MILITARY ORDERS

HISPANIC NOTES

A Brief Account of the Military Orders in Spain

THE intention of this little book is to supply for persons of taste and cultivation, who may be travelling in Spain or reading Spanish books, a brief account of the foundation and fall of the three great Orders: Calatrava, Alcántara and Santiago. Montesa is included, chiefly for the sake of symmetry, though the history and the figures that move through it belong exclusively to the east coast. The others, however, are so essentially Castilian, and so many of the great names in Spanish story stand on the roll of Masters, that a word about them cannot come amiss. In passing through the courts of Seville the tourist hears a vague murmur of the cruel death of the Master D. Fadrique: in approaching Granada the Romance rings in his ears:

Ah, God, what a good knight was the Master of Calatrava!

Old tradition

Los Caballeros de la Cruz

Uclés and Calatrava lie far from the travelled roads even of those who go in motors, but the Bridge of Alcántara and S. Mark's Hospital at Leon are depicted in every colour-book: and the red cross of Calatrava and the white mantle of Santiago figure in the portraits of every town gallery and great house. The passer-by knows a vague sense of something impalpable but not quite perished; he is faintly aware as of a faded glory, and of the dust of crumbling honour worn with age but still clean. What is it that they mean? the imagination insists and will not be appeased: what is this fragrance of dead leaves, this light of suns long set, that lingers still in the hush of the ambient air?

To explain that, is the present intention: to relate, and a little to interpret.

A mutual chivalry

Some have said that the Arabs organized, very early, a kind of wild chivalry, and had certain knights called rabitos, or frontiersmen, who were bound together by mutual vows and a common austerity of life, and who kept the outposts of Islam with sleepless ward. This may be. It is hard to say where first the use obtained. In the interchange of perpetual warfare between noble enemies customs and usage must have grown much alike, in Syria or Egypt, in Sicily or Spain, and the florid Berbers and the dark Iberians have imitated each other as well as emulated. There were almogavares in the Pyrenees and assassins in the Lebanon. Wherever the intermittent but endless war went on, it moulded men's observance and tempered their spirits, by a like process, to a like ideal. Through long lifetimes, through generations and centuries, the conflict continued and resumed, necessary to man's life as food and fire, refining in its emotion, its issues, its sanctions, as the love of lovers and the bitterness of martyrs. Overpopulation, we are told, and the want of raw materials, produce the convulsions of history—a high birth-rate and the law of diminishing returns. The outcome is not always alike, however: the same pressure may have flung forth the Huns and the Normans, but the consequences in Europe were different: and where one age has been involved in a World War, on another had burst the glory of the Crusades. Brotherhood in vows was familiar to the age; equality of opportunity awaited the self-dedicated, in the cloister or in the front of battle; the tie of danger not only shared but sought together, the thirst of self-devotion slaked at a common cup, the ecstasy of immolation for God's glory and the world's ransom—all these were ordinary experience from the tenth century to the thirteenth, and that not in Europe only, but on the northern shore of Africa and in the western lands of Asia and among the islands of the midland sea.

"A terrible and splendid trust"

“ . . . And conquest is dragged captive through the deep ”

As there were many pilgrimages, so there were many crusades—Ferdinand the Saint spoke well when he replied in this sense to S. Louis of France, who was his mother's sister's son. In Spain there was always a crusade. It is possible and even likely that the model of the Templars, and of the Knights of S. John and of the Holy Sepulchre, gave rise immediately to the great Spanish Orders, but these three, of Calatrava, of Alcántara, and of S. James of the Sword, are only the strongest, the surviving, among many that sprang up. In the eastern parts, particularly, the Palestinian orders were established early: D. Alfonso el Batallador, dying without heirs in 1134, left the kingdom of Aragon to "the Holy Houses and Soldiery of the Sepulchre of the Hospital, and of the Temple of Jerusalem." True, the Cortes repudiated his will and elected D. Ramiro el Rey Monje, but already in his lifetime he had given over to the Templars his palace at Sangüesa, and by 1146 the same order was established at Puente la Reyna. The Templars did nobly in Spain. Their earliest house was at Monzón where the wreck of their castle still crumbles above the hill-climbing town. When they were and act,

ruined, by the determination and power of the King of France and a French Pope his creature, their wealth in Spain was saved in part and assigned for the foundation of other Orders.

Hospital

The Order of S. John of Jerusalem has a like story and one almost contemporary. The King D. Peter the Catholic of Aragon loved the Order well, and was buried at Sijena in the Convent of Comendadores de S. Juan de Jerusalem, where he had been armed a knight: Cervera was another double monastery of the Hospital ruled by the Comendadora: in 1806 the good Villanueva could still trace the ruins of a circular church there. But all the while there were other orders springing up under the shadow of these: perhaps the earliest that of the freyles or Knightly Brethren of the Palms who assisted Alfonso el Batallador in 1110, their master being called D. García Sánchez. The learned and loyal historian, Pedro Abarca, would see in these the Order of Santiago, present in the world and doing God's service sixty-five years before any Bull endorses them:

it can hardly be so. Already, in his turn, Briz Martínez had said that Aragonese knights before going to war went up to S. Juan de la Peña and called themselves Knights of S. John, and that they were installed in Monreal, the brown hill that rears above the river Aragon, between Tiermas and Pampeluna. Briz Martínez was abbot of S. Juan de la Peña and knew the archives there; he is likely to have known the truth.

of the Rock

At the conquest of Daroca there was a Milicia called after S. Saviour: at Teruel was one called after the Redeemer,* joined to the Temple in 1296. At a meeting of prelates in Gerona, called by Ramiro IV and presided over by the Cardinal-legate Guido, on the 27th of November, 1143, the King created a new order of soldiery to fight against the Moors in imitation of that of the Temple, and subject to the Master of that. The short-lived Order of Monte Gaudio* passed from the west to the east and back again. But all these Aragonese orders—and more are known, and others, doubtless, there were, now unknown —either died out or were gathered in by the Temple or the Hospital. Only that of Calatrava was too deeply rooted and too well sustained. Turning from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic shore, the same process appears. So, far in the west, the Order of Evora* was organized in 1147; and that of Alcántara was anticipated and then being established was supported in its turn: and a donation of Alfonso IX gave five towns in 1195 to the Order of Trujillo.*

Calatrava was a frontier-post, a castle in the south. The Templars had thrown it up, as too hard to hold; the King had proffered it to any taker; two white monks of Fitero had accepted: a cowled Cistercian, Frey Raimundo Sierra, ecclesiastic to the marrow, and Frey Diego Velázquez, an old soldier who had looked to end his days inside a cloister, dozing in the sun, drowsing under the psalms.

The Order of Calatrava

The foundation of the Order of Calatrava was on this wise:

Alfonso VI took Toledo in 1072. El que ganó Toledo: that is how the chronicles name the amazing old king of the many monasteries, the many wives, the many conquests. But though he recovered Toledo, Calatrava la Vieja was for seventy-two years more in the power of the Hagenes. In 1147 Alfonso VII took but could not keep Cordova, so he returned to Toledo and thence besieged Calatrava and stormed it. He gave the chief mosque to the Chapter and Archbishop of Toledo, who put in ten clerks (what with priests, deacons and other clergy) and he gave the stronghold to the Master and Knights Brethren of the Temple, who for eight years kept it at a great expenditure of goods and men. Then when the Emperor was dead and the realm was divided and the Moors were raising an immense army, even over-sea, the Master resigned it to Sancho the Desired in Toledo. The King offered it to anyone that dared the adventure. No one appeared. The abbot of Fitero, D. Raimundo, was at the court with one of his Cistercian monks, a knight who had been reared at the court of Alfonso the Emperor: the king told him the situation and he volunteered, the abbot assenting. It must have seemed a short cut to martyrdom. The donation was signed in Almazán: the gift being made to God and the Blessed Virgin Mary and the Congregation of Cîteaux and the abbot Raimundo and his freyles.— The date is Era 1196: the boundaries begin at Las Navas de Tolosa and end in the Sierra de Orgaz, including a region about twenty-eight leagues long and as many wide, comprising a good bit of the Sierra Morena.

In after years, when the other Orders were in existence, and Santiago was established at Uclés, and Calatrava claimed the obedience of Alcántara, the spheres of influence were not easy to define, but, roughly speaking, the domain of Calatrava reached from the Mountains of Toledo to the Sierra Nevada and included, with La Mancha, the upper waters of the Guadiana and the Guadalquivir. Though a Castilian foundation, its power looked eastward, on the whole: the first two Masters were Navarrese and the third was of Aragon.

It is curious, but certainly true, that while Calatrava had more power Santiago had more glory: the lesser orders were ranged under the former but the greatest and most romantic figures belong in the latter. Something of this may be due to the difference in the original organization: Santiago was a brotherhood of gentlemen; Calatrava started as another monkish association, with a Rule and a Habit. Dress, food and behaviour were strictly prescribed and monastic celibacy enforced for those that fought as well as those that prayed.

Calatrava's power, Santiago's glory

The abbot, seeing that the boundaries of the city of Calatrava were great and the land fertile and little peopled, set out to look for a folk: he went back to Fitero and fetched thence monks, leaving the old and the sick behind, and fetched also sheep and cattle and other movable wealth, and twenty thousand men to people and defend it all: Archbishop Roderick says that he talked with men who had seen them. In addition, the Archbishop D.

John of Toledo had ordered public preaching and given great pardons to all that went to defend Calatrava by their persons, or gave arms or horse wherewith to buy what was needed to defend the place. They had there, then, the three things necessary: tenantry, soldiery and clerks. The incorporation with the Congregation of Cîteaux was effected only in 1187: that it was ever done is surprising, but you would never guess from the Histories that King or Archbishop had occasion or impulse for opposition.

facts

Yet Abbot Raymond, when he came back from Barcelona, governed the Order with no superior spiritual or temporal but the Roman Pontiff and the Chapter-General of Cîteaux. Thereafter, the power was divided between the Master and the Prior of the Convent of Calatrava; long after the Orders were brought into subjection by the Catholic Kings they could claim and did use the following tokens and symbols of this high place:

The Prior is cura general of all persons of the Order: uses Mitre and Pastoral

Staff, and other pontifical insignia and can give, like a Bishop, solemn Benediction after Mass, Vespers or Matins: he can confer minor orders on the conventuals, and consecrate ornaments and vases for the use of the church, and can reconcile them if they are polluted or violated.

The Master has all the spiritual and temporal power possible without orders, the Prior having the rest. He receives professions and gives the habit, administers or assigns the benefices and does all that in other orders the abbots do: and for three hundred and twenty-three years the Order was governed by Masters, from the sixth year after its institution to 1487. Five other dignities there were in addition, and these are the officers that filled them:

1. Comendador Mayor, who held the chief place after the Master and ruled the richest and most powerful encomienda—Commandery is the English word in the case of the Templars.

2. Clavero or Keeper of the Keys: through many a hard battle the Clavero of Calatrava carried the wrath of God.

The Dignities

3. The Prior, and

4. The Sacrist, whose business was that of the treasurer in cathedrals: the office drew its income from the city of La Calzada.

5. The Obrero who probably was responsible for the fortifications and munitions as well as the sustenance of the Order: it was a heavy stewardship.

A list of the Commanderies of the Order shows about a hundred and forty places.

The Bull of Alexander III was given at Siena in 1167 in the time of the first Master, D. Frey Garcia, a Navarrese. Food and dress were to be as Abbot Raymond ordained: linen might not be worn except as underclothing, but leather garments and furred cloaks were permitted, and the monastic habit was altered to suit riding and fighting, though it included a hooded scapular until in 1397 Benedict XIII disallowed it. A white cloak was worn, with a red cross cut in lilies. The Rule required them to sleep dressed and girt, like frontier soldiers, and allowed "no superfluity or curiosity in any of the dress" that they wore. It required them, like other Religious, to keep silence in the Oratory, the Refectory, the Dormitory and the Kitchen, but the diet was modified and their fasting was like that of the converse or lay brother among Cistercians. The prescription of silence at table seems to have been especially stringent: except for the cheerlessness of this, it looks to be a good rule of life.

The

The Rule

There were always, besides the knights, priests in orders, and lesser clerics, for the Offices, the sacraments, and the sick. The Master, though under vows, was, of course, a layman, and after the first Master was elected, or the second, the original monks of Fitero so resented obedience to a secular, that they were finally removed to S. Pedro de Gumiel. I know nothing of similar trouble thereafter. The Master was elected by the Order in chapter assembled: kings often tried to dictate the choice and sometimes succeeded.

The first master was D. Frey Garcia, a Navarrese, as said: in his time the Papal

The first Master

Bull was obtained and apparently the Cistercian authority acknowledged. He was an important figure in a troubled time, when Alfonso VIII was still a baby and the feuds of Castro and Lara were laying the land waste. A shadowy and ghostly image in the rule of successive Masters, he is barely discernible as late as 1178: at any rate he fought the Moors many times.

D. Frey Fernando Escaza was his successor, and assisted at the siege of Zorita. Now the tale of the Siege of Zorita is a tract, and admirably edifying when Rades y Andrada relates it, who knows well how to adorn a moral. When Lope de Vega in his turn gives an act or two to the great castle, wherein the seneschal is noble-hearted, the traitor ingeniously false, and the barber deftly villainous, he supplies better reading than The Troublesome Raigne of King John. But the whole story is too rich to be put off into a paragraph here, and the ruined castle and church, whereon Torres Campos y Balbas has published most excellent matter, are too splendid to be overlooked, and Zorita de los Canes must be left apart for a more convenient season. Five years later the King gave Zorita to the Order to defend it from the Moors, that were too close by far.

Cuenca indeed was seemingly founded by the Moors, for Romans and Visigoths name it not, and like Burgos it begins existence within the Reconquest. The beautiful cathedral bears marks of English invention and handiwork, in conception and adornment, and enshrines the memory of the loveliest of English queens in Castile, Doña Leonor. All the tierra de Cuenca is dotted with commanderies of the Orders, from Ocaña to Cañete and from Requena to Albarracín. Though the story of Albarracín is as good as that of Zorita, and prettier, it is less momentous for the Order. And the exploits of D. Frey Fernando are not yet all told.

From Calatrava he raided the Moors by the Port of Muradal, that opens on the richest of the Andalusian plain, and took the Castle of Ferral: then as the knights were moving, with booty and prisoners, he let one prisoner loose to report his advance at Úbeda. But the Moors did not come to look for him. Later, however, those of Úbeda and Baeza gathered a great force, and besieged Ferral for ten days. He, being forewarned, had sent to Toledo for help, and to all the cities of his Order, and thrown himself into the threatened castle in time. There was a battle finally, about where that of Las Navas was later to be fought, and there many died on both sides. Returning to Calatrava victorious, he divided the spoil and gave the greater part to the Toledans in recompense for their good help, and the city had great rejoicing and the archbishop ordered thanksgiving in the cathedral and a procession. A set battle was a serious matter, and much of the warfare consisted rather in skilful raids enhanced by brilliant skirmishes: Argote de Molina copies out with quiet complacency the story of this Master's return from his latest exploit in which he captured many Moors who were going about the country, and came home driving—he and his freyles—plenty of fine cattle before them, and so entered into Calatrava rich and much honoured. Then, being very old, he resigned the Mastership, though he seems to have used the title to the close of his life. When that was, no one knows.

His successor was less thrifty but in the end no less successful: D. Martin Pérez de Siones of Tarazona. The town lies in Aragon. This may have accounted for some of his difficulties, but it brought advantage to the Order. Early in his administration there was a sort of mutiny: the Master was raiding Morería, both northward and southward, when the Moors captured the castle of Almodovar; he pursued them as soon as he could, captured more than two hundred, and killed every one. The knights were indignant, for these prisoners might have been sold and thus have paid the expenses of the war, or they might have been exchanged for Christian captives. Furthermore, the loot was not divided to their liking, and they wrote up to D. Diego García, still living at Calatrava, who suggested that they should depose the present Master. His motives were probably no more than spleen, and the irritability that comes with old age. One by one the knights got leave from Almodovar, on various pretexts, and coming up to Calatrava held an election, but the clerks took no part and sent word to the Master, and the trouble died away. To clear his character it should be added that the Moors when they took Almodovar had massacred seventy Christians and the retaliation was meant for a lesson, doubtless. Shortly afterwards he founded a hospital and Alfonso of Castile dowered it well; he went on a raid with the King of Aragon; he was present at the taking of Cuenca and won for the Order some important houses and other property. These later were exchanged for others with the Order of Santiago. In recognition of their great services the King of Aragon gave to Calatrava the city of Alcañiz, with the consent of the grandees; but apparently the inhabitants were not well content. At any rate, four years later it was bestowed again, this time on D. Martin Ruiz who called himself Master, with obligation to observe the king's pacts and truces with the Moors.

Alcañiz remained the High Commandery of Calatrava, in Aragon. Sometimes it recognized the mother convent, sometimes it set up for an independent order. What remains of architecture in the beautiful unvisited little town is mainly of the rich late Gothic and delicate Italianate styles that obtained likewise in the seats of the Order in the south, at Daimiel and Almagro. It fell to be an appanage of princes; but Bourbons, having no pride or part in the great inheritance to which they came, forgot it. It lies still forgotten among the hills.

Alcañiz

The next Master, being a Leonese of a great name, D. Nuño Pérez de Quiñones, was able to make advantageous adjustments with the Order of Santiago. Some of these have been named, and Ocaña was among the cities exchanged. He made likewise a pact of brotherhood (herman-

A chasuble of cramoisy taffetas, with its dalmatics, and with some panizos of gold and silver, of very ancient workmanship—these things were long preserved at the Convent of Calatrava. It was believed that they were made from the dress of a Moorish prisoner whom D. Frey Nuño captured in a raid and ultimately put to ransom. He had proved to be the brother of the Queen of Cordova: and for her sake the King, his kinsman, gave fifty Christians in exchange, of whom four were knights of Calatrava. In the perishing silken stuff so reverently preserved, in the fading broideries and the blackening silver and the tarnishing gold, lives the symbol of the exquisite civilization of the south, already passing. She was very beautiful, that woman, and very well beloved, as Itimad had been loved before her by the King who planted all the Sierra de Cordova with almond trees to make a snow for his love to pleasure her eyes. Mutámid was dead in exile long since, and pilgrims had kissed the dust from his tomb in Aghmat; the Berbers had sacked the cities and from Morocco Almoravides had ruled; the Almohades now reigned throughout Andalusia. Though ravished by the African, still Cordova was fair beyond comparison, musical with poets and fountains, fragrant with heavy flowers and pale women, rich in all the arts of life, and the subtilties of the doctors: Averroës was there.

The Cordova civilization

The memory of it, doubtless, was still fresh for these four red-crossed veterans on their return, sitting silent, in white, at the long table among their sunburnt mates, while under the heavy arched vault of brooding Romanesque stone-work the lector's voice rolled on in Latin as intelligible to them as their yet-hardly-altered Romance speech, and the strange shrill Arabic of the court-poets was hardly out of their ears—for instance, that couplet;

Defence of Christianity

It was this same Master who concluded the affiliation to Cîteaux, going to the Chapter-General in Burgundy, in 1187, and reporting what the knights of the Order were doing in defence of the Catholic faith, which meant, in truth, at the moment, European civilization. Gregory VIII was to confirm everything in due time.

The rising

The Moors were gathering a great army and he strengthened Calatrava and fortified other places. He had probably foreseen this and gone to Burgundy to urge the need of help, which Spain needed then as sorely as in Count Raymond's and Count Henry's days. The dark tide of invasion coming in across Calpe and Tarifa was mounting fast, the waves were coming nearer with every spring, and they washed back not so far. The great third wave broke in the battle of Alarcos.

It was a great defeat. The Masters of Santiago and Calatrava were there, but the Castilian nobles would not fight, for Alfonso their king had said that his knights of Estremadura were good enough to meet the Moors with. Characteristically, they preferred to die, and spent their lives to avenge themselves on the King. The Master of Santiago, a Gallegan, died there too: and the King came out of the fight with nothing but the bridle in his hand, says the historian of the Arabs. He wanted rather to die than go back to Toledo shamed, but his people pulled him out and forced him away. The Christians made a stand at a pass between La Zarzuela and Darazutan; they all were killed or taken. Those that fled got into the castle of Guadalherza—where the hospice was—with the Master escorting and defending the King; others got to Calatrava; others, among them the Counts of Haro and of Lara, shut themselves up in the castle of Alarcos, where the Moors laid siege and took it by storm. Some books, however, say that Lope de Haro fled, with the King's flag, to the castle of Alarcos, leaving his lord in the battle, and afterwards surrendered the castle to the Moors: and there are uglier stories yet of his breaking a solemn pledge and escaping after the surrender with his sons-in-law, leaving Fernán Ruiz de Castro to take all the consequences. At any rate the Moors took Calatrava also, and killed all the freyles there, and many other Christians.

The Castle of Calatrava

So the histories tell it, and, as Cervantes once said, the story is so old it must be true. It is a good story, both the tragedy and the sorry part. But the Primera Coronica General, the first complete history of Spain, which is the book of el Rey Sabio, does better. It incorporates some fragments of elder poetry, like carved capitals and corbels built into a house wall. This is epical: it is one of the cantilènes that French scholars used to postulate, though I think myself it is the remnant, and not the germ, of a great poetry.

The Battle of Alarcos

Then Mazemut in his triremes set sail from the African cove,
And his folk were beyond the telling, so great was the throng thereof, And like the sands of the seashore, as they crossed by the Straits of the South,

And reached the city of Seville, and brought to Cordova drouth.

For he set his face to Alarcos, his wrath on Toledo bent,

The plains of Tolosa were barren behind him, the ways that he went

He widened with track of horseshoes, the mountain gorges between,

And the streams ran dry—where the folk of his following passed—that were green.

The fame of their coming hurried more swift than the flight of a bird,

Scattered abroad through the country till every least village had heard.

The light-footed news waked fury; yet the sound of the message was joy,

The foeman's coming was welcomed as love by the heart of a boy.

What man knows God's intention, or the way of the Most High?

Nor any son of Adam His counsel may espy.

When the hosts were joined in battle, and Christians had lost the day,

The noble King Alfonso his own men forced away

The

a lost epic

And only the noble wisdom of his own folk in that hour Saved him from death or capture in midst of the battle's stour.
 And after the day was ended, and the battle lost and done
 The Moors took certain castles, and they held them, all that they won.
 Now this was Alarcos battle; in July they came to strive,
 In the year of Our Lord Incarnate eleven and ninety-five.

So the Moors came up and besieged Toledo and withdrew; and in the south, where all the work of half a century was to be done again, the Master fell to it. There was a little house at Ciruelos, where Abbot Raymond had ended his days and found burial: what was left of the Order he settled there, "and he gave the habit to many knights that, by God's providence, asked for it," as great hearts are always prompt for the hopeless enterprise.

Politicians are prompt, too, and those of Aragon snatched this moment to elect a

Moventa, hoping to get control of the whole machinery while shattered. Alcañiz, notwithstanding, remained, as said above, no more than encomienda mayor, the Master going up, in a lull about 1207, and adjusting matters. But there was little rest. The Master D. Nuño being past fighting now, he sent out the knights under D. Martin Martínez, and they took Salvatierra in the Campo de Calatrava and translated the convent thither; and four years later elected D. Martin with the title, Master of Salvatierra. Then the Moors besieged that castle for three months, and took it, and pulled it down, and the convent passed to Zorita, and again many candidates received the habit. It is likely that nearly any one will be received at such a time, if so that he be able-bodied, but applicants know that if it is a short road to nobility it is also a short cut to heaven, and at the cross-roads they stand, well-content.

In Toledo

The Archbishop of Toledo, D. Rodrigo Ximénez de Rada, went to Rome, and into France, preaching a crusade, urgently asking help, warning the princes of Europe of what would happen if Spain were overwhelmed. The princes of Europe were occupied, but they permitted what we should call "a drive" and "propaganda." Of volunteers there was no lack: the chance offered adventure, loot, and salvation, all at once. By February of 1212 Toledo was filling up with foreigners, chiefly French and Italian. The Four Gauls sent swarms of men—gentlemen and enthusiasts, ruffians and criminals, all classes and all kinds more or less in contact, all marked with the cross, visibly, on the shoulder. Queen Leonor drew from her father's continental domain, and the Archbishop of Bordeaux came in person: so also a mysterious D. Tybalt de Blazón, of Poitou, with his retainers, "who was a noble man and a liberal, a Spaniard born of Castilian lineage." He was a loyal gentleman, as will appear. Arnault of Narbonne brought thither his pack of war-dogs, still reeking with blood from Béziers and Carcasonne; and he never left the scent, and he lived to be abbot of Cîteaux, as D. Roderick recalls. The Lombard communes sent their quota and the Ghibelline cities, and Rome: Italia, to the Spanish chronicler, means either Lombardia or Roma—all these came "como en romería," to save their souls: all these are classed together, by the early historians, as outlanders. The throngs described by D. Roderick as "from beyond the Ports of Aspe," I take to be a great wave from the first epoch of the Albigensian persecution, part soldiery of the black-and-tan order, part refugees.

On the octave of Pentecost arrived King Peter of Aragon, coming by forced marches from Cuenca, anxiously expected and received with processions and with thanksgiving. Among the great lords of Aragon who accompanied him were the Archbishop of Tarragona,* and his brother-elect of Barcelona; Cardonas and Cerveras from Catalonia, others of the old rock with such names as D. Aznal Pardo. They were accommodated on the other shore of the Tagus, in the King's own domain there. Portuguese were there as well, though their King excused himself; D. Sancho of Navarre likewise had refused to participate but he could not endure, in the end, to stay away from where civilization was at stake and Spain was the issue, and he arrived in the south at a fortunate moment.

leader

King Alfonso had a hard winter. He had long been preparing in every way imaginable: he had asked his nobles to sacrifice the ornaments of their dress and turn the value into arms and equipment, according as each one lacked. In Toledo, as the foreigners came in, he saw to quartering them where they could be understood, and could not quarrel: he did not disdain to go about himself, nor shrink from sending the higher clergy to talk with them in their own languages and cheer them and content them, now with tact and again with gifts. The "morale" of the mustering at Toledo was superb, and it was the King's doing. He kept his temper, and his wits, well in hand, and went about like Holinshed's King Harry, and he gave whatever was needed, and he gave more, for "the history says that among his gifts were many noble horses of lineage, and stuffs of many sorts that gave delight with their lovely semblance." There was a fixed allowance for each knight, and for each foot-soldier, and, as one likes to remember, something also for women, and young lads, and those not fit to fight; and for them, later, a ration of food, and baggage wagons, and draught-animals and beasts of burden.

