development of a comprehensive development programme pertaining to the collection and analysis of pension statistics and to undertake research on the socio-economic impact and the deployment of pension funds.

Mr. Chairman, if I may, at the appropriate time I will have a short statement to make with respect to the Treasury board secretariat.

Mr. J. R. Breithaupt (Kitchener): Mr. Chairman, in its wisdom, the government has seen fit to bring down the estimates of The Department of Treasury and Economics in the period between the Treasurer's (Mr. MacNaughton), presenting his Budget and the reply of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Nixon). I am wondering if, perhaps, by this means the Treasurer feels that he will be able to escape, to some extent, the impact of criticism in the general review of his department to which this estimate pertains. If so, let me disabuse him of that impression.

Since we are so much earlier in the year in our consideration of these particular estimates, the Treasurer will no doubt notice that all hon. members are wearing their jackets and that any heat that may be generated during this particular estimate will, I can assure him, be subservient to the light that will be cast upon the workings of his department. By the time we are through, perhaps all our eyes will have been opened.

Now that the Treasurer has cast off the revenue responsibility—if he will pardon the simile—like a garter snake shucking off its skin, we are afforded the vision of a new and pristine exterior that will doubtless wither as the year proceeds, and as the significance of the Budget proposals really begins to be understood by the people of Ontario. When the rhetoric fades away, the reality will remain.

Mr. Chairman, we are now deeply involved in the planning-programming-budgetting experience and, quite frankly, we are expecting it to deliver. It is now quite clear that the frills are a thing of the past, and the Treasurer who has even yet fought shy of a totally disinterested review of government expenditures, preferring instead a hybrid affair, must assert himself and make his authority known throughout the proliferating cells of government. We must know the benefit of every move, and we must know its cost.

For example, we heard a great deal last year about the great expectations that had been raised by the rationalization of computer services and the aborting of computer programmes that would not yield precise results relevant to the government's purposes. We shall want to know how well this programme of computer programme rationalization has proceeded in the intervening 12 months. What kinds of programme have been deemed unworthy of the robot's attention? What are the criteria of relevance?

How far are we ahead with acknowledging the federal contribution in respect of each of our shared-cost programmes? How many such programmes are there today? Are we now going to give the figures, as the municipalities are required to do in respect of provincial contributions, or are we going to continue to pretend that the federal government is the harsh landlord of the rental agreement, taking all our taxes and giving little in return? It is important that we appreciate—and that the general public appreciates—the fact that our major source of revenue is still channelled through Ottawa, and that Finance Minister Benson does not pocket every penny, which is the impression the members of the government like to give on every public occasion, including that of only two days ago.

Our economic forecasts are pliable, in that they can reflect the gloom or joy of the Premier (Mr. Robarts), and the Treasurer as these alternate, depending on whether these gentlemen are putting on a good face in Bonn or a gloomy one in the Chateau Laurier. The cry is still heard, however, "How could they be so wrong?" of the back-room boys whose slide-rules predict disaster one minute and the millenium the next. Eventually, I prophesy, they will form a professional association and not allow themselves and their predictions to be bandied about for narrow political ends.

This will be particularly important as this government nears the end of its tether and casts caution to the winds in the face of the shrinking potential mandate in 1971 that the polls will all to rapidly forecast. Will the gentlemen of the Treasury then become the counterparts of Lou Harris and George Gallup, as they are called upon to counter the public reaction? Or will they assert themselves in the dignity of their calling and allow the Ontario Economic Review to become something more objective than The Adventures of Pollyanna?

We are hearing a lot about the productivity improvement project—PIP for short. This is the half-an-half study, neither internal nor independent, that has been called for, following what one can only conclude is the failure of the earlier "Ontario's House in Order" review, so graphically described, by the Honourable Treasurer, to the captive audience at the tenth national conference of the Chartered Institute of Secretaries in London, on September 20 last, less than half a year ago.

Let me recall the promise of that earlier review. It was to have been, and I quote, "full-scale" and "critical". This "intensive examination" was to cover the activities of every department and agency, and to encompass the full range of operational areas, including staff, organization, equipment and accommodation. Sophisticated techniques of policy setting would establish priorities and direct restraints. Stringent criteria would be applied to new programmes. "We are bearing down," the Treasurer proclaimed, "on government costs in an exercise which I believe to be the most exhaustive and thorough economy drive ever undertaken by an administration of this province."

We were made privy to the special meeting of all Cabinet Ministers, deputy Ministers and senior financial officials, which took place in the Treasury building on July 22 last, where the Premier ordered a "total examination." It was a powerful and dramatic confrontation, by all accounts, of which, unfortunately, posterity has to make do with one. The synoptic versions, I am sure, would have made good reading as tales told from different viewpoints often do. But all that remains when memory dies is the official, authorized version, in which the Premier leaned forward in his seat and earnestly asked the Treasury board to work with all phases of the government to ensure that every tax dollar would be put to its most effective use.

Since the membership of the board at that time consisted of the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs (Mr. Rowntree), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett), and the Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld), the Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), the Provincial Secretary (Mr. Welch) and the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Guindon)—two of whom appeared to be engaged in a feverish competition as to who could spend the most public money in the shortest possible time—this demand must have come somewhat as a shock.

One can imagine the realization by the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management that he might have to draw back at Pickering before the hon. Minister of Tourism and Information retrenched at the Centennial Science Centre, and that neither of them would ever again feel that first, fine careless rapture of another million being added to the estimates for work in progress. I am told that the handsome television profile of the Minister of Tourism on Tuesday reflected the sad realization that the Treasurer meant what he said, and that not only the Centennial centre, but the whole business of tourism was now the shorn lamb before the ill-wind of austerity.

