that he is ready to reach his helpinge hande. For God is maruelously prouoked to wrath by our distrustfulnes, if we aske of him the benefits which we hope not to obtaine. Therefore there is nothinge more agreeable with the nature of praier, than that this law be prescribed & appointed to them, that they breake not foorth rashly, but folowe faith going before thé. To this principle Christ calleth vs all wth this saying: I say vnto you, whatsoeuer things ye require, beleue y^e ye shal receiue them, & they shall happen to you. The same also he cōfirmeth in another place. Whatsoeuer ye aske in prayer beleuing, ye shall receiue. Wherwith agreeth Iames sayinge, If any neede wisdom, let him aske it of him which giueth to all mē freely, & vpbraideth not: but let him aske in faith no douting. Wherin setting douting as contrary to faith, he doth most fittely expresse the nature of it. And no lesse is that to be noted which he addeth, that they obtaine nothinge which cal vpon God in wauering & dout, and do not determine in their hearts whether they shal be heard or no. Whom he also cōpareth to waues which are diuersly tossed and driuen about of the winde. Whereupon in another place he calleth a right praier, the praier of faith. Againe whē God so oft affirmeth that he will giue to euery one according to his faith, he signifieth that we obtaine nothing without faith. Finally it is faith that obtaineth whatsoeuer is graunted by prayer. This is meant by that notable sayinge of Paule, which the foolish menne do take no heede vnto. Howe shall any man call vpon him, in whome he hath not beleued? But whoe shall beleue, vnlesse he haue heard? But faith commeth of hearinge, and hearinge of the word of God. For, cōueying by degrees the beginning of praier from faith, he plainly affirmeth that God can not be sincerely called vpō of any other, than them to whom by the preachinge of the Gospell his mercifulnes and gentlenesse hath bin made knowen, & familiarly declared.

12 This necessity our aduersaries do not thinke vpon. Therefore when we bid the faithfull to holde with assured confidence of minde that God is fauourable & beareth good will to them, they thinke that we speake a most great absurdity. But if they hadde any vse of true praier, they would truely vnderstand that God can not be rightly called vpon without that stedfast feeling of Gods good will. Sith no mā can wel perceiue the force of faith, but he which by experience feleth it in his heart: what may a man profite by disputinge with such men which do openly shew, that they neuer had any thing but a vaine imaginatiō? For of what force, & how necessary is y^e assurednes which we require, is chiefly learned by inuocation. Which who so seeth not, he bewraieſt y^e he hath a very dul cōſcience. Let vs therfore, leauing this kinde of blindemen, ſticke faſt in that ſaying of Paule, that God can not be called vpon of any other, but them that know his mercy by the Goſpell, & are ſurely perſwaded y^e it is ready for thē. For what maner of ſaying ſhould this be? O Lord, I am verily in dout whether thou wilt heare me: but becauſe I am diſtreſſed with carefulnes, I flee to thee, that thou maiſt help me if I be worthy. This was not the wōted maner of all the holy ones, whoſe praierſ we reade in the Scriptures. Neither hath y^e holy Ghoſt thus taught vs by the Apoſtle which biddeth vs to go to the heauenly throne with cōfidence, that we may obtaine grace & when in an other place he reacheth y^e we haue boldnes & a ceſſe in confidence by the faith of Chriſt. We muſt therfore holde faſt with both handes this aſſurednes to obtaine what we aſke (ſith both the Lord with his owne voice ſo cōmaundeth vs, & all the holy ones teach it by their exāple) if we will pray with frute. For, that only praier is pleaſinge to God which ſpringeth out of ſuch a preſūptiō of faith (as I may ſo call it) & is grōided vpon a dredles certainty of faith. He might haue bin content with the bare name of faith, but he not only added cōfidence, but alſo furniſhed the ſame with liberty or boldnes, by this marke to put differēce betwene vs & vnbelcuers, which do in deede alſo praye to God as we do, but at aduenture. For which reaſon y^e whole Church praieſt in y^e Pſalme: Let thy mercy be vpon vs, as we put our truſt in thee. The ſame cōdition is alſo ſpoken of in an other place by the Prophet: In what day I ſhall crie, this I know that God is with me. Againe, in the morninge I will direct my ſelfe to thee, & I wil watch. For of theſe words we gather, that praierſ are in vaine ca. into y^e aire, vnleſſe hope be adioined, from whence as out of a watchtour we may quietly waite for the Lord. Wherewith agreeth the order of Paules exhortation. For before that he moue the faithfull to pray in ſpirit at all times with wakefulnes & diligence, he firſt of al biddeth them to take the ſhield of faith, the helmet of ſaluation, & the ſwerd of the ſpirit, which is the word of God Now let the readers here cal to remēbrance that which I haue before ſaid, y^e faith is not ouerthrowen where it is ioyned with acknowledginge of our miſery, nedines, & filthines. For with how heauy weight ſoeuer of e-ūil doings the faithfull feele themſelues to be ouerloden or grieued, & y^e they be not only void of all thinges which may procure fauour with God, but alſo that they be burdened with many offeſes which may worthily make him dreadful to them: yet they ceaſe not to preſent themſelues, neither doth this feeling make thē ſo afraid but that they ſtil reſort to him, forasmuch as there is no other way to come to him. For, prayer was not ordained, whereby we should arrogantly aduāce our selues before God, or esteeme at great value any thing of our owne, but wherby confessing our giltines, we should bewaile our miseries to him, as childrē do familiarly open their cōplaints to their parents. But rather the vnmeasurable heape of our euils ought to be full of spurres or prickes to pricke vs forward to pray. As also the prophet teacheth vs by his example, sayinge. Heale my soule, because I haue sinned against thee. I graunt in deede that in such sayings should be deadly prickings vnlesse God did help: but the most good father of his incomparable tender kindes hath brought remedy in fit season, whereby appeasing all trouble, assuaginge all cares, wiping away feares, he might gently allure vs to him, yea & taking away all doutes (much more all stoppes) he might make vs an easie way.

13 And first when he commaundeth vs to pray, he doth by the very same commaundement accuse vs of wicked obstinacy, vnlesse we obey him. Nothing could be more precisely commaunded, than that which is in the psalme: call vpon me in the day of trouble. But forasmuch as among all the duties of godlines, the scripture cōmendeth none more often, I nede not to tary longer vpon this point. Aske (saith our maister) & ye shal receiue: knocke, it shalbe opened to you. Howbeit here is also with the commaundement ioyned a promise as it is necessary. For though all men cōfesse that the cōmaundement ought to be obeyed, yet the most part would flee from God whē he calleth, vnlesse he promised ȳ he would be easie to be entreated, yea & would offer himselfe. These two things being stablished, it is certain ȳ who-soeuer make delaies that they come not streight to God, are not only rebellious and disobedient, but also are proued guilty of infidelity, because they distrust the promises. Which is so much more to be noted, because hypocrites vnder the colour of humility & modesty do as wel proudly despise the commaundement of God, as discredit his gentle callinge, yea and defraud him of the chiefe part of his worship. For after that he hath refused sacrifices, in which at that time al holines seemed to stand, he declareth that this is the chiefe thing and most precious to him, aboue all other, to be called vpon in the day of nede. Therefore where he requireth his owne, & encourageth vs to cherefulness of obeyinge, there are none so gay colours of douting ȳ may excuse vs. Wherefore how many testimonies are cōmonly found in ȳ scriptures wherby we are cōmaunded to cal vpon God, so many standes are sette vp before our eyes to put affiance into vs. It were rashnes to rushe into the sight of God, vnlesse he did preuēt vs with calling vs. Therefore he openeth vs ȳ way with his owne voice sayinge:

ch. 13 I will say to them, Ye are my people: and they shal say to me, thou art our God. We see how he preuenteth them that worship him, & willeth them to follow him, and therefore it is not to be feared that this should not be a very swete melody which he tuneth. Specially let this notable title of God come in our minde, wherupon if we stay, we shall easily passe ouer all stoppes. Thou God that hearest prayer, euen to thee shall all flesh come. For what is more louely or more alluringe, than that God be garnished with this title which may ascertainē vs that nothing is more proper to his nature, than to graunt the desire of humble suters? Hereby the Prophet gathereth that the gate standeth open not only to a fewe, but to all men: because he speaketh euen to
 a. 50. all in this sayinge: Call vpon me in the day of trouble: I will deliuer thee, and thou shalt glorifie me. According to this rule Dauid laieth for himselfe that a promise was giuen him, that he may obtaine what he asketh: Thou Lorde hast reuealed into the eare of thy seruauent: therefore thy seruauent hath found his heart to pray. Whereupon we gather that he was fearefull, sauing insomuch as the promise had encouraged him. So in an other place he armeth himselfe with this general doctrine. He will do the will of them that feare him. Yea & this
 a. 145 we may note in y^e Psalmes y^e as it were breaking his course of praying he passeth ouer somtime to the power of God, somtime to his goodnesse, somtime to the trueth of his promises. It might seeme that Da-uid by vnseasonable thrustinge in of these sentences, made manged praiers: but the faithfull know by vse and experience, that seruantes fainteth vnlesse they put new nourishmentes vnto it, and therefore in prayinge the meditation both of the nature of God, and of his word is not superfluous. And so by the example of Dauid, let it not grieue vs to thrust in such things as may refresh fainting hearts with new liue-ly strength.

14 And it is wonderfull that with so great sweetenesse of promises we are either but coldly or almost not at all moued, that a great parte of men wandringe about by compasses had rather leauinge the fountaine of liuing waters, to digge for themselves drie pitts, than to embrace the liberality of God freely offred thē. An inuincible tour is the
 o. 18. name of the lord, (saith Salomon) to it the righteous man shal flee, & he shalbe saued. And Ioel, after that he had prophecied of that horrible destructiō which was at hand, added this notable sentence. Whosoeuer calleth vpon the name of y^e lord, shalbe safe: which sentēce we know to pertaine properly to the course of y^e Gospell. Scarcely euery hundreth mā is moued to go forward to mete God. He himself crieth
 a. 65 by Esay: Ye shal cal vpō me, & I wil heare you, yea before that ye crie,

I will aunswer you. And this same honor also in an other place he vouchsafeth to geue in common to the whole Church, as it belongeth to all the membres of Christ. He hath cried to me, I will hear him, I am in trouble with him, that I may deliuer him. Neither yet (as I haue already said) is it my purpose to reckon vp all the places, but to chöose out the chiefe, by which we may take a tast howe kindly God allureth vs vnto him, and with howe streight bonds our vnthankfulnes is bound, when among so sharp prickings our sluggishnesse stil maketh delay. Wherefore let these sayings alway sound in our eares: The Lorde is nie to all them that call vpon him, that call vpon him in trueth: also these sayings which we haue alleged out of Esaye and Ioel, by which God affirmeth that he is hedesfull to heare prayers, yea and is delited as with a sacrifice of swete sauoure, when we cast our cares vpon him. This singular frute we receiue of the promises of God, when we make our prayers not doubtingly & ferefully: but trusting vpon his word, whose maiesty wold otherwise make vs afraide, we dare call vpon him by the name of Father, forasmuch as he vouchsafeth to put this most swete name into our mouthes. It remaineth that we hauing such allurements should knowe that we haue thèreby matter enough to obtaine our prayers: forasmuch as our prayers stand vpon no merite of our own, but all their worthines and hope of obtaining are grounded vpon the promises of God, and hang vpon them: so that it nedeth none other vnderpropping, nor loketh vpwarde hither or thither. Therefore we must determine in our minds, that although we excell not in like holines as is praised in the holy fathers, prophets & Apostles, yet because the cōmaundement of prayer is common to vs, and faith is also common, if we rest vpon the word of God, in this right we are fellowes with them. For, God (as we haue before shewed) promising that he will be gentle, and mercifull to all, geueth cause of hope to all euen the most miserable that they shall obteine what they aske. And therefore the generall formes are to be noted, from which no man (as they say) from the first to the last is excluded: onely let there be present a purenes of heart, misliking of our selves, humility, and faith: let not our hypocrisy vnholily abuse the name of God with deceitfull calling vpon it: the most good father will not put back them, whom he not onely exhorteth to come to him, but also moueth them by all the meanes that he can. Herupon cometh the māner of praying of Dauid which I haue euen nowe reherfed. Lo thou hast promised, Lorde, to thy seruant: for this cause thy seruant at this day gathereth courage, and hath found what prayer he might make before thee. Now therefore

O Lorde God, thou art God, and thy words shalbe true. Thou hast spoken to thy seruant of these benefits: begin therefore, and do them.

As also in an other place, Performe to thy seruant according to thy word. And all the Israelites together, so oft as they arme themselves with remembrance of the couenant, do sufficiently declare that we should not pray fearfully, whereas the Lorde so apointeth. And herein they followed the examples of the fathers, specially of Iacob, which after that he had confessed that he was vnworthy of so many mercies which he had receiued at the hand of God, yet he saith that he is encouraged to require greater things because God had promised that he would do the. But whatsoever colours the vnbeleuers do pretend, when they flee not to God so oft as necessitie presseth the, when they seeke not him nor craue his helpe, they do as much defraud him of his due honor as if they made to themselves newe Gods, and idoles: for by this meane they deny that he is to the the author of all good things. On the other side there is nothing stronger to deliuer the godly from all dout, than to be armed with this thought, that no stop ought to stay them while they obey the commaundement of God, which pronounceth that nothing is more pleasing to him than obedience. Here againe that which I said before more clerely appereth, that a dredles spirit to pray agreeth well with fear, reuerence, and carefulnes: and that it is no absurdity to say that God raiseth vp the ouerthrowen. After this manner those formes of speach agree well together which in seming are contrary. Ieremie and Daniel say that they throwe downe prayers before God. In an other place Ieremie saith. Let our prayer fall down in the sight of God, that he may haue mercy on the remnant of his people. On the other side, the faithfull are oftentimes said to lift vp prayer. So speaketh Ezechias, requiring the prophet to make intercession for him. And Dauid desireth that his prayer may ascende as incense. For although they being perswaded of the fatherly loue of God, cherefully committ themselves into his faithfull keping, and dout not to craue the helpe which he freely promiseth: yet doth not an idle carelesnesse lift them vp, as though they had cast away shame, but they ascend so vpward by degrees of promises, that they still remaine humble suppliants in the abacement of themselves.

15 Here are questions obiected more than one. For the scripture reporteth that the Lorde granted certaine desires which yet brake forth of a minde not quiet nor well framed. Verily for a iuste cause: Ioatham had auowed the inhabitants of Sichem, to the destruction which afterward came vpon the: but yet God kindled with seruēnes of anger and vengeance following his execration seemeth to allowe ill tempered violent passions. Such heat also caried Samson when he said, Strengthen me O God, that I may take vengeance of the vncircumcised. For though there were some peece of good zeale mingled with it: yet a hote, and therefore faulty gredines of vengeance did beare rule therein. God granted it. Whereupon it seemeth that it may be gathered, that although the prayers be not framed according to the prescribed rule of the word, yet they obtaine their effect. I answer first that a generall law is not taken away by singular examples: again, that sometime speciall motions haue bene put into a fewe men, whereby it came to passe that there was an other cōsideration of thē than of the cōmon people. For the aunswer of Christ is to be noted, when the disciples did vndiscretly desire to cōterfait the example of Elias, that they knewe not with what spirit they were endued. But we must go yet further, and say that the prayers do not alway please God which he granteth: but that, so much as serueth for example that is by clere praise made plaine which the scripture teacheth, namely that he succoureth the miserable, heareth the gronings of them which being vniustly troubled do craue his helpe: that therefore he executeth his iudgemēt, when the complaints of the poore rise vp to him, although they be vnworthy to obtaine any thing be it neuer so litle. For howe oft hath he taking vengeance of the cruelties, robberies, violence, filthy lustes and other wicked doings of the vngodly, subduing their boldnes and rage, and also ouerthrowing their tyrannous power, testified that he helpeth the vnworthily oppressed, which yet did beat the aire with praying to an vncertaine godhed? And one Psalme plainely teacheth that the prayers want not effect, which yet do not pearce into heauen by faith. For he gathereth together those prayers which necessitie wringeth no lesse out of the vnbeleuers thā out of the godly by the very feling of nature: to which yet he pro-ueth by the effect that God is fauourable. Is it because he doth with such gentlenes testifie that that they be pleasing to him? No. but to enlarge or to set out his mercie by this circumstance, for that euen to vnbeleuers their prayers are not denied: and then the more to pricke forward his true worshipers to pray, when they see that profane wailinges sometime want not their effect. Yet there is no cause why the faithfull should swarue from the lawe laid vpon them by God, or should enuie the vnbeleuers, as though they had gotten some great gaine, when they haue obtained their desire. After this manner we haue said, that the Lorde was bowed with the repentance of Achab, that he might shew by this example how easy he is to entreat toward his elect, when true turning is brought to appease him. Therefore in the Psalme he blameth the Iewes, that they hauing by experience proued him so easy to grant their prayers, yet within a litle after returned to the stubbornes of their nature. Which also plainly appeareth by the history of the Iudges: namely that so oft as they wept, although their teares were deceitfull, yet they were deliuered out of the handes of their enemies. As therefore the Lord indifferently bringeth forth his sunne vpon the good and the euell: so doth he also not despise their weepinges, whose cause is righteous and their miseries woorthy of helpe. In the meane time he no more heareth these to saluation, than herein ministreth foode to the despisers of his goodnes. The question seemeth to be somewhat harder of Abrahā and Samuel: of whom the one being warranted by no word of God; prayed for the Sodomites: the other against a manifest forbidding prayed for Saul. Likewise is it of Ieremie, which prayed that the citie might not be destroyed. For though their requestes were denied, yet it seemeth harde to take faith from them. But this solution shall (as I trust) satisfie sober readers: that they being instructed with the generall principles, whereby God cōmaundeth them to be mercifull even also to the vnworthy, were not altogether without faith, although in a speciall case their opinion deceiued them. Augustine writeth wisely in a certaine place. Howe (saith he) do the holy ones pray by faith, to aske of God contrarie to that which he hath decreed? Euen because they pray according to his will: not that hiddē & vnchangeable will, but the will which he inspireth into them, that he may heare them after an other manner: as he wisely maketh difference. This is well said: because after his incomprehensible counsell he so tempereth the succeses of things, that the prayers of the holy ones be not voyde which are wrapped both with faith and errour together. Neither yet ought this more to auaille to be an example to followe, than it excuseth the holy ones themselues, whome I denie not to haue passed measure. Wherefore where appeareth no certaine promise, we must aske of God with a condition adioined. To which purpose serueth that saying of Dauid. Watch to the iudgement which thou hast commaunded: because he telleth that he was warranted by a speciall oracle to aske a temporall benefite.

16 This also it is profitable to note, that those things which I haue spoken of the sower rules of right prayer, are not so exactly required with extreme rigor, that God refuseth the prayers in which he shall not finde either perfect faith or perfect repentance together with a seruenteesse of zeale and well ordered requestes. We haue said that although prayer be a familiar talke of the godly with God, yet we must kepe a reuerēce and modestie, that we geue not loose reins to all requestes whatsoeuer they be, and that we desire no more than God geueth leaue: and then, least the maiesty of God should growe in contempt with vs, that we must lift our mindes vpward to a pure & vndefiled worshipping of him. This no man hath euer performed with such purenesse as it ought to be. For (to speake nothing of the common sort) howe many cōplaintes of Dauid do sauore of vntemperance: not that he meant of purpose to quarell with God, or carpe against his iudgements: but because he fainting for weakenesse, found no other better comfort, than to cast his sorrowes into his bosome. Yea and God beareth with our childish speach and pardoneth our ignorance, so oft as any thing vnaduisedly escapeth vs: as truely without this tender bearing, there shoulde be no libertie of praying. But although Dauids minde was to submit himselfe wholly to the will of God, and he prayed with no lesse patience than desire to obtaine: yet there arise yea boile out sometimes troublous affectiones, which are much disagreing from the first rule that we haue set. Specially we may perceiue by the conclusion of the xxxix. Psalm, with howe great vehemence of sorrowe that holy man was carried away, that he could not kepe measure. Cesse (saith he) frō me, til I go away and be not. A man would say that he like a desperate man desireth nothing els but that the hand of God censing, he might rot in his euels. He saith it not for that he with an auowed minde runneth into such outrage, or (as the reprobate are wont) would haue God to depart from him: but onely he complaineth that the wraath of God is to heauy for him to beare. In these tentations also there fall out oftentimes requestes not well framed according to the rule of the word of God, and in which the holy ones do not sufficiently wey what is lawfull and expedient. Whatsoeuer prayers are spotted with these faultes, they deserue to be refused: yet if the holy ones do bewaile, correct themselues, and by & by come to themselues againe, God pardoneth them. So they offend also in the second rule, because they are oftentimes driuen to wraastle with their owne coldnesse, & their neede and misery doth not sharply enough pricke them to pray earnestly. And oftentimes it happeneth that their mindes do slippe aside, and in a manner wander away into vanitie. Therefore in this behalfe also there is neede of pardon, least our faint, or vnperfect, or broken and wandering prayers haue a deniall. This God hath naturally planted in the mindes of men, that prayers are not perfect but with mindes lifted vpwarde. Hereupon came the ceremonie of lifting vp of handes, as we haue before said, which hath bene vsed in all ages and nations, as yet it is in vre. But howe many a one is there, which when he listeth vp his hands, doth not in his owne conscience finde himsele dull, because his heart resteth vpon the ground? As touching the asking of forgeuennesse of sinnes, although none of the faithful do ouerpasse it, yet they which are truly exercised in prayers do fele that they bring scarcely the tenth part of that sacrifice, of which Dauid speaketh. An acceptable sacrifice to God is a troubled spirit: a broken and humbled heart O God thou wilt not despise. So there is alway double pardon to be asked, both because they knowe themselues guilty in consciences of many faultes, with feeling whereof they are not yet so touched, that they mislike themselues so much as they ought: and also that, so much as it is giuen them to profit in repentance and in the feare of God, they being thrown downe with iust sorrowe for their offenses, should pray to escape the punishment of the iudge. Chiefely the febleness or imperfection of faith corrupteth the prayers of the faithful, vnlesse the tendre mercie of God did helpe them. But it is no maruell that God pardoneth this default, which doth oftentimes exercise them that be his with sharpe instructions, as if he would of purpose quench their faith. This is a most harde tentation, when the faithfull are compelled to crie: How long wilt thou be angry vpon the prayer of thy seruant? as though the very prayers made God more angry. So whē Ieremie saith. The Lord hath shut out my prayer, it is no dout that he was shaken with a violent pange of trouble. Innumerable such examples are commonly found in the scriptures, by which appeareth that the faith of the holioyes was oftentimes mingled and tossed with doutinges, that in beleuing and hoping they bewrayed yet some vnfaithfulness: but bicause they come not so far as it is to be wished, they ought to endeuor so much the more that their faults being amended, they may daily come nerer to the perfect rule of praying, and in the meane time to fele in howe great a depth of euels they be drowned, which euen in the very remedies do get to themselues newe diseases: sith there is no prayer, which the Lorde doth not worthily loth, vnlesse he winke at the spottes wherwith they are all besprinkled. I reherse not these things to this ende that the faithfull should carelessly pardon themselues any thing, but that in sharply chastising themselues they should trauaile to ouercome these stoppes, and although Satan laboure to stoppe vp all the wayes, that he may kepe them from praying, yet neuertheless they should breake through, being certainly perswaded, that although they be not vncombred of all hinderances, yet their endeuors do please please God, & their prayers are allowed of him, so y^e they trauaile and bende theselues thitherward, whether they do not by and by attaine.

17 But forasmuch as there is no man woorthy to present himselfe to God, and to come into his sight: the heauenly Father himselfe to deliuer vs both from shame and feare which should haue throwen downe all our courages, hath geuen to vs his sonne Iesus Christ our Lorde, to be an aduocate and Mediator with him for vs, by whose leading we may boldly come to him, trusting that we haue such an intercessor, nothing shall be denied vs which we aske in his name, as nothing can be denied him of the Father. And here vnto must all be referred whatsoeuer we haue heretofore taught cōcerning faith: because as the promise setteth out vnto vs Christ for our Mediator, so vnlesse our hope of obteneing stay vpon him, it taketh from it selfe the benefite of praying. For so soone as the terrible maiesty of God cōmeth in our minde, it is impossible but that we should tremble for feare, & the acknowledging of our own vnwoorthinesse should driue vs far away, till Christ come meane betwene vs and him, which may change the throne of dreadfull glorie into the throne of grace: as also the Apostle teacheth that we may be boulded to appeare with al confidence which shall obtene mercy and finde grace in helpe cōming in fit season. And as there is a lawe set that we should call vpon God like as there is a promise geuen, that they shalbe heard which call vpon him: so are we peculiarly commaunded to call vpon him in the name of Christ, and we haue a promise set forth, that we shall obtene that which we shall aske in his name. Hetherto (saith he) ye haue not asked any thing in my name: aske and ye shall receiue. In that day ye shall aske in my name, and whatsoeuer ye aske, I will do, that the father may be glorified in the sonne. Herby it is plaine without controuersie, that they which call vpon God in any other name than of Christ, do stubbornly breake his commaundements, and regarde his will as nothing, and that they haue no promise to obtene any thing. For (as Paule saith) all the promises of God are in Christ, yea and Amen, that is to say, they are confirmed and fulfilled.

18 And y^e circumstance of the time is diligētly to be marked, where Christ cōmaundeth his disciples to flee to intercessiō to him after that he is gone vp into heauen. In that houre (saith he) ye shall aske in my name. It is certain y^e euen from the beginning none were heard that prayed, but by meane of y^e Mediator. For this reason y^e Lord had ordeined in the law, y^e the priest alone entring into y^e sanctuarie, should beare vpon his shoulders the names of the tribes of Israell, & as many precious stones before his breast: but the people should stand a far of in the porche, & from thence should ioine their prayers with the priest. Yea and the sacrifice auailed hereto, that the prayers should be made sure and of force. Therefore that shadowish ceremonie of the lawe taught that we are all shutt out from the face of God, and that therefore we neede a Mediator, which may appeare in our name, and may beare vs vpon his shoulders, and holde vs fast bound to his breast, that we may be heard in his person: then that by sprinkeling of bloode our prayers are cleansed, which (as we haue already said) are neuer voide of filthinesse. And we see that the holy ones, when they desired to obtaine any thing, grounded their hope vpon sacrifices, bycause they knewe them to be the stablishings of all requestes. Let him remembre thy offering (sayeth Dauid) and make thy burnt offering fatt. Hereupon is gathered that God hath bene from the beginning appeased by the intercession of Christ, to receiue the prayers of the godly. Why then doth Christ apoint a newe heire, when his Disciples shall beginne to pray in his name, but because this grace, as it is at this day more glorious, so deserueth more commendation with vs. And in this same sense he had said a litle before. Hetherto ye haue not asked any thing in my name: now aske. Not that they vnderstood nothing at all of the office of the Mediator (whereas all the Iewes were instructed in the principles) but because they had not yet clerely knowen that Christ by his ascending into heauen should be a surer patron of the Church than he was before. Therefore comfort their grieefe of the absence with some speciall frute, he claimeth to himself the office of an aduocate, & teacheth that they haue hitherto wanted the chiefe benefite, which it shalbe graunted them to enioy, when being aided by his mediation, they shall more frely call vpon God: as the Apostle saith that his newe way is dedicate in his blood. And so much lesse excusable is our frowardnes, vnlesse we do with both armes (as the saying is) embrace so inestimable a benefite, which is proprely apointed for vs.

19 Nowe whereas he is the onely way, and the onely entrie by which it is graunted vs to come in vnto God: whoe so do swarue from this way and forsake this entrie, for them there remaineth no way nor entrie to God: there is nothing left in his throne but wrath, iudgement, and terrour. Finally sith the Father hath marked him for our heade, and guide, they which do in any wise swarue or go away from him; do labore as much as in them lieth to race out & disfigure the marke which God hath imprinted. So Christ is set to be the only Mediator, by whose intercession the Father may be made to vs fauorable and easy to be entreated. Howe be it in the meane time the holy holy ones haue their intercessions left to them, whereby they do mutually commend the safetie one of an other to God, of which the Apostle maketh mention: but those be such as hange vpon that one onely intercession: so farre is it of, that they minish any thing of it. For as they springe out of the affection of loue, wherewith we embrace one an other, as the membres of one body: so they are also referred to the vnitie of the heade. Sith therefore they also are made in the name of Christ, what do they els but testifie that no manne canne be holpen by any prayers at all, but with the intercession of Christ? And as Christ with his intercession withstandeth not, but that in the Church we may with prayers be aduocates one for an other: so let this remaine certaine, that all the intercessors of the whole Church ought to be directed to that onely one. Yea and for this cause we ought specially to be beware of vnthankfulnessse, because God pardoning our vnworthinesse, doth not onely geue leaue to euery one of vs to pray for himselve, but also admitteth vs to be entreaters one for an other. For, where God appointeth aduocates for his Church which deserue worthily to be reiected if they pray priuately euery one for himselve: what a pride were it to abuse this libertie to darken the honoure of Christ?

20 Nowe it is a meare trifeling, which the Sophisters bable, that Christ is the Mediatour of redemption, but the faithfull are Mediatours of intercession. As though Christ hauing perfourmed a Mediation for a time, hath geuen to his seruantes that eternall Mediatourshippe which shall neuer dy. Full courteously forsoth they hadle him, that cutte away so little a portion of honor from him. But the Scripture saith farre otherwise, with the simplicitie whereof a godly man ought to be contented, leauing these deceiuers. For where Iohn saith, that if any do sinne, we haue an aduocate with y^e Father, Christ Iesus: doth he meane that he was ones in olde time a patrone for vs, and not rather assigneth to him an euerlasting intercession? Howe say we to this that Paule also affirmeth, that he sitreth at the right hande of God the Father and maketh intercession for vs? And when in an other place he calleth him the onely Mediatour of God and men: meaneth he not of prayers, of which he had a little before made mention? For when he hadde before said that intercession must be made for all men: for prooffe of that saying, he by and by addeth, that of all menne there is one God and one Mediatour. And none otherwise doth Augustine expounde it, when he saith thus: Christian menne do mutually commende themselues in their prayers. But he for whom none maketh intercession, but he for all, he is the only and true Mediatour. Paule the Apostle, though he were a principall membre vnder the heade (yet bycause he was a membre of the body of Christ, and knewe that the greatest and truest priest of the Church entred, not by a figure, into the inward places, of the vaile, to the holy of holy places, but by expresse & stedfast trueth into the innermost places of heauen, to a holinesse not shadowish but eternall) cōmendeth himselfe also to the prayers of the faithfull. Neither doth he make himselfe a Mediatour betwene the people and God, but prayeth that all the membres of the body of Christ should mutually pray for him: bycause the membres are carefull one for an other: and if one membre suffer, the other suffer with it. And that so the mutuall prayers one for an other of all the membres yet trauailing in earth, may ascende to the head which is gone before into heauen, in whom is appeasemēt for our sinnes. For if Paul were a Mediatour, the other Apostles should also be Mediatours: and if there were many Mediatours, then neither should Paules own reason stande fast, in which he hadde said, For there is one God, one Mediatour of one God and menne, the manne Christ, in whom we also are one if we keepe the vnitie of faith in the bonde of peace. Againe in an other place. But if thou seke for a Priest he is aboue the heauens, where he maketh intercessiō for thee, which in earth died for thee. Yet do we not dreame that he falleth downe at the fathers knees and in humble wise entreateth for vs: but we vnderstand with the Apostle, that he so appeareth before the face of God, that the vertue of his death auaieth to be a perpetuall intercession for vs: yet so that being entred into the sanctuarie of heauen, vnto the ende of the ages of the world he alone carrieth to God the prayers of the people abiding a farre of in the porche.

21 As touching the Saintes, which being deade in the flesh do liue in Christ, if we geue any prayer at all to them, let vs not dreame that they themselues haue any other way of askinge, than Christ which onely is the way, or that their prayers be acceptable to God in any other name. Therefore sith the Scripture calleth vs backe from all to Christ only: sith the heauenly fathers wil is to gather together all in him: it was a point of to much dulnes, I wil not say madnes, so to desire to make for our selues an entrie by them, that we should be ledde away from him without whome euen they them selues haue no entrie open. But, that this hath bene vsually done in certaine ages past, and that it is at this day done wheresoeuer Papistry reigneth, who can denie? Their merites are from time to time thrust in, to obtaine the good will of God: and for the most part, Christ being passed ouer, God is prayed to by their names. Is not this, I beseeche you to conuey away to them the office of that onely intercession, which we haue affirmed to belong to Christ alone? Againe, what Angel or Deuell euer reueled to any man any one syllable of this their intercession which these men faine? For in the Scripture is nothing of it. What is the reason therefore of inuventing it? Truely, when the witte of man so seketh for it selfe succoures, wherewith we are not certified by the word of God, it plainly bewrayeth his owne distrustfulnesse. If we appeale to all their consciences that are delited with the intercession of saintes, we shall finde that the same cometh from no other ground, but because they are greued with carefulnes, as though Christ were in this behalfe either to weake or to rigorous. By which doubtfulnesse first they dishonour Christ, and robbe him of the title of onely Mediatour, which as it is geuen him of the Father for a singular prerogatiue, so ought not also to be conueyed away to any other. And in this very doing they darken the glorie of his birth, they make voide his crosse, finally what soeuer he hath done or suffred they spoile & defraude of the due praise therof: for all tend to this ende that he may be in deede and be accompted the onely Mediatour. And therewith they cast away the goodnesse of God, which gaue himselfe to be their Father. For he is not their father, vnlesse they acknowledge Christ to be their brother. Which they vtterly deny vnlesse they thinke that he beareth a brotherly affection towarde them, than which there can nothing be more kinde or tender. Wherefore the Scripture offereth onely him to vs, sendeth vs to him, and stayeth vs in him. He (saith Ambrose) is our mouth, by which we speake to the Father: our eye, by which we see the Father: our right hande, by which we offer vs to the Father, otherwise than by whose intercession neither we nor all the Saintes haue any thing with God. If they aunswer that the comon prayers which they make in Churches, are ended with this cōclusiō adioined, Through Christ our Lorde: this is a trifeling shifte: because the intercession of Christ is no lesse profained when it is mingled with the prayers and merites of deade men, than if it were vtterly omitted and onely deade men were in our mouth. Againe, in al their Letanies, Hymnes, and Profes where no honor is leste vngeuen to deade saintes, there is no mention of Christ.

22 But their folish dulnesse proceded so farre, that here we haue the nature of Superstition expressed, which when it hath ones shaken of the bridle, is wont to make no ende of running a stray. For after that men ones begun to loke to the intercession of Saintes, by litle and litle there was geuen to euey one his speciall doing, that according to the diuerfity of busines, sometime one & sometime an other should be called vpon to be intercessor: then they to them selues euey one his peculiar Sainte, into whose faith they comitted themselves as it were to the keeping of safegarding Gods. And not onely (wherewith the prophet in the olde time reproched Israell) Gods were set vp according to the nūbre of cities, but euen to the nombre of persons. But sith the Saintes referre their desires to the onely will of God, and behold it and rest vpon it: he thinketh foolishly, and fleshly, yea and sclaunderously of them, which assigneth to them any other prayer, then whereby they pray for the comming of the kingdome of God: from which that is most farre distant which they faine to them, that euey one is with priuate affection more partially bent to his owne worshippers. At length many abstained not frō horrible sacrilege, in calling nowe vpon them not as helpers but as principall rulers of their saluation. Lo wherunto foolish men do fall when they wander out of their true standing, that is, the word of God. I speake not of the grosser monstrousnesses of vngodlineffe, wherin although they be abhominable to God, Angels, & men, they are not yet ashamed nor wery of them. They falling downe before the image or picture of Barbara, Catharine, and such other, do mumble Pater noster, Our father. This madnes the Pastors do so not care to heale or restraine, that being allured with y^e swete sauour of gaine they allowe it with reioising at it. But although they turne frō themselves the blame of so hainous an offense, yet by what colour will they defende this that Loy or Medard are prayed vnto to looke downe vpon & helpe their seruantes from heauen? that the holy Virgin is prayed vnto, to commaunde her sonne to do that which they aske? In the olde time it was forbidden in the Council at Carrhage, y^e at the alter no directe prayer should be made to Saintes. And it is likely that when the holy men could not altogether suppress y^e force of that naughty custome, yet they added at least this restraint that the publike prayers should not be corrupted with this forme: Saint Peter pray for vs. But howe much further hath their deuellish importunacie ranged, which sticke not to geue away to deade men that which proprely belonged onely to God and Christ?

23 But whereas they traauaile to bring to passe that such intercession may seeme to be grounded vpon the authoritie of scripture, therein they labor in vaine. We read oftentimes (say they) of the prayers of Angels: & not that only: but it is said that the prayers of the faithfull are by their handes caried into the sight of God. But if they liste to compare holy men departed out of this present life, to Angels: they should proue that they are ministring spirits, to whom is comitted the ministerie to loke to our safetie, to whom the charge is geuen to kepe vs in all our wayes, to go about vs, to admonish and counsell vs, to watch for vs: all which things are geuen to Angels, but not to thē. Howe wrongfully they wrappe vp deade holy men with Angels, appeareth largely by so many diuers offices, whereby the scripture putteth difference betwene some and other some. No man dare execute the office of an aduocate before an earthely iudge, vnlesse he be admitted, from whēse then haue wormes so great libertie, to thrust vnto God those for patrons to whom it is not read that the office is enioined? Gods will was to appoint the Angels to loke vnto our saftie, wherefore they do both frequent holy assembles, and the Church is a stage to thē, wherein they wōder at the diuers & manifold wisdom of God. Who so conueye away to other that which is peculiar to them, verily they cōfounde and peruert the ordre set by God, which ought to haue bene inuiolable. With like hādsonnesse they procede in alleging other testimonies. God said to Ieremie: If Moses and Samuel should stand before me, my soule is not to this people. Howe (say they) could he haue spoken thus of deade men, vnlesse he knewe that they made intercession for the liuing? But I on the cōtrary side gather thus, that sith it thereby appeareth that neither Moses nor Samuel made intercessiō for the people of Israel; there was then no intercession at all of deade men. For which of the Saintes is to be thought to be carefull for y safetie of the people, whē Moses cesserth, which in this behalfe farre passed al other when he liued? But if they followe such slight suttelties, to say that the deade make intercession for the liuing, because the Lorde said, If they should make intercessiō: I will much more colorably reason in this maner: In the extreme necessitie of the people Moses made not intercessiō, of whom it is said, if he shall make intercession. Therefore it is likely that none other maketh intercession, sith they are all so farre from the gentlenesse, goodnesse, and fatherly carefulnesse of Moses. This forsoth they get with caulling, that they be wounded with the same weapons, wherewith they thought themselues gaily fensed. But it is very sonde that a simple sentēce should so be wrested, because the Lord pronounceth onely that he will not spare the offenses of the people, although they had seen Moses to be their patron, or Samuel, to whose prayers he had shewed himselfe so tender. Which sense is most clerely gathered out of a like place of Ezechiel. If (saith the Lorde) these three men were in y citie, Noe, Daniel, & Iob, they shall not deliuer their sonnes Iere. 15 and daughters in their righteousnesse: but they shall deliuer onely their owne soules. Where it is no dout that he meant if two of them should happen to reuiue againe, for the thirde was the aliuie, namely Daniell, who (as it is knowen) did in the first flourishing of his youth shewe an incomparable example of godlinesse: let vs then leaue them whom y^e Scripture plainly sheweth to haue ended their course. Therefore Paule, when he speaketh of Dauid, teacheth not y^e he doth with prayers helpe his posteritie, but onely that he serued his owne time.

24 They answered againe: shall we then take from them all prayer of charitie, which in the whole course of their life breathed nothing but charitie and mercie? Verily as I will not curiously searche what they do, or what they muse vpon: so it is not likely, y^e they are caried about hether and thether with diuerse and particular requestes: but rather that they do with a stayed & vnmoued will, long for the kingdome of God, which standeth no lesse in the destructiō of the wicked than in the saluation of the godly. If this be true, it is no dout that their charitie is contained in the communion of the body of Christ, and extendeth no further, than the nature of that cōmunion beareth. But nowe though I graunt that they pray in this maner for vs, yet they do not therefore depart from their own quietnesse, to be diuersly drawen into earthly cares: and much lesse must we therefore by and by call vpon them. Neither doth it thereby followe that they must so do, because men which liue in earth may commende one another in their prayers. For this doing serueth for nourishing of charitie among them, when they do as it were part and mutually take vpon them their necessities among themselues. And this they do by the commandement of the Lorde, and are not without a promise, which two things, haue alway the chiefe place in prayer. All such considerations are farre from the dead, whom when the Lord hath cōueyed from our companie, he hath left to vs no enterchāge of doings with them, nor to them with vs, so farre as we may gather by coniectures. But if any man allege, that it is impossible but that they must kepe the same charity toward vs, as they be ioined in one Faith with vs: yet who hath reueled y^e they haue so long eares to reach to our voices? and so percing eyes to watch our necessities? They prate in their shadowes I wote not what of the brightnes of the countenance of God extending his beames vpon them, in which as in a mirror they may from on hie behold the matters of men beneath. But to affirme that, specially with such boldnesse as they dare, what is it elles but to go about by the dronken dreames of our owne braine, without his word to pearce & breake into the hidden iudgements of God, & to treade the the Scripture vnder fete which so oft pronoūceth that the wisdome of the flesh is enemie to the wisdome of God, which wholly condemneth the vanitie of our naturall witt, which willeth all our reason to be throwen downe, and the onely will of God to be looked vnto of vs. Ro. 8. 6.

25 The other testimonies of Scripture which they bring to defende this their lie, they most noughtily wrest. But Iacob (said they) praieth that his name & the name of his Fathers Abraham & Isaac be called vpon ouer his posteritie. First let vs see what forme of calling vpon this is amōg the Israelites. For they call not vpon their Fathers, to helpe them: but they besech God to remēber his seruantes Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob. Therefore their example maketh nothing for thē that speake to the Saintes themselues. But because those blockes (such is their dulnesse) neither vnderstande what it is to call vpon the name of Iacob, nor why it is to be called vpon: it is no maruell if in the very forme also they so childishly stumble. This maner of speche is not seldome founde in the Scriptures. For Esaye saith that the name of the men is called vpon ouer the women, when they haue them as their husbādes vnder whoes charge & defense they liue. Therefore the calling vpon of the name of Abrahā vpon the Israelites, standeth in this when they conuey their pedegree from him, and doo with solemne memorie honor him for their author & parent. Neither doth Iacob this because he is carefull for the enlarging of the renome of his name: but for asmuch as he knewe that the whole blesse dnesse of his posteritie cōsisted in the enheritance of the couenant which God had made with him: he wisheth that which he seeth should be the chefe of all good things to them, that they be accōpted in his kinred: For, that is nothinge ells but to conuey to them the succession of the couenant. They againe when they bring such remembrāce into their prayers, do not flee to the intercessions of deade men: but do put the Lorde in minde of his couenant, wherby the most kinde father hath promised that he will be fauorable & beneficiall to thē for Abrahās, Isaacs, and Iacobs sakes. Howe litle the holy ones did otherwise leane vpon the merites of their father, the cōmon saying of the Chirch in the Prophet testifieth, Thou art our Father, and Abraham knewe vs not, & Israēll was ignorant of vs. Thou Lorde art our Father and our redemer. And when they say thus, they adde therewithall, Returne O Lorde for thy seruants sakes: yet thinking vpon no intercession, but bendinge their minde to the benefite of the couenāt. But now sith we haue the Lord Iesus, in whoes hand the eternall couenant of mercy is not onely made but also confirmed to vs: whoes name should we rather vse in our prayers? And because these good maisters will haue the Patriarches to be by these wordes made intercessors, I woulde faine knowe of them why in so great a route Abraham the Father of the Chirch hath no place at all among them. Out of what sinke they fethe their aduocates, it is not vnknowē. Let the aunswere me, how fit it is that Abraham, whom God preferred aboue all other, and whom he aduanced to the hiest degree of honor, should be neglected & suppressed. Verily when it was euident that such vse was vnknowē to the old Chirch, they thought good for hiding of the newnesse to speake nothing of the olde Fathers: as though y^e diuersity of names excused the newe & forged maner. But whereas some obiekt y^e God is prayed vnto, to haue mercy on y^e people for Dauids sake, it doth so nothing at all make for defense of their error, that it is a most strōg profe for the cōfutation therof. For if we cōsider what person David did beare: he is seuered from all the assembly of y^e Saintes, y^e God should stablish the couenāt which he hath made in his hāde. So both y^e couenāt is rather cōsidered thā y^e mā, & vnder a figure y^e only intercessiō of Christ is affirmed. For it is certaine that that which belōged only to David, in so much as he was the image of Christ, accordeth not wth any other.

26 But this forsooth moueth some, that it is oftentimes red that the prayers of Saintes haue bene heard. Why so? Euen because they prayed. They trusted in thee (saith the Prophet) & they were saued: they cried, and they were not cōfounded. Therefore let vs also pray as they did, that we may be heard as they were. But these men, otherwise than they ought, do wrōgfully reason, that none shalbe heard but they that haue ones bene heard. Howe much better doth Iames say? Elias (sayeth he) was a man like to vs: & he prayed with prayer that it should not raine, & it rained not vpon the earth in three yeares and six monethes. Againe he prayed, and the heauen gaue raine, and the earth gaue here frute. What? doth he gather any singular prerogatiue of Elias, to which we ought to flee? No. But he teacheth what is y^e continual strength of godly & pure praier, to exhorte vs likewise to pray. For we do niggardly construe the redinesse & gentlenesse of God in hearing the, vnlesse we be by such experiences cōfirmed into a more sure affiāce of his promises, in w^{ch} he promiseth y^e his care shalbe enclined not to one, or two, nor yet to a few, but to all y^e call vpō his name. And so much lesse excusable is this foolishnesse, because they seeme as it were of set purpose to despise so many admonitiōs of Scripture. David was oft deliuered by the power of God. Was it that he should draw that power to himself, that we should be deliuered by his helpe? He himself affirmeth farre otherwise: The righteous loke for me, till thou reder to me. Againe, The righteous shall see & they shall reioise, and

and trust in the Lord. Behold, this poore man hath cried to God, and he hath answered him. There be in the psalmes many such praier, in which to craue that which he requireth, he moueth God by this manner, y^e the righteous be not made ashamed, but may by his exāple be raised vp to hope well. Let vs now be contented with this one example. Therefore euery holy one shall pray to thee in fit time. Which place I haue so much the more willingly rehearsed, because the leud babblers which do let out to hire the seruice of their waged tongue haue not bin ashamed to alleage it to proue the intercession of the dead. As though Dauid meant any thing else, than to shew the frute that shall come of the mercifulnesse and gentlenesse of God, when he shall be heard. And in this kinde we must learne, that the experience of the grace of God, as well towarde our selues as other, is no sclender help to cōfirme the credit of his promises. I leaue vnrehearsed many places, where Dauid setteth before himselfe the benefits of God for matter of cōfidence, because the readers of the Psalmes shall commonly find them without sekeing. This selfe same thing had Iacob before taught by his owne example: I am vnworthy of all thy mercies, and of the trueth which thou hast performed to thy seruant. I with my staffe haue passed ouer this Iordane, and now I come forth with two bandes. He alleageth in deede the promise, but not alone: but he also ioineth the effect, that he may the more couragiously in time to come trust that God will be the same toward him. For he is not like to mortall men, which are wery of their liberality, or whose ability is wasted: but he is to be weyed by his owne nature, as Dauid wisely doth where he sayth, Thou hast redeemed me, O God that speakest trueth. After that he hath giue to God the praises of his saluation, he addeth that he is a true speaker: because vnlesse he were cōtinually like himselfe, there could not be gathered of his benefites a sufficiently strong reason of affiance & calling vpon him. But when we know that so oft as he helpeth vs, he sheweth an exāple & prooffe of his goodnesse, we neede not to feare that our hope shall be put to shame or disapoint vs.

27 Let this be the summe. Whereas the Scripture setteth out this vnto vs for the chiefe point in the worshipping of God, (as refusing all sacrifices, he requireth of vs this duety of godlinesse) praier is not without manifest sacrilege directed to other. Wherefore also it is sayd in the Psalme. If we stretch forth our hands to a strāge God, shall not God require these things? Againe, wheras God wil not be called vpon, but of Faith, & expressly commaūdeth praier to be framed according to the rule of his word; finally wheras Faith founded vpon the word, is the mother of right praier: so sone as we swarue frō the word, our praier must needes be corrupted. But it is already shewed, that if the whole Scripture be sought, this honor is therein chalenged to God only. As touching the office of intercessiō, we haue also shewed that it is peculiar to Christ, & that there is no praier acceptable to God, but which that mediator halloweth. And though the faithful do one for an other offer praiers to God for their brethren, we haue shewed that this abateth nothing from the onely intercession of Christ: because they altogether standing vpon it do cōmend both theselues & other to God. Moreouer we haue taught that this is vnfitly drawn to dead men, to whom we neuer read that it hath bin commaunded that they should pray for vs. The Scripture doth oftentimes exhorte vs to mutuall doings of this duety one for an other: but of dead men there is not so much as one syllable: yea and Iames ioyning these two things together, that we should cōfesse our selues among our selues, & mutually pray one for an other, doth secretly exclude deade men. Therefore to condemne this errour, this one reason sufficeth, that the beginning of praying rightly, springeth out of Faith, and that Faith commeth of the hearing of the word of God, where is no mentiō of the fained intercession, because superstition hath rashly gotten to it selfe patrones which were not giuen them of God. For whereas the Scripture is full of many formes of praier, there is no example found of this patronship, without which in y papacy they beleue that there is no praier. Moreouer it is certaine that this superstition hath growē of distrustfulnesse either because they were not content with Christ to be their intercessour, or haue altogether robbed him of his praise. And this later point is easily proued by their shamelesnesse: because they haue nō other stronger argumēt to proue that we haue nede of the intercession of Saintes, than whē they obiect that we are vnworthy of familiar accessē to God. Which we in deede graunt to be most true: but thereupō we gather, that they leaue nothing to Christ, which esteeme his intercession nothinge worth, vnlesse there be adioyned George, Hypolite, or such other visors.

28 But although prayer properly signifieth only wishes & petitiōs: yet there is so great affinity betwene petitiō & thankegiuing, y they may be fitly comprehended both vnder one name. For, these special sortes which Paule rehearseth, fall vnder the first part of this diuision. With asking & crauing we poure forth our désires before God, requiring as well those things y seme to spred abroad his glory & set forth his name, as the benefites that are profitable to our vse. With giuinge of thankes, we do with due praise magnifie his good doinges towarde vs, acknowledging to be receiued of his liberality whatsoeuer good things do come to vs. Therefore Dauid cōprehended these two partes together, saying: Call vpon me in the day of necessity : I will deliuer thee, & thou shalt glorifie me. The Sctipture not in vaine cōmaundeth vs to vse both. For we haue sayd in an other place that our needes is so great, & y^e experience it selfe crieth out that we are on euery side pinched and pressed with so many & so great distresses, that all haue cause enough why they should both sigh to God, & in humble wise call vpon him. For though they be free from aduersities, yet the giltines of their wicked doings, & their innumerable assaultes of tentations ought to pricke forward the most holy to aske remedy. But in the sacrifice of praise and thankesgiuing there can be no interruptiō without hainous sinne, forasmuch as God cesseth not to heape vpon diuerse men diuerse benefites to driue vs though we be slacke & slow, to thankfulness. Finally so great & so plenteous largesse of his benefites doth in a maner ouerwhelme vs: ther are so many & so great miracles of his sene on euery side which way soeuer thou turne thee, that we neuer want ground and matter of praise and thankesgiuinge. And, that these things may be somewhat plainelier declared: sith all our hopes and wealth stand in God (which we haue before sufficiently proued) that neither we nor all our things can be in prosperity but by his blessinge : we must continually commit our selues and all our things to him. Then, whatsoeuer we purpose, speake, or do, let vs purpose, speake, & do vnder hs hande & wil, finally vnder the hope of his help. For, all are pronounced accursed of God, which deuise or determine any purposes vpon trust of themselues or of any other, which without his wil, & without calling vpon him do enterprise or attempt to begin any thing. And wheras we haue diuerse times already said, y^e he is duely honored when he is acknowledged the author of al good things: therupon followeth that all those things are so to be receiued at his hande, that we yelde continuall thankes for them: & that there is no other right way for vs to vse his benefites, which flow & procede frō his liberality to no other end, but y^e we should be continually busied in confessing his praise & giuing of thankes. For Paul, when he testifieth y^e they are sanctified by the word & praier, doth therewithal signify y^e they are not holy & cleane to vs without the word & praier, vnderstanding by y^e word, faith by figure. Therefore Dauid saith very wel, when hauing receiued y^e liberality of the Lord, he declareth that there is giuen him into his mouth a new song: wherby verily he signifieth that it is a malicious silence, if we passe ouer any of his benefites without praise : sith he so oft giueth vs matter to say good of him, as he doth good to vs. As also Esay settinge out the singular grace of God, exhorteth the faithfull to a new and vnwonted songe. In which sense Dauid sayth in an other place, Lord open thou my lippes, and my mouth shall shew foorth thy praise. Likewise Ezechias and Ionas testifie y^e this shalbe to the end of their deliuerance, to celebrate the goodnes of God with songes in the temple. This same Law Dauid prescribeth to all the godly. What shal I repay to the Lord (saith he) for all the thinges that he hath bestowed vpon me? I will take the cup of saluations, and will call vpon the name of the Lorde. And the same law the Church foloweth in an other Psalm, Saue vs our God, that we may confesse to thy name and glory in thy praise, Againe, he hath looked vnto the praier of the solitary, and he hath not despised their praiers. This shalbe wrytten to the generation that shal follow, and the people created shall praise the Lorde, that they may declare his name in him and his praise in Hierusalem. Yea so oft as the faithfull besech God to do for his names sake: as they professe themselues vnworthy to obtaine any thinge in their owne name, so they binde themselues to giue thanks, and they promise that this shalbe to them the right vse of the bountifulnes of God that they shalbe publishers of it. So Osee speakinge of the redemption to come of the Church, sayth: Take away iniquity O God, and lift vp good: and we will pay the calues of lippes. And the benefites of God do not onely claime to themselues the praise of the tongue, but also do naturally procure loue. I haue loued (sayth Dauid) because y^e Lord hath heard the voice of my prayer. Againe in an other place, rehearsing the helpes which he had felt, he sayth: I will loue thee O God my strength. Neither shal the praises euer please God, which shal not flow out of this sweetenes of loue. Yea and also we must holde fast this sayinge of Paule, that all praiers are wrongfull and faulty to which is not adioyned giuinge of thanks. For thus he sayth, in all praier and beseechinge with thanksgiuing, let your petitions, be knowen with God. For, sith testinesse, tediousnesse, impatience, bitterness of griefe, and feare do moue many in prayinge to murmure, he commaundeth that our affections be so tempered, that the faithful ere they haue obtained that which they desire, should neuertheless cherefully blesse God. If this knot ought to haue place in things in a maner contrary, with so much more holy band doth God binde vs to sing his praises, so oft as he maketh vs to enioy our requestes. But as we haue taught that our praiers are hallowed by the intercession of Christ, which otherwise shoulde be vncleane: so the Apostle, where he commaundeth vs to offer a sacrifice of praise by Christ, putteth in minde that we haue not a mouth clean enough enough to praise the name of God, vnlesse the priesthode of Christ Heb. 13.

 that he willeth that with so great cōtinuing as may be, at euery time in euery place, in all matters and busineses, the praiers of all men should be lifted vp to God, which may both looke for al things at his hand & yelde to him the praise of al things, as he offreth vs continuall matter to praise and pray.

29 But this continuall diligence of prayinge, although it specially concerne the propre and priuate prayers of euery man, yet somewhat also pertaineth to the publike prayers of the Church. But those can neither be continuall, nor ought otherwise to be done than according to the politike order that shall by cōmon consent be agreed vpon amonge all. I graunt the same in dede. For therefore certaine houres are set & appointed, as indifferent with God, so necessary for the vses of men, that the cōmodity of all men may be provided for, and all things (according to the saying of Paul) may be comelily and orderly done in the Church. But this maketh nothing to the cōtrary 1. Cor.

 selfe to often vse of prayers, and when it is admonished by any greater necessity, to be feruent with more earnest endeuour. As for perseuerance which hath a great affinity with continual diligence, there shall be a fitte place to speake of it about the ende. Nowe these

 For we know that Hypocrites, because they do not cōsider that they haue to do with God, do no lesse makē a pōpous shew in their praiers than in a triumph. For, the Pharisee which thanked God that he was not like to other men, without dout reioysed at himselfe in the eyes of men, as if he would by praier seeke to get a fame of holines. Hereupon came that much babbling, which at this day vpon a like cause is vsed in y^e papacy: while some do vainly spend the time in repeating the same praiers, and other some do set out themselues amonge the people with a lōg heape of words. Sith this babbling childishly mocketh God, it is no maruell that it is forbidden out of the Church, to the end that nothing should there be vsed but earnest & proceeding from the bottome of the hart. Of a neere kinde and like to this corruption is there an other, which Christ condemne with this, namely that hypocrites for boasting sake do seeke to haue many witnesses, and do rather occupy the market place to pray in, than their praier should want the praise of the worlde. But whereas we haue already shewed that this is the mark that praier shooteth at, that our mindes may be caried vpwrd to God, both to confession of praise & to crauinge of helpe: thereby we may vnderstande that the chiefe duties thereof do stand in the minde & the hart, or rather that praier it selfe is properly an affection of the inward hart, which is poured forth and laid open before God the searcher of hearts. Wherefore (as it is already sayd) the heauenly schoolemaister, whē he minded to set out the best rule of praying, cōmaunded vs to go into our chamber, & there the dore beinge shut to pray to our Father which is in secreete, that our Father which is in secreete may heare vs. For when he hath drawn them away frō the example of hypocrites, which with ambitious boasting shew of prayers sought the fauour of men, he therewithall addeth what is better, namely to enter into our chamber, & there to pray the dore beinge shut. In which words (as I expound them) he willed vs to seeke solitary beinge, which may helpe vs to descende & to enter throughly with our whole thought into our hart, promisinge to the affections of our hart that God shalbe neere vs whose tēples our bodies ought to be. For he meant not to deny but that it is expedient also to pray in other places: but he sheweth that praier is a certaine secret thing, which both is chiefly placed in the soule, & requireth the quiet therof farre from all troubles of cares. Not without cause therefore the Lorde himselfe also, when he was disposed to apply himselfe more earnestly to praier conueied himselfe into some solitary place farre from the troublesome company of men: but to teach vs by his example that these helps are not to be despised, by which our mind beinge to slippery of it selfe is more bent to earnest applyinge of praier. But in the meane time euen as he in the midst of the multitude of men, abstained not from praying, if occasion at any time so serued: so should we in all places where nede shalbe, lift vp pure handes. Finally thus it is to be holdē, that whosoever refuseth to pray in the holy assembly of the godly, he knoweth not what it is to pray aparte, or in solitarines, or at home. Againe, that he that neglecteth to pray alone or priuatly how diligently soeuer he haunt publike assemblies, doth there make but vaine praier: because he giueth more to the opinion of men than to the secret iudgement of God. In the meane time, that the commō praier of the Church should not grow into contempt,

God

God in old time garnished them with glorious titles, specially where he called the temple the house of praier. For, by this sayinge he both taught that the chiefe part of the worshipping of him is the duety of praier: & that to the end that the faithfull shoulde with one consent exercise themselues in it, the temple was set vp as a standard for them. There was also added a notable promise: There abideth for thee, O God, praife in Sion: & to thee the vow shalbe paied. By which wordes the Prophet telleth vs, that the praiers of the Church are neuer void: because the Lord alway ministreth to his people matter to sing vpon with ioy. But although the shadowes of the law are cessed: yet because the Lords wil was by this ceremony to nourish among vs also the v-nity of faith, it is no dout that the same promise belógeth to vs, which both Christ hath stablished with his owne mouth, and Paul teacheth that it is of force for euer.

30 Now as the Lord by his word cōmaundeth the faithfull to vse common praiers: so there must be cōmon temples appointed for the vsing of them: where who so refuse to communicate their praier with the people of God, there is no cause why they should abuse this pretense, that they enter into their chamber that they may obey the cōmaudemēt of the Lord. For he that promiseth that he wil do what soeuer two or three shall aske beinge gathered together in his name, testifieth that he despiseth not praiers openly made: so that boastinge and seking of glory of men be absent, so that vnfaigned & true affectiō be present which dwelleth in the secret of the hart. If this be the right vse of temples (as truly it is) we must againe beware that neither (as they haue begon in certaine ages past to be accompted) we take them for the proper dwellinge places of God from whence he may more nerely bende his eare vnto vs: nor faine to them I wote not what secrete holinesse, which may make our praier more holy before God. For sith we our selues be the true réples of God we must pray in our selues if we will call vpon God in his own holy temple. As for ȳ grosse-nesse, let vs which haue a commaundement to call vpon the Lord in Spirit and truth without difference of place, leaue it to the Iewes or the Gentiles. There was in dede a temple in old time by the cōmaundement of God for offringe of praiers and sacrifices: but that was at such time as the truth lay hid figured vnder such shadowes, which being now liuely expressed vnto vs doth not suffer vs to stick in any materiall temple. Neither was the temple giuen to the Iewes themselues with this condition, that they should enclose the presence of God, w̄in the walles thereof, but whereby they might be exercised to beholde the image of the true temple. Therefore they, which in any thought

31 Here moreouer it is more than euident, that neither voice nor song, if they be vsed in praier, haue any force, or do any whit profite before God, vnlesse they procede from the depe affectiō of the hart. But rather they prouoke his wrath against vs, if they come only from the lippes and out of the throte: forasmuch as that is to abuse his holy name, and to make a mockery of his maiesty: as we gather out of the words of Esay, which although they extende further, yet pertaine also to reprove this fault. This people (sayth he) commeth nere to with their mouth and honoreth me with their lippes but their hart is farre from me: and they haue feared me with the commaundement and doctrine of men. Therefore beholde I will make in this people a miracle great and to be wondered at: For, wisdom shall perish from their wise men, and the prudence of the Elders shall vanish away. Neither yet do we here condemne voice or singing, but rather do hiely commende them, so that they accompany the affection of the minde. For so they exercise the minde and holde it intentine in thinkinge vpon God: which as it is slippery and rolling, easily slacketh and is diuersely drawen vnlesse it be stayed with diuerse helpes. Moreouer whereas the glory of God ought after a certaine maner to shine in al the parts of our body, it specially behoueth that the tongue be applied and auowed to this seruice both in singinge and in speakinge which is properly created to shewe foorth and display the praise of God. But the chiefe vse of the tongue is in publike praiers, which are made in the assembly of the Godly: which tende to this ende, that we may all with one common voice, and as it were with one mouth together glorifie God, whom we worship with one Spirit & one Faith: and that openly, that all men mutually, euery one of his brother, may receiue the confession of Faith, to the example wherof they may be both allured and stirred.

32 As for the vse of singing in Churches (that I may touch this also by the way) it is certaine that it is not only most auncient: but that it was also in vse among the Apostles, we may gather by these words of Paule, I will sing in Spirit, I will sing also in minde. Againe to the Colossians, Teachinge and admonishinge you, mutually in hymnes psalmes, and spirituall songes, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord. For in the first place he teacheth that we should sing with voice and hart: in the other he commenderh spirituall songes, wherewith the Godly do mutually edifie themselues. Yet that it was not vniuersall, Augustine testifieth, which reporteth that in the time of Ambrose

the Church of Millain first beganne to singe, when while Iustina the mother of Valentinian cruelly raged against y^e true Faith, the people more vsed watchings than they were wont: and that afterwarde the other westerne Churches followed. For he hadde a litle before sayd that this maner came from the Easterne Churches. He telleth also in his seconde booke of Rētractations that it was in his time receiued in Africa. One Hilarie (sayth he) a ruler did in euery place where soeuer he could, with malicious blaming raile at the maner which thē began to be at Carthage, that the hymnes at the altar shoulde be pronouncēd out of the booke of Psalmes, either before the oblation, or when that which had bin offered was distributed to y^e people. Him I answered at the commaundement of my brethren. And truely if song be rēpered to y^e grauity which becommeth the presence of God & Angels, it both procureth dignity and grace to the holy actions, and much auaieth to stirre vp the mindes to true affection, and feruentnesse of prayinge. But we must diligently beware that our eares be not more heedefully bent to the nore, than our mindes to the spirituall sense of the words. With which peril Augustine in a certain place saith y^e he was so moued, that he sometime wished that the maner which Athanasius kept should be stablised, which commaunded that the reader should founde his wordes with so small a bowinge of his voice, that it should be liker to one that readeth than to one that singeth. But when he remembered how much profit he himselfe had receiued by singing, he enclined to the other side: Therefore vsing this moderation, there is no dout that it is a most holy & profitable ordinance. As on the other side what songs so euer are framed only to sweetenes and delite of the eares, they both become not the maiesty of the Church & can not but hiely displease God.

33 Wherby it also plainely appeareth that common praiers are to be spoken not in Greeke amonge Latine men, nor in Latine amonge Frenchmen or Englishmen (as it hath heretofore bin ech where commonly done) but in the peoples mother tongue, which commonly may be vnderstoode of the whole assembly: forasmuch as it ought to be done to the edifying of the whole Church, which receiue no frute at all of a sounde not vnderstanded. But they which haue no regarde neither of charity nor of humanity, should at least haue bin somewhat moued with the authority of Paule, whose wordes are nothing doubtful. If thou blesse (sayth he) in Spirit, how shal he that filleth the place of an vnlearned man answer Amen to thy blessing, sith he knoweth not what thou sayst? For thou in dede giuest thankes, but the other is not edified. Who therefore can sufficiently wonder at the vnbrideled licentiousnesse of the Papistes, which, the Apostle so openly cryinge out against it, feare not to roare out in a strange tongue most babbling praier, in which they themselues sometime vnderstand not one syllable, nor woulde haue other folkes to vnderstand it? But Paul teacheth that we ought to do otherwise. How then? I will pray (saith he) with spirit, I will pray also with minde: I wil sing with spirit: I will sing also with minde: signifying by the name of Spirite, the singular gift of tongues, which many being endued with abused it, when they seuered it from the mind, that is, from vnderstanding. But this we must altogether thinke, that it is by no meane possible, neither in publike nor in priuate praier, but that the tongue without the hart must hiely displese God. Morouer we must think that the mind ought to be kindled with feruentnesse of thought, that it may farre surmount all that the tongue may expresse with vterance. Finally that y^e tongue is not necessary at all for priuate praier, but so farre as the inward feelinge either is not able to suffice to enkindle it selfe, or the vehemence of enkindling violētly carieth the worke of y^e tongue with it. For though very good praier sometime be without voice, yet oftētimes betideth, that when the affectiō of the minde is feruent, both the tongue breaketh forth into voice, and the other members into gesturing without excessiue shew. Hereupon came the muttering of Hanna, and such a like thinge all the holy ones alway feele in themselues, when they burst out into broken and vnperfect voices. As for the gestures of the body which are wont to be vsed in praier (as kneeling and vncouering of the head) they are exercises by which we endeouour to rise vp to a greater reuerencing of God.

34 Nowe we must learne not onely a more certaine rule, but also the very forme of prayinge: namely the same, which the heauenly Father hath taught vs by his beloued Sonne: wherein we may acknowledge his vnmesurable goodnesse and kindenesse. For beside this he warneth and exhorteth vs to seeke him in all our necessity, (as children are wont to flee to their fathers defence, so oft as they be troubled with any distresse) because he sawe that we did not sufficiently perceiue this, how slender our pouerty was, what were meete to be asked, & what were for our profit: he prouided also for this our ignorance, and what our capacity wanted, he supplied and furnished of his own. For he hath prescribed to vs a forme wherein he hath as in a Table set out whatsoeuer we may desire of him, whatsoeuer auailth for our profit, & whatsoeuer is necessary to aske. Of which his gētlenes we receaue a great frute of comfort that we vnderstand that we aske no inconuenient thing, no vnseeminge or vnfit thing, finally nothing that that is not acceptable to him, sith we aske in a maner after his owne mouth. Whē Plato saw the folly of men in making requestes to God, which being graunted, it many times besel much to their own hurte he pronounced that this is the best maner of prayinge taken out of the olde Poete, Kinge Iuppiter giue vnto vs the best thinges both when we aske them, and when we do not aske them, but commaund euil thinges to be away from vs euen when we aske them. And verily the heathen man is wise in this, that he iudgeth howe perillous it is to aske of the Lord that which our owne desire moueth vs: & therewithal he bewraieith our vnhappy case, that we can not ones opē our mouthes before God without danger, vnlesse the Spirite do instruct vs to a right rule of prayinge. And in somuch greater estimation this priuilege is worthy to be had of vs, sith the onely begotten Sonne of God ministreth words into our mouth which may deliuer our minde from all douting.

35 This whither you call it forme or rule of praying is made of six petitions. For, the cause why I agree not to them that diuide it into seuen parts, is this, that by putting in this aduersatiue word (But) it seemeth that the Euangelist ment to ioyne these two peces together, as if he had said: Suffer vs not to be oppressed with tentation but rather help our weakenes, & deliuer vs, that we faint not. The old writers also thinke on our side, so that nowe that which is in Marthew added in the seuenth place, is by way of declaratiō to be ioyned to the sixt petition. But although the whole praier is such that in euery parte of it regarde is specially to be had of the glory of God, yet the three first petitions are peculiarly appoynted to Gods glory, w̄ alone we ought in them to looke vnto without any respect (as they say) of our owne profit. The other three haue care of vs, and are properly assigned to aske those thinges that are for our profite. As when we pray that the name of God be hallowed: because God wil proue whether he be loued & honored of vs freely or for hope of reward, we must thē thinke nothing of our owne cōmodity: but his glory must be set before vs, w̄ alone we must behold with fixed eies: & no otherwise ought we to be minded in the other praiers of this sort. And euen this turneth to our great profit, ȳ when it is sanctified as we pray, it is also likewise made our sanctification. But our eyes (as it is sayd) must winke and after a certaine maner be blinde at such profit, so as they may not ones loke at it: that if all hope of our priuat benefite were cut of, yet we shoulde not cease to wishe and pray for this sanctification and other thinges which pertaine to the glory of God. As it is seene in the examples of Moses and Paule, to whom it was not grieuous to turne away their mindes and eyes from themselues, and with vehement and enflamed zeale to wish their owne destruction that though it were with their owne losse they might auance the glory & kingdom of God. On the other side when we pray that our daily bread be giuen vs: although we wish y^e which is for our owne commodity, yet here also we ought chiefly to seeke the glory of God, so that we should not aske it vnlesse it might turne to his glory. Now let vs come to the declaring of the praier it self.

36 First in the very entry we mete with this which we said before that all praier ought none otherwise to be offered of vs to God than in the name of Christ, as it can by no other name be made acceptable vnto him. For since we call him Father, truely we alleage for vs the name of Christ. For by what boldnesse might any man call God, Father? who shoulde burst foorth into so great rashnesse, to take to himselfe the honor of the Sonne of God, vnlesse we were adopted the children of grace in Christ? Which being the true Sonne, is giue of him to vs to be our brother: that that which he hath proper by nature, may by the benefite of adoption be made ours, if we do with sure faith embrace so great bountifulnesse. As Iohn sayth, that power is giuen to th^e which beleue in the name of the only begotten Sonne of God, that they also may be made the children of God. Therefore he both calleth himselfe our Father, & will be so called of vs, by this sweetenesse of name deliuering vs from all distrust, sith there can no where be found any greater affection of loue than in a Father. Therefore he could by no surer example testifie his vnmeasurable dere loue toward vs than by this that we are named the sonnes of God. But his loue is so much greater & more excellent toward vs than all loue of our parentes, as he passeth all men in goodnesse and mercy: that if all the fathers that are in the earth, hauing shaken of al feeling of fatherly naturalnesse, would forsake their children, yet he wil neuer faile vs, because he can not deny himselfe. For we haue his promise, If you beinge euill can giue good giftes to your children, how much more can your Father which is in heauen? Againe in the Prophet, Can a mother forget her children? Though she forget them, yet I will not forget thee. If we be his children: then as a childe can not giue himselfe into the tuition of a stranger and foreine man, vnlesse he cōplaine either of the cruelty or pouerty of his father: so we can not seeke succours from else where than from him alone, vnlesse we reproch him with pouerty and want of ability, or with cruelty or to extreme rigorousnesse.

37. Neither let vs alleage that we are worthily made feareful with conscience of sinnes, which may make a Father be he neuer so mercifull and kinde, daily to be displeas'd. For if among men the sonne can with no better aduocate pleade his cause to his father, and by no better meane get and recouer his fauour beinge lost, than if he himselfe humbly & lowly, acknowledging his fault, do besech his fathers mercy (for then the fatherly bowels can not hide theselues but must be moued at such prayers) what shall that father of mercies do, and the God of all comforte? shall not he rather heare the teares and gronings of his children intreatinge for themselues (specially sith he doth call and exhort vs to do so) than any other intercessions, whatsoever they be: to the succour whereof they do so fearefully flee, not without some shew of despeire, because they distrust of the kindenes and mercifulnes of their father? This ouerflowing plenty of fatherly kindenes he depainteth and setteth out vnto vs in the parable, where the Father louingly embraceth the sonne that had estranged himself from him, that had riotously wasted his substãce, that had euery way grievously offended against him: and he tarieth not till he do with words craue pardon, but he himselfe preuenteth him, knoweth him a farre of returning, of his owne wil goeth to meete him, comforteth him and receiueth him into fauour. For, setting out in a man this example of so great gentlenes, he minded to teach vs how much more plentifull kindenes we ought to looke for at his hand, who is not onely a Father, but also the best and most merciful of all Fathers, howsoeuer we be vnkinde, rebellious, and naughty children: so that yet we cast our selues vpon his mercy. And that he might make it to be more assuredly beleued, that he is such a Father to vs; if we be Christiãs: he willed not onely to be called Father, but also by expresse name Our father: as if we might thus talke with him, O Father which hast so great natural kindnes toward thy children, so great easines to pardon, we thy children call to thee and pray to thee, being assured and fully perswaded, that thou bearest no other affection to vs than fatherly, howsoeuer we be vnworthy of such a Father. But because the small capacities of our hearte conceiue not so great vnmeasurablenesse of fauour, not only Christ is to vs a pledge and earnest of our adoption, but also he giueth vs the Spirit for witnesse of the same adoption, through whome we may with a free and lowde voyce crie Abba, Father. So oft therefore as any delay shall withstande vs, lette vs remember to aske of him, that correctinge our fearefulnesse he will set before vs that Spirit of coragiousnesse to be our guide to praye boldly.

38 Whereas we are not so taught that euery one should seuerally call him his owne father, but rather that we should al in common together call him Our Father: thereby we are put in minde, how great affection of brotherly loue ought to be among vs, which are altogether by one same right of mercy and liberality, the children of such a Mar. 23. Father. For we all haue one common Father, from whome commeth
9. whatsoeuer good thinge may betide vnto vs: there ought to be nothing seuerall amonge vs, which we are not ready with great cheerefulnesse of minde to communicate one to an other, so much as neede requireth. Now if we be so desirous, as we ought to be, to reach our hand & help one to an other, there is nothing wherein we may more profit our breithren, than to commende them to the care and prouidence of the most good Father, who being wel pleased and fauoring, nothing at al can be wanted. And verily euē this same we owe to our Father. For as he that truely & hartily loueth any Father of household, doth also embrace his whole household, with loue and good will: likewise what loue & affection we beare to this heauēly Father, we must shew toward his people, his household and his inheritance, which he hath so honored; that he hath called it the fulnesse of his onely begotten Sonne. Lette a Christian man therefore frame his prayers by this rule, that they be common, and may comprehend all them that be breithren in Christ with him: and not onely those whom he presently seeth and knoweth to be such, but al men that liue vpon earth: of whom, what God hath determind, it is out of our knowledge: sauing that it is no lesse godly then naturall to wish the best to them, & hope the best of them. Howbeit we ought with a certaine singular affection to beare a speciall inclination to them of the householde of
Eph. 1. 24. faith, whom the Apostle hath in euery thing peculiarly commended
Gala. 6. 10. vnto vs. In a summe, All our praers ought to be so made, that they haue respect to that community which our Lorde hath stablished in his kingdom and his house.

39 Yet this withstandeth not, but that we may specially praye both for our selues and for certaine other: so that yet our minde depart not from hauing an eie to this community, nor ones swarue frō it, but apply all things vnto it. For though they be singularly spoken in forme, yet because they are directed to that marke, they cease not to be common. All this may be easily vnderstoode by a like example. The commaundement of God is generall, to relieue the neede of all poore: and yet they obey this commaundement which to this end do helpe their pouerty whome they knowe or see to be in neede, although they passe ouer many whom they see to be pressed with no lesse lesse necessity: either because they can not knowe all, or be not able to helpe al. After this maner they also do not against the wil. of God, which hauing regard vnto and thinkinge vpon this common fellowship of the Church, do make such particular praier, by which they do with a common minde in particular wordes, commende to God the- selues or other, whose necessity God willed to be more neerely kno- wen to them. Howebeit all thinges are not like in praier and in be- stowing of goods. For, the liberality of giuing can not be vsed but to- ward them whose neede we haue perceiued: but with praier we may helpe euen them that are most strange and most vnknownen to vs, by howe great a space of grounde soeuer they be distant from vs. This is done by the general forme of praier, wherein all the children of God are contained, among whom they also are. Hereto we may apply that which Paul exhorteth the faithfull of his time, that they lift vp euery where pure handes without strife: because when he warneth the that strife shutteth the gate against praier, he willeth the with one minde to lay their petitions in common together.

40. It is added, y he is in heauen. Wherupō it is not by and by to be gathered that he is bound fast enclosed & compassed with the circle of heauen, as within certaine barres. For Salomon also confesseth that the heauens of heauens can not containe him. And he himselfe saith by the Prophet that heauen is his seate, & the earth his footestool. Wherby verily he signifieth y he is not limited in any certaine coast, but is spred abroad throughout all thinges. But because our minde (such is the grossenesse of it) coulde not otherwise conceiue his vn- speakeable glory, it is signified to vs by the heauen, than which ther e- cā nothing come vnder our sight more ample or fuller of maiesty. Sith therefore whersoever our senses comprehend any thing, there they vse to fasten it: God is set out of all place, that when we will seeke him we should be raised vp aboute all sense both of body and soule. Againe by this maner of speaking he is lifted vp aboute all chaunce of corruptiō & change: finally it is signified that he comprehendeth & containeth the whole world & gouerneth it with his power. Wherefore this is al one as if he had bin called of infinite greatnes or height, of incōpre- hensible substance, of vnmeasurable power, of euerlasting immortali- ty. But while we haue this, we must lift vp our minde hier when God is spoken of, that we dreame not any earthly or fleshly thinge of him, that we measure him not by our small proportions, nor draw his will to the rule of our affections. And therewithal is to be raised vp our af- fiance in him, by whose prouidence and power we vnderstand heauen & earth to be gouerned. Let this be y summe, that vnder the name

cause the word of God is like a kingly scepter, we are here commaunded to pray that he will subdue the mindes and hartes of all men to willing obedience of it. Which is done, when with the secret instinct of his Spirit he vttereth the effectuall force of his worde, that it may be auanced in such degree as it is worthy. Afterward we must come downe to the wicked which do obstinately and with desperate rage resist his authoritie. God therefore setteth vp his kingdome by humbling the whole world: but that in diuerse maners: because he tammeth the wantonneses of some, and of other some he breaketh the vntamed pride. This is daily to be wished that it be done, that it may please God to gather to himselfe Chirches out of all the coastes of the world, to enlarge and encrease them in number, to enrich them with his gistes, to stablish right order in them: on the other side to ouerthrowe all the enemies of pure doctrine and religion, to scatter abroad their counsells, to cast downe their enterprises. Whereby appeareth that the endeuor of daily proceeding is not in vaine commaunded vs: because the matters of men are neuer in so good case, that filthinesse being shaken away and cleansed, full purenesse flourisheth and is in liuely force. But the fulnesse of it is differred vnto the last comming of Christ, when Paule teacheth that God shalbe all in all. And so this prayer ought to withdrawe vs from all the corrupt ons of the world, which do seuer vs from God that his kingdome should not flourish in vs, and also to kindle our endeuor to mortifie the flesh, finally to instruct vs to the bearing of the crosse: forasmuch as God will in this wise haue his kingdome spread abroad. Neither ought we to take it discontentedly that the outward man be destroyed, so that the inward man be renewed. For this is the nature of the kingdome of God, when we submitt our selues to the righteousnesse thereof, to make vs partakers of his glorie. This is done when brightly setting fourth his light and truth with alway newe encreasces, whereby the darkenesse and lies of Satan and his kingdome, may vanish away, be destroyed, and perish, he defendeth them that be his, with the helpe of his Spirit directeth them to vprightnesse and strengtheneth them to continuance: but ouerthroweth the wicked conspiracies of his enemies, shaketh abroad their treasons and deceites, preuenteth their malice, and beateth downe their stubbornnesse; till at length he kill Antichrist with the Spirit of his mouth and destroy all vngodlinesse with the brightnesse of his comming.

43 The third petition is, That the will of God be done in earth as it is in heauen. Which although it hageth vpon his kingdome, and can not be seuered from it, is not in vaine added seuerally, for our gross-grossnesse, which doth not easily or by and by conceiue what it is that God reigne in the world. It shall therefore be no absurditie if this be taken by way of plainer exposition: that God shall then be king in the world when all things shall submit themselves to his will. Nowe here is not meant of his secreete will, wherby he gouerneth all things and directeth them to their ende. For though Satan & men are troublesomly caried against him, yet he can by his incōprehensible counseil not onely turne aside their violent motions, but also driue them into order that he may do by them that which he hath purposed. But here is spoken of an other will of God, namely that, whereunto auanswereth willing obedience: and therefore the heauen is by name compared with the earth: because the Angells, as it is said in the Psalme, do willingly obey God, & are diligently bent to do his commaundements. We are therefore cōmaunded to wish that as in heaue Ps. 10.

nothing is done but by the becke of God, & the Angells are quietly framed to all vprightnesse: so the earth, all stubbornnesse & peruerfenesse being quenched, may be subiect to such gouernemēt. And when we require this, we renounce the desires of our owne flesh: because whosoever doth not resigne and yelde his affections to God, he doth as much as in him lieth set himself against him, forasmuch as nothing cometh out of vs but faulty. And we are againe by this prayer framed to the forsaking of our selues, that God may gouerne vs after his will: and not that onely, but that he may also creat in vs newe mindes and newe hartes, our olde being brought to nought: that we may fele in our selues none other motion of desire than a mere consent with his will: summarily that we may will nothing of our selues, but that his Spirit may gouerne our hartes, by whome inwardly teaching vs we may learne to loue those things that please him, and to hate those things that displease him. Whereupon this also followeth, that whatsoever affections fight against his wil, he may make them vaine and voide. Loe here be the first three thiese pointes of this prayer, in asking whereof we ought to haue the onely glorie of God before our eyes, leauing the respect of our selues, and hauing no regarde to any of our owne profit, which although it come hereof largely vnto vs, yet we ought not here to seke it. But albeit all these things, though we neither thinke of them, nor wish them, nor aske them, must neuerthelessse come to passe in their due time, yet we must wishe them and require them. And this to do is no small profite for our trauaill; that we may so testifie and professe our selues to be the seruantes and children of God, as much as in vs lieth endeuoring and being truly and throughly geuen to set fourth his honor, which is due to him

Cap. 26. Of the manner how to receiue being both a Lorde and a Father. Who so therefore do not with affection and zeale of auaucing the glorie of God, pray that the name of God be hallowed, that his kingdome come, that his will be done:
they are not to be accompted among the children and seruantes of God: and as all these things shalbe done against their willes, so they shall turne to their confusion and destruction.

44 Nowe followeth the seconde part of the prayer, in which we come downe to our owne commodities: not that bidding farewell to the glory of God (which as Paule witnesseth, is to be regarded euen in meate & drinke) we should seke onely what is profitable for our selues: but we haue already geuen warning that there is this difference, that God peculiarly claiming three petitions to himselfe doth drawe vs to himself wholly, that he may in this wise proue our godlinesse. Then he graunteth vs also to haue an eye to our owne commodities, but with this condition that we aske nothing for our selues but to this ende that whatsoeuer benefits he bestoweth vpon vs, they may set foorth his glory: forasmuch as nothing is more rightful than that we liue and die to him. But in this petition we aske of God generally all things which the vse of the body nedeth vnder y^e elements of this world, not onely wherewith we may be fed and clothed, but also whatsoeuer he foreseeeth to be profitable for vs, that we may eate our bred in peace. By which prayer brefely we yelde our selues into his care, and commit vs to his prouidence, that he may feede, cherish, and preserue vs. For the most good Father disdaineth not to receiue also our body into his faithfull sauegarde and keping, to exercise our Faith in these smal things, when we loke for all things at his handes euen to a crumme of bred and a droppe of water. For whereas it is come to passe I wote not howe by our iniquitie, that we be moued and vexed with greater care of the fleshe than of the soule: many which dare trust to God for their soule, are yet careful for their flesh, are yet in doute what they shall eate, and wherewith they shalbe clothed: and if they haue not plenty of wine, wheate, and oyle a-forehande, they tremble for feare. So much more do we esteeme the shadowe of this life which lasteth but a momēt, than that euerlasting immortalitie. But who so trustinge to God haue ones cast away that carefulnesse for the prouision of the flesh, do also by and by loke for saluation and euerlasting life at his hand, which are greater things. It is therfore no smal exercise of Faith, to hope for those things of God, which otherwise do so much holde vs in care: & we haue not smally profited, when we haue put of this vnbeleuingnesse which sticketh fast within the bones almost of all men. As for that which some do

here teache of transubstantiall bred, it seemeth but smally to agree with the meaninge of Christ: yea but if we did not euen in this fraile life geue to God y office of a nourishing Father, our prayer should be vnperfect. The reason which they bring is to much profane: that it is not mete that the children of God, which ought to be spirituall, should not onely cast their minde to earthly cares, but also wrappe God there in with them. As though his blessing and fatherly fauor doth not also appeare in the sustenance of our life, or as though it were written in vaine that godlinesse hath promises not onely of the life to come, but also of this present life. But although the forgeuenesse of sinnes is of much greater value than the sustenances of the body, yet Christ hath set the inferor thing in the first place, to the entent to lift vs vp by degrees to the other twoo petitions which do properly belong to the heauenly life, wherin he had regarde to our grossenesse. We are commaunded to aske Our bred, that we should be contente with the quantitie which our heauenly Father vouchefaueth to geue to vs, and should not seke for gaine by vnlawfull crafty meanes. In the meane time we must learne that it is made Ours by title of gifte, because neither our diligence, nor our trauaill, nor our handes (as it is sayed in Moses) do by themselues gett vs any thing, vnlesse the blessing of God be presente: yea y plentie of bred should nothing at all profit vs, vnlesse it were by God turned into nourishment. And therefore this liberality of God is no lesse necessaric for the riche than for the poore: because hauing their cellers and their barnes full, they should yet fainte for drinesse and emptinesse, vnlesse they did by his grace enioy their bred. The word This day, or Euery day as it is in the other Euangelist, and also the adiectiue Daily, do bridle the to much gredines of fraile things, wherewith we are wont to burne out of measure, and wherunto are ioined other euells: sith if we haue plentifull abundance, we do gloriously poure it out vpon pleasure, delites, boasting, and other kindes of riotous excesse. Therefore we are commaunded to aske onely so much as is enough for our necessity, and as it were from day to day, with this affiance that when our heauenly Father hath fed vs this day, he will also not faile vs to morrow. Therefore howe great plentie of thinges so euer do flowe vnto vs, yea when our barnes be stuffed and our cellers full: yet we ought alway to aske our daily bred: because we must certainly beleue that all substance is nothing, but in somuch as the Lorde doth by pouring out of his blessinge with continuall encrease make it frutesfull: and that the very same substance that is in our hand, is not our owne; but insomuch as he doth euery houre geue vs a portion and graunt vs the vse of it. This whereas the pride of men doth most hardly suffer it selfe to be perswaded: the Lorde testifieth that he hath shewed a singular example thereof for all ages, when he fed his people with Manna in the wildernesse, to teache vs that man liueth not in bred onely, but rather in the worde that cometh out of his mouth. Whereby is declared, that it is his power alone by which our life and strengthes are susteined, although he do minister it vnto vs vnder bodily instrumentes. As he is wont also to teache vs by the contrarie example, when he so oft as he will, breaketh the strength and (as he calleth it) the staff of bred, that men eating may pine with hunger; and drinking may be dried vp with thirst. But whoso not being contented with daily bred, but with vnbrindeled gredinesse are gaping for endlesse store, or whoso being full with their aboundance, and carelesse by reason of the heape of their richesse, do neuerthelessse sue to God with this prayer, they do nothing ells but mocke him. For, y first sorte of such men aske that which they would not obtaine, yea that which they most of all abhorre, that is, to haue onely daily bred, & so much as in them lieth they dissemblingly hide from God the affection of their couetousnesse: whereas true prayer oughte to poure out before him the very whole minde it selfe, and whatsoever inwardly lieth hidden. But the other sort do aske that which they loke not for at his hande, namely that which they thinke that they haue with themselues. In this that it is called Oures y bountifulesse of God (as we haue said) so much more appeareth, which maketh that oures that is by no right due to vs. Yet that exposition is not to be reiected which I haue also touched, that by our bred is meant: that which is earned with rightfull and harmelesse trauaill, and not gottē with deceites & extorcions: because that is alway Other mens which we get to our selues with any ill doing. Whereas we pray that it be geuen vs, thereby is signified that it is the onely and fre gifte of God, from whensesoever it come to vs, yea when it shall most of all seeme to be gotten by our owne policie and trauaill, and earned with our owne handes: forasmuch as it cometh to passe by his onely blessing, that our labours prosper well.

45 Nowe followeth, Forgeue vs our dettes: in which petition and the nexte followinge, Christ hath brefely contened whatsoever maketh for the heauenly life: as in these twoo partes aboue standeth the spirituall couenant which GOD hath made for the saluation of his Chirch, I will write my lawes in their hartes, and I will be mercifull to their iniquitie. Here Christ beginneth the forgeuenesse of finnes: after this, he will by and by adioine the seconde grace, that

God defend vs with the power of his Spirit, and sustaine vs with his helpe, that we may stande vnouercome against all tentations. And sinnes he calleth dettes, because we are detbounde to pay the penalty of them, and were by no meanes able to satisfie it, vnlesse we were acquitted by this forgeuenesse. Which pardon is of his free mercie, when he himselfe liberally wipeth out these dettes, taking no painēt of vs, but with his owne mercie satisfying himselfe in Christ, which hath ones geuen himselfe for recompense. Therefore whoso trust that God shalbe satisfied by their owne or other mennes merites, and that with such satisfactiōs the forgeuenesse of sinnes is recompensed and redemed, they haue no parte of communicating of this free forgiuenesse: & when they call vpon G O D in this maner, they do nothing but subscribe to their owne accusation, yea & seale their owne condemnation with their own witnesse. For they confesse themselues detters, vnlesse they be acquitted by the benefit of forgeuenesse, which yet they do not receiue, but rather refuse, whē they thrust vnto God their owne merites and satisfactions. For, so they do not beseech his mercie, but do appeale to his iudgement. As for them that dreame of a perfectiō in themselues, which taketh away neede to craue pardō, let them haue such disciples whom the itching of their eares driueth to errors: so that it be certaine that so many disciples as they get, are taken away from Christ: forasmuch as he instructing all to confesse their guiltinesse, receiueh none but sinners: not for that he cherisheth sinnes with flatterings, but because he knewe that the faithfull are neuer throughly vnclouted of the vices of their flesh, but that they alway remaine subiect to the iudgement of God. It is in deede to be wished, yea & to be earnestly endeouored, that we hauing performed all the partes of our dutie may truely reioise before God that we are cleane from all spott: but forasmuch as it pleaseth God by litle & litle to make againe his image in vs, that there alway remaineth some infection in our flesh, the remedie ought not to haue bene despised. If Christ by the authoritie geuen to him of his Father, cōmaundeth vs throughout the whole course of our life, to flee to crauing of pardō of our guiltinesse: who shalbe able to suffer these newe maisters, which go about with this imagined ghost of perfect innocēcie to dasell the eyes of the simple, to make them to trust that they may be made free from all fault? Which, as Iohn witnesseth, is nothing ells but to make God a lier. And withall one worke these lewde men by cācilling one article do teare in sonder & by that meane do weaken from the very foundation y whole couenāt of God, wherin we haue shewed that our saluation is cōteined: so as they be not only robbers of God, because they seuer those things so conioined, but also wicked and cruell because they ouerwhelme poore soules with despeire: and traitors to themselues & other, that be like them, because they bring themselues into a slouthfulnesse directly contrary to the mercy of God. But whereas some obiekt, that in wishing the coming of the kingdome of God, we do also aske the putting away of sinne: that is to childish, because in the first table of this prayer is set forth vnto vs most hie perfection, but in this part is set forth our weakenesse. So these two things do fitly agree together, that in a spring toward the marke we despise not the remedies which our necessitie requireth. Finally we pray that we may be forgeuē as we our selues do forgeue our dettors, that is, as we do forgeue and pardon all of whomesoeuer we haue bene in any thing offended, either vniustly handled in deede, or reprochefully vsed in word. Not that it lieth in vs to pardon the guiltinesse of the fault and offense, which pertaineth to God alone: but this is our forgeuing, of our owne willingnesse to lay away out of our minde wrath, hatred, and desire of reuengement, and with voluntary forgetfulnesse to treade vnder fote the remembrance of iniuries.

29. Wherefore we may not aske forgeuenesse of sinnes at the hande of God, if we do not also forgeue their offenses towarde vs which either do or haue done vs wrong. But if we kepe any hatreds in our hartes, and purpose any reuengementes and imagine by what occasion we may hurt, yea and if we do not endeuor to come into fauor againe with our enemies, & to deserue well of them with all kinde of frendly doings, and to winne them vnto vs: we do by this prayer beseeche God that he do not forgeue vs. For we require that he graunt to vs the same forgeuenesse which we graunt to other. But this is to pray that he graunt it not to vs, vnlesse we graunt it to them. Whoso therefore be such, what do they obtaine by their prayer but a more greuous iudgement? Last of all it is to be noted, that this cōdition that he forgeue vs as we forgeue our dettors, is not herefore added for that we deserue his forgeuenesse by the forgeuenesse which we graunt to other, as if that cause of forgeuenesse to vs were there expressed: but by this worde partly the Lordes will was to comforte the weakenesse of our Faith, for he added this as a signe whereby we may be assured that he hath as surely graunted to vs forgeuenesse of our sinnes, as we surely knowe in our conscience that we haue graunted the same to other, if our minde be voide and cleansed of all hatred, enuie and reuengement, and partly by this as it were by a marke, he wipeth them out of the number of his children that they may not be bolde to call vpon him as their Father, which being hedlong hasty to reuenge, and

hardily entreated to pardon, do vse stiffly continuing enmities, and do cherish in themselues the same displeasure towarde other which they pray to be turned from themselues. Which is also in Luke exprefly spoken in the wordes of Christ.

46 The fixt petition (as we haue said) aunswereth to the promise of engrauing the lawe of God in our hartes. But because we do not without continuall warrefare and hard and great struiings obey to God, we do here pray to be furnished with such wepons and defended with such succor, that we may be able to get the victorie: whereby we are warned that we stande in neede not onely of the grace of the Spirit, which may soften, bowe, and direct our hartes to the obedience of God, but also of his helpe, whereby he may make vs vnuincible against both all the traiterous entrappings and violent conflictes of Satan. But now of tentations there are many and diuerse sortes. For, both the peruerse thoughtes of minde prouoking vs to trespassing against the lawe, which either our owne lust doth minister vnto vs, or the deuell stirreth vp, are tentatiōs: and also those things which of their owne nature are not euell, yet by the craft of the deuell are made tentations, when they are so set before our eyes, that by the occasiō of them we be drawn away or do swarue from God. And these tentations are either on the right hande or on the left. On the right hand, as richesse, power, honors, which commonly do with their glistering and shewe of good so dasell the sight of men, and catche them with the baited hoke of their flattering, that being entrapped with such deceites, or droonke with such swetenesse, they may forget their God. On the left hande, as pouertie, reproches, despisinges, troubles, and such other: that they being greued with the bitteresse and hardnesse thereof may be vtterly discouraged, cast away faith and hope, and finally be altogether estranged from God. To these tentations of both sortes, which fight with vs either being kindled in vs by our owne lust, or being set against vs by the craft of Satan, we pray to our heauenly Father that he suffer vs not to yelde. But rather that he vpholde vs and raise vs vp with his hande, that being strong by his strength, we may stande fast against all the assaultes of the maliciousemie, whatsoeuer thoughtes he put into our minde: then, that whatsoeuer is set before vs on either side, we may turne it to good, that we neither be puffed vp with prosperitie, nor throwen downe with aduersitie. Neither yet do we here require that we may fele no tentatiōs at all, with which we haue great neede to be stirred vp, pricked, & pinched, least by to much reste we growe

Gen. 22 cause the Lorde daily tempteth his electe, chastising them by shame, pouertie, trouble, and other kindes of crosse. But God tempteth after one maner and Satan after an other: Satan, to destroy, damne, confounde and throwe downe hedlong: but God, that by prouing them that be his he may haue a triall of their vnfainednesse, and by exercising them may confirme their strength, to mortifie purge by fier, and seare their flesh, which vnlesse it were in this wise restrained, would waxe wanton and would wildly outrage aboue measure. Moreouer
1. Cor. 10. 13. Satan assaileth men vnarmed and vnredy, that he may oppresse them vnware: God euen with tēpting worketh the effecte, that they which be his may patiently beare whatsoeuer he sendeth vpon them. By the name of the Euell, whether we vnderstande the Deuell or sinne,
2. Pet. 2 it maketh litle matter. Satan in deede himself is the enemy that lieth in waite for our life: but with sinne he is armed to destroy vs. This
1. Pet. 5. therefore is our request, that we may not be ouercome or overwhelmed with any tentations, but may by the power of the Lorde stande strong against all contrary powers wherewith we are assailed: which is, not to yelde vs vanquished to tentations, that being receiued into his keping and charge, & being safe by his protection we may endure vnouercome ouer sinne, death, the gates of hel, and the whole kingdome of the deuill: which is to be deliuered from euell. Where it is also to be diligently marked, that it is aboue our strength to matche with the deuill so great a warrier, and to beare his force and violēce. Otherwise we should but vainely or as it were in mockage aske that which we had already in our selues. Surely, they which prepare them to such a battell with trust of themselues, do not sufficiently vnderstande with howe fierce and well armed an enemy they haue to do. Nowe we pray to be deliuered from his power, as out of the mouth of a mad & raging Lyon, whereas we should be torne in peeces with Psa. 60. his teeth and pawes, and swallowed with his throte, vnlesse the Lorde do deliuer vs out of the middest of death: yet therewithall knowing this that if the Lorde shall stande by vs, and fight for vs when we are ouerthrowen, we shall in his strength shewe strength. Let other trust as they list to their owne abilities and strengthes of free will, which they thinke that they haue of themselues: but let it suffice vs that we stand and are strong by the onely strength of God. But this prayer conteineth more than at the first sight it beareth in shewe. For if the Spirit of God be our strenght to fight out our combate with Satan, we shall not be able to get the victorie vntill we being filled with that Spirit shall haue put of all the weaknesse of our flesh. When therefore we pray to be deliuered from Satan and the Deuell, we pray to bee from time to time enriched with newe encreases of the grace of God, till being fully stuffed with them we may triumph ouer all euell. It semeth hard and rough to some, that we craue of God that he leade vs not into tentation, forasmuch as it is contrary to his nature to tempt, as Iames witnesseth. But this question is already partly assoiled, where we said that our owne lust is properly the cause of all the tentations wherewith we are ouercome, and therefore worthily bereth the blame therof. Neither doth Iames meane any thing ells, Iames. 1.13. but that the faultes are without cause & wrongfully layed vpon God, which we are driuen to impute to our selues, because we knowe our selues in our conscience guilty of them. But this withstandeth no: but that God may when it pleaseth him make vs bonde to Satan, cast vs away into a reprobate sense, and to filthy lustes, and so leade vs into tentation by his iudgemēt which is righteous in deeде but yet oftentimes secret: forasmuch as the cause of it is often hidde from men, which is yet certainly knowen with him. Whereupon is gathered that this is no vnfit maner of speaking, if we be perswaded that he doth not without cause so oft threaten, that when the reprobate shalbe striken with blindnesse and hardening of haite, these shalbe sure tokens of his vengeance.

47 These three petitions, wherewith we do peculiarly cōmende vs and our things to God, do evidently shewe this which we haue before said, that the prayers of Christians ought to be common and to tend to the common edifying of the Chirch, and to the encrease of the communion of the faithfull. For there doth not euery man pray to haue any thing priuatly geuen, but all in common together do pray for Our bred, for forgeuennesse of sinnes, that we may not be led into tentation, that we may be deliuered from euill. There is furthermore adioined a cause why we haue both so great boldnesse to aske, and so great trust to obtaine: which although it be not in y^e latine copies, yet it agreeth more fitly in this place thā that it should seeme worthy to be omitted, namely that his is the kingdome, and the power and the glorie for euer. This is the perfect and quiet rest of our soule. For if our prayers were to be commended to God by their owne worthinesse, who should be so bolde, as ones to open his mouth before him? Nowe howsoeuer we be most miserable, howsoeuer most vnworthy of all men, howsoeuer voide of all commendation: yet we shall neuer want cause to pray, & neuer be destitute of confidence: forasmuch as our father can not haue his kingdome, power, and glorie taken away from him. At the ende is added Amen, whereby is expressed our feruentnesse of desire to obtaine those things that we haue asked of God, and our hope is confirmed that all such things are already obtained and shall surely be geuē vs because they are promised of God, which can not deceiue. And this agreeth with that maner of prayer which we haue here before rehearsed, Do it Lorde for thy names sake, not for our sakes or our righteousnesse : whereby the holy ones do not only expresse the ende of their praier, but also confesse that they are vnworthy to obtaine vnlesse God fetch the cause from himself, and that their trust to speede cometh of the onely nature of God.

48 Thus haue we whatsoeuer we ought yea or in any wise may aske of God, set forth in this forme and as it were a rule of praying taught by the best scholemaister Christ, whome the Lorde hath set ouer vs to be our teacher, & whom alone he hath willed to be harkened vnto. For he both alway hath bene his eternall wisdome, and being made man is geuen to men the Angell of great counsell. And this prayer is in all pointes, so fully perfect, that whatsoeuer foreyne or strange thing is added which can not be referred to it, it is vngodly and vnworthy to be allowed of God. For in this summe he hath set forth, what is mete for him, what is pleasing to him, what is necessary for vs, finally what he will graunt. Wherefore who so dare go further, and to aske any thing of God beside these, first they will adde of their owne to the wisdome of God (which can not be done without mad blasphemie) then they holde not themselues vnder the will of God, but despising it do with gredinesse wander further : finally they shall neuer obtaine any thing, forasmuch as they pray without faith, And there is no dout that all such prayers are made without faith, because here wanteth the woord of God, vpon which vnlesse faith be grounded, it can in no wise stande. But they which forsaking the maisters rule, do followe their owne desires, are not only without the word of God, but also so much as they be able with their whole endeuor, are against it. Therefore Tertullian no lesse fitly than truly hath called this a lawfull prayer, secretly signifying that all other are lawlesse and vnlawfull.

49 We would not haue these things so taken as though we were so bound with this forme of prayer, that we may not change a word or a fillable. For there are echewhere red many prayers in the Scriptures, farre differing from this in woordes, yet written by the same Spirit, and which are at this day ptofitable to be vsed of vs. Many are continually put into the mouthes of the faithfull by the same Spirit, which in likenesse of wordes do not so much agree. This onely is our meaning in so teaching, that no man should seke, loke for, or aske any other thing at all than that which is summarily comprehēded in this prayer, prayer, and which though it most differ in wordes yet differeth not in sense. Like as it is certaine that all the prayers which are found in the Scriptures, and which do come out of godly hartes, are applied to this, so verily none can any where be found, which may match, much lesse passe, the perfectnesse of this prayer. Here is nothing left out, that might be thought vpon to the praises of God, nothing that ought to come into the minde of man for his owne profites: and the same so fully that all hope is worthily taken away from all men to attempt to make any better. In a summe, let vs remembre that this is the doctrine of the wisdome of God, which hath taught what he willed, and willed what was needefull, 50 But although we haue aboue sayed, that we ought alway to breath vwarde with minds listd vp to God, & pray without ceassing: yet forasmuch as such is our weakenesse, as needeth to bee vpholden with many helpes: such is our dullenesse, as needeth to be pricked forward with many spurres: it is good that euery one of vs appoint to himself priuately certaine houres which may not passe away without prayer, and which may haue the whole affections of our minde thoroughly busied to that purpose: as, when we rise in the morning, before that we go to our dayes worke, when we sitt downe to meate, when we haue bene fedde by the blessing of God, when we take vs to rest. Onely let this not be a superstitious obseruing of houres, by which, as paying a taske to God, we may think our selues discharged for the other houres: but a training of our weakenes, wherby it may so be exercised and from time to time stirred vp. Specially we ought carefully to loke that so oft as either we our selues are in distresse, or we se other to be in distresse with any hardnesse of aduersitie, we runne streight way to him, not with feete but with hartes: then, that we suffer not any prosperitie of our owne or other mens, to passe but that we testifie that we acknowelge it to bee his with praise and thankesgeuing. Finally, this is diligently to bee obserued in all prayer, that we go not about to binde God to certaine circumstances, nor to appoint to him, what he shall do, at what time, in what place, and in what maner: as by this prayer we are taught to make to him no lawe, nor to appoint to him any condition, but to leaue to his will that those things which he will do, he may do in what maner, at what time, and in what place it pleaseth him. Wherefore ere we make any prayer for our selues, we first pray that his will be done: where we do already submitt our will to his: with which when it is restrained as with a bridle put vpon it, it may not presume to bring God into rule, but make him the iudge and gouernor of all her desires.

51 If we do with mindes framed to this obediēce, suffer our selues to be ruled with the lawes of Gods Prouidēce, we shall easily learne to continue in prayer, and with longing desires patiently to waite for the Lord: being assured that although he appeare not, yet he is alway present with vs, and will when he seeth his time declare howe not deaffe eares he gaue to the prayers, which in the eyes of men semed to be despised. And this shalbe a most present comfort, that we faint not and fall downe by despaire, if at any time God do not aunswere at our first requestes. Like as they are wont to do, which while they are caried with their sodeine heate, do so call vpon God, that if he come not to them at their first brintes & bring them present helpe, they by and by imagine him to be angry and hatefully bent against them, and casting away all hope of obteneing do cesse to call vpon him. But rather differring our hope with a well tempered cuennesse of minde, let vs go forwarde in that perseuerance which is so much commended to vs in Scriptures. For in the Psalmes we may oftentimes see howe Dauid and other faithfull men, when they seeme in a maner wried with praying, did beate the aire, because they threwe away their words to God that heard them not, & yet they cesse not from praying: because the word of God hath not his full authoritie mainteined, vnlesse the credite thereof bee set aboue all successes of things. Moreouer let vs not tempte God and prouoke him against vs being wried with our importunacie, which many vse to do, which doe nothing but indent with God vpon a certaine condition, and binde him to the lawes of their couenancing as though he were seruant to their desires: which if he doe not presently obey, they disdaine, they chafe, they carpe against him, they murmure, they turmoile. Therefore to such oftentimes in his furor he being angry graunteth that, which to other in his mercie he being fauorable denieth. An example hereof are the children of Israell, for whome it had bene better not to haue bene heard of the Lorde, than with flesh to eate vp his wrath.

52 But if yet at length after long loking for it our sense do not perceiue what we haue preuailed with praying, and feleth no fruite thereof: yet our faith shall assure vs of that, which can not be perceiued by sense, namely that we haue obteneid that which was expedient for vs, forasmuch as the Lorde doth so ofte and so certainly take vpon him that he will haue care of our greues, after that they haue bene ones laide in his bosome. And so he will make vs to possesse aboundance in pouertie, comfort in affliction. For howsoeuer all other things do faile vs, yet God will neuer faile vs, which suffereth

the waiting and patience of them that be his to be disappointed. He alone shall suffice vs in steede of all things, forasmuch as he conteineth in himselfe all good things, which he shall one day disclose vnto vs at the day of iudgement when he shall plainly shewe forth his kingdome. Beside this although God graunt to vs, yet he doth not alway aunswer according to the expresse forme of our request, but holding vs after outwarde seeming in suspense, yet by a meane vnknewē he sheweth that our prayers were not wain. This is meant by the wordes of Iohn, If we knowe that he heareth vs when we aske any thing of him, we know that we haue the petitions which we aske of him. This seemeth a weake superfluousnesse of wordes: but it is a singularly profitable declaration, namely that God euen when he doth not follow our desires, is yet gentle & fauorable to our prayers, that the hope which resteth vpon his worde may neuer disappoint vs. But with this patience the faithfull do so farre neede to be sustained, that they should not long stand vnlesse they did stay vpon it. For the Lorde doth by not light trialles proue them that be his, and not tenderly doth exercise them: but oftentimes driueth them into the greatest extremities, and when they are driuen thether he suffreth them long to sticke fast in the mire, ere he geue them any tast of his swetenesse: and, as Hanna saith, he slayeth, and quckneth: he leaderh downe to the helles, and bringeth backe againe. What he coulde they here do but be discouraged, and fall hedlonge into despaire: vnlesse when they are in distresse and desolate and already halfe dead, this thought did raise them vp, that God doth loke vpon them, and that there shall be at hande an ende of their euels? But howsoever they stande fast vpon the assurednesse of that hope, they ceasse not in the meane time to pray: because if there be not in prayer a stedfastnesse of continuance, we nothing preuaile with praying.

The xxj. Chapter.

Of the eternall Election, vvhcreby God hath predestinate some to saluation, and other some to destruction.

BVt nowe whereas the couenant of life is not egally preached to all men, and with them to whome it is preached it doth not either egally or continually finde like place: in this diuersitie the wonderous deapth of the iudgement of God appeareth. For neither is it any dout but that this diuersitie also serueth the free choise of Gods eternall election. If it be euident that it is wrought by the will of God that saluation is frely offred to some, and other some are debarred from cōming to it: here by and by arise great and hard questions which can not otherwise be discuffed, than if the godly mindes haue that certainly stablished which they ought to holde concerning election and Predestination. This is (as many thinke) a comber some questiō: because they thinke nothing to be lesse reasonable thā of the cōmon multitude of men some to be foreordeined to saluatiō, other some to destruction. But howe they wrongfully encombre themselues, shall afterwarde be euidēt by the framing of the matter together. Beside that in y very same darknesse which maketh men afraide, not onely the profitableness of this doctrine but also the most swete fruite sheweth forth it selfe. We shall neuer be clerely persuaded as we ought to be, that our saluation floweth out of the fountaine of the free mercy of God, till his eternall electiō be knowē to vs, which by this comparison brightly setteth forth the grace of God, that he doth not without difference adopt all into the hope of saluation, but geueth to some that which he denieth to other. Howe much the ignorāce of this principle diminisheth of the glory of God, howe much it withdraweth from true humilitie, it is plaine to see. But Paule denieth that that which is so necessary to be knowē, is possible to be knowen, vnlesse God leauing altogether the respect of workes do chose them whom he hath determined with himself. In this time (saith he) the remnantes were saued according to free election. If by Grace, then not of workes: forasmuch as Grace should then not be grace. If of workes, then not of Grace: forasmuch as worke should nowe not be worke. If we must be brought backe to the beginning of election, that it may be certaine that saluation cometh to vs from no otherwhere than frō the mere liberalitie of God: they which will haue this principle quenched, do niggardly so much as in them lieth darken that which ought gloriously & with full mouth to haue bene published, and they plucke vp the very roote of humilitie. Paule, where the saluation of the remnant of the people is ascribed to free election, clerely testifieth that onely then it is knowen that God doth by his mere good pleasure saue whom he will, and not render rewarde which can not be done. They which shutt the gates, that none may be bolde to come to the tasting of this doctrine, do no lesse wrong to men than to God: because neither shall any other thing suffice to hūble vs as we ought to be, neither shall we otherwise feele from our hart how much we are boude to God. Neither yet is there any otherwhere the vpholding stay of sounde affiāce, as Christ himselfe teacheth, which to deliuer vs from all feare, & to make vs vnuā-

quishable among so many dangers, ambushes, & deadly battels, promiseth y whatsoeuer he hath receiued of his Father to keepe, shall be safe. Whereof we gather that they shal with continuall trembling be miserable, whosoeuer they be that knowe not themselues to be the proper possession of God: and therefore that they do very ill provide both for themselues & for all the faithfull, which in beinge blinde at these three profits which we haue touched, would wish y whole foundation of our saluation to be quite taken from among vs. Moreouer hereby the Church appeareth vnto vs, which otherwise (as Bernard rightly teacheth) were not possible to be founde, nor to be knowen among creatures: because both waies in maruelous wise it lieth hidden within the bosome of blessed predestination, and within the Masse of miserable damnation. But ere I entre into the matter it self, I must before hande in two sortes speake to two sortes of men. That the entreating of predestination, whereas of it selfe it is somewhat combersome, is made very doutfull yea and dangerous, the curiousnes of men is the cause: which can by no stoppes be restrained from wandringe into forbidden compasses, and climbing vp an hic: which, if it may, wil leaue to God no secrete which it will not searche and turne ouer. Into this boldenesse and importunacie forasmuch as we commonly see many to runne headlong, and among those some that are otherwise not euill men: here is fit occasion to warne them what is in this behalfe the due measure of their duty. First therefore let them remember, that when they enquire vpon Predestinatiō, they pearce into the secret closets of the wisdom of God: wherinto if any man do carelesly and boldly breake in, he shall both not attaine wherewith to satisfie his curiousnesse, and he shall entre into a mase whereof he shall finde no way to get out againe. For neither is it meete that man should freely search those things which God hath willed to be hidden in himself, and to turne ouer from very eternity the height of wisdom, which he willed to be honored & not be conceiued, that by it also he mought be maruelous vnto vs. Those secretes of his will which he hath determined to be opened vnto vs, he hath disclosed in his word: & he hath determined, so farre as he foresaw to pertaine to vs and to be profitable for vs.

2 We are come (saith Augustine) into y way of Faith, let vs steadfastly holde it. It bringeth into the Kinges chamber, in which all the treasures of knowledge and wisdom are hidden. For, the Lorde himselfe Christ did not enuy his excellent & most chosen disciples, when he said, I haue many thinges to be said to you, but ye can not beare them now. We must walke, we must profit, we must encrease, that our hartes may be able to conceiue those things which now we can not conceiue. If the last day finde vs profitinge, there we shall learne that which here we could not. If this thought be of force with vs, that the word of the Lord is the only way, that may leade vs to searche whatsoever is lawfull to be learned of him: that it is the only light, which may giue vs light to see whatsoever we ought to see of him: it shall easily holde backe and restraine vs from all rashenesse. For we shall know that so soone as we be gone out of the bounds of the word, we runne out of the way, and in darkenesse, in which race we must nedes oftentimes stray, slippe, and stumble. First therefore lette this be before our eyes, that to couet any other knowledge of Predestination than that which is set forth by the word of God, is a point of no lesse madnesse than if a man haue a will to goe by an vnpassable waye, or to see in darkenesse. Neither let vs be ashamed, to be ignorant of somewhat in it wherein there is some learned ignorance. But rather let vs willingly abstaine from the searching of that knowledge, whereof the excessiue coueting is both foolish and perillous, yea & deadly. But if the wantonnes of wit prouoke vs, it shalbe profitable alway to set this against it, whereby it may be beaten backe, that as too much of honey is not good, so the searchinge of glory doth not turne vnto glory to the curious. For there is good cause why we shoulde be fraied away from that boldnes, which can do nothinge but throw vs downe headlong into ruine.

3 There be other which when they haue a will to remedy this euill, do commaund all mentiō of Predestination to be in a maner buried, at the least they teach mē to flee from euery maner of questioning thereof as from a rocke. Although the moderatiō of these men be herein worthily to be praised, that they iudge y^e mysteries shoulde be tasted of wth such sobriety: yet because they descend too much beneath the meane, they litle preuaile with the wit of man, which doth not lightly suffer it selfe to be restrained. Therefore, y^e in this behalfe also we may keepe a right ende, we must returne to the word of the Lord, in which we haue a sure rule of vnderstandinge. For, the Scripture is the schoole of the holy Ghost, in which as nothing is left out which is both necessary and profitable to be knowen, so nothinge is taught but that which is behouefull to learne. Whatsoever therefore is vttered in the Scripture cōcerning Predestination, we must beware that we debarre not the faithfull from it, least we should seme either enuiously to defraude them of the benefite of their God, or to blame and accuse the holy Ghost who hath published those things, which it is in any wise profitable to be suppressed. Let vs (I say) giue leaue to a Christian man, to open his minde and his eares to all the sayings of God which are directed to him, so that it be done with this temperance, that so soone as the Lord hath closed his holy mouth, he may also foreclose to himself all y way to enquire further. This shalbe the best bound of sobriety, if not onely in learninge we alway follow the Lord going before vs, but also when he maketh an end of teaching, we ceasse to will to learne. Neither is the danger which they feare of so great importāce, that we ought therfore to turne away our mindes from the oracles of God. Notable is the sayinge of Salomon, that the glory of God is to concele a word. But sith both godlinesse and common reason teacheth that this is not generally meant of euery thing, we must seeke a difference, least brutishe ignorance should please vs vnder colour of modesty and sobriety. That differēce is in few words plainly ser out by Moses: To the Lord our God (sayth he) belong his secretes: but to vs and to our children he hath disclosed these things. For we see how he commendeth to the people the study of the doctrine of the law, only by reason of the decree of God, because it pleased God to publish it: & how he withholdeth y people within those boundes, by this only reason because it is not lawful for mortall men to thrust themselues into the secretes of God.

4 Prophane men (I graunt) do in the matter of Predestination so dainly catch hold of somewhat which they may carp, or cauil, or barke, or scoffe at. But if their waiwardnes do fray vs away from it, the chief articles of the faith must be kept secret, of which there is almost none which they or such as they be do leaue vntouched with blasphemy. A froward wit will no lesse proudly outrage when he heareth that in the essence of God there are three persons, than if he heare that God foresaw what shoulde become of man when he created him. Neither will they abstaine from laughinge, when they shall vnderstande that there is litle more than fise thousand yeres passed since the creation of the world: for they will aske why the power of God was so longe idell and a slepe. Finally there can be nothinge brought foorth, which they will not scoffe at. For the restraining of these sacrileges, must we holde our peace of the Godheade of the Sonne, & of the holy Ghost? or must we passe ouer in silence the creatiō of the world? Yea but the trueth of God is both in this behalfe and euery where mightier than that it neede to feare the euill speakinge of the wicked: as Augustine strongly maintaineth in his worke of the good of Perseuerance. For we see that the false Apostles could not by defaming and sclanderung the true Doctrine of Paule, make him to be ashamed of it. But wheras they saye that this whole disputation is perillous also for Godly mindes, because it maketh against exhortatiōs, because it shaketh faith because it troubleth the heart it selfe: this is vaine. Augustine sticketh not to confesse that for these causes he was wont to be blamed, for that he did to freely preach Predestination: but, as he had in readines wherewithal, he largely confuteth thē. But we, because many & diuers absurdities are thrust into this place, had rather to referue euery one to be wiped away in place fit for it. Only this I desire generally to obtaine of them, that those things which the Lorde hath layd vp in secret, we may not search: those things which he hath brought openly abroad, we may not neglect: least either on the one part we be condemned of vaine curiosity, or on the other part, of vnthankfulnesse. For, this also is very well sayd of Augustine, that we may safely follow the Scripture, which as with a motherly pace goeth stoupingely, least it shoulde forsake our weakenesse. But who so are so ware and so fearefull that they woulde haue Predestination to be buried, least it should trouble weake soules: with what colour, I besech you, wil they couer their arrogance, when they indirectly accuse God of foolish vnadvisednesse, as though he foresaw not the danger, which they think themselues to haue wisely met with? Whosoever therefore trauaileth to bring the doctrine of Predestinatiō into misliking, he openly saith euill of God: as though somewhat had vnadvisedly slipped from him which is hurtful to the Church.

25 Predestinatiō wherby God adopteth some into y hope of life, & iudgeth some to eternal death, no man that would be accōpted godly dare simply deny: But they wrap it vp with many cauillatiōs, specially they which make foreknowledge the cause of it. We in deece do say that they be both in God, but we say that the one is wrongfully made subiect to the other. When we giue foreknowledge to God, we meane that all things alway haue bin and perpetually do remaine vnder his eies, so that to his knowledge there is nothinge to come or past, but all thinges are present, & so present that he doth not imagine only by conceiued formes (as those things are present to vs, whereof our minde holdeth fast the remembrance) but he truely beholdeth & seeth them as set before him. And this foreknowledge extendeth to the whole compasse of the world and to all creatures. Predestination we call the eternal decree of God, wherby he had it determined with himselfe what he willed to become of euery man. For al are not created to like estate: but to some, eternall life, and to some, eternall damnation is foreappointed. Therefore as euery man is created to the one or other ende, so we say that he is predestinate either to life or to death. But this predestination God hath not onely testified in euery

feuerall person, but hath shewed an example therof in the whole issue of Abraham, whereby might plainly appeare that it lieth in his will what shalbe the estate of euery nation. When the Hiest diuided the nations, and seuered the children of Adam, his part was the people of Israell, the corde of his inheritance. The separation is before the eyes of all men: in the person of Abraham as in a drie stocke one people is peculiarly chosen, all other being refused: but the cause appeareth not, sauinge that Moses, to cut of all occasion of glorying from posterity, teacheth that they excell only by y^e fre loue of God. For he assigneth this to be the cause of their deliuerance, for that God loued the Fathers, and chose their seede after them. More plainely in an other chapter: He was pleased in you to chose you, not because you passed other nations in number, but because he loued you. The same admonition is often repeated with him, Behold, to the Lord thy God belongeth the heauen, the earth, and whatsoeuer things are in it: and he hath pleased himselfe only in your Fathers, and hath loued them, & hath chosen you their sede. Againe in another place sanctificatiō is commaunded them, because they are chosen to be a peculiar people And againe in another place, Loue is affirmed to be y^e cause of protection. Which also the faithfull do declare with one voice, sayinge: He hath chosen for vs our inheritance, the glory of Iacob, whom he hath loued. For they do all impute to free loue al the giftes wherwith they were garnished of God: not only because they knew that they themselues had obtained the by no deseruings, but also that euen the holy Patriarch was not endued with such vertue, that he coulde purchase to himselfe and his posterity so great a prerogatiue of honor. And, the more strongly to treade downe all pride, he vpbraided them that they haue deserued no such thing, forasmuch, as they are a stubborne & hard necked people. And oftentimes y^e Prophets do hatefully & as by way of reproch cast the Iewes in the teeth with this election, because they had fowly departed from it. Whatsoeuer it be, now let the come forth which will binde the election of God either to the wor-thines of men, or to the merites of works. When they see one nation to be preferred before all other, & when they heare y^e God was led with no respect to be more fauorably bet to a few & vnnoble, yea & froward and disobedient men: will they quarell with him, because his will was to shewe such an example of mercy? But they shall neither with their pratling voices hinder his work, nor with throwing stones of tauntes into heauen shall hit or hurt his righteousnesse, but rather they shal fall backe vpon their owne heads. Moreouer the Israelits are called backe to this principle of the free couenant, whē either thanks are to be giuē to God, or their hope to be raised vp against the time to come. He made vs, & not we our selues (saith y^e Prophet) his people and the sheepe of his pastures. The negatiue is not superfluous, which is added to exclude vs, that they may knowe y^e of all the good things wherewith they excell, God is not onely the author, but fetched the cause thereof from himselfe, because there was nothing in them worthy of so great honor. Also he biddeth them to be contented with the mere good pleasure of God, in these words, The seede of psal. 105 Abraham are his seruantes: the children of Iacob, his elect. And after that he hath rehearsed the cōtinual benefits of God as fruites of the election, at length he cōcludeth, that he dealt so liberally because he remembred his couenant. With which doctrine agreeth the song of psal. 44 the whole Church, Thy right hand and the light of thy countenance gaue the land to our Fathers, because thou wast pleased in them. But it is to be noted, that where mētion is made of the land, it is a visible signe of the secret seuering wherin the adoption is cōtaind. To the same thankfulnessse Dauid in an other place exhorteth the people, saying, Blessed is the natiō whose God the Lord is, the people which he hath chosen for an inheritance to himselfe. And Samuell encourageth them to good hope, saying, The Lord will not forsake you, for his owne great names sake, because it pleased him to create you for a people to himselfe. Likewise Dauid when his faith is assailed, armeth himselfe to fight, sayinge, Blessed is he whome thou hast chosen, he shall dwell in thy courtes. But forasmuch as the election hidden in God was stablished as well by the first deliuerance as by the second, and other meane benefites: in Esay the word of Electing is transferred to this. God shall haue mercy on Iacob, and he shall yet choose out of Israell: because he signifying the time to come, sayth that the gathering together of the remnant of the people which he seemed to haue forsaken, shall be a signe of the stable and stedfast election, which ones seemed to haue bin fallen away. When also it is sayd in an other place, I haue chosen thee & haue not cast thee away: he setteth out the continuall course of the notable liberality of his fatherly good will. And yet more plainely the Angell sayth in Zacharie, God shall yet choose Ierusalem: as though in hardly chastinge it, he had reiectēd it: or as though the exile were an interruptinge of the election: which yet remaineth inuiolable, although y^e signes thereof do not alway appeare.