Morale

The Castilians were coming in now with the warm weather, great lords and private gentlemen and a contingent from each of the three communities of Castile: Segovia, Avila and Medina. The bishops were strictly Castilian: they represented Osma, Sigüenza, Palencia and Avila. All the orders had mustered: Ruiz Díaz, Master of

The Spanish array

Calatrava, with his Religious—brethren, good knights and God's friends, and hardy; the Templars under their Master Gómez Ruiz, the Hospital with the Prior Gutier Alviles, and with the Knights of Santiago the Master D. Pedro Árias. That these had sworn never to quit their religion, betrays how often and how easily men might end their lives in Morería as wealthy renegades. Diego López de Haro had gathered and organized the hosts of the northern shore: Biscayans, Asturians and even Gallegans he had under his command, and he seems to have ranked with the Kings.

battle of Armageddon

To Spaniards it was a solemn season, and they walked warily, needing to placate God; the lesson of Alarcos being yet present in mind. "From the great cities and the castles on every side, came gentlemen well arrayed at all points, with horse and arms in plenty, with harness and meat abundant for each man's self and his mount, which they shared each with his fellow, being used and disciplined to the custom of arms and the nobility of horsemanship. And humbly all came for the great házard of the faith and the law of Christ, constantly mindful and constrained by the greatness of what should be." So the chronicle.

"And about midsummer in this year set forward from Toledo to go down to battle, the host of the Lord God. In front went those from across the mountains, and Diego López de Haro was appointed them for a leader." This was a measure of simple precaution on the King's part: he dared not leave them out of sight. They took Malagón and killed all the Moors there, and apparently they wasted the land, for already the army was in straits, with a cruel shortage of food. The divers divisions moved by divers roads; Calatrava was appointed for a rendezvous. The Moors, it will be remembered, held that castle and had fortified it further. They had sown calthrops over the approaches and in the fords of the Guadiana; nevertheless, by God's help it was taken. The story is a good one as the Coronica General rehearses it, with the sense of God's mighty hand, and His stretched-out arm, still shadowing and exalting the style. The Arab King was so stricken by the loss of the castle that for wrath he could not eat or drink.

Of the spoil King Alfonso kept nothing. He divided it between the Aragonese and the outlanders, and what with quarrels, and the fatness of the present loot, the outlanders at this point went home again. It is shameful, but it befell. Arnaut of Narbonne and his ruffians of the south stayed there, scenting carrion beyond the Pass of Muradal; and D. Tybalt de Blazón and his own retainers stayed because he was a gentleman and a Spaniard. In all, out of the great host that had assembled at Toledo, and been fed there and dowered with gifts, and had pickings along the south-bound road, and had the loot of Calatrava, there remained but seven hundred and thirty knights of gentle blood, and such footmen as cared to abide or were feudatories of Spaniards.

if they can—for the truth is that D. Alfonso VIII did at Las Navas in 1212 what D. John of Austria did at Lepanto in 1571: he lifted the terror that lay upon men's spirits. It was three centuries and a half before the great wave gathered again. In another four centuries and a half thereafter, or something less, men were to shiver and shrink before the same terror, and the Asiatic multitudes to be in men's minds a mighty affright; and the Powers to-day are assembling machinery, and for arms they manufacture poisons. But our story lies with the Spanish host who moved to this battle as to an atonement.

As they reached Alarcos, Sancho of Navarre arrived, for "when came the day of battle and the danger, he could not withhold from God's service his hardihood nor his heart." The three Kings took counsel together in name of the Trinity: the case looked desperate and daily men were deserting to the Moors. The castle of El Farral was in the Moors' hands now, who planned to trap the army in the narrow pass and destroy it leisurely where rocks overhung and a stream filled up the gorge: but the Count of Haro with a vanguard took the ascent of the pass and the host followed him and took the castle. Thence looking into the valley of Las Navas they could see the red tent of the Moorish leader; it was—as they were to see later—of cramoisy velvet, embroidered richly with gold and sown with precious stones of inestimable value. And to them there God sent a shepherd who knew the hills, and he showed them a way. So they left the castle and the Moors came back, rather surprised: indeed one hoary general observed in the midst of their barbaric rejoicings that the array of the Christian host looked more like order of battle than like retreat. But the scarlet tent blazed in the sun and the sound of kettle-drums and nakirs came up to the Christians among the hills.

All Saturday they lay there, and Sunday, with only one skirmish when the Moors arrived to investigate, and found out, and withdrew. The army confessed and communicated and was ready and rather anxious to die, for it would have been a good death, and heaven, for once in a man's life, would have been sure. The King of Navarre knighted his nephew there, that day; and the Count of Roussillon, his son.

"A heaven taken by storm

Shortly after midnight the call was blown and the word was spread: "Arise all in God's name and arm for the battle of the Lord." The bagpipes screamed among the rocks and the olifaunts brayed as for the Day of Doom, and the Spanish host was drawn out. They lifted up their hands to heaven. They lifted up their hearts to martyrdom. The Count of Haro led the van: the King of Aragon and the four Orders constituted one wing and Ruy Díaz de los Cameros with his brother Álvaro Díaz, and other noblemen with them, the other wing, and the King of Navarre led these; and in the rear-guard were placed King Alfonso of Castile, and the Archbishop Don Roderick, the other bishops, and Spanish nobles, many of whose names are Gallegan or Asturian. And in each of these divisions were posted the commons of the noble cities, Segovia.

The roll-call of honour

Avila and Medina. Argote de Molina, writing in the sixteenth century, calls the roll of the army, made up from the traditions of the noble houses that fought there. All the history of Spain is in that roll-call of the sons of the great dead, and the ensamples of the good knights to come.

A rampart of live flesh

The Moorish host was a huge and horrible mass of many nations, sheer flesh and bone to dull steel's edge and encumber horses' passage. Their centre was upon a little eminence within an enclosure made of living bodies, linked leg to leg, and there the bravest fighting-men were stationed and the King among them. He was wrapped in the old black cloak of the Berber conqueror, his ancestor, and sword and Koran were with him in either hand. No wonder the slaughter was unlimited: row by row the turbans went down and men lay chained as they fell. The living rampart was impossible to scale: the men of Haro wavered and fell back. Then said the King aloud, to D. Rodrigo: "Archbishop, you and I will die here." And the young cleric answered: "Lord, trust God and we will do better than die." On the flag beating over their head was broidered the image of Mary, God's Mother, the Virgin, "Our Mother," as Spaniards yet call her in Zamora. The King tried to advance, but his nobles put him back. Then the King said again, and he never changed colour, nor did his voice alter: "You and I will die here, for in such a place death is good"; and the Archbishop answered again—"If God please, victory is yours and not death; but if otherwise seem good to God, we are ready to die with you and for you." Then the banner moved forward and the Moors broke. The Archbishop said: "Lord, remember God's mercy that he has done you this day," and again he said, "Lord, forget not your good knights and your noble folk by whose aid you have attained so great a glory;" and then he began to sing the Te Deum,

*Virgen

Te Deum

The Moorish King Almiramomelin fled on a great red horse: and when those of Baeza saw him at their gate and asked him what to do he said, "I have no counsel for myself nor for you," and changed horses and went on to Jaén.

Discipline

But on the field of Las Navas the work was finishing. Not unmindful of Calatrava, the Kings had ordered straitly that none should stop for looting, and the knights were busy still. D. Roderick notes with surprise that, though the dead were tall men and stout, no blood was seen upon the field. The wretched masses overthrown must have suffocated in heaps, been crushed and trampled, been clubbed and battered, and doubtless also been picked up as part of the spoil. The chronicler piles it up hastily: "There was much gold taken, much silver and many precious stuffs of silk, and many jewels and much money, and many vases and cups; and all this was taken by the foot-soldiers and by some knights of Aragon: for those who had zeal for the faith and love for Our Lord, and loved the Law and knew what shame is, stayed strictly at their proper business, to them victory was wealth and honour and glory: and withal they laboured till nightfall." The scarlet pavilion was taken home, however, into the north by King Peter of Aragon for a token, like that tent of Francis I, still preserved in the Armoury at Madrid: and the chains thereof were set about the shield of Navarre, and the banner from above it hangs still in the Convent of Las Huelgas de Burgos.

a chapel in

When night fell, the host sat down within the tents—"tired but happy," says the chronicler, as though they had but passed the day in woodcraft. They had taken not only camels but other beasts as well, and they supped full: and for firewood for all the army the broken lances and the arrows sufficed so long as they stayed there. The third day they moved.

When they took Baeza they burned the mosque and therein those who had taken refuge there; but when they came to Úbeda the citizens offered to pay a high ransom for their lives and city and the Kings would fain have accepted. The clergy would not admit it: they had not borne this war, they said, to leave in the midst of recovered and rechristened land a canker of heathendom which should spread till at last all the work should be to do again. Heathendom was to be made unprofitable, the city was to be razed and the inhabitants sold into slavery. It is the logic of Torquemada: Arnaut of Narbonne was stubborn and Roderick of Toledo had the Pope's orders and had to support him. So it was done. But the Archbishop was set sternly against looting: and when a great pestilence fell upon the land he saw God's judgement in it: "By luxuria and dishonesty with captive Mooresses," says Andrada bluntly.

So told
D. Rodrigo

The plague was terrible: so that one man could not give another water, not a vassal to his lord nor a friend to his friend. Here, in the chronicle, the curtain falls, with, for epilogue, processions in Toledo cathedral. Then every man gets home somehow to his own land.

This is official history, written indeed originally by one who was there, a great prelate, in God's confidence and the King's. It was augmented in time from the histories of family pride, of feats and honours. The roll of those who took part fills five pages in the huge folio of Argote de Molina: and the Orders are represented in a long line three generations deep, of Masters' sons, and Masters, and Masters who were to be, arranged by rank and family, Comendador and Alférez, Clavero and treze, and the Masters, and the Comendadores Mayores.

Other cities showed a banner on the field, besides the three of Segovia, Avila, and Medina: Toledo, Valladolid, Olmedo and Arévalo, are counted over: and again "into this battle went the Corporations of Madrid, Almazán, Atienza, S. Esteban de Gormaz, Ayllon, Cuenca, Huete and Alarcón." It was a sort of patent of ancient nobility: it was a certain warrant of old and fair renown. Argote, who is scrupulous according to his lights, depends with most confidence on Rades y Andrada, the historian of the Orders, but he cites also Zorita who composed the Annals of Aragon, and Esteban Garibay: and likewise a fine fellow Per Anton Beuther, the author of a Coronica General de toda España y del Reyno de Valencia. Amongst other matter this last supplies new names of those who came in the transpyrenean host: the Count of Foix, the lord of Montesquieu, and renowned families, Lunas and Rocabertis, lords of Castelnou and Castelroussillon.

William of Cabestany

Also there went that great lover, William of Cabestany. It was perhaps of this romería that he wrote one spring-time, when nightingales were crying by day and by night in the deep of the budding wood: and he said:

I will go to make my home
 In a strange country and far
 And his bitter envious tongue
 Shall give thanks I go to war:
 As a pilgrim I depart
 And desire will slay me soon—
 Though of Love's I have been none,
 Yet I serve you with my heart.

The record of Argote de Molina, like the Archbishop's, was composed for great folk, as a memorial of honours and of feats. He continues: "Because the King of Navarre broke the enclosure of chains (about the tent of Miramomelin) he took for arms the chains or in a field gules and in the midst an emerald which was among the spoils; and certain of the chains are still about his tomb in the church of Roncesvalles." Then the author turns to discussing whether or not, before this battle, King Alfonso had used for arms gules a castle or. It seems that such a shield is found on the seal upon donations to S. Domingo de la Calzada, dated 1187 and 1207. Certainly this day was an epoch from which men reckoned.

Another record exists, however, of the battle and the years that followed upon it, written by a humble and unknown clerk of Toledo. What the great overlooked he felt, and set down faithfully, and we know that his testimony is true.

The Toledan Annalist

Annals

The Toledan Annals, so-called—the brief record of things long past and then of memorable things in a man's own life-time—were known to Morales and to Berganza, and were published by Flórez in the eighteenth century, but few have cared to read the story that they relate. The beginning was where all commences:

“The birth of Jesus Christ the Son of God in Bedlam Judean, Era XXXVIII.” Follow, in order, King Herod's bidding to kill the Innocents, and to behead the Baptist, and then “Jesus Christ received his Passion, Era LXXI.” After three entries more, concerned with the Martyrdom of SS. Stephen, James, and Peter and Paul, and after the death of S. Martin the Bishop, appears Arthur of Britain:

“King Arthur strove with Modred his nephew at Camelot, Era DLXXX.” On the next page “Charlemagne came into Spain”; after two items of strictly Spanish importance was “The Battle of Roncevalles when the XII Peers died, Era DCCCCXXV”: incontinent “Charlemagne died, Era DCCCCXLIX.”

HISPANIC NOTES

Brief are the entries of those things that must not be forgotten: one king's marriage, another's death; how the convent of Oña was founded: how in such a year the Moors took Osma. In 1017 died the Count D. Sancho, he who gave the good laws; in 1019 they killed the Infant D. García in Leon.

The bloody wedding

A plain sort of person, we make out, for all his writing, and his care for great moments and the deaths of heroes, who farmed his own patch of mountain-side and river-bottom. Of the year 1213 he writes that there was freezing weather steadily from October till February, and there was no rain in March nor thence on through June. "Never was there so bad a year, and we gathered no wheat, no one of us."

He had noted the great snow "all over the land" in 1122, and a rain of blood in 1149; the frost in May that killed the vines (1160) and the flood seven years later when the Tagus came up as far as S. Isidro in Toledo; and how the river was frozen from bank to bank in 1191. Glancing down

Frost and flood

Death and invasion

the column of too-brief entries, and noting how many the deaths of great leaders and how many and how daring the Moorish raids from the south, about the middle of the twelfth century, one sees precisely how the Orders were called into being by the deadly peril of all reconquered Spain, and how they were the challenge of the human soul to Doom: "So nigh is grandeur to our dust."

The wrath of God

As the twelfth century begins the very sun is darkened, "on the last day of February from tierce even to none," and the great earthquake over-sea shakes men's hearts, and the Tagus floods recur every winter or so (four times in a single decade) and bring down the bridge. The great raid of the King of Morocco, two years after the rout of Alarcos, that reached past Maqueda to Toledo and Madrid and Alcalá, and extended by Orella and Uclés to Huete and Cuenca and Alarcón, is signalled as "the wrath of God," and the cloud grows blacker as the years go on. After Salvatierra was lost, the King D. Alfonso sent the Archbishop D. Rodrigo to France and Germany and to the Apostolic in Rome. The other historians have told this and we have read it, but there are here, besides, details which international etiquette did not permit formal history to record, scraps of hearsay and glimpses into the popular mind. So we continue with the poor clerk of Toledo, who died in 1219.

“The Apostolic gave so freely to all the world that all were loosed from their sins, and this pardon was because the King of Morocco said that he would do battle with whosoever adored the Cross in all the world. So the men from across the ports of the Pyrenees assembled and came to Toledo in Whitsun week and they turned Toledo upside down, and killed many of the Jews, and the knights of Toledo armed and defended the Jews.” These Crusaders against Albigensians who brought their habits with them, were not pleasant guests; no wonder the reflexion of the anxious waiting lies even on the page of the Coronica General. “And after a se’nnight King Alfonso and the King of Aragon entered Toledo and a great folk out of all Spain helped them, and out of everywhere overmountains, and they cut all the King's park, and all that of Alcardel, and they did much evil in Toledo, and they lay there long. Afterwards the Kings moved with the hosts and they took Malagón by the sword, and they had a long fight at Calatrava, until at last it yielded. . . ."

So the story goes on as we know it already, with little novel except that the four days before the great battle were all occupied with repelling attacks, and that the opening hours of the engagement were as desperate as, indeed, the dialogue already quoted implies. Both wings had closed in vain against the entrenched Paymins, and been broken: lastly the King of Castile moved with his rear-guard and it pleased God to rout the Moors. Anon:

"The Christian Kings went on to take Úbeda, and they took many cativos y cativas, more than LX thousand. . . . And in the doing of all this those from across the mountains had no share, for they went back from Calatrava and tried to take Toledo by treachery. But the men of Toledo shut the gates and reviled them, and called them disloyal, and traitors, and excommunicate. And the Kings, having staked and won for Christendom, went home."

Laus Deo

But there is no discharge in this war. In September of that year three Moorish Kings attacked all that had just been won, and the Castilian forces were mustered and put them to rout and had rich loot. By the next February the King was out again. In the following year, 1213, two thousand Christians were lost, in the loss of a single stronghold. Here falls the cold winter and bad harvest already cited. So the King of Castile and the King of Leon made peace and made a pact to march against the Moors each on his own frontier, and the King of Leon borrowed a commander, took Alcántara, tried for Cáceres but failed, and went home again. The King of Castile, who was besieging Baeza, asked him to execute a diversion in the south, but no. In the autumn, however, Alfonso had taken a town, and had killed many Moors and many Moresses, and had driven off much cattle: but in January he lay three weeks before Baeza and could not take it. "And horses died there, and mules, and she-mules and asses, and the folk ate them, and thereafter the folk died of hunger. At that time a measure of grain cost sixty sols. And the host came up to Toledo and the famine was in the kingdom till summer, and most of the folk died, and they ate the beasts and the dogs and the cats and what children they could steal. This was in Toledo, and wheat went up to . . . ."

Curiously enough he never set down the figure, leaving it, presumably, to be verified—a trustworthy chronicler. I know few pages which can so convey the sense of living through those wars. The same tale is told now by travellers in southeastern Europe, or in the fringes of Austria, or by the coasts of Syria and the uplands of Armenia.

In the battle of Las Navas the Master of Calatrava was wounded in the arm, so that he never fought again: and on the battle-field he assembled his knights and resigned his office and saw a new Master elected regularly: then he went back to Calatrava and lived there holily for nine years more. The Convent was despoiled and exhausted with expenses, but the Archbishop D. Roderick with his men stayed there for six months in case of attack and he paid all his men's expenses and those of the secular knights with him, and for several years there are records of rich gifts made by the King and by knights who were harboured there on the return from forays. God did not forget the freyles of Calatrava: one Lent about this time there was no fish to be had, and they were about to sit down to meat, and risk their souls to keep up their strength when pack-mules arrived: the vassals of D. Alfonso and knights of Toledo having sent fish and vegetables and other Lenten victuals.

The ensuing years are spent in reconstruction and adjustment. When, in 1213, the Master D. Rodrigo Garcés ceded to the Master of the Order of Avis certain properties that the Convent held in Evora, Avis in return acknowledged subjection to Calatrava. The Portuguese order had been founded as early as 1147, called then after Evora, the castle of Avis being given to it only in 1181. By this time Portugal was so far dissevered from Spain that an order needed independence: Calatrava likewise had staked and won in the battle, and being now rich and strong, was determined for power. Throughout the thirteenth century all that they asserted they secured: in 1238 the Master D. Martin Ruiz was received as visitor at Evora, conjointly with the Cistercian abbot of Sotos Albos: in that year it was admitted that his representative must be present at an election. The arms of Avis were the cross of Calatrava with a difference: two little birds below, where Calatrava had borne fetters till growing pride left them off. The Portuguese remained thus subject to Calatrava until the Master D. John, the bastard of a King of Portugal, conquered in the battle of Aljubarrota. Nor was Avis yet left unmolested. The whole matter, claims and recriminations alike, was ventilated in the Council of Bâle, 1431-43. That princely warrior whom the chroniclers call Master Davis, and that stricken field that Froissart calls Jubaroth,* belong in the annals of the west.

Within a few years the Master Martin Fernández gave to D. Nuño Fernández, the Master of S. Julian of Pereyro, the city of Alcántara which D. Alfonso of Leon had gained a few years before and given to Calatrava whence to fight against the Moors of Estremadura. The condition was that the Master of Pereyro with his freyles, knights and clerks, present and future, should be visited, corrected and reformed by the Master of Calatrava and his successors forever. Rades y Andrada copies the document: the order, which was constituted more like Santiago, is not obliged to receive a monk for Prior unless it likes, but shall elect a Prior from Pereyro or Calatrava or any daughter house of Calatrava: the Master of Pereyro is to be called for the election of future Masters of Calatrava, nor can any goods of the order be alienated without consent: given in Ciudad Rodrigo 1218.

The ninth Master, D. Frey Gonzalo Yáñez, was a Gallegan, the son of Joan Árias de Noboa, and he had married a daughter of Count Fernán Pérez de Traba—which means that he could call up all the west. The convent of S. Felices being founded for nuns, near Amaya, the Master had the nomination of the abbess, and neither party could receive a nun without the other's consent. The convent in a later age claimed the sepulchres of the Infant D. Philip and Doña Leonor de Castro, and their son: but this is impossible; their tombs stand yet in the Templar's church of Villasirga and their bodies yet rest within the carven tombs.

In 1221 King Ferdinand III gave to the Master the Castle of Monfrac of the Order and Knights of Monfrac called also Monte Gaudio, which had fallen into much diminution: a bull of Alexander III, given in 1180, names many castles thereto appertaining both in the Holy Land and in Spain and elsewhere. They held a castle of S. Angelo de Ursaria in Apulia, which, in 1228, Gregory IX gave to the diocese of Troja. In short, what with property and what with power, and with plenty of common sense in swapping horses, Calatrava did well by herself.

A close alliance or hermandad was knit up between Santiago and Calatrava, with two principal intentions: the Orders should each observe what truce with the Moors the other might make; and in stress of need the knights of either would obey a leader of the other. The practical wisdom of this is apparent. They fought neck to neck.

At the taking of Cordova the Masters of Calatrava and Santiago were early on the scene. Complaint being made to S. Ferdinand of the Comendador of Zurita, Frey Fernán Pérez, that he evilly entreated both townsfolk and peasants, the King wrote him a sharp letter, "in very bad Latin" but quite unmistakable: he would be ejected from his bailiwick if he had not better treatment for the mezquinos, the meanest folk. At the taking of Seville they did well. When Sancho IV captured Tarifa and was about to pull it down, the Master of Calatrava undertook to garrison it, as Captain General, for a fixed sum: afterwards Fernán Pérez de Guzmán took it over, on like terms. The great corporation, now that the pressure of danger was lifted, began to do business like other corporations. This appears further from what follows.

The Order
V. p. 164

In the time of Garci López de Padilla the Order of Montesa was affiliated. When the Order of the Temple was destroyed—and to the deathless glory of Spain, her prelates refused to participate in that outrage—then there was scrambling for the pieces. Neither Kings nor lords secular, in Spain, secured as much as elsewhere. King Jaime of Aragon asked John XXII to give the goods of the Templars in the Kingdom of Valencia to institute a Military Order. The Convent of S. George was founded in the city of Montesa in 1318 and was visited jointly by the Master of Calatrava and the Abbot of SS. Creus. In this year a pact was made with Santiago and Alcántara for mutual defence if the King or his guardians threatened any of their privileges.

The House of Padilla were gentlefolk always, of ancient Castilian lineage. They gave three Masters to Calatrava and one elect—the Clavero whose tragic end Juan de Mena has deplored. They did gloriously in battles, they married with great families, they held high office. When King Peter fixed his love upon the gentle Maria de Padilla, he was not derogating, nor was she wronged. He was not then married, nor was she, and their children would have reigned, had it not been for the children of Leonor de Guzmán.

The House of Padilla

When the Master of the time of Alfonso XI was very old the Orders were, in an ugly battle, sorely outnumbered, and finally he retreated. This so enraged some of the knights that, without ceasing to retreat, they deposed him and elected one of them-

las que van y tornen. . .*

selves. A series of schisms and intrusions followed, very like what was happening in the Papacy. D. Juan Nuñez de Prado was Captain General of King Peter's in the whole diocese of Jaén, harrying the Moors of Granada, but he rebuked the King for leaving Blanche of Bourbon and living with Doña Maria, and quarrelled with him, and in consequence withdrew to Calatrava, and then fled to Aragon. Doña Maria bore herself well in her hard place, and cherished no personal griefs, but he remembered the outrages he had done on her kinsman, the Master, and he put no trust in King Peter of Aragon. With a safe-conduct he came back and was reconciled, but not long after in Almagro they took him at table. The town did not rise nor did the knights protest. The King called for a chapter in Almagro; there he was tried and deposed and D. Diego García de Padilla elected in his stead; he was removed to a castle of the Order and after a few days beheaded.

Almagro was the court of the Masters of Calatrava, and they had their magisterial palaces there: but where wealth and ease had flourished with independence to the close of the fifteenth century, small remnant is left of the gracious fourteenth-century Gothic of the days of these Padillas. Doubtless it bore the same strange and lovely exotic flower as the convent palace at Tordesillas and the Alcázar at Seville, from the same cross-fertilization of Arab and Iberian art. The town, founded after Las Navas, lies in the wide plain, below the hills where Calatrava guards the pass, without a brook, without a snowy crest to enliven the unchanging aspect of things. Plenty of plateresque house-fronts register the truth, that when the Order was ruined the members of it were not. Before that time another Garci López de Padilla had been Master, and, dying in 1487, been buried in the choir of the great Cistercian church at Calatrava; after that time D. Gutierre de Padilla was to be Comendador Mayor and endow a hospital so richly that a convent was founded with the surplus, about 1519, and to set a device above it of a heart in a vulture's claws, with the legend, Gay colours, and the heart as you see. It might have been Maria de Padilla's device, or her lover's the ill-starred, passionate king.

From this point history wants wary walking, for those who wrote it, from Pero López de Ayala down to Rades y Andrada and Caro de Torres, could never forget that the reigning house descended from the murderer of D. Peter, and lest that ghost should rise, fling stones upon the huge cairn over him. The King and all his men must still be blackened that the Bastard's long rebellion and culminant treachery may still appear God's judgement.

Character
of the Master
D. García
de Padilla

The former Master D. Frey García López de Padilla—twice deposed and twice restored and resigning quietly in the end, keeping only Aragon and Zorita—was the uncle of the Masters of Calatrava and Santiago and Doña Maria their sister. D. Diego García de Padilla, though elected by the king's influence, retained his freedom of action: at the outset he had joined with the Master D. Fadrique and Count Henry of Trastamara and the Count of Albuquerque against the Queen Mother, but he was wounded before Toro; on the King's entry, in the terrible hour of his wrath, he protected the Queen, and the King struck him down and many of his party were killed there. He gave the habit in Andalusia with some indifference to family. In the wars of Granada, returning carelessly from a raid, the Master was taken prisoner by a Moorish knight, who presented him to el Rey Bermejo with a great shouting and festivity. The Red King received him royally and very honourably, and conferred with him on political issues, proposing finally that he should bring about an understanding with the King D. Peter, and to that end set him free without ransom, after a few days, and with him other knights of the Order.

on the wrong side

This is how the Red King came to Seville: you know the tragical history, how King Peter judged and sentenced him for a black heart, but because a King cannot die by a common hand did the sentence himself. It is one of the strangest stories, most hardly comprehensible, of all that haunt the chambers of the Alcázar: and the Master's honour ailed, for he had brought about the visit, and he withdrew to his Maestrazgo.