From lambs to lions is but a leap, and I could not help but feel, as I listened to the Treasurer tell it like it was, and come up with a flourish with the columns of his Budget balanced, that we had, indeed, paid the cost in the past 24 years and will continue to do so in the future. As they used to say while keeping score in the Coliseum: "Lions 24, Christians 1."

The Premier went on to exhort those assembled in the Frost building to greater austerities, and the Treasurer was pleased to amplify the agony in London by saying:

We are examining every facet of our operations, from mailing rooms to management, from warehouse facilities to welfare programmes, from utilization practices to university projects.

He might have added, "from alliteration to zeugma," so full of figures of speech was his London effort.

One of the fancy words he didn't use was zetetic, which means "proceeding by inquiry," which is exactly what we are doing now in the public accounts committee. As chairman of that committee, I, of course, do not want to anticipate the report at this time in the House, but even as we look backward in that committee, we can also look forward here. We note that the Treasurer's optimism is not justified, certainly in relation to the speed with which the economies inherent in centralized purchasing are being put into effect. Only furniture and stationery are really responding to this supposedly cost-saving technique. We will have to do better than that.

However, let us return to London, where the Treasurer was telling the chartered secretaries that there would be a branch-by-branch review of existing programmes, concentrated on a critical assessment of goals and on achievement of maximum efficiency in administration.

As I contemplated the branch-by-branch review which he promised, my mind went back to a scene in that other London, across the waves, some 328 years before, where a similar exhortation culminated in the petition of London of December 11, 1640. In that petition, which was to become the Root and Branch Bill, it was demanded that "the said government, with all its dependencies, roots and branches, be abolished."

Well, we would like to abolish the government and replace it with a better one. This government has not got very far. Ontario still has its dependencies, its Indian ghettos that only yesterday the Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) was loath to acknowledge. We certainly have branches proliferating in every department, and at least one Root, whose lineage and tradition have recently been promulgated in an official OWRC press release.

Faced with such a remarkable parallel, perhaps we ought to return to the source of it all, the Scriptures, where, in the Book of Malachi, chapter 4, verse 1, we read:

For behold, the day cometh that shall burn them up, saith the Lord of Hosts. It shall leave them neither root nor branch.

Now let us become serious for a moment, Mr. Chairman, and look at the questions asked by the Treasury board. I want to read them into the record at this time, so that, as the estimates proceed, members can conveniently refer to them, as the Opposition proposes to dig into the administrative shortfall that has turned these probing queries into little more than pious hopes. That they are pious hopes can be seen by examining the figures in the Budget papers and the estimates for the coming year. If there are cutbacks, they are in programmes rather than in administration, and this fact makes the questions ironic in the extreme, although they were intended seriously enough.

I think that what we are up against here is simply Parkinson's law and there is no better example than the educational television branch, which has grown in three years from two men sitting in a corridor in an Eglinton west building, to a formidable establishment with a salary call alone in excess of $1.5 million. That figure doesn't include programmes or maintenance. That is up to $7.5 million in total now. This before they even have a transmitter of their own! Just watch tumescence take over when channel 19 or some other form of distribution becomes available!

So, having glanced through the upcoming estimates, especially the main office and administrative items, and noting how they have swollen, listen to these questions from the Treasury board directive. It is almost laughable in view of what we know now, less than half a year later. Here are some of the questions:

Has the original objective of the programme been met?

Can the programme be discontinued or curtailed?

Is there a more economical way of achieving or maintaining the same result?

If the objective has not been achievable within present programme structure, is it worth continuing?

Can present vacancies be left unfilled through reassignment of duties, elimination of non-essential procedures and/or improved techniques?

Can expenditure on temporary help be reduced by greater inter-branch, inter-office co-operation?

Are staff, equipment and supplies properly controlled and correctly utilized?

In regard to proposed, improved or new programmes, the branches were asked these questions:

Is the change essential at this time? Is it the most efficient way of achieving the improvement having regard to both the costs and the anticipated benefits?

Have the proposals been tested on a pilot basis to ensure that the expected results will be achieved?

Can the additional costs be offset by a cut-back on an existing programme or activity?

Can the additional costs be restricted by making greater use of existing facilities and/or personnel?

You can see why we of the Opposition, Mr. Chairman, want a totally independent review by outside consultants of the operations of government, rather than this internal farce or the hybrid farce called PIP.

And I suppose the readers of English literature are with us. We have a character called Master Pip in "Great Expectations", and perhaps the great expectations that the Treasury has from this programme will probably not be realized.

As we review the estimates, of which this is the first, I want to remind my colleagues of a further request made last September by the Treasury board, of the departments of government. They were asked to achieve a minimum improvement in productivity of two per cent over 1968-1969 levels in their estimates for 1960-1970. Now, how do you measure that? Certainly, the book does not reflect it. We must all give this matter further analysis, because you will recall that, since there is no way to measure the output of government departments, except perhaps by weighing the garbage and scrap paper, it was to be registered as a reduction in administrative expense of two per cent in current monetary values, rather than in absolute terms.

The Treasurer said that an anticipated price increase of three per cent over the fiscal year which, by the way, is an admission that inflation does indeed plague us in spite of later protestations to the contrary by others, would mean a saving in real terms of about five per cent, but for the purpose of our estimate book comparisons, year to year, we can be content if we can discover a two per cent saving in the columns of figures concerned with administration. If these estimates reflect that saving, then improved productivity, as expressed in these terms, will have proved to be more than a pious hope.