6 There is to be added a secōd degree more narrowly restrained, or in which was seene a more speciall grace of God: when of the same kindred of Abraham God refused some, & other some by nourishing rishinge them in the Church he shewed that he retained amonge his childre. Ismael had at y^e beginning obtained egall degre with his brother Isaac, because the spirituall couenant had bin no lesse sealed in him by the signe of Circūcision. He is cut of: and then, Esau: at the last an innumerable multitude and almost Israell. In Isaac was the seede called: the same calling endured in Iacob. A like exāple God shewed in reiecting Saul: which thing is also gloriously set forth in the Psalm, He hath put backe the tribe of Ioseph, & y^e tribe of Ephraim he hath not chosē, but he hath chosē the tribe of Iuda. Which the holy history diuerse times repeateth, that the wonderfull secret of the grace may the better appeare in this change. Ismaell, Esau, and such other, (I graunt) fell from the adoption by their owne fault & giltines: because there was a condition adioined, that they should faithfully kepe the couenant of God, which they falsely brake. But this was yet a singular benefit of God, that he vouchsafed to preferre thē aboue the other Gentiles: as it is said in y^e Psalme, He hath not so done to other nations, nor hath opened his iudgements to them. But here I haue not without cause said that there be two degrees to be noted: because nowe in the choosinge of the whole nation God shewed that he is in his owne mere liberality bounde to no lawes: but he is free, so that egall portion of grace is not to be required at his hand: the vnequality whereof sheweth that it is truely of free gift. Therefore Malachie amplifieth the vnthankfulness of Israel, because they being not only chosen out of all mankinde, but also seuered out of a holy house to be a peculiar people, do vnfaithfully and wickedly despise God so beneficiall a Father. Was not Esau the brother of Iacob? (saith he) & yet Iacob I loued, but Esau I hated. For, God taketh it for confessed, that when either of them was borne of a holy Father, and successour of the couenant, finally a branch of the holy roote: now the children of Iacob were more than cōmonly bond, which were taken into that dignity. But when, Esau the first begotten being refused, their Father which was by nature inferiour was made the heire, he proueth them doublely vnthankfull, and complaineth that they were not holden with that double bound.

7 Although it be already sufficiently euident, that God doth by his secreete counsell freely choose whom he will, reiectinge other, yet his free election is hitherto but halfe shewed, till we come to all particular persones, to whome God not onely offereth saluation, but so assigneth it that the certainty of the effect therof is not in suspense or doutfull. For, these are accompted in that onely seede, whereof Paule maketh mention. For although the adoption was left in the hand of Abraham, yet because many of his posterity were cut of as rotten members: that the election may be effectually and truly steadfast, we must needs ascend to the head, in whom the heavenly Father hath bound together his elect one with an other, & hath knit them to himselfe with a knot impossible to be loosed. So in the adoption of the kinred of Abraham, shined the liberall fauour of God, which he denied to other mē: yet in the members of Christ, appeareth a much more excellent strength of grace, because they being grafted into their head do neuer fall away frō saluation. Therefore Paul doth fitly reason out of the place of Malachy which I euen now alleaged: y where God with makinge a couenant of eternall life calleth any people to himselfe, there is in part a special maner of election, that he doth not choose all effectually with common grace. Whereas it is sayd, I haue loued Iacob, this pertaineth to y whole issue of the Patriarch, which the Prophet there setteth in cōparison against the posterity of Esau. Yet this withstandeth not but that in the person of one man was set forth to vs an example of the election, which can not slip away but must come to the marke that it tendeth to. These Paul doth not vainly note to be called remnantes: because experience teacheth that of a great multitude many slide and vanish away, so that oftentimes there remaineth but a small portion. But why the generall election of a people is not alway firme & steadfast, there is a reason offering it selfe in readinesse: because with whom God couenanteth he doth not by-and-by giue to them the Spirite of regeneration, by the power whereof they may continue in the couenant to the ende: but the outward changinge without the inward effectuallynesse of grace, which might be of force to holde them in, is a certaine meane thinge betwene the forsaking of whole mankinde, and the election of a small number of the Godly. The whole people of Israell was called the inheritance of God, of whom yet there were many strangers. But because God had not for nothings made couenant with them that he woulde be their Father and redeemer, he rather hath respect to his owne free fauour than to the vnfaithfull falling away of many: by whom also his truth was not abolished: because where he reserued any remnant, it appeared that his callinge was without repentance. For wheras God did from time to time choose vnto himselfe a Church rather out of the children of Abraham, than out of the prophane nations, he had regard to his couenant, which being broken of the whole multitude he restrained to a few, that it should not vtterly fall away. Finally the common adoption of the seede of Abraham was a certaine visible image of a greater benefit, which God hath vouchsafed to graunt to

few out of many. This is the reason why Paule so diligently putteth difference betwene the children of Abraham according to the flesh, and his spirituall children which were called after the example of Iſaac. Not that it was a vaine and vnfrutefull thinge simply to be the childe of Abrahā (which might not be sayd without dishonor of the couenant) but because the vnchangeable counsell of God, whereby he hath predestinate whom he would, is by it selfe effectually only to this later sorte vnto saluation. But I warne the readers that they bringe not a foreconceiued iudgement on either side, till it appeare by the places of Scripture brought forth what is to be thought. That therefore which the Scripture clearely sheweth, we say that God by eternall and vnchangeable counsell hath ones appointed whome in time to come he would take to saluation, and on the other side whom he would condemne to destruction. This counsell as touching the elect, we say to be grounded vpon his free mercy without any respect of the worthinesse of man: but whom he appointeth to damnation, to them by his iust in dede and irreprehensible, but also incomprehensible iudgement, the entry of life is foreclosed. Now in the elect we set vocation, to be the testimony of Election: & then iustification to be another signe of the manifest shewing of it, til they come to glory wherein is the fullfilling of it. But as by vocation and election God maketh his elect: so by shutting out the reprobate either from the knowledge of his name or from the sanctification of his Spirite, he doth as it were by these markes open what iudgement abideth for them. I will here passe ouer many fained inuentions, which foolish men haue forged to ouerthrowe predestination. For they nede no confutation, which so sone as they are brought forth do largely bewray their owne falsnesse. I will tary only vpon those, which either are in controuersie among the learned, or which may bring any hardinesse to the simple, or which vngodlinesse with faire seeming show pretendeth, to scoffe at the righteousnesse of God.

The xxij. Chapter.

A confirmation of this doctrine by testimonies of the Scripture.

AL these thinges which we haue set are not without controuersie amonge many, specially the free election of the faithful: which yet can not be weakened. For the common sorte do thinke that God, as he foreseeeth that euery mannes deseruings shalbe, so maketh difference betwene men: that therefore whome he foreknoweth that they shalbe not vnworthy of his grace,

them he adopteth into place of children : and whose natures he espieeth that they will be bent to wickednesse and vngodlinesse, them he appointeth to the damnation of death. So by clokinge it with the veile of foreknowledge they do not onely darken election, but faine that it hath beginninge from else where. And this opinion receiued of the common sorte is not the opinion of the common sorte alone: for in all ages it hath had great maintainers. Which I do plainly cōfesse, to the entent that no manne shoulde trust that it shall much hurt our cause if their names be obiected against vs. For, the trueth of God herein is more certaine, than that it may be shaken: more cleare, than that it may be darkened with the authority of menne. But some other neither exercised in the Scripture, nor worthy of any voice, do raile at this doctrine with greater maliciousnesse, than that their frowarde pride ought to be suffered. Because God choosinge some after his owne wil, leaueth other some, they picke a quarell against him. But if the thinge it selfe be knowen for true, what shall they preuaile with brawlinge against God? We teach nothing but that which is approued by experience, that it was alway at liberty for God to bestowe his grace to whome he will. I will not enquire whereby the posterity of Abraham excelled other, but by that vouchsaunge, whereof there is founde no cause elsewhere than in God. Let them answere why they be men rather than oxen or asses. When it was in the hand of God to make them dogges, he fashioned them after his owne image. Will they giue leaue to brute beastes to quarell with God for their estate, as though the difference were vnrighteous? Truly it is no more righteous, that they shoulde enioy the prerogatiue which they haue obtained by no deseruings, than for God diuersly to deale abroad his benefites according to the measure of his owne iudgemēt. If they skippe ouer to persons, where the inequality is more hateful to thē, at the least at the example of Christ they ought to be afraid to prate so boldely of so hie a mysterie. He is conceiued of the seede of David, a mortall man: by what vertues wil they say that he deserued to be in the very wombe made the head of Angels, the onely begotten sonne of God, the image & glory of the Father, the light, righteousness, and saluation of the worlde? This thinge Augustine wisely noted, that in the very head of the Church is a most cleare mirror of free election, least it should trouble vs in the members: and that he was not by righteously luinge made the sonne of God, but y he had so great honor freely giuen him, that he might afterwarde make other partakers of his giftes. Here if any man aske why other were not the same that he was, or why all we are so farre distant distant from him, why all we be corrupt and he purenes: such a man shall bewray not onely his madnesse but therewithal also his shamelesnesse. But if they go forward to labour to take from God the free power to chose and refuse, let them also take away that which is giuen to Christ. Now it is worth the trauaile to cōsider what the Scripture pronounceth of euery one. Paule verily, when he teacheth that we were chosen in Christ, taketh away all respect of our owne worthinesse. For it is all one as if he hadde sayd: because in the whole seede of Adam the heauenly father founde nothing worthy of his election, he turned his eyes vnto his Christ, to choose as it were members out of his body them whom he woulde take into the felowship of life. Let this reason then be of force amonge the faithfull, that we were therefore adopted in Christ into the heauenly inheritance, because in our selues we were not able to receiue so great excellence. Which also he toucheth in an other place, when he exhorteth y Colossians to giuinge of thankes, for this that they were by God made fit to be partakers of the estate of the holy. If election go before this grace of God, that we be made fit to obtaine the glory of the life to come: what shall God himselfe nowe finde in vs, whereby he may be moued to elect vs? My meaning shal yet be more openly expressed by an other sayinge of his. He hath chosen vs (sayth he) ere the fundatiōs of the world were laid, according to the good pleasure of his wil, that we might be holy, and vnspotted, and vnreprouable in his sight: where he setteth the good pleasure of God against all our deseruings whatsoeuer they be.

2 That the prooffe may be more stronge, it is worth the labour to note all the partes of that place, which beinge coupled together do leaue no dout. Where he nameth the elect, it is no dout that he speaketh to the faithfull, as he also by and by afterward affirmeth. Wherefore they do with too fowle a glose abuse that name, which wrest it to the age wherein the Gospell was first published. Where he sayth that they were elect before the beginninge of the worlde, he taketh away all respect of worthines. For, what reason of difference is there betwene them which yet were not, and those which after ward should in Adam be egall? Nowe if they be elect in Christ, it followeth that not only euery man is seuered without him. Ife, but also one of the from an other, forasmuch as we see that not all are the members of Christ. That which is added, that they were elect that they might be holy, plainely confuteth the errour which deriueth election from foreknowledge, forasmuch as Paule crieth out against it and sayeth that whatsoeuer vertue appeareth in men, it is the effect of election.

Now if a hier cause be sought, Paul answereth, that God hath so predestinate, yea and that according to the good pleasure of his will. In which wordes he ouerthroweth whatsoeuer meanes of their election men do imagine in themselues. For he also teacheth that whatsoeuer thinges God giueth toward spirituall life, they flowe out of this one fountain, because God hath chosen whom he would, & ere they were borne he had feuerally layd vp for them the grace which he vouchsafed to giue them.

3 But wheresoeuer this pleasure of God reigneth, there no works come to be considered. He doth not here in deede pursue the comparison of contraries, but it is to be vnderstanded such as he himselfe declareth. He hath called vs (saith he) with a holy calling, not according to our workes, but according to his purpose & the grace which is giuen of Christ before the times of the world. And we haue already shewed that all dout is taken away in this which followeth, that we might be holy and vnspotted. For if thou say, because he foresaw that we should be holy, therefore he chose vs, thou shalt peruert the order of Paule. Thus therefore thou maist safely gather. If he chose vs that we might be holy: then he chose vs, not because he foresaw that we would be such. For these two thinges are contrary the one to the other: that the godly haue it of election that they be holy, and that they come to it by meane of workes. Neither is their cauillation here any thing worth to which they commonly flee, that the Lorde doth not render the grace of election to any workes goinge before, but yet graunteth it to workes to come. For when it is sayd that the faithfull were chosen, that they might be holy: therewithal is signified that the holinesse which was to come in them rooke beginninge at election. And how shall this saying agree together, that those thinges which are deriued from election gaue cause to election? The same thing which he sayd he seemeth afterwarde to confirme more strongly, where he saith, Accordinge to the purpose of his will which he had purposed in himselfe. For, to say that God purposed in himselfe, is as much in effect as if it had bin sayd, y without himselfe he considered nothing wherof he had any regard in decreing. Therefore he by and by addeth, that the whole summe of our election tendeth to this ende, that we should be to the praise of the grace of God. Truly the grace of God deserueth not to be praised alone in our electiō, vnlesse our election be free. But free it shall not be, if God in electing his, do cōsider what shalbe the workes of euery one. Therefore we finde that that which Christ said to his disciples, hath place vniuersally among all the faithful, Ye haue not chosen me, but I haue chose you. Where he not only

excludeth deseruings past, but also signifieth that they had nothing in themselves why they shoulde be chosen, if he had not preuented them with his mercy. Like as this saying of Paule is also to be vnder-stood: Who first gaue to him, & shall receiue recompense? For he mea-neth to shewe that the goodnesse of God so preuenteth men, that it findeth nothing in them neither past nor to come, wherby he may be wonne to be fauorable to them. Rom. 11 35.

4 Now to the Romaines, where he fetcheth this questiō further of, & followeth it more largely, he denieth that all they are Israelites, Ro. 9. 6. which are issued of Israell: because although by right of inheritance they were all blessed, yet the succession did not egally passe to thē al. The beginning of this disputation proceeded of the pride & deceitful glorying of the Iewish people. For when they claimed to themselves the name of the Church, they would haue y^e credit of the Gospell to hang vpō their will: as the Papistes at this day would gladly with this fained colour thrust thēselues into the place of God. Paule, although he graunt that the offspringe of Abraham is holy by reason of the couenant, yet affirmeth that the most part of them are strangers in it: & that not onely because they swarue out of kinde, so that of lawefull children they become bastardest, but because the especiall election of God stādeth aboue & reigneth in the hiest top, which alone maketh the adoption thereof sure. If their owne godlines stablished some in the hope of saluation, & their owne falling away alone disherited other some: Paul verily should both fondly and vnconueniently lift vp the readers euen to the secret election. Nowe if the will of God (the cause wherof neither appeareth nor is to be sought without himself) maketh the one sort differing from the other, so that not all the children of Israell be true Israelites, it is vainly fained that euery mans estate hath beginning in himselfe. Then he further followeth the matter vnder the example of Iacob & Esau. For when they both were the sonnes of Abraham, both together enclosed in one mothers wombe, it was a mōsterlike change that the honor of first birth was remoued to Iacob, by which change Paul affirmeth that there was testified the election of the one & the reprobation of the other. The originall & cause of it is enquired, which the teachers of foreknowledge will haue to be set out in the vertues, and vices of men. For this is an easie short way with them, that God shewed in the person of Iacob, that he chooseth the worthy of his grace: and in the person of Esau, he refuseth them whom he foreseeeth to be vnworthy. Thus they say boldly. But what sayth Paule? when they were not yet borne, and hadde not done any good or euill, that according to election the purpose of

Rom. 9. 1. God might abide, not of works, but of him that calleth, it is sayd, The elder shall serue the yonger : as it is wrytten, Iacob I haue loued, but Esau I haue hated. If foreknowledge were of any force in this difference of the brethren, then verily mention were vnfitly made of the time. Let vs graunt that Iacob was chosen, because he had worthines gotten by workes to come: to what purpose should Paule say that he was not yet borne? And this now should be vnaduisedly added, that he had yet done no good : because this shalbe a ready answere, that nothing is hidden from God, and that so the godlines of Iacob was present before him. If workes do win grace, they should then worthily haue had their price before that Iacob was borne as if he had bin growen to full age. But the Apostle goeth forward in vndoinge this knot, and teacheth that the adoption of Iacob was not made of workes, but of the callinge of God. In workes he enterlaceth not the time to come or time past: & then he directly setteth them against the calling of God, meaning by stablishinge of the one expressly to overthrow the other: as if he had said that it is to be considered what hath pleased God, not what men haue brought of themselues. Last of all it is certaine that by the words of Election & Purpose, all causes whatsoever men are wont to faine elsewhere than in the secret counsel of God, are quite remoued from this matter.

5 What colour wil they bring to darken these things, who in election assigne some place to workes either past or to come? For this is vtterly to mocke out that which the Apostle affirmeth, that the difference of the brethren hangeth not vpon any consideration of workes, but vpon the mere calling of God: because it was put betwene them when they were not yet borne. Neither had he bin ignorant of this their suttelty, if it had had any soundnes in it: but because he very well knew, that God can foresee no goodnesse in man, but that which he hath first determined by his benefit of his election to giue him: he fleeth not to that vnorderly order, to set good workes before the cause of themselues. Thus haue we by the words of the Apostle that the saluation of the faithful is founded vpon the will of the only election of God: & that the same fauour is not gotten by workes, but commeth of free calling. We haue also as it were an image of that thing set before vs. Esau & Iacob are brethren, issuing both of one the same parents, enclosed yet both in one wombe, not yet brought out into the world. In them all things are egall, yet of the judgement of God is diuerse. For he takerh the one & forsaketh the other. There was nothing but the only first birth, by right wherof the one excelled the other. But this also being passed ouer, that thing is giuen to the yonger which is denied nied to the elder. Yea and in other also God seemeth alway as of set purpose to haue despised first birth, to cut of from the flesh all matter of glorying. Refusinge Ismaell, he cast his minde to Isaac. Pluckinge backe Manasse, he more honored Ephraim.

6 If any man interrupt me with saying that we must not by these inferiour & smal benefits determine of the summe of y^e life to come, that he which hath bin aduanced to the honor of first birth, shoulde therefore be reckened to be adopted into the inheritance of heauen: (for there be some which spare not Paul himselfe, as though in allea- ging these testimonies he had wrested y^e Scripture to a strâge sense:) I answere as I haue done herebefore, that y^e Apostle neither slipped by vnaduisednes, nor wilfully abused y^e testimonies of the Scripture. But he saw (which they can not abide to consider) that God minded by an earthly signe to declare the spiritual election of Iacob, which otherwise was hidden in his inaccessible throne. For vnles we refer the first birth graunted to him vnto the worlde to come, it shoulde be a vaine & fonde forme of blessing whereby he obtained nothings but manifolde miseries, discommodities, grifefull banishment, and many bitternesse of sorrow and cares. Therefore when Paule sawe without doutinge, that God by outward blessing testified the blessing which he had in his kingdom prepared spirituall and neuer decayinge for his seruant: he doubted not for prooue of this spiritual blessing, to fetch an argument from that outward blessing. This also we must remember that to the land of Canaan was adioyned the pledge of the hea- uenly dwelling: so that it ought not at al to be doubted that Iacob was graffed with the Angels into y^e body of Christ that he might be par- taker of the same life. Iacob therefore is chosen, whē Esau is reiected: Rom. 9. and by the Predestination of God is made different from him from 15. whom he differed not in any deseruings. If you aske a cause, the A- postle rendreth this, because it is sayd to Moses, I wil haue mercy vpon whom I will haue mercie: and I will vouchsaue to graunt mercy to whom soeuer I will vouchsaue to graunt mercy. And what, I beseech you, meaneth this? Verily, the Lord himselfe most plainly pronoun- ceth that men haue in themselues no cause why he should do good to them, but he fetcheth the cause from his own mercy only: & ther- fore that the saluation of his is his owne worke. When God setteth thy saluatiō in himselfe alone, why wilt thou descend to thy self? Whē he appointeth to thee his mercy alone, why wilt thou runne to thine own deseruings? When he holdeth thy thought wholly in his merci- fulnes alone, why wilt thou turne part to the beholding of thine own workes? Therefore we must nedes come to that lesser people, which

Rom. 11 2. Paul in an other place sayth to haue bin foreknowen to God: not in such sort as these men imagine, to foreknow out of an idle watchtourt the thinges that he worketh not: but in such sense as it is oft reade.

Act. 2 23. For truely when Peter saith in Luke, that Christ was by the determined counsell and foreknowledge of God appointed to death, he doth not bring God as a looker on but the author of our saluation. So the

1. Pet. 1 2. same Peter also, where he sayth that the faithfull to whom he wrote were chosen accordinge to the foreknowledge of God, properly expresseth that secreete Predestination whereby God hath marked for his children whom he would. And the word Purpose, which he ioyneth for a diuers word, expressing all one thing, forasmuch as it doth euery where signifie a stedfast determination as they commonly call it, vndoubtedly teacheth that God when he is author of our saluation goeth not out of himselfe. In which sense he saith in the same Chapter that Christ was the lambe foreknowen before the creation of the worlde. For what is more fonde or trifling, than to say that God from on hie did stand looking whense saluation should come to mankinde? Therefore in Paul the foreknowen people is as much as a small portion mingled with the multitude which falsely pretendeth the name of God. In an other place also Paule to beate downe their boasting which beinge but couered with a visor, do take vpon themselues the chiefe preeminence amōg the godly before the world, saith that God knoweth who be his. Finally by that sayinge Paule pointeth vnto vs two sortes of people: the one, of the whole kined of Abraham: the other, seuerally chosen out of it, and which beinge laid vp vnder the eies of God is hidden from the sight of men. And it is no dout that he tooke this out of Moses, which affirmeth that God will be mercifull to whom he will (although he there spake of the elect people, whose estate in outwarde seeming was egall) as if he shoulde haue sayd, that in the common adoption is included with him a speciall grace toward some, as it were a more holy treasure: and that the cōmon couenaunt withstandeth not but that the same small number may be exempt in degree: and he willinge to make himselfe the free disposer and ruler of this thing, precisely denieth that he wil be mercifull to one rather than to an other, for any other reson, but for that it so pleaseth him: because when mercy commeth to him that seeketh it, though he in deede suffer not a deniall, yet he either preuenteth or partly getteth to himselfe the fauour whereof God claimeth to himselfe the praise.

7 Now let the soueraigne Iudge & maister pronounce of y whole matter. Whē he saw so great hardnesse in his hearers, that he did in a maner maner waste his wordes without fruite among the multitude: to remedie this offence, he crieth out, Whatsoever my Father geueth me, it shall come to me. For this is the will of my Father, that whatsoever my Father hath geuen me, I shal not lose any thing of it. Note that the beginning is taken at the Fathers gifte, that we may be deliuered into the faithfull keping and defence of Christ. Here some man peradventure will turne a circle about, and will take exception, saying that they onely are accópted in the propre possession of the Father, whose yeeldinge hath bene voluntarie by faith. But Christ standeth onely vpon that pointe, that although the fallings away of great multitudes do shake the whole world, yet the counsell of God shalbe stedfast and stande faster than the heauens themselues, that his election may neuer faile: They are saide to haue bene the elect of the Father, before that he gaue to them his onely begotten Sonne. They aske whether it were by nature: yea rather, them which were straungers he made his owne by drawing them to him. There is a greater clearenesse in the wordes of Christ, than can by shifting be covered with any darknesse. No man (saith he) can come to me, vnlesse my Father drawe him. But who so hath hearde & learned of my Father, he cometh to me. If all generally without difference should bowe their knee before Christ, then the election were common: but nowe in the fewnesse of the beleuers appeareth a manifest diuersitie. Therefore after that Christ had affirmed that \bar{y} disciples which were giuē him, were the peculiar possession of God the Father, within a little after he added, I pray not for the worlde, but for those whom thou hast geuen me, because they are thine. Whereby is proued that the whole world belongeth not to the Creator of it, sauing that grace deliuereth a fewe from the wrath of God, and from eternall death, which otherwise should haue perished: but the world it selfe is lefte in his owne destructiō to which it was appointed. In the meane time although Christ putte himselfe meane betweene, yet he claimeth to himselfe the power of choosing in common with the Father. I speake not (saith he) of all: I knowe whom I haue chosē. If any man aske frō whense he hath chosē thē, he answereth in an other place, Out of the world, which he excludeth out of his prayers when he commendeth his disciples to his Father, This is to be holden, that when he affirmeth that he knoweth whome he hath chosē, there is signified some speciall sort in the generall kinde of men: then, that the same speciall sort is made to differ not by thē qualitie of their owne vertues, but by the heauenly decree. Whereupon followeth that many excell by their owne force or diligence, when Christ maketh himselfe the author of electiō. For when in an other place he reckeneth Iudas among the elect, whereas he was a deuill, this is referred onely to the office of Apostleship which although it be a cleere mirror of the fauor of God (as Paule so oftentimes acknowledgeth in his owne persone,) yet it containeth not in it selfe the hope of eternall saluation. Iudas therefore, when he did vnfaithfully beare the office of an Apostle, might be worse than the deuill: but of those whom Christ hath ones grafted into his body, he will suffre none to perishe: because in preseruing their saluation he will performe that which he hath promised, that is, he will stretch forth the power of God which is greater than all. For whereas he saith in an other place,

oh. 10.
8. Father, of those whom thou haste geuen me, I haue lost none but the sonne of perdition: although it be an abusive speche by figure, yet it hath no doutefull meaning. The summe is, that God makerh them his children by free adoption whom he will haue to be his children: and that the inwarde cause thereof is in himselfe: because he his content with his owne secrete good pleasure.

8 But Ambrose Origene, and Hierome thought that God distributeth his grace among men, as he forseeth that euery man will vse it well: Yea and Augustine was ones in the same opinion. But when he had better profited in knowledge of the Scripture, he not onely reuoked it as evidently false, but also strongly confuted it: yea and after his reuoking of it, in reprobuing the Pelagians for that they continued in the same error, sayeth: Who can not meruail that the Apostle knewe not this most subtle sense? For when he hadde sette out a thing to be wondred at of these brethren, while they were not yet borne, and afterwarde objected a question against himselfe, saying: what then? Is there vniustice with God? Here was fitte place for him to aunswere, that God foresawe the merites of them both: yet he sayeth not this, but fleeth to the iudgements and mercy of God. And in an other place, when he had taken away all merites before electiō, Here (saith he) is confuted their vaine reasoning which defende the foreknowledge of God against the grace of GOD, and therefore say that we are chosen before the making of the world, because God foreknewe that we would be good, not that he himselfe would make vs good. He sayeth not this, which saith, Ye haue not chosen me, But I haue chosen you. For if he hadde therefore chosen vs, because he forknewe that we would be good: he should therewithall also haue foreknownen that we would choose him: and so forth as followeth to that effect. Let the testimonie of Augustine be of force among them that willingly rest in y authority of the Fathers. Howe be it Augustine suffreth suffreth not himselfe to be seuered from the rest: but by cleere testimonies sheweth that this disagreement is false with ſ malice wherof the Pelagians burdened him. For in the. six. chapter of his booke of the Predestination of Sainctes, he allegeth out of Ambrose, Christ calleth whom he hath mercie on. Againe, If he had willed, of the vndeuoute he might haue made deuoute. But God calleth whom he vouchsafeth: & whom he will he maketh religious, If I listed to knitte together a whole volume out of Augustine, I could readily shewe to the readers that I neede no other words but his: but I will not loade them with tediousnesse. But go to, let vs imagine that they speake not at all: but let vs geue hede to the matter it selfe. A harde questiō was moued, whether God didde righteously in this that he vouchsafed to graunte his grace but to some: Of which questiō Paul might haue vncombred himselfe with one word if he had alleged the respect of workes. Why therefore doth he it not, but rather continueth on a discourse which abideth in the same hardenesse? Why, but because he ought not? For the Holy ghost which spake by his mouth, had not the disease of forgetfulnes. Therefore without any circūstances he answereth, that God therefore fauoreth his elect, because he will: herefore hath mercy, because he wil. For this Oracle of God, I wil haue mercy vpon whom I will haue mercy, & I wil shewe mercie to whom I will shewe mercie, is as much in effect as if it had bene said, that God is moued to mercy by no other reason but because he will haue mercy. Therefore this saying of Augustine remaineth true, that the grace of God doth not find men fit to be chosen, but maketh them.

9 Neither do we any thing passe vpon that sutteltie of Thomas, that the foreknowing of deseruings, is not in deede the cause of predestination on the behalfe of the aēt of him that doth predestinate, but on our behalfe it may after a certaine maner be so called, that is, according to the particular weyeng of Predestination: as when it is said that God predestinateth glorie to man by deseruings, because he hath decreed to geue to him grace by which he may deserue glorie. For sith the Lorde will in election haue vs to loke vnto nothing but his meere goodnesse, if any man shall couet here to see any more, it shalbe a wrongfull gredinesse. If we lusted to strue in sutteltie, we want not wherewith to beat backe this silly sutteltie of Thomas. He affirmeth that to the elect glorie is after a certaine maner predestinate by deseruings, because the Lord doth after a certain maner predestinate to thē the grace, by which they may deserue glory. What if I aunswer on the contrary side and say that predestination vnto grace, serueth election vnto life, and is as it were a waiting maide after it? that grace is predestinate to them, to whom the possession of glorie hath bene long ago apointed: because it pleaseth the Lorde to bring his children from election into iustification? For thereupon it shall followe that the predestination of glorie was rather the cause of the Predestination of grace, than contrariwise, But away with these struings, as things superfluous for such as shall thinke that there is wisdom enough for them in the worde of God. For this was in olde time truly written of an Ecclesiasticall writer, that they which assigne the electiō of God to merites are more wise than they ought to be.

10 Some do obiect that God should be contrary to himselfe, if he should vniuersally call all men to him, & receiue but a fewe elect. So by their opinion the vniuersalnes of the promise taketh away the difference of speciall grace. And thus certaine sobre men speake, not so much to oppresse the truth, as to debarre crabbed questions, and to bridle the curiositie of many. Their will is praise worthy, but their counsell is not to be allowed: because dallying by shifts is neuer excusable. But their obiecting of it which do more railingly inuey against it, is verily to fonde a cauillation, or to shamefull an error. Howe the Scripture maketh these two to agree together, that by outward preaching all men are called to Repentance and faith, and yet not to all men is geuen the Spirit of Repentance and faith, I haue in an other place already declared, and by and by somewhat of it must be repeated againe. Nowe that which they require I denie to them, sith it is two wayes false. For, he that thretneeth that while it raineth vpon one citie, there shall be drought vpon an other: He that pronounceth that there shall in an other place be famine of doctrine, bindeth not himself with a certaine lawe to call all men egally. And he which forbidding Paule to speake in Asia, and turning him from Bithinia draweth him into Macedonia, sheweth that it is in his own power to distribute this treasure to whomsoever it shall please him. Yet more plainly he sheweth by Esaie, howe he peculiarly directeth to the electe the promises of saluation: for he sayeth of them onely, and not of all makeinde indifferently, that they shall be his disciples. Whereby it is certaine that the doctrine of saluation is wrongfully sette open in common to all men to profite effectually, which is said to be seuerally laide vp onely for the children of the Chirch. Let this suffice at this presente, that although the voice of the Gospell speake generally to all, yet the gifte of faith is rare. Esaie assigneth a cause, for that the arme of the Lorde is not open to all men. If he had said that the Gospell is maliciously and frowardly despised, because many do stubbornly refuse to heare: peradventure this color touching ching vniuersall callinge should preuaile. Neither is it the purpose of the Prophet to diminish the faulte of men, when he teacheth that the fountaine of blindnesse is, that God vouchsaueth not to open his arme to them: onely he geueth warning, that because faith is a singular gift, the eares are beaten in vaine with outwarde doctrine. But I would faine knowe of these doctors, whether onely preaching, or faith, make the children of God. Certainly when it is said in the first chapter of Iohn, Whosoeuer beleue in the onely begotten Sonne of God, are themselves also made the children of God, there is not in that place a confused heape iumbled vp together: but a speciall order is geuen to the faithfull, which are borne not of blood, not of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. But (say they) there is a mutuall consent of faith with the word. Namely where- soeuer is faith. But it is no newe thing that seede fall among thornes or in stonie places: not onely because the greater part appeareth in deede obstinate against God, but also because not all men haue eyes & eares. How then shal it agree that God calleth to him thē who he knoweth will not come? Let Augustine aunswere for me. Wilt thou dispute with me? Meruaile with me, and crie out, O depth. Let vs both agree in feare, least we perish in error? Moreouer if election (as Paule witnesseth) be the mother of faith, I turne backe the argument vpon their owne head, that faith is therefore not generall, because election is speciall. For by the orderly hanging together of causes & effectes, it is easily gathered that where Paule saith, that we are full of all spirituall blessing, as God had chosen vs before the creatiō of the world: therefore these riches are not common to all, because God hath chosen onely whom he would. This is the reason why in an other place he cōmendeth the faith of the electe, least it should be thought that any man doth by his owne motion get faith to himself: but that this glorie may remaine with God, that they are freely enlightned of him, whome he had chosen before. For Bernarde saith rightly, Fren- des do seuerally heare, to whom he also saith, Feare not thou small flocke: for to you it is geuen to knowe the misterie of the kingdome of heauen. Who be these? euen they whom he hath foreknowen and predestinate to be fashioned like to the image of his Sonne. A great and secrete counsell is made knowen. The Lorde knewe who be his: but that which was knowē to God, is made manifest to men: neither doth he vouchsafe to make any other partakers of so great a mystery, but those selfe same men whome he hath forknowen & predestinate to be his. A little after he concludeth. The mercie of God is from eternitie euen to eternitie vpon them that feare him: from eternitie, by reason of predestinatiō: to eternitie, by reason of blessed making: the one without beginning, y other without ending. But what neede I to cite Bernarde for witness, when we heare of the masters owne mouth, that none doe see but they which are of God? By which wordes he signifieth, that all they which are not begotten againe of God, do dash at the brightnesse of his countenance. And to election faith in deede is fitly ioined, so that it kepe the second degree. Which order the wordes of Christ do clerely expresse in an other place, This is the will of my Father, that I lose not that which he hath giue. For this is his will, that whosoever beleueth in the Sonne shall not perish. If he would haue all saued, he would appoint ouer them his Sonne to be their keeper, and would graffe them all into his body with the holy bond of faith. Nowe it is certain that faith is a singular pledge of his fatherly loue, layed vp for his children whom he hath adopted. Therefore Christ in an other place saith that the shepe followe the shepherd, because they know his voice: but they followe not a stranger, because they knowe not the voice of strangers. Whence commeth this differēce, but because their eares are boared by God? For no man maketh himselfe a shepe: but he is made one by the heauenly grace. For which cause also the Lorde teacheth that our safetie shall alway be certaine and free from danger, because it is kepte by the inuincible power of God. Wherefore he concludeth that y vnbeleuers are not of his shepe: namely because they are not of the number of them, whome God hath promised by Esau that they shall be his disciples. Nowe because in the testimonies which I haue alleged is expressed perseuerance, they do therewithall testifie the vnmouable stedfastnesse of election.

11 Nowe let vs speake of the reprobate, whom the Apostle ioineth there together. For as Iacob, hauing yet with good workes deserued nothing, is taken into grace: so Esau, being yet defiled with no wicked doinge, is hated. If we turne our eyes to workes, we do wrong to the Apostle, as though he sawe not the same thing which we clerely see. It is proued that he sawe it not, forasmuch as he expressly enforceth this pointe, that when they had not yet done any good or euell, the one was chosen, and the other refused, to proue that the foundation of the predestination of God is not in workes. Again when he moued the obiection, whether God be vnrighteous, he allegeth not that which had bene the most certaine and plaine defence of his righteousness, namely that God reduced to Esau according to his euellnesse: but he was content with an other solution, that the reprobate are stirred vp to this ende, that the glorie of God may be set forth by them. Last of all he adioineth a concluding sentence, that God hath mercie vpon whome he will, and hardeneth whom he will. See you not howe he imputeth both to the onely will of God? Therefore if we can not declare a reason why he vouchsaueth to graunt mercie to them that be his, but because it so pleaseth him: neither also shall we haue any other cause in reiecting of other, than his own will. For when it is said that God hardeneth, or sheweth mercie to whome he will, men are thereby warned to seke no cause els where than in his will.

The xxiiij. Chapter.

A Confutation of the sclanders vvhich with this doctrine hath alway bene v wrongfully burdened.

BVt when the witt of man heareth these things, the frowardnesse thereof can not be restrained, but that by & by as at the bloody blast of a trumpet, sounding to battaile, it diuersly and excesssiuely turmoyleth. And many in deede, as though they would driue away the malice from God, do so graunte election, that they denie that any man is reprobate: but they do to ignorantly and childishely: forasmuch as election it selfe could not stande vnlesse it were set contrary to reprobation: God is said to seuer them whom he adopteth vnto saluation: it should be more than foolishly said that other do either by chaunce or by their owne endeuor obtaine that which onely election geueth to a fewe. Therefore whom God passeth ouer, he reiecteth: and for none other cause, but for that he will exclude them from the inheritance which he doth predestinate to his children. Neither is the waiwardnes of men tolerable, if it suffre not it selfe to be bridled with the word of God, where the incōprehensible counsell of God is entreated of, which the Angels themselues do worship. But we haue already heard, that hardening is no lesse in the hand and will of God than mercie. Neither doth Paul (as these men Rom. 9. do that I haue spoken of) busily labour to excuse God with a lying 20. defence: but onely he teacheth that it is not lawfull for the thing formed to quarel with him that formed it. Now who sodo not admit that any are reiected of God, howe will they vncombe themselues from that saying of Christ, Euery tree which my father hath not planted, Mat. 15. shalbe plucked vp by the roote? They plainly heare that all they are 13. adiudged and auowed to destruction, whome the heavenly Father hath not vouchsaued to plāt as holy trees in his ground. If they denie this to be a signe of reprobatiō, then is there nothing so clere that it may be proued to them. But if they cesse not to wrangle, let v̄ sobriety

Rom. 9. 21. of faith be contented with this admonition of Paule, that there is no cause to quarel with God, if he willing on the one side to shewe his wrath and to make his power knowen do with dumme sufferance, and lenitie beare with the vessels of wrath prepared to destruction: and on the other side he make knowen the richesse of his glorie toward the vessels of mercy which he hath prepared to glory. Let the Reders marke, howe Paul to cutte of occasion from whisperinges & backbitings, geueth the chiefe rule to the wrath & power of God: by cause it is vniust that those depe iudgemētts which swallowe vp all our senses, should be made subiect to our determination. Our aduersaries answere is very trifling, that God doth not vtterly reiect them whom he suffreth in lenitie, but abideth with a minde hanginge in suspence toward them, if peradventure they may repent. As though Paule geueth to God a patience, to loke for their turning, whome he sayeth to be made to destruction. For, Augustine saith rightly where he expoundeth this place, where power is ioined to sufferance, God doth not suffer, but gouerne with his power. They further say also that it is not for nothing said that the vessels of wrath are prepared to destruction: but, that God hath prepared the vessels of mercie: because by this meane he ascribeth and chalengeth the praise of saluation to God, but the blame of destruction he casteth vpon them which by their owne will do bring it vpon themselues. But although I graunt to them that Paul by the diuerse maner of speaking didde soften the roughnesse of the first part of the sentence, yet it is not meete to assigne the preparing vnto destruction to any other thing than to the secret counsell of God: which also is affirmed a little before in the rest of the texte, That God stirred vp Pharao: Thē, that he hardneth whom he will. Wherupon followeth that the hidden counsell of God is the cause of hardning. This at the lest I get which Augustine saith, that when God of wolues maketh shepe, he doth with a mightier grace reforme them, that their hardnes may be tamed: and therefore God for this cause doth not conuert the obstinate, because he doth not shewe forth in them the mightier grace, which he wanteth not if he would shewe it forth.

2 These sayinges in deede should be sufficient for the godly and sobre, & them which remembre themselues to be men. But forasmuch as these venemous dogges do cast vp not onely one sort of venime against God, we will as the matter shall serue, aunswer to euery one particularly. Foolishe men do diuers wayes quarell with God, as though they had him subiect to their accusations. First therefore they aske, by what right the Lorde is angry with his creatures, of whome he

he hath not bene first prouoked by any offence: for to condemne to destruction whom he will, agreeth rather with the wilfulnesse of a tyrant, than the lawfull sentence of a iudge. Therefore they say that there is cause why men should charge God, if by his bare will, without their owne deseruing, they be predestinate to eternall death. If such thoughts do at any time come into the minde of the godly, to breake their violent assaultes they shalbe sufficiently armed with this although they had no more, if they consider how great wickednesse it is, euen so much as to enquire of the causes of the will of God: such of all things that are, it is the cause, and worthily so ought to be. For if it haue any cause, then somewhat must go before it, wherto it must be as it were bound: which it is vnlawfull ones to imagine. For, the will of God is so the highest rule of righteousness, that whatsoeuer he willeth, euen for this that he willeth it, it ought to be take for righteous. When therefore it is asked, why the Lorde did it: it is to be answered, because he willed it. But if thou go further in asking why he willed it, thou askest some greater and hier thing than the will of God: which can not be found. Let therefore the rashnesse of man restrain it selfe, and not seke that which is riot, least peraduenture it may not finde that which is. With this bridle (I say) he shalbe well withholden whosoever he be that will dispute of the secrets of God with reuerence. As for the boldenesse of the wicked, which drede not openly to speake euell of God: against it the Lorde with his owne righteousness, without any our defense shall sufficietly defend himselfe, when he shall take all shifring from their consciences, and hold them fast conuincid, and condemne them. Neither do we yet thrust in the fained deuise of absolute power, which as it is prophane, so worthily ought to be abhorred of vs. We faine not God lawelesse, who is a lawe to himselfe: because (as Plato saith) men stand in neede of lawes, who are troubled with vnlawfull lustes: but the will of God is not onely pure from all fault, but also is the hiest rule of perfectio, yea and the lawe of all lawes. But we denie that he is subiect to yelde accompt. We denie also that we are mete iudges, which would pronouce of this cause after our owne sense. Wherefore if we attempt further than we lawefully may, let that threatening of the Plalme bring vs in feare, that God shall ouercome so oft as he is iudged of any mortall man.

3 So can God in keping silence, put his enemies to silence. But, that we may not suffer them freely to scorne his holy name, he deliuereth to vs out of his word weapons against them. Wherefore if any man assaile vs with such wordes: why God hath from the beginning predestinate some to death, which when they were not, could not yet deserue the iudgement of death: we in steede of aunswer may againe on our side aske of them, what they thinke that God oweth to man, if he will iudge him by his owne nature. In such sort as we be all corrupted with sinne, we can not but be hatefull to God: & that not by tyrannous crueltie, but by most vpright reason of iustice. If all they whom the Lord doth predestinate to death, are by the estate of nature subiect to the iudgement of death: of what vniustice against themselues, I beseeche you, may they complaine? Let all the sonnes of Adam come: Let them striue and dispute with their creator, for that by his eternall prouidence they were before their generation condemned to euerlasting miserie. What shall they be able ones to murter against this defense, whē God on the other side shall call them to reknewledging of themselues? If they be all takē out of a corrupt masse, it is no maruell if they be subiect to damnation. Let them not therefore accuse God of vniustice, if by his eternall iudgement they be apointed to death, to which they themselues do fele whether they will or no, that they are willingly led of their owne nature. Whereby appereth howe wrongfull is the desire of their murmuring, because they do of set purpose hide the cause of damnation which they are cōpelled to acknowledge in themselues, that the laying of the blame vpon God may acquite them. But though I do a hundred times confesse, as it is most true, that God is the author of it, yet they do not by and by wipe away the giltinesse which being engrauen in their cōsciēces from time with oft recourse, presenteth it selfe to their eyes.

4 Againē they except and say: were they not before predestinate by the ordinance of God to the same corruption which is nowē alleaged for the cause of damnation? When therefore they perish in their corruption, they do nothing but suffer the punishment of that miserie into which by his predestination Adam fell and drewē his posteritie hedlong with him. Is not he therefore vniust, which doth so cruelly mocke his creatures. I graunt in deede that all the children of Adam fell by the will of God into that miserie of state wherin they be nowē bound: and this is it that I said at the beginning, that at length we must alway returne to the determination of the will of God, the cause whereof is hidden in himselfe. But it followeth not by and by that God is subiect to this sclaunder. For we will with Paule aunswer them in this maner, O man, what art thou that contendest with God? doth the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou formed me so? Hath not the potter power to make of the same lumpē one vessel to honor, and an other to dishonor? They will say that the righteousnesse of God is so not truly defended, but that we seke a thift, such as they are wont to haue that want a iust excuse. For what els seemeth here to be said, than that God hath a power which can not be hindered from doing any thing whatsoever it be as he will himselfe? But it is farre otherwise. For, what stronger reason can be brought than when we are commaunded to thinke what a one God is? For howe should he commit any vniustice, which is iudge of the world? If it properly pertaineth to the nature of God to do iudgement, then he naturally loueth righteousnesse, and abhorreth vnrighteousnesse. Wherefore the Apostle did not, as though he were ouertaken, looke about for holes to hide him; but shewed that the reason of the righteousnesse of God is hier than that it either is to be measured by the measure of man, or may be comprehended by the slender capacitie of the wit of man. The Apostle in deepe confesseth that there is such depth in the iudgements of God, wherewith the mindes of men should be swallowed, if they endeouored to pearce into it. But he teacheth also howe hainous wrong it is, to binde the workes of God to such a lawe, that so sone as we vnderstand not the reason of them, we may be bold to disallowe them. It is a known saying of Salomon (which yet fewe do rightly vnderstand) The great creator of all rendreth reward to the foole, and reward to transgressors. For he crieth out concerninge the greatnesse of God: in whose will it is to punish fooles & transgressors, although he do not vouchesauue to let them haue his Spirit. And monstrous is the madnesse of men, whē they so couet to make that which is vnmeasurable, subiect to the smal measure of their reason. The Angels which stode stil in their vprightnesse, Paule calleth elect. If their stedfastnes was grounded vpon the good pleasure of God, the falling away of the other proueth that they were forsaken: Of which thing there can no other cause be alleged than reprobation, which is hidden in the secret counsell of God.

5 Go to: let there nowe be present some Manichee, or Celestine, a sclauderer of the prouidence of God: I say with Paule that there ought no reason to be rendred thereof: because with the greatnesse of it, it farre surmounteth our vnderstanding. What maruell? or what absurditie is it? Would he haue the power of God so limited, that it may be able to worke no more, than his minde is able to conceiue? I say with Augustine, that they are created of y^e Lord, whom he without douting foreknewe that they should go into destruction: and that it was so done, because he so willed: but why he willed, it is not our part to aske a reason of it, who can not comprehend it: neither is it mete that the will of God should come downe into controuersie among vs, of which so oft as mention is made, vnder the name of it is named the hiest rule of righteousness. Why therefore is any question moued of vnrighteousnesse where righteousness clerely appereth? Neither let vs be ashamed, after the example of Paule, so to stoppe the mouthes of the wicked, and from time to time so oft as they shalbe bold to barke against it; to repete this, Who be ye miserable men, that lay an accusation to Gods charge, and do therefore lay it to his charge because he doth not temper the greatnesse of his workes to your dulnesse? As though they were therefore wrongfull, because they are hidden from flesh. The vnmeasurablenesse of the iudgements of God is by cleare experiences knowen vnto you. Ye

Psa. 36. knowe that they are called the depe bottomlesse depth. Nowe aske of the narrowe capacities of your wit, whether they comprehend that which God hath decreed with himselfe. What good doth it you therefore with mad searching to plunge your selues into the bottomlesse depth; which reason it selfe teacheth you that it shalbe to your destruction? Why are ye not at the least restrained with some feare of that which both the historie of Iob and the bookes of the Prophets do report of the incomprehensible wisdome, and terrible power of God: If thy minde be vnquieted, let it not greue thee to embrace the counsell of Augustine. Thou being a man lokest for an answer at my hand: and I also am a man. Therefore let vs both heare him that saith: O man, what art thou? Better is a faithfull ignorance than rash knowledge, Seke merites: thou shalt finde nothing but peine. O depth. Peter denieth: the These beleueth: O depth. Sekest thou a reason? I will treble at the depth. Reason thou, I will wonder: dispute thou, I will beleue: I see depth, but I reache not the bottome. Paul rested, because he found wondering. He calleth the iudgements of God vnsearchable: and art thou come to searche them? He saith that his wayes are impossible to be traced out: and doest thou trace them? with proceeding further we shall nothing profit: For neither we shall satisfie their way wanton curiousnesse, neither doth the Lord neede any other defense, than which he hath vsed by his Spirit, which spake by the mouth of Paule: and we forget to speake well; when we cesse to speake with God.

6 Their other obiection also ariseth out of vngodlinesse, which yet redeth not so directly to the accusing of God as to the excusing of the sinner. Howebeit the sinner which is condemned of God can not be iustified without dishonor of the iudge. Thus therefore prophane tongs do barke against God, saying: why should God impute those those things for sinne to men, whereof he hath by his predestination layed necessitie vpon men? For, what should they do? Should they wastle with his decrees? But so should they do it in vaine, sith they can not do it at all. Therefore they are not rightfully punished for those things, wherof the chiefe cause is in Gods predestination. Here I will absteine from that defense, wherunto the Ecclesiastical writers do commonly flee, namely that the foreknowledge of God withstandeth not but that man may be accompted the sinner: because God foreseeeth the euels of man, not his owne. For so the cauillatiō would not stay here, but will rather presse vs further with saying that God might if he had would, haue provided remedie for those euels which he foresaw: and that sith he hath not so done, he hath of determined purpose created men to that ende that he should so behaue himself in earth: and if by the prouidence of God, man was created to this condition, that he should do all those things that he doth: then he is not to be blamed for that which he can not auoide, & which he enterprised by the will of God. Therefore let vs see how this knot ought to be well loosed. First of all this ought to be holden certaine among all men which Salomon saith, that God hath created all things for himself, & the wicked man to an euell day. Behold, when the despising of all things is in the hand of God, when in his power remaineth the rule of safetie and death: he so ordereth them by his counsell and becke, that among men there are borne some adiudged euen from their mothers wombe to death, which with their destruction may glorifie his name. If any man answer, that there is no necessitie layed vpon them by the prouidēce of God, but rather that he created them in such estate, because he foresawe their peruersnesse to come: he neither saith nothing at all, nor altogether. The old writers are wont in deede somtimes to vse this solution: but as it were doubtingly. But the Scholemen rest vpon it, as though nothing could be obiected against it. In dede I wil willingly graunt, y^e foreknowledge alone bringeth no necessitie to creatures, although all men do not so agree: for there be some that will haue it also to be the cause of things. But it seemeth to me that Valla, a man otherwise not much practised in holy writinges, saw both more depely & more wisely, which shewed that this contention is superfluous: because both life and death are rather the doings of Gods will than of his foreknowledge. If God did but foresee the succeses of men, & did not also dispose and order them by his will, then this question should not without cause be moued, whether his foreseeing any thing auailed to the necessitie of them, But sith he doth none otherwise foresee the things y^e shall come to passe, than because he hath decreed that they should so come to passe: it is vaine to moue controuersie about foreknowledge, where it is certaine that all things do happen rather by ordinance and commaundement.

7 They say that this is not written in expresse words, that it was decreed of God, that Adam should perish by his falling away. Although the same God, whome the Scripture reporteth to do what soeuer he will, created the noblest of all his creatures to an vncertaine ende. They say he had freewill, that he might shape to himselfe his owne fortune: and that God decreed nothing, but to handle him according to his deseruing. If so cold a deuise be receiued, where shalbe that almightines of God, wherby he gouerneth all things according to his secret counsell, which hangeth vpon none other thing than it selfe? But predestination, whether they will or no, sheweth himselfe in Adams posteritie. For it came not to passe naturally that all men should lose saluation by the fault of one part. What hindereth them to confesse of one man, that which against their willes they confesse of all mankind? For why should they lose their labour with dallying shifts? The Scripture crieth out that all men were in the persone of one man made bonde to eternall death. Sith this can not be imputed to nature, it is plaine that it proceeded from the wonderous counsell of God. But it is to much absurditie that these good Patrones of the righteousnesse of God do so stumble at a strawe, and leape ouer great beames. Againe I aske: howe came it to passe, that the fall of Adam did wrappè vp in eternall death so many nations with their children being infantes without remedie, but because it so pleased God? Here their tongues which are otherwise so pratling, must of necessitie be dumme. It is a terrible decree, I graunt: yet no man shalbe able to denie, but that God foreknewe what ende man should haue, ere he created him, and therefore foreknewe it bycause he had so ordeined by his decree. If any man here inuey against the foreknowledge of God, he rashly and vndiscretely stumbleth. For, what matter is there, I besech you, why the heauenly iudge should be accused for that he was not ignorant of that which was to come? Therefore if there be any either iuste or colorable complaint, it toucheth predestination. Neither ought it to serue an absurdity which I say, that God foresaw not onely the fall of the first man, and in him the ruine of his posterity, but also disposed it after his owne wil. For as it belongeth to his wisdom, to foreknowe all things that shalbe: so it belongeth to his power, to rule and gouerne all things with his hand. And this question Augustine very well discusseth, as he doth other, saying: We most

most holisomely confesse that which we most rightly beleue, that the God and Lorde of all things, which created all things very good, and foreknewe that euell things should spring out of good, and knewe that it more pertained to his almighty goodnesse euen of euell things do well, than not to suffer them to be euell: that he so ordered the life of Angels and men, that in it he might first shewe what free will could do, and then what the benefit of his grace and iudgement of iustice could do.

¶ 8 Here they runne to the distinction of will and permission, by which they will haue it graunted that the wicked do perish, God onely permitting but not willing it. But why should we say that he permitteth it, but because he so willeth. Howebeit it is not likely, that man by himselfe, by the onely permission of God, without any his ordināce, brought destruction to himselfe: as though God appointed not, of what condition he woulde haue the chiefe of his creatures to be. I therefore will not dout to cōfesse simply with Augustine, that the wil of God is a necessitie of things and that what he willeth, it must of necessitie come to passe: as those things shall truely come to passe which he hath foreseen. Nowe if for excuse of themselues and of the vngodly, either the Pelagiās, or Manichees, or Anabaptistes, or Epicureans (for with these fower sectes we haue to do in this question) shall object against vs necessitie wherewith they be bound by the predestination of God: they bring nothing fit to the purpose. For if predestination be nothing els but a dispensation of rightcoufnesse of God, which is hidden in deede, but yet without faulte: For asmuch as it is certaine that they were not vnworthy to be predestinate to that estate, it is also as certaine that the destruction is most righteous which they entre into by predestination. Moreouer their destruction so hangeth vpon the predestination of God, that both cause and matter thereof is founde in themselues. For the first man fell, because the Lorde so iudged it to be expedient: why he so iudged, is vnknownen to vs: yet it is certaine that he so iudged for no other reason but because he sawe that thereby the glorie of his name should be worthily set forth. When thou hearest mention of the glorie of God, there thinke of his righteousnes: For it must be righteous that deserueth praise. Man therefore falleth, the prouidence of God so ordeininge it: but he falleth by his owne fault. The Lorde had a litle before pronouced, that all the things which he had made were very good. Whense therefore commeth that peruersnesse to man, to fall away from his God? Least it should be thought to be of creation, the Lorde with his commendation allowed that which came from himselfe. Therefore by his owne euellnesse he corrupted the nature which he had receiued pure of the Lorde, and by his fall he drew his whole posteritie with him into destruction. Wherefore let vs rather beholde an euident cause of damnation in the corrupted nature of mankinde, which is nerer to vs, than search for a hidden and vtterly incomprehensible cause thereof in the predestination of God. Neither let it greue vs so farre to submit our wit to the vncemeasurable wisdome of God, that it may yeld in many secrets of his. For, of those things which it is neither graunted nor lawefull to knowe, the ignorance is well learned: the coueting of knowledge, is a kinde of madnesse.

9 Some man parhappes will say; that I haue not yet brought enough to subdue that wicked excuse. But I verily confesse that it can neuer be brought to passe, but that vngodlinesse will alway grudge and murmure against it: yet I thinke that I haue spoken so much as might suffice to take away not onely all reason but also all colour of ginesaying. The reprobate would be thought excusable in sinning, because they can not escape the necessitie of sinning: specially sith such necessitie is cast vpon them by the ordinance of God. But we denie that they are thereby well excused, because the ordinance of God, by which they complaine that they are destinate to destruction, hath his righteousnesse, vnknown in deepe to vs, but yet most certaine. Whereupon we conclude, that they beare no euil which is not layed vpon them by the most righteous iudgement of God. Then, we teach that they do ouerthwartly, which to seke out the beginning of their damnation, do bend their eyes to the secret closets to the counsell of God, and winke at the corruption of nature; from whence their damnation springeth. And this withstandeth that they can not impute it to God, for that he witnesseth of his owne creation. For although man is creat by the eternall prouidence of God to that calamitie, whereunto he is subiect: yet the matter thereof he tooke of himselfe, not of God: forasmuch as he is by no other meane so lost, but because he wente out of kinde from the pure creation of God into a corrupt and vnpure peruersnesse.

10 Nowe the aduersaries of Gods predestination do sclander it also with a third absurditie. For when we impute it to nothing els but to the choise of the will of God, y they are made free from the vniuersall destruction, whom he maketh heires of his kingdome, thereby they gather that there is with him accepting of persones, which the Scripture euery where denieth: & therefore, that either the Scripture disagreeeth with it self, or that in the electiō of God there is respect of deserdeseruings. First, the Scripture in an other sense denieth, that God is an accepter of persones, than as they iudge it. For by the name of Person, it signifieth not a man, but those thinges which beinge seene with eies in man are wont to procure either fauour, grace, and dignity, or hatred, contempt, and shame: as, richesse, wealth, power, nobility, office, countrey, excellency of beauty, and such other: on the other side pouerty, neede, basenesse, vilenesse, contempt, and such other. So Peter and Paul do teach that the Lord is not an accepter of persones, because he putteth not difference betwene the Iew & the Grecian, to refuse the one and embrace the other for only respect of nation. So Iames vseth the same words when he mindeth to affirme, that God in his iudgement nothing regardeth richesse. But Paule in an other place speaketh thus of God, that in iudging he hath no consideration of freedome or bondage. Wherefore there shalbe no contrariety if we shall say that God accordinge to the will of his good pleasure without any deseruinge chooseth to his sonnes whome he will, reiectinge and refusinge other. But the matter may thus be opened, that men may be more fully satisfied. They aske howe it cometh to passe, that of two betwene whom no deseruinge putteth any difference, God in his electinge passeth ouer the one and taketh the other. I on the other side do aske them, whether they thinke that in him that is taken there is any thinge that may make the minde of God to encline toward him. If they confesse (as they nedes must) that there is nothing, it shall follow that God looketh not vpon man, but from his owne goodnesse fetcheth a cause why to do good to him. Whereas therfore God chooseth one man, refusinge an other, this cometh not of respect of man, but of his mercy alone, which ought to haue liberty to shew forth and vtter it selfe where and when it pleaseth him. For we haue in an other place also shewed, that there were not frō the beginninge many called noble, or wise, or honorable, that God might humble the pride of flesh: so farre is it of, that his fauour was bound to persones.

¶ Wherefore many do falsely and wickedly accuse God of partiall vnrighteousnesse, for that he doth not in his predestination kepe one selfe course toward all men. If (say they) he finde all guilty, let him egally punish all: if he finde them vngilty, let him withhold the rigor of his iudgemēt from all. But so they deale with him, as if either mercy were forbidden him, or whē he would haue mercy he be compelled altogether to giue ouer his iudgemēt. What is it that they require: if all be guilty, that all may together suffer al one paine. We graunt the guiltinesse to be common, but we say that the mercy of God helpeth some. Let it help all, say they. But we answere, that it is rightfull that he should also in punishinge shewe himselfe a rightfull iudge. When they suffer not this: what do they else but either go about to spoyle God of his power to haue mercy, or at least to graunt it him vpon this condition, that he vtterly giue ouer his iudgement. Wherefore these sayings of Augustine do very well agree together. Sith in the first man the whole masse of mankinde fell into condemnation, these vessels that are made of it to honor, are not the vessels of their owne righteousnesse, but of the mercy of God: & whereas other are made to dishonor, the same is not to be imputed to vnrightfulnesse but to iudgement &c: That to those whom he refuseth, God rendereth due paine: to those whom he calleth, he giueth vnderserued grace: that they are deliuered from all accusation, after the manner of a creditor, in whose power it is, to forgiue to the one, and aske of the other. Therefore the Lord also may giue grace to whom he will, because he is mercifull: & giue it not to all, because he is a iust iudge. He may by giuing to some, that which they do not deserue, shew his free grace: and by not giuing to all, declare what all deserue. For wheras Paul writeth that God enclosed all vnder sinne, that he might haue mercy vpon all, it is therewithall to be added that he is dettor to no man: because no man first gaue to him, that he may require like of him.

12 This also they often say, to ouerthrowe predestination, that while it standeth, all carefulnesse and endeouour of well doing falleth away. For who (say they) shall heare that either life or death is certainly appointed for him by the eternall decree of God, but that it will by and by come into his minde that it maketh no matter how he behaue himselfe, sith the predestination of God can by his worke be nothinge hindered or furthered? So shall all men dissolutely throw forth themselues, and after a desperate manner runne headlonge whether their lust shal cary them. And verily they say not altogether falsely, for there be many swine, which with filthy blasphemies defile the doctrine of predestination, and by this pretense also do mocke out all admonishments and rebukinges, sayinge, God knoweth what he hath ones determined to do with vs: if he haue decreed our saluatiō, he will bring vs to it at the time appointed: if he haue predestinate our death, we shoulde trauaile in vaine to the contrary. But the Scripture, when it teacheth with how much greater reuerence and religiousnesse we ought to thinke of so great a mistery, doth both instruct the godly to farre other sense, and well confute these mens outrage. For it doth not speake of predestinatiō to this end, that we should be encouraged to boldnesse, and with vnlawfull rashnesse attempt to search the vnattained secretes of God: but rather that being humbled and abaced we should learne to tremble at his iudgement, & reuerently to looke vp to his mercy. To this marke the faithfull wil leuell themselves. As for that filthy groning of swine, it is well confuted of Paule. They say that they go carelesly forward in vices: because if they be of the number of the elect, their vices shall nothing hinder them, but that they shall at length be brought to life. But Paul Eph. 1. 4 telleth that we be to this end, that we should lead a holy & faultlesse life. If the marke that election is directed vnto be holinesse of life, it ought more to awake & sturre vs vp cherefully to practise that holinesse, than to serue for a clokinge of slothfulnesse. For howe greatly do these thinges differ the one from the other: to ceasse from well doing, because election sufficeth to saluation: and that the appointed ende of election is that we shoulde apply our selues to the endeuour of good doings. Away therefore with such sacrileges which do wrongfully misturne the whole order of election. Where they stretch their blasphemies further, when they say that he which is reprobate of God, shall loose his labour if he go about to make himselfe allowable to him with innocency & honesty of life: therein they are taken with a most shamelesse lye. For, whense coulde such endeuour come but of election? For whosoeuer be of the number of the reprobate, as they are vessels made to dishonor, so they ceasse not with continuall wicked doinges to prouoke the wrath of God against themselves; and by euident tokens to confirme the iudgement of God which is already pronounced vpon them: so farre be they from striuinge with him in vaine.

13 But other do maliciously & shamefully sclaunder this doctrine as though it did ouerthrowe all exhortations to godly liuinge. For which matter in olde time Augustine was burdened with a great malice. Which he wiped away with his booke of correption and Grace wrytten to Valentine, the readinge whereof will appease all Godly and tractable men: yet I will touch a fewe thinges, which (as I trust) shall satisfie them that be honest and not contentious. We haue already scene how open and loude a preacher of the free election Paul was: was he therefore cold in admonishing and exhorting? Let these good zealous men compare their earnestnesse with his, and it shalbe found in them ise in comparison of his incredible heate. And truely this principle taketh away all douts, that we are not called to vncleannesse, but that euery man should possesse his vessell in honor, &c. A- 1. Thec.

he. 2. which he hath prepared that we shoulde walke in them. Summarily, they that are euen but meanly exercisid in Paul, shall without longe declaration easily perceiue how fitly he maketh these things to agree, which they faine to disagree. Christ commaundeth that men beleue in him : Yet is his definitiue sentence neither false nor contrary to
hn. 6. this commaundement, where he sayth. No man can come to me, but he to whom it is giuen of my father. Let preaching therefore haue his course, which may bringe men to faith, and with continuall profiting holde them fast in perseuerance. Neither yet let the knowledge of predestination be hindered, y they which obey may not be proud as of their owne, but may glory in the Lord. Christ not for nothing at 13 sayth, Who so hath eares of hearinge, let him heare. Therefore when we exhorte and preach, they that haue eares do willingly obey : but
a. 6. 9 who so lacke eares ; in them is fulfilled that which is wrytten , That
b. de hearing they heare not. But why (saith Augustine) should some haue, ono and other not haue ? Who hath knowe the minde of the Lord ? Must
p. 15 that therefore be denied which is open , because that can not be cō-prehended which is hidden ? These sayinges I haue faithfully reported out of Augustine : but because parauenture his wordes shal haue more authority than mine, go to, let vs bringe forth the very wordes that are read in himselfe. If when this is heard, many are turned into dulnesse & sluggishnesse, and beinge enclined from labour to lust do go after their desires : ought that therefore to be accompted false which is spoken of the foreknowledge of God ? If God haue foreknown that they shalbe good, shall they not be good, in how great euilnesse soeuer they now liue ? and if he haue foreknown that they will be euill, shall they not be euill, in how great goodnesse soeuer they be now seene ? Shall therefore those things which are truely spoken of the foreknowledge of God, be for such causes either to be denied or to be leste vnspoken of ? namely then when if they be not spoken of, men go into errors ? The rule (sayth he) to keepe trueth vnspoken of, is one thinge, & the necessity to speake trueth is an other. As for the causes of leauinge trueth vnspoken, it were longe to search them out all : of which yet this is one, that they be not made worse which vnderstande it not, while we meane to make them more learned that vnderstand it, who when we speake any such thing are indeede not made more learned, nor yet are made worse. But when a true thing is in such case, that whē we speake it, he is made worse that can not conceiue it : and when we speake it not, he is made worse that can conceiue it : what thinke we now to be done ? is not the trueth rather to be spokē, that he may conceiue it, that can cōceiue it : than to keepe it

it vnspoken, that not only neither of them may conceiue it, but also he that more vnderstādeth may be the worse? whereas if he did heare and conceiue it, by him also many shoulde learne? And we will not say that which, as the Scripture witnesseth, we lawfully might haue spoken. For we feare forsooth least when we speake; he be offended that can not conceiue it: but we feare not least while we holde our peace; he that can conceiue trueth be deceiued with falthode. Which sentence he at the last shortly knitting vp, more plainely also confirmeth. Wherefore if the Apostles, and they which followed them, the doctors of the church did both, namely both goddily preach of the eternall election of God, and hold the faithfull in awe vnder the discipline of Godly life: why do these our aduersaries being confuted with inuincible violence of trueth, thinke that they say well in saying that that which is spoken of predestination is not to be preached to the people although it be true. Yea it must in any wise be preached, y^e he which hath eares to heare may heare. But who hath cares if he haue not receiued the from him y^e promiseth that he wil giue them? Truely let him that receiueh not, refuse it: so that yet he which receiueh it, do take & drinke, do drinke and liue. For as godlines is to be preached, that God may be rightly worshipped: so is also predestination, that he which hath eares to heare of the grace of God, may glory in God and not in himselfe.

Cap 20

14 And yet that holy man, as he had a singular desire to edifie, so tempereth the maner of teaching the trueth, that offense be wisely auoided so far as it lawfully may be. For he sheweth that those things which are truely sayd, may also be conueniently sayd. If any man do thus preach to the people. If ye beleue not, y^e cause is for that ye are already predestinate of God to destruction: such a man doth not only cherish slothfulnesse, but also maintaine wickednesse. If any man also stretch his saying to the time to come, and say that they which heare shall not beleue, because they are reprobate: this shalbe rather a cursing than a teaching. Such therefore Augustine not vnworthily biddeh to depart from the Church, as foolish teachers, and vnlucky and ill prophesying Prophetes. In an other place he truely affirmeth that it is to be holden that a man then profiteh with rebukinge, when he hath mercy and helpeth which maketh to profit whom he will, euen without rebukinge. But why some thus, and some otherwise? God forbid that, that we should say that the power of iudging belōgeth rather to the clay than to the potter. Againe afterward. When men by rebukinge either come or returne into the way of righteousness, who worketh saluation in their hearts but he, which when any who.

soeuer he be planteth and watereth, giueth the increase, whom when he will saue, no freewill of man resisteth? It is therefore not to be doubted that the wils of men can not resist the will of God (which both in heauen and earth hath done whatsoeuer he woulde, and which hath also done those things that are to come) but that he may do what he will, forasmuch as euen of the very wils of men he doth what he will. Againe, when he will leade mē to him, doth he binde them with corporall bondes? He inwardly worketh, inwardly holdeth heartes, inwardly moueth heartes, & draweth thē with their wils which he himselfe hath made in them. But, that which he by and by addeth ought in no wise to be omitted: that because we know not who belongeth or not belongeth to the number of the predestinate, we ought so to be affectioned that we woulde all men to be saued. So shall it come to passe, that whomsoeuer we finde, we shall trauaile to make him partaker of peace. But our peace shall rest vpon the children of peace. Therefore for our part, we must apply holosome & sharp rebuking to all men like a medecine, that they perishe not, nor destroy other, but it shalbe the worke of God to make it profitable to thē whom he hath foreknowen and predestinate.

The xxiiij. Chapter.

That election is stablished by the callinge of God; but that the reprobate do bring vpon themselves the iust destruction whereunto they are appointed

BVt, that the matter may more plainely appeare, we must entreate both of the callinge of the elect, and of the blinding and hardeninge of the wicked. Of the first of these I haue already spoken somewhat, when I confuted their error, which think that the generalnes of the promises extēdeth egally to al mankinde. But this election which otherwise God hath hidden with himselfe he doth not without choise at length disclose by his calling, which a man may therefore call the testifyinge of it. For, whom he hath foreknowen, them he hath also foreappointed to be fashioned like the image of his sonne: whom he hath foreappointed, them he hath also called: whom he hath called, them he hath also iustified, that in time to come he may glorifie them. When the Lorde hath by electing already adopted his into the number of his children: yet we see how they entre not into possession of so great a benefit, but when they be called: on the other side, how being called they do now enioy a certaine communicatinge of his election. For which reason Paule calleth the Spirite which they receiue, both the Spirite of adoption, and

and the seale, & earnest of the inheritance to come: namely because it doth with the testimony thereof stablish and seale to their heartes the assurednesse of the adoptiō to come. For though the preaching of the Gospell spring out of the fountaine of electiō: yet because it is also common to the reprobate, therefore it could not by it selfe be a sure prooffe thereof. But God effectually teacheth his elect, that he may bring them to faith: as we haue before alleaged out of the wordes of Christ, Who so is of God, he & none other seeth the Father. Againe, I haue shewed thy name to the men whom thou hast giuen me: Where as he saith in an other place, No man can come to me, vnlesse my Father drawe him. Which place Augustine wisely weierth, whose words are these. If (as Trueth sayth) euery one that hath learned, commeth: whosoeuer commeth not, certainly neither hath he learned. It doth not therefore followe that he which can come, also commeth, vnlesse he haue both willed & done it. But euery one that hath learned of the Father, not only can come, but also commeth, when nowe there is present both the profit of comming, and the affection of wilinge, and the effect of doinge. Also in an other place more plainly. What is this else, Euery one that hath hearde of the father, and hath learned, commeth to me, but there is none that heareth and learneth of the father and commeth not to me? For if euery one which hath hearde of the father and learned, commeth: truely euery one that commeth not, hath not heard of the father, nor learned: for if he had heard and learned, he woulde come. This schoole is farre from the senses of the fleshe, in which schoole the father is heard and teacheth, that men may come to the sonne. And a litle after. This grace which is secretly giuen to the heartes of men, is receiued of no hard heart: for it is therefore giuen, that the hardnesse of the heart may first be taken away. When therefore the father is heard within, he taketh away the stony heart, and giueth a fleshy heart. For so he maketh the children of promise and vessels of mercy, which he hath prepared to glory. Why therefore doth he not teach all, that they may come to Christ, but because all whome he teacheth, by mercy he teacheth: whom he doth not teach, by iudgement he doth not teach: because he hath mercy vppon whom he will, and hardeneth whome he will. Therefore God assigneth them for children to himselfe, and appointeth himselfe father to them, whom he hath chosen. Now by calling he bringeth them into his household, and vniteth himselfe to them, that they may be one together. But, when Calling is ioyned to election, in that manner the Scripture sufficiently signifieth that in it nothinge is to be required but the mercy of God. For if we aske whom he calleth and for what reason: he answereth, whom he had elected. But when we come once to election, there the onely mercy of God appeareth on euery side. And here that saying of Paul truely hath place, It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy: Neither yet that same so as they commonly take it, which part it betwene the grace of God, & the willing and running of man. For they expound it, that the desire & endeouour of man haue in deede no force of themselves, vnlesse they be prospered by the grace of God: but when they are holpen by his blessing, then they affirme that they haue also their partes in obtaininge saluation. Whose cauillation I had rather confute with Augustines wordes thā mine owne: If the Apostle meant nothings else but that it is not of him only that willeth or runneth, vnlesse the Lorde be there present mercifull: we may contrariwise turne it against them and say that it is not of onely mercy, vnlesse there be present willing and runninge. But if this be openly wicked, let vs not dout that the Apostle giueth all to the mercy of the Lord, & leaueth nothings to our willes or endeouours. To this effect speaketh that holy man. And I set not a straw by that nice sutrelty, that they say that Paule would not haue so said vnlesse there had bin some endeuor & some wil in vs. For he did not consider what was in man: but when he saw that some did assigne part of saluation to the endeuour of men, he simply condemned their error in the first parte of the sentence, and in the second he chalenged the whole summe of saluation of y^e mercy of God. And what other thinge do the Prophetes trauaile about, but continually to preach the free calling of God?

2 Morouer the very nature also and dispensation of Calling doth clearly shewe it, which consisteth not in the only preachinge of the word, but also in the enlightning of the Spirit. To whom God offereth his word, is shewed vs in the prophet: I am found of them that sought me not: I haue openly appeared to them that did not aske for me. To a people which hath not called vpon my name I haue sayd, Loe I am present. And least the Iewes should thinke that this kindenes belonged only to the Gentiles, he doth also put them in remembrance from whence he tooke their father Abraham, when he vouchsafed to ioiner him to himselfe, namely from mere idolatry, in which he was drowned with all his. When he first shineth with the light of his worde to men not deseruinge it, he therein sheweth an example plaine enough of his free goodnesse. Here therefore the vnmeasurable goodnes of God sheweth forth it self, but not vnto saluation to all: because for the reprobate there abideth a more grieuous iudgement, for that they refuse refuse the testimony of the wil of God. And God also, to set foorth his glory, withdraweth from them the effectuall force of his Spirit. Therefore this inward calling is a pledge of saluation, which can not deceiue vs. For which purpose maketh that saying of Iohn, Thereby we know that we are his children, by the Spirit which he hath giuen vs. And least flesh should glory, that it did at the least answere to him when he called & of his owne will offered himselfe, he affirmeth that it hath no eares to heare, no eyes to see, but which he hath made: and that he maketh them, not accordinge to euery mans thankefulnesse, but accordinge to his owne election. Of which thinge you haue a notable example in Luke, where both Iewes and Gentiles in common together heard the preaching of Paule and Barnabas. Whereas they were at that time all taught with one selfe same worde, it is sayd that they beleued which were ordained to euerlastinge life. With what face may we deny that the Callinge is free, in which euen to the very last part election reigneth alone.

3 But here we must beware of two errours : because many make man a worker together with God, that he by his consent may make the election to be of force: so by their opiniõ, the wil of man is aboue the counsell of God. As though the Scripture did teach, that it is only giuen vs that we may beleue, and not rather faith it selfe. Other some, although they do not so weaken the grace of the holy Ghost: yet being led by I wote not what resõ, hang election vpon faith as though it were doutfull, yea & vneffectuall vntill it be confirmed by faith. It is in deede certaine that it is confirmed, as toward vs : and we haue already shewed that the secret counsel of God beginneth to shine out, which was before hidden: so that by this word you vnderstande nothinge else, than that it is approued which was vnknown, and is as it were sealed with a seale. But it is falsely sayd, that election is then and not till then effectuall, when we haue embraced the Gospell, and that thereof it taketh liuely strength. We must in deede from thense fetch the certainty of it: Because if we attẽpt to reach vnto the eternall ordinance of God, that deepe bottomlesse depth wil swallow vs vp. But when God hath opened it vnto vs, we must climbe vp hier, least the effect should drowne the cause. For what greater absurdity or shamefull vniustice is there, than that when the Scripture teacheth that we are enlightened as God hath chosen vs, our eyes shoulde be so daseled with this light, that they shoulde refuse to looke vpon election? Yet in the meane time I deny not, that to the ende we may be certaine of our saluation, we must beginne at the word, and that our assurance ought therewith to be contented, that we may call vpon God by the name of Father. For some quite contrary to right order, that they may be certified of the counsell of God (which is neere vnto vs, in our mouth & in our heart) do couet to flie aboute the cloudes. Therefore that rashnes is to be restrained with sobriety of faith, that it may suffice vs that God in his outwarde worde is a witnessse of his hidden grace: to that the conduit pipe out of which there floweth water largely for vs to drinke, do not hinder but that the springhead may haue his due honor.

4 Therefore as they do wrongfully, which hang the strength of election vpon the faith of the gospel, by which faith we feele that election pertaineth to vs: so we shall kepe the best order, if in seeking the certainty of our election, we sticke fast in these later signes, which are sure witnessings of it. Satan doth with no tentation either more grievously, or more dangerously astonish the faithfull, thā when disquieting them with dout of their election, he doth also moue them with a peruerse desire to seeke it out of the way. I cal it seeking out of the way, when a wretched man enterpriseth to breake into the hidden secretes of the wisdom of God, and to pearce euen to the hiest eternity to vnderstand what is determined of himselfe at the iudgement seate of God. For then he throweth himselfe headlong to be swallowed vp into the depth of the vnmeasurable deuouringe pit: then he wrappeth himselfe with innumerable snares and such as he can not winde out of: then he ouerwhelmeth himselfe with the bottomlesse depth of blinde darkenesse. For so is it rightfull that the foolishnesse of the wit of man be punished with so horrible ruine, when he attēpeth of his owne force to rise vp to the height of the wisdom of God. And so much more deadly is this tentation, as there is none to which we are commonly all more bent. For there is most rarely any man to be founde, whose minde is not sometime striken with this thought. Whence hast thou saluation, but of the election of God? And of Election what reuelation hast thou? which thought, if it haue ones taken place in any man, either perpetually vexeth the miserable man with terrible tormentes, or vtterly dismayeth him. Truly I would haue no surer argument than this experience to proue, howe wrongfully such men imagine of predestination. For the minde can be infected with no errour more pestilent, than that which plucketh downe and thrusteth the conscience from her peace and quietnesse towards God. Therefore if we feare shipwrecke, we must diligently beware of this rocke, which is neuer striken vpon without destruction. And though the disputinge of predestination be esteemed like a dangerous Sea, yct in passinge through it there is found a safe and quiet quiet yea and pleasant saylinge, vnlesse a man do wilfully couet to be in danger. For as they do drowne themselues in the deadly bottomelesse depth, which to be certified of their election do enquire of the secret Counsell of God without his word: so they which do rightly and orderly searche it in such sorte as it is contained in the worde, receiue thereof a singular frute of comfort. Let this therefore be our way to search it, that we beginne at the callinge of God, and ende in the same. Howebeit this withstandeth not, but that the faithfull may thinke that the benefites which they daily receiue at the hande of God, do descend from that secret adoption: as they say in Esay, Thou hast done maruels, thy thoughtes are olde, true, and faithfull: forasmuch as by that adoption as by a token, the Lordes wil is to cōfirme so much as is lawfull to be knowen of his counsell. But least any man shoulde thinke this a weake testimony, let vs cōsider how much both clearenesse and certainerie it bringeth vs. Of which thinge Bernarde speaketh fitly. For after that he had spokē of the reprobate, he saith: The purpose of God standeth, the sentence of peace standeth vpon them that feare him, both couering their euils, and rewardinge their good thinges: so as to them after a maruelous maner not onely good thinges, but also euil do worke together vnto good. Who shal accuse the elect of God? It sufficeth me to all righteousnesse, to haue him alone merciful, to whom alone I haue sinned. Al that he hath decreed not to impute to me, is so as if it neuer had bin. And a litle after: O place of true rest, and to which not vnworthily I may giue the name of a bedchamber, in which God is seene not as troubled with wrath, not as withholden with care, but his will is proued in him good, and well pleasinge, and perfect. This sight doth not make afraid, but calmeth: doth not stirre vp vnquiet curiousnesse, but appeaseth it: doth not weary the senses, but quieteth them. Heie is quiet truely taken. God being appeased, appeaseth all things: and to behold him quiet, is to be quiet.

5 First if we seeke a fatherly kindenesse and fauorable minde of God, we must turne our eies to Christ, in whom alone the soule of the father resteth. If we seeke saluation, life, & the immortality of the heauenly kingdome, we must then also flee to no other: forasmuch as he alone is both the fountayne of life, and authot of saluation, and heire of the kingdome of Heauen. Now whereto serueth election, but that being adopted of the heauenly Father into the degre of children; we may by his fauour obtaine saluation and immortality? Howsoever in seekinge thou tosse it and shake it, yet thou shalt finde that the vtermost marke of it extendeth no further. Therefore whom God hath taken to his childrē, it is not said that he hath chosen them in themselues, but in his Christ: because he could not loue them but in him, nor giue them the honor of the inheritance of his kingdom, vnlesse they had first bin made partakers of him. If we be chosen in him, we shall not finde in our selues the certainty of our election: no, nor yet in God the Father, if we imagine him naked without the Sonne. Christ therefore is the mirrour, in whome we both must, and without deceite may beholde our election. For sith it is he into whose body the Father hath appointed to graffe all them whom from eternity he hath willed to be his, that he may take for his children so many as he reknowledgeth among his members: we haue a witnesse plaine and sure enough, that we are wrytten in the booke of life, if we communicate with Christ. And that sure communion of himselfe he gaue vs, when by the preaching of the Gospell he testified that he was giuen to vs of the father, that he with all his good things should be ours. We are sayd to put on him, and to grow together into him, that we may liue: because he liueth. So oft is this doctrine repeated, The Father spared not his only begotten sonne, that whosoever beleueth in him, may not perishe. But he that beleueth in him, is sayd to haue passed from death into life. In which sense he calleth himselfe the bread of life, which who so eateth, he shall not die for euer. He (I say) hath bin a witnesse to vs, that they shall be receiued of the heavenly Father in place of his children, of whom he hath bin receiued by faith. If we couet any more than to be accounted among the children & heires of God, then we may climbe aboute Christ. If this be our vttermoſt marke: howe much be we mad in seeking without him that which we haue already obtained in him, and which may be founde in him alone? Moreouer sith he is the eternall wisdom, the vnchangeable trueth, and fast settled counsell of the Father: it is not to be feared least that which he declareth to vs in his word, shoulde vary any thinge be it neuer so litle from that will of the father which we seeke: but rather he faithfully openeth it vnto vs, such as it was from the beginnunge, and euer shall be. The practise of this doctrine ought also to be in vre in prayers. For though the faith of election doth encourage vs to call vpon God: yet when we make our prayers, it were vnorderly done to thrust it into the presence of God, or to couenant with this condition. Lord, if I be elected, heare me: forasmuch as he willet vs to be content with his promises, and no where else to seeke whether he will be entreateable to vs or no. This wisdom shall deliuer vs from many snares, if we can skill to apply that to a right vse which hath bin rightly wrytten: but let vs not

vn discretely drawe hither and thither that which ought to haue bin restrained.

6 There is also for stablishing of our affiance an other stay of election, which we haue sayd to be ioyned with our calling. For, whom Christ taketh beinge enlightened with the knowledge of his name into the bosome of his Church, them he is sayd to receiue into his faith & protection. And whom soeuer he receiueth, they are sayd to be committed to him of the father & deliuered to his trust, that they may be kept into eternall life. What meane we? Christ crieth out with a loude voice, that so many as the Father willeth to be saued, he hath deliuered them into his protection. Therefore if we list to know whether God haue care of our safety, let vs seeke whether he hath committed vs to Christ, whom he hath made the onely Sauour of all his. Now if we dout whether we be receiued of Christ into his faith and keping, he preuenteth our douting, when he voluntarily offereth himselfe to be our shepeheard, and pronounceth that we shalbe in the number of his shepe if we heare his voice. Let vs therefore embrace Christ, being liberally set open for vs, and comming to meete vs: he shall number vs in his flocke, and shall kepe vs enclosed within his folde. But there entreth into vs a carefulnesse of our state to come. For as Paule teacheth that they are called, which were before chosen: so Christ sheweth that many are called, but fewe are chosen. Yea and also Paule himselfe in an other place dishorteth vs from carefulnesse: Let him that standeth (sayth he) looke that he fall not. Againe, Art thou grafted into the people of God? Be not proude, but feare: for God is able to cut thee of againe that he may graffe other. Finally we are sufficiently taught by experience it selfe, that calling & faith are of smal value, vnlesse there be adioyned continuance which happeneth not to al men. But Christ hath deliuered vs fro this care: for verily these promises haue respect to the time to come. All that my Father giueth me, shall come to me: and him that shall come to me, I will not cast him out of doers. Againe, This is the will of him that sent me, the Father, that I loose nothinge of all thinges that he hath giuen me, but may raise them vp againe in the last day. Againe, My shepe heare my voice and they followe me: I knowe them, and I giue them eternall life, and they shall not perishe for euer, neither shall any man take the out of my hand. The Father which gaue them to me, is greater then all: and no man can take them out of the hande of my Father. Now when he pronounceth, Euery tree which my Father hath not planted, shalbe plucked vp by the roote: he signifieth on the contrary side, that they can neuer be plucked from saluation, which haue roote in God. Wherewith agreeth that saying of Iohn;

1. Ioh. 2. If they had bin of vs, they had not at all gone out from vs. Hereupon
19. also commeth that noble glorying of Paule against life and death, Rom. 8 present thinges and thinges to come: which gloryinge must needes 38. be grounded vpon the gift of continuãce. Neither is it any dout that he directeth this saying to all the faithfull. In an other place the same Phil. 1. Paule sayth. He that hath begonne in you a good worke, shall ende it
15. euen vntill the day of Christ. As also Dauid, when his faith fainted, Psa. 138 leaned vpon this stay: Thou shalt not forsake the worke of thy hands.
8. And now neither is this doutfull, that Christ when he prayeth for all the faithfull, asketh the same thinge for them which he asketh for Luk. 22 Peter, that their faith may neuer faint. Whereby we gather, that
32. they are out of daunger of fallinge away, because the sonne of God, askinge stedfast continuance for their godlinesse, suffered no deniall.
What woulde Christ haue vs to learne hereby, but that we shoulde trust that we shall perpetually be safe, because we are ones made his?

7 But it daily happeneth, that they which seemed to be Christes, do againe revolt from him & fal. Yea & in the very same place where he affirmeth that none had perished of them which were giuen him Ioh. 16. of the Father, yet he excepteth the sonne of perdition. That is true in 12. deede: but this is also as certaine, that such did neuer cleaue to Christ with that affiance of heart with which I say that the assurednes of our
1. Ioh. 2 election is stablished. They went out from vs (sayth Iohn) but they
19. were not of vs. For if they had bin of vs, they had still taried with vs.
Neither do I deny that they haue like signes of callinge as the elect haue: but I do not graunt that they haue that sure stablishment of election which I bid the faithfull to fetch out of the worde of the Go-spell. Wherefore let not such examples moue vs but that we quietly rest vpon the promise of the Lorde, where he pronounceth, that all Iohn 3. they are giue to him of the Father, which receiue him with true faith, 16. & 6 of whom sith he is their keper and Pastor, none shall perish. Of Iudas 39. we shall speake hereafter. Paule doth not counsell Christians from as-surednesse altogether, but from carelesse and loose assurednesse of the flesh, which draweth with it, pride, presumption, & disdain of other, and quenched humilitie and the reuerence of God, & bringeth for-getfulnes of grace receiued. For he speaketh to the Gentiles, whom he teacheth, that they ought not proudly & vngently to reproch the Iewes for this, that the Iewes beinge disherited, they were set in their stede. Feare also he requireth not wherwith they should be dismayed and stagger, but which framing vs to the hūbler receiuing of the grace

of God, should abate nothing of the affiance thereof, as we haue sayd in an other place. Beside that, he doth not there speake to euery man particularly, but to the sectes theselues generally. For when y^e Church was diuided into two parts, & enuy bred dissension. Paule putteth the Gentiles in minde that their being; supplied into the place of y^e peculiar & holy people, ought to be to them a cause of feare & modesty. And among them there were many puffed vp with glory, whose vain boasting it was profitable to beat down. But we haue in an other place shewed, that our hope is extended to the time to come euen beyond death, and that nothing is more contrary to the nature of it, than to dout what shall become of vs.

8 That saying of Christ, of many beinge called but few chosen, is very ill taken after that maner. There shalbe nothinge doutfull if we hold fast that which ought to be cleare by the things aboue spoken, that there are two sorts of calling. For there is an vniuersall callinge wherby through the outward preaching of the word, God calleth altogether to him, euen them also to whom he setteth it forth vnto the sauer of death, & vnto matter of more grieuous condemnation. The other is a speciall calling which for the most parte he vouchsaueth to giue only to the faithfull, when by the inward enlightning of his spirit he maketh y^e the word preached is settled in their hearts. Yet sometime he maketh them also partakers of it whome he enlighteneth but for a time, & afterward by the deseruing of their vnthankfulnes forsaketh them, & striketh them with greater blindenes. Now when the Lorde saw the Gospell to be published farre and wide, and to be despised of many, but to be had in due price of fewe: he describeth to vs God vnder the person of a king, which preparinge a solemne feast sendeth his messengers rounde about to bidde a great multitude to be his gastes, and yet can get but a fewe, because euery one alleageth lettes for his excuse, so that at length he is compelled vpon their refusal, to call out of the hie wayes euery one that he meeteth. Hitherto euery man seeth that the parable must be vnderstande of the outward callinge. He addeth afterward that God doth like a good maker of a feast, which goeth about the tables, to cheere his gastes. If he finde any not clothed with a wedding garment, he will not suffer him with his vncleanlinesse to dishonour the solemnity of the feast. This parte of the parable, I graunt, is to be vnderstande of them which enter into the Church by the profession of faith, but are not clothed with the sanctification of Christ. Such dishonors and as it were botches of his Church, the Lord will not suffer for euer: but, as their filthinesse deserueth he will cast them out. Therefore fewe are chosen out of a great number of them that are called, but yet not with that callinge by which we say that the faithfull ought to iudge their election. For, that generall callinge is also common to the wicked: but this speciall Callinge bringeth with it the spirite of regeneration, which is the earnest & seale of the inheritāce to come, wherewith our hearts are sealed vp against the day of the Lord. In a summe phe. 1. sith hypocrites boast of godlinesse as well as the true worshippers of

 3. God, Christ pronounceth ȳ at length they shalbe cast out of the place sa. 15. which they wrongfully possesse: as it is sayd in the Psalm, Lord, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle? The innocent in handes, & the man of sa. 22 a pure heart. Again in an other place. This is the generation of them that seeke God, of them that seeke the face of the God of Iacob. And so doth the Spirit exhorte the faithfull to sufferance, that they take it not grievously that the Israelites be mingled with thē in the Church: for at length their visor shalbe plucked from them & they shalbe cast out without shame.

8 The same reson is of ȳ exceptiō euē now alleaged, where Christ sayth that none perished but the sonne of perdition. It is in deede an vnproper speeche, but yet not darke. For he was not accompted amōge the shepe of Christ, for that he was one in deede, but because he kept the place of one. And where in an other place the Lord af-firmeth that he was chosen with the Apostles, that is spoken onely in respect of the ministry. Twelue (sayth he) haue I chosen, and one of them is a Deuil: that is, he had chosen him to the office of an Apostle.
 But when he speaketh of choosing to saluation, he denieth him farre away from the number of the chosen sayinge: I speake not of all: I knowe whome I haue chosen. If a man do in both places confounde the worde of Choosinge he shall miserably entangle himselfe: if he make difference, nothings is more plaine. Therefore Gregory teacheth very ill and pettily when he sayth that we knowe onely our callinge, but are vncertaine of our election: whereby he moueth all men to feare and tremblinge: vsinge also this reason, but because we know what we be to day, but what we shalbe we know not. But in that place he sufficiently declareth, how he stumbl'd at this blocke. For, because he hanged election vpon the merites of workes, he had matter enough and more to discourage the mindes of men: but he could not strengthen them, which did not remoue them from themselues to the affāce of the goodnes of God. Hereof ȳ faithful haue some tast of that which we haue determined at the biginning ȳ predestinatiō if it be rightly thought vpon, bringeth not a shaking of faith, but rather the best strengthening of it. And yet I deny not, that ȳ holy Ghost frameth

his talke to the smale mesure of our sense. As when he saith. In the secret of my people they shall not be, and in the rowle of my seruants they shall not be written. As though God did beginne to write in the booke of life, them whom he reckoneth in the numbre of his: whereas yet we knowe, euen by the witnesse of Christ, that the names of the children of God are from the beginning written in the booke of life. But in these words is only expressed the casting away of them which seemed the chiefe among the elect: as it is said in the Psalme. Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, & let them not be written with the righteous.

9 But the elect are neither immediatly from the wombe, nor all at one time, by calling gathered together into the flocke of Christ, but as it pleaseth God to distribute his grace to them. But ere they be gathered together to that chiefe shepeherd, they are scattered abroad and stray in the common deserte, and differ nothing from other, sauing that they be defended by the singular mercie of God, from falling into the extreme hedlonge downefall of death. Therefore if you loke vpon them selues, you shal see the offspring of Adam, which sauoreth of the common corruption of the whole masse. That they be not carried into extreme and despeired vngodlynesse, this cometh not to passe by any goodnesse naturally planted in them but because the eye of God watcheth, and his hand is stretched out to their saluation. For they that dreame that from their very natiuitie there is plated in their heartes I wote not what seede of election, by the vertue whereof they are alway enclined to godlynes and to the feare of God, they both are not holpen to proue it by the authoritie of Scripture, and also are confuted by experience it selfe. They do in deede bring forth a fewe examples to proue that the elect euen before their enlightning, were not vtterly strangers from religion: that Paule in his being a Pharisee liued vnreprouable, that Cornelius was by almes and prayers accepted of God: and such other. Of Paule, we graunt to them: of Cornelius, we say that they are deceiued. For it appeareth that he was then already enlightned and regenerate, so that he wanted nothing but the clere reueling of the Gospell. But what will they wring out by these fewe examples? that all the elect are alway endued with the spirit of goodlinesse? No more than if a man by shewing the vprightnesse of Aristides, Socrates, Xenocrates, Scipio, Curius, Camillius, and other, should thereof gather that all they that are left in blindnesse of idolatrie, were desirous followers of holines & honestie. Yea and the Scripture in more places than one, openly crieth out against them. For, the state which Paul describeth

Eph. 2. of the Ephesians before their regeneration, sheweth not one grain which ye walked according to the time of this worlde, according to the prince of the aire, which nowe worketh in the obstinate children:

among whom we all also were sometime conuersant in the lustes of our flesh, doing those things that liked our flesh and minde. And we

21. the Lorde: walke as the children of light. But peradventure they will haue these things to be referred to the ignorance of the true God, wherewith they denie not that the elect are holden before that they be called. Albeit this were a shamelesse cauilling, si:h he thereof con-cludeth, that they ought nowe no more either to lie or to steale: yet
1. Cor. what will they aunswer to other places? as is that place to the Corinnor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor weakelings, nor buggerers, nor theues, nor couetous men, shalbe heires of the kingdome of God: he by & by adderth that they were wrapped in the same hainous offenses before that they knewe Christ: but nowe that they are both washed by his bloode and made free by his Spirit. Againe an other place to righteousnesse. For what frute had you of those things, in which ye are nowe worthily ashamed. &c.

11 What maner of seede of election, I pray you, did then budde in the, which being manifoldly defiled in all their life, as it were with desperate wickednes, wallowed in the most abhominable & accursed sinne of all? If he would haue spoken after their opinion, he should haue shewed howe much they were bond to the bountifullnesse of God, by which they had bene preserued from sliding into so great filthinesse. So Peter also should haue exhorted his to thankfulnessse

16. which silly curious men do rashely deuise to themselues without the Scripture. But let that abide certaine with vs, which the Scripture hath,

hath, that all haue strayed like lost shepe, euery one hath swarued into his owne way, that is, perdition. Out of this goulfe of perdition, whom the Lorde hath determined ones to plucke forth, them he differreth til his fit time: onely he preferueth them, that they fall not vnto vn pardonable blasphemy. Esa. 53.

12 As the Lorde by the effectualnesse of his calling towarde the elect, maketh perfect the saluation, where vnto he hadde by eternall counsell appointed them: so he hath his iudgements against the reprobate, whereby he executeth his counsell of them. Whom therefore he hath created vnto the shame of life, and destruction of death, that they should be instrumentes of his wrath, and examples of his seueritie: from them, that they may come to their ende, somtime he taketh away the power to heare his word, and somtime by the preaching of it he more blindeth and amaseth them. Of the first maner, whereas there be innumerable examples, let vs choose out one more cleare and notable than all the rest. There passed away about fower thousande yeares afore Christ, in which he hidde from all the Gentiles the light of his health bringing doctrine. If any man answer that he therefore made them not to enioy so great a benefit bycause he iudged them vnworthy, they which come after shall not be proued any more worthy. Of which thing, biside the experience, Malachie is a substantiall witnes, which reproving infidelitie mingled with grosse blasphemies, yet declareth that there shall come a redeemer. Why therefore is he rather geuen to these than to those? He shall trouble himselfe in vaine, that shall here search for a cause hier than the secret and vnsearchable counsell of God. Neither is it to be feared least any scholet of Porphyrie, should freely gnawe at the righteousnesse of God while we aunswer nothing in defense of it. For when we say that none perish vnderdeseruing, and that it is of the free bountifullnesse of God that some be deliuered, there is largely enough said for the setting forth of his glorie, so that it needeth not our shifting. The soueraigne iudge therefore maketh a way for his predestination, when whome he hath ones reiected, them being deprived of the communicating of his light he leaueth in blindenesse. Of the other maner there are both daily examples, and also many cōteined in the Scripture. One selfe same preaching is cōmonly made to a hundred, twenty receiue it with ready obedience of faith: the rest do either set naught by it, or scorne it, or hisse it out, or abhorre it. If any man aunswer that this diuersitie proceedeth of their malice and peruerfnesse, he shall not yet satisfie vs: bycause the others witt also should be possessed with the same malice, vnlesse God did amende it with Mala 4.

his goodnesse. Therefore we shall still be encombred, vnlesse we call to mind that which Paul saith, Who maketh thee to differ? Whereby he signifieth that some excell other some, not by their owne vertue, but by the onely grace of God.

13 Why therefore doth he in graunting grace to those passe ouer these? Of those Luke sheweth a cause, Bycause they are ordeined to life. Of these, what shall we think, but because they are the vessels of wrath vnto dishonor? Wherefore let it not greue vs to say with Augustine. God (saith he) might turne the will of the euell into good, because he is almighty. He might in deede. Why therefore doth he it not? because he would not. Why he would not, is in himself. For we ought to be no more wise than we ought to be. And that is much better, than to shift with Chrysostome, and say that he draweth him that is willing and reacheth his hand, that the difference may not seeme to stand in the iudgemēt of God, but in the onely will of men. Truely it so standeth not in the propre motion of man, that euen the godly and they that feare God haue neede of a singular instruction of the Spirit. Lidia the purple seller feared God, and yet it behoued that her heart should be opened, that she might harken to the doctrine of Paule, and profit in it. This is not spoken of onē woman alone, but that we should knowe that the profiting of euery man in godlinesse is the secreete worke of the Spirit. This verily can not be brought in question, that the Lord sendeth his word to many, whose blindness he will haue to be more enforced. For, to what purpose doth he bidde so many commaundements to be carried to Pharao? was it because he hoped that with often repeted messages he would be appeased? No, but before he beganne, he foreknewe and foretolde the ende. Go (said he to Moses) and declare to him my will: but I will harden his heart, that he obey not. So when he stirreth vp Ezechiel, he warneth him aforehande that he sendeth him to a rebellious and stubborne people: to the ende that he should not be afrayde if he perceiue himself to singe to def men. So he foretelleth to Ieremie, that his doctrine should become a sier, to destroy and wast the people like stuble. But the prophēcie of Esaie yet more enforceth it. For he is thus sent of the Lorde: Go and say to the children of Israell: With hearing heare ye, and vnderstande not: With seing see ye, and knowe not. Make obstinate the heart of this people, and make heauy their eares, and ouer plaister their eyes: least paraduventure they may see with their eyes, and heare with their eares, and vnderstand with their heart, that being turned they may be healed. Behold he directeth his voice to them, but that they may waxe more desse,

desse, he lighteth a light, but that they may be made more blinde: he sheweth forth doctrine, but that they may be made more dull: he laieth to them a remedy, but not that they may be healed. And Iohn ^{Ioh. 12.} alleging this prophetic, affirmeth that the Iewes could not beleue ^{39.} the doctrine of Christ, because this curse of God lay vpon them. Neither can this also be in controuersie, that whom God will not haue to be enlightened, to them he deliuered his doctrine wrapped vp in darke speeches, that they may nothing profit thereby but to be thrust into greater dulnesse. Christ also testifieth, that he doth therefore expound onely to the Apostles the parables in which he had ^{Mat. 13.} spoken to the multitude, bycause to them it was geuen to knowe the ^{11.} misteries of the kingdome of God, but to the common people not so. What meaneth the Lorde (wilt thou say) in teaching them, of whome he prouideth that he may not be vnderstanded? Consider whense is the fault, and thou wilt cesse to aske. For in the word howe great darknesse soeuer there be, yet there is alway light enough to conuince the conscience of the wicked.

14 Nowe remaineth for vs to see, why the Lord doth that which it is plaine that he doth. If it be aunswered that it is so done because men haue so deserued by their vngodlinesse, wickednes, & vnthankfulness: the same shall in dede be well & truely said: but because there appeareth not yet the reason of this diuersitie, why when some are bowed to obedience, other some continue hardened, in searching it we must needes go to that which Paule hath noted out of Moses, ^{Rom. 9.} namely that God hath raised them vp from the beginning, that he ^{17.} might shewe his name in the whole earth. Whereas therefore the reprobate do not obey the word of God opened vnto them, that shalbe well imputed to the malice and peruerseness of their heart, so that this be therewithall added that they are therefore geuen into this peruersnesse, because by the righteous but yet vnsearcheable iudgemēt of God they are raised vp to set forth his glorie with their damnation. Likewise when it is said of the sonnes of Hely, that they ^{1. Sam.} harkened not to holosome warnings, because the Lorde willed to kill ^{2. 25.} them: it is not denied that the stubbornesse proceded of their owne naughtinesse: but it is therewithall touched why they were leste in stubbornesse, when the Lorde might haue softened their heartes, namly because his vnchāgeable decree hadde ones appointed them to destruction. To the same purpose serueth that saying of Iohn, ^{Ioh. 12.} When he had done so great signes, no man beleued in him: that the ^{38.} word of Esaie might be fulfilled, Lorde, who hath beleued our saying? For though he do not excuse the stifnecked from blame, yet he is cōtent with that reason, that the grace of God is vnsauoric to men, till the holy Ghost bring taft. And Christ alleging the prophecie of John. 6. Esaie, They shall all be taught of God, tendeth to no other ende but

5. to proue that the Iewes are reprobate and strangers frō the Church, because they are vnapt to learne: and he bringeth no other cause thereof, but for that the promise of God doth not pertaine to them.
Cor. 1 Which thing this saying of Paule confirmeth, that Christ which to
3. the Iewes is an offense, and to the gentiles foolishnes, is to the called the strength and wisdome of God. For when he hath tolde what commonly happeneth so oft as the Gospell is preached, namely that some it maketh more obstinate, and of some it is despised, he saith that it is had in price of them onely which are called. He had in deede a little before named them beleuers, but he meant not to take away the due degree from the grace of God which goeth before faith, but rather he added this seconde saying by way of Correction, that they which had embraced the Gospell should geue the praise of their faith to the calling of God. As also a litle after he teacheth that they are chosen of God. When the vngodly heare these things, they crie out that God with inordinate power abuseth his poore creatures for a sporte to his crueltie. But we which knowe that all men are so many wayes endangered to the iudgement seate of God, that being asked of a thousand things they can not satisfie in one, do confesse that the reprobate suffer nothing which agreeth not with the most iust iudgement of God. Whereas we do not clerely atteine the reason thereof, let vs not be discontent to be ignorant of somewhat, where the wisdome of God listeth vp it selfe into so great heighth.

15 But forasmuch as there are a fewe places of scripture wont to be objected, in which God seemeth to denie that it is done by his ordinance that the wicked do perish, but by this that, he crieng out against it, they wilfully bring death vpon themselues: let vs by brefely declaring these places, shewe that they make nothing against the sentence aboue set. There is brought forth a place of Ezechiel, that God will not the death of a sinner; but rather that he may be turned and liue. If they will extende this to all mankind: why doth he not moue many to repentance, whose mindes are more pliable to obedience, than theirs which at his daily allurements waxe harder and harder?
Eze. 34 With the Sodomites (as Christ witnesseth) the preaching of the
1. 3. Gospell and miracles would haue brought forth more frute than in Iurie. Howe commeth it to passe therefore, if God will all to be faued, that he openeth not the gate of repentance to those miserable men that would haue bene more ready to receiue grace? Hereby we see that the place is violently wrested, if the will of God, whereof the Prophet maketh mention, be set against his eternall counsell, whereby he hath seuered the elect from the reprobate. Now if we seke for the true naturall meaning of the Prophet: his purpose is to bring hope of pardon to y^e penitent. And this is the summe, that it is not to be doubted but that God is ready to forgeue so sone as the sinner turneth. Therefore he willeth not his death, in so much as he willeth his repentance. But experience teacheth that he so willeth them to repent whome he generally calleth to him, that yet he toucheth not all their heartes. Yet is it therefore to be said that he dealeth deceitfully, because although the outward voice do but make them vnexcusable which heare & do not obey it, yet it is truely accompted the testimonie of the grace of God, by which testimonie he reconcileth men to himselfe. Therefore let vs holde this for the meaning of the Prophet, that the death of a sinner pleaseth not God: that the godly may haue affiance, that so sone as they shalbe touched with repentance, there is pardon ready for them with God: and the wicked may fele that their fault is doubled, because they aunswer not to so great mercifull kindenesse and gentlenesse of God. The mercie of God therefore wil alway mete repentance, but to whom repentance is geuen, both all the Prophets, and Apostles, and Ezechiell himselfe do plainly teach. Secondly there is alleged a place of Paule, ^{1 Tim.} where he saith that God willeth all men to be saued, which although ^{2. 4.} it haue a diuerse meaning from the other, yet in somthing they agree together. I aunswer, first that by the rest of the texte it is made plain: howe he willeth. For Paule coupleth together, that he willeth them to be saued, and to come to the acknowledging of the truth. If they will haue this to be determined by the eternall counsell of God, that they receiue the doctrine of saluation: what meaneth that saying of Moses; What nation is so noble, that God commeth ^{Deut. 4.} neare to it as he doth to thee? How came it to passe that God ^{7.} restrained from many peoples the light of the Gospell, which other enioyed? Howe came it to passe, that the pure knowledge of godlynesse neuer came to some, and some scarcely tasted so much as any darke principles of it? Hereof it shall nowe be easy to gather, whereto Paule tendeth. He hadde commaunded Timothee to make solemne prayers in the Churche for kings and princes. But when it seemed somewhat an absurditie that prayers shoulde be made to God for a kinde of menne in a manner despeired (because they were not onely strangers from the body of Christ, but also endeouored with all their forces to oppresse his kingdome) he added, that the same is acceptable to God which willeth all men to be saued. Whereby verily he signifieth nothing els but that he hath stopped vp the way vnto saluation to no degree of men: but rather that he hath so powred out his mercie that he willeth no man to be voide of it. The other sentēces do not declare what God hath by his secret iudgemēt determined of all men: but do shewe that there is pardon redy for all sinners which do onely turne themselues to require it. For if they more stiffly stande vpon this that it is said that he will haue mercie vpon all, I will on the contrarie side aunswer them with that which is written in an other place, That our God is in heauen where he doth whatsoever he will. This word therfore must so be expounded that it may agree with the other, I will haue mercie vpon whome I will haue mercy, and I will shewe mercie to whom I will shew mercy. He that chooseth out them whom he will haue mercie on, doth not geue it to all. But sith it clearely appereth that in that place is spoken not of all particular men, but of degrees of men, we wil make no longer disputing about it. Howebeit it is also to be noted, that Paul doth not affirme what God doth alway and euery where and in all men: but leaueth it to him at his libertie at length to make kings and magistrats partakers of the heauenly doctrine, although by reason of their blindnesse they do nowe rage against it. They seeme to presse vs more strongly with obiecting the place of Peter, that God willeth none to perish, but receiue all to repentance. But the vndoing of this knot doth by and by offer it selfe in the second worde, bycause the will to receiue can not be vnderstāded to be any other than that which is euery where taught. Truely the turning is in the hand of God: whether he will turne all or no, let himselfe be asked, when he promiseth that he will geue to a certaine fewe men a fleshly heart; leauing to other some a stony heart. It is true in deede, that vnlesse he were ready to receiue them which call vpon his mercie, this saying should be falsē, Turne to me, and I will turne to you. But I say that none of all mortall men doth come to God but he that is preuented of God. And if repentance were in the will of man, Paule would not say, If paradventure he geue them repentance. Yea vnlesse the same God which with word exhorteth all men to repentance, did with secret mouing of his spirit bring the chosen to it: Ieremie would not say, Turne me, Lorde, and I shalbe turned: for when thou hast turned me, I haue repented.
Mat. 13 that

16 But (thou wilt say) if it be so, there shalbe smal truth in the promises of the Gospell, which when they testifie of the will of God, affirme that he willeth that which is against his inuiolable decree.

Not

Not so. For howe so euer the promises of saluation be vniuersall, yet they nothing disagree with the predestination of the reprobate, so that we direct our mindes to the effect of them. We knowe that then and not till then the promises are effectually to vs, when we receiue them by faith, on the other side when faith is made voide, the promise is therewithall abolished. If this be the nature of them, let vs then see whether these things disagree together: that it is said that God hath from eternitie ordeined whome he will embrace with loue, and vpon whom he will exercise wrath: and that he promiseth saluation to all without difference. Truely I say that they agree very well. For in so promising he meaneth nothing els than that his mercy is set open for all which do couet and craue it: which thing none do but they whom he hath enlightned. And them he enlightneth, whom he hath predestinate to saluation. They (I say) haue the truth of the promises sure and vnshaken, so as it can not be said that there is any disagreement betwene the eternall election of God, and the testimonie of his grace which he offereth to the faithfull. But why nameth he All? verily that the consciences of the godly may the more safely rest, when they vnderstand that there is no difference of sinners, so that faith be present: and that the wicked may not cauilt for their excuse, that they want a sanctuary wherunto they may withdrawe themselues from the bondage of sinne, when with their owne vnthankfulnesse they refuse it being offred them. Therefore when the mercie of God is by the Gospell offred to both sortes, it is faith, that is to say the enlightning of God, which maketh difference betwene the godly and vngodly, so as the one sort feleth the effectualnesse of the Gospell, and the other sort obtaine no frute therof. The enlightning it self also hath the eternall election of God for the rule therof. The cōplaint of Christ, which they allege, Ierusalem, Ierusalem, how oft haue I willed to gather together thy chickens, but thou wouldest not? maketh nothing for them. I graunt that Christ there speket not onely in the person of man, but also reprocheth them that in all ages they haue refused his grace. But we must define y^e will of God which is entreated of. For neither is it vnknown, howe diligently God endeouored to kepe still that people, and with how great stiffenesse they euen from the first to the last being geuen to their wandering desires refused to be gathered together: but it followeth not thereof that the counsell of God was made voide by the malice of men. They aunswer and say that nothing lesse agreeth with the nature of God than to haue a double will in him. Which I graunt to the, so that they fitly expound it. But why do they not consider so many testimonies, where God putting vpon him the affections of man descendeth beneath his owne maiesty? He saith that he hath with stretched out armes called the rebellious people, that he hath early & late trauailed to bring them backe to him. If they wil apply all these things to God, and not consider the figure, there shall arise many superfluous contentions, which this one solution bringeth to agreement, that the proprietie of man is figuratiuely applied to God. Howbeit the solution which we haue brought in an other place largely sufficeth, that although the will of God be, as to our sense manifold: yet he doth not in himselfe diuersly will this and that, but according to his wisdom, which is diuersly manifold (as Paule calleth it) he amaseth our senses, till it shall be geuē vs to know that he maruelously willeth that which now seemeth to be against his will. They also mocke with caullation, that sith God is the father of all, it is vnrighteous that he should disherit any that hath not before with his own fault deserved this punishmēt. As though the liberalitie of God stretcheth not euen to hogges & dogges. But if they speake only of mankind, let thē answer why God bound himself to one people, to be the father thereof: and why also out of the same people he picked a smal numbre as it were a floure. But their owne lust of euell speaking hindereth these railers that they cōsider not that God so bringeth forth his sunne to shine vpon the good and euell, that the inheritance is layed vp for a fewe, to whome it shall one day be said, Come ye blessed of my Father, possesse the kingdome. &c. They object also that God hateth none of these things that he hath made. Which although I graunte them, yet this remaineth safe which I teache, that the reprobate are hatefull to God, and that very rightfully, because they being destitute of his Spirit can bring forth nothing but cause of curse. They say further, that there is no difference of the Iewe and the Gentile, and therefore that the grace of God is without difference set before all menne: namely if they graunt (as Paul determineth) that God calleth as well out of the Iewes as out of the Gentiles, according to his good pleasure, so that he is bound to no man. After this maner also is that wiped away which they object in an other place, that God hath enclosed all things vnder sinne, that he may haue mercy vpon all: namely because he will that the saluation of all them that are saued be ascribed to his mercie, although this benefite be not common to all. Nowe when many things are alleaged on both parts, let this be our conclusion, to tremble with Paule at so great depth, and if wanton tongues shall be busie, that we be not ashamed of this his crieng out, O man, what arte thou that striuest with God? For Augulline truly affirmeth that they do peruersly which measure the righteousnesse of God by the measure of the righteousnesse of man.

The xxv. Chapter.

Of the last Resurrection.

Although Christ the sonne of righteousnesse, hauing overcome death, shining by the Gospel, geueth vs the light of life (as Paule witnesseth) whereby also it is said that by beleuing we haue passed from death into life, being nowe not foreners and strangers, but citizens with the saintes, and of the housholde of God, which hath made vs to sit with the onely begotten sonne himselfe in heauenly places, that nothing may be wanting to perfect felicitie: yet least it should be greuous vnto vs to be exercised vnder this hard warfare, as though we had no frute of the victorie which Christ hath gotten, we must holde fast that which is in an other place taught of the nature of hope. For, because we hope for those things which appeare not, & (as it is said in an other place) faith is a demonstration of things inuisible: so long as we are enclosed in the prison of the flesh, we are wayfaring from the Lorde. For which reason the same Paule saith in an other place that we are deade, and that our life is hidden with Christ in God, and that when he which is our life, shall appeare, then shall we also appeare with him in glorie. This therefore is our condition, that with liuing soberly and iustly and godlily in this worlde, we loke for the blessed hope, and the comming of the glorie of the great God, and of our sauour Iesus Christ. Here we neede a singular patience, that we be not wearied and either tourne backe our course, or forsake our standing. Therefore whatsoever hath bene hetherto set out concerning our saluation, requireth mindes lifted vp to heauen, that we may loue Christ whome we haue not seen, and beleuing in him may reioyse with vnspeakeable and glorious ioyfulness, till we receiue the ende of our faith, as Peter telleth vs. After which maner, Paule saith that the faith and charitie of the godly hath respect to the hope which is layed vp in heaue. When we thus with our eyes fastened vpon Christ do hang of heauen, and nothing withholdeth them in earth, from carrieng vs to the promised blessednesse: then is that truely fulfilled, Our heart is where our treasure is. Hereupon commeth that faith is so rare in the world, because nothing is more hard to our dulnesse then through innumerable steppes to climbe vp aboute them with endeuoring forward to the price of our heauenly calling: To the great heape of miseries wherewith we be almost ouerwhelmed, are added the mockings of vngodly men, wherewith our simplicitie is railed at, when volutarily forsaking the allurements of present good things, we seeme to followe the blessednes hidden from vs, as it were a fleeing shadow. Finally aboue and beneth vs, before vs and behinde vs, violent tentations besege vs, to the susteining of the feare whereof our courages should be farre to weake, vnlesse beinge vncumbred of earthly things they were fast bound to the heauenly life, which in seming is farre from vs. Wherefore onely it hath soundly profited in the Gospell, which is enured to a cōtinuall meditation of the blessed resurrection.

2 Of the soueraigne ende of good things, the philosophers haue in olde time curiously disputed, and also strued among themselues: yet none except Plato, acknowledged the soueraigne good of man to be his conioining with God. But what maner of conioining that was, he could not perceiue so much as with any smale tast, and no maruel, sith he had neuer learned of the holy bonde thereof. To vs the only and perfect felicitie is knowē euen in this earthly wayfaring: but, such as daily more and more enkindleth our heartes with desire of it, till the full enjoyinge may satisfie vs. Therefore I said that none receiue frute of the benefites of Christ, but they that lift vp their mindes to the resurrection. For, Paul setteth vp this marke to the faithfull, toward which he saith that he endeuoreth, and forgetteth all things till he come to it. And so much the more cherfully ought we to trauaill towarde it, least if this world withhold vs, we suffer greuous punishment for our slothfulnesse. Wherefore in an other place he marketh the faithfull with this marke, that their conuersation is in heauen, from whence also they looke for their sauiour. And y^e their courages should not faint in this race, he ioineth all creatures companiōs with them. For, because euery where are seen deformed ruines, he saith that all things in heauen & earth do endeuour to the renewing. For Rom. 8. sith Adam by his fall dissolued the perfect ordre of nature to the creatures, their bondage is painefull and greuous, wherunto they are subiect by reason of the sinne of man, not for that they are endued with any feling, but for that they naturally couet the perfect estate from which they are fallen. Therefore Paul saith that they grone, and are as in peine of childe bearing, that we to whom are geuen the first frutes of the Spirit, may be ashamed to pine away in our corruption, and not at the least to followe the dead elements, which beare paine of an others sinne. And the more to pricke vs forward, he calleth the last coming of Christ our redemption. It is true in deede that all the partes of our redemption are already fulfilled: but because Christ hath hath ones bene offered for sinnes , he shall be seene againe without sinne vnto saluation . With what miseries soeuer we be pressed , let this redemption susteine vs euen vntill the performance of it. Heb. 10.

3 The very weight of the thing it selfe shall whet our endeuor. For neither doth Paul without cause affirme that the whole Gospel is void and deceitfull, vnlesse the dead do rise againe : because our state should be more miserable than the state of all men , namely sith we lieng open to the hatredes and reproches of many, are euery houre in danger, yea & are as shepe appointed to the slaughter : and therefore the authority thereof should fall away not only in one part, but also in the whole summe which both our adoption and the effect of our saluation cōteineth. And so let vs be hedelessly bent to this most earnest thing of all, that no continuance of time may make vs wery. For which purpose I haue differred to this place that which I hadde breesely to entreate of it, that the readers may learne, when they haue receiued Christ the author of their saluation, to rise vp hier, and may knowe that he is clothed with heavenly immortality and glorie, that the whole body may be made like fashioned to the heade: as also the holy Ghost ofentimes setteth forth in his person an example of the resurrection. It is a thing harde to be beleued, that bodies when they haue bene consumed with rottenesse, shall at their appointed time rise vp againe. Therefore where many of the Philosophers haue affirmed soules to be immortall : the resurrection of the flesh hath bene allowed of fewe : wherin although there was no excuse, yet we are thereby put in minde, that it is to harde thing to drawe mans senses to beleue it. That faith may ouercome so great a stoppe, the scripture ministreth two helps: the one is in the likenes of Christ, the other is the almightines of God. Nowe so oft as the resurrection is thought of, let the image of Christ come into our mindes: which in y nature that he tooke of vs, so ranne out the race of mortall life , that nowe hauing obtined immortallitie, he is to vs a pledge of the resurrection to come. For in y miseries wherewith we are beseged, we carie about his mortifying in our flesh , that his life may be openly shewed in vs. 2. Cor. 4. 10. And we may not seuer him from vs, neither can we possibly , but that he must be torne in sunder. Wherupon commeth that argumēt of Paul, If the deade do not rise againe , then neither is Christ risen againe: because verily he taketh y principle for confessed, that Christ was not made subiect to death , nor obtined victorie of death by risinge againe, priuately for him selfe : but, that that was begon in the heade which must needes be fulfilled in all the membres, accordinge to the degree and ordre of euery one. For it were not right that they 1. Cor. 15. 13.

sa. 16. should in all points be made egall with him. It is said in the Psalme.
2. Thou shalt not suffer they meke one to see corruption. Although a portion of this trust pertaineth to vs according to the measure of gift, yet the full effect hath not appeared but in Christ, which being free from all rotting hath receiued againe his body whole. Nowe least the
hil. 3. fellowship of blessed resurrection with Christ should be doutfull to
1. vs, that we may be contented with this pledge, Paule expressly affirmeth that he therefore sitteth in heauen, and shall come at the last day a iudge, that he may make our base and vile body likefashioned to his glorious body. In an other place also he teacheth, that God raised not vp his sonne from death to the entent to shewe a token of his power: but to stretch out the same effectuall force of the Spirit toward vs which are faithfull: whom he therefore calleth life, while he liueth in vs, because he was geuen to this ende that he should make aliue that which is mortall in vs. I knit vp in a breife & bridgemēt those things which might both be more largely handled and are worthy to be more gorgeously set out: and yet I trust that the godly readers shall in fewe words finde matter enough which may suffice to edifie their faith. Christ therefore is risen againe, that he might haue vs com-paniōs of the life to come. He was raised vp of the father, in so much as he was y^e head of the Church, from which he doth in no wise suffer himselfe to be plucked away. He was raised vp by the power of the Spirit, which is common to vs vnto the office of quickening. Finally he was raised vp, that he should be resurrectiō and life. But as we haue said that in this mirrour, there is to be seene of vs a liuely image of the resurrection, so let it be to vs a sure substāce to stay our minde, so that yet we be not lothfull or wery of long tarieng: bycause it is not our part to measure the seasons of times by our will, but patiently to rest, till God at his own fit time repaire his kingdome. To which pur-Cor. 5. pose seemeth that exhortation of Paule. The first frutes is Christ: and then they that are Christes, euery one in his ordre. But y^e no question should be moued of the resurrection of Christ, vpon which the resurrection of vs all is founded, we see by howe many and how diuerse meanes he hath made it approued by witnesse to vs. Fine nosed men wil laugh at y^e history which the Euangelistes rehearse, as at a childish mockerie. For of what importāce shall the message be which fearefull silly women bring, and afterward the disciples confirme being in a maner astonished? Why did not Christ rather set vp the triumphinge ensignes of his victorie in the midst of the temple and the market place? Why came he not forth terrible into the sight of Pilate? Why doth he not also proue himselfe to the priests, and to whole Hierusalē
that

that he is risen vp aloue againe? As for the witnesses which he chose, prophane men will scarcely graunt them to be sufficient. I aunswer that although in these beginnings the weakenesse thereof was contemptible, yet all this was governed by the wonderful prouidence of God: that partly the loue of Christ and zeale of godlinesse, and partly their owne hardnesse of belefe should carry them in hast to the sepulchre which had lately bine dismaied for feare, that they might not only be seing witnesses of y^e thing, but also should heare of y^e Angels that which they sawe with their eyes. How shall we suspect their credit, who thought it to be a fable which they had heard of the womē, till they were brought to the present sight of the thing it selfe? As for all the people and the Ruler himself, after that they had bene largely cōuined, it is no maruell if as well the sight of Christ, as other signes, was not graunted thē. The sepulchre was sealed vp, the watchemen watched it, the third day the body was not found, The soldiours corrupted with mony scattered a rumor y^e his Disciples had stolen him away. As though they had had power to gather a band together, or had armure, or were practised men to enterprise any such feate. If the soldiars had not courage enough to driue them away, why did they not pursue them, that with the helpe of the people they might haue taken some of them? Pilate therefore with his ring truely sealed the resurrection of Christ: and the watchemen which were set at the sepulchre both in their holding their peace and in their lieng, were made publishers of the same resurrection. In the meane time the voice of Angels sounded, He is risen, he is not here. The heauenly glistering plainly shewed that they were not men but Angels. Afterward, if there remained any douting, Christ himselfe tooke it away. The disciples sawe him oster than ones, and also felt his feete and his handes, and their hardnesse of beleuing not a litle profited to the strengthening of our sauth. He disputeth among them of the misteries of the kingdome of God, and at the last in their sightes beholding him, he ascended into heauen. And not onely this sight was shewed to the xi. Apostles, but also he was seen at ones of mo than five hundred brethren. Nowe when he sent the holy Ghost, he shewed a sure prooffe not onely of life, but also of the soueraigne power: as he had said before, It is profitable for you that I go: otherwise the holy Ghost shall not come. But nowe Paule was ouerthrowen by the way not by the strength of a dead man, but he felt him whom he persecuted to haue most hye power, To Stephan he appeared for an other ende, namely that with assurednes of life he might ouercome the feare of death. witnesse is, not onely a parte of distrustfulnesse, but also of frowarde and furious stubbournesse.