Death of

King

"... Hear the little cry

He was a troubled spirit, as it would seem—very tender of his honour, very keen that his knightliness should protect the right, and bewildered often, enlisted on the losing side, prompt for the lost cause. So he went on, befriending the King's brethren when they were threatened and his mother when she was defeated, and then the Red King; then Count Henry in Toledo. King Peter felt the wound and wrote with a personal passion, that yet glows in the ash, his reproach that his daughters' and heiress's uncle should give obedience to a tyrant, that he should do this whom he had trusted before all the nobles of his kingdom. The Master doubted what to do and stayed out of the battle of Nájera (where Pero López de Ayala was taken fighting for D. Enrique): it was singularly unfortunate. He went to the King in the end, but it was too late, and in Andalusia he was taken and put in prison, where he died. Too careful of his honour, he yet sullied it; loyal, he wounded and was wounded in the affections; he moves in a mist, and fights like one in a dream.

Martin López of Cordova was Master of Alcántara; quite regularly the King had him made Master of Calatrava. He had his own adventures when, as Viceroy of Cordova, he failed in his mission and in a Granada campaign was taken prisoner and released again. When the King was dead he stood by his children and tried to save his treasure: King Henry came down with D. Pedro Muñoz Godoy of Montiel who called himself Master, and before Carmona the two Masters met. The elder line was doomed: Martin López was taken and beheaded. Godoy was ultimately translated to the Order of Santiago, and his successor, who was formerly of the habit of S. John, died fighting gallantly at Aljubarrota; "the great maŕster of Calatrava," as Froissart calls him, "and his brother who was that day made knight."

The twenty-third Master was a Guzmán.

"D. Gonzalo Nuñez de Guzmán was a great lord in Castile"; so Fernán Pérez sets about the portrait in his Generations and Semblances; and develops it thus:

"He was ugly of countenance, heavy, short-necked and high-shouldered. But he was a mighty man; he did right well in arms; he was short in speech but very pleasant and companionable with his friends. For he never knew how to be alone, but was always in company of his own. He was free-handed, not ordinarily, but as much as ever you liked, so that you might call him prodigal. And to my mind this extreme of prodigality, though it be a vice, is greater and less bad than that of avarice, for the great gifts of the prodigal are greatly prized and they show a great heart"—in short, Aristotle's virtue of Magnanimity. "This man was very dissolute in respect of women; and so with such virtues and vices he came to great estate and great fame and renown, and had great men for his familiars, and some that did not live with him but had his money every year.”

It is said by Rades y Andrada that in 1404, when the previous Master died, the King D. Enrique III ordered Calatrava not to elect until he could arrive, and he treated with the most ancient and principal of the Order to elect his cousin, D. Enrique de Villena, although he was a married man.

King Henry was a young man—he was to die at seven and twenty—and Doña Maria de Albornoz, the wife, was a fair lady for whom he had a great desire. The plan was that a Papal divorce should be secured on the ground of impotence, with a confirmation of the Mastership: meanwhile the lady withdrew into the convent of Poor Clares at Guadalajara, living not, however, as a Religious, but as a guest. The King, one is disposed to infer, had probably his own reasons for keeping her withdrawn from the world till she could be delivered over to him.

for his acquiescence, but it is hard to see what wiser he could have done. There was no love in the case; his grandfather, the Constable of Castile, had married him at a tender age. His own honour was worth considering and if his wife were to be the King's property, she had better not be his wife: once quit of her, his name remained stainless. Nor was he ill-disposed to women: the cynicism of the arrangement may have amused his philosophic mind. At any rate, after the divorce was obtained, Doña Beatriz was not without attraction; he is said to have been her lover, and what is more, he is said to have been kind to her, and, when the King was dead, to have shared his poverty with her need.

D. Enrique
de Villena

He was Master of everything except success: and perhaps for that he cared less than his critics. He had always the price of a book, and materials of the necromancer's art. Worldly goods dropped away from him: the reversion of Villena he was forced to exchange against the countship of Cangas and Tineo, and that, in turn, was commuted to the crown when he was elected Master, for the goods of a Master reverted at his death to the Order, and Cangas and Tineo were in the royal patrimony and could not be alienated. He was elected duly at Toledo. Thereafter, though recalcitrant knights had elected at Calatrava D. Luys de Guzmán, who fled into Aragon when the King set out for the mother house, at Calatrava D. Enrique was re-elected and installed formally. The King gave Belvis to the Convent for vestuary of the clerks. When the King died, those of Calatrava fortified and provisioned the place, then, feeling safer, they voted that they were all excommunicate to have elected Villena. The schism dragged on until, in 1414, a Chapter-General of the Cistercian Order in Burgundy pronounced against D. Enrique, and declared his election and the Papal confirmation equally invalid. Yet twelve knights stood by him for two years more.

He did not get on well with the freyles comendadores, says Fernán Pérez de Guzmán in the Chronicle of D. John II, "por muchos desaguisados y sinrazones." Doubtless with the generality this was true. He was singularly ill-fitted for either the soldier's life or the ecclesiastic's. A profound scholar, who added Arabic and Hebrew to the classical and the current languages, deeply read in history, in philosophy, in astrology and necromancy, he was a poet, and called into being the courtly pageant at Saragossa, and held at Barcelona a consistory of the Gai Saber, when he went away from Calatrava. Very learned in the law, he was, besides, the complete gentleman, and composed a treatise on that ideal. Calatrava probably struck him as both rough and illiterate, and at the same time too worldly and political for peace. He probably struck Calatrava as absurd: small, and in later years stout, white-skinned; a gourmet and a connoisseur of women, metaphysical, impractical, and given to the Black Art.

On his little estate of Hiniesta near Cuenca he was to live more happily, and in his old house at Toledo where he could command the books and the learning of the cathedral and hold converse with scholars many of whom were circumcised. His own library was famous, and the burning thereof is truth of history, whether or not we may trust the racy letter of the Bachelor of Ciudad Real; it is a more wanton and a graver loss than that of Don Quixote (which may indeed have taken a hint therefrom) and in the field of Hebrew and Arabic probably irreparable. He died in 1434. He was a perfect humanist, and in him the growing ideals of the Renaissance clashed with those of the age just passing; he was modern, secular, and personal.

Nor may we forget that Macias o Namorado was of his household, that trobador that died because he loved so well; though how or on what occasion none are agreed, yet all admit that surely he died for love. So the Renaissance and the mediaeval types are still seen in juxtaposition: the ripe old humanist with the fatal lover, the author of an early and curious treatise on poetics and diction in general, with the subject of a recent and delightful grammar of the Gallegan speech. D. Enrique had the same affinity as the young king, his cousin, D. Juan II, for men of letters and of parts, and his correspondents and familiars formed a little court comparable to that which D. Álvaro de Luna graced, and Micer Francisco Imperial, and the Marquis of Santillana.

Meanwhile <sup>John II</sup> D. Luys served the King well always, not only when under the Infant D. Ferdinand he raided the Vega of Granada, but also in the war with Aragon. Again in 1431 he raided the south, though Granada paid tribute to Castile: a letter of the Moorish King's was long preserved at Calatrava as a memorial of his honour, laid up in the precious casket in which belike it came. He was a good friend of the Master of Santiago, D. Álvaro de Luna, and arranged with him the exchange of certain places between the two orders.

The court of John II

In his long rule of nearly forty years becomes apparent the change that the Order was undergoing. This is the fifteenth century, and the reign of John II, whose court was a hothouse of Renaissance literature, exotic, exquisite, full of colour, fragrance, melody. All that Italy and France could give, was there transplanted, and flourished with a new strange bloom.

The knights of the Order were caught betwixt heaven and earth, between castle, court and convent. They were not crusaders, and they wore the cross on their shoulders as a token not of soldierly brotherhood but of lordly lineage. They were not Religious, for they were the sons of great houses, intriguing for commanderies, indifferent to Latin and theology and avid of the Italian literature and the new poetry. In the incessant struggle between the great houses for the control of the King and that of the realm thereby, they knew how to use their power to advantage, and with exercise it grew.

Their vows meant no more to them than the thirty-nine articles to an English clergyman, and the vows themselves by now imposed little more than loyalty to Our Lady and the King—the latter part being negligible. In the previous century the cowl had been given up and only the cloak and cross distinguished them from other men: D. Luys put through a Bull allowing them to marry, and was the only one at the time to take advantage of it. We can hardly suppose that the rest lived celibate. Of one Master early in the thirteenth century the historian observes that "he had three sons and a daughter: it is not known whether he was married before he took the habit, or whether they were illegitimate." It hardly mattered, for the merciful Spanish law distinguished rightly between the fruits of adultery and the children born to the unmarried. Nor was the limpieza, now strictly required for admission to the Order, tainted by bastardy, if the quarterings crossed by the bar sinister were but sufficient and regular. The new change which was to come within forty years thereafter will hardly have seemed very great to the knights: there had been schisms and intrusions before, and now that state was to be, so to speak, permanent—there was never to be a Master any more. But for the rest, fat commanderies should still be distributed, and precedence and prestige should still count at court, and great wealth and the command of many men should still be within reach. To us the policy, finally triumphant, of Ferdinand and Isabel, seems the ending of a world, but in those days it must have happened as imperceptibly as the turning of a tide.

Forty years is a long time, and the younger generation grows impatient when old men will not die. When D. Frey Luys de Guzmán was old and sick, and as his lieutenant D. Ferdinand de Padilla, the Clavero, was administering the Order, a rumour came to Toledo that the Master was dead. The Comendador Mayor D. Juan Ramírez de Guzmán then hoped to be elected Master in his stead. The King being of no value politically and the parties playing off against each other, D. Juan

Ramírez suggested to the Infant D. Enrique of Aragon to give him countenance and men enough to seize the castles and towns of the Order; he raised two hundred heavy-armed horse and a hundred jinetes and set out for Calatrava. The Clavero met him with a hundred and eighty of the former and two hundred of the latter, and the fighting was bloody in the Campo de Barajas: Padilla captured the Comendador Mayor, his two brothers and his son, with others, and carried them off to Almagro and thence to Calatrava. King John sent a letter: the Master was too ill for business and the Keeper appealed to Rome; then the Master died and Fernando de Padilla was elected in his stead, but never confirmed, for the King's consent could not be had—the plan being now to put in a cousin, D. Alfonso, the King of Navarre's natural son—nor could the Keeper get a safe-conduct to come up for investiture. He had released D. Juan Ramírez de Guzmán, who swore loyalty to him as Master but returned within a few days with the Infant D. Enrique and besieged him in the Castle of Calatrava, and there, by accident, upon the walls, he was wounded by one of his own men, and so died. His brothers were able to conceal this long enough to make good terms for the surrender. Juan de Mena, feeling compelled to praise him and caring little about him, made shift with some fine verses that ring like scabbards on saddle-leather when men ride hard:

Aragon
intrudes again

D. Alfonso of Aragon and Navarre was a half-brother of Ferdinand the Catholic. He was not professed until after he was elected—which shows, if anything, a canny mind and a shameless. In the war which followed he backed his father against his uncle of Castile: the latter, conquering, called a new election, in which D. Juan Ramírez the Comendador Mayor again received some votes but the majority went to D. Pedro Giron. This meant a schism into three, and two intrusions, any way you counted. Finally the Comendador accepted a pension—paid part by the Master and part by the King—and retired. D. Alfonso held Aragon for ten years and a half and then decided for matrimony instead, and secured a Papal dispensation on the ground that he had never wanted at heart to be professed though verbally he was. Comment here would be no addition, as Juan de Mena says somewhere.

D. Pedro Giron had for brother the Marquis of Villena, D. Juan Pacheco, one of the great lords of Spain, involved in politics to the eyebrows. He was himself an important piece, pushed from one square to another, set down now on one side of the board and now on the opposite, in that long game where liberty was the stake and both sides lost. The Master stood in with the unhappy Prince D. Enrique, and helped him in rebellion against the foolish, old, helpless, poetearing King John and his perpetually changing masters among the great nobles. With him, he galloped through the streets of Valladolid in the little band that after the funeral showed the new King to the town, heralds and trumpeters sounding before and the royal flag beating in the wind while the king-at-arms gave out the cry, from interval to interval, "Castile for King Henry!" He was made Camarero Mayor and shared in the expedition against Granada that began so gallantly. You may read it all in the Divers Feats of Mosen Diego de Valera: how first the King would risk his life in a skirmish, an arrow reached him and the nobles blamed him; and then he would not risk his army in an ambush, or what seemed such—and again the nobles blamed him; how finally he made a truce on terms of tribute and supplies of food and fruit and goodwill, and the release of all Christian captives, and still the nobles were ill-content. In the following year another expedition was already launched, when the King had news of conspiracies in Castile and withdrew to go up thither, nor indeed did he ever get back to finish what had been so hardly begun. Even so far back as in April of 1455, at the first setting out, near Cordova, according to the Chronicle of the King's chaplain, Diego Enríquez del Castillo, some of the King's friends knew of a conspiracy to seize the King's person, and they persuaded the King to change his plans, so that it came to nought. If this were so, it cannot have been the fruitless breaking off of the campaign that threw the Master, afterwards, into the party of the King's brother D. Alfonso.

There is no reason to seek for personal motives in these times, nor yet an ideal shattered; for politics, like religion, constituted a separate sphere, and a man's personal honour enjoyed strange exceptions and reservations.

The realm was infected with policy and torn by parties and ravaged by such dissension precisely as that of York and Lancaster, as that of Burgundians and Armagnacs, which existed elsewhere in those same days, in those very years, while the relation of Aragon to Castile was even more tormented than that of England to France.

Yet these are the years when Sir Thomas Mallory wrote the Morte d'Arthur and still in the lifetime of some of these men

Public and private virtue have no common denominator

Caxton was to print it in black-letter; and to finish it with such good words and touching as rarely were written in any tongue of men's daily speech:—

Sir Bors's
elegy

There, Sir Launcelot, there thou liest, thou that wert never matched of any earthly Knight's hand; and thou wert the courtesest Knight that ever bare shield; and thou wert the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrad horse; and thou wert the truest lover of a sinful man that ever loved woman; and thou wert the kindest man that ever struck with sword; and thou wert the meekest man and the gentlest that ever ate in hall among ladies; and thou wert the sternest knight to thy foe that ever put spear in rest. Then there was weeping and dolour out of measure.

There you have, like a Credo, the ideal of that tormented and exquisite fifteenth century, and it is doubtless as true a picture of a man as Kipling's Strickland or Meredith's Redworth or James's Strether. For his beliefs are what a man lives and dies by, and at this moment belief and conduct existed in complete and coherent systems indeed, but in more than one, and a man passed with immunity, as I have said, from one into another, as though—if you like—from one dimension into another.

In the figures of the two Girones, father and son, who were both Masters of Calatrava, reappears, clear and full-coloured, the knightly ideal of that chivalry, artificial but not unreal, which flushed all Spain with sunset-light and which was lovely as are all things that pass.

In the war of Granada there was a brilliant hazaña; the Master met and vanquished a Moorish knight, and sent his head to the Reyna mora. Against the King of Navarre he served D. Enrique well and turned all to advantage; he had concessions confirmed to the Order, as he had already had Osma and Cazalla attached to the Maestrazgo in exchange for other towns less desirable; then when Archidona was taken, the convent of S. Salvador de Pinilla in the diocese of Sigüenza submitted to him, and the nuns so long as it survived wore the habit of S. Bernard with the red cross of Calatrava.

In the rebellion at Avila the Master was one of the principal actors, when the King was dethroned in effigy and the Infant D. Alfonso received homage in his place. The Marquis of Villena his brother, and his uncle Carrillo, the Archbishop of Toledo, were equally engaged; they were strong men, not to be conquered or subdued. As befell, the King's party were in good point, and the commons rose in indignation, by whom Carrillo was burnt in effigy at Valladolid. It was a moment for mutual advantage, and without much trouble the Archbishop of Seville, Alfonso de Fonseca, himself no friend of the King's, made a peace between them. The King probably consented to receive Pacheco's advice, and the Master agreed to serve the King with all his force, to lend him money, and to marry his sister Doña Isabel.

Reading the historian's indifferent page, one is hardly aware of the event till the leaf is turned, one hardly rouses to wonder what would have been the fate of Spain had this approved knight and Castilian noble, stubborn and incontrollable, been the consort of Isabel the Catholic. It was agreed: Frey Pedro de Acuña went to Rome for the dispensations that would allow him to marry and to resign the Mastership to his son. It was under way: the little eight-year-old lad was set in the Master's chair and the knights kissed his hand and swore fealty: in the palace at Almagro D. Pedro Giron made great and costly preparations, not only in liveries and other things needful, but in stones, brocades, hollands, jewels and other things of great worth, to give to the Infanta whom he had already married conditionally at Peñafiel—the dispensation being surely expected. Here is some ground for quaint speculation: when he was married I know not, nor how long he was away from the Princess, but, intending to rejoin her in Madrid, he set out with all his deudos, his own kinsfolk, clients and personal following of Girones, Pachecos, Acuñaas and Carrillos, "and other principal knights." They lay the first night at Villarrubia, and there the Master fell so sick that within four days he was dead. No doctors could discover what his sickness was, and it was generally thought that some great nobles of the realm, misliking the marriage, had poisoned him. Certainly it is a strange circumstance, as the old chronicler remarks, that his death was reported throughout Castile three days before he died. He has been called arrogant and outrageous, certainly he was both stubborn and daring: all that ambition could dream his hand was stretched out to take. If Alonso de Palencia were to be believed, he died blaspheming God for not granting him forty days more to live; but Alonso de Palencia is not to be believed in the matter of Doña Isabel's adventures. It was his business, and that of Mosen Diego de Valera, to blacken King Henry's character, as the chancellor Ayala had blackened King Peter's, to the end that rebellion and usurpation should appear God's judgement and the unhappy monarch an abhorred monster.

Whether or not there was poisoning, and whether, if so, there was connivance in high place, who shall say? At any rate, in the days when she ruled, Isabel the Catholic knew all that concerned her in the kingdom and a good deal more: here again there is space for serious speculation.

On the spot, in Villarrubia, his son, D. Rodrigo Téllez Giron, was sworn again, and for the time the Pope put the Order into commission under the Marquis of Villena, who was afterwards elected Master of Santiago and governed both Orders at once. At twelve D. Rodrigo took over the charge; at seventeen he espoused the cause of Doña Juana the heiress of King Henry now dead, and captured Ciudad Real: but the town, which had never been willing to belong to the Order, appealed to Ferdinand and Isabel; they sent against him the Count of Cabra and the Master of Santiago, and he was defeated.

Another episode of this time throws light

—like the revolving beacon on capes and islets—on more than one point. At Fuenteovejuña the town rose against the Comendador Mayor of the Order, who was there at the time, took the house of the Order and killed all the members, throwing the Comendador out of the window before he was dead. Those below slashed him into little bits. The Catholic Kings sent commissioners who investigated, with torture of women and little boys, but no one would admit who had been the leader in the uprising. To the question: "Who killed the Comendador Mayor?" there was always the same answer. "Fuenteovejuña": to the next, "Who is Fuenteovejuña?" the single answer, "Everybody." Lope de Vega, who strikes deep roots into the soil of Spain, has not forgotten this traditional matter in his play of Fuenteovejuña: which is indeed as full of the pride of history and the consciousness of race as King Edward II or King Richard III.

Meanwhile the Clavero, D. García López de Padilla, stood by the Catholic Kings, and many knights with him, and finally

D. Rodrigo "came in" as the Scots say; and thereafter found his occupation against the Moors. In 1482, when he died before Loja, Padilla was elected—the twenty-ninth master and the last.

When a historian remarks bitterly that D. Rodrigo at the time of his election was a baby as well as a bastard, he is something less than just, for in an epoch and a land when kings of Spain by law attained majority at fourteen, and King Peter assumed power at—as I think—eleven years, the Master counted already twelve. He died at twenty-seven: too short a time in all was allowed him for heroic action. He did not live to be a great captain, but, as Menéndez y Pelayo says, his barbaric audacity, his striking and comely carriage, and, above all, his early and heroic death, set a glory about his name and marked his figure for the Romances. Like others of his name, the Gothic King and My Cid Ruy Díaz, he enjoys a complete légende which may be pieced together out of the Romances and augmented from the masterpiece of wild fantastical history and enchanting poetry of manners, The Civil Wars of Granada.

Here, unfortunately, is not the place for that emprise, but the best of the Romances though perhaps the least historical, that which Timoneda had chosen for the Rosa Española, may perhaps find room.

"*¡Ay Dios,

The Master of Calatrava
 he was a goodly knight
 And in Granada meadow the Moors he put to flight:
 He came with but three hundred the ruddy cross that wore And swept it from the mountains clear to Granada's door, Though the Elvira portal hurling his long spear stout:
 The gates were barred with iron and not a Moor stepped out.
 Word came to Albayaldos where in his land lay he,
 He mustered barks and galleys to bear men over-sea:
 The Young King of Granada came out to greet him fain
 "You are welcome, Albayaldos, and welcome yet again.

If so you come for hire
 I will give you double pay,
 Or if 'tis for a bridal,
 here is many a bonny may."
 "Thanks, thanks, good King," he answered,
 "I come not for a fee,
 Nor come not for a bridal,
 My wife will do for me.
 But word came to me yonder where over-sea I slept That yon accursed Master besieged Granada kept."
 "'Tis sooth," the Moor King answered and paused and sighed a space;
 "There's no Moor in the country can meet him face to face, Unless it were Escado, Alhama's seneschal,
 And when he risked a sally,
 it cost a heavy toll;
 Of twenty thousand men he took not one came home again,
 And him, sore wounded, his good mare fetched back across the plain."
 "O, foul fall Mohammed!" said these that stood about,

“Call up and give me, King,
the best of all thy men,

Footmen of thy household,

And I will fetch the Master within Granada’s walls.”

“Peace, Albayaldos,” spake a Moor, “such boasting ill befalls.

The Master is a youngster and lusty in the fray,

If in the field he catch you your beard will shake that day.”

Then Albayaldos answered with an evil thing:—

“A blow would be my answer, were it not for the King.”

“Your blow would be returned you by three good sons of mine,

For in the realm my children

 The good King called for silence and nothing more was heard Till Albayaldos asked for leave with his men to keep his word.
 The good King gave him license and plenty soldiery,
 And in the Jaén country
 they lifted all the kye,
 And with the sheep the shepherds,

 But when a stream they forded

 And on the gates of Jaén he hammered hard and cried:—
 "Where are you, Master? Waken!
 Call up your men and ride.
 Your glory all is stolen by Albayaldos on this day."
 The Master heard him calling where in his halls he lay;
 "Peace, shepherd, peace," he answered,
 "Such word you may not say,
 Tomorrow I will find again

 And straightway in the field he was, urging them still with speech.
 At the entering to a valley where first it opened fair, They saw the Moors advancing:
 the Master called them there.
 "On them, good knights! Set at them,

 Now grip your horse and fix your lance and strike your prey!" When Albayaldos met them moving in this array
 The Master's fierce encounter slew man and steed straightway;
 The Moors broke up and fled each one a different way.

Garci López
 de Padilla

Garci López de Padilla was a good Master. In time of peace he abode at the convent, and kept his place in the choir, and lived like a good Religious. He would have fetched the body of Abbot Raymund thither but the monks of S. Bernard in Toledo would not part with it, so he gave them a rich ark or shrine for the precious bones. In 1487 he died.

Then the Kings begged a Bull of Innocent VIII, reserving the provision of Mastership of the Orders as it came vacant, and they governed as administrators. Isabel, as a woman, was probably disqualified from holding the title, and Ferdinand no less, as being married and holding already Santiago and Alcántara. The Comendador Mayor at this time was D. Gutierre de Padilla, of whose hospital in Almagro I have already spoken: in the convent also founded there of nuns called Comendadoras de Calatrava the ladies of the Padilla family had a preference, but all members must be noble, hijasdalgo, so likewise their father and mother and grandparents, and clean of all race or admixture of Jews, Moors, or commoners.

At the death of King Ferdinand Cardinal Adrian, administering the kingdom for Charles V, called a Chapter-General in Guadalupe, sending word that it could not elect a Master, for the Pope had given the

Maestrazgo to Charles V: he came down and argued it with them in person. So because they could not help themselves, the Order elected Charles V, and Leo X confirmed this: and D. García de Padilla was Comendador Mayor. That was not the end of the Order, for it exists still: it was the end of its history:

Says Madrazo:

To the end of the eighteenth century the Castle-Convent lasted, as a mother-house, inhabited by clerks of the institution and preserved with love and respect. Now there are only ruins on the steep height; for they moved into Almagro and pulled it down so that they could not be sent back. Some of the tombstones are in La Calzada de Calatrava, in the Maldonado house of the sixteenth century. This is the nearest village and grew up under its protection: and there, in 1834, the Carlist troops burned the church tower with a hundred and sixty-three persons who had taken refuge there.

The Castle

Calatrava

Legitimist ferocity

The Castle crowns a height and guards a gateway of the hills; like great dogs, chin on paw, the Convent and a smaller castle opposite, keep watch above the road. The curtain walls yet stand, the flanking towers, and many chambers therein; the church is not yet roofless. With wide nave and aisles of four bays, deep round apse, the chevet of eight parts and the parallel side-apses deep too, rib-vaulted with brick, sustained on massive columns, the architecture is characteristic Cistercian. The capitals are all plain, the big red stone columns are like the western door and the great rose above; but some bits of the marble facing to doors and windows, of fifteenth-century work, lie about, and a little Mudéjar arcading in horseshoe cusping clings within the apses and outside the northern one. The stains are left where once stood frescoed saints, and the sparkle of their halos in strayed sun-rays has not all died. In a sort of chantry, at the eastern end, the Master D. Pedro Giron had prepared his tomb, and all the lovely chapel was designed and wrought for him by Annequin de Egas, the master of Toledo Cathedral: the will he signed in 1467 refers to Maestre Haniquin. Many towers still stand secure, and the springing vault-ribs cling to the walls of them; and innumerable long barrel-vaulted chambers, quite dark, that were store-rooms, are still sound.

A neat bowling-green of turf, edged with great shrubs, covers the roof of the church, looking as if planted symmetrically. Except in the church, there is much bad building, of broken stones of all sizes and shapes, with some courses of bricks in places, and in places a timber introduced, as the castle was built at Mycenae perhaps three millenniums before. The situation, indeed, is not unlike, except that the mountains here are not so close. From the top of towers three lines of wall are plain, and the castle, covering the hill-top, counted many stories. It is built into the crest, the thunder-cloven pinnacles of the mountain are bonded into the fabric, and live rock serves for wall and buttress and angle-stone. The rock and turf drop steeply away on one hand to the road far below, and on the other almost as steeply to arable land almost as far; a green-mantled tank still holds faithfully its treasure of hoarded water. If once there were wells they are dry now, and blocked up and long forgotten; but a cistern on arches (aljibe is the Spanish name), needs only filling, perhaps, to serve again. The sky leans close above dark stone and thunder-smitten rock; a wind blows through the pass by night and day, and always there is the scent of crushed thyme and mint.