Not that the Treasurer wants any credit for this achievement if, in fact, it proves to have been realized. For in London he said:

I emphasize that this productivity improvement target is in addition to, not part of, our critical review of programmes and operations.

The Treasurer was still complacent last fall in London. Again I quote:

The administrative and operations costs of the government itself account for only 20 per cent of the total budget.

Only 20 per cent!

Yet where did the axe fall two days ago? Not here, in administration, but on the balance, on the statutory payments, on the helpless victims of Ontario's succour in various forms.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): On the people.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): They are happy about it.

Mr. Sopha: Always strike at the people first.

Mr. Breithaupt: The Treasurer said:

The remaining 80 per cent is made up of major statutory obligations, including grants to school boards, municipalities and hospitals, major transfer payments to people, including family allowances and premium assistance for health insurance plans, and major transfer payments to institutions, primarily universities and colleges of applied arts and technology.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the Treasurer has interjected, "the people are happy". This noon I spoke to approximately 100 social workers in Kitchener. I can assure you that in the programmes that they have to implement and in the difficulties which they are facing in the interest that this government places in projects before people, they are not happy, nor are the people that they have to deal with.

Mr. Sopha: They said the member should be Treasurer and I agree.

Mr. Breithaupt: One ought not to have needed a crystal ball, Mr. Chairman, to predict where the blow would fall. It fell, not on administration, but on the people programmes.

This is the kind of thing that makes me wary of the rhetoric of the white paper, so much at variance with the plodding pedestrianism of the Budget itself. But let us leave that for another day. We have enough of the Treasurer's rhetoric from these earlier occasions to make us think twice before accepting, with naivete, his later propositions. Regardless of our constituencies, we of the Opposition are all from Missouri in this regard. Don't just tell us, show us! Then, maybe, we'll believe you.

The Treasurer told his London audience that The Department of Treasury and Economics had devised a priority rating for all the government's activities, to serve as the master guide for the budget he has now presented. The Cabinet committee on policy development had put out guidelines to departments, following meetings which the Premier had again chaired. While the Treasurer was commendably modest about taking the credit, he took care in all of his speeches that whatever blame might be laid subsequently would be well and truly shared.

If programme budgeting focusses on objectives rather than operations, then it fails if the government is getting nowhere. For example, an army unit that went through the war maintaining itself would fare well under an operational analysis but not under one based on objectives and goals. Thus it is with this government. It is costing us an awful lot to get nowhere. We are paying a lot of money to be frustrated, and the small businessman, whose concern was expressed by the hon. members for Halton East (Mr. Snow) and for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent), is not the only one who is frustrated these days.

We are considered by our colleagues in the United States and in other governments to be among the leaders in the field of progressive budgeting, says the Treasurer. In other words, we are leaders in scanning the horizon, as the white paper, one of the fruits of this exercise, proves. But if we are not moving along the trail towards that horizon, if we are getting nowhere at all, how futile all this talk is!

The Treasurer is fond of saying that he is in search of a viable federalism. Mr. Chairman, we of the Opposition are rather more concerned with our search for a viable provincialism, which is a goal more elusive than federalism. Now that it is assertive, federalism seems to be working very well. It is therefore totally appropriate in this, the first of the many lead-in speeches to the estimates of the government departments, that I should reiterate that we are here to do Ontario's business.

The Department of Treasury and Economics is supposed to give leadership to other departments of government. That's the theory. It isn't working. The reason it isn't working is that up to now, nobody in the other departments has taken the Treasurer seriously. The estimates are the best he could do with his big stick, but the bruises hardly show. Most of the departments appear to have thrived on punishment, even in real terms. While some of this is attributable to the growth in our population, it can't all be explained away so easily. Some of it is fat, and it has got to come off.

We cannot do less for the taxpayers of Ontario than to examine estimate after estimate with the sharp and critical eye that even previous years have not seen in action. The Treasury estimates are the first. As we get down to the nuts and bolts of voting supply, let us realize that this is our prime function. This is where we earn our indemnity. If we, through our perception and acuity, can better your best, nobody loses. The people of Ontario are the winners in the end.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I want to divide my opening remarks into two parts. I want to speak, first of all, about what we are going to do as we embark on this long course of dealing with the estimates for the upcoming fiscal year of the government.

I have been concerned that we have talked from time to time—and I have heard rumours of discussions and advice that perhaps consideration is going to be given to clarify—the purposes that we are intended to serve in the course of going through these estimates.

I think it is most important that the government gives consideration to the appointment of a select committee on the procedures of the House in committee of supply and in committee of ways and means to see whether or not it is possible to devise a method which will allow us to perform a meaningful role as we stand up to question the ministry on the items of their expenditures.

We cannot here—and I am not making any plea for any special provision of services for those of us in Opposition—but we cannot possibly and conceivably match the resources available to the government. Therefore, what we ask must of necessity be somewhat amateurish and, in many cases, quite naive about many areas of government.

What of course has happened is that this committee, instead of being involved in an intense scrutiny of the estimates in any meaningful way, in fact is dealing with matters which are going to be unchanged. We start out with the premise that we will discuss the estimates for the next three or four months in this Legislature. But not one single item in this estimate book will be changed by anything that we here on this side of the House can say.

The result is that we tend to lose the purpose of the committee, and we tend to use this as a subterfuge method of discussing policy. I happen to think that if you confuse functions without knowing what you are doing, you do not accomplish either one part or the other of the operation that we are designed to carry out.