4 This which we haue said, that in prouing the resurrection our
hil. 3. senses must be directed to the infinite power of God, Paule brefely 0. teacheth, that he may make (saith he) our vile body likefashioned to the body of his brightnes, according to the working of his power, by which he may subdue all things to himselfe. Wherefore nothing is more vnmete, than here to haue respect what may naturally be done, where an inestimable miracle is set before vs, which with y^e greatnes thereof swalloweth vp our senses. Yet Paul by setting forth an example of nature, reproveth their dulnes which deny the resurrection.
Thou foole (saith he) that which thou sowest is not quickened vnlesse it first dy. &c. He saith that in seede is sene a forme of the resurrectiō, because out of rottennes groweth corne. Neither were it so harde a thing to beleue, if we were as heedfull as we ought to be to the miracles which throughout all the costes of the world do offer themselues to our eyes. But let vs remembre that none is truly perswaded of the resurrection to come, but he which being rauished into admiration, geueth to the power of God his glory. Esaie listed vp with this
fa. 26. affiance, crieth out, Thy deade shall liue, my carcase shall rise againe.
9. Awake ye, & praise, ye dwellers of the dust. In despeired case he listeth vp himselfe to God the author of life, in whose hande are the endes of death, as it is said in the Psalme. Job also being liker to a carrion fa. 68. than to a man, trusting vpō the power of God sticketh not as though ob. 19. he were whole and sounde to lifte vp himselfe to that day saying, I
5. knowe that my redeemer liueth: and in the last day he shall rise vpon the dust (namely to shewe forth his power therein) and I shall againe be compassed with my skinne, and in my flesh I shall see God, I shall see him, and none other. For albeit that some do suttely wreste these places, as though they ought not to bee vnderstande of the resurrection, yet they strengthen that which they couet to ouerthrowe: by-cause the holy menne in their euels seeke comfote from no where els, than from the likenesse of the resurrection. Which better appeareth by the place of Ezechiell. For when the Iewes beleued not the promise of their returne, and obiected that it was no more likely that a way should be made open for them, than that deade menne should
ze. 37. come out of their graue: there was a vision shewed to the Prophet, a fielde full of dry bones: those the Lorde commaunded to take againe flesh and sinewes. Although vnder that figure he raiseth vp the people to hope of returne: yet the matter of hoping he gathereth of the resurrection: as it is to vs an exemplar of the deliuerances which

which the faithfull do feele in this world. So Christ, when he hadde taught that the voyce of the Gospell giueth life: because the Iewes receiued not this, he by and by sayd further: Maruell not at this, because the houre commeth in which all that are in the graues shall heare the voyce of the sonne of God, and shall come forth. Therefore after this example of Paule, let vs already cherefully triumphe in the midst of battels, because he which hath promised life to come, is mighty to keepe that which is left with him: and so let vs glory that a crowne of righteousnesse is layd vp for vs, which the iust iudge shall deliuer vs. So shall it come to passe, that whatsoeuer grieues we suffer, they shall be to vs a shewing of the life to come, because it agreeth with the nature of God to render affliction to the wicked which afflict vs: but to vs which are vniustly afflicted, rest at the appearinge of Christ with the Angels of his power, in a flame of fire. But that is to be holden which he addeth by and by afterwarde, that he shall come that he may be glorified in his saintes, and be made wonderfull in all them that haue beleued, because the Gospell hath bin beleued.

5 But although the mindes of men ought to haue bin continually occupied in this study: yet as though they would of set purpose destroy all remembrance of the resurrection, they haue called death the vtermost bound of all things & the destruction of man. For verily Salomon speaketh of the common and receiued opinion, when he sayth that a liuing dogge is better than a dead Liō. And in an other place: Who knoweth whether the soule of a man go vpward, & the soule of a beast go downward? But in all ages this brutish sensles error hath bin common in the world, yea & hath broken into the Church it self: for, the Sadduces haue presumed to professe openly that there is no resurrection, yea and that soules are mortall. But that this grosse ignorance should not help to excuse any man, the infidels euen by very instinct of nature haue alway had an image of the resurrection before their eies. For to what purpose serued that holy and inuiolable maner of burying, but to be an earnest of new life? Neither may it be answered that this spring of error: because the religiousnesse of buriall was alway in vre amonge the holy Fathers, and God willed the same maner to remaine among the Gentiles, that an image of the resurrection set before them might awake their drowlines. But although that ceremony wanted his vse of profiting, yet it is profitable for vs if we wisely marke the end of it, because it is no slender confutation of vnbeliefe, that altogether professed that which no man beleued. But Satan hath not only astonished the senses of men, so that they haue buried with the bodies the remembrance of the resurrection, but also hath practised to corrupt this part of doctrine with diuerse fained inuentions, that at length it might vtterly die. I passe ouer howe in Paules time Satan began to pinch at it: but in a litle after there followed the Millenaries, which limited y^e reigne of Christ to a thousande yeares. This errour is so childish, that it needeth not or is not worthy of any confutation. Neither doth the Reuelation make on their side, by which it is certaine that they coloured their errour: forasmuch as in the place where he mentioneth the number of a thousand, he entreateth not of the eternal blessednesse of the Church, but only of the diuers troubles which were to come vpon the Church, while it yet trauailed in earth. But the whole Scripture crieth out that there shalbe no end of the blessednesse of the elect, nor of the punishment of the reprobate. Now of all thinges which both are hidden from our sight and do farre passe the capacity of our minde, either we must fetch the credit out of y^e certaine oracles of God, or we must vtterly cast it away. They which assigne to the children of God a thousande yeres to enioy the inheritace of the life to come, do not marke how great a dishonor they do both to Christ and his kingdom. For if they shall not be clothed with immortality: then neither is Christ himself, to whose glory they shalbe newly fashioned, receiued into the immortall glory. If their blessednesse shall haue any end: then the kingdom of Christ, vpon the stedfastnes whereof it standeth, endureth but for a time. Finally either they are most vnskillfull of all mat^rer concerning God, or they go about with crooked maliciousnesse to overthrow the whole grace of God and power of Christ, the fulfillingge wherof is no otherwise perfect, but when sinne being blotted out & death swallowed vp, eternal life is fully restored. But very blinde men may see how fondly they play the fooles, which feare that they shold ascribe to God to great cruelty if the reprobate be condemned to euerlasting paines. The Lord forsooth shall do wronge, if he deny his kingdom to them which haue by their vnthankfulnessse made themselves vnworthy of it. But (say they) their sinnes endure but for a time I graunt: but the maiesty, yea and the righteousnesse of God, which they haue offended by sinning, is eternall. Worthily therefore the remembrance of iniquity dieth not: But so the paine exceedeth the measure of the fault. This is a blasphemy not to be suffred, when the maiesty of God is so litle set by, when the despising thereof is esteemed at no greater value than the destruction of one soule. But let vs leaue these trifles, least contrary to that which we haue before sayd, we may seeme to iudge their dotages worthy of confutation.

6 Beside these, there haue bin two other doring errors brought in by men peruersly curious. The one sorte thought, as though the whole man died, that the soules shall rise againe with the bodies. The other forasmuch as they graunt that the soules be immortall spirites, say that they shalbe clothed with new bodies: whereby they deny the resurrectiō of the flesh. Of the first sort, because I haue touched somewhat in speaking of the creation of man, it shalbe enough for me to warne the readers againe, how beastly an error it is to make of a spirit fashioned after the image of God, a vanishing blast which doth nothing but quicke the body in this fraile life: & to bring the temple of the holy Ghost to nothing: Finally to spoyle that part of vs wherein diuinenesse chiefly shineth and marks of immortality appeare, to spoyle it (I say) of this gift: so that the estate of the body shoulde be better & more excellent than the estate of the soule. The Scripture teacheth farre otherwise, which compareth the body to a cotage, out of which it sayeth that we remoue when we die, because it esteemeth vs by that part which maketh vs differinge from brute beasts. So Peter beinge neere to death, sayth that the time is come, when he must lay away his tent. And Paule speakinge of the faithfull, after that he hath sayd: That when our earthly house shalbe dissolued, there is a buildinge for vs in heauen, adioyneth that we are wayfaringe from the Lord so long as we abide in the body, but do desire the presence of God in the absence of the body. If the soules do not ouerliue the bodies, what is it that hath God present when it is seuered from the body? But the Apostle taketh away all doutinge, when he teacheth that we are ioyned in fellowship to the spirites of the righteous. By which words he sheweth, that we are ioyned in fellowship to the holy fathers, which euen being dead do keepe the same godlinesse with vs, so that we can not be the members of Christ vnlesse we grow together with them. Vnlesse also the soules being vnclouted of the bodies, did keepe still their substance and were able to receiue blessed glory, Christ would not haue sayd to the thiefe: This day thou shalt be with me in paradise. Hauinge so cleare testimonies, let vs not dout after the example of Christ when we are dyinge, to commende our soules to God, or after the example of Stephen to commit them to Christ to keepe, which not vnworthily is called a faithfull shepheard and Bishop of them. To enquire of their meane state, is neither lawfull nor expedient. Many do much comber themselues with disputing what place they keepe, and whether they do now enjoy the heauenly glory or no. But it is folly and rashnesse, to search deepe lier of vnknown things, than God doth giue vs leaue to knowe. When the Scripture hath sayd that Christ is present with them, and receiueth them into paradise that they may enioy comfort, on y^e other side that the soules of the reprobate do suffer such paines as they haue deserued: it goeth no further. What teacher or maister shall now open to vs that which God hath hidden? Of the place, the question is no lesse fonde and vaine: forasmuch as we know that there is not the same dimension of the soule which is of the body. Whereas the blessed gathering together of holy spirits is called the bosome of Abraham, it is enough for vs after this wayfaringe to be receiued of the common father of the faithfull, that he may communicate with vs the frute of his faith. In the meane time sith the Scripture euery where biddeth vs to hang vpon the expectation of Christes comminge, and differreth the crowne of glorie till then: let vs be content with these bondes appointed vs of God: namely, that the soules of the godly ha- uing ended the labor of their warfare do go into a blessed rest, where with happy ioyfulness they looke for the enioyinge of the promised glory: and that so all thinges are holden in suspense till Christ the redeemer appeare. As for the reprobate, it is no dout that they haue the same estate which Iude assigneth to the Deuils, to be holden bounde with cheines, till they be drawen to the punishment whereunto they are condemned.

7 No lesse monstrous is their error, which imagine that soules shall not receiue againe the same bodies wherwith they are now clothed, but shal haue new and other bodies. And the reason of the Manichees was very triflinge, that is, that it is not meete that flesh which is vncleane should rise againe. As though there were no vncleannes of soules, which yet they debarred not from the hope of euerlastinge life. It was therefore all one as if they should say that that which is infected with the filth of sinne can not be cleansed by God. For I nowe passe ouer that dotage, y^e flesh was naturally vncleane, because it was create of the Deuill: Onely I shew that whatsoeuer is nowe in vs vnworthy of heauen, it hindereth not the resurrection. And first wheras Paule biddeth the faithfull to cleanse themselues from all defilinge of the fleshe and of the Spirite, thereupon followeth the iudgement which he in an other place pronouceth, that euery man shal receiue by his body either good or euill. Wherewith agreeth that which he wryteth to the Corinthians, That the life of Iesus Christ may be openly shewed in our mortall flesh. For which reason in an other place he doth no lesse pray that God preferue the bodies whole vnto the day of Christ, than the soules and spirites. And no maruell, because it were a most great absurdity that the bodies which God hath dedicate to be temples to himselfe, shoulde fall away into rottenesse without hope of risinge againe. What say we to this, that they are also the members of Christ? that God commaundeth all the partes of them to be sanctified to himselfe? that he willeth his name to be praised with tongues, pure handes to be lifted vp to him, sacrifices to be offered? What madnesse is it therefore that that part to which the heavenly iudge hath vouchesaued to graunt so great honor, shoulde be brought from a mortal man into dust without any hope of restoring? Likewise when Paule exhorteth vs to suffer the Lord as well in body as in soule, because both belong to God, verily he suffereth not that which he chalengeth to God as holy, to be adiudged to eternall rottenesse. Neither is there a plainer determination of the Scripture for any thing, than for the risinge againe of this flesh which we beare. This corruptible (sayth Paule) must put on vncorruption, and this mortall must put on immortality. If God did make new bodies, where is this changing of quality? If it had bin sayd that we must be renewed, the doubtful spech peradventure mought haue giuen occasion to their cauillation. But nowe when poyntinge with his finger to the bodies wherewith we are clothed, he promiseth to them vncorruption, he plainly enough denieth any new bodies to be made. Yea he coulde not (sayth Tertullian) speake more plainly, vnlesse he had holden his owne skinne in his hande. And they can by no cauillation escape frō this, that where in an other place he sayth that Christ shalbe y^e iudge of the worlde, he allegeth this testimony of Esay, I liue (sayth the Lord) euery knee shal bow to me: for as much as he plainly pronounceth y^e they to whom he speaketh shalbe subiect to yeeld an accompt of their life: which could not agree, if new bodies shoulde be brought before the iudgement seate. Now in the words of Daniell there is no doubtfulnesse: And many of them that slepe in the earth of dust, shall awake, some to eternall life, and some to reproches and to euerlasting contempt: sith he fetcheth not new matter out of the foure elementes to make men, but calleth dead men out of their graues. And this very plaine reson teacheth. For if mortality which tooke beginning at the fall of man, be accidentall: then the repaying, which Christ brought, pertaineth to the same body which beganne to be mortall. And truly, whereas the Athenians laughed when Paule affirmed the resurrection, thereupon we may gather what maner of resurrection he preached: and that same laughinge not finally auaieth to strengthen our faith. The saying of Christ also is worthy to be noted: Feare not them which kill the body, and can not kill the soule: but feare him which can throwe both the soule and the body into hell of fire, For there is no cause to feare, vnlesse the body which we nowe beare be subiect to punishment. And no lesse plaine is an other sayinge of the same Christ, The houre commeth, when all they that are in graues, shal heare the voice of the sonne of God, & shal come forth: they that haue done good, into the resurrection of life: but they that haue done euill, into the resurrection of iudgement. Shall we say that soules rest in the graues, that they lying there may heare Christ? and not rather that at his commaundement the bodies shall returne into the liuelines which they had lost? Moreouer if we shall haue new bodies giue vs, where is the like fashioning of the head and the members? Christ rose againe: was it with forging to himselfe a new body? No, but as he had said before, Destroy this temple, and in three dayes I wil build it vp: he tooke againe the same body which he hadde before borne mortall, For he had not much profited vs, if a new body being put in place, y^e old body had bin destroied which was offred vp for a sacrifice of satisfactory cleansunge. We must also holde fast that fellowship which the Apostle preacheth? That we rise againe, because Christ hath risen againe: for nothing is lesse probable than that our flesh in which we beare about the mortifyinge of Christ, should be deprived of the resurrectiō of Christ. Which verily appeared by a notable example, when at y^e rising againe of Christ, many bodies of the Saintes came out of the graues. For it can not be denied that this was a foreshewing, or rather an earnest of the last resurrection which we hope for: such as was before in Inoch and Elias, whome Tertullian calleth New possessors of the resurrection: because they being in body & soule deliuered from corruption, were receiued into the keeping of God.

8 I am ashamed in so cleare a matter to spende so many wordes: but the readers shall contentedly beare this trouble with me, that no hole may be open for frowarde and bolde wittes to deceiue the simple. The steinge spirites with whom I now dispute, bring forth a fained inuention of their owne braine, that at y^e resurrection there shal be a creation of new bodies. What reason moueth them to thinke so, but because it seemeth to them incredible, that a carion consumed with so long rottennes should returne into his aunciēt state? Therefore only vnbeliefe is the mother of this opinion. But vs on y^e other side the Spirit of God ech where in the Scripture exhorteth to hope for the resurrection of our flesh. For this reason baptisme (as Paul witnesseth) is to vs a seale of the resurrection to come: and likewise the holy Supper allureth vs to the trust thereof, when we receiue with our mouth the Signes of spirituall grace. And truely the whole exhortation tion of Paule, that we giue our members to be weapons vnto the obedience of righteousnesse, shoulde be colde vnlesse that were ioyned which he addeth afterwarde, He that hath raised vp Christ from the deade, shall quicken also your mortall bodies. For, what shoulde it profite to applie our feete, handes, eyes, and tongues vnto the seruice of God, vnlesse they were partakers of the frute and re-warde? Which thinge Paule plainely confirmeth with his owne wordes, sayinge: The body not to fornication, but to the Lord: and the Lord to the body. And he that hath raised vp Christ, shall also raise vp vs by his power. More playne are those wordes which followe: that our bodies are the temples of the holy Ghost & the members of Christ. In the meane time we see howe he ioyneth the resurrection with chastitie and holinesse, as a litle after he sayeth that the price of redemption pertaineth also to the bodies. Now it were not reasonable that the body of Paule, in which he hath borne the printes of Christ, and in which he honorably glorified Christ, should loose the rewarde of the crowne. Whereupon also came that gloryinge, We looke for the redeemer from heauen, which shall make our vile body likefashioned to the body of his brightnes. And if this be true, that we must by many afflictions enter into the kingdom of God, no reason suffreth to debarre the bodies from this entry, which God both exerciseth vnder the standard of the crosse, and honoreth with the praise of victory. Therefore of this matter there arose amōg the Saintes no doutinge, but that they hoped to be companions of Christ, which remoueth into his own person all the afflictions wherwith we are proued, to teache that they bring life. Yea and vnder the law he exercised the holy fathers in this faith with an outward ceremony. For to what purpose serued the vsage of buryinge, as we haue already shewed, but that they should know that there is new life prepared for the bodies that are layd vp? Hereunto also tended the spices & other signes of immortality, wherewith vnder y^e law the darke-nesse of faith was holpen euen as it was by the sacrifices. Neither was that maner bredde by superstition, forasmuch as we see that the Spi-rite doth no lesse diligently rehearse buriales than the chiefe mysteries of fayth. And Christ commendeth that worke as a speciall worke, truly for none other reason but because it listeth vp our eyes from beholding of the graue which corrupteth & destroyeth al, to the sight of the reninge. Moreouer the so diligent obseruinge of the ceremony which is praised in the Fathers, sufficiently proueth that it was to them a rare and pretious help of faith. For neither would Abraham haue so carefully provided for the burying place of his wife, vnlesse there had bin set before his eyes a religion and a profite hyer than the world, namely that garnishinge the deade body of his wife with the signes of the resurrection he might confirme both his owne faith and the faith of his household. But a clearer prooffe of this thing appeareth in the example of Iacob, which to testifie to his posterity that the hope of the promised lande was not euen by death fallen out of his minde, commaunded his bones to be caried thither. I beseech you, if he was to be clothed with a newe body, shoulde he not haue giuen a sonde commaundement concerninge dust that shoulde be brought to nothings? Wherefore if their authority of the Scripture be of any force with vs, there can be required of no doctrine either a more cleare or more certaine prooffe. For this euen children vnderstande by the wordes of Resurrection, and raising vp againe. For neither can we call it the Resurrection of that which is now first created, neither shoulde that saying of Christ stande fast, Whatsoeuer the Father hath giuen me, it shall not perish, but I will raise it vp in the last day. To the same purpose serueth the word of Sleping, which pertaineth only to the bodies. Whereupon also burying places were called Cœmeteria, Sleping places. Nowe it remaineth that I speake somewhat of the maner of the resurrection. I vse this word, because Paule calling it a mistery, exhorteth vs to sobriety, and bridleth the liberty to dispute like Philosophers freely & suttelly of it. First we must hold, as we haue sayd, that we shall rise againe in the same flesh which we beare, as touching the substãce, but the quality shalbe other. As when the same flesh of Christ which had bin offred for sacrifice, was raised vp againe, yet it excelled in other qualities as if it had bin altogether another flesh. Which thing Paule declareth by familiar examples. For as there is all one substance of the fleshe of a man, and of a beast, but not all one quality: as all starres haue like matter, but not like brightnesse: so he teacheth that though we shall kepe still the substãce of our body, yet there shalbe a change, that the state of it may be much more excellent. The body therefore, that we may be raised vp againe, shal not perish nor vanish away: but putting of corruption, it shall put on vncorruption. But forasmuch as God hath all the elementes ready at his becke, no hardinesse shall hinder him, but that he may commaunde both the earth and waters and fier, to render that which seemeth to be consumed by them. Which also Esay testifieth though not without a figure, where he sayth, Beholde, the Lorde shall go forth of his place, that he may visit the iniquity of the earth: & the earth shall discouer her bloode, and shall no more hide her dead. But there is to be noted a difference betwene them that haue bin deade longe longe before, and those whom that day shall finde aliue. For we shall not all slepe (as Paul sayth) but we shall all be changed: that is to say, it shall not be of necessitie that there be a distance of time betwene death and the beginning of the second life: because in a moment of time, and in the twinkling of an eye, the sounde of the trompet shall pearce, to raise vp the deade vncorruptible, & with a sodaine change to fashion againe the liuing into the same glory So in an other place he comforteth the faithfull which must die: because they which shall then remaine aliue shal not go before the dead, but rather they shal first rise againe which haue slept in Christ. If any obiekt that sayinge of the Apostle, that it is appointed to all mortall men ones to die, it is easie to answer it with saying that when the state of nature is changed, it is a kinde of death, and is fitely so called. And therefore these things agree wel together, that all shalbe reued by death when they shall put of their mortall body: and yet that it is not necessary that there be a seueringe of the body and the soule where there shalbe a sodaine changing.

9 But here ariseth a harder question: by what right the resurrection which is the singular benefit of Christ is common also to the wicked and the accursed of God. We knowe that all were in Adam condemned to death: Christ came the resurrection & life. Came he to giue life to all mankinde vniuersally without choyse? But what is more against reason, than that they shoulde by their obstinate blindenesse obtaine that which the godly worshippers of God do obtaine by onely faith? Yet this remaineth certaine, that there shalbe one resurrection of iudgement, and an other resurrection of life, & that Christ shal come to seuer the Lambes fro the Goates. I answer, that this ought not to seeme strange, the likenesse whereof we see in dayly experience. We see that in Adam we were deprived of the inheritance of the whole world, and that we are by no lesse iuste reason debarred from common foode, than from the eating of the tree of life. Whense then commeth it to passe, that God doth not onely make his sunne to rise vpon the good and euill, but also as touching the vses of this present life, his inestimable liberality continually floweth forth to them with large plentuousnesse? Hereby verily we knowe that those thinges which properly belonge to Christ and his members, do also ouerflow to the wicked: not that it is their rightfull possession, but that they may be made y more inexcusable. So the wicked do oftentimes finde God beneficiall, by more than meane proues, yea such as sometime do darken all the blessinges of the Godly, but yet do turne to their greater damnation. If any man obiekt, that the resurrection is not fitly compared to fadinge and earthly benefites: here also I answered that so soone as they were estranged from God the fountaine of life, they deserued the death of the Deuill, whereby they shoulde be vtterly destroyed : Yet by the maruelous counsell of God there was found a meane state that out of life they might liue in death. No more absurdity ought it to seeme, if the resurrection happen to the wicked, which draweth them against their willes to the iudgement seate of Christ, whom now they refuse to heare for their maister and teacher. For it were a small paine to be consumed away with death, if they were not, to suffer punishment for their obstinacy, brought before the iudge, whose vengeance they haue without ende and measure prouoked against themselues. But although we must holde that which we haue sayd, and which that notable confession of Paul before Felix containeth, that he looketh for y^e resurrection of the righteous and wicked: yet the Scripture oftentimes setteth foorth election together with the heauenly glory to the only children of God: Because Christ properly came not to the destruction, but to the saluation of the world. Therefore in the Creede there is made mention of the blessed life only.

10 But forasmuch as the Prophecy of death swallowed vp by victory, shall then and not till then be fulfilled: let vs alway haue in minde the eternall felicity, the ende of the resurrection: of the excellency whereof, if all things were spoken which the tongues of men were able to speake, yet scarcely the smallest parcell thereof shoulde be expressed. For howe soeuer we truely heare that the kingdome of God shalbe stuffed full with brightnesse, ioy, felicity, and glory: yet those things that are spoken of are most farre remoued from our sense, and remaine as it were wrapped in darke speeches, vntill that day come when he himselfe shall giue to vs his glory to be seene face to face. We know (saith Iohn) that we are the children of God, but it hath not yet appeared. But when we shalbe like to him, then we shall see him such as he is. Wherefore the Prophetes, because they could by no wordes expresse the spiritual blessednesse in it selfe, did in a manner grossly portray it out vnder bodily things. But forasmuch as the feruentnesse of desire must with some tast of that swetenesse be kindled in vs, let vs chiefly continue in this thought, y^e if God do as a certaine fountaine which can not be drawn drie, containe in him the fulnesse of all good things, nothings is beyonde him to be coueted of them that tende towarde the soueraigne good and the full perfection of felicity: as we are taught in many places. Abraham, I am thy rewarde exceedinge great. With which sayinge accordeth Dauid, that haue beleued. If the Lord will enterparten his glory, power, and rigeousnes with his elect, yea and will giue himselfe to them to be enioyed, and (which is better) will after a certaine maner grow into one with them: let vs remember that vnder this benefit is contained all kinde of felicity. And when we haue much profited in this meditation, let vs reknowledge that we yet stay beneth at the bottome of the rootes, if the conceiuing of our minde be cōpared with the high-nesse of this mistery. Wherefore in this behalfe we must keepe sobriety, least with how much greater boldnesse we shall flie vp on hie beinge vnmindefull of our owne small measure, so much more the brightnesse of the heauenly glory ouerwhelme vs. We feeie also how the vnmeasurable gredinesse to know more than is lawefull, tickleth vs: from whence both trifling and hurtfull questions do spring from time to time: trifling I call those of which there can no profit be gathered. But this second kind is worse, because they which giue themselues to them, do entangle themselues with pernicious speculatiōs, and therefore I call them hurtefull. That which the Scriptures do teach, ought to be out of all dout with vs: namely that as God diuersly distributinge his gistes to the Saintes in this worlde, doth vnequally enlighten them, so the measure of glorie shall not be equall in heauen where God shal crowne his gifts. For neither doth this belonge indifferently to all which Paule sayth, Ye are my glorie and crowne 1. The in the day of Christ: nor also that sayinge of Christ to the Apostles: 2. 19.

 Ye shall sit iudginge the twelue tribes of Israell. But Paule (which Mat. 1 earth, so he beautifieth them with glorie in heauen) douteth not that there is a peculiar crowne layd vppe for him accordinge to the rate of his labours. And Christ to set forth to the Apostles the dignity of the office which they did beare, telleth them that the frute ther-of is layd vp for them in heauen. So Daniell also sayth, But the wise Dan. 1 shall shine as the brightnesse of the firmament, and they which iu- 3. stifie many, as Starres to the worldes ende and for euer. And if a manne heedefully consider the Scriptures, they do not onely promise eternall life to the faithfull, but also speciall reward to every one.

 Whereupon commeth that sayinge of Paule, The Lorde render to 2. Tim him in that day. Which the promise of Christ confirmeth, Ye shall 14

19 receive a hundred folde in the eternall life. Finally as Christ beginneth in this worlde the glory of his body with manifolde diuersity of gifte, and encreaseth it by degrees: so he shall also make it perfect in heauen.

11 But as all the godly will receiue this with one consent, because it is sufficiently testified by the word of God: so on the other side leauing crabbed questions, which they shall know to be a hinderance to them, they will not passe their appointed boundes. As for my parte, I do not onely priuately forbear superfluous searchinge of vnprofitable thinges, but I also thinke that I ought to beware that I do not with aunsweringe nourishe the lightnesse of other. Menne hungrie of vayne knowledge do aske howe great shall be the distance betwene the Prophetes and the Apostles, and agayne betwene the Apostles and the Martyrs: howe many degrees Virgines differ from married folkes: finally they leaue no corner of heauen vnsearched. Then it commeth in their mindes to enquire to what purpose serueth the repairinge of the worlde, sith the children of God shal neede nothinge of all this so great and incomparable plenty: but shalbe like to the Angels, whose not eatinge is a Signe of the eternall blessednesse. But I aunswere that in the very sight there shal be so great pleasauntnesse, so great sweetenesse in the onely knowledge without any vse, that this felicity shall farre passe all the helps wherewith we be nowe holpen. Lette vs imagine our selues to be sette in the most wealthy coast of the worlde, and where we shall want no pleasure: yet who is there whome his sickenesse do not sometime hinder and not suffer to vse the benefites of God? Who is there whose course his owne intemperance doth not oft breake in sunder? Whereupon foloweth that a cleare enjoyng and pure from all fault, although there be no vse of corruptible life, is the perfection of felicity. Some go further and aske whether drosse and other corruptions in metalles, be not farre from restoringe and are contrary to it. Which though in
n. 8. some respect I graunt them, yet I looke with Paule for the repairinge of these faultes which tooke their beginninge at sinne, towarde which repayringe they grone and are in trauaile. Yet they proceede further, and aske what better estate is prepared for manne; sith the blessinge of issue shall then be at an ende. This knot is also easie to be loosed. Whereas the Scripture so honorably setteth out that kinde of blessinge, that is referred to the encreasces wherewith God continually draweth forward the order of nature her marke: but in the perfection it is knowen that there is an other manner. But sith the vnware are easily taken with allurementes, and then the maze drawith

weth them in deeplier, and at length when euery mannes deuises please himselfe there is no end of striuinge: therefore let this be a shorte way for vs, to be contented with the glasse and darke speech vntill we shall see face to face. For fewe of a great multitude care which way they may go to heauen: but all do before their time couet to know what is done there. All beinge commonly sluggish and slow to enter into battels, do already paint out to themselues imagined triumphes.

12. Now because no description can matche the grieuousnesse of the vengeance of God vpon the reprobate, their tormentes and paines are figured to vs by bodily thinges, namely by darkenes, weeping, gnashing of teeth, vnquencheable fier, and a worme endlessly gnawing the heart. For by such maners of speech it is certaine that the holy Ghost meant to trouble all our senses with horrour: as when it is sayd that there is prepared from eternity a deepe Hell, that the nourishmentes thereof are fire and much woode: that the blast of the Lorde, as a streame of brimstone, doth set it on fier. As by such thinges we must be holpen after a certaine maner to conceiue the miserable state of the wicked, so we ought chiefly to fasten our thought vpon this howe wretched a thinge it is to be estranged from the fellowship of God: and not that onely, but also to feele the maiesty of God so bent against thee, that thou canst not escape but be fast strained of it. For first his displeasure is like a most violent fier, with touchinge whereof all thinges are deuoured and swallowed vp. Then, ali creatures so serue him to execute his iudgement, that they to whom the Lord shall so shew his wrath, shal fele the heauen, earth, sea, and beastes, as it were with cruell indignation emflamed against them and armed to their destruction. Wherefore it is no small thinge that the Apostle pronounceth when he sayth that the vnbeleuinge shall suffer eternall punishment by dyinge from the face of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. And so oft as the Prophetes do cast vs in feare with bodily figures, although they speake nothinge excessiuely for our dulnesse, yet they adde foreshewinges of the iudgement to come, in the sunne and the moone and the whole frame of the world. Wherefore the vnhappy consciences do finde no rest, from being vexed and tossed with a terrible whirlwinde, frō feeling themselves to be torne in peeces by God beinge angrily bent against them, from being pearced and launced with deadly stinges, from trembling at the lighteninge of God, and beinge broosed with the weight of his hand: so that it is much more ease to enter into al bottomles depthes and deuouringe pittes, than to stande one moment in those terrours.

What and how great then is this, to be pressed with euerlasting and neuer ceassing siege of him? Of which thing the 90. Psalme containeth a notable sentence: that although with only sight he scatter a-broade all mortall men and bringe them to nought, yet his worshippers, how much more fearefull they are in the worlde, so much more he enforceth them and pricketh them forward loden with the crosse, vntill he be all in all.

The first Chapter.

Of the true Church vwith vvhich vve ought to kepe vvnity, because it is the mother of all the godly.

Hat by Faith of the Gospel Christ is become oures, & we be made partakers of the saluation brought by him & of eternal blessednes, is already declared in the last booke. But because our rudenesse, and slothfulnesse, yea and vanity of wit, do nede outward helpes whereby Faith in vs may both be engendred, and grow and encrease in proceeding toward the marke wherunto it tendeth: God hath also added them therby to prouide for our weakenes. And that the Preaching of the Gospel might flourish, he hath left this treasure with the Church. He hath appointed Pastors and teachers, by whose mouth he might teach them that be his: he hath furnished them with authority, finally he hath left nothing vndone that might auaille to the holy consent of faith and right order. First of all he hath ordained Sacramentes, which we feele by experience to be more than profitable helpes to nourishe and confirme Faith. For because beinge enclosed in the prison of our flesh, we do not yet attaine to the degre of Angels, God applying himselfe to our cappacity according to his wonderful Providence, hath appointed a meane whereby we being farre distant from him might come vnto him. Wherefore the order of reaching requireth that now we entreate of the Church, & of the gouernement, orders, & power of it, & then of the Sacramentes, and lastly also of ciuile order: and therewithall that we call away the godly readers from those corruptions wherewith Satan in the Papacy hath depraued all things that God hath appointed for our saluation. I will beginne at the Church, into whose bosome God will haue his children to be gathered together, not only that they should by her helpe and ministry be nourished while they are infantes and yonge children, but also be ruled by her motherly care till they grow to riper age, and at length come to the marke of Faith. For it is not lawfull that those things be seuered which God hath conioined, that to whom he is a Father, the Church be also their mother: and that not only vnder the law, but also since the coming of Christ, as Paul witnesseth, which teacheth that we are the children of the new & heavenly Hierusalem.

2 In the Creede, where we professe that we beleue the Church, that is not spoken onely of the visible Church whereof we nowe entreate, but of all the elect of God, in whose nūber they are also comprehended that are departed by death. And therefore this word Beleue is there ser, because oftentimes there can no other difference be noted betwene the children of God & the vngodly, betwene his peculiar flocke and sauage beastes. For whereas many do enterlace this worde in, that is without probable reason. I graunt in deede that it is the more commonly vsed, & also wāteth not the consenting testimony of antiquity, forasmuch as euen the Nicen Crede, as it is reported in the Ecclesiastical history, addeth the preposition in. But therewithall we may marke by the wrytings of the aunciēt Fathers, that it was in olde time receiued without controuersie to say, that they beleued the Church & not in the Church. For Augustine, & that ancient writer whatsoever he was, whose work remaineth vnder y name of Cyprian concerning the exposition of the Crede, do not only so speake theselues, but also do expressly note that it should be an vnproper manner of speakinge if the preposition were adioyned, & they confirme their opinion with no trifling reason. For we therefore testifie that we beleue in God because vpō him as a true speaker our mind reposeth it selfe, & in him our confidence resteth which could not so cōueniently be spoken to say in the Church, no more than it could be sayd, I beleue in the forgiuēnes of sinnes, or in the resurrectiō of the flesh. Therefore although I woulde not striue about wordes, yet I hadde rather follow the propriety of speakinge that shoulde be fittest to expresse the matter, than curiously to seeke for formes of speech whereby the matter may without cause be darkened. But the ende is, that we shoulde knowe that although the Devill attempt all meanes to ouerthrowe the grace of Christ, and though the enemies of God be caried with violent rage to the same entent: yet it can not be extinguished, nor the bloude of Christ be made barren, but that it will bring foorth some frute. And so is both the secret election of God, and his inwarde callinge to be considered: because he alone knoweth who be his, and holdeth them enclosed vnder a seale as Paule tearmeth it: saying that they beare his tokens whereby they may be seuerally knowen from the reprobate. But because a small and contemptible number lieth hid vnder a huge multitude, & a few graines of wheate are couered with a heape of chaffe, to God onely is to be left the knowledge of his Church, the fundation whereof is his secret electiō. But it is not sufficient to conceiue in thought and minde the multitude of the elect, vnlesse we thinke vpon such an vnity of the Church into which we be truly perswaded that we our selues be engrafted. For vnlesse we be vnder our heade. Christ vnited together with all the rest of his members, there abideth for vs no hope of the inheritance to come. It is therefore called Catholike or Vniuersall, because we can not finde two or three Churches but that Christ must be torne in sonder, which can not be done. But all the elect of God are so knit together in Christ, that as they hang vpon one head, so they may growe together as it were into one body, cleauing together with such a compacting of ioyntes as the members of one selfe body: being truly made one, which with one hope, Faith, Charity, with one selfe Spirite of God do liue together, beinge called not only into one inheritance of eternal life, but also into one partakinge of one God and Christ. Wherefore although the sorowfull desolation that on ech side presenteth it selfe in sight, crieth out that there is nothinge left of the Church, yet lette vs know that Christes death is frutefull and that God maruellously as it were in secreete corners preserueth his Church. As it was sayd to Elias, I haue kept to my selfe seuen thousand men that haue not bowed their knee before Baal.

3 Albeit this article of the Creede doth in some respect belonge to the outwarde Church, that euery one of vs should holde himselfe in brotherly consent with all the children of God, shoulde yeelde vnto the Church that authoritie which it deserueth, finally should so behaue himselfe as a shepe of the stocke. And therefore is adioyned the

communion of Saintes. Which parcell, although commonly the olde writers do leaue it out, yet is not to be neglected: because it very well expresseth the qualitie of the Church: as if it had bene sayed that the Saints are gathered together into the fellowship of Christ with this condition, that whatsoeuer benefites God bestoweth vpon them they should continually communicate them one to an other. Whereby yet the diuersitie of graces is not taken away, as we knowe that the giftes of the holy Ghost are diuersly distributed: neither is the order of ciuile gouernement disturbed, by which it is lawfull for euery man priuately to enioy his owne possessions, as it is necessary, that for preseruation of peace among men, they should haue among them selues peculiare and deuided properties of things. But there is a community affirmed, such as Luke describeth, that of the multitude of the belcuers there was one harte and one soule: and Paule, when he exhorteth the Ephesians to be one body, one Spirit, as they be called in one hope. For it is not possible, if they be truely perswaded that God is the common father, and Christ the common head to them all, but that being conioined among themselues with brotherly loue, they should continually communicate those things that they haue. Nowe it much behoueth vs to knowe what profite thereupon returneth vnto vs. For we beleue the Church to this ende, that we may be certainly perswaded that we are the members of it. For by this meane, our saluation resteth vpon sure and sounde stayes, that it, although the whole frame of the world be shaken, can not come to ruine and fall downe. First it standeth with goddes election, neither can it vary or faile but together with his eternall Prouidence. Then, it is after a certaine maner ioined with the stedfastnesse of Christ, which will no more suffer his faithfull to be plucked from him, than his owne members to be rente and torne in peces. Beside that, we are assured that trueth shall alway abide with vs, so long as we are holden in the bosome of the Church. Last of al that we fele that these promises belong to vs, there shalbe saluation in Syon, God shall for euer abide in Hierusalem, that it may not at any time be moued. So much can the partaking of the Church do, that it holdeth vs in the fellowippe of God. Also in the very worde Communion is much comfort: because while it remaineth certaine, that whatsoeuer the Lorde geueth to his and our members, belongeth to vs, our hope is by all their good things confirmed. But in such sorte to embrace the vnitie of the Church, it is not needefull (as we haue already sayed) to see the Church it selfe with our eyes, or fele it with our handes: but rather by this that it consisteth in Faith, we are admonished that we ought no lesse to thinke it to be, when it passeth our vnderstanding, than if it openly appeared. Neither is our faith therefore the worse, because it conceiueth it vnknown: for asmuch as we are not here in cōmaunded to discern the reprobate from the elect (which is the office of God onely, and not oures) but to determine assuredly in our mindes, that all they that by the mercifull kindnesse of God the father through the effectuall working of the Holy Ghost, are come into the partaking of Christ, are seuered into the peculiar right and proper possession of Christ: and that, for asmuch as we be in the number of those, we are partakers of so great a grace.

4 But sith it is now our purpose to entreat of the visible Church; let vs learne euen by this one title of Mother, how much y^e knowledge thereof is profitable, yea necessary for vs: for asmuch as there is no other entry into life, vnlesse she conceiue vs in her wombe, vnlesse she bring vs forth, vnlesse she feede vs with her breastes, finally vnlesse she kepe vs vnder her custody and gouernaunce, vntill such time as being vnclouted of mortall flesh we shall be like vnto Angels. For our weakenesse suffreth vs not to be dismissed from schole, till we haue bene scholars throughout the whole course of our life. Beside that out of her bosome there is no forgeuenesse of sinnes, and no saluation to be hoped for, as witnesseth Esaie & Ioel, with whom agreeth Ezechiel when he declareth that they shall not be in the number of Goddes people whom he putteth away from the heauenly life. As on the contrary side, they are sayd to write their names among the citezens of Hierusalé, that turne them selues to the following of true godlinesse. After which maner it is also sayed in an other Psalm: Remember me, Lorde, in the good will of thy people: visite me in thy saluation that I may see the benefites of thy elect, that I may be merry in the mirth of thy people, that I may reioise with thy enheritaunce. In which wordes the fatherly fauor of God, and the peculiar testimonie of the Spirituall life is restrained to his flocke, so that the departing from the Church is alway damnable.

5 But let vs procede to prosecute that which properly belongeth to this place. Paul writeth that Christ, that he might fulfill all things, gaue some Apostles, some Prophetes, some Euangelistes, and some Pastors & teachers, to the restoring of the holy ones, into the worke of ministerie, vnto the edification of the body of Christ: vntill we all come into the vnitie of Fayeth, and of the acknowledging of the sonne of God, vnto a perfect manne, and to the measure of the full growen age of Christ. We see howe God, which was able to make them that be his perfect in a momente, yet will not haue them grow into manly age but by the bringing vp of the Church. We see the meane expresse, for that vnto the Pastors is enioined the preaching of the heauenly doctrine. We see howe all, not one excepted, are brought into one rule, that they should with milde Spirit and willing to learne, yelde themselues to the teachers appointed for that vse. And by this marke Esaye had longe before set out the kingdome of Christ, where he sayeth: My Spirit which is in thee, and the wordes that I haue put in thy mouth shall neuer departe, neither out of thy mouth, nor out of y^e mouth of thy sede & thy childres childre. Wherevpon followeth that they are worthy to perish with famine & pining hunger, whosoever they be that refuse the Spirituall meate of the soule reached vnto them of God by the handes of the Church. God doth breath faith into vs, but by the instrument of his Gospell, as Paule sayeth that faith is by hearing. As also with God remaineth his power to saue, but (as the same Paule witnesseth) he vttereth and displayeth the same in the preaching of the Gospell. For this reason in olde time he willed that there should be made holy assemblies to the sanctuary, that doctrine vttered by the mouth of the Priest should nourish the consente of faith. And to no other ende those glorious titles haue respect, where the temple is called the rest of God, and the sanctuary his house, where he is sayed to sit betwene the Cherubins, but to bring estimation, loue, reuerence and dignitie to the ministerie of the heauenly doctrine, which otherwise the sight of a mortall and despised man would not a litle diminish. Therefore that we should knowe, that out of earthen vessels is brought fourth vnto vs inestimable treasure, God himself cometh fourth, & in as much as he is author of this degree, so he will haue himself to be acknowledged presente in his institution. Therefore after that he hath forbidden his to giue themselues to iudgement by flying of birdes, to south sayings, magicall artes, necromancy and other superstitions, he immediately addeth that he will geue them that which ought to suffice in steade of all, that is to say, that they shall neuer be destitute of Prophetes. But like as he sent not the olde people to Angels, but raised vp teachers out of the earth, which might truely performe the office of Angels: so at this day also his will is to teach vs by men. And as in the olde time he was not contente with the onely lawe, but added Priests for expositors, at whose lippes the people should enquire for the true meaninge thereof: so at this day he not onely willeth vs to be hede fully bent to reading, but also appointeth maisters ouer vs, by whose trauail we may be holpen: whereof cometh double profit. For on the one parte by a very good triall it proueth our obedience, where we heare his ministers speaking euen as it were himselfe. On the other side it also prouideth for our weaknesse, while after the maner of men he had rather speake vnto vs by interpreters to allure vs vnto him, than with thondring driue vs away from him. And truly howe expedient this familiar maner of teaching is for vs, all the godly do fele by the feare wherewith the maiestie of God doth worthily astonish them. But they that thinke that the authoritie of the doctrine is abaced by the contempt of the men that are called to teach, do bewray their vnthankfulness: because among so many excellent giftes wherewith God hath garnished mankinde: this is a singular prerogatiue, that he vouchsafeth to consecrat the mouths and tonges of men to himselfe, that his owne voice should sound in them. Wherefore on our behalues let vs not be greued obediently to embrace the doctrine of saluation set foorth by his commaundment and by his owne mouth: because although the power of God is not bounde to outwarde meanes, yet he hath bounde vs to an ordinary maner of teaching: which whyle phrentike menæ refuse to kepe, they wrappe themselues in many deadly snares. Either pride, or disdainefulnesse, or enue moueth many to perswade themselues that they can sufficiently profit by their owne priuate reading and study, and so to despise publike assemblies, and to accompte preaching superfluous. But sith they do as much as in the is lose or breake in sonder the holy bonde of vnitie, no man escapeth the due punishment of this diuorce, but he bewitcheth himselfe with pestilent errors and most wicked dotages. Wherefore, that the pure simplicitie of faith may flourish among vs, let vs not be grieued to vse this exercise of godlinesse, which God by his institution hath shewed to be necessarie for vs and so earnestly comendeth. But there was neuer yet found any euen of the most wanton dogges which would say that we ought to stoppe our eares against God: but in all ages the Prophets and godly teachers haue had a hard strife against the wicked, whoes stubbornesse can neuer come vnder this yoke, to be taught by the mouth and ministerie of menne. Which is as much as to blotte out the face of God which shineth vnto vs in doctrine. For, in olde time the faithfull were commaunded to seke the face of God in the Sanctuarie, and the same is so ofte repeted in the lawe, for no other cause but for that the doctrine of the lawe and the exhortations of the Prophets were to them a liuely image of God: as Paule affirmeth that in his preaching shineth the glorie of God in the face of Christ. Howe much the more detestable are the Apostates, which greedely seeke to deuide Churches, as though they did driue shepe from

from their foldes and cast them into the moutnes of wolues. But we must holde that which we haue alleged out of Paul, that the Church is no otherwise bilded but by outwarde preaching, and that the holy ones are holden together with no other bonde but when with learning and profiting with one consente they kepe the order appointed by God to the Church. To this ende principally, as I haue sayed, the faithfull in olde time vnder the lawe were commaunded to resorte to the sanctuary. Because when Moses speaketh of the dwelling place of God, he doth there withall call it the place of name, where God hath set the memorie of his name. Whereby he plainly teacheth that without the doctrine of godlinesse there is no vse thereof. And it is not doutefull but that for the same reason Dauid with great bitterness of Spirit complaineth that he is by the tyrannous crueltie of his enemies kept from entring into the Tabernacle. It semeth commonly to many, a childish lamētation, because it should be but a very small losse, and also no great pleasure should be forgone thereby, to wante the entrie of the temple, so that there were enough of other delitefull things. But he bewaileth that with this one grieffe, anguish, and sorowe, he is fretted & vexed & in a maner wasted. For nothing is of greater estimation with the faithfull, than this helpe whereby God by degrees listeth vp his on hie. For this is also to be noted; that God in the mirror of his doctrine alway so shewed himselfe to the holy Fathers, that the knowledge was spirituall. Wherefore the temple is called not onely his face, but also (to take away all superstition) his foote stole. And this is that happy meting into vnitie of faith; while from the hiest euen to the lowest all do aspire to the head. All the temples that euer the Gentiles vpon any other purpose builded to God, were but a mere prophaning of his worship: whereunto though not with like grossenes, yet somewhat the Iewes fell. Whereof Stephen out of the mouth of Esay reprocheth thē, where he sayeth, that God dwelleth not in temples made with handes. &c. Because onely God doth by his worde sanctifie to himselfe temples to the lawefull vse. And if we rashly attempt any thing without his commaundement, by and-by to an euill beginning do cleaue newe deuises by which y euill is spreade abroad without measure. Yet Xerxes, when by the couंसell of the Magitiās he burned vp or plucked downe all the tēples of Greece, vndiscretely sayed, that the goddes to whom all things ought to be freely open were inclosed within wals & tiles. As though it were not in the power of God, to the entente he might be nere vs, after a certaine maner to descende vnto vs, & yet neither to change place, nor to fasten vs to earthly meanes: but rather by certaine chariotes to carry vs vp to his heavenly glory, which with the inmeasurable greatnesse therof filleth all things, yea & in height surmounteth the heauens.

6 Nowe forasmuch as at this time there hath bene great strife about the effectualnesse of the ministry, while some excessiuely amplify the dignitie thereof: and some other affirme that that which is properly belonging to the Holy Ghost is wrongfully geuen away to mortall man, if we thinke that ministers and teachers do pearce to the mindes & hartes, to amende as well the blindnesse of the mindes as the hardnesse of hartes: it is mete that we geue a right determination of this cōtrouersy. All that they contend on both partes shal easily be accorded by expressly noting the places where God the author of preaching ioining his Spirit with it promiseth fruit thereof: or againe, when seuering himself from outwarde helpes he chalengeth to himselfe alone as well the beginnings of faith as the whole course thereof. It was the office of the secōde Elias (as Malachie witnesseth) to enlighten the mindes, and to turne the hartes of fathers to the children, and vnbeleuers to the wisdome of the righteous. Christ pronounceth that he sendeth the Apostles, that they should bring fruite of their labor. But what that fruite is Peter shortly defineth, saying that we be regenerate with incorruptible seede. And therefore Paule glorieth that he by the Gospell begate the Corinthians, and that they were the seale of his Apostleshippe: yea that he was not a literall minister, such as did onely beate the eares with sounde of voice, but that there was geuen him an effectualnesse of Spirit, that his doctrine should not be vnprofitable. In which meaning also in an other place he sayeth, that his Gospell was not in word onely, but in power. He affirmeth also that the Galathians by hearinge receiued the Spirit of faith. Finally in many places he maketh himselfe not onely a worker together with God, but also assigneth himselfe the office of geuing saluation. Truly he neuer brought fourth all these things to this entent to geue vnto himselfe any thing were it neuer so little seuerally from God: as in an other place he shortly declareth, saying: our labour was not vnprofitable in the Lorde, according to his power mightily working in me. Againe in an other place, he that was mightie in Peter towarde the circumcision, was also mightie in me towarde the Gentiles. But howe he leaueth nothing seuerally to the ministers, appeareth by other places, as: he that planteth is nothing, and he that watereth is nothing, but God that geueth the encrease. Again: I haue laboured more than all: not I, but the grace of God that was with me. And truly we must holde fast those those sayings, where God ascribing to himselfe the enlightening of the minde, and the renewing of the harte, teacheth that it is a robbery of God if man take vpon himself any parte of either of them. In the meane time if any man offer himselfe to the ministers whom God ordeineth, willing to learne, he shall knowe by the frute, that this maner of teaching not in vaine pleased God, and that this yoke of modesty was not in vaine layed vpon the faithfull.

7 But as for the Church visible and which is within the compasse of our knowledge, what iudgement is mete to be geuen thereof, I thinke it already appeare evidently by that which we haue before sayed. For we haue sayed, that the holy Scripture speaketh of the Church after two sortes. Somtime when it nameth the Church, it meaneth that Church which is in deede before God, into which none are receiued but they that are both by grace of adoptiō the children of God; and by sanctification of the Spirit the true members of Christ. And then truely it comprehendeth not onely the holy ones that dwell in earth, but also all the elect that haue bene since the beginning of the world. But oftentimes vnder the name of the Church it signifieth the vniuersall multitude of men scattered abroad in the world, which professe that they worship one God and Christ, by Baptisme entre into his faith, by partaking of the Supper testifie their vnitie in true doctrine and charitie, haue an agreement in the word of the Lorde, and for the preaching thereof do kepe the ministerie ordeined by Christ. In this Church there be mingled many hypocrites which haue nothing of Christ but the name and outwarde shewe: there be many ambitious, couetous, enuious, euill speakers, some of vncleane life: which be suffred for a time, either because they can not by lawfull order of iudgemēt be conuincēd, or because there is not alway in vre that seueritie of discipline that ought to be. Therefore as we must needes beleue that the Church which is inuisible to vs, is to be seen with the eyes of God onely: so are we commaunded to regarde this Church which is called a Church in respect of men, and to kepe the communion of it.

7 Therefore so much as behoued vs to knowe it, the Lord hath set it out by certaine markes and as it were signes vnto vs. This is in deede the singular prerogatiue of God himselfe, to knowe who be his, as we haue already alleaged out of Paule. And truely that the rashnesse of menne should not crepe so farre, it is prouided, by the very successe of thinges daily putting vs in minde, howe farre his secret iudgementes do surmounte our vnderstanding. For euen they that seemed most desperate, and accompted vtterly past hope, are by his goodnesse called backe into the way : & they that seemed to stande fast in comparison of other, doo oftentimes fall. Therefore according to the secret predestination of God (as Augustine sayeth) there be many shepe without, and many wolues within. For he knoweth them, and hath them marked that knowe neither him nor themselues. But of those that openly beare his badge, his onely eyes do see who be both holy without faining, and who will continue euen to the ende, which is the very chiefe point of saluation. Yet on the other side, forasmuch as he forsaue it to be somedeaile expedient, that we should knowe who were to be accompted his children, he hath in this parte applied himselfe to our capacitie. And because the certaintie of faith was not necessarie, he hath put in place thereof a certaine iudgement of charitie: whereby we should acknowledge for membres of the Church those that both with confession of faith, and with example of life, and with partaking of sacraments, do professe the same God and Christ with vs. But as for the knowledge of the body thereof, howe much more that he knewe it to be necessary for our saluation, with so much y more certaine markes he hath set it out.

9 Loe hereupon groweth & ariseth vnto vs, a face of the Church visible to our eyes. For wheresoeuer we see the word of God to be purely preached and hearde, and the sacraments to be ministred according to the institutiō of Christ, there it is in no wise to be doubted that there is some Church of God: forasmuch as his promise canne not deceiue, Wheresoeuer two or three are gathered together in my name, there I am in the middes of them. But that we may evidently vnderstande the summe of this matter, we must procede by these as it were degrees: that is to say, that the vniuersall Church is a multitude gathered together out of all natiōs whatsoeuer they be, which being sōdered and seuerally scattered by distances of places, yet doth agree in one truth of godly doctrine, and is bounde together with the bonde of one selfe religion: And that so vnder this are cōprehended all particular Churches which are in all townes and streetes according to the order of mens necessitie, so that euery one of them may rightfully haue the name and authoritie of a Church: And that all particular men which by professiō of godlinesse are reckened among such Churches, although they be in dede strāgers from the Church, yet do after a certaine maner belong vnto it, till by publike iudgemēt they be banished out of it. Howbeit there is somewhat a diuers maner in iudging of priuate men and of Churches. For it may fall in experience, that such men as we shall thinke not to be altogether worthy of the company of the godly, yet we must vse like brethren, and accompt compt them amonge the faithfull, for the common consent of the Church, wherby they are suffered and borne withall in the body of Christ. We do not by oure testimonie allowe such to be members of the Church: but we leaue them the place that they haue amonge the people of God, till it be by orderly right of lawe take away from them. But of the very multitude we must otherwise thinke: which if it hath and honoreth the ministry of the Word, and the administration of Sacramentes, it deserueth without dout to be esteemed & iudged a Church: because it is certaine that those things are not without fruite. So we do also preferue to the vniuersall Church her vnitie, which diuclishe spirits haue alway trauailed to cut in sunder: neither do we defraude of their authoritie those lawfull assemblies which are disposed according to the fitnessse of places.

10 We haue set for signs to discern the Church by, the preaching of the Word, and the obseruing of the Sacraments. For these can be no where but they must bring forth fruite, and be prospered with the blessing of God. I do not say, that wheresoeuer the word is preached, there by and by springeth vp fruit: but I say that no where it is receiued and hath a stayed seate, but that it bringeth forth the effectualnesse thereof. Where the preaching of the Gospell is reuerently heard; and the Sacraments are not neglected, howesoeuer it be, there for that time appeareth a not deceitfull & not doutfull face of the Church, whereof no man may vnpunished either despise the authoritie, or refuse the admonitions, or resist the counsells, or mocke at the corrections: much lesse to depart from it, and to breake in sunder the vnitie of it. For the Lorde so hiely esteemeth the Communion of his Church, that he compteth him for a waterous runne away and forsaker of Religion, whosoeuer shal stubbornely estrange himselfe from any Christian fellowship, so that it be such a one as hath the true ministerie of the Word and Sacraments. He so commendeth the Churches authority, that when it is violate, he iudgeth his owne diminished. Neither is it of small importaunce, that the Church is called the pillar and strong stay of truth and the house of God. By which wordes Paule signifieth, that to the ende the truth of God should not decay in the world, the Church is a faithful keper thereof: because Gods will was to haue the preaching of his word kept pure, and to shewe himselfe vnto vs a father of houtholde by her ministerie and labour, while she feedeth vs with spirituall nourishments, and procureth all things that make for our saluation. It is also no slender praille, that it is said that she is chosen and seuered by Christ to be his spouse, that should be without wrinkle and spot, the body and fulnes of him. Whereupon followeth, that departing from the Church is a denying of God and of Christ. Therefore so much the more we must beware of so wicked disagreement. For while we go about, so much as in vs lieth, to procure the ruine of Gods truth, we are worthy that he should sende downe his lightening with the whole violent force of his wrath to destroy vs. Neither can there be imaginèd any faulte more hainous, than with wicked breache of faith to defile the mariage that the onely begotten sonne of God hath vouchesaued to contracte with vs.

11 Wherefore let vs diligently kepe these markes. emprinted in our mindes, and let vs esteeme them according to the Lordes will. For there is no thing that Satan more endeoureth than to take away and abolish the one of these, or both: sometime that when these markes are faced and blotted out, he may take away the true and naturall distinction of the Church: sometime that when they are brought in contempt, he may with open falling away plucke vs from the Church. By his craft it is brought about, that in certain ages past, the pure preaching of the word hath vanished away: and nowe he doth with as great importunacy trauaile to ouerthrowe the ministerie, which yet Christ hath so stablished in the Church; that when it is taken away, the edification of the Church perisheth. But nowe, howe dangerous, yea howe deadly a tentation is it when it doth but come in our minde to depart from that congregation, wherein are seene the signes and tokens by which the Lorde thought his Church sufficiently described? We se howe great hede is to be taken on both sides. For, that we shoulde not be deceiued vnder the title of the Church, euery cōgregation that pretēdeth the name of the Church must be examined by that maner of triall, as by a touchstone. If it haue in the word and Sacraments the order appointed by the Lord; it will not deceiue vs: let vs boldly yeld vnto it the honor due to Churches. But contrary wise if it boast it selfe without the word and Sacramēts, we must no lesse with fearefull consciencē beware of such deceites, than on the other side we must flee rashenesse and pride.

12 Where as we say that the pure ministerie of the word and the pure vsage in celebrating the Sacraments, is a sufficient pledge and earnest, so that we may safely embrace as the Church any fellowshippe wherein both these shalbe: this extendeth so farre, that it is neuer to be cast of, so longe as it shall continue in those, although it swarme full of many other faultes. Yea and there may some faultinesse creepe into it, in the administration either of Doctrine, or of the Sacramentes, which ought not to estraunge vs from the Communion of it. For all the articles of true Doctrine be not of one sorte. Some be so necessarie to be knowen, that they ought to be certaine and vndouted to all men, as the propre principles of Religion: of which sort are, That there is one God. That Christ is God, and the sonne of God: that our Salvation consisteth in the mercy of God: and such like. There be other that being in controuersie betwene Churches, yet do not breake the vnitie of faith. For those Churches that disagree about this one point, if without lust of contention, without stubburnesse of affirming, the one thinke that soules when they departe from the bodies do flie vp into heauen, and the other Church dare determine nothing of the place, but yet certainly holdeth that they liue to the Lorde. The wordes of the Apostle are: Let ^{Phil. 3.} all vs that be perfect thinke all one thing: but if ye thinke any thing ^{19.} otherwise, this the Lorde shall also reuele vnto you. Doth he not sufficiently shewe that diuersitie of opinions about these matters, that be not so necessary, ought to be no grounde of disagreement among Christians? It is in deede a principall pointe, that we agree in all things. But for as much as there is no man that is not wrapped with some littell clowde of ignoraunce: either we must leaue no Church at all, or we must pardon a beinge deceiued in such things as may be vnknown without violating the summe of Religion, and without losse of saluation. But I meane not here to defend any errors be they neuer so litle, so as I would thinke that they should be cherished with flattering and winking at them: but I say that we ought not rashly for euery light dissention forsake the Church, in which at least that Doctrine is reteined safe and vncorrupted, wherein standeth the safetie of godlinesse, and the vse of Sacramentes is kept as it was institute by the Lorde. In the meane time if we endeuor to amend that which displeaseth vs, we do therein according to our dutie. And hereunto belongeth that saying of Paule: If any thing better be ^{1. Cor.} reueled to him that sitteth, let the first holde his peace. Whereby ^{14. 30.} it is euidente, that all the membres of the Church are euery one charged with endeuour to publike edification, according to the measure of his grace, so that it be done comely and according to order: that is, that we neither do forsake the communion of the Church, nor abiding in it, do trouble the peace and well ordred discipline thereof.

swation of perfect holinesse as though they were already made certaine ayry spirits, despised the company of all men, in whome they sawe remaining any thing of the nature of man. Such in old time were the Cathary, and they that were as madde as they, the Donatistes. Such at this day are some of the Anabaptistes, which would seeme to haue profited aboute the rest. Some there be that offende more by an vndiscrete zeale of righteousnesse, than by that madde pride. For when they see among them to whom the Gospell is preached, the fruit of life not agreably answering to the doctrine therof, they by and by iudge that there is no Church. It is in deede a most iust displeasure, and such a one whereunto in this most miserable age of the world, we geue to much occasion. Neither may we excuse our accursed slouthfulnesse, which the Lorde will not suffer vnpunished: as euen already he beginneth with greuous scourges to chastise it. Wo therefore to vs, which with so dissolute licentiousnesse of wicked dooinges, make that weake consciences be wounded by reason of vs. But in this againe they offende whom I haue spoken of, because they can not measure their beeing displeas'd. For where the Lorde requireth clemencie, they leauing it, do geue them selues wholly to immeasurable rigorousnesse. For, because they thinke that there is no Church where there is not sounde purenesse and vprightnesse of life, for hatred of sinnes they departe from the lawefull Church, while they thinke that they swarue from a company of wicked men. They alledge that the Church of Christ is holy. But that they may also vnderstande that it is mingled of good and euill men, let them heare this parable out of the mouth of Christ, wherein it is compared to a nette, in which fishes of all kindes are gathered together: & are not chosen out til they be laid abrode vpon y^e shoare. Let them heare that it is like vnto a corne fielde, which being sowed with good graine, is by the enemies fraude scattered with tares, of which it is not cleansed vntill the croppe be brought into the barne floore. Finally let them heare that it is like vnto a floore, wherein the wheat is so gathered together, that it lieth hidden vnder the chaffe, till being clenfed with fanne and syue it be at length laid vp in the grainer. If the Lorde pronounce that the Church shall euen to the day of Iudgement be troubled with this euill, to be burdened with mingling of euill men: they do in vaine seeke for a Church sprinkled with no spotte.

14 But they crie out that it is an intollerable thing, that the pestilence of vices so raungeth abroade. What if the saying of the Apostle do here also answer them? Among the Corinthians not onely

a few had gone out of the way, but the infection hadde in a maner possessed the whole body: There was not onely one kinde of sinne, but many: neither were they light offences, but certaine horrible outrageous doings: it was not only corruption of maners, but also of doctrine. What in this case saith the holy Apostle, that is to say, the instrument of the Holy Ghost, by whoes testimonie the Church standeth and falleth? Doth he require a diuision from them? Doth he banish them out of the kingdome of Christ? Doth he strike them with the extremest thunderbolt of curse? He not onely doth none of all these thinges: but he both acknowledgeth and reporteth it a Church of Christ and fellowship of saintes. If there remaine a Church among the Corinthians, where contentions, sectes, and enuious partakinges do broile: where quarels and brawlinges be in vre, with a gredinesse of hauing where that wicked dooing is openly allowed, which were abhominable among the very Gentiles: where Paules name is vniustly railed at, whom they ought to haue honoured as their father: where some scorne at the resurrection of the dead, with ruine whereof the whole Gospell falleth: where the gracious gifts of God serue to ambition, & not to charitie: where many things are vncomely and vnorderly doone: and if therefore there still remaine a Church, because the ministerie of the word and of the Sacraments is there not refused, who dare take away the name of the Church from them that can not be charged with the tenth part of these fautes? They that with so great precisenesse deale so cruelly against the Churches of this present time: what (I pray you) would they haue done to the Galathiās, which were almost vtter forsakers of the Gospell amōg whom yet the same Apostle founde Churches:

15 They obiect also, howe that Paule greuouesly rebuketh the Corinthians for suffering in their company a man that was a hainous sinner; and then he setteth a generall sentence wherein he pronounceth, that it is vnlawefull euen to eate breade with a manne of reprochefull life. Here they crie out: If it be not lawefull to eate common breade, howe may it be lawefull to eate with them the bread of the Lorde. I confesse in deede that it is a great dishonour, if hogges and dogges haue place among the children of God: it is also a much more dishonour if the holy body of Christ be geuen forth to them.
And truely if they be well ordred Churches, they will not suffer wicked men in their bosome, and will not without choise admitte both worthy and vnworthy together to that holy banquet. But foras-much as the Pastors do not alway so diligently watche, yea and sometime are more tender in bearing with men than they ought to be, or are hindered so that they can not vse that seueritie that they would: it commeth to passe that euen they that are openly euill, are not alway thrust out of the company of the holy ones. This I graunte to be a faulte: neither will I diminishe it, sith Paule doth so sharply rebuke it in the Corinthians. But although the Church be slacke in her duetic, it shall not be therefore immediately in the power of euery priuate man, to take vpon him selfe the iudgement to seuer him. I do in dede not deny that it is the doing of a godly mā to withdrawe himselfe from all priuate company of euill men, to entangle himselfe in no willing familiaritie with them. But it is one thing to flee the compaignie of euill men, and an other thing for hatred of them to forsake the Communion of the Church. But where as they thinke it sacrilege to be partakers of the Lordes bread with them, they are therein much more rigorous than Paule is. For where he exhorteth vs to a holy and pure partaking, he requireth not that one should examine an other, or euery man y^e whole Church, but y^e they shoulde echone proue himselfe. If it were vnlawfull to communicate with an vnworthy man, then truely Paul would bid vs to looke circumspectly whether there weré any in the multitude, by whoes vncleaneesse we might be defiled. Nowe when he requireth onely of euery man the prooffe of themselves, he sheweth that it nothing hurteth vs if any vnworthy do thrust themselves in among vs. And nothing els is ment by this which he sayeth afterwarde, He that eateth vnworthily, eateth and drinketh iudgement to himselfe. He doth not say, to other, but to himself. And rightfully. For it ought not to stande in the choise of euery particular man, who be to be receiued, & who to be rejected. The knowledge hereof belongeth to the whole Church, which knowledge can not be had without lawfull order, as hereafter shall be said more at large. Therefore it should be vnrightuous, that any priuate man should be defiled with the vnworthinesse of an other, whom he neither can nor ought to kepe backe from comming to it.

16 But although by this vndiscrete zeale of righteousnesse this tentation doth sometime also entre into good men: yet this we shall finde that to much precisenesse groweth rather of pride, disdainfulnesse, and false opinion of holynesse, than of true holinesse and true zeale thereof. Therefore they that are bolder than other, and as it were stander d bearers to make any departing from the Church, for the most parte do it vpon no other cause, but in despising of all men to boast themselves to be better than other. Therefore Augustine sayeth well and wisely: When godly order & maner of Ecclesiasticall discipline ought principally to haue regarde vnto the ynitie of Spirit in the bonde of peace: which the Apostle commaunded to be kept by bearing one with an other: and which beinge not kept, the medicine of reuenge is proued to be not only superfluous, but also pernicious, and therefore nowe to be no medicine at all: those euill children, which not for hatred of other mens iniquities, but for affection of their owne contentions, do gredily labour either wholly to drawe or at least to diuide the weake common people entangled with the boasting of their name, swelling with pride, madde with stubburnesse, traiterous with sclaunders, troublesome with seditions, least they should seeme to want the light of truth, do pretende a shadowe of rigorous seueritie: and those things that are in the holy Scriptures commaunded to be done with a gentler kinde of healing, sauing the sinceritie of loue, and keping the vnitie of peace, to correct the faultes of brethren, they abuse it to sacrilege of schisme, and to occasion of cutting off. But to godly and quiet men he geueth this counsell, that they mercifully correct that which they can, and that which they can not, patiently beare, and grone and mourne with loue, vntill God either amende and correct them, or at the haruest roote vp the tares, and fanne out the chaffe. Let the godly trauaile to fortifie themselves with the se armures, least while they seeme to themselves strong and couragious reuengers of righteousness, they departe from the kingdome of heauen, which is the onely kingdome of righteousness. For sith it is Gods will to haue the communion of his Church to be kept in this outward felowship: he that for hatred of euil men doth break the token of that felowship, entreteth into a way whereby is a slippery falling from the communiõ of saints. Let them thinke that in a great multitude there be many truely holy and innocent before the eyes of the Lord, whom they see not. Let them thinke that euen of them that be diseased there be many that do not please or flatter themselves in their faultes, but beinge nowe and then awakened with earnest feare of God do aspire to a greater vprightnesse. Let them thinke that iudgement ought not to be geuen of a man by one deede: forasmuch as the holiest do sometime fall away with a most greuous fall. Let them thinke that to gather a Church there lieth more weight both in the ministerie of the word and in the partakinge of the holy mysteries, than that all y force should vanishe away by the fault of some wicked men. Last of all let them consider, that in iudging the Church, the iudgement of God is of greater value than the iudgement of man.

17 Where also they preted that the Church is not without cause called Holy, it is mete to wey with what holinesse it excelleth: least if we will admitte no Church but such a one as is in all pointes perfect,

Cap. i. Of the outwarde meanes

he. 5. we leaue no Church at all: It is true in deede which Paule saith, that Christ gaue himselfe for the Church to sanctifie it: that he clesed it with the lauer of water with the word of life, to make her vnto himselfe a glorious spouse hauing no spotte or wrinkle &c. Yet this is also nothing lesse true, that the Lorde daily worketh in smothering her wrinkles and wiping away her spottes. Whereupon followeth that her holinesse is not yet fully finished. Therefore the Church is so holy, that it daily profiteth and is not yet perfect. dayely procedeth, & is not yet come to the marke of holinesse: as also in an other place el. 7. a. 35. shalbe more largely declared, whereas therefore the Prophets prophetic that there shalbe a holy Hierusalem, through which straungers shall not passe: and a holy temple wherinto vnclane men shall not entre: let vs not so take it, as if there were no spotte in the membres of the Church: but for that with their whole endeouour they aspire to holinesse and sound purenesse, by the goodnesse of God cleannesse is ascribed to them, which they haue not yet fully obtained. And although oftentimes there be but rare tokens of such sanctification amonge men: yet we must determine y there hath bene no time since the creation of the world wherin the Lord hath not had his Church, and that there shall also be no time to the very ende of the world, wherin he shall not haue it. For albeit immediatly fro the beginning the whole kinde of men is corrupt and defiled by the sinne of Adam: yet out of this, as it were a polluted masse, God alway sanctifieth some vessels vnto honour, that there should be no age without feling of his mercie. Which he hath testified by certaine promises: as these: a. 39. I haue ordeined a testament to my elect: I haue sworne to Dauid my seruant, I will for euer continue thy seede: I will builde thy seate in a. 132. generation and generation. Againe, the Lorde hath chosen Syon, he hath chosen it for a dwelling to himselfe: This is my rest for euer. &c. er 31. Againe, These things saith the Lord which geueth the Sunne for the light of y day, the mone & starres for the light of the might. If these lawes shall faile before me, then the seede of Israell shall also faile.

18 Hereof Christ himselfe, the Apostles, and in maner all the Prophets haue geuen vs example. Horrible are those descriptions wherin Esaie, Hieremie, Ioel, Abacuc, and the other do lament the sicknesses of the Church of Hierusalem. In the common people, in the magistrat, in the Priests all things were so corrupt, that Esaie doubteth not to match Hierusalem with Sodom and Gomorrha. Religion was partely despised, partely defiled: in their maners are commonly reported thestes, extortions, breaches of faith, murders and like mischieues. Yet therefore the Prophets did neither erect to themselues newe Churches, nor build vp newe altars on which they might haue feuerall sacrifices: but of whatsoeuer maner men they were, yet because they considered, that God had left his word with them, and ordained Ceremonies wherby he was there worshipped, in the midst of the assembly of the wicked they helde vp pure handes vnto him. Truely if they had thought that they did gather any infection thereby, they woulde rather haue died a hundred times than haue suffred themselues to be drawn thereunto. Therefore nothing withheld them frō departing, but desire to the keping of vnty. But if the Prophets thought it against conscience, to estrange themselues from the Church, for many & great wicked doings, not of one or two men, but in maner of the whole people: then we take too much vpon vs, if we dare by and by depart frō the communiō of the Church, where not all mens maners do satisfie either our iudgemēt, yea or the Christian profession.

19 Now what maner worlde was there in the time of Christ and the Apostles? And yet that desperate vngodlinesse of the Pharisees, and the dissolute licentiousnesse of liuinge, which then eche where reigned, could not hinder, but that they vsed the same Ceremonies with the people, and assembled with the rest into one temple to the publike exercises of religion. Whereof came that, but because they knew that the felowship of euil men did not defile them, which with a pure conscience did communicate at the same Ceremonies. If any man be litle moued with the Prophets and Apostles, let him yet obey the authority of Christ. Therefore Cyprian well sayth, though there be scene tares or vncleane vessels in the Church, yet there is no cause why we should depart from the Church: we must only labour that we may be wheate: we must vse diligence and endeuour as much as we may y we may be a golden or siluer vessel. But to breake the earthen vessels, is the only worke of the Lord, to whom also is giuen an iron rodde. And let no man challenge to himselfe that which is properly belonging to the Sonne onely, to be able alone to fanne the floore, and clense the chaffe, and seuer all the tares by mans iudgement. This is a proude obstinacy, and a presumption ful of sacrilege, which a peruerse furour taketh to it selfe. &c. Therefore let both these thinges remaine certainly fixed. First that he hath no excuse, that of his owne will forsaketh the outwarde communion of the Church. Where the word of God is preached and the sacramentes ministred: then that the faultes of a fewe or of many are no hindrance, but that we may therein rightly professe our faith by the Ceremonies institute by God: because a godly conscience is not hurt by the vnworthines

of any other either pastor or priuate man, and the misteries are to a holy & vpright man neuerthelesse pure & holosome because they are together handled of vncleane men.

20 Their precisenesse and disdainfulnes proceedeth yet further: because they acknowledge no Church but such a one as is pure from all spottes be they neuer so small: yea they are angry with good teachers, for that in exhortinge the faithfull to go forward, they teache them all their life long to grone vnder the burden of vices, & to flee vnto pardō. For they prate y by this meane men be led frō perfectiō. I graunt in deede, that in earnest callinge vpon perfection we ought not slowly or coldly to trauaill, much lesse to be idle: but to fill our mindes with confidence thereof while we be yet in our course, I say, it is a deuclishe inuention. Therefore in the Creede the forgiuenesse of sinnes is aptly ioyned next after the Church. For none do attaine it, but only they that are citizens and of the household of the Church, as it is read in the Prophet. Therefore the buildinge of the heavenly Hierusalem ought to go before, wherein afterward this mercifulnesse of God may haue place, that whosoever come vnto it, their iniquity may be taken away. I say that it ought first to be builded, not for that there can be any Church without the forgiuenes of sinnes, but because the Lord hath not promised his mercy but in the Communiō of Saintes. Therefore the first entry for vs into the Church and kingdome of God, is the forgiuenesse of sinnes, without which we haue no couenant or conioyning with God. For thus he sayth by the Prophet: In that day I will strike you a couenant with the beast of the helde, with the fowle of the aire, and with the vermine of the earth. I will breake the sworde and warre from out of the earth, and I will make men to sleepe without feare. I will espouse you vnto me for euer. I will espouse you (I say) in righteousnesse, in iudgement, in mercy, and in compassions. We see how by his mercy the Lord reconcilcth vs to himselfe. And so in an other place, when he foresayth that the people shalbe gathered together againe, whom he had scattered abroad in his wrath, he sayth, I will clense them from all wickednesse wherewith they haue sinned against me. Wherefore by the signe of washinge we enter into the feloshippe of the Church, wherby we may be taught, that there is no entry open for vs into y household of God, vnlesse our filthines be first wiped away with his goodnesse.

21 But by the forgiuenesse of sinnes the Lord doth not onely receiue & adopt vs once into the Church, but by the same he also preserueth and maintaineth vs still in it. For to what purpose were it, to haue haue such a pardon graunted vs, as should serue for no vse? But eue-ry one of the godly is a witnesse to himselfe that the mercy of God should be vaine and mocking, if it should be graunted only but once: because there is none y^e is not in his owne consciēce priue throughout his whole life of many weakneses, which neede y^e mercy of God.

And truely not in vaine God promiseth this grace peculiarly. to thē of his owne hougholde: and not in vaine he commaundeth the same mellage of reconciliation to be daily offred vnto them. Therefore as throughout all our life we cary about vs the remnantes of sinne, vnlesse we be sustained with the continuall grace of the Lorde in forgiuing our sinnes, we shall scarcely abide one moment in the Church: But the Lord hath called his vnto eternall saluation. Therefore they ought to thinke that there is pardon alway ready for their sinnes.
Wherfore we ought to holde assuredly, that by the liberality of God by meane of Christes deseruing through the Sanctificatiō of the Spirit, sinnes, haue bin and are daily pardoned to vs which be called and grafted into the body of the Church.

22 To deale this benefit vnto vs, the keies were giue to the Church For when Christ gaue the Apostles commaundement, and deliuered thē power to forgiue sinnes, he meant not this onely, that they should loose thē from sinnes that were frō vngodlines cōuerted to the faith of Christ: but rather that they should continually execute this office among the faithfull. Which thing Paul teacheth, whē he writeth that the embassage of reconciliation was left with the ministers of the Church, whereby they shoulde oftentimes in Christes name exhorte the people to reconcile themselues to God. Therefore in the Communion of Saintes, by the ministry of the Church it selfe, sinnes are continually forgiuen vs, when the Priestes or Bishops, to whom that office is committed, do with the promises of the Gospell confirme godly consciences in hope of pardon and forgiuenes: and that as well publikely as priuately, accordinge as necessity requireth. For there be very many, which for their weakenes do neede a singular atonement.
And Paul reporteth that not only in common preaching, but also in houses he had testified the Faith in Christ, and severally admonished eue-ry one of the doctrine of saluation. Therefore we haue here thre things to be noted: First, that with how great holines soeuer the children of God do excell, yet they be alway in this estate, so long as they dwell in a mortall body, that without forgiueness of sinnes they can not stande before God. Secondly, that this benefit is so proper to the Church, that we canne not otherwise enioy it; but if we abide in the Communion thereof. Thirdly, that it is distributed vnto vs by the ministers and Pastors, either by preachinge of the Gospell, or by ministering of the Sacraments: & that in this behalfe principally appeareth the power of the keyes, which the Lord hath giuen to the felowship of the faithful. Wherefore let euery one of vs think this to be his duty, no where else to seeke forgiuenes of sinnes, than where the Lord hath set it. Of publike reconciliation which belongeth to discipline we shall speake in place fit for it.

23 But forasmuch as those phrentike Spirites that I haue spoken of, do go about to plucke away from the Church this only anchore of saluation, consciences are the more strongly to be confirmed against a so pestilent opinion. The Nouatiās in old time troubled the Church with this doctrine: but not much vnlike to the Nouatiās our age also hath many of the Anabaptistes which fall to the same dotages. For they faine that the people of God are in Baptisme regenerate into a pure and Angelike life, that is corrupted with no filthines of the flesh. But if any man offend after Baptisme, they leaue vnto him nothing but y vnappealable iudgemēt of God. Briefly they graunt no hope of pardon to a sinner fallē after grace receiued: because they acknowledge no other forgiuenes of sinnes but that whereby we be first regenerate. But although there be no lie more clearely confuted by the Scripture: yet because these men finde some whom they may deceiue (as also in old time Nouatus had many folowers) let vs shortly shew how mad they be to their owne and others destruction. First; whereas by the commaundement of the Lord, the holy ones do daily repeat this praier: forgiue vs our dettes: truely they do confesse them selues detters. Neither do they craue it in vaine because the Lorde hath alway appointed no other thinge to be asked, than that which he himselve would giue. Yea whereas he hath testified that the whole praier shalbe heard of his father, yet he hath also sealed this absolution with a peculiar promise. What wil we more? The Lord requireth of the holy ones all their life long a confession of sinnes, yea and that continuall, & promiseth pardon. What boldnes is it, either to exempt them from sinne, or if they haue stumbled, vtterly to exclude them from grace? Now whom doth he will vs to forgiue seuentie times seuen times? not to our brethren? To what end did he commaund it, but that we shoulde folow his clemency. He forgiueth therefore, not once or twise: but as often as being striken downe with the acknowledging of sinnes they sigh vnto him.

24 But that (we may begin in a maier at the very swadling cloutes of the Church) the Patriarches were circumcised, being allured into partakinge of the couenant hauinge vndoubtedly by their fathers diligence bin taught righteousnesse and innocence, when they conspired to murder their brother: this was a mischieuous act, to be abhorred euen of the most desperate theeues. At the last being meekened with the monitions of Iudas, they solde him: this was also an intolerable haynousnesse. Simeon and Leui, with wicked reuenge, and such as was also condemned by their owne fathers iudgement, vsed cruelty against the Sichemites. Ruben with most vncleane lust defiled his fathers bed. Iudas when he would giue himselfe to fornication against the law of nature, went into his sonnes wife. And yet so farre are they from being wiped out of the chosen people, that they be rather raised vp to be heades of it. But what did Dauid? when he was a gouernour of iustice, with how great wickednesse did he by sheding of innocent bloude open the way to his blinde lust? He was already regenerate, and among the regenerate garnished with notable praises of the Lord: neuertheless he committed that haynous offence, which is horrible euen amoge the Gentiles: and yet he obtained pardon. And (that we may not tary vpon single examples) how many promises there are in the law and the Prophetes of Gods mercy towarde the Israelites, so oft it is proued that the Lord sheweth himselfe appeaseable to the offenses of his people. For what doth Moses promise to come to passe, when the people beinge fallen into Apostasie shall returne vnto the Lord? He shall bringe thee backe out of captiuity, and shall haue mercy on thee, & shall gather thee together out of the peoples to whom thou hast bin dispersed. If thou be scattered euen to the borders of the heauen, I will from thense agayne gather thee together.

25 But I will not beginne a recital that shoulde neuer be ended. For the Prophetes are full of such promises, which do yet offer mercy to the people couered with infinite wicked doinges. What offense is there more hainous thã rebellion? for it is called a diuorce betwene God and the Church. But this is ouercome by the goodnesse of God. What man is there (sayth he by Ieremy) that if his wife giue foorth her body in common to adulterers, can abide to returne into fauour with her? but with thy fornications all the wayes are polluted, O Iuda, the earth hath bin filled with thy filthy loues. But returne vnto me, and I will receiue thee. Returne thou turne away, I will not turne away my face from thee: because I am holy, and am not angry for euer. And truly he can be no otherwise minded, which affirmeth y he wil leth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be conuerted & liue. Therefore when Salomon did dedicate the temple, he appointed it also to this vse, that the praiers made for obtaininge pardon of sinnes shoulde be heard from thense. If (sayd he) thy sonnes shall sinne (for there is no man that sinneth not) and thou beinge angry shalt deliuer them to their enemies, & they shall repent in their hart, and beinge turned shall entreate thee in their captiuitie, sayinge, we haue sinned, we haue done wickedly, and shall pray towarde the hande which thou hast giuen to their fathers, and towarde this holy temple: thou shalt heare their prayers in heauen, and shalt be made mercifull to thy people that hath sinned against thee, and to all their wickednesses wherewith they haue offended thee. And not vainely the Lorde ordained in the lawe daily Sacrifices for sinnes. For if the Lord had not foreseene that his people should be troubled with continuall diseases of sinnes, he woulde neuer haue appointed these remedies for them.

26 Was this benefite taken away from the faithfull, by the coming of Christ, wherein the fulnes of grace was shewed forth, so that they dare not now pray for pardon of sinnes? that if they offende the Lord they may not obtaine any mercy? What shall this be else, but to say that Christ came to the destruction of them that be his, & not to their saluation, if that mercifullnesse of God in pardoninge sinnes which in the old testament was continually ready for the holy ones; be now sayd to be vtterly taken away? But if we beleue the Scriptures which expressly crie out, that in Christ only the grace & kindenes of the Lord fully appeared, that the plentifulnesse of mercy was poured out, that the reconciliation of God and men was fulfilled: let vs not doubt that there floweth vnto vs a more bountifull mercifulnes of the heavenly father, than that it is cut of or shortned. And hereof there want not examples. Peter which had heard that he should be denied before the Angels of God that confessed not the name of Christ before men, denied him thrise in one night, and that not without execration: yet he was not put away from pardon. They that liued inordinatly amonge the Theffalonians are so chastised, that yet they be gently called to repentance. Euen Symon the Magician himselfe is not cast in desperation, but he is rather commaunded to hope well, when Peter counselleth him to flee to prayers.

27 Yea most haynous sinnes haue sometime possessed whole Churches, out of which Paule rather gently vnwrapped them, than pronounced them accursed. The falling away of the Galathians was no meane offense. The Corinthians were so much lesse excusable than they, as they abounded in mo & those nothing lighter sinnes: yet neither of the are excluded from the mercy of God. Yea euen they that had sinned aboute the rest in vncleanes, fornication & vchastity, are namely

namely called to repentance. For the covenant of the Lorde remaineth & shall remaine for euer inuiolable, which he solemnly made with Christ the true Salomon & his members, in these wordes: It his sonnes shall forsake my law, & shall not walke in my iudgements, if Psa. 89. they shal defile my righteousnes, & not kepe my cōmaundements, ^{32.} I will visite their iniquities with a rod, & their sinnes with stripes: But my mercy I will not take away from him. Finally by the very order of the Creede we be taught, that there remaineth in the Church of Christ continuall pardon of sinnes: for that when the Church is as it were stablished, yet forgiuennesse of sinnes is adioyned.

28 Some that be somewhat wiser, when they see the doctrine of Nouatus to be confuted with so great plainnesse of Scripture, make not euery sinne unpardonable, but wilful transgressing of the law, into which a man wittingly & willingly falleth. Now they that say so, do vouchsaue to graunt pardō to no sinne, but where a man hath erred by ignorance. But whereas the Lord in the law cōmaundeth one sorte of Sacrifices to be offred for cleansing of the wilful sinnes of the faithfull, and other to redeme their ignorances: how great lewdnes shall it be to graunt no cleansing to wilful sinne? I say that there is nothing plainer, than that the onely Sacrifice of Christ auaieth to forgiue the wilful sinnes of the holy ones: forasmuch as the Lorde hath testified the same by carnall Sacrifices as by signes. Againe who can excuse Dauid by ignorance, whome it is euident to haue bin so well instructed in the law? Did Dauid not know, how great was the fault of adultery & manslaughter, which daily punished the same in other? Did brotherslaughter seme to y Patriarches a lawful thing? Had the Corinthians so ill profited that they thought that wantonnesse, vncleannesse, whordom, hatreds & contentions pleased God? Did Peter beinge so diligently admonished not know howe great a matter it was to forswear his maister? Therefore let vs not with our owne enuiousnesse stop vp the way against the mercy of God that so gently vttereth it selfe. Leui. 4.

29 Truely I am not ignorant that the olde wryters expounded those sinnes that are daily forgiuen to the faithfull, to be the light offenses that crepe in by weaknesse of the flesh: & that they thought that the solemne repentance which was then required for haynous misdeedes might no more be iterate than Baptisme. Which sayinge is not so to be taken, as though they would either throw them down headlonge into desperation that after their first repentance had fallen againe, or extenuate those other sinnes as though they were smal in the sight of God. For they knew that the holy ones do oftentimes stagger by infidelity that superfluous othes do sometimes fall from them, that they nowe and then are chafed vnto anger, yea that they breake out euen into manifest raylings, & beside these be troubled with other euils which the Lord not scenderly abhorreth: but they so called them, to put a difference betwene them and publike crimes y with great offense came to the knowledge of the Church. But whereas they did so hardly pardon them that had comitted any thing worthy of Ecclesiasticall correction, they did not this therefore, because they thought that such should hardly haue pardon with the Lord: but by this seuerity they meant to make other afraid that they should not rashly runne into wicked doings, by the deseruing wherof they might be estranged from the Communion of the Church: howbeit truely the word of the Lord which herein ought to be the only rule vnto vs, appointeth a greater moderation. For it teacheth that the rigor of discipline is so farre to be extended, that he that ought chiefly to be provided for be not swallowed vp with heauines: as we haue before declared more at large.

The ij. Chapter.

A comparison of the false Church with the true Church.

OF howe great value the ministry of the worde and Sacramentes ought to be with vs, and how farre the reuerence of it ought to proceede, that it be vnto vs a perpetuall token whereby to discern the Church, it hath bin already declared. That is to say, whersoever that ministry abideth whole and vncorrupted, there the faultes or diseases of maners are no impediment; but that it may beare the name of a Church. Then, that the very ministry it selfe is by small errors not so corrupted, but that it may be esteemed lawful. Morouer we haue shewed that the errors that ought so to be pardoned, are those wherby the principal doctrine of religion is not hurt, wherby those chiefe pointes of religion that ought to be agreeably holden among the faithful are not destroyed, and in the Sacramentes, those that do not abolish nor empaire the lawefull institution of him that ordained them. But so soone as lying is broken into the chiefe tower of religion, so soone as the summe of necessary doctrine is peruerted, and the vse of the Sacramentes falleth: truely the destruction of the Church followeth: like as a mans life is at an end, when his throte is thrust through or his hart deadly wounded. And this is clearly proued by the wordes of Paule, when he teacheth that the foundation of the Church is layd vpon the doctrine of the Apostles files and Prophets, Christ himselfe beinge the head corner stone. If the fundation of the Church be the doctrine of the Prophets & Apostles, by which the faithful are commaunded to repose their saluation in onely Christ: then take away that doctrine, and how shall the building stande any longer? Therefore the Church must needs fall downe, where that summe of religiō falleth which is only able to vpholde it. Againe, if the true Church be the pillar & stay of the truth, it is certaine, that there is no Church, where lying & falshoode haue vsurped the dominion. 1. Tim. 3

2 Sith it is in such case vnder the Papistry, we may vnderstande how much of the Church is there remaininge. In stede of the ministry of the word, there reigneth a peruerse gouernement and made of lies mingled together, which partly quenbeth and partly choketh the pure light. Into the place of the Lordes Supper is entred a most filthy sacrilege: the forme of worshippinge God is deformed with a manifold and intolerable heape of superstitions: the doctrine, without which Christianity can not stande, is altogether buried and driuen out: the publike assemblies are the schooles of idolatry and vngodlinesse. Therefore there is no perill least in departing from a damnable partaking of so many mischieues, we be plucked frō the Church of Christ. The communion of the Church was not ordained to this end, that it should be a bond whereby we should be entangled with idolatry, vngodlinesse, ignorance of God, and other kindes of euils: but rather whereby we should be fast holden in the feare of God & obedience of truth. They do in dede gloriously set out their Church vnto vs, that there should seeme to be no other Church in the worlde: and afterward, as though the victory were gotten, they decree that al be Schismatikes that dare withdrawe themselues from the obedience of that Church that they paint out: and that all be heretikes that dare once mutter against the doctrine thereof. But by what proues do they confirme that they haue the true Church? They alleage out of the auncient Chronicles, what in olde time was in Italy, in Fraunce, in Spaine. They say that they fetch their beginning from those holy mē that with sound doctrine founded & raised vp Churches, & stablished the same doctrine & edifying of y^e Church with their blood. And that so the Church hath bin among thē so consecrate both with spiritual gistes, & with the blood of martyrs, & preserued with continuall succession of Bishops, y^e it might not fall away. They rehearse how much Ireneus, Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, & other esteemed this succession. But how trifling these things be, & how they be but very mockeries, I wil make them very easily to vnderstande that wil be content a little to wey them with me. Truly I woulde also exhort themselues earnestly to take hede hereunto, if I did trust that I might any thing preuaile with them by teachinge. But forasmuch as they, leauinge all regard of trueth, do bend themselues to this only purpose, by all the wayes that they can, to defend their owne cause, I will only speake a few things whereby good men and those that loue the trueth, may winde themselues out of their sutable cauillatiōs. First I aske of them, why they do not alleage Aphrike, and Egypt, and all Asia? Euen because in all those countreyes this holy Succession of Bishops hath ceased, by meane whereof they boast that they haue preserued Churches. They come therefore to this point to say, that they therefore haue a true Church, because since it first beganne to be, it hath not bin destitute of Bishops: for in perpetuall course they haue succeeded one an other. But what if I cast Greece in their way? Therefore I aske againe of them, why they say that the Church is lost amonge the Grecians, among whom that succession of Bishops was neuer interrupted; which in their opinion is the only keeper and preseruer of the Church. They make y^e Grecians Schismatikes, but by what right? because in departing frō the Apostolike sea, they haue lost their priuilege: what? Do not they much more deserue to loose it that depart from Christ himselve? It foloweth therefore, that the pretence of succession is but vaine, vnlesse the posterity do kepe fast and abide in the truth of Christ, which they haue receiued of their fathers from hand to hand.

3 Therefore the Romanistes at this day do alleage nothings else but that, which it appeareth that the Iewes in old time alleaged whē they were by the Prophetes of the Lord reprobued of blindenes, vngodlines and idolatry. For they gloriously boasted of the temple, Ceremonies & priesthoodes, by which things, by great reason as they thinke they measure the Church. So in steede of the Church, they shewe certaine outwarde visours, that ostentimes are farre from the Church, and without which the Church may very well stand. Therefore we neede to confute them with no other argument, then that wherewith Hieremy fought against the foolish presumptuousnes of the Iewes: that is, that they should not boast in lying wordes, saying, The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, it is the temple of the Lorde. Forasmuch as the Lord doth no where acknowledge any thinge for his, but where his word is heard and reuerently obserued. So when the glory of God did sit betwene the Cherubins in the Sanctuary, & he had promised them that that should be his stedfast seate: yet when the Priestes once corrupted the worshippinge of him with peruerse superstitions, he remoued else where, & left the place without any holinesse. If the same temple which seemed to be holily appointed to the perpetuall dwelling of God, might be forsakē of God and become vnholly: there is no cause why these men should faine to vs that God is so bound to persons or places, and so fast tied to outward obseruations, that he must needs abide with them that haue onely the title and shewe of the Church. And this is it about which Paule contendeth in the Epistle to the Romaines, from the 9. chapter to the 12. For this did sore trouble weake cōsciences, that the Iewes when they seemed to be the people of God, did not only refuse the doctrine of the Gospell, but also persecute it. Therefore after that he hath set out the doctrine, he remoueth this dout, and denieth that those Iewes beinge enemies of the trueth are the Church, howsoeuer they wanted nothinge that otherwise might be required to the outward forme of the Church. And therefore he denieth it, because they embraced not Christ. But somewhat more expressly in the Epistle to the Galathians: wherein cōparing Ismael with Iaac, he sayth that many hold place in the Church, to whom the inheritance belongeth not, because they are not begotten of the free mother. From whence also he descendeth to the comparison of two Hierusalems. Because as the lawe was giuen in the mount Sina, but the Gospell came out of Hierusalem. So many beinge seruilely borne and brought vp do without doutinge boast themselues to be the children of God and of the Church, yea they proudly despise the naturall children of God, whē thēsēlues be but bastards. On the other side also, when we heare that it was once pronounced from heauen: Cast out the bond woman and her sonne, let vs, standing vppon this inuiolable decree, boldely despise their vnfauey boastings. For if they be proud by reason of outward profession, Ismael was also circumcised: if they contende by antiquity, he was the first begotten, and yet we see that he is put away. If the cause be demaunded, Paule assigneth it, for that none are accounted children, but they that are begotten of the pure and lawful seede of doctrine. According to this reason God denieth that he is bounde to wicked Priestes by this that he couenanted with their Father Leui that he shoulde be his Angell or interpreter: yea he turneth against themselues their false boasting, wherwith they were wont to rise vp against the Prophetes, that the dignity of Priesthoode was to be had in singular estimation. This he willingly admitteth, and with the same condition he debateth with them, because he is ready to keepe his couenant, but when they do not mutually performe their part to him, they deserue to be reiectēd. Loe what succession augeth, vnlesse therewithal be also ioyned an inuitation & euenly continu-inge course : euen to this effect that the successors, so soone as they be proued to haue swarued from their originall, be deprived of all honor. Vnlesse perhappes because Caiphaz succeeded many Godly Bishoppes (yea there was euen from Aaron to him a continuall vnbroken course of succession) therefore that same mischieuous assembly was worthy the name of the Church. But this were not tolerable euen in earthly dominions, that the tyranny of Caligula, Nero, Heliogabalus and such other, should be called a true state of Common weale, for that they succeeded the Brutes, Scipions, & Camilles.

 But specially in the gouernement of the Church there is nothinge more fonde, than leauinge the Doctrine to set the succession in the Persons onely, but neither did the holy doctours whom they falsly thrust in vnto vs, meane any thing lesse, then to pray that precisely as it were by right of inheritance, Churches be there where Bishops are successiue placed one after an other. But where as it was then out of controuersie, that from the very beginnige to that age nothinge was chaunged in Doctrine, they alleaged that which might suffice to make an ende of all newe errors, that is, that by those was that doctrine oppugned, which had bin euen from the Apostles constantly and with one agreeinge consent retained. There is therefore no cause, why they should any longer go forward to deceiue by pretending a false colour vnder the name of the Church, which we do reue-rently esteeme as becommeth vs: but when they come to the definitiō of it, not only water (as the common sayinge is) cleaueth vnto them, but they sticke fast in their owne myre because they put a stinkinge harlot in place of the holy spouse of Christ. That this puttinge in of a changeling shoulde not deceiue vs, beside other admonitions, let vs remēber this also of Augustine. For speaking of the Church, he sayth.
 It is it that is sometime darkened, & couered with multitude of offences as with a cloude: sometime calmenesse of time appeareth quiet & free: sometime is hidden and troubled with waue of tribulations and temptations. He bringeth forth examples, y^e oftentimes the strongest pillers either valiaurly suffred banishmēt for the faith, or were hidden in the whole world.

4 In like maner the Romanistes do vexe vs, and make afraid the ignorant with the name of the Church, whereas they be the deadly enemies of Christ, Therefore although they pretende the temple, the priesthoode and the other such outward shewes, this vaine glstringe where with the eies of the simple be daseled ought nothing to moue vs to graunt that there is a Church where the Word of God doth not appear. For this is the perpetual marke wherwith God hath marked them that be his. He that is of the trueth (saith he) heareth my voice. Ioh. 18. 37. Againe, I am that good shepheard, and I know my shepe, & am known of them. My shepe heare my voyce, and I know them and they follow me. And a litle before he had sayd, that the shepe follow their shepheard, because they know his voice: but they follow not a stranger, but runne away from him, because they knowe not the voice of strangers. Why are we therefore wilfully mad in iudging the Church, whereas Christ hath marked it with an vndoutful signe, which wherfoeuer it is seene can not deceiue, but that it certainly sheweth the Church to be there: but where it is not, there remaineth nothing that can giue a true signification of the Church. For Paule rehearseth that the church was builded, not vpon the iudgements of men, not vpon Ephe. 2. 20. priesthoodes, but vpon the doctrine of the Apostles and Prophetes. But rather Hierusalem is to be seuerally knowen from Babilon, and the Church of Christ from the conspiracy of Satan, by that difference wherewith Christ hath made them different one from the other. He that is of God (saith he) heareth y^e Words of God. Ye therefore heare Iohn. 8. 47. not, because ye are not of God. In a summe, forasmuch as the church is the kingdom of Christ, & he reigneth not but by his word, can it be now doutfull to any man, but that those be the wordes of lyinge, by which Christes kingdome is fained to be without his scepter, that is to say without his holy word?

5 But now where as they accuse vs of Schisme & heresie, because we both preach a contrary doctrine to them, & obey not their lawes, and haue our assemblies to Praiers, to Baptisme, to the ministracion of the Supper, and other holy doings, seuerally from them: it is in dede a very sore accusation, but such as nedeth not a long or laborosome defence. They are called heretikes & schismatikes, which making a diuision, do breake in sunder the communion of the Church. And this communion is holden together with true bondes, that is to say, the agreement of true Doctrine, & brotherly charity. Wherupon Augustin putteth this difference betwene heretikes & schismatikes, that heretikes in dede do with false doctrines corrupt the purenes of faith, but the Schismatikes sometime euen where there is like faith, do breake the bonde of felowship. But this is also to be noted; that this conioyning of charity so hangeth vpon the vnity of Faith, that Faith ought to be the beginnunge thereof, the ende, and finally the only rule. Let vs therefore remember that so oft as the vnity of the Church is commended vnto vs, this is required, that while our mindes agree in Christ, our wils also may be ioyned together wth mutuall wel willing in Christ.

Eph. 4. 5 Therefore Paule, when he exhorteth vs to that well willinge, taketh Phil. 2. for his fundation that there is one God, one Faith, & one Baptisme.
 2. & 5. Yea whersoever he teacheth vs. to be of one minde, and of one will, he by and by addeth in Christ, or according to Christ: meaning y it is a factious cōpany of the wicked, & not agreement of the faithful which is without the word of the Lord.

6 Cyprian also following Paul deriueth the whole fountaine of the De sim- agreement of the Church, from the only bishoprike of Christ. He af-pl. pr. 2. terward addeth the Church is but one, which sprēdeth abroad more la. largely into a multitude with encrease of frutesfulnesse: like as there be many sunnebeames, but one light: and many branches of a tree, but one body grounded vpon a fait roote: And when many streames do flow from one fountaine, although the number seeme to be scattered abroad by largenes of ouerflowing plēty, yet the vnity abideth in the originall: Take away a beame of the sunne from the body, the vnity can suffer no diuision. Breake a braunch from the tree, the broken braunch can not spring. Cut of the streame from the spring hed, being cut of it drieth vp. So also the church being ouerspred with the light of the Lord, is extended ouer the whole world: yet there is but one light: that is spred euery where. Nothing could be sayd more fitly to expresse that vndiuidable knitting together, which all the mēbers of Christ haue one with an other. We see how he continually calleth vs backe to the very head. Wherupon he pronounceth that heresies & schismes do arise hereof, that men do not returne to the originall of truth, nor do seke the head, nor kepe the doctrine of the heauēly maister. Now let thē go & cry that we be heretikes that haue departed frō their Church: sith there hath bin no cause of our estranginge from them but this one, that they can in no wise abide the pure professing of the trueth: but I tell not how they haue driuen vs out with cursinges and cruel execrations. Which very selfe doing doth abundantly enough acquite vs, vnles they wil also condemne the Apostles for Schismatikes, with whom we haue all one cause. Christ (I say) did Ioh. 16. foresay to his Apostles, that the time should come when they should be cast out of the Sinagoges for his names sake. And those Sinagoges of which he speaketh, were then accompted lawefull Churches. Sith therefore it is euident that we be cast out, & we be ready to shew y the same is done for the names sake of Christ, truely the cause ought first to be enquired of, before that any thinge be determined vpon vs, either one way or other. Howbeit, if they wil, I am cōtent to discharge them of this point. For it is enough for me, that it behoued that we should depart from them, that we might come to Christ.

7 But it shall appeare yet more certainly, in what estimation we ought to haue all the Churches whom the tyranny of that Romishe idoll hath possessed, if it be compared with the old Church of the Israelites, as it is described in the Prophetes. There was then a true Church among the Iewes and Israelites, when they continued in the lawes of the couenant, for they obtained those things by the benefit of God, wherupon the Church consisteth. They had the truth of doctrine in the law: the ministry thereof was among the Priestes & the Prophets: with the signe of circumcision they entred into religion: by other Sacraments they were exercised to the confirmation of Faith. It is no doubt that those titles wherewith the Lorde hath honored his Church, fitly pertained to their fellowship. After that, forsakinge the law of the Lord, they went out of kinde to idolatry and superstition, they partly lost that prerogatiue. For who dare take away the name of the Church from them, with whom God hath left the preaching of his word and obseruation of his mysteries? Againe, who dare call that the Church without any exceptiō, where y^e word of y^e Lord is openly & freely troden vnder foote? where the ministry thereof, the chief sinew, yea the very soule of the Church is destroyed?

8 What then? will some man say: was there therefore no parcel of a Church remaining among the Iewes after that they fell away to idolatry? The answer is easie. First I say y^e in the very falling away there were certaine degrees. For we wil not say that there was all one falle of Iuda, and Israell, at such time as they both first swarued from the pure worshipping of God. When Iarobeam first made calves, against the open prohibition of God, & did dedicate an vnlawfull place for worshipping, he did vtterly corrupt religion. The Iewes did first defile themselues with wicked & superstitious maners before y^e they wrongfully changed the order in the outward forme of religiō. For althogh vnder Rechabeam they had already gotten them many peruerse Ceremonies: yet because there taried at Hierusalem both the Doctrine of the Law, & the Priesthoode, and the Ceremonious vsages in such sort as God had ordained the, the godly had there a tolerable state of Church. Amonge the Israelites vnto the reigne of Achab, there was no amendement of things, and from thense forth they fell from worse to worse. They that succeeded afterward, to the very destruction of the kingdom, partly were like vnto him, & partly (when they minded to be somewhat better than he) they folowed the example of Iarobeam: but they all euery one were wicked and idolaters. In Iewry there were nowe and then diuerse changes, while some kinges perverted the worshippinge of God with false and forged superstitions, some other restored religion that was decayed: vntil the very priestes themselves defiled the temple of God with prophane & abhominable vsages.

9 Now let the Papistes if they can howe much soeuer they extenuate their owne faulkes, deny that among them the state of religion is as corrupt and defiled as it was in the kingdom of Israell vnder Ierobeam. But they haue a grosser idolatrie: & in doctrine they are not one droppe purer: vnlesse peradventure euen in it also they be more vnpure: God, yea all men that are endued but with a meane iudgement, shalbe witnesses with me, and the thinge it selfe also declareth, how herein I tell nothinge more then trueth. Nowe when they will driue vs to the communion of the Church, they require two thinges of vs: first, that we shoulde communicate with all their praiers, sacramentes, and Ceremonies: then that whatsoeuer honor, power and iurisdiction Christ giueth to his Church, we shoulde giue the same to their Church. As to the first point, I graunt that all the Prophets that were at Hierusalem, when thinges were there very much corrupted, did neither seuerally sacrifice, nor had assemblies to pray seueral from other men. For they had a commaundement of God, whereby they

Exo. 29. were commaunded to come together into Salomons temple: they knew that the Leuiticall priestes, howsoever they were vnworthy of that honor, yet because they were ordained by the Lord ministers of the holy Ceremonies, & were not as then deposed, did yet still rightfully possesse that place. But (which is the chiefe point of this question) they were compelled to no superstitious worshippinge, yea they tooke in hande to do nothing but that which was ordained by God. But among these men, I meane the Papistes, what like thing is there? For we can scarcely haue any meetinge together with them, wherein we shall not defile our selues with open idolatrie. Truely the principall bonde of their communion is in the masse, which we abhorre as the greatest sacrilege. And whether we do this rightfully or wrongfully, shalbe seene in an other place. At this present it is enough to shew that in this behalfe we are in other case thã the Prophets were, which although they were present at the Ceremonies of the wicked, were not cõpelled to behold or vse any Ceremonies but such as were institute by God. And, if they will needes haue an example altogether like, lette vs take it out of the kingdom of Israell. After the ordinance of Ierobeam Circumcision remayned, the sacrifices were offered, the lawe was accompted holy, the same God was called vpon whom they had receiued of their Fathers: but for the forged and forbidden formes of worshippinge, God disallowed and condemned

all that was there done. Shewe me one Prophet, or any one godly man that ones worshipped or sacrificed in Bethell. For they knewe they coulde not do it, but that they should defile themselues with some sacrilege. We haue then thus much, that the communion of the Church ought not so farre to be of force with the godly, that if it should degenerate to prophane and filthy vsages, they should forth with of necessitie followe it.

10 But about the other pointe we contende yet more earnestly. For if the Church be so considered to be such, whoes iudgement we ought to reuerence, whoes authoritie to regarde, whoes monitions to obey, with whoes chastisements to be moued, whoes communion in all things we ought religiously to obserue: then we can not graunt them a Church, but that we must of necessity be bounde to subiectiō and obedience vnto it. Yet we will willingly graunt them that which the Prophets graunted to the Iewes & Israelites of their time: when things were there in as good, yea or in better state. But we see howe eche where they cry out, that their assemblies are vnholly, to which it is no more lawefull to consent than it is to denie God. And truly if those were Churches, it followeth therfore that in Israel Helias, Micheas and such other: in Iurie, Esaie, Ieremie, Osee and other of that sorte, whom the Prophets, priests and people of that time hated and detested worse than any vncircumcited men, were strangers from the Church of God. If those were Churches, then the Church was not the pillar of truth, but the stay of lieng: not the tabernacle of the liuing God, but the receptacle of idoles. Therefore it was needefull for them to depart from the consent of those assemblies, which was nothing els but a wicked conspiracie against God. In like maner if any man acknowledge the assemblies at these dayes being defiled with idolatrie, superstition and wicked doctrine, to be such in whoes full communion a Christian man ought to continue euen to the cōsente of doctrine, he shal greatly erre. For if they be Churches then they haue the power of the keyes. But the keyes are vnseparably knitte with the word, which is from thense quite driuen away. Againe, if they be Churches, then the promise of Christ is of force among them, whatsoeuer ye binde. &c. But they contrariwise do banishe from their communion all such as do professe themselues not fainedly the seruātes of Christ. Therefore either the promise of Christ is vaine, or at least in this respect they are not Churches. Finally in stede of the ministerie of the word they haue scholes of vngodlinessse, and a sinke of all kindes of errors. Therefore either in this respecte they are not Churches, or there shall remaine no token

Cap. 2. Of the outward meanes whereby the lawfull assemblies of the faithfull may be severally known from the meetings of Turkes.

11 But as in the olde time there yet remained among the Iewes certaine peculiar prerogatiues of the Church, so at this day also we take not from the Papistes such steppes as it pleased the Lorde to haue remaining among them after the dissipatiō of the Church. The Lorde hadde ones made his couenant with the Iewes. That same rather beinge vpholden by the stedfastnesse of it selfe didde continue with striuing against their vngodlinesse, than was preserued by them.
Therefore (such was the assurednesse and constancie of Goddes goodnesse) there remained the couenant of the Lord, neither could his faithfulness be blotted out by their vnfaithfulness: neither could Circumcision be so prophaned with their vncleane handes, but that it still was the signe and sacrament of that couenante. Whereuppon the childern that were borne of them, the Lorde called his owne, which vnlesse it were by special blessing, belonged nothing to him. So when he hath left his couenaut in Fraunce, Italy, Germany, Spaine, Englande: sins those prouinces haue bene oppressed with the tyranny of Antichrist, yet that his couenaut might remaine inuiola-ble, first he there preserued Baptisme, the testimonie of his couenant, which being cōsecrate by his owne mouth reteineth her owne force notwithstanding the vngodlinesse of man: then, with his prouidence he hath wrought that there should remaine other remnantes, least the Church should be vtterly destroyed: And as oftentimes bildinges are so pulled downe, that the foundations and ruines reimaine: so he hath not suffred his Church either to be ouerthrowen by Antichrist from the very foundation, or to be laid euen with the grounde (how-soeuer to punish the vnthankfulness of men that had despised his word, he suffreth horrible shaking and dissipation to chaunce) but euen after the very wasting he willed that the bilding half pulled downe should yet remaine.

12 Whereas therefore we will not simply graunt to the Papistes the title of the Church, we do not therefore deny that there be Churches among them: but onely we contende of the true and lawfull ordering of the Church: which is required in the communion both of the sacraments which are the signes of profession, but also specially of doctrine. Daniel and Paule foretolde that Antichrist should sitte in the temple of God. With vs we accompt the bishop of Rome the captaine and standard bearer of that wicked and abhominable kingdome. Whereas his seate is placed in the temple of God, thereby is meant that his kingdome shall be such as can not abolish the name
of

of Christ nor of his Church. Hereby therefore appeareth, that we do not deny but that euen vnder his tyrannie remain Churches: but such as he hath prophaned with vngodlinesse full of sacrilege, such as he hath afflicted with outragious dominion, such as he hath corrupted and in maner killed with euill & damnable doctrines, as with poisoned drinckes: such wherein Christ lieth halfe buried, the Gospell overwhelmed, godlinesse banished, the worshipping of God in a maner abolished: such finally wherein all things are so troubled, that therein rather appereth the face of Babylon then of the holy citie of God. In a summe, I say that they be Churches, in respect that the Lorde there maruelously preserueth the remnauntes of his people howsoever they were dispersed and scattered abroad, in respecte that there remaine some tokes of the Church, specially these tokens, the effectualnesse whereof neither the craft of the Deuil, nor the maliciousnesse of man can destroy. But on the other side because these markes are blotted out, which in this discourse we ought principally to haue respect vnto, I say that every one of their assemblies and the whole body wanteth the lawfull forme of a Church.

Of the teachers and ministers of the Church, and of their election and office.

NOwe it is mete that we speake of the order, by which it was the Lordes will to haue his Church gouerned. For although in his Church he onely must rule and reigne, yea and beare preeminence or excelle in it, and this gouernment to be vsed or executed by his onely word: yet because he dwelleth not among vs in visible presence, so that he can presently with his owne mouth declare his will vnto vs, we haue sayed that in this he vseth the ministerie of men, and as it were the trauaille of deputies, not in transferring his right and honour vnto them, but onely that by their mouth he might do his owne worke, like as a workeman, to do his worke vseth his instrument. I am compelled to repete againe those things that I haue already declared. He might in deede do it either by himselfe without any other helpe or instrument, or also by meane of Angells: but there are many causes why he had rather do it by men. For by this meane first he declareth his good will toward vs, when he taketh out of men them that shall do his message in the world, that shall be the interpreters of his secret will, finally that shall represent his owne person. And so by experience he proueth that it is not vaine that commonly he calleth vs his temples, when out of the mouthes of men, as out of his sanctuarie, he geueth aunsweres to men. Secondly, this is the best and most profitable exercise to humilitie, when he accustometh vs to obey his worde, howsoever it be preached by men like vnto vs, yea sometime our inferiors in dignity. If he himselfe spake from heauen, it were no maruell if his holy Oracles were without delay reuerently receiued with the eares and mindes of all men. For who would not drede his power being in presence? who would not be throwen downe at the first sight of so great maiesty? who would not be confounded with that infinite brightnesse? But when some silly man risen out of the dust speaketh in the name of God, here with very good testimony we declare our godlinesse and reuerent obedience toward God himselfe, if to his minister we yelde our selues willing to learne, which yet in nothing excelleth vs. Therefore for this cause also he hath hidden the treasure of his heauenly wisdom in bricke & earthen vessels, that he might haue the certainer profe howe much he is esteemed of vs. Moreover there was nothing fitter for the cherishing of mutuall charitie, than that men should be bound together one to another with this bonde, when one is made a pastor to teach the rest, and they that are commaunded to be scholars receiue all one doctrine at one mouth. For if euery man were able enough to serue himselfe, and needed not the helpe of another: such is the pride of mans nature, that euery one would despise other, and should againe be despised of them. Therefore the Lord hath bounde his Church with that knotte, which he forsaue to be the strongest knotte to hould vnity together, when he hath lefte with men the doctrine of saluation, and of eternall life, that by their handes he might communicate it to the rest. Hereunto Paule had respect when he wrote to the Ephesians, One body one spirit, as also ye be called in one hope of your calling. One Lord, one faith, one Baptisme. One God, and the father of all, which is aboue all, and by all, and in vs all. But vnto euery one of vs grace is geuen according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Wherefore he saith: When he was gone vp on hy, he ledde captiuitie captiue, he gaue giftes to men. He that wente downe is the selfe same he, that wente vp, that he might fulfill all things. And the same hath geuen some to be Apostles, and some Prophets, and some Euangelistes, and other some Pastors and teachers, vnto the restoring of the holy ones, to the worke of ministracion, to the edifying of the body of Christ, vntill we come all into the vnitie of faith, and of the knowledge of the Sonne of God, into a perfect man, into the measure of full grown age: that we be no more children that may be caried about with

euery winde of doctrine : but following truth in charitie , let vs in all things growe into him that is the hed , euen Christ , in whome the whole body conioined and compacted together by all the ioint of subministratiō, according to the working in measure of euery parte, maketh encrease of the body, vnto the edifying of it selfe by charity.

2 By these words he sheweth, that that ministerie of men, which God vseth in gouerning his Church is the chiefe sinew, wherby the faithfull cleaue together in one body : and also he sheweth that the Church can not otherwise be preserued safe, but if it be vpholdē by these staies, in which it pleased the Lord to repose the saluation of it, Christ (sayeth he) is gone vp on hy , that he might fulfill all things. Eph. 10.
This is the maner of fulfilling, that by his ministers, to whom he hath committed that office, and hath geuen the grace to execute that worke, he disposeth and distribureth his giftes to the Church, yea and after a certaine maner geueth himselfe present, with extending the power of his spirit in this institution, that it should not be vain or idle. So is the restoringe of the holy ones performed : so is the body of Christ edified : so do we by all things growe into him that is the hed, and do grow together among our selues : so are we all brought into the vnitie of Christ, if prophecie flourish among vs, if we receiue the Apostles, if we refuse not the doctrine ministred vnto vs. Eph. 4. 12.
Therefore he goeth about the dissipatiō, or rather the ruine & destruction of the Church, whosoeuer he be that either endeuoreth to abolish this Order of whom we speake, and this kinde of gouernement, or minisheth the estimatiō of it as a thing not so necessary. For neither the light and heate of the sunne, nor meate & drinke are so necessary to nourish and susteine this present life, as the office of Apostles and pastors is necessarie to preserue the Church in earth.

3 Therefore I haue aboue admonished, that God hath oftentimes with such titles as he could, commended the dignitie thereof vnto vs, that we should haue it in most hy honour and price, as the most excellent thing of all. He testifieth that he geueth to men a singular benefite, in raising them vp teachers, where he commaundeth Esa. 57. 7.

Church more excellēt or glorious than the ministry of the Gospel, forasmuch as it is the administration of the Spirit, and of righteousness, and of eternall life. These and like sayings serue to this purpose, that that order of governing & preserving the Church by ministers, which the Lord hath stablished for euer, should not growe out of estimation among vs, and so at length by very contempt growe out of vse. And howe great is the necessity thereof, he hath declared not onely by wordes, but also by examples. When his will was to shine more fully to Cornelius with the light of his truth, he sente an Angell from heauen to sende Peter vnto him. When his will was to call Paule to the knowledge of himselfe, and to engraft him into the Church, he spake not to him with his owne voice, but sente him to a man, of whom he should receiue both the doctrine of saluation, and the sanctification of Baptisme. If it be not done without cause, that an Angell, which is the interpreter of God, do himselfe absteine from declaring the will of God, but commaundeth that a man be sente for, to declare it: and not without cause that Christ the onely scholemaster of the faithfull committeth Paule to the schooling of a man, yea euen that same Paule whom he had determined to take vp into the thirde heauen, and to vouchsaue to graunt him miraculous reuelation of things vnspeakable: who is there nowe that dare despise that ministry, or passe it ouer as a thing superfluous, the vse whereof it hath pleased God to make approued by such examples?

4 They that haue rule of the government of the Church according to the institution of Christ, are named of Paul first Apostles; then Prophets, thirdly Euangelistes, fourthly Pastors, last of all teachers. Of which, the twoo last alone haue ordinarie office in the Church: the other three the Lorde raised vp at the beginning of his kingdome, and sometime yet also raiseth vp, as the necessitie of times requireth. What is the Apostles office, appeareth by that commaundement: go, preache the Gospel to euery creature. There are not certaine boundes appointed vnto them: but the whole world is assigned them, to be brought into the obedience of Christ: that in spreading the Gospel among all nations wheresoeuer they shall be able, they may eche where raise vp his kingdome. Therefore Paule, when he wente about to proue his Apostleship, rehearseth that he hath gotten to Christ not some one citie, but hath farre and wide spread abrode the Gospel: and that he hath not layed his handes to an other mans fundatiō; but plāted Churches where the name of the Lorde had neuer bene heard of. Therefore the Apostles were sente to bring backe the world from falling away, vnto true obedience of God,

God, and eche where to stablish his kingdome by preaching of the Gospell: or (if you like that better) as the first bilders of the Church, to lay the foundations thereof in all the world. Prophetes he calleth, not all expositors of Gods will whatsoeuer they be, but those that by singular reuelation excelled, such as at this time either be none, or are lesse notable. By Euangelistes I vnderstande those, which when in dignity they were lesse than the Apostles, yet in office were nexte vnto them, yea and occupied their roomes. Such were Luke, Timo-thee, Titus and other like: and peradventure also the seuentie Disciples, whom Christ appointed in the seconde place after the Apostles. According to this exposition (which seemeth to me agreeable both with the wordes and meaning of Paule) those three offices were not ordeined in the Church to this ende that they should be perpetuall, but onely to serue for that time wherein Churches were to be erected, where were none before, or at least to be remoued from Moses to Christ. Albeit I denie not, but that afterward also the Lorde hath sometime raised vp Apostles, or at least in their places Euangelistes, as it hath bene done in our time. For it was needefull to haue such, to bring backe the Church from the falling away of Antichrist. Yet the office it selfe I do neuerthelesse call extraordinarie, because it hath no place in the Churches already well set in order, Next after these are Pastors and Teachers, whome the Church may neuer lacke: betwene whom I thinke that there is this difference, that the Teachers are not appointed to beare rule of discipline, nor for the ministracion of Sacramentes, nor admonishments or exhortations, but onely to expounde the Scripture, that pure and sounde doctrine may be kept among the faithfull. But the office of Pastor conteineth all these things within it.

5 Nowe we haue, which were those ministeries in the Church that continued but for a time, and which were those that were ordeined to endure perpetually. If we ioine the Euangelistes with the Apostles, we shal haue remaining two couples after a certaine maner aunsweringe the one to the other. For as our Teachers are like to the olde Prophetes, in such sort are our Pastors like to the Apostles, The office of Prophetes was more excellent, by reason of the singular giste that they had of reuelation: but the office of Teachers hath in a maner like order, and altogether the same ende. So those. xij. whom the Lorde did choose, that they should publish abroad to the world the newe preaching of the Gospell, in degre and dignitie went before the rest. For although by the meaning and propertie of the word, all the ministers of the Church may be rightly called

Apostles, because they are sente of the Lorde, & are his messengers; yet because it was much behouefull, that there should be a certaine knowledge had of the sending of them that should bring a thing newe and vnheard of, it was necessarie that those xij (to whoes number Paule was afterwarde added) should be garnished with some peculiar title aboue the rest. Paule himselfe in deede in one place geueth this name to Andronicus & Iunias, whom he sayeth to haue bene notable among the Apostles: but when he meaneth to speake properly, he referreth it to none other but to that principall degree. And this is the common vse of the Scripture. Yet the Pastors (sauing that eche of them do gouerne seuerall Churches appointed to them) haue all one charge with the Apostles. Nowe what maner of thing that is, let vs yet heare it more plainly.

6 The Lorde, when he sente the Apostles, gaue them cōmaundement (as we said euen now) to preach the Gospell, and to baptise them: that beleue vnto forgeuenesse of sinnes. He had before commaunded, that they should distribute the holy signes of his body and bloud, as he had done. Loc here is a holy, inuolable and perpetuall lawe layed vpon them that succede in the Apostles place, whereby they receiue commandement to preache the Gospell, and minister the Sacramēts. Whereupon we gather, that they which neglect both these things, do falsly say that they beare the person of the Apostles.

But what of the Pastors? Paule speaketh not of himselfe onely, but of them all, when he sayeth: let a man so esteeme vs as the ministers of Christ, and distributors of the misteries of God. Againe in another place: a Bishop must be a fast holder of that faithful word which is according to doctrine: that he may be able to exhorte by sounde doctrine, and to conuince the gaine sayers. Out of those and like places, which are echwhere to be founde, we may gather, that also in the office of the Apostles these be the two principall partes, to preach the Gospell, and to minister the Sacraments. As for the order of teaching, it consisteth not only in publike Sermons, but belongeth also to priuate admonitions. So Paul calleth the Ephesians to witnesse that he hath not fled from doing of any of those things that were for their profit, but that he preached and taught them both openly and in euery house, testifying both to the Iewes and Grecians, repentāce and faith in Christ. Againe a little after: that he hath not ceased with reares to admonishe euery one of them. Neither yet belongeth it to my purpose at this present to expresse, all the qualities of a good Pastor, but onely to point out what they professe that call themselues Pastors: that is, that they are so made rulers of the Church, not that they

they should haue an idle dignity, but that they should with the doctrine of Christ instruct the people to true godlinesse, minister the holy mysteries, and preserue and exercise vpright discipline. For whosoever be set to be watchemen in the Church, the Lorde declareth vnto them, that if any by their negligence perish through ignorance, he will require the blood at their handes. That also pertaineth to them all, which Paul sayeth of himselfe: wo to me vnlesse I preach the Gospell, forasmuch as the distributing thereof is committed to me. Finally what the Apostles performed to the whole world, the same ought euery Pastor to performe to his flocke to which he is appointed.