The Moors worried Salamanca towards the close of the twelfth century, and two knightly brothers collected some other knights and vowed perpetual war against the Moors. They were D. Suero Fernández and D. Gómez his brother, grandsons of D. Rodrigo Gómez, Count of Salamanca, and related to the royal house of Aragon. One fancies them young, gallant creatures like the Twins at Chartres or at Leon, with their ardent vow sent ringing down eternity—"perpetual war!" A hermit from the mountains southward suggested to them something not unlike a lodge in a garden of cucumbers. This, however, was in a pear-orchard, whiter in spring-time than the snows of the mountain behind. They called the brotherhood S. Julián de Pereyre, and, long after they had assumed a cross identical except in colour with that of Calatrava, they left the pear tree set at the heart of it. The Rule of S. Benedict was modified to suit a gentleman's and a military life: the Bull was approved by Alexander III in 1176, only a year later than that of Santiago. It prescribes neither habit nor rule. A privilege of Ferdinand II, dated in the year before, shows them already established among the pear-trees: it was confirmed by Archbishop Peter of Compostella, and the Bishops of Burgos, Leon, Oviedo, Salamanca, Astorga, Zamora, Ciudad Rodrigo, and the vacant see of Coria. The enumeration defines pretty well the special task of the Order: they were to fight up and down the Camino de Plata, and over their peculiar domain brooded the great domes of cathedrals and collegiate churches. Estremadura was their charge.

The domed architecture of the region

Under the third Master, D. Frey Nuño Fernández, Alcántara was taken and given to Calatrava, to found another Order in the Kingdom of Leon. Just so Santiago already had two centres, one at S. Marcos and the other near to Cuenca: it was an unwieldy machine, and in 1218 the town and the bridge and castle were given to S. Julian in return for a nominal obedience, afterwards thrown off. So the knights called themselves by a new name and put a pair of fetter-bolts under the pear tree.

The fourth Master, D. Frey Diego Sánchez, translated the convent to the Castle of Alcántara: now almost all is destroyed but you can see the shape of the church and some tombs of Masters and other knights, and the thirty-eight stone seats in the quire. For two hundred and fifty years the Convent of the

The convent in the sixteenth century

Order was there; the Master's palace stood alongside. Later, the knights lived where they liked, and the clerks lived each in his own house in town and came to quire for Mass and the Hours, till the Catholic Kings were commissioners and sent the clerks to S. Benito el Viejo out of town; lastly, they built a big house in town where they still are.

and today

In 1572 Rades y Andrada wrote thus. The altar piece of Morales is scattered and lost, to-day. The church now is ransacked and ruinous. The palace has become private dwellings, humble tenements though still princely, where donkeys are stabled in cells about the great cloister that once were knights' lodgings.

A marvellous staircase

A winding stair of stone mounts up through a huge tower, turning on itself without a newel-post, and discharges upon successive platforms where the air and the view may be enjoyed. In the Chapter-room and that above, every boss has been cut away for export trade, and the roof of the church stripped off likewise. But this was not the castle comparable to those of Uclés and Calatrava. The air of the place is rather stately than strong. The glory of the conquest lasted no longer than an August day: it passed, and the long twilight of the eighteenth century yet broods above each pinnacled buttress, and lingers below each vault and console.

The collegiate church was never finished: it keeps three apses, and a double transept, two bays in depth, with windows high up at the west: then a wall was run up across the incompleated nave and a poor brick vault thrown over it, that now has fallen in. The capitals are classical in their motives, and a rich plateresque decoration runs about the south transept; the star-shaped vaults are adorned with a silver-smith's pride, like the consoles of the main apse. The ravaging of the glorious church has been perfectly systematic and perfectly commercial; retables and altar-fronts have been carefully removed by expert workers, and the very glass of the windows is stacked, in piled panes, for use elsewhere. From the carved organ, corbelled up in the north transept, carvings have been deftly picked away. Nothing was smashed—as at Poblet or Ripoll, for instance—but everything which could be dug out by hammer and chisel is gone: the kneeling statues taken from the apse-tombs, the very brasses from the iron balustrade. The wealth of the Order that rebuilt the church in the Spanish Renaissance and remodelled the palace in the eighteenth century, and peopled the former and its cloister with alabaster and marble effigies, and furnished the latter with cast bronze and beaten iron-work—like the jewels of a fair woman among brigands. was cause of destruction and wrong.

The town easier to replace

The town, except here and there, is not princely: many houses have only one story, or one and a loft. A sweet place it is, white-washed along its narrow ways, stone-paved through its steep streets, but not to be compared with such Castilian strongholds as Haro or such Aragonese frontier-towns as Daroca, where every vista ends in another casa solar. It was doubtless planned, apart from the Convent, as easy to destroy and easy to rebuild, which is indeed one way of guarding the confines of kingdoms. By steep ways and built-up levels and repeated zig-zag descents, the town ranges down, between long-deserted churches and half-abandoned nunneries, to the gorge of the Tagus, and there the slope is terraced and planted with gardens and olive-orchards, to the shaly edges of the bank.

Betwixt the setting sun and the rising moon I came upon the bridge suddenly: it was like a painting by Mantegna. The bridge was plain and austere as the landscape. On the farther hillside a Moorish watch-tower clung; on the nearer bank a Roman temple stood, a little, solemn bridge-chapel. The dark water brimmed silently below. The tawny hills were soundless, the dim-coloured stone arches stretched between them, forgetting nothing. Two little Spanish soldiers, in dark uniforms, kept the bridge-head with their muskets. I crossed to them and gave them a good day, and turned up the road to see the rose-colour of the full moon turn into silver, and as I came back to recross we bade each other go with God: and I saw, where the fiery ball of the sun had sunken, only white wreaths of mist. I was aware, for an hour of life, of the passing of time, and the centuries stood still to be measured above the dark irresistible stream. For that hour I seemed to breathe in the heart of the perdurable, and in the world of change, to enter into the changeless.

western land

Alcántara, as I have said, belonged to the west, and it was a mere accident of politics, that for a time (and perhaps intermittently even then) it gave obedience to Calatrava. D. Frey Árias Pérez was a Gallegan and Alfonso IX was his friend, and gave him houses in Badajoz and elsewhere: and when the King died, he stood out for the orphan princesses Dulce and Sancha, holding in their name Merida, Badajoz, Coria and Ciudad Rodrigo, with many other towns. As they had, in the end, poor ladies! to accept a compromise,

The Bridge of Alcántara

and a pension, and the estate of irremediable celibacy which was worse, so he too submitted to King Ferdinand and gained Trujillo, and set knights and clerks of his order there. There was already a Convent and Order of Freyles Trujilleses, as noted earlier, but they were another body: they may, however, have merged at this time with that of Alcántara. This Master died in 1234.

V. pp. 8, 159

The next Master retook Medellin and secured it for the Order, also Elges which is a village of Coria, and other places. When King Ferdinand came down from Benavente to Cordova he passed by Alcántara and ordered the Master to follow, who, within four days, came on with six hundred horse and two thousand of foot. That was a test of efficiency. The King gave them a church in Cordova; then they went with D. Alfonso, King Ferdinand's heir, into Murcia, and took and peopled the town they called Alcantarilla; they served at the taking of Seville and got town-houses and villages. Finally, after twenty years of such knightly service, this Master

The Order under King Ferdinand the Saint

and King Alfonso the Sage was elected Master of Calatrava and passed away from this place. His successor stood by the King and the Prince D. Sancho, as the chronicle says, and the Infant D. Pedro rose with the towns of Coria, Salamanca, and Ciudad Rodrigo and fought the Master. This is worth the noting, because later historians have not always seen that D. Sancho the Bold conceived himself and his partisans to be on his father's side, as against rebels in open rebellion. D. Fernando Pérez who followed him was brother to Suero Paez the Master of Santiago; and being of Portuguese lineage, in 1286 he helped (against the rebellious Infant D. Alonso of Portugal) the King D. Dionis—D. Dinis, as the chronicler says. In Badajoz there was a civil war between the Portuguese and the Bejaranos, and the men of Béjar, having killed a good many Portuguese, in self-protection proclaimed for D. Alonso de la Cerda; and the Masters and the forces of the Orders from Seville and Cordova were sent thither to besiege the city. It surrendered on promise of life and liberty, but D. Sancho killed every one of the lineage and bando of Béjar, and that meant more than four thousand men and women.

The region having at the moment no Moors, the Order continued to fight the Portuguese. The following Master was a Gallegan, and he was succeeded by his nephew whom he had brought up in his own house and that of a cousin (also Master): a good training for a great office. A number of the castles of their Orders along the frontier had been given to Portugal, among them S. Julián de Pereyre: it was said that the Order of Avis held this in some sort of subjection to Alcántara, but that has been denied. The Bridge of Alcántara was taken by the Prince Dom Joam and the Portuguese soldiery of King Dionis: the young Master came back hot-foot from Valladolid with a royal order for men, and on that collected all he could in Plasencia and sent to Cáceres for more. For three months a knight called Garci Gutiérrez held the bridge from the bridge-tower—such men's names should not be forgotten—then the Master took it by storm and killed the knight and those with him: "Morí el hombre y no su nombre."

This Master, bred up for the office, was called D. Ruy Vázquez: his adventures were only beginning. In 1318 a conspiracy broke out against constituted authority, that is against himself, the Comendador Mayor and the Clavero. A charge was laid against them before D. García López de Padilla, the Master of Calatrava, that they evilly-entreated the freyles, knights and clerks of the convent. Padilla, as father and reformer of the Order, came in state, with two Cistercian abbots, him of Valdeyglesias and him of Valparaiso. The three accused fortified themselves in the Convent but others had gone out and taken a city gate, and these admitted the Master of Calatrava: and the case was called. The accused, who represented the entire government, denied the jurisdiction of Calatrava: if knights were wronged they might appeal to Rome, for Calatrava had lost all rights by failing in obligations, and especially in not summoning the Master of Pereyre and Alcántara for the elections of the Master of Calatrava. The Convent was taken by storm and many knights were killed. As the chapter sat, only twenty-two knights were not on their side in the contention; notwithstanding, these twenty-two elected a Maldonado for Master in Ruy Vázquez's stead. He assented under protest and set up for himself in Valencia de Alcántara: then he carried the appeal to Burgundy.

Majority did not count

This year the three Masters of Calatrava, Santiago and Alcántara made a hermandad or alliance. He was a great figure still: he went to the wedding of the King's sister, Doña Leonor, with the King of Aragon: at last he died and was succeeded in due process of election by his brother, who raised the siege of Badajoz. The King for some reason was ill-pleased, and the Master, being warned of that, resigned his office into the hands of the Abbot of Morimundo, the same who had judged for his brother eighteen years before. The King insisted on nominating, and again a small minority was able to act: five knights and three clerks gave the habit to the King's Almoner, D. Gonzalo Núñez against

of Oviedo, and elected him. Fernando López called a chapter in Alcántara and had himself elected, but he died within six months, then his nephew Suero López was elected but resigned his rights to Ruy Pérez: this simplified and strengthened the issue. The King, less pleased than ever, called in the Master of Calatrava and the Abbot of Morimundo again for a visitation and raised soldiery in Plasencia, Coria, Cáceres and Trujillo: Ruy Pérez resigned again and Nuñez was properly elected in 1337.

A barra-
enmity

God's judgement waited for him. Those had been two busy years: the new Master sensibly turned his attention and his knights against the Moors. The Master was dear to King Alfonso XI and held the appointment of Captain General, but he was to lose both his estate and his life, for Doña Leonor de Guzmán bore him ill-will. In a very like case to his own he had opposed the election of her brother D. Alfonso Meléndez Guzmán as Master of Santiago. She complained to the King that the Master had said much evil of his royal person and many insults against her, and for false witnesses she produced the Master's enemies. The King sent for him.

He evaded those charged to capture him, and wrote bitterly to the King: it is not hard to guess what manner of thing he said. He came up by the west-country, from castle to castle of his Order, swearing the Alcayde not to deliver the castle to the King, and fortifying and provisioning as though for war. The King wrote again, urging him to come with a safe-conduct, for whatever he might have done his services should overbalance it: the Master wrote back that since the King believed false folk and disloyal, who considered their own interests exclusively, he must be excused from coming. Some of the Order, misdoubting the event, besieged Alcántara, castle and bridge. The King thanked them and requested them to elect a new Master, Nuño Chamiso, the Comendador of Santibañez: whereon D. Gonzalo Nuñez offered to the King of Portugal Valencia de Alcántara.

Truth-speaking to a King

This episode is what my old chronicler

Banners

calls a gallardia, a gallant bit. The King had come up to Alcántara hurriedly, and Chamiso had taken the town, but D. Gonzalo Nuñez held the castle, and he hung out all the banners he had taken from the Moors, and in the midst thereof one of white damask with the arms of the Order. There with him he had mucha y muy lucida gente, many shining lights of chivalry, Estremeños, Leonese and Asturians, his kinsfolk and friends. Then he waited for D. Pedro of Portugal. But the Prince dallied, expecting news. He never came. The King claimed to enter by right of homage done; and he swore on the Cross and the Gospels to assure him every security, not to kill him nor imprison, nor deprive of the Mastery, nor let him suffer molestation by royalty or by the Order. The oath seems to cover all contingency.

When the Master consulted his relatives, D. Alvar Rodríguez Osorio warned him ominously that it was no new thing for kings to give a safe-conduct to those who had offended them, and later do their will, so he refused again. The King held him in talk from a tower, while in the meantime the King's men tried to assault the castle: he received two strong stones on his shield in the defence, and as he turned to go down, others in the back: the Comendador of Herrera, beside him, was shot with an arrow and died.

Foul play and force being baffled, King Alfonso tried power. Returning to his lodging, he called nobles and lawyers before him and gave a sentence against the Master as a traitor. The Master called a council and settled down for defence, putting the towers into the charge of his friends, but two of these betrayed him to the King, for they had been servants of the King D. Alfonso. The King's party prepared scaling ladders and the next night came in silence and darkness to the tower, and the first up were eight of the Order. When sufficient had mounted without a sound, they raised the deadly cry of "Castile, Castile! King Alfonso, and death to traitors!" The rest made what terms they could, but the Master held the keep: fire was set there and next day he surrendered.

The King made him a speech in the best and most approved manner: "You came to my house a man of no estate (hombre de pequeña manera, he really said, 'a small sort of man') and I exalted you to high estate and made you a lord over gentlemen." So he went on and quite believed that he had been surprised as well as offended: of Doña Leonor no word. The Master had time for confession and then was beheaded, this being in 1338, and his accuser, D. Alonso Fernandez Coronel, lord of Aguilar and Motilla, when for other offences he came to die, confessed his false witness and God's justice.

Between King and Order

The history of these three years provokes reflections a little in the King's vein. The issue was between King and Order, a conflict of powers and a struggle for supremacy. One thing that he might have foreseen the King overlooked when he put in a man from Oviedo: that the west-country was never tamed by Castile till Ferdinand and Isabel wrecked it in the process. He thought to put in his creature, who would come at his whistle, and found like Doña Urraca at Santiago that a great corporate body takes up men into itself and remakes them in its own image. As D. Diego Gelmírez at Compostella from a poor clerk, the servant of the Count and Countess, became the superb Archbishop, Apostolical and Primatial, so the Master who began as intruso, and lived to fight and to lose against a later intruso, was remoulded by the Order to its service utterly.

An impersonal force remoulding men

The Master who began as the villain of a one chronicle play, ends as the protagonist of a second part: Chamiso will grow glorious likewise in part the third. So long as history related events and presented portraits, a man was good or bad, nor changed his colour before the bitter end. History to-day, since it offers neither events nor figures, only a vague welter of movements and tendencies, inextricable and indistinguishable, has bettered nothing here: but those who turn the dusty pages of old chronicles in search of life and emotion, of human motive and conscious or unconscious state-craft, may care to observe how a man can begin as a low sort

History not portraiture only

nor only record of tendencies of politician and end in the full glory of upholding a splendid and a foredoomed cause.

D. Nuño Chamiso

D. Nuño Chamiso fought in the Battle of Salada, though the Poem says no more than that Alcántara and Calatrava fought well: and he was in the siege of Algeciras. Later, carrying provisions to besieged Christians on the other side of the river, and fording it safely as he went, he was caught by the tide on the return, and drowned. At the siege as they lay, the knights elected the Keeper, D. Per Alfonso Pantoja: he was wounded there, and anon he died. His death is hardly noticed in the terrible mortality before that scorching city, to which the Black Death came earliest, in ships from the east perhaps.

The Black Death

His successor was a Guzmán, a cousin of Doña Leonor. At the death of D. Alfonso he stayed with her in Medina Sidonia. She gathered her friends there, gave out that the King had married her, and that her sons were legitimate, and said what she liked of the young King D. Peter. When her relatives pointed out that the King D. Alfonso when he knew her was already married, she said quite improper things that the Queen and D. Peter heard: they threatened the cabal and the gentry scattered. Then the King sent, summoning the cabal to appear either at the Cortes in Seville or at the siege of Gibraltar.

To this the Master replied that while he had no intention of changing the kingdom, nor had ever had, nor of doing anything in disservice of the King, yet, as his life was in danger, and because he was blameless, he purposed defending himself in the towns and lands of the Order. The King sequestered the rents and first-fruits, and ordered the knights to obey the Master of Calatrava, and Guzmán came back to obedience. He promised to serve no other King or Infant, and put all the castles except Alcántara in the hands of knights whom the King designated, and thereafter served King Peter loyally and faithfully and was Captain General at Morón in battle against the Moors.

News of his death came to King Peter before Toro. The tale that follows is a fair specimen of many that are told by Pero López de Ayala, as instances of King Peter's cruelty, yet it is hard to see what else any king would have done. He was—as Andrada says—a stubborn doer of his will: he was capable of great trust, and when he punished it was with finality. There under the battlements of Toro he called a chapter and urged the election of D. Diego Gutiérrez de Cervellos, who had not the habit of the Order, nor indeed any other, promising to send for an Apostolic Bull. He sent the new Master to Palanzuela with some knights of the Order and others secular: anon he heard that they were conspiring with the enemy. The King, learning the treachery of one he had so hardily sustained, wrote him to leave the siege to his cousin the Comendador Mayor: when he came he was arrested and taken to the Alcázar of Zamora, and evilly entreated. The charge was transferred to Juan Fernández de Ynestrosa. Cervellos escaped and fled to Aragon, and served the King there, having held the charge for fifty-eight days and never been professed. The King D. Peter called a chapter in Zamora and according to the statutes they elected the Keeper: he served the king well and died in Soria, 1371.

The Guzmán bastard was pressing D. Pedro hard. Martin López de Cordova was sent on an embassy to the King of England, having sworn that he would not help D. Enrique. He went with the King from Corunna to Bayonne to ask help from the Black Prince and in his absence was ousted by D. Enrique whom Pero López de Ayala is calling King, as Fernán Pérez de Guzmán calls D. Alonso King in the reign of Enrique IV. D. Pedro Nuñez de Godoy intended, by the usurper's help, to be, as he said himself, a great lord with two Masterships. The freyles of Alcántara petitioned the Pope, and the Mastership was put in commission with the Clavero in charge to await the event of history. When knights had fought on both sides after Nájera, there had been two Masters and two Keepers. Godoy was promoted to Calatrava, and Melén Suárez was elected Master.

Du Guesclin in the assassination

In 1371 King Peter died at Montiel: we all know how Du Guesclin lent a hand in the treachery and the assassination, and how a Gallegan spoke a canny word: "I make no kings, I break no kings, but I help my Lord." One wishes one might hear that quoted in testimony before the Judgment-Seat of God, and know if it were allowed or ruled out. There are fragments extant of a Romance of the Death of the King D. Peter, and though the popular imagination has a predisposition towards bastards it is moving:

The

of Montiel

And Henry's men
They sing, they slash and cry
"Hail, Henry, hail!"
And Peter's men

One Gallegan may be set against another: if an Andrada lent a hand to D. Enrique, it was Fernán Ruiz de Castro on whose tomb was written, in 1374:

None was better loved than King Peter, and in the midst of treason he commanded the perfect loyalty. Alcántara was faithful and preferred anything to D. Enrique: when the King of Portugal took up the title of the princess Doña Beatriz, the daughter of King Sancho the Bold, the Master stood with him, and the cities of Ledesma, Zamora, Ciudad Rodrigo, Coria, and most of Galicia. He was defeated by the Clavero, and fled to Portugal.

His successor, elected in absence by compulsion of the King, was D. Ruy Díaz de la Vega, chamberlain and intimate of D. Enrique, and brother of Doña Yñez Díaz de la Vega, by whom the King had certain daughters—King Henry having in fact a fairly wide connection in this regard.

One daughter, indeed, Doña Ysabel, was privately married to D. Gonzalo Nuñez de Guzmán before he took the habit of Alcántara; King Henry discovered and was wroth, and imprisoned him. King John I thereafter made him Master, and the lady, with her sister, took the Franciscan habit in S. Clare of Toledo. Always there was war with Portugal. In the battle of Aljubarrota, when the Master of Calatrava was killed, he was promoted to his place. Here is material of romance, a life-time-full: but less stirring than the story, a half-century before, of D. Gonzalo Nuñez of Oviedo.

of Aljubarrota

The "marvellous battle that was at Juberother," should be told by none but Froissart. The war had been kept up for the benefit of French mercenaries, and the Spanish chivalry was ill content:

"They would say that King could make no war but by the Frenchmen, and in like wise no more could his father"—in which they said truth, for King Peter had pacified Castile, more than once, and the allies of King Henry had ravaged it again.

They were Companions Adventurers and had nothing to lose. And on the other side the Master of Avis was a King's bastard who had made himself King in Portugal. His forces, with their English contingent, drew out from Lisbon: "And without the town a quarter of a league or there about, there was a great abbey of monks, whither they of Juberoth and of other villages were wont to come and hear mass, and the church standeth a little out of the way in a moat environed about with great trees, hedges and bushes: it was a strong place with a little help." They cut down the trees and laid them so as to encumber cavalry, and stationed their archers and cross-bowmen within the blockade; and when the Spaniards drew out to view the field the advisers of the King would have him wait for the morrow, Sir Diego Gómez Manrique, Sir Diego Pier Sarmiento, Pier González of Mendoza and the Great Master of Calatrava: but again the French urged on. So the King said at last, "I will in the name of God and S. James that our enemies be fought withal," and for the honour of God and S. George he made a hundred and forty-two knights there in the field. "There might have been seen among these new knights great nobleness, and they maintained themselves so nobly that it was a pleasure to behold them, for it was a fair battle." These, as named over, appear mostly Frenchmen, often Pyrenean, and the Spaniards were sullen, as they had been two centuries before at Alarcos, and they agreed softly among themselves to leave the vaward to the French.

fight

"The same Saturday was a fair day, the sun was turned towards evensong." Then the French advanced, and the English and Portuguese defeated them and took many: "So of these some were put to their finance incontinent: and some would abide their adventure: for they imagined that the King of Spain, with his great army, would shortly come and deliver them." And the news came to him. "Then the Spaniards began to ride a better pace, close together, in good order, and by that time the sun was near down." And when the Portuguese saw them approaching "then incontinent they ordained a piteous deed, for every man was commanded, on pain of death, to slay their prisoners, without mercy, noble, gentle, rich nor other, none except."

Prisoners

As the massacre ended the Spanish host charged.

Here Froissart pauses to give his opinion of the Spaniard as soldier, speaking as a half-English Frenchman, who in all the intricate policies of his age had always met him as a stranger and an enemy.

True it is at their first setting on they are fierce and courageous and of great courage and high-minded, if they have advantage. They fight well a-horseback, but as soon as they have cast two or three darts and given a stroke with their sword, and see that their enemies be not discomfited therewith, then they fear and turn their horses and fly away to save themselves that best may. And at this battle of Juberoth they used the same play [indeed it is very Arab, and it is what the frontier wars had taught them];

The Spaniard as soldier

as the
view him

for they found their enemies hard and strong and as fresh in the battle as though they had done nothing all of the day before, whereof they had marvel, and also that they heard no tiding of the vaward and knew not where they were become. There the Spaniards that evening were in the hard fortune of battle and perilous for them; for as many as entered into their strength [the Portuguese entrenchment] were by valiantness of feats of arms all slain.

Far more than at Nájera, says Froissart

And every man named above, and many more, were all slain; for indeed the Spanish chivalry, trained against the Moors, was inapt to meet the bull-dog English methods where masses and endurance were the measure of success.

“When the King of Castile understood and saw how his men were thus discomfited and that Sir Raynold Limousin was dead who was his marshal, and saw how all his noble chivalry were lost, as well of his own realm as of France and elsewhere, such as were come thither to serve him with their good wills, were lost, he was then sore displeased and wist not what counsel to take." At last "the king of Castile believed counsel and then changed his horse and mounted on a fresh charger, strong and light, whereon no man had ridden before of all day. Then the king strake the steed with his spurs and turned his back towards his enemies and took the way towards Santarem." And the King of Portugal refused to follow up the slaughter.

So there was a new Master of Calatrava.

But the Clavero of Avis, a Portuguese, Martínez de la Barbida, had not followed the Master of Avis, and the King made him Master of Alcántara. He is a figure out of the Romances and the long legends, a younger brother of the Infants of Lara. In the Moorish war he made a raid and took much booty, but a hermit betrayed him to the Moorish King and he was caught behind and before, and died with many knights of the Order and others secular. Some say, however, that he was captured, and taken to Granada, and there he had, by a Mooress, a son, who grew up in Granada and afterwards was Soldan of Babylon. He was buried in the church at Alcántara, and praised by his epitaph as one who never, for any cause, lodged fear in his heart.

*Aqui jaza quele que por neuma cousa

The next Master was a child of eight, the Infant D. Sancho, the son of the Infant D. Fernando the King's guardian. The prince talked politics to the Bishop of Palencia, offering to put the income of the Master into the Granada wars till he should come of age, and the Bishop replied translating it with pious phrases—it is good comedy—and the bargain was made. The little prince was a postulant in the Convent of Alcántara: but he died at seventeen. Queen Catharine, the King's other guardian, would have given the office then to the King's tutor, D. Gómez Carrillo of Cuenca, but D. Juan de Sotomayor was elected canonically and kept it. In the trouble, throughout this reign, with the Infants of Aragon, he stood by the Infant D. Enrique who was the Master of Santiago.

His story makes a racketing novel of the sort that youth relishes, with history enough to keep it sweet, and action enough to keep it plausible. A strong wind of adventure blows down the Chronicle of John II, and in the western confines of the kingdom, among Benaventes and Zuñigas, the forces of the great houses flood and subside like streams in spate. The average European reader will hardly recognize their names, most of them, and the story must be told more briefly here than either Fernán Pérez de Guzmán merits or the action that he presents.