We are tempted always to talk about policy, partly because we think that we must, in the course of the estimates, speak to those outside the House through the media in the press gallery because the actual intense scrutiny of government expenditure is not an exciting pastime. With proper accounting procedure and proper auditing procedure we are certainly not going to uncover any scandal in the government's financial operation. If there was one existing amongst the government operations, in all likelihood it would be found outside the House not in anything that we are going to do here.

I, for one, do not think this is the proper forum in which to discuss the policies of the government. I think there are other forums in this Legislature for that purpose. There are the major debates and there are, on occasion, the special orders which are put on the order paper, such as the confederation debate which is now in progress.

But that part of the government's operations, and that part of the function of this House cannot be performed unless the ministry is prepared to come and listen to the debates which take place on those general occasions. At least, we have the Minister that we are dealing with in this particular department available in the House. This is a perennial problem, in the general debates, as to whether or not the Ministers are going to be in attendance.

It may well be that we would have to, in such a select committee, work out a method by which those members in opposition who are going to speak on matters relating to particular Ministers, would so advise, through the Whips, the Ministers concerned so that they would have an opportunity to so order their affairs that they could be available in the House at the time these matters were discussed.

So, while I do not think that the procedures in the House can be dealt with in isolation, one from the other, I think a very wise start could be made if we did have a select committee of the House, but not to deal with all the procedures of the House. I think there is too much for that purpose. I think a select committee of this Legislature could deal with the questions of the House in committee of supply, and the House in committee of ways and means, to see what method can be devised by which we can perform a meaningful role.

I, therefore, do not intend to embark on policy matters. I might make a few introductory comments that might be termed comments of mine on policy matters, but I have tried to set out what I believe the function of this committee is, and it is within that framework that I, at least in these estimates, am going to restrain myself, much as I would like to talk about many other matters in the course of the Treasurer's estimates.

I jotted these down, and I think they are at least a basis of discussion as to what I am going to do in this committee:

1. Examine the estimates presented to the House and ascertain if the policy implied in those estimates may be carried out more economically;

2. Are the managerial arrangements under which expenditures take place fully effective?

3. What specific economies may be made?

That, to my mind, Mr. Chairman, connotes what I am about in this committee, and I think provides the framework within which I would suggest that you, as Chairman, could perhaps contain the discussion which will take place on these particular estimates.

The first one: Examine the estimates presented to this House and to ascertain if the policy implied in those estimates may be carried out more economically.

The second one: Are the managerial arrangements under which expenditures take place fully effective?

The third one: What specific economies may be made?

But even having stated those, Mr. Chairman, you will recognize that the third one is not really within our control. As I stated just a few minutes ago, there just is not going to be any change in this estimate book between now and the time we adjourn in June or July, or whenever the government business of the province for this year is completed.

So my first comment to the Treasurer (Mr. McNaughton)—indeed, the appropriate time for me to have intervened with these comments would have been when he made the motion for the House to go into committee of ways and means but it seemed to me that I would leave them to this point so that he would give consideration to them—is to ask that he convey this to the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), and the other members of the government to see whether or not they would give consideration to the appointment of a select committee on the operations of these two vital committees of the House which in fact take up, I suppose, the majority of the time of the House, certainly a very substantial part of the time of the House.

The other area which concerns me is, of course, what role we can play in Opposition when the government is embarked on long-term planning. I might say, Mr. Chairman, we had a perfect example of it this afternoon, and that is that the Treasurer put on the table of the House ten reports of the regional development councils of the province which are final reports of five-year studies which have been conducted.

Under the second vote in these estimates we are supposed to discuss that particular area of operation in his department. Well, I need only say how nonsensical it is. But of course that is the state to which the government has reduced us in the Opposition. They do not think it important that we have those studies and have an opportunity to give consideration to them. There are men in this caucus who are intensely interested in that field. We have followed the meagre information which has been available from the government for some time, while these studies have been going on, and now we are faced with the proposition of not being able to study them for useful comment when the vote comes up under which those studies took place.

I do not think, in this particular instance, it makes sense for the Treasurer to say, "Oh, yes, there will be another occasion during the Budget debate to discuss those reports." There is a very important aspect of those reports which has to be discussed during his estimates. I, of course, await those in this caucus, who are intensely interested in that particular field, when they have had an opportunity in a hurried way, to look at them to decide whether or not we will ask that that particular item of the Treasurer's estimates be stood down until such time as we in this party, and I am sure the members of the Liberal Party who are interested, have an opportunity to consider those matters. Those members from the various regions that have these reports have an opportunity on their part to study.

I think the government is going to have to recognize that we are here, that we have a role to perform and that we intend to perform it. We intend to press for the procedural arrangements in this House which will permit us to perform it.

I want to come back to this question of how we participate in the economic planning of this province as a representative body, when you are now talking about five-year projections in practically all the studies which you are going to make. Again I suggest to the Treasurer that we have a role to play. I do not intend to suggest that I know all the aspects of the solution to the problem. I do not.

I think we have a role to play in the preparation of the options which are presented to the government before they decide what their policy will be. I think it would be quite possible, quite possible, using the latest Budget as an example, for the Treasurer to have brought to the House the options which were under consideration by the government for debate.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): The member has to be kidding.

Mr. J. Renwick: The Treasurer may comment afterwards. I do not quite know the import of the Treasurer's remark. I am going to take it to assume that in some way or other the alternatives available to the government are not matters which can be debated prior to the decision being made, when we are in effect faced with the fait accompli as to the choice which the government has made.