7 Albeit when we assigne to euery one their seuerall Churches, yet in the meane while we do not denie but that he which is bounde to one Church may helpe other Churches, if any troublesome thing do happen that requireth his presence, or if he be asked counsell of any darke matter. But forasmuch as for the keping of the peace of the Church, this policy is necessary, that there be sette forth to euery man what he should do, least all shoulde be confusely disordered, runne about without calling, or rashly runne altogether into one place, and least such as are more carefull for their owne commoditie than for the edification of the Church, should at their owne will leaue their Churches vacant: this ordering ought commonly to be kept so nere as may be, that euery man contented with his owne boundes should not breake into an other mans charge. And this is no inuention of man, but the ordinance of God himselfe. For we reade that Paule and Barnabas created Priests in all the seuerall Churches of Lистра, Antioche, Iconium: and Paule himselfe commaundeth Titus that he should appointe Priests in euery towne. So in one place he speaketh of the Bishoppes of Philippes, and in an other place of Archippus Bishop of the Colossians. And there remaineth a notable Sermon of his in Luke, to the Priests of the Church of Ephesus. Whosoever therefore shall take vpon him the gouernment and charge of one Church, let him knowe that he is bound to this lawe of Gods calling: not that as bounde to the soile (as the lawyers terme it) that is, made bonde and fastened vnto it, he may not ones moue his foote from thense, if the common profit do so require, so that it be done well and orderly: but he that is called into one place ought not himself to thinke of remouing, nor seke to be deliuered as he shall thinke to be good for his commoditie. Then, if it be expedient that any be remoued to an other place, yet he ought not to attempt it of his owne priuate aduise, but to tary for publike authoritie.

8 But whereas I haue without difference called them Bishops, and Priests, and Pastors, and Ministers, that rule Churches: I did that according to the vsage of the Scripture, which indifferently vseth these wordes. For whosoever do execute the ministry of the word, to them he geueth the title of Bishops. So in Paule, where Titus is commaunded to appointe Priests in euery towne, it is immediatly added. For a Bishop must be vnreprouable. &c. So in an other place he saluteth many Bishops in one Church. And in the actes it is rehearsed, that he called together the Priests of Ephesus, whom he himselve in his owne Sermon calleth Bishops. Here nowe it is to be noted, that hetherto we haue recited none but those offices that stande in the ministerie of the word: neither doth Paule make mention of any other in that fourth chapter which we haue alleged. But in the Epistle to the Romaines, and in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, he reckeneth vp other offices, as powers, the gift of healing, interpretation, gouernement, caring for the poore. Of the which I omitted those that endured but for a time, because it is to no profitable purpose to tary vpon them. But there are two that do perpetually abide, that is to say, gouernement and care of the poore. Gouernours I thinke were the Elders chosen out of the people, that should together with the Bishops, haue rule of the iudgement of maners, and the vsing of discipline. For a man cannot otherwise expounde that which he sayeth: let him that ruleth do it with carefulnesse. Therefore at the beginnunge euery Church had their Senate, gathered of godly, graue and holy men: which had that same iurisdiction in correcting of vices, whereof we shall speake hereafter. And that this was the order of more than one age, experience it selfe declareth. Therefore this office of gouernement is also necessarie for all ages.

9 The care of the poore was comitted to the Deacons. Howbeit to y^e Romaines there are set two kindes. Let him that geueth (sayeth Paule in that place) do it in simplicitie: let him that hath mercy, do it in cherefulnesse. Forasmuch as it is certaine that he speaketh of the publike offices of the Church, it must needes be that there were two seuerall degrees. Vnlesse my iudgement deceiue me, in the first point he meaneth Deacōs, that distributed the almes: in the other he speaketh of them that had geuen themselues to loking to the poore and sicke: of which sort were the widowes of whom he maketh mention to Timothee. For women could execute no other publik office, but to geue themselues to the seruice of the poore. If we graunt this, (as we must needes graunt it) thē there shall be two sortes of Deacōs: of which one sort shall serue in distributing the things of the poore,

the other in loking to y^e poore of the Church themſelues. But although the very word Diaconia, Deaconrie extēdeth further: yet the Scripture ſpecially calleth thē Deacons, to whom the Church hath geuen the charge to diſtribute the almes, and to take care of the poore, and hath appointed them as it were ſtewar-des of the common treaſurie of the poore: whoes beginning, inſtitution and office, is deſcribed of Luke in the Actes. For when a murmuring was raiſed by the Gre- A& 6.
cians, for that in the miniſterie of the poore their widowes were neglected, the Apoſtles excuſing themſelues with ſaying that they could not ſerue both offices, both the preaching of the word and the miniſtring at tables, required of the multitude, that there might be choiſen. vii. honeſt men, to whom they might commit that doing. Loe what maner of Deacons the Apoſtolike Church had, and what Deacons it were mete for vs to haue according to their example.

10 Now whereas in the holy aſſembly all things are to be done in order and comely, there is nothing wherein that ought to be more diligently obſerued, than in ſtabliſhing the order of gouernement: becauſe there is no where greater perill if any thing be done vnorderly. Therefore to the ende that vnquiet and troubleſome men (which otherwiſe would happē) ſhould raſhly thruſt in themſelues to teach or to rule, it is expreſly provided, that no man ſhould without calling take vpon him a publike office in the Church. Therefore that a man may be iudged a true miniſter of the Church, firſt he muſt be orderly called: then he muſt aunſwere his vocation, that is to ſay, take vpon him and execute the duties enioined him. This we may oftentimes marke in Paule: which when he meaneth to approue his Apoſtleſhip, in a maner alway with his faithfulneſſe in executing his office he allegeth his calling. It ſo great a miniſter of Chriſt dare not take vpon himſelſe the authoritie that he ſhoulde be heard in the Church; but becauſe he both is appointed thereunto by the commandement of the Lord, and alſo faithfully performeth that which is committed vnto him: howe great ſhamefulneſſe ſhall it be, if any man wanting both or either of theſe, ſhall chalenge ſuch honor to himſelſe? But becauſe we haue aboue touched the neceſſitie of executing the office, nowe let vs entreate onely of the calling.

11 The diſcourſe therof ſtandeth in foure pointes: that we ſhould knowe, what maner of miniſters, how, and by whom miniſters ought to be inſtitute, and with what uſage or what Ceremonie they are to be admitted. I ſpeake of the ourwarde and ſolemne calling, which belongeth to publike order of the Church: as for that ſecrete calling, whereof euery miniſter is priuy in his own conſciēce before God, & hath not the Church witnesse of it, I omitt it. It is a good witnesse of our hart, that not by any ambition, nor couetousnesse, nor any other greedy desire, but with pure feare of God and zeale to edefie to the Church, we receiue the office offered vnto vs. That in deede is (as I haue sayed) necessarie for euery one of vs, if we will approue our ministerie allowable before God. Neuerthelesse he is rightly called in presence of the Church, that commeth vnto it with an euill conscience, so that his wickednes be not open. They are wont also to say that euē priuate men are called to y^e ministerie, whom they see to be mete and able to execute it: because verily learning ioined with godlinesse and with the other qualities of a good Pastor, is a certaine preparation to the very office. For whom the Lorde hath appointed to so great an office, he first furnisheth them with those armures that are required to fulfill it, that they should not come empty and vnprepared vnto it. Whereupon Paul also to the Corinthians, when he meante to dispute of the very offices, first rehearsed the giftes which they ought to haue that execute the offices. But because this is the first of those fower pointes that I haue propounded, let vs nowe go forwarde vnto it.

12 What maner of Bishoppes it is mete to choose, Paule doth largely declare in two places, but the summe commeth to this effect, that none are to be chosen, but they that are of sounde doctrine, and of holy life, & not notable in any vice, which might both take away credite from them, & procure slaunder to their ministry. Of Deacōs and Elders there is altogether like consideration, It is alway to be looked vnto, that they be not vnable or vnfit to beare the burden that is layed vpon them, that is to say, that they may be furnished with those powers that are necessarie to the fulfilling of their office.

So when Christ was about to sende his Apostles, he garnished them with those weapons & instruments which they could not wante. And Paule when he had painted out the image of a good & true Bishop, warneth Timothee, that he should not defile himselfe with choosing any man that differeth from it. I referre this word Howe, not to the ceremonie of choosing, but to the reuerente feare that is to be kept in the choosing. Hereupon come the fastings and prayers, which Luke reciteth that the faithfull vsed when they made Priests. For whereas they vnderstoode that they medled with a most earnest matter, they durst attempt nothing, but with great reuerence and carefulnesse. But they chesely applied themselues to prayers, whereby they might craue of God the Spirit of counsell and discretion.

13 The third thing that we haue set in our diuisiō was, by whom

ministers are to be chosen. Of this thing no certaine rule can be gathered out of the institution of Apostles, which had some difference from the common calling of the rest. For, because it was an extraordinary ministerie, that it might be made discernable by some more notable marke, it behoued that they which should execute it, should be called and appointed by the Lordes owne mouth. They therefore tooke in hande their doing, being furnished by no mans election, but by the onely commaundement of God and of Christ. Hereupon commeth that when the Apostles would put an other in the place of Judas, they durst not certainly name any one man, but they brought forth two, that the Lorde shoulde declare by lot, whether of them he would haue to succede. After this maner also it is mete to take this, that Paule denieth that he was creat Apostle of men or by man, but by Christ and God the father. That first point, that is to say of men, he had common with all the Godly ministers of the worde. For no man could rightly take vppon him that execution, but he that were called of God. But the other point was proper and singular to himselfe. Therefore when he glorieth of this, he doth not onely boast that he hath that which belongeth to a true and lawefull Pastor, but also bringeth foorth the signes of his Apostleship. For whē there were some among the Galathians, which trauailing to diminish his authoritie, made him some meane disciple, put in office vnder them by the principall Apostles: he, to defende in safetie the dignitie of his preaching, which he knewe to be shot at by those suttile deuises, needed to shewe himselfe in all pointes nothing inferior to the other Apostles. Therefore he affirmeth that he was chosen, not by the iudgement of men, like some common Bishop, but by the mouth and manifest Oracle of the Lorde himselfe.

14. But no man that is sober will deny, that it is according to the order of lawefull calling, that Bishops should be appointed by men: forasmuch as there are so many testimonies of y^e Scripture for profe thereof. Neither doth that saying of Paule make to the contrary, as it is said, that he was not sent of men, nor by men: forasmuch as he speaketh not there of the ordinary choosing of ministers, but challengeth to himselfe that which was special to the Apostles. Howbeit God also so appointed Paule by himselfe by singular prerogatiue, that in the meane time he vsed the discipline of Ecclesiastical calling. For Luke reporteth it thus, when the Apostles were fasting and praying, the Holy Ghost said: Separate vnto me Paule and Barnabas to the worke to which I haue seuerally chosen them. To what purpose serued that separation and putting on of handes, sith the Holy Ghoſt hath teſtified his owne election, but that the diſcipline of the Church in appointing miniſters by men, might be preſerued: Therefore the Lord could by no plainer example approve ſuch order, than he did when hauing firſt declared that he had ordained Paul Apoſtle for the Gentiles, yet he willeth him to be appointed by the Church.

a. 1. Which thing we may ſee in the chooſing of Mathias. For, becauſe
3. the office of Apoſtleſhip was of ſo greate importance, that they durſt not by their owne iudgement chooſe any one man into that degree, they did ſet two men in the middes, vpon the one of whom the lot ſhould fall: that ſo both the election might haue an open teſtimonie from heauen, and yet the policie of the Church ſhould not be paſſed ouer.

15. Nowe it is demaunded whether the miniſter ought to be choien of the whole Church, or only of the other of the ſame office, and of the Elders that haue the rule of diſcipline, or whether he may be made by the authority of one man. They that geue this authority
it. 1. 5. to one man, allege that which Paule ſayth to Titus: Therefore I haue leſte thee in Creta, that thou ſhouldeſt appointe in euery towne Tim. 22. Prieſtes. Againe to Timothee: lay not handes quickly vpon any man. But they are deceiued if they think, that either Timothee at Ephesus, or Titus in Creta, vſed a kingly power, that either of them ſhould diſpoſe all things at his owne will. For they were aboue the reſt, only to go before the people with good and hoſſome counſells: not that they onely, excluding all other, ſhould do what they liſted. And that I may not ſeeme to faine any thing, I will make it plaine by a like a. 14. example. For Luke rehearſeth that Paule and Barnabas appointed 3. Priests in diuerſe Churches: but he alſo expreſſeth y^e order or maner howe, when he ſayeth that it was done by voices: ordeining Priests (ſayeth he) by liſting vp of handes in euery Church. Therefore they two did creat them: but the whole multitude, as the Grecians maner was in elections, did by holding vp their handes declare whom they would haue. Euen in like maner the Romaine histories do oftentimes ſay, that the Conſul which kept the aſſemblies, created newe officers, for none other cauſe but for that he receiued the voices & gouerned the people in the election. Truely it is not likely that Paule graunted more to Timothee and Titus than he toke to himſelfe. But we ſee that he was wonte to creat Biſhops by voices of the people. Therefore the places aboue are ſo to be vnderſtanded, that they miniſh nothing of the cōmon right and libertie of the Church. Therefore Ciprian ſayeth well, when he affirmeth that it commeth from the authoritie of God, that the Priest ſhould be choſen in preſence of the people before the eyes of all men, and should by publike iudgement and testimonie be allowed for worthy & mete. For we see that this was by the commaudemēt of the Lorde obserued in the Leuiticall Priests, that before their cōsecratiō they should be brought into the sight of the people. And no otherwise is Mathias added to the fellowship of the Apostles: and no otherwise the seuen Deacons were created: but the people seing and allowing it. These examples (sayeth Ciprian) do shewe, that the ordring of a Priest ought not to be done, but in the knowledge of the people standing by: that the ordering may be iust and lawfull, which hath bene examined by the witnessse of all. We are therefore come thus farre, that this is by the word of God a lawfull calling of a minister, when they that seeme mete are created by the consenr and allowaunce of the people, And that other Pastors ought to beare rule of the election, that nothing be done amisse of the multitude either by lightnesse, or by euill affections, or by disorder.

16 Now remaineth the forme of ordering, to which we assigned the last place in the calling. It is euident that the Apostles vsed no other ceremonie, when they admitted any man to ministerie, but the laying on of handes. And I thinke that this vsage came from the maner of the Hebrues, which did as it were presente vnto God by laying on of handes that which they would haue blessed & hallowed. So when Iacob was about to blesse Ephraim and Manasse, he layed his handes vpon their heds. Which thing our Lorde followed, when he prayed ouer the infantes. In the same meaning (as I thinke) the Iewes, by the ordināce of the lawe, layed handes vpon the Sacrifices. Wherefore the Apostles by laying on of handes did signifie that they offered him to God, whom they admitted into the ministerie. Albeit they vsed it also vpon them, to whom they applied the visible graces of the Spirit. Howesoever it bee, this was the solemne vsage, so ofte as they called any man to the ministerie of the Church. So they consecrated Pastors and teachers, and so also Deacons. But although there be no certaine commaudemēt concerning the laying on of handes, yet because we see that it was continually vsed among the Apostles, their so diligent obseruinge of it ought to be to vs in stede of a commaudemēt. And truely it is profitable, that by such a signe, both the dignitie of the ministry should be cōmended to the people, and also that he which is ordered should be admonished, that he is not nowe at his own liberty, but made bonde to God & the Church. Moreouer it shall not be a vaine signe, if it be restored to the naturall beginning of it. For if the Spirit of God, hath ordeined nothing in the Church in vaine, we must thinke that this Ceremonie, sith it proceeded from him, is not vnprofitable, so that it be not turned into a superstitious abuse. Last of all this is to be holden, that not the whole multitude did lay their handes vpon the ministers, but the Pastors onely. Howbeit it is vncertaine whether many did alway lay on their handes or no. But it is euident that that was done in the Deacons, in Paule and Barnabas, and a fewe other. But Paule himselfe in an other place reporteth, that he, and not many other, did lay his handes vpon Timothee. I admonish thee (sayeth he) that thou raise vp the grace which is in thee by laying on of my handes. For, as for that which in the other Epistle is spoken of the laying on of the handes of the degree of Priests, I do not so take it, as though Paule did speake of the companie of the Elders, but I vnderstande by that word the very ordinance it selfe: as if he had sayed: Make that the Grace, which thou hast receiued by laying on of handes when I did creat thee a priest, may not be void.

The iiij. Chapter.

Of the state of the olde Church, and of the maner of governing that was in vse before the Papacie.

Hitherto we haue intreated of the order of governing the Church, as it hath bene deliuered vs out of the pure word of God: and of the ministeries, as they were institute by Christ. Nowe that all these things may be more clerely and familiarly opened, and also be better fastened in our mindes: it shalbe profitable in these things to cōsider the forme of the Olde Church, which shall represent to our eyes a certaine image of Gods institutiō. For although the Bishops of those times did set forth many Canons, wherein they seemed to expresse more thā was expressed in the holy Scripture: yet they with such hedefulnesse framed all their order after the onely rule of Gods word, that a man may easily see that in this behalf they had in a maner nothing disagreeing from the word of God. But although there might be somewhat wantinge in their ordinances, yet because they with sincere zeale endeoured to preserue Gods institutiō, & they swarued not much frō it, it shal be very profitable here shortely to gather what maner of obseruation they had. As we haue declared that there are thre sortes of ministers cōmēded vnto vs in the Scripture: so all the ministers y^e the olde Church had, it diuided into thre Orders. For out of the order of Elders were partly chosen Pastors and Teachers: the rest of them had the rule of the iudgement and correction of maners. To the Deacons was committed the care of the poore, and the distributing of the almes.

As

As for the Readers and Acoluth, were not names of certaine offices: but those whom they called Clerkes, they trained from their youth vpward in certaine exercises to serue the Church, that they might be y better vnderstande to what purpose they were appointed, & might in time come y better prepared to their office: as I shal by and by shew more at large. Therefore Hierome, when he had appointed .fiue or - In Epi. ad Eu. cap. 9.
 ders of the Church, reckoneth vp Bishops, Priestes, Deacons, Beleuers, and Cathecumeni : to the rest of the Clergy & monkes he giueth no proper place.

2 Therefore to whom the office of teachinge was enioyned, all them they named Priestes. In euery city they chose out of their own number one man, to whom they specially gaue the title of Bishoppe: that dissentions shoulde not grow of equality, as it is wont to come to passe. Yet the Bishop was not so about the rest in honor and dignity, y he had a dominion ouer his felowes. But what office y Consul had in the Senate, to propound of matters, to aske opinions, to go before the other with counselling, monishing and exhorting, to gouerne the whole action with his authority, and to put in execution that which is decreed by common counsell: the same office had the Bishop in the assembly of the Priestes. And the olde wryters themselues confesse, that the same was by Mens consent brought in for the necessity of the times. Therefore Hierome vpon the Epistle to Titus saith : The same was a Priest which was a Bishop. And before that by the institution of the Deuill, there were dissentions in religion, and it was said amonge peoples : I am of Paule, I am of Cephas, Churches were gouerned by common counsell of Elders. Afterward, that the seedes of dissentions might be plucked vppe, all the care was committed to one man. As therfore the Priestes do know, that by custome of the Church they are subiect to him that is set ouer them: so let the Bishops know, that they are about the Priestes, rather by custome, than by the truth of the Lordes disposing, and that they ought to gouerne the church in common together. But in an other place he teacheth, how auncient an institutio it was. For he sayth that at Alexandria, from Marcke Epi. ad Eu.
 the Euangelist euen to Heraclas and Dionysius, the Priestes did alway choose out one of theselues, and set him in a hyer degree, whom they named a Bishop. Therefore euery city had a company of Priestes which were Pastors and Teachers. For they all did execute amonge the people that office of teaching, exhorting and correcting, which Paul appointeth to the Bishops: and that they might leaue secede af- Tit. 1. ter them, they trauailed in teaching the yonger men, that hadde professed themselues souldiours in the holy warfare. To euery city there was appointed a certaine countrey, that should take their Priestes from thence, and be accompted as it were into the body of that Church. Euery company (as I haue before sayd) only for preseruatiō of Policy and Peace, were vnder one Bishop: which was so aboue the rest in dignity, that he was subiect to the assembly of his brethren. If the compasse of ground that was vnder his Bishoprike were so great, that he coulde not suffice to serue all the offices of a Bishop in euery place of it, in the countrey it selfe there were in certaine places appointed Priestes which in small matters should execute his authority. Them they called countreybishops, because in the countrey they represented the Bishop.

3 But, so much as belongeth to the office, wherof we now speake, as well the Bishops as the Priestes were bound to apply the distributing of the word and Sacramentes. For it was ordained only at Alexandria, (because Arrius had there troubled the Church) y^e the priest should not preach to the people, as Socrates sayth in the 9. booke of the Tripartite history. Which yet Hierome confesseth that he mistaketh not. Truely it should be counted monstrous, if any man had giuen out himselfe for a Bishop, that had not also in very dede shewed himselfe a true Bishop. Therefore such was y^e seuerity of those times, that all ministers were driuen to the fulfilling of such office, as the Lord requireth of thé. Neither do I rehearse the maner of one age alone: For euen in Gregories time, when the Church was now almost decayed (certainely it was much degenerate from the auncient purities) it had not bin tolerable that any Bishop shoulde abstaine from preaching. The Priest (sayth he in one place) dieth if there be no sōūd heard of him: because he asketh against himselfe the wrath of the secrete iudge, if he go without sounde of preaching. And in an other place: When Paule testifieth that he is cleane from the bloud of all: in this saying we be conuincid, we be bounde, we be shewed to be guilty, which are called Priestes, which beside the euils that we haue of our owne, adde also the deathes of other: because we kill so many as we beinge luke warme and silent do daily see to go to death. He calleth himselfe & other silent, because they were lesse diligēt in their worke than they ought to be. When he spareth not them, that did halfe performe their duty: what thinke you he would haue done, if a man had altogether sitte idle? Therefore this was a great while holden in the Church, that the chiefe duty of the Bishop was to feede Gods people with the word, or both publikely and priuately to edifie the Church with sound doctrine.

Archebi-

Archebifhop: alfo where in the Nicene Synode there were ordained Patriarches, which fhoulde in degree & dignity be aboue the Archbifhops, that pertained to the preferuinge of difcipline. Howebeit in this difcourfe, that which was moft rarely vfed may not be omitted. For this caufe therfore chiefly thefe degrees were ordained, that if any thing hapned in any Church, that could not well be ended by a fewe, might be referred to a prouinciall Synode. If the greatneffe or difficulty of the matter required a greater difcuffinge, the Patriarches were alfo called to it with the Synodes, frō whom there might be no appelle but to a General Council. The gouernment fo ordered many called a Hierarchie, by a name (as I thinke) vnproper, and truly vnufed in the Scriptures. For the holy Gheft willed to prouide, that no mā fhould dreame of a principality or dominion whē the gouernment of the Church is fpoken of. But if, leauinge the word we looke vpon the thing, we fhall finde that the old Bifhops ment to forge no forme of ruling the Church, differing from that which the Lord appointed by his word.

5 Neither was the order of the Deacons at that time any other then it was vnder the Apoftles. For they receiued the daily offerings of the Faithfull, and the yearely reuenues of the Church, to beftowe them vpon true vfes, that is to fay, to diftribute thē to fede partly the minifters, & partly the poore: but by the appointment of the Bifhop, to whome alfo they yearely rendred accomptes of their diftribution. For whereas the Canons do euery where make the Bifhop diftributer of all the goods of the Church, it is not fo to be vnderftanded, as though he did by himfelfe difcharge that care: but becaufe it was his part to appoint to the Deacon, who fhould be receiued into the common almes of the Church, and of that which remained, to whome it fhould be giuen, & how much to euery one: becaufe he had an ouerfeeing whether the Deacon did faithfully execute that which belōged to his office. For thus it is red in the canons which they afcribe to the Apoftles: We commaunde that the Bifhoppe haue the goodes of the Church in his owne power. For if he be put in truft with the foules of men, which are more precious, much more it is meete that he haue charge of money: fo that by his power all thinges may be diftributed to the poore by the Elders and Deacons: that they may be miniftred with all feare and carefulneffe. And in the Council of Antioche Cap. 35 it is decreed, that the Bifhops fhoulde be reftained that meddle with the goodes of the Church, without the knowledge of the Elders and Deacons. But of that point we neede to make no longer difputation, fith it is euident by many epiftles of Gregoric, that euen at that time, when otherwise the ordinances of the Church were much corrupted, yet this obseruation continued, that the Deacons shoulde vnder the Bishop be the stewardest of the poore. As for Subdeacons, it is likely y^e at the beginning they were ioyned to the Deacōs, that they should vse their seruice about the poore: but that difference was by litle and litle confounded. But Archdeacons began then to be created, when the plenty of the goods, required a new and more exact maner of disposing them: Albeit Hierome doth say, that it was euen in his age. In their charge was the summe of their reuenues, possessions, and store, and the collection of the daily offerings. Whereupon Gregory declareth to the Archdeacon of Salon, that he shoulde be holden guilty if any of the goodes of y^e Church perished either by his fraud or negligence. But whereas it was giuen to them to reade the Gospel to the people, and to exhort them to prayer: and whereas they were admitted to deliuer the Cuppe in the holy Supper, that was rather done to garnish their office, that they shoulde execute it with the more reuerence, whē by such signes they were admonished that it was no prophane bailiwiki that they exercised, but a spirituall function and dedicate to God.

6 Hereby also we may iudge what vse there was, and what maner of distribution of the Church goods. Ech where both in the decrees of the Synodes, and among the old wryters it is to be found, that whatsoever the Church possesseth either in landes or in money, is the patrimony of the poore. Therefore oftentimes there this song is sung to the Bishops and Deacons, that they shoulde remember, that they medle not with their owne goodes, but the goodes appointed to the necessity of the poore: which if they vnfaithfully suppress or wast, they shalbe guilty of bloud. Whereby they are admonished, with great feare & reuerence, as in the sight of God, without respect of persons, to distribute them to whom they be due. Hereupon also come those graue protestations in Chrysostome, Ambrose, Augustine, and other like Bishoppes, whereby they affirme their owne vprightnesse to the people. But sith it is equity, and established by the law of the Lorde, that they which employ their seruice to the Church, shoulde be fed with the common charges of the Church, and also many Priestes in that age, consecrating their patrimonies to God, were willingly made poore: the distributinge was such, that neither the ministers wanted sustenance, nor the poore were neglected. But yet in the meane time it was provided, that the ministers themselues, which ought to giue exáple of honest sparing to other, should not haue so much, wherby they might abuse it to riotous excesse or deliciousnes, but only wherwith to sustaine their owne nede. For those of the Clergy (sayth Hierome) which are able to liue of the goods of their parents, if they take that which is the poores, do commit sacrilege, & by such abuse they eate and drinke to themselues damnation.

7 First the ministracion was free and voluntary, whereas the Bishops and Deacons were of their owne wil faithfull, and vprightnesse of conscience and innocence of life were to them in stede of lawes. Afterwarde when euill examples grewe of the gredinesse or peruerse affections of some, to correct those faultes, the canons were made, which diuided the reuenues of the Church into foure partes: of which they assigned one part to thē of the Clergy, the second to the poore, the third to the maintenance and reparation of Churches, and other holy buildinges, the fourth to the poore as well straungers as of their owne countrey. For whereas the other canons, giue this last parte to the Bishop, that varieth nothing frō my abouesaid diuision. For they meane not that that part should be his owne, that either he himselfe alone shoulde deuoure it, or poure it out, vpon whom or what he list, but that it should suffice to maintaine the Hospitality which Paul requireth of that order. And so do Gelasius & Gregory expound it. For Gelasius bringeth no other reason why the Bishop should chalenge any thinge to himselfe, but that he might giue it prisoners and strangers. And Gregory speaketh yet more plainely. It is the maner (sayth he) of the sea Apostolike, to giue cōmaundement to the Bishop when he is ordred, that of all the reuenuē that ariseth, there be made foure portions: that is to say, the one to the Bishop and his family for Hospitality, & entertainment: the second to the Clergy: the third to the poore: the fourth to the repairing of Churches. Therefore it was lawfull for the Bishoppe to take nothing to his owne vse, but so much as were enough for moderate & meane foode and clothing. If any began to excede, either in riotous expense, or in ostentation and pomp, he was by and by repressed by his felowes, & if he obeyed not, he was put from his dignity.

8 As for that which they bestowed vpon garnishinge of holy thinges, at the first it was very litle. Afterward when the Church became somewhat richer, yet in that behalfe they stil kept a meane. And yet all the money that was bestowed therupon, remained safe for the poore, if any greater necessity happened. So when famine possessed the Prouince of Hierusalem, and the nede could not otherwise be re-lieued, Cyrillus solde the vessels and garmentes, and spent them vpon sustenance of the poore. Likewise Acarius Bishop of Amida, when a great multitude of the Persians, in a maner starued for hunger, called together the Clergy, and when he had made that notable oration, Our God needeth neither dishes nor cuppes, because he neither eateth nor drinketh, he melt the vessels, to make thereof both meate & ransome for mē in misery. Hierom also, when he inueyeth against the to much gorgiousnes of temples, doth with honor make mentiō of Exuperius Bishop of Tholosa in his time, which caried the Lords body in a wicker basket, and his bloud in glasse, but suffred no poore mā to be hungry. That which I euen now sayd of Acatius, Ambrose rehearseth of himselfe. For when the Arrians charged him, for y he had broken y holy vessels to ransom prisoners, he vsed this most godly excuse: He that sent y Apostles without golde, gathered Churches together without gold. The Church hath gold, not to kepe it, but to bestow it, & to giue reliefe in necessities. What neede is to kepe that which helpeth not? Do we not know, how much golde and tiluer the Assyrians tooke out of the temple of the Lord? Doth not the Priest better to melt them for the sustenance of the poore, if other reliefes do faile, than an enemy a robber of God to beare them away? Will not the Lord say: Why hast thou suffred so many nedy to die for hunger? & verily thou hadst gold whereof thou mightest haue ministred them sustenance. Why were so many led away captiue, & not ransomed? why were so many slaine by the enemy? It had bin better that thou shouldest saue the vessels of liuinge men, than of metalles. To these things thou shalt not be able to aunswere. For what wouldest thou say? I feared least Gods tēple should want garnishing. He would answere: Sacraments require not gold: neither do those things please with golde that are not bought with golde. The ransoming of prisoners is a garnishing of Sacraments. In summe, we see that it is most true which the same man sayeth in an other place, that whatsoeuer the Church thē possessed was the store of the nedy. Againe: that a Bishop hath nothing that is not the poores.

9 These that we haue rehearsed were the ministeries of the Old Church. For the other of which the Ecclesiasticall wryters make mention, were rather certaine exercises and preparations, than appointed offices. For those holy men, that they might leaue a store for the Church after them, receiued into their charge, gouernance & discipline, yong men which with the consent & authority of their parentes, professed themselues souldiours of the spirituall warfare: & they so framed them from their tēder age, that they should not come vnskilful & raw to the executing of their office. But all they that were instructed with such beginnings, were called Clerkes. I would in dede that some other proper name hadde rather bin giuen them. For this name grew of error, or of corrupt affectiō: forasmuch as Peter cal-^{1. Pet. 5.} leth the whole Church the Clergy, that is to say, the Lordes inheri-^{3.} tance. But the institution it selfe was very holy and profitable, that they which woulde consecrate themselues and their seruice to the Church, should be so brought vp vnder the keeping of the Bishop, that none should minister to the Church, but he that were well informed aforehande, and that had from his very youth both sucked holy do-ctine, and by seuerer discipline put in a certaine continuing quality of grauity & holy life, & were estranged from worldly cares, & were accustomed to spiritual cares and studies. But as yong souldiours are by certaine counterfeit skirmishes instructed to learne true and earnest fight, so there were also certaine rudimentes, whereby they were ex-exercised while they were Clerkes, before that they were promoted to the very offices. Therefore first they committed to the Clerkes the charge to open and shut the Church, and they named them Ostiarij, dorekeepers. Afterward they called them Acoluthi, folowers, which waited vpon the Bishop in his houthold seruices, and did continually accompany him, first for honors sake, & then that no suspition should arise of them. Morouer y by litle & litle they might become knowen to the people, and get to themselues commendation: also that they might learne to abide the sight of all men, & to speake before al men: that being made Priestes, when they came forth to teach, they should not be abashed with shame: therfore place was appointed the to read in the pulpet. After this maner they were promoted by degrees, to shew prooffe euery one of their diligēce in all their seuerall exercises, till they were made Subdeacons. This only is my meaning, that those were rather grosse beginnings, than such offices as were accompted among the true ministeries of the Church.

10 Whereas we said y the first & second point in the calling of ministers, are, what maner of men they ought to choose, & how great a religious carefulnes they ought to vse in that matter: therin the old Church hath folowed the prescribed order of Paul, & the examples of the Apostles, For they were wōt to come together to choose y pastors with most great reuerence, & carefull callinge vpon the name of God. Beside this they had a forme of examination, wherby they tried the life & doctrine of the that were to be chosen by that rule of Paul.
 Only they somewhat offended herein with too great seuerity, because they would require more in a Bishop than Paule required, & specially^{1. Tim. 3.} in processe of time they required vnmarried life. But in y other points^{2.} their obseruation was agreeinge with Paules description. But in this which we made the third point, that is to say, who ought to institute

Lib 2. ministers, they kept not alway one order. In olde time, none was re-ceiuved into the company of Clerkes without the consent of all the epist. 5. people: insomuch that Cyprian laboreth earnestly to excuse that he appointed one Aurelius to be a Reader without asking aduise of the Church, because that was done beside the custome, though not without reason. For this he sayth before: In ordering of Clerkes, dere brethren, we are wont first to aske you aduise, and by common counsell to wey the maners and deseruings of euery one. But because in these lesser exercises there was not much peril: because they were chosen to a longe prooffe, and not to a great office, therefore the consent of the people therin cessed to be asked. Afterward in the other degrees also, except the Bishoprike, the people commonly left the iudgemēt and choise of them to the Bishop and the Priestes, that they shoulde examine who were meete and worthy : sauinge peraduenture when new Priestes were appointed for paroches : for then it behoued that the multitude of that place namely should consent. Neither is it any maruall, that the people in this behalfe was litle carefull in keepinge their owne right: For no man was made a Subdeacon, that had not shewed a longe prooffe of himselfe in his beinge a Clerke, vnder that seuerity of discipline, which then was vsed. After that he hadde bin tried in that degree, he was made a Deacon. From thense he came to the honor of priesthoode if he had behaued himselfe faithfully. So no man was promoted, of whom there had not bin in deede a triall had many yeares before the eyes of the people. And there were many cannōs to punish their faultes: so that the Church could not be troubled with euil Priestes or Deacons, vnles it neglected the remedies. Howbeit in the Priestes also there was alway required the cōsent of them of the same city: which the very first canon testifieth in the 67. distinction, which is fathered vpon Anacletus. Finally all the admissions into orders were therefore done at certaine appointed times of the yeare, that no man should priuily crepe in without the consent of the faithfull, or shoulde with too much easinesse be promoted without witnesses.

11 In choosing of Bishops the people had the liberty longe preserued; that none shoulde be thrust in that were not accepted of all.
 This therefore was forbidden in the counsell at Antioche, that none shoulde be thrust in to them against their will. Which thinge also Epi. 90. Leo the first doth diligently confirme. Hereupon came these sayings:
 cap. 2. Let him be chosen, whom the Clergy, and the people, or the greater number shall require. Againe: Let him that shall beare rule ouer al, be chosen of all. For it must needes be, that he that is made a ruler being

vnkown and not examined, is thrust in by violence. Againe, Lette him be chosen, that is both chosen by the Clerkes, and desired by the people: & let him be consecrate by them of that Prouince, with the iudgement of the Metropolitane. The holy Fathers tooke so great heede that this liberty of the people should by no meane be diminished, that when the generall Synode gathered together at Constantinople did order Nectarius, they would not do it without the allowance of the whole Clergy & people, as they testified by their epistle to the Synode at Rome. Therefore when any Bishop did appoint a successor to himselfe, it was not otherwise stablished, vnles the whole people did confirme it. Whereof you haue not onely an example, but also the very forme in Augustine in y^e naming of Eradius. And Theodorite, when he reherfeth that Peter was named by Athanasius to be his successour, by and by addeth, that the order of priestes confirmed it, & the magistrate, and nobility, & the people approoued it with their allowing shouwe.

12 I graunt in dede that this also was by very good reason stablished in the Councell at Laodicea, that the Election should not be left to multitudes. For it scarcely happeneth at any time, that so many heades should wel order any thing with one meaning: and commonly this is true, that the vncertaine communalty is diuided into contrary affections. But for this peril there was vsed a very good remedy. For first the Clerkes onely did choose: whom they had chosen they presented to the Magistrate, or to the Senate and chiefe men of the people. They, after consultation hadde, if they thought the election good, confirmed it: if not, they did choose an other, whome they did rather allow. Then the matter was moued to the multitude, which although they were not bound to those fore iudgementes, yet thereby they could the lesse be disordered. Or if they began at the multitude: that was done onely to learne whom they did chiefly desire. When the desires of the people were heard, the they of y^e Clergy did choose him. So neither was it lawfull for the Clergy to appoint whom they listed, neither were they bounde to obey the foolish desires of the people. Leo appointeth this order in an other place, when he sayth: There are to be looked for, both the desires of the citizens, the peoples testimonies, the iudgement of the honorable, & the election of the clerkes. Againe, Let there be holden the testimony of the honorable, the subscription of the clerkes, the consent of the order & communalty. No reason (sayth he) suffreth it to be otherwise done. And nothinge else meaneth y^e decree of the Synode at Laodicea, but that the clergy, & chiefe of the people, should not suffer themselues to be carried away by the vndiscrete multitude : but rather that with their wisdom & grauity they should repress the peoples foolish affections, if at any time nede should so require.

13 This order of choosing was yet in force in the time of Gregory: & it is likely that it endured long after. There remaine many Epistles of his, that giue euident testimony of this matter. For so oft as he hath to do with the creating of any new Bishop, he vseth to wryte to the clergy, to the order, & to the people, & sometime also to the ruler, according as the gouernment of the city is appointed. But if by reason of the disordered state of the Church, he comitteth to any Bishop adioyninge, the charge of overseeing in the election, yet he alway requireth a solemne decree strenghtened with the subscriptions of all.

ib 2. Yea and when there was one Constantius create Bishop at Milaine, pi. 69. and that many of the Millaneis were by reason of the invasion of the barbarous nations fled to Genua; he thought that the election could not otherwise be lawful, vnlesse they also were called together & gaue their assent. Yea there are not yet five hundred yeares past, since Pope Nicolas decreed thus of the election of the Bishop of Rome: that the Cardinall Bishops shoulde beginne, then that they shoulde ioyne to them the rest of the clergy, last of all that the election should be confirmed by the consent of the people. And in the ende he reciteth that decree of Leo, which I euen now alleaged, & commaundeth it from thense forth to be in force. But if the malice of wicked men shall so preuaile, that the clerkes to make a true election be compelled to depart out of the city: yet he commaundeth that some of the people be present with them, As for the Emperours consent, so farre as I can perceiue, was required only in two Churches, that is, Rome: and Constantinople: because there were the two seates of the Empire. For whereas Ambrose was sent to Milaine with a power from Valentinian to gouerne the election of the new Bishop: that was extraordinarily done, by reason of grieuous factions wherewith the citizens then boyled among themselues. But at Rome in old time the Emperours authority was of so great force in creatinge of the Bishop, that distin. 3. cap. in no. line. Grego- ry sayeth, that he was set by his commaundement in the gouernment of the Church: when yet by solemne vsage he was desired by the people. This was the maner, that whē the clergy & the people had appointed any bishop, the clergy should forthwith moue it to the Emperour, that he should either by his allowance confirme the election, or by disallowance vndo it. Neither are the decrees that Gratian gathereth together, repugnant to this custome: wherein is nothinge else sayd, but that it is in no wise to be suffred, that takinge away the canonicall election, a kinge shoulde appoint a Bishop after his owne lust: & that the Metropolitan shou'd cōsecrate none that were so promoted by violence powers: For it is one thinge to spoyle the Church of her right, that all should be transferred to the lust of one man: and an other thinge to graunt this honor to a kinge or an Emperour, that by his authority he may confirme a lawfull election.

14 Now it followeth, that we entreate, with what forme the ministers of the Church were admitted into their office after election: this the Latines called Ordinatio or Consecration: the Grekes haue called it Cheirotonia, lifting vp of handes, and sometime also Cheirothesia, laying on of handes. Howbeit Cheirotonia is properly called that kinde of electiō, where mens consentes are declared by holding vp of their handes. There remaineth a decree of the Nicene cōcil, that the Metropolitan should mete together with all the Bishops of the prouince to order him which is chosen. But if some of them be hindered either by length of way, or by sicknesses, or by any necessity, that yet three at the least should mete: and that they that are absent shoulde by letters testifie their consent. And this Canon, when with discontinuance it grew out of vse, was afterward renewed with many Synodes. But all, or at least as many as had no excuse, were therefore cōmanded to be present, that they might haue the grauer triall of the learninge and maners, of him that was to be ordered: for the matter was not done without triall. And it appeareth by Ciprians words, that in the old time they were wont not to be called after the election, but to be present at the election: and to this ende that they should be as it were gouernours, that nothing should be troublesomly done, in the multitude. For where he sayd that the people haue power either to choose worthy Priestes, or to refuse vnworthy, within a litle after he addeth: Wherefore accordinge to the tradition of God & of the Apostles, it is to be diligently kept and holden (which is yet holden with vs also & in a maner throughout all prouinces) that for the right celebration of orderings, all the Bishops adioyninge of the same prouince should come together to that people for which a gouernour is ordered, and that the Bishop be chosen in presence of the people. But when they were sometime slowly gathered together, and there was peril lest some would abuse that delay to occasion of ambitious sving: it was thought that it should be enough if after the election made, they should mete and after allowance vpon lawfull examination consecrate him.

15 When this was ech where done without exception, by litle & litle a diuerse maner grew in vse, that they which were chose should resorte to the Metropolitane city to fetche their orderinge. Which came to passe rather by ambition, and by deprauation of the first institution, than by any good reason. And not long after, when the authority of the see of Rome was now encreased, there came in place yet a worse custome, that the Bishoppes almost of all Italy shoulde fetche their consecration from thence. Which we may note out of the Epistles of Gregorie. Onely a fewe cities, which did not so easily giue place, hadde their auncient right preferued: as there is an example had of Millaine. Paraduventure the onely Metropolitane cities kept their priuiledge. For all the Bishoppes of the Prouince were wont to come together to the chiefe citie to consecrate the Archebishoppe. But the Ceremonie was laying on of handes. For I reade of no other Ceremonies vsed: sauinge that in the solemne assembly the Bishops had a certtaine apparell whereby they might be distinctly knowen from other Priestes. They ordered also Priestes and Deacons with onely layinge on of handes. But euery Bishoppe with the company of Priestes ordered his owne Priestes. But although they did all the same thing: yet because the Bishop went before, and it was all done as it were by his guidinge, therefore the ordering was called his. Whereupon the old writers haue oft this saying: that a Priest differeth from a Bishop in no other thinge, but because he hath not the power of ordering.

The v. Chapter.

That the olde forme of government is viterly ouerthrowers by the tyranny of the Papacy.

NOW it is good to set before mēs eies the order of gouerning the Church, that the see of Rome and all the champions thereof do kepe at this day, & the whole image of that Hierarchie which they continually haue in their mouth, and to compare it with that order of the first & old Church which we haue described: y by the cōparison it may appeare what maner of Church they haue, which vse this only title to charge or rather to ouerwhelm vs. But it is best to begin at Callinge, that we see both who, and what maner of mē, and by what order they be called to this ministry. And then afterward we shal consider how faithfully they execute their office. We will giue the first place to Bishops: to whom I would to God this might be an honor, to haue y first place in this discourse. But the matter it selfe doth not suffer me, ones to touch this thing be it neuer so lightly, without their great shame. And yet I will remember, in what kinde of wryting I am now occupied: & will not suffer my talke, which which ought to be framed onely to simple doctrine, to flow abroade beyonde due boundes. But let some one of them that haue not vtterly lost all shame, answer me, what maner of bishoppes are at this day commonly chosen. Truly it is now growen too much out of vse, to haue any examinatio had of their learning: but if there be had any respect of learning, they choose some lawyer that can rather brawle in a court, than preach in a Church. This is certaine, that these hundred yeares there hath scarcely bin euery hundreth man chosen that vnderstoode any thing of holy doctrine. I do not therefore spare the former ages, for y they were much better, but because we haue now only the present Church in questiō. If iudgement be had of their manners, we shall finde that there haue bin few or almost none, whom the olde Canons woulde not haue iudged vnworthy. He that was not a dronkard was a whoremonger: he that was also cleane from this wickednesse, was either a dyce, or a hunter, or dissolute in some parte of his life. For there be lighter faultes, which by the olde Canons do exclude a man frō being a bishop. But this is a most great absurdity, y very children scarcely ten yeares olde, are by the Popes graunt made bishops. They are growen to such shamelesnes, and senselesse dulnes, that they dreaded not that extreme yea & monstrous wicked doing, which is vtterly abhorring from the very sense of nature. Hereby appeareth howe religious their elections were, where the negligence was so carelesse.

2 Now in election, all that right of the people is takē away. Their desirings, their assentings, their subscribings, and all such thinges are vanished: the whole power is transferred to the Canons onely. They bestowe the bishoprike vpon whom they will, and afterwarde bringe him forth into the sight of y people, but to be worshipped, not to be examined. But Leo crieth on the other side, that no reason suffreth it, and he pronounceth that it is a violent imposition. Ciprian, when he testifieth that it proceedeth from the law of God that it should not be done but by the consent of the people, sheweth that the cōtrary manner is repugnāt to the word of God. The decrees of so many Synodes do most seuerely forbid it to be otherwise done: & if it be done, they commaunde it to be voide. If these thinges be true, there now remaineth in y Papacy no Canonical election, neither by Gods law nor by the Ecclesiastical law. But although there were no other euil, yet how shal they be able to excuse this that they haue so spoyled the Church of her right? But (say they) the corruption of times so required, that because in appointinge of bishops, hatreds and affections more preuailed with the people and the Magistrates, than right and sounde judgement, therefore the rule thereof should be giuen to a few. Admit verily that this were the extreme remedy of a mischief in depeired case. But sith the medecine it selfe hath appeared more hurtfull than the very disease, why is not this new euil also remedied? But (say they) it is exactly prescribed to the Canons, what they ought to folow in the election. But do we dout, but that the people in old time did vnderstand that they were bound to most holy lawes, when they saw that they had a rule set the by the word of God, when they came together to choose a bishop? For that only voyce of God, wherby he describeth the true Image of a bishop, ought worthily to be of more value than infinit thousandes of Canons. But neuerthelesse the people, corrupted with a most euill affection, had no regard of the lawe or of equity. So at this day though there be very good lawes writtē, yet they remaine buried in papers. Yet for the most part it is vsed in mens maners, yea and alowed as though it were done by good reason, that dronkards, whoremongers, dycers, are commonly promoted to this honor: (it is but litle that I say) that bishoprikes are the rewardes of adulteries and bawderies. For when they are giuen but to hunters and falconers, it is to be thought to be gaily well bestowed. Any way to excuse so haynous indignity, it is too much wicked. The people (say I) had in olde time a very good Canon to whom Gods word prescribed, that a bishoppe ought to be vnreprouable, a teacher, no fighter. &c. Why therefore is the charge of choosinge removed from the people to these men? Because forsooth the word of God was not heard among the tumultes & seditious partakings of the people. And why shoulde it not at this day be removed againe from these men, which not onely do breake all lawes, but casting away all shame, do wantonly, couetously, ambitiously, mingle and confounde Gods and mens matters together?

3 But they lye, when they say, y^e this was deuised for a remedy. We often read that in old time Churches were in tumultes at the choosinge of bishops: yet neuer any man durst thinke of taking away the authority from the people. For they had other wayes whereby they might either preuent these faultes, or amend the if they were alredy comitted. But I will tell what it is. When the people began to be negligent in makinge the elections, and did cast that care vpon the Priestes as litle belonging to them, they abused this occasion to vsurp a tyranny to themselues, which afterwarde they stablished by new Canons set forth. As for their ordering, it is nothing els but a mere mockage. For the shew of examination that they there set out is so vaine and hungry, that it wanteth euen all colour. Therefore whereas in some places

Princes haue by couenāt obtained of the bishops of Rome, that they themselues might name bishops, therein the Church suffered no new losse: because the election was taken away, onely from the Canons, which had by no right violently takē it, or verily stolen it. Truly this is a most fowle example, y^e out of the court are sent bishops to possesse Churches: & it should be the worke of godly Princes to abstaine from such corruption. For it is a wicked spoiling of y^e Church, when there is thrust vnto any people a bishop, whom they haue not desired, or at least with free voice allowed. But that vnorderly maner which hath longe ago bin in the Churches, gaue occasion to Princes to take the presentation of bishops into their owne handes. For they had rather that it should be their gift, than those mens, to whom it nothing more belonged, and which did no lesse wrongfully abuse it.

4 Loc here is a noble calling, by reason whereof the bishops boast themselues to be the successors of the Apostles. But they say that the authority to create Priestes belongeth to them only. But in this they most lewdly corrupt the old institution: because they do not by their ordering create Priestes to rule and fede the people, but Sacrificers to Sacrifice. Likewise when they consecrate Deacons, they do nothinge of their true & proper office, but they ordaine them only to certaine Ceremonies about the chalice and the paten. But in the Synode at Chalcedon, it is contrariwise decreed, that the orderings should not be absolutely giuen, that is to say, but that a place shoulde be therewithall assigned to them that are ordered, where they shall exercise their office. This decree is for two causes very profitable. First, that the Church shoulde not be burdened with superfluous charges: nor that that should be spent vppon idle men which should be giuen to the poore: Secondly, that they which be ordered, should thinke that they be not promoted to an honor, but that there is an office committed vnto them, to the execution whereof they are bounde by solemne protestation. But the Romishe maisters (which thinke that there is nothinge in religion to be cared for, but their bellie) first do expounde title to be the reuenue that may suffice to sustaine them, whether it be by their owne liuelyhoode or by benefice. Therefore when they order a Deacon or a Priest, without taking care where they ought to minister, they giue them the order, if they be rich enough to finde themselues. But what man can admit this, that the title which the decree of the Councell requireth, shoulde be the yearly reuenue for their sustenance? But nowe because the later Canons condemned the bishoppes with penalty to finde them whom they had ordered without sufficient title, by this meane to restraine their too much ease admitting: there hath bin also a suttelty deuised to mocke out this penalty. For he that is ordered, naminge any title whatsoever it be, promisseth that he wilbe content therewith: by this shift he is driuen from his action for his finding. I passe ouer a thousande fraudes that are herein vsed: that when some do falsely name vaine titles of benefices, wherupon they can not make fīue shillings by yere: other some vnder secret couenāt do borow benefices, which they promise that they wil by and by restore againe, but sometime they restore not at all. And such other misteries.

5 But although these grosser abuses were takē away, is not this alway an absurdity, to appoint a Priest to whom you assigne no place? Also they order no man but to Sacrificē. But the true ordināce of a Priest is, to be called to the government of the Church: & a Deacon to be called to the gathering of y^e almes: they do in dedde with many pompes shadow their doing, that in the very show it may haue a reuerēce among the simple. But among men that haue their sound wit, what can these disguisings auail, if there be no sound stuffe or truth vnderneath them? For they vse Ceremonies about it, either fetched out of Iewishnes, or fained of thēselues: which it were better to forbear. But of true examination, (for I nothinge passe vpon that shadow which they retaine) of the peoples cōsent, & of other things necessary, they make no mention. I call a shadow their foolish gesturings mete to be laughed at, framed to a fond & colde counterfaiting of antiquity. The bishops haue their deputies which before the ordering may enquire of their learninge. But what? whether they can reade their masses: whether they can decline a common nowne, that they shal light vpon in reading, or coniugate a verbe, or do know the signification of one word, for it is not necessary that they be cunning enough to construe a verse. And yet they be not put backe frō Priest-hood, which faile euen in the childish rudiments, so that they bring any money or commendation of fauour. Of like sort it is, that when they are brought to y^e altare to be ordered, it is asked thise in a tong not vnderstanded, whether they be worthy of that honor. One answereth (which neuer saw them: but because nothinge should want of the forme, he hath that part in the play) They are worthy. What may a man blame in these reuerend fathers, but that with mockinge in so open Sacrileges, they do without shame laugh to scorne both God and men? But because they are in long possession therof, they thinke that nowe it is lawefull for them. For whosoever dare once open his mouth against these so euident and so haynous wicked doinges, he is forthwith haled by them to punishment of death, as though it were one

one that had in olde time disclosed abroad the holy misteries of Ceres, would they do this if they thought that there were any God?

6 Nowe howe much do they behaue themselues better in bestowinge of benefices: which thing was ones ioined with y ordering, but nowe it is altogether separate? There is among them a diuerse maner. For the Bishops onely do not conferre benefices: and in those whereof they are said to haue the conferring, they haue not the full right: but other haue the presentation, and they retein onely the title of collation for honors sake. There are also nominatiōs out of scholes, & resignations, either simple, or made for cause of echange, commendatorie writings; preuentions, and whatsoeuer is of that sorte. But they also behaue themselues that none of thē can reproch an other with any thing. So I affirme, that scarcely euery hundreth benefice, is bestowed at this day in the papacy without Simonie, as the olde writers defined Simony. I do not say that they all buy them with ready money: but shewe me one of twentie that commeth to a benefice without some by commendation, some either kinned or alliance promoteth, and some the authoritie of their parentes: some by doing of pleasures dō get themselues fauor. Finally benefices are geuen to this ende, not to provide for the Churches, but for them that receiue them. Therefore they call them benefices, by which worde they do sufficiently declare, that they make no other accompt of them, but as the beneficiall giftes of princes, whereby they either get the fauour of their soldiars or rewarde their seruices. I omit how these rewardes are bestowed vpon barbers, cookes, moile keepers, and such dreggith men. And nowe iudiciall courtes do ring of no matters more, than aboute benefices: so that a man may say that they are nothing els but a pray cast afore dogs to hunt after. Is this tolerable euen to be heard of, that they should be called Pastors, which haue brokē into the possessiō of a Church as into a ferme of their enemy? that haue gotten it by brawling in the lawe? that haue bought it for money? that haue deserued it by filthy seruices? which being childrē yet scantly able to speake, haue receiued it, as by inheritance from their vnclcs and kinsmen, and some bastardes from their fathers?

7 Would euer the licentiousnesse of the people, though they had bene neuer so corrupt and lawelesse, haue gone so farre? But this is also more monstrous, that one man, (I will not say what maner of man, but truely such a one as can not gouerne himselfe) is set to gouerne fīue or six Churches. A man may see in these dayes in Princes courtes, yong men that haue thre abbaties, two Bishoprikes, one Archbishoprike. But there be cōinonly Canons with fīue, six or seuen

Cap. 5. Of the outwarde meanes

benefices, whereof they haue no care at all, but in receiuing the reuenues. I will not obiecte, that it is eche where cried out against by the word of God, which hath long ago cessed to be of any estimation at all among them. I will not obiect, that there haue bene many most seueren penall ordinances in many councells made against this wickednes: for those also they boldly despise as oft as they list. But I say that both are monstrous wicked doings, which are vtterly against God & nature and the gouernment of the Church, that one robber shall oppresse many Churches at ones, and that he should be called a Pastor, which can not be presente with his flocke though he would: and yet (such is their shamelesnesse) they couer such abominable filthinesse with the name of the Church, to deliuer themselues from all blame. But also (and God will) in these lewdnesses is contained that holy succession, by the merit whereof they boast that it is wrought that the Church may not perishe.

8 Now (which is the seconde marke in iudging a lawfull Pastor) let vs see howe faithfully they exercise their office. Of the Priests that be there created, some be Monkes, some be (as they call them) Secular. The first of these two companies was vnknownen to the olde Church: and it is so against the profession of Monkes, to haue such a place in the Church, that in olde time when they were chosen out of Monasteries into the clergie, they cessed to be Monkes. And Gregorie, whoes time had much dregges, yet suffered not this confusion to be made. For he willeth that they be put out of the Clergie that be made Abbots, for that no man can rightly be together both a Monke and a clerke: sith the one is a hinderance to the other. Nowe if I aske, howe he well fulfilleth his office, whom the Canons declare to be vnmete: what I pray you, will they aunswere? They will forsooth allege vnto me those vntimely borne decrees of Innocent and Boniface, whereby Monkes are so receiued into the honor and power of Priesthode, that they might still abide in their Monasteries. But what reason is this, that euery vnlearned asse, so sone as he hath ones possessed the sea of Rome, may with one word ouerthrowe all antiquity? But of this matter we shall speake hereafter. Let this suffice for this time, that in the purer Church it was holden for a great absurdity, if a Monke did execute the office of Priesthode. For Hierome sayeth that he doth not execute the office of a Priest, while he is conuersant among Monkes: and maketh himselfe one of the common people to be ruled by the Priests. But, although we graunt them this, what do they of their dutie? Of the mendicantes some do preach: all the other Monkes either sing or mumble vp masses in their dennes. As though either Christ willed, or the nature of the office suffereth, Priests to be made to this purpose. Whereas the Scripture plainly Aa. 20. testifieth, that it is the priests office to rule his owne Church, is it not 23. a wicked prophanation, to turne an other way, yea vtterly to change the holy institution of God? For when they are ordered, they are expressly forbiddē to do the things that God cōmaundeth all priests. For this song is song to them: let a Monke, cōtente with his cloister, not presume to minister the Sacramentes, nor to execute any thing belonging to publike office. Let them deny, if they can, that it is an open mockerie of God, that any priest should be made to this purpose, to absteine from his true and naturall office: and that he which hath the name, may not haue the thing.

9 I come to the secular priests: which are partly beneficed men, (as they call them) that is to say, haue benefices whereupon to liue: and partly do let out their daily labour to hire, in massing, or singing; and liue as it were of a stipende gathered thereupon. Benefices haue either care of soules, as bihoprikes, and cures of paroches: or they be the stipendes of deintie men, that get their liuing with singing, as prebendes, Canonships, personages, and dignities, chaplainships, and such other. Howbeit, sins things are nowe turned vpside downe, Abbacies and priories are geuen to very boyes, by priuilege, that is to say by common and vsuall custome. As concerning the hirelings, that get their liuing from day to day, what should they do otherwise than they do? that is in teruile and shameful maner to giue out them selues for gaine, specially sith there is so great a multitude as nowe the world swarmeth with? Therefore when they dare not beg openly, or forasmuch as they thinke they shoulde but little profite that way, they go about like hungry dogs, and with their importunacie; as with barking, they enforce out of men against their willes somewhat to thrust into their bealy. Here if I would go about to expresse in wordes, howe great a dishonour it is to the Church, that the honor and office of priesthod is come to this point, I should haue no ende. Therefore it is not mete that the readers should looke for at my hande such a long declaration as may be proportionall to so heinous indignitie. Brefely I say, if it be the office of priesthod, (as the word of God prescribeth, and the auncient canons require) to feede the Church, and to gouerne the spirituall kingdome of Christ: 1. Cor. 4 all such sacrificers as haue none other worke or wages, but in making a market of masses, are not onely idle in their office, but also 21. haue no office at all to exercise. For there is no place assigned them to teach: they haue no flocke to gouerne: Finally there is nothing leste to them, but the altar, whereupon to sacrifice Christ: which is not to offer to God, but to deuils, as we shall see in an other place.

10 I do not here touch the outward faultes, but onely the inward euill, which sticketh fast by the roote in their institution. I will adde a saying, which will sound ill in their eares: but because it is true, I must speake it: that in the same degree are to be accompted Canons, Deanes, Chaplains, Prouosts, and ail they that are fedde with idle benefices. For what seruice can they do to the Church? For they haue put from themselues the preaching of the word, the care of discipline, and ministracion of Sacraments, as to much troublesome burdens. What then haue they remaining, whereby they may boast themselues to be true priests? Singing for sooth, and a pompe of Ceremonies. But what is that to y^e purpose? If they alledge Custome, if vse, if prescription of long time: I againe on the other side do lay vnto them the definition of Christ, whereby he hath expressed vnto vs both true priests, and what they ought to haue that will be accompted such. But if they can not beare so hard a lawe, to submit themselues to Christes rule: at the least let them suffer this matter to be determined by the authoritie of the Primitiue Church. But their case shall be neuer the better, if their state be iudged by the olde canons. They that haue degenerate into Canons, should haue bene priests, as they were in olde time, that should rule the Church in cōmon with the Bishop, and be as it were his companions in the office of Pastor. Those Chapter dignities as they call them, do nothing at all belong to the gouerning of the Church: much lesse, chapleinships, and the other dregges of like names, What accompt then shall we make of them all? Truly both the word of Christ, and the vsage of the Church excludeth them from the honor of priesthode. Yet they stiffely holde that they be priests: but we must plucke of their visour; so shall we finde, that their whole profession is most strange and far removed from that office of priests, both which the Apostles describe vnto vs, and which was required in the primitiue Church. Therefore all such Orders, with what titles soeuer they be notified, sith they be newe, being verily neither vpholden by the institution of God, nor by the auncient vsage of the Church, ought to haue no place in the description of the spiritual gouernment, which the Church hath receiued consecrate with the Lordes owne mouth. Or (if they will rather haue me to speake more simply and grossely) for as much as chaplains, canons, Deanes, Prouosts, & other idle bealies of the same sorte, do not so much as with their litle finger touch any small parcell of that office, which is necessarily required in priests, it is not to be

suffred, that in wrongfully taking a fals honor vpon themselues, they should breake the holy institution of Christ.

11 There remaine Bishops, and persons of Paroches: who, I would to God they did striue to reteine their office. For we would willingly graunt vnto them, that they haue a godly and excellent office, if they did execute it. But when they will be accōpted Pastors, while they forsake the Churches committed to them, and cast the care of them vpon other, they do as if it were the Pastors office to do nothing. If an vsurer y neuer stirred his foote out of the city, would professe himself a plowman, or a keper of a vineyarde: if a souldiour that had bene continually in the bataile and in the campe, and hadde neuer seene iudiciall court or bookes, would boast himselfe for a lawyer, who could abide such stinking folies? But these mē do somewhat more absurdly, that will seeme and be called lawfull Pastors of the Church, and yet will not be so. For howe many a one is there, that doth so much, as in shewe, exercise the gouernement of his Church? Many do all their life long deuoure the reuenues of Churches, to which they neuer come so much as to loke vpon them. Some other do ones by yeare either come themselues, or sende their stewart, that nothing should be lost in the letting to ferme. When this corruption first crept in, they that would enioy this kinde of vacation, exempted themselues by priuiledges: nowe it is a rare example, to haue one resident in his owne Church. For they esteeme them none otherwise than farmes, ouer which they set their vicars as bailies or farmers. But this very naturall reason reiecteth, that he should be pastor of a flocke, that neuer sawe one shepe thereof.

12 It appereth that euen in the time of Gregorie, there were Homil. certaine seedes of this mischief, that the rulers of Churches, began 17. to be negligēt in teaching: for he doth in one place grieuously complaine of it. The world (sayeth he) is full of priests: but yet in the haruest there are seldome workemen founde: because in deede we take vpon vs the office of priest, but we fulfill not the worke of the office. Againe, because they haue not the bowelles of charitie, they will seeme Lordes: they acknowledge not themselues to be fathers. They change the place of humilitie into the aduancing of lordlinessse. Againe, but what do we, O pastours, which receiue y rewarde, and are no workemen? We are fallen to outwarde businesse, and we take in hande one thing, and performe an other. We leaue the ministerie of preaching: and to our punishment, as I see, we are called Bishops, that keepe the name of honor and not of vertue. Sith he vseth so great sharpnesse of wordes against them, which were but lesse continuing and lesse diligent in their office: What I pray you, would he say, if he sawe of the Bishops almost none, or truly very fewe; and of the rest scarcely euery hundreth man ones in all his life to go vp into a pulpet? For men be come to such madnesse, that it is commonly compted a thing to base for the dignitie of a Bishop, to make a sermon to the people. In the time of Bernarde, things were somewhat more decayed: but we see also with howe sharpe chidings he inueyeth against the whole order: which yet it is likely to haue bene then much purer than it is nowe.

13 But if a man do well wey & examine this outward forme of ecclesiasticall gouernement that is at this day vnder the papacy, he shall finde that there is no theuish corner wherin robbers do more licenciously range without lawe and measure. Truly all things are there so vnlike the institution of Christ, yea so contrary to it, they are so degenerate from the auncient ordinances and maners of the Church, they are so repugnant to nature and reason, that there can be no greater iniurie done to Christ, than when they pretend his name to the defence of so disordred gouernement. We (say they) are the pillars of the Church, the chief Bishops of religiõ, y vicars of Christ, the heades of the faithfull: because the power of the Apostles is by succession come vnto vs. They are alway bragging of these follies, as though they talked vnto stockes. But so oft as they shall boast of this, I will aske of them againe, what they haue common with the Apostles. For we speake not of any inheritably descending honor, that may be geuen to men euen while they ly sleeping: but of the office of preaching, which they so much flee from. Likewise when we affirme that their kingdom is the tyranny of Antichrist, by and by they aunswer, that it is that reuerende Hierarchie, so ofte praised of notable and holy men. As though the holy fathers, when they commended the Ecclesiasticall Hierarchie or spirituall gouernement, as it was deliuered them from hande to hande from the Apostles, did dreame of this misshapen and waste disordred heape, where the Bishops are for the most part, either rude asses, which knowe not the very first and common principles of faith, or sometime children yet newe come from the nourse: and if any be learned (which yet is a rare example) they thinke a Bishoprike to be nothing els but a title of gloriousnesse and magnificence: where the persones of Churches thinke no more of feedinge the flocke, than a shoemaker doth of plowing: where all things are confounded with more than Baby-lonicall disperling, that there remaineth no more any one steppe whole of that ordinance of the Fathers.

14 What if we descende to their maners? where shalbe that light of the world, which Christ requireth? where is the salte of the earth? where is that holinesse, which may be as a perpetuall rule to iudge by? There is no degree of men at this day more il spoken of for riot, wantonnesse, deintinesse, finally all kinde of lustes. There are of no degree men either fitter, or conninger maisters of all deceit, fraude, treason, and breach of faith: there is no where so great conning or boldnesse to do hurt. I passe ouer their disdainfulnesse, pride, extorcion, crueltie. I passe ouer the dissolute licenciousnesse in all the parts of their life. In suffering whereof the world is so weries, that it is not to be feared, that I should seeme to enforce any thing so much. This one thing I say, which they themselues shall not be able to denie: that of the Bishops there is almost none, of the Parsons of paroches not the hundreth man, but if iudgemēt should be geuen of his maners, according to the olde Canons, he should be either to be excommunicate, or at lest to be put from his office. I seeme to say somewhat incredible: so farre is that auncient Discipline growen out of vse, that commaunded an exacter triall to be had of the maners of the clergie: but the truth is so. Now let them go, that fight vnder the standerd and guiding of the see of Rome, & let them boast among themselues of the order of priesthode. As for the order that they haue, truely it is euident, the it is neither of Christ, nor of his Apostles, nor of the fathers, nor of the olde Church.

15 Nowe let the Deacons come forth, and that most holy distributing that they haue of the goods of the Church, Howbeit they do not nowe creat their Deacons to that purpose, for they enioine them nothing els but to minister at the altar, to read and sing the Gospell, and do I wote not what trifles. Nothing of the almes, nothing of the care of the poore, nothing of all that functiō which they in olde time executed. I speake of the very institution. For if we haue respect what they do, in deedē it is not to them an office, but onely a steppe toward priesthoode. In one thing, they that kepe the Deacons place at the masse, do represente a voidē image of antiquity. For they receiue the offerings before the consecration. This was the auncient maner, that before the communion of the Supper, the faithfull did kisse one another, and offer their almes at the altar: so first by a signe, & afterward by very liberalitie they shewed their charitie. The Deacon, that was the poore mens steward, receiued that which was giuen, to distribute it. Nowe of those almes, there cometh no more to the poore, than if they vere throwen into the sea. Therefore they mocke the Church with this lying Deaconrie. Truely therein they haue nothing like, neither to the institution of the Apostles, nor to the auncient vsage. But the very distribution of the goods they haue coueied an other way: and haue so framed it; that nothing can be deuised more vnorderly. For as theues, when they haue cutte mens throtes, do diuide the pray among them: so these, after the quenching of the light of Gods word, as though the Church were slaine, do thinke that whatsoever was dedicate to holy vses is laid open for pray and spoile. Therefore making a diuision, euery one hath snatched to himselfe as much as he coule.

16 Here all these olde orders, that we haue declared, are not onely troubled, but vtterly wiped out and rased. The Bishops and priests of cities, which being made riche by this pray, were tourned into canons, haue made hauocke of the chiefe part among them. But it appereth that the partition was vnorderly, because to this day they strue about the boundes. Whatsoeuer it be, by this diuision it is provided, that not one halfe peny of the goodes of the Church should come to the poore, whoes had bene the halfe part at least. For the canons do giue them the fowerth part by name: and the other fowerth parte they do therefore appoint to the Bishops, that they shoulde bestowe it vpon hospitalitie, and other duties of charitic. I speake not what the clerkes ought to do with their portion, and to what vse they ought to bestowe it. For we haue sufficiently declared, that the rest which is appointed: for temples, buildings and other expenses, ought to be open for the poore in necessitie. I pray you, if they had one sparke of the feare of God in their hart, would they abide this burden of conscience, that all that they eate, and wherewith they be clothed, cometh of theste; yea of sacrilege? But sith they are litle moued with the iudgement of God, they shoulde at least thinke, that those be men endued with wit and reason, to whome they would persuaide, that they haue so goodly and well framed orders in their Church, as they are wont to boast. Let them aunswer me shortly, whether deaconrie be a licéce to steale and robbe. If they denie this, they shall also be compelled to confesse, that they haue no deaconrie left: for as much as among them, all the disposition of the goodes of the Church is openly tourned into a spoiling full of sacrilege.

17 But here they vse a very faire colour. For they say, that the dignitie of the Church is by that magnificence not vncomlily vpholden. And they haue of their secte some so shamelesse, that they dare openly boast, that so onely are fulfilled those prophecies, whereby the olde Prophets describe the gloriousnesse of the kingdome of Christ, when that kingly gorgeousnesse is seen in the priestly order. Not in

wayne (say they) God hath promised these things to his Church: Kings shall come, they shall worship in thy sight, they shall bring thee giftes. Arise, arise, clothe thee with thy strength, O Syon: clothe thee with the garmentes of thy glorie, O Hierusalem: All shall come from Saba, bringing golde and incense, and speaking praise to the Lorde. All the cattell of Cedar shalbe gathered together to thee. If I should tarie long vpon confuting this lewdnesse, I feare least I should seeme foude. Therefore I will not lose wordes in vaine. But I aske: if any Iewe would abute these testimonies, what solution would they geue? Verily they would reprehende his dullnesse, for that he transferred those things to the flesh and the world, that are spirituallly spoken of the spirituall kingdome of Christ. For we knowe, that the Prophetes vnder the image of earthly things, did paint out vnto vs the heauenly glorie of God, that ought to shine in the Church. For the Church had neuer lesse abundance of these blessings, which their wordes expresse, than in the time of the Apostles: and yet all confesse, that the force of the kingdome of Christ then chiefly florished abroad. What then mean these sayings? Whatsoeuer is any where precious, hy, excellent, it ought to be made subiect to the Lord. Where as it is namely spoken of kings, that they shal submit their scepters to Christ, that they shall throwe downe their crownes before his feete, that they shall dedicate their goodes to the Church: when (will they say) was it better and more fully performed, than when Theodosius, casting away his purple roabe, leauing the ornamentes of the empire, as some one of the common people, submitted himselfe before God and the Church, to solemne penance? then when he and other like godly princes bestowed their endeouers and their cares to preserue pure doctrine in the Church, and to cherish and defende sounde teachers? But howe priests at that time exceded not in superfluous richesse, that onely sentence of the Sinode at Aquileia, where Ambrose was chief, sufficiently declareth: Glorious is pouertie in the priests of the Lord. Truely the Bishops had at that time some richesse, wherewith they might haue set out the Churches honor, if they had thought those to be the true ornamentes of the Church. But when they knew that there was nothing more against the office of Pastors, than to glister and shew themselues proudly with deintinesse of fare, with gorgeousnesse of garmentes, with great train of seruantes, with stately palaces, they followed & kept the humblenesse & modestie, yea the very pouertie which Christ holily appointed among his ministers.

18 But, that we may not be to long in this point, let vs againe gather into a short summe, howe farre that dispesation or dissipation of the goods of the Church, that is nowe vsed, differeth from the true deaconrie, which both the word of God commendeth vnto vs, and the auncient Church obserued. As for that which is bestowed vpon the garnishing of temples, I say it is ill bestowed, if that measure be not vsed, which both the very nature of holy things appointeth, and the Apostles and other holy fathers haue prescribed both by doctrine and examples. But what like thing is there seen at this day in the temples? whatsoever is framed, I will not say after that auncient sparing, but to any honest meane it is reiected. Nothing at all pleaseth, but that which saoureth of riot and the corruption of times. In the meane time they are so farre frō hauing due care of the liuely temples, that they woulde rather suffer many thousandes of the poore to perish for hunger, than they would breake the least chalice or cruet, to releue their neede. And that I may not pronounce of my selfe any thing more greuously against them, this onely I would haue the godly readers to thinke vpon: if it should happen that same Exuperius bishop of Tholosa, whom we euen nowe rehearsed, or Acatius, or Ambrose, or any such to be raised from death, what they would say. Truely they would not allowe that in so great necessitie of the poore, richesse in a maner superfluous should be tourned an other way. Admit I speake nothing howe these vses vpon which they be bestowed, (although there were no poore) are many waies hurtful, but in no behalfe profitable. But I leaue to speake of men. These goodes are dedicate to Christ: therefore they are to be disposed after his will. But they shall in vaine say, that this part is bestowed vpon Christ, which they haue wasted otherwise than he commaunded. Howbeit, to confesse the trueth, there is not much of the ordinarie reueneue of the Church abated for these expenses. For there are no bishoprikes so welthy, no abbaries so fatte, finally neither so many, nor so large benefices, that may serue to fill the gluttonie of priests. But while they seke to spare themselues, they persuaue the people by superstition, to turne that which should be bestowed vpon the poore, to builde temples; to sette vp images, to buy iewels, to gette costly garmentes. So with this gulfe are the daily almes consumed.

19 Of the reueneue, that they receiue of their landes and possession, what els shall I say, but that which I haue already said, & which is before all mens eyes? We see with what faithfulness they which are called bishops and Abbots do dispose the greatest parte. What madness is it, to seeke here for an ecclesiasticall order? Was it mete that they, whose life ought to haue bene a singular example of frugallitie, modestie, continence, and humilitie, should contende with the royaltie of princes in number of goodes, in gorgioustnesse of houſes, in deintinesſe of apparell and fare? And howe much was this contrary to their office, that they, whom the eternall and inuiolable cō- Tit. 1. 7 maundement of God forbiddeth to be deſirous of filthy againe, and biddeth to be cōtente with ſimple liuing, ſhould not only lay handes vpon townes and caſtels, but alſo violently entre vpon the greateſt lordſhips, finally poſſeſſe forceably very empires? If they deſpiſe the word of God: what will they anſwere to thoſe auncient decrees of the Synodes: whereby it is decreed that the biſhop ſhould haue a ſmall lodging not farre from the Church, meane fare & houſeholde ſtuffe? what will they ſay to that praiſe of the Synode at Aquileia: where pouertie is reported glorious in the prieſts of the Lorde? For perhappes they will vterly reſuſe as to much rigorous, that which Hierome aduiſeth Nepotianus, that poore men and ſtrangers, and among them Chriſt as a gueſt, may knowe his table. But that which he by and by addeth, they will be aſhamed to denie, that it is the glory of a biſhop to prouide for the goodes of the poore: that it is the ſhame of all prieſts to ſtudy for their owne richeſſe. But they can not receiue this, but they muſt all cōdemne themſelues of ſhame. But it is not needefull in this place to ſpeake more hardly againſt them, ſith my meaning was nothing els, but to ſhewe, that among them the lawefull order of deaconry is long ago taken away: that they may no more glorie of this title to the cōmmendation of their Church: which I thinke I haue already ſufficiently ſhewed.

The vj. Chapter.

Of the Supremacie of the See of Rome.

Hitherto we haue reherſed thoſe orders of y Church, which were in the gouernement of the olde Church: but afterwarde corrupted in times, and from thencefoorth more and more abuſed, do nowe in the Popiſhe Church reteine onely their name, and in deede are nothing els but viſours: that by comparison the godly reader might iudge, what maner of Church the Romaniſtes haue, for whoes ſake they make vs ſchiſmatikes, becauſe we haue departed from it. But as for the hed and top of the whole order, that is to ſay, the ſupremacy of the ſee of Rome, whereby they trauaile to proue that they only haue the catholike Church, we haue not yet touched it: becauſe it toke beginning neither from the institution of Chriſt, nor from the uſe of the olde Church, as thoſe former partes did: which we haue ſhewed to haue ſo proceeded from antiquitie, that by wickedneſſe of times they are vterly degenerate, and haue put on altogether a new forme. And yet they go about to perswade the world, that this is the chief and in a maner onely bonde of the vnitie of the Church, if we cleaue to the see of Rome, and continue in the obedience thereof. They rest (I say) principally vpon this stay, when they will take away the Church from vs, and claime it to themselues, for that they kepe the head, vpon which the vnitie of the Church hangeth, and without which the Church must needes fall asunder and be broken in pieces. For thus they thinke, that the Church is as it were a maimed and headlesse body, vnlesse it be subiect to the see of Rome, as to her head. Therefore when they talke of their Hierarchie, they alway take their beginning at this principle: that the bishop of Rome (as the vicar of Christ, which is the head of the Church) is in his steede President of the vniuersall Church: and that otherwise the Church is not well ordred, vnlesse that See do holde the Supremacie aboue all other. Therefore this also is to be examined, of what sort it is: that we may omitt nothing that pertaineth to a iust gouernement of the Church.

2 Let this therefore be the principal point of the question: Whether it be necessary for the true forme of Hierarchie (as they call it) or ecclesiasticall order, that one See should be aboue the other both in dignitie & in power, that it may be the heade of y^e whole body. But we make the Church subiect to too vniust lawes, if we lay this necessity vpon it, without the word God. Therefore if the aduersaries wil proue that which they require, they must first shew y^e this disposition was ordeined by Christ. For this purpose they alledge out of the law the hy priesthode, also the hy iudgement, which God did institute at Hierusalem. But it is easy to geue a solution, and that many wayes, if one way do not satisfie them. First no reason compelleth to extēde that to the whole world, which was profitable in one nation: yea rather, the order of one nation and of the whole world shall be farre different. Because the Iewes were on eche side compassed with idolaters: that they should not be diuersely drawn with varietie of religions, God appointed the place of worshipping him in the middest part of the lande: there he ordeined ouer them one head bishop, whom they should all haue regard vnto, that they might be y^e better kepte together in vnitie. Nowe, when religion is spred abroad into the whole world, who doth not see that it is altogether an absurdity, that the gouernment of the East and West be geuen to one man? For it is in effect as much as if a man should affirme, that the whole world ought to be gouerned by one ruler, because one piece of lande hath no mo rulers but one. But there is yet an other reason, why that ought not to be made an exáple to be followed. No man is ignorant that that hy bishop was a figure of Christ. Nowe, sins the priesthode is removed, that right must also be removed. But to whom is it removed? Truly, not to the Pope (as he himselfe is so bold shamelessly to boast) when he draweth this title to himselfe: but to Christ, which as he alone susteineth this office, without any vicar or successor, so he resigneth the honor to none other. For the priesthode consisteth not in doctrine onely, but in the appeasing of God, which Christ hath fully wrought by his death, and in that intercessiõ which he nowe vseth with his Father.

3 There is therefore no cause why they should bind vs by this example, as by a perpetuall rule, which we haue sene to be enduring but for a time. Out of the newe testament they haue nothing to bring forth for prooffe of their opinion, but that it was sayed to one: Thou art Peter, & vpon this stone I will builde my Church. Againe, Peter, Louest thou me? Feede my shepe. But admitting that these be strong proues, they must first shewe, that he which is commaunded to feede the flocke of Christ, hath power committed to him ouer all Churches: and that to binde and to lose is nothing els but to be ruler of all the world. But as Peter had receiued the cõmaundement of the Lorde, so he exhorteth all other priests to feede the Church. Hereby we may gather, that by this saying of Christ, there was either nothing geuen to Peter more then to the rest, or that Peter did egally communicate with other the power that he had receiued. But, that we striue not vainly, we haue in an other place a cleare exposition out of the mouth of Christ, what is to binde and to lose: that is to say, to reteine and to forgeue sinnes. But the maner of binding and loosing, both the whole Scripture eche where sheweth, and Paul very well declareth, when he saith that the ministers of the Gospell, haue cõmaundement to reconcile men to God, and also haue power to punishe them that refuse this benefite.

4 Howe shamefully they wrest those places, that make mention of binding and loosing, I both haue already shortly touched, and a litle hereafter I shall haue occasion to declare more at large. Nowe it is good to se onely, what they gather of that famous aunswere of Christ to Peter. He promised him y keys of the kingdome of heauẽ: he sayed that whatsoeuer he bounde in earth, should be bounde in heauen. If we agree vpon the word keyes, and the maner of binding, all contention shall by and by cesse. For the Pope himselfe will gladly geue ouer the charge enioined to the Apostles, which being full of trauaile and grief, should shake from him his pleasures, without gaine. Forasmuch as the heauens are opened vnto vs by the doctrine of the Gospell, it is with a very fit metaphore expressed by the name of keyes. Nowe men are bounde and loosed in no other wise, but when faith reconcileth some to God, and their owne belefe bindeth other some. If the Pope did take this onely vpon him: I thinke there will be no man that would either enuie it or strize about it. But because this succession being trauailsome and nothing gainefull pleaseth not the Pope, hereupon groweth the beginning of the contention, what Christ promised to Peter. Therefore I gather by the very matter it selfe, that there is nothing meant by the dignitie of the office of an Apostle, which can not be seuered from the charge. For if that definition which I haue rehearsed, be receiued (which can not but shamelesly be reiected) here is nothing geuen to Peter, that was not also common to his other fellowes: because otherwise there should not only wrong be done to the persons, but the very maiestie of doctrine should halt. They crie out on the other side: what auaieth it, I pray you, to run vpon this rocke? For they shall not proue, but as the preaching of one same Gospell was enioined to all the Apostles, so they were also all alike furnished with power to binde & loose. Christ (say they) appointed Peter Prince of the whole Church, when he promised that he would geue him the keyes. But that which he then promised to one; in an other place he gaue it also to all the rest, and deliuered it as it were into their hâdes. If the same power were graunted to all, which was promised to one, wherein shall he be aboue his fellowes? Herein (say they) he excelleth; because he receiued it both in cōmon together with them, & seuerally by himselfe, which was not geuen to the other, but in common. What if I answer with Cyprian and Augustine, that Christ did it not for this purpose, to prefer one man before other, but so to set out y^e vnitie of the Church. For thus sayeth Cyprian, that God in the person of one gaue the keyes to all, to signifie the vnitie of all: and that the rest were the same thing that Peter was, endued with like partaking both of honor and power: but that the beginning is taken at vnitie, that the Church of Christ may be shewed to be one. Augustine sayeth: If there were not in Peter a mystery of the Church, the Lorde would not say to him, I will geue thee the keyes. For if this was sayed to Peter, the Church hath them not: but if the Church haue them, then Peter, when he receiued the keyes, betokened the whole Church. And in an other place. When they were all asked, onely Peter answered, thou art Christ: and it is said to him, I will geue thee the keyes, as though he alone had re-ceiued the power of binding and loosing: whereas both he being one said the one for all, and he received the other with all, as bearing the person of vnitie. Therefore one for all, because there is vnitie in all.

5. But this, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will bilde my Church, is no where red spoken to any other. As though Christ spake there any other thing of Peter, than that which Paul and Peter himselfe speaketh of all Christians. For Paule maketh Christ the chiefe and corner stone, vpon which they are bilded together that growe into a holy temple to the Lorde. And Peter biddeth vs to be liuely stones which being founded vpon that chosē and precious stone, do by this ioynt and coupling together with our God, cleaue also together among our selues. He (say they) aboue the rest: because he hath the name peculiarly. In deede I do willingly graunt this honor to Peter, that in the bilding of the Church he be placed among the first, or (if they will haue this also) the first of all the faithfull: but I will not suffer them to gather thereupon, that he should haue a Supremacie ouer y rest. For what maner of gathering is this? He excelleth other in feruentnesse of zeale, in learning, and courage: therefore he hath power ouer thē. As though we might not with better colour gather, that Andrewe is in degree before Peter, because he went before him in time, and brought him to Christ. But I passe ouer this. Let Peter truly haue y first place: yet there is great difference betwene y honor of degree and power. We see that the Apostles commonly graunted this to Peter, that he should speake in assemblies, & after a certaine maner go before them with propounding, exhorting, and admonishing: but of his power we reade nothing at all.

6 Howbeit we be not yet come to dispute of that point: onely at this present I would proue, that they do to fondly reason, when by the onely name of Peter they would bilde an Empire ouer the whole Church. For those olde follies wherwith they went about to deceiue at the beginning, are not worthy to be rehearsed, much lesse to be cōfuted, that the Church was bilded vpon Peter, because it was said vpon this rock. &c. But some of the Fathers haue so expounded it. But when the whole Scripture crieth out to the contrary, to what purpose is their authoritie alleged against God? Yea, why do we strue about the meaning of these wordes, as though it were darke or doutfull, whē nothing can be more plainly nor more certainly spokē? Peter had cōfessed in his owne and his brethrens name, that Christ is the sonne of God. Vpon this rocke Christ bildeth his Church: because it is (as Paule sayeth) the onely foundation, beside which there can be layed none other. Neither do I here therefore refuse the authority of the Fathers, because I waite their testimonies, if I listed to allege them: but (as I haue sayed) I will not with contending about so cleare a matter trouble the readers in vaine, specially sith this point hath bene long agoe diligently enough handleed and declared by men of our side.

7 And yet in deede no man can better assoile this question, than the Scripture it selfe, if we compare all the places, where it teacheth, what office and power Peter had among the Apostles, howe he behaued himselfe, and howe he was accepted of them. Runne ouer all that remaineth written, you shall finde nothing els, but that he was one of the. xij. egall with the rest, and their fellowe, but not their Lorde. He doth in deede propoude to the councell, if any thing be to be done, and geueth warning what is mete to be done: but therewithall he heareth other, and doth not onely graunte them place to speake their minde, but leaueth the iudgement to them: when they had determind, he followed and obeyed. When he writeth to the Pastors, he doth not commaunde them by authoritie, as Superior: but he maketh them his companions, and gently exhorteth them, as egalles are wont to do. When he was accused for that he had gone in to the Gentiles, although it were without cause, yet he answered & purged himselfe. When he was commaunded by his fellowes, to go with Iohn into Samaria, he refused not. Whereas the Apostles did send him, they did thereby declare that they helde him not for their superior. Whereas he obeyed and toke vpon him the embassage committed to him, he did thereby confesse, that he had a fellowship with them, and not an authority ouer them. If none of these things were, yet the only Epistle to the Galathiās may easily take all douting from vs: where almost in two whole Chapters together Paule trauaileth to proue nothing els; but that he himselfe was egall to Peter in honor of Apostleship. Then he rehearseth that he came to Peter, not to professe subiection, but onely to make their consent of doctrine approved by testimonie to all men: and that Peter himselfe required no such thing, but gaue him his right hande of fellowship, to worke in common together in the Lordes vineyarde: & that there was no lesser grace geuen to him among the Gentiles, than to Peter among the Iewes: Finally that when Peter dealt not very faithfully, he was corrected by him, and obeyed his reprobuing. All these things do make plaine, either that there was an equalitie betweene Paule and Peter, or at least that Peter had no more power ouer the rest, than they had ouer him. And (as I haue already sayed) Paule of purpose labourereth about this, that none shoulde preferre before him in the Apostle-

Apostleshipe either Peter, or Iohn, which were felowes not Lordes.

8 But, to graunt them that which they require concerninge Peter, that is, that he was the Prince of the Apostles, and excelled the rest in dignity: yet there is no cause why they should of a singular example make an vniuersall rule, and drawe to perpetuity that which hath bin once done: first there is a farre differinge reason. One was chiefe among the Apostles: forsooth, because they were few in number: If one were the chiefe of twelue men, shall it therefore folow that one ought to be made ruler of a hundred thousande menne? It is no maruell that twelue had one amonge them that should rule them all: For nature beareth this, and the witte of men requireth this, that in euery assembly, although they be all egal in power, yet there be one as a gouernour, whome the rest may haue regarde vnto. There is no court without a Consull: no sessiõ of iudges without a pretor, or propounder, no company without a ruler, no fellowship without a maister. So shoulde it be no absurdity, if we confessed that the Apostles gaue to Peter such a supremacy. But y which is of force among few, is not by and by to be drawen to the whole world, to the ruling whereof no one man is sufficiẽt. But (say they) this hath place no lesse in the whole vniuersality of nature, than in all the partes, that there be one soueraigne head of all. And hereof (and God will) they fetche a prooffe from cranes and bees, which alway choose to themselues one guide, not many. I allow in dede the exãples which they bring forth: but do bees resorte together out of all the worlde to choose them one kinge? euery seuerall king is content with his owne hyue. So among cranes, euery heard hath their owne king. What else shall they proue hereby, but that euery Church ought to haue their own seueral bishop appointed them? Then they call vs to ciuile examples. They alleage y saying of Homere, It is not good to haue many gouernours: & such things as in like sense are red in prophane writers to the commendation of Monarchie. The answer is easie. For Monarchie is not praised of Vlysses in Homere, or of any other, in this meaninge, as though one ought to be Emperour of y whole world: but they meane to shew that one kingdom can not hold two kinges: & that power (as he calleth it) can abide no companion.

9 But let it be, as they will, that it is good and profitable that the whole worlde be holden vnder Monarchie, which yet is a very great absurdity: but let it be so: yet I will not therefore graunt that the same should take place in the government of the Church. For the Church hath Christ her only head, vnder whose dominion we al cleaue together, according to that order and that forme of policy which he hath Ephes. 4. prescribed. Therefore they do a great wronge to Christ, when by that 15. pretense they wil haue one man to be ruler of the vniuersal Church, because it cā not be without a head. For Christ is the head, of whom the whole body coupled and knit together in euery ioint, wherewith one ministreth to an other, according to the working of euery member in the measure therof, maketh encrease of the body. See you not, how he setteth all men without exception in the body, & leaueth the honor & name of head to Christ alone? See you not how he giueth to euery member a certaine measure, & a determined & limited function: wherby both the perfection of the grace & the soueraigne power of gouernāce may remaine with Christ only? Neither am I ignorrant what they are wont to caull, whē this is objected against them:

 they say that Christ is properly called the only hed, because he alone reigneth by his own authority & in his ownē name: but that this nothing withstandeth, but that there may be vnder him an other ministerial heade (as they terme it) that may be his vicegerent in earth. But by this caullation they preuaile nothing, vnlesse they first shew that this ministry was ordained by Christ. For the Apostle teacheth, that the whole ministratiō is dispersed through the members, & that the power floweth from the one heauenly head. Or if they wil haue it any plainer spoken, sith the Scripture testifieth that Christ is the hed, & claimeth that honor to him alone, it ought not to be transferred to any other, but whom Christ himself hath made his vicar. But y is not only no where red, but also may be largely confuted by many places.
 Ephes. 1. 10 Paul somtimes depainteth vnto vs a liuely image of y Church

 10. shew the meanē wherby he presenteth himselfe, he calleth vs backe Ephes. 4. 7. & 11. to the ministeries which he vseth. The Lord (sayth he) is in vs all, according to y measure of grace y he hath giuen to euery mēber. Therfore he hath appointed some Apostles, some Pastors, some Euangelistes, other some Teachers &c. Why doth he not say, that he hath set one ouer all, to be his vicegerent? For the place required that principally, and it could by no meanes haue bin omitted, if it had bin true.
 Christ (sayth he) is with vs. How? by the ministry of men, whom he hath appointed to gouernē the Church. Why not rather by the ministerial head, to whom he hath cōmitted his stede? He nameth vnity: but in God, & in the faith of Christ. He assigneth to men nothing but common

common ministry, & to euery one a particular measure. In that commendatio of vnity, after that he had sayd that there is one body, one Spirite, one hope of calling, one God, one Faith, one Baptisme, why hath he not also immediatly added one chiefe Bishop, that may hold the Church together in vnity? For nothing, could haue bin more fitly spoken, if it had bin true. Let that place be diligently weyed. It is no dout but that he meant there altogether to represent the holy & spirituall gouernment of the Church, which they that came after called Hierarchie. As for Monarchy among ministers, he not only nameth none, but also sheweth that there is none. It is also no dout but y^e he meant to expresse the maner of cōioyning, wherby the faithfull cleaue together with Christ their head. There he not only speaketh of no ministeriall head, but appointeth to euery of the mēbers a particular working according to y^e measure of grace distributed to euery one. Neither is there any reason why they shoulde fittly dispute of the comparison of the heauenly and earthly Hierarchie. For it is not safe to know beyond measure of it. And in framing this gouernment we must follow no other figure, than the Lord himselfe hath painted out in his word.

11 Now although I graunt them an other thing, which they shal neuer winne by prooffe before sober men, that the supremacy of the Church was so stablished in Peter, that it shoulde alway remaine by perpetuall successiō: yet how wil they proue, that his seate was so placed at Rome, that whosoever is Bishop of that Church, shoulde be set ouer the whole world: By what right do they binde this dignity to the place, which is giuen without mention of place? Peter (say they) liued & died at Rome. What did Christ himselfe? Did not he, while he liued, exercise his Bishoprike, & in dying fulfill the office of Priesthoode, at Hierusalem? The Prince of Pastors, the soueraigne Bishop, the heade of the church, could not purchase honor to the place: & could Peter, that was farre inferior to him? Are not these follies more than childish? Christ gaue the honor of supremacy to Peter: Peter sate at Rome: therefore he there placed the see of Supremacy. By this reason, the Israelites in old time might haue set the seate of Supremacy in the desert, where Moses the chiefe Teacher and Prince of Prophets executed his ministry and died.

12 Let vs see howe trimly they reason. Peter (say they) hadde the Supremacy amonge the Apostles: therefore the Church where he sate ought to haue that priuilege. But where sate he first? At Antioche, say they. Therefore the Church of Antioche doth rightly claime to it selfe the supremacy. They cōfesse that it was in old time the first: but they say, that in remouing thence, he remoued to Rome the honor that he brought with him. For there is an Epistle vnder the name of Pope Marcellus to the bishops of Antioche, where he 12. que-

 sti. 1. ca. sayth thus: Peters seate was at the beginnige with you, which after-ward by the Lordes commaundement was remoued hither. So the Church of Antioche, which was ones the chiefe, hath giuen place to the see of Rome. But by what Oracle had that good mā learned, that the Lorde so commaunded? For if this cause be to be determined by the law, it is necessary that they answer, whether they will haue this priuilege to be personall, or reall, or mixt. For it must be one of these three. If they say that it is personall, then it belongeth nothing to the place. If they say that it is real, then when it is once giuē to the place; it is not taken away by reason either of the death or departure of the person. It remaineth therefore that they must say it is mixt: but then that place shal be not simply to be considered, vnlesse the person do also agree. Let them choose which soeuer they will, I will by- and-by inferre and easily proue, that Rome can by no meane take the Supremacy vpon it selfe.

13 But be it, that as (they triflingly say) the supremacy was remo-ued from Antioche to Rome: yet why did not Antioche keepe the se- cond place? For if Rome haue therefore the first place, because Peter sate there to y end of his life: to whom shal the second place rather be graunted, than where he had his first seate? How came it to passe thē, that Alexandria went before Antioch? How agreeth it, that y Church of one disciple should be aboue the seate of Peter? If honor be due to euey Church, accordinge to y worthines of y founder, what shall we
 Gal. 2.9 say also of the other Churches? Paul nameth three, that semed to be pillars, Iames, Peter and Iohn. If the first place were giuen to the see of Rome in the honor of Peter: do not the sees of Ephesus, & Hieru- salem, where Iohn & Iames sate, deserue thē second & third place? But among the Patriarches Hierusalem had the last place: Ephesus could not sit so much as in the vttermost corner. And other Churches were left out, both all those that Paule founded, & those that the other A- postles were rulers of. The seate of Marcke, which was but one of their disciples, obtained the honor. Therefore they must either cōfesse that that was a preposterous order, or they must graūt vs that this is not a perpetuall rule, that there be due to euey Church the same de- gree of honor which the founder had.

14 Howbeit, as for that which they report of Peters sitting in the Church of Rome, I see not what credit it ought to haue. Truly that which is in Eusebius, that he ruled there five & twenty yeares, is very easily easily confuted. For it is euident by the first and second Chapter to the Galathians, that about twenty yeares after the death of Christ, he was at Hierusalem, and that then he went to Antioche: where how long he was, is vncertaine. Gregory reckoneth seuen yeares, & Eusebius twenty & fise. But from the death of Christ, to the end of Neroes Empire, (in whose time they say y he was slayne) there shalbe found but thirty and seuen yeares. For the Lord suffred vnder Tiberius, the eighteenth yeare of his Empire. If you rebate twenty yeres, duringe the which Paule is witnesse that Peter dwelt at Hierusalem, there will remayne but seuentie yeares at the most, which must nowe be deuided betwene two bishoprikes. If he taried longe at Antioche he coulde not sitte at Rome, but a very litle while. Which thinge we may yet also more plainely proue. Paule wrote to the Romines, when he was in his iourney going to Hierusalem, where he was taken and frō thense brought to Rome. It is not likely that this Epistle was written foure yeares before that he came to Rome. Therin is yet no mentiō of Peter, which should not haue bin left out, if Peter had ruled that Church. Yea and in the end also, when he rehearseth a great number of the godly, whom he biddeth to be saluted, where verily he gathereth together all those y he knew, he yet sayth vterly nothing of Peter. Neither is it nedeſul here to make a long or curious demonstration to men of sounde iudgement: for the matter it selfe, and the whole argument of the Epistle crieth out, that he should not haue ouerpasseſed Peter, if he had bin at Rome.

15 Then Paule was brought prisoner to Rome. Luke reporteth that he was receiued of the brethren, of Peter he sayth nothing. He wrote from thense to many Churches: & in some places also he wryteth salutatiōs in the names of certaine: but he doth not in one word shew that Peter was there at that time. Who, I pray you shall thinke it likely, that he could haue passed him ouer with silence, if he had bin present: Yea to the Philippians, where he sayd that he had none that so faithfully looked vnto the worke of the Lord, as Timothee, he complained that they did all seeke their owne. And to the same Timothee he maketh a more grieuous cōplaint, that none was with him at his first defense, but all forsooke him: where therefore was Peter then? For if they say that he was then at Rome, howe great a shame doth Paul charge him with, y he was a forsaker of the Gospel? For he speaketh of the beleuers: because he addeth, God impute it not vnto the. How long therefore, & in what time did Peter kepe that seate? But it is a constant opinion of writers, that he gouerned that Church euen to his death. But amonge the wryters themselues it is not certaine who was his successor, because some say Linus, & other some say Clement. And they tell many fond fables, of the disputation had betwene him & Simon the magician. And Augustine sticketh not to confesse, when he entreateth of Superstitions, that by reason of an opinion rashely conceiued, there was a custome growen in vse at Rome, that they should not fast that day that Peter got the victory of Simon the magician. Finally the doings of that time are so entangled with diuersity of opinions, that we ought not rashly to beleue where we finde any thing written. And yet by reason of this cōsent of writers, I striue not against this, that he died there: but yet that he was Bishop there, and specially a long time, I can not be perswaded, neither do I much passe vpō that also: forasmuch as Paul testifieth that Peters Apostleship did peculiarly belonge to the Iewes, and his owne to vs. Therefore that that felowship which they couenanted betwene themselues, may be confirmed with vs, or rather that the ordinance of the holy Ghost may stand in force amonge vs, we ought to haue respect rather to the Apostleship of Paul than of Peter. For the holy Ghost so diuided the prouinces bewene them, that he appointed Peter to the Iewes, and Paul to vs. Now therefore let the Romanistes go and seeke their supremacy else where than in the word of God, where it is founde not to be grounded.

16 Now let vs come to the olde Church, that it may also be made to appeare plainly, y our aduersaries do no lesse causelessly, & falsely boast of the consent therof, than they do of the witnessse of the word of God. When therefore they brag of that principle of theirs, that the vnyty of the Church can not otherwise be kept together, but if there be one supreme head in earth, to whom al the members may obey, & that therefore the Lord gaue the supremacy to Peter, and from thence forth to the see of Rome by right of succession, that the same shoulde remaine in it to the end: they affirme, that this hath bin alway obserued from the beginning. But forasmuch as they wrongfully wrest many testimonies. I wil first say this aforehand, that I deny not but that the olde wryters do eche where giue great honor to the Church of Rome, & do speake reuerently of it. Which I thinke to be done specially for three causes. For y same opinion, which I wot not how was growen in force, that it was founded & ordained by the ministry of Peter, much auailed to procure fauour & estimatiō vnto it. Therefore in the East parts it was for honors sake called the see Apostolike. Secondly, when the heade of the Empire was there, & that therefore it was likely, that in y place were men more excellent both in learninge & wisdom, & skil, & experience of many things, than any where else:

there was worthily consideration had thereof, that both the honor of the citie, and also the other more excellent giftes of God shoulde not seeme to be despised. There was beside these also a third thing, that when the Churches of the East, and of Grecia, yea & of Africa, were in tumultes among themselues with disagrementes of opinions, the Church of Rome was quieter & lesse full of troubles thã the rest. So came it to passe, that the godly & holy Bishops, beinge driuen out of their seates, did oftentimes flee thither as into a Sanctuary or certaine hauen. For as the Westerne men are of lesse sharpnes & swiftnes of wit, than the Asians or Africans be, so much are they lesse desirous of alteratiõs. This therfore added much authority to y^e Church of Rome, that in those doubtful times it was no so troubled as the rest, & did holde the doctrine once deliuered them, faster thã all the rest as we shal by and by better declare. For these three causes (I say) it was had in no small honor, & commended with many notable testimonies of the old wryters.

17 But when our aduersaries will thereupon gather that it hath a supremacie and soueraigne power ouer other Churches, they do too much amisse, as I haue already sayd. And that the same may the better appeare, I will first briefly shew what the olde fathers thought of this vnity which they enforce so earnestly. Hierome, wryting to Nepotianus, after that he had recited many examples of vnity, at the last descended to the Hierarchie of the Church. Eche Bishop of eüery seuerall Church, eche Archpriest, eche Archdeacon, & all the ecclesiasticall order, do rest vppon their owne rulers. Here a Romaine Priest speaketh, he commendeth vnity in the ecclesiasticall order: why doth he not rehearse that all Churches are knitte together with one heade: as with one bonde? Nothing could haue more fitly serued the matter y^e he had in hand: & it can not be said that it was for forgetfulness, that he omitted it: for he would haue done nothing more willingly if the matter had suffred him. He saw therfore without dout, that that is the true reson of vnity which Ciprian excellently wel describeth in these words: The bishoprike is one, whereof ech hath a part wholly: & the Church is one, which is with encrease of frutesfulness more largely extended into a multitude. Like as there are many sunbeames & one light: and many branches of a tree, but one body grounded on a fast holding roote: and like as from one fountaine flow many streames, & though the multitude seme to be diuersly spread abroad with largenesse of ouerflowinge plenty, yet the vnity is kept whole in the originall: so the Church also being ouerspread with the light of the Lord, extendeth her beames abroad throughout y^e whole world, yet is it but one that is ech where poured forth, and the vnity of the body is not seuered: she spreadeth her branches ouer the whole worlde, she sendeth out her ouerflowinge streames: yet is there but one heade and one beginninge &c. Afterward The spouse of Christ can not be an aduresser: she knoweth one onely house, she keepeth the holinesse of one onely chamber with chaste shamefastnesse. You see how he maketh the vniuersall bishoprike to be Christ onely, which comprehendeth the whole Church vnder him: and sayth that all they that execute the office of bishop vnder this heade, haue their partes thereof wholly. Where is the supremacy of the see of Rome, if the whole bishoprike remaine with Christ only, & ech bishop hath his part thereof wholly? These things therefore make to this purpose, that the reader may vnderstande by the way, that the olde fathers were vtterly ignorant of that principle, which the Romanistes do take for confessed & vndouted, concerning the vnity of an earthly head in the Hierarchie of the Church.

pli. pre.

The vij. Chapter.

Of the beginninge and encrease of the Papacie of Rome, vntill it aduanced it selfe to this height, vvhich by both the liberty of the Church hath bin oppressed, and all the right government thereof ouerthrowen.

AS concerning the auncientnesse of the supremacy of the see of Rome, there is nothing had of more antiquity to stablishe it, than that decree of the Nicene Synode, wherein the bishop of Rome both hath the first place among the Patriarches giuen vnto him, and is commaunded to looke vnto the Churches adioyning to the city. Whē the Council maketh such diuision betwene him and the other Patriarches, that it assigneth to euery one their boundes: truely it doth not appoint him the heade of all, but maketh him one of the chiefe. There were present Vitus and Vincentius in the name of Iulius, which then gouerned the Church of Rome: to them was giuen the fourth place. I beseeche you, if Iulius were acknowledged the head of the Church, should his Legats be thrust into the fourth seate? Should Athanasius be chiefe in the Council, where principally the image of the Hierarchicall order ought to be seene? In the Synode at Ephesus it appeareth, that Celestinus which was then bishoppe of Rome, vsed a crooked suttle meane, to prouide for the dignitie of his seate. For when he sent his deputies thither, he committed his steede to Cyrillus of Alexandria, which shoulde notwithstandinge otherwise haue bin the chiefe. To what purpose was that same committing, but that his name might by what meane soeuer abide in the first place. For his Legates sate in a lower place, and were asked their opinion among the rest, & subscribed in their order: in the meane time y^e Patriarch of Alexandria ioyned Celestins name with his owne. What shall I say of the seconde councill at Ephesus: where when Leos Legates were present, yet Dioscorus Patriarche of Alexandria sate the chiefe as by his owne right? They wil take exception that it was no vpright councel, by which both the holy mā Flavianus was condemned, & Eutyches acquitted, & his vngodlines allowed. But when the Synode was gathered, when the Bishoppes tooke their places in order, verily the Legates of the Bishop of Rome sate there among the rest none otherwise than in a holy & lawful Councell. Yet they striued not for the first place, but yeilded it to an other: which they wold neuer haue done, if they had thought it to be theirs of right. For the Bishops of Rome were neuer ashamed to enter into the greatest contētions for their honors, & for this only cause oftentimes to vex & trouble the Church with many and hurtfull striues. But because Leo saw that it shoulde be a too much vnreasonable request, if he should seke to get the chiefe place for his Legates, therefore he surcessed it.

2 Then folowed y^e Councell of Chalcedon, in which by the graūt of the Emperour y^e Legates of the Church of Rome sate in the chiefe place. But Leo himselve cōfesseth that this was an extraordinary priuilege. For whē he made petition for it to the Emperour Marcianus, & Pulcheria the Empreffe, he did not affirme that it was due to him, but only pretended, that the Easterne Bishops, which sate as chief in the councel at Ephesus, troubled all things, & ill abused their power. Whereas therefore it was nedeful to haue a graue gouernour, & it was not likely that they should be mete for it, which had once bin so light & disordered: therefore he praied, that by reason of the default & vnfitnesse of other, the office of gouerning might be remoued to him. Truely that which is gotten by singular priuilege and beside order, is not by common law. Where this only is pretended, that there nedeth some new gouernour, because the former gouernours had behaued themselues ill, it is euident that it neither was so before, nor ought to cōtinue so for euer, but is done only in respect of present danger. The Bishop of Rome therefore had the first place in the Councell at Chalcedon: not because it was due to his see, but because the Synode was at that time destitute of a graue and fit gouernour, while they y^e ought to haue bin the chiefe, did through their owne intemperance & corrupt affectiō, thrust themselues out of place. And this that I say, Leos successour did in dede proue. For when he sent his Legates to the fift Synode at Constátinople, which was holden long time after, he brauled not for the first seate, but easily suffred Menna the Patriarche of Constantinople to sitte as chiefe. So in the councill at Carthage, at which Augustine was present, we see that not the Legates of the see of Rome, but Aurelius Archbishop of that place sate as chiefe: when yet the contention was about the authority of the Bishop of Rome. Yea there was also a generall council holden in Italy it selfe, at which the Bishop of Rome was not present. Ambrose was chiefe there, which was in very great authority with the Emperour, there was no mention made of the Bishop of Rome. Therefore at that time it came to passe by the dignity of Ambrose, that the see of Millain was more noble than the see of Rome.

3 As concerning the title of supremacy, and other titles of pride, wherupon it now maruelously boasteth it selfe, it is not hard to iudge, whé & in what sort they crept in. Ciprian oftentimes maketh mentiõ of Cornelius. He setteth him out with no other name, but by the name of brother, or fellow bishop, or fellow in office. But when he writeth to Stephen the successor of Cornelius, he doth not only make him egal with himselfe & the rest, but also speaketh more hardly to him, charging him sometime with arrogance, sometime with ignorance. Since Ciprian we haue what all the Church of Affrica iudged of that matter. The Councell at Carthage did forbid that any shoulde be called Prince of Priests, or chiefe Bishop, but only bishop of the chiefe see. But if a man turne over the auncienter monumentes, he shal find that the bishop of Rome at that time was content with the cõmon name of brother. Certainly so long as the face of the Church cõtinned true & pure, all these names of pride, where with since that time the see of Rome hath begon to waxe outrageous, were vtterly vnheard of: it was not knowen, what was the hiest bishop, & the only head of the church in earth. But if the bishop of Rome had bin so bold to haue také such a thing vpon him, there were stout & wise men that woulde haue by- & by repressed his folly. Hierom forasmuch as he was a priest at Rome, was not ill willing to set out the dignity of his owne Church, so much as the matter & state of the time suffred: yet we see how he also bringeth it downe into fellowship with the rest. If authority (sayth he) be sought for, the world is greater thã a city. Why doest thou alleage to me the custome of one city? Why doest thou defend smalnes of nũber, out of which hath growẽ pride, against the lawes of the Church? Wheresoeuer there be a bishop, either at Rome, or at Eugubium, or at Constantinople, or at Rhegium, he is of the same merite & of the same same Priesthoode. The power of riches or basenes of pouerty maketh not a bishop hier or lower.

4 About the title of vniuersal bishop the contention first began in the time of Gregory, which was occasioned by the ambition of Iohn bishop of Cōstantinople. For he (which thing neuer any man before had attempted) would haue made himselfe vniuersal bishop. In that contention Gregorie doth not alleage that the right is taken away which was due to himselfe: but stoutly crieth out against it, that it is a prophane name, yea full of sacrilege, yea the forewarner of Antichrist. The whole Church (sayth he) falleth downe from her state, if he fall, which is called vniuersal. In an other place: It is very sorowefull, to suffer patiently, that our brother and fellow bishop, despising all other, should only be named Bishop. But in this his pride what els is betokened but y times of Antichrist nere at hand? because verily he foloweth him, that despising the felowship of Angels, went about to climbe vp to the toppe of singularity. In an other place he wryteth to Eulolius of Alexandria, and Anastasius of Antioch. None of my predecessors at any time would vse that prophane word: for if one be called vniuersal Patriarch, the name of Patriarches is abated from the rest. But farre may this be from a christian minde, that any shoulde haue a will to take that vpon him, wherby he may in any part, be it neuer so litle, diminish the honor of his brethren. To consent in this wicked word is nothing else but to lese the faith. It is one thing (sayth he) that we owe to the preseruing of the vnity of faith, and an other thing that we owe to the keping downe of pride. But I say it boldly, because who soeuer calleth himselfe or desireth to be called vniuersal bishop, he doth in his proude aduācing runne before Antichrist, because he doth with shewing himselfe proude preferre himselfe aboue the rest. Again to Anastasius bishop of Alexandria: I haue sayd that he can not haue peace with vs, vnlesse he amēded the aduācing of the superstitious & proude word, which the first apostata hath inuēted. And (to speake nothing of the wrong done to your honor) if one be called vniuersal Bishop, the vniuersal Church falleth when that vniuersal one falleth. But whereas he writeth, that this honor was offred to Leo in the Synode at Chalcedō, it hath no colour of truth. For neither is there any such thing red in the actes of that Synode. And Leo himselfe, which with many Epistles impugneth y decree there made in honor of the see of Constantinople, without dout would not haue passed over this argumēt, which had bin most to be liked of al other, if it had bin true, that he refused that which was given him: & beinge a man otherwise too much desirous of honor, he would not haue omitted that which made for his praise. Therefore Gregorie was deceiued in this, that he thought that that title was offered to the see of Rome by the Synode at Chalcedon: to speake nothinge, how fonde it is, that he both testi-

5. Now I come to the iurisdiction, which the bishop of Rome affirmeth that he hath ouer all Churches. I know how great contentions haue bin in olde time about this matter: For there hath bin no time wherein the see of Rome hath not coueted to gette an Empire ouer other Churches. And in this place it shall not be out of season, to search by what meanes it grew then by litle & litle to some power. I do not yet speake of that infinite Empire, which it hath not so long ago taken by force to it selfe: for we wil differre that to a place conuenient. But here it is good to shew briefly, how in old time & by what meanes it hath aduanced it selfe, to take to it selfe any power ouer other Churches. When the Churches of the East were diuided and troubled with the factions of the Arrians vnder the Emperours, Constantius & Constans the sonnes of Constantine the Great, & Athanasius the chiefe defendour there of the true faith was driuen out of his see: such calamity compelled him to come to Rome, that with the authority of the see of Rome he might both after a sort repress the rage of his enemies, & confirme the godly that were in distresse. He was honorably receiued of Iulius then Bishop, and obtained that the Bishops of the West tooke vpon the defence of his cause. Therefore when the godly stode in great nede of foreine ayde, & saw that there was very good succour for them in the Church of Rome, they willingly gaue vnto it the most authority that they could. But all that was nothing else, but that the communion thereof should be hiely esteemed, & it should be compted a great shame, to be excommunicate of it. Afterward euill and wicked men also added much vnto it. For, to escape lawefull iudgements, they fled to this sanctuary. Therefore if any priest were condemned by his Bishop, or any Bishop by the Synod of his prouince, they by and by appelled to Rome. And the Bishops of Rome

Rome receiued such appellatiōs more gredily thā was mete: because it seemed to be a forme of extraordinary power, so to entermedle with matters farre & wide about them. So when Eutyches was condemned by Flauianus Bishop of Constantinople, he complained to Leo that he had wronge done vnto him. Leo without delay, no lesse vndiscretely thē sudenly, tooke in hand the defence of an euil cause: he grieuouly inueyed against Flauianus, as though he had, without hearing the cause, condemned an innocent: and by this his ambition he caused that the vngodlinesse of Eutyches was for a certaine space of time strengthened. In Affrica it is eident ȳ this oftētimes chaunced. For so soone as any lewd man had taken a foile in ordinary iadgement, he by and by flew to Rome, and charged his countreemen with many sclaūderous reports: & the see of Rome was alway ready to entermedle. Which lewdnes compelled the bishops of Affrica to make a law, that none vnder paine of excommunication should appelle beyond the sea.

6 But whatsoeuer it were, lette vs see what authority or power the see of Rome then had. Ecclesiasticall power is contained in these four pointes, orderinge of Bishops, summoning of Councils, hearinge of Appealles or iurisdiction, Chastisinge admonitions or censures. All the old Synodes commaund Bishops to be consecrate by their owne Metropolitans: and they neuer bid the bishop of Rome to be called vnto it, but in his owne Patriarchie. But by litle and litle it grewe in vse, that all the Bishops of Italy came to Rome to fetche their consecration, except the Metropolitans, which suffred not themselues to be brought into such bondage: but when any Metropolitane was to be consecrate, the bishop of Rome sent thither one of his priests, which should only be present, but not president. Of which thinge there is an example in Gregorie: at the consecration of Constantius Bishoppe of Millain after the death of Laurencē. Howebeit I do not thinke that that was a very auncient institution: but when at the beginnige for honor & good wils sake they sent one to an other their Legates, to be witnesses of the consecration, and to testifie their communion with them, afterward that which was voluntary, began to be holden for necessary. Howsoeuer it be, it is eident that in olde time the Bishop of Rome had not the power of consecrating, but in the prouince of his owne Patriarchie, that is to say in the Churches adioining to the city, as the canon of the Nicene Synode sayth. To the Consecration was annexed the sending of a Synodical Epistle, in which he was nothing aboute the rest. For the Patriarches were wont immediatly after their consecration, by solemne wrytinge to declare their fayth, whereby they professed that they subscribed to the holy & catholicke Councils. So, rendering an accompt of their Fayth, they didde approue themselves one to an other. If the bishoppe of Rome had receiued of other, and not himselfe giuen this confession, he hadde thereby bin acknowledged superior: but when he was no lesse bound to giue it, than to require it of other, and to be subiect to the common lawe: truly that was a token of fellowship, not of dominion. Of this thinge there is an example in Gregories Epistle to Anastasius and to Cyriacus of Constantinople, and in other places to all the Patriarches together.

7 Then follow admonitions or censures: which as in old time the bishops of Rome vsed toward other, so they did againe suffer them of other. Ireneus grieuouly reprobued Victor, because he vndiscretly for a thing of no value, troubled the Church with a pernicious dissentio: Victor obeyed, and spurned not against it. Such a liberty was then in vire among the holy bishops, that they vsed a brotherly authority toward the bishop of Rome, in admonishing and chastisinge him if he at any time offended. He againe, when occasion required, did admonishe other of their duety: & if there were any fault, rebuked it. For Cypria, when he exhorteth Stephen to admonish the bishoppes of Fraunce, fetcheth not his argumēt from the greater power, but from the common right that priestes haue among themselves. I beseech you, if Stephen had the bin ruler ouer Fraunce, would not Cyprian haue said: Restraine them, because they be thine? but he sayth farre otherwise. This (sayth he) the brotherly fellowship, wherewith we be bound one to an other requireth that we should admonish one an other. And we see also with how great sharpnes of words he being otherwise a man of a mild nature inueyeth against Stephen himselfe, whē he thinketh him to be too insolent: Therefore in this behalfe also there appeareth not yet, y the bishop of Rome had any iurisdiction ouer thē that were not of his owne prouince.

8 As concerning the calling together of Synodes, this was the office of euery Metropolitane, at certaine appointed times to assemble a Prouinciall Synode. There the bishop of Rome had no authority. But a Generall council the Emperour only might summon. For if any of the bishoppes had attempted it, not only they that were out of his prouince, would not haue obeyed his calling, but also there would by-andby haue risen an vprore. Therefore the Emperour indifferently warned them all to be present. Socrates in dede reporteth, that Iulius did expostulate with the bishops of the East, because they called him not to the Synode of Antioch, whereas it was forbidden by the Canons, that that any thing shoulde be decreed without the knowledge of the Bishop of Rome. But who doth not see that this is to be vnderstanded of such decrees as binde the whole vniuersal Church? Nowe it is no maruel, if thus much be graunted both to y^e antiquity & honor of the city, & to the dignity of the see, that there should be no generall decree made of religion, in the absence of the bishop of Rome, if he refuse not to be present. But what is this to y^e dominion ouer the whole Church? For we deny not, that he was one of the chiefe: but we will not graunt, that which the Romanistes now affirme, that he had a dominion ouer all.

9 Now remaineth the fourth kind of power, which stādeth in ap-pealles. It is euident that he hath the chiefe power, to whose iudge-ment seate appellation is made. Many oftentimes appelled to the Bishop of Rome: and he himselfe also went about to draw the hearinge of causes to himselfe: but he was alway laughed to scorne, whē he passed his owne boundes. I will speake nothing of the East and of Gre-cia: but it is certaine that the bishops of Fraunce stoutly withstoode him, when he seemed to take to himselfe an empire ouer them. In Affrica there was longe debate about that matter. For where at the Mileuitane Councell, at which Augustine was present, they were excommunicate that appelled beyond the sea, the bishop of Rome tra-uailed to bringe to passe, that that decree might be amended. He sent his legates to shew that that priuilege was giuen to him by y^e Nicene Councell. The Legates brought foorth the acts of the Nicene Coucell, which they hadde fetched out of the storehouse of their owne Church. The Affricans withstoode it, and denied that the bishops of Rome ought to be credited in their owne cause: and sayd that therefore they would send to Constantinople, & into other cities of Gre-cia, where copies were to be had y^e were lesse suspicious. It was foūd, that therein was no such thing written, as the Romains had pretēded.
 So was y^e decree confirmed, which tooke the chiefe hearing of causes from the bishop of Rome: In which doing the lewde shamelesnesse of the Bishoppe of Rome himselfe appeated. For when he guilefully did thrust in the Synode at Sardos in stede of the Nicene Synode, he was shamefully taken in a manifest falsehoode. But yet greater and more shamelesse was their wickednesse, that added a forged Epistle to the Councell, wherein I wote not what bishoppe of Carthage, condemninge the arrogance of Aurelius his predecessour, for that he was so bold to withdraw himselfe from the obediēce of the see Apostolike, and yeldinge himselfe & his Church, humbly craueth pardon. These be the goodly monumentes of antiquity, whereupon the maiesty of the see of Rome is founded, while they so childishely lye, vnder the pretence of Antiquity, that very blinde men may finde it out by gropinge. Aurelius (sayth he) puffed vp with deuēlishe boldenesse and stubbornesse, rebelled against Christ, and saint Peter, and therefore to be condemned with curse. What sayd Augustine? But what sayd so many fathers that were present at the Mileuitane Council? But what neede is it to spende many wordes in confuting that foolish writing, which the Romanistes themselues, if they haue any face left, can not looke vpon without great shame? So Gratian, I can not tell whether of malice or of ignorance, where he rehearsed that decree, that they shoulde be excommunicate that appelle beyonde the sea, addeth an exception: Vnlesse peradventure they appelle to the see of Rome. What may a man do to these beastes, which are so voide of common reason, that they except that only thing out of y^e law, for whose cause euery man seeth that the lawe was made? For the Councell when it condemneth appelles beyond the sea, forbiddeth only this, that none should appelle to Rome. Here the good expositor excepteth Rome out of the common law.

10 But (to determine this question at once) one history shal make plaine what maner of iurisdiction the bishop of Rome had in old time. Donate of the blacke houses had accused Cecilian bishoppe of Carthage. The man accused was condemned, his cause not hearde. For when he knew that the bishops had conspired against him, he would not appeare. Then the matter came to the Emperour Constantine. He, forasmuch as he willed to haue the matter ended by ecclesiasticall iudgement, committed the hearinge of it to Melciades bishop of Rome. To whom he adioyned felow commissioners many bishops of Italy, Fraunce and Spaine. If that belonged to the ordinary iurisdiction of the see of Rome, to heare an appelle in an ecclesiastical cause: why doth he suffer other to be ioyned with him at the will of the Emperour? Yea why did he himselfe take the iudgement vppon him rather by the Emperours commaundement, than by his owne office?

August. But let vs heare what hapned afterward. There Cecilian got y^e victory. epi. 162 Donate of the blacke houses was condēned for sclaūder: he appelled: Constantine comitted the iudgement of y^e appelle to y^e bishop of Orleance. He sate as iudge, to pronounce what he thought, after the bishop of Rome. If the see of Rome hath y^e chief power without appellatiō: why doth Melciades suffer himselfe to receiue so great a shame, y^e y^e bishop of Orleance should be preferred aboue him? And what Emperour doth this? eue Constantine of whom they boast y^e he employed not only al his endeuor, but in a maner al the richesse of the empire to encrease increase the dignitie of their see. We see therefore nowe, howe farre the bishop of Rome was at that time by all meanes from that supreme dominiõ, which he affirmeth to be geuen vnto him by Christ ouer all Churches, and which he liengly sayeth that he hath in all ages possessed by the consent of the whole world.

11 I knowe howe many epistles there be, howe many writings and decrees, wherin the bishops do geue much, and boldly challenge much vnto it. But this also all men that haue but a very little wit and learning do knowe, that the most part of those are so vnsauerie, that by the first tast of them a man may soone find out of what shop they came. For what man of sounde wit and sobre, will thinke that that goodly interpretation is Anacletus his owne, which is in Gratian reported vnder the name of Anacletus: that is, that Cephas is a head? The Romanists do at this day abuse for defence of their see, many such trifles, which Gratian hath patched together without iudgement; and yet still in so great light they will sell such smokes, wherewith in olde time they were wont to mocke out the ignorãt in darke-nesse. But I will not bestowe much labor in confuting those things, which do openly confute themselues by reason of their vnsauory folie. I graunt that there remain also true epistles of the olde bishops, wherin they set forth the honor of their see with glorious titles: of which sort are some epistles of Leo. For that man, as he was learned and eloquent, so was he also aboue measure desirous of glory and dominion: but whether the Churches then belueed his testimonie when he so aduanced himselfe, that in deede is it that is in contro- uersie. But it appereth that many offended with his ambition, did also withstãd his gredie desire. Sometimes he appointed in his steede the bishop of Thessalonica throughout Grecia and other countrees adioining: sometime he appointed the bishop of Orleance, or some other throughout Fraunce. So he appointed Hormisdas bishop of Hispaliõ to be his vicar in Spain, but euery where he excepteth, that he geueth out such apointements vpon this condition, that the Metropolitans may haue their auncient priuileges remaining safe and whole. But Leo himselfe declareth, that this is one of their priuileges, that if any dout happen about any matter, the Metropolitane should first be asked his aduise. Therefore those apointements of vicars in his steede were vpon this condition, that neither any bishop should be letted in his ordinary iurisdiction, nor any Metropolitane in being judge of Appealles, nor any prouincial Councel in ordering of their Churches. What was this els but to absteine from all iurisdiction: but to entermedle to the appeasing of discordes, onely so farre as the lawe and nature of the communion of the Church suffreth.