The Infant of Aragon, D. Enrique, was in armed rebellion, and the King sequestered not only his goods in Castile which were great but those of the Mayorazgo of Santiago, which he held in usufruct. D. Álvaro de Luna, the Constable of Castile, went down to Estremadura to check his ravages there, the Masters of Calatrava and Alcántara being bidden to lend their aid, and the King of Portugal and his son D. Eduarte being requested not to harbour the cattle he was lifting and the rest of his loot. D. Álvaro's siege of Trujillo, in this emprise, is a good story but not to the present purpose: the Alcayde was a loyal servitor and the Constable, who was a great gentleman, knew how to honour him. The King himself arrived in time to take Montanches, and save the scruples of the Warden there. The Master of Alcántara meanwhile did nothing: D. Álvaro had taken command in his own marches, and moreover D. Enrique was his own friend: thirdly, the Orders, even where no precise hermandad or pact existed, were disposed to friendly action mutually, and knew how to use judicious inaction, or what the unions in Spain today call a passive strike, or even sabotage. The King gave a letter, a castle, and some money. The Master took action for a little while and slackened again. So the King issued letters of sequestration against him, and warned all men not to follow him or to pay their dues to the Maestrazgo, fearing his support of D. Enrique, and mistrusting that he might make over to him certain strongholds. At the same time he sent the Bishop of Cuenca to mediate as being his kinsman and friend: and with him a certain Doctor Franco: "and the King's intention notwithstanding was that the Master should not tarry in that region, for by reason of his suddenness none might be secure of him." Indeed, the whole of the west seemed to be up for the Infants of Aragon, and the Bishop learned from a devoted servant of the Master's that the Infants lay for him on the road home, and departed very ill-content, and the Master, being as aforesaid sudden, sent after him a message agreeing to everything and stating his requirements by the Clavero of the Order. So ends a chapter.

Negotiation

What he seems to have wanted was a free hand in his own parts: leave to stay on Portuguese soil, for instance, even if the King sent out a general summons: and amnesty for the past, and control of his own Maestrazgo, the estates and the privileges and rents thereof. So thereafter, as it happened, one Saturday morning in June, the eve of SS. Peter and Paul, his nephew, the Comendador Mayor, arrived to visit him, Frey Gutierre de Sotomayor. He was of the personal following of the rebel princes, and robbed as much as they or more, as the chronicle says, and moreover was consenting in all the harm they did throughout the land and to this end he had come: and he was, apparently, too much for the Master's quieter second thoughts. They had dined together, that June midday; after dinner the Keeper, and the Master's secretary, who had been involved in the compact, were put under arrest, and it was known that the Infants were present in the outskirts of the town.

Doctor Franco, when he knew this, gathered up his scarlet gown and pulled down his furred cap: he would for once have ridden a hard-trotting hack, only in order to go faster than a pace: he learned that the roads were held, and he might not go. In his lodging he hid his papers as best he might where they could not be found even by searching through his linen and silver and other property there: and came back to "the stronghold of Alcántara which is called the Convent," and faced the Master and asked some awkward questions: not a bad sort, Doctor Franco, in his long gown, with his scholarly pallor gone a little green in the cheeks and about the lips! Had the Master, perhaps (being notoriously sudden), changed his mind about the pledge not to admit the Infants to the city? Had he indeed sent for the Infants who were now in the suburb?

Truly, yes, replied the Master: moreover, his mind was changed about those pledges and compacts, and he would have the papers back again, please. Then said the Doctor "Impossible, for I have sent them to the King already." So the Master, leaving him under strong guard, went down to his lodgings and searched, but in vain; he cared more for the papers than the stuff, but being annoyed and desiring especially not only some pretty extensive pardons for the past, for him and his, that the King had signed, but also some other blank pardons, that would have been useful things to keep—being, as I say, vexed, he flung the things about and took the silver finally, and some gold money that a lad, the legist's body-servant, had, and apparently let his men take what they liked, including the beasts, so that nothing was left but what the Doctor had on when he went up the hill. The silver was given to the Infant D. Pedro, and the rest to his men or the Princes': lastly the lawyer's servants were all arrested.

The third

The third chapter is this. That night Doctor Franco talked long with the Comendador Mayor, and warned him that he and his uncle were in the wrong way, and made an impression on him. But on Sunday morning the Master handed over the Convent-fortress of Alcántara to the Infant D. Pedro, and handed over the lawyer, Doctor Franco, to the Infant D. Enrique, and with the last, set out from the town, and joined Ruy López Dávalos, whose father had been the Constable of Castile. The prisoner was in his charge. As they rode, the legist heard them talking over their plan, which was to put all that Alcántara controlled into the power of the Princes: at best this would have made such a situation for the crown as Enrique IV faced when D. Alfonso and Doña Isabel were at the head of the rebel nobles: at worst, it might have cost the kingdom. The Doctor listened: the Master was to go up towards Valencia de Alcántara with all the specie and plate that he could collect: the Prince was to turn toward Albuquerque of which he was Duke, and the Wardens of all the castles were to swear the same fealty to the Princes as to the Master himself.

Conspiracy and rebellion

But God has His own ways, and a little thing altered and defeated this dangerous plan. The road which runs up from Alcántara to Valencia, and that which turns off for Albuquerque, run all as one for two or three leagues: so the Master and the Infant rode together for these three leagues, or some such: and then the former decided to go with the other and have his escort for the treasure, sending some of his mounted men to Valencia, and some to Mayorago, a castle near by. And they were so angry

with him thereupon, that they would not go where he sent but left him there and scattered, save five or six squires. On the next day the party came to Albuquerque; the Master, not daring to lie in the town, went up to the castle with all his men, and put Doctor Franco in a tower there.

ruined the Master

The nephew had waited, as planned, for news from Valencia: when he learned where the Master and the treasure had gone, he suspected constraint; so also thought those with him and those left to garrison Alcántara; and a like message came from Valencia: moreover, some such possibility had been foreseen and provided for. So on July 1st, while the Prince D. Pedro was asleep in the hot noon, in the castle of Alcántara, the Comendador Mayor, the secretary who had been arrested, and others, ten or twelve men in all, came in with swords drawn where the Prince slept and took him. And all the town was glad.

In the next chapter the Admiral of Castile, D. Fadrique, and the Warden, D. Pero Manrique his brother, who were at Cáceres, being apprised of this, make haste to present themselves but are not admitted into the town. The Master was to be moved to the castle of Piedra Buena and the Keeper to come up from Alcántara to make sure he was not under restraint, for the Infant D. Enrique, rather, should be held in pledge for the services done him: however, it appears that the Master was actually held as a hostage. So the match was played out: the King removing from Valladolid to Salamanca to be nearer at hand, with all the coming and going of messengers, and D. Pedro being removed to Valencia de Alcántara, where another uncle of the Comendador Mayor was Warden, and could guard him better.

The historian has been hardly just to D. Juan de Sotomayor, who, for all his suddenness, was a good man in a bad place, and powerless more than once. Where the King had summoned him and sent the Bishop of Cuenca, the cleric had been afraid to enter the lands of Alcántara, and the Master had been afraid to leave them. In refusing to go to court, where his enemies held the King's ear, he had shown no more than common caution: and he had offered as hostages three nephews, all in the Order. Then those to whose interest it was, had convinced him the King meant death: and again fresh negotiations had failed because he could not trust the King's word. Now the pieces were so arranged upon the board that for him there was only check and mate in successive moves. A chapter of the Order sat in Alcántara, and deposed him for offences against the King, and elected in his stead D. Gutierre his nephew—whereby the King hoped still to keep D. Pedro under lock and ward.

The King moved again, down to Ciudad Rodrigo, and being there at Mass in the cathedral, the new Master did homage to him there, between the King's hands, and swore on the Cross and on the holy gospels to serve him well and loyally, and received the banner of the Order: and that day the King had him seated at his table and freed the city of Alcántara from certain taxes. He got the King's pardon for his uncle, furthermore, and allowed him a pension.

One remembers rather pitifully this

Greco's Portrait of a Knight presented by Saint Julian

Master D. Juan de Sotomayor, who, though of gentle blood, was the son of a poor squire that had married a farmer's daughter, and was so good a soldier that the Order had elected him gladly, and so poor a politician that being caught in the net of Castilian discontent he could not get free ever. His sudden rushes are like those of any other strong creature and untamed: it would seem that he ended as he had begun, fighting in stormy splendours. As for his nephew, the Master D. Gutierre, I know that in the Granada war, long after, he was trapped in a mountain pass where he should have died, but that a soldier, born in those parts, showed to him a secret path and some knights got away: whether he got away safe, and where he died, if so, I have forgotten. The great orb of D. Álvaro de Luna was dropping now in stormy decline, and in the red light of its setting the chroniclers cannot note the lesser stars.

Epilogue:
A good knight of Alcántara

A Chronicle Play:

Part I, The fall of D.
Gómez de Cáceres

A successor of his, D. Gómez de Cáceres y Solis, by an accident and a personal feud arising thence, was drawn into the wars of King Henry the Fourth's time. He had been the King's Major-domo. Again the story is laid in the west-country: he had married his sister to a noble gentleman of Trujillo called D. Francisco de Hinojosa: the wedding was at Cáceres. There were sports and feasting and knightly exercises. among these tilting at a tablado which was placed very high. The Clavero of Alcántara took a lance, instead of the wand used for the sport, and threw it over the top of this, and mocked the Master and the other knights as weaklings.

The bridegroom in especial was piqued. He called for the lance-playing (juego de cañas) and challenged the Clavero and by ill-luck just missed striking him twice in the face: the Clavero took a lance and struck him over the head. Then two kinsmen, the Master's brothers, tried to kill the Clavero, and indeed one hardly wonders, on this accumulation of insults: he defended himself until the Master arrived.

Sent off to the Convent of Alcántara, but released after a few days, he gathered his friends and relatives, took two castles, and made war on the Master. King Henry was well content, and promised the Mastership if he could win it. He took Coria and held it for nine months on its hilly promontory, then, by help of the townsfolk, he managed to take Cáceres, the Master's own town. The little war dragged on. Mosen Diego de Valera will have it that the Master ill-used Cáceres, where the Clavero had honourable kinsfolk: the account which the Order kept, as we have heard, was other. Then the young prince D. Alfonso died. The rebellious nobles were checked for an instant, though it cost them little to put his sister in his place.

Against the King Don Alfonso or Doña Isabel, all one

Monroy the Clavero—it is a Salamanca name and of the west-country—hearing that two hundred lances of the Master's were near Guadalupe, went down to fight them: they flung themselves into the town and he besieged them there. After the surrender he took their horses and arms and sent them packing, and the outcome of the whole was ruin for the dwellers in the steep, picturesque little town hanging on the mountain's flank.

It was Alvar Gómez of Ciudad Real, the King's trusted secretary, and a traitor, who had made the trouble between the King and the Master: "he was of low blood, so that of his lineage behooves no memorial," says Diego Enríquez del Castillo—base-born, base-spirited, is his meaning. He kept the two apart, lest they should understand each other and trust, until the King came down to give Trujillo to the Count of Plasencia. Then they met, and the King forgave all and gave him the cities of Badajoz and Cáceres, and at his request and that of the Master of Santiago, gave Coria to his brother D. Gutierre de Cáceres, and confirmed his title of Count. He did other favours at the same time, to the Keeper, D. Alonso de Monroy, who had been his loyal servitor unwavering. But the end was foreordained: Monroy raised a rebellion through all the Order, and indeed the Master had a heavy hand. The Commanders came up against him armed, and if he had not got to cover, and so made good his flight, he could have been taken or slain assuredly: and Alcántara was actually taken. The Master turned to an old ally, D. Alonso Carrillo, the rebel Archbishop of Toledo, and to the Count of Alba de Tormes, D. Fernán Álvarez de Toledo, and raised an army of fifteen hundred horse and twenty-five hundred foot: Monroy laid an ambush and took many, and when open battle was joined, defeated the Master and wounded him severely in the face. The Count of Coria came to his help, pledging Coria to the Count of Alba de Tormes to get reinforcements, and never got his town back: and when the forces moved the Keeper had burned all the bridges and boats upon the Tagus, and held the fords, so that they could not join, and Alcántara was besieged for thirteen months. Thence on—says the chronicler—the Master of Alcántara was always in decay, without the power to recover, so that he died not as Master of Alcántara, but as Gómez de Cáceres, which he was when he came to the King's household, for the sovereign justice of God is such that he never leaves such ingrates without punishment. So, like David, the good chaplain comforts himself, in a world where he had seen the wicked flourishing like a green bay tree.

The on-looker appreciates the irony of events

We may find some satisfaction ourselves in knowing that Monroy was to reap the advantage and the place for which he had planted and watered; nor could he be cut down.

The Mastership was wanted, indeed, elsewhere. The Duchess Leonor Pimentel, of the great house of Benavente, and her husband, D. Álvaro de Zuñiga, the Duke of Plasencia, wanted the place for their son and plotted with the lord of Belvis, D. Fernando de Monroy, who held the Convent; but D. Alonso the Clavero by a stratagem seized it, called a chapter, had D. Gómez de Cáceres deposed and himself elected.

Part II, the Rise and

He had been brought up by D. Gutierre de Sotomayor who was his mother's brother, but not from him had he learned rebellion and ingratitude, for the second Sotomayor, as has appeared, took an odd sort of care of his uncle even when supplanting him. Monroy got himself re-elected when the Master died; not even that could bring peace.

One time he besieged three castles at once, and for two years Estremadura was racked by cruel war. The Master of Santiago and the Countess of Medellín favoured the three besieged Wardens, and so great was the evil that there was no safety in field or in town, nor dared the labourers sow, not knowing if they might reap. D. Francisco de Solis, who was holding out in vengeance for his uncle, at the last offered to surrender, the terms being a fixed sum of money and a bastard daughter of the Master's to wife. So the wedding was contracted. Solis allowed only six men, and those unarmed, to come in with Monroy and his daughter, the bride to be: at supper the first course served was two heavy fetters of iron, on silver platters: and hard thereupon D. Fernando came in and took him. He said, "Is this my son? Is this a gentleman's act?" and the answer was prompt: "You may be the devil's father but you will not be mine."

They put him in prison, fettered and chained: D. Francisco got himself elected, and the question of Monroy's life was discussed at length. The Duchess again asked for the Mastership for her son. The King gave her leave to appeal to the Pope, and the Bulls came. So she held, in her young son's name, the castle and town of Alcántara. Meanwhile, in the prison, Monroy had found, after six months, some old catapult-cords, and of these he made a rope. Then, putting shoes on his hands to protect them (it would seem that they should have been alpargatas), from a very high window he slipped down, but with the weight of the chains he wore the rope broke, and he fell heavily. It dislocated a leg, nevertheless he crept on all fours to a lower wall and got over that, dragging his useless leg. The hill beyond was thickly wooded, but he knew he would be searched for there, and he hid in a copse in the plain, but next morning they found him and took him back. He lay in a dungeon ten months more. The end of the story is as romantic and irrational as the rest: when the Catholic Kings came to the throne D. Francisco took their part and fought for them against the Portuguese: he was defeated, and wounded, and his horse fell on him. There, as he lay, he asked a foot-soldier to help him: the man had been a servitor of D. Alonso de Monroy, and he killed him as he lay.

So D. Alonso got out, and collected some of his own men and some roving ruffians, and made war on D. Juan de Zuñiga, and the Duke wrote up for the Duchess who was in Arévalo, to come down and defend her son now. The Dukes of Plasencia were of the party of the King of Portugal and the Excellent Lady Doña Juana: therefore the Catholic Kings sustained Monroy, and with the help of their letter he got some gentlemen about him, and campaigned against the Portuguese. After various victories the Queen received and thanked him but she said nothing about the Mastership. With his old adaptability he made friends with the Countess of Medellín, who held Merida—though in truth this belonged to the Order of Santiago. They joined the other party, took plenty of castles, and wasted and ravaged. At last, as is well known, Queen Isabel and the Infanta Beatrice made a peace, and Monroy got his pardon and his own property back but resigned the title.

Epilogue:
Review of the protagonists 1. Don
Juan de Sotomayor

It is tempting to pause here, like King Henry's chaplain, and reviewing the vista of two life-times draw a moral or twain. The readiest one is that the protagonist always wears the dress of a hero, and how often soever the actor may change, the mask and the voice are noble always. D. Juan de Sotomayor had risen from low estate, he had stood by D. Enrique de Aragon, who was Master of Santiago, even in rebellion against the King; and his nephew, D. Gutierre, who had a powerful uncle in the Comendador of Valencia, was a better politician and supplanted him. Nevertheless, D. Gutierre was, in his way, loyal to his predecessor, and he trained one who was to be a good successor.

2. Don Gutierre de

Against D. Gómez de Cáceres y Solis,

Master, stood D. Alonso de Monroy, Keeper: from their first appearance they were arrayed against each other, perhaps by old hostility of bandos, perhaps by elective antipathy. D. Gómez had been made by King Henry, had left him and was to come back to him, like the Master of Santiago, D. Juan Pacheco. Supplanted he still kept his title, and his striking attitude: the figure of a wronged man moves across the stage in his person.

3. Don Gómez de Cáceres

Monroy is the intruder, the sower of sedition, the wronger, up to the last possible moment: then with his brief elation and cruel downfall he becomes the sympathetic personage in turn. The one blameless figure, D. Francisco de Solis, gets the least out of it: a striking gesture, a quick reply, and a tragic taking-off, no more.

4. Don Alonso de Monroy

The deuteragonist D. Francisco de Solis

The thirty-seventh Master, D. Juan de Zuñiga and Pimentel, reckoned his names and his lineage along the old Silver Road. He served with distinction in the conquest of Granada. The Queen Doña Isabel arranged with some principal knights of the city of Plasencia that they should withdraw from the obedience and fealty of the Duke D. Álvaro—the Master's father—and come under the royal crown: these took up arms and drove out the Duke's officers and besieged the fortress, that tower still strong where white pigeons coo and mate in the sunshine now. The Duke discreetly gave it up to the Kings and was called thereafter Duke of Béjar. Next the Kings claimed the Mastership when it should fall vacant, and Innocent VIII and Alexander VI gave Bulls to that effect: within two years thereafter John was invited to resign. He was discreet as his father had been: with three knights and three clerks he retired to a convent that he built in Villanueva de la Serena, and that was the end of the Order. D. Juan became later Archbishop of Seville, and the Pope made him a Cardinal: finally he died when on a visit to Guadalupe and lies among the innumerable unknown dead, great lords and kings and pilgrims, at the sanctuary there.

The history of the Order began and ended in the west-country, along the Roman road that was called Camino de Plata, and the great feats, the sudden incidents, the play of motives belong all to border and ballad stuff.

A ballad-literature that lacked its blind beggars

The Order of Monte Gaudio has been mentioned twice already, and some account must now be indicated of that strange offshoot from Santiago whereof a slip was planted in Aragon and flourished for a while only to be grafted into the tree of the Temple; and how, from the overthrown stock in the west, a new branch grew up and was cut down at last.

The Lesser Orders

Monte Gaudio

One of the original ruffianly founders of the Order of Santiago (thus the tale opens) was a count of Sarria, Rodrigo Álvarez by name, a nephew, cousin and great-grandson of kings. In one of his adventures he had burned the Church of S. Mary at Toral—which I take to be Toral de los Vados on the Way of S. James, that at this day still lacks a proper house of God. His parents were noble and pious, and were the founders and patrons of the Cistercian abbey of Meira in the diocese of Lugo, whereof the present writer hopes to give a good account next year. In the archives there Yepes had seen a document signed after his father's death, which calls him Count and also Master of the Milicia of Monte Gaudio. In 1170, however, and for a few years thereafter, he was still only a great lord and a gallant figure, attendant on the King's person in September of that year at Alba de Tormes: then his name appeared among those of the founders of the Order of S. James of the Sword. In September of 1172 the King of Portugal gave over to that new Order the city of Abrantes and castle of Monte Sancto on the express condition that the Comendador Mayor, Count Rodrigo, should hold it and none other.

Count

Why he quit the Order it is hard to guess. The original Bull is lost by which he founded a new one of his own, but from the confirmation that has survived, and succeeding documents, we know that in 1173, at some time between the 7th of July and the 24th of November, before the Cardinal-legate Jacinto, then probably in Zamora, he renounced the habit of S. James, seeking a stricter rule. His own Order was, like that of Calatrava, put under the Cistercian Rule, and gathered men to it fast, it would appear, and gifts also; Padornelo, of the Pilgrims' Road, was one donation, and another Linar de Rey hard by. There was probably an affiliation to the Abbey of Moreruela, such as Montesa accepted to SS. Creus.

another order

Yepes says that the Order of Monte Gaudio owned many villages in Castile, Catalonia and Valencia, being called in the latter kingdoms Mongoja; it had nine Masters, and Ferdinand the Saint incorporated it with Calatrava. The freyles wore a red mantle and a silver star: some have thought that the Order of Trujillo proceeded therefrom.

The nine Masters must have ruled simultaneously or overlapping at times, and indeed it is a strange thing how suddenly—perhaps when the King married a daughter of the house of Lara, and Castile had the say in Leon—the Aragonese gifts are multiplied and those of Leon ignored. In 1175 at Saragossa the Count received, among other donations, Fuentes de Alfambra, and thereafter a great number of frontier towns. The Bull of 1180 mentions gifts over-seas as well: Teonasaba was ceded by King Baldwin; el Palmar and the Tower of the Maids. at the city of Ascalon, these both given by Guy of Ascalon; and in Lombardy the Bridge of Amallone with other holdings, given by the Marquis of Monferrat and his wife.

The
founder's death

Probably about 1187 or 1188 Count Rodrigo died: his body lies in Alfambra. One or two Masters or commissioners ruled uneasily; then, after a little while, the names are changed: Frey Gasco appears and another Italian, Frey Fralmo de Lucca, who, in 1196, was Master. Finally the Order was aggregated to the Temple with all its goods, though certain knights' names are missing among the signatures. The Hospital of the Redeemer at Teruel seems to have lent a name, as it was itself a member of the Order in those parts; and a long time thereafter Fraga was still held by the insubmissive few, and the Templars were put to it to recover what was theirs.

Fraga

Meanwhile the west was again alive. Monfrac or Monfrague, a castle on the Tagus, belonged to D. Froila Ramírez and his wife, Doña Urraca González. The King gave it to Santiago in 1171. Taken by the Moors, it was given perhaps on recovery to Trujillo, and again in 1197 to the Order of Monfrac and the Master of it, D. Rodrigo González. In 1206 and 1210 the Order was making exchanges with other Orders. But by this time the greater Orders of the west were well established, it had no chance in the competition, and in 1221 it was, as already said, incorporated with Calatrava, apparently by a fresh outburst of the same spirit that had led the first Master to move out of Leon sooner than submit to the domination of his next neighbours.

In 1218 it was incorporated with Alcántara and Calatrava, says the historian, which can only be interpreted to mean that, in the Scripture phrase, "they of the household divided the spoil."

The Order
of S. George

The Order of S. George of Alfama was founded by Peter I of Aragon, on September 24, 1201. The King gave the Wild of Alfama, in the Diocese of Tortosa, to found a castle and Order to hold back the Hagarenes. The first Superior was a Catalan knight, D. Frey Juan de Almenara, who is said to have been in deacon's orders, the donation being to him and Martin Vidal, and those who should succeed in the Order. There the knights obeyed the Rule of S. Augustine for a hundred and seventy-two years without pontifical approbation, but they had probably the Bishop's. It was such an order as many another of those that sprang up and withered away from Gerona to Trujillo: none grudged them here their life under Augustinian Rule, or their seat in the Coll de Balaguer, and it lived on unmolested. A hospice had been there from almost unknown antiquity. A text of 1567 says:

“The sea forever beats on the Mount of Alfama: they built a castle thereon with walls armed, a large patio or cloister, with dorter at the right and church at the left, with five windows that look to tramontana and ponente, and three openings to the east, a sacristy and other offices, like the chapter-room, the refectory, the kitchen and yet more: all made with simple artifice as the ruins to-day attest, and the ancient walls.” They wore the white habit with red cross. “S. George himself appeared therein in these kingdoms, divers times, favouring the Christians and killing the Moors with his sight and his sword.”

In 1373 King Peter IV got a Bull from Gregory XI with a Rule, and the King in Barcelona knighted the Master. For twenty-seven years the Order was rich and active and then King Martin, in 1400, incorporated it with Montesa. The business was done in Avignon, by John XXII, and Montesa gave up the black cross and wore S. George's. The Master D. Berenguer March took possession of what goods there were in Aragon, Valencia and Catalonia. Mallorca, and Sardinia—a small heritage it was except in honour. Two Priorates lasted on, S. George of Alfama and S. George of Valencia. There had been ten Masters in all, from Juan de Almenara, elected in 1202, to Francisco Ripolles who resigned in 1400 but lived until after 1414.

The ruined castle still shelters two or three quaint memories: as that of the May Day in 1608 when the Rector of the parish church of Santiago in Tortosa was jogging along on his mule quietly to visit his uncle the parish priest of Vallfogona de Reus, and the pirates seized him and carried him off. There in Algiers he died the next year, the poor Reverend D. Miguel Bons. But in 1650 the Spanish galleys demolished the castle by cannon-fire to keep the French from taking it.

The Hospice lay (so far as this writer can make out) somewhat up-hill and inland from the present station of Hospitalet. In 1310 Queen Blanche of Anjou, the second wife of D. Jaime II the Just, being on her way from Barcelona to Valencia to attend the siege of Almeria. was struck by the need of Christian service there. The rocky headlands are both steep and wild, even to this day, and before steam bored the rocks and built up the mountain-flanks, where today the trains fleet and shriek along the land's edge the ways were very lonely. Pilgrims and travellers had cause to bless her name. She died not long after in Barcelona, but she made a provision in her will for the work, and the King carried it on, and the Hospice was finished in 1343 by their son, the Infant D. Pedro of Aragon, count of Ribagorza, for whose sake, and because of his arms over the door into the keep, it was called Hospitalet del Infante. It played a good part in the revolution of 1640, like so many other places small in size but noble in spirit, along that indomitable east coast.

of Montesa

Montesa was a younger sister though a richer. It has been said already that when the Order of the Temple was destroyed, and the King of France and the Pope in Avignon laid hand on the wealth of it, the kings in the Peninsula took measures to save what they could. Out of these resources D. Dionis of Portugal created the Order of Christ or of Avis, in 1318.

Ruin of
Templars

The Councils of Tarragona and Salamanca had declared the Templars innocent, but in vain: in the great tenth chapter of his Fifteenth Book Mariana tells their fate in Castile. In Aragon the Templars defended themselves stubbornly, offering to submit to a Council of the Pope and the Cardinals, or to disband and go into other orders, but not submitting to be extinguished under the charge of heresy: that also was in vain. Mioravel withstood besiegers for nine months: Monzón held out till 1309. Yangüas has a story of the Castle of Tudela: the seneshal, when he delivered it by inventory, in 1308, to Hutier de Fontaines, reported:

“Two men to be arrested: as summoned, here is D. Frey Domingo de Exexa, Comendador of Ribaforada: as for D. Frey Gil de Burueta, deceased, who is buried by the porch where suits were heard, I doubt if your words can be heard there.”

Philip the Fair and Clement V were both notoriously greedy, says Villanueva, and withstood the combined effort of the Kings of Aragon, Castile and Portugal. The King's secret orders to his emissary were to get the property and try for a new order: he offered for that “his castle of Montesa, very noble, apt and strong, situate in the frontier of the Moors.” In 1317 John XXII gave a Bull to institute a new Order of Knighthood in the Castle of Montesa, from knights of Calatrava. The Pope wrote to the Master of Calatrava and the Abbot of SS. Creus and under these the foundation was made: the new order was to have the privileges, graces, prerogatives and immunities of Calatrava but the Master and knights were to be distinct, to reside in Valencia, and to wear their crosses with a difference. The Abbot of SS. Creus was to name the first Master from the Order of Calatrava. Supervisors of a sort, partly protective—for they were to see that the Knights of S. John did not molest—were the Bishop of Tortosa, the Abbot of Valdigna and the Casiscol of Gerona.