I think it would be quite feasible for the Assembly, as such, to discuss and consider and debate the alternatives, the options, which are open. I am not talking about the fine option of whether you impose the two-cent tax on cigarettes or five per cent additional tax on liquor. I am not talking in those terms. I am talking in terms of the broad question, which the Treasurer decided in his wisdom, that required this government (a) to have a balanced budget; (b) not to borrow on the capital markets during the forthcoming period of time, and (c) to restrain the expenditure programme.

If I could just emphasize that point, I will come back to it later. I think that we have a role to play in the consideration of the opinions available to government, to debate with them, for whatever advantage the government may derive from those comments which we make. Otherwise, we abdicate to the technocrats of The Department of the Treasurer, and I do not think that that is our role.

I think that somewhere or other there are four other aspects to it. There is a choice to be made among the options—that is the role of government, obviously. I think there is a preparation of the plans which are to be made by the department. I think there is an area and a time during which those plans are being prepared during which they could well be subject to debate in the Legislature.

I think the debate in the Legislature could well precede the actual discussion and final adoption by the government of any particular plan. And again, of course, there is a role which we have to play in the control of the implementation of any plan.

I simply put those forward because otherwise as the government is required, by the force of planning in the province of Ontario, to project many years ahead. The projections will be made and the decisions will be made and our role here will be seriously affected if we do not have an opportunity to participate at some point in the formulation of those long-range plans.

Well, those, Mr. Chairman, are what I would say are my preliminary remarks, not related specifically and directly to the Treasurer, but of general application to the role which we on this side of the House can usefully play and must usefully play in the course of the revision and revamping of the procedures of the assembly, which I hope will take place in not too distant time.

Now, turning directly to the Treasurer's estimates, strangely enough I feel compelled to congratulate the Treasurer on the Budget. I enjoyed the presentation of the Budget. Within the limits in which the Conservative Party operates in viewing the problems of the province, I think it was the best solution which could be found to the problems with which the Treasurer was faced.

I am not suggesting for a moment that we agree either with the quality of the decisions or the programmes which have been curtailed or cut. We have not, as yet, been able to discover all the ones which have been curtailed or cut. But I think I would be remiss in opening these remarks without conveying a sense of gratitude to the Treasurer for a lucid statement of what the government's position is on the present budget and certainly, the rudimentary parts, in any event, of the massive work which will have to be done in order to implement the taxation reform programme which the government outlined, when he read the second paper to the budget.

The matters that I would now like to deal with are specifically related to his department and perhaps the Treasurer would make a note of them. We can pick them up at whatever point appears useful. The programming, planning and budgeting system, which has become so much part of the rhetoric of government administration, causes me some concern when I see it in the way in which it has been translated into the estimates this year.

I had expected that there would have been a very substantial difference in the presentation of the estimates this year over the estimates of prior years. But when you actually analyze them, there has been a re-ordering of the Treasurer's department in terms of the internal re-organization which he outlined a few minutes ago. And there has been a short statement at the commencement of each vote stating what the programme of that particular branch of The Department of the Treasurer is. That, in substance, seems to be the Treasurer's conception of programming.

I do not, sir, think it is sufficient. I think it makes it again extremely difficult for us because when we look through them we find the same listings; salaries, travelling expenses, maintenance and then a few minor items such as, under the first vote, the grant to the St. John Ambulance, and similar items which are worth about a moment or two of comment and that is about all.

We do not really, either from the head note or from anything which the Treasurer has said, have any real understanding of just what this programme of the office of the Treasurer and the Minister of Economics and the office of the deputy Treasurer and the deputy Minister is.

We do not know whether it is one programme; whether there are many programmes that come under that heading and similarly, under the various other votes of the Treasurer's department. We do not know whether the so-called omnibus programme stated in a few lines at the top of the vote encompasses a large number of other programmes.

If I could turn again to that question of the salaries and of the travelling expenses, the maintenance and other similar repetitive items that run through the estimates; I simply ask the Treasurer how long it is going to be before we have an opportunity to have standard objects as they do in the estimates of the federal House.

It would seem to me that the time has passed when we need to add up all the items scattered through his estimates and the other estimates, to find out what is the total salary bill of the province; what is the total travelling in and out of the province; what is the total travelling expense; what is the maintenance in total that the province is charged with. We have made some preliminary calculations. I cannot vouch for their accuracy but I think they are probably reasonably accurate on this point.

We found in the preceding estimates that the salary account accounted for about 12.3 per cent of the ordinary expenditures. We found that the travel expenses accounted for about 1.3 per cent and maintenance accounted for about 2.3 per cent. The salary figure was $336 million; the travelling expense figure was $35 million to $36 million; the maintenance figure, $64 million. In the course of this, we found that certain salaries in highways and public works are charged against capital account and not against ordinary account. We do not particularly know why. But the totals for those three items—salaries, travel and maintenance—while they may be quite reasonable, it seems to us should be comprised in the standard objects compilation which would be available with the estimates, separate and distinct from the estimate book itself.

The maintenance heading, necessarily from our point of view to the extent that we have a remnant of purpose in scrutinizing the expenditures, should be broken down. Again, I suggest the method by which the federal parliament breaks down the items which come under maintenance.