12 In Gregories time that auncient order was already much changed. For when the Empire was shaken, & torne in peeces, when Fraunce and Spaine were afflicted with many ouerthrowes receiued, Slaunonia wasted, Italic vexed, and Africa in a maner destroyed with continuall calamities: that in so great a shakinge of ciuil affaires, at least the integritie of faith might remaine, or yet not vterly perish, all the bishops from eche part did the rather ioine themselues to the bishop of Rome. Thereby it came to passe, that not only the dignity, but also the power of that see greatly encreased. Howebeit I do not so much passe by what meanes it was brought about. Truly it appeareth that it was then greater than in the ages before. And yet it then greatly differed from being an vnbridled dominion, that one man might beare rule ouer other after his owne will. But the see of Rome had this reuerence, that it might with her authoritie subdue and repress the lewde and obstinate that coulde not by the other bishops be kept within their dutie. For Gregorie deth oftentimes diligently testify this, that he doth no lesse faithfully preferue to other men their rightes, than he requireth his owne of them. Neither do I (saith he) prick on by ambition, plucke from any man that which is his right: but I desire in all things to honor my brethren. There is no saying in his writings wherin he doth more proudly boast of the largenesse of his Supremicie, than this: I knowe not what bishop is not subiect to the see Apostolike when he is founde in faulte. But he by and by adioineth, Where fault requireth not, all according to the order of humilitie are egall. He geueth to himselfe power to correct them that haue offended: if all do their dutie, he maketh himselfe egall with the rest. But he himselfe geueth himselfe this power: and they assented to it that would; and other that liked it not, might frely gainesay it, which it is well knowen that the most parte of them did. Beside that he speaketh there of the Primate of Constantinople: which when he was condemned by the prouinciall Synode, refused the whole iudgement. His fellowe bishops informed the Emperour of this stubbornesse of him. The Emperour willed Gregorie to be iudge of the cause. We see therfore that he both artenpteth nothing, whereby he may breake the ordinary iurisdiction, and the same thing that he doth for the helping of other, he doth not but by the commaundement of the Emperour.

13 This therfore was then all the power of the bishop of Rome, to set himself against obstinate & vntamed heds, when there needed any extraordinary remedy: and that to helpe & not to hinder other bishops.

bishops. Therefore he taketh no more to himselfe ouer all other, than in an other place he graunteth to all other ouer himselfe, when he confesseth that he is redy to be corrected of all, to be amended of all. So in an other place he doth in deede commaunde the bishop of Aquileia to come to Rome, to pleade his cause in a controuersy of faith that was risen betweene him and other: but he doth not commaunde him of his owne power, but because the Emperour had so commaunded. Neither doth he geue warning that he alone shalbe iudge, but promised that he will assemble a Synode by whom the whole matter may be iudged. But although there was yet such moderatiō, that the power of the see of Rome had her certaine bounds; which it might not passe, and the bishop of Rome himselfe was no more about than vnder other: yet it appeareth howe much Gregory disliked such state. For he nowe and then complaineth, that vnder color of bishoprike he was brought backe to the world: and that he was more entangled with earthly cares, than euer he had serued them while he was a lay man: that he was in that honor oppressed with tumult of worldly affaires. In an other place: so great burdens (saith he) of businesse do holde me downe, that my minde can nothing at all be raised vp to things aboue. I am shake with many waues of causes: and after those leisures of rest I am tossed with tempestes of troublesome life: so that I may rightly say, I am come into y depth of the sea, and the tempeste hath drowned me. Hereby gather, what he would haue sayed, if he had happened to be in these times. Although he fulfilled not the office of a Pastor, yet he was doing it. He abstained from the gouernment of the ciuil Empire, and confessed himselfe to be subiect to the Emperour as other were. He did not thrust himselfe into the cure of other Churches, but being compelled by necessitie. And yet he thinketh himselfe to be in a maze, because he can not apply himselfe altogether onely to the office of a bishop.

14 At that time the bishop of Constantinople striued with the bishop of Rome for the Supremicie, as it is already said. For after that the seat of the Empire was stablished at Constantinople, the maiesty of the Empire seemed to require, that that Church also should haue the seconde place of honor after the Church of Rome. And truely at the beginning, nothing more auailed to cause the Supremicie to be geuen to Rome, but because the hed of the Empire was there at that time. There is in Gratian a writing vnder the name of Pope Lucinus, where he saith, that cities were no otherwise diuided, where Metropolitanes and Primates ought to sit, than by the reason of the ciuil gouernment that was before. There is also an other vnder the name of Pope Clement, where he saith, that Patriarches were ordained in those cities that had had the chiefe Flamines in the. Which, although it be false, yet is taken out of a truth. For it is certaine, that, to the ende there should be made as litle change as might be, the prouinces were diuided according to the state of thinges that then were: and that Primates and Metropolitans were set in those cities that excelled the other in honors and power. Therefore in the Councell at

Cap. 1. Taurinú it was decreed; that those cities which in the ciuile gouernment where the chiefe cities of euery prouince, should be the chiefe sees of bishops. And if it happened the honor of the ciuile gouernment to be remoued from one citie to an other, that then the right of the Metropolitane citie should therewithall be remoued thether. But Innocentius bishop of Rome, when he sawe the auncient dignity of his citie to growe in decay, after that the seate of the Empire was remoued to Constantinople, fearing the abacement of his see, made a contrary lawe: wherein he denieth it to be necessary that the ecclesiasticall mother cities should be changed as the Imperiall mother cities change. But the authoritie of a Synode ought of right to be preferred aboue one mans sentence. Also we ought to suspecte Innocentius himselfe in his owne cause. Howesoever it be, yet by his owne prouiso he sheweth, that from the beginning it was so ordered, that the Metropolitane cities should be disposed according to the outwarde order of the Empire.

Socrat. 15 According to this auncient ordinance, it was decreed in the his tri- first councell at Constantinople, that the bishop of the citie should part. li. haue the priuileges of honor next after the bishop of Rome, because
9. ca. 13. it was a newe Rome. But a long time after, when a like decree was Decret. made at Chalcedon, Leo stoutly cried out against it. And he not only 22 dist. gaue himselfe leaue to esteeme as nothing that which sixe hundred bishops or mo had decreed: but also bitterly taunted them, for that they toke from other sees that honor which they were so bolde to geue to the Church of Constantinople. I besech you, what other thing could moue a man to trouble the world for so smal a matter, but mere ambition? He sayth that y^e ought to be inuiolable, which the Nicene Synode hath ones decreed. As though forsooth the Christian faith were endangered, if one Church be preferred before an other: or as though Patriarchies were there diuided to any other end, but for policies. But we know y^e policy receiueth, yea requireth diuerse chaunges, according to the diuersity of times. Therefore it is fond that Leo pretendeth, that the honor, which by the authoritie of the Nicene Synode was geuen to the see of Alexandria, ought not to be geuen to the see of Constantinople. For common reason telleth this, that it was such a decree, as might be taken away according to the respect of times. Yea none of the bishops of the East withstode it, whom that thing most of all concerned. Truly Proterius was present, whom they had made bishop of Alexādria in the place of Dioscorus. There were presente other Patriarches, whues honor was diminished. It was their parte to withstand it, not Leos which remained safe in his owne place. But when all they holde their peace, yea assent vnto it, and onely the bishop of Rome resisteth: it is easy to iudge, what moueth him: that is, he foresaw that which not long after happened, that it would come to passe, that, the glory of olde Rome decaying, Constantinople not contented with the seconde place, would striue with Rome for the Supremicie. And yet with his crying out he did not so much preuaile, but that the decree of the councill was confirmed. Therefore his successors, when they sawe themselues overcome, quietly gaue ouer that stiffenesse: for they suffred that he should be accompted the seconde Patriarche.

16 But within a litle after, Iohn which in Gregories time ruled the Church of Constantinople, brake forth so farre that he called himselfe the vniuersall Patriarche. Here Gregorie, lest he should in a very good cause faile to defende his owne see, did constantly set himself against him. And truly both the pride and madnesse of Iohn was intolerable, which desired to make the bouēdes of his bishoprike egall with the boundes of the Empire. And yet Gregorie doth not claime to himselfe, that which he denieth to an other: but abhorreth that name as wicked, and vngodly, and abhominable, whosoeuer take it vpon him. Yea and also in one place he is angry with Eulolius bishop of Alexandria, which had honored him with such a title. Beholde (sayeth he) in the preface of the Epistle which ye directed to my selfe that haue forbidden it, ye haue cared to emprinte the word of proude calling, in naming me vniuersall Pope. Which. I pray that your holinesse will no more do because that is withdrawn from you, which is giuen to an other more than reason requireth. I compe it no honor, wherin I se the honor of my brethren to be diminished. For my honor is the honor of the vniuersall Church, and the sounde strength of my brethren. But if your holinesse call me the vniuersall Pope, it denieth it selfe to be that which it cōfesseth me to be wholly. Truly Gregorie stode in a good and honest cause. But Iohn holpen by the fauor of Maurice the Emperour, could neuer be remoued from his purpose. Cyriacus also his successor neuer suffered himselfe to be entreated in that behalfe.

17 At the last Phocas, which when Maurice was slaine, was set in his place (I wote not for what cause being more frendly to the Romaines, but because he was there crowned without strife) graunted to Boniface the third, that which Gregorie neuer required, that Rome should be the hed of all Churches. After this maner was the controuerſy ended. And yet this benefite of the Emperor, could not ſo much haue profited the ſee of Rome, vnleſſe other things alſo had afterwarde happened. For Grecia & all Aſia were within a litle after cut of from the communion of Rome. Fraunce ſo much reuerenced him, that it obeyed no further than it liſted. But it was then firſt brought into bondage when Pipine vſurped the kingdome. For when Zacharie biſhop of Rome had bene his helper to the breache of his faith, and to robbery, that thruſting out the lawfull king, he might violently enter vpon the kingdome as layed open for a pray: he receiued this rewarde; that the ſee of Rome ſhould haue iuriſdiction ouer the Churches of Fraunce: As robbers are wonted in parting to deuide the common ſpoile: ſo theſe good men ordered the matter betweene themſelues, that Pipine ſhould haue the earthly and ciuile dominion, ſpoiling the true king: and Zacharie ſhould be made hed of all biſhops and haue the ſpirituall power: which, when at the beginning it was weake, (as it is wont to be in newe things) was afterward confirmed by the authority of Charles, in maner for a like cauſe. For he was alſo indetted to the biſhop of Rome, for that by his endeuor he had attained to the honor of the Empire. But although it be credible, that Churches eche where were before that time much deformed, yet it is certaine that the olde forme of the Church was then firſt vtterly defaced in Fraunce and Germanie. There remaine yet in the recordes of the court of Pariſe breſe notes of theſe times, which, where they entreate of the matters of the Church, make mention of the couenant both of Pipine and of Charles with the biſhop of Rome. Thereby we may gather that then was an alteration made of the olde ſtate.

18 Sins that time, when things did eche where daily fall from worſe to worſe, the tyranny of the ſee of Rome was nowe and then alſo ſtabliſhed and encreaſed, and that partly by the ignorance, and partly by the ſlouthfulneſſe of the biſhops. For when one man toke all things vpon him, and without measure proceeded more and more to aduance himſelfe againſt lawe and right: the biſhops did not with ſuch zeale as they ought, endeuor themſelues to reſtraine his luſt, & though they wated not courage, yet they were deſtitute of true learning and knowledge: ſo that they were nothing fitt to attempte ſo great a matter. Therefore we see what & howe Monstruous an vnholly defiling of all holy things, & a scattering abroad of the whole order of the Church, was in Bernardes time. He cōplaineth that there resort by heapes to Rome out of all the world, ambitious men, couetous, Simoniás, robbers of God, keepers of concubines, cōmitters of incest, and all such mor:ers, to obtaine or reteine ecclesiasticall honors by the Apostolike authority: & that fraud and vndermining, & violence were growen in force. He saith that that maner of iudging which thē was vsed, was abhominable, and vnsemely, not onely for the Church, but also for a iudiciall court. He crieth out that the Church is full of ambitious men: and that there is none that more dredeth to cōmit mischeuous Actes, than robbers do in their caue, when they deuide the spoiles of waifaring men. Fewe (sayeth he) do loke vnto the mouth of the lawgeuer, but vnto his handes. But not without cause. For those hādes do all the Popes businesse. What a thing is this, that they are bought of the spoiles of Churches, that say to thee, oh well done, well done? The life of the poore is sowen in the stretes of the riche: siluer glistereth in the mire: men run to it from all places: not the poore, but the stranger taketh it vp, or he paradventure that runneth fastest before. But this maner, or rather this death, came not of thee, I would to God it might ende in thee. Among these things thou a Pastor goest forward compassed with much and precious aray. If I durst say it, these are rather the Pastors of deuils, than of shepe. Forsoth Peter did thus, Paule played thus. Thy court is more accustomed to receiue men good than to make them good. For the ill do not there profit, but the good do decay. Nowe as for the abuses of appealles that he rehearseth, no godly man can reade them without great horror. At the last he thus cōcludeth of that vnbrideled gredinesse of the see of Rome in the vsurping of iurisdiction: I speake the murmour and common complaint of the Churches. They crie out that they be mangled and dismembred. There are either none or fewe that do not either bewaile or feare this plague. Askest thou what plague? The Abbotes are plucked from the bishops, the bishops from the Archebishops, &c. It is maruelous if this may be excused. In so doing ye proue that ye haue fulnesse of power, but not of righteousnesse. Ye do this, because ye can do it: but whether ye also ought to do it, is a question. Ye are sett to preferue, not to enuie to euery man his honor and his owne degree. These fewe things of many I listed to rehearse, partly that the rede:s may see, how sore the Church was then decayed, and partly that they may know in howe great sorowe and mourning this calamitie helde all the godly.

19 But nowe, albeit that we graunte to the bishop of Rome at this day that preeminence and largenesse of iurisdiction, which that see had in the meane times, as in the times of Leo and of Gregory: what is that to the present state of the Papacie? I do not yet speake of the earthly dominion, nor of the ciuil power thereof, which we will afterwarde consider in place fit for it: but the very spirituall gouernment y they boist of, what hath it like to the state of those times? For they define the Pope none otherwise than the Supreme hed of the Church in earth, and the vniuersall bishop of the whole world: And the bishops themselues, when they speake of their owne authoritie, do with great stoutnesse of countenance, pronounce that to them belongeth the power to commaunde, & other are bounde to the necessitie to obey, that so all their decrees are to be holden as confirmed with the diuine voice of Peter: that the prouinciall Synodes, are without force, because they want the presence of the Pope: that they may order clerkes of any Church that they will: and may call them to their see that haue bene ordered els where. Innumerable of that sorte are in Gratiens packe, which I do not nowe rehearse, least I should be to tedious to the Reders. But this is the summe of them, that onely the bishop of Rome hath the Supreme hearing and determining of all ecclesiasticall causes, whether it be in iudging and defining of doctrines, or in making of lawes, or in stablishing of discipline, or in executing or iudgements: It were also long and superfluous to rehearse the priuileges that they take to themselues in reseruations, as they call them. But, (which is most intollerable of all other) they leaue no iudgement in earth to restraine and bridle their outragious lust, if they abuse so immeasurable power. It is lawefull for no man (say they) to reuoke the iudgement of that see, because of the Supremicie of the Church of Rome. Againe. The iudge shalbe iudged neither by the Emperor, nor by kinges, nor by all the Clergie, nor of the people. That is in deede to imperiously done, that one man maketh himselfe iudge of all men, and suffreth himselfe to obey the iudgement of no man. But what if he vse tyranny ouer the people of God? if he scatter abroad and wast the kingdome of Christ? if he trouble the whole Church? if he turne the office of Pastor into roberie? Yea though he be neuer so mischeuous, he sayeth that he is not bounde to yelde accompte. For these be the sayinges of the bishops: Gods wil was to determine the causes of other men by men, but he hath without question reserued the bishop of this see to his owne iudgement. Againe. The doinges of subiectes are iudged of vs: but oures, of God onely.

20 And that such decrees might haue the more weight, they haue falsly thrust in the names of the olde bishops, as though things had bene so ordeined from the beginning: whereas it is most certaine, that it is newe & lately forged whatsoeuer the bishop of Rome geueth to himselfe more than we haue rehearsed to be geuen him by the auncient Councells: Yea they are come to so great shamelesnesse, that they haue set forth a writing vnder the name of Anastasius Patriarch of Constantinople, wherein he testifieth that it was decreed by the olde rules, that nothing should be done euen in the furthest prouinces, that were not first moued to the see of Rome. Beside this that it is certaine that this is most vaine, what man shall thinke it likely, that such a commendation of the see of Rome proceeded from the aduersary and enuier of the honor & dignitie thereof? But verily it behoued that these Antichristes should be carried on to so great madnesse and blindenesse, that their lewdenesse might be plaine for all men to see, at least so many as will open their eyes. But the decretall epistles heaped together by Gregorie the ix. againe the Clementines, and Extrauagantes of Martine, do yet more openly and with fuller mouth eche where breath forth their outragious fiercesnesse and as it were the tyrannie of barbarous kings. But these be the oracles, by which the Romanistes will haue their papacie to be weyed. Hereupon arose those notable principles, which at this day haue euery where in the papacie the force of oracles: that the Pope can not erre: that the Pope is aboue the councells: that the Pope is the vniuersall bishop of all bishops, and the Supreme head of the Church in earth: I passe over the much absurder follies, which the foolish Canonistes babble in their scholes: to which yet the Romish diuines do not onely assente, but do also clap their handes at them, to flatter their idole.

21 I will not deale with them by extremity of right. Some other man would against this their so great insolence set the saying of Cypriane, which he vsed among the bishops, at whoes councell he sate as chiefe. None of vs calleth himselfe bishop of bishops, or with tyrannous feare compelleth his fellowe bishops to necessitie to obey. He would obiect that, which a litle afterwarde was decreed at Carthage. That none should be called Prince of Priests, or chiefe bishop. He would gather many testimonies out of Histories, Canons out of Synodes, and many sentences out of the bokes of olde writers, by which the bishop of Rome should be brought downe into the fellowship of the rest. But I passe over all these, least I should seeme too precisely to presse them. But let the best patrones of the see of Rome aunswere me, with what face they dare defende the title of vniuersal bishop, which they se so oft to be condemned with curse by Gregory. If Gregories testimonie ought to be of force, they do thereby declare that Antichrist is their bishop, because they make him vniuersal. The name also of hed was no more vsuall. For thus he sayeth in one place. Peter is the chiefe member in the body, Iohn, Andrewe and Iames the hedes of particular peoples: yet they all are members of the Church vnder one hed: yea the holy ones before the lawe, the holy ones vnder the lawe, the holy ones vnder grace, are set among members, altogether making vp the body of the Lorde: and no man euer willed to haue himselfe called vniuersal. But whereas the bishop of Rome taketh vpon himselfe the power of commaunding, that thing smally agreeth with that which Gregory saith in another place, For whereas Eulolius bishop of Alexandria, had said that he was commaunded by him, he aunswered in this wise. I pray ye, take away this word of commanding from my hearing. For I knowe what I am and what ye be. In place, ye be to me brethren: in maners ye be to me fathers. Therefore I commanded not, but I eared to tell you those things that I thought profitable. Whereas he so extendeth his iurisdiction without end, he doth therein great & hainous wrong, not onely to the other bishops, but also to all particular Churches, which he so teareth and plucketh in peeces, that he may bilde his seate of their ruines. But whereas he exempteth himselfe from all iudgements, and will so reigne after the maner of tirantes, that he accompteth his owne onely lust for lawe, that verily is so hainous, and so farre from ecclesiasticall order, that it may in no wise be borne: for it vtterly abhorreth not onely from all feling of godlinesse, but also from all humanitie.

23 But that I be not cōpelled to go through & examine al things particularly, I do againe appelle to them, that will at this day be accompted the best and most faithfull patrones of the see of Rome, whether they be not ashamed to defende the present state of the papacie: which it is certaine to be a hundred times more corrupt, than it was in the times of Gregory and Bernard: which state yet did then so much displease those holy men. Gregory eche where cōplaineth, that he is to much diuersly drawn away with forain busines: that he is vnder the colour of bishoprike brought back to the world: wherin he serueth so many cares of the world as he neuer remembreth that he serued when he was a lay man: that he is pressed downe with tumulte of worldly affaires, that his minde is nothing raised vp to things aboue: that he is shaken with many waues of causes, and tossed with tempestes of troublesome life : so that he may worthily say, I am come into the depth of the sea. Truly among those earthly businesses, he might yet teache the people with Sermons, priuately admonish and correct such as it behoued, order the Church, geue counsell to his fellowe bishops and exhort them to their dutie : beside these things there remained some time to write : and yet he lamenteth his calamitie, that he is drowned in the depest sea. If the gouernement of that time was a sea : what is to be sayed of the pa-pacie at this time ? For what likenesse haue they together ? Here be no preachings, no care of discipline, no zele to the Churches, no spirituall doing, finally nothing but the world. Yet this maze is praised, as though there could nothing be founde more orderly and better framed. But what complaintes doth Bernarde poure out, what grones doth he vtter, when he loketh vpon the faultes of his age ? What then would he do, if he behelde this our age of iron, and worse if any be worse than iron ? What obstinate wickednesse is this, not onely stiffe to defende as holy and diuine, that which all the holy men haue with one mouth condemned : but also to abuse their testimonie to the defense of the papacie, which it is certaine that they neuer knewe of ?

Howbeit of Bernardes time I confesse, that then the corruption of all things was so great, that it was not much vnlike our time. But they are without all shame, that fetche any pretense for it, out of that meane age, that is the time of Leo, Gregory, & such other. For they do like as if one, to stablish the Monarchie of Emperours, would praise the olde state of the Empire of Rome : that is, would borrowe the praises of libertie, to set forth the honor of tyranny.

23 Finally, although all these things were graunted them : yet there ariseth of fresh a newe strife for them, when we deny that there is a Church at Rome, in which such benefites may be resident : when we denie that there is a bishop, which may beare these priuileges of dignitie. Admit therefore all those things to be true, (which yet we haue already wroong from them) that Peter was by the mouth of Christ appointed hed of the vniuersall Church : and that he left the honor that was geuen him, in the see of Rome : that the same was stablished by the authoritie of the auncient Church, and confirmed with long continuance : that the Supreme power hath bene alway by one consent geuen of all men to the bishop of Rome : that he hath bene the iudge of all both causes and men, and himselfe subiect to the iudgement of none : let them haue also more, if they will : yet I answere in one word, that none of these things auaille, vntill there be at Rome a Church & a bishop. This they must needes graunt me, that it can not be the morher of Churches, which is not it selfe a Church: that he can not be chiefe of bishops, which is not himselfe a bishop. Will they therefore haue the see Apostolike at Rome? Then let them shewe me a true and lawefull Apostleship. Will they haue the chief bishop? Then let them shewe me a bishop. But what? where will they shewe vs any face of a Church? They name one in deede, and haue it oft in their mouth. Truly the Church is knowne by her certaine markes: and bishoprike is a name of office. I speake not here of the people: but of the gouernment it selfe, which ought continually to shine in the Church. Where is the ministerie in their Church, such as Christes institution requireth? Let vs call to remembrance that which hath before bene spoken of the office of Priests and of a bishop. If we shall bring the office of Cardinals to be tried by that rule, we shall confesse that they are nothing lesse than Priests. As for the chiefe bishop himselfe, I would faine knowe what one thing at all he hath bishoplike. First it is the principall point in the office of a bishop, to teach the people with the word of God: an other and the next point to that is, to minister the sacraments: the third is to admonish and exhort, yea and to correct them that offend, and to hold the people together in holy discipline. What of these things doth he? yea, what doth he faine himselfe to do: Let them tell therefore, by what meane they would haue him to be compted a bishop, that doth not with his little finger, no not ones so much as in outwarde shewe, touche any part of a bishops office.

24 It is not so of a bishop as it is of a king. For a king, although he do not execute that which belongeth to a king, doth neuertheless retaine the honor and title. But in iudging of a bishop respect is had to Christes commaundement, which alway ought to be of force in the Church. Therefore let the Romanistes loose me this knot. I denie that their hy bishop, is the chiefe of bishops, forasmuch as he is no bishop. They must needes proue this last point to be false, if they will haue the victorie in the first. But howe say they to this, that he not onely hath no properrie of a bishop, but rather all things contrarie? But here, O God, where at shall I beginne? at his learning, or at his maners? What shall I say, or what shall I leaue vnsaide? where shall I make an ende? This I say: that whereas the world is at this day, stuffed with so many peruerse and wicked doctrines, full of so many kindes of superstitions, blinded with so many errors, drowned in so great idolatry: there is none of these any where, that hath not either flowed from thense, or at least bene there confirmed. Neither is there any other cause, why the bishops are caried with so greate

rage against the doctrine of the Gospell newly springing vp againe, why they bend all their strengthes to oppresse it, why they kindle vp kings and princes to crueltie, but because they see that their whole kingdom decayeth & falleth down, so sone as the Gospell of Christ cometh in place. Leo was cruell: Clement was bloudie: Paule is a fierce murtherer. But nature hath not so much moued them to fight against the truth, as for that this was their onely meane to maintain their power. Therefore sith they can not be safe, till they haue driuen away Christ, they trauaile in this cause, as if they did fight for their religion and contries, and for their owne liues. What then? Shall that be to vs the see Apostolike, where we see nothing but horrible Apostasie? Shall he be Christes vicar, which by persecuting the Gospel with furious enterprises, doth openly professe himselfe to be Antichrist? Shall he be Peters successour, that rangeth with sword and fire, to destroy all that euer Peter hath builded? Shall he be head of the Church that cutting of & dismembing the Church from Christ the onely true head thereof, doth in it selfe plucke and teare it in pieces? Admitte verily that in the olde time Rome was the mother of all Churches: yet sith it hath begon to be the seate of Antichrist, it hath cessed to be that which it was.

25 We seeme to be to much euill speakers and railers, when we call the bishop of Rome Antichrist. But they that so thinke, do not vnderstande that they accuse Paule of immodestie, after whom we so speake, yea out of whoes mouth we so speake. And least any man obiecte, that we do wrongfully wrest against the bishop of Rome, these wordes of Paul that are spoken to an other intent, I will brefely shewe, that they can not be otherwise vnderstanded, but of the Papacie. Paul writeth, that Antichrist shall sitt in the temple of God. In an other place also the Holy Ghost describing his image in the person of Antiochus, sheweth that his kingdome shal consist in haughtinesse of speche, and blasphemings of God. Hereupon we gather, that it is rather a tyrannie ouer soules, than ouer bodies, that is raised vp against the spirituall kingdome of Christ. Then, that it is such, as doth not abolish the name of Christ and the Church: but rather should abuse the pretēce of Christ, and lurke vnder the title of the Church, as vnder a disguised visour. But although all the heresies and sectes that haue bene from the beginning, belong to the kingdome of Antichrist: yet where as Paule propheciethe, that there shall come a departing, by this description he signifieth, that that seate of abomination shall then be raised vp, when a certaine vniuersall departing shall possesse the Church: howsoeuer many membres of the Church here and there continue in the true vnitie of faith. But where he addeth, that in his time he began in a mysterie to sette vp the worke of iniquitie, which he would afterward shewe openly: thereby we vnderstand, that this calamitie was neither to be brought in by one man, nor to be ended in one man. Nowe whereas he doth set out Antichrist by this marke, that he should plucke away from God his due honor, to take it to himself: this is the chiefe token that we ought to followe in seeking out of Antichrist, specially where such pride procedeth euen to the publike dissipation of the Church. Sith therefore it is certaine, that the bishop of Rome hath shamelessly conueyed away to himselfe that which was the chiefe propre thing to God alone & Christ, it is not to be doubted but that he is the capitaine and standerbearer of the wicked and abominable kingdome.

26 Nowe let the Romanists go, and obiect an iquitie against vs: As if in so great alteration of all things, the honor of the See might stand where there is no see. Eusebius telleth, howe God, that there might be place for his vengeance, remoued the Church that was at Hierusalem to Pella. That which we heare to haue bene ones doone, might be oster donne. Therefore so to binde the honor of supremacy to a place, that he which is in deede the most hatefull enemy of Christ, the hiest aduersarie of the Gospell, the greatest waster and destroyer of the Church, the most cruell slaughtermã & butcher of the saints, should neuertheless be accompted the vicar of Christ, the successor of Peter, the chief bishop of the Church, only because he occupieth the see that was ones the chieftest of all: that verily is to much to be scorned and foolish. I speake not, howe great difference there is betwene the popes chauncerie, and a well framed order of the Church, Howbeit this one thing may well take away all dout of this question. For no man that hath his right wit, will thinke the bishoprike enclosed in leade and bulles: much lesse, in that schoole of fraudes and deceites, in which thinges the Popes spirituall gouernment consisteth. Therefore it was very well said by a certain man, that that Church of Rome which is boasted of, is long ago tourned into a court which onely is nowe scene at Rome. Neither do I here accuse the faultes of men: but I shewe that the Papacie it selfe is directly contrary to the true order of a Church.

27 But if we come to the persones of men, it is well enough knowe what maner of vicars of Christ we shall finde. Iulius forsooth, and Leo, and Clement, and Paul, shalbe pillers of the christian faith, and the chiefe expositours of religion, which neuer knewe any other thing of Christ, than that which he had learned in Lucians schole.

But

But why do I reckon vp thre or fower Popes? as though it were doubtful, what maner of forme of religion the Popes with their whole college of Cardinals haue sinned long ago professed, & at this day do professe. For first this is the principall article of that secret Diuinity that reigneth among them, That there is no God: the seconde, That all things that are written and taught concerning Christ, are lies and deceits: the third, That the doctrine of the life to come, and of the last resurrection, are mere fables. They do not all thinke so: and fewe of them speake so. I graunt. But this hath long ago begon to be the ordinarie religion of Popes. Whereas this is very well knowne to all that knowe Rome, yet the Romishe Diuines cease not to boast, that by Christes priuilege it is prouided, that the Pope can not erre, because it was said to Peter: I haue prayed for thee, that thy faith should not faint. What, I pray you, winne they by mocking so shamelesly, but that the whole world may vnderstand, that they are come to that extremitie of wickednesse, that they neither feare God, nor stande in awe of men? Luc. 22.

28 But let vs imagine, that the vngodlines of those Popes whom I haue spoken of, is hidden, because they haue neither published it by preaching, nor by writings: but onely haue bewrayed it at their table, and in their chamber, or at least within walles of houses. But if they will haue this priuilege to be of force, which they pretēde, they must needs wipe Iohn the. xxij. out of the number of Popes, who openly affirmed that soules are mortall, and that they die together with the bodies vntil the day of resurrection. And, that you may perceiue that the whole See with her principall stayes was then wholly fallen: none of all the Cardinals withstode so great a madnesse, but the schoole of Parise moued the king of Fraunce to compell him to recant it. The king forbad his subiectes to communicate with him, vnlesse he did out of hande repent: and the same, as the maner is, he proclaimed by a heralde. The Pope compelled by this necessitie, abjured his error. This example maketh that I neede not to dispute any more with my aduersaries about this that they say, that y^e see of Rome and the bishops therof, can not erre in the faith, because it was saide to Peter, I haue prayed for thee, that thy faith may not fainte. Truly he fell with so fowle a kinde of fall from the right faith, that he is a notable example to them that come after, that they are not all Peters which succede after Peter in the bishoprike. Howbeit this is also of it selfe so childish, that it needeth no aunswere. For if they will drawe to Peters successours whatsoever was spoken to Peter, it shall followe that they are all Satans, forasmuch as the Lorde said this also to Gerson

Peter. Go behinde, thou Satan, because thou art an offence to me. For it shalbe as easy for vs to turne backe this latter saying against them, as it shalbe for them to object the other against vs.

29 But I list not to strue with them in playing the foole. Therefore I returne thether from whence I made digression. So to bind the place, and Christ, and the Holy Ghost, and the Church together, that whosoever sit in that place, although he be the deuil, yet he must be iudged the vicar of Christ, and the hed of the Church, because it was ones the seate of Peter: I say this is not onely wicked & sclanderous to Christ, but also to great an absurdity and against common reason. It is already long ago sins the bishops of Rome are either without al religion, or the greatest enemies of religion. Therefore they are no more made the vicars of Christ, by reaton of the seate which they occupie, than an idoll, when it is set in the temple of God, is to be taken for God. Nowe if their maners be to be iudged vpon, let the Popes themselues aunswere for themselues: what one thinge at all there is in them, wherein they may be knowen for bishops. First whereas there is such life at Rome, they not onely winking at it, but also as it were with secret countenance allowing it, this is vterly vnmete for bishops, whoes duetie is with seueritie of discipline to restraine the licetiousnesse of the people. But I will not be so rigorous against them, to charge them with other mens faultes. But whereas they themselues, with their owne household, with almost y whole college of Cardinals, with y whole flocke of their clergie, are so geuen forth to all wickednesse, filthinesse, vncleannesse, to all kindes of Jewde and mischeuous doings, that they resemble rather monsters than men: therin truely they bewray theselues to be nothing lesse thã bishops. And yet they neede not to feare least I should further disclose their filthinesse. For both I am wery to haue to do in so stinking mire, and I must fauour chaste eares; and I thinke that I haue already enough and more proued that which I went about: that is, that although Rome had in old time bene the head of Churches, yet at this day she is not worthy to be iudged one of the smallest toes of the Churches feete.

30 As concerning the Cardinals (as they call them) I can not tell howe it is come to passe, that they be so sodeinly risen vp to so great dignitie. This name in Gregories time belonged to bishops only. For so oft as he maketh mention of Cardinals, he meaneth it not of them of the Church of Rome, but of any other: so that brefely, a Cardinal Priest is nothing els but a bishop. In the writers before that age I finde not this name at all. But I see that they were then lesse than bishops, whom they be nowe farre aboue. This saying of Augustine is well known: Although according to the names of honor, which the use of the Church hath already obtained, bishoprike is greater than priesthoode, yet in many things Augustine is lesse than Hierom. Here in deede he maketh difference betwene a priest of the Church of Rome and other: but he indifferently setteth them all behinde the bishops. And y^e was so long obserued, that in y^e Council at Carthage, when there were present two legates of the see of Rome, the one a bishop, the other a priest, the priest was thrust back into y^e last place. But not to folow two old examples, there remaineth a Council holden vnder Gregorie at Rome, at which the priestes sate in the lowest place, & subscribed seuerally by themselves, as for the Deacons, they had no place at al in subscribing. And truely they had then no office, but to be present and vnder the bishop at ministring of doctrine and of the sacraments. Now the case is so changed, that they are become the cousins of kings and Emperours. And it is no doubt but that they grew vp by litle and litle together with their heade, till they were aduanced to this hie toppes of dignity. But this also I thought good to touch shortly by the way, that the readers might the better vnderstande, that the See of Rome, such as it is at this day, doth much differ from that auncient one, vnder pretense wherof, it doth nowe maintaine and defende it selfe. But of what sort soeuer they were in old time, forasmuch as they haue now nothinge of the true and lawfull office in the Church, they retaine only a deceitful colour & vaine visour: yea forasmuch as they haue all thinges utterly contrary, it was necessary that that should happen to them, which Gregorie wryteth so oft. I say it (sayth he) wepinge: I giue warninge of it, groning: y^e sith the order of priesthoode is fallen within, it shall also not be able to stand long without. But rather it behoued that this should be fulfilled in the which Malachie sayth of such: Ye haue gone backe out of the way, and haue made many to stumble in the law. Therefore ye haue made voide the couenant of Leui, sayth the Lord. Therefore beholde I haue giuen you out of estimation, and vile to all the people. Now I leaue it to all the godly to thinke of what sort is that supreme height of the Hierarchie of Rome, whereunto the Papistes with abhominable shamelesnesse sticke not to make subiect the very worde of God, which ought to haue bin honorable & holy both to heauen & earth, men and Angels.

Of the power of the Church as touching the articles of Faith: & vvhich how vnbriyled licentiousnes it hath in the Papacy bin vvested to corrupt all purenesse of Doctrine.

Now foloweth the third place, of the power of the Church, which partely consisteth in all the bishoppes, and partely in the Councelles, and those either prouinciall or generall. I speake onely of the spirituall power, which is proper to the Church. That consisteth either in doctrine, or in iurisdiction, or in makinge of lawes. Doctrine hath two partes, the authoritie to teache articles of Doctrine, and the expoundinge of them. Before that we beginne to discourse of euery one of these in specialty, we will that the godly readers be warned, that whatsoeuer is taught concerning the power of the Church, they must remember to applie it to that ende, whereunto (as Paule testifieth) it was giuen: that is, to edification, and not to destruction: which who so lawefully vse, they thinke themselues no more than the ministers of Christ, and therewithall the ministers of the people in Christ. Nowe of the edifyinge of the Church, this is the onely way, if the ministers themselues endeuour to preferue to Christ his authoritie, which can not otherwise be safe vnlesse that be left vnto him, which he receiued of his Father: that is, that he be the onely schoolemaister of the Church. For it is wrytten, not of any other, but of him alone, Heare him. The power of the Church therefore is not to be sparingly set forth, but yet to be enclosed within certaine boundes, that it be not drawen hither and thither after the lust of men. Hereunto it shalbe much profitable to note, how it is described of the Prophetes and Apostles. For if we simply graunt vnto me such power as they list to take vppon them, it is plaine to all men, what a slippery readinesse there is to fal into tyranny, which ought to be farre from the Church of Christ.

2 Therefore here it must be remembered, that whatsoeuer authority or dignity y^e holy Ghost in the scripture giueth either to the priests or to the Prophetes, or to the Apostles, or to the successours of the Apostles, al that same is giuen, not proprely to the men themselues, but to the ministry ouer which they are appointed, or (to speake it more plainly in one word) whereof the ministry is committed to them. For if we go through them all in order, we shall not finde that they had any authority to teach or to answer, but in the name and word of the Lord. For when they are called to the office, it is also enioyned them, that they should bring nothinge of themselues, but speake out of the mouth of the Lord. And he himselfe doth not bring them forth to be heard of the people, before that he haue giuen them instructions what they ought to speake, to the entent that they should speake nothing beside his word. Moses himselfe, the prince of all the Prophets, was to be heard aboue the rest: but he was first instructed with his cōmaundemētes, that he might not declare any thing at all, but frō the Lord. Therefore it is sayd, that the people when they embraced his doctrine, beleued in God and in his seruant Moses. Also that the authority of the priestes should not grow in contempt, it was stablished with most grieuous penalties. But therewithall the Lord sheweth vpon what condition they were to be heard, when he saith y he hath made his couenāt with Leui, that the law of trueth should be in his mouth. And a litle after he addeth: The lips of the priest shal kepe knowledge, & they shal require the law at his mouth: because he is the angell of the God of hostes. Therefore if the priest will be heard, let him shew himselfe the messenger of God: that is, let him faithfully reporte the cōmaundements that he receiued of his author. And where it is specially entreated of the hearing of them, this is expressly set, That they may answere according to the law of God.

3 What maner of power the Prophets generally had, is very well described in Ezechiel: Thou sonne of man (sayth the Lord) I haue giuen thee to be a watchman to the house of Israell. Therefore thou shalt heare the worde out of my mouth, and thou shalt declare it to them from me. He that is commaunded to heare out of the mouth of the Lorde, is he not forbidden to inuent any thinge of himselfe? But what is to declare from the Lord, but so to speake as he may boldly boast, that it is not his owne, but the Lords word y he hath brought? The selfe same thing is in Hieremy, in other words. Let the Prophet (sayth he) with whom is a dreame, tell a dreame: & let him that hath my word speake my word true. Certainly he appointeth a law to the all. And that is such, that he permitteth not any to teach more than he is commaunded. And after he calleth it chaffe, all that is not come from himselfe only. Therefore none of the Prophets themselues opened his mouth, but as the Lord told him the wordes before. Whereupon these sayings are so oft found among them: the word of the lord, the burden of the Lord, so sayth the Lord, the mouth of y Lord hath spoken. And worthily. For Esay cried out that he had defiled lips. Hieremy cōfessed that he could not speake, because he was a child: What coulde procede from the defiled mouth of the one, and the foolish mouth of the other, but yncleane and vnwise, if they had spokē their owne spech? But his lips were holy and pure, when they began to be the instruments of the holy Ghost. When the Prophets are bounde with this religion, that they deliuer nothings, but that which they haue receiued, then they be garnished with notable power and excellent titles. For when the lorde testifieth, that he hath set them ouer nations and kingdomes, to plucke vp and to roote out, to destroy and plucke downe, to build and to plant, he by and by adioyneth the cause: because he hath put his words in their mouth.

4 Now if you looke to the Apostles: they are in deede commended with many & notable titles, that they are the light of the world; and the salt of the earth, that they are to be hearde in stede of Christ; that whatsoever they binde or loose in earth shalbe bound or loosed in heauen. But in their very name they shew how much is permitted them in their office: that is, if they be Apostles, that they should not prate whatsoever they list: but should faithfully report his commaundements frō whom they are sent. And the words of Christ are plaine enough, in w^{ch} he hath determined their embassage: whē he commaunded thē to go & teach all nations, all those things y^e he had commaunded. Yea & he himselve also receiued this law, & laid it vpō himselve; that it should be lawfull for no mā to refuse it. My doctrine (sayth he) is not mine, but his that sent me, my fathers. He that was alway the only & eternall counsellor of the Father, & he that was appointed by the Father the Lorde and schoolemaister of all men, yet because he executed the ministry of teaching, prescribed by his owne example to all ministers what rule they ought to folow in teaching. Therefore the power of the Church is not infinit, but subiect to the word of the lord, & as it were enclosed in it.

5 But sith this hath from the beginning bin of force in the church, & at this day ought to be in force, that the seruantes of God should teach nothing, which they haue not learned of him: yet according to the diuersity of times they had diuers orders of learning. But that order which is now, much differeth from those that were before. First if it be true which Christ sayeth, that none hath seene the Father, but the Sonne, and he to whom it hath pleased the Sonne to shew him: it behoued verily that they should be alway directed by that eternal wisdom of the Father, which would come to the knowledge of God. For how should they either haue comprehended in minde, or vttered the misteries of God, but by his teaching; to whom alone the secretes of the Father are opē? Therefore the holy fathers in old time knew God no other wise but beholding him in the Sonne as in a glasse. When I say this, I meane that God did neuer by any other meane disclose him selfe selfe to men but by the Sonne, that is, his only wisdom, light, & truth. Out of this fountaine did Adam, Noe, Abraham, Isaac, Iacob & the other drawe all the knowledge that they had of heavenly doctrine. Out of the same fountaine haue also all the Prophets theselues drawn all the heavenly Oracles that they vttered. For verily this Wisdom hath alway disclosed it selfe by moe waies than one. To the Patriarches he vsed secret reuelations: but therewithall to confirme their mindes, he adioyned such signes, that it could not be doubtful to them, that it was God that spake. The Patriarches conueied ouer frō hand to hand to posterity, that which they had receiued. For the Lord left it with them to this entent, that they should so spread it abroad. But the children and childrens children, by God secretly informing the, did know that that which they heard was from heauen, & not from the earth.

6 But when it pleased God, to raise a more apparant forme of a Church, he willed to haue his word put in wryting & noted, that the priestes should fetch from these what they might deliuer to the people, and that all the doctrine that should be taught should be tried by that rule. Therefore after the publishing of the law, when the priests are commaunded to teache out of the mouth of the Lord, the meaning is, that they should teach nothinge straunge or differinge from that kinde of learning which the Lord comprehended in the law: & to adde and diminish was vnlawful for them. Then followed the Prophetes, by whom in dede the Lord published new oracles to be added to the law: but yet not so new, but that they came out of the law, & had respect vnto it. For, as touching doctrine, they were only expositors of the law, & added nothing vnto it, but prophecies of things to come. Those excepted, they vttered nothing else but a pure exposition of the law. But because it pleased the Lord that there should be a plainer & larger doctrine, that weake consciēces might be the better satisfied: he commaūded that the Prophecies also should be put in wryting, and accompted parte of his word. And hereunto were added the histories, which are also the works of the Prophetes, but made by the endinge of the holy Ghost. I reckon the Psalmes amonge the Prophecies, because that which we attribute to the prophecies is also cōmon to the psalmes. Therefore that whole body compacted of the law, prophecies; psalmes & histories, was the word of y^e Lord to y^e old people, by the rule whereof the priests & teachers euē vnto Christes time were bound to examine their doctrine: neither was it lawful for them to swaue either to the right hand or to the left: because all their office was enclosed within these boundes, that they should aunswere the people out of the mouth of God. Which is gathered of a notable place of Malachie, where he biddeth them to be mindefull of the law, & to giue hede to it, euen to the preachinge of the Gospell. For therby he forbidderth them all new found doctrines, & graunteth thē no leaue to swarue neuer so litle out of the way which Moses hadde faithfully shewed thē. And this is the reason why Dauid so honorably setteth out the excellēcy of the law, & rehearteth so many praises of it: that is, that the Iewes should couet no forein thing without it, sith within it was all perfection enclosed.

7 But when at last the Wisdom of God was openly shewed in the fleshe, that same Wisdom with full mouth declared vnto vs all that euer can with mans witte be comprehended, or ought to be thought concerninge the heauenly Father. Nowe therefore, since Christ the sonne of righteousnesse hath shined, we haue a perfect brightnesse of the trueth of God, such as the clearenesse is wont to be at midde day, when the light was before but dimme. For verily the Prophete meant not to speake of any meane thinge, when he wrote that God in olde time spake diuersly & many wayes to the fathers by the Prophetes: but y^e in these last daies he began to speake to vs by his beloued Sonne. For he signifieth, yea he openly declareth, that God will not hereafter, as he did before, speake sometime by some and sometime by other, nor will adde Prophecies to Prophecies, or reuelations to reuelations: but that he hath so fulfilled all the partes of teachinge in the Sonne, that they must haue this of him for the last and eternall testimony. After which sort al this time of the new Testament wherein Christ hath appeared to vs with the preaching of his Gospell euen to the day of iudgement, is expressed by the last houre, the last times, the last daies: to the end verily that contented with the perfection of the doctrine of Christ, we should learne neither to faine vs any newe beside it, or receiue it fained of other. Therefore not without cause the Father hath by singular prerogatiue ordayned the Sonne to be our Teacher: commaunding him, and not any man, to be heard. He did indeede in few wordes set out his schoolemaistership vnto vs, when he sayd, heare him: but in which there is more weight and force than men commonly thinke. For it is as much in effect, as if leading vs away from all doctrines of men, he should bring vs to him only, and commaūd vs to looke for al the doctrine of saluation at him alone, to hang vpon him alone, to cleaue to him alone, finally (as the very wordes do sound) to harkē to the voice of him alone. And truely what ought there now to be either looked for or desired at the hand of man, when the very worde of life hath familiarly and openly disclosed himselfe vnto vs? Yea but it is mete that the mouthes of all men be shut, after that he, in whom the heauenly Father willed to haue al the treasures of knowledge and wisdom to be hidden, hath once spoken, and so spoken as became both the wisdom of God (which is in no parte vn-perfect) and Messias at whose hande the reuelation of all things is hoped for: that is to say, that he left nothinge afterward for other to be spoken.

8 Let this therefore be a stedfast principle: y there is to be had no other word of God, wherunto place should be giuen in the Church, than that which is contained first in the lawe & the Prophets, & then in the writings of the Apostles: and that there is no other maner of teaching rightly, but accordinge to the prescription and rule of that word. Hereupon also we gather, that there was no other thing graunted to the Apostles, but that which y Prophets had had in olde times: that is, that they shoulde expounde the olde Scripture, and shew that those things that are therein taught are fulfilled in Christ: and yet that they shoulde not do the same but of the Lord, that is to say, the Spirit of Christ going before them, and after a certaine maner endinge wordes vnto them. For Christ limited their embassage with this condition when he commaunded them to go and teache, not such things as they themselves had rashely forged, but all those things that he had commaunded them. And nothing could be more plainly spoken, than that which he sayth in an other place: but be not ye called maisters, for onely one is your maister, Christ. Then, to emprint this more deeply in their minde, he repeateth it twise in the same place. And because their rudenes was such, that they could not conceiue those things that they had hearde & learned of the mouth of their maister, therefore the Spirit of truth is promised them, by whom to the holy Ghost, to put the in mind of all those things y he before taught them by mouth.

9 Therefore Peter who was very wel taught how much he might lawfully do, leaueth nothing either to himself or other, but to distribute the doctrine deliuered of God. Let him that speaketh (sayth he) to tremble whose own conscience mitigueth them, but with sure confidence, w becōmeth the seruāt of God furnished with assured instructions. What other thinge is this, but to forbid al inuentions of mans minde, from what head soeuer they haue proceeded, y the pure word of God may be heard & learned in the church of y faithful? to take away the ordinances or rather the fayned deu'ties of all men, of what degree soeuer they be, that the decrees of God onely may remaine in force? These be those spirituall armures, mighty through God to cast downe holdes: by which the faithfull seruantes of God may throwe downe counsellles, and all height that aduanceth it selfe against the knowledge of God, and may leade all knowledge captiue to obey Christ. Lo this is the soueraigne power, wherewith it behoueth the Pastors of the Church to be endued, by what name soeuer they be called, that is, that by the word of God they may with confidence be bold to do all thinges: may compell all the strength, glory, wisdom & height of the world to yeelde and obey to his maiesty: being vpholden by his power, may commaunde all euen from the hiest to the lowest: may build vp the house of Christ and pull downe the house of Satan: may feede the sheepe and driue away the wolues: may instruct and exhort the willing to learne: may reprove, rebuke & subdue the rebellious and stubbornes: may binde, and loose: finally may thunder and lighten, if nede be: but all thinges in the word of God. Howbeit there is, as I haue said, this difference betwene the Apostles and their successors, that the Apostles were the certaine and authentike secretaries of the holy Ghost, & therefore their wrytings are to be esteemed for the Oracles of God: but the other haue none other office, but to teach that which is set forth and written in the holy Scriptures. We determine therefore, that this is not nowe left to faithfull ministers, that they may coyne any new doctrine, but that they ought simply to cleaue to y^e doctrine, wherunto the lord hath made al mē without exception subiect. When I say this, my meaninge is not onely to shew what is lawfull for all particular men, but also what is lawfull for the whole vniuersall Church. Now as touchinge all particular men: Paule verily was ordained by the Lorde Apostle to the Corinthians: but he denieth that he hath dominion ouer their faith. Who nowe dare take a dominion vpon himselfe, which Paule testifieth that it belonged not to him? If he had acknowledged himselfe to haue this liberty of teaching, that whatsoever y^e Pastor teacheth he may therein of right require to be beleued: he would neuer haue taught the Corinthians this discipline, that while two or three Prophets speake, the rest should iudge, & if it were reuealed to any that sate, the first should holde his peace. For so he spared none, whose authority he made not subiect to the iudgement of the word of God. But, wil some man say; of the whole vniuersall Church the case is otherwise. I answer that in an other place Paule meeteth with this dout also, where he sayth; that Faith is by hearinge, and hearinge by the word of God. Truly if

Faith hang of the word of God only, hath respect vnto & resteth vpon it alone, what place is there now left to y^e word of the whole world? For herin no mā may dout, y^e hath wel knowē what Faith is. For Faith ought to be staid vpon such assurednes, wherby it may stand inuincible against Satan, & all the engines of the hels, & against the whole world. This assurednes we shal no where find but in the only word of God. Again, it is a generall rule which we here ought to haue respect vnto: that God doth therefore take from men the power to set forth a new doctrine, y^e he only may be our schoolemaister in heauēly learninge, as he only is true which can neither lie nor deceiue. This rule belōgeth no lesse to y^e whole Church than to euery one of y^e faithfull.

10 But if this power of the Church, which we haue spoken of, be compared with that power, whereof the spiritual tyrantes, that haue falsly called theselues Bishops & Prelates of religion, haue in certaine ages past boasted theselues among the people of God, the agreement shalbe no better than Christ hath wth Beliall. Yet it is not in this place my purpose to declare in what sort & with how wicked meanes they haue exercised their tyranny: I will but rehearse the doctrine, which at this day they defende, first with writings, & then with swerd & fire. Because they take it for a thing confessed, that a generall Councell is the true image of the Church, when they haue taken this principle, they do without dout determine, that such councels are immediatly gouerned of the holy Ghost, & that therefore they can not erre. But wheras they themselues do rule, the councels, yea & make them, they do in dede chalēge to themselues whatsoever they affirme to be due to the Councels. Therefore they will haue our Faith to stand & fall at their wil, that whatsoever they shal determine on the one side or the other, may be stablished & certaine to our mindes: so y^e if they allow any thing we must allow the same without douting: if they condemne any thing we must also hold it for cōdemned. In the meane time after their owne lust, & despising the word of God, they coyne doctrines, to which afterward they require by this rule to haue Faith giuen. For they also say that he is no Christian, that doth not certainly consent to all their doctrines as well affirmatiue as negatiue: if not with expressed yet with vnexpressed Faith: because it is in the power of the Church, to make new articles of the Faith.

11 First let vs heare by what argumentes they proue that this authority is giuen to the Church: and then we shall see how much that maketh for the which they alleage of the Church. The Church (say they) hath notable promises, that it shall neuer be forsaken of Christ her spouse, but that it shalbe guided by his Spirit into all truth. But of

Of the outward meanes

the promises which they are wont to alleage, many are giuē no lesse to euery one of the faithfull particularly, than to the whole Church vniuersally. For though the Lord spake to the twelue Apostles, when he said: Beholde I am with you euen to the end of the world: Again: I will aske my Father, & he shall giue you an other comforter, namely the Spirit of truth: yet he made the promise not only to the whole number of the twelue, but also to euery one of thē: yea to the other disciples likewise, either those that he had already receiued, or those that should afterward be added to thē. But when they expounde such promises ful of singular comfort, as though they were giuen to none of the Christians, but to the whole Church together: what do they else, but take away from all Christians that confidence which they all ought to receiue thereby to encorage them? Yet I do not here deny, but that the whole felowship of the faithfull furnished with manifold diuersity of giftes, is endued with much larger & more plentiful treasure of the heauenly wisdom, than eche one seuerally: neither is it my meaning, that this is spoken in common to the faithful, as though they were all alike endued with the Spirite of vnderstanding and doctrine: but because it is not to be graunted, to y^e aduersaries of Christ, that they should for the defense of an euill cause wrest the Scripture to a wronge sense. But, omittinge this, I simply confesse that which is true, that the lord is perpetually present with his, & ruleth them with his Spirite. And that this Spirite is not the Spirit of errour, ignorance, lying or darkenesse: but of sure reuelation, wisdom, trueth, & light, of whome they not deceitfully may learne those thinges that are giuen them, that is to say, what is the hope of their calling, & what be the riches of the glory of the inheritance of God in the saintes. But whereas the faithfull, euen they that are endued with more excellent giftes about the rest, do in this flesh receiue only the first frutes & a certaine tast of that Spirite: there remaineth nothing leeuier to them than knowing their owne weakenes, to holde themselues carefully within the boundes of the word of God: least, if they wander far after their owne sense, they by and by stray out of the right way, insomuch as they be yet voide of that Spirite, by whose only teaching trueth is discerned from falshode. For all men do confesse with Paule, that they haue not yet attained to the marke. Therefore they more endeouour to daily profiting, than glory of perfection.

12 But they wil take exceptiō, & say that whatsoeuer is particularly attributed to euery one of the holy ones, the same doth throughly & fully belong to the Church it selfe. Although this hath some seeming of trueth, yet I deny it to be true. God doth in dede so distribute to e-

uery one of the members the gifts of his Spirit by measure, that the whole body wanteth nothing necessary, when the giftes are giuen in common. But the riches of the Church are alway such, that there euer wanteth much of that hiest perfectiō, which our aduersaries do boast of. Yet the Church is not therefore so left destitute in any behalfe, but that she alway hath so much as is enough. For the Lorde knoweth what her necessity requireth. But, to holde her vnder humility & godly modesty, he giuerh her no more than he knoweth to be expedient. I know what here also they are wont to object, that is, that the Church is cleansed with the washing of water in the word of life, that it might be without wrinkle & spot, & that therefore in an other place it is called the pillar & stay of truth. But in the first of these two places is rather taught, what Christ daily worketh in it, than what he hath already done. For if he daily sanctifieth, purgeth, polisheth, wipeth from spots all them that be his: truely it is certaine that they are yet besprinkled with some spots and wrinkles, and that there wanteth somwhat of their sanctification. But how vaine and fabulous is it, to iudge the Church already in euery part holy & spotlesse, wherof all the members are spotty and very vnclane? It is true therefore that the Church is sanctified of Christ. But onely the beginninge of that sanctifying is here seene: but the end and ful accomplishment shalbe, when Christ the holiest of holy ones shall truely and fully fill it with his holinesse. It is true also that the spottes and wrinkles of it are wiped away: but so that they be daily in wiping away, vntill Christ with his comminge do vtterly take away all that remayneth. For vnlesse we graunt this, we must of necessity affirme with the Pelagians, that the righteousnesse of the faythfull is perfect in this life: and with the Cathari and Donatistes we must suffer no infirmitie in the Church. The other place, as we haue else where seene, hath a sense vtterly differinge from that which they pretende. For when Paule hath instructed Timothee, and framed him to the true office of a Bishoppe, he sayth that he did it to this purpose, that he shoulde knowe how he ought to behaue himselfe in the Church. And that he should with the greater religiousnesse and endeuour bende himselfe thereunto, he addeth that the Church is the very pillar & stay of truth. For what else do these words meane, but that the truth of God is preserued in the Church, namely by the ministry of preaching? As in an other place he teacheth, that Christ gaue Apostles, Pastors & Teachers, that we shoulde no more be caried about, with euery winde of doctrine, or be mocked of mé: but that being enlightened with the true knowledge of the Sonne of God, we shoulde altogether meete in vnity of Fayth.

Whereas therefore the trueth is not extinguished in the world, but remaineth safe, that same cometh to passe because it hath y^e Church a faithfull keper of it, by whose help & ministry it is sustained. But if this keping standeth in the ministry of the Prophets & Apostles, it foloweth that it hangeth wholly hereupon, if the word of the Lord be faithfully preserued and do kepe his purity.

13 But that the readers may better vnderstande, vpon what point this question chiefly standeth, I will in few wordes declare what our aduersaries require, and wherein we stand against them. Where they say that the Church can not erre, it tendeth hereunto, and thus they expounde it, that forasmuch as it is gouerned by the Spirit of God, it may goe safely without the word: that whethersoever it goeth, it can not thinke nor speake any thing but trueth: that therefore if it determine any thing without or beside Gods word, the same is no otherwise to be esteemed than as a certaine Oracle of God. If we graunt that first point, that the Church can not erre in thinges necessary to saluation, this is our meaninge, that this is therefore because forsaking all her owne wisdom, she suffereth her selfe to be taught of the holy Ghost by the word of God. This therefore is the difference. They set the authority of the Church without the worde of God, but we will that it be annexed to the worde, & suffer it not to be seuered from it. And what maruel is it, if the spouse & scholar of Christ be subiect to her husband & schoolemaister, that she continually & earnestly hangeth of his mouth? For this is the order of a well gouerned house, y^e the wife should obey the authority of the husband: & this is the rule of a well ordered schoole, that the teaching of the scholemaister alone should there be heard. Wherefore let the Church not be wise of her selfe, not thinke any thing of her selfe: but determine the ende of her wisdom where he hath made an end of speaking. After this maner she shall also distrust all the inuentions of her owne reason: but in those things wherein it standeth vpon y^e word of God, she shal wauer with no distrustfulnes or douting, but shal rest with great assurednes & stedfast constancy. So also trusting vpon the largenes of those promises that she hath, she shal haue whereupon abundantly to sustaine her faith: that she may nothinge dout that the best guide of the right way the holy Spirit is alway present with her: but therewithall she shall kepe in memory what vse the Lord woulde haue vs to receiue of his holy Spirit. The Spirit (sayth he) which I wil send fro my Father, shal leade you into al truth. But how? because (sayth he) he shal put you in minde of all those things that I haue tolde you. Therefore he giueth warning that there is nothing more to be looked for of his Spirit, but that he should should enlighten our mindes to perceiue the trueth of his doctrine. Therefore Chrysoſtome ſaith excellently well. Many (ſaith he) do boast of the holy Spirit: but they which ſpeake their owne do falſly pretende that they haue him. As Chriſt teſtified that he ſpake not of himſelfe: becauſe he ſpake out of the law and the Prophets: ſo if any thing beſide the Goſpel be thruſt in vnder the title of the Spirit, let vs not beleue it becauſe as Chriſt is the fulfilling of the law & the Prophets: ſo is the Spirit, of the Goſpel. Theſe be his words. Now it is eaſie to gather how wrongfully our aduerſaries do, which boast of the holy Ghoſt to no other ende, but to ſet forth vnder his name ſtrange & foraine doctrines from the word of God: whereas he will with vnſpeakeable knot be cōioined with the word of God, & the ſame doth Chriſt profeſſe of him when he promiſeth him to his Church. So is it truly. What ſobriety y^e lord hath once preſcribed to his church, y^e ſame he will haue to be perpetually kept. But he hath forbidden her, y^e ſhe ſhould not adde any thing to his word, nor take any thing frō it. This is the inuiolable decree of God & of y^e holy Ghoſt, which our aduerſaries go about to abrogate, when they ſaine that the Church is ruled of the Spirit without the word.

14 Here againe they murmure againſt vs, and ſay that it behoued that the Church ſhould adde ſome things to the writings of the Apoſtles, or that they theſelues ſhould afterward with liuely voice ſupply many thinges which they had not clearly enough taught, namely ſith Chriſt ſaid vnto thē. I haue many thinges to be ſaid to you, which you can not now beare: & that theſe be the ordinances, which without the Scripture haue bin receiued onely in uſe & maners. But what ſhameleſneſſe is this? I graunt the diſciples were yet rude, & in a manner vnapt to learne, whē the Lord ſayd this vnto them. But were they then alſo holden with ſuch dulnes, whē they did put their doctrine in wrytinge, that they afterward needed to ſupply with liuely voice that which they had by fault of ignorance omitted in their wrytings? But if they were already led by the Spirit of trueth into all trueth when they did ſet forth their wrytings: what hindred that they haue not therein contained & left written a perfect knowledge of the doctrine of the Goſpel? But go to: let vs graunt them that which they require. Only let them point out what be thoſe thinges that it behoued to be reuealed without writing. If they dare enterpriſe that, I wil aſſaile thē with Auguſtines wordes: that is, When the Lord hath ſayd nothinge of them, which of vs dare ſay, theſe they be or thoſe they be: or if any dare ſay ſo, whereby doth he proue it? But why do I ſtrive about a ſuperfluous matter? For a very childe doth know, that in the wrytinges of the Apostles, which these men do make in a maner lame and but halfe perfect, there is the frute of that reuelatiō which the Lord did then promise them.

15 What say they, did not Christ put out of controuersie whatsoever the Church teacheth & decreeth, when he commaundeth him to be takē for a heathen man & a Publicane that dare say against her? First in that place is no mention made of doctrine, but onely the authority of the censures is established for correcting of vices, that they which haue bin admonished or rebuked should not resist her iudgement. But omitting this, it is much maruell, that these losels haue so litle shame, that they dare be proude of that place. For what shal they get therby, but that the cōsent of the Church is neuer to be despised, which neuer cōsenteth but vnto the trueth of the word of God? The Church is to be heard, say they. Who denieth it? forasmuch as it pronounceth nothing but out of the word of y^e Lord. If they require any more let them know that these words of Christ do nothing take their part therein. Neither ought I to be thought too much cōtentious because I stande so earnestly vpon this point, That it is not lawfull for the Church to make any new doctrine, that is, to teach & deliuer for an Oracle any more than y^e which the lord hath reueled by his word. For men of sounde wit do see howe great daunger there is, if so great authority be once graunted to men. They see also howe wide a window is opened to the mockings & caullations of the wicked, if we say that that which mē haue iudged is to be taken for an Oracle among Christians. Beside that, Christ speaking according to the consideratiō of his owne time, giueth this name to the Sinagoge, that his disciples should afterward learne to reuerence holy assemblies of the Church. So should it come to passe that euery city & village should haue egall authority in coyning of doctrines.

16 The examples which they vse, do nothing helpe them. They say that the Baptisinge of infantes, proceeded not so much from the expresse commaudemēt of the Scripture as from the decree of the Church. But it were a very miserable succour, if we were compelled to flee to the bare authoritie of the Church for defense of the Baptisme of infantes: but it shal in an other place sufficiently appeare that it is farre otherwise. Likewise whereas they obiect that y^e is no where founde in the Scripture, which was pronounced in the Nicene Synode, that the Sonne is consubstantiall with the father: therein they do great wrong to the fathers, as though they had rashly condemned Arrius, because he would not sweare to their wordes, when he professed all that doctrine which is comprehended in the writings of the Prophets & Apostles. This word, I graunt, is not in the Scripture: but when therein is so oft affirmed, that there is but one God, againe Christ is so oft called the true and eternall God, one with the Father: what other thing do the fathers of the Nicene council whē they declare that he is of one substāce, but simply set out the natural sense of the Scripture? But Theodorite reporteth that Constantine vsed this preface in their assembly. In disputations (saith he) of diuine matters; there is a prescribed doctrine of the holy Ghost: the bookes of the Gospels & of the Apostles, with the Oracles of the Prophets, do fully shew vs y^e meaning of God. Therefore laying away discorde, let vs take the discussings of questions out of the wordes of the Spirit. There was at that time no man that spake against these holy monitions. No man tooke exception, that the Church might adde somewhat of her owne: that the Spirit reueled not all things to the Apostles, or at least vttered them, not to those that came after: or any such thing. If it be true which our aduersaries woulde haue: first, Constantine did euill, that tooke from the Church her authority: then, wheras none of the Bishops at that time rose vp to defend it, this was not without breach of their faith: for so they were betrayiers of the right of the Church. But sith Theodorite rehearseth that they willingly embraced that which the Emperour sayd; it is certaine that this newe doctrine was then viterly vnknown.

Of Councils and of their authority.

NOwe, although I graunt them all thinges concerninge the Church: yet they shall thereby not much preuaile for their intent. For whatsoeuer is sayd of the Church, the same they by and by giue to y^e Councils, forasmuch as in their opinion those represent the Church. Yea where they so stiffely contende for the power of the Church, they do it of no other purpose, but to giue all that they can get to the bishop of Rome & his gard. But ere I begin to discusse this question, I must nedes here make protestation of two things aforehand. First, that where I shall in this point be somewhat rough, it is not because I lesse esteeme the olde Councils than I ought to do. For I reuerence them from my hart, & wish them to be had in their due honor with all men. But here in is some meane, that is, that there be nothings withdrawen from Christ. Nowe this is the right of Christ, to be the head in all Councils, & to haue no man fellow with him in this dignity. But I say that then only he is the head, when he gouerneth the whole assembly with his worde & Spirit. Secondly, whereas I giue lesse to Councils than the aduersaries require, I do it not for this cause that I am afraid of the Councils, as though they did make for their side, & were against ours. For as we are abundantly furnished with the word of the Lord to the full prooffe of our owne doctrine fully, & to the ouerthrowe of the whole Papistry that we nede not much to desire any other thing beside it: so if the matter require, the old Councils do for a great part minister vnto vs so much as may suffice for both.

2. Nowe lette vs speake of the thing it selfe. If it be sought of the Scriptures, what is the authority of Councelles: there is no plainer promise than in this saying of Christ: Where two or three shalbe gathered together in my name, there I am in the midst of them. But that doth no lesse belong to euery particular assembly thā to a general Council. But the dout of the question standeth not therein: but because there is a condition added, that God wil so only be in the midst of the Council, if it be gathered together in his name. Therefore although our aduersaries do a thousand times name Councils of bishops, they shal litle preuail: neither shal they make vs to beleue that which they affirme, that is, that they be gouerned of the holy Ghost, vntil they haue proued that they are gathered together in the name of Christ. For it is as possible that wicked & euil Bishops may cōspire against Christ, as good & honest Bishops may come together in his name. For a very cleare prooffe hereof are many decrees that haue proceeded from such Councils. But this shalbe seen hereafter. Now I do but answere in one word, that Christ promiseth nothing, but to thē that are gathered together in his name. Let vs therefore define what that is. I deny that they be gathered together in the name of Christ, which casting away the cōmaundement of God, wherein he forbiddeth any thing to be added to his word, or taken from it, do decree euery thing after their owne wil: which beinge not contented with the Oracles of y^e Scripture, that is to say the only rule of perfect wisdom, do imagine some new thing of their own hed. Surely sith Christ hath not promised that he wil be present at all Councils, but hath adioyned a peculiar marke, wherby to make true & lawful Councils different from other: it is mete that we should not neglect this difference.

18. This is the couenant, which in old time God made with the Liuitical Priests, y^e they should teach out of his mouth. This he alway required of the Prophets: this law also we see to haue bin laid vpon y^e Apostles. Who so breake this couenāt, God doth not vouchsaue, to let thē haue the honor of Priesthoode, nor any authority. Let the aduersaries vndo me this knotte, if they will make my faith bonde to the decrees of men beside the word of God.

3 For whereas they thinke not that truth remaineth in the Church, vnlesse it be among the Pastours: & that the Church it selfe stāderh not, vnlesse it appeare in general Councils: that is farre from hauing bene alway true, if the Prophets haue left vnto vs true testimonies of their owne times. There was in the time of Esaie a Church at Hierusalem, which God had not yet forsaken. But of the pastors he saith thus: The watchmen are all blinde, neither knowe they any thing. They are all dumme dogges, neither are they able to barke. They lie along & slepe, and loue slepinge: and the Pastors themselues knowe nothing, nor do vnderstāde: and they do altogether loke backe vnto their owne ways. After the same maner Osee sayeth: The watchman of Ephraim with God, the snare of the fouler, hatred in the house of God. Where ioining them with God by way of mockage, he reacheth y^e their pretense of the priesthod is vaine. The Church also endured vnto the time of Hieremie. Let vs heare what he sayeth of the Pastors. From the Prophet euen to the priest, euery one followeth lying. Againe. The Prophets do prophecie a ly in my name, when I haue not sent them, nor commaunded them. And least we should be to long in reciting his wordes, let those things be red that he hath written in the whole. xxiiij. and. xl. chapters. At that time on the other side Ezechiel did no more gently inuey against the same men. The conspiracie (sayeth he) of the Prophets in the middes of her as a roaring lyon, and that violently taketh his pray. Her priests haue broken my lawe, and haue defiled my holy things, and haue made no difference betweene holy and prophane: and the rest that he adioineth to the same effect. Like complaintes are euery where in the Prophets, so that nothing is ofter found in them.

4 But perhappes it might be that that was so among the Iewes: but our age is free from so great an euill. I would to God in deede it were so: but the Holy Ghost hath geuen warning that it shalbe farre otherwise. The wordes of Peter are plaine. As (sayeth he) there were in the olde people false Prophets, so shall there also be among you false teachers, slily bringing in sectes of perdition. See you not howe he sayth, that there is daunger to come, not by men of the common people, but by them that shal boist themselues with the title of teachers & Pastors? Moroeuer howe oft hath it bene so: espoken by Christ and his Apostles, that there should very great daungers hang ouer the Church by the Pastors? Yea Paule plainely sheweth, that Antichrist shall sit in no other place than in the temple of God.

Whereby he signifieth, that the horrible calamitie of which he there speaketh, shall come from no where els but from them that shall sit in steede of Pastors in y^e Church. And in an other place he sheweth, that y^e beginnings of so great a mischief are euen already nere at hand.

Act. 20. For when he speaketh to the bishops of Ephesus. I know (sayeth he) 19. that after my departure there shall enter into you rauening wolues not sparing the flocke. And they shalbe of your owne selues, that shall speake peruerse things, to leade away disciples after them. Howe much corruption might a long course of yeares bring among Pastors, when they could so farre go out of kinde in so samall a space of time? And, not to fill much paper with reherfing thē by name: we are admonished by the examples in a maner of all ages, that neither the truth is alway nourished in the bosome of the pastors, nor the safetic of the Church doth hang vpon their state. They ought in dedde to haue bene the gouernours and keepers of the peace and safetic of the Church, for preseruatiō whereof, they are ordeined: but it is one thing for a man to performe that which he ought, and another thing to owe that which he performeth not.

5 Yet let no man take these our wordes in such part, as though I would euery where and rashely without any choise diminish the authoritie of Pastors. I do but onely admonish that euen among Pastors themselues there is a choise to bee had, that we should not immediatly thinke them to be pastors that are so called. But the Pope with all his flocke of bishops, vpon none other reason, but because they are called pastors, shaking away the obedience of the word of God, do tumble & tosse al things after their own lust: & in the meane time they trauaile to persuaide, that they can not be destitute of the light of truth, that the spirit of God perpetually abideth in them, that the Church consisteth in them and dieth with them. As though there be nowe no iudgements of the Lord, whereby he may punish the world at this day with the same kinde of punishment, wherewith somtime he toke vengeance of the vnthankfulnesse of the olde people, that is, to strike the Pastors with blindnesse and amased dullnesse.

Zacha. 12. 4. Neither do they most foolish men vnderstande, that they sing the same song, which those in olde time did sing that warrd against the word of God. For the enemies of Hieremie did thus prepare themselues against the truth: Come, & we will imagine imaginatiōs against Hieremie: forasmuch as the lawe shall not perish from the Priest, nor counsell from the wise man, nor the word from the Prophet.

6 Hereby it is easy to aunswer to that other obiection cōcerning generall councells. It can not be denied but that the Iewes had a true Church in the time of the Prophets. But if there had then bene a generall councell gathered together of the priests, what maner face of the Church had there appered? We heare what God saith, not to ^{Hier. 4.} one or two of them but to the whole order: The priestes shalbe ^{9.} astonied, and the prophets shalbe made afraide. Againe, the lawe ^{Ezec. 7.} shall perish from the priest, and councell from the Elders. Againe, ^{26.} Night shalbe to you in steede of a vision, and darkenesse in steede of ^{Mich. 3.} prophecieng: and the sunne shall fall downe vpon the Prophets, and ^{6.} be darkened vpon these dayes. &c. Well: if all such had then bene gathered together in one, what Spirit should haue gouerned in that assemblee? of that thing we haue a notable example in that councell which Achab called together. There were present foure hundred ^{1 Kin.} Prophets. But, because they were come together of no other minde ^{22. 5. &} but to flatter the wicked king: therefore Satan was sent of the Lord to ^{22.} be a lying spirit in the mouth of the all. There by all their voices the truth was condemned. Micha was condemned for an heretike, stricken and cast in prison. So was done to Hieremie, so to the other Prophets.

7 But let one example suffice for all, which is more notable then the rest. In that councell which the bishops and Pharisees gathered ^{Ioh. 11.} at Hierusalem against Christ, what can a man say that there wanted, ^{47.} in so much as pertained to the outwarde shewe? For if there had not then bene a Church at Hierusalem, Christ would neuer haue communicate with their sacrifices and other ceremonies. There was made a solemne summoning of them together: the by bishop sat as chief:
 the whole order of priests sat by him: yet Christ was there condēned, and his doctrine driuen away. This doing is a profe that the Church was not enclosed in that councell. But there is no perill that any such thing should happen to vs. Who hath geuen vs assurance thereof?
 For it is not without fault of sluggishnesse, to be to carelesse in so great a matter. But where the Holy Ghost doth with expresse wordes prophecie by the mouth of Paule, that there shall come a departing ^{2. The 1.} (which can not come but that the Pastors must be the first that shall ^{2. 3.} forsake God) why are we hering wilfully blinde to our owne destruction? Wherefore it is in no wise to be graunted, that the Church consisteth in the companie of Pastors, for whom the Lorde hath no where vndertaken that they shall perpetually be good, but he hath pronounced that they shall sometime be euill. But when he warneth vs of the daunger, he doth it to this entente to make vs the warer.

8 What then? wilt thou say: Shall the councells haue no au-thoritie in determining? Yes forsooth. For neither do I here argue that all councells are to be condemned, or all their actes to be repelled, or (as the saying is) to be defaced with one blotte. But (thou wilt say to me) thou bringest them all into subiection, that it may be free for euery man to receiue or refuse that which the councells haue determined. Not so. But so oft as y^e decree of any councell is brought forth, I would haue it first to be diligently weyed, at what time it was holden, for what cause it was holden, what maner of men were present: and then the very thing that is intreated of, to be examined by the rule of the Scripture: and that in such sorte as the determination of the councell may haue his force, and be as a foreiudged sentence, and yet not hinder the aforesaid examination. I would to God all men did kepe that moderation which Augustine prescribeth in the third boke against Maximinus. For when he minded brefely to put to silēce this heretike cōtending about the Decrees of councels: Neither (sayth he) ought I to object against thee the Synode of Nice, nor thou against me the Synode of Ariminum, as to the entēe to conclude one an other by foreiudged sentēce, neither am I bound by the authoritie of the one, nor thou of the other. By authorities of Scriptures, not such as are propre to either one, but such as are common to both, let there striue matter with matter, cause with cause, reason with reason. So should it come to passe, that councells should haue the maiestie that they ought: but in the meane season the Scripture should be alone in the hier place, that there might be nothing that should not be subiect to the rule thereof. So these olde Synodes, as of Nice, of Constantinople, the first of Ephesus, of Chalcedon, and such other, which were holden for confuting of errors, we willingly embrace and reuerence as holy, so much as belongeth to the doctrines of faith: for they containe nothing but the pure and naturall expositiō of Scripture, which the holy fathers with spirituall wisdome applied to the subduing of the enemies of religion that then rose vp. In some of the later councells also, we se to appere a true zeale of godlineffe, & plaine tokens of witt, learning, and wisdom. But as things arre wonte commonly to growe to worse, we may se by the later councells, howe much the Church hath nowe and then degenerate from the purenesse of that golden age. And I doute not but that in these corrupter ages also, councells haue had some bishoppes of the better sorte. But in these the same happened which the Senators themselues complained to be not well done in making of ordinances of the senate at Rome. For while the sentēces are numbred, not weyed, it is of necessitie that oftentimes the better part is overcome of the greater. Truly they brought forth many wicked sentences. Neither is it here needefull to gather the speciall examples, either because it should be too long, or because others have done it so diligently that there can not much be added.

9 Nowe, what neede I to rehearse Councells disagreeing with councells? And it is no cause that any should murmure against me, and say, that of those councells that disagree the one is not lawfull. For, howe shall we iudge that? By this, if I be not deceiued, that we shall iudge by the Scriptures, that y^e decrees thereof are not agreeable with true doctrine. For this is the onely certaine lawe to discern them by. It is nowe about nine hundred yeares ago, since the Synode of Cōstantinople gathered together vnder Leo the Emperour, iudged that images sette vp in Churches should be ouerthrowen, and broken in peeces. A littell afterward, the council of Nice, which Irene the Emperesse assembled in spite of him, decreed that they should be restored. Whether of these two shall we acknowledge for a lawfull council? The later which gaue images a place in Churches, hath preuailed among the people. But Augustine saith that that can not be done without most present perill of idolatrie. Epiphanius which was before in time, speaketh much more sharply: for he saith that it is wickednesse and abomination to haue images seen in a Church of Christians. Wolde they that so speake, allowe that council, if they were aliue at this day? But if both the historians tell truth, and the very actes be beleued, not onely images themselves, but also the worshipping of them was there receiued. But it is euident that such a decree came from Satan. Howe say you to this, that in deprauing and tearing the Scripture; they shewe that they made a mocking stocke of it? Which thing I haue before sufficiently made open. Howsoever it be, we shall no otherwise be able to discern betwene contrarie and disagreeing Synodes, which were many, vnlesse we trie them all by that balance of all men and angels, that is, by the word of the Lorde. So we embrace the Synode of Chalcedon, refusing the secōde Synode of Ephesus, because in this latter one the wickednesse of Eutiches was cōfirmed, which the other former condemned. This thing holy men haue iudged none otherwise but by the Scripture: whom we so followe in iudging: that the worde of God which gaue light to them doth also nowe geue light to vs. Nowe let the Romanistes go and boast, as they are wont, that the Holy Ghost is fastned and bound to their councells.

10 Howbeit there is also somewhat which a man may well thinke to be wanting in those auncient and purer councells: either because they that then were at them, being otherwise learned and wise men, wholly bent to the businesse then in hande, did not foresee many other things, or for that many things of lighter importance escaped them being busied with weightier and more earnest matters: or for that simply, as beying menne they might be deceiued with vnskillfulnesse: or for that they were sometime caried headlong with too much affection. Of this last point (which seemeth the hardest of all) there was a plaine example in the Nicene Synode, the dignitie whereof hath by consent of all men, as it was worthy, bine receiued with most hy reuerence. For when the principall article of our faith was there in daunger, Arrius the enemy was present in redinesse, with whom they must fight hande to hande, and the chiefe importance lay in the agremēt of them that came prepared to fight against the error of Arrius, this notwithstanding, they carelesse of so great daungers, yea as it were hauing forgotten grauitie, modestie and all humanitie, leauing the battell that they had in hand, as if they had come thether of purpose to do Arrius a pleasure, began to wound themselves with inward dissentions, and to tourne against themselves the stile that should haue bene bēt against Arrius. There were heard fowle obiections of crimes, there were scattered bokes of accusations, and there would haue bene no ende made of cōtentions, vntill they had with mutuall woundes one destroyed an other, vnlesse the Emperor Constantin had preuēted it, which professing that the examining of their life was a matter aboue his knowledge, and chastised such intemperāce rather with praise than with rebuking. Howe many wayes is it credible that the other councells also failed, which followed afterward? Neither doth this matter neede long profe. For if a man reade ouer the actes of the councells, he shall note therein many infirmities: though I speake of nothing more greuous.

11 And Leo bishop of Rome sticketh not to charge with ambition and vnadvised rashnesse, the Synode of Chalcedon, which yet he confesseth to be sounde in doctrines. He doth in deede not denie that it was a lawfull Synode: but he openly affirmeth, that it might erre. Some man peradventure will thinke me fonde, for that I busy my selfe in shewing such errors: forasmuch as our aduersaries do confesse, that councells may erre in those things that are not necessary to saluation. But this labor is not yet superfluous. For although because they are compelled, they do in deede confesse it in word: yet when they thrust vnto vs the determination of all councells in euery matter whatsoeuer it be, for an oracle of the Holy Ghost, they do therein require more than they toke at the beginning. In so doing what do they affirme, but that councells can not erre: or if they erre, yet it is not lawfull for vs to see the truth, or not to sooth their errors? And

I intend nothing els, but that it may thereby be gathered that the Holy Ghost so gouerned the godly and holy Synodes, that in the meane time he suffred somewhat to happen to them by the nature of men, lest we should to much trust to men. This is a much better sentence, thã that of Gregory Nazianzene, that he neuer saw a good end of any council. For he y affirmeth y all without exceptiõ ended ill, doth not leaue them much authoritie. It is nowe nothing needefull to make mention seuerally of prouinciall councill: forasmuch as it is easy to iudge by the generall, how much authoritie they ought to haue to make newe articles of faith and to receiue what kinde of doctrine soeuer it pleaseth them.

12 But our Romanists, when they see that in defence of their cause all helpe of reason doth faile them, do resort to that extreme & miserable shift: that although the men themselues be blockish in wit and councill, and most wicked in minde & will, yet the word of God remaineth, which commaundeth to obey Rulers. Is it so? what, if I denie that they be rulers that are such? For they ought to take vpon themselues, no more thã Iosua had, which was both a Prophet of the Lorde, and an excellent pastor. But let vs heare with what wordes he is set by the Lorde into his office. Let not (sayth he) the volume of Iosua. 1. this lawe depart from thy mouth: but thou shalt studie vpon it dayes 7- and nights. Thou shalt neither bowe to the right hand nor to the left: then shalt thou direct thy way and vnderstande it. They therefore shalbe to vs spirituall rulers which shall not bow from the lawe of the Lord, neither to y one side nor to the other. But if the doctrine of all pastors whatsoeuer they be, is to be receiued without any douting, to what purpose was it that we should so oft & so earnestly be admonished not to harken to the speche of false prophetes. Here not (saith he by Hieremie) the words of the prophets that prophecie to you, Hier. 23. For they teach you vanitie, & not out of y mouth of the Lord. Again, 16 Beware you of false prophets, that come vnto you in shepes clothing, Mat. 7. but inwardly are rauening wolues. And Iohn should in vaine exhort 15. vs, that we should proue the Spirits, whether they be of God. From 1. Ioh. 1. which iudgement the very Angels are not exépted, much lesse Satan 4. 1. with all his lies. What is to be said of this saying: if the blind lead the Mat. 18. blind, they shall both fall into y ditch? Doth it not sufficiétly declare, 10. that it is of great importance what maner of prophets be heard, and that not all are rashely to be heard? Wherfore there is no reason that they should make vs afraid with their titles, thereby to drawe vs into partaking of their blindness: forasmuch as we see on the other side, that the Lorde hadde a singular care to fray vs away from suffering our selues to be led with other mens error, vnder what visor of name soeuer it lurketh. For if the aunswer of Christ be true, then all blinde guides, whether they be called fathers of the Church, or prelates, or bishops, can do nothing but draw their partners into the same headlong downefall. Wherefore let no names of councells, Pastors, bishops, (which may as well be falsly pretended as truly vsed,) hinder vs, but that being taught by lessons both of words and examples, we may examine all spirits of all men by the rule of the word of God, that we may proue whether they be of God or no.

13 Forasmuch as we haue proued that there is not geuen to the Church a power to set vp a newe doctrine, nowe let vs speake of the power which they attribute vnto it in expounding of Scripture. Truly we do willingly graunt, that if there happen debate about any doctrine, there is no better nor surer remedy than if a Synode of true bishops assemble together, where y^e doctrine in cōtrouersie may be discussed. For such a determination, whereunto the Pastors of Churches shall agree in common together, calling vpon the Spirit of Christ, shall haue much greater force, than if euery one seuerally should conceiue it at home, and so teach it to the people, or if a fewe priuate men should make it. Againe, when bishops are gathered in one, they do the more commodiously take aduise in common, what and in what forme they ought to teach, least diuersitie should brede offence. Thirdely Paule prescribeth this order in discerning of doctrines: For whereas he geueth to euery seuerall Church a power to discern, he sheweth what is the order of doing in weightier causes: that is, that the Churches should take vpon them a common triall of the matter together. And so doth the very feeling of godlinesse instructe vs, that if any man trouble the Church with an vnwonted doctrine, and the matter procede so farre that there be perill of greater dissention, the Churches should first meete together, and examine the question propounded, at last, after iust discussing had, bring forth a determination taken out of the Scripture, such as may both take away douting out of the people, and stoppe the mouthes of wicked & greedy men, that they may not be so hardy to procede any further. So when Arius was risen, the Nicene Synode was gathered together, which with the authoritie thereof both did breake the wicked endeuors of the vngodly man, and restored peace to the Churches, which he had vexed, and defended the eternall godhead of Christ, against his blasphemous doctrine. When afterwarde Eunomius and Macedonius stirred vp newe troubles, their madnesse was resisted with like remedie by the Synode of Cōstantinople. In the council at Ephesus the wickednesse of Nestorius was banished. Finally this hath bene frō the beginning the ordinarie meane in the Church to preferue vnitie, so ofte as Satan began to worke any thing. But let vs remembre, that not in all ages or in all places are founde Athanasies, Basiles, Cyrilles, and such defenders of true doctrine whom the Lorde then raised vp. But let vs thinke what happened at Ephesus in the second Synode, where the heresie of Eutiches preuailed, the man of holy memory Flavianus was banished with certaine other godly men, and many such mischeues committed: euen because Dioscorus a seditious man and of a very naughty nature, was there the chief, and not the Spirit of the Lorde. But there was not the Church. I graunt. For this I determine vtterly that the truth doth not therefore die in the Church, although it be oppressed of one councill: but that the Lorde meruailously preserueth it, that it may againe in due time rise vp, and get the ouerhande. But I denie that this is perpetuall, that that is a true and certaine exposition of scripture which hath bene receiued by consentes of a councill.

14 But the Romanists shoote at an other marke, when they teach that the power to expound the Scripture belōgeth to the counsell, yea and that without appellation from them. For they abuse this colour, to call it an exposition of the Scripture whatsoever is decreed in the counsell. Of purgatorie, of the intercession of Saintes, of auricular confession, & such other, there can not be founde one sillable in the Scriptures. But because all these things haue bene stablished by the authoritie of the Church, that is to say (to speake truely) receiued in opinion and vse, therefore euery one of them must be taken for an exposition of Scripture. And not that onely: But if a councill decree any thing, though Scripture crie out against it, yet it shall beare the name of an exposition thereof. Christ commaundeth all to drinke of the Cuppe, which he reacheth in the Supper. The councill of Constance forbade, that it should not be geuen to the lay people, but willed that the priest onely should drinke of it. That which so directly fighteth against the institution of Christ, they will haue to be taken for an exposition of it. Paule calleth the forbidding of marriage, the hypocrisie of deuels: and the Holy Ghost in an other place pronounceth, that marriage is in all men holy and honorable. Where as they haue afterwarde forbidden priests to marry, they require to haue that taken for the true and naturall exposition of the Scripture, when nothing can be imagined more against it: If any dare ones open his mouth to the contrary, he shalbe iudged an herenke: because the determination of the Church is without appellation: and to doute of her exposition, that it is not true, is a hainous offence. Why should I inueye against so great shamelesnes? For the very shewing of it is an ouercoming of it. As for that which they teach of the power to allowe the Scripture, I wittingly passe it ouer. For in such sort to make the Oracles of God subiect to the iudgement of men, that they should therefore be of force because they haue pleased men, is a blasphemie vnworthy to be reherfed: and I haue before touched the same matter already. Yet I will aske them one thing: If the authoritie of the Scripture be founded vpon the allowance of the Church, what counsell decree will they alledge of that matter? I thinke they haue none. Why then did Arrius suffer himselfe to be ouercome at Nice with testimonies brought out of the Gospell of Iohn? For after these mens saying, it was free for him to haue refused them, forasmuch as there had no allowance of a generall councill gone before. They alledge the olde rolle, which is called the Canon, which they say to haue proceeded from the iudgemēt of the Church. But I aske them againe, in what councill that Canon was set forth. Here they must needes be dumme. Howbeit I desire further to know, what maner of canon they thinke that was. For I se that the same was not very certainly agreed among the olde writers, And if that which Hierome sayeth ought to be of force, the bokes of Machabees, Tobie, Ecclesiasticus and such other shalbe thrust among the Apocrypha: which those canons do in no wise suffer to be done.

The x. Chapter.

Of the power in making of lawes: wherein the Pope and his haue used a most cruell tyranny and butcherie vpon soules.

NOwe followeth the second part, which they will haue to consist in making of lawes, out of which spring haue flowed innumerable traditions of men, euen so many snares to stragle poore soules. For they haue had no more cōscience, than had the Scribes and Pharisees, to lay burdens vpon other mens shoulders, which they themselues would not touch with one finger. I haue in an other place taught howe cruell a butcherie is that which they commaunde concerning auricular confession. In other lawes there appeareth not so great violence: but those which seeme the most tolerable of all, do tyrannously oppresse consciences. I leaue vnspoken howe they corrupt the worship of God, and do spoile God himselfe of his right, which is the onely lawmaker. This power is nowe to be entreated of, whether the Church may binde cōsciences with her lawes. In which discourse y order of policy is not touched,

but this only is intended, that God be rightly worshipped according to the rule which himselfe hath prescribed, and that the spirituall liberty, which hath regarde vnto God, may remaine safe vnto vs. Vse hath made that all those decrees be called traditions of men, whatsoever they be that haue concerning the worship of God proceeded from men beside his word. Against these do we strue, not against the holy and profitable ordinances of the Church which make for the preseruation either of discipline or honestie or peace. But the ende of our struing is, that the immeasurable and barbarous Empire may be restrained, which they vsurpe vpon soules, that would be compted pastors of the Church, but in very dede are most cruel butchers. For they say that the lawes which they make are spirituall, and pertening to the soule, and they affirme them to be necessarie to eternall life. But so (as I euen nowe touched) the kingdome of Christ is inuaded, so the liberrie by him geuen to the consciences of the faithfull is vtterly oppressed and thrown abrode. I speake not nowe with howe great vngodlinesse they stablish the obseruing of their lawes, while out of it they teache men to seke both forgeueneffe of sinnes, and righteousnesse, and saluatiō, while they set in it the whole summe of religion and godlynesse. This one thing I earnestly holde, that there ought no necessitie to be layed vpon consciences in those things wherein they are made free by Christ, & vnlesse they be made free, as we haue before taught, they can not rest with God. They must acknowledge one onely king Christ their deliuerer, and be gouerned by one lawe of libertie, euen the holy word of the Gospell, if they will kepe still y grace which they haue ones obtained in Christ: they must be holden with no bondage, and bounde with no bondes.

2 These Solons do in deede faine that their constitutions are lawes of libertie, a swete yoke, a light burden: but who can not se that they be mere lies? They themselues in deede do fele no heauinesse of their owne lawes, which casting away the feare of God, do carelesly and stoutly neglect both their owne and Gods lawes. But they that are touched with any care of their saluation, are farre from thinking themselues free so long as they be entangled with these snares. We se with how great warenesse Paul did deale in this behalfe, that he durste not so much as in any one thing lay vpon men any snare at all, and that not without cause. Truly he foresawe with howe great a wounde consciences should be striken, if they should be charged with a necessitie of those things whereof the Lorde had left them liberty. On the other side the cōstitutions are almost innumerable, which these men haue most greuouly stablished with threate-ninge of eternall death, which they most severely require as necessarie to saluation. And among those there are many most hard to be kept, but all of them (if the whole multitude of them be layed together) are impossible: so great is the heape. Howe then shall it be possible, that they vpo whom so great a weight of difficultie lieth, should not be vexed in perplexitie with extreme anguish & terror? Therefore my purpose is here to impugne such cōstitutions, as tend to this ende, inwardly to binde soules before God, and charge them with a religion, as though they taught them of things necessary to saluation.

3 This question doth therefore encomber the most part of men, because they do not suttely enough put difference betweene the outward court (as they call it) and the court of cōscience. Moreouer this encreaseth the difficultie, that Paul teacheth that the Magilstrat ought to be obeyed, not onely for feare of punishment, but for consciences sake. Wherupon followeth, that consciences are also bounde with the politike lawes. But if it were so, then all should fall that we haue spoken in the last chap. and entende nowe to speake cōcerning the spirituall gouernment. For the loosing of this knot, first it is good to learne what is conscience. The definition is to be gathered of the proper deriuation of the word. For, as when men do with minde and vnderstāding cōceiue the knowledge of things, they are thereby said scire, to knowe, wherupon is deriued the name of science knowledge: so when they haue a feling of Gods iudgemēt as a wirnesse adioined with them, which doth not suffer them to hide their sinnes, but that they be brought accused to the iudgement seate of God, that same feling is called cōscience. For it is a certaine meane betwene God & man: because it suffreth not man to supresse that which he knoweth, but pursueth him so farre till it bring him to guiltinesse. This is it that Paule meaneth when he teacheth that conscience doth together witnesse with men, when their thoughtes do accuse or acquite them in the iudgemēt of God. A simple knowledge might remaine in man as enclosed. Therefore this feling which presenteth man to the iudgement of God, is as it were a keper ioined to man, to marke and watch all his secretes, that nothing should remaine buried in darkenesse. Wherupon also cōmeth that olde proverbe, conscience is a thousand witnesses. For the same reason also Peter hath set the examination of a good conscience, for quietnesse of minde, when we being persuaded of the grace of Christ, do without feare present our selues to God. And the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues, vseth these wordes, to haue no more conscience of sinne, in steede of, to be deliuered or acquitted, that sinne may no more accuse vs.

4 Therefore as workes haue respect to men, so the conscience is referred to God: so that conscience is nothing els but the inward purenesse of the hart. In which sense Paul writeth that Charitie is the fulfilling of the lawe, out of a pure conscience, and faith not fained. Afterwarde also in the same chap. he sheweth, howe much it differeth from vnderstanding, saying that some had suffered shipwracke from the faith, because they had forsaken good conscience. For in these words he signifieth, that it is a liuely affection to worship God, and a sincere desire to liue Godlily and holily. Sometime in deede it is referred also to men, as in Luke, when the same Paule testifieth, that he endeouored himself that he might walke with a good cōsciēce toward God and men. But this was therefore sayed, because the frutes of good conscience do flowe, and come euen to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God only, as I haue already said. Herupon cometh that a lawe is said to binde conscience, which simply bindeth a man, without regarde of men, or not hauing any cōsideration of them. As for example. God cōmaundeth not only to kepe the minde chaste and pure frō all lust, but also forbiddeth all maner of filthinesse of words and outward wantonnesse whatsoeuer it be. To y^e keeping of this lawe my conscience is subiect, although there liued not one man in y^e world. So he that behaueh himselfe intemperantly, doth not onely sinne in this that he geueth euill example to his brethren, but he hath his cōscience bounde with giltinesse before God. In things y^e are of themselves meane, there is an other cōsideratiō. For we ought to abstaine from thē, if they brede any offense, but the conscience still being free. So Paul speaketh of fleshe cōsecrate to idoles. If any (saith he) make dout, touch it not, for cōsciēces sake. I say for conscience, not thine own, but y^e others. A faithful mā should sinne, which being first warned should neuertheles eate of such flesh. But howsoeuer in respect of his brother, it be necessary for him to abstaine, as it is prescribed of God, yet he cesseth not to kepe still y^e liberty of cōscience. We see how this lawe binding the outward worke, leaueth the conscience vnbounde.

5 Nowe let vs returne to the lawes of men. If they be made to this ende, to charge vs with a religion, as though the obseruing of them were of it selfe necessarie, then we say that that is layed vpon conscience which was not lawe full to be layed vpon it. For our consciences haue not to do with men, but with God onely: whereunto pertaineth that common difference betwene the earthly court and the court of cōscience. When the whole world was wrapped in a most thicke mist of ignorance, yet this smal sparckle of light remained, that they acknowledged a mans cōscience to be aboue all iudgements of men. Howbeit the same thing that they did with one word confesse, they did afterwarde in deede ouerthrowe: yet it was Gods will that there should the also remaine some testimonie of Christian libertie, which might deliuer consciences from the tyranny of men. But that difficulty is not yet dissolued, which ariseth out of the words of Paul. For if we must obey Princes not onely for penalties sake, but also for conscience, it seemeth thereupon to followe that Princes lawes haue also dominion ouer conscience. If this be true, then the same also ought to be said of the lawes of the Church. I answer that first here we must put a difference betweene the generaltie and the specialtie. For though all speciall lawes do not touch the conscience, yet we are bounde by the generall commaundement of God, which commēdeth vnto vs the authoritie of magistrats. And vpon this point stādeth the disputation of Paule, that magistrats are to be honored because they are ordeined of God. In the meane time he teacheth not that those lawes that are prescribed by them, do belong to the inward gouernement of the soule: whereas he eche where extolleth both the worshipping of God & the spirituall rule of liuing righteously, aboue all the ordinances of men whatsoever they be. An other thing also is worthy to be noted, (which yet hāgeth vpon y former) that the lawes of men, whether they be made by the magistrat or by the Church, although they be necessarie to be kepte, (I speake of the good and righteous lawes) yet therefore do not by themselues binde cōscience, because the whole necessity of keping them is referred to the generall ende, but consisteth not in the things cōmaunded. From this sort do farre differ both those that prescribe a newe forme of y worshipping of God; & those that appoint necessitie in things y be at liberty.

6 But such are those that at this day be called Ecclesiasticall constitutiōs in the Papacie, which are thrust in, in steede of the true and necessarie worshipping of God. And as they be innumerable: so are there infinite bondes to catch and snare soules. But although in the declaration of the lawe we haue somewhat touched them: yet because this place was fitter to entreate fully of them, I will nowe trauaile to gather together the whole summe in the best order that I can. And because we haue already discoursed so much as seemed to be sufficient, cōcerning the tyranny which the false bishops do take vpon themselues; in liberty to teach whatsoever they list, I will nowe omit all that parte: and I will here tarry onely vpon declaring the power, which they say they haue, to make lawes. Our false bishops therefore do burden cōsciences with newe lawes, vnder this pretense, that they are ordeined of the Lorde spirituall lawmakers, sins the gouernemēt of the Church is committed vnto them. Therefore they affirme that whatsoeuer they commaunde and prescribe, ought necessarily to be obserued of the Christian people: & that he that breaketh it, is gilty of double disobedience, for that he is rebellious both to God & to the Church. Certainly, if they were true bishops. I would in this behalfe graunt to them some authoritie, not so much as they require, but so much as is requisite to y^e well ordering of the policy of the Church. Nowe sith they are nothing lesse than that which they would be accounted, they can not take any thing to them, be it neuer so little, but that they shall take to much. But because this hath ben els where considered, let vs graunt them at this present, that whatsoeuer power true bishops haue, the same rightly belongeth to them also: yet I deny that they be therefore appointed lawmakers ouer the faithfull, that may of themselues prescribe a rule to liue by, or compell to their ordināces the people comitted vnto them. When I say this, I meane, that it is not lawfull for thē, to deliuer to the Church to be obserued of necessity, that which they haue deuised of themselues without the worde of God. Forasmuch as that authoritie both was vnknown to the Apostles, and so oft takē away from the ministers of the Church by the Lords owne mouth: I maruell who haue bene so bolde to take it vpon them, and at this day are so bolde to defende it, beside the example of the Apostles, & against the manifest prohibition of God.

7 As touching that y^e pertained to the perfect rule of well liuing, the Lorde hath so cōteined all that in his lawe, that he hath left nothing for men that they might adde to that summe. And this he did first for this purpose, that because the whole vprightnesse of liuing standeth in this point, if all works be governed by his will as by a rule, he should be holden of vs y^e only maister and directer of life: then, to declare that he requireth of vs nothing more than obedience. For this reason Iames saith: he y^e iudgeth his brother iudgeth the law: he that iudgeth the lawe, is not an obseruer of the law, but a iudge. But there is one only lawmaker, that can both saue & destroy. We heare y^e God doth claime this one thing as proper to himselfe, to rule vs with the gouernment and lawes of his worde. And the same thing was spoken before of Esay. although somewhat more darkly: the Lord is our king, the Lord is our lawmaker, y^e Lord is our iudge, he shall saue vs. Truly in both these places is shewed, y^e he that hath power ouer the soule, hath y^e iudgemēt of life & death. Yea Iames pronounceth this plainly. Nowe, no man can take that vpon him. Therefore God must be acknowledged to be the only king of soules, to whom alone belongeth the power to saue and destroy, as those words of Esaiē expresse, & to

Pet. 5. be the king, and iudge, and lawmaker and Sauer. Therefore Peter, when he admonisheth the Pastors of their dutie, exhorteth them so to feede the flocke, not as vjing a Lordship ouer the Clergy, by which word Clergie he signifieth the inheritance of God, that is to say the faithfull people. This if we rightly wey, that it is not lawfull, that that should be transferred to man, which God maketh his owne onely: we shall vnderstande that so all the power is cut of whatsoeuer it be that they challenge, which aduaunce themselues to commaunde any thing in the Church without the word of God.

8 Nowe, forasmuch as the whole cause hangeth thereupon, that if God be the onely lawemaker, it is not lawfull for men to take that honor to themselues: it is mete also therewithall to kepe in minde those two reasons which we haue spoken, why the Lord claimeth that to himselfe alone. The first is, that his will may be to vs a perfect rule of all righteousnesse and holinesse: and that so in the knowing of him may be the perfect knowledge to liue well. The other is, that (when the maner is sought howe to worship him rightly and well) he onely may haue authoritie ouer our soules, whom we ought to obey, and vpon whoes becke we ought to hang. These two reasons being well marked, it shalbe easy to iudge, what ordinances of men are cōrary to the word of God. Of that sort be all those which are fained to belong to the true worshipping of God, and to the obseruing whereof consciēces are bounde, as though they were necessary to be obserued. Let vs therefore remember that all lawes of men ought to be weyed with this balance, if we will haue a sure triall that may neuer suffer vs to erre. The first of these reasons Paul in the Epistle to the Colossiās vseth in contending against the false Apostles that attempted to oppresse the Churches with newe burdens. The second reason he more vseth with the Galatians in the like case. This therefore he trauailēth to proue in the Epistle to the Colossiās, that the doctrine cōcerning the true worshipping of God is not to be sought at mens handes: because the Lord hath faithfully and fully instructed vs howe he ought to be worshipped. To proue the same in y first chap. he saith that in the Gospell is contained all wisdom, whereby y man of God may be made perfect in Christ. In y beginning of the ij. chap. he saith, that all the treasures of wisdom & vnderstāding are hiddē in Christ. Therevpon he afterward concludeth, let y faithfull beware that they be not by vain Philosophie led from the flocke of Christ, according to the constitutiōs of men. But in the ende of the chapter, he doth yet with greater boldnesse condemne all Ethelothreskias, y is to say, all fained worshippings; which men devise to themselues, or receiue of other, & what-whatsoever precepts they dare of themselves give concerning the worshipping of God. We have therefore, that all those ordinances are wicked, in observing whereof the worshipping of God is fained to be. As for the places in the Galatians wherewith he earnestly affirmeth that consciences, which ought to be ruled of God only, ought not to be entangled with snares, they are open enough, specially in the fifth Chapter. Therefore lette it be sufficient to have but noted them.

9 But because the whole matter shall better be made open by examples, before that we go any further, it is good also to apply this doctrine to our own times. We say that y^e constitutions which they call Ecclesiasticall, wherewith the Pope and his do burden the Church, are pernicious and wicked: our aduersaries defende that they be holy & available to saluation. There be two kindes of the: for some concerne Ceremonies & rites, other some pertaine more to discipline. Is there then a iust cause to moue vs to impugn them both? Truly a iuster than we woulde. First do not the authors themselves clearly define, that the very worshipping of God is contained in them? To what purpose do they apply their Ceremonies, but that God should be worshipped by them? And that cometh to passe not by the onely error of the ignorant multitude, but by their allowance that haue the place of teaching. I do not touch the grosse abominations, wherewith they haue gone about to ouerthrow all godlines. But it shoulde not be imagined amonge them to be so hainous an offense, to haue failed in any of the least petty traditions, vnlesse they did make the worshipping of God subiect to their fained deuises. What do we the offend, if at this day we can not beare that, which Paule taught to be intolerable, that the lawfull order of the worshipping of God should be reduced to the will of men: specially when they commaund men to worship according to the elementes of this world, which Paule testifieth to be against Christ? Againe it is not vnknownen, with how precise necessity they binde consciences to kepe whatsoever they commaund. Here when we cry out to the contrary, we haue all one cause with Paul, which in no wise suffreth faithful consciences to be brought into bondage of men.

10 Moreover this worst of all is added, that when religion hath once begon to be defined with such vaine inuentions, there euer followeth after that peruersenesse an other abominable frowardnesse, whereof Christ reproched the Pharisees that the commaundement of God is made void for the traditions of men. I will not vse mine owne wordes in fightinge against our lawemakers at these daies. Let them haue the victory, if they can by any meane purge themselves from this accusation of Christ. But how should they excuse themselves, when amonge them it is thought infinitely more haynous, to haue omitted auricular confession when the time of yere cometh about, than to haue continued a most wicked life a whole yere together: to haue infected their tongue with a litle tasting of flesh on a Friday, than to haue defiled their body with whoredom al the daies of the weke? to haue put their hande to an honest worke vpon a day consecrate: to I wote not what petty Saines, than to haue continually exercised their members in most wicked offenses? for a Priest to be coupled with one lawfull mariage, than to be entangled with a thousand adulteries? not to haue performed a vowed pilgrimage, than to breake faith in al promises? not to haue wasted somewhat vpon monstrous & no lesse superfluous & vnprofitable excessiue gorgiousnes of temples, than to haue failed to help the extreme necessities of the poore? to haue passed by an idole without honor, than to haue despitefully entreated all kindes of men? not to haue mumbled vp at certaine houres a great number of wordes without vnderstanding, than neuer to haue conceiued a true praier in their hart? What is to make voide the commaundement of God for the traditiōs of men, if this be not: when comending the keping of Gods commaundements but coldly & as it were lightly by the way, they do no lesse earnestly & busily exact the obeying of their owne, than if they contained in themselves the whole pith of godlines? when reuenging the transgressing of Gods law, with light penalties of satisfactions, they punish the very least offence of one of their owne decrees with no lesse paine than with prisonment, banishment, fier or sword? Beinge not so sharp & hard to entreate against the despisers of God, they persecute the despisers of themselves with vnappeaseable hatred to the extremity: and do so instruct all those, whose simplicity they hold captiue, that they would with more contented minde see the whole law of God ouerthrowen, than one smal tittle (as they call it) in the commaundements of the Church to be broken. First in this point is grieuous offence committed, that for small matters, and such as (if it shoulde be tried by Gods iudgement) are at liberty, one man despiseth, iudgeth & casteth away another. But now, as though that were not euil enough, those triflinge elementes of the world (as Paule calleth them in his wryting to the Galatians) are weyed of more value than the heauely Oracles of God. And he that is in a manner acquitted in adultery, is iudged in meate: he that hath leaue to vse a harlot, is forbidden to haue a wife. This profite verily is gotten by that transgressinge obedience, which is so much turned from God as it declineth to men.

Ga. 4. 9.

11 There be also other two not sclēder faultes, which we disallow in the same ordināces. First, because they prescribe for the most part vnprofitable, & sometime also fond obseruations: then, because godly consciences are oppressed with the infinite multitude of them, & being rouled backe into a certain Iewishnes, they so cleaue to shadowes, that they can not attaine to Christ. Whereas I cal them fond & vnprofitable, I know that that will not seeme credible to the wisdom of the flesh, which so wel liketh them, that it thinketh the Church to be vtterly deformed when they be taken away. But this is it that Paul writeth of, to haue a resemblance of wisdom in counterfait worshipping, in humility, & in this that they thinke that with their sharpenes they be able to tame their flesh. This is truely a most wholesome admonition, such as ought neuer to slip away from vs. Mens traditions (sayth he) do deceiue vnder the shewe of wisdom, whense haue they this colour? because they are fained of men; therefore the wit of man doth therein acknow his owne, & acknowinge it doth more gladly embrace it, thā any thing were it neuer so good, that lesse agreed with his vanity. Againe, they haue hereby an other cōmendation, because they seeme to be fit introductions to humility, for that with their yoke they hold the mindes of men pressed downe to the ground. Last of all, because they seeme to tend to this end to restrain the deintines of the flesh, & to subdue it with rigor of abstinēce, therefore they are thought to be wisely deuised. But what saith Paul to these things? doth he not shake of those visors, least the simple shoulde be deceiued with false pretense? Because he iudged this enough for cōfutation of them, that he had sayd that they were the inuentions of men, he passeth ouer all these things without confutation, as though he esteemed them for nothing. Yea, because he knew y all fained worshippinges in the Church were condemned, and are so much more suspicious to the faithfull as they more delite the wit of man: because he knew that that fained image of outward humility doth so much differ from true humility, as it might easily be discerned: finally because he knew that that childish introduction was no more esteemed thā an exercise of the body: therefore he willed that the very same things should be to the faithfull in steede of a confutation of mens traditions, by fauour of which they were commended among the ignorant.

12 So at this day not only the vnlearned commō people, but every mā as he is most puffed vp with worldly wisdom, so is he most maruellously delited with beholding of Ceremonies. But hypocrites & foolish women thinke that there can be nothings deuised more glorious nor better. But they which do more depely searche, and more truely weie according to the rule of godlinesse, of what value so many and such Ceremonies are, do vnderstand, first that they are trifles, because they haue no profite: then, that they are deceites, because they do with vaine pompe beguile the eies of the beholders. I speake of those Ceremonies, vnder which y^e Romish maisters wil that there be great misteries: but we find them by experience to be nothing els but mere mockeries. And it is no maruel that the authors of them haue fallen so far as to mocke both themselues & other with trifling follies: because they partely tooke their examplar out of the dotages of the Gentils, & partly after the maner of apes did vndiscretly counterfaite the olde vsages of the lawe of Moses, which no more pertained to vs than the Sacrifices of beastes & such other thinges. Truely although there were none other argument, yet no man that hath his sound wit wil looke for any goodnes of a heape so il patched together. And the thinge it selfe plainly sheweth, that many Ceremonies haue no other vse but to amase the people rather thã to teach them. So in these new found Canons, that do rather peruert thã preserue discipline, the hypocrites repose great importance: but if a man do better looke into them, he shal finde that they are nothinge else but a shadowish & vanishing shew of discipline.

13 But nowe (to come to the other point) who doth not see that traditions with heaping one vpon an other, are ouergrown into so great a number, that the Christian Church may in no wise beare the? Hereby it is come to passe, that in Ceremonies there appereth I wote not what Iewishnesse, & the other obseruations bring a grieuous butchery to Christian soules. Augustine complained that in his time, the commaundementes of God neglected, all things were ful of so many presumptions, that he was more grieuously rebuked y^e in his vtas had touched the ground with bare foote, than he that had buried his wit with dronkennes. He complained that the Church, which the mercy of God willed to be free, was so burdened, that the state of the Iewes was much more tolerable. If that holy man had happened to liue in our age, with what complaintes would he haue bewailed the bondage that nowe is? For both the number is ten times greater, and euery smal title is a hundred times more rigorously looked vnto, thã at that time. So is wont to be done: when these peruerse lawemakers haue gotten the dominion, they make no end of bidding and forbiddinge, till they come to extreme peuisnesse. Which thing Paule hath also very wel declared in these wordes: If ye be deade to the world, why are ye holden as though ye were liuinge, with traditions, as eate not, tast not, handle not? For where as the Greeke word aptesthai, signifieth both to eate and to touche, doutlesse in this place it is taken in the first of these two significations, least there shoulde be a superfluous repetition. Therefore he doth here excellently well describe the proceedings of the false Apostles. They beginne at superstition, so that they do not onely forbid to eate, but also euen slenderly to chaw: when they haue obtained this, they the also forbid to tast. When this is also graunted them, they reckon it not lawfull so much as to touch with a finger.

14 This tyranny in the ordinances of men we do at this day worthily blame, by which it is come to passe that poore consciences are maruelously tormented with innumerable decrees and immeasurable exacting of keepinge of them. Of canons pertaining to discipline we haue spoken in an other place. Of the Ceremonies what shall I say, by which it is brought about that, Christ beinge halfe buried, we are returned to Iewishe figures? Our Lorde Christ (sayth Augustine) hath bound together the felowship of the new people, with Sacramentes very fewe in number, most excellent in signification, most easie in obseruing. How farre the multitude and diuersity of vsages wherwith at this day we see the Church to be entangled, doth differ from this simplicity, it can not be sufficiently declared. I know with what crafty shifte some suttle men do excuse this peruersenesse. They say that among vs there are many as rude as they were in the people of Israel: that such introduction was ordained for their sakes, which although the stronger may well want, yet they ought not to neglect it, forasmuch as they see it to be profitable for the weake brethren. I answer, that we are not ignorant, what we owe to the weakenes of our brethren: but on the other side we take exception and say, that this is not the way whereby the weake may be prouided for, y they should be ouerwhelmed with great heapes of Ceremonies. The Lorde did not in vaine put this difference betwene vs and the old people, that his will was to instruct them like children with signes and figures, but vs more simply without such outwarde furniture. As (sayeth Paule) a also touched in his owne words this difference of the olde and new people, when he sayd to the woman of Samaria, that the time was come wherein the true worshippers shoulde worship God in Spirite and trueth. This verily had alway bin done: but the new worshippers differed from the olde in this point, that vnder Moses the spirituall worshipping of God was shadowed & in a maner entangled with many Ceremonies, which being abolished, he is now more simply worshipped. Therefore they that confound this difference, do ouerthrow the order institute & stablished by Christ. Shall there then (wilt thou say) no Ceremonies be giuen to the ruder sort to helpe their vnskilfulnes? I say not so: for I verily thinke that this kinde of help is profitable for them. I do here trauaile onely that such a meane may be vsed, as may brightly set out Christ, & not darken him. Therefore there are giuen vs of God few Ceremonies, & those not laboursome, that they should shewe Christ beinge present. The Iewes had moe giuen them, that they should be images of him beinge absent. Absent I say he was, not in power, but in maner of signifying. Therefore, y^e meane may be kept, it is necessary to kepe that fewnesse in number, easines in obseruing, & dignity in signifying, which also consisteth in clearnes. What nede I to say that this hath not bin done? For the thing it selfe is in all menseies.

15 Here I omit with howe pernicious opinions mens mindes are filled, in thinking that they be sacrifices wherewith oblation is rightly made to God, whereby sinnes are cleansed, whereby righteousness & saluation is obtained. They wil deny that good things are corrupted with such forein errours: forasmuch as in this behalfe a man may no lesse offend in the very workes also cōmaunded of God. But this hath more hainousnes, that so much honor is giuen to works rashly fained by the wil of mā, that they are thought to be things deseruing eternal life. For the works cōmaunded of God haue reward therfore, because the lawmaker himselfe in respect of obedience accepteth them. Therefore they receiue not their value of their owne worthines, or of their own deseruinge, but because God so much esteemeth our obedience toward him. I speake here of that perfection of workes which is cōmaunded of God, & is not performed of men. For therefore the very workes of y^e law which we do, haue no thanke but of the free goodnes of God, because in them our obedience is weake & lame. But because we do not here dispute, of what valuee workes are without Christ, therefore let vs passe ouer that question. I come backe againe to that which properly belongeth to this present argument, that whatsoever commendation workes haue in them, they haue it in respect of the obedience ence, which onely the Lord doth looke vpon, as he testifieth by the Prophet: I gaue not commaundement of sacrifices & burnt offrings, but only that ye should with hearing, heare my voyce. But of fayned workes he speaketh in an other place, saying: Ye weie your siluer and not in bread, Againe, they worship me in vaine with y^e precepts of m^e. This therfore they can by no wayes, excuse, that they suffer the silly people to seke in those outward trifles the righteousnes wherby they may stand against God, & vphold theselues before y^e heauenly iudgement seate. Morouer, is not this a fault worthy to be inueied against, that they shew forth Ceremonies not vnderstâded as it were a stage play, or a magical enchauntment? For it is certaine y^e all Ceremonies are corrupt & hurtful, vnlesse men be by them directed to Christ. But the Ceremonies that are vsed vnder the papacy, are seuered frô doctrine, that they may the more hold men in signes without all signification. Finally (such a cunning craftsman is the belly) it appeareth that many of the haue bin inuented by couetous sacrificing priestes, to be snares to catche money. But what beginninge soeuer they haue, they are all so giuen forth in common for filthy gaine, that we must needes cut of a great part of them, if we wil bring to passe that there be not a prophane market, and ful of sacrilege vsed in the Church.

16 Although I seeme not to teach a continual doctrine cōcerning the ordinances of men, because this speakinge is altogether applied to our own time: yet there is nothing spokē that shal not be profitable for all times. For so oft as this superstition crepeth in, that men will worshippe God with their owne fayned deuises, whatsoeuer the lawes be that are made to y^e purpose, they do by and by degenerate to those grosse abuses. For the Lord threatneth not this curse to one or two ages, but to al ages of the world, that he will strike them with blindnes and amased dulnes that worship him with the doctrines of men. This blinding continually maketh that they flee frô no kinde of absurdity, which despising so many warnings of God, do wilfully wrap themselves in those deadely snares. But if, settinge aside circumstances, you wil haue simply shewed what be the mens traditions of all ages, which it is mete to be reiected of the Church, and to be disallowed of all the godly, that same shalbe a sure and plaine definition which we haue aboue set: that all lawes without the word of God are made by men to this ende, either to prescribe a maner of worshipping God, or to binde consciences with religion, as though they gaue commaundement of thinges necessary to saluation. If to the one or both of these there be adioyned other faultes: as, that with their multitude they darken the brightnesse of the Gospell: that they nothing edifie, but be rather vnprofitable and triflinge occupations than true exercises of godlinesse: that they be laid abroad to filthinesse and vnhonest gaine: that they be too hard to be kept: that they be defiled with euil superstitions: these shall be helpes that we may the more easily finde how much euill is in them.

17 I heare what they answere for themselues, that their traditiōs are not of themselues, but of God. For, they say that the Church is gouerned of the holy Ghost, that it can not erre: and that the authority thereof remaineth with them. When this is obtained, it therewithall foloweth, that their traditions are the reuelations of the holy Ghost, which can not be despised but wickedly and with the contempt of God. And that they shoulde not seeme to haue attempted any thinge without great authority, they will haue it beleued that a great parte of their obseruations came from the Apostles: and they affirme that by one example is sufficiently declared what the Apostles did in other things, when being assembled in one Councell, they did by the decre of the Councell commaunde the Gentiles to abstaine from thinges offered to idols, from blood and strangled. We haue already in an other place declared, how falsly for boasting of themsel-ues they lyingely vsurpe the title of the Church. So much as concerning this present cause: if, plucking away all visors, and deceitfull colours, we truely looke vpon that which we ought principally to care for, & which chieftly is for our behoofe, that is, what maner of Church Christ will haue, that we may fashion and frame our selues to the rule therof: it shal easily be euidēt vnto vs, that it is not the Church, which passinge the boundes of the word of God, doth outrage and runne at riot in makinge of newe lawes. For doth not that lawe which was once prescribed to the Church, remaine eternall? What I commaund thee, that thou shalt kepe that thou maist do it. Thou shalt not adde any thing, nor take any thing frō it. And in an other place: Adde not to the word of the Lord, nor minish any thing: least he peradventure reproue thee, and thou be founde a lyer. Sith they can not deny that this was spokē to the Church, which do they else but report the stub-bornesse of that Church, what they boast to haue bin so bold as after such prohibitions neuerthelesse to adde & mingle of her owne with the doctrine of God? But God forbid that we shoulde assent to their lies, whereby they burden the Church with so great a sclaunder: but let vs vnderstande, that the name of the Church is falsly pretended, so oft as this lust of mens rashnesse is spoken of, which can not holde it selfe within the prescribed bouēdes of God, but that it wildly rangeth & runneth out into her owne inuētiōs? There is nothing entangled, nothing darke, nothing doutfull in these wordes, in which the whole Church is forbiddē to adde to the word of God, or to take any thing from it, when the worshippinge of God, and preceptes concerninge saluation, are entreated of. But this (say they) was spoken of the lawe only, after which folowed the prophecies & the whole ministracion of the Gospel. I graunt in dede: and I adde also, which are rather fulfillmentes of the law, than additions or diminishinges. But if the Lorde suffred nothing to be added to or taken from the ministry of Moses, which was (as I may so terme it) darke by reason of many doutfull enwrappinges, till by his seruantes the Prophetes, and at length by his beloued Sonne, he ministred a clearer doctrine: why shoulde we not thinke it much more seuerely forbidden vs, that we should adde nothing to the law, the Prophetes, the Psalmes, and the Gospel? The Lorde is not gone out of kinde from himselfe, which hath longe ago declared, that he is with nothing so hiely offendēd, as whē he is worshipped with the inuentions of men? Whereof came those notable sayinges in the Prophetes, which ought to haue continually sounded in our eares: I spake no words to your fathers, in y day that I brought them out of Ægipt, concerning sacrifice and burnt offringe. But this word I commaunded them, saying: With hearinge heare my voyce: and I will be your God, and you shalbe my people, & you shall walke in all the way that I shall commaunde you. Againe, I haue with protesting protested vnto your fathers, Heare my voyce. And other like sayings: but this is notable aboue the rest. Will God haue burnt offerings and sacrifices, and not rather that his voyce be obeied? For obedience is better than sacrifice, and to harken is better than to offer the fatte of rammes. For, to resist is as the sinne of soothsayinge: and not to obey is as the wickednesse of Idolatry. Therefore whatsoever inuentions of men are in this behalfe defended with the authority of the Church, forasmuch as the same can not be excused from the crime of vngodlinesse, it is easie to proue that it is falsly imputed to the Church.

18 After this sorte we freely inuicie against this tyranny of mens traditions, which is proudly thrust in among vs, vnder the title of the Church. For neither do we scorne the Church (as our aduersaries, to bring vs in hatred, do vniustly lye vpon vs) but we giue vnto her the praise of obediēce, than which she knoweth no greater praise. They rather are very sore wrong doers to the Church, which make her obstinate against her Lorde, while they faine that she hath proceeded further than she lawfully might do by y word of God: though I speake nothing how it is a notable shamelesnesse ioyned with as great ma-

Episto. 118. ad Janu. wrytten. For, that which Augustine sayth, that certayne Churchies in his time did shunne that solemne folowinge of Christes example in washinge of feete, least that vsage shoulde seeme to pertaine to Baptisme, secretly sheweth that there was then no kinde of washing that had any likenesse with Baptisme. Whatsoever it be, I will not graunt that this proceeded from an Apostolike Spirite, that Baptisme, when it is with a daily signe brought into remembrance, should after a certaine manner be repeated. And I passe not vpon this, that the selfe same Augustine in an other place ascribeth other thinges also to the Apostles. For sith he hath nothing but coniectures, judgement ought not vppon them to be giuen of so great a matter. Finally admitte that we graunt them also, that those thinges which he rehearseth came from the time of the Apostles: Yet there is great difference betwene instituting some exercise of Godlinesse, which the Faythfull with a free conscience may vse, or if the vse of it shall not be profitable for them, they may forbear it: and making a law that may snare consciences with bondage. But now, from what author soeuer they proceeded, sith we see that they are sliddé into so great abuse, nothing withstandeth, but that we may without offence of him abolish them: forasmuch as they were neuer so commended, that they must be perpetually immouable.