D. García
López de
Padilla

The Master of Calatrava was not enthusiastic perhaps, certainly not prompt: the King was impatient and the Pope wrote to the Bishop of Valencia that he must be made to come down and proceed. He did not, but he empowered the Comendador of Alcañiz. The ceremony was in the Royal Palace at Barcelona, on July 22, 1319, being present the Comendador Mayor D. Frey Gonzalo Gómez, the Abbots of SS. Creus, Benifaza and Valdigna, the Military Knights of the Order of S. John, S. George and the Merced, and many secular knights. Mass was said in the slender Gothic chapel of S. Agueda, under the delicate painted roof, and the habit was given there to D. Guillén de Eril, D. Garceran de Billera, D. Erman de Eroles, all formerly knights of S. John. When the habit had been given they were further professed and finally license given to D. Guillén to admit others. He was an old knight, a mirror of virtues and military experience, norm of all those of his time and inferior to none in nobility. So the King presented eight knights to him for admission, among them two of his own brothers, and made over Montesa, castle and surroundings. He set out to take possession, fell ill, and died at Peñíscola.

There are signs here that the Hospital and Calatrava were played off against each other at the foundation. The old Master was probably chosen as unlikely to live too long. Ten Knights of Calatrava were ready to take charge till another could be elected, but the King, not much disposed towards this, and sending down two monks from SS. Creus, asked leave to appoint the new Master: he was refused. Incidentally, the townsfolk of Montesa disliked the transfer. The Master of Calatrava at this time was D. Garci López de Padilla, who enforced the claims of his Order to visit and command in Alcántara, and certainly he intended to maintain as much, and reached out as long an arm, in the east as in the west. Ultimately the whole proceeding of Calatrava was repeated da capo: but the Abbot of SS. Creus got in his appointee, D. Frey Arnaldo de Soler, who took possession on March 21, 1319.

The Order, however, claimed in the Kingdom of Valencia to be subjected immediately to the Cistercian Chapter-General, without any other jurisdiction. On the other hand, no Rule was given in the foundation, on the ground that it was not a new Order. It lived under the Rule of S. Benedict, with the three statutes that Cîteaux had given to Calatrava, and the Definitions that in 1283 and 1304 the Abbot of Morimundo had formulated: but in 1326 the "Master of Calatrava of Castile" visited Montesa and gave Definitions.

By the Rule as adapted the knights could eat meat on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Sundays; they fasted on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays from Holy Cross Day to Easter, excepting Candlemas, Christmas and Epiphany, All Saints, and any Apostle's day. Julius II commuted this on condition of their giving a meal one day a year to twelve poor persons. Fast-days, they had bread and wine, which is what the Tuscan or the Spanish peasant still eats, and labours in the strength thereof. They slept in one dormitory, not in separate cells.

In the early years, their hair was cut and their faces shaven: they wore white cloaks abroad except in stormy weather, and then the covering might be of any honest colour. Under Philip II, in 1588 the Mastership was incorporated in the Crown of Aragon.

The ending

Great figures there were, however, in the Order, and among the foremost of them that Luis Despuig long resident in the Kingdom of Naples and high in the esteem of Alfonso the Magnanimous, who sent him somewhere on business with the Castellan of the Castle of S. Angelo on December 7, 1441. Again he wrote back a report from home that arrived from Valencia on the first of June, 1452; and in September of 1455 the King bestowed on him the collar of the Jarro, adorned with the device of Our Lady and "30 giaretti e 30 tronchi." Here—and it is the only time—the erudite Italian who thirty years or more ago published quaint extracts from the accounts of the Neapolitan Realm, transcribed correctly the good rough Catalan name. That same Order of the Jar herein referred to (the Jar itself being the Lily-pot of our Lady's Annunciation with its three branching lilies) was a pretty toy, and the goldsmiths in Naples made many a dainty piece with a pendant griffin and enamels and gems thick all about, but it is a decoration rather than a brotherhood, and a courtly rather than a military order. As here appears, a man might wear it and still be the Keeper of Montesa and call himself Frey Luis Despuig. The historians of the Order are not concerned, like Caro de Torres, or like Rades y Andrada when he writes alone, with hazañas, great men and great deeds, adventures and personalities, but for the most part with dignities and privileges. For instance:

The Master of Montesa is spouse of his church, and when he dies she calls herself a widow: he cannot be excommunicated: he has no superior but the General of the Cistercian Order: he is inferior in order to the priests but superior in jurisdiction: and the like. This is partly due to the later date of many of the histories—there is a century's difference or more—partly to the later foundation of the Order. How should these supple levantine courtiers be mindful of the great traditions, or measure the great standards, as when Spain and all Europe were at stake? The difference is curious notwithstanding: it is a measure of the isolation, and the integrity, of Castile.

of Santiago

The history of the two great Orders of Calatrava and Santiago is inextricably intertwined, and like twin stars you measure their rising and their setting together. Beginning now with the Order and Knighthood of S. James of the Sword, which was organized under D. Pedro Fernández of Fuentencalada in 1170, and sanctioned by a Bull of Alexander III in 1175, it appears in all books of history undistinguishable from the other except by name and badge and details of the Rule. Notwithstanding the difference is fundamental and very profound. The traditions of the Order look back to an earlier date. A confraternity of S. James at Leon claimed the recognition of S. Isidore at the camp before Baeza in the time of Alfonso the Emperor, and for this Luke of Tuy vouches. "Instituted in the kingdom of Leon or Galicia about 1170," says Rades y Andrada, "but many years before there was a Brotherhood of Knights of S. James without form of Religion." At the very mention of this confraternity, historians become uneasy: it seems possible that brotherhood

something real and not perhaps to be blushed for as homely or bourgeois lies in the dim backward of time, earlier in the twelfth century.

The official account may be examined first.

Where the Way of S. James runs through Leon, it crosses the river Esla. From time immemorial there has been a bridge there, and before the bridge and beside it a ford, and for the up-keep and care of this a hermitage with a chapel. A hospice grew up: a building, that is, was erected where any pilgrim might sleep and the sick stay "till they were well or dead"—as in the Hospital del Rey in a similar situation at Burgos. Money was found, chiefly in the form of rents charged on real estate, to feed the lodgers and the attendants and give a bowl of broth and a piece of bread to any one who passed, hungry and on the tramp. I think a mediaeval institution of this sort might never refuse a dole, when asked, lest it should be found to have refused the Lord. If not an unmixed good (what institution is that?) it had great advantages: men travelling in search of work, or on other secular business, would not be frozen to death or exhausted by starvation, who could scarcely have carried the price of their hotel bills at a time when money was scarce and much of the exchange of the world was carried on in other commodities. The brothers knew how to protect their institution and conserve their resources, getting returns in kind, or labour, or other service, or in that care for the humanity that needed it which the Middle Age recognized as a good like any other goods. And indeed there was probably less deliberate graft in any one century in Spain (for instance) from the ninth to the fifteenth inclusive, than in enterprises which governments paid for between 1914 and 1919. Between the last pilgrim's hospice and the first penny night-refuge yawns a gulf of centuries: a black gulf that pride cannot bridge; therein lie the Protestant Reformation and the Council of Trent and the Industrial Revolution.

It rested with those in charge, as I have said, that due return should be made by those who could afford it, and that what was given for use should not be spent on sloth or luxury: and the Master of the Hospice at Leon was a Canon of the Rule of S. Loy. So the old documents state. No one seems to know much about such an order: the name, however, comes from that Bishop of Noyon and minister of the good King Dagobert, S. Eligius, who was also a goldsmith and a blacksmith. Besides making an espousal ring for S. Godeberte, he once shod a demon horse, as Nanno de Banco depicted in a niche at Or San Michele: in short, the enchanted white horse of S. James is somehow in the story or accountable for the association.

The Order
of S. Loy

The Prologue to the Rule of the Order says: That all the Kings of Spain were at war together, that Moors innumerable had passed the sea, and that thirteen knights set the cross on their breast in the likeness of a sword, with the badge of the invocation of the Blessed Apostle S. James, and ordained that they would fight no Christians nor hurt their goods; and they renounced and gave up honours and worldly pomp, rich clothes, and long hair; and covenanted to abstain from what Scripture forbade and to keep only what Scripture allowed. Really, this is, already, quite unlike the foundation of Calatrava. The knights, we are told elsewhere, swore to live in obedience to a superior, to keep poverty of spirit and conjugal chastity. There is a curious but persistent tradition that the original thirteen were reformed highwaymen, who bound themselves by oath to protect and guide travellers along the Way and submitted and allied themselves to the Canons of S. Loy with this intent. The knights must be poor and humble, without personal property, and the community would give to them what they needed in sickness and health, and likewise to their wives and children. The clerks were to take charge of the education of the children, besides other duties. This is the account of La Fuente, writing in the nineteenth century with elder historians before him. He mentions casually, elsewhere, that by the original Rule any knight who hiciese alarde de noblesa, who boasted of nobility, did public penance in the refectory.

Humility essential

This is a strange story: who are these strange brethren that live together like primitive Christians in community of goods and perfect brotherhood, sharing all, injuring none, aiding the helpless, meek and lowly of heart? From time to time some people have been like that, and have called themselves the friends of God: in Milan in the eleventh century, in France in the twelfth, in south Germany in the fifteenth. There were some in Umbria in the twelfth century, led by a certain Francis: there were some in Galicia in the fourth, adherents of a Bishop Priscillian. They were never much liked by other people, and were extirpated now by sword and now by flame; nor did the authorities call them friends of God, but heretics generally, and in special cases (in the eleventh and twelfth centuries) by such names as Patarins, Catharists, and Albigenses. It is not impossible that the Order of S. James, like some other pacifists, barely escaped extermination by going into the army.

Friends of

Luke of Tuy yields evidence on cross-examination

There seems, upon examination, a fair amount of evidence. Luke of Tuy when he lived at Leon was a fine hunter-out of Albigenses, and had his hands full: the whole twenty-third volume of España Sagrada, which deals with the early history of the diocese, is full of Albigenses: some are shepherds from the hills; some are clerks in orders, of the city; they work miracles of their own. Europe in these centuries was full of this sort of feeling: on a map of France in the twelfth century you could spot such springs bursting up all over the realm. How much of the Priscillian temper had lasted or what like manifestations followed I cannot say, for I have not access to the long-out-of-print original Historia de los Heterodoxes en España, but I know that Rades y Andrada has a vague certainty that the beginnings of the Order of Santiago were somewhere in Galicia. And of beginnings amidst religious mysticism

however palpable a forgery may be the charter of the Comendadoras del Santo Spirito in Salamanca, he insists that a document of 1120 shows the Order in Leon, and another record of about the same time preserves the memory of a dispute with the Canons of S. Isidore about precedence in processions. This last we feel credible.

The habit in the early days was a red cloak, of cloth or silk, with the cross and a cockle-shell thereon: the banner of the Order bore a red cross like that of Calatrava with five cockleshells for a difference. The thirteen—los trezes—whose function was advisory to the Master, and who came to constitute a sort of Elder Statesmen—wore for the Chapters-General a black cassock and biretta like Canons Regular. Besides these there were two Priors, one at Uclés and one at Leon, that both used the mitre, the crozier, and other episcopal insignia by Papal permission: a Comendador Mayor of Leon and another of Castile.

From this it appears that the difficulty which beset the Master of Calatrava, who ruled houses in Castile and Aragon, was nothing to that of the Master of Santiago, since here the lesser branch was also the elder, and abated no rights. Actually, the Order was called "of Ucles" often enough and the First Chronicle General, that tells in one chapter How the Masters of Calatrava and of Alcántara and of Alcañiz conquered the Moors, relates on the next page Another good adventure of the Master of the Order of Uclés and his Brethren. Verbalists that we are, we would tie up the past as hard and fast as ourselves in formulae and phrases, but there was a kind of liberty of spirit while men thought still in images and emotions. When D. Pedro Fernández de Fuentecalada had not yet been to Rome about the Bull, he went down with his knights to Cáceres in guerilla warfare, raided, burned and robbed, and got back safe to Coria; then helped the King and others to take Cáceres, and received it as a gift for the new Order, and put a convent there. So they were called Freyles de Cáceres, and helped the King at Badajoz, and many towns were given to be lost again. The King of Castile gave them a castle on the Tagus near Fuentedeuna, and then shortly after, Uclés, six leagues nearer to the Moors. This was in 1174. The next year the Master crossed the sea with some freyles, and secured the Bull, having evidently stipulated the terms. "Like all the company of the faithful, they are divided into married and single," it says: and this indeed must have been always a factor in the spiritual life of the Order, that a gentleman could live normally, like those in the world about him, and yet keep his vows. The Chapter-General is held at All Saints' when the season of raids and expeditions is over, and indeed All Saints' is a fit day for Santiago as Lord of the Dead. Where a parish church exists, bishops are not to be defrauded of their rights, but in desert places and these newly recovered, if they build churches, the bishops are not to meddle, or to exact tithes. None of the Order may be excommunicated except by a Papal Legate.

Uclés

The gateway of the hills

Like the other great seats and strongholds of the Orders, Uclés is reared upon a grand site. The castle tops a low hill-crest, looking over the wide brown plain to the mountains that encompass the Castilian upland, straight towards where, unsleeping, like a chained lioness, Cuenca still couches in the gateway of the hills. Of the castle two brown towers and a curtain wall rise against the twilight sky from far, and battlements and ruins break the clear light, and two or three enclosed chambers yet stand that have been cloven or nibbled away here and there, and have harboured a few sheep in the wilderness. Just below, the huge cold mass of the sixteenth-century convent and church spread out four-square like a grimmer and lonelier Escorial: the road winds and turns, coming up from below, beneath its grey monotonous flanks; and before the huge portal, with flanking towers, pediment and buttresses, lies only a narrow parvis on top of enormous substructures. All day I had been travelling towards it, first in a train, then through a town in fiesta, lastly for five leagues or more in the slow-moving carrier's cart over moors and between vineyards. From afar we had seen the landmark that defined itself more clearly as each successive eminence was topped, and the gentle folk my fellow-travellers had left their own discourse to question a little about my land. "Ah, America!" said the old woman, "silk, and pañuelos de Manilla": it was for them the place of dreams. The civil lad, who was a Singer Sewing Machine agent, asked me to state to the company whether he lied in affirming that his house in New York occupied a building fully twenty-two stories high: and I confirmed him, upon my word of honour: then the conversation turned to what seemed to them far more credible, an aërial railway—and the present writer endeavoured earnestly to explain how it looked and functioned. As the castle loomed again in warm colour, now, above the white-washed houses huddling up from the river-bank, the death of the Prince D. Sancho was spoken of, and the immortal glory of the Knights of S. James. The Singer Sewing Machine agent pointed from under the hood of the cart, to sum up: "Ruin and poverty and great memories—that is Spain!" said he. I did not leave the sad word undisputed.

Meditation in twilight

At eventide I was sitting on the short brown turf under the sun-warmed wall of the castle, and looking out over the plain in the darkening rose-coloured twilight, where the sky was streaked with pinkish brown and the endless earth lay before me, a brownish-pink like antique tarnished gold-work. It was like looking at some ancient Chinese painting, embrowned by the dusky centuries, fraught with the deep and untroubled wisdom of the timeless past. The warmed and windless air, the dusty rose of the ineffable distances, were elder even than the glorious past I had travelled so far and so painfully to evoke.

mystery

They could appease. The Spanish landscape, with its strange colourings, its mysterious and unaccustomed contours, its imperishable memories of a long-lived race, often hapless but never ignoble, has, I am disposed to believe, the same power as the landscape of the age of Sung, to stir the spirit, and woo it and lead it away. Partly this may be due to the accumulated associations, by which a wayside stone, a mountain valley, and the half-ruined tower of a parish church, can testify of ancestral virtues or poetic utterance not to be forgotten by men. Partly, however, as I think, it is due to the palpable and visible beauty of the land itself, that actual and respirable loveliness which is like the skin and hair of a beautiful woman, the sheer painting in the picture, the contours and shadows and patina in the statuary's art. The distances, the altitudes, the colourings, the drift of light and movement of cloud in Spanish landscape, are present to consciousness like the modulations of sound and enhancements of concrete imagery that it lays hold of in some great poetry, and this I think is a part of the power of Sung landscape also: the conception that constantly strives to penetrate beyond the presentation, and the immediate power of line and tone that will not let it escape,

In 1176 the Master and knights were helping Alfonso IX against the King of Navarre who had seized Navarrete, Logroño and other places that made up the old Kingdom of Nájera: the Moors raided Uclés and the King collected to help this Order, Templars and those of Calatrava, and they took Cuenca and on the way home recovered Uclés. Thence the Master went on to the Holy Land, perhaps to found a convent there: at any rate Bohemond of Antioch gave him certain castles. The Order of Calatrava still held the royal titles to Uclés, and now the Master was able to acquire these in exchange for the city of Alcobella. He died in that year and was buried in S. Marcos: I have quoted his epitaph in The Way of S. James. Two Masters were elected, but D. Frey Sancho Fernández of Lemos, elected to León, after two years resigned: he was a priest and the King gave him the monastery of S. Audito in the Buytrago hills, and Fernández-Díaz of Avila ruled the whole Order alone. Under him was founded the Hospital of Santiago de los Caballeros in Toledo; and other hospitals in Avila and Talavera; likewise a convent of nuns, S. Euphemia de Cozollos, which received also the wives of knights who elected to live celibate; this Ferdinand and Isabel removed to S. Fé in Toledo, where tourists may still remark the Cross of the Order. Two years later the hospital in Cuenca was founded and well dowered by Tel Pérez de Meneses, and D. Pedro Gutiérrez; likewise another in Alarcón; and the same Tel Pérez, lord of Meneses, founded the hospital in Villamartín near Carrion. The Order still accepted its original obligation of the Works of Mercy and caring for those along the Road: it kept too its western affiliation and received the gift of certain heritages in Noya, on the blue tidal estuary of the Atlantic shore. When Castile and Leon went to war, there were two Masters again, and Uclés being left nearly empty, the Moors captured it. King Alfonso IX meanwhile cleared his kingdom of Castilians and seized castles. In 1213, however, at the time of the joint expedition which the Toledan Annalist records, when Templars, Calatrava and Santiago all were mustered, D. Nuño de Andrada rode with him as lieutenant of the Master, and all those who were natives of Galicia or Leon or held encomiendas there. They helped in taking Alcántara and Montanches, and recovered Cáceres. It was already theirs, given in 1170, but the King would not recognize the original donation and they carried the case to Rome, and could not hold it. Throughout the thirteenth century, however, they owned Merida.

with all his mournful

Alfonso IX had a lofty spirit, though he lived under an evil star, and Luke of Tuy learned to love him well; when he went to war with Castile over the guardianship of his young son, who was to live to be Ferdinand the Saint, and the knights in Leon elected a Leonese Master, then he saw the wrong therein and sent them back to their obedience. He bound them, however, to support his daughters' claim to the Kingdom of Leon when he should be dead, and loyally they tried but could only secure a better compromise with Castile for the poor ladies, and found themselves bereft of castles of their own in consequence.

S. James now, in the thirteenth century, was the protector of travellers and the guardian of souls, as well as the warrior. All the functions that he fulfilled in his own land of Galicia may be perceived, though less clearly, wherever his Order appeared.

S. James as wayfarer and psychopompos

The Master of Santiago had been standard bearer at Las Navas. In 1224 discord broke out between the knights and the clerks in the Order, the latter claiming a tithe of all booty the former brought in: and when the Masters and knights outrageously ejected the Prior and clerks from Uclés, having taken all their goods, these in retaliation carried off with them all the plate from the sacristy. How much and how splendid will have been that gold and silver work, those chalices and paxes, patens and portable altars, it is hard to imagine, but one piece we may be sure was there, a Byzantine slab of dark serpentine carved in the tenth century with the Harrowing of Hell. S. James was the Conductor of Souls, and this piece had a special significance: it was superbly reset as a pax in 1565 by Cristóbal Becerril, and bears the hall-mark of Cuenca. Now preserved in Ciudad Real, it had come back to Uclés when a Papal commission of three Spanish bishops had adjusted the relations of lay and clerical there, the first clause of the arrangement providing that every one should forgive every one else and bear no grudges.

Apparitions in the Americas

Santiago was still their leader, and awake. At the battle of Jerez de la Frontera S. James and his white horse were seen by Moors and Christians. But indeed he was seen in the Americas, in battle, also, though honest Bernal Díaz stoutly maintained the horse was grey and the rider much like any one else, and indeed a man whom he knew. At the battle of Salada in 1340, he was seen in like manner and recognized: says Rodrigo Yáñez of Seville, who wrote the Poem of Alfonso XI:

The death of the Master D. Gonzalo Ruiz Giron in 1280, though it is written in the contemporary Chronicle of Alfonso X, is stuff torn off from a romance. It was Saturday, the eve of S. John; the host under the Infant D. Sancho had entered the Vega of Granada and was awaiting reinforcements there: and the Prince gave it strictly in charge to D. Gonzalo Ruiz Giron, and an abbot from Valladolid, and another, to guard those who went out for forage, and for food and for wood. The expedition pushed as far as the castle of Moclín, and already the provisioners were safe again in camp, and the others straggling back, when near the castle came in sight a hundred Moorish knights. Then the Master, because his heart was great, waited for none of the others nor yet for his own folk but started to attack them with a bare handful, and the Moors fleeing drew him on to an ambush where lay two thousand of the Moorish cavalry. These being discovered, assaulted, and they gave Gonzalo Ruiz the wounds of which he died; they chased the Christians back to the tents of the encampment and killed that day, between knights and footmen, two thousand and eight hundred: and there died the greater part of the freyles of the Order of S. James; and many knights and many others were taken prisoners there. The Prince, when he knew it, mounted and went over all the camp, and lay there until Monday: then he ordered the Master of Santiago to go back to Alcadete for attention; they started to move him in a litter, but the soldiery were so terrified by what had befallen that half the camp started to move off with him. Which seeing, the Prince ordered him back again, with bitter words: "The camp shall not be broken up for you," he said, and again, "You have spoilt my sally into Granada meadow." And with that, as I think, the Master's great heart broke, for,

. . . They have gone down under the same white stars . . ."

says the Chronicle, "therewith the Master died."

This was he that had stayed the sun once, trundled hither and yon in a litter, chidden by a headstrong Prince.

Centrifugal and anti-clerical forces

After the death of King Ferdinand the Master had confederated with other nobles and with the Infant D. Fadrique, and was one of the foremost to compel the King to govern differently and not break the old fueros and privileges of the nobility, or fatigue the labourers with excessive tribute. The struggle between the central power and the centrifugal forces inherent in the Spanish race was already declared.

Crabbed youth and age

Though between seculars and clerics the trouble had been adjusted, there was a gulf between old and young, and dissensions. The trezes, the thirteen Elder Statesmen, wanted to elect one of their own for Master, they too often succeeded, and such were useless in the field. The King D. Sancho insisted on D. Gonzalo Martel, in 1284, who was de los muy modernos, but he died in three months by a fall from his horse and the old men came back: in 1324, for instance, the knights in the field had to serve under the Master of Calatrava.

The accident was unlucky for the Master, Martel, but it was of a piece with all the ill-luck that hangs over the King his friend. This King D. Sancho the Bold was perhaps such another unhappy warrior as his father's grandfather, Alfonso IX of Leon, ill-starred in life, ill-spoken of thereafter, for no wrongdoing of his own but by perversity of fate. He married his second cousin Doña María, the daughter of the Lord of Molina, S. Ferdinand's knightly younger brother, and the Pope, though the degree was so remote, withheld his dispensation at the instance of the King of France, saying that D. Sancho had usurped the kingdom from his nephew D. Alonso who by his mother, the Princess Blanche, was a nephew of the King of France. The correspondence of another Pope, Innocent VI, with another French Blanche, the Queen of King Peter, has lately been published. The fixed policy of the Roman curia was to keep Spain torn by intestine wars, in order to manipulate the balance of power. Spanish Kings had enough to do, at home and abroad, and could not retaliate in self-protection like the great princes in Italy. Meanwhile, and in consequence perhaps, towards the close of the thirteenth century a Bull of Nicholas IV permitted the Portuguese Comendador and knights to elect their own Master in complete independence. The whole Order protested with such justice and force that Celestine V revoked it, but never again would the Portuguese recognize the Master of Castile and Leon.

King Alfonso XI, being in Cuenca when in 1338 the Master D. Vasco Rodríguez died, learned promptly of it, and sent messages to the trezes forbidding them to elect a new Master without his presence and licence, and summoning them to Cuenca for the purpose. They replied that they would elect a person proper for the service of God and the King, but that it was not lawful to hold an election in Cuenca or any other town not of their Order, and at Uclés incontinently they elected D. Vasco López. The King was not pleased. He seems to have moved out of their country into his own, and sent for them to come to him at Guadalajara: and there he explained that he desired to have his six-year-old son D. Fadrique elected. D. Vasco López, hearing of this, went to Montanches and took the treasure and many precious things withal, and withdrew to Portugal. This was stated at the chapter in Ocaña called by King Alfonso's orders, and it is quite credible: other accusations, like that of coining false money, and entering a city over the wall, are commonplaces of false-witness and may be dismissed. The chapter obediently elected the baby son of Leonor de Guzmán, and consented that her brother D. Alonso Méndez de Guzmán should be frocked for the interim. It was, of course, a scandal, though it gave the King a good soldier where he needed one, the policy of Alfonso XI being to keep his great lords too busy with war to have time to make trouble for him.

The honour of Guzmán

The Chronicle has a spirited story which must fall about this time: how the Master on a raid into the Kingdom of Granada, being three times outnumbered, held a council but would not withdraw. The Masters his predecessors, he said, did not worry when they were fighting the Moorish Kings, and even granting his lineage was no better than other Masters' before him, yet he could not do less than those of the lineage of Guzmán whence he came: "Therefore I ask you kindly to come on into the battle," and without waiting for an answer he displayed his banner.

A big, tough spirit had he, like all the race of Guzmán. That Doña Leonor's sons were all thrice-dyed traitors and rebels irreconcilable, was due chiefly to their position as disappointed pretendants to royalty, and their apt use as tools for those whose livelihood was sedition. Henry of Trastamara honestly and candidly wanted to murder his brother from birth to death; D. Tello, on the other hand, King Peter believed in and trusted to the very last though he seems to have been the one whose heart was foul and whose tongue was double by nature. D. Fadrique was loyal and friendly at times, but capable of becoming at any moment a menace: and once too often the King mistrusted him. All this brood of half-breed princes were already in the field when D. Alfonso set out for the battle of Salada: the vassals of the Infant and heir D. Pedro were there with his banner, but he was left in Seville, being then five years old.