Instead of having the one omnibus heading, they break down, as I see it, maintenance into travelling and removal expenses, freight, express and cartage, postage, telephones and telegrams, publications, films, exhibits and advertising, office stationery supplies, equipment and furnishings, materials and supplies, acquisition of equipment, repairs and upkeep of equipment. At least a presentation of maintenance broken down, perhaps not into those precise headings or necessarily into that number of headings, would be much more informative as far as our consideration of the estimates goes.

The next matter that I would like to deal with in the form of the estimates as they have been presented to us, is that we have asked and the public accounts committee has for a number of years requested, that there be the insertion in the estimates of the separate columns showing the comparable figure for the preceding fiscal year of the government. I do not know what the problem is in providing at least the column matching the figures to the extent that it is possible to do so, bearing in mind that there is a certain transition going on by the government in the presentation of the estimates which may not make it possible to match all figures.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Especially when they change the format.

Mr. J. Renwick Particularly when they change the format. I think that some work could be devoted to that and I hope that this is the last year that we will have to fumble through a second book in order to correlate what is happening in one year compared with the preceding year.

Then in the public accounts report—I might say, Mr. Chairman, that that particular remark has been in the public accounts report for some time. I happen to have the June 13, 1967, report of the standing committee on public accounts. Item three on page two is that question of providing the information about the preceding year.

Item two has this, and I think I will read it because this is confusing for us. Again, I do not know why the estimates are not presented in the method suggested in the public accounts report.

In the development of a new format for the estimates we urge a consistent and standard treatment of reimbursement of expenditures.

Recommendation 10 of the 1966 report of the public accounts committee and the provincial auditors' report for 1965-66 both recommend that consideration be given to standardizing the voting of funds for programmes for which reimbursements are available.

Funds could be voted on a gross basis and recovery shown as revenue until the end of the fiscal year, and then transferred as reimbursements of expenditure to the related vote and item. This should standardize the presentation in the estimates, the public accounts, and eliminate the need for Treasury board orders for temporary finance.

I would like the Treasurer's comments as to why it is not possible to implement that recommendation of the standing committee on public accounts. I have not checked the other particular recommendations; those are ones which came to my mind as I looked at the new estimate book.

The member for Kitchener (Mr. Breithaupt), has spoken about PIP and I am going to constrain my remarks into very brief compass. I do not think there is any validity (as a study of the proceedings of the Glassco report on the federal government study of administration) in the proposition that, in some way or other, a Royal commission would grind to a halt the implementation of recommendations until the committee had reported.

The Glassco report very clearly shows that during the course of their meetings and discussions with the civil servants of the federal government many improvements were implemented as they went along. Many recommendations which the commission knew they were going to make were put in train during the course of that work. The commission also, on many occasions, sat in public session so that interested parties could attend before the commission and listen to what was going on.

I find it surprising that when the report was finally issued two years after the commission was appointed, the report would say that they anticipated savings to the federal government in administration running into the tens of millions of dollars, and to think, on the other hand, in this government on a much smaller scale, it would not be possible by a properly constituted commission to save many dollars in the administration costs of this government.

I do not think that is a criticism of the party that happens to be in power, I think it is something that just happens to government as their administration grows.

In this time of stringency and curtailment of programmes, we have seen that the very act of spinning off the revenue branch into a separate department has already, under Parkinson's law, created additional expense to the government. It would seem to me that this must of necessity happen time and time again as the government activities have expanded over the last quarter of a century.

Yet the Minister persists, when he makes his statement in the House, that he is going to invite persons from the management consulting firms downtown to meet to form a steering committee, as I understand it, with, I am quoting from page 1390 of Hansard.

Our productivity improvement project will be directed by a senior steering committee, composed of a combination of outstanding leaders from the private sector of the Ontario economy and senior public servants. I believe this co-ordination of internal and external expertise offers significant advantages over a Royal commission or a completely independent review.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: That does not embody the use of consultants does it?

Mr. J. Renwick: Oh, Mr. Chairman, I stand corrected. It is at the next level under the various projects that the management consultants will be used under the project.

I am simply asking, Mr. Chairman, if the Treasurer would reconsider constituting, in a rather more formal way, the steering committee to provide some method by which the public can be involved in what is going on, and some understanding can be gained of the immensity and complexity of the administrative procedures of the government, and the methods by which economies can be fashioned, rather than to have it done in the way in which the Treasurer appears to want to have it done; that is by more or less a closed operation in a way in which we have no indication that there will be reports or interim reports, or a final report, tabled in this House, or made available publicly—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Except you have my word for it, my statement.

Mr. J. Renwick: Well, all right, but you may not be around at that time.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Somebody else will.

Mr. J. Renwick: Yes, somebody else may be. The point I want to make is the involvement of people and their opportunity to know that there is such a commission; what its terms of reference are; where its hearings will be held so that those people who are interested can come and at least listen to the proceedings of the commission as it conducts its inquiry.

We got the impression that in some way or other the Treasurer decided that this should be an in-government operation, and that as all in-government operations under the system that this government operates there is a substantial cloak of secrecy as to the information which is available and as to the proceedings which have taken place. I do not think that this particular project will satisfy, in our minds, the purpose which the Treasurer wants it to satisfy, unless he is prepared to formalize it to some extent in order to provide a forum in which the public can have some participation and gain some knowledge of the government's operations.

I would ask the Treasurer if he is in a position during the course of these estimates to name the members of the steering committee, or could he give us some indication when he anticipates that he will be in a position to name the members of the steering committee; when this project will get off the ground; and will he elaborate on his prepared statement as to the extent to which the public will be able to come and view the proceedings of the steering committee, and view the proceedings of the various projects when they are under study to the extent that it involves the questioning of the civil service of the province of Ontario.