21 Neither doth it much helpe them, that to excuse their tyranny they pretend the example of the Apostles. The Apostles (say they) & the elders of the first Church, made a decree beside the commaundement of Christ, wherein they commaunded all the Gentils to abstaine from things offred to idols, from strangled, & from blood. If that was lawful for the, why is it not also lawful for their successours, to follow the same so oft as occasiõ so requireth? I would to God, they did both in all other thinges and in this thing folow them. For I deny that the Apostles did there institute or decree any new thinge, which is easie to be proued by a strong reason. For whereas Peter in that Councell pronounceth, that God is tempted, if a yoke be layd vpon the neckes of the disciples: he doth himselfe ouerthrow his owne sentence, if he afterwarde consent to haue any yoke layd vpon them. But there is a yoke layd, if the Apostles do decree of their owne authority that the Gentils should be forbidden, that they should not touch thinges offred to idols, blood, and strangled. In dede there yet remaineth a dout, for that they do neuerthelessse seeme to forbid. But this dout shall easily be dissolued, if a man do more nerely consider the meaning of the decree it selfe: in the order and effect wherof the chiefe point is, that to the Gentils their liberty is to be leste, and that they ought not to be troubled,

troubled, nor accombred about the obseruations of the law. Hitherto it very well maketh of our side. But the exception that immediatly foloweth, neither is any new law made by the Apostles, but y^e diuine and eternall commaundement of God, that charity ought not to be broken, nor doth diminish one title of that liberty: but only admonisheth the Gentils, how they should temper themselues to their brethre, that they abuse not their liberty to the offence of them. Let this therefore be the second point, that the Gentils should vse a harmlesse liberty, and without offence of their brethren. But yet they prescribe some certaine thinge: that is, they teach & appoint, so farre as was expedient for the time, by what things they might runne into y^e offence of their brethren, that they might beware of those thinges: but they adde no new thinge of their owne to the eternall law of God, which forbiddeth the offending of brethren.

22 Like as if the faithful Pastors which gouerne the Churches not yet well reformed, shoulde commaunde all their people, that till the weake with whom they liue do grow stronger, they should not openly eate flesh on Friday, or openly labour vpon holy daies, or any such thinge. For although these thinges, settinge superstition aside, are by themselues indifferent: yet when there is added offence of brethren, they cā not be done without a fault. But the times are such, that the saythfull can not shewe such a sight to the weake brethren, but that they shall sore wounde their consciences. Who, but a cauiller, will say that so they make a new law, whereas, it is certaine that they do onely preuent offences, which are expressely enough forbidden of the Lord? And no more cā it be sayd of the Apostles, whose purpose was nothing else, but in takinge away the matter of offences, to call vpon the law of God concerninge the auoydinge of offence: as if they had sayd: It is the Lords cōmaundement y^e ye offend not a weake brother. Ye can not eate thinges offred to images, strangled and blood, but that the weake brethren shalbe offended. Therefore we commaunde you in the word of the Lord, that ye eate not with offence. And that the Apostles had respect to the same thinge, Paule himselfe is a very good witness, which writeth thus, verily none otherwise than according to the meaning of the Council: Concerning meates that are offered to Idols, we know that the Idole is nothing. But some with conscience of the Idole, do eate it as offred to Idols, and their conscience, forasmuch as it is weake, is defiled. See that your liberty be not made an offence to the weake. He y^e shall haue well weied these things, shall not afterwarde be deceiued with such a false colour as they make, that pretend the Apostles for defence of their tyranny, as though the Apostles had begonne with their decree to breake the liberty of the Church. But, that they may not be able to escape, but be driuen euen with their owne confession to allowe this solution, lette them answer me, by what right they were so bolde to abrogate the same decree. Because there was no more peril of those offences & dissentions, which the Apostles meant to prouide for, & they know that the lawe was to be wey'd by the end therof. Forasmuch as therefore this lawe was made in respect of charity, there is nothinge prescribed in it, but so much as pertaineth to charity. When they confesse that the transgressing of this lawe is nothing but a breaking of charity, do they not therewithall acknowledge, that it is not a forged addition to the lawe of God, but a naturall and simple appliance to the times and matters whereunto it was directed?

23 But although such lawes be a hundred times vniust & iniurious vnto vs, yet they affirme that they must be heard without exception: for they say that this is not here intended, that we shoulde consent to errours, but only that being subiects we should beare the hard commaundements of our gouernours, which it is not our partes to refuse. But here also the Lorde very well resisteth them with the trueh of his word, & deliuereth vs out of such bondage into the liberty, which he hath purchased for vs with his holy blood, the benefit whereof he hath more than once confirmed with his word. For that is not here only intended (as they maliciously faine) that we shoulde suffer some grieuous oppression in our body, but that our consciences being spoiled of their liberty that is of the benefit of the blood of Christ, shold be seruilely tormented. Howbeit let vs passe ouer this also, as though it made litle to the matter. But of how great importance do we think it is, that the Lordes kingdom is taken away from him, which he claimeth to himselfe with so great seuerity? But it is taken away so oft as he is worshipped with the lawes of mens inuentions, whereas he will be holden for the only lawmaker of his owne worship. And least any man shold thinke it to be a matter of nothing, let vs heare how much the Lord esteemeth it. Because (sayth he) this people hath feared me

Esa. 19. with the commaundement & doctrine of men: beholde I wil astonish 13. them with a great & wonderous miracle. For wisdom shal perish from the wise men therof, & vnderstanding shal depart frō the elders. In an Matt. 15 other place, They worship me in vaine teaching doctrines, the com-
9. maundements of mē. And truly wheras the children of Israell defiled theselues with many idolatries, the cause of al y euil is ascribed to this vncllean mixture, y transgressing the commaundements of God, they haue forged new worshippings. And therefore the holy History rehearseth

heareth that the new strangers that had bin transplanted by the king of Babilon to inhabite Samaria, were torne in peeces & consumed of wilde beastes, because they knew not the iudgements or statutes of the God of that lande. Although they had nothinge offended in the Ceremonies, yet God would not haue allowed a vaine pompe: but in the meane time he ceased not to take vengeance of the defilinge of his worship, for that men did thrust in deuises strange from his word. Wherupon it is afterward said, that they being made afraid with that punishment, receiued the Ceremonies prescribed in the law: but because they did not yet purely worship the true God, it is twise repeated that they did feare him and did not feare him. Wherupon we gather, that the parte of reuerence which is giuen to him, consisteth in this, while in worshipping him we simply follow what he commaundeth with mingling none of our inuentions. And therefore the godly kings are oftentimes praised, because they did according to al the commaundements, & declined not to the right hande nor to the left. I go yet further: although in some fayned worshipping there do not opely appeare vngodlines, yet it is seuerely condemned of the holy Ghost, so soone as men depart frō the cōmaundemēt of God. The Altar of Achaz, the paterne wherof was brought out of Samaria, might haue seemed to encrease the garnishment of the temple, whereas his deuise was to offer Sacrifices thereupon to God onely, which he shoulde do more honorably than vpon the first & old Altar: yet we see how the Spirit detesteth that boldnesse, for none other cause but for that the inuentions of mē in ȳ worshipping of God are vncleane corruptions. And howe much more clearly the will of God is opened vnto vs, so much the lesse excusable is our frowardnes to attēpt any thinge. And therefore worthily with this circumstance the crime of Manasses is enforced, for that he builded a new altar in Ierusalē, of which God had pronounced I will there set my name, because the authority of God is now as it were of set purpose refused.

24 Many do maruell why God so sharply threatneth ȳ he will do thinges to be wondred at to the people of whom he was worshipped with the commaundements of men, & pronounceth that he is worshipped in vaine with ȳ precepts of men. But if they considered, what it is in the cause of religion, that is to say of heauenly wisdom, to hang vpo the only mouth of God, they would therewithal see, ȳ it is no sclēder reason why God so abhorreth such peruerse seruices, that are done to him accordinge to the lust of mans wit. For although they that obey such lawes for the worshipping of God, haue a certaine shew of humility in this their obedience, yet they are not hūble before God, to whom they prescribe the same lawes which they themselues do kepe. This is the reason why Paul willeth vs so diligently to beware, that we be not deceiued by the traditiōs of men & that which he calleth ethelothreskian that is, Wilworship inuented of men beside the doctrine of God. This is verily true, both our owne wisdom, & al mēs wisdom must be foolish vnto vs, that we may suffer him alone to be wise. Which way they keepe not which do study with pety obseruations fained by the wil of men to commend themselues vnto him, & do thrust vnto him as it were against his wil a transgressinge obedience toward him, which is in dede giuen to men. As it hath bin done both in many ages heretofore, & in the time within our owne remembrance, & is also at this day done in those places where the authority of the creature is more esteemed than of the creator: where religiō (if yet the same be worthy to be called religion) is defiled with more & more vnfauory superstitions, than euer was any Paynime wickednes. For what could the wit of men brede but all things carnall & foolish and such as truely resemble their authors?

25 Wheras also the Patrones of superstitions alleage, that Samuel .Sam. 7 Sacrificed in Ramatha, and although the same was done beside the law, yet it pleased God: the solution is easie, that it was not a certaine secōd altar to set against the one only altar: but because the place was not yet appointed for the arke of couenant, he appointed the towne where he dwelled for Sacrifices, as the most conuenient place. Truly the minde of the holy Prophet was not to make any innouation in holy things, wheras God had so streightly forbidden any thing to be added or minished. As for the example of Menoha, I say y it was an extraordinary and singular case. He being a priuate man offred sacrifice to God & not without the allowance of God: verily because he enterprised it not of a rash motiō of his own minde, but by a heauenly instinctiō. But how much the Lord abhorreth those things that mē deuisse of themselues to worship him withall, an other not inferior to Gedeon is a notable example, whose Ephod turned to destruction not only to him and his family, but to the whole people. Finally eue-ry new found inuention, wherwith men couet to worship God, is nothing else but a defiling of true holinesse.

26 Why then (say they) did Christ will that those intolerable burdens should be borne, which the Scribes and Pharisees bound vpon men? But why in an other place did the same Christ will that men should beware of the leuē of the Pharisees: calling leuen (as Mathew the Euangelist expoundeth it) all their owne doctrine that they mingled with the purenes of the word of God? What would we haue more plaine, than that we be commaunded to flee and beware of all their doctrine? Whereby it is made most certaine vnto vs, that in the other place also the Lorde willed not, that the consciences of his should be vexed with the Pharisees owne traditions. And the very wordes, if they be not wrested, sounde of no such thing. For the Lord purposing there to enuey sharply against the maners of the Pharisees, did first simply instruct them that heard him, that although they sawe nothing in their life mete for them to followe, yet they should not cesse to do those things which they taught in wordes, while they sate in the chaire of Moses, that is, to declare the lawe. Therefore he meant nothing els but to prouide that the common people should not with the euill exāples of the teachers be brought to despise the doctrine. But forasmuch as many are nothing at all moued with reasons, but alway require authornie, I will allege Augustines wordes, in which the very same thing is spoken. The Lordes shepefolde hath gouernours, some faithfull, and some hirelinges. The gouernours that are faithfull, are true Pastors: but heare ye, that the hirelinges also are necessarie: for many in the Church following earthly profits, do preach Christ, and by them the voice of Christ is heard: and the shepe do followe, not a hireling, but the Pastor by the meanes of a hireling. Heare ye that hirelinges are shewed by the Lorde himselte. The Scribes (saith he) and the Pharisees sitt in the chaire of Moses. Do ye those things that they say, but do not those things that they do. What other thing said he, but heare the voice of the Pastor by the hirelinges? For in sitting in the chaire they teach the lawe of God: therefore God teacheth by them. But if they will teach their owne, heare it not, do it not. This saith Augustine.

In Ioh
Tract.
46.

27 But whereas many vnkilfull men, when they here that consciences are wickedly bounde and God worshipped in vaine with the traditiōs of men, do at ones blott out altogether all lawes whereby the order of the Church is set in frame: therefore it is conuenient also to mete with their error: Verily in this point it is easy to be deceiued, because at the first sight it doth not by and by appeare what difference is betweene the one sort and the other. But I will so plainly in fewe wordes sett out the whole matter, that the likenesse may deceiue no man. First let vs holde this, that if we see in euery fellowship of men some policie to be necessarie, that may serue to nourish common peace and to reteine concorde: if we se that in the doing of things there is alway some orderly forme, which is behouefull for publike honestie and for very humanitie not to be refused: the same ought chiefly to be obserued in Churches, which are both best maintained by a well framed disposition of all things, & without agreement are no Churches at all. Therefore if we will haue the safetie of the Church well provided for, we must altogether diligently procure that which Paule commaundeth, that all things be done comelily and according to order. But forasmuch as there is so great diuerfitie in the maners of men, so great varietie in mindes, so great disagreement in iudgements and wittes: neither is there any policie stedfast enough, vnlesse it be stablished by certaine lawes, nor any orderly vsage can be obserued without a certaine appointed formes: Therefore we are so farre of from condemning the lawes that are profitable to this purpose, that we affirme that when those be taken away, Churches are dissolued from their sinewes, and vtterly deformed and scattered abrode. For this which Paule requireth, that all things be done decently and in order, can not be had, vnlesse the order it selfe and comelinesse be stablished, with obseruatiōs adioined as with certaine bondes. But this onely thing is alway to be excepted in those obseruatiōs, that they be not either beleued to be necessary to saluation, and so binde consciences with religion, or, be applied to the worshipping of God, and so godlinesse be reposed in them.

28 We haue therefore a very good and most faithfull marke, which putteth difference betwene those wicked ordinances, by which we haue sayed that true religion is darkened and consciences subuerted, and the lawfull obseruations of the Church: if we remember that the lawfull obseruations tende alway to one of these two things or to both together, that in the holy assembly of the faithfull all things be done comely and with such dignitie as becometh: and that the very common fellowship of men should be kept in order as it were by certaine bondes of humanitie and moderation. For when it is ones vnderstode that the lawe is made for publike honesties sake, the superstition is nowe taken away, into which they fall that measure the worshipping of God by the inuentiōs of men. Again when it is knowen that it pertaineth to cōmon vse, then that false opinion of bond and necessitie is ouerthrowen, which did strike a great terror into consciences, when traditions were thought necessarie to saluation. For herein is nothing required but that charitie should with common dutiefull doing be nourished among vs. But it is good yet to define more plainely, what is comprehended vnder that comelinesse which Paule commendeth, and also what vnder order. The ende of comelinesse is, partly that when such Ceremonies are vsed as may procure a reuerence to holy things, we may by such helpes be stirred vp to godlinesse: partly also that the modestie and grauitie which ought ought to be seen in all honest doings may therein principally appeare. In order, this is the first point, that they which gouerne may knowe the rule and lawe to rule well: and the people which are gouerned may be accustomed to obeying of God, and to right discipline: Then, that the state of the Church being well framed, peace & quietnesse may be provided for.

29 Therefore we shall not say that comelinesse is, wherein shalbe nothing but vaine delectation: such as we se in that playerlike apparell which the Papistes vse in their ceremonies, where appeareth nothing els but an vnprofitable visor of gainesse, and excesse without frute. But we shall accompt that to be comelinesse which shall so be mete for the reuerence of holy misteries, that it be a fitt exercise to godlinesse, or at least such as shall serue to conuenient garnishing for the celebrating thereof: and the same not without frute, but that it may put the faithfull in minde with howe great modestie, religiousnesse and reuerence, they ought to handle holy things. Nowe, that ceremonies may be exercises of godlinesse, it is necessarie that they leade vs the streight way to Christ. Likewise we may not say that order consisteth in those trifling pompes that haue nothing els than a vanishing gainesse: but that it standeth in such an orderly framing as may take away all confusion, barbarousnesse, obstinacie, and all strifes & dissentions. Of the first sort are these examples in Paul: that prophane banquettings should not be mingled with the holy Supper of the Lorde: that women should not come abrode, but couered: and many other which we haue in common vse: as this, that we pray kneeling and bare hedded: that we minister the Lordes Sacraments not vnclenly, but with some dignitie: that in the burying of the dead we vse some honest shewe: and other things that are of the same sort. Of the other kinde are the houres appointed for publike prayers, Sermons, and celebrations of misteries: at Sermons, quietnesse and silence, places appointed, singing together of Hymnes, dayes prefixed for celebrating of the Lordes Supper, that Paule forbiddeth that women should teach in the Church, and such like. But specially those things that concerne discipline, as the teaching of the Catechisme, the censures of the Church, excommunication, fastings, and such as may be reckened in the same number. So all the constitutions of the Church, which we receiue for holy and hollome, we may referre to two chiefe titles: for some pertaine to rites and ceremonies, and the other to discipline and peace.

30 But because here is perill, least on the one side the false bishops should thereby catch a pretense to excuse their wicked and tyránous

lawes, & least on the other side there be some men to fearfull; which admonished with the aforesaid euels do leaue no place to lawes be they neuer so holy: here it is good to protest, that I allowe onely those ordinances of men, which be both grounded vpon the authoritie of God, and taken out of the scripture, yea and altogether Gods owne. Let vs take for an example the kneeling which is vsed in time of common prayer. It is demanded, whether it be a tradition of man, which euery man may lawfully refuse or neglect. I say that it is so of men, that it is also of God. It is of God, in respect that it is a part of that comelineffe, the care and keping whereof is commended vnto vs by the Apostle: it is of men, in respect that it specially berokeneth that which had in generaltie rather bene pointed to, than declared. By this one example we may iudge, what is to be thought of that whole kinde: verily because the Lord hath in his holy Oracles both faithfully contained and clerely set foorth both the whole summe of true righteousnesse, and all the partes of the worshipping of his diuine maiestie, and whatsoever was necessarie to saluation; therefore in these things he is only to be heard as our scholemaster. But because in outward discipline and Ceremonies his will was not to prescribe ech thing particularly what we ought to followe (because he foresaw this to hang vpon the state of times, and did not thinke one forme to be fitt for all ages) herein we must flee to those generall rules which he hath geuen, that thereby all those things should be tried which the necessitie of the Church shall require to be commaunded for order and comelineffe. Finally, Forasmuch as he hath therefore taught nothing expressly, because these things both are not necessary to saluation, and according to the maners of euery nation and age ought diuersly to be applied to the edifying of the Church: therefore as the profit of the Church shall require, it shalbe conuenient as well to change and abrogate those that be vsed, as to institute newe. I graunt in deede, that we ought not rashly, nor oft, nor for light causes to runne to innouation. But what may hurt or edifie, charitie shall best iudge: which if we will suffer to be the gouerneffe, all shall be safe:

31 Nowe it is the dutie of Christian people, to kepe such things as haue bene ordeined according to this rule, with a free conscience and without any superstition, but yet with a godly and easy redinesse to obey, not to despise them, not to passe them ouer with carelesse negligence: so farre is it of, that they ought by pride and obstinacie openly to breake them. What maner of libertie of conscience (wilt thou say) may there be in so great obseruation and warenesse? Yea, it shall stande excellently well when we shall consider, that they are not stedfast and perpetuall stayed lawes, whereunto we be bounde, but outwarde rudements for the weakenesse of men: which although we do not all neede, yet we do all vse them, because we are mutually one bounde to an other, to nourish charitie among vs. This we may reknowledge in the examples aboue reherfed. What? Doth religion stande in a womans veile, that it is not lawefull to go out of dores with her hed vncouered? Is that holy decree of his cōcerning silence, such as can not be broken without most hainous offence? Is there any misterie in kneling, or in burying of a dead carcase, that may not be omitted without sinne? No. For if a woman neede, for the helping of her neighbor, to make such hast as may not suffer her to couer her hed, she offendeth not if she runne thether with her hed vncouered. And it may sometime befall that it may be no lesse conuenient for her to speake, than at an other time to holde her peace. And there is no cause to the contrary, but that he which by reason of disease can not bowe his knees may pray standing. Finally, it is better to burie a dead man speedely in time, than when they lacke a winding shete, or when there be not men present to conuey him, to tarry till he rot vnburied. But neuerthelesse in these things there is somewhat which the maner and ordinances of the contree, and finally very naturall honestie and the rule of modestie apointeth to be done or auoided: wherein if a man swarue any thing from them, by vnwarenesse, or forgetfulnesse, there is no crime committed: but if vpon contempt, such stubbornnesse is to be disallowed. Likewise the dayes themselves, which they be, and the houres, and howe the places be bilded, and what Psalmes be song vpon which day, it maketh no matter. But it is mete that there be both certaine dayes, and appointed houres, and a place fitt to receiue all, if there be regarde had of the preservation of peace. For howe greate an occasion of brawlings should the confusion of these things be, if it were lawfull for euery man, as he list, to change those things that belong to common state: forasmuch as it will neuer come to passe that one same thing shall please all men, if things be leste as it were in the middest to the choise of euery man? If any man do carpe against vs, and will herein be more wise than he ought, let him se himselfe by what reason he can defende his owne precisenesse to the Lorde. As for vs, this saying of Paule ought to satisfie vs, that we haue not an vse to contende, nor

32 Moreouer it is with great diligence to be endeouored, that no error crepe in, that may corrupt or obscure this pure vse. Which shalbe obtained, if all obseruations, whatsoeuer they shalbe, shall haue

a shewe of manifeste profit, and if very fewe be receiued, but principally if there be adioined a faithfull doctrine of the Pastor, that may stoppe vp the way to peuerse opiniōs. This knowledge maketh, that in all these things euery man may haue his owne libertie preserved, and neuertheless shall willingly charge his owne libertie with a certaine necessitie, so farre as either this comelinesse that we haue spoken of, or the order of Charitie shall require. Secondly, that both we our selues should without any superstition be busied in the obseruing of those things, and should not to precisely require them of other, so as we should think the worshipping of God to be the better for the multitude of Ceremonies: that one Church should not despise an other for the diuersitie of discipline: last of all that setting herein no perpetuall lawe to our selues, we should referre the whole vse and ende of obseruatiōs to the edification of the Church, that, when it requireth we may without any offense suffer not onely somewhat to be changed, but all the obseruations that were before in vse among vs, to be altered. For this age is a present experience, that certaine rites, which otherwise are not vngodly nor vncomely, may according to the fit occasion of y^e matter, be conveniently abrogate. For (such hath bene the blindenesse and ignorancē of the former times) Churches haue heretofore, with so corrupt opinion and with so stiffe affection, sticked in Ceremonies, that they can scarcely be sufficiently purged from monstrous superstitions, but that many Ceremonies must be taken away, which in olde time were paraduerture ordeined not without cause, and of themselues haue no notable vngodlinesse in them.

The xj. Chapter.

Of the iurisdiction of the Church, and the abuse thereof, such as is seen in the Papacie.

NOW remaineth the third part of the power of the Church, yea and the chiefe parte in a well ordered state, which we haue sayed to cōsiste in iurisdiction. The whole iurisdiction of the Church pertaineth to the discipline of maners, of which we shall entrate by and by. Forasmuch as no citie, or no towne can stande without Magistrat and policy: so the Church of God (as I haue already taught, but nowe I am compelled to repete it againe) needeth her certaine spirituall policie: but such as is vtterly seuered from the ciuile policie, and doth so nothing hinder or minish it, that it rather doth much helpe and further it. Therefore this power of iurisdiction shall in a summe be nothing els but an order framed for the preservation of spirituall policie. To this ende from the beginning were ordeined iudiciall orders in Churches, which might vse examinatio of maners, correct vices, & exercise the office of the keies. This order Paul speaketh of in the Epistle to the Corinthians, when he nameth gouernements. Againe to the Romaines, when he saith: let him that ruleth, rule in carefulnesse. For he speaketh not to the magistrats, (for at that time there were no Christiã magistrats) but to them that were ioined with the Pastors for the spirituall gouernement of the Church. Also in the Epistle to Timothee, he maketh two sortes of Elders: some, that labor in the word: other some, that do not vse the preaching of the word, and yet do rule well. By this later sort it is no dout that he meaneth them that were appointed to loke vnto maners; and to the whole vse of the keyes. For this power, of which we nowe speake, hangerth wholly vpon the keyes which Christ gaue to the Church, in the xvij. Chap. of Mathewe: where he commaundeth, that they shoulde be sharply admonished in the name of the whole Church, that haue despised priuate monitions: but if they go forward in their obstinacie, he teacheth that they should be put out of the fellowship of the faithfull. But these monitions and corrections can not be without knowledge of the cause: therefore there needeth both some iudgement and order. Wherefore vnlesse we will make void the promise of the keyes, and take vterly away excõmunication, solemne monitions, and all such things whatsoeuer they be we must nedes geue to the Church some iurisdiction. Let the readers marke that that place entreateth not of the generall authoritie of doctrine, as in the. xvj. Chapt. of Mathewe, and the. xxj. of Iohn: but that the power of the Sinagoge is for the time to come transferred to the flocke of Christ. Vntill that day the Iewes had their order of gouerning, which Christ stablisheth in his Church, and that with great penaltie, so much as concerneth the pure institution of it. For so it behoued, forasmuch as otherwise the iudgement of an vnnoble and vnregarded congregation might be despised of rash and proude men. And that it should not encomber the reders, that Christ doth in the same words expresse things somewhat differinge one from the other, it shalbe profitable to dissolue this dout. There be therefore two places, that speake of binding and loosing. The one is in the. xvj. Chapter of Mathewe, where Christ, after that he had promised that he would geue to Peter the keyes of the kingdome of heauen, immediately addeth, that whatsoeuer he shall binde or loose in earth, shalbe confirmed in heauen. In which wordes he meaneth none other thing, than he doth by other wordes in Iohn, when sending

Mat. 16. his disciples to preache, after that he had breathed vpon them he
 19. said: whose sinnes ye forgeue, they shalbe forgeuen: and whoes ye reteine, they shalbe reteined in heauen. I will bring an exposition not futtle, not enforced, not wrested: but naturall, flowing, and offring it selfe. This commaundement of forgeuing and reteining sinnes, and that promise of binding and loosing made to Peter, ought to be referred to no other thing but to the ministry of the word: which whē the Lorde committed to the Apostles, he did therewith also arme them with this office of binding and loosing. For what is the summe of the Gospell, but that we all being the bondseruantes of sinne and of death, are loosed & made free by the redemption that is in Christ Iesus: and that they which do not receiue nor acknowledge Christ their deliuerer and redemer, are damned & adiudged to euerlasting bondes? When the Lorde deliuered this message to his Apostles, to be carried into all nations: to approue that it was his owne and proceeding from himselfe, he honored it with this noble testimonie: and that to the singular strengthening both of the Apostles themselues, and of all those to whom it should come. It behoued that the Apostles shoulde haue a stedfast and sounde certaintie of their preaching, which they should not only execute with infinite labors, cares, troubles and dangers, but also at the last seale it with their blood.
 That they might (I say) knowe the same to be not vaine nor voide, but full of power and force: it behoued that in so great carefulnesse, in so great hardnesse of things, and in so great dangers, they should be perswaded that they did the businesse of God: that when all the world withstode them and fought against them, they should knowe that God stode on their side: that hauing not Christ the author of their doctrine present by sight in earth, they should vnderstande him to be in heauen, to confirme the trueth of the doctrine which he had deliuered them. It behoued againe that it should also be most cer-tainely proued by testimony to the hearers, that that doctrine of the Gospell was not the word of the Apostles, but of God himselfe: not a voice bred in earth, but come downe from heauen. For these things, the forgeuenesse of sinnes, the promise of euerlasting life, the message of saluation, can not be in the power of man. Therefore Christ hath testified, that in the preaching of the Gospell there is nothing of the Apostles, but the onely ministry: that it was he himselfe that spake and promised all things by their mouths as by instruments: and therefore that the forgeuenesse of sinnes which they preached, was the true promise of God: and the damnatiō which they pronounced, was the certaine iudgement of God. But this testifying is geuen to all ages,

ages, and remaineth in force, to certifie and assure all men, that the word of the Gospell, by what man soeuer it be preached, is the very sentence of God, published at the soueraigne iudgemēt seate, written in the booke of life, ratified, firme & fixed in heauen. Thus we see that in those places the power of the keys is nothing but the preaching of the Gospell: and that it is not so much a power as a ministry, if we haue respect to men. For Christ hath not geuen this power properly to men, but to his owne word, whereof he hath made men ministers.

2 The other place which we haue said to be, concerning the power of binding and loosing, is in the. xviii. chapter of Mathewe, where Christ saith: If any brother heare not the Church, let him be to thee as a heathē man or a publicane. Verily I say vnto you: whatsoever ye bind vpon earth, shalbe bound also in heauen: whatsoever ye loose shalbe loosed. This place is not altogether like the first, but is a litle otherwise to be vnderstanded. But I do not so make them diuerse, that they haue not great affinitie together. This first point is like in both, that either of them is a generall sentence: that in both there is alway all one power of binding and loosing, namely by the word of God, all one commaundement, all one promise. But herein they differ, that y first place peculiarly belongeth to preaching, which the Ministers of the worde do execute: this later place to the discipline of Excommunication, which is committed to the Church. The Church bindeth, whome she excōmunicateth: not that she throweth him into perpetuall ruine and desperation, but because she condemneth his life and maners, and vnlesse he repent, doth already warne him of his damnation. She looseth whom she receiueth into communion: because she doth make him as it were partaker of the vnitie which she hath in Christ Iesus. Therefore that no man should obstinately despise the iudgement of the Church, or little regarde that he is condemned by the consenting voices of the faithfull: the Lord testifieth that such iudgement of the faithfull is nothing els but a publishing of his owne sentence: and that whatsoever they do in earth, is cōfirmed in heauen. For they haue the word of God, whereby they may condemne the peruerse: they haue the word, whereby they may receiue the repentant into grace. And they can not erre, nor dissent from the iudgement of God: because they iudge not but after the lawe of God, which is not an vncertaine or earthly opinion, but the holy will of God, and a heauenly Oracle. Out of these two places, which I thinke I haue both brefely and familiarly and truly expounded, those furious men without difference as they be caried with their owne giddinesse, go about to stablish sometime cōfession, sometime excommunication, sometime iurisdiction, sometime the power to make lawes, sometime pardons. But the first place they allege to stablish the supremacie of the See of Rome: they can so well skill to fit their keyes to all lockes and doores, that a man may say they haue practised smithes craft all their life.

3 For whereas many thinke that those things endured but for a time, when the Magistrats were yet strangers from the profession of our religion: they are deceiued in this, that they consider not, howe great difference and what maner of vnlikenesse there is of the Ecclesiasticall and ciuile power. For the Church hath not the power of the swerd to punish or restrain, no empire to commaunde, no prison, no other pains which the Magistrat is wont to lay vpon men. Againe, it tendeth not to this end, that he that hath sinned should be punished against his will, but should with willing chastisement professe his repentance. Therefore there is a farre diuers order: because neither doth the Church take to it selfe any thing which properly belongeth to the Magistrat, nor the magistrat can execute that which the Church doth. This shalbe made plainer by an example. Is any man dronke? In a well ordered citie prison shalbe his punishment. Hath he committed fornication? He shall haue like, or rather greater punishment. So shall both the lawes, and the magistrat, and outward iudgement be satisfied. But it may be that he shall geue no signification of repentance, but rather murmure & grudge against it. Shall the Church in this case do nothing? But such can not be receiued to the Supper, without doing wrong both to Christ and his holy institution. And reason requireth this. that he which offendeth the Church with an euill example, should with solempne declaration of repentance take away the offence which he hath raised. The reason which they bring that are of contrary opinion, is to colde. Christ say they committed these doings to the Church, when there was no magistrat to execute them. But it happeneth oftentimes that the magistrat is more negligent, yea sometime peradventure that himselfe is to be chastised, which happened to the Emperor Theodosius. There may beside this asmuch be said of the ministerie of the word. Nowe therefore after their sentence, let Pastors cesse to blame manifest wicked doings, let them cesse to chide, to reprove, to rebuke: for there be Christian magistrates, which ought to correct these things with the lawes and with the swerd. But as the Magistrat ought by punishing, and by restraining with force, to purge the Church of offences: so likewise the minister of the word for his part ought to helpe the magistrat that there may not so many offende. So ought their workings to be conioined,

that the one may be a helpe, not a hindrance to the other.

4 And truly if a man more nerely wey the wordes of Christ, he shall easily perceiue that in these places, is described a stayed state, and a perpetuall order of the Church, not such as endureth but for a time. For is not mete that we should accuse them to the magistrat, that will not obey our monitions: which yet should be necessary if the magistrat succeded into the office of the Church. What is this promise? Shall we say that it is a promise of one or a fewe yeres? Verily verily I say vnto you, whatsoeuer ye bind in earth? Moreouer Christ did here institute no newe thing, but followed the custome alway obserued in the auncient Church of his owne nation: whereby he signified that the Church can not want the spirituall iurisdiction, which hadde bene from the beginning. And this hath bene confirmed by the consent of all times. For when Emperors and magistrats began to professe Christ, the spirituall iurisdiction was not by and by abolished: but onely so ordred, that it should diminish nothing of the ciuile iurisdiction, or be confounded with it. And rightfully. For the magistrat, if he be godly, will not exempt himselfe frō the common subiection of the children of God, whereof it is not the last part to submit himselfe to the Church, iudging by the word of God: so farre it is of, that he ought to take away that order of iudgement. For what is more honorable (saith Ambrose) for the Emperour, than to be called the sonne of the Church? For a good Emperour is within the Church, not aboue the Church, Therefore they, which to honor the Magistrat do spoile the Church of this power, do not onely with false exposition corrupt the sentence of Christ, but also do not scenderly condemne so many holy Bishops which haue bene from the time of the Apostles, that they haue by false pretence vsurped the honor and office of the Magistrat.

5 But on the other side it is good to see this, what was in olde time the true vse of the iurisdiction of the Church, and howe great abuse is crepte in, that we may knowe what is to be abrogate, and what is to be restored of antiquitie, if we will ouerthrowe the kingdome of Antichrist, and set vp the true kingdome of Christ againe. First this is the marke to be shotte at, that offences be preuented, and if any offence be risen vp, that it may be abolished. In the vse two things are to be considered: first, that this spirituall power be altogether seuered from the power of the swerd: then, that it be not executed by the will of one man, but by a lawfull assembly. Both these things were obserued in the purer Church. For the holy Bishops did not exercise their power with fines, or emprisonments, or other ciuile punishments: but they vsed the onely word of the Lorde, as they ought to do. For the seuerest reuenge, and as it were the vttermost thunderbolt of the Church is excommunication, which is not vsed but in necessitie. But this requireth neither force nor strong hande, but is cōtent with the power of the word of God. Finally the iurisdiction of the olde Church was nothing els but a declaration in practise (as I may so call it) of

2. Cor. 10. 4. that which Paul teacheth concerning the spirituall power of Pastors. There is (saith he) power geuen to vs, whereby we may throwe down strong holdes, wherby we may make low all height that listeth vp it selfe against the knowledge of God, whereby we may subdue all thought, and may leade it captiue into the obedience of Christ, and we haue in readinesse a reuenge against all disobedience. As this is done by the preaching of the doctrine of Christ: so, least the doctrine should be scorned, according to that which is taught ought they to be iudged which professe themselues of the houshold of faith. But that can not be done, vnlesse there be ioined with the ministerie a power to call them that are to be priuately admonished, or to be more sharply corrected, and also a power to exclude them from the communion of the Supper, which can not be receiued without prophaning of so great a misterie. Therefore when in an other place he saith, that it belongeth not to vs to iudge strāgers, he maketh the children subiect to the censures of the Church, which may chastise their faultes: and he secretly signifieth that there were then iudiciall orders in force from which none of the faithfull was free.

6 But such authority (as we haue declared) was not in the power of one man, to do euery thing according to his owne will: but in the power of the assemblie of the Elders, which was the same thing in the Church that a Senate is in a City. Cyprian, when he maketh mention by whom it was exercised in his time, vseth to ioine the whole Clergie with the bishop. But in an other place also he sheweth, that the very clergy so gouerned, that in the meane time the people was not excluded from the hearing of matters. For thus he writeth: Sins the beginning of my bishoprike I haue determined to do nothing without the counsell of the clergy and consent of the people. But this was the common and vsuall maner, that the iurisdiction of the Church should be exercised by a Senate of Elders: of whom (as I haue sayed) there were two sortes: For some were ordeined to teaching, & other some were onely iudges of maners. By little and little this institution grewe out of kinde from the first beginning of it: so that euen in the time of Ambrose onely clerkes were iudges in ecclesiasticall iudgements. Which thing he himselfe complaineth of in these these wordes: The olde Sinagoge (saith he) and sins that time the Church hath had Elders, without whoes counsell nothing was done. Which by what negligence it is growen out of vse, I knowe not, vnlesse peradventure by the slouthfulnesse or rather the pride of the teachers, while they alone would be thought to be somewhat. We see howe much the holy man is displeas'd, that any thing of the better state is decayed, when notwithstanding they had yet continuing an order that was at the least tolerable. What then would he do if he sawe these deformed ruines that shewe almost no signe of the olde bilding? What bewayling would he vse? First against lawe and right, the Bishop hath claimed to himselfe alone, that which was geuen to the whole Church. For it is like as if the Consul, driuing out the Senate, should take the empire vpon himselfe alone. But as he is about the rest in honor, so in the whole assemblie is more authoritie than in one man. Therefore it was to wicked a deede, that one man, removing the cōmon power to himselfe, hath both opened an entrie to tyrannous lust; and hath taken from the Church that which belonged vnto her, and hath suppressed and put away the assemblie ordeined by the Spirit of Christ.

7 But (as of one euill alway groweth an other) Bishops disdain-ing it as a thing vnworthie of their care, haue committed it ouer to other. Hereupon are created Officials to serue that roome: I do not yet speake what kind of men they be, but onely this I say, that they nothing differ from prophane Iudges. And yet they still call it a spirituall iurisdiction, where men contende about nothing but earthly matters. Although there were no more euell, with what face dare they call a brawling court the iudgement of the Church? But there are monitions, there is excommunication. So verily they mocke with God. Doth a poore man owe a little money? he is cited: if he appeare, he is condemned. When he is condemned, if he do not satisfie it, he is monished: after the seconde monition they procede one steppe toward excommunicatiō: if he appeare not, he is monished to come & yeld himselfe to iudgement: if he then make delay, he is monished, and by andby excommunicate. I besech you, what is there any thing like either to the institution of Christ, or to the auncient maner, or to an Ecclesiasticall order? But there is also correction of vices. But howe? verily they not onely suffer but with secret allowance do after a certaine maner cherish and confirme adulteries, wantonnesse, drunkennesse and such kinde of mischeuous doinges: and that not onely in the cōmon people, but also in the clergie themselues. Of many they call a fewe before them, either that they should not seeme slouthfull in winking at them, or that they may milke out some money. I speake not of the pillages, robberies, briberies, & sacrileges that are gathered thereby, I speake not what maner of men are for the most parte chosen to this office. This is enough and too much, that when the Romanistes do boast that their iurisdiction is spirituall, it is easie to shewe that there is nothinge more contrary to the order institute of Christ, and that it hath no more likenesse to the auncient custome than darkenesse hath to light.

8 Although we haue not spoken all things that might be alleaged for this purpose, and those things that we haue spoken of are knit vp in fewe wordes: yet I trust that we haue so fought it out, that there is nowe no more cause why any man should dout, that the spirituall power whereof the Pope with all his kingdome proudly glorieth, is wicked against God, and an vniust tyranny ouer his people. Vnder the name of spirituall power I comprehend both boldenesse in framing new doctrines, wherewith they haue turned away y^e sily people from the naturall purenesse of the word of God, and the wicked traditions wherewith they haue snared them, and also the false ecclesiasticall iurisdiction which they execute by Suffraganes and Officials. For if we graunt vnto Christ a kingdome among vs, it is not possible but that all this kind of dominion must immediatly be ouerthrowen and fall downe. As for the power of the swerd which they also geue to them selues, because it is not exercised vpon consciences, it pertaineth not to our present purpose to entreate of it. In which behalfe yet it is also to note, that they be alway like theselues, verily nothing lesse than that which they would be taken for, that is to say, Pastours of the Church, Neither do I blame y^e peculiar faults of men, but the common wickednesse of the whole order, yea the very pestilence of the order: forasmuch as it is thought that the same should be maimed, vnlesse it be gloriously set forth with wealth and proude titles. If we require the authoritie of Christ concerning this matter, it is no dout but that his minde was to debarre the ministers of his worde from ciuile dominion and earthly gouernement, when he sayd, The kings of the Gentiles beare rule ouer them: but you shall not so. For he signifieth not onely that the office of Pastor is distinct from the office of a Prince, but that they be things so seuered, that they can not mete together in one man. For wheras Moses did beare both the offices together: First, that was done by a rare miracle: againe, it was but for a time till things were better sett in order. But when a certaine forme was ones prescribed of God, the ciuile gouernement was left vnto him, and he was commaunded to resigne the priesthode to his brother.

brother. And worthily. For it is about nature, that one man should suffice to beare both burdens. And this hath in all ages bene diligently obserued in the Church. And there was neuer any of the Bishops, so long as the true forme of the Church endured, that ones thought of vsurping the power of the swerd: so that this was a common pro-uerbe in the time of Ambrose, that Emperors rather coueted the priesthode, than priests the empire. For this which he afterward saith, was emprinted in the mindes of all men: that palaces pertained to the Emperor, and Churches to the priest.

9 But sins that a way hath bene deuised, whereby bishops might holde the title, honor and riches of their office without burden or care: least they should be lefte altogether idle, y power of the swerde was geuen them, or rather they did by vsurpation take it vpon themselves. By what color will they defend this shamelesnesse? Was this the dutie of bishops to wrappe themselves with iudiciall hearing of causes, with the gouernements of cities and prouinces, and through large circuites to meddle in businesse so vnperntaining to them: which haue so much worke and businesse in their owne office, that if they were wholly and continually occupied in it, and were withdrawn with no callings away from it, yet they were scarcely able to satisfie it? But (such is their waiwardnesse) they sticke not to boast, that by this meane the Church doth flourish according to her worthinesse, and that they themselves in the meane time are not to much drawen away from the duties of their vocation. As touching the first point: if this be a comely ornament of the holy office; that they be aduanced to such heighth, that the hiest monarches may stand in feare of them: then they haue cause to quarell with Christ, which hath in such sort greuously pinched their honor. For, at lest in their opinion, what could haue bene spoken more dishonorably than these words: The kings of the Gentiles and princes beare rule ouer them, but you shall not so? And yet he laid no harder lawe vpon his seruantes than he first laid and receiued vpon himselfe. Who (saith he) hath made me a iudge or diuider among you? We see that he plainly putteth away from himselfe the office of iudging, which he would not do if it were a thing agreing with his office: will not the seruantes suffer themselves to be brought into that order, whereunto the Lorde hath yelded himselfe subiect? As for the other pointe, I would to God they could so proue it in experience as it is easy to speake it. But forasmuch as the Apostles thought it not good, to leaue the worde of God and minister at tables: thereby, because they will not be taught, they are conuincd, that it is not all one mans worke to be both a good this is not only fabulous, but also to be laughed at. But to passe ouer histories, Gregory himselfe is both a sufficient and most full witnessse hereof. For so oft as he speaketh of y^e Emperour, he calleth him most noble Lord, and himselfe his vnworthy seruant. Againe in an other place: But let not our Lord by the earthly power be the sooner angry with the priestes: but with excellent consideration, for his sake whose seruantes they be, let him so rule ouer them, that he also giue them due reuerence. We see how in common subiection he would be accounted as one of the people. For he there pleadeth not any other mans cause, but his owne. In an other place, I trust in the almighty God, that he will giue a longe life to our godly Lordes, and will dispose vs vnder your hande accordinge to his mercy. Neither haue I therefore alleaged these thinges, for that it is my purpose throughly to discusse this question concerning the gift of Constantine: but only that the Readers should see by the way how childishly the Romanistes do lye, when they go about to chalenge an earthly Empire to their Bishop. And to much the more fowle is the shamelesnesse of Augustine Steuchus, w^h in such a despeired cause hath bin so bolde to sell his trauaile and tongue to the bishoppe of Rome. Valla (as it was not hard for a man learned and of a sharp wit) had strongly confuted that fable. And yet (as a mā litle exercised in ecclesiastical matters) he had not sayd all that might haue made for that purpose. Steuchus burst in, and scattered stinking trifles to oppresse the cleare light. And true-ly he doth no lesse coldly hādle the cause of his maister, than if some mery conceited fellow faining himselfe to do the same, would in dede take Vallas parte. But verily it is a worthy cause, for which the Pope should hyre such patrones for money: and no lesse worthy are those hyred losells to be deceiued of their hope of gayne, as it happened to Eugubinus.

13 But if any man require to know the time, since this fained Empire began to rise vp, there are not yet passed five hūdred yeres, since the bishoppes yet remained in subiection of the Princes, neither was the Pope created without the authority of the Emperour. The Em-perour Henry the fourth of that name, a light & rash man, and of no forcast, of great boldnes & dissolute life, gaue first occasiō to Gregory the seuenth to alter this order. For when he had in his court the bishopricks of al Germany partly to be sold, & partly laid opē for spoiles: Hildebrand, which had receiued displeasure at his hand, caught hold of a goodly colour to reuenge himselfe. But because he seemed to pursue an honest and a godly cause, he was furthered with the fauour of many. And Henry was otherwise, by reason of his insolent maner of gouerning, hated of the most part of Princes. At the length Hildebrand, which called himself Gregory the seuenth, as he was a filthy & naughty man, bewrayed the malice of his hart: which was the cause that he was forsaken of many that hadde conspired with him. But he thus much preuailed, that his successours might freely without punishment not onely shake of the yoke, but also bringe Emperours in subiection to them. Hereunto was added that from these forth there were many Emperours liker to Henry than to Iulius Cesar: whome it was no hard thing to subdue, while they sate at home carelesse of all things and slouthfull, when they had most nede with vertue and lawfull meanes to repressse, the gredinesse of the bishoppes. Thus we see with what colour that same goodly gift of Constantine is shadowed, whereby the Pope faineth that the Empire of the West was deliuered vnto him.

14 In the meane time the Popes cessed not, somtime with fraude, somtime with treason, and somtime with force to inuade other mens dominions: and the very city it selfe, which before was free, within a hundred and thirty yeares, or there about they brought into their subiection: till they grew to the same power which they haue at this day: and for the obtaining or encreasing whereof, they haue so troubled Christendome by the space of two hundred yeares (for they beganne before that they tooke to them the dominion of the city) that they haue almost destroyed it. In the olde time when vnder Gregorie the keepers of the goodes of the Church, did take possession of the landes which they reckned to belong to the Church, & after the manner of leasing to the vse of the Prince did set titles vpon them for token of claime, Gregory assembling a Councell of bishops, inueyinge sore against that prophane maner, asked whether they did not iudge that Clerke accursed which did of his owne wil by writing of any title attempt to enter vpon any possession They all pronounced, accursed. If to claime a peece of ground by writing of a title be in a Clerke an offense worthy of accursing: when whole two hundred yeares together Popes do practise nothing else but battells, shedding of blood, destructions of armies, sackings of some cities, racing of other, ouerthrowes of nations, wastings of kingdomes, onely that they might catch hold of other mens possessions: what curtings can be enough to punish such examples. Truly it is very plaine that they seeke nothinge lesse than the glory of Christ. For if they of their owne will do wholly resigne all the secular power that they haue, therein is no daunger to the glory of God, no daunger to sounde doctrine, no daunger to the safety of the Church: but they are caried blinde and headlong with only greedinesse of dominion : because they thinke nothinge safe , vnlesse Eze. 34. they may beare rule with rigorousnesse (as the Prophet saith) & with 4. power.

15 To iurisdiction is annexed immunity, which the Romish Clergy tooke to themselues. For they thinke it against their dignity, if they aunswere in personall causes before a temporall iudge: and therein they thinke both the liberty and dignity of the Church to consist, if they be exempt from common iudgements and lawes. But the olde bishops, which otherwise were most rigorous in defending the right of the Church, iudged themselues & their order to be nothing hurt, if they were subiect to the. And the godly Emperours, without gaine-sayinge of any man, did alway call Clerkes to their iudgement seates so oft as neede required. For thus sayth Constantine in his Epistle to the Nicomedians: If any of the bishops shall vndiscretly disorder him selfe, his boldnesse shalbe restrained by the execution of the minister of God, that is by my execution. And Valentiniã sayth: good bishops do not speake against the power of the Emperour, but do sincerely both kepe the commaundementes of God the great kinge, and also obey our lawes. At that time all men were perswaded of this without controuersie. But Ecclesiastical causes were referred to the iudge-ment of the Bishop. As if any Clerke had offended nothinge against the lawes: but onely was accused by the Canons: he was not cited to the cõmon iudgemēt seate, but in y cause had y bishop for his iudge.
 Likewise if there were a question of Faith in controuersie, or such a matter as properly pertained to the Church, the iudgement thereof was committed to the Church. So is that to be vnderstanded, which Epist. 31. Ambrose wryteth to Valentinian: Your father of honorable memory, not onely aunswered in word, but also decreed by lawes, that in a cause of Faith he ought to be iudge that is neither vnfit in office nor vnlike in right. Againe: If we haue regard to the Scriptures or olde exāples, who is there that can deny that in a cause of Faith, in a cause (I say) of Faith, bishops are wont to iudge of Christian Emperours, and not Emperours of bishops? Againe: I would haue come, O Em-perour, to your consistory, if either the bishops or the people would haue suffred me to go: saying, that the cause of Faith ought to be debated in the Church before the people. He affirmeth verily that a spirituall cause, that is to say the cause of religiõ, ought not to be drawen into the temporall courte where prophane causes are pleaded.
 Homel. Worthily do all men praise his cõstance in this behalfe. And yet in a de basi. good cause he proceedeth but thus farre, that if it come to violence ic. trad. and strong hand, he sayth that he will giue place. Willingly (sayth he)

I will not forsake the place committed vnto me : but when I am enforced, I know not how to resist: for our armour are prayers & tears. Let vs note the singular modesty and wisdom of the holy man , ioyned with stoutnesse of courage and boldnesse. Iustina the Emperours mother, because she coulde not draw him to the Arrians side, practised to driue him frō the gouernment of the Church. And so should it haue come to passe, if he had come when he was called to the palace to pleade his cause. Therefore he denieth the Emperour to be a competent iudge of so great a controuersie. Which maner of doinge both the necessity of that time, and the continuall nature of the matter required. For he iudged that he ought rather to die, than that such an example should by his consent be giuen to posterity: & yet if violence be offered, he thinketh not of resistance. For he denieth it to be bishoplike, to defend the Faith & right of the Church with armes.
But in other causes he sheweth himselfe ready to do whatsoeuer the Emperour shall commaunde him. If he demaunde tribute, (sayth he) we denie it not: the landes of the Church do pay tribute. If he aske landes, he hath power to claime them, none of vs resisteth. After the same manner also speaketh Gregory . I am not ignorant (sayth he) of the minde of our most noble soueraigne Lorde, that he vseth not to entermeddle in causes pertaininge to Priestes, least he shoulde in any thinge be burdened with our sinnes. He doth not generally exclude the Emperour from iudging of Priestes: but he sayth that there be certaine causes, which he ought to leaue to the iudgement of the Church.

16 And by this very exception the holy men sought nothing else, but that Princes lesse zealous of religion shoulde not with tyrannous violence and wilfulnes interrupt the Church in doing her office. For neither did they disallow, if Princes sometime did vse their authority in Ecclesiasticall matters , so that it were done to preserue the order of the Church, not to trouble it, to stablishe discipline, not to dissolue it. For sith the Church hath not the power of compellinge, nor ought to require it (I speake of ciuile constraininge:) it is the office of Godly kinges & Princes to maintaine religion with lawes, proclamations, and iudicial proceedings. After this maner, when the Emperour Maurice had commaunded certaine bishops that they should receiue their felow Bishops that were their neighbours and driuen out by the barbarous nations: Gregory confirmeth that commaundement, and exhorteth them to obeye it . And when he himselfe is admonished by the same Emperour to come to atonement with Iohn the bishop of Constantinople, he doth in deede render a reason why he ought not

The xij. Chapter.

Of the discipline of the Church, v whereof the chiefe vse is in the censures and excommunication.

THe discipline of the Church, the entreating wherof we haue differed vnto this place, is briefly to be declared, that we may at length passe ouer to the rest. But that same for the most parte hangeth vpon the power of the keyes and spirituall iurisdiction. That this may be the more easily vnderstode, let vs diuide the Church into two principall degrees, that is to say the Clergy, and the people. Clerkes I call by the vsuall name those that execute publike ministry in the Church. First we will speake of common discipline, to which all ought to be subiect: then we will come to the Clergie, which beside that common discipline, haue a seuerall discipline by themselues. But because many for hatred of discipline do abhorre the very name thereof, let them heare this? If no felowship, yea no house though it haue but a small householde, can be kept in right state without discipline, the same is much more necessary in y^e church, whose state ought to be most orderly of all. Therefore as the doctrine of Christ which bringeth saluation is the soule of the Church, so discipline is in steede of sinewes therein: whereby it is brought to passe, that the members of the body hang together euery one in his fit place. Wherefore whosoever do either desire to haue discipline taken away, or hinder the restoringe thereof, whither they do it of set purpose or by vnadvisednesse, verily they seeke the extreme dissipatiō of the Church. For what shall betide, if what is lustfull be lawfull to euery man? But so would it be, if there were not with the preachinge of doctrine adioyned priuate admonishments, corrections, & such other helps which sustaine doctrine & suffer it not to be idle. Discipline therefore is as it were a bridle wherewith they may be holden backe and tamed which coltishly resist against Christ: or as it were a pricke, wherewith they that are not willing enough may be stirred vp: and sometime, as a fatherly rod, wherewith they which haue more greuously fallē may be chastised mercifully & according to the milde-nesse of the Spirit of Christ. Sith therefore we do nowe see at hande certaine beginninges of a horrible wastnesse in the Church, because there

there is no care nor order to keepe the people in awe, very necessary crieth out that there is nede of remedy. But this is the only remedy, which both Christ hath commaunded, & hath alway bin vsed amög the godly.

2 The first fundation of discipline is, that priuate monitions should haue place: that is to say, that if any man of his owne accorde do not his duety, if he behaue himselfe licentiously, or liue not honestly, or haue committed any thing worthy of blame, he should suffer himselfe to be admonished: and that euery man shoulde study to admonish his brother when occasiõ shal require. But specially let the Pastors and Priestes be watchfull to do this, whose office is not only to preach to the people, but in euery house to admonish and exhort if at any time they do not sufficiently preuaile by generall doctrine: as Paule teacheth, when he rehearseth that he taught priuately and in houses, and protesteth that he is cleane from the blood of all men, Act 20.
20. & 26 because he hath not ceassed with teares day & night to admonishe euery one. For doctrine doth then obtaine force and authority when the minister not only doth declare to al togethier what their duety is to Christ, but also hath power and order to require the keping thereof of them whom he marketh to be either not obedient to doctrine, or slothfull. If any man do either stubbornly refuse, or in going forward in his faultes, do despise such admonishments: when he hath bin the second time admonished with witnesses called to it, Christ commaundeth them to be called to the iudgement of the Church, which is the assembly of Elders: and that there they shoulde be more greuoussly admonished as it were by publike authority, that if he reuerence the Church he may submit himselfe & obey. But if he be not hereby subdued, but do continue in his wickednes, then he commaundeth him, as a despiser of the Church, to be put away from the felowship of the faithfull. Matt 18
15. & 17

3 But because he speaketh here onely of secreete faultes, we must make this diuision: that some sinnes be priuate, and some publike or openly manifest. Of the first sorte Christ sayth to euery priuate man, Reproue him betwene thee and him alone. Of manifest sinnes Paule Mat. 18.
15. sayeth to Timothee, Reproue him before all men, that the rest may 1. Tim. 5
22. haue feare. For Christ had said before, If thy brother haue offended against thee. Which words, (against thee) vnlesse thou wilt be contentious, thou canst not otherwise vnderstande than vnder thine owne secreete knowledge, so that there be no moe priuie to it. But the same thing which the Apostle teacheth Timothee concerning the rebuking of them openly that sinne openly, he himselfe folowed in Peter:

Gala. 2. For when Peter sinned euen to publike offence, he did not admonish
4. him apart by himselfe, but brought him forth into the sight of the Church. Therefore this shalbe the right order of doing, if in secrete faultes we go forward accordinge to those degrees that Christ hath set: but in manifest faultes, we immediatly proceede to the Churches solemne rebuking, if the offense be publike.

4 Let this also be an other distinction: that of sinnes some be defaultes, other some be wicked doinges, or hainous offences. To the correcting of this later sort, not only admonishment or rebuking is to be vsed, but also a seuerer remedy: as Paule sheweth which not onely
1. Cor. 5 chastised with wordes the Corinthian that had committed incest, but
4. also punished him with excommunication, so soone as he was certified of his wicked deede. Now therefore we beginne better to see how the spirituall iurisdiction of the Church, which punisheth sinnes accordinge to the word of the Lord, is the best maintenance of health, & fundation of order, & bonde of vnity. Therefore whē the Church doth banishe out of her cōpany manifest adulterers, whoremongers, theeues, robbers, seditious persons, periured men, false witnesses, and such other, againe, obstinate men, which beinge orderly admonished euen of small faultes do scorne God & his iudgement: she taketh no-thinge vpon her selfe without reason, but executeth the iurisdiction giuen her of the Lorde. Moreouer, that none shoulde despise such iudgemēt of the Church, or lightly regard that he is condemned by the consenting voices of the faithfull: the Lord hath testified, that the
Mat. 16 same is nothinge else but a pronouncing of his owne sentence, & that
9. & 18 whatsoeuer they do in earth is confirmed in heauen. For they haue 18. the word of the Lord, wherby they may condemne the froward: they
1oh. 20. haue the word, wherby they may receiue the repentant into fauour,
23. They I say that trust that without this bonde of discipline Churches may long stande, are deceiued in opinion: vnlesse perhappes we may want that helpe which the Lord foresaw that it shoulde be necessary for vs. And truely how great is the necessity therof, shalbe better perceiued by the manifold vse of it.

5 There be three endes which the Church hath respect vnto in such corrections and excommunication. The first is, that they shoulde not, to the dishonor of God, be named amonge Christians, that leade a filthy & sinful life, as though his holy Church were a conspiracy of
1. phe. 5. naughty and wicked men. For sith the Church is the body of Christ,
25. it can not be defiled with such filthy & rotten members, but that some shame must come to y head. Therefore that there should not be any such thing in the Church, wherby his holy name may be spotted with Colo. 1. any

any reproch, they are to be driue out of her household, by whose dishonesty any sclaunder might redounde to the name of Christians. And herein also is consideratiō to be had of the Supper of the Lord, that it be not profaned with giuinge it to all without choise. For it is most true, that he to whom the distribution of it is committed, if he wittingly & willingly admit an vnworthy man whom he might lawfully put backe, is as guilty of Sacrilege, as if he did giue abroade the Lords body to dogges. Wherefore Chrysofome greuously inueyeth against the Priestes, which while they feare the power of great men, dare debarre no man. The blood (sayth he) shalbe required at your handes. If ye feare man, he shall laugh you to scorne: but if ye feare God, ye shalbe reuerenced also among men. Let vs not feare maces, nor purple, nor crownes: we haue here a greater power. I verily will rather deliuer mine owne body to death, and suffer my blood to be shed, than I will be made partaker of this defilinge. Therefore least this most holy mystery be spotted with sclaunder, in the distributinge thereof choise is greatly requisite: which yet cā not be had but by the iurisdiction of the Church. The second ende is, least (as it is wont to come to passe) with the continuall company of the euill, the good should be corrupted. For (such is our redy inclination to go out of the way) there is nothing easier than for vs to be ledde by euill examples from the right course of life. This vse the Apostle touched, when he cōmaunded the Corinthians to put the incestuous man out of their company. A litle leuen (saith he) corrupteth the whole lumpe of doae. And he foresawe herein so great daunger, that he forbade him euen from all felowship. If any brother (sayth he) among you be named either a whoremonger, or a couetous man, or a worshipper of Idoles, or a dronkarde, or an euill speaker, with such a one I graunt you not leaue so much as to eate. The thirde ende is, that they themselues confounded with shame may beginne to repent of their filthinesse. So it is profitable for them also, to haue their owne wickednes chastised, that with feeling of the rod they may be awaked, which otherwise by tender bearing with thē would haue become more obstinate. The same thing doth the Apostle meane whē he saith thus: If any do not obey our doctrine, marke him, and kepe no company with him, that he may be ashamed. Againe in an other place, when he writeth that he hath deliuered the Corinthian to Sathan, that his Spirite might be saued in the day of the Lord: that is (as I expound it) that he went into a damnation for a time, that he might be saued for euer. But he therefore sayth that he deliuereth him to Sathan, because the deuill is out of the Church, as Christ is in the Church. For whereas some do referre it to a certaine vexinge of the flesh, I thinke that to be very vncertaine.

6 When these endes be set foorth, now it remaineth to see how the Church executeth this part of discipline which consisteth in iurisdiction. First let vs kepe the diuision aboue set, that of sinnes some be publike, and other some be priuate or more secrete. Publike are those that haue not only one or two witnesses, but are committed openly & with the offense of the whole Church. Secret I call those, not which are altogether hidden from men, as are the sinnes of Hypocrites, for those come not into the iudgemēt of the Church, but those of the meane kinde which are not without witnesses, and yet are not publike. The first kinde requireth not those degrees which Christ re-hearseth: but when any such thing appeareth, the Church ought to do her duty in calling the sinner & correcting him according to the proportion of the offense. In the seconde kinde according to the rule of Christ, they come not to the Church till there be also obstinacy added. When it is once come to knowledge, then is that other diuision to be noted betwene wicked doinges and defaultes. For in lighter sinnes there is not to be vsed so great seuerity, but chastisement of words sufficeth, & the same gentle & fatherly, which may not harden nor confound the sinner, but bring him home to himselfe, that he may more reioyce thā be sory that he was corrected. But it is mete that hainous offenses be chastised with sharper remedy. For it is not enough, if he that by doing wicked dede of euill example hath greuouly offended the Church, should be chastised only with words, but he ought for a time to be deprived of the communion of the Supper, til he haue giuen assurance of his repentance. For against the Corinthian Paule vs-

The old and better Church kept this order, when rightfull gouernment florished. For if any man had done any wicked dede whereupon was growen offense, first he was commaunded to abstaine from partaking of the holy Supper, then both to humble himselfe before God, & to re-

 & 26. stitifie his repentance before the Church. There were also certaine solemne vsages, which were enioyned to them that had fallen, to be tokens of their repentance. When they had so done, that the Church was satisfied, thē by laying on of hands he was receiued into fauour. Which receiuing is oftētimes called of Ciprian peace, who also briefly describeth this vsage. They do penance (sayth he) in a certaine full time: then they come to confession, & by the laying on of handes of the bishop & the Clergy they receiue power to come to the communion.

nion. Howbeit the bishop & his clergy had so the ruling of reconciliation, that they did therewithall require the consent of the people: as he sheweth in an other place.

7 From this discipline there was no man exempted, that euen the Princes together with the common people did submit themselues to beare it. And rightfully, sith it was euident that it was the discipline of Christ, to whom it is mete that all scepters and crownes of kinges be submitted. So when Theodosius was deprived by Ambrose of power to come to the communion because of the slaughter committed at Thessalonica, he threw downe all the royall ornament wherewith he was clothed: he openly in the Church bewailed his sinne, which had crept vpon him by fraude of other men: he craued pardon with groning & teares. For great kings ought not to thinke this to be any dishonor to them, if they humbly throw downe theselues before Christ the king of kings, neither ought it to displease the that they be iudged by the Church. For sith in their court they heare nothinge else but mere flatteries, it is more than necessary for the to be rebuked of the Lorde by the mouth of the Priestes. But rather they ought to wish, that the Priestes should not spare them, that the Lord may spare the. In this place I omit to speake, by whom this iurisdiction is to be exercised, because it is spoken of in an other place. This onely I adde that that is the lawful maner of proceeding in excommunicatinge a man, which Paul sheweth: if the Elders do it not alone by themselues, but with the Church knowing and allowing it: that is, in such sort that the multitude of the people may not gouerne the doinge, but may marke it as a witnes & a keeper that nothing should be done of a few by wilfull affection. But the whole maner of doing, beside the calling vpon the name of God, ought to haue such grauity, as may resemble the presence of Christ: that it may be vndouted that he there sitteth for ruler of his owne iudgement.

8 But this ought not to be passed ouer, that such seuerity becometh the Church as is ioined with y Spirit of mildenes. For we must alway diligently beware (as Paul teacheth) that he which is punished be not swallowed vp of sorrowe: for so shoulde of a remedy be made a destruction. But out of the end may better be gathered a rule of moderation. For whereas this is required in excommunication that the sinner should be brought to repentance, & euill examples takē away, least either the name of Christ should be euill spokē of, or other men be prouoked to folow them: if we shall haue an eie to these things, we shalbe able easily to iudge how far seuerity ought to procede & where it ought to end. Therefore when the sinner giueth a testimony of his repentāce, & doth by his testimony, as much as in him lieth, blot out the offense: he is not to be enforced any further: but if he be enforced, rigorousnesse doth then exceede measure. In which behalfe the immeasurable seuerity of the olde fathers can not be excused, which both disagreed from the prescribed order of the Lord, and also was maruelously dangerous. For whē they charged a sinner with solemne penance, & depriuation frō the holy communion sometime for seuen yeres, sometime foure yeres, sometime three yeres, sometime for their whole life: what other thing could folow thereof but either great hypocrisie or most great desperation? Likewise wheras no man that had fallen the seconde time was admitted to seconde penance but was cast out of the Church euen to the end of his life: that was neither profitable nor agreeing to reason. Therefore whosoever shal wey the matter with sound iudgement, shall herein perceiue want of their discretion. Howbeit I do here rather disallow the publike maner, thā accuse all them that vsed it, whereas it is certaine that many of thē misliked it: but they did therefore suffer it, because they coulde not amend it. Truely Ciprian declareth, how much beside his owne will he was so rigorous. Our pacience (sayth he) and easines and gentlenes is redy to thē that come. I wish all to returne into the Church: I wish all our felowsoldiars to be enclosed within the tentes of Christ and in the houses of God y father. I forgiue al things, I dissemble many thinges: for zeale and desire to gather brotherhoode together, I examine not with full iudgement those things that are committed against God: in pardoninge defaultes more than I ought, I am my selfe almost in default: I do with ready and full loue embrace them that returne with repentance, cōfessing their sinnes with humble & plaine satisfaction. Chrysofome is somewhat harder, and yet he sayth thus: If God be so kinde, why wil his Priest seme so rigorous? Moreouer we know what gentlenesse Augustine vsed toward the Donatistes, insomuch that he sticked not to receiue into bishoprike those that had returned from schisme, euen immediatly after their repentance. But because a contrary order had growen in force, they were compelled to leaue their owne iudgement to folow it.

9 But as this mildnes is required in the whole body of the church, that it thoulde punishe them that are fallen, mercifully & not to the extremity of rigor, but rather according to the precept of Paul, should confirme charity toward thē: so euery priuate man for himselfe ought to temper himselfe to this mercifulnesse & gentlenes. Therefore it is not our part to wipe out of the number of the elect such as are driuen out of the Church, or to despeire of them as though they were already dy lost. We may in dede iudge them straungers from the Church, & therefore strangers from Christ: but that is only during the time that they abide in diuorce. But if then also they shewe a greater resemblance of stubbornnes than of gentlenes, yet let vs commit them to the iudgement of the Lord, hopinge better of them in time to come than we see in time present, and let vs not therefore cease to pray to God for them, & (to comprehend all in one worde) let vs not condemne to death the person it selfe, which is in the hand & iudgemēt of God alone, but let vs rather weie by the law of the Lord of what sort euery mans workes be. Which rule while we folowe, we rather stand to the iudgemēt of God than pronounce our owne. Let vs not take to our selues more liberty in iudging, vnlesse we will binde the power of God within boundes, & appoint a law to his mercy, at whose pleasure when he thinketh it good, very euill mē are turned into very good, straungers are grafted & foreins are chosen into the church. And this the Lord doth, thereby to mocke out the opinion of men, & rebate their rashnesse: which if it be not restrained, presumeth to take to it selfe power of iudging more than it ought.

10 For where as Christ promiseth that that shalbe bound in heauen, which they that be his shall binde in earth, he limiteth the power of bindinge, to the Censure of the Church: by which they that are excommunicate are not throwen into euerlastinge ruine & damnation: but hearing their liues & maners to be condemned, they are also certified of their owne euerlastinge condemnation, vnlesse they repent. For excommunication herein differeth from accursing, that accursing taking away al pardon doth condemne a man and adiudge him to eternall destruction: excommunication rather reuengeth and punisheth maners. And though the same do also punish the man, yet it doth so punish him, that in forewarning him of his damnation to come, it doth call him backe to saluation. If that be obtayned, reconciliation and restoringe to the communion is ready. But accursing is either very seldome or neuer in vse. Therefore although ecclesiasticall discipline, permitteth not to liue familiarly, or to haue frédly conuersation with them that be excommunicate: yet we ought to endeuour by such meanes as we may, that returninge to amendement, they may returne to the feloship & vnity of the Church: as the Apostle also teacheth. Do not (saith he) thinke them as enemies, but correct them as brethren. Vnlesse this gentlenes be kept as well priuately as in common, there is daunger least from discipline we forthwith fall to butchery.

which Augustine entreateth of in disputinge against the Donatistes: that neither priuate me, if they see faults not diligently enough corrected by the Councell of Elders, should therefore by and by departe from the Church: nor the Pastors themselues, if they can not according to their hartes desire purge all thinges that nede amendment, shoulde therefore throw away the ministry, or with vnwonted rigorousnes trouble the whole Church. For it is most true which he wryteth: that he is free & discharged from curse, whosocuer he be that either by rebuking amendeth what he can: or what he can not amend, excludeth, sauing the bond of peace: or what he can not exclude, sauing the bond of peace, he doth disallow with equity, and beare with stedfastnesse. He rendreth a reason thereof in an other place: because all godly order and manner of ecclesiasticall discipline ought alway to haue respect vnto the vnity of the Spirit in the bond of peace: which the Apostle commaundeth to be kept by our bearing one with an other: and when it is not kept, the medicine of punishment beginneth to be not only superfluous, but also hurtfull, & therefore ceaseth to be a medicine. He that (saith he) doth diligently thinke vpon these things doth neither in preseruinge of vnity neglect the seuerity of discipline, nor doth with immeasurablenesse of correction breake the bonde of felowship. He graunteth in dede that not only the Pastours ought to trauaill to this point, that there may remaine no fault in the Church, but also y every man ought to his power to endeouour thereunto: & he plainly declareth that he which neglecteth to monish, rebuke, & correct the euill, although he do not fauour them, nor sinne with the, yet is guilty before the Lord. But if he be in such degree, that he may also seuerer them from the partaking of sacramentes, and doth it not, now he sinneth not by an others euill, but by his own. Only he willeth it to be done, with vsing of discretion, which the Lord also requireth, least while the tares be in rootinge out, the corne be hurt. Hereupon he gathereth out of Ciprian, Let a man therefore mercifully correct what he can: & what he can not, let him patiently suffer, and with loue grone and lament it.

12 This he saith because of the precisenes of the Donatistes, who when they saw faultes in the Churches which the bishops did in dede rebuke with wordes, but not punishe with excommunication, (because they thought that they coulde this way nothings preuaile) did sharply inuey against the bishops as traitiers of discipline, & did with an vngodly schisme deuide themselues from the flocke of Christ. As the Anabaptistes do at this day, which when they acknowledge no congregation to be of Christ, vnlesse it do in euery point shine with angelike perfection, do vnder pretense of their zeale ouerthrowe all edification. Such (saith Augustine) not for hatred of others mēs wickednes, but for desire to maintaine their own contentions, do couet either wholly to draw away, or at least to diuide the weake people snared with the boasting of their name: they swelling with pride, mad with stubbornes, traiterous with sleanders, troublesome with seditions, least it should opely appeare that they want the light of trueth, do pretend a shadow of rigorous seuerity: & those thinges which in scripture are commaūded to be done with moderate healing for correcting of the faults of brethren, preseruing the sincerenes of loue, & keeping the vnity of peace, they abuse to sacrilege of schisme & occasion of cutting of. So doth Satan transforme himselfe into an angell of light, when by occasiō as it were of iust seuerity he persuadeth vnmercifull cruelty, coueting nothinge else but to corrupt & breake the bond of peace & vnity: which bond remaining fast, among Christians all his foes are made weake to hurt, his trappes of treasons are broken, and his counsels of ouerthrowing do vanish away.

1. Cor.

13 This one thing he chiefly cōmendeth, that if the infection of sinne haue entred into the whole multitude, then the seuerer mercy of liuely discipline is necessary. For (saith he) the deuises of separation are vaine, & hurtful & ful of sacrilege, because they are vngodly & proud, & do more trouble the weake good ones, than they amend the stout euill ones. And that which he there teacheth other, he himselfe also faithfully folowed. For writing to Aurelius bishop of Carthage he cōplaineth that dronkennes which is so sore condemned in scriptures, doth range vnpunished in Affrica: & he aduiseh him, that assembling a Councel of bishops he should prouide remedy for it. He addeth by and by after: These thinges (as I thinke) are taken away not roughly, not hardly, not after an imperious maner, but more by teaching thā by cōmaunding, more by admonishing than by thretning. For so must we deale with a multitude of sinners, but seuerity is to be exercised vpo the sinnes of few. Yet he doth not meane that Bishops should therefore winke or hold their peace at publike faultes, because they can not seuerely punish them: as he himselfe afterward expoundeth it. But he willeth that the measure of correctiō be so tempered, that so farre as may be, it may rather bring health than destruction to the body. And therefore at length he cōcludeth thus: Wherefore both this cōmaundement of the Apostle is in no wise to be neglected, to seuer the euil, whē it may be done without peril of breaking of peace: & this is also to be kept, that bearing one with an other, we shoulde endeouour to preserue vnity of the Spirit, in the bonde of peace.

Eph. 4.

14 The parte that remaineth of discipline, which properly is not contained in the power of keies, standeth in this, that accordinge to the necessity of times the Pastors shoulde exhort the people either to fasting, or to common supplicatiōs, or to other exercises of humility, repentance, and faith, of which thinges there is neither time, nor measure, nor forme prescribed by y word of God, but is left in y iudgement of the Church. The obseruing of this part also, as it is profitable, so hath alway bin vsed of the old church euen frō the very Apostles. Howbeit the Apostles themselues were not the first authors of them, but they rooke example out of the law & the Prophetes. For we see that there so oft as any weighty businesse happened, the people was called together, common praiers enioyned, & fasting commaunded. Therefore the Apostles folowed that which both was not new to the people of God, & they foresaw that it should be profitable. Likewise is to be thought of other exercises, wherewith the people may either be stirred vp to their duety, or be kept in awe and obedience. There are examples eche where in holy histories, which we nede not to gather together. In summe this is to be holdē, that so oft as there happeneth any controuersie of religion, which must be determined either by a Synode or by ecclesiastical iudgement, so oft as they be about choosing of a minister, finally so oft as any hard matter or of great importance is in doinge: againe when there appeare tokens of the wrath of God, as pestilence, & warre, & famine: this is a holy ordināce & profitable for all ages, that the Pastors shoulde exhort the people to cōmon fasting, & to extraordinary praiers. If any man do not allow the testimonies which may be alleaged out of y old testament, as though they were not mete for the Christian Church, it is certaine that the Apostles also did the same. Howbeit of praiers I thinke there will scarcely any be found that will moue any question, Therefore let vs say somewhat of fasting: because many when they vnderstande not what profit it hath, do iudge it not so necessary: some also do viterly refuse it as superfluous: & when the vse of it is not well knowen, it is easie to slide into superstition.

15 Holy & true fastinge hath three endes. For we vse it, either to make leane and subdue the flesh, that it should not waxe wanton, or that we may be better disposed to praiers & holy meditatiōs, or that it shoulde be a testimony of our humblinge before God, when we be willing to confesse our giltines before him. The first end hath not so often place in cōmon fasting, because all men haue not like estate of body, nor like health: therefore it rather agreeth w private fasting. The second end is cōmon to both, for as well the whole Church as euery one one of the faithfull hath neede of such preparation to prayer. The thirde also is likewise common. For it shall sometime befall that God shall strike some nation with warre, or pestilence, or with some calamitie. In such a common scourge the whole people must accuse themselues, and openly confesse their owne guiltinesse. But if the hand of the Lorde do strike any priuate man, he ought to do the same, either alone, or with his owne familie. That standeth chiefly in the affection of the minde. But when the minde is affected as it ought to be, it is scarcely possible, but that it will breake out into outward testifying: and then chiefly if it turne to common edifying, that altogether in openly confessing their sinne shoulde yelde praise of righteousnesse to God, and euery one mutually exhorte other with their example.

16 Wherefore fasting, as it is a signe of humbling, hath more often vse publikely, than among priuate men, howsoeuer it be common, as is already said. Therefore as touching the discipline whereof we nowe entreate: so oft as we must make supplication to God for any great matter, it were expedient to commaunde fasting together with prayer. So when the Antiochians laide handes vpon Paule and Barnabas, that they might the better comede to God their ministry which was of so great importance, they ioined fasting with prayer. So both they afterward, when they made ministers ouer Churches, were wont to pray with fasting. In this kinde of fasting they had regarde to none other thing, but that they might be made fresher and more vncombred to pray. Verily this we finde by experience, that when the belly is full, the minde is not so lifted vp to God, that it can both with hartly & feruēt affection be caried to prayer, and continue in it. So is that to be vnderstood which Luke reberfeth of Anne, that she serued the Lorde in fastinges and prayers. For he doth not set the worshipping of God in fasting: but signifieth that the holy womā did after that maner exercise her selfe to cōtinuance of prayer. Such was the fasting of Nehemias when he did with earnestly bent zele pray to God for the deliuerance of his people. For this cause Paule saith that the faithfull do well, if they absteine for a time from their wedding bed, that they may the more freely apply prayer and fasting. Where ioining fasting to prayer in steede of a helpe, he putteth vs in minde that it is of no value but so farre as it is referred to this ende. Againe when in the same place he geueth a rule to maryed folkes, that they should mutually render good will one to an other, it is plaine that he doth not speake of daily prayers, but of such prayers as require a more earnest intentiuenesse.

17 Againe, if either pestilence, or famine, or warre beginne to range abroad, or if any calamitie otherwise seeme to hang ouer any contree and people: then also it is the duetic of Pastors to exhort the Church to fasting, that they may humbly beseeche the Lorde to turne away his wrath. For he geueth warning that he is prepared and in a maner armed to reuenge, when he maketh any dāger to appere. Therefore as accused men in time past with long hanging beard, with vncombed heare, with blacke aray, were wont humbly to abace themselves, to procure the mercie of the iudge: so when we are accused before the iudgement seate of God, it behoueth both for his glorie, and for common edification, and also is profitable and healthfull for vs, that we should in piteous array craue to escape his seueritie. And that this was vsed among the people of Israell, it is easy to gather by the wordes of Ioel. For when he commaundeth a trompet to be sounded, the congregation to be gathered together, fasting to be appointed, and the rest that followe: he speaketh of things receiued in common custome. He had a little before said, that examination is appointed of the wicked deedes of the people, and had declared that the day of iudgement was nowe at hand, and had summoned them being accused to pleade their cause: then he crieth out that they should hast to sacke cloth and ashes, to weping and fasting: that is, that they should also with outward testifyinges throwe themselves downe before the Lorde. Sacke cloth and ashes paraduenture did more agree with those times: but there is no dout that the calling together, and weping and fasting and such like do likewise pertaine also to our age, so oft as the state of our things doth so require. For sith is a holy exercise, both to humble men, and to confesse humility, why should we lesse vse it than the olde people did in like necessitie?

We reade that not onely the people of Israell, which were informed and instructed by the word of God, but also the Niniuites which had no doctrine but the preaching of Ionas, fasted in token of sorowe. What cause is there therefore why we should not do the same? But it is an outward ceremonie, which was with the rest ended in Christ. Yea rather euen at this day it is, as it alway hath bene, a very good helpe to the faithfull, and a profitable admonition, to stirre vp themselves, that they should not with to great carelesnesse and sluggishnes more & more prouoke God whē they are chastised with his scourges.

Therefore Christ when he excuseth his Apostles for that they fast not, doth not say that fastinge is abrogate: but he appointeth it to times of calamitie, & ioineth it with mourning. The time shall come (saith he) when the bridegrome shall be taken away from them.

18 But that there should be no error in the name, let vs define what fasting is. For we do not here vnderstand by it onely abstinence and sparing in meate and drinke, but a certaine other thing. The life of the godly ought in deede to be tempered with honest sparing and sobrietie, that so nere as is possible it may in the whole course thereof beare a certaine resemblance of fasting. But beside this there is another fasting for a time, whē we withdrawe any thing of our wonted diet, either for one day or for a certaine time, and do charge our selues with a streighter and seuerer abstinence in diet than ordinarie. This consisteth in three things, in time, in qualitie of meates, and in smallnes of quātitie. I meane by time, that we should vse those doings fasting, for which fasting is ordeined. As for example, if a man fast for common prayer: that he come emptie vnto it. Qualitie standeth in this, that all deintinesse should be absent, and being content with common and baser meates, we should not stirre vp appetite with delicates. The rule of quantitie is in this, that we eate more sparingly and lesse than we be wont, onely for necessitie, and not also for pleasure.

19 But we must alway principally beware, that no superstition crepe vpon vs, as it hath heretofore happened to the great hurt of the Church. For it were much better that there were no vse at all of fasting, than that it should be diligently kepte, and in the meane time be corrupted with false and hurtfull opinions, whereunto the world sometime falleth, vnlesse the Pastors do with great faithfulness and wisdom preuent it. The first point therefore is, that they should alway enforce that which Ioel teacheth, that they should cutt their hartes Ioel. 2. and not their garmentes: that is, that they should admonish the peo- 13. ple, that God doth not greatly esteeme fasting of it selfe, vnlesse there be an inwarde affection of the harte, a true misliking of sinne and of himselfe, true humbling, and true sorowe through the feare of God: yea that fasting is profitable for no other cause, but for that it is ioined to these as an inferior helpe. For God abhorreth nothing more than when men in setting signes and an outward shewe in steede of innocence of hart, do labor with false color to deceue themselues. Therefore Esaie most sharply inueyeth against this hypocrisie, that Esa. 58. the Iewes thought that they had satisfied God, when they had onely 5. fasted, howsoeuer they did nourish vngodlinesse & vncleane thoughts in their hart. Is it (saith he) such a fasting which the Lord requireth? and so forth as followeth. Therefore the hypocriticall fasting is not onely an vnprofitable and superfluous werying, but also a great abomination. An other euell neere vnto this is chiefly to be taken hede of, that it be not taken for a meritorious worke, or a forme of worshipping God. For sith it is a thing of it selfe indifferent, and hath no value but by reason of those endes which it ought to haue respect vnto, it is a most hurtfull superstition, to cōfoude it with the workes commaunded of God and necessarie of themselues without other respect. Such was in olde time the dotage of the Manichees: whom when Augustine cōfuteth, he doth plainly enough teach, that fasting is to be iudged by no other endes than those which I haue spoken of, and is no otherwise allowed of God, vnlesse it be referred to the same. The thirde error is in deede not so vngodly, yet it is perillous: to require the keping of it more precisely and rigorously as it were one of the chiefe dueties, and so to aduance it with immeasurable praises, that men should thinke they haue done some excellent thing when they haue fasted. In which behalfe I dare not altogether excuse the olde fathers, but that they haue sowed some seedes of superstitiō, and geuen occasion to the tyranny which hath risen since. There are founde in deede sometimes in them sounde and wise sentences, of fasting, but afterwarde we nowe and then mete with immeasurable praises of fasting which aduance it among the chiefe vertues.

20 And at that time the superstitious obseruing of lent was eche where growen in vse: because both the commō people thought that they did therein some notable seruice to God, and the Pastors did commend it for a holy following of Christ: whereas it is plaine, that Christ did not fast to prescribe an example to other, but that in so beginning the preching of the Gospell, he might in very deede proue that it was not a doctrine of men, but descended from heauen. And it is meruailous, that so grosse an error, which is confuted with so many & so euident reasons, could crepe into men of so sharpe iudgement. For Christ did not fast oft (which he must needs haue done if he would haue set forth a lawe of yerely fasting) but onely ones when he prepared himselfe to the publishing of the Gospell. And he fasted not after the maner of menne, as it was mete that he should haue done if he would haue prouoked men to followe him: but rather he sheweth an example, whereby he may rather drawe men to wonder at him than stirre them vp to followe him. Finally there is none other cause of this fasting, than of that which Moses fasted when he receiued the law at the hand of the Lord. For sith that miracle was shewed in Moses to stablish the authoritie of the lawe, it ought not to haue bene omitted in Christ, least the Gospell should seeme to geue place to the lawe. But since that time it neuer came in any mans minde vnder color of following of Moses to require such a forme forme of fasting in the people of Israel. Neither did any of the holy Prophets and fathers follow it, when yet they had minde and zeale enough to godly exercises. For, that which is said of Helias, that he passed forty dayes without meate and drinke, tended to no other ende but that the people should knowe that he was stirred vp to be a restorer of the lawe from which almost all Israell had departed. Therefore it was a mere wrongfull zeale and full of superstition, that they did set forth fasting with the title and color of following of Christ. Howbeit in the maner of fasting there was then great diuersity, as Cassiodorus rehearseth out of Socrates in the ninth booke of his historie. For the Romaines (saith he) had but three weekes, but in these there was a continuall fasting, except on the Sunday and Saturday. The Slaunonians and Grecians had six weekes: other had seuen: but their fasting was by deuided times. And they disagreed no lesse in difference of meates. Some did eat nothing but bread and water: some added herbes: some did not forbear fish and fowles: summe had no difference in meates. Of this diuersitie Augustine also maketh mention in the latter Epistle to Ianuarie.

19. 6.

21 Then followed worse times, and to the preposterous zeale of the people was added both ignorance and rudenesse of the Bishops, and a luste to beare rule, and a tyrannous rigor. There were made wicked lawes, which straine consciences with pernicious bondes. The eating of fleshe was forbidden, as though it defiled a man. There were added opinions full of sacrilege one vpon an other, till they came to the bottome of all errors. And that no peruerseness should be omitted, they began with a most sonde pretence of abstinence to mocke with God. For in the most exquisite deintinesse of fare is sought the praise of fasting: no delicates do then suffice, there is neuer greater plentie, or diuersitie, or sweetenesse of meates. In such and so gorgious preparatiō they thinke that they serue God rightly. I speake not howe they neuer more fowly glutte themselues, than when they would be compted most holy men. Brefely, they compt it the greatest worshipping of God to abstaine from flesh, and (these excepted) to flowe full of all kinde of deinties. On the other side they thinke this the extremest vngodlinesse, and such as scarcely may be recompensed with death, if a man tast neuer so little a piece of bacon or vnsauery flesh with browne breade. Hierome telleth, that euen in his time were some that with such follies did mocke with God: which because they would not eate oyle, caused most deintie meates from euery place to be brought them: yea to oppresse nature with violence, they abstained from drinking of water, but caused swete and costly suppinges to be made for them, which they did not drinke out of a cup, but out of a shell. Which faulte was then in a fewe, at this day it is a common faulte among all riche menne, that they fast to no other ende but that they may banquet more sumptuously & deintily. But I wil not waste many wordes in a matter not doutefull. Only this I say, that both in fasting and in all other partes of discipline, the papistes so haue nothing right, nothing pure, nothing well framed and orderly, whereby they may haue any occasiō to be proude, as though there were any thing remaining among them worthy of praise.

22 There followeth another parte of discipline, which peculiarly belongeth to the clergie. That is cōteined in the canons which the olde Bishops haue made ouer themselues and their order. As these be: that no clerke should geue himselfe to hunting, to dicing, nor to banketting: that none should occupie vsurie, or merchandise: that none should be present at wanton dauncings: and such other ordinances. There were also added penalties: whereby the authority of the canons was stablished, that none should breake them vnpunished. For this ende to euery Bishop was committed the gouernemēt of his owne clergie, that they should rule their clerkes according to the canons, and holde them in their dutie. For this ende were ordeined yerely ouerseinges and Synodes, that if any were negligēt in his duetie, he should be admonished: if any had offended, he should be punished according to the measure of his offence. The Bishops also themselues had yerely their prouinciall Synodes, and in the olde time yerely two Synodes, by which they were iudged if they had done any thing beside their duetie. For if any Bishop were to harde or violent against his clergie, they might appelle to those Synodes, although there were but one that complained. The seuerest punishment was that he which had offended should be removed from his office, & for a time be deprived of the Cōmunion. And because that same was a continuall order, they neuer vsed to dismisse any Synode, but that they appointed a place and time for the next Synode. For, to gather a generall Councell pertained to the Emperour onely, as all the olde summoninges of Councells do testifie. So long as this seueritie flourished, the clerkes did require in word no more of the people, than themselues did performe in example and deede. Yea they were much more rigorous to themselues than to the people. And verily so it is mete, that the people should be ruled with a gentler & looser discipline, as I may so terme it: but the clerkes should vse sharper iudgements among themselues, and should lesse beare with themselues, than with other men. Howe all this is growen out of vse,

it is no neede to rehearse, when at this day nothing can be imagined more vnbridled and dissolute than the Clergie, and they are broken forth to so great licentiousnesse, that the whole world crieth out of it. That all antiquitie should not seeme to be vtterly buried among them, I graunt in deede that they do with certaine shadows deceiue the eyes of the simple: but those are such as come no nerer to the auncient maners, than the counterfainting of an ape approacheth to that which men do by reason and aduise. There is a notable place in Xenophon, where he teacheth howe fowly the Persians had swarued from the ordinances of their Elders, and were fallen from the rigorous kinde of life, to softnes and deintinesse, that yet they couered this shame, saying that they diligently kept the auncient vsages. For when in the time of Cyrus sobrietie and temperance so farre flourished that men needed not to weepe, yea and it was accompted a shame: with posteritie this continued a religious obseruation, that no man should drawe snott out at his nosethrilles, but it was lawfull to sucke it vp, & feede within euen till they were rotten the stinking humors which they had gathered by gluttonous eating. So by the olde order it is vnlawfull to bring winepots to the borde: but to swill in wine that they neede to be caried away dronken, is tolerable. It was ordeined to eate but ones in a day: this these good successors haue not abrogate, but they gaue leaue to continue their surfettings from mid day to mid night. The custome was that me should make an end of their dayes iourney fasting. But it was at libertie & vsedly the custome, for auoiding of werinesse, to shorten their iourney to two houres. Whensoever the Papistes shall pretende their bastarde rules, to shewe themselues to be like to the holy fathers: this example shall sufficiently reprove their fonde counterfainting, that no painter can more liuely expresse it.

23 In one thing they be to rigorous and vntreatable, that they geue not leaue to Priests to mary. But howe great libertie there is among them to vse whordome vnpunished, is not needefull to be spoken: & bearing them bold vpon their stinking vnmarried life, they haue hardened themselues to all wicked doings. But this forbidding doth plainly shewe, howe pestilente all their traditiōs are, forasmuch as it hath not onely spoiled the Church of good and fitt Pastors, but also hath brought in a horrible sinke of mischeues, & throwen many soules into the gulfe of desperation. Truely whereas mariage hath bene forbidden to Priests, that same hath bene done by wicked tyrannie, not onely against the word of God, but also against all equitie. First to forbidde that which the Lorde had leste at libertie, was by no meanes lawfull for men. Againe, that God hath expressely provided by his word that this libertie should not be broken, is so euidente that it needeth no long demōstration. I speake not howe Paul

 1. Tim. in many places willeth a Bishop to be the husbāde of one wife. But
 3. 2 and what could be more vehemētly spoken, than where he pronounceth
 1. 6. by the Holy Ghost, that there shalbe in the last times wicked men
 1. Tim. that shall forbidde mariage: and he calleth them not onely deceiuers, 4 3. but deuells? This therefore is a Prophecie, this is a holy Oracle of the Holy Ghost, wherewith he willed to arme the Church aforehāde against dangers, that the forbidding of mariage is the doctrine of deuells. But they thinke that they haue gaily escaped whē they wrest this sentence to Montanus, the Tatrans, Encratites and other olde heretikes. They onely (say they) condemned mariage: but we do not condemne it, but debarre the Clergie from it, for whom we thinke it not to be cōuenient. As though albeit this prophecy was first fulfilled in those aforesaid men, it might not also be applied to these: or as though this childish fond sutteltie were worth the hearing, that they say that they forbidde it not, because they forbid it not to all. For it is all one as if a tyrant would affirme that it is not an vniust lawe, with vniustice whereof one part alone of the citie is oppressed.

24 They obiect, that the Priest doth by some marke differ from the people. As though the Lorde did not also foresee this, with what ornaments Priests ought to excell. So they accuse the Apostle of troubling the order and confounding the comlinessse of the Church, which when he portrayed out the absolute forme of a good Bishop, durst set mariage among the other gistes which he required in him.
 I knowe howe they expounde this, namely that none is to be chosen that hath had a seconde wife. And I graunt that this is not a newe exposition: but that it is a false exposition, appeareth by the text it selfe, because he by and by after setteth out of what qualities the wiues of Bishops and Deacons ought to be. Paule reckoneth mariage among the vertues of a Bishop: these men teache that it is an intollerable faulte in the order of the Clergie. And, on Gods name, not cōtented with this generall dispraise they call it in their canons vnclennesse and defiling of the flesh. Let euery man thinke with himselfe out of what workeshop these things be come: Christ vouchesaueth so to honor mariage that he willeth it to be an image of his holy con-joining with the Church. What could be spoken more honorably to set out the dignitie of mariage? With what face therefore shall that be called vnclene or defiled wherein shineth a likenesse of the spirituall grace of Christ?

25 But nowe when their forbidding so euidently fighteth with the word of God, yet they finde in the Scriptures wherewith to defende it. The Leuiticall Priests were bounde to lie a sonder from their wiues, so oft as it came to their turnes to minister, that they might handle the holy things pure and vndefiled. Therefore it were very vncomely, that our holy things, sith they be both much more noble and daily, should be handled of married men. As though there were all one person of the minister of the Gospell, as was of the Leuiticall Priesthode. For they, as figures, represented Christ, which being the mediator of God and men should with most absolute purenesse reconcile the Father vnto vs. But when sinners coulde not in euery behalfe expresse the figure of his holinesse, yet that they might with certaine grosse draughtes yeld a shadowe of him, they were commaunded to purifie themselues beyond the maner of men, when they came to the Sanctuarie: namely because they then properly figured Christ, for that as pacifiers to reconcile the people to God they appeared at the tabernacle the image of the heavenly iudgement seate. Forasmuch as the Pastors of the Church do not beare this persone at this day, therefore they are vainly compared with them. Wherefore the Apostle doth without exception boldly pronounce, that mariage is honorable among all men, but that for whoremongers and adulterers abideth the iudgement of God. And the Apostles themselues did with their owne example approue that mariage is not vnmete for the holinesse of any office be it neuer so excellent. For Paule witnesseth that they did not onely kepe wiues, but also carried them about with them.

26 Againe it was a maruelous shamelesnesse that they durst set out this comelinesse of chastitie for a necessarie thing, to the great reproche of the olde Church: which when it abounded with singular learninge of God, yet excelled more in holinesse. For if they passe not vpon the Apostles, (as they are wont sometime stoutely to despise them) what I beseeche you will they do to all the olde fathers, whom it is certaine to haue not onely suffered, but also allowed mariage in the order of Bishops? They forsooth did nourish a filthy profaning of holy things, forasmuch as so the misteries of the Lorde were not rightly reuerenced among them. It was moued in deede in the Nicene Synode to haue vnmarried life commaunded: as there alway want not some superstitious men, which do euer inuente some newe thing, to bring themselues in admiration. But what was decreed? The sentence of Paphnutius was assented to, which pronounced that a mans lying with his owne wife is chastitie. Therefore mariage re-maintained holy among them: neither did it turne them to any shame, nor was thought to spott the ministerie.

27 Then followed times, in which to superstitious obseruation of single life grewe in force. Hereupon came those often and vnmeasurably aduanced praises of virginie, so that scarcely any other vertue was thought among the people to be compared with it. And although mariage was not condemned for vncleane, yet the dignitie thereof was so diminished, and the holinesse of it obscured, that he seemed not to aspire with a courage strong enough to perfection, that did not refraine himselfe from it. Hereupon came those canons whereby it was first forbidden that they which were come to the degree of Priesthode should not contracte mariage: then, that none should be taken into that order but vnmarried men, or such as did forsake mariage together with their wiues. These things, because they seemed to procure reuerence to Priesthode, were (I graunt) euen from antiquitie receiued with great well liking. But if the aduersaries obiekt antiquitie against me, first I aunswer that this libertie remained both vnder the Apostles and in certaine ages after them, that Bishops might be married: that the Apostles themselues, and other Pastors of great authoritie which succeded in their places, vsed the same without sticking at it. The example of that auncienter Church ought worthily to be of greater weight with vs, than that we should thinke that to be either vnlawfull or vncomely for vs which was then with praise receiued and vsed. Secondly I say that that age which for immeasurable affection to virginie began to be partiall against mariage, did not so lay vpon Priests the lawe of vnmarried life, as though it were a thing necessarie of it selfe, but because they preferred vnmarried men aboue the married. Finally I aunswer that they did not so require it that they did with force and necessitie constraime them to continence which were not fit to kepe it. For when they punished whoredomes with most seuerelawes, of them that contracted mariage they decreed no more but that they should geue over the execution of their office.

28 Therefore whensoever the defenders of this newe tyrannie shall seke the pretense of antiquitie to defende their vnmarried life: so oft we shall aunswere them with requiring them, that they restore the olde chastnesse in their Priests: that they remoue adulterers and whoremongers: that they suffer not those in whom they suffer not honest and chaste vse of mariage bed, to run vnpunished into all kinde of lust: that they call againe the discontinued discipline, whereby all wantonnesse may be restrained: that they deliuer the Church from this so wicked filchines, wherwith it hath bene long deformed. When they haue graunted this, then they must againe be put in minde that they boſt not that thing for neceſſarie, which being of it ſelfe at libertie hangeth vpon the profit of the Church. Yet I ſay not this for that I thinke that in any condition place is to be geuen to thoſe canons which lay the bonde of vnmarried life vpon the order of Priests: but that the wiſer ſort may vnderſtande with what face our enemies do ſclaunder holy mariage in Priests, by obiecting the name of antiquitie. As touching the fathers, whoſe writings remaine, euen they when they ſpeake of their owne iudgement, except Hierome, did not with ſo great ſpitefulneſſe deface the honeſty of mariage. We ſhalbe content with one commendation of Chriſtoſtome: becauſe he ſith he was a principal eſteemer of virginie, can not be thought to haue bene more lauiſh than other in commendation of mariage. Thus he ſaith: The firſt degree of chaſtite is pure virginie: the ſeconde is faithfull mariage. Therefore the ſeconde kinde of virginie is the chaſt loue of matrimonie.

The xiiij. Chapter.

Of vowes; by rash promiſing, whereof eche man hath miſerably entangled himſelfe.

IT is verily a thing to be lamented, that the Church, for whom libertie was purchaſed with the inestimable price of the blood of Chriſt, hath bene ſo oppreſſed with cruell tyranny, and almoſt ouerwhelmed with a huge heape of traditions: but in the meane time euery mans priuate madneſſe ſheweth, that not without moſt juſt cauſe there hath bene ſo much permitted of God to Satan & his miniſters. For they thought it not enough, neglecting the commaundement of Chriſt, to beare any burdens whatſoever were layed vpon them by falſe teachers, vnleſſe they did alſo eche man procure to himſelfe ſeueral burdens of his owne, and ſo with digging pittes for themſelues ſhould drowne themſelues deper. This was done while they ſtriued in deuiling of vowes, by which there might be added to the common bondes a greater and ſtreighter binding. Sith therefore we haue taught, that by their boldneſſe which haue boine rule vnder the title of Paſtors in the Church, the worſhipping of God hath bene corrupted, when they ſnared ſilly conſciences with their vniuſt lawes: here it ſhall not be out of ſeaſon to adioine an other euell which is nere vnto it, that it may appeare that the world according to the peruerſneſſe of his owne diſpoſition, hath alway, with ſuch ſtoppes as it could, put away the helps whereby it ſhould haue bene brought to God. Nowe, that it may the better appeare that very greuous hurt hath bene brought in by vowes, let the reders kepe in minde the principles aboue set. For first we haue taught, that whatsoever may be required to the framing of life godlily & holily, is comprehended in the lawe. Againe we haue taught, that the Lorde, that he might thereby the better call vs away from deuising of newe workes, hath enclosed the whole praise of righteousnesse in the simple obedience of his will. If these things be true, it is easy to iudge that all fained worshippings, which we inuent to our selues to deserue the fauor of God, are not acceptable to him howe much soeuer they please vs. And truely the Lord himselfe in many places doth not onely openly refuse them, but also greuously abhorre them. Hereupon ariseth a dout of those vowes which are made beside the expresse word of God, what accompt is to be made of them, whether they may rightly be vowed of Christian men, and howe farre they binde them. For the same which among men is called a promise, in respect of God is called a vowe. But to men we promise those things either which we thinke will be pleasant vnto them, or which we owe of dutie. Therefore there ought to be a much greater hedefull obseruatiō in vowes which are directed to God himselfe, with whom we ought to deale most earnestly. In this point superstition hath in all ages maruelously ranged, so that menne without iudgement, without choise, did by and by vowe vnto God whatsoever came in their minde, or into their mouth. Hereupon came those follies, yea monstrous absurdities of vowes among the heathen, wherewith they did to insolently mocke with their gods. And I would to God that Christiāns also had not followed this their boldnesse. It ought not in deede to haue bene so: but we se that in certaine ages past nothing hath bene more vsuall than this wickednesse, that the people eche where despising the lawe of God did wholly burne with mad greedinesse to vowe whatsoever had pleased thē in their dreame. I will not hatefully enforce, nor particularly rehearse howe hainously and howe many wayes herein men haue offended: but I thought good to say this by the way, that it may the better appeare, that we do not moue question of a needlesse matter, when we entreate of vowes.

2 Nowe if we will not erre in iudging which vowes be lawfull, and which be wrongfull, it behoueth to wey three things: that is to say, who it is to whom the vowe is made: who we be that make the vowe: last of all, with what minde we vowe. The first pointe hath respect to this, that we should thinke that we haue to do with God, whome our obedience so much deliteth, that he pronounceth all will worships to be accursed, howe gay and glorious soeuer they be in the eyes of men. If all voluntarie worshippes, which we our selues deuise without commaundement, be abhominable to God, it followeth that no worship can be acceptable to him but that which is allowed by his word. Therefore let vs not take so great libertie to our selues that we dare vowe to God that which hath no testimonie howe it is esteemed of him. For whereas that which Paule teacheth, Rom 14 that it is sinne whatsoever is done without Faith, extendeth to all 23 doings, then verily it chiefly hath place when thou directest thy thought the streight way to God. But if we fall and erre euen in the smallest things, (as Paul there disputeth of the difference of meates) where certaintie of Faith shineth not before vs: howe much more modestie is to be vsed, when we attempte a thing of greatest weight? For nothing ought to be more earnest vnto vs than the duties of religion. Let this therefore be the first consideration in vowes, that we neuer come to the vowing of any thing, but that conscience haue first certainly determined that it attempteth nothing rashly. But it shall then be free from danger of rashnesse, when it shall haue God going before it, and as it were enforming it by his word what is good or vnprofitable to be done.

3. In the other thing which we haue said to be here to be considered, this is contained, that we measure our owne strengthes, that we haue an eye to our vocation, that we neglect not the benefite of libertie which God hath geuen vs. For he that voweth that which either is not in his power, or disagreeeth with his vocation, is rash: and he that despiseth the bountifulnesse of God, whereby he is appointed Lorde of all things, is vnthankfull. When I say thus, I do not meane that any thing is so sett in our owne hande, that standing vpon confidence of our owne strength we may promise the same to God: For it was most truely decreed in the Councell at Arausium, that nothing Concil. is rightly vowed to God but that which we haue receiued of his Arausi. hande, forasmuch as all things that are offred him are his mere giftes. cap. 11. But sith some things are by Gods goodnesse geuen vs, and other Rom. 12 some things by his equitie denied vs: let every man (as Paule com- 3. maundeth) haue respect to the measure of grace geuen vnto him. 1. Cor. Therefore I do here meane nothing els, but that vowes must be tem- 12. 11. pered to that measure which the Lorde prescribeth there in his ge- uing: lest if thou attempt further than he permitteth, thou throw thy selfe downe hedlong with taking to much vpon thee. As for example. When those murtherers, of whom mention is made in Luke, vowed A& 23. that they would tast of no meate till Paule were slayen: although the 12.

deuie had not bene wicked, yet the rashnesse it selfe was not to be suffered, that they made the life and death of a man subiect to their
 11. power. So Iephthe suffred punishmēt for his folly, whē with hedlong
 30. heate he conceiued an vnadvised vowe. In which kinde vnmarried life hath the chiefe place of mad boldnesse. For sacrificing Priestes, monkes, and nonnes, forgetting their owne weakenesse, thinke themselues able to kepe vnmarried life. But by what Oracle are they taught that they shall haue chastitie throughout all their life, to the very
 Gen. 2. ende whereof they vowe it? They heare the word of God concer-
 8. ning the vniuersall state of men, It is not good for man to be alone.
 They vnderstande, and I would to God that they did not fele, that sinne remaining in vs is not without most sharpe prickes. With what confidence dare they shake of that generall calling for all their life long: whereas the gift of continence is oftener graunted for a certaine time as opportunitie requireth. In such stubbornesse let them not loke for God to be their helper: but let them rather remember that which is said. Thou shalt not tempt the Lorde thy God. And this is to tempt God, to endeuor against the nature put in vs by him, and to despise his present giftes as though they nothing belonged vnto vs. Which they not onely do: but also marriage it selfe, which God thought it not against his maiestie to institute, which he hath
 Heb. 13. pronounced honorable in all men, which Christ our Lorde hath 4 sanctified with his presence, which he vouchesaue to honor with his
 10. 2. 2 first miracle, they dare call defiling, onely to aduaunce with maruelous commendations a certaine vnmarried life of what sorte soeuer it be. As though they themselues did not shewe a clere example in their life, that vnmarried state is one thing, and virginitee an other: which their life yet they most shamelesly call Angelike, doing herein verily to great iniurie to the Angels of God, to whom they compare whoremongers, adulterers, and somewhat els much worse and filthier. And truely here neede no argumentes, when they are openly confuted by the thing it selfe. For we plainly se, with howe horrible paines the Lorde doth commonly take vengeance of such arrogance, and contempt of his giftes by to much trust in themselues.
 I spare for shame to speake of the more secrete faultes, of which euen this that is already perceiued is to much. It is out of cōtrouersie that we ought to vowe nothing, that may hinder vs from seruing of our vocation. As if a householder should vowe, that he will leaue his wife and his children and take other charges in hande: or if he that is fit to beare office, when he is chosen do vowe that he will be a priuate man. But what is meant by this, that our libertie should not be

be despised, hath some difficulty if it be not declared. Therefore thus in fewe wordes I expounde it. Sith God hath made vs Lordes of all things, and liath so made them subiect vnto vs that we should vse them all for our commoditie: there is no cause why we should hope that it shalbe an acceptable worke to God if we yelde our selues into bondage to the outward things which ought to be a helpe vnto vs. I say this for this purpose, because many do hereby seke praise of humilitie, if they snare themselues with many obseruations, from which God not without cause willed vs to be free and discharged. Therefore if we will escape this danger, let vs alway remember that we ought not to depart from that order which the Lorde hath ordeined in the Christian Church.

4 Nowe I come to that which I did set in the thirde place: that it is much materiall with what minde thou makest a vowe, if thou wilt haue it allowed of God. For sith the Lorde regardeth the hart, not the outward shewe, it cometh to passe that the selfe same thing, by changing the purpose of the minde, doth sometime please him and is acceptable vnto him, and sometime hiely displeaseth him. If thou so vowe the absteyning from wine, as though there were any holinesse in it, thou art superstitious: if thou haue respect to any other ende which is not euell, no man can disallowe it. But in my iudgement there be fower endes, to which our vowes shalbe rightly directed: of which for teachings sake I referre two to the time past, and the other two to the time to come. To the time past belong those vowes, whereby we do either testifie our thankfulnessse to God for benefites receiued: or to craue the turning away of his wrath, we our selues do punish our selues for the offenses that we haue committed. Let vs call the first sort, if you will, the exercises of thankesgeuing, the other of repentance. Of the first kinde we haue an example in the tithes which Iacob vowed, if the Lorde did bring him home safe out of banishment into his contree. Againe in the olde Sacrifices of the peaceofferings, which godly kinges and capitaines, when they toke in hande righteous warre, did vowe that they would pay if they had obtained the victorie, or at least when they were oppressed with any great distresse, if the Lorde had deliuered them. So are all those places in the Psalmes to be vnderstode which speake of vowes. Such vowes may at this day also be in vse among vs, so oft as the Lorde hath deliuered vs either out of any calamitie, or from a hard sicknesse, or from any other danger. For it is then not against the dutie of a godly manne, to consecrate to God his vowed oblation, as a solemne token of his reknowledging, least he shoulde seeme vnthankfull toward his goodnesse. Of what sort the seconde kinde is, it shall suffice to shewe with one onely familiar example. If any by the vice of gluttonie be fallen into any offense, nothing withstandeth but that to chastise his intemperance he may for a time forsake all deinty meates, and may do the same with a vowe adioined, that he may binde himselfe with the streighter bonde. Yet I do not so make a perpetuall lawe to them that haue likewise offended: but I shewe what is lawfull for them to do, which shall thinke such a vowe profitable for themselues. I do therefore so make such a vowe lawfull, that in the meane time I leaue it at libertie.

5 The voves that are applied to the time to come, partly (as we haue already said) do tende to this ende that we may be made the water: & partly that as it were by certaine spurres we may be pricked forward to our dutie. Some man seeth him selfe to be so inclined to some certaine vice, that in a thing which otherwise is not euill he can not temper himselfe from fallinge forthwith into an euill: he shall do nothing inconueniently if he do for a time by vowe cut of fro himselfe the vse of that thing. As if a man know that this or that apparell of body is perilous vnto him, and yet entised with desire he earnestly couet it, what can he do better, than if in putting a bridle vpon himself, that is in charging himself with necessitie of absteyning from it, he deliuer himselfe from all douting? Likewise if a man be forgetfull or slowe to necessarie duties of godlinesse, why may he not by taking a vowe vpon him both awake his memorie and shake of his slouthfulnesse? In both I graunt that there is a forme of childishe schooling: but euen in this that they are helpes of weakenesse, they are not without profit vsed of the rawe and vnperfect. Therefore we shal say that those voves are lawfull which haue respect to one of these endes, specially in outward things, if they both be vpholden with the allowance of God, and do agree with our vocation, and be measured by the power of grace geuen vs of God.

6 Nowe also it is not hard to gather what is generally to be thought of all voves. There is one common vowe of all the faithful, which being made in Baptisme we do confirme and as it were stablish by Catechisme and receiuing of the Supper. For the Sacramentes are as charters, by which the Lorde deliuereth to vs his mercy and thereby euerlasting life, and we againe on our behalves do promise him obedience. But this is the forme or verily the summe of the vow, that forsaking Satan we yelde our selues into seruice to God, to obey his holy commaundementes, and not to followe the peruerse desires of our flesh. It ought not to be doubted but that this vowe,

sith it hath testimony of the Scripture, yea and is required of all the children of God, is both holy and profitable to saluation. And it maketh not to the contrary, that no man in this life performeth the perfect obedience of the lawe which God requireth of vs. For sith this forme of couenancing is comprised within the couenant of grace, vnder which is contained both forgiuenesse of sinnes and the Spirit of Sanctification: the promise which we there make is ioyned both with beseching of pardon and with crauing of helpe. In iudging of particular vowes, it is necessary to kepe in minde the three former rules, whereby we may safely weie of what sort euery vow is. Neither yet thinke that I so commend the very same vowes which I affirme to be holy, that I would haue them to be daily. For though I dare teach no certaine rule of the number or time: yet if any man obey my counsell, he shall take vpon him none but sober and for a time. For if thou oftentimes breake foorth into making of many vowes, all religiousnesse will with very continuance growe out of estimation with thee, and thou shalt come to a bendinge readinesse to fall into superstition. If thou binde thy selfe with a perpetuall vowe, either for great payne and tediousnesse thou shalt vndo it, or beinge weryed with longe continuance thou shalt at one time or other be bolde to breake it.

7 Now also it is plaine with how great superstition in this behalfe the worlde hath in certaine ages past bin possessed. One man vowed that he would abstaine from wine: as though abstaininge from wine were of it selfe a worship acceptable to God. An other bounde himselfe to fasting, an other to abstaininge from flesh for certaine daies, in which he had with vaine opinion fained to be a singular holinesse aboue the rest. And some things also were vowed much more childish, although not of children. For this was holden for a great wisdom, to take vpon them vowed pilgrimages to holier places, & sometime either to go all their iourney on foote, or with their body halfe naked, that by their werines the more merite might be gotten. These & such other, with incredible zeale wherof the world hath a while swelled, if they be examined by those rules, which we haue aboue sette, shalbe found not only vaine & trifling, but full of manifest vngodlinesse. For howsoeuer the flesh iudge, God abhorreth nothing more than fained worshippings. There are beside this those pernicious & damned opinions, that hipocrites whē they haue such trifles thinke that they haue gotten no smal righteousnes: they repose the summe of godlinesse in outwarde obseruations: they despise all other that are lesse carefull of such thinges.

8 To reckon vp all the particular formes, is nothinge to purpose. But forasmuch as the monkish vowes are had in greater reuerence, because they seeme allowed by the common iudgement of y^e church: of those it is good to speake briefly. First least any should by prescription of long time defende monkery, such as it is at this day, it is to be noted that in old time there was in monasteries a farre other order of liuing. Such as were disposed to exercise themselues to greatest severity and patience, went thither. For what maner of discipline they say that the Lacedemonians had vnder the lawes of Lyncurgus, such was at that time amonge the monkes, yea and much more rigorous. They slept vpon the ground: their drinke was water: their meate was bread, herbes & rootes: their chiefe deinties were in oyle and ciches. They abstained from all delicate diet and trimming of body. These things might seeme aboue trueth, if they were not written by witnesses that saw & proued them, as Gregory Nazianzen, Basile, and Chrysofome. But with such introductions they prepared themselues to greate offices. For, that the colledges of monkes were then as it were the sedeploottes of the order of ministers of the Church, both these whom we haue now named are a profe plain enough, (for they were all brought vp in monasteries and from thense called to the office of bishops) & also many other singular and excellent men in their time. And Augustine sheweth that this was also vsed in his time, that monasteries

Epi. 81. yielded clerkes to the Church. For he speaketh thus to the monkes of the Isle of Caprarea: But you brethren we exhort in the Lord, that ye kepe your purpose and continue to the end: & if at any time our mother the Church shall require your trauaile, do ye neither with greedy pride take it vpon you, nor with flattering slouthfulnesse refuse it: but with a meke hart obey to God. Neither preferre ye your owne quiet leasure aboue the necessities of the Church: to whom if no good mē would haue ministred in her trauaile, you should not haue found how you shoulde haue bin borne. He speaketh there of the ministry, by

Epi. 76. which y^e faithfull are spiritually borne againe. Also to Aurelius: There is both occasion of fallinge giuen to themselues, and most haynous wronge done to the order of the Clergy, if forsakers of monasteries be chosen to the souldiorship of the Clergy: whē euen of those that remaine in the monastery, we vse to take into the Clergy none but the most approued and best. Vnlesse perhappes as the common people say, he is an euill pyper but a good fiddler: so it shall also be iestingely said of vs, he is an euill monke, but a good Clerke. It is too much to be lamented, if we list vp monkes into such a ruinous pride, and thinke Clerkes worthy of so great reproche, whereas sometime

euen a good monke makerh not a good Clerke, if he haue sufficient continence, & yet want necessary learninge. By these places it appeareth, that godly mē were wont with the discipline of monkes to prepare themselues to the gouernment of the Church, that they might the fitter and better instructed take so great an office vpon them. Not that they all attained to this end, or yet tended toward it, whē for the most part they were vnlearned mē: but such were chosen out as were mete for it.

9. But chiefly in two places he painteth out vnto vs the forme of the olde monkerie. In the booke Of the manners of the Catholike Church, where he setteth the holinesse of that profession against the sclaunders of the Manichees: & in an other booke, which he entituled Of the worke of monkes, where he inuieith against certaine degendred monkes, which began to corrupt that order. I will here so gather a summe of those thinges which he sayth, that so nere as I may I will vse his owne wordes. Despisinge (sayth he) the enticementes of Demon eccles. cathol. cap. 31. this worlde, gathered into one most chaste and holy life, they spende their time together, liuinge in praiers, readings, and disputations, not swelling with pride, not troublesome with stubborines, not wāne with enuiousnesse. None possesseth any thinge of his owne, none is burdenous to any man. They get by working with their handes those thinges wherewith both their body may be fed, and their minde may not be hindered frō God. Their worke they deliuer to them whom they call Deanes. Those Deanes despisinge all thinges with great carefulnesse make accompt thereof to one whom they call Father. These fathers not only most holy in maners, but also most excellent in godly doctrine, hie in all thinges, do with no pride prouide for thē whom they call children, with great authority of them in commaunding, & great willingnes of the other in obeying: They come together at the very last time of the day, euery one from his dwelling, while they be yet fasting, to heare that Father: & there mete together to euery one of these Fathers at the least three thousand men, (he speaketh chiefly of Ægypt, and of the east.) then they refresh their body, so much as suffiseth for life and healthfulnesse, euery man restraining his desire, not to take largely euen of those thinges that they haue present very spare and vile. So they do not onely abstaine from fleshe and wine, so much that they may be able to raine their lustes, but frō such thinges which do so much more greedily prouoke appetite of the belly and throte, howe much they seeme to other, to be as it were cleaner, by colour whereof the filthy desire of exquisite meates, which is not in flesh, is wont to be fondly and fowly defended. Whatsoeuer remayneth about necessary foode (as there remaineth oftentimes much of the workes of their handes and pinching of their fare) is with greater care distributed to the poore, than it was gotten by them that distribute it. For they do in no wise trauail that they may haue abundance of these things, but they by all meanes endeour that that which they haue aboundinge may not remaine with them. Afterwarde when he hath rehearsed the hardnesse, whereof he himselfe had scene examples both at Millaine and else where: among these things (sayth he) no man is enforced to hard things which he can not beare: no man is charged with that which he refuseth: neither is he therefore condemned of the rest, because he cōfesseth himselfe to want strength in folowing of them: for they remember how much charity is commē-ded: they remember that all things are cleane to the cleane. Therefore all their diligēce watcheth, not to the refusing of kindes of meate as vnclane, but to tame lust, & to retaine the loue of brethren. They remember, meate for the belly, and the belly for meates. &c. Yet many stronge do abstaine for the weakes sakes. Many of them haue no nede to do thus: but because it pleaseth them to sustaine themselues with baser diet and nothing sumptuous. Therefore they themselues, which being in health do forbear, if consideration of their helth cō-pell, when they are sicke do take without any feare. Many drinke no wine, & yet they thinke not themselues defiled with it: for they most gently cause it to be giuen to the fainter, and to them that can not get the health of their body without it: and some which foolishly refuse it, they do brotherly admonishe that they be not with vaine superstition sooner made weaker than holier. So they diligently exercise godlinesse: but they know that the exercising of the body pertaineth but to a short time. Charity is chiefly kept: to charity the diet, to charity the speech, to charity the apparel, to charity the countenance, is fitted. They mete and conspire into one charity. To offend it is accounted as haynous as to offende God. If any resist charity, he is cast out and shunned. If any offende charity, he is not suffred to abide one day. Forasmuch as in these words, as in a painted table, that holy man semeth to haue set out what maner of life monkery was in olde time, although they were somewhat long, yet I was content to enterlace the here: because I saw that I shold haue bin somewhat longer if I had gathered the same things out of diuers, how much soeuer I studied for briefenesse.

10 But my purpose here is not to go through this whole matter, but only by the way to point out, not only what maner of monkes the Old Church had, but what maner of thing the profession of monkes was at that time : so as the sounde witted readers may iudge by the comparison, what face they haue which alleage antiquity to maintaine the present monkery. Augustine when he depainteth vnto vs a holy & true monkery, would haue to be absent all rigorous exacting of those things which by the word of the Lord are left vs at liberty. But there is nothings that is at this day more seuerely required. For they compt it a mischiefe that can neuer be purged, if any do neuer so litle swarue from the prescribed rule in colour or fashion of garment; in kinde of meate, or in other trifling & cold ceremonies. Augustine stoutly maintaineth, that it is not lawful for monks to liue idle vpo other mens. He denieth that there was euer in his time any such example of a well ordered monastery. Our men set the chiefe part of their holinesse in idlenesse. For if you take idlenes from them, where shalbe that contemplatiue life whereby they boast that they excell all other men, and approach nere vnto Angels? Finally Augustine requireth such a monkery, as should be nothing but an exercise & help to the dueties of godlinesse which are commended to all Christians. What? when he maketh charity the chiefe, yea and almost only rule therof, do we thinke that he praiseth a conspiring, wherby a few men being bound together, are seuered from y^e whole body of the church? But rather he willeth them with their example to giue light to other to kepe the vnity of y^e Church. In both these points, there is so much difference of the monkery at this present, that a manne can scarcely finde any thing more vnlike, I will not say contrary. For our monkes not contented with that godlines, to the study of which alone Christ commaundeth them that are his continually to apply, do imagine I wote not what newe godlinesse, by meditation whereof they may be perfecter than other.

11 If they deny this, I would know of them why they vouchsaue to giue to their owne order alone the title of perfection, and take away the same from all the callings of God. Neither am I ignorant of that sophisticall solution, that it is not therefore so called because it doth containe perfection in it, but because it is the best of all other to attaine perfection. When they are disposed to boast themselues before the people, when to snare vnskilfull and vnware yonge men; when to maintaine their priuileges, when to aduaunce their owne dignity to the reproch of other, then they boast that they are in y^e state of perfection. When they are so nye driuen that they can not defend this vaine arrogance, then they flee to this starting hole, y^e they haue not yet attained perfection, but that they are in the same state wherein they aspire vnto it aboue other. In the meane time that admiration among the people remaineth, as though the only monkish life were angelike, perfect, & clesed from all fault. By this pretence they make most gaineful markets, but that same moderation lieth buried in a few bookes. Who doth not see that this is an intollerable mockery? But let vs so reason with thē, as though they gaue no more to their profession than to call it a state of attaining perfection. Verily in giuing it this name, they do as by a speciall marke make it differinge from other kindes of life. And who can abide this, that so great honor shoulde be giuen away to an ordinance that is no where by any one syllable allowed: and that by the same all other callinges of God, which are by his owne holy mouth not onely commaunded, but also commended with notable titles of praise, are by the same accounted vnworthy? And how great wrong (I besech you) is done to God, when I wote not what new founde thinge is preferred aboue all the kindes of life ordained by himselfe, and praised by his owne testimonie?

12 But go to, let them say that it is a sclander which I haue before said, that they are not cōtented with the rule prescribed of God. Yet though I hold my peace, they themselues do more than enough accuse themselues. For they openly teache, that they take vpon them more burdē than Christ laid vpon his: because forsooth they promise to kepe the counsels of the Gospel concerning louing their enemies, not coueting of reuenge, not swearing, &c. To which things Christians are not generally bound. Herein what antiquity will they shewe forth against vs? This neuer came in any of the old fathers mindes. They all crie out with one voice that there was no one litle word at all vttered of Christ, which ought not necessarily to be obeyed. And without any doutinge they do echewhere teache, that these very same thinges by name were commaundementes, which these good expositors triflingly say, that Christ did but counsell. But forasmuch, as we haue before taught that this is a most pestilent errour, lette it suffice here to haue briefly nored that the monkery which is at this day, is grounded vpon the same opinion, which all the godly ought worthily to abhorre: which is, that there shoulde be imagined some perfecter rule of life, than this common rule which is giuen of God to the whole Church. Whatsoever is builded vpon this foundation, can not be but abhominable.