The battle of Salada is recalled as one of the glories of Spain, and the treasure taken in the booty there was so great that the value of the gold fell one-sixth in the markets of Europe. "There sheep were sheared with fleece of gold," says the poem. It caught the last wave of invasion just as it broke, and thereafter Spain never lay in real danger, and the wars of Granada were for a sort of gallant play, and then for conquest and profit. There is but little difference, in truth, between the expulsion of the last Moors by the Catholic Kings and the expulsion of the Jews and Moriscoes thereafter: both were explosions of anti-semitism commercially accounted for. But at the river Salada the danger was real, and the struggle had still the consecration of self-defence and the aureole of a crusade. The Poem of Alfonso XI is the chanson de geste of that battle: it leads up to it and away again but the battle is the life and reason of the poem. Very gallant, in its short ballad-beat, is the account of the mustering:

anti-semitism is commercial, invasion is personal

Gentry in great guise,
From Castile the royal,
Princes of Galicia
And knights of Portugal.

Castilian noblemen
 And many knights beside,
 For keeping of their vow
 Like brethren they ride.

For a moment the crusading spirit has returned again; but the piece is a little artificial, like the ideals, and refers to Charlemagne, Oliver and Roland, and recalls, to its own disadvantage, the heroic age. Notwithstanding, it can stir the blood like the shrilling of trumpets and kettle-drums, as for instance in the passage where the whole army intones the Salve Regina, or that where the King waits for dawn, lying on his bed not coveting wealth but longing for the day that shall show him the enemy, stretched out with passion at heart, like a couchant lion, and praying for the light, till the planets finish their course and twilight begins, and dawn comes, and the light brightens, and the King makes a prayer.

More often, however, it stays at the ballad level:

A right

Then up and rode for the frontier
 The Kings with all their noble men,
 And ever in the front of all The Master of S. James rode then:
 The Master of S. James was lord
 Of castle and of town by right,
 He was a noble gentleman
 A trusty leader in a fight.

The Chronicle's account of the Pope's reception at Avignon of the news of the victory, is more splendid than anything in the Poem: the great banner beating in the autumn wind, the captured horses and armour, the four and twenty Moorish standards, Benedict the Pope in procession, and the long, bright line of cardinals, and the thunderous chanting, Vexilla Regis prodeunt fulget Crucis mysterium. But the Orders counted for little there.

The Master of Santiago was killed that day: the poet is quite indifferent but does his duty:

The Master D. Fadrique was installed at ten years of age, in 1343, and the King sent over his standard and his vassals to the Order at once. He was under age and a bastard but the Papal dispensations were at hand. Then in 1350 King Alfonso XI died, before Algeciras. Along with him died many another noble gentleman, some from far countries. It was the first appearance of the Black Death: two years before it had raged in Italy and England, and had reached the Spanish seaports: now it got into the serried camp. Among the dead the Chronicle recites are the King of Navarre, the Master of Alcántara, Gaston

Count of Foix and Béarn, and Henry of Lancaster the Earl of Derby. The Genoese had weighed anchor and spread sail, though the King contrived to retain them, nor would he consent to go. When the King himself was dead and the funeral procession set out from the camp black-cloaked, black-hooded, by tens and by hundreds, the Moors within the city came out by the gates and stood in silence honouring a great King and a goodly enemy.

So at the age of fifteen King Peter was left with a kingdom broken to war, and wealthy; with two strong women who panted for each other's death; with a band of well-grown brothers who had counted on inheriting the crown and the princely places. He certainly tried at first to trust them: he used them well. His mother declared her own life insecure—which may quite have been true—and had her will of Leonor de Guzmán, nor did any much regret.

The Master visited the King at Cuellar, and María de Padilla and the King's own friends tried to come to a good understanding with him, but Albuquerque, as all historians agree, made mischief, for his own ends, between King Peter, and the Count of Trastamara and the Master; and with Blanche of Bourbon as an excuse they rebelled.

Next the King tried to put in some one whom he could trust, D. Juan García, María de Padilla's brother: the Comendador Mayor and he met in battle at Tarancón (which lies between Uclés and Cuenca) and he was killed. Meantime Toledo had risen for the French Queen Blanche, and the Master and Count Henry were sacking the Jewry there, as the French had tried to sack it two centuries and a half before, and again, as then, some knights withstood them. The rebels held the bridge of Alcántara but the King made a brilliant move, forded the Tagus, and retook the town by the bridge of S. Martin. The brothers escaped and the Master elected for loyalty; next year, for service in the war with Aragon, he got back the Maestrazgo. Shortly after, when he was in Seville, King Peter was informed of other matters: false the story may have been but it was characteristic, and credible; he believed it, and sent for him. In the annals of the Order it is said that King Peter told his cousin, the Infant of Aragon, of knowing other treachery of the Master's and that he must die: and a certain clerk learned somehow of this, and went out by the road on which the Master should arrive, to warn him. He dared not speak plainly but conveyed it to him by enigmas and comparisons, but the Master paid no heed. Then when, says the Chronicle, the Master D. Fadrique had talked with the King he visited María de Padilla and the King's children, and D. Maria who knew all could not conceal her sadness. He went downstairs and found the gates closed, but an Asturian of the order, Suer Gutiérrez de Navales, said to him twice, "Master, the little gate of the yard is open," and again, "Get out of the Alcázar for you have plenty of mules," meaning thereby freyles of the order, serviceable. "If he could not escape, at least he should not die till many had died before him"—a goodly saying, that, for the Chronicle of Pero López de Ayala is gallant reading. But he came back to the King and by this time he was bewildered, and when the executioners came upon him his sword caught in the baldric so he could not draw it and they chased him from side to side, and at last one struck him down. This was in the delicate Mudéjar apartments of the Alcázar of Seville, where the shifting shadows in the fountain basins still weave a bewilderment and the air is heavy with sorrowful memories.

The truth we shall never know: but it is likely the Master was plotting again. The popular fancy, which loves these tragic histories, has seized for an admirable Romance on this young comely figure, unsuspecting and almost fey. He died at twenty-six and left two children: the popular imagination cherishes also the notion that one of these children was borne by Blanche of Bourbon, for whose sake and his honour's King Peter hated him. That is incredible, though the great house of Perafan de Ribera, the Admiral of enhance-

Castile, was pleased to countenance it. In matter of legend nothing need stand or fall with anything else; but a legend is none the worse because belief is not of obligation.

The piteous Romance, then, of the Death of the Master, is somewhat as follows. By a rare and vivid invention, the wronged man himself speaks:

I lay in Coimbra city that I had taken in war,
 When a letter was sent from my brother Peter
 in Seville jousting there.
 I the Master was luckless
 I the Master was fey:
 I took a dozen mule-men,
 a score of horses that day,
 All with gold chains jingling

 It was a fortnight's journey and we will christen him right.” Then up and answered the Master—mark well what he must say—“Bid me not that, good father!

It boots not, I cannot stay.
I ride to answer a summons,
the King my brother’s claim.”
I spurred my mule through the gateway and into Seville I came.
No hangings I saw on the houses, in the ways no tilting knight;
I turned and sought the palace and my brother King Peter’s sight.
When I had passed the gateway
the gates behind me swung;
They took my sword away from me that at my side had hung;

Warnings on the way

The King's
reproach

They took my men away from me that all the way had come.
These warned me then of treason
my loyal men and true,
And bade me still turn back with them for they could see me through.
Nothing I recked of their warning because my heart was free
And I went to King Peter's chamber who greeted me evilly.
"Never you come to see us save only once a year, Yet when you come, proud Master,
you are fetched by force or fear.
And now your head is begged me in largess or in fee."
"Why so, good King? for never have I done ill to thee!
I left thee not in battle nor when with the Moors we fought."
"Come, warders, and do my bidding!
You know it, what you ought!"
Hardly the words were spoken his head was hacked off straight And to María Padilla sent in a silver plate.
As though he stood there living the lady faced that brow:

"At last I pay you, traitor for yester-year and now!
 The evil council you gave as the King your brother has found."
 She snatched it up by the curls and flung it out to a hound.
 The faithful hound was the Master's,
 he laid it softly by,
 And with his wretched howling
 the palace echoed high.
 Then asked the King in anger
 "Now who has hurt the hound?"
 And bitter was the answer of those that stood around:—
 "Lord, the Head he is guarding, the Master your brother's head." Then up and spake an aged aunt of the living and the dead:—
 "How ill you served him, King!
 how ill you have served," she saith,
 "All for a worthless woman to do a brother to death!"
 Although he answered nothing when he had thought awhile
 He went to Doña María and bespake her in this style:
 "Take her, knights, as she stands and put her in sure hold,

The Lady's revenge

Was she a witch?

For I will give her such penance as ever more shall be told.”
Deep in his darkest dungeons
the King has closed her up, With his own hand he carries her every bite and sup,
And trusts to no one excepting a page that he brought up.

Character
of María
Padilla

In the popular imagination Doña María de Padilla was not only a worthless woman, una mala mujer, she was also a witch, and such to this day she remains in obscure phrases of folk-lore. The King's precaution in this Romance bespeaks the same power. In the romantic and accomplished narrative of Pero López de Ayala she is a guiltless and lovely lady, whose only wrong was to have loved, gentle and kind beyond the ordinary, wistful, very touching. As such she has passed into history: the one figure is as fabulous as the other.

It is hard not to see these figures as miniatures in a Book of Hours or Chronicles: slender youths in vivid green and scarlet, sinuous girlish forms in blue and rose, all inhuman as the flowers in the grass, as the bright birds in cages of osier or gilded wire. They have their passions, doubtless, and the death of the Master in the history is as terribly real as the death of Lear; for a moment the beating of time's wings is stopped. You feel hearts throb and sicken, but you turn on, and over the leaf find a quaint case of conscience.

Miniatures

D. Pedro Ruiz de Sandoval was called Pig-face, perhaps for some personal deformity, but he was a gentleman of a nice honour. During the war between King Peter and his usurping brother two Masters were in the field, and after D. Peter's murder one resigned. Now Sandoval was in command of a castle, which he had sworn to his lawful King that he would not give up without his leave: and he refused to admit the new Master. He resigned the command of the castle to his squire, and put himself in the hands of the Master as a freyle of the Order: and all said he acted as a good knight. It seems that a man's honour may cost him more pains than a love-affair.

Peribañez
and the Commander of Ocaña

Of another Romance about a Commander of the order, only two fragments have survived: it related how the Comendador of Ocaña loved the wife of Peribañez, and what was the outcome we cannot surely know.

The wife of Peribañez was fair all else above;

The Commander of Ocaña would have her for his love.

So it begins, and we know the chaste wife's answer to an unlawful suit:

“For I love Peribañez with his cloak of hodden grey

More than yourself, Commander, although you go so gay.”

This is the right ballad vein, and the ballad ending should be happy as well as virtuous. Lope de Vega, making a play out of the scraps he had picked up somewhere, calls it a tragi-comedy, and here the wife for all her honesty would have fared ill but for her husband's sudden return. Peribañez, surprising the Commander by night in his house, kills him: and when the King offers a reward for the person of the murderer, presents, in person, his wife to collect the price, which will give her wherewith to support her widowhood when he shall have been executed. An ingenious ending this, too clever by half for the Romances: in consequence, we doubt the outcome of the original Romance. But it is likely that the dramatist knew no more than he puts in the mouth of a reaper laid to sleep with his mates under a balcony through the short midsummer night.

Lope de Vega is at his happiest in dealing with legendary matter, better by far than any of the English dramatists because more poetic and, at the same time, more sincere.

English and Spanish
compared

Comparing with this play Greene's Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay, one feels how shallow in that is the historical concern and how little the personages of the different intrigues have rightly to do with each other: comparing the Robert Earl of Huntington plays, and the quite unconcerned adaptation of ballad matter to a chronicle form that drags out through ten acts, one perceives that the author was held to no particular standards dramatic or racial.

The parallels are not very precise, but they may serve: it is hard to find closer, for the different temper of playwrights in the peninsula and the island, the latter preferring to take their history in chunks and go abroad for their romance, so that the strictly English comedies are the Roaring Girl, and A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, and in Measure for Measure (to take a single instance from a possible score) the setting and the issues are consciously exotic and alien. With Lope de Vega, the material and the sense for romance are racial both, and the play in question is a compact fabric, close-woven and even-coloured, background and love-interest alike. Like the best Spanish wine, it keeps a tang of the skin.

The Infants of Aragon come upon the scene. I think those who know nothing else in the history or the poetry of Spain, still hear like a ringing in the ears, that old question:

The Infants of Aragon

¿Que se hizo el rey D. Juan?
¿Los infantes de Aragon
Que se hicieron?

D. Enrique de Aragon was the thirty-fifth Master. His father, the Infant Ferdinand of Aragon (el de Antequera) was set upon it, having one son already Master of Alcántara, and being himself Lord of Lara, Duke of Peñafiel, Count of Majoraga, Lord of Cuellar, S. Esteban de Gormaz, and Castrojeriz, and by his wife Duke of Albuquerque, Count of Ledesma, Lord of Haro, Briones, Bellorado, etc., etc. Who should gainsay?

The
tragedy

The Infant was not yet satisfied. His father died first and then Queen Catharine of Lancaster, the young King's two guardians, and he was not yet appointed for the office, nor yet was the Princess Catharine given him to wife. She, poor lady, perhaps was fair, certainly was virtuous; and she was strong-willed, but not fortunate. He raised three hundred men and under pretext of visiting his mother, Queen Leonor, he went to Tordesillas and captured the King. Mendozas were with him in this adventure, and the Constable Ruy de Ávalos. They dismissed all the King's friends except D. Álvaro de Luna, and carried off D. Juan to Segovia with his sister. The Princess had taken sanctuary in the convent of S. Clare, in the lovely Mudéjar palace that King Peter built for María de Padilla, with its cusped and carven arches of molded plaster around sun-steeped patios, its marvellous hall where on such interlacing arches a dome hangs like a great fruit and the perishing colours of frescoes yet glow on the walls as from afar. Thence she refused to come. She may have remembered how Queen Blanche of Bourbon had taken sanctuary once in Toledo cathedral and the town had risen in her defence. But she was no queen nor were the nuns strong burghers of a great city. When the Prince's party threatened the convent, she had to leave.

Meanwhile the Infant D. Juan was in Navarre marrying Queen Blanche of Evreux: Fernán Alonso de Robies wrote to him and he gathered men at Cuellar and came on to Segovia for a rescue, but the King D. Juan professed himself content. A conference was arranged at Avila in which Queen Leonor set herself to make peace among her sons and other kindred—not easy when they were of that kind. It was during this stay at Avila that, says the Chronicle, the Infant D. Enrique made the King send an ambassador to Rome, the archdean of Guadalajara, D. Gutierre Gómez, to explain to the Holy Father how D. Enrique had been in the right throughout and how wrong had been the Infant D. Juan. But this was not all: the secret of the mission was, in the King's name, to ask the following: that all cities and places which were attached to the Master-ship of Santiago should become the personal and entailed property of the Infant D. Enrique, to be inherited by his offspring, and that the domain should be called no longer Maestrazgo, but Duchy. This being, as he seemed to think, as good as done, he went on to take his wife; the King was apparently compliant entirely. As surely as the King was going from Avila to Talavera, without the knowledge of Queen Leonor who lay in Medina del Campo, awaiting a solution of the negotiations, so surely he was going with D. Enrique in spite of D. Álvaro de Luna's opposition. The Constable forbade it. He went notwithstanding and lay one night in a mountain castle belonging to the Archbishop of Toledo, called Alamín, and there the Infant and the Infanta Doña Catalina saw each other and held converse. What else happened only those there and D. Álvaro de Luna knew: but Rades y Andrada says that they were privately married there. In Talavera, thereafter, they were publicly married, and the Princess's dowry was the Marquisate of Villena. For a while the King moved restlessly about Castile in the custody of the Master D. Enrique, but finally he escaped under cover of a boar hunt. It is a good story for a winter's night. He had now the assistance of D. Álvaro de Luna, D. Fadrique of Trastámara, and D. Rodrigo Alonso Pimentel the Count of Benavente. Of these D. Álvaro was sincerely attached, as it would seem, and the others had their own plans.

Fortune's wheel swung swiftly round in the days of John II. The Master, when he had others to reckon with than a girl and a foolish King, anon found himself in prison, the Mastership being administered by a deputy. Finally his brother, D. Juan, now King of Navarre, begged his custody and the two waited in Tarazona and were joined by the Princess Catharine and a third brother, the King of Aragon. The Castilian King John refusing to pardon and restore him, the three brothers joined with the Masters of Calatrava and Alcántara to overthrow the power of D. Álvaro de Luna. In the turmoil the Master exchanged Villena for Trujillo, which had long belonged to the Order: there are some forged letters involved here. He being again found in open rebellion, the King confiscated all his goods and gave them to other knights. When besieged in the castle of Segura he escaped, and went on an enterprise over-sea against the Genoese, where all three brothers were taken and sent to Milan, and there at last the Duke of Milan set them free. Finally, being a widower, he married Doña Beatriz Pimentel, D. Rodrigo's daughter. A battle in open field at Olmedo followed hard on this, in 1445, where D. Enrique was so wounded that shortly afterwards he died in Calatayud, having been Master for thirty-six years.

An Italian

He is a picturesque ruffian, more like a Sforza or a Riario than most Spanish personages. Of royal blood, without an establishment, what could he do except live upon those of his relatives who had crowns and thrones? And as supple dependence was impossible to his character, the only possible career was that of the professional bully. In his relation with D. Juan, which was sheer brutal coercion, with Doña Catalina, which was abduction and worse, with his own family, which was a superior sort of blackmail varied by complicity, he played out in palaces the rôle of the ruffiano that the comedies and novels have developed.

To him succeeded D. Álvaro de Luna the Constable of Castile. His predecessor in the Constabulary of Castile had been D. Ruy López Dávalos, who died in exile and poverty, though before, as men said, he could travel from Seville to Santiago de Galicia and lie every night in his own house. The Master being once in Valencia desired to visit him, but the old man sent back a message: "Tell your lord D. Álvaro that what he is, we were, and what we are, he shall be."

The légende
of D. Álvaro

It is good traditional matter, it may well be true. D. Álvaro is a great traditional figure and his légende is rich. He is reported to have said upon the scaffold: "This is how the world serves its servants: I must have served the world since I am served thus." The English reader will remember Wolsey at the abbey gate.

The Constable was Master for only seven years. The story of his life is too long and too magnificent to be summarised in these. The story of his fall should have been written by Roper or Cavendish, that English readers might have no less advantage than the Spanish. These may enjoy the admirable portrait drawn by Dr. Salazar in his Apologia, and the Chronicle of the Constable, written by a loyal servitor as noble and lofty-spirited as that of the Chevalier Bayard, and like him, unknown except for his loyalty.

Character
of D. Álvaro

D. Álvaro de Luna was a man of great parts, who rose without any considerable backing, or property, or high connections, to be the greatest man in the kingdom and the King's master. Nor throughout his life, from the age of eighteen, when he was put about the King's person as a page, to the hour of his death by that same King's consent and procurance, was his loyalty ever altered; not so much as in the accusations of his enemies. What shall we say (his chronicler asks) of one who thus satisfied all that the world may ask of the good, and met every test—that of blood by his nobility, that of time by his discretion, that of adversity by his courage, that of power by his knightliness, that of his King by pure loyalty?

He was a very fine gentleman, the perfect figure of the courtier, as fit by agreeableness of his nature as by the love of all conditions: of middle height, straight, white and shapely and at every age slender; his neck rather long and straight, his eyes quick and always bright, his glance steady, dwelling on what he regarded. He carried his countenance high and glad, the mouth being large, the nose well shapen and not pinched, and the forehead broad: he was very early bald. He hesitated a little in beginning to speak: was gamesome and setting sun and music at the close”

given to laughter at apt times; very keen of wit. He was so compact, of flesh and figure, that he seemed all bone and nerve. He loved and honoured women and was a good lover, discreet above most, so that none ever knew such things as should not be known: an excellent musician. He made many and excellent songs in which with great subtlety he declared his inventions, and at times opened many mysteries, and valiant actions. His dress was fit and whatever he wore became him, whether for the field, for feats or for hunting. In horsemanship he was surpassing, and delighted in having them curiously chosen and serviceable. In war he was hardy, and set himself in all extraordinary danger, and suffered well arms and the inconvenience of a soldier's life. Always he spoke with particular reverence and dutifulness of the King, his lord. Hunting he relished when his occupations allowed, and was more skilled in that art than any other man of his time. He frequented much discreet and pregnant persons and sought them out for his household and relied upon them. With the facetious talkers he was merry and very pleasant, but never made them partakers of his actions.

He was the son of a gentleman of noble birth and quality, of an ancient house in Aragon, who had held office about the person of the late King of Castile. The Pope Benedict XIII was Peter of Luna and his great-uncle; another Peter his uncle was Archbishop of Toledo; another his cousin-german, Archbishop of Saragossa. His brother, D. Juan de Cerezuelos, he procured to be promoted from the see of Seville to that of Toledo, and his nephew he preferred to be Archbishop of Santiago.

His mother dwelt in the village of Cañete, near Cuenca, but by her name María de Urazandi she would be of Vascongada: she married, later, the Alcayde of Cañete; D. Juan de Cerezuelos was the son of this Warden. His father dying when he was still very young, his uncle D. Juan Martínez de Luna bred him up in his house, and because he was of a good wit, and very quick and ready, he was well liked by all, as much of the household as abroad, and they looked that he should have great lordship and power and a bright name. His uncle, D. Peter of Luna, being appointed to be Archbishop of Toledo, he kept him with him there until, seeing that if he lived he would be a good knight, generous and of a great heart, he placed him at the court of King John. This was in the year 1408, when he was, as I think, about eighteen years of age. And the King received him for a page, and as he was a young boy, seeing the pleasantness and good breeding and the sprightliness, ease and grace of D. Álvaro de Luna, he was pleased with his service beyond any other's, and would have him to sleep at his bed's foot; and took pleasure in him to want him always by him. And this ascendancy of the young man's was never altered or diminished.

The state of Spain

The state of Spain was such as I have said already, that all the nobility was divided into bands and confederations, that made war perpetual upon each other and upon the King, but for the most part counted the King's person as a pledge or pawn of power, and the Seal of Castile as the lawful prize of victory in the field. The character of King John was such that whomsoever he saw in presence that urged something upon him, that one he obeyed: of this the Pledge of Tordesillas is the case universally known, but the matter was daily; and no man lived secure, howsoever great, but when in the King's company. Three times was the Constable cut off from the King's presence and sent abroad into his estates and three times he came back stronger than when he withdrew.

The only charge historians had against him, even those most opposite in the factions of the reign, was that of greediness in heaping up honours and places, and the amassing of great riches, and a vast following, and without distinction of great and small, so that the same day that the king gave him ("or more truly," said Fernán Pérez de Guzmán, "he took") a great city or dignity, if a King's lancer fell vacant, that too he would have: notwithstanding that none was ever so hardy as to say that he kept them for himself. As he pardoned

Con armas sangre y guerra, con las vidas y famas . . .

many wrongs against himself, so he rewarded services done to the King. With no inheritance of land or feudatories, his incessant need of the royal countenance appears in the roll of those who lived by his, those that were of his household, as the Romances tell—“Cuatrocientos sois los mios, los que comeis mi pan”—

Those that ate his bread

but where Fernán González counted four hundred moss-troopers of those that ate his bread, in the Constable's following they were great lords of Spain: to read the roll of them—counts, prelates, and noble men, and many lords of fortified cities—is to evoke all Spanish history for three-quarters of a century; and his houses wherein they lodged and lived at his expense without reckoning castles and towns, or yet the commanderies of the Order, were situate in all the capitals and most principal cities of the Castiles and Andalusia and the south, from Estremadura to the Rioja and throughout the north. Quintals of fine gold he distributed every year to knights and servants of his person: so great was his liberality, that he desired all should have a part of his goods and thought himself born not for himself alone but for all the world. Yet none taxed him with prodigality though all men praised his magnificence. The archbishops he had made, for their own honour, though his familiars, were not of his family; but he gave lodging, allowance and benefactions to eight bishops at the least, and the Master of Alcántara D. Gutierre de Sotomayor.

V. p. 173

The great love of the King for this strong lover of his would seem to have been, by a law of nature, the romantic affection of the gentle for the strong; his duty to the King he took to involve the care of him in all kinds, even in his use of God's creatures, his table and his wife.

By necessity the Master stood alone, except for his household and following, for whosoever would have tyrannized the King found him in the way. Therefore as the Queen Mother had sent him away at the commencement, so the new Queen

brought about his ruin at the close. And because fortune is a jade, it was in the matter of the King's second marriage that the tragic error entered into the play and D. Álvaro fetched her into Castile that should put him out thence.

The King was desirous to marry the King of France's daughter, Madame Renée, being taken by report of her beauty and affability; being married to the Princess of Portugal, Doña Isabel, he was wont to say that though he was married the deed was the Constable's, and from that hour was remarked a notable falling off in his love, notwithstanding that he came to dote on his new Queen, and she that owed all to the Constable contrived his fall.

The fall of the Master

The fall of princes is no new thing in the world, nor did Lydgate and Boccace rehearse the most tragical histories. In the thirty-two years that the Master ruled the kingdom, he had served his King and spared his enemies and now the ascendant was overpassed. A strange series of accidents fell upon him, street brawls threatened his safety; there was talk of retiring to his estates, till the bad weather should blow over, but his pride could not brook to turn his back. His trusted chamberlain Vivero, whom he had elevated from the dust of the highways, had grown to so great a menace that when justice was done on him in the end, though all men knew the doer, none could name him. In Lent the Master had recommended Vivero to see to his confession: on Easter Tuesday in Burgos, the gate of the Master's lodging was beaten in by those who called themselves the King's men. By accident, his son D. Pedro had been wounded in a tourney and was not yet healed; by treachery his son D. Juan was withdrawn with his men from the city. Zuñiga, an ancient enemy, had come up from Plasencia to do the business, bringing his son's tutor, Mosen Diego de Valera, to see that the history thereof was rightly written. The principal companion of the Master was D. Gonzalo Chacon, one of those loyal and noble figures that history can often show in minor places, whose name men would not willingly let die. By his influence he had wrought upon the Master, while the outer gate was still beset, to get away disguised into safety, but he turned and came back, saying he had rather die with his servants than be saved crawling through dark hidden drains like a rogue and a worthless man. The King sent a safe-conduct and a solemn promise to see him: and broke both. Chacon warned him that for the conquered the only remedy was to expect no remedy. He answered that he could not die in strife against the royal standard: he laid up papers in a coffer to be committed to the King's hands, he opened and distributed three chests of money; he ate a last supper with Chacon and those of the faithful, he gave them sound counsel and loving words as of one on the way to death. He sent for his seals and a hammer and broke them up, to forestall any shameful act. He did on a harness of great price, a gift of the King of France, and when he was in the saddle of a great charger he bid open the gates. They took him away and he never saw the King. They put Chacon and the others in the common prison. It was told in after years that they kept him in a cage at Portello. Imprisoned he was, while the mockery of a court was held: he was not present or represented and the judgement of that court could never be found again. By June he knew that he was to die on the scaffold, in Valladolid; and having made his peace with God, like the martyrs of the early ages he went to his death as to a banquet. No ignominy was spared: not the sack for the head, nor the tying of his hands before execution, nor the body left for three days upon the scaffold, nor a plate set to gather alms for his burial. A huge crowd filled the square; and though they came as folk who are drawn to see a spectacle, when the moment approached a profound and ominous silence fell upon them and when the executioner held up the severed head they gave a great and terrible cry—"so dolorous, so sad and so grievous a wailing," says the chronicler, who was there, "as though each man or woman had lost his own father or some one very dear." The Bachellor Cibdareal states that in these hours the King was very restless and wretched, and twice he called a servant and gave him a paper to carry, and twice he checked him again and said, "Let be, let be!" So he flung himself at last upon his bed and lay there awhile and no one told him it was ended till after dinner.