I think it is a most important point on which the Treasurer should comment during his estimates. I think it would be also worth his while to comment as to what the anticipated costs will be. It may be that it is provided in these estimates, but I could not find it. Perhaps he would indicate whether it is provided in the estimates and what the estimate is if it is not provided in the estimates.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I mentioned it in the statement, you will see it there—

Mr. J. Renwick: You mentioned it in the statement? Is it in the estimates?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: There is provision in the estimates.

Mr. J. Renwick: Provision in the estimates for it? Well, at the point when we reach that particular provision, perhaps the Treasurer would comment again about it.

The next matter, Mr. Chairman, that I want to speak about is the question of the task force which advised the government in the preparation of its Budget. On page 7 of his Budget statement the Treasurer referred to the task force in The Department of Treasury and Economics which worked particularly closely with the staffs of The Departments of Revenue and Municipal Affairs.

This task force delineated the Smith and select committee's recommendations in terms of their implications for provincial-municipal financial operations. The task force then provided a comprehensive range of policy for review by the government.

I want to ask the Treasurer if he will make available to us, either in printed form or in his comments on these estimates, a statement of the comprehensive range of policy options which were submitted by the task force? The reason, of course, is that I happen to believe that there are always alternatives, that all problems are not simply technical problems. That there are in fact, alternatives.

The government had to direct its attention to them and they had, from the civil service, this comprehensive range of policy options. I would ask that the Minister would make that statement available to us.

Similarly, on the question of programme priorities: Throughout the Budget statement the Treasurer stated that he had to curtail severely many programmes and that new programmes were not launched and that in other programmes in which improvements had been envisaged, the improvements could not be carried on.

Again on page 16 of his Budget, we have this statement "that these targets", referring to the targets of efficiency improvement in the government, "were based on a system of priority rankings for the whole range of government programmes".

I would like to have a statement from the Treasurer either in printed form or in his comments of how many programmes are there in which the government has a priority? I cannot tell whether or not the method of classification is the rather rudimentary classification system set out in the new form of the estimates, or whether, in fact, it is a detailed programme by programme priority statement.

I think it is most important that we, on this side of the House, have available to us the priority decisions of the government, without having the dig through each specific programme in each of the estimates as we go through to find out whether or not this is a programme which has been curtailed, whether this is a programme where the improvements have not been carried out or where a decision has been made not to expand the programme.

It would facilitate the work of the committee, Mr. Chairman, if those priorities were available. I can see that the Treasurer does not accept that with any great degree of acquiescence.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Not with a great degree of enthusiasm.

Mr. J. Renwick: No. Perhaps I could just emphasize the point, if he has not got it. What we have to do is to comment upon, in the course of these estimates, the programmes of the government. This is the programming, planning, budgeting system that you have instituted. Now are we supposed to engage in the activity of finding out which programmes have been cut back, which programme has not had improvements made in it. Is this what we are to do, or are you going to facilitate it by making available to us the priorities that you have allocated for the government programmes?

Mr. Chairman, that in substance, until the Treasurer comments or until others participate, are the remarks that I want to make on the opening of these estimates. I have tried to itemize for the Treasurer the kind of information that we want from him on these estimates. I have tried to indicate to him the specific concerns we have about the structure and functioning of this committee.

I have expressed to him the concern which we have had about the form of the estimates and the various simple matters which have been referred to on previous occasions, which would do so much to facilitate our study of the estimates of every department. I have dealt with PIP. I have dealt with the request we make for the task force statement of the comprehensive range of options which were available to the government in making its budgetary presentation. I have asked for, specifically, the listing of the priorities of the programmes of the government and those that have been curtailed, those which have not been implemented and those where improvements have not been made in them. I leave it now to the Treasurer or for the other members of the House to comment.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I will do my best to deal with these questions as they come to the related vote and items. If I forget to comment on them at the right time, I am sure the hon. member for Riverdale will remind me.

I think it would be preferable if we proceed in order of the votes as outlined in the estimates and do it in that manner.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 2401; it has a number of similar items. Perhaps we should deal with that one, item by item.

On vote 2401:

Item 1 agreed to. On item 2:

Mr. Breithaupt: Mr. Chairman, I am wondering if the Treasurer can give us the reason for the substantial salary increase, between the two years, from some $34,500 under general administration at least to $117,000. Perhaps at the same time, he might wish to give us the increase in the travelling expense amount projected from the $2,000 to $10,000 in item 2 of that vote?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I am having a little difficulty relating the figures proposed by the hon. member. I see clearly the $117,000 and I see the travelling expense item of $10,000, but I do not follow the other—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Are you referring to the previous year?

Mr. Breithaupt: 1968-69.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: 1968-69—$86,300 versus $117,000. Is that what you are making reference to?

Mr. Breithaupt: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The salaries pay a staff of five in the Minister's office—which supplies an executive assistant, a driver, two secretaries and a clerk—and a staff of six in the deputy Minister's office—the deputy Minister, an executive assistant, an administrative assistant, two secretaries and a receptionist.

The complement has been increased there slightly and I would think the balance is made up largely because of negotiated salary increases during the period.

Item 2 agreed to. On item 3:

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, perhaps this would be a useful point for the Treasurer to comment on the question of standard objects—the salaries, travelling expenses, maintenance; whether or not the government does intend to change the form of the estimates to provide the standard objects information. If so, when?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes. The question is quite an appropriate one. I was interested in a reference to salaries in one department charged to highways and another to capital, for instance. I am prepared to pursue that; I cannot give you that answer but this is something that can be pursued. I propose to talk also, when we come to the estimates of the Treasury board, on the programming-planning-budgeting system and attempt to bring that situation up to date one more year.