13 But they bring an other prooffe of their perfection, which they thinke to be most strōg for them. For the Lord sayd to the yong man that asked him of the perfection of righteousnesse, If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast and giue it to the poore. Whether they do do so or no, I do not yet dispute: but graunt thē that for this present. Therefore they boast y they be made perfect by forsaking all theirs. If the summe of perfection stand in this, what meaneth Paul when he teacheth, that he which hath distributed all his goodes to the poore, vnlesse he haue charity, is nothing? What maner of perfectiō is this, which if charity be absent, is brought with man to nothings? Here they must nedes answer, that this is the chiefest in dede, but not the only worke of perfection. But here also Paul crieth against thē, which sticketh not to make charity the bonde of perfection, without any such forsaking. If it be certaine that betwene the maister & the disciple is no disagreement, and the one of them clearly denieth the perfection of man to consist in this y he should forsake all his goods, and againe affirmeth, that perfection is without it: we must see howe that sayinge of Christ is to be taken, If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast. Nowe, it shalbe no darke sense, if we wey (which we ought alway to marke in all the preachings of Christ) to whom these wordes be directed. A yong man asketh, by what workes he shall enter into euerlastinge life. Christ, because he was asked of workes, sendeth him to the law, & rightfully: for it is the way of eternall life, if it be considered in it selfe, and is no otherwise vnable to bringe saluation vnto vs but by our owne peruersenesse. By this answer Christ declared, that he teacheth no other rule to frame life by, than the same that had in olde time bin taught in the law of the Lord. So did he both giue witness to the lawe of God, that it was the doctrine of perfect righteousness: and therewithall did mete with sclaunders, that he shoulde not seeme by any new rule of life to stirre the people to forsaking of the law. The yonge man beinge in deede not of an euill minde, but swellinge with vaine confidēce, answered that he had from his childehoode kept all the commaundementes of the law. It is most certaine that he was an infinite space distant frō that to which he boasted that he had attained. And if his boasting had bin true, he had wanted nothings to the hiest perfection. For we haue before shewed, that the law containeth in it selfe perfect righteousness: and the same appeareth hereby, that the keping of it is called the way of eternall saluation. That he might be taught to knowe howe litle he had profited in that righteousness, which he had too boldly answered that he had fulfilled, it was profitable to shake out a familiar faule of his. When he abounded in riches, he had his hart fastened vpon them. Therefore because he felt not this secreete wound, Christ launced him. Go (sayth he) sell all that thou hast. If he had bin so good a keeper of the lawe as he thought he was, he woulde not haue gone away sorowfull when he heard this word. For who so loueth God with all his hart, whatsoeuer disagreeeth with the loue of him, he not onely taketh it for donge, but abhorreth as bringinge destruction. Therefore whereas Christ commaundeth the couetous riche man to leaue all that he hath; it is all one, as if he should commaund the ambitious man to forsake all honors, the voluptuous man all delites, and the vnchast man all the instrumentes of lust. So consciences that are touched with no feeling of generall admonition, must be called back to the particular feelinge of their owne euill. Therefore they do in vaine draw this speciall case to generall exposition, as though Christ did ser the perfection of man in forsaking of goods: whereas he ment nothing else by this sayinge, than to driue the yong man that stooode too much in his owne conceite, to feele his owne sore, that he might vnderstande that he was yet a great way distant from perfect obedience of the law, which otherwise he did falsly take vpon him. I graunt that this place hath bin euill vnderstanded of some of the fathers, & that therupon grew this coueting of wilful pouerty, wherby they onely were thought to be blessed, which forsaking all earthly things, did dedicate themselues naked to Christ. But I trust that all the good and not contentious men will be satisfied with this my exposition, so that they shall no more dout of the meaning of Christ. Howbeit the Fathers thought nothing lesse, than to stablish such a perfection, as hath since bin framed by the cowed Sophisters, thereby to raise vp a double Christianity. For that doctrine ful of sacrilege was not yet borne, which compareth the profession of monkery to Baptisme, yea and openly affirmeth, that it is a forme of second Baptisme. Who can dout that the Fathers with all their heart abhorred this blasphemy? Now as touchinge that last thinge, which Augustine sayth to haue bin among the olde Monkes, that is, that they applied themselues wholly to Charity: what neede I to shew in wordes that it is most farre from this newe profession? The thinge it selfe speaketh, that all they that go into Monasteries, depart from the Church. For why? Do not they seuer themselves from the lawfull felowship of the faithful, in taking to themselues a peculiar ministry and priuate ministracion of Sacramentes? What is it to dissolue the Communion of the Church, if this be not it? And (that I may follow the comparison which I began to make, and may once conclude it) what haue they in this behalfe like to the olde monkes? They although they dwelt seuerally from other men, yet had not a seuerall Church: they did partake of the sacramentes together with other: they appeared at solemne assemblies: there they were a part of the people. These men, in erecting to

themselues a priuate altar, what haue they else done but broken the bond of vnity? For they haue both excommunicate themselues from the whole body of the Church, & haue despised the ordinary ministry, whereby the Lord willed to haue peace & charity kept among his. Therefore howe many ministeries there be at this day, I say that there be so many assemblies of schismatikes, which troubling the order of the Church; are cut of from the lawfull felowship of the faithfull. And that this departing should not be secret, they haue giuen to theselues diuers names of sectes. Neither were they ashamed to boast of that, which Paul doth so detest that he can not sufficiently amplifie the hainoulnes of it. Vnlesse perhap we thinke that Christ was diuided of the Corinthians, when one gloried of one teacher, & another of another: & that now it is done without any iniury to Christ, that in stede of Christians we heare some called Benedictines, some Franciscanes, some Dominicans: & that they are so called, that they themselues when they couet to be seuerally knowen from the common sort of Christiãs, do with great pride take these titles to theiour the profession of their religion.

15 These differences which I haue hitherto rehearsed betwene the old monkes & the monkes of our age, are not differences in manners, but in the profession it selfe. Therefore let the readers remeber that I haue rather spokẽ of monkery than of monks, & haue touched those faultes, not which sticke in the life of a few of them, but which can not be seuered from their very order of liuinge it selfe. But what differẽce is in their maners, what nede I particularly to declare? This is certaine, that there is no degree of men more defiled with all filthinesse of vices: no where more are factions, hatredes, affections of parties, ambitions whorer than among them. In dede in a few monasteries they liue chastly, if it be to be called chastity where lust is so farre kept downe that it be not openly euill spoken of: yet a man shall scarcely finde euery tẽth monastery which is not rather a stewes thã a holy house of chastity. But what honest sparing is in their diet? Swine be none otherwise fatted in sties. But least they should complaine that I handle them too vngently, I go no further. Howebeit in those few things which I haue touched, whosoever knoweth the thinge it selfe will confesse that there is nothings spoken accuserlike. Augustine, when according to his testimony monkes excelled in so great chastity, yet complaineth that there were many vagabundes, which with euil craftes and deceites wiped simple men from their money, which with carying about the reliques of martyrs did vse filthy marchandisinges, yea and in stede of the reliques of martyrs did shew forth the bones of any other dead men, and which with many such wicked doinges sclaundered the order. As he reporteth that he sawe no better men than them which haue profited in monasteries, so he lamenteth that he hath seene no worse men than those that disprofited in monasteries. What would he say if at this day he saw all monasteries to swell, & in a maner to burst with so many & so despeired vices? I speake nothing but that which is well knowen to all men. Yet doth not this dispraise pertain to all without any exception at all. For as there was neuer rule & discipline of liuinge holily so stablished in monasteries, but that there remained some dranes much vnlike the rest: so I do not say that monkes are at this day so runne out of kinde from that holy antiquity, but that they haue yet some good men in their flock. But they lye hidden a few & scattered in y^e huge multitude of naughty & wicked men: and they are not only despised, but also lewdly railed at, & somtime cruelly handled of other, which (as the Milesians prouerbe is) thinke that there ought to be no place for any honest man among them.

16 By this comparison of the olde and present monkery, I trust I haue brought to passe that which I purposed, that it may appeare that our cowled menne do falsely pretende the example of the first Church for defence of their profession: forasmuch as they no lesse differ from them than apes from menne. In the meane time I sticke not to declare, that euen in that olde forme which Augustine commendeth, there is somewhat which litle pleaseth me. I graunt that they were not superstitious in exactinge the outwarde exercises of rougher discipline, but I say that there wated not too much affectatiō and wrongefull zeale. It was a goodly thinge, forsakinge their goods, to be without all earthly carefulnesse: but God more esteemeth care to rule a householde godlily, when a holy householder beinge loose and free from all couetousnesse, ambition, and other desires of the fleshe, trauaileth to this purpose to serue God in a certayne vocation. It is a goodly thing to play the Philosopher in wildernesse farre from the companie of men: but it agreeth not with Christian gentlenesse as it were for hatrede of mankinde to flie into deserte and solitarinesse, and therewithall to forsake those dueties which the Lorde hath chiefly commaunded. Although we graunt that there was no other euill in that profession, yet this verily was no small euill, that it brought an vnprofitable and perillous example into the Church

17 Nowe therefore lette vs see what maner of vowes they be, wherewith monkes at this day are professed into this goodly order.

First,

First, because their minde is to institute a new and fained worshippinge to deserue Gods fauour: I conclude by the things afore spoken that whatsoeuer they vowe is abhominable before God. Secondly without any regarde of Gods callinge, without any his allowance, they inuent for them such a kinde of liuing as pleaseth them selues. I say that it is a rashe and therefore an vnlawefull enterprise: because their conscience hath nothings whereupon it may vpholde it selfe before God, and whatsoeuer is not of faith, is sinne. Moreouer when they binde themselues to many peruerse and wicked worshippings, which the monkery at this day containeth in it. I affirme that they be not consecrate to God, but to the Deuill. For why was it lawefull for the Prophete to say, that the Israelites offered their children to Deuils and not to God: onely for this that they had corrupted the true worshippinge of God with prophane Ceremonies: and shall it not be lawefull for vs to say the same of monkes, which with their cowle do put vpon themselues a snare of a thousande wicked superstitions? Nowe what sortes of voves are there? They promise to God perpetuall virginity, as though they hadde bargained with God before, that he shoulde deliuer them from neede of marriage. There is no cause why they shoulde alleage, that they do not make this vowe but trustinge vpon the grace of God. For sith he pronounceth that he giueth it not to all men, it is not in vs to conceiue a confidence of a speciall gift. Lette them that haue it, vse it. If at any time they feele themselues to be troubled of their fleshe, let them flee to this helpe by whose onely power they may resist. If they preuaile not, let them not despise the remedy that is offered them. For they by the certaine worde of God are called to marriage, to whom power of continence is denied. Continence I call, not whereby the body is onely kept cleane from whoredome, but whereby the minde kepeth chastity vndefiled. For Paule commaundeth not only outward wantonnesse, but also the burninge of the minde, to be auoided. This (say they) hath from furthest time of memory bin obserued, that they which woulde dedicate themselues wholly to the Lord, should binde themselues to the vowe of continence. I graunt in deede that this maner hath also bin of auncient time receiued: but I do not graunt that that age was so free from all faulte, that whatsoener was then done must be taken for a rule. And by litle and litle this vnappeaseable seuerity crept in, that after a vowe made there was no roome for repentance. Which is euident by Ciprian. If virgins haue of Faith dedicated themselues to God, let them continue shamefastly, and chastly without any faining. So being strong and stedfast let them looke for the rewarde of virginity. But if they will not or can not continue, it is better that they shoulde mary than with their delightes fall into the fier. What reproches would they now spare to teare him withall, that would with such equity temper the vowe of continence? Therefore they are departed farre from that auncient manner, which will not only admit no moderation or pardon if any be founde vnable to performe his vowe: but they do without all shame pronounce that he sinneth more greuoussly if he remedy the intemperance of the fleshe with takinge a wife, than if he defile both his body and soule with whoredome.

18 But they still enforce the matter, and go about to shewe that such a yowe was vsed in the Apostles time: because Paule sayth that the widowes which hauing bin once receiued into the Publike ministry did mary, denied their first Faith. But I do not deny to them, that the widowes, which bounde themselues and their seruices to the Church, did therewithal take vpon them the bonde of continuall vnmarried life: not because they reposed any religion therein, as it afterward began to be vsed: but because they could not beare that offence but beinge at their owne liberty and loose from yoke of marriage. But if, when they had once giuen their Faith, they looked backe to new mariages, what was this else but to shake of the callinge of God? Therefore it is no maruell that with such desires he sayth that they waxe wanton against Christ. Afterwarde to amplifye the matter he sayth, that they do so not performe that which they haue promised to the Church, that they do also breake and make void their first Faith giuen in Baptisme: in which this is comprehended, that euery man should answere his calling. Vnlesse perhap you had rather vnderstand it thus, that hauing as it were lost all shame, they did from thence forth cast away all care of honesty, did giue forth themselues to all wantonnesse and vnchastity, and did in licentious and dissolute life resemble nothinge lesse than Christian women: which sense I like very well. Therefore we aunswere, that those widowes which were then receiued to Publike ministry, did lay vpon themselues a bonde to continue vnmarried: if they afterward married, we easily perceiue that that happened to them which Paule speaketh of, that casting away shame they became more wanton than besemed Christian women. That so they not only sinned, in breakinge their Faith giuen to the Church, but swarued from the common law of godly women. But first I deny that they did professe vnmarried life for any other reason, but because marriage agreed not with that ministry which they tooke in hande: & I deny that they did binde themselues at all to single life, but so far as the necessity of their vocation did beare. Againe I do not graunt that they were so bound, but that it was then also better for them to mary, than either to be troubled with the prickings of the flesh, or to fall into any vncleannesse. Thirdly I say that that age is appointed of Paul, which is commoly out of danger: specially sith he cōmaundeth them onely to be chosen, which contented with one mariage haue already shewed a token of their continence. And we do for no other reason disallow the vow of vnmarried life, but because it is both wrōgfully taken for a seruice of God, & it is rashly vowed of thē to whom power of continence is not giuen.

19 But how was it lawful to draw this place of Paule to Nunnes? For there were created deconisses, not to delite God with singing & with mumbling not vnderstanded, and liue the rest of their time idle: but that they should execute publike ministrations toward the poore, that they should with all study, earnestnesse, and diligence, endeouour thēselues to the duties of charity. They did not vowe vnmarried life, to yeelde thereby any worship to God because they abstained from mariage: but only because they were therby the more vncombred to execute their office. Finally they did not vowe it, either in the beginning of their youth, or yet in the midst of their flowing age, that they might afterward learne too late by experience into how great a headlonge downe fall they had thrown themselues: but when they seemed to haue passed all danger, thā they vowed a no lesse safe than holy vowe. But (not to enforce the first two pointes) I say it was not lawfull to haue women receiued to vowe continence before the age of three score yeares: forasmuch as the Apostle admitteth onely women of 60. yeares olde, and commaundeth the yonger to mary and bring forth children. Therefore neither that release made of 12. yeres, & then 20. & afterward of thirty yeares, can be any way excused: and much lesse is it tolerable, that silly maides, before that they can by age know themselues, or haue any experience of themselues, are not only trained by fraude, but cōstrained by force & threatnings to put on those cursed snares. I will not tary vpon confuting the other two voves. Only this I say: beside this that they be entangled with not a few superstitions, (as the matter is now a daies) they seme to be made to this purpose, that they which vow thē should mocke both God & men. But least we should seme too maliciously to shake vp euery small parcell, we will be content with that generall confutation which is aboue set.

20 What manner of voves be lawfull and acceptable to God, I thinke is sufficiently declared. Yet because sometime vnskillfull and fearefull consciences, euen when they mislike or disallow any vowe, do neuertheless dout of the binding, and are greuouly tormented, when they both drede to breake their Faith giuen to God, & on the other side they feare least they should more sinne in keeping it: here they are to be succoured, that they may winde themselues out of this distresse. But, to take away all dout at once: I say that all voves being not lawful, nor rightly made, as they are nothing worth before God, so ought to be void to vs. For if in contractes of men those promises onely do binde, in which he with whom we contract would haue vs boundent is an asurdity, that we should be driuen to the keepinge of those things which God doth not require of vs: specially sith our workes are no otherwise right, but when they please God, and when consciences haue this testimonie that they please him. For this remaineth certaine, whatsoeuer is not of Faith, is sinne. Whereby Paul meaneth, that the worke which is taken in hande with doutinge, is therefore faulty, because Fayth is the roote of all good workes, by which we are assured that they be acceptable to God. Therefore if it be lawfull for a Christian man to go about nothinge without this assurednes: if by fault of ignorance they haue taken any thing in hand, why shoulde they not afterward giue it ouer when they be deliuered from errors. Sith voves vnaduisedly made are such, they do not onely nothinge binde, but are necessarily to be vndone. Yea what if they are not onely nothing esteemed, but also are abhominable in the sight of God, as is aboue shewed? It is needlesse to discourse any longer of a matter not needefull. This one argument seemeth to me to be enough to pacifie godly consciences and deliuer them from all dout: that whatsoeuer workes do not flowe out of the pure fountaine & be not directed to the lawfull end, are refused of God: and so refused that he no lesse forbiddeth vs to go forwarde in them, than to beginne them. For hereupon followeth, that those voves which proceede of error and superstition, are both of no value before God, and to be forsaken of vs.

21. Moreouer he that shall know this solution, shall haue wherewith he may defende against the sclaunders of the wicked, them that departe from monkery to some honest kinde of life. They are greuouly accused of breache of Fayth and periury, because they haue broken (as it is commonly thought) the insoluble bonde wherewith they were bounde to God and to the Church. But I say that there was no bonde, where God doth abrogate that which mā confirmeth. Moreouer, admittinge that they were bounde, when they were holden entangled with not knowinge of God and with error: now since they are lightened with the knowledge of the trueth, I say that they are therewithall free by the grace of Christ. For if the crosse of Christ haue so great effectualnesse, that it looseth vs from the curse of the lawe of God, wherewith we were holden bonde, howe much more shall it deliuer vs from foreine bondes, which are nothings but the snaring nettes of Satan? To whomsoever therefore Christ shineth with the light of his Gospell, it is no dout that he looseth them from all snares which they hadde put vpon themselues by superstition. Howebeit they want not yet an other defense, if they were not fit to liue vnmarried. For if an impossible vowe be a sure destruction of the soule, whom the Lorde woulde haue saued and not destroyed: it followeth that we ought not to continue therein. But howe impossible is the vowe of continence to them that are not endued with a singular gift, we haue already taught, and experience speaketh it though I holde my peace. For neither is it vnknown with howe great filthines almost all monasteries do swarme. And if any of them seme honest, and more shamefast than the rest: yet they are not therefore chaste because they suppress and keepe in the fault of vnchastity. So verily God doth with horrible examples take vengeance on the boldnesse of men, which forgettinge their owne weakenesse, do against nature couet that which is denied them, and despisinge the remedies which the Lord had giuen them at hande, do trust that they can with stubbornnesse and obstinacy ouercome the disease of incontinence. For what else shall we call it but stubbornnesse, when one beinge warned that he needeth mariage, and that the same is giuen him of the Lord for a remedy, doth not onely despise it, but also bindeth himselfe with an oth to the despising of it?

The xiiij. Chapter.

Of Sacramentes.

BEside the preaching of the Gospell, an other help of like sorte is in the Sacramentes: of which to haue some certaine doctrine taught, is much behouefull for vs, wherby we may learne both to what ende they were ordained, and what is now the vse of them. First it is meete to consider what is a Sacrament. It seemeth to me that this shalbe a plaine and proper definition, if we say that it is an outward signe, wherwith the Lord sealeth to our consciences the promises of his good wil toward vs, to sustaine the weakenesse of our Faith: & we againe on our behalues do testifie our godlinesse toward him as well before him and the Angels as before men. We may also with more briefenesse define it otherwise: as to call it a testimony of Gods fauour toward vs confirmed by an outward signe, with a mutual testifying of our godlines toward him. Whethersoever you choose of these definitions, it differeth nothing in sense from that definition of Augustine, which teacheth that a Sacrament is a visible signe of a holy thing, or a visible forme of inuisible grace: but it doth better and more certainly expresse the thing it selfe. For whereas in that briefenesse there is some darkenes, wherein many of the vnskilfuller sort are deceiued, I thought good in moe words to giue a fuller sentence, that there should remaine no dout.

2 For what reason the olde wryters vsed this word in that sense, it is not hard to see. For so oft as the old translater would render in Latine this Greeke word Mysterion mysterie, specially whē diuine matters were entreated of, he translated it Sacrament. So to the Ephesians, That he might make knowen vnto vs the Sacrament of his will. Againe, if yet ye haue hearde the distribution of the grace of God, which is giuen to me in you, because according to reuelation the Sacrament was made knowen to me. To the Colossians, The mystery which hath bin hidden from ages and generations, but now is manifested to his Saintes, to whom the Lord would make knowen the riches of this Sacramēt. &c. Againe to Timothee, A great Sacrament of godlinesse: God is openly shewed in the fleshe. He would not say a secret, least he should seeme to say somewhat vnder the greatnes of the things. Therefore he hath put Sacrament in stede of Secret, but of a holy thing. In that signification it is sometime founde among the ecclesiasticall wryters. And it is well enough knowen, that those which in Latine are called Sacraments, in Greeke are Mysteries: which expressing of one thing in two seuerall words endeth all the contentiō. And hereby it came to passe that it was drawē to those signes which had a reuerende representation of hie and spirituall things. Which Augustine also noteth in one place. It were long (saith he) to dispute of the diuersity of signes, which when they pertaine to diuine things, are called Sacramentes.

3 Now of this definition which we haue set, we vnderstande that a Sacrament is neuer without a promise going before it, but rather is adioyned as a certaine addition hanginge to it, to this ende that it should confirm and seale the promise it selfe, and make it more approued vnto vs, yea after a certaine maner ratified. Which meane the Lorde foreseeeth to be needefull first for our ignorance and dullnesse, and then for our weakenesse: and yet (to speake properly) not so much to confirme his holy word, as to stablish vs in the Fayth therof.

For

For the truth of God is by it selfe sounde and certaine enough, and can not from any other where receiue better cōfirmation than from it selfe. But our Faith, as it is smal and weake, vnlesse it be stayed on euery side, and be by all meanes vpholden, is by and by shaken, waue-reith, staggereth, yea and fainteth. And herein verily the mercifull Lorde according to his great tender kindnesse tempereth himselfe to our capacitie: that, whereas we be naturall men, which alway creping vpon the grounde and sticking fast in the flesh, do not thinke nor so much as conceiue any spirituall thing, he vouchesaueth euen by these earthly elements to guide vs vnto himselfe, and in the flesh it selfe to set foorth a mirror of spirituall good things. For if we were vnbody (as Chrysostome saith) he would haue geuen vs the very same things naked and vnbody. Nowe because we haue soules put within bodies, he geueth spirituall things vnder visible things. Not because there are such giftes planted in the natures of the things which are set foorth to vs in the Sacraments: but because they were signed by God to this signification.

4 And this is it which they cōmonly say, that a Sacrament consisteth of the word and the outward signe. For we must vnderstande the worde to be, not that which being whispered without meaning and Faith, with onely noise as it were with a magicall enchauntment hath power to consecrate the element: but which being preached maketh vs to vnderstande what the visible signe meaneth. Therefore that which was vsually done vnder the tyrannie of the Pope, was not without a great profaning of the misteries. For they thought it inough, if the Priest, while the people stode amasedly gazing at it without vnderstanding, did mumble vp the forme of cōsecration. Yea they of set purpose prouided this, that no whit of doctrine should thereof come to the people: for they spake all things in Latine before vnlearned men. Afterwarde superstition brake out so farre, that they beleued that the consecration was not formally made, vnlesse it were with a hoarse whispering sounde which fewe might heare. But Augustine teacheth farre otherwise of the Sacramentall word. Let the word (saith he) be added to the element, and there shalbe made a Sacrament. For whense cometh this so great strength to the water, to touch the body and washe the soule, but by the word making it? not because it is spoken, but because it is beleued. For in the very word it selfe the sounde which passeth is one thing, and the power which abideth is an other. This is the worde of Faith which we preach, saith the Apostle. Whereupon in the Actes of the Apostles it is said, by Faith cleansing their hartes. And Peter the Apostle saith.

So Baptisme also saueth vs: not the putting away of y^e filthines of the flesh, but the examinatioⁿ of a good cōscience. This is y^e word of Faith which we preach: by which without dout, y^e it may be able to cleanse, Baptisme also is halowed. You se howe it requireth preaching, wher-vpon Faith may grow. And we neede not to trauaile much in profe hereof, forasmuch as it is clere what Christ did, what he commaunded vs to do, what the Apostles followed, what the purer Church obserued. Yea euen from the beginning of the world it is knowen, that so oft as God offred any signe to the holy Fathers, there was added an vnseparable knot of doctrine, without which our senses should be made amased with bare beholding. Therefore when we heare mention made of the Sacramentall word, let vs vnderstand the promise, which being with a loude voice preached of the minister may leade the people thether as it were by the hande, whether the signe tendeth and directeth vs.

5 Neither are some to be heard which trauaill to fight against this, with a double horned argument rather suttile than sounde. Either (say they) we knowe, or we knowe not, that the word of God which goeth before the Sacrament, is the true will of God. If we know it, then we learne no new thing of the Sacramēt which followeth after. If we knowe it not, then neither will the Sacrament teach it, whoes whole force standeth in the word. Whereunto let this brefely be for an aunswere: that the seales which are hanged at patentes and other publike instruments, taken by themselues are nothing, forasmuch as they should be hanged in vaine if the parchment had nothing written in it: yet they do not therefore not confirme and seale that which is written, when they be added to writings. Neither can they say that this similitude is lately fained by vs, which Paule himselfe vsed, calling Circumcision a seale, where he purposely trauaileth to proue, that Circumcision was not righteousnesse to Abraham, but a sealing of that couenaunte, by faith whereof he had already bene iustified before. And what, I besech you, is there that may much offende any man, if we teach that the promise is sealed with Sacramēts, when of the promises themselues it is euident that one is confirmed with an other? For as euery one is manifest, so is it more fit to vpholde faith. But the Sacramēts do both bring most clere promises, and haue this peculiar more than the word, that they liuely represent them to vs as it were painted out in a table. Neither ought that distinction any thing to moue vs, which is wont to be obiected, betweene Sacraments and seales of patentes: that whereas both consist of carnall elements of this world, those can not suffice or be mete to

seale the promises of God, which are spirituall and euerlasting, as these are wont to be hanged to, for sealing of the graunts of Princes concerning fading and fraile things. For a faithfull man, when the Sacraments are presente before his eyes, sticketh not in that fleshly sight, but by those degrees of proportion, which I haue spoken of, he riseth vp with godly cōsideration to the hy misteries which lie hidden in the Sacraments.

6 And sith the Lorde calleth his promises, couenantes: and his Sacraments, seales, of couenantes: a similitude may well be brought from the couenātes of men. What can a sowe killed worke, if wordes were not vsed, yea vnlesse they wente before? For sowes are many times killed without any more inwarde or hier misterie. What can the geuing of a mans right hande do, sith oftentimes handes are matched with enmitie? But when wordes haue gone before, by such signes the lawes of leagues are stablished, although they were first conceiued, made, and decreed in wordes. Therefore Sacraments are exercises which make the credit of the word of God certainer vnto vs: & because we are carnall, they are deliuered vnder carnall things: that so they should instruct vs according to the capacitie of our dullnesse, and guide vs by the hande as scholl maisters guide children. For this reason Augustine calleth a Sacrament, a visible word: because it representeth the promises of God as it were painted in a table, and setteth them before our sight continually expressed and as in an image. Other similitudes also may be brought, whereby Sacraments may be more plainly set out, as if we call them pillers of our Faith. For as a bilding standeth and resteth vpon the fundatiō: yet by setting vnder of pillers, it is more surely stablished: so: Faith resteth vpon the word of God, as vpon a foundation: but when Sacraments are added, it staieth yet more soundly vpon them as vpon pillers. Or if we call them loking glasses, in which we may beholde the richesse of the grace of God, which he geueth vs. For (as we haue already said) he doth in them manifestly shewe himselfe to vs, so much as is geuen to our dullnesse to knowe, and doth more expressely testifie his good will and loue toward vs than by his word.

7 Neither do they reason fitly enough to the purpose, when they labor to proue hereby that they are not: testimonies of the grace of God, because they are also geuen to the wicked, which yet do thereby fele God nothing more fauourable to them, but rather procure to themselues more greuous damnation. For by the same argument neither should the Gospell, which is heard and despised of many, be the testimony of the grace of God: nor yet Christ himself, which was seen and knowen of many, of whom very fewe receiued him. The like we may also see in patentes. For a greate parte of the multitude laugheth at and scorneth that authentike seale, howsoeuer they knowe that it proceded from the Prince to seale his will withall: some regarde it not, as a thing not pertaineing to them: some also abhorre it: so that cōsidering this so egall relation of both, that same similitude which I haue aboue vsed, ought more and more to be liked. Therefore it is certaine that the Lord doth offer vnto vs mercy and a pledge of his grace both in his holy word and in the Sacraments: but the same is not receiued but of them which receiue the word and Sacraments with sure Faith: like as Christ is offered of the Father vnto saluatiō, to all, yet he is not acknowledged and receiued of all. Augustine in one place minding to declare the same, said that the effectualnesse of the word is shewed foorth in the Sacrament: not because it is spoken, but because it is beleued. Therefore Paule, when he speket to the faithfull, so entreateth of Sacraments that he includeth the communion of Christ in them, as when he saith: all ye that are Baptised, haue put on Christ. Againe, we are all one body and one Spirit, which are Baptised in Christ. But when he speaketh of the wrongfull vse of Sacraments, he geueth no more to it than to colde and voide figures. Whereby he signifieth, that howsoeuer the wicked & hypocrites with their peruersnesse do either oppresse or darken or hinder the effect of the grace of God in the Sacraments, yet that withstandeth not but that where and so ofte as it pleaseth God, both they may bring a true testimonie of the communicating of Christ, and the Spirite of God himselfe may deliuer and performe that which they promise. We determine therefore that Sacraments are truely called testimonies of the grace of God, and as it were certaine scales of the good will which he beareth toward vs: which by sealing it vnto vs, do by this meane susteine, nourish, confirme, & encrease our faith. As for the reasons which some are wont to obiekt against this sentence, they are to trifling and weake. They say that if our Faith be good, it can not be made better: for they say that it is no Faith, but which without shaking, stedfastly, and without withdrawing, resteth vpon the mercy of God. It had bene better for such to pray with the Apostles that the Lorde would encrease their Faith, than carelesly to pretēde such a perfection of faith, which neuer any of the sonnes of men hath obtained, nor any shall obtaine in this life. Let them answer, what maner of faith they thinke that he had which said: I beleue Lorde, helpe my vnbeleuingnesse. For euen that faith, howsoeuer it was but a begon faith, was a good faith, and might be made better when vnbeleuingnesse were taken away. But they are confuted by no certainer argument than by their owne conscience. For if they confesse themselues sinners, (which whether they will or no they can not denie) they must needes impute the same to the imperfection of their faith.

8 But (say they) Philip answered the Eunuch, that he might be Baptized, if he beleued with all his hart. What place here hath the confirmation of Baptisme, where faith filleth the whole hart? Againe I aske them whether they do not fele a good parte of their hart void of faith: whether they do not daily acknowledge newe encreases. The heathen manne gloried that he waxed olde with learning. Therefore we Christians be thirse miserable, if we waxe olde with profiting nothing, whoes faith ought to go forwarde by all degrees of ages, till it growe into a perfect man. Therefore in this place to beleue with all the hart, is not perfectly to beleue Christ, but onely from the hart and with a sincere minde to embrace him: not to be full with him, but with feruent affection to hunger, & thirst, and sigh towarde him. This is the maner of the Scripture, to say that that is done with the whole hart, which it meaneth to be done sincerely and hartily. Of this sort are these sayings: I haue in all my hart sought thee: I will confesse to thee in all my hart, and such other. As on the other side, where he rebuketh guilefull and deceitfull men, he vseth to reproch them with hart and hart. Then they say further, that if faith be encreased by Sacraments, the Holy Ghost is geuen in vaine whoes strength and worke it is to begin, maintein, and make perfect faith. To whom in deede I graunt, that faith is the propre and whole work of the holy Ghost, by whom being enlightened we knowe God and the treasure of his goodnesse, and without whoes light our minde is so blinde, that it can see nothing, so senslesse, that it can smell nothing of spirituall things. But for one benefite of God which they set forth, we consider three. For first the Lorde teacheth and instructeth vs with his word: then he strengtheneth vs with Sacraments; last of all he shineth into our mindes with the light of his holy Spirit, & openeth an entrie for the word and Sacraments into our hartes, which otherwise should but strike our eares, and be present before our eyes, and nothing moue the inward partes.

9 Wherefore as touching the cōfirmation and encrease of faith, I would haue the reader warned (which I thinke I haue already in plaine wordes expressed) that I do so assigne that ministerie to the Sacramentes, not as though I thought that there is perpetually in them I wote not what secret force, by which they may of themselues be able to further or confirme faith : but because they are ordained of the Lorde to this ende , that they should serue to the stablishing and encreasing of faith. But then onely they do truly performe their office, when that inwarde schoolemaister the Spirit is come to them, with whoes onely power both the hartes are pearced, and affections are moued , and the entrie is set open for the Sacraments into our soules. If he be absente , Sacraments can do no more to our mindes, than if either the brightnesse of the sunne should shine vppon blinde eyes, or a voice sounde to deafe eares. Therefore I so make diuision betweene the Spirit and sacraments, that the power of workinge remaine with the spirit , and to the Sacraments be left onely the ministration, yea and the same voide and trifling without the working of the spirit : but of much effectuallnesse, when he inwardly worketh & putteth forth his force. Nowe it is plaine in what sorte according to this sentence, a godly minde is confirmed in the faith by Sacraments: that is to say, euen as the eyes see by the brightnesse of the sunne, and the eares heare by the sounde of a voice : of which neither the eyes should any whit perceiue any light , vnlesse they had a sight in themselves that might naturally be enlightened : and the eares should in vaine be knocked at with any crying whatsoever it were, vnlesse they were naturally made and fit to heare. But if it be true , which ought at ones to be determined among vs , that what the sight worketh in our eyes to seing of the light, what the hearing worketh in our eares to the perceiuing of a voice, the same is the worke of the holy Ghost in our hartes, both to the conceiuing, & sustaining, and cherishing and stablishing of faith : then both these things do likewise followe: that the Sacraments do nothing at all profite without the power of the holy Ghost : and that nothing withstandeth but that in hartes already taught of that scholemaister , they may make faith both stronger and more encreased. Onely this difference there is, that the power of hearing and seing is naturally set in our eares and eyes: but Christ beside the measure of nature doth by speciall grace worke the same in our mindes.

10 Whereby those obiections also , which comber some men, are dissolued : That if we ascribe to creatures either the encrease or confirmation of faith, there is wronge done to the Spirit of God, whom we ought to acknowledge the only author therof. For neither do we in the meane time take from him the praise either of confirming or encreasing it : but rather we affirme, that euen this that he encreaseth and confirmeth faith , is nothing els but with his inward enlightning to prepare our mindes to receiue that confirming which is set forth by the Sacraments. But if it be yet to darkly spoken, it shall be made very clere by a similitude which I will bring. If thou purpose with wordes to perswade a man to do any thing, thou wilt search out all the reasons, whereby he may be drawen to thy opinion, and may be in a maner subdued to obey thy counsell. But thou hast hetherto nothing preuailed, vnlesse he likewise haue a pearcing and sharpe iudgement, whereby he may weye what pith is in thy reasons: vnlesse also he haue a tractable wit and ready to harken to teaching: finally vnlesse he haue conceiued such an opinion of thy faithfulness and wisdom, as may be to him like a certaine fore-iudgement to cause him to subscribe. For both there are many stubborn heads, which a man can neuer bowe with any reasons: and also where credite is suspected, where authoritie is despised, little good is done euen with the willing to learne. On the other side let all those things be present, they will truely bring to passe that the hearer, to whom thou geuest counsell, will obey the selfe same counsels which otherwise he would haue laughed to scorne. The same worke also the Spirit worketh in vs. For least the word should beate our eares in vaine, least the Sacramentes should strike our eyes in vaine, he sheweth vs that it is God which speaketh therein, he softeneth the stubbornesse of our heart, and frameth it to the obedience which is due to the word of the Lorde. Finally he conueyeth those outward wordes and Sacramentes from the eares into the soule. Therefore both the word & the Sacraments do confirme our faith, whē they set before our eyes the good will of the heauenly father toward vs, by knowledge of whom both the whole stedfastnesse of our faith standeth fast, and the strength of it encrease: the Spirit confirmeth it, when in engraving the same confirmation in our mindes he maketh it effectuell. In the meane time the father of lightes can not be forbidden, but as he enlightneth the bodily eyes with the beames of the sunne, so he may enlightē our mindes with sacraments, as with a brightnesse set meane betweene.

11 Which proprietie the Lorde taught that there was in his outward word, when in the parable he called it seede. For as seede, if it fall vpon a desert and vntilled peece of ground, will do nothing but
 die. but if it be throwen vpon arable lande well manured and tilled, it will bring forth her fruit with very good encrease: so the word of God, if it light vpon a stiffe necke, it will growe barrein as that which is sown vpon sande: but if it light vpon a soule manured with the hande of the heauenly Spirit, it will be most fruitfull. But if there be like reason of seede and of the word: as we say that out of seede corne both springeth and encrease, and groweth vp to ripenesse: why may we not say that faith taketh out of the word of God both beginning, encrease, and perfection. Paule very well expresseth both these things in sundry places. For when he goeth about to put the Corinthians in remembrance howe effectually God vsed his trauaile, he glorieth that he hath the ministerie of the Spirit, as though the power of y^e holy Ghost were with an vnseparable knot joined with his preaching, to enlighten and thoroughly moue the minde. But in an other place when he mindeth to admonish them, of what force the word of God is of it selfe being preached by man, he compareth the ministers themselues to husbandmen, which when they haue bestowed their labor and trauaile in tilling the earth, haue no more to do. But what should tilling, and sowing, and watering profit, vnlesse that which is sown should receiue liuelinesse by heavenly benefite? Therefore he concludeth, that both he that planteth and he that watereth are nothing: but that all things are to be ascribed to God, which alone geueth the encrease. Therefore the Apostles do in their preaching vter the power of the Spirit, so farre as God vseth the instruments ordeined by himselfe to the setting forth of his spirituall grace. Yet we must kepe still that distinction, that we remembre, what man is able to do by himselfe, and what is propre to God.

12 Sacraments are so cōfirmations of our faith, that many times when the Lorde meaneth to take away the confidence of the very things that are by him promised in the Sacraments, he taketh away the sacraments themselues. When he spoileth and thrusteth away

Genes. 3. 3.

Adam from the giste of immortalitie, he saith: Let him not eate of the fruit of life, least he liue for euer. What saith he? Could that fruit restore to Adam his vncorruption, from which he was nowe fallen. No. But this is all one as if he had said: Least he should enioy a vaine confidence if he kepe still the signe of my promise, let that be shaken away from him which might bring him some hope of immortalitie.

12. Ephe. 2.

After this maner when the Apostle exhorteth the Ephesians to remembre that they were forein gistes of the testaments, strangers from the fellowship of Israell, without God, without Christ, he saith, that they were not partakers of Circumcision. Whereby he doth (by figure of transnominacion) signifie that they were excluded from the promise it selfe, which had not receiued the signe of the promise. To their other obiection, that the glory of God is conueyed to creatures, to whom so much power is ascribed, and that thereby it is so farre diminished, we haue in redinesse to aunswere that we set no power in creatures. Onely this we say, that God vseth meanes and instruments, which he himselfe seeth to be expedient: that all things may serue his glorie, forasmuch as he is Lorde and iudge of all. Therefore as by bread and other nourishments he feedeth our body: as by the sunne he enlightneth the world: as by fire he warmeth: yet neither bread, nor the sunne, nor fire, are any thinge but so farre as by those instruments he doth distribute his blessings vnto vs: so spiritually he nourisheth faith by the Sacraments, whose onely office is to set his promises before our eyes to be looked vpon, yea to be pledges vnto vs of them. And as it is our duetic to fasten none of our affiance in other creatures, which by the liberality and bountifulnesse of God are ordeined to our vses, and by the ministry whereof he geueth vs his giftes, nor to haue them in admiration, and praise them as causes of our good: so neither ought our confidence to sticke fast in the Sacraments, nor the glorie of God to be remoued vnto them: but leauing all things, both our faith and confession ought to rise vp to him the author both of the sacraments and of all things.

13. Whereas some bring an argument out of the very name of a Sacrament, it is nothing strong. A sacrament (say they) whereas it hath among allowed authors many significations, yet it hath but one which agreeth with the signes: that is, whereby it signifieth that solemne othe which the soldior maketh to his capitaine when he entreteth into professiō of a soldior. For as by that othe of warfare newe soldiors do binde their faith to the capitaine, and professe to be his soldiors: so by our signes we professe Christ our capitaine, and do testifie that we serue vnder his banner. They adde similitudes to make therby the matter more plaine. As a gowne made the Romains seuerally knowen from the Grekes which did weare clokes: as the very degrees of men at Rome were discerned by their seueral signes: the degree of Senators from the degree of knightes, by purple cote and piked shooes: againe a knight from a commoner, by a ring: so we beare our signes that may make vs seuerally knowen from prophane men. But by the things aboue said it is euident enough that the olde writers, which gaue to the signes the name of Sacraments, hadde no regarde howe this word was vsed among Latine writers, but for their owne purpose fained this newe signification, whereby they signified onely holy Signes. But if we will searche the matter more depely, it may seeme that they haue with the same relation applied this word to such a significatiō, wherewith they haue remoued the name of faith to that sense wherein it is nowe vsed. For whereas faith is a truth in performing promises: yet they haue called faith an assurednesse, or sure persuasion which is had of the truth it selfe. Likewife whereas a sacrament is the soldiors part whereby he voweth himselfe to his capitaine: they haue made it the capitaines parte, whereby he receiueth soldiors into roomes of seruice. For by the sacrament the Lorde doth promise that he will be our God, and that we shall be his people. But we passe ouer such subtleties: forasmuch as I thinke I haue proued with arguments plaine enough, that they hadde respect to nothing els but to signifie that these are Signes of holy and spirituall things. We receiue in deede the similitudes which they bring of outward tokens: but we allowe not that that which is the last point in the sacraments, is by them set for the chief yea and onely thing. But this is the first point, that they should serue our faith before God: the later point that they should testifie our confession before men. According to this later consideration those similitudes haue place. But in the meane time let that first point remaine: because otherwise (as we haue already proued) the misteries should be but colde, vnlesse they were helpes to our faith, and additions to doctrine ordeined to the same vse and ende.

14 Againe we must be warned, that as these men do weaken the force, and vtterly ouerthrowe the vse of sacraments: so on the contrarie side there be some, which faine to sacraments, I wote not what secret vertues, which are no where red to be put in them by God. By which error the simple and vnskillfull are dangerously deceiued, while they are both taught to seke the giftes of God where they can not be founde, and are by little and little drawn away from God, to embrace mere vanitie in steede of his veritie. For the Sophisticall schooles haue taught with great consent, that the Sacraments of the newe lawe, that is to say those which are nowe in vse in the Christian Church, do iustifie and geue grace, so that we do not lay a stoppe of deadly sinne. It can not be expressed howe pernicious and pestilent this opinion is, and so much the more, because in many ages heretofore, to the great losse of the Church it hath preuailed in a great part of the world: Truely it is vtterly deuelish. For when it promiseth righteousnesse without faith, it driueth soules hedlong into destruction: then because it fetcheth the cause of righteousnesse from the sacraments, it binderth the miserable mindes of men already of their owne accorde to much bending to the earth, with this superstition that they rather rest in the sight of a bodily thing than of God himselfe. Which two things I would to God we had not so proued in experience, so little neede they any long profe. But what is a sacramēt taken without faith, but the most certaine destruction of the Church? For whereas nothing is to be looked for thereof without the promise, and the promise mise doth no lesse threaten wrath to the vnfaithfull, than it offreth grace to the faithfull: he is deceiued that thinketh that there is any more geuen to him by the sacraments, than that which being offred by the word of God, he receiueth by tauch. Whereupon an other thing also is gathered, that the affiance of saluation hangeth not vpon the partaking of the sacrament, as though Iustification consisted therein: which we knowe to be reposed in Christ onely, and to be communicated vnto vs no lesse by the preaching of the Gospell, than by the sealing of the sacrament: and that without that it can not wholly stande. So true is that which Augustine also writeth, that inuisible sanctification may be without a visible signe, and againe that a visible signe may be without true sanctification. For (as he also writeth in an other place,) men do put on Christ sometime vntill the receiuing of a sacrament, sometime euen vntill the sanctification of life. And that first point may be common both to good and to euill: but this other is propre to the good and godly.

15 Hereupon cometh that distinction if it be well vnderstanded, which the same Augustine hath often noted, betweene a sacrament, and the thing of the sacrament. For it not onely signifieth, that the figure and truth are there contained, but that they do not so hang together but that they may be seuered: and that euen in the very conioining the thing must alway be discerned from the signe, that we geue not to the one that which belongeth to the other. He speaketh of the separation, when he writeth that the sacraments do worke in the onely elect that which they figure. Againe, when he writeth thus of the Iewes: When the sacraments were common to all, the grace was not common, which is the power of the sacraments. So nowe also the washing of regeneration is common to all: but the grace it selfe, whereby the membres of Christ are regenerate with their bed, is not common to all. Againe in an other place of the Supper of the Lorde, We also at this day receiue visible meate. But the sacrament is one thing, and the power of the sacrament an other thing. What is this, that many receiue of the altar and dy, and in receiuing do dy? For the Lordes morsell was poison to Iudas: not because he receiued an euell thing, but because he being euell receiued a good thing euelly. A little after. The sacrament of this thing, that is of the vnitie of the body and blood of Christ, is somewhere prepared on the Lordes table daily, somewhere by certaine distances of dayes: and thereof is receiued vnto life to some, and vnto destruction to some. But the thing it selfe whereof it is a sacrament, is receiued vnto life to all men, but vnto destruction to no man, whosoever is partaker of it. And a little before he had said, He shall not dy which eateth: but he which pertaineth to the power of the sacrament, not to the visible sacrament: which eateth within, not without: which eateth with hart, not he which presseth with tooth. Thus you heare euery where, that a sacrament is so seuered from his owne truth by the vnworthinesse of the receiuer, that there remaineth nothing but a vaine and vnprofitable figure. But that thou maist haue not a signe voide of truth: but the thing with the signe, thou must conceiue by faith the word which is there enclosed. So howe much thou shalt by the sacraments profite in communicating of Christ, so much profite shalt thou take of them.

16 If this be somewhat darke because of the shortenesse, I will set it out in mo wordes. I say that Christ is the matter, or (if thou wilt) the substance of all sacraments: forasmuch as in him they haue all their perfectnesse, and do promise nothing without him. So much lesse tolerable is the error of Peter Lombard, which doth expressly make them causes of righteousnesse and saluation, whereof they be partes. Therefore bidding all causes farewell which mans wit doth faine to it selfe, we ought to stay in this one cause. Therefore howe much we be by their ministry holpen to the nourishing, confirming, and encreasing of the true knowledge of Christ in vs, and to the possessing of him more fully, and to the enioying of his richesse, so much effectualnesse they haue with vs. But that is done when we do with true faith receiue that which is there offered. Do the wicked then (wilt thou say) bring to passe by their vnthankfulnesse, that the ordinance of God be voide and turne to nothing? I aunswer that that which I haue said, is not so to be taken, as though the force and truth of the sacrament did hang vpon the state or will of him that receiuet it. For that which God hath ordeined remaineth steadfast and kepeth still his nature, howesoever men do varie. But sith it is one thing to offre, an other to receiue: nothing withstandeth but that the signe halowed by the word of God may be in deede that which it is called, and kepe his owne force: and yet that there come thereby no profit to an euell doer and wicked man. But Augustine doth in fewe wordes well assoile this question. If (saith he) thou receauest carnally, it ceaseth not to be spirituall: but it is not to thee. But as Augustine hath in the aforesaid places shewed that a sacrament is a thing nothing worth, if it be seuered from the truth thereof: so in an other place he geueth warning that euen in the very coniointing needeth a distinction, least we sticke to much in the outward signe. As (saith he) to followe the letter, and to take the signes in steede of the things, is a point of a seruile weakenesse: so to expounde the signes vnprofitably is a point of euell wandring error. He nameth two faultes which are here to be auoided: The one when we so take the signes as though they were geuen in vaine, and when with abacing or diminishing their secrete significations by our enuiousnesse, we bring to passe that they bring vs no profite at all. The other, when in not raising our mindes beyonde the visible signe, we geue away to the sacrament the praise of all those good things which are not geuen vs but of Christ onely, and that by the Holy Ghost, which maketh vs partakers of Christ himselfe: and in deede by the helpe of the outwarde signes: which if they allure vs to Christ, when they be wrested an other way, the whole profite of them is vnworthily ouerthrowen.

17 Wherefore let this remaine certaine, that there is no other office of the sacraments than of the word of God: which is to offer and set forth Christ vnto vs, and in him the treasures of heauenly grace: but they auaille or profit nothing, but beinge receiued by faith: euen as wine, or oile, or any other liquor, though you poure it on largely, yet it will runne beside & perish, vnlesse the vessels mouth be open to receiue it, and the vessell though it be wette rounde about on the outside, shall neuerthelessse remaine emptie and void within. Beside this we must beware, least those things which haue bene writtē by the olde writers somewhat to gloriously to amplifie the dignitie of sacraments, should leade vs away into an error nere to this: namely that we shoulde thinke that there is some secret power knit and fastened to the sacraments, that they may of themselues geue vs the graces of the Holy Ghost, like as wine is geuen in a cup: whereas onely this office is appointed to them by God, to testifie and stablish to vs the good will of God toward vs, and do profite no further vnlesse the Holy Ghost ioine himselfe to them, which may open our mindes and hartes, and make vs partakers of this testimonie, wherein also do clerely appere diuers and seuerall graces of God. For the sacraments, as we haue aboue touched, are that thing to vs of God, which to men are messangers of ioyfull things, or earnestes in stablishing of bargaines: which do not of themselues geue any grace, but do tell and shewe vs, and (as they be earnestes and tokens,) do ratifie vnto vs those things that are geuen vs by the liberalitie of God. The Holy Ghost (whom the sacraments do not in comon without difference bring to all men, but whom the Lorde peculiarly geueth to them that be his) is he that bringeth the graces of God with him, which geueth to the sacraments place in vs, which maketh them to bring forth fruit. But although we do not denie that God himselfe with the most present power of his Spirit is present with his owne institution, least the ministrations which he hath ordeined of the sacraments should be fruitlesse & vaine: yet we affirme that the inward grace of the Spirit, as it is seuered from the outward ministerie, so ought to be seuerally weyed and considered. God therefore truely performeth in deede whatsoever he promiseth and figureth in signes: neither do the signes want their effect, that the author of them may be proued true and faithfull. The question here is onely whether God worketh by his owne and by inward power (as they call it) or do resigne his office to outwarde signes. But we affirme, that whatsoever instruments he vse, his originall working is nothing hindered thereby. When this is taught concerning the sacraments, both their dignitie is honorably set out, and their vse is plainly shewed, and their profitableness is abundantly reported, and the best meane in all these things is retained, that neither any thing be geuen to them which ought not, nor againe any thing be taken from them which is not cōuenient to be taken from them. In the meane time that fained deuise is taken away, whereby the cause of iustification and power of the Holy Ghost is enclosed in elements as in vessels or waggons, and that principall force which hath bene omitted of other is expressly set out. Here also it is to be noted, that God inwardly worketh that which the minister figureth and testifieth by outward doing: least that be drawn to a mortall man, which God claimeth to himselfe alone. The same thing also doth Augustine wisely touch. Howe (saith he) doth both Moses sanctifie, and God? Not Moses for God: but Moses with visible sacraments by his ministerie, but God with inuisible grace by his holy Spirit: where also is the whole fruit of visible sacraments. For without this sanctification of inuisible grace, what do those visible sacraments profite?

18 The name of sacramēt, as we haue hetherto entreated of the nature of it, doth generally conteine all the signes that euer God gaue to men, to certifie and assure them of the truth of his promises. Those he sometime willed to remaine in naturall things, sometime he deliuered them in miracles. Of the first kinde these be examples, as when he gaue to Adam and Eue, the tree of life for an earnest of immortallitie, that they might assure themselues of it, so long as they did eate of the frute thereof. And when he did set the heauenly boaw for a monument, to Noe and his posteritie, that he would no more from thence forth destroy the earth with ouerflowing of water. These Adam and Noe had for sacraments. Not that the tree did geue them immortalitie, which it could not geue to it selfe : nor that the Boawe (which is but a striking backe of a sunbeame vpon the cloudes against it) was of force to hold in the waters : but because they had a marke grauen in them by the word of God , that they should be examples and seales of his testaments. And the tree was a tree before, and the boawe a boawe. When they were written vpon with the word of God , then a newe forme was put into them , that they shoulde begin to be that which they were not before. That no man should thinke these things spoken without cause , the boawe it selfe is at this day also a witness of that couenant, which God made with Noe; which boawe so ofte as we beholde, we reade this promise of God wrytten in it, that the earth shall neuer be destroyed with ouerflowing of waters. Therefore if any fonde Philosopher, to scorne the simplicitie of our faith , do affirme that such varietie of colours doth naturally arise of reflected beames and a cloude set against them: let vs graunt it in deede , but let vs laugh to scorne his senselesse foillie, which doth not acknowledge God the Lorde and gouernor of nature : which at his owne will vseth all the elements to the seruice of his owne glory. If he had emprinted such tokens in the sunne, the starres, the earth, stones, and such like, they should all haue bene sacraments to vs. Why are not vncoined and coined siluer both of one value, sith they are both one metall? euen because the one hath nothing but nature : when it is striken with a common marke, it is made money, and receiueh a newe valuation. And shall not God be able to marke his creatures with his word , that they may be made sacraments, which before were naked elemets? Of the second kinde these were examples , when he shewed to Abraham a light in a smoking ouen : when he watered the flece with dewe , the earth remaining dry : againe he watered the earth, the flece being vntrouched, to promise victory to Gedeon: when he drewe the shadowe of the diall ix. lines backward, to promise safety to Ezechias. These things, when they were done to relieue and stablishe the weakenesse of their faith, were then also sacraments.

19 But our presente purpose is , to discourse peculiarly of those sacraments, which the Lorde willed to be ordinarie in his Church, to nourishe his worshippers and seruantes into one faith and the confession of one faith. For (to vse the wordes of Augustine) men can be congeled together into no name of religion either true or false, vnlesse they be bounde together with some felloship of visible signes and sacramentes. Sith therefore the most good Father foresawe this necessitie, he did from the beginning ordeine certaine exercises of godlinesse for his seruantes, which afterwarde Satan by turning them to wicked and superstitious worshippings, hath many wayes depraued and corrupted. Hereupon came those solemne professions of the Gentiles into their holy orders, and other bastarde vsages: which although they were full of error and superstition, yet they also were therewith a profe that men could not in profession of religion be without such outward signes. But because they neither were grounded vpon the word of God, nor were referred to that trueth whereunto all signes ought to be directed, they are vnworthy to be rehearsed where mention is made of the holy signes which are ordeined of God and haue not swarued from their foundation; that is, that they should be helpes of true godlinesse. They consist not of bare signes, as were the boawe and the tree, but vpon Ceremonies: or rather the signes that be here geuen are Ceremonies. But as it is aboue said, that they be on the Lordes behalfe testimonies of grace and saluation: so they be againe on our behalfe markes of profession, by which we openly sweare to the name of God, for our partes binding our faith vnto him. Therefore Chriostome in one place fitly calleth them couenancinges whereby God bindeth himselfe in league with vs, and we be bounde to purenesse and holinesse of life, because here is made a mutuall forme of couenancing betweene God and vs. For as the Lorde therein promisseth that he will cancell and blot out whatsoeuer giltinesse: and penaltie we haue gathered by offending, and doth reconcile vs to himselfe in his onely begotten Sonne: so we againe on our behalves do by this profession binde our selues vnto him to the following of Godlinesse and innocence: so that a man may rightly say that such sacraments are Ceremonies, by which God will exercise his people first to the nourishing, stirring vp, and strengthening of Faith inwardly, then to the testifying of religion before men.

20 And euen these sacraments also were diuerse, after the diuerse order of time, according to the distribution whereby it pleaseth the Lorde to shewe himselfe after this or that maner to men. For to Abraham and his posteritie Circumcision was commaunded: whereunto afterwarde purifyings, and Sacrifices, and other Ceremonies were added out of the lawe of Moses. These were the Sacraments of the Iewes vntill the comming of Christ: at whiche comming, those beinge abrogate, two Sacramentes were ordeined, which nowe the Christian Church vseth, Baptisme, and the Supper of the Lorde. I speake of those that were ordeined for the vse of the whole Church. For as for the laying on of handes, whereby the ministers of the Church are entred into their office, as I do not vnwillingely suffer it to be called a Sacrament, so I do not reckon it among the ordinary Sacramentes. As for the rest which are commonly called Sacraments, what they are to be accompted, we shal see by and by. Howbeit the old Sacraments also had respect to the same marke, wherunto ours do tende, that is, to direct and in a maner leade by the hande to Christ: or rather as images to represent him, and shew him foorth to be knowen. For whereas we haue already taught, that they are certaine seales wherewith the promises of God are sealed: and where it is most certaine, that there was neuer offered any promise of God to mē but in Christ: that they may teach vs of some promise of God, they must nedes shewe Christ. Whereunto pertaineth that heauenly paterne of the tabernacle and of the worshippinge in the law, which was giuen to Moses in the mount. One onely difference there is, that those did shadow out Christ being promised, whē he was yet looked for: these do testifie him already giuen and deliuered.

21 When these things shall all be particularly and eche one seuerally declared, they shalbe made much plainer. Circumcision was to the Iewes a signe, whereby they were put in minde, that whatsoever commeth of the seede of man, that is to say the whole nature of mā, is corrupt, and hath neede of proynge. Moreover it was a teaching, and token of remembrance, whereby they shoulde confirme themselves in the promise giuen to Abraham, concerninge that blessed seede in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, from whom they hadde their owne blessinge to be looked for, Now that healthfull seede (as we are taught of Paule) was Christ, in whom alone they hoped that they shoulde recouer that which they had lost in Adam. Wherefore Circumcision was to thē the same thing which Paule saith that it was to Abraham, namely the seale of the righteousness of Faith: that is to say, the seale whereby they should be more certainly assured, that their Faith, wherewith they looked for that seede, shoulde be accompted to them of God for righteousness. But we shall vppon a better occasion in an other place go through with the comparison of Circumcision and Baptisme. Baptisings and purifyinges did set before their eies their owne vncleannes, filthines and pollution, wherwith they were defiled in their owne nature: but they promised an other washinge, whereby all their filthinesses shoulde be wiped and washed away. And this washinge was Christ, with whose blood we being washed do bring his cleannes into the sight of God, that it may hide all our defilinges. Their Sacrifices did accuse them of their owne wickednesse, and therewithall did teach, that it was necessary that there shoulde be some satisfaction which should be payd to the iudgemēt of God. That therefore there should be some one chief Bishop, a mediatur betwene God and men, which shoulde satisfie God by sheding of blood, and by offering of a Sacrifice which shoulde suffice for the forgiuenes of sinnes. This chiefe Priest was Christ: he himselfe shed his owne blood: he himselfe was the Sacrifice: for he offered himselfe obedient to his Father vnto death: by which obedience he tooke away the disobedience of man, which had prouoked the displeasure of God.

22 As for our Sacramentes, they do so much more clearely present Christ vnto vs, as he was more neerely shewed to men, since he hath bin truly deliuered of his Father such as he had bin promised.
 For Baptisme doth testifie vnto vs that we are cleansed and washed, the Supper of thanksgiuing testifieth that we be redeemed. In water; is figured washing: in blood, satisfaction. These two things are found in Christ, which (as Iohn saith) came in water and blood, that is to say that he might cleanse and redeeme. Of which thing the Spirit of God also is a witnessse. Yea there are three witnessses in one, Water, Blood, and Spirit. In water and blood we haue a testimonie of cleansing and redeeminge: but the Spirite the principall witnessse bringeth vnto vs assured credit of such witnesssing. This hie mystery hath notably well bin shewed vs in the crosse of Christ, when water & blood flowed out of his holy side: which side for that cause Augustin rightfully called the fountaine of our Sacramentes: of which yet we must entreate somewhat more at large. There is no dout but that more plentifull grace also of the Spirite doth here shewe foorth it selfe if you compare time with time. For that pertaineth to the glory of the kingdom of Christ, as we gather out of many places, but specially out of the 7. Chapter of Iohn. In which sense we must take that sayinge of Paule, that vnder the law were shadowes, but in Christ is the body.
 Neither is it his meaning to spoyle of their effect the testimonies of grace, in which Gods will was in the olde time to proue himselfe to the Fathers a true speaker, euen as at this day he doth to vs in Bap-tisme and in the holy Supper. But onely his purpose was by way of comparison to magnifie that which was giuen vs, least any shoulde thinke it maruelous, that the Ceremonies of the law were abolished by the comming of Christ.

23 But that same schoole doctrine (as I may also briefly touch this by the way) is vtterly to be hilled out, whereby there is noted so great a difference betwene the Sacraments of the olde and new law, as though those did nothinge but shadow out the grace of God, and these

these do presently giue it. For the Apostle speaketh no lesse honorably of those thā of these, when he teacheth that the Fathers did eate the same spirituall meate which we eate, and expoundeth that same meate to be Christ. Who dare make that an empty signe, which deliuered to the Iewes a true communion of Christ? And the grounde of the cause which the Apostle there handeleth, doth plainly fight on our side. For, that no man trusting vpon a colde knowledge of Christ, and empty title of Christianity, and outward tokens, should presume to despise the iudgement of God: he sheweth foorth examples of Gods severity to be seene in the Iewes: that we shoulde knowe that the same paines which they haue suffred, hang ouer vs, if we followe the same faultes. Now that the comparison might be fit, it behoued that he shoulde shewe that there is no vnegallnesse betwene vs and them in those good things whereof he did forbid vs to boast falsely. Therefore first he maketh vs egall in the Sacramentes, and leaueueth to vs not so much as any small peece of prerogatiue, that might encourage vs to hope of escapinge vnpunished. Neithei verely is it lawfull to giue any more to our Baptisme, than he in an other place giueth to circumcision, when he calleth it the seale of the righteousnesse of Faich. Whatsoever therefore is at this day giuen vs in our Sacramentes, the same thing the Iewes in old time receiued in theirs. that is to say, Christ with his spirituall richesse. What power our Sacramentes haue, the same they also felt in theirs: that is to say, that they were to them seales of Gods good will towarde them, into the hope of eternall saluation. If they had bin apt expositors of the Epistle to the Hebrues, they woulde not haue so bin blinded. But when they read there, that sinnes were not cleansed by the Ceremonies of the law, yea that the olde shadowes had no auailing force to righteousness: they neglectinge the comparison which is there handeled, while they tooke holde of this one thing, that the law of it selfe nothing profited the folowers of it, thought simply that the figures were voide of trueth. But the Apostles meaning is to bring the ceremonial law to nothing, vntill it come to Christ, vpon whom alone hangeth al the effectualnesse of it.

24 But they will obiect those thinges which are red in Paul concerning the circumcision of the letter, that it is in no estimation with God, that it giueth nothing, that it is vaine. For such sayings seeme to presse it downe farre beneth Baptisme. Not so. For the very same might rightfully be sayd of Baptisme. Yea and also the same is sayd, first of Paule himselfe, where he sheweth that God regardeth not the outward washinge whereby we enter into profession of religion, vnlesse the minde within be both cleansed and continue in cleanness to the ende : againe of Peter, when he testifieth that the trueth of Baptisme standeth not in the outward washing, but in a good witnessing, of conscience. But he seemeth also in an other place vtterly to despise the circumcision made with hand, when he compareth it with the circumcision of Christ. I answer that euen in this place nothing is abated of the dignitie of it. Paule there disputeth against them, which required it as necessary when it was now abrogate. Therefore he warneth the faithfull, that leauing the olde shadowes they should stande fast in the trueth. These maisters (sayth he) instantly call vpon you, that your bodies may be circumcised. But ye are spiritually circumcised according to the soule and body. Ye haue therefore the deliuerance of the thing in deede, which is much better than the shadowe. A man might take exception to the contrary and say that the figure is not therefore to be despised because they hadde the thing in deede : forasmuch as the putting of of the olde man of which he there spake, was also among the Fathers, to whom yet outwarde Circumcision hadde not bin superfluous. He preuenteth this obiection, whē he by & by addeth, that the Colossians were buried with Christ by Baptisme. Whereby he signifieth that at this day Baptisme is the same to Christians, which circumcision was to the olde people : and therefore that circumcision can not be enioined to Christians without wrong done to Christ.

25 But that which followeth and which I euen nowe alleaged, is harder to assoyle, that all the Iewishe Ceremonies were shadowes of things to come, and that in Christ is the body : but most hard of all is that which is entreated in many chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrewes, that the blood of beastes, attained not to consciences: that the law had a shadow of good thinges to come, not an image of thinges: that the folowers of it obtained no perfectiō of y Ceremonies of Moses: and such other. I go backe to that which I haue already touched, that Paule doth not therefore make the Ceremonies shadowish, because they had no sounde thing in them : but because the fulfilling of them was after a certaine manner hanged in suspense vntill the deliuering of Christ. Againe I say that this is to be vnderstanded not of the effectualnesse, but rather of the maner of signifying. For til Christ was manifestly shewed in the flesh, all the signes did shadow him out as absent, howsoever he did inwardly vtter to the faithfull the presence of his power and of himselfe. But this we ought chiefly to marke, that in all those places Paule doth not speake simply, but by way of contention. Because he striued with the false Apostles, which would would haue godlinesse to consist in the Ceremonies onely without any respect of Christ:to confute them,it sufficed onely to entreate,of what value Ceremonies are by themselues. This marke also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues followed.Let vs therefore remember that here is disputed of Ceremonies,not as they be taken in their owne and naturall signification, but as they be wrested to a false and wrongfull exposition:not of the lawfull vse of them, but of the abuse of superstition. What maruell is it therefore if Ceremonies beinge seuered from Christ,are vnclathed of all force? For all signes whatsoever they be,are brought to nought,when the thing signified is taken away. So when Christ had to do with them which thought that Manna was nothinge else but meate for the belly, he applieth his speeche to their grosse opinion, and sayth that he ministreth better meate,which may feede soules to hope of immortality. But if you require a plainer solution,the summe of all tendeth to this:First,that al that furniture of Ceremonies,which was in the law of Moses,is a vanishinge thinge and of no value,vnlesse it be directed to Christ. Secondly,that they so had respect to Christ,that when he at length was manifestly shewed in the fleshe,they had their fulfillinge. Finally that it behoued that they shoulde be taken away by his comminge,euē as a shadow vanisheth away in the cleare light of y sunne.But because I do yet differre longer discourse of that matter vnto that place where I haue purposed to compare Baptisme with circumcision,therefore I do now more sparingly touch it.

26 Perhaps also those immeasurable praises of the Sacramentes, which are read in the olde writers concerninge our signes, deceiued those miserable Sophisters.As this of Augustine. That the Sacraments of the olde law did only promise the Sauour, but ours do giue saluation. When they marked not that these & such other formes of speaking were spoken:they also published their excessiue doctrines,but in a cleane contrary sense from the wrytinge of the olde Fathers. For Augustine meant no other thinge in that place, than as the same Augustine wryteth in an other place, That the Sacramentes of the law of Moses did foretell of Christ, but ours do tell of him present. And against Faustus. That those were promises of thinges to be fulfilled,these were tokens of thinges fulfilled: as if he shoulde say, that those figured him whē he was looked for, but ours do as it were shew him present which hath bin already deliuered.Moreouer he speaketh of the maner of signifyinge,as also he sheweth in an other place. The lawe(sayth he) and the Prophetes had Sacramentes, foretellinge of a thing to come:but the Sacramentes of our time do testifie that that is already come, which those did declare to be to come. But what he thought of the thing and effectualnesse, he expoundeth in many places: as when he sayth, that the Sacramentes of the Iewes were in signes, diuerse: but in the thing signified, egal with ours: diuerse in visible forme, but egal in spiritual power. Againe: In diuerse signes is all one Faith: so in diuerse signes, as in diuerse wordes: because wordes change their soundes by rimmes: and truely wordes are nothinge but signes. The Fathers did drinke the same spirituall drinke, for they dronke not the same bodily drinke. See ye therefore, Faith remaining one, the signes varied. To them the rocke was Christ: to vs that is Christ which is set vpon the altar. And they dronke for a great Sacramēt, the water flowing out of the rocke: what we drinke, the faithfull knowe. If thou consider the visible forme, they dronke an other thing: if an vnderstandable signification, they dronk the same spiritual drinke. In an other place, in the mystery the same is their meate and drinke which is ours: but the same in signification, not in forme: because the selfe same Christ was figured to them in the rocke, & thewed to vs in the flesh. Howebeit in this behalfe also we graunt that there is some difference. For both Sacramentes do testifie that the fatherly good will of God and the graces of the holy Ghost are offered vs in Christ: but our Sacraments testify it more clearely & brightly. In both is a deliuering of Christ: but in these more plenteous and fuller, namely as that difference of the olde and new Testament beareth, of which we haue entreated before. And this is it that the same Augustine meant (whom we more oftē allege as the best & faithfullest witnesse of all the olde writers) where he teacheth, that when Christ was reuealed, Sacramentes were ordained both in number fewer, in signification hier, in force more excellent. Of this thing also it is expedient y^e the readers briefly be warned, that whatsoeuer the Sophisters haue trifflingly taught concerning y^e worke wrought, is not onely false, but disagreeeth with the nature of the Sacramentes, which God hath ordained, that the faithfull beinge voide and needy of all good thinges should bringe nothing thither but beggery. Whereupon followeth that in receiuing them, these men do nothinge whereby they may deserue praise: or that in this doinge (which in their respect is merely passiue) no worke can be ascribed vnto them.

Of Baptisme.

Baptisme is a signe of the entringe wherewith we are receiued into the felowship of y^e Church, that beinge grafted into Christ we may be reckened amonge the children of God. Now it was giuen vs of God to this end, (which I haue taught to be common to all the mysteries) first, that it shoulde serue to our Faith with him, and to our confession before menne. We will orderly declare the manner of both purposes. Baptisme bringeth three thinges to our Faith, which also must be seuerally entreated of. This is the first which the Lord setteth out vnto vs, that it shoulde be a token and prooffe of our cleansing: or (to expresse my minde better) it is like to a certaine sealed charter, whereby he confirmeth vnto vs, that all our sinnes are so defaced, cancelled, and blotted out, that they may neuer come in his sight, not be rehearsed, not be imputed. For he willeth y^e all they that beleue, should be baptised into forgiveness of sinnes. Therefore they which thought that baptisme is nothings else but a marke and token wherby we professe our religion before men, as souldiars beare the conuance of their capitaine for a marke of their profession, wey not that which was the chiefe thing in baptisme. That is this, that we should receiue it with this promise, that whosoever beleue & are baptised, shall be saued.

Mar. 16

2 In this sense is that to be vnderstoode which Paule writeth, that the Church is sanctified of Christ her spouse, and cleansed with washing of water in the word of life. And in an other place, that we are saued according to his mercy by the washing of regeneration and of the renunge of the holy Ghost. And that which Peter writeth, that baptisme saueth vs. For Paules will was not to signifie, that our washing and saluation is perfectly made by water, or that water containeth in it selfe the power to cleanse, regenerate, & reene. Neither did Peter meane the cause of saluation, but onely the knowledge and certaynetie of such giftes to be receiued in this Sacramente: which is evidently enough expressed in the wordes themselves. For Paule knitteth together the worde of life, and baptisme of water: as if he had said, that by the Gospell the message of washing and sanctifyinge is brought vs, that by baptisme such message is sealed. And Peter immediatly adioyneth, that that baptisme is not the puttinge away of the filthinesse of the flesh, but a good conscience before God, which is of Fayth. Yea baptisme promisseth vs no other cleansing, but by the sprinklinge of the blood of Christ: which is figured by water, for the likenesse of cleansinge and washinge. Who therefore can say that we be cleansed by this water, which certainly testifieth that the blood of Christ is our true and only washing? So that from no where else can be fetched a surer reason to cōfute their blinde error which referre all thinges to the power of the water, than from the signification of Baptisme it selfe: which doth withdraw vs as well from that visible element which is set before our eies, as from all other meanes, that it may binde our mindes to Christ alone.

3 Neither is it to be thought that Baptisme is applied only to the time past, that for new fallinges, into which we fall backe after Baptisme, we must seeke new remedies of cleansing in I wote not what other Sacramentes, as though the force of Baptisme were worne out of vse. By this error it came to passe in old time, that some would not be Baptised but in the vttermost perill of life, & at their last gaspings, that so they might obtaine pardon of their whole life. Against which waywarde suttile promise the old Bishops so oft inuey in their writings. But thus we ought to thinke, that at what time soeuer we be Baptised, we are at once washed and cleansed for all our life. Therefore so oft as we fall we must go backe to the remembrance of Baptisme, & therewith we must arme our minde, that it may be alway certaine & assured of the forgiuenes of sinnes. For though when it is once ministred, it seemeth to be past, yet by later sinnes it is not abolished. For the cleannes of Christ is therein offred vs: that alway flourisheth, is oppressed with no spottes, but ouerwhelmeth & wipeth away all our filthinesse: yet ought we not to take thereof a liberty to sinne in time to come (as verily we be not hereby armed to such boldnes) but this doctrine is giuen only to them, which when they haue sinned, do grone wried & oppressed vnder their sinnes, that they may haue wherewith they may raise vp and comfort themselues; least they should fall into confusion and desperation. So Paul saith, that Christ was made to vs a propitiator, vnto the forgiuenes of faults going before. Wherein he he denieth not that therein is obtained perpetuall & continuall forgiuenes of sinnes euen vnto death: but he meaneth that it was giue of the Father, onely to poore sinners, which wounded with the searinge iron of conscience, do sigh to y^e Phisitian. To these the mercy of God is offred. They which by escaping of punishment do hunt for matter & liberty to sinne, do nothinge but prouoke to themselues the wrath and iudgement of God.

4 I know in dede that it is commonly thought otherwise, that by the benefite of repentance and of the keies we do after Baptisme obtaine forgiuenes, which at our first regeneration is giuen vs by onely

Baptisme

Baptisme. But they which deuise this do erre herein that they do not remember that the power of the keies, whereof they speake, doth so hang vpon Baptisme that it ought in no wise to be seuered. The sinner receiueth forgiuenesse by the ministry of the Church, namely not without the preaching of the Gospell. But what maner of preaching is that? That we be cleansed frō sinnes by the blood of Christ. But what signe and testimony is there of that washing, but Baptisme? We see therefore howe that absolution is referred to Baptisme. And this errour hath bred vs the fained Sacrament of penance: of which I haue touched somewhat before, and the residue I will make an ende of in place fit for it. But it is no maruel if men, which according to the grossenesse of their witte were immeasurably fast tied to outward things, haue in this behalfe also bewrayed that fault, that not contented with the pure institution of God, they did thrust in new helps fained of themselues: As though Baptisme it selfe were not a Sacrament of repentance. But if repentance be commended to vs, for our whole life, the force also of Baptisme ought to be extended to the same boundes. Wherefore it is also no dout but that all the godly throughout al their life long, so oft as they be vexed with knowledge in conscience of their owne sinnes, dare call backe themselues to the remembrance of Baptisme, that thereby they may confirme theselues in the affiance of that only and continuall washing which we haue in the blood of Christ.

It bringeth also another frute, because it sheweth vs our mortification in Christ, & new life in him. For (as the Apostle saith) we are baptised into his death, being buried together with him into death, that we may walke in newnesse of life. By which wordes he doth not only exhorte vs to the followinge of him (as though he did say, that we are by Baptisme put in mind, that after a certaine example of the death of Christ, we should die to our lustes: and after the example of his resurrection, we should be raised vp to righteousness) but he fetcheth the matter much deeper: that is to say, that by Baptisme Christ hath made vs partakers of his death, that we may be grafted into it. And as the graffe receiueth substance and nourishment of the roote into which it is grafted: so they that receiue Baptisme with such faith as they ought, do truely feele the effectualnes of the death of Christ in the mortifyinge of their flesh: and therewithall also they feele the effect of his resurrection in the quickeninge of the Spirit. Hereupon he gathereth matter of exhortation: that if we be Christians, we ought to be dead to sinne, and to liue to righteousness. This selfe same argument he vseth in an other place: that we be circumcised, and haue

Tit. 3. 5. put of the olde man, since that we be buried in Christ by Baptisme. And in this sense, in the same place which we haue before alleaged, he called it the washing of regeneration & of reuenge. Therefore first free forgiuenesse of sinnes & imputation of righteousness is promised vs, & then the grace of the holy Ghost, which may reforme vs into newnesse of life.

6 Last of all our Faith receiueth also this profit of Baptisme, that it certainly testifieth vnto vs, that we are not onely grafted into the death and life of Christ; but that we are so vnited to Christ himselfe that we are partakers of all his good things. For therefore he hath dedicated and hallowed Baptisme in his owne body, that he might haue it common with vs, as a most strong bonde of the vinity and fellowship which he vouchsafed to enter into with vs: so that Paule proueth therby that we be the children of God, because we haue put on Christ in baptisme. So we see that the fulfillinge of baptisme is in Christ, whom also for this reason we call the proper object of baptisme. Therefore it is no maruell if it be reported that the Apostles baptised into his name, which yet were commaunded to baptise into the name of the Father also and of the holy Ghost. For whatsoever giftes of God are set foorth in baptisme, are founde in Christ alone. And yet it can not be, but that he which baptiseth into Christ, do therewithall call vpon the name of the Father and of the holy Ghost. For we are therefore cleansed with his blood, because the mercifull Father according to his incōparable kindnes, willing to receiue vs into fauour, hath set him a mediator in the middelt, to procure to vs fauour with him. But regeneration we so only obtaine by his death and resurrection, if being sanctified by the Spirite we be endued with a newe and spirituall nature. Wherefore both of our cleansing & regeneration: we obtaine & after a certaine maner distinctly perceiue the cause in the Father, the matter in the Sonne, and the effect in the holy Ghost. So Iohn first baptised, so afterward the Apostles, with the baptisme of repentance into the forgiuenesse of sinnes: meaninge by this word repentance, such regeneration: and by forgiuenes of sinnes, washing.

7 Wherby also it is made most certaine, that the ministry of Iohn was altogether the same which was afterward cōmitted to the Apostles. For the diuers handes wherewith it is ministred, make not the baptisme diuers: but the same doctrine sheweth it to be the same Baptisme. Iohn & the Apostles agreed into one doctrine: both baptised into repentance, both into the forgiuenesse of sinnes, both into the name of Christ, from whom was both repentance and forgiuenesse of sinnes.

sinnes. Iohn said that he was the lambe of God, by whom the sinnes of the world should be taken away: where he made him the Sacrifice acceptable to the Father, the propitiator of righteousnesse, the author of saluation. What coulede the Apostles adde to this confession? Wherefore let it trouble no man, that the olde writers labour to teuer the one frō the other, whose voice we ought not so much to esteerne that it may shake the certaintye of the Scripture. For who will rather harken to Chrysofome denying that forgiuenes of sinnes was comprehended in the baptisme of Iohn, than to Luke contrariwise affirminge that Iohn preached the baptisme of repentance into the forgiuenes of sinne? Neither is that suttelty of Augustine to be receiued, that in the baptisme of Iohn, sinnes were forgiuen in hope, but in the baptisme of Christ they are forgiuen in dede. For whereas the Euangelist plainely testifieth, that Iohn in his baptisme promised the forgiuenes of sinnes: what nede we to abate this title of commendation, whē no necessity compelleth vs vnto it? But if any man seke for a differēce out of the word of God, he shall find none other but this, that Iohn baptised into him that was to come, the Apostles into him that had already presented himselfe.

8 As for this that more abundant graces of the Spirite were poured out since the resurrection of Christ, it maketh nothing to stablish a diuersity of baptsimes: For the Baptisme which the Apostles ministred while he was yet conuersant in earth, was called his: yet it had no larger plentifullnesse of the Spirite, than the baptisme of Iohn. Yea euen after his ascension, the Spirite was not giuen to the Samaritans aboue the common measure of the Faithfull before the ascension, although they were baptised into the name of Iesus, till Peter and Iohn were sent vnto them to lay their handes vpon them. This onely thinge, as I thinke, deceiued the olde wryters, that they sayd that the baptisme of Iohn was but a preparation to the baptisme of Christ, because they reade, that they were baptised againe of Paule, which had once receiued the baptisme of Iohn. But howe much they were herein deceiued, shall else where be plainely declared in place fit for it. What is it therefore that Iohn sayd, that he baptised in dede with water, but that Christ shoulde come which should baptise with the holy Ghost, and with fyer? This may in fewe wordes be affoyled. For he meant not to put difference betwene the one baptisme and the other, but he cōpared his own person with the person of Christ, sayinge that himselfe was a minister of water, but that Christ was the giuer of the holy Ghost, and shoulde declare this power by visible miracle the same day that he shoulde sende the holy Ghost, to the are yet in the way, and let the beleue that they haue much profited, when they feele that there is daily somewhat minished of their lust, till they haue attained thither whither they trauaile, namely to the last death of their flesh, which shalbe ended in y^e dying of this mortal life. In the meane time let them not cesse both to strue valiantly, and to encourage them to go forward, and to stirre them vp to full victorie. For this also ought more to whet on their endeouours, that they see that after that they haue longe trauailed, they haue yet no small businesse remaininge. This we ought to holde: we are baptised into the mortifyinge of our flesh, which is begon by baptisme in vs, which we daily folow: but it shalbe made perfect when we shall remoue out of this life to the Lord.

12 Here we say no other thing, than the Apostle Paule in the seventh Chapter to the Romaines most clearly setteth out. For after that he had disputed of free righteousnes, because some wicked men did thereof gather, that we might liue after our owne lust, because we shoulde not be acceptable to God by the deseruinges of workes: he addeth, that all they that are clothed with the righteousnes of Christ, are therewith regenerate in Spirite, and that of this regeneration we haue an earnest in baptisme. Hereupon he exhorteth the faithfull, that they suffer not sinne to haue dominion in their members. Now because he knewe that there is alway some weakenesse in the faithfull: that they shoulde not therefore be discouraged, he adioyneth a comfort, that they are not vnder the lawe. Because againe it might seme, that Christians might growe insolent, because they are not vnder the yoke of the law, he entreateth what maner of abrogating that is, and therewithall what is the vse of the law: which question he had now the second time differred: The summe is, that we be deliuered from the rigour of the lawe, that we shoulde cleaue to Christ: but that the office of the law is, that we being conuincd of our perverseness, shoulde confesse our owne weakenesse and misery. Now forasmuch as that perversenes of nature doth not so easily appeare in a prophane man, which followeth his owne lustes without feare of God: he setteth an example in a man regenerate, namely in himselfe. He saith therefore that he hath a continuall wrastring with the remnantes of his fleshe, and that he is holden bounde with miserable bondage, that he can not consecrate himselfe wholly to the obediēce of the law of God. Therefore he is cōpelled with groning to crie out: Vnhappie am I. Who shall deluer me out of this body subiect to death? If the children of God be holden captiue in prison so long as they liue, they must nedes be much carefully grieued with thinkinge vpon upon their owne perill, vnlesse this feare be met withall. Therefore he adioyneth to this vse a comfort, that there is no more damnation to them that are in Christ Iesu. Where he teacheth, that they whom the Lord hath once receiued into fauour, engrassed into the communion of his Christ, hath by baptisme admitted into the fellowship of his Church, while they continue in the faith of Christ, although they be besieged of sinne, yea & cary sinne about within them, yet are acquitted from giltnes & condemnation. If this be the simple & natural exposition of Paul, there is no cause why we should seeme to teache any new vnwonted thing. Rom. 8.

13 But baptisme so serueth our confession before men. For it is a marke, whereby we openly professe that we woulde be accompted amonge the people of God: whereby we testifie that we agree with all Christians into the worshipping of one God & into one religion: finally wherby we openly affirme our faith: that not only our heartes shoulde breath out the praise of God, but also our tongue, and all the members of our body shoulde sounde it out with such vterances as they be able. For so, as we ought, all our thinges are employed to the seruice of the glory of God, whereof nothing ought to be voyd, and other may by our example be stirred vp to the same endeouours. Hereunto Paul had respect, when he asked the Corinthians, whether they had not bin baptised into the name of Christ: meaning verily, that euen in this that they were baptised into his name, they auowed themselues vnto him, swore to his name, & bounde their faith to him before men, that they coulde no more confesse any other, but Christ alone, vnles they would forsake the confession which they had made in baptisme. 1. Cor. 12.

14 Now sith it is declared what our Lord had regard vnto in the institution of baptisme: it is plaine to iudge what is the way for vs to vse and receiue it. For so farre as it is giuen to the raisinge, nourishing and confirming of our faith, it is to be taken as from the hande of the author himselfe: we ought to holde it certaine and fully persuaded, that it is he which speaketh to vs by the signe, that it is he which clenseth vs, washeth vs, & putteth away the remembrance of our sinnes, that it is he which maketh vs partakers of his death, which taketh away from Satan his kingdome, which febleth the forces of our lust, yea which groweth into one with vs, that being clothed with him we may be reckened the children of God: that these things, I say, he doth inwardly so truly & certainly performe to our soule, as we certainly see our body outwardly to be washed, dipped, and clothed. For this either relation, or similitude, is the most sure rule of Sacraments:

that in bodily thinges we should beholde spirituall thinges, as if they were presently set before our eyes, forasmuch as it hath pleased the Lorde to represent them by such figures: not for that such graces are bounde and enclosed in the Sacrament, that they should be giuen vs: by the force thereof: but only because the Lorde doth by this token testifie his will vnto vs; that is, that he will giue vs all these thinges, Neither doth he onely feede our eyes with a naked sight, but he bringeth vs to the thing present, and together fulfilleth that which it figureth.

15 Hereof let Cornelius the capitaine be an example, which was baptised, hauinge before receiued forgiuenesse of sinnes and visible graces of the holy Ghost: seeking not by baptisme a larger forgiuenesse: but a more certaine exercising of Faith, yea an encrease of confidence by a pledge. Paraduenture some man will obiekt: why therefore did Ananias say to Paule; that he shoulde washe away his sinnes by baptisme, if sinnes be not washed away by the power of baptisme it selfe? I aunswere: We are sayd to receiue, to obtaine, to get that which so farre as concerneth the feeling of our faith, is giuen vs of the Lorde; whether he do then first testifie it, or beinge testified doth more and certainerliet confirme it. This therefore onely was the meaninge of Ananias: that thou mayest be assured, Paule; that thy sinnes are forgiuen thee, be baptised. For the Lorde doth in baptisme promise forgiuenesse of sinnes: receiue this, and be out of care. Howebeit I meane not to diminishe the force of baptisme, but that the thinge and the truth is present with the signe, so farre as God worketh by outwarde meanes. But of this Sacrament, as of all other, we obtaine nothinge but so much as we receiue by Faith. If we want fayth, it shalbe for a witnesse of our vnthankfullnes; wherby we may be declared guilty before God, because we haue not beleued the promise there giuen. But so farre as it is a signe of our confession, we ought by it to testifie that our affiance is in the mercie of God, and our cleanness is in the forgiuenesse of sinnes, which is gotten vs by Iesus Christ: and that by it we enter into the Church of Christ, that we may with one consent of Faith and charitie liue of one minde with all the faithfull. This last point didde Paule meane, when he sayeth that we are all baptised in one Spirite; that we may be one body.

16 Nowe if this be true which we determine, that a Sacrament is not to be weyed accordinge to his hande of whom it is ministred, but as of the very hande of God, from whom without dout it proceeded: hereupon we may gather, that nothinge is added to it nor taken from it by the worthinesse of him by whoes hande it is deliuered. And euen as among men, if a letter be sent, so that the hand and the seale be well knowne, it maketh no matter who or what maner of man be the carrier: so it ought to suffice to acknowe the hande and seale of our Lorde in his Sacraments, by what carrier soeuer they be brought. Hereby the error of the Donatistes is very well confuted, which measured the force and value of the Sacrament by the worthinesse of the minister. Such at this day are our Catabapristes, which deny that we be rightly baptised, because we were baptised by wicked men and idolaters in the popish kingdome: therefore they furiously call vpon vs to be baptised again. Against whoes follies we shalbe armed with a reason strong enough, if we thinke that we were professed by baptisme not into the name of any man, but into the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost, and that therefore it is not Mat. 28 the baptisme of man, but of God, of whomsoever it be ministred. 19.

Although they were neuer so much ignorant or despisers of God and all godlinesse, which baptised vs: yet they did not baptise vs into the fellowshipe of their owne ignorance or sacrilege, but into the faith of Iesus Christ: because they called not vpon their owne name, but the name of God, nor baptised vs into any other name. Nowe if it were the baptisme of God, it hath verily enclosed in it a promise of the forgeuenesse of sinnes, the mortifying of the flesh, the spirituall quickning, and the partaking of Christ. So it nothing hindered the Iewes, to haue bene circumcised of vncleane priests and apostataes: neither was the signe therefore voide, that in needed to be done of newe: but it was sufficient to returne to the naturall beginning. Where they obiekt that baptisme ought to be celebrate in the assemblie of the godly, that proueth not, that that which is faultie in parte; should destroy the whole force thereof. For when we teache what ought to be done that baptisme may be pure, and voide of all defiling, we do not abolishe the ordinance of God, although idolaters corrupt it. For when in olde time Circumcision was corrupted with many superstitions, yet it ceased not to be taken for a signe of grace: neither did Iosias and Ezechias, when they gathered out of all Israell them that had departed from God, call them to a seconde Circumcision:

17. Now where as they aske vs, what faith of ours hath yet followed bptisme in certaine yeares past, that they might thereby proue that the baptisme is voide, which is not sanctified vnto vs, but by the word of promise receiued by faith: to this question we aunswer, that we in deede being blinde & vnbeleuing, did in a long time not holde fast y promise giue vs in baptisme: yet the promise it selfe, for as much as it was of God, continued alway stayed, stedfast, and true. Although all menne be liers and faithbreakers, yet God cesseth not to be true: Rom. 3. although all menne be lost, yet Christ remaineth saluation. We confesse therefore that baptisme, for that time profited vs nothing at all: forasmuch as in it the promise offered vs, without which baptisme is nothing, lay nothing regarded: Nowe sith by the grace of God, we haue begonne to waxe wiser, we accuse our owne blindnesse and hardnesse of hart, which haue so long bene vnthankfull to his so great goodnesse. But we beleue that the promise it selfe is not vanished away: but rather thus we cōsider, God by baptisme promiseth the forgeuennesse of sinnes, and sith he hath promised it, will vndoubtedly performe it to all that beleue it. That promise was offred vs in baptisme: by faith therefore let vs embrace it. It hath in deede long bene buried from vs because of infidelitie: nowe therefore let vs receiue it by faith. Wherfore where the Lord calleth the Iewish people to repentance, he geueth them no commaundement of a seconde Circumcision, which being (as we haue said) circumcised with a wicked and vngodly hande, liued a certaine time entangled with the same wickednesse. But he earnestly calleth vppon the onely turning of the hart. Because, howe soeuer the couenāt was broken of them, yet the signe of the covenant, by the ordinance of the Lorde, remained alway stedfast and inuolable. Therefore with the onely condition of repentance they were restored into the covenant which the Lorde had ones made with them in Circumcision: which yet being received by the hande of a leaguebreaker priest, so much as in them lay, they had defiled againe, and the effect wherof they had quenched.

18. But they thinke that they shake a fiery darte at vs, when they A& 19. allege that Paule rebaptised them which were ones baptised with the baptisme of Iohn. For if by our owne confession, the baptisme of Iohn was altogether the same that oures is nowe: euen as they hauing bene before peruersely instructed, when they were taught the true faith, they were againe baptised into it: so that baptisme, which was without true Doctrine, is to be taken for nothing, and we ought to be newly baptised againe into the true religion, wherewith we are nowe first instructed. Some thinke, that there was some wrongfully affectioned manne to Iohn, which hadde entred them with their first baptisme rather to a vaine superstition. Of which thing they seeme to gather a coniecture hereupon, because they cōfessed themselves to be vtterly ignorant of the Holy Ghost: whereas Iohn verily would would neuer haue sente away from himselfe scholars so vntaught. But neither is it likely that the Iewes, although they had not bene baptised at all, were destitute of all knowledge of the Holy Ghost, which is famously spoken of by so many testimonies of the scripture. Where as therefore they aunswere that they knowe not whether there be a Holy Ghost, it is to be vnderstanded as if they had said that they haue not yet heard, whether the graces of the Spirit, of which Paule asked them, were geuen to the Disciples of Christ. But I graunt that that was the true baptisme of Iohn, and all one and the selfe same with the baptisme of Christ: but I deny that they were baptised againe. What then meane these wordes, they were baptised in the name of Iesus? Some do expound it, that they were but instructed of Paule with true Doctrine. But I hadde rather vnderstande it more simply, to be the baptisme of the Holy Ghost, that is to say, that the visible graces of the Spirit were geuen them by the laying on of handes: which to be expressed by the name of baptisme, is no newe thing. As on the day of Pētecoste it is said, that the Apostles remembered the wordes of the Lorde, concerning the baptisme of fier and of the Spirit. And Peter saith that the same came to his remēbrance, when he sawe those graces poured out vpon Cornelius, and his household and kinred. Neither is that contrarie which is after ad-

 16. joined, When he had layd his hands on them, the Holy Ghost came downe vpon them. For Luke doth not tell of two diuerse things: but followeth the maner of telling commonly vsed among the Hebrues, which do first propounde the summe of the matter, and then do set it out more at large. Which euery man may perceiue by the very framing together of the wordes. For he saith, When they had heard these things, they were baptised in the name of Iesus. And when Paul had layd his handes vpon them, the Holy Ghost came downe vpon them. In this latter sentence is described, what maner of baptisme that was. If ignorance do so corrupt a former Baptisme, that it must be amended with a seconde baptisme: the Apostles should haue bene rebaptised first of all, which in whole three yeres after their baptisme, had scarcely tasted any small parcell of purer doctrine. And nowe among vs what riuers might suffice to renewe so many washings, as there be ignorances by the mercy of the Lorde daily amended in vs?

19 The force, dignitie, profit, and ende of the misterie, if I be not deceiued, ought by this time to be plaine enough. So much as concerneth the outward signe, I would to God the naturall institution of Christ had preuailed so much as was mete, to restrain the boldnesse of men. For, as though it were a contemptible thing to be baptised with water according to the precept of Christ, there is in-vented blessing, or rather enchaunting, to defile the true hallowing of the water. Afterwarde was added a taper with chresme: but the blowing seemed to open the gate to baptisme. But although I am not ignorant, howe auncient is the beginning of this added packe: yet it is lawfull both for me and all the godly to refuse whatsoeuer things men haue presumed to adde to the ordinance of Christ. When Satan sawe that by the foolish light credit of the world at the very beginnings of the Gospel his deceites were easily receiued, he brake forth into grosser mockeries. Hereupon spittle, and like trifles, were openly brought in with vnbridled libertie to the reproche of baptisme. By which experiēces let vs learne that nothing is either holier, or better, or safer, than to be content with the authoritie of Christ alone. Howe much better therefore was it, leauing stagelike pompes, which dasell the eyes of the simple, and dull their mindes, so oft as any was to be baptised, that he should be presented to the assemblie of the faithfull, and be offered to God, the whole Church looking on as a witnessse: and praying ouer him: that the confession of faith should be rehearsed, wherewith he that is to be catechised should be instructed: that the promises should be declared which are contained in baptisme: that the instructed should be baptised in the name of the Father, and the Sonne, and the Holy Ghost: at length that he be sente away with prayers and thankesgeuing. So is nothing omitted that might make to the matter, and that the onely Ceremonie which proceded from God the author thereof, should most clerely shine, being not overwhelmed with any forein filthinesse. But whether he be wholly dipped which is baptised, and that thrise or once, or whether he be but sprinkled with water onely poured vpon him, it maketh very little matter: but that ought to be at libertie to Churches according to the diuersitie of contrees. Howbeit the very word of baptizing signifieth to dippe, and it is certaine that the maner of dipping was vsed of the olde Church.

20 This also pertaineth to the purpose, to knowe that it is done amisse if priuate men take vpon themselues the administration of baptisme. For as well the distribution of this as of the Supper is a part of the ecclesiasticall ministerie. For Christ did not commaunde women, nor yet euery sort of men, y they should baptize: but whom he had ordeined his Apostles, to them he gaue this commaundement. And when he commaunded his disciples to do that in the ministracion of the Supper which they had sene him do, when he executed the office of a right distributer: he would without dout, that they should therein therein followe his example. As for this that in many ages past, yea and in a maner at the very beginning of the Church, it hath bene receiued in vse, that lay men might baptise in perill of death, if the minister were not present in time. I se not with howe strong a reason it may be defended. The very olde Fathers themselues, which either helde or suffred this maner, were not sure whether it were well done. For Augustine seemeth to haue this dout, when he saith: Although a lay man compelled by necessitie do geue baptisme, I can not tell whether a man may godlily say that it ought to be iterate. For if it be done when no necessitie compelleth, it is the vsurping of an other mans office: but if necessitie enforceth, it is either none or a veniall sinne. Moroeuer of women it was decreed without any exception in the Councell at Carthage, that they should not presume to baptise at all. But there is danger, least if he which is sicke should die without baptisme, he should be deprived of the grace of regeneration. Not so. God pronounceth that he adopteth our infantes to be his owne, before they be borne, when he promiseth that he will be a God to vs and to our seede after vs. In this word is contained their saluation. Neither shall any man dare to be so reprochefull against God, to deny that his promise is of it selfe sufficient to worke the effect thereof. Howe much harme that doctrine being euill expounded, that baptisme is of necessitie to saluation, hath brought in, fewe do marke: and therefore they take lesse heede to themselue. For where this opinion is growen in force, that all are lost to whom it hath not happened to be washed with water, our state is worse than the state of the olde people, as though the grace of God were nowe more narrowly streigthened than it was vnder the lawe. For Christ shalbe thought to be come, not to fulfill the promises, but to abolish them: forasmuch as the promise which then was of it selfe effectual enough to geue health before the eighth day, nowe should not be of force without helpe of the signe.

21 But howe the custome was before that Augustine was borne, first is gathered of Tertullian, that it is not permitted to a woman to speake in the Church, nor to teach, nor to baptise, nor to offer, that she shoulde not claime to her selfe the execution of any mans office, much lesse of the Priests. Of the same thing Epiphanius is a substantiall witnesse, where he reprocheth Marcion, that he gaue women libertie to baptise. Neither am I ignorant of their aunswere which thinke otherwise, that is, that common vse much differeth from extraordinary remedie, when extreme necessitie enforceth: but when he pronouncing that it is a mockerie to geue womé liberty to baptise, excepteth nothing, it sufficiently appeareth that he cōdemneth this corruption, so that it is by no color excusable. Also in the third booke, where teaching that it was not permitted euen to the holy mother of Christ, he addeth no restrainte.

22 The example of Sephora is vnseasonably alleged. For whereas the Angell of God was appeased, after that she taking a stone, circumcised her sonne, thereupon it is wrongfully gathered that her doing was allowed of God. Otherwise it ought to be said, that the worshipping which the nations that were brought out of Assyria raised vp, pleased God. But by other strong reasons it is proued, that that which a foolish woman did, is wrongfully drawn to an example of imitation. If I should say that it was a certaine singular case, which ought not to be made an example, and specially that sith it is nowhere red that in olde tyme there was geuen to the Priests a speciall cōmaundement to circumcise, the order of Circumcision & baptisme is vnlike: this should be strong enough to confute them. For the wordes of Christ are plaine: Go ye, teache all nations, and baptise. When he ordeined the telfe same men publishers of the Gospel, & ministers of baptisme: & none (as the Apostle witnesseth) doth take honor vpon himselfe in the Church, but he that is called as Aaron: whosouer without lawfull calling baptiseth, he rusheth into an other mans office. Euen in the smallest things, as in meate & drinke, whatsoever we enterprise with a doutefull cōscience, Paule openly crieth out to be sinne. Therefore in womens baptising is much more greuously sinne, where it is euident that they breake the rule appointed by Christ: forasmuch as we knowe that it is vnlawfull to plucke in sōnder those things that God conioineth. But all this I passeouer. Onely I would haue the reders to note, that Sephoraes purpose was nothing lesse, than to do any seruice to God. Seing her sonne to be in danger, she grudged, and murmured, and not without stomaching threwe the foreskinne vpon the grounde, she so taunted her husbande, that she was also angrie with God. Finally it is plaine that all this came of a furiousnesse of minde, because she murmured against God and her husbande, for that she was compelled to shed the blood of her sonne. Moreouer if she had in all other things behaued her selfe well, yet herein is an vnexcusable rashe presumption that she circumcised her sonne, her husbande being presente, not any private manne, but Moses the principall Prophete of God, than whom there neuer rose any greater in Israell: which was no more lawfull for her to do, than at this day it is for women in the sight of the bishoppe. But this controuersie shall by and by be easily taken away by this principle, that infantcs arc not debarred from the kingdome of heauen, whom it happeneth to departe out of this present life before that it be graunted them to be dipped in water. But it is already proued, that no small wrong is done to the couenant of God, if we do not rest in it, as though it were weake of it selfe: whereas the effect thereof hangeth neither vpon baptisme, nor vpon any additions. There is afterward added to it a Sacrament like a seale, not that it bringeth effectualnesse to the promise of God as to a thing weake of it selfe, but onely confirmeth it to vs. Whereupon followeth, that the children of the faithfull are not therefore bapused, that they may then first be made the children of God, which before were straungers from the Church, but rather that they be therefore receiued by a solemne signe into the Church, because by the benefite of the promise they did already belong to the body of Christ. Therefore if in omitting the signe there be neither slouthfulnesse, nor contempte, nor negligence, we are free from all danger. It is therefore much more holy, to geue this reuerence to the ordinance of God, that we seke Sacraments from no where els, than where the Lorde hath lefte them. When we may not haue them of the Church, the grace of God is not so bounde to them, but that we may obtaine them by faith out of the word of the Lorde.

The xvj. Chapter.

That the Baptisme of infantcs doth very vuell agree vwith the institution of Christ and the nature of the signe.

BVt. forasmuch as in this age, certaine phrentike Spirits haue raised vp sore troubles in the Church for the Baptisme of infantcs, and do not yet cesse to turmoile: I can not chose but I must ioine here an addition to restrain their furiousnesse. If peraduenture it shall seeme to some man to be very much to long, let him (I besech him) wey with himself, y we ought so much to esteeme the purenesse of doctrine in a most great matter, together with the peace of the Church, that nothing ought to be lothselomly receiued, which may auaille to procure them both. Beside y, I so study to frame this discourse, that it shall be of no small importance to the clerer declaration of the mistery of baptisme. They assaile the baptisme of infantcs with an argumēt in deede fauourable in shewe, saying that it is grounded vpon no institution of Christ, but that it was brought in onely by the boldnesse of men, and peruerse curiousnesse, and then afterward with fonde easinesse rashly receiued in vse. For a sacramēt, vnlesse it rest vpon a certaine fundation of the word of God; hangeth but by a thred. But what if; when the matter is wel considered, it shall appeare that the Lordes holy ordināce is falsely & vniustly charged with such a sclauder? Let vs therefore searche out the first beginning of it. And if it shall appeare, that it was deuised by the onely rashnesse of men, then bidding it farewell, let vs measure the true obseruation of baptisme by the onely will of God. But if it shalbe proued that it is not destitute of his certaine authoritie, we must beware, lest in pinching the holy ordināces of God, we be also sclauderous against the author himselfe.

2 First it is a doctrine well enough knowen, and cōfessed among all the godly, that the right consideration of the signes, consisteth not onely in the outward Ceremonies: but principally hangeth vpon the promise, and vppon the spirituall misteries, for figuring whereof the Lorde ordeineth the Ceremonies themselues. Therefore he that will perfectly learne of what value baptisme is, to what ende it tendeth; finally what it is: let him not stay his thought vpon the elemente and bodily sight: but rather let him raise it vp to the promises of God, which are therein offred vs, and to the inwarde secretes which are therein represented vnto vs. He that knoweth these things, hath attained the sound truth of baptisme, and the whole substance thereof; as I may so call it: and thereby also he shalbe taught, what is the reason, and what is the vse of the outward sprinkling. Againe he that contemptuously passing ouer these, shall haue his minde wholly fastened & bounde to the visible Ceremonie, shall vnderstande neither the force nor propertie of baptisme: nor yet so much as this, what the water meaneth, or what vse it hath. Which sentence is proued with so many and so cleare testimonies of Scripture, that we neede not at this present to tarry long about it. Therefore it remaineth now, that we seke out of the promises geuen in baptisme, what is the force and nature of it. The Scripture sheweth, that the clensing of sinnes, which we obtaine of the blood of Christ, is here first shewed: then the mortifying of the flesh, which standeth vpon the partaking of his death, by which the faithfull are regenerate into newnesse of life, yea and into the fellowship of Christ. To this summe may be referred whatsoeuer is taught in the Scriptures concerning baptisme: sauing that beside this it is a signe to testifie religion before men.

3 But forasmuch as before the institution of baptisme, the people of God had circumcision in steede thereof: let vs se what these two signes differ the one from the other, and with what likenesse they agree together. Whereupon may appeare what is the relation of the one to the other. Where the Lorde gaue circumcision to Abraham Gen.17. to be kept, he telleth him before, that he would be God to him and 10. to his seede: adding, that with him is the flowing store and suffisance of all things, that Abraham should accompt that his hande should be to him a spring of all good things. In which wordes the promise of eternall life is contained: as Christ expoundeth it, bringing an argument from hense to proue the immortalitie of the faithfull, and the resurrection. For God (saith he) is not the God of the dead, but of the liuing. Wherefore Paule also shewing to the Ephesians from Mat. 22. what destruction the Lorde had deliuered them, gathereth by this 32. that they had not bine admitted into the couenante of circumcision, Luk. 20. that they were without Christ, without God, without hope, strangers 38. from the testaments of the promise: all which things the couenante Eph. 2. it selfe contained. But the first accessse to God, the first entrie to 12. immortall life, is the forgeuenesse of sinnes. Whereupon is gathered, that this forgeuenesse aunswereth to the promise of baptisme concerning our clensing. Afterwarde the Lorde taketh couenante of Abraham that he should walke before him in purenesse and innocence of hart: which belongeth to mortifying or regeneration. And that no man should dout, that circumcision is a signe of mortifying. Moses in an other place doth more plainly declare it, when he ex- Deu. 10. horteth the people of Israel, to circumcise the vncircumcised skinne 16. of the hart, because they were seuerally chosen to be the people of God out of all the nations of the earth. As God, where he adoprth the posteritie of Abraham to his people, commaundeth them to be circumcised: so Moses pronounceth that the hartes ought to be cir- Deu. 30. cumcised, declaring verily what is the trueth of this circumcision. 6. Then that no man should endeuor toward it by his owne strength, he teacheth that they neede the grace of God. All these things are so often repeted of the Prophets, that I neede not to heape into this place many testimonies, which do eche where offer themselues. We haue proued therofore, that in circumcision a spirituall promise was vttered to the Fathers, such as in baptisme is geuen: forasmuch as it figured to them the forgeuenesse of sinnes, and the mortifying of the flesh. Moreouer as we haue taught that Christ is the foundation of baptisme, in whom both these things remaine: so it is euident that he is also of circumcision. For he is promised to Abraham, and in him the blessing of all nations. To the sealing of which grace, the signe of circumcision is added.

4 Nowe we may easily se, what there is like in these two signes, or what there is differing. The promises, whereupon we haue declared that the power of the signes consisteth, is all one in both, namely of the fatherly fauor of God, of the forgeuennesse of sinnes, of life euerlasting. Then, the thing figured also is all one and the same, namely regeneration. The fundation wherupon the fulfilling of these things standeth, is all one in both. Wherefore there is no difference in the inwarde misterie, whereby the whole force and propertie of the Sacraments is to be weyed. The vnlikennesse that remaineth, lieth in the outward Ceremonie, which is the smallest portion: whereas the chiefest part hangeth vpon the promise and the thing signified. Therefore we may determine, that whatsoever agreeth with circumcision doth also belong to baptisme, except the difference of the visible Ceremonie. To this relation and comparison, the Apostles rule leadeth vs by the hande, whereby we are commaunded to examine all exposition of scripture by the proportiō of faith. And truely the trueth doth in this behalfe almost offer it selfe to be fekt. For as circumcision, because it was a certaine token to the Iewes, whereby they were certified that they were chosen to be the people and householde of God, and they againe on their behalues professed that they yelded themselues to God, was their first entrie into the Church: so nowe also we by baptisme enter into profession of God; that we may be reckned among his people, and mutually swear to his name. Wherby it appeareth out of controuersie, that baptisme is come into the place of circumcision, that it may haue the same office with vs.

5 Nowe if we list to search out, whether baptisme be lawfully communicate to infantes: shall we not say that he doth to much play the foole, yea dote, which will rest onely vpon the element of water, and the outward obseruation, but cannot abide to bende his minde to the spirituall misterie? Whereof if there be any consideration had, it shall without dout certainly appeare that baptisme is rightfully geuen to infantes, as the thing that is due vnto them. For the Lorde in olde time did not vouchesaue to admit them to circumcision, but that he made them partakers of all those things which were then signified by circumcision. Otherwise he should with mere deceites haue mocked his people, if he had fed them with deceitfull signes, which is horrible euen to be heard of. For he pronounceth expresly, that the circumcision of a litle infante should be in steede of a seale to seale the promise of the couenant. But if the couenant remaine vnbroken and stedfast, it doth at this day no lesse belong to the children of Christians, than vnder the olde testament it pertained to the infantes of the Iewes. But if they be partakers of the thing thing signified, why shall they be debarred from the signe? if they haue the truth, why shall they be put backe from the figure? Although the outward signe cleaue fast together with the word in the Sacrament, so that they can not be plucked in sonder: yet if they be seuerally cōsidered, whether of them, I pray you, shall we esteeme of more value? Truely sith we see that the signe serueth the word, we must say that it is vnder it, and must set it in the inferior place. Sith therefore the word of Baptisme is extended to infantes: why shall the signe, that is to say, the addition hanging to the word, be debarred from them? This one reason, if there were no mo, were abundantly enough to confute all them that will speake to the contrary. That which is obiected, that there was a day certainly set for circumcision, is altogether but a shift. We graunte that we be not nowe bounde to certaine dayes, like the Iewes: but when the Lorde, howsoeuer he certainly appointeth no day, yet declareth that he is pleased that infantes should with a solemne formal vsage be receiued into his couenant: what seke we more?

6 Howbeit the Scripture openeth vnto vs yet a certainer knowledge of the truth? For it is most eident, that the couenant which the Lorde ones made with Abraham, is at this day no lesse in force to Christians, than it was in olde time to the Iewish people: yea and that this word hath no lesse respect to Christians, than it then had respect to the Iewes. Vnlesse parhappes we thinke, that Christ hath by his comming diminished, or cut short the grace of his Father. Which saying is not without abhominable blasphemie. Wherefore as euen the children of the Iewes were called a holy seede, because being made heires of the same couenant they were made differing from the children of the vngodly: for the same reason euen yet also the children of Christians are accompted holy, yea although they be the issue but of one parent faithfull: and (as the Apostle witnesseth) they differ from the vncleane seede of idolatrs. Nowe when the Lord immediatly after the couenant made with Abraham, commaunded the same to be sealed in infantes with an outward Sacrament: what cause will Christians allege, why they should not at this day testifie and seale the same in their children? Nether let any man obiect against me, that the Lorde commaunded his couenant to be confirmed with no other signe than of circumcision, which is long agoe taken away. For we haue in redinesse to aunswere, that for the time of the olde testament he ordeined circumcision to confirme his couenant: but circumcision being taken away, yet alway remaineth the same maner of confirming which we haue common with the Iewes. Wherefore we must alway diligently consider what is comon to both, and what they haue seuerall from vs. The couenant is comon, the cause of confirming it is common. Onely the maner of confirming is diuerse, because circumcision was that to them, in place whereof baptisme hath succeeded among vs. Otherwise if the testimonie, whereby the Iewes were assured of the saluation of their seede, be taken away from vs, it should be brought to passe by the comming of Christ, that the grace of God should be darker and lesse approued by testimonies to vs, than it was before to the Iewes. If that can not be said without extreme sclaunder of Christ, by whom the infinite goodnesse of the Father hath more clerely and liberally than euer heretofore bine poured fourth vpon the earth, & declared to men: we must needes graunt, that it is at the least not more pinchingly to be suppressed, nor to be set foorth with lesse testimonie, than it was vnder the darke shadowes of the lawe.

7. Wherefore the Lorde Iesus, minding to shewe a token whereby the world might vnderstande that he was come rather to enlarge than to limit the mercy of God, gently embraced children offred vnto him, rebuking the disciples which went about to forbid them to come to him: forasmuch as they did leade those, to whom the kingdome of heauen belongeth, away from him by whome alone the entrie is open into heauen. But (will some man say) what like thing hath baptisme with this embracing of Christ. For neither is it reported that he Baptised the, but that he receiued them, embraced them, and wished them well. Therefore if we list to followe his example, lette vs helpe infantes with prayer, but not baptise them. But let vs wey the doinges of Christ somewhat more hede fully, than such kinde of men do. For neither is this to be lightly passed ouer, that Christ commaundeth infantes to be brought vnto him, adding a reason why, because of such is the kingdome of heauen. And afterwarde he witnesseth his will with deede, when embracing them he commendeth them to his Father with his prayer and blessing. If it be mete that infantes be brought to Christ, why is it not also mete that they be receiued to baptisme, the signe of our communion and fellowship with Christ? If the kingdome of heauen be theirs, why shall the signe be denied them, whereby there is as it were an entrie opened into the Church, that being admitted into it they may be adnombred among the heires of the heavenly kingdome? Howe vniust shall we be, if we drue away them whom Christ calleth vnto him? if we spoile them, whom he garnisheth with his gyfies? if we shutte out them whom he willingly receiueth? But if we will examine howe

much that which Christ there did, differeth from baptisme, yet of howe much greater price shall we haue baptisme, (whereby we testifie that infantes are contened in the couenant of God) than receiuing, embracing, layeng on of handes, and prayer, whereby Christ himself being present: declareth that they both are his, and are sanctified of him? By the other cauiltiōs, whereby they labor to mocke out this place, they do nothing but bewray their owne ignorance. For they gather an argument of this which Christ saith. Let litle ones come to me, that they were in age good bigge ones which were already able to go. But they are called of the Euangelistes, brephe, and paidia, by which wordes the Grekes do signifie babes yet hanging on the brests. Therefore this word (to come) is simply set for (to haue accesse.) Lo what snares they are compelled to make, which are growen hard against the truth. Nowe where they say, that the kingdome of heauen is not geuen to them, but to such as be like them, because it is sayed to be of such, not of them: that is no sounder than the rest. For if that be graunted, what maner of reason shall the reason of Christ be, whereby he meaneth to shewe, that infantes in age are not strangers from him? When he commaundeth that infantes be suffered to haue accesse vnto him, nothing is plainer than that very infancy in deede is there spokē of. And that this should not seeme an absurditie, he by and by addeth: of such is the kingdome of heauen. But if it must needes be that infantes be comprehended herein, it must be plaine that by this word (Such) are meant very infantes themselues, and such as be like them.

8 Nowe there is no man that seeth not, that Baptisme of infantes was not framed by man, which is vpholden by so great approving of Scripture. Neither do they colorably enough play the fooles, which obiekt that it is no where founde, that any one infant was baptised by the handes of the Apostles. For although it be not Act. 16. expressly by name rehearsed of the Euangelistes: yet because a-15. and gaine they are not excluded, so ofte as mention happeneth to be 32. made of the baptising of any householde: who, vnlesse he be madde, can reason thereupon that they were not baptised? If such arguments were of any force, women should be forbidden to partake of the Lordes supper, whom we reade not to haue bene receiued vnto it in the time of the Apostles. But here we be contente with the rule of faith. For when we consider, what the institution of the Supper requireth, thereby also we may easily iudge to whom the vse thereof ought to be communicated. Which we obserue also in baptisme. For when we marke, to what ende it was ordeined, we evidently espy, that it belongeth no lesse to infantes, than to elder folkes. Therefore they can not be deprivied of it, but that the will of the author must be manifestly defrauded. But whereas they spred abroad among the simple people, that there passed a long roawe of yeares after the resurrection of Christ, in which the baptisme of infantes was vnknown: therein they most fowly do lie. For there is no writer so olde, that doth not certainly referre the beginning thereof to the time of the Apostles.

9 Nowe remaineth that we breiefely shewe, what fruit cometh of this obseruation, both to the faithfull which present their children to the Church to be baptised, and also to the infantes themselves that be baptised with the holy water: that no man shoulde despise it as vnprofitable or idle. But if it come in any mans minde, vpon this pretence to mocke at the baptisme of infantes, he scorneth the commaundement of Circumcision geuen by the Lorde. For what will they bring forth to impugne the baptisme of infantes, which may not also be thrown backe against Circumcision? So the Lorde taketh vengeance of their arrogance, which do by and by condemne that which they comprehend not with the sense of their owne fleshe. But God furnisheth vs with other armures, whereby their foolishnesse may be beaten flatt. For neither this his holy institution, by which we feele our faith to be holpen with singular comfort, deserueth to be called superfluous. For Gods signe communicated to a childe doth as it were by an emprinted scale cōfirme the promise geuen to the godly parente, and declareth that it is ratified that the Lorde will be God not onely to him but also to his seede, and will continually shewe his good will and grace, not to him onely, but also to his posteritie euen to the thousandth generation. Where when the great kindnesse of God vttereth it selfe, first it yeldeth most large matter to aduance his glorie, and ouerspreadeth godly hartes with singular gladnesse, because they are therewithall more earnestly moued to loue againe so godly a Father, whom they see to haue care of their posteritie for their sakes. Neither do I regarde, if any man take exception, and say that the promise ought to suffice to confirme the saluation of our children: forasmuch as it hath pleased God otherwise; whoe as he knoweth our weaknesse, willed in this behalfe so much to beare tenderly with it. Therefore let them that embrace the promise of Gods mercy to be extended to their children, thinke that it is their duetie to offer them to the Church to be signed with the signe of mercy, and thereby to encourage themselves to a more assured confidence, because they do with present eye beholde the couenant of the Lorde grauen in the bodies of their children. Againe, the children receiue some commoditie of their baptisme, that being engrafted into the body of the Church, they be somewhat the more commended to the other membres. Then when they are growen to riper age, they be thereby not sclderly stirred vp to earnest endeour to worship God, of whom they haue bene receiued into his children by a solenne signe of adoption, before that they coulde by age acknowe him for their Father. Finally that same condemnation ought greatly to make vs ^{Gen.17.} ^{14.} afraide, that God will take vengeance of it, if any man despise to marke his sonne with the signe of the couenant, because by such contempt the grace offred is refused and as it were forsworne.

10 Nowe let vs examine the arguments, whereby certaine furious beastes do not cesse to assaile this holy institution of God. First because they see that they be exceedingly nere driuen and hard strained with the likenesse of baptisme and Circumcision, they labor to plucke in sonder these two signes with great difference, that the one should not seeme to haue any thing common with the other. For they say that both diuers things are signified, and that the couenant is altogether diuers, and that the naming of the children is not all one. But while they go about to proue that first point, they allege that Circumcision was a figure of mortification and not of baptisme. Which verily we do most willingly graunt them. For it maketh very well for our side. Neither do we vse any other profe of our sentence, than that Baptisme and Circumcision are signes of mortification. Hereupon we determine that Baptisme is set in the place of Circumcision, that in should represente vnto vs the same thing which in olde time it signified to the Iewes. In affirming the difference of the couenant, with howe barbarous boldnesse do they turmoile and corrupt the Scripture: and that not in one place alone, but so as they leaue nothing safe or whole? For they depainte vnto vs the Iewes so to be carnall that they be liker beasts than men: with whom forsooth the couenant made procedeth not beyonde the temporall life, to whom the promises geuen do rest in present and bodily good things. If this doctrine take place, what remaineth but that the nation of the Iewes were for a time filled with the benefits of God, none otherwise than as they fatte a hearde of swine in a stie, that at length they should perish with eternall damnation. For so sone as we allege Circumcision and the promises annexed vnto it, they aunswere that Circumcision was a litterall signe, and the promises thereof were carnall.

11 Truly if Circumcision was a literall signe, there is no otherwise to be thought of baptisme. For the Apostle in the seconde Chapter to the Coloſſians maketh the one no more spirituall than the other. For he ſaith that we are circumciſed in Chriſt, with a circumciſion not made with hande, putting away the body of ſinne that dwelled in our fleſh: which he calleth the circumciſion of Chriſt. Afterward for declaration of that ſaying, he adioineth, that we be buried with Chriſt by baptiſme. What meaneth he by theſe wordes, but that the fulfilling and truth of baptiſme, is alſo the truth and fulfilling of circumciſion, becauſe they figure both one thing? For he trauaileth to ſhewe, that baptiſme is the ſame to Chriſtians, which Circumciſion had bene before to the Iewes. But forasmuch as we haue nowe evidently declared, that the promiſes of both the ſignes, and the miſteries that are represented in them, do agree together, we will for this preſent tary no longer vpon them. Onely I will put the faithfull in minde, that though I holde my peace, they ſhould wey with themſelues whether it be taken for an earthly and literall ſigne, vnder which nothing is contained but spirituall and heavenly. But, that they ſhould not ſell their ſmokes to the ſimple, we will by the way confute one obiection wherewith they colour this moſt ſhameleſſe lie. It is moſt certaine that the principall promiſes, wherein was contained the couenāt which in the Olde teſtament God ſtabliſhed with the Iſraelites, were spirituall, and tended to eternall life: and then againe, that they were receiued of the fathers ſpirituallly, as it was mete, that they might thereof receiue affiance of the life to come, whereunto they longed with the whole affection of their hart. But in the meane time we denie not, but that he wiſſeſſed his good will towarde them with earthly and carnall benefites: by which alſo we ſay that the ſame promiſe of spirituall things was confirmed.

Gen. 15. As when he promiſed euerlaſtinge bleſſedneſſe to his ſeruant A-
1. & 18. braham, that he might ſet before his eyes a manifeſt token of his fauor, he addeth an other promiſe concerning the poſſeſſion of the lande of Chanaan. After this maner we ought to vnderſtande all the earthly promiſes that are geuen to the Iewiſh nation; that the ſpirituall promiſe, as the hed, whereunto they are directed, ſhould alway haue the chiefe place. But ſith I haue more largely entreated of theſe things in the difference of the newe and olde teſtament, therefore nowe I do the more ſlightly knitte it vp.

12 In the naming of the children they finde this diuerſity, that in the olde teſtament they were called the children of Abraham, which iſſued of his ſeede: but that nowe they are called by that name, which follow his faith: And that therefore that carnall infancy, which was by circumcision grafted into the felowship of the couenant, figured the infantes of the Newe testament, which are regenerate by the word of God to immortall life. In which wordes we beholde in dede a small sparcle of trueth: but herein these light spirites greuouly offende, that when they catche holde of that which first commeth to their hande, when they should go further and compare many things together, they stande stify vppon one word. Whereby it can not otherwise be but that they must sometime be deceiued which rest vpon the sound knowledge of nothings. We graunt in dede that the carnall seede of Abraham did for a time holde the place of the spirituall seede which is by faith grafted into him. For we be called his children howsoever there is no naturall kinred betwene him and vs. But if they meane, as they plainly shewe that they do, that there was neuer spirituall blessinge promised to the carnall seede of Abraham, herein they are much deceiued. Wherefore we must leuell to a better marke, wherunto we are directed by the most certaine guiding of the Scripture. The Lord therefore promised to Abraham, that he should haue a seede, wherein all nations of the earth shalbe blessed: and therewithall assureth him, that he woulde be a God to him and his seede. Whosoeuer do by Faith receiue Christ the author of blessinge, are heires of this promise, and therefore are called the children of Abraham.

13 But although since the resurrectiō of Christ the bouēdes of the kingdome of God haue begon to be farre and wide enlarged into all nations without difference, that accordinge to the sayinge of Christ, faithful ones should be gathered from euery part to sit downe in the heauenly glory with Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob: yet he had many ages before extended that same so great mercy to the Iewes. And because passinge ouer all other, he had chosen out that only nation, in which he would restraine his grace for a time, called them his peculiar possession, and his purchased people. For testifying of such liberality, Circumcision was giuen by the signe whereof the Iewes might be taught that God is to them the author of saluation: by which knowledge their mindes were raised into hope of eternall life. For what shall he want, whom God hath once receiued into his charge? Wherefore the Apostle meaninge to proue that the Gentiles were the children of Abraham as well as the Iewes, speaketh in this manner: Abraham (saith he) was iustified by faith in vncircumcision. Afterward he receiued the signe of circumcisiō, the scale of the righteousness of faith, that he should be the father of all the faithful, both also after the resurrection of Christ, he iudgeth that the promise of the couenāt is to be fulfilled, not only by way of allegory, but as the very words do sound, to the carnall seede of Abraham. To the same intent serueth that which Peter in the second Chapter of the Acts; Ac. 2. 39. declareth to the Iewes, that the benefit of the Gospell is due to them and their seede by right of the couenant, & in the Chapter next followinge he calleth them the children of the Testament, that is to say heires. From which also not much disaccordeth the other place of the Apostle about alleaged, where he accompteth & setteth Circumcision emprinted in infantes, for a testimony of that cōmunion which they haue with Christ. But if we harken to their trifles, what shalbe wrought by that promise, whereby the Lorde in the second article of his law vndertaketh to his seruants, that he will be fauorable to their seede euen to the thousandth generation? Shall we here flee to allegories? But that were too trifling a shift. Or shal we say that this is abolished? But so the law should be destroied, which Christ came rather to stablish, so farre as it turneth vs to good vnto life. Let it therefore be out of cōtrouersie, that God is so good & liberall to his, that for their sakes, he will haue also their children, whom they shal beget, to be adnumbred among his people.