"But we are in the calm and proud procession of eternal things"

This was the death of the best knight there was in his time in all the Spains and the best lord uncrowned, the good Master of Santiago.

Portrait

His personal charm, and what we call distinction, was the rarest of his gifts, as perhaps it was the most potent: one recalls the pains at which are the speakers in the Book of the Courtier to define that last flower and fragrance of the perfect gentleman by a word usually translated grace, "a certain virtue or perfection above other men."

Old Portrait of Don Álvaro de Luna from his chapel in Toledo

The Constable had this, whether you consider his authority when he sat, his graceful carriage when he stood, or his measure when he walked. If I tell you the Master was very humane and merry, how shall you know his pleasant and facetious humour? Or his gravity at the trial of great deeds? Or his repose or mildness when he was set? It was as though the remnant of the excellency of many long dead in him was preserved as an ensample; and who could be rude or common for whom his great house had been the school of magnanimity?

By the

As a poet we can hardly measure him, for the same fortune that scattered his goods, robbed him of the offspring of his wit. In Cancioneros and manuscripts his poems lie still ungarnered: and I have only a few to show as pieces in the courtly mode and the fashion of the age. They surpass others of their kind whether by Juan de Mena or by the Marquis of Santillana, in two things: in an apparent passion that even yet warms and lightens, and in a pulse or colour that seems not so much personal emotion as the sheer luminous throb that is pure beauty.

Because the English reader is little used to the intricate concision of the Castilian concept, a version consciously unworthy is set here.

The next piece, if little read, yet is often cited by hearsay as carrying extravagance rather near to a fantastical blasphemy. Yet it is because the Spaniard has always felt himself on such good terms with God, that he could take such liberties.

If God our Saviour sweet
 Were looking for a love,
 He would be my rival meet;

So, Lord, I long—by token

These two pieces have kept the rhyming of the original and something not too unlike in effect to the measure. But because the feeling of this verse is, before all else, of the Renaissance, the remaining two are set to Elizabethan airs: and if perforce transposed into another key, yet that suits better an English voice.

Lover's urgency

When the Constable was wounded once in a tourney, the poems that were writ thereon would have filled a folio, but only one is known to survive. Juan de Mena's tribute in the Labyrinth was written before his fall, and was used as a poetical stake on which to hang an elaborate imitation of Lucan. The Marquis of Santillana lamented him frigidly and composed a long discourse on Mutability and the Fragility of Favourites and the Fall of the Proud, which is not so much unlike as one could wish to the five-and-thirty ballads on the death of the Master collected by Duran in the Romancero General. In the popular imagination he had a place, and a lament. and lived on; he was such another as My Cid, and like him gathered marvels about him. The long episode in Juan de Mena's Trescientos is concerned with a witch and an evocation of the dead. The ridiculous document that was drawn up twenty years after his death to formulate his accusation, is concerned with such charges as that he kept a familiar spirit in a bottle for consultation; that he had enchanted the King with a ring he gave him; it was said that he bewitched the Queen with potions. His tomb in Toledo, erected in his lifetime with a marvellous effigy of bronze that rose to kneel at Mass and lay down again, working by such a hidden mechanism as Villard de Honnecourt drew out in diagram for an angel to turn and bow—this effigy, though it was destroyed once in his lifetime by his enemy, D. Enrique of Aragon, then Master of Santiago and in arms against the King, was demolished ultimately by that King's daughter, Isabel the Catholic, as savouring too much of magic. The Master was buried in the vault below his chapel and his wife Doña Juana Pimentel there with him

“A sacristan once penetrated there,” said Parro in mid-nineteenth century, “and when he was a very old man I talked with him, and he said the dead sat there in two ancient chairs before a table, and the Master's head lay on the table.”

This sounds like what the peasant saw who entered the cave where Barbarossa still waits though his beard has grown quite through the stone slab: it sounds like what is told of Charlemagne and Frederick II. It is possible that in the popular imagination, dimly and half forgotten, the Master also waits to come forth when Spain shall know her need.

D. Beltran
de la Cueva

After King John II, the Infant D. Alfonso, and King Henry IV, had all been administrators of the Mastership in commission, D. Beltran de la Cueva, by the King's wish, became Master. He married Doña Mencía de Mendoza, the younger daughter of D. Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, Marquis of Santillana and Count of the Real de Manzanares, afterwards Duque del Infantado; and the grandees of Spain were angry. It is curious that no portrait of D. Beltran can be found in an age and country much given to the analysis of character and the investigation of motives. The delightful book of Generations and Semblances ends too early to include him, and he is not reckoned among the Claros Varones. One thing we know of him surely, that his love never failed his lord:

whether or not he was the Queen's lover, he was the King's faithful friend. When D. Enrique was dead he served the Catholic Kings both in the Navarrese war and before Granada: his name figures as Duke of Albuquerque, among those of other grandees at the surrender of the city. His tomb, which was perhaps erected by a granddaughter that founded the Convent of S. Anne in Cuellar in 1572, stood in the Church of S. Francisco there, until that was destroyed. Since he had died, full of years, more than two generations before, the effigy can represent no more than a tradition: traditional he moves for a brief while across our stage, holding the Mastership only from 1462 till at the King's bidding he renounced it: "as a loyal servitor and without treason or aught for which it should be taken away." This was in 1467, but possibly he was supplanted earlier, for Enríquez del Castillo reckons that he held the Mastership only three years.

There is, however, a modern study by D. Antonio Rodríguez Villa from which this outline may be transferred:

The King's
good lover

Rodríguez Villa's summing up

Even with such flecks and defects as are proper to all mankind and characteristic of his epoch, D. Beltran de la Cueva remains still the most gracious and admirable figure of his age; the accomplished and charming page, the gallant and hardy knight, the loyal and dutiful counsellor, the splendid and free-handed grandee, and above all the consistently faithful vassal, ready to sacrifice his life and his interests for the King.

The tourney at which his device was a golden letter that corresponded to the Queen's initial, was no more than a pretty compliment to his King's young wife. The "incurable lightness" of Queen Joan was never asserted until her royal daughter and her still-born son had long since been recognized as legitimate without a question. In later years, what with the King's other fancies and the nobles' studied insults, she had excuse if not justification for taking amusement where she could find it, and for accepting an impassioned loyalty from her own kinsman that gave her shelter, and children, and a brief happiness. If D. Beltran had offered her more than conventional homage, he never meant to pass beyond the courtly code of loving par amours, and was indeed not a little embarrassed when someone suggested the poor lady's seeking a refuge with him. His passion and devotion were all for D. Enrique, and in a conscious revival of the antique manner he offered them where they met a like loyalty and affection. "The King could not be without his company, he was the ornament and splendour of the court, and many grandees sought his alliance and intermediation."

D. Juan Pacheco, the Márqués de Villena, was the brother of the Master of Calatrava. At D. Beltran's election he had cried Out Haro! alleging the Master-ship to belong to the Prince Alfonso, the late King's son, by right; now when D. Beltran was out he got himself elected without leave of King or Pope and held the office till death—dying almost as strangely as his brother, D. Pedro Téllez Giron. Hernando Pulgar admired him hugely: his portrait, in the Claros Varones, is one of the most splendid, as rich and vigorous as his sumptuous tomb at El Parral. Pulgar says:

Portrait by Hernando
del Pulgar

He was of middle height, his frame slender and well shapen, his features beauteous, and a lively grace present in his carriage. His speech was seemly and abounding in reason, without superfluity of words: his voice shook a little by an infirmity and not by defect of Nature. In youth's estate he had the wit and authority of age. He showed a great ability to govern in all temporalities: of the four things necessary thereto—which are a piercing judgement, prudence, and diligence, and long-suffering—he had more than any other man in his time. He considered well the quality of a business, time, place and person and the other circumstances which prudence must regard in the regiment of things. His judgement pierced so into persons that with little discourse he knew their conditions and their needs, and giving to each the hope of his desires, attained often to what himself had hoped. He suffered long, that no ill word could move him, nor ill news could change him; and in the greatest distinctions of things he had the better will to consider and remedy them. He was such a man as with ripe deliberation used to determine what was to be done; nor ever forced the time, but forced himself to wait the time to do. By natural condition he seemed a tower of truth, and by choice his conversation was with true and constant men; although such as would acquire great goods and honours, and especially such as understand the government of great things, behove at times to feign and disguise, to simulate and dissimulate, either in the alterations of season or the variableness of business; and either to escape greater harms or to touch greater gains, such men have to make alterations in affairs as time shall admit. [By which Hernando del Pulgar intends treachery and changing sides as well as disloyalty and armed rebellion.] He had sundry friends of them that good fortune brings alone; many enemies likewise, that covetousness of another's weal is wont to breed, who planned his death and destruction and indignation on the King D. John's part, and the Prince's his son whom he served; notwithstanding that divers times this came to the point of execution, yet by chances unguessed and most admired he escaped out of the snares of death that many times were laid for him. He was a brave man, and when need was he showed himself an hardy: wise and temperate in eating and drinking, he seemed immoderately given up to women, by the many sons and daughters he had besides the legitimate.

""Tis wisdom and that high

After praising his judicious liberality and the immense property that he acquired, Pulgar passes to his humanity, so that he condemned none to death on his own account and but few in justice, and his indifference to vengeance, being wont to say that the man who broods torments himself rather than harms another.

However great a quarrel he might enter into, he seldom broke into speech and less into action, but arranged rather a reconciliation of differences, feeling a sure peace better than uncertain victory. He liked not to trust, to the fortune of an hour, all acquired in life past: so by long-suffering and abiding the time, he augmented his honour and increased his goods.

D. Enrique as prince had loved him well: he took up the side of D. Alfonso, the King's young brother, and was of the party that crowned him in Avila; then at the last came back to allegiance and held the King at his command. The phrase of Enriquez del Castillo is: "After the Master D. Juan Pacheco and the other tyrants of his party had seized the city of Segovia." The faithful chaplain, by the way, qualifies the Master as a quite marvellous liar, and cites his "vain words and but few true ones."

Enriquez del Castillo sees him otherwise

About this time his son-in-law, the Count of Benavente, to whom King Henry had promised the Mastership, lay for him. So it was—this is in Segovia still—

Assassination frus-

that the Master D. Juan Pacheco being in the Palace of the Prince talking with the Infanta Doña Isabel, the Count with certain of his knights well armed came to the place to execute his intent when his father-in-law should come out. And if he had not been advised thereof, doubtless he would have slain him there, but he came so quickly from the room that those watching could not lay hands on him, nor had time to, so he escaped and came out whole from amongst them, but thereafter he went always cautiously, with plenty of folk to guard his person and always armed with secret arms and on horseback. And although thereafter the Count of Benavente, dissimulating, spake with him, always he had that rancour gnawing in his entrails, seeking and waiting a time to take vengeance.

But the Master was wary and the Count went home.

Either his life was more hazardous than most men's or his biographies were more picturesque. Enríquez del Castillo indeed knows how to tell a good tale; take for instance this:

The King went on his way to the town of Osuna; arriving there he determined to go to Jaén and sent on thither his chamberlains. And as the Constable, D. Miguel Lucas de Iranzo, held that city for the King, and had ever been loyal and faithful in his service, when he saw the chamberlains and read the letter that the King sent, he answered that this his loyal city of Jaén had always been and should be at his service, and that of his Highness's coming they were not only glad and well content, but wishful to see his Royal Excellency, so he and all the place conjointly begged him to come straightway to his city with his loyal servitors; but that they prayed him of his grace and asked with all humility that he should not bring with him the traitors who had so foully dishonoured him and persecuted, for in no wise would they be received there; and this he said of the Master D. Juan Pacheco and divers others of those who came with his Highness. Then the Master, when he heard the Constable's answer, said he would wait in Osuna and the King went on to Jaén. When he got there, the Constable came out to meet him with many horsemen. And at entering into the city he placed himself within the gate and as the King entered he said to the Bishop of Sigüenza: "Come in, loyal prelate deserving of much honour; for you and your line have served the King my lord always and followed him, like noble men of blood untainted." And behind, he let the counsellors pass in and the servants of the King, and as Roderick of Ulloa addressed himself to pass, he set the front of his lance against his breast, saying: "Stay out, Roderick of Ulloa, for the city of Jaén is not used to welcoming traitors, but only such men as are loyal to the King, my lord," and so shamefully the gate was shut in his face and he was left outside. And then he took the King right gladly and took him to lodging in his house in the joyfullest guise he could; and all the others were well lodged, and the King lay there a week right well pleased. But as the Master D. Juan Pacheco still ruled him, when the Master sent for him, the King went back from Jaén to Osuna.

At last he came to die. It was 1474 now.

He was at S. Cruz, in the west, arranging a Portuguese marriage for the Princess Joan, and trying to get his hand on the city of Trujillo, when the same malady struck him that had slain his brother, an imposthume of the throat, and he vomited blood and so died. But his men hid his death and set him in a chair, darkening the room, and the Alcayde surrendered the stronghold to the dead man.

A strange and sudden malady

He had resigned the Mastership to his son, and the trezes and most of the knights had approved, too, perforce, but before the Bull could come from Rome, King Henry died, and D. Diego López Pacheco could not hold what he had. He remained loyal, notwithstanding, to the Princess.

D. Enrique IV was now dead, having in his last hour declared that the excellent Lady Doña Juana was his daughter and his heiress—so the impartial historians believe. These are not the contemporary ones, as may be well understood, for it was in the reign of the Princess Isabel, his sister, that they had to write, and they had indeed been of her faction long before. Alonso de Palencia spent a diligent life in her service and praise, and did as much as any man uncrowned to put through her marriage with Ferdinand of Aragon. Hernando de Pulgar was titular Chronicler to the Catholic Kings, and as careful in their interest as Pero López de Ayala in that of Enrique II. King Henry's chaplain, Diego Enríquez del Castillo, suffered much for his loyalty during his master's life and afterwards; he was seized once at Segovia and his papers taken away: long after he had to write a piteous letter to Queen Isabel entreating that the money yet owing to him as salary might be paid.

judgement
event of history

Three-quarters of a century ago Dozy pointed out that early Spanish churchmen had blackened the character of the Visigothic kings in the eighth century to save the case for God's justice. If misfortunes so terrible befell them and overwhelmed Spain they must have been abominable so to bring them down. Pero López de

Ayala in the fourteenth century, in rebellion against his natural lord and king, Peter I, set out to show that he too was deserving of God's judgement, and that the line of New Kings was God's punishment for the sins of the Old. Now a third time in the fifteenth, the historians of the stronger battallions construct their case for God and depict the establishment of the Catholic Kings as though the sun were rising upon the earth after another destruction of Sodom.

Whether Enrique IV was really all that he was called is mightily to be doubted. He has been made out a sort of preliminary study for the invariable protagonist of J. K. Huysmans' novels, but it is more probable that he was only such another as the English Edward II, though he wanted a Marlowe: fantastical and unhappy, wayward and ennuyé, corrupt and wanton, who wore his shame like purple with the pitiful effrontery of the helpless.

The Catholic Kings would be perpetual administrators of the Orders

As Princes, Ferdinand and Isabel had begged the Pope to appoint them administrators: as Kings they asked it again and the Pope gave them the place to continue at his pleasure. Notwithstanding, the Prior of S. Marcos called a chapter and elected D. Alonso de Cardenas, and the Prior of Uclés did the like and elected D. Rodrigo Manrique; him for whom his son George made the coplas. He was a good knight.

*Coplas

He left no well-filled treasury,
He heaped no pile of riches high,
Nor massive plate;
He fought the Moors, and in their fall
City and tower and castle wall
Were his estate. . . .

And if of old his walls displayed
The honoured and exalted grade
His worth had gained,
So in the dark disastrous hour,
Brothers and bondsmen of his power
His hand sustained.

After high deeds, not left untold,
 In the stern warfare which of old
   'T was his to share
 Such noble leagues he made that more
 And fairer regions than before

These are the records half effaced,
 Which with the hand of youth he traced
   On history's page;
 But with fresh victories he drew

By the tried valour of his hand
 His monarch and his native land
   Were nobly served;
 Let Portugal repeat the story,
 And proud Castile, who shared the glory
   His arms deserved . . . . .

Mosen Diego de Valera devotes a couple of diverting chapters to the contention for the Mastership at Pacheco's death, but he rises to a fine phrase where he admits that "not for that did the great spirit of D. Rodrigo Manrique, who called himself the Master of Santiago, leave off the undertaking once begun, though the King and the Archbishop of Toledo willed otherwise."

D. Alonso de Cardenas is reckoned the last Master: he served the Catholic Kings very loyally, raiding Portugal and then when Manrique was dead he "came in," he and his men. He needed to be elected cleanly according to the constitutions of the Order, and with the consent of the King and Queen, as was the custom in Castile. Doña Isabel rode in three days from Valladolid to Uclés; gathered those of the habit of Santiago and bid them suspend the election as Royalty wished the Order to stay in commission: so he went on raiding Portugal and arguing with the Kings. They yielded at last, but he had to pay a great sum to be used nominally for the building and maintenance of castles on the frontier of Granada. Thereafter great exploits followed and the battle of Albuhera, the retaking of Merida, and the war of the Axerquia.

Near Antequera, in some villages, they were hard beset, the horsemen got among gullies and valleys and the Moors sallied out from the castle and, themselves untouched, killed the Christians with stones and arrows. Then said the Master: "Let us die making a road with our hearts since we cannot with our arms, and not die so dully. Come up this hill like men and lie not bogged to await death." But they did not know the ground and the Moors cut them in two and killed many; some got off by rough ways. This was in 1483. In 1499 he died. Ferdinand and Isabel got the Bull they wanted, then Charles V got one and in his time the Pope annexed the Mastership in perpetuity to the Royal Crown of Castile and Leon.

At least the last Master was a gallant knight, and the last years of the Order were bright with panoply and plume and ringing with clash of arms and drum-beat:

Las justas é los torneos, paramentos, bordaduras, é cimeras . . . .

Like April sun they breathed away and were no more. But the name lived on, and

Apologia

For the Spanish policy of the Catholic Kings there is more to be said than space affords here, even though if necessary it might still be granted that Isabel's religious passion was tinged with the madness that possessed her mother and that she transmitted to her daughter; nay more, that Ferdinand was the same bogey at home as abroad, the sinister figure that looms in the background of Il Principe. Macchiavelli wrote a treatise on how to make a strong state at the expense of your soul. Ferdinand illustrated it. Spain was strong.

In the two centuries since Ferdinand III took Seville the great houses had come up and they were stronger than the throne. For each reign history offered only three chances: the nobles could be kept busy against the Moors, or they could be left to tear the land to pieces, or they could be broken. Alfonso XI, for instance, tried the first and succeeded: Peter, his son, tired the last and failed. In the reign of John II the Constable could not prevent the second: it went on in the reign of his son Henry. After Granada fell there were no more Moors. The Catholic Kings broke the great nobles and the great convents, and the land had rest.

The peasant stepping down the red furrow behind his yoke of brown oxen, the spectacled merchant leaning above his painfully amassed spoils of eastern traffic spread brilliant on the board at the shop front, tasted security. The flush of sunset faded from chivalry; the defence of Spain had ended and conquest had begun. Queen Isabel's breach of faith with the last Moors down by Granada, like Queen Constance's with the first Moors up in Toledo, is justified by history if the course of things can justify what outrages the spirit. So was the expulsion of the Jews: so was, presently, the expulsion of the Moriscoes. It is vain as well as hypocritical to lay the exhaustion of a country bled white by its colonies to the application, four hundred years ago, of a policy that western Europe is now in a frenzy of applying. Why not lay it to the Inquisition, or the orange trade of Florida, or the Argentine wheat? We may not be sanctimonious until we wash out our own cup and platter and clean out from our sepulchres the dead men's bones. In a sense, everything in history is the cause of everything after, but that proposition is as general as gravitation and somewhat more irrelevant.

To "wage
God's

Spain took up in the seventeenth century the White Man's burden, the same charge that England assumed in the nineteenth. To the honest observer, between America and India, in their respective centuries, no difference will be apparent. Gomara and Kipling sing to the same tune. Spain was the earliest country in modern Europe to undertake colonies: so she was the first to feel exhaustion. The lesson learned, she has withdrawn the first.

The story of the Conquistadores is, in the familiar phrase, another story. They were, many of them, nearly all of the greatest, knights and commanders in the Orders, but their greatness lay elsewhere, and these titles were now no different from others. So also were many good and great soldiers in the Italian wars, as later in those of Flanders. The Gran Capitan was a Knight of Santiago: Caro de Torres devotes forty-six folio pages to the Orders in the Italian campaigns. Ferdinand the Catholic paid for service in the Neapolitan wars—says La Fuente, quoting—with habits and crosses, which brought these into disrepute. The proofs of nobility were exacted with increasing strictness: we remember what pains one Sevillian gentleman took to prove his limpieza Castilian and Portuguese, and to show that he had exercised the art of painting only as a genteel pastime and never professionally. His name was D. Diego de Silva y Velázquez.

with some unction, and goes on, with relish, to relate how the Comendador of Biedma, D. Alonso de la Cueva y Benavides, before the last battle swore by God and his cross to seek out Juan de Padilla. He kept the oath and took him prisoner, snatching the guion from him and taking his arms, and then turned him over to the governors of the realm—which means presumably Charles V's Flemings. Not always did the sixteenth century feel so compliantly: the Count of Benavente had sent back to Charles V the Golden Fleece, saying that he wanted no Burgundian insignia when in Castile there were others much older and more honourable in the crosses of the Orders, under whose holy protection his ancestors had fought against the infidel and conquered the kingdoms.

Velázquez
and Calderón

Those crosses, we may remember, were worn as precious jewels by the shining lights of Spanish letters: if not, as long believed, by Garcilaso de la Vega, yet by Alonso de Ercilla the friend of Greco, by Francisco de Quevedo, and Calderón de la Barca, and many a lesser but still luminous star: and hagiography can count up its half-dozen or more of the blessed and the sainted. S. Domingo de Guzmán himself began as a conventual freyle of Uclés.

That Philip IV called out the Order against the insurgents in Catalonia, is reckoned by a Spanish historian among his gravest sins. But indeed for what they could be used was a hard question, now that not a Moor was left in Spain. Cisneros when he took Orán offered to transport them to Africa and give them convents and churches and allow them all of Africa that they could conquer: if he might have had his way, the lot of Africa would be happier perhaps to-day. But the event of history was against his intention and they went, instead, to America; but not corporately.

Estremadura supplied the greatest of those conquerors and the Order of Santiago counts their names. Says Caro de Torres:

The war of Granada being ended with so much honour and advantage to all Spain, and the lordship of the Moors

Africa

expelled from the land, after so many years, the Catholic Kings turned their knights to new enterprises greater and more glorious than the past, all directed to the exaltation of the Christian religion, that their vassals should show their strength and use it in foreign lands and kingdoms, in Italy, France and Barbary and the farthest ends of the earth, that from sunrise to sunset there should be no spot where the trophies and blazons of their victories were not set up. The enterprise most memorable of the greatest honour and advantage that was ever undertaken in Spain was the discovery of the West Indies that are called the New World.

One of these was Vasco Nuñez de Balboa of Badajoz, a man of great heart: in 1513 he saw the Isthmus, and the Catholic Kings gave him the title of Warden of the Southern Sea. Hernando Cortés, a Knight of the Order of Santiago, in 1520 took Montezuma in his palace: he was the son of Martín Cortés de Monroy and of Doña Catalina Pizarro of Altamura, descended of the lineage in Aragon of the Count of Molina, ricos omes. Francisco Pizarro of Trujillo, when he had decided to go to the conquest of the southern sea, drew a line with his sword's point as the term of immense labours necessary for the conquest, and invited those who would to cross it with him: only thirteen did. When he went home he gathered his goods and his elder brother Hernando, and twice more he returned, but he died by the conspiracy of Almagro.

They all died, somewhere, in the end, and their bones are not laid up any more in the convents and castles of the Order, the Cloister at Uclés or the Church at Alcántara, but in far-off lands. They were well content. Caro de Torres says again:

One of the principal parts of the History of the Military Order, which most touches them, is the conquest of the rich and great kingdoms of Mexico and Peru, because their captains, general and conquerors were D. Fernando Cortés, D. Francisco Pizarro, D. Hernando Pizarro, of the Order of the Lord S.

James, because so many times they saw the glorious apostle fighting in these conquests in defence of the Christians.

"True valour doth her own renown command"

My friend Bernal Diaz misdoubts the latter statement, and fully contradicts Gomara's Apparitions, but the glory was there and he saw that. In this age still, as in the mediaeval, riches were coveted but as the way to power and not power as the way to wealth: greatness was the end and gold was but the means. So success was prized for the sake of glory and energy was only the manifestation of passion.

Therein, it had the advantage of ours. The institution of the three Military Orders in Castile had been a great instrument, not merely for the shaping and defence of a secure empire, but for the forging and tempering of the spirit of man.

Tempering
the spirit of man

The tradition of a great past was there to fall back upon and what we call "morale" was fostered by all the conditions of life and organization, but these enforced also—and thereby checked the dangers of brutality and pride—the religious obligation of obedience and brotherhood. It is as hard for us to-day to understand in Isabel, and Cisneros, and their knights and conquerors, the passionate need to convert all men to the faith of the Cross, as to understand the actual democracy of human relations to-day in Spain: but it was there and it must be reckoned with. It goaded men like the sight of a body's agony. The doctrine of "invincible ignorance" was to be invented later, that men might live in peace together and sleep o' nights without dreams of those who unless converted would surely burn in hell. It is a consequence of the Spanish trait of realism, famous in literature and almost as active in life, that what a man sustained he was prepared to prove to the bitter end, and what he believed to be so he was aware of in his own flesh, whether it were the doctrine of stoicism or the dogma of hell.

The passion to save illuminated men's lives. That passion burned above the wilderness and beyond the mountain-tops of the New World and purified the breast of even the sorriest and most hardened adventurer. It is a glory about the ending of the Orders, and a faint glow yet lingers in the shabby little pages of Otañes' Manual of the Ceremonies at Receiving the Habit of Calatrava, printed in 1785, at Pueblo de los Angeles, in New Spain.

Children of the northern seas, reared under northern stars, we too have kindled to our conquests and suffered our disillusionment. The northern race has been tried out and found wanting and for hope we turn to the Mediterranean, as our fathers turned, belike six millenniums ago.