I will just take this much time, because it was the lead-off item that the hon. member referred to, to say that we realize that these estimates are not in programme-planning-budgeting form yet. There is no question about this. You are quite right. It is a refinement over the former process but it is far from complete. I will go into more detail on that later if I may.

Mr. J. Renwick: If that is a more appropriate place.

Mr. Sopha: Can I ask a question of the Treasurer through you? Does this provide for the expenditure for the administration of his office?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: My office?

Mr. Sopha: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes.

Mr. Sopha: May I ask, very courteously, how many offices do you have?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I have one office.

Mr. Sopha: You get along with the office across in the Frost building? Do you?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes.

Mr. Sopha: And you have none in this building?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, that is right, Mr. Chairman. I am close enough at the Frost building. Some of the other Ministers are not.

Mr. Sopha: That is interesting.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I have a short three-minute walk. I think it—

Mr. Sopha: Have you actually measured the distance that you are? Would you say you are any farther than a three-minute walk? Are you any farther than the Minister of Social and Family Services (Mr. Yaremko)?

Mr. Chairman: I would just suggest to the hon. member that—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): That comes under the athletic commission—

Mr. Sopha: Labour?

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): All I have got is a hole in the ground.

Mr. Sopha: Lands and Forests?

Mr. Chairman: Order, please!

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I have one office.

On item 4:

Mr. Sopha: Do you have an executive assistant?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes.

Mr. Sopha: How many do you have?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: One.

Mr. Sopha: Now your executive assistant, he does not have an executive assistant?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Not yet.

Mr. Sopha: Does he have an office?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Who, the executive assistant?

Mr. Sopha: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, of course.

Mr. Sopha: Could you give us an idea of the size of office your executive assistant has?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Oh, just a cubicle.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I suppose these are appropriate questions, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sopha: I have no doubt they are.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: —if the hon. member wants to pursue this course. I am not much good at measurement by the eye, but I would think the executive assistant of the Treasurer occupies an office approximately 14 x 15, 12 x 14, something on that order. Functional, comfortable.

Mr. Sopha: What sort of rug in his office? Is there a broadloom rug?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I should say the same rug as everyone else uses.

Mr. Sopha: It has a rug?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Oh, yes.

Mr. Sopha: May I ask, what kind of a staff has he got, the executive assistant? What kind of secretarial staff has he got?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: He has a secretary, one secretary.

Mr. Sopha: Now, how many other people are employed in the Treasurer's office in the way of providing administrative assistance to him other than the executive assistant?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The Minister's secretary, the executive assistant and the executive assistant's secretary would comprise the Minister's staff. The deputy Minister occupies space in the same office complex, and his office is also in the same office complex.

Mr. Sopha: I see. I have just one further question. Does the deputy Minister have an executive assistant?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, sir. There is complement for one, but he has not been hired yet.

Mr. Sopha: Pardon?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: There is complement for him, but there is nobody occupying the job.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, they have not actually hired one?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No.

Mr. Sopha: Well, has an office been set aside for him?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, we will have to find space for him when he arrives.

Mr. Sopha: And without asking, I ask rhetorically, he, of course, will have a rug on the floor.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can answer that question. Let me say that the offices that have rugs on the floor in the Minister's complex have now all been occupied. So, whether there will be a rug on that floor or not I cannot say, because at the moment I do not think we know where he is going to be located.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I want to make sure everybody is housed, you see.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We are making out.

Mr. Sopha: Because the housing I have to put up with as we start to engage in—what is it, $2,996,000,000? Is that in the ball park?—

Mr. Chairman: The member for Sudbury is out of order.

Mr. Sopha: As we start off on this journey which will take us to May or June or July, I want the satisfaction of knowing that everybody in the most modest positions of the civil service are adequately housed and that they have necessary staff to help them. Because I want the people of Ontario to know—no sense of beating the chest like Job of old—that the accommodation I have to put up with, as I embark on this responsible task, is a far cry from that which is either adequate or dignified.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Ask him if the executive secretary is here every day.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Sopha: Have you got an executive assistant?

Mr. Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. MacDonald: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I wonder if I could, through you, ask the Provincial Treasurer at this point whether or not other copies of these regional development studies are available, and whether or not it is possible to postpone the consideration of regional development until the last item in the estimates, so that people who come from various parts of the province might have an opportunity to first get a copy and have a look at it. I think the only way in which we are going to rescue the Minister's tabling of them on the eve of his estimates from being, in effect, a road blocking effort to dealing with them this year, is that we get copies and that we postpone this estimate until the end of the department.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I would say to the hon. member that I have not seen the contents of those reports on the table here myself yet. We have not had them.

Mr. MacDonald: Could the Minister tell me why he has not seen them himself, when some of them are dated November?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, I have not seen them, and some of them have not been around more than a very few days. Now, I have a fair pile of prescribed reading for me. I thought it would be a sensible thing if I could have them all at once and get them all read in the same context. I might say that there is no attempt to cut off Opposition comment on these reports. If there had been, they would not have been tabled.

Mr. MacDonald: Can we have a set or two here so that they can be distributed?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: They are tabled now to give you and others an opportunity to make comment on them. I would say that there have been no conclusions developed with respect to these reports as far as final policy is concerned at all. In other words, I would welcome any comment that anybody cares to make on them, before the final policy is decided.