16 Moreouer the differēces which they go about to put betwene baptisme and circumcision, are not only worthy to be laughed at, and void of all colour of reason, but also disagreeing with themselues. For when they haue affirmed that baptisme hath relation to the first day of the spirituall battell, but circumcisiō to the eighth when mortification is already ended, by and by forgetting the same, they turne their songe, and call circumcision a figure of the flesh to be mortified, but baptisme they call buriall, into which none are to be put till they be already dead. What dotages of phrentike men, can with so great lightnesse leape into sundry diuersities? For in the first sentence, baptisme must go before circumcision: by the other, it is thrust backe into the later place. Yet is it no new example, that the wits of men be so tossed vp and downe, when in steede of the most certaine word of God they worship whatsoever they haue dreamed. We therefore say that that former difference is a meere dreame. If they list to expounde by way of allegory vpō y^e eighth day, yet it agreed not in that maner. It were much fitter, accordinge to the opinion of the olde writers, to referre the number of eight to the resurrection which was done on the eighth day, whereupon we know that the newnesse of life hangeth: or to the whole course of this present life, wherein mortification ought alway to go forwarde, till when life is ended, mortification is

selfe may also be ended. Howbeit God may seeme to haue minded to prouide for the tenderesse of age, in differring circumcision the eighth day, because the wound should haue bin more dangerous to the children new borne and yet red from their mother. How much stronger is that, that we being deade before, are buried by baptisme: when the Scripture expressely crieth to the contrary that we are buried into death to this entent, that we should dye, and from thenceforth shoulde endeouour to this mortification? Now, a likewise handlinge it is, that they caull that women ought not to be baptised, if baptisme must be framed like to circumcision. For if it be most certaine that the sanctifyinge of the seede of Israell was testified by the signe of circumcision: thereby also it is vndouted, that it was giuen to sanctifie both males & females. But the only bodies of male children were marked with it, which might by nature be marked: yet so that the womē were by them after a certaine maner companions & partners of circumcisiō. Therefore sending far away such follies of theirs, let vs sticke fast in the likenes of baptisme & circumcision, which we most largely see to agree in the inward mystery, in the promises, in vse, in effectualnesse.

17 They thinke also that they bring foorth a most strong reason, why children are to be debarred from baptisme, when they alleage that they are not yet for age able to vnderstande the mysterie there signified. That is spirituall regeneration, which can not be in the first infancy. Therefore they gather, that they are to be taken for none other than the children of Adam, till they be growen to age mete for a second birth. But the trueth of God echwhere speaketh against all these things. For if they be to be left among the childrē of Adam, then they are left in death: forasmuch as in Adā we can do nothing but die. But contrariwise Christ commaundeth them to be brought vnto him. Why so? because he is life: Therefore that he may giue life to them, he maketh them partakers of himselfe: when in the meane time these fellowes driuinge them farre away do adiudge them to death. For if they say for a shift, that infantes do not therefore perish if they be accompted the childrē of Adam, their error is abundantly confuted by witnesse of the Scripture. For where as it pronounceth that all do die in Adam, it foloweth that there remaineth no hope of life but in Christ. Therefore that we may be made heires of life, we must communicate with him. Againe when it is wrytten in an other place, that by nature we are all subiect to the wrath of God, & conceiued in sinne, whereunto damnation perpetually cleaueth: we must depart out of our owne nature, before that the entry be open to vs into the kingdom of God. And what can be more plainly spoken, than that flesh and blood can not possesse the kingdom of God? 1. Cor. 15. 50. Therefore let all be done away whatsoever is ours (which shall not be done without regeneration) then we shall see this possession of the kingdom. Finally if Christ say truly, when he reporteth that he Ioh. 11. 25. & 14. 5. is life, it is necessary that we be grafted into him, that we may be deliuered out of the bondage of death. But (say they) how are infantes regenerate, which are not endued with knowledge neither of good nor of euill? But we answere, that the work of God is not yet no work at all, although it be not subiect to our capacity. Moreouer it is nothing doutfull, that the infants which are to be saued (as verily of that age some are saued) are before regenerate of the Lorde. For if they Ren. 21. 27. bring with them from their mothers wombe the corruption naturally planted in them: they must be purged thereof, before that they be Eph. 2. 3. Pl. 51. 7. admitted into the kingdom of God, wherinto nothing entreth that is defiled or spotted. If they be borne sinners, as both Dauid and Paul affirme: either they remaine out of fauour and hatefull to God, or they must nedes be iustified. And what seeke we more, when the iudge Ioh. 3. 3. himselfe openly affirmeth that the entrie into heauenly life is open to none but to them that be borne againe? And to put such carpers to silence, he shewed an example in Iohn the baptist, whom he sanctified in his mothers wombe, what he was able to do in the rest. Neither do they any thinge preuaile by the shift wherewith they here mocke, that that was but once done: whereupon it doth not by and by folowe that the Lorde is wont commonly to do so with infantes. For neither do we reason after that maner: onely our purpose is to shew, that the power of God is by them vniustly and enuiously limited within those narrowe boundes within which it suffreth not it selfe to be bounde. Their other byshift is euen of as great weight. They alleage that by the vsuall maner of the Scripture, this word (from the wombe,) is as much in effect, as if it were sayd, from childhoode. But we may clearely see, that the Angel when he declared the same to Zachary, meant an other thing: that is, that it which was not yet borne, should be filled with the holy Ghost. Let vs not therefore attempt to appoint a lawe to God, but that he may sanctifie whom it pleased him, as he sanctified this child, forasmuch as his power is nothing diminished.

Luc. 1. 15.

18 And truly Christ was therefore sanctified from his first infancy, that he might sanctifie in himselfe his elect out of euery age without difference. For as, to do away the fault of disobedience which had bin committed in our flesh, he hath put on the same flesh vpon himselfe selfe, that he might in it for vs and in our stede performe perfect obedience: so he was conceiued of the holy Ghost, that hauinge the holiness thereof fully poured into him in the fleshe which he had taken vpon him, he might poure foorth the same into vs. If we haue in Christ a most perfect paterne of all the graces which God continually sheweth to his childre, verily in this behalfe also he shalbe a profeynto vs, that the age of infancy is not so farre vnfit for sanctification. But howsoever it be, yet this we hold out of controuersie, that none of the elect is called out of this present life, which is not first made holy and regenerate by the Spirite of God. Whereas they object to the contrary, that in the Scriptures the Spirite acknowledgeth no other regeneration but of incorruptible seede, that is, of the word of God: they do wrongfully expounde that sayinge of Peter, wherein he comprehendeth onely the faithfull which hadde bin taught by preaching of the Gospell. To such in deede we graunt that the word of the Lorde is the onely seede of spirituall regeneration: but we deny that it ought therupon to be gathered, that infantes can not be regenerate by the power of God, which is to him as easie & ready as to vs it is incomprehensible and wonderfull. Moreover it shoulde not be safe enough for vs to take this away from the Lorde, that he may not be able to shewe himselfe to be knowen to them by whatsoever way he wil.

19 But Faith, say they, is by hearinge, whereof they haue not yet gotten the vse, neither can they be able to knowe God, whom Moses teacheth to be destitute of the knowledge both of good and euill. But they consider not that the Apostle, when he maketh hearing the beginning of faith, describeth onely the ordinary distribution of the Lorde and disposition which he vseth to keepe in callinge them that be his: but appointeth not to him a perpetuall rule, that he may not vse any other way. Which way verily he hath vsed in the callinge of many, to whom he hath giuen the true knowledge of himselfe by an inward maner, by the enlightening of the Spirite, without any preaching vsed for meane thereof. But whereas they thinke it shalbe a great absurditie, if any knowledge of God be giuen to infantes, from whom Moses taketh away the vnderstanding of good and euill: I beseech them to aunswere me, what danger is there if they be said to receiue some part of that grace, whereof a little after they shal enioy the full plentifulnes. For if the fulnes of life standeth in the perfect knowledge of God, when many of them, whom in their very first infancy death by and by taketh away, do passe into eternall life, truely they are receiued to beholde the most present face of God. Whom therefore the Lorde will enlighten with the full brightnesse of his light, why may he not presently also, if it so please him, sende out to shine vpon them some small sparckle thereof: specially if he do not first vnclouth them of ignorance, before that he take them out of the prison of the fleshe? Not that I meane rashly to affirme that they be endued with the same Faith which we feele in our selues, or that they haue altogether like knowledge of faith: (which I had rather leaue in suspense) but somewhat to restrain their foolish arrogance, which according as their mouth is puffed vp with fulnes, do boldly deny or affirme they care not what.

20 But that they may yet stande more strongly in this point, they adde, that baptisme is a Sacrament of repentance and of Faith: wherefore sith neither of these can befall in tender infancy, we ought to beware least if they be admitted to the communion of baptisme, the signification of it be made voyde and vaine. But these dartes are thrown rather against God than against vs. For it is most euident by many testimonies of Scripture, that circumcision also was a signe of repentance. Moreouer it is called of Paule the seale of the righteousnes of Faith. Let therefore a reason be required of God himselfe why he commaunded it to be marked in the bodies of infantes. For sith baptisme and circumcision are both in one case, they can giue nothing to the one but that they must also therewithall graunt the same to the other. If they looke backe to their wonted starting hole, that then by the age of infancy were figured spirituall infantes, the way is already stopped vp against them. We say therefore, sith God hath communicated to infantes circumcision a Sacrament of repentance and Faith, it seemeth no absurdity if they be made partakers of baptisme: vnlesse they list openly to rage against the ordinance of God. But both in all the doings of God, & in this selfe same doing also shineth wisdom and righteousnesse enough, to beate downe the backebittings of the wicked. For though infantes, at the same instant that they were circumcised, did not comprehend in vnderstandinge what that signe meant: yet they were truely circumcised into the mortification of their corrupt and defiled nature, in which mortification they should afterward exercise themselues when they were growen to riper age. Finally it is very easie to assoyle this obiection, with sayinge that they be baptised into repentance and Fayth to come: which although they be not formed in them, yet by secrete workinge of the Spirite the seede of both lyeth hidden in them. With this answer at once is ouerthrowen whatsoeuer they wrest against vs which they haue fetched out of the signification of baptisme. Of which sort is that title wherewith it is commended of Paul, where he calleth it the washing of regeneration and of renewing. Whereupon they gather that it is to be giuen to none but to such a one as is able to conceiue those things. But we on the contrary side may answer, that neither was circumcision which betokened regeneration, to be giuen to any other than to them that were regenerate. And so shall we condemne the ordinance of God. Wherefore (as we haue already touched in diuerse places) whatsoever arguments do tende to the shakinge of circumcision, they haue no force in the assailinge of baptism. Neither do they so escape away, if they say that we ought to take that for determined & certaine, which standeth vpon the authority of God, although there appeare no reason of it: which reuerence is not due to the baptism of infantes, nor to such other things which be not commended vnto vs by the expresse word of God: sith they are still fast holden with this double argumēt. For the commaundement of God concerning infantes to be circumcised, was either lawfull & subiect to no cauellations, or worthy to be found fault withall. If there were no inconuenience nor absurdity in the commaundement of circumcision, neither can there any absurdity be noted in obseruing the baptism of infantes.

21 As for the spot of absurdity which in this place they go about to lay vpon it, we thus wipe it away. Whom the Lord hath vouchsafed to elect, if hauinge receiued the signe of regeneration, they departe out of this present life before that they be come to riper age, he reneweth them with the power of his Spirit incomprehensible to vs, in such manner as he alone foreseech to be expedient. If they chauce to grow vp to age, whereby they may be taught the truth of baptism, they shal hereby be the more enkindled to the endeour of renewing, the token whereof they shall learne to haue bin giuen them from their first infancy, that they should exercise themselues in it throughout y whole course of their life. To the same entent ought that to be applied which Paule teacheth in two places, that by baptism we are buried together with Christ. For he doth not meane thereby, that he which is to be baptised, must be already first buried together with Christ: but simply declareth what doctrine is contained vnder baptism, yea & that to them that be already baptised: so that very mad men woulde not affirme by this place that it goeth before baptism. After this maner Moses & the Prophets did put the people in mind what circumcision meant, wherwith yet they had bin marked while they were infantes. Of the same effect also is that which he writeth to the Galatians, that they when they were baptised, did put on Christ. To what ende? verily that they should from thence forth liue to Christ, because they had not liued before. And although in the older sort the receiuing of the signe ought to follow the vnderstanding of y^e mystery: yet it shalbe by and by declared that infants ought to be otherwise esteemed & accompted of. And no otherwise ought we to iudge of y^e place of Peter, in which they thinke that they haue a strong hold: when he saith that it is not a washing to wipe away the filthinesse of the body, but the witnessse of a good conscience before God, by the resurrection of Christ. They in deede do gather thereby, that nothing is left to the baptisme of infantes, but that it should be a vaine smoke, namely from which this truth is farre distant. But they often offend in this errour, that they will haue the thing in order of time to go alway before the signe. For the truth of circumcision also consisted of the same witnessse of good conscience. If it ought of necessity to haue gone before, infantes should neuer haue bin circumcised by the commaundement of God. But he shewinge that the witnessse of a good conscience was contained vnder the truth of circumcision, & yet therewithall also commaunding infantes to be circumcised, doth in y^e point sufficiently declare that circumcision is applied to the time to come. Wherefore there is no more present effectualnes to be required in baptisme of infantes, thā y^e it should confirme & stablish the couenāt made by the Lord with them. The rest of the signification of that Sacrament shall afterward folow at such time as God himselte foreseeeth.

22 Now I thinke there is no man, that doth not clearely see that all such reasons of theirs are mere misconstrings of Scripture. As for the rest that be of a nere kinde to these, we wil lightly runne through them by the way. They obiekt that baptisme is giuen vnto the forgiuenes of sinnes: which whē it is graunted, will largely make for defense of our sentence. For sith we be borne sinners, we do euen from our mothers wombe nede forgiuenes and pardon. Now seeinge the Lord doth not cut of, but rather assure to that age the hope of mercy: why shoulde we take from them the signe which is much inferiour than the thing it selfe? Wherefore that which they go about to throw against vs, we thus throw backe against themselues: infantes haue remission of sinnes giuen them, therefore they ought not to haue the signe takē from them. They alleage also this out of the Epistle to the Ephesians: that the Church is cleansed of the Lord, with the washing of water in the word of life. Than which there could nothinge be alleaged more fit to overthrowe their errour: for thereupon groweth an easie profe of our side. If the Lord wil haue the washing wherwith he cleanseth his Church, to be testified by baptisme: it seemeth not rightful that it should want the testimony of it in infantes, which are rightfully accōpted part of the Church, forasmuch as they be called heires of the heauenly kingdome. For Paule speaketh of the whole Church, where he saith that it was cleansed with the baptisme of water. Likewise of this that in an other place he sayth that we be by baptisme grafted into y^e body of Christ, we gather that infants, whom he reckoneth amonge his members, ought to be baptised, least they be plucked away from his body. Beholde with what violence with so many engines they assault the fortresses of our faith. 1. Cor. 12. 17.

23. Then they come downe to the practise & custome of y^e time of y^e Apostles, wherin none is found to haue bin admitted to baptisme, but he which hath before professed Faith & repentance. For where Peter was asked of them that were minded to repēt, what was needful to be done, he counsell'd them first to repent, & then to be baptised, into the forgiuenes of sinnes. Likewise Philip, whē the Eunuch required to be baptised, answered that he might be baptised if he beleued with all his hart. Hereby they thinke that they may winne, that it is not lawfull that baptisme be graunted to any, but where Faith & repentance go before. Truly if we yeelde to this reason, the first of these two places where is no mention made of Faith, will proue that repentance alone sufficeth: and the other place, wherein repentance is not required, will proue that Faith only is enough. I thinke they will aunswere that the one place is holpen with the other, and therefore must be ioyned together. I say also likewise, that other places must be laid together which make somewhat to the vndoing of this kuor: forasmuch as there be many sentences in Scripture, the vnderstanding whereof hangeth vpon the circumstance of the place. As this presently is an example. For they to whom Peter and Philip spake these thinges were of age sufficient to haue practise of repentance and to conceiue Faith. We earnestly deny that such ought to be baptised, vntill after perceiuing of their conuersion and Faith, at least so farre as it may be searched out by the iudgemēt of men. But, that infantes ought to be accompted in an other number, it is more than euident enough. For in old time if any man did ioyne himselfe into communion of religion with Israell, it behoued that he should first be taught the couenant of the Lord, & instructed in the law, before that he were marked with circumcision, because in birth he was a straunger from the people of Israell, with whom the couenant had bin made which circumcision stablished. A& 2. 37. A& 8. 37.

24. As also the Lord, when he adopteth Abrahā to himselfe, doth not begin at circumcision, hidinge in the meane time what he mea- Gen. 15.

neth by that signe: but first he declareth what couenāt he entēdeth to make with him, & then after Faith giuen to the promise, he maketh him partaker of the Sacramēt. Why doth in Abraham the Sacrament follow Faith, & in Isaac his sonne it goeth before all vnderstanding? Because it is mete that he, which being in full growen age is receiued into felowship of the couenant, from which he had bin hitherto a stranger, should first learne the conditions thereof: but an infant begotten of him neded not so, which by right of inheritance according to y^e forme of the promise is euen frō his mothers wombe cōtained in the couenant. Or (that the matter be may more clearely & briefly shewed) if the children of the faithful, without the help of vnderstandinge, are partakers of the couenant, there is no cause why they shoulde be debarred from the signe for this that they can not sweare to the forme of the couenant. This verily is the reason, why in some places God affirmeth that the infantes which are issued of the Israelites, are begottē & borne to him. For without doubt he esteemeth as his children the children of them to whose seede he promiseth y^e he will be a Father. But he which is vnfaithfull, issued of vngodly parents, till he be by Faith vnited to God, is iudged a straunger from the communion of the couenant. Therefore it is no maruel if he be not partaker of the signe, the signification whereof should be deceitfull and voyde in him. To this effect Paule also writeth, that the Gentiles so long as they were drowned in their idolatry, were out of the Testament. With this short summe, (as I thinke) the whole matter may be clearely opened: that they which in growen age, embrace the Fayth of Christ, forasmuch as they were hitherto strangers from the couenant, are not to be marked with baptisme, but whereas Faith and repentance come betwene, which onely can open them the entrie into felowshippe of the couenant: but the infantes that are issued of Christians, as they are receiued of God into the inheritance of the couenant so soone as they be borne, so ought to be receiued to baptisme. Hereunto must that be applied which the Euangelist speaketh of, that they were baptised of Iohn which confessed their finnes. Which exāple at this day also we thinke mete to be kept. For if a Turke offer himselfe to baptisme, he shoulde not be rashely baptised of vs, namely not till after cōfession whereby he may satisfie the Church.

25 Moreouer they bring forth the wordes of Christ, which are rehearsed in the third Chapter of Iohn, wherby they thinke that a present regeneration is required in baptisme. Vnlesse a man be borne againe of water and the Spirite, he can not enter into the kingdom of God.

God. Lo (say they) howe baptisme is by the Lordes owne mouth called regeneration. Them therefore whom it is more than enough knowen to be vnable to receiue regeneratiō, by what colour do we admit to baptisme which can not be without regeneratiō? First they are deceiued in this that they thinke that in this place mention is made of baptisme, because they heare the name of water. For after that Christ had declared to Nicodemus the corruption of nature, & taught him that mē must be borne of new, because Nicodemus dreamed of a bodily newe birth, he there shewed the maner howe God doth regenerate vs, namely by water and the Spirite: as though he should say, by the Spirite which in cleansinge and wateringe faithfull soules, doth the office of water. Therefore I take water and the Spirite simply for the Spirit, which is water. Neither is this a new forme of spech, for it altogether agreeth with the same which is in the third Chapter of Mathewe: He that foloweth me, it is he that baptiseth in the holy Ghost and fier. Therefore as to baptise in the holy Ghost and fier, is to giue the holy Ghost, which hath the office and nature of fier: so to be borne againe of water and the Spirite, is nothing else but to receiue that power of the holy Spirite which doth the same thinge in the soule that water doth in the body. I knowe that other do otherwise expounde it: but I am out of dout that this is the naturall meaninge: because the purpose of Christ is none other, but to teach that all they must put of their owne nature which aspire to the heauenly kingdom. Howbeit if we list to cauil vnfauorably as they do, it were easie for vs (when we haue graunted as they would haue it) to inferre vpon them that baptisme is before Fayth and repentance: forasmuch as in the wordes of Christ it goeth before the Spirite. It is certayne that this is vnderstanded of spirituall gistes: which if they come after baptisme, I haue obtayned what I require. But leauinge caullations, we must holde fast the plaine exposition, which I haue brought, that no manne till he haue beene renewed with liuinge water, that is, with the Spirite, can enter into the kingdome of God.

26 Now hereby also it is euident that their fained inuention is to be hissed out, which adiudge all the vnbaptised to eternall death. Therefore let vs accordinge to their request imagine baptisme to be ministred to none but to them that be growen in age: what will they say, shall become of a childe, which is rightly and well instructed with the introductions of godlinesse, if when the day of baptisinge is at hand, he happen to be taken away with sudden death beside all mens hope? The Lordes promise is cleare, that whosoeuer hath beleued in the Sonne, shall not see death, nor shall come into iudgement, but is already passed from death into life: and it is no where founde that he euer damned him that was not yet baptised. Which I woulde not haue so taken of me as though I meant that baptisme might freely be despised (by which despisinge I affirme that the Lordes couenant is defiled: so much lesse can I abide to excuse it) only it is enough for me to proue, that it is not so necessary, that he should be immediatly thought to be lost, from whome power is taken away to obtaine it. But if we agree to their fained deuise, we shall damne all them without exception, whom any chaunce withholdeth from baptisme, with howe great Faith soeuer (by which Christ himselfe is possessed) otherwise they are endued. Moreouer they make all infantes gilty of eternall death, to whom they deny baptisme, which by their owne confession is necessary to saluation. Nowe lette them looke howe trimly they agree with the wordes of Christ, by which the kingdom of heauen is adiudged to that age. But, to graunt them euery thinge so much as pertaineth to the vnderstandinge of this place, yet they shall gather nothinge thereof, vnlesse they ouerthrowe the former doctrine which we haue stablished concerninge the regeneration of infantes.

27 But they glory that they haue the strongest holde of all in the very institution of baptisme, which they fetch out of the last Chapter of Matthew: where Christ sending forth his Apostles to all nations, giueth them the first commaundement to teache them, and the seconde to baptise them. Then also out of the last of Marke they adioyne this, He that beleueth and is baptised, shalbe saued. What seke we further (say they) when the Lordes owne words do openly sound, that we must first teache ere we baptise, and do assigne to baptisme the second state after Faith? Of which order the Lord also shewed an example in himselfe, which would be baptised not till the thirtieth yeare. But here, O good God, how many waies do they both entangle themselues, and bewray their owne ignorance? For herein they now more than childishly erre, y they fetch the first institutiō of baptisme from thense, which Christ had from the beginning of his preachinge giuen in charge to his Apostles to minister. Therefore there is no cause why they shoulde affirme that the lawe and rule of baptisme is to be fetched out of these places, as though they contained the first institution thereof. But, to beare with them for this fault, yet how strong is this maner of reasoning? Truely if I listed to dally with them, there is not a litle lurking hole, but a most wide fielde offereth it selfe open for vs to escape them. For when they sticke so fast to the order

order of wordes, that they gather that because it is sayd, Go, preache Mar. 16 and baptise, Againe, he that beleueth and is baptised, therefore they ^{15.} must preache before that they baptise, & beleue before that they require baptisme: why may not we againe answere them with sayinge that we must baptise before that we must teache the keping of those thinges that Christ hath commaunded: namely sith it is sayd, baptise ye, teaching them to kepe whatsoeuer thinges I haue commaunded you? which same thinges we haue noted in that sayinge of Christ which haue bin euen now alleaged concerninge the regeneration of water and the Spirit. For if it be so vnderstode as they would haue it, verily in that place baptisme must be before spirituall regeneration, because it is named in the first place. For Christ doth teache that we must be regenerate, not of the Spirit and water, but of water and the Spirit.

28 Now this inuincible reason whereupon they beare themselues so bolde, seemeth to be somewhat shaken: but because trueth hath defense enough in simplicity, I will not escape away with such light ar-gumentes. Therefore let them take with them a full answere. Christ in this place giueth the chiefe commaundement concerninge preaching of the Gospell, whereunto he adioyneth the ministry of bap-tisme as an addition hanging vpon it. Againe he speaketh none otherwise of baptisme but so farre as the ministratiō of it is vnder the office of teachinge. For Christ sendeth the Apostles to publishe the Gospell to all y nations of the world, that they should frō echwhere with the doctrine of saluation gather together into his kingdom men that before were lost. But whom, or what maner of men? It is certaine that there is no mention but of thē that are able to receiue teachinge.
 Afterward he addeth that such, when they are instructed, ought to be baptised, adioyninge a promise, that they which beleue and are baptised shalbe saued. Is there in all that saying so much as one sillable of infantes? What forme therefore of reasoning shall this be wherewith they assaile vs: they which are of growen age, must first be instructed, that they may beleue, ere they be baptised: therefore it is vnlawful to make baptisme common to infantes? Although they would burst themselues, they shall proue nothing else by this place but that the Gospell must be preached to thē that are of capacity able to heare it, before y they be baptised, forasmuch as he there speaketh of such only. Let them hereof, if they can, make a stoppe to debarre infantes from baptisme.

29 But, that euen blinde men also may with groping finde out their deceites, I will point them out with a very cleare similitude. If any man cauill that infantes ought to haue meate taken from them, vpon this pretense that the Apostle suffereth none to eate but them that labour, shall he not be worthy that all men should spit at him? Why for? Because he without difference draweth that to all men, which was spoken of one kinde & one certaine age of mē. No whit handsomer is their handeling in this present cause. For, that which euery man seeth to belonge to one age alone, they draw to infantes, that this age also may be subiect to y^e rule which was made for none but thē that were more growen in yeres. As for the example of Christ, it nothinge vp-holdeth their side. He was not baptised before y^e he was thirty yeres olde. That is in deede true: but there is a reason thereof ready to be shewed: because he then purposed by his preachinge to lay a sounde foundation of baptisme, or rather to stablish the foundation which had bin before layd of Iohn. Therefore when he minded with his doctrine to institute baptisme, to procure the greater authority to his institution, he Sanctified it with his owne body, and that in such fitnesse of time as was most conuenient, namely when he began his preaching.

 Finally they shall gather nothing else hereof, but that baptisme toke his originall and beginninge at the preachinge of the Gospell. If they list to appoint the thirtith yere, why do they not keepe it, but do re-ceiuē euery one to baptisme as he hath in their iudgement sufficiently profited? yea & Seruettus one of their maisters, when he stiffely required this time, yet began at the 21. yere of his age to boast himselfe to be a Prophete. As though he were to be suffered that taketh vpon himselfe the place of a teacher in the Church, before that he be a mēber of the Church.

30 At the last they obiekt, that there is no greater cause why bap-tisme should be giuen to infantes, than the Lordes Supper, which yet is not graunted them. As though the Scripture did not euery way expresse a large difference. The same was in dede vsually done in the old Church, as it appeareth by Cyprian and Augustine: but that maner is worthily growen out of vse. For if we consider the nature and property of baptisme, it is truely an entry into the Church and as it were a forme of admission, whereby we are adnumbred into the people of God, a signe of our spirituall regeneration by which we are borne againe into the children of God: whereas on the other side the Supper is giuen to them that be more growen in age, which hauing passed tender infancy, are now able to beare strong meate. Which difference is very euidently shewed in the Scripture. For there the Lord so much as pertaineth to baptisme, maketh no choise of ages. But he doth not likewise giue the Supper to all to take part of it, but only to them

which are fit to discerne the body and blood of the Lord, to examine their owne conscience, to declare the Lordes death, to weye the power thereof. Would we haue any thing plainer, than that which the Apostle teacheth whē he exhorteth that euery man should proue and examine himselfe, and then eate of this bred and drinke of this cup? Therefore examination must go before, which should in vaine be loked for of infantes. Againe, he that eateth vnworthily, eateth and drinketh damnatiō to himselfe, not discerning the Lordes body. If none can partake worthily but they that can well discerne the holinesse of the Lordes body, why should we geue to our tender children, poison in steede of liuely foode? What is that commaundement of the Lorde, ye shall do it in remembrance of me? what is that other which the Apostle deriueth from the same, So oft as ye shall eate of this bread, ye shall declare the Lordes death till he come? What remembrance (I beseeche you) shall we require at our infantes of the thing which they neuer attained with vnderstanding? what preaching of the crosse of Christ, the force and benefite whereof they do not yet comprehend in minde? None of these things is prescribed in baptisme. Therefore betwene these two signes is great difference: which we note also in like signes in the olde testament. Circumcision, which is knowen to aunswere to our baptisme, was appointed for infants. But the passcouer into whoes place the Supper hath nowe succeded, did not receiue all maner of gistes without difference, but was rightly eaten of them onely that might by age enquire of the signification of it. If these men had remaining one crumme of sounde braine, would they be blinde at a thing so clere and offering it selfe to sight?

31 Although it greuenth me to lode the readers with a heape of trifles: yet it shalbe worth the trauaill brefely to wipe away such gay reasons as Seruettus not the least of the Anabaptistes, yea the great glory of that company, thought himselfe to bring when he prepared himselfe to cōfist. He allegeth, that Christes signes as they be perfect, so do require them that be perfect or able to conceiue perfection. But the solution is easy: that the perfection of baptisme, which extēdeth euen to death, is wrongfully restrained to one point of time. I say yet further, that perfection is foolishly required in man at the first day, whereunto baptisme allureth vs all our life long by continual degrees. He obiecteth that Christes signes were ordeined for remembrance, that euery man should remember that he was buried together with Christ. I aunswere that, that which he hath fained of his owne head, needeth no confutation: yea that which he draweth to baptisme, Paules wordes shewe to be propre to the holy Supper, that euery man should examine himself: but of baptisme there is no where any such thing. Whereupon we gather that they be rightly baptised which for their smalnesse of age, are not yet able to receiue examination. Whereas he thirdly allegeth, that all they abide in death which beleue not the Sonne of God, and that the wrath of God abideth vpon them: and therefore that infants which can not beleue lie in their damnation: I aunswere that Christ there speaketh not of the generall giltinesse wherewith all the posteritie of Adam are enwrapped, but onely thretneeth the despisers of the Gospell, which do proudly and stubbornly refuse the grace offered them. But this nothing pertaineth to infantes. Also I set a contrarie reason against the: that whomsoever Christ blesseth, he is discharged from the curse of Adam and the wrath of God: Sith therefore it is knowen that infantes are blessed of him, it followeth that they are discharged from death. Then he falsly citeth that which is no where red, that whosoever is borne of the Spirit, heareth the voice of the Spirit. Which although we graunt to be written, yet shall proue nothing els but that the faithfull are framed to obedience, according as the Spirit worketh in them. But that which is spoken of a certaine number, it is faultie to drawe indifferently to all. Fowerthly he objecteth: because that goth before which is naturall, we must tarry ripe time for baptisme which is spirituall. But although I graunt that all the posteritie of Adam begotten of the fleshe do from the very wombe beare their owne damnation, yet I denie that that withstandeth but that God may presently bring remedy. For neither shall Seruettus proue that there were many yeares appointed by God that the spirituall newnesse of life many beginne. As Paule testifieth, although they which are borne of the faithfull are by nature damned: yet by supernaturall grace they are saued. Then he bringeth forth an allegoric, that Dauid going vp into y^e toure of Sion, did leade neither blinde men nor lame men with him but strong souldiors. But what if I set a parable against it, wherein God calleth to the heauenly banket blinde men and lame men: howe will Seruettus vnwinde himselfe out of this knott? I aske also whether lame and maimed men had not first bene souldiors with Dauid. But it is superfluous to tary longer vpon this reason, which the readers shall finde by the holy historie to be made of mere falsehod. There followeth another allegoric, that the Apostles were fishers of men, not of litle children. But I aske, what that saying of Christ meaneth, that into the nette of the Gospel are gathered all kindes of fishes. But because I like not to play with allegories, allegories,

allegories, I aunswere that when the office of teaching was enioined to the Apostles, yet they were not forbidden from baptising of infantes. Howbeit I would yet knowe, when the Euangeliste nameth them Anthropous men, (in which word is comprehended all mankinde without exception) why they should deny infantes to be men. Seuenthly he allegeth, that sith spirituall things agree with spirituall, infantes which are not spirituall, are also not mete for baptisme. But first it is plainly eident howe wrongfully they wrest the place of Paule. There is entreated of doctrine: when the Corinthians did to much stande in their owne conceite for vaine sharpnesse of witte, Paule rebuketh their sluggishnesse, for that they were yet to be instructed in the first introductions of heauenly wisdome. Who can thereof gather that baprisme is to be denied to infantes, whom being begotten of the flesh God doth by free adoption make holy to himselfe? Whereas he saith, that they must be fed with spirituall meate, if they be newe men, the solution is easy, that by baptisme they are admitted into the flocke of Christ, and that the signe of adoption suffiseth them, till being growen to age they be able to beare strong meate: that therefore the time of examination which God expressly requireth in the holy Supper, must be taried for. Afterward he objecteth that Christ calleth all his to the holy Supper. But it is certaine enough that he admitterh none, but them that be already prepared to celebrate the remembrance of his death. Whereupon followeth that infantes, whom he vouchesaue to embrace, do stay in a feuerall and proper degree by themselves till they growe to age, and yet are not strangers. Whereas he sayeth, that it is monstrous that a man after that he is borne, should not eate: I aunswere that soules are otherwise fed than by the outward eating of the Supper: and that therefore Christ is neuertheless meate to infantes, although they absteine from the signe. But of baptisme the case is otherwise, by which onely the gate into the Church is opened to them. Againe he obiecteth that a good Stewarde distributeth meate to the householde in due time. Which although I willingly graunt: yet by what right will he appoint vnto vs the certaine time of Baptisme, that he may proue that it is not geuen to infantes out of time. Moreouer he bringeth in that commaundement of Christ to the Apostles, that they should make hast into the harvest, while the fieldes waxe white. Verily Christ meaneth this onely, that the Apostles seying the fruit of their labor present, should the more cherefully prepare themselves to teache. Who shall thereof gather that the onely time of haruest is the ripe time for baptisme? His eleuenth reason is, that in the first Church

Christians and disciples were all one: but we see now that he fondly reasoneth from the parte to the whole. Disciples are called men of full age, which had bene already throughly taught, and had professed Christ: as it behoued that the Iewes vnder the lawe should be the disciples of Moses: yet no man shall thereof rightly gather, that infantes were strangers, whom the Lorde hath testified to be of his householde. Beside these he allegeth, that all Christians are brethren, in which number infantes are not vnto vs, so long as we debarre them from the Supper. But I returne to that principle, that none are heires of the kingdome of heauen, but they that are the membres of Christ: then, that the embracing of Christ was a true token of the adoption, whereby infantes are ioined in common with full growen men, and that the absteyning for a time from the Supper withstandeth not but that they pertaine to the body of the Church. Neither did the these that was conuerted on the Crosse, cesse to be brother of the godly, although he neuer came to the Supper. Afterward he addeth, that none is made our brother but by the Spirit of adoption, which is geuen onely by the hearing of faith. I aunswere, that he still falleth backe into the same deceitefull argument, because he ouerthwartly draweth y^e to infants which was spokē only of growē men. Paule teacheth there that this is Gods ordinarie maner of calling to bring his elect to the faith, whē he stirreth vp to them faithfull teachers, by whoes ministerie and trauaile he reacheth his hande to them. Who dare thereby appoint a lawe to him, but that he may by some other secret way graffe infantes into Christ? Where he objecteth that Cornelius was baptised after that he had receiued the Holy Ghost: howe wrongfully he doth out of one example gather a generall rule, appereth by the Eunuch and the Samaritanes, in whom the Lorde kepte a cōtrary order, that baptisme went before the gifts of the Holy Ghost. The fiftenth reason is more than foolish. He saith that we are by regeneration made gods: and that they be gods to whom the word of God is spoken, which accordeth not to children that be infantes. Whereas he faineth a Godhead to the faithfull, that is one of his dotages, which it pertaineth not to this present place to examine. But to wrest the place of the Psalme to so cōtrarie a sense, is a point of desperate shamelesnesse. Christ saith, that Kings and Magistrates are called of the Prophet goddes, because they beare an office appointed them of God. But, that which concerning the speciall commaundement of gouernance is directed to certaine men, this handsome expositor draweth to the doctrine of the Gospell, that he may banish infantes out of the Church. Againe he objecteth, that infantes can not be accompted newe men, because they are not begotten by the word. But I do nowe againe repete that which I haue often said, that to regenerate vs doctrine is the vncorruptible seede, if we be fit to receiue it: but when by reason of age there is not yet in vs aptnesse to learne, God kepeth his degrees of regenerating. Afterward he commeth backe to his allegories, that in the lawe a shepe and a goate were not offred in sacrifice so sone as they came out of the wombe. If I listed to drawe figures to this purpose, I could likewise redily obiect against him, that all first begotten things were consecrate to God so sone as they had opened the wombe: then, that a lambe must be killed at a yeares age. Wherupō followeth that manly strength is not to be taried for, but rather that the newe and yet tender issues are chosen of God for sacrifices. Furthermore he affirmeth that none can come to Christ, but they that haue bene prepared of Iohn. As though Iohns office were not enduring but for a time. But, to omitt this, truely that same preparation was not in the children whom Christ embraced and blessed. Wherefore let him go with his false principle. At length he calleth for patrones Trismegistus and the Sibylles, to proue that holy washings pertaine not but to them that are of growen age. Lo howe honorably he thinketh of the baptisme of Christ, which he reduceth to the Ceremonies of the Gentiles, that it may be no otherwise ministred than pleaseth Trismegistus. But we more esteeme the authoritie of God, whom it hath pleased to make infantes holy to himself, and to admitte them with the holy signe, the force whereof they did not yet by age vnderstād. Neither do we compt it lawfull to borowe out of the cleansings of the Gentiles any thing that may change in our baptisme the euerlasting and inuiolable lawe of God, which he hath stablished concerning circumcision. Last of all, he maketh this argument: that if it be lawfull to baptise infantes without vnderstanding, then baptisme may enterludelike and in sport be ministred of boyes when they play. But of this matter let him quarell with God by whoes commaundement circumcision was common to infantes before that they had attained vnderstanding Was it therefore a playing matter, or subiect to the follies of children, that they might ouerthrow the holy ordinance of God? But it is no meruaile that these reprobate Spirits, as though they were vexed with a phrenesie, do thrust in all the grossest absurdities for defence of their errors: because God doth with such giddinesse iustly take vengeance of their pride and stubbornesse. Verily I trust I haue made plaine with howe feble succors Seruettus hath holpen his silly brethren the Anabaptists.

32 Nowe I thinke it will be doutfull to no sobre man, howe rashly they trouble the Church of Christ, that moue brawles and contentions for the baptisme of infantes. But it is profitable to cōsider, what Satan goeth about with this so great suttelty: euen to take away from vs the singular fruit of affiance and spirituall ioy which is to be gathered hereof, & to diminish as much also of the glory of the goodnesse of God. For howe swete is it to godly mindes, to be certified not onely by word, but also by sight to be seene with eyes, that they obtaine so much fauor with the heauenly father, that he hath also care of their posteritie? For here it is to be seene, howe he take: h vpon him the person of a most prouident Father of householde toward vs, which euen after our death doth not lay away his carefulnesse of vs, but prouideth and forseeeth for our children. Ought we Psal. 48. 21. not here after the example of Dauid with al our hart to leape vp vnto thankesgeuing, that by such shewe of his goodnesse, his name may be sanctified? This, verily Satan intendeth, in assailing with so great armiees the baptisme of infantes: namely, that this testifying of the grace of God being taken away, the promise which by it is present before our eyes, may at length by little and little vanish away. Wherevpon should growe not onely a wicked vnthankfulnesse toward the mercy of God, but also a certaine slouthfulnesse in instructing our children to godlinesse. For by this spurre we are not a little pricked forward to bring them vp in the earnest feare of God & in the keeping of his lawe, when we cōsider that euen immediatly from their birth, he taketh and acknowledgeth them for his children. Wherefore vnlesse we list enuiously to darken the bountifulnesse of God, let vs offer to him our children, to whom he geueth a place among them that be of his familie and householde, that is to say, the members of the Church.

The xvij. Chapter.

Of the holy Supper of Christ: and what it availeth vs.

After that God hath ones receiued vs into his familie, and not onely to take vs as his seruantes, but as his children: that he may fulfill the office of a most good Father, and carefull for his issue, he taketh also vpon him to nourish vs throughout the whole course of our life. And not cōtented therewith, it pleased him by a pledge geuen, to assure vs of this continuall liberaltie. To this ende therefore he hath geuen his Church an other Sacrament by the hand of his only begotten Sonne, namely a spirituall banquet, wherein Christ testifieth himselfe to be the quickning bread, wherewith our soules are fed to true & blessed immortalitie. But forasmuch as the knowledge of so great a misterie is very necessarie, and according to the greatnesse thereof, requireth a diligent declaration: and Satan, that he might bereue the Church of this inestimable treasure, hath long ago spread mistes, and sins that time darknesse, to obscure the light of it, and then hath stirred strives and bartels that might estrange the mindes of the simple from tasting of this holy fode, and hath also in our time attempted the same craft: therefore when I shall haue brefely knit vp the summe for the capacitie of the vnlearned, I will vndo those knottes, wherewith Satan hath endeoured to snare the world. First, bread and wine are signes, which represent vnto vs the inuisible foode, which we receiue of the flesh and blood of Christ. For as in baptisme God againe begetting vs doth graffe vs into the fellowship of his Church, and by adoption doth make vs his owne: so we haue said that he performeth the office of a prouident Father of householde, in this that he continually ministreth vs meate, that he susteineth and preserueth vs in that life whereinto he hath by his word begotten vs. Nowe the onely meate of our soule is Christ, and therefore the heavenly Father calleth vs to him, that being refreshed with common partaking of him, we may from time to time gather liuely force, vntill we attein to heavenly immortalitie. But forasmuch as this misterie of the secret vnitng of Christ with the godly is by nature impossible to be comprehended, he geueth the figure and image thereof in visible signes most fit for our small capacitie: yea as it were by earnestes and tokens geuen, he maketh it so assured vnto vs as if it were sene with our eies, because this so familiar a similitude entreth euen into the grossest mindes, that soules are so fed with Christ, as bread and wine do susteine the bodily life. Nowe therefore we haue it declared, to what ende this mysticall blessing tendeth, namely to assure vs, that the body of the Lorde was so ones offred for vs, that we nowe eate it, and in eating it do fele in vs the effectuall working of that onely sacrifice: that his blood was so ones shed for vs, that it is vnto vs continuall drinke. And so sounde the words of the promise there adioined. Take, this is my body, which is deliuered for you. The body therefore which was ones offred vp for our saluation, we are commaunded to take and eate: that when we see our selues to be made partakers of this, we may certainly determine that the power of his death which bringeth life shalbe effectuall in vs. Whereupon also he calleth the cuppe, the couenāt in his blood. For after a certaine maner it reneweth, or rather continueth the couenāt which he hath ones stablished with his blood, so much as pertaineth, to the confirming of our faith, so ofte as he reacheth vnto vs that holy blood to be tasted of.

2 A great fruit verily of affiãce and swetenesse may godly soules gather of this Sacrament, because they haue a witnesse, that we are growen together into one body with Christ, so that whatsoeuer is his we may call ours. Hereupon followeth that we may boldly promise vnto our selues, that euerlasting life is ours, whereof he is heire: and that the kingdome of heauen, whereinto he is nowe entred, can no more fall away from vs than from him: againe that we can not nowe be condemned by our sinnes, from the giltinesse whereof he hath acquitted vs, when he willed them to be imputed to himself as if they were his owne. This is the maruailous exchange, which of his immeasurable bouñtífulesse he hath made with vs: that he being made with vs the sonne of man, hath made vs with him the sonnes of God: that by his comming downe into earth, he hath made vs a way to go vp into heauen: that putting vpon him our mortalitie, he hath geuen vs his immortalitie: that taking on him our weakenesse, he hath strengthened vs with his power: that taking our pouerty to himselfe he hath conueyed his riches to vs: that taking to him the weight of our vnrighteousnes, wherewith we were oppressed, he hath clothed vs with his righteousnesse.

3 Of all these things we haue so full a witnessing in this sacrament, that we must certainly determine, that Christ is truely geuen vs, as if Christ himself were set present before our eyes, and handled with our handes. For this word can neither lie to vs, nor mocke vs: Take, eate, drinke: this is my body which is deliuered for you: this is the blood, which is shed into the forgeuennesse of sinnes. Whereas he commaundeth to take, he signifieth that it is ours. Whereas he commaundeth to eate, he signifieth that that is made one substance with vs. Whereas he saith of the body, that it is deliuered for vs: of the blood, that it is shed for vs: therein he teacheth that both are not so much his as ours: because he toke and laide away both, not for his commoditie, but to our saluation. And truely it is to be diligently marked, that the chiefe and in a maner whole pith of the sacrament standeth in these words, Which is deliuered for you, Which is shed for you. For, otherwise it should not much profit vs, that the body and blood of the Lorde are nowe distributed, vnlesse they had bene ones geuen forth for our redemption and saluation. Therefore they are represented vnder bread and wine, that we should learne that they are not onely ours, but also ordeined for the nourishment of spirituall life. This is it that we before sayed, that from the corporall porall things which are shewed forth in the Sacrament, we are by a certaine proportionall relation guided to spirituall things. So when bread is geuen vs for a signe of the body of Christ, we ought by and by to conceiue this similitude: As bread nourisheth, susteineth, and mainteineth the life of our body: so the body of Christ is the onely meate to quicken and geue life to our soule. When we see wine set forth for a signe of his blood: we must call to minde what vses wine bringeth to the body, that we may consider that the same are brought to vs spiritually by the blood of Christ: those vses be, to cherish, to refresh, to strengthen, to make mery. For if we sufficiently weye, what the deliuering of this holy body, what the shedding of this holy blood, hath profited vs: we shall plainly perceiue that these things which are spoken of bread and wine, according to such proportionall relation do very well accorde with them toward vs when they are communicated vnto vs.

4 Therefore the chiefe partes of the Sacrament are not, simply and without hier consideration to reach to vs the body of Christ: but rather that same promise, whereby he testifieth, that his flesh is verily meate, and his blood is drinke, with which we are fed into eternall life: whereby he affirmeth himselfe to be the breade of life, of which who so eateth, he shall liue for euer: to seale. (I say) and confirme that promise: and for bringing the same to passe, to lende vs to the crosse of Christ, where that promise hath bene truly performed, and in all pointes fulfilled. For we do not well and healthfully eate Christ but crucified, when we do with liuely feeling conceiue the effectualnesse of his death. For whereas he called himselfe the breade of life, he did not borrowe that name of the sacrament, as some do wrongfully expounde it: but because he was geuen vs such of the Father, and performed himselfe such, when being made partaker of our humane mortalitie, he made vs parteners of his diuine immortalitie: when offering himselfe for sacrifice, he toke our accursednesse vpon himself, that he might fill vs with blessing: when with his death he deuoured and swallowed vp death: when in his resurrection he raised vp this our corruptible flesh which he had put on, to glory and vncorruption.

5 It remaineth that by appliance all the same may come to vs. That is done, both by the Gospell, and more cleerely by the holy Supper, where both he offereth himselfe to vs with all his good things, and we receiue him by faith. Wherefore the sacrament maketh not that Christ first beginneth to be the breade of life: but when it bringeth into remembrance, that he was made the breade of life, which we continually eate, and when it geueth vnto vs the tast and sauor of that bread then it maketh vs to fele the strength of that bread. For it promiseth vs, that whatsoever Christ did or suffred, the same was done to geue life to vs. Then, that this geuing of life is euerlasting, by which we may without ende be nourished, susteined, & preserued in life. For as Christ should not haue bene to vs the bread of life, vnlesse he had bene borne and had died for vs; vnlesse he had risen againe for vs: so now he should not be the same vnlesse the effectualnesse and fruit of his birth, death and resurrectiō, were an euerlasting and immortall thing. All which Christ hath very well expressed in these wordes: The bread which I will geue, is my flesh, which I will geue for the life of the world. By which words without dout he signifieth, that his body should therefore be to vs for bread, to the spirituall life of the soule, because it should be geuen forth to death for our saluation: and that it is deliuered to vs to eat of it, when by faith he maketh vs partakers of it. Ones therefore he gaue it, that he might be made bread; when he gaue forth himselfe to be crucified for the redemption of the world: daily he geueth it, when by the word of the Gospell he offreth it vnto vs to be receiued, so farre as it was crucified: where he sealeth that deliuerace with the holy misterie of the Supper: where he inwardly fulfilleth that which he outwardly betokeneth. Nowe herein we must beware of two faultes, that neither doing to much in abacing the signes, we seeme to plucke them from their misteries to which they are in a maner knitte fast: nor that being immeasurable in aduancing the same; we seeme in the meane time somewhat to darkē the misteries themselues. That Christ is the bread of life, wherewith the faithfull are nourished into eternall saluation; there is no man but he graunteth, vnlesse he be altogether without religion. But this point is not likewise agreed vpon among all men, what is the maner of partaking of him. For there be that in one word define, that to eat the flesh of Christ, and to drinke his blood, is nothing els but to beleue in Christ himselfe. But I thinke that Christ meant some certainer and hier thing, in that notable sermon where he commenderth to vs the eating of his fleshe: namely, that we are quickned by the true partaking of him: which also he therefore expressed by the wordes of eating and drinking, least any man should thinke, that the life which we receiue of him is conceiued by bare knowledge only. For as not the sight, but the eating of bread suffiseth the body for nourishmēt: so it behoueth that the soule be truely and throughly made partaker of Christ, that by the power of him it may be quickened into a spirituall life. But in the meane time we confesse that there is no other eating, but of faith: as there can no other be imagined.

imagined. But this is the difference betweene my wordes and theirs, that which them to eate is onely to beleue: but I say that the fleshe of Christ is eaten with beleuing; because by faith he is made ours, and I say that eating is the fruite and effect of faith. Or, if you will haue it plainer; with them eating is faith: and I thinke it rather to followe of faith. In wordes verily the difference is but smalle: but in the thing it selfe; not small. For though the Apostle teacheth that Eph. 3. Christ dwelleth in our hartes by Faith: yet no man will expounde 17. this dwelling to be faith: but all men do perceiue that there is expressed a singular effect of faith, for that by it the faithfull do obtaine to haue Christ dwelling in them. After this maner, the Lorde meant, Iohn. 6. in calling himselfe the bread of life, not onely to teache that in the 51. faith of his death and resurrection; saluation is reposed for vs: but also that by true partaking of himselfe it is brought to passe, that his life passeth into vs, and becometh oures: like as bread, when it is taken for soode, ministreth liuelinesse to the body.

6 Neither did Augustine, whom they bring in for their patron; in any other meaning write that we eate by beleuing, than to shewe that this eating is of faith, not of the mouth. Which I also denie not: but yet therewithall I adde, that we do by faith embrace Christ, not appearing as farre of, but making himselfe one with vs, that he may be our head, and we his membres. Yet do not I vtterly disallowe that maner of speaking: but onely I deny it to be a full declaration, if they meane to define what it is to eate the fleshe of Christ. Otherwise I see that Augustine hath ofte vsed this forme of speche: as when he saith in the thirde booke Of Christian doctrine, Vlesse ye eate the fleshe of the sonne of man: this is a figure teaching that we must communicate with the passion of the Lorde, and most sweetely and profitably lay vp in remembrance that for vs his fleshe was crucified and wounded. Againe when he sayeth, that the three Homel. thousande menne which were conuerted at Peters sermon; did in Ioh. drinke the bloode of Christ by beleuing, which they had shedde 31. and by cruell dealing. But in many other places he honorably setteth out 40. that benefit of faith, that by it our soules are no lesse refreshed with A. 2. the communicating of the fleshe of Christ, than our bodies are 41. with the breade which they eate, And the same is it which in a certaine place Chrysostome writeth, that Christ doth not onely by Homel. faith, but also in deede make vs his body. For he meaneth not that 60. we do from any other where than from faith, obtaine such a benefite: but this onely he meaneth to exclude, that none when he heareth faith to be named, shoulde conceiue a naked imagination. As for them that wil haue the Supper to be onely a marke of outward profession, I do nowe passe them ouer: because I thinke that I haue sufficiently confuted their error, when I entreated of Sacraments generally. Onely this thing let the reders marke, that when the cup is called the couenant in the blood, there is a promise expressed that may be of force to confirme faith. Whereupon followeth, that vnlesse we haue respect to God, and embrace that which he offreth, we do not rightly vse the holy Supper.

7. Moreover they also do not satisfie me, which acknowledging that we haue some communion with Christ, when they meane to expresse it, do make vs partakers onely of the Spirit, without making any mention of fleshe and blood. As though all those things were spoken of nothing, that his fleshe is verily meate, that his blood is verily drinke: that none hath life, but he that eateth that fleshe, and drinketh that blood: and such other sayings that belong to the same ende. Wherefore if it be certaine that the full communicating of Christ procedeth beyonde their description, as it is to narrowly strained: I will nowe go about to knit vp in fewe wordes, howe large it is and howe farre it extendeth it selfe, before that I speake of the contrarie fault of excesse. For I shall haue a longer disputation with the excessive teachers, which, when according to their owne grossnesse they frame a maner of eating and drinking full of absurditie, do also transfigure Christ stripped out of his fleshe into a fantasie: if yet a man may with any wordes comprehend so great a misterie, which I see that I can not sufficiently comprehend with minde: and therefore I do willingly confesse it, that no man shoulde measure the hinesse thereof by the small proportion of my childishnesse. But rather I exhorte the reders, that they do not restrain the sense of their minde within these to narrowe boundes: but endeuor to rise vp much higher, than they can by my guiding. For I my selfe, so oft as I speake of this thing, when I haue trauailed to say all, thinke that I haue yet said but litle in respect of the worthinesse thereof. And although the minde can do more in thinking, than the tong in expressing: yet with greatnesse of the thing, the mind also is surmounted and ouerwhelmed. Finally therefore nothing remaineth, but that I must breake fourth into admiration of that misterie, which neither the minde can suffise to thinke of, nor the tong to declare. Yet after such maner as I can, I will set fourth the summe of my sentece: which as I nothing dout to be true, so I trust that it will not be disallowed of godly harres.

8. First of all, we are taught out of the Scripture, that Christ was from

from the beginning that life bringing word of the Father, the fountaine and originall of life, from whence all things euer receiued their hauing of life. Wherefore Iohn sometime calleth him the word of life, and sometime writeth that life was in him: meaning that he euen then flowing into all creatures, poured into them the power of breathing and liuing. Yet the same Iohn addeth afterward, that the life was then and not till then openly shewed, when the Sonne of God, taking vpon him our fleshe, gaue himselfe to be sene with eyes and felte with handes. For though he did before also spred abroad his power into the creatures: yet because man, being by sinne estranged from God, hauing lost the communion of life, sawe on euery side death hanging ouer him: that he might recouer hope of immortalitie, it behoued that he should be receiued into the communion of that word. For howe small a confidence mayest thou conceiue thereof, if thou heare that the word of God in deede, from which thou art most farre removed, conteineth in it selfe the fulnesse of life, but in thy selfe and rounde about thee nothing offreth it selfe and is present before thine eyes but death? But sins that fountaine of life beganne to dwell in our fleshe, nowe it lieth not a farre of hidden from vs, but presently deliuereth it selfe to be partaken of vs. Yea and it maketh the very fleshe, wherein it resteth, to be of power to bring life to vs, that by partaking thereof we may be fed to immortalitie. I am (saith he) the bred of life, that am come downe from heauen. And the bred which I will geue, is my fleshe, which I will geue for the life of the world. In which wordes he teacheth, not onely that he is life, in respect that he is the eternall word of God which came downe to vs from heauen, but that in coming downe he poured the same power into the fleshe which he did put on, that from thence the communicating of life might flowe fourth vnto vs. Hereupon also these things nowe followe, that his fleshe is verily meate, and his blood is verily drinke, with which sustenances the faithfull are fostered into eternall life. Herein therefore consisteth singular comfort to the godly, that nowe they finde life in their owne fleshe. For so they do not onely with easy passage atteine vnto it, but haue it of it selfe laid abroad for them and offring it selfe vnto them. Onely let them holde open the bosome of their hart, that they may embrace it being present, and they shall obtaine it.

9 But although the fleshe of Christ haue not so great power of it selfe, that it can geue life to vs, which both in the owne first estate of it was subiecte to mortalitie, and nowe being endued with immortalitie, liueth not by it selfe: yet it is rightfully called life bringing, which is filled with fulnesse of life, to poure it into vs. In which meaning I do with Cirill expounde that saying of Christ: as the Father hath life in himselfe, so he hath also geuen to the Sonne to haue life in himselfe. For there he properly speaketh of his giftes, not which he from the beginning possessed with the Father, but with which he was garnished in the same fleshe in which he appeared. Therefore he sheweth that in his manhode also dwelleth the fulnesse of life, that whosocuer partaketh of his fleshe and blood, may therewithall also enjoy the partaking of life. Of what sort that is, we may declare by a familiar example. For as out of a fountaine water is sometime dronke, sometime is drawen, sometime by forrowes is conueyed to the watering of groundes, which yet of it selfe doth not ouerflowe into so many vses, but from the very spring it selfe which with euerlasting flowing yeldeth and ministreth vnto it from time to time new aboundance: so the fleshe of Christ is like a riche and vnwasted fountaine which poureth into vs the life (springing from the Godhead into it selfe. Nowe who seeth not, that the communion of the fleshe and blood of Christ is necessarie to all that aspire to heauenly life? Hereunto tendeth that saying of the Apostle, that the Church is the body of Christ and the fulfilling of it: and that he is the head out of which the whole body coupled and knit together by iointes, maketh encrease of the body: that our bodies are the members of Christ. All which things we vnderstande to be impossible to be brought to passe, but that he must wholly cleaue to vs in Spirit and body. But that most nere fellowship whereby we are coupled with his fleshe, he hath yet set out with a more glorious ritle, when he said that we are members of his body, and are of his bones and of his fleshe. At the last, to declare it to be a matter greater than all wordes, he concludeth his saying with an exclamation, This is (saith he) a great secret. Therefore it should be a pointe of extreme madnesse, to acknowledge no communion of the faithfull with the fleshe and blood of the Lord, which the Apostle declareth to be so great, that he had rather wonder at it than expresse it.

10 Let the summe be, that our soules are so fed with the flesh & blood of Christ, as bred and wine do mainteine and susteine the bodily life. For otherwise the proportionall relation of the signe should not agree, vnlesse soules did finde their fode in Christ. Which can not be done, vnlesse Christ do truely growe into one with vs, and refresh vs with the eating of his fleshe and drinking of his blood. But although it seeme incredible, that in so great distance of places the flesh of Christ reacheth to vs that it may be meate to vs: let vs remeber

howe much the secret power of the Spirit surmounteth aboue all our senses, and howe foolish it is to go about to measure his vnmeasurablenesse by our measure. That therefore which our minde comprehendeth not, let our faith conceiue, that the Spirit truly knitteth in one those things that are seuered in places. Nowe that same holy communicating of his body and blood, whereby Christ poureth his life into vs, euen as if he pearced it into our bones and marowes, he in the Supper also testifieth and sealeth: and that not with setting before vs a vaine or void signe, but bringing fourth there the effectuall working of his spirit, whereby he fulfilleth that which he promiseth. And verily he there offereth and deliuereth the thing signified to all them that sit at that spirituall banquet: although it be receiued with fruit of the faithfull onely, which receiue so great bountifullnesse with true faith and thankfulnessse of minde. After which maner the Apostle said, that the bred which we breake is the communion of the body of Christ: and that the cup which we hallowe with the word and prayers to that purpose, is the communion of his blood. Neither is there any cause why any man should object, that it is a figuratiue speche, by which the name of the thing signified is geue to the signe. I graunt verily that the breaking of the bred is a signe, not the thing it selfe. But this being admitted, yet we shall rightly gather of the deliuerance of the signe, that the thing it selfe is deliuered. For vnlesse a man will call God a deceiuer, he can neuer be so bolde to say that he setteth before vs an empty signe. Therefore if by the breaking of bred the Lorde doth truly represente the partaking of his body, it ought to be out of dout that he truly performeth and deliuereth it. And this rule is alway to be holden of the godly, that so oft as they se the signes ordeined of the Lorde, they certainly thinke and perswade them selues that y^e truth of the thing signified is there present. For to what purpose should the Lord deliuer to thee into thy hande the signe of his body, but to assure thee of the true partaking of it? If it be true, that a visible signe is geuen vs, to seale the gift of an inuisible thing: when we receiue the signe of the body, let vs no lesse certainly beleue that the body it selfe also is geuen vs.

¶ I say therefore (which both hath bine alway receiued in the Church, and all they teache at this day that thinke right) that the holy misterie of the Supper consisteth of two things: that is to say, of the bodily signes, which being set before our eyes do represent vnto vs inuisible things according to the capacitie of our weakenesse; and of spirituall truth, which is by those signes both figured and deliuered. Of what sort that is, when I meane to shewe it familiarly,

I vse to set three things: the signification, the matter which hangeth of the signification, the vertue or effect which followeth of both. The signification consisteth in the promises, which are after a certaine manner wrapped together with the signe. The matter or substance I call Christ with his death and resurrection. By effect I vnderstande the redemption, righteousnesse, sanctification, and eternall life; and whatsoever other benefites Christ bringeth vs. Nowe although all these things haue respect to faith: yet I leaue no place to this cauil- lation: as though when I say that Christ is receiued by faith, I would haue him conceiued with vnderstanding onely and imagination. For the promises offer him, not that we should sticke fast in the sight alone and in bare knowledge: but that we should enioy the true commu- nicating of him. And truely I se not howe any man may haue confi- dence that he hath redemption and righteousnesse in the crosse of Christ, and life in his death, but principally standing vpon the true communion of Christ himselfe. For those good things should not come to vs, vnlesse Christ first made himselfe ours. I say therefore, that in the misterie of the Supper, by the signes of bread and wine Christ is truely deliuered to vs, yea and his body and blood, in which he hath fulfilled all obedience for purchasing of righteousnesse to vs: namely that first we should growe together into one body with him: and then being made partakers of his substance, we may also fele his power in the communicating of all his good things.

12 Nowe I come downe to the excessiue mixtures, which super- stition hath brought in. For herein Satan hath played with marue- lous suttelkie, that withdrawing the mindes of men from heauen, he might fill them with peruerse error, as though Christ were fastened to the element of bred. And first we must not dreame such a pre- sence of Christ in the Sacrament, as the craftesment of the court of Rome haue fained: as though the body of Christ were made pre- sent with presence of place, to be handled with handes, to be broosed with teethe, and swallowed with mouth. For this forme of recanta- tion Pope Nicolas endited to Berengarius, to be a witnesse of his re- pentance: namely with wordes so far monstrous, that the author of the glose crieth out that there is danger, if the reders do not wisely take hede to themselues, least they should sucke out of them an he- resie worse than was that of Berengarius. In the seconde distinction, in the Chapter beginning thus, Ego Berengarius. But Peter Lom- barde, although he trauaile much in excusing the absurdity, yet more inclineth to the contrary sentece. For as we nothing dout that it hath limites according to the perpetuall nature of the body of men, and is holden in heauen, into which it was once receiued, vntil he returne to iudgement: so to draw it backe vnder these corruptible elementes or to imagine it present euery where, we accompt it to be vtterly vnlawfull. Neither verily is it so nedetull to this that we may enioy the partakinge of it: forasmuch as the Lord giueth vs this benefit by his Spirite, that we be made one with him in body, Spirite, and soule: The bonde therefore of this conioynge is the Spirite of Christ, by the knitting wherof we be coupled together, and as it were a certaine conduit, by which whatsoeuer Christ himselfe both is and hath, is conueied to vs. For if we beholde the sunne shuning foorth with his beames vpon the earth after a certaine maner to cast forth his substance vnto it to engender, nourishe, and quicken the frutes thereof: why should the extendinge of beames of the Spirite of Christ be inferiour to conuey the communion of his fleshe and blood into vs? Wherefore the Scripture, when it speaketh of our partakinge with Christ, referreth the whole force thereof to the Spirite. Yet in stede of many, one place shalbe sufficient. For Paule in the eight Chapter to the Romaines, sayeth that Christ dwelleth in vs none otherwise than by his Spirite: whereby yet he taketh not away that communion of his fleshe and blood of which we now speake, but teacheth that the Spirite alone worketh that we possesse whole Christ and haue him dwelling in vs.

13 The Schoolemen thought more shamefastly which were withholden with horroure of so barbarous vngodlinesse. Yet they also themselves do nothing but mocke with sutteler deceites. They graunt that Christ is not contained there by way of circumscription nor after a bodily maner: but afterward they inuent a way, which neither themselves do vnderstande, nor they can declare to other: yet it is such as falleth to this point that Christ must be sought in the forme of bred as they call it. For what is it? When they say that the substance of bread is turned into Christ, do they not fasten him to the whitenes which they there leaue? But (say they) he is so contained in the Sacrament, that he abideth in heauen: and we determine no other presence but of habitude. But whatsoeuer words they bring in to cloke it with a deceitfull colour, this is the ende of all, that that is by consecration made Christ, which before was bread: that from thence foorth Christ lieth hid vnder that colour of bread. Which also they are not ashamed in plaine words to expresse, For these be y words of Lombarde: that the body of Christ, which in it selfe is visibler, when the consecration is ended, lieth hidden and is couered vnder the forme of bred. So the forme of that bread is nothing else but a yisour, that taketh away the sight of the flesh from the eyes. Neither nede we many conjectures, to finde what snares they minded to lay with these wordes, sith the thinge it selfe plainely speaketh it. For it is to be seene with howe great superstition in certaine ages past, not onely the common sorte of men, but also the very chiefe of them haue bin holden, and at this day be holden in popishe Churches. For hauinge litle care of true Faith (by which alone we both come into y^e fellowship of Christ, and do cleaue together with him) so that they haue a carnal presence of him, which they haue framed beside the worde, they thinke that they haue him present enough. Therefore in a summe, we see that this hath bin gotten by this witty suttelty, that bread was taken for God.

14 From hense proceeded that same fained transubstantiation, for which at this day they fight more earnestly than for all the other articles of their faith. For the first builders of that locall presence could not vnwinde themselues frō this dout how the body of Christ should be mingled with the substance of bread, but that by and by many absurdities did thrust themselues in place. Therefore they were driuen of necessity to flee to his inuention, that there is made a turning of bread into the body: not that the body is properly made of God, but because Christ, that he might hide himselfe vnder the forme, bringeth the substance to nothing. But it is maruelous, that they fell to so great ignorance, yea senselesse dulnesse, that not onely the Scripture but also the consent of y^e old Church fighting against it, they brought abroad that monster. I graunt in dede that some of the olde writers sometime vsed the name of turning: not for that they woulde destroy the substance in the outwarde signes, but that they might teache that the bread dedicate to the mystery differeth farre from common bread and is nowe other. But ech where they all plainely declare, that the holy Supper consisteth of two partes, an earthly parte, and a heauenly: and the earthly part they do without controuersie expound to be bread and wine. Truly whatsoeuer they babble, it is plaine that in confirming of this doctrine they want the defense of antiquity, which they oftentimes presume to set against the euident word of God. For it is not so long ago since it was inuented: it was verily vnknowē not only to those better ages, in which the purer doctrine of religion yet flourished, but also euen when that same purenesse was much defiled. There is none of the old writers that doth not in expresse words confesse that the holy signes in the Supper are bread and wine: although, as we haue sayd, they sometime sette it out with diuerse titles, to aduance the dignity of the mystery. For whereas they say that in the

consecration is made a secrete turning, that now it is an other thing than bread and wine : I haue euen now giuen warninge that they do not thereby meane that the things theselues are brought to nought, but that they are now to be otherwise esteemed than cōmon meates, which are appointed only to feede the belly: forasmuch as in them is deliuered to vs the spirituall meate and drinke of the soule. This we also deny not. If (say these men) there be a turninge, it must needes be that there is of one thinge made an other thinge. If they meane that there is some thinge made which before was not, I agree with them. If they will draw it to y^e their owne imagination, let them answer me what chāge they thinke to be made in baptisme. For herein the Fathers also do determine a maruellous turning, whē they say that of a corruptible element is made a spirituall washing of the soule, yet none of them denieth that water remaineth. But (say they) there is no such thing in baptisme, as is that in the Supper. This is my body. As though the question were of those words, which haue a meaning plaine enough: & not rather, of y^e word of turning, which ought to signify no more in the Supper thā in baptisme. Therefore farewell they with these snares of syllables, whereby they do nothing else but bewray their owne hungrienesse. For otherwise the signification woulde not agree together, vnlesse the trueth which is there figured, had a luely image in outward signe. Christes wil was by the outward signe to testifie that his flesh is meate. If he did set before vs only an empty imaginatiue forme of bread not true bread, where were the correlation or similitude which shoulde leade vs frō the visible thing to the inuisible? For, that all thinges may agree together, the signification shall extende no further, but that we be fed with the forme of the flesh of Christ. As, if in baptisme y^e forme of water should deceiue our eies, it shoulde not be to vs a certaine pledge of our washinge: yea by that deceitfull shewe there should be giuen vs an occasion of waueringe. Therefore the nature of the Sacrament is ouerthrowen, vnlesse in the maner of signifying, the earthly signe answer to the heauenly thing. And therefore we loose the trueth of this mystery, vnlesse true bread represent to vs the true body of Christ. I repeate it againe : Sith the Supper is nothing else, than a visible testifyinge of that promise which is in the 6. chapter of Iohn, namely y^e Christ is the bread of life, which came downe frō heauen: there must be visible bread vsed for a meane, whereby that same spiritual bread may be figured: vnlesse we will that we loose all the frute, which in this behalfe God tenderly graunteth to sustaine our weakenesse. Now by what reason should Paule gather, that all we are one body and one bread, which do together partake of one bread, if there remained only an imaginatiue forme & not rather a naturall trueth of bread?

15 But they could neuer haue bin so fowly begiled with \bar{y} deceites of Satan, but because they were already bewitched with this error, that the body of Christ enclosed vnder bread was by \bar{y} bodily mouth sent downe into the belly. The cause of so brutish imagination was, that consecration signified as much amonge them as a magickall enchauntment. But this principle was vnknownen to them, that bread is a Sacrament to none but to men, to whom the word is directed: like as the water of baptisme is not changed in it selfe, but so soone as the promise is adioined, it beginneth to be that to vs which it before was not. This shall better appeare by example of a like Sacrament. The water springing out of the rocke in the desert was to the fathers a token and signe of the same thing, which the wine doth figure to vs in the Supper. For Paule teacheth that they dronke the same spirituall drinke. But it was a common wateringe for the beastes and catell of the people. Whereupon it is easily gathered, that in earthly elements, when they are applied to a spirituall vse, there is made no other turninge but in respect of men, in so much as they are to them scales of the promises. Moreouer sith Gods purpose is (as I often repeate) as it were by handsome chariots to lift vs vppe to himselfe, they do by their waywardnesse wickedly disappoint the same, which do in deede call vs to Christ, but lurking inuisibly vnder bread. For it is not possible that the minde of men, vncombring it selfe from the immeasurable-ness of places, should attaine to Christ euen aboute the heauens. That which nature denied them, they attempted to amende with a more hurtfull remedy: that abiding in earth, we should neede no heavenly neerenesse of Christ. Loe, this is the necessity, that compelled them to transfigure the body of Christ. In Bernardes time, although a harder maner of speaking was growen in vse, yet transubstantiation was not then kuowen. And in all ages before that, this similitude did flie about in euery mans mouth, that there is with bread and wine a spirituall thing ioyned in this mystery. Of the wordes they answered, as they thinke, wittily: but bringing nothing fit for this present cause.

0.4 3 The rod of Moses (say they) being turned into a Serpent, although it
 7.10 did get the name of a Serpent, yet keepeth still the olde name, and is called a rod. So in their opinion it is as probable, that although the bread passe into a newe substance, it may be abusiuely and yet not vnaptly called that which it appeareth to the eies. But what likelihood or neerenesse finde they betwene a cleare miracle, and their fained illusion, of which no eie in earth is witnesse? The Magicians had mocked

with deceites, so that the Ægyptians were perswaded, that they excelled in diuine power to change creatures about the order of nature. Moses came forth, and driuing away all their deceites, shewed that the inuincible power of God was on his side, because his owne rod consumed all the rest. But forasmuch as that was a turning discernable with eyes, therefore as we haue sayd, it pertaineth nothinge to this present cause: and in a litle time after, the rod visibly returned into his owne forme. Beside that it is not knowē, whether that sudden turning was of substance or no: Also the alluding to the rods of the Magicians is to be considered, which the Prophet therefore would not call Serpentes, least he shoulde seeme to signifie a turning where none was: because those deceiuers had done nothinge but cast a myst before the eyes of the beholders. What likenesse herewith haue these formes of speeche, The bread which we breake, So oft as ye shall eat this bread, They communicated in breaking of bread, & such others. It is certaine that their eyes were onely deceiued with the enchaunement of the Magicians. As concerninge Moses, the matter is more doutfull, by whose hande it was no more hard for God to make of a rod a Serpent, and againe of a Serpent to make a rod, than to clothe Angels with fleshely bodies, and by and by after to vnclath them: If the nature of this mystery were the same or like, there were some colour for their solution. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that it is not truely nor fully promised vs that in the Supper the flesh of Christ is, truely to vs for meate, vnlesse the true substance of the outward Signe agree with it. And (as one error groweth of another) the place of Jeremy is so foolishly wrested to proue transubstantiation, that it irketh me to rehearse it. The Prophet complaineth that wood is put in his bread: meaninge that by the cruelty of his enemies, his bread was infected with bitternesse. As Dauid with a like figure bewailerth that his meate was corrupted with gall, and his drinke with vineger. These men will haue it that the body of Christ was by way of allegorie fastened to the crosse: But some of the olde fathers thought so. As though we ought not rather to pardon their ignorance, and to burie their shame, than to adde shamelesnesse to compell them yet still to fight like enemies with the naturall meaninge of the Prophet.

16 Other, which see that the proportionall relation of the signe & the thinge signified, can not be ouerthrowen, but that the truth of the mystery must fall, do confesse that the bread of the Supper is verily a substance of an earthly and corruptible element, and suffereth no change in it selfe, but hath vnder it selfe the body of Christ enclod-

fed. If they did so declare their meaninge, that when the bread is deliuered in the mysterie, there is adioyned the deliueringe of the body, because the truth is vnseuerable from the signe: I would not much striue with them. But because they placing the body in the bread, do faine to it a beinge euery where contrary to the nature therof, and in adding vnder the bread, they will haue it lie there hid-den: it is necessarie a litle while to drawe such subtelties out of their dennes. For my mind is not yet as of set purpose to go through with all this point: but only that I may lay the foundations of the disputa-tion which shall by and by folowe in place fitte for it. They will there-fore haue the body of Christ to be inuisible and immeasurable, that it may lie hid vnder the bread: because they thinke they do not other-wise communicate with him than if he descend into bread: but they comprehend not the maner of descending, wherby he listeth vs vp-ward to himselfe. They lay vpon it all the colours that they can: but when they haue said all, it sufficiently appeareth, that they stay vpon the locall presence of Christ. Whense cometh that? euen because they can abide to conceiue no other partaking of the flesh & blood, but which consisteth either of ioyning and touchinge of place, or of some grosse enclosing.

17. And, that they may obstinately defende the errour once rashly conceiued; some of them sticke not to say, that the flesh of Christ had neuer any other measurings, but so far & wide as heauen and earth is broad. Whereas he was borne a child out of the wombe, whereas he grew, whereas he was spread abroad on the crosse, whereas he was enclosed in the sepulchre, the same was done by a certaine dispensa-tion, that he might be borne & die, & performe the other dueties of man. Whereas after his resurreccion he was seene in his wonted forme of body, whereas he was taken vp to heauē, whereas last of all also after his ascension he was seene of Stephen and Paule: it was done by the same dispensation, that it might appeare to the sight of men that he was made a king in heauen. What is this else, but to raise vp Marcion out of hell? For no man can dout that the body of Christ was a fan-tasie or a fantastickall thunge, if he was of such state. Some slippe away somewhat more subtelly, with saying that this body which is giuen in the Sacrament is glorious and immortall: and that therefore it is no absurdity, if it be contained in many places, if in no place, if with no forme, vnder the sacrament. But I aske what manner of body Christ gaue to the disciples the day before that he suffred: do not the words sounde that he gaue the same mortall body, which was within a litle after to be deliuered? He had already before (say they) shewed his glory glory to be seene to three of the disciples. That is true in deede, but his will was by that brightnes to giue them a tast of immortality for an houre. In the meane time they shall not there finde a double body, but that one body which Christ did beare, garnished with newe glory. But when he distributed his body at his first Supper, the time was now at hand, when he being striken of God, and humbled should lie without glory as a leprous man: so far is it of that he then would shew forth the glory of his resurrection. And how great a window is here opened to Marcion; if the body of Christ was seene in one place mortal and base, and in an other place was holden immortall & glorious: Howbeit if their opinion take place, the same happeneth daily: because they are compelled to confesse that the body of Christ beinge visible in it selfe, lieth hid inuisibly vnder the signe of bread. And yet they that vomit out such monstrousnes, are so not ashamed of their owne shame, that they do vnproouoked hainously raile at vs, because we do not subscribe to them. Bfa. 59.

18 Now if they list to faste the body & blood of the Lord to bread & wine: the one shall of necessity be plucked in sunder, fro the other. For as the bread is deliuered seuerally from the cup, so the body vnited to the bread must nedes be diuided fro the blood enclosed in the cup. For when they affirme that the body is in the bread & the blood in the cup: & the bread & wine are by spaces of place distant the one fro the other: they can by no shift escape, but that the body must be seuered fro the blood. But whereas they are wont to alleage, that by accompaning (as they faine) in the body is the blood, & likewise in the blood is the body, that verily is too trifling: forasmuch as the Signes in which they are enclosed, are so seuered. But if we be listid vp with our eies & mindes to heauen, that we seeke Christ there in the glory of his kingdom: as the signes do allure vs to him whole, so vnder the signe of bread, we shalbe fed with his body, vnder the signe of wine we shall seuerally drinke his blood, that at length we may enioy him whole. For although he hath taken away his fleshe from vs, and in his body is ascended vp into heauen, yet he sitteth at the right hande of the Father, that is to say, he reigneth in the power, & maiesty, & glory of the Father. This kingdom is neither bounded with any spaces of place, nor compassed about with any measurings, but that Christ may shew forth his might wheresoeuer it pleaseth him both in heauen and in earth: but that he may shew himselfe present with power and strength: but that he may alway be at hande with them that be his, breathing his life into them, may liue in them, strengthen them, quicken them, preserue them safe, euen as if he were present in body.

finally but that he may feede them with his owne body, the communion whereof he doth by the power of his Spirite poure into them. After this maner the body & blood of Christ is deliuered to vs in the Sacrament.

19 But we must appoint such a presence of Christ in y^e Supper, as may neither fasten him to the element of bread, nor shut him vp in the bread, nor by any meane compasse him in, (for it is plaine that all these things abate his heauenly glory) finally such as may neither take from him his owne measure, nor diuersly drawe him in many places at once, nor faine to him such an vnmeasurable greatnesse as is spread abroad throughout heauen and earth, for these things are plainly against the truth of the nature of manhoode. Let vs (I say) neuer suffer these two exceptions to be taken away from vs. The one, that nothing be abated from the glory of Christ, which is done, when he is brought vnder the corruptible elementes of this worlde, or is bound to any earthly creatures. The other, that nothing be by faining applied to his body, that agreeth not with the nature of man: which is done, when it is either sayd to be infinite, or is set in many places at once. But these absurdities being taken away, I willingly receiue whatsoeuer may auayle to expresse the true and substantiall communicating of the Body and Blood of the Lord, which communicating is deliuered to the faithful vnder the holy signes of the Supper: & so that they may be thought not to receiue it by imagination only or vnderstanding of minde, but to enioy it in deede to the foode of eternall life. Why this sentence is so hatefull to the world, & all defence taken away from it by the vniust iudgements of many, there is no cause at all, but for that the deuill hath with horrible bewitchinge madded their mindes. Truly that which we teach, doth in all points very well agree with the Scriptures: it containeth neither any absurdity, nor darkenesse, nor doubtfulnesse: it is not against true godlinesse and sound edification: finally it hath nothinge in it, that may offend, sauing that in certaine ages past, whē that ignorance and barbarousnesse of Sophisters reigned in the Church, so cleare light and open truth hath bin vnworthily oppressed. Yet because Satā at this day also trauaileth by troublesome Spirites to spot it with all the sclaunders and reproches that he can, and bendeth himselfe to no other thinge with greater endeouour: it is profitable the more diligently to defend and rescue it.

20 Nowe before that we go any further, we must entreate of the selfe institution of Christ: specially because this is the most glorious obiection that our aduersaries haue, that we depart from the wordes

of Christ. Therefore that we may be discharged of the false cause of malice wherewith they burden vs, our firtest beginninge shall be at the exposition of the words. Three Euangelistes and Paul rehearse, Mat. 26 that Christ tooke bread, when he had giuen thanks he brake it, gaue 26. it to his disciples and sayd, Take eate: this is my Body which is de- Mar. 14. liuered, or broken for you. Of the cuppe Mathewe and Marke say 22. thus. This cuppe is the blood of the Newe testament, which shall be Luc. 22. shedde for many vnto forgiuenesse of sinnes. But Paul and Luke say 17 thus: This cuppe is the Newe testament in my blood. The patrones 1. Cor. of transubstantiation will haue by the pronounce (this) the forme of 11. 24. bread to be signified, because the consecration is made in the whole content of the sentence, and there is no substance that can be shewed. But if they be holden with religious care of the wordes, because Christ testified, that that which he reached into the disciples handes, was his body: truely this their devise, that that which was bread is nowe the body, is most farre from the proper meaninge of them. That which Christ tooke into his handes and gaue the Apostles, he affirmeth to be his body: but he tooke bread: who therefore can not vnderstande that bread is yet shewed? and therefore there is no greater absurdity, than to remoue that to the forme, which is spoken of the bread. Other, when they expounde this worde (is) for (to be transubstantiate,) do flee to a more enforced and violently wraisted glose. Therefore there is no cause why they should pretende that they be moued with reuerence of wordes. For this was vnheard of amonge all nations and languages, that the word (is) should be taken in this sense, namely for to be turned into an other thing. As for the that leaue bread in the Supper, and affirme that there is the body of Christ, they much differ among themselues. They which speake more modestly, although they precisely exact the letter; This is my body, yet afterward swarue from their precisenesse, and say that it is as much in effect as that the body of Christ is with bread, in bread, and vnder bread. Of the matter it selfe which they affirme, we haue alredy touched somewhat, and we shall by and by haue occasion yet to speake more. Now I dispute only of the wordes, by which they say they are restrained that they cannot admit bread to be called the body, because it is a signe of the body. But if they shunne all figures, why do they leape away from the plaine shewing of Christ, to their owne maners of speaking farre differinge from it? For there is great difference betwene this that bread is the body, and this that the body is with bread. But because they sawe it to be impossible, that this simple proposition might stande, that bread is the body: they haue attempted to scape away by those formes of speecche, as it were by crooked turnings. Some more bolde sticke not to affirme that euen in proper speakinge, bread is the body, and by this meane they truly proue themselues to be literall men. If it be obiected, that therefore the bread is Christ, and is God: this verily they will deny, because it is not expressed in the wordes of Christ. But they shall nothinge preuaile by denyinge it: forasmuch as all do agree that whole Christ is offered vs in the Supper. But it is an intolerable blasphemy, that it be without figure spoken of a fraile and corruptible element, that it is Christ. Now I aske of them, whether these two propositions be both of one effect, Christ is the Sonne of God, and bread is the body of Christ. If they graunt that they are diuers, (which we will enforce them to graunt whether they will or no) then lette them aunswere whence commeth the difference. I thinke they wil bring none other but that the bread is after the sacramentall manner called the body. Whereupon foloweth, that Christes wordes are not subiect to the common rule, nor ought to be tried by Grammar. Also I aske of all the precise and stiffe requirers of the letter, where Luke and Paule do call the cuppe the testament in the blood, whether they do not expresse the same thing which they did in the first parte, where they cal bread the body. Truly the same religion was in the one parte of the mystery that was in the other: and because shortnesse is darke, longer speech doth better open the meaninge. So oft therefore as they shall affirme by one worde, that the bread is the body: I will out of moe wordes bringe a fitte exposition, that it is the Testament in the body. For why? Shall we neede to seeke a more faithfull or surer expositor than Paule and Luke? Neither yet do I tende hereunto, to diminish any thing of that communicating of the body of Christ which I haue confessed: only my purpose is to confute that foolish waiwardnesse, wherby they do so hatefully brawle about words. I vnderstand, by the authority of Paul & Luke, that the bred is the body of Christ, because it is the couenant in the body. If they fight against this, they haue warre not with me, but with the Spirite of God. Howefoeuer they cry out that they be touched with reuerence of the wordes of Christ, whereby they doe not figuratiuely vnderstand those things that are plainly spoken: yet this is not a pretence rightfull enough, why they shoulde so refuse all the reasons which we obiect to the contrary. In the meane time, as I haue already given warning, it is conuenient to learne, what maner of thing this is, The testament in the body and blood of Christ: because the couenant stablished with the sacrifice of death, should otherwise not profit vs, vnlesse there were adioynded that secret communicinge whereby we growe into one with Christ.

21 It remaineth therefore that for the affinity which y^e things signified haue with their signes, we confesse that the selfe name of the thing was giuen to the signe: figuratiuely in deede, but not without a most fit proportionall agreement. I leaue allegories and parables, least any man should quarell that I seeke startinge holes, and wander out of the present purpose. I say that this is a speeche by figure of transnominatiō which is commonly vsed in the Scripture, when mysteries are entreated of. For neither can you otherwise vnderstand that which is sayd: that circumcision is a couenant: that the lambe is the Passeouer: that the Sacrifices of the lawe are expiations: finally that the rocke, out of which water flowed in the desert, was Christ: vnlesse you take it to be spoken by way of transferringe of names. Neither are names transferred only from the hier name to the lower: but cōtrariwise the name of the visible signe is also giuen to the thinge signified: as when it is sayd that God appeared to Moses in the bushe: when the arke of couenant is called God, and the face of God: and the doue is called the holy Ghost. For though the signe differ in substance from the thinge signified: because this is spiritual and heauenly, and that is corporall and visible: yet because it doth not only figure the thinge which it is holly appointed to represent, as a naked and empty token, but doth also truely deliuer it in deede: why may not the name of the thing rightly accorde with it? If signes deuised by menne, which are rather images of thinges absent, than markes of thinges present, which selfe absent things, they do oftentimes deceitfully shadow, are yet sometime garnished with the titles of the things: then those things that are ordained of God, do by much greater reason borrow the name of those things, of which they alway both beare a sure and not deceitfull signification, and haue the trueth adioynded with them. There is therefore so great likenesse and nerenesse of the one to the other, that it is easie to draw their names to & froe. Therefore let our aduersaries ceasse to heape vnsauory scoffings against vs, in callinge vs Tropists: because we expounde the Sacramentall manner of speaking after the common vse of the Scripture. For whereas the Sacramentes agree together in many thinges: in this transferringe of names, they haue all a certaine community together. As therefore the Apostle teacheth, that the stone out of which spirituall drinke did springe to the Israelites, was Christ, because it was a visible signe, vnder which that spirituall drinke was truely in deede but not discernably to y^e eie perceiued: so bread is at this day called y^e body of Christ, forasmuch as it is a signe whereby the Lorde offereth to vs the true eatinge of his bodie. Neither did Augustine otherwise thinke or speake, least any man shoulde despise this as a newe inuention. If (sayth he) the Sacramentes hadde not a certayne likenesse of those thinges whereof they are Sacramentes, they shoulde not be Sacramentes at all. And of this likenesse oftentimes they take the names of the thinges themselues. As therefore after a certaine manner the Sacrament of the body of Christ, is the body of Christ: the Sacrament of the blood of Christ, is the blood of Christ: so the Sacrament of faith is faith. There be in him many like places, which it were superfluous to heape together, sith that same one suffiseth: sauing that the readers must be warned that the holy man teacheth the same thinge in the Epistle to Enodius. But it is a triflinge shift to say, that where Augustine teacheth, that when transferringe is often and commonly vsed in mysteries, he maketh no mention of the Supper: because if this shift were receiued, we might not reason from the generalltie to the specialltie, neither were this a good argument: Euery feeling creature hath power of mouinge, therefore an oxe and a horse haue power of mouinge. Howebeit long disputation hereof is in an other place ended by the wordes of the same holy man, where he saith, that Christ sticket not to call it his bodie, when he gaue the signe of his body. Against Adimantus, the Manichean, in the twelue Chapter. And in an other place, vpon the third Psalme. Maruelous (sayth he) is the patience of Christ, that he receiued Iudas to the banquet, wherein he committed and deliuered to his disciples the figure of his body and blood.

22 But if some precise man, beinge blinde at all the rest, do stande onely vpon this worde (this is) as though it seuered this mysterie from all other, the solution is easie. They say that the vehemence of the substantiue verbe (is) is so great that it admitteth no figure. Which if we graunt to them: euen in the wordes of Paule is redde the substantiue verbe, where he calleth bread the communicatinge of the body of Christ. But the communicatinge is an other thinge than the body it selfe. Yea commonly where sacramentes are entreated of, we finde the same worde vsed. As: This shall be to you a couenant with me. This lambe shall be to you a Passeouer. To rehearse no moe: when Paule sayeth that the rocke was Christ, why do they take the substantiue verbe in that place to be of lesse vehemence than in the speeche of Christ? Lette them also aunswere, where Iohn sayth, the holy Ghost was not yet, because Iesus was not yet glorified, of what force the substantiue verbe is in that place. For if they abide fastened ned to their rule, the eternall essence of the holy Ghost shalbe destroyed, as though it tooke beginning at the Ascension of Christ. Finally let them aunswere, what meaneth that saying of Paul, that baptisme is the washing of regeneration and renewing, which it is euident to be vnprofitable to many. But nothing is stronger to confute them, than that saying of Paule, that the Church is Christ. For, bringinge a similitude of the body of manne, he addeth, So is Christ: in which place he vnderstandeth the only begotten sonne of God, not in him selfe, but in his members. Hereby I thinke I haue obtayned that to soundewitted and vncorrupted men the sclaunders of our enemies, are lothsome, when they spread abroad, that we withdrawe credit from the wordes of Christ: which we do no lesse obediently embrace than they, and do wey them with more godly reuerence. Yea their negligent carelesnesse sheweth that they do not greatly care what Christ ment, so that it giue them a buckler to defende their obstinacie: like as our earnest searchinge ought to be a witnessse howe much we esteeme the authority of Christ. They odiously spread abroad, that naturall sense of man withholdeth vs from beleuing that which Christ hath vttered with his owne holy mouth: but how maliciously they burden vs with this sclaunder, I haue a great parte already made plaine, and hereafter it shall more clearly appeare. Therefore nothing withholdeth vs from beleuing Christ when he speaketh, nor from obeying so soone as he doth but with becke will this or that. Only this is the question, whether it be vnlawefull to enquire of the naturall meaning.

23 These good maisters, that they may seme well lettred, do forbid men to departe be it neuer so litle from the letter. But I on the other side, when the Scripture nameth God a warlike man, because I see that without figuratiue translatiō it is too rough a maner of speaking, do not dout that it is a comparison taken from men. And truly vpon none other pretence in the old time the Anthropomorphits troubled the true teachinge Fathers, but that catchinge fast holde of these sayings, The eies of God do see, It wēt vp to his eares, His hand stretched out, The earth his foote stole, they cried out that God had his body taken from him, which the Scripture assigneth vnto him. If this lawe be receiued, outragious barbarousnesse shall ouerwhelme the whole light of faith. For, what monsters of absurdities may not phrentike me picke out, if it be graunted them to alleage euery small title to stablish their opinions? That which they obiect, that it is not likely, that when Christ prepared for his Apostles a singular comfort in aduersities, he did then speake in a riddle or darkely, maketh of our side. For if it had not come in the mindes of the Apostles, that bread was figuratiuely called the body, because it was the signe of the body, they had without dout bin troubled with so monstrous a thing. Almost at the same moment Iohn reporteth that they did sticke in perplexitie at euery of the least difficulties. They which striue among themselves, how Christ will go to the Father: and do moue question, how he will go out of the world: they which vnderstand nothinge of those thinges that are spoken concerninge the heauenly Father, till they see him: how would they haue bin so easie ro beleue that which all reason refuseth, that Christ sitteth at the boorde in their sight, and is enclosed inuisible vnder bread? Whereas therefore they in eating the bread without doutinge, testified their consent, hereby appeareth that they tooke Christes wordes in the same sense that we do, because they remembered that which ought not to seeme strange in mysteries, that the name of the thing signified is transferred to the signe. Therefore it was to the disciples, as it is to vs, a certaine and cleare comforte, entangled with no riddle. Neither is there any other cause why some shoulde departe from our exposition, but because the enchantment of the deuil hath blinded them, namely that they should faine darkenesse to themselves, where the exposition of an apt figure offreth it selfe. Moreouer if we precisely stand vpon the words, Christ should wrongfully haue spoken in one place seuerally an other thing cōcerning the bread than he speaketh of the cup. He calleth the bred his body, he calleth y wine his blood: either it shalbe a confused vaine repetition, or it shalbe such a partitiō as shal diuide the body from the blood. Yea it shall as truely be said of the cup, This is my body, as of the bread it selfe, & it may likewise enterchangeably be sayd, that the bread is the blood. If they answer that we must cōsider to what end or vse the signes were ordained: I graunt it in dede: but in the meane time they shal not vnwinde themselves, but that their error must draw this absurdity with it, that the bread is the blood, and the wine is the body. Nowe I wote not what this meaneth, when they graunt the bread and the body to be diuerse things, yet to affirme that the one is spoken of the other properly & without any figure: as if a man should say that a garment is in dede a thing differing from a man, & yet that it is properly called a man. In the meane while as though their victorie consisted in obstinacy & railing, they say that Christ is accused of lyinge, if an exposition be sought of the wordes. Nowe it shalbe easie for vs to shew to the readers how vniust wrong these catchers of syllables do to vs, when they fill the simple with this opinion, that we withdraw credit from the words of Christ, which we haue proued to be

be furiously peruerted and confounded by them, but to be faithfully and rightly expounded by vs.

24 But the sclaunder of this lie can not be vtterly purged, till an other crime be wiped away. For they spread abroad, that we be so addicted to naturall reason, that we giue no more to the power of God, than the order of nature suffereth, & common sense teacheth. Frō so malicious sclaunders I appelle to the very doctrine it self which I haue declared: which doth clearely enough shew, y I do not measure this mystery by the proportion of mans reason, nor do make it subiect to the lawes of nature. I beseech you, haue we learned out of naturall philosophie, that Christ doth so frō heauen feede our soules and bodies with his flesh, as our bodies are nourished with bread and wine? Whence cōmeth this power to flesh, that it may giue life? All men wil say that it is not done naturally. It wil no more please mans reason, that the fleshe of Christ reacheth to vs, that it may be foode vnto vs. Finally whosoever hath tasted of our doctrine, shalbe rauished into admiration of the secrete power of God. But these good mē that be so zealous of it, forge to thēselues a miracle, which being taken away, God himselfe vanisheth with his power. I desire to haue the readers once againe warned, that they diligently wey what our doctrine bringeth, whether it hang vpon common sense, or with the wings of Faith, surmounting the world, climbeth vp beyonde it into the heauens. We say that Christ as well with the outward signe as with his Spirite, descendeth to vs, that he may truly quicken our soules with the substance of his flesh and of his blood. In these few words he that perceiueh not to be cōtained many miracles, is more than senselesse; forasmuch as there is nothinge more beside nature, than that soules shoulde borrowe spirituall and heauenly life, of the flesh which tooke her beginning of the earth, and which was subiect to death. Nothinge is more incredible, than that thinges distant and a sunder by the whole space of heauen and earth, should in so great distance of places not only be conioyned, but also vnited, that soules may receiue foode of the flesh of Christ. Therefore let waiward men cease to procure hatred to vs by a filthy sclaunder, as though we did enuiously reſtraine any thing of the immeasurable power of God. For they do either to foolishly erre or to maliciously lie. For it is not here in question what God could, but what he would. We affirme y to be done which pleased him. But it pleased him, y Christ should be made like to his brethren in all things, except sinne. What maner of thing is our flesh? Is it not such as consisteth of the certaine measure of it, as is contained in place, as is touched, as is seene? And why (say they) may not God make, that one selfe same flesh may occupy many & diuerse places, may be contained in one place, may be without measure and forme? Thou madde man, why requirest thou of the power of God, to make flesh at one selfe time to be and not to be flesh? Like as if thou shouldest instantly require him to make at one selfe time the light to be both light and darkenesse. But he willeth light to be light, darkenesse to be darkenesse, fleshe to be fleshe. He shall in deede when it pleaseth him, turne darkenesse into light, and light into darkenesse: but when thou requirest that light and darkenes may not differ, what doest thou else but peruert the order of the wisdom of God? Therefore fleshe must be fleshe: and Spirit, Spirit: every thinge in such law and condition as God hath created it. But such is the condition of fleshe, that it must be in one yea and that a certaine place, and consist of her measure and of her forme. With this condition Christ toke fleshe vpon him, to which (as Augustine witnesseth) he hath giuen in deede vncorruption and glory, but he hath not taken from it nature and trueth.

25 They aunswere, that they haue the worde, whereby the will of God is made plaine: namely if it be graunted them to banishe out of the Church the gift of expositiō, which may bring light to the word. I graunt that they haue the worde: but such as in olde time the Anthropomorphites had, when they made God hauinge a body: such as Marcion & the Manichees had, when they fained the body of Christ to be either heauēly or fantastical. For they alleaged for testimonies, The first Adam was of the earth, earthly: the second Adam is of heauen, heauenly. Againe, Christ abaced himselfe, taking vpon him the forme of a seruant, and was founde in likenes as a man. But the grosse eaters thinke that there is no power of God, vnlesse with the monster forged in their braines the whole order of nature be ouerthrowen: which is rather to limit God, when we couet with our fained inuentions to proue what he cā do. For out of what word haue they taken, that the body of Christ is visible in heauen, but lurketh inuisible in earth vnder innumerable litle peces of bread? They will say that necessity requireth this, that the body of Christ should be giuen in the Supper. Verily because it pleased them to gather a fleshly eatinge out of y words of Christ: they being caried away by their own foreiudgement, were driuen to necessity to coine this suttelty, which the whole Scripture crieth out against. But that any thing is by vs diminished of the power of God, is so false, y by our doctrine the praise of it is very honorably sette out. But forasmuch as they alway accuse vs, that we defraude God of his honor, when we refuse that which accordinge to cōmō sense is hard to be beleued, although it haue bine promised by the mouth of Christ: I make againe the same aunswere that I made euen nowe, that in the misteries of faith we do not aske counsell of common sense, but with quiet willingnesse to learne, and with the Spirit of mekenesse which Iames commendeth, we receiue the doctrine come from heauen. But in that when they perniciously erre, I deny not that we followe a profitable moderation. They hearing the wordes of Christ, This is my body, imagine a miracle most farre from his minde. But when out of this fained inuention arise fowle absurdities, because they haue already with hedlong hast put snares vpon themselves, they plunge themselves into the bottomlesse depth of the almightinesse of God, that by this meane they may quenche the light of truth. Hereupon commeth that proude precisenesse: We will not know howe Christ lieth hidde vnder the bred, holding our selues contented with this saying of his, This is my body. But we, as we do in the whole Scripture, do with no lesse obedience than care, study to obteine a sounde vnderstanding of this place: neither do we with preposterous heate rashly and without choise catch holde of that which first thrusteth it selfe into our mindes: but vsing diligent musing vpon it, we embrace the meaning which the Spirit of God ministreth: and standing therupon we do from alofte despise whatsoeuer earthly wiidome is set against it. Yea we holde our mindes captiue, that they may not be bolde so much as with one litle worde to carpe against it: and do humble them, that they may not dare to rise vp against it. Hereupon sprong vp the exposition of the wordes of Christ, which to be by the continuall vsage of the Scripture common to all Sacraments, all they that haue bene though but meanly exercised therein, do knowe. Neither do we, after the exāple of the holy virgin, thinke it lawfull for vs, in a hard matter to enquire howe it may be done.

26 But because nothing shall more auaille to confirme the faith of the godly, than when they haue learned that the doctrine which we haue taught, is taken out of the word of God, and standeth vpon the authoritie thereof: I will make this also euident with as great breuenes as I can. The body of Christ, sins the time that it rose againe, not Aristotle but the Holy Ghost teacheth to be limited, and that it is comprehended in heauen vntill the last day. Neither am I ignorāte that they boldly mocke out those places that are alleged for this purpose. So oft as Christ saith that he will departe, leauing the world, they aunswere that that departing is nothing els but a changing of mortall state. But after this maner, Christ should not set the Holy Ghost in his place to supplie (as they call it) the wante of his absence:

forasmuch as he doth not succede into his place, nor Christ himselfe doth descende againe out of the heauenly glorie to take vpon him the state of mortall life. Truly the comming of the Holy Ghost, and the ascending of Christ are things set as contrarie: therefore it can not be that Christ should accordinge to the fleshe dwell with vs after the same maner that he sendeth his Spirit. Moreouer he in plaine wordes expresseth, that he will not be alway with his disciples in the world. This saying also they thinke that they do gaily wipe away, as though Christ said that he will not alway be poore and miserable or subiect to the necessities of this fraile life. But the circumstance of the place crieth plainly to the contrarie, because there is not entreated of pouertie and neede, or of the miserable state of earthly life, but of worship and honor. The anointing pleased not the disciples, because they thought it to be a superfluous and vnprofitable cost, and nere vnto riotous excesse, therefore they had rather that the price thereof which they thought to be il wasted, had bene bestowed vpon the poore. Christ aunswereth that he shall not alway be present, that he may be worshipped with such honor. And none otherwise did Augustine expounde it, whoes wordes be these which are nothing doutfull. When Christ said, Ye shall not alway haue me, he spake of the presence of his body. For according to his maiestie, according to his prouidence, according to his vnspeakable and inuisible grace, this was fulfilled which he said, Behold, I am with you euen to the ending of the world. But according to the fleshe which the word toke vnto him, according to this that he was borne of the Virgin, according to this that he was takē of the Iewes, that he was fastened to the tree, that he was taken downe from the crosse, that he was wrapped in linnen clothes, that he was layed in the graue, that he was manifestly shewed in the resurrection, this was fulfilled, Ye shal not alway haue me with you. Why so? Because he was conuersante according to the presence of his bodie fortie dayes with his disciples, and while they accompanied him in seing not in following, he ascended. He is not here: for he sitteth there at the right hande of the Father. And yet he is here: because he is not gone away in presence of maiestie. Otherwise according to the presence of maiesty we haue Christ alway: and according to the presence of the flesh it is rightly said, But me ye shall not alway haue. For according to the presence of the fleshe, the Church had him a fewe dayes: nowe she holdeth him by faith, but seeth him not with eies. Where (that I may note this also brefely) he maketh him presente to vs three wayes, by maiestie, prouidence, and vnspeakable grace, vnder which I comprehend this maruelous communion munion of his body and blood: if so that we vnderstande it to be done by the power of the Holy Ghost, not by that fained enclosing of his body vnder the element. For our Lorde hath testified, that he hath fleshe and bones which may be felt and sene. And to Go away and Ascende do not signifie to make a shewe of one ascending and going away, but to do in deede that which the wordes sounde. Shall we then (will some man say) assigne to Christ some certaine coast of heauen? But I aunswere with Augustine, that this is a most curious and superfluous question, if so that yet we beleue that he is in heaue.

27 But what doth the name of ascending so oft repeted: doth it not signifie a remouing from one place to an other? They derie it: because after their opinion, by heighth is onely signified maiestie of Empire. But what meaneth the very maner of ascending? was he not, in sight of his disciples loking on, lifted vp on hy? Do not the Euan- gelistes plainly declare, that he was taken vp into the heauens? These witty Sophisters do aunswere, that with a cloude set betweene him and them, he was conueyed out of their sight, that the faithfull might learne that from thense fourth he should not be visible in the world. As though, to make credit of his inuisible presence, he ought not rather to vanishe away in a moment: or as though the cloude ought not rather to compasse him before that he stirred his foote. But when he is carried vp on hy into the aire, and with a cloude cast vnderneath him, teacheth that he is no more to be sought in earth: we safely gather, that now he hath his dwelling place in the heauens: as Paule also affirmeth, and from thense biddeth vs to loke for him. After this maner the Angels warned the disciples, that they in vaine gazed vp into heauen: because Iesus which is taken vp into heauen, shall so come as they haue sene him go vp. Here also the aduersaries of sounde doctrine starte away with a pleasante shifte as they thinke, saying that he shall then come visible, which neuer wente out of the earth but that he abideth inuisible with them that be his. As though the Angells did there signifie a double presence, and do not simply make the disciples witnesses of his going vp seing it with their eyes, that no douting might remaine: euen as if they had said: he in your sightes beholding it, being taken vp into heauen, hath claimed to himselfe the heauenly Empire: it remaineth that ye patiently abide in expectation, till he come againe the iudge of the world: because he is now entered into heauen, not that he may alone possesse it, but that he may gather together with him you and all the godly.

28 But forasmuch as the defenders of this bastarde doctrine are not ashamed to garnishe it with the consenting voices of the olde writers and specially of Augustine: I will in fewe wordes declare howe peruersly they go about it. For whereas their testimonies haue bene gathered together of learned & godly mē, I will not do a thing already done: let him that will, seke them out of their workes. I will not heape together, neither out of Augustine himselfe, all that might make to the purpose: but will be contente to shewe by a fewē that he is without controuersie whole on our side. As for this that our aduersaries, to writhe him from vs, do allege that it is commonly red in his bookes, that the fleshe and blood of Christ is distributed in the Supper, namely the Sacrifice ones offred in the crosse: it is but trifling: sith he also calleth it either Thankesgeuing, or the Sacramēt of the body. But in what sense he vseth the words of fleshe & blood, we neede not to seke with long compassing about: forasmuch as he declareth himselfe, saying that Sacraments take their names of the likenesse of the things which they signifie: and that therefore after a certain maner y Sacramēt of the body is the body. Wherwith accordeth an other place which is wel enough knowen: The Lord sticket not to say, This is my body, when he gaue the signe of it. Againe they obiect, that Augustine writeth expresly, that y body of Christ falleth to the grounde, and entreth into the mouth: euen in the same sense, that he affirmeth it to be consumed, because he ioineth them both together. Neither doth that make to the contrarie, which he saith, that when the misterie is ended the bred is consumed: because he had a litle before said: sith these things are knowē to men, forasmuch as they are done by men, they may haue honor as things: but as maruelous things, they may not. And to no other ende tendeth that which our aduersaries do to vnadvisedly drawe to themselues: that Christ did (after a certaine maner) beare himselfe in his owne hādes, when he reached y mysticall bred to the disciples. For by enterlacing this aduerbe of liknesse (after a certain maner) he sufficiently declareth, that he was not truely nor really enclosed vnder the bred. And no maruell: sith in an other place he plainly affirmeth that bodies, if spaces of places be taken from them, shalbe no where: and because they shalbe no where, they shall not be at all. It is a hungry cauillation, to say that in that place is not entreated of the Supper, in wich God vttereth speciall power: because the questiō was moued concerning the fleshe of Christ, and the holy man of set purpose aunswering saith: Christ gaue immortalitie to his fleshe, but toke not nature from it. After this forme it is not to be thought that he is eche where spred abroad: for we must beware that we do not so affirme the Godhed of the man, that we take away the truth of the body. And it followeth not, that that which is in God must be eche where as God is. There is a reason by and by added: for one person is God and man, and both are one Christ: eche where, by this that he is God: in heauen, by this that he is man. What a negligence had it bene, not to excepte the misterie of the Supper being a thing so earnest and weighty, if there had bene in it any thinge against the doctrine which he entreated of. And yet if a manne do heedefully read that which followeth within a litle after, he shall finde that vnder that generall doctrine, the Supper is also comprehended, that Christ the onely begotten Sonne of God, and the same the sonne of man, is eche where whole present as God: that he is in the temple of God (that is in the Church) God as it were there dwelling, and in some certaine place of heauen by reason of the measure of his true body. We see howe, to the vniting of Christ with the Church, he doth not drawe his body out of heauen: which surely he would haue done, if the body of Christ were not truely meate to vs vnlesse it were enclosed vnder bred. In an other place defining howe the faithfull do now possesse Christ, Thou hast him (saith he) by the signe of the crosse, by the Sacrament of Baptisme, by the meate and drinke of the altar. Howe rightly he reckoneth a superstitious vsage among the Signes of the presence of Christ, I do not nowe dispute: but he that compareth the presence of the fleshe to the signe of the crosse, sufficiently sheweth that he faineth not a two bodied Christ, that the same he may lurke hidden vnder the bred, which sitteth visible in heauen. If this neede plainer declaration, it is by and by after added in the same place, that according to the presence of maiestie, we alway haue Christ: that according to the presence of the fleshe, it is rightly sayed, Me ye shall not alway haue. They aunswere, that this is also added, that according to an vnspeakable and inuisible grace, it is fulfilled which is said of him, I am with you, euen vnto the ending of the world. But that is nothing for their auantage: because this is at length restrained to his maesty, which is euer in cōparison set against the body, and his fleshe by expresse name is made different from his grace and power. As in an other place the same comparison of contraries is red in him, that Christ by bodily presence left the disciples, that by spirituall presence he may be still with them: where it is plaine that the substance of the fleshe is distinguished from the power of the Spirit, which conioineth vs with Christ, though we be otherwise farre seuered by distance of places. The same maner of speaking he oftentimes vseth, as when he saith: He is to come againe to the quicke and the dead with bodily presence, according to the rule of

Tra&. I

Faith and sounde doctrine. For with spirituall presence he was also to come to them, and to abide with the whole Church in the world vntill the ending of the world. Therefore this speche is directed to the beleuers, whom he had already begonne to saue with bodily presence, and whom he was to leaue with bodily absence: that he might with his Father saue them with spirituall presence. To take bodily for visible is but trifling: sith he setteth also the body in comparison against the diuine power: and adding (to saue with the Father) he clearly expresseth that he doth poure abroad his grace from heauen to vs by his Spirit.

29 And sith they put so much confidence in this lurking hole of inuisible presence, go to, let vs see howe well they hide themselues in it. First they shall not bring fourth one syllable out of the Scriptures, whereby they may proue that Christ is inuisible: but they take that for confessed which no man that hath his sounde witt will graunt them, that the body of Christ can not otherwise be geuen in the Supper but being couered with the visor of bred, And this is the very pointe about which they striue with vs, so farre is it of from hauing the place of a principle. And when they so babble, they are cōpelled to make a double body of Christ: because after their opinion, it is in it selfe visible in heauen, but inuisible in the Supper after a speciall maner of dispensation. But howe trimly this agreeth, it is easy to iudge both by other places of Scripture, and by the witnesse of Peter. Peter saith that Christ must be holden or contened in heauen, till he come againe. These men teache that he is euery where, but without forme. They take exception and say that it is vniust dealing, to make the nature of a glorified body subiect to the lawes of common nature. But this aunswere draweth with it that doting error of Seruettus, (which is worthily to be abhorred of all the godly) that the body was swallowed vp of the Godhed. I do not say that they thinke so. But if this be reckened among the qualities of a glorified body, to fill all things after an inuisible maner, it is euident that the bodily substance is destroyed, and that there is left no difference of the godhed and the nature of man. Againe if the body of Christ be so of many fashions and diuerse, that it is sene in one place, and is inuisible in an other: where is the very nature of a body which consisteth of his measured proportions? and where is the vnitie? Much more rightly doth Tertullian say, which affirmeth that the body of Christ was a true and naturall body, because in the mysterie of the Supper the figure of it is set before vs for a pledge and assurance of the spirituall life. And verily Christ said of his glorified body, see and fele, for a

Spirit hath not fleshe and bones. Lo by Christs owne mouth the truth of his fleshe is proued, because it can be felt and sene. Take away these things, than it shall cesse to be fleshe. They still flee to their denne of dispensation which they haue framed to themselues. But it is our part so to embrace that which Christ absolutely pronounceth, that that which he meaneth to affirme may be of force with vs without exception. He proueth himselfe to be no ghost, because he is visible in his fleshe. Let that be taken away which he claimeth as propre to the nature of his body: must they not then be faine to coine a newe definitiō of a body? Nowe whether soeuer they turne theselues about, their fained dispensation hath no place in that place of Paul where he saith, that we loke for a Sauior from heauen, which shall fashion our base body like to his glorious body. For we may not hope for a like fashioning in those qualities which they faine to Christ, that eucry one should haue an inuisible and vnmeasurable body. Neither shall there be founde any man so dull witted whom they may make to beleue so great an absurdity. Let them not therefore ascribe this gift to Christs glorified body, to be at ones in many places, and to be contained in no space. Finally let them either opely deny the resurrection of the fleshe, or let them graunt that Christ beinge clothed with heauenly glory, did not put of his fleshe, who shall make vs in our fleshe fellowes and parteners of the same glory, when we shall haue the resurrection common with him. For, what doth the Scripture teache more plainely, than that as Christ did put on our true fleshe when he was borne of the Virgin, and suffred in our true fleshe when he satisfied for vs: so he receiued againe also the same true fleshe in rising againe, and caried it vp to heauen. For this is to vs the hope of our resurrection and ascending into heauen, that Christ is risen againe and ascended: and (as Tertullian saith) he carried the earnest of our resurrection into the heauens with him. Nowe howe weake and fraile should that hope be, vnlesse this our selfe flesh had bene raised vp with Christ & entred into the kingdome of heauen? But this is the propre trueth of a body, to be contained in space, to consist of his measured proportions, to haue his forme. Therefore away with this solish deuise, which doth fasten both the mindes of men and Christ to the bred. For to what purpose serueth the secret presence vnder bred, but that they which couet to haue Christ ioined with them, may rest in that signe? But the Lorde himselfe willed vs to withdrawe not onely our eyes but all our senses from the earth, forbidding himselfe to be touched of the women vntill he had gone vp to his Father. When he seeth Marie with godly zele of reuerēce to make hast to kisse his fete, there is no cause why he should disalowe and forbid this touching till he haue bene taken vp into heauen, but because he will be sought no where els. Whereas they obiect that he was afterwarde sene of Stephen, the solution is easy. For neither was it therefore necessary that Christ should change place, which could geue to the eyes of his seruant such sharpnesse of sight as might pearce through the heauens. The same also is to be said of Paule. Whereas they obiect that Christ came out of the Sepulchre being shut: & entred in among the disciples, the dores being shut: that maketh neuer a whit more for maintenance of their error. For as the water like a fast pauement made a way to Christ walking vpon the lake: so it is no maruell, if at his comming the hardnesse of the stone yelded it selfe. Howbeit it is more prouable, that by his commaundement the stone was remoued, and by and by after passage giuen him returned into his place. And to enter, the dores being shut, is not asmuch in effect as to pearce through the whole substāce, but by diuine power to open an entrie for himselfe, that he sodenly stode among the disciples, verily after a maruelous maner, when the dores were fast locked. That which they allege out of Luke, that Christ sodenly vanished away from the eyes of the disciples with whom he went to Emaus, profiteth them nothing, and maketh for vs. For, that he might take away the sight of himselfe from them, he was not made inuisible, but onely went out of sight. As when he went in journey together with them (as the same Luke witnesseth) he did not put on a newe face, that he might not be knowen, but helde their eyes. But these fellowes do not onely transforme Christ, that he may be conuersant in earth, but in diuerse places they make him diuerse and vnlike himselfe. Finally in so trifling they do, not by one word in deede, but by a circumechnce, make of the fleshe of Christ a Spirit: and not contented therewith, they put vpon it altogether contrarie qualities. Whereupon of necessitie followeth that it is double.

30 Nowe although we graunt them that which they prate of the inuisible presence, y vnmeasurableness shal not be yet proued, without which they shall in vaine attempt to enclose Christ vnder bred. Vnlesse the body of Christ may be euery where at ones, without any compasse of place, it shall not be likely that he lieth hidden vnder bred in the Supper. By which necessitie they brought in the monstrous being euery where. But it is shewed by strong and plaine witnessess of Scripture, that it was limited about by the measure of the body of a man: and then that by his ascēding he hath made it plaine that he is not in all places, but that when he passeth into one place, he leaueth the other that he was in before. Neither is the promise which they allege, to be drawē to the body, I am with you euen to the ending of the world. First the continuall conioining can not stande, vnlesse Christ dwell in vs corporally without the vse of the Supper. Therefore there is no iust cause why they should so sharply brawle about the wordes of Christ, that they may in the Supper enclose Christ vnder bred. Againe the text it selfe proueth, that Christ speaketh nothing lesse than of his fleshe, but promiseth to his disciples inuincible helpe, whereby he may defende and susteine them against all the assaultes of Satan and the world. For when he enioined them a hard charge: least they should dout to take it in hande, or should fearefully execute it, he strēgheneth them with affiance of his presence: as if he had said, that his succor shall not faile them, which shalbe impossible to be ouercome. Vnlesse they listed to confounde all things, ought they not to haue made distinction of the maner of presence. And verily some had rather with great shame to vtter their ignorance, than to yelde neuer so litle of their error. I speake not of the Papistes: whoes doctrine is more tolerable, or at the least more shamefast. But cōtentiuousnes so carrieth some away, that they say that by reason of the natures vnited in Christ, wheresoeuer the Godhed of Christ is, there is also his fleshe, which can not be seuered from his Godhed. As though that same vniting haue compounded of those two natures I wote not what mean thing which was neither God nor man. So in deede did Eutiches, and after him Seruettus. But it is plainly gathered out of the Scripture, that the onely one person of Christ doth so consist of two natures, that either of them hath still her owne propertie remaining safe. And that Eutiches was rightfully condemned, they will be ashamed to deny: it is maruell that they marke not the cause of his condemning, that taking away the difference betwene the natures, enforcing the vnitie of person, he made of God man, and of man God. What madnesse therefore is it, rather to mingle heauen and earth together, than not to drawe the body of Christ out of the heauenly Sanctuarie? For whereas they bring for themselues these testimonies, None is gone vp to heauen but he that is come down, the Sonne of man which is in heauen. Againe, The sonne which is in the bosome of the Father, he shall declare them: it is a point of like senselesse dullnesse, to despise the communicating of properties which was in olde time not without cause inuented of the holy Fathers. Truely, when the Lorde of glory is said to be crucified, Paule doth not meane that he suffred any thing in his Godhed: but because the same Christ which being an abie& and despised in the fleshe did suffer, was both God and Lorde of glory. After this maner also the Sonne of man was in heauen: because the selfe same Christ, which according to the fleshe did dwell the Sonne of man in earth, was God in heauen. In which sorte he is said to haue descended from the said place according to his Godhed: not that the Godhed did forsake heauen, to hide it selfe in the prison of the body: but because, although it filled all things, yet in the very manhode of Christ it dwelled corporally, that is to say naturally and after a certaine vnspeakable maner. It is a common distinction in scholes, which I am not ashamed to reherse: that although whole Christ be euery where, yet not the whole that is in him is euery where. And I woulde to God the Scholemen themselues had well weyed the pith of this saying: for so should the vnsauorie inuention of the fleshly presence of Christ haue bine met withall. Therefore our mediator, sith he is whole euery where, is alway at hande with his, & in the Supper after a speciall maner geueth himselfe present: but yet so, that whole he is present, not the whole that he is: because, as it is said, in his fleshe he is cōteined in heauen till he appeare to iudgemēt.

31 But they are farre deceiued, which conceiue no presence of the fleshe of Christ in the Supper, vnlesse it be made present in bread. For so they leaue nothing to the secret working of the Spirit, which vniteth Christ himselfe vnto vs. They thinke not Christ present, vnlesse he come downe to vs. As though if he did lift vs vp to him, we should not aswell enioy his presence. Therefore the question is onely of the maner: because they place Christ in the bread, but we thinke it not lawfull for vs to pluck him out of heauē. Let the readers iudge whether is the righter. Onely let this cauillatiō be driuen away, that Christ is taken away from his Supper, vnlesse he be hidden vnder the couer of bread. For sith this misterie is heauenly, it is no neede to drawe Christ into the earth, that he may be ioined to vs.

32 Nowe if any man do aske me of the maner, I will not be ashamed to confesse, that it is a hier secret than that it can be either comprehended with my witt, or vttered with my wordes: and, to speake it more plainly, I rather fele it, than I can vnderstand it. Therefore I do herein without cōtrouersie embrace the truth of God, in which I may safely rest. He pronounceth that his fleshe is the meate of my soule, and his blood is the drinke. With such foode I offre my soule to him to be fedde. In his holy Supper he commaundeth me vnder the signes of bread and wine to take, eate, and drinke his body and blood. I nothing dout that both he doth truely deliuer them, and I do receiue them. Onely I refuse the absurdities, which appeare to be either vnworthy of the heauenly maiestie of Christ, or disagreeing from the truth of his nature of manhode: forasmuch as they must also fight with the word of God, which also teacheth that Christ was so taken vp into the glorie of the heauenly kingdome that it listeth him vp aboute all estate of the world, and no lesse diligently setteth forth in his nature of man, those things that are properly belonging to his true manhode. Neither ought this to seeme incredible, or not consonant to reason: because as the whole kingdome of Christ is spirituali, so whatsoever he doth with his Church, ought not to be reduced to the reason of this world. Or, that I may vse the wordes of Augustine, this misterie, as other are, is done by men, but from God: in earth, but from heauen. Such (I say) is the presence of the body, as the nature of the Sacramēt requireth: which we say here to excell with so great force, and so great effectualnesse, that it not onely bringeth to our mindes vndouted trust of eternall life, but also assureth vs of the immortalitie of our fleshe. For it is nowe quickened of his immortall fleshe, and after a certaine maner communicateth of his immortalitie. They which are caried aboute this with their excessiue speaches, do nothing but with such entanglements darken the simple and plaine truth. If any be not yet satisfied, I would haue him here a while to consider with me, that we nowe speake of a Sacrament, all the partes whereof ought to be referred to faith. But we do no lesse deintily and plentifully feede faith with this partaking of the body which we haue declared, than they that plucke Christ himselfe out of heauen. In the meane time I plainly confesse, that I refuse that mixture of the fleshe of Christ with our soule, or the pouring out of it such as they teache: becaute it suffiseth vs, that Christ doth out of the substance of his flesh breath life into our soules, yea doth poure into vs his owne life, although the very fleshe of Christ doth not entre into vs. Moreouer it is no dout that the proportion of faith, whereby Paul willeth vs to examine all exposition of Scripture, doth in this behalfe very well agree with me. As for them that speake against so euident a truth, let them looke after what rule of faith they fashion themselues. He that doth not confesse that Iesus Christ is come in the fleshe, is not of God. These men, although they cloke it, or marke it not, do spoile him of his fleshe.

33 Of communicating is to be likewise thought, which they acknowledge none, vnlesse they deuoure the fleshe of Christ vnder bread. But there is no small wrong done to the Holy Ghost, vnlesse we beleue that it is brought to passe by his incomprehensible power, that we communicate with the fleshe and blood of Christ. Yea if the force of the misterie, such as it is taught of vs, and as it was knowne to the olde Church from fower hundred yeres ago, were weyed according to the worthinesse of it, there was enough and more wherevpon we might be satisfied: the gate had bine shut against many fowle errors, out of which haue bene kindled many horrible dissensions wherewith both in olde time and in our age the Church hath bene miserably vexed, while curious men do enforce an excessiue maner of presence, which the Scripture neuer sheweth. And they turmoile about a thing fondly and rashely conceiued, as if the enclosing of Christ vnder bread were (as the prouerbe is) the prow and poupe of godlinesse. It principally behoued to knowe, howe the body of Christ, as it was ones deliuered for vs, is made ours: howe we are made partakers of his bloody was shedde: because this is to possesse whole Christ crucified, that we may enioy all his good things. Nowe these things, in which was so great importãce, being omitted yea neglected and in a maner buried, this onely crabbed question pleaseth them, howe the body of Christ lieth hidde vnder bread or vnder the forme of bread. They falsly spread abroad that whatsoeuer we teache concerning spirituall eating, is contrarie to the true and reall eating, as they call it: because we haue respect to nothing but to the maner, which among them is carnall, while they enclose Christ in bread: but to vs it is spirituall, because the secret power of the Spirit is the bonde of our cõioining with Christ. No truer is that other obiection, that we touche onely the frute or effect which the faithfull take of the eating of the fleshe of Christ. For we haue said before, that Christ himselfe is the substance of the Supper: and that thereupon followeth the effect, that by the sacrifice of his death we are cleansed from sinnes, by his blood we are washed, by his resurrection we are raised vp into hope of the heauenly life. But the foolish imagination, wherof Lombarde was the author, hath peruered their mindes, while they thinke that the eating of the fleshe of Christ is the Sacrament. For thus saith he: The Sacrament and not the thing are the formes of bread and wine: the Sacrament and the thing, are the fleshe and blood of Christ: the thing and not the Sacrament, is his mysticall fleshe. Againe within a littell after. The thing signified and contained, is the propre fleshe of Christ: the thing signified and not contained is his mysticall body. Whereas he maketh difference betwene the fleshe of Christ, and the effectuall power of norishing, wherewith it is endued, I agree: but whereas he faineth it to be a Sacrament, yea and contained vnder bread, it is an error not to be suffred. Herevpon hath growen the false exposition of sacramentall eating, because cause they haue thought that wicked men also and euell doers do eate the fleshe of Christ, howe much soeuer they be strangers from him. But the fleshe of Christ it selfe in the misterie of the Supper is no lesse a spirituall thing than eternall saluation. Wherupon we gather, that whosoever be voide of the Spirit of Christ, can no more eate the fleshe of Christ, than they can drinke wine wherewith is ioined no tast. Truly Christ is to hainously torne in sonder, when that dead body and which hath no liuely strength, is geuen forth in common to vnbeleuers: and his expresse wordes are directly against it, Who soeuer eateth my fleshe and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him. They aunswere that in that place is not entreated of the sacramentall eating: which I graunt, so that they will not nowe and then stamble against the same stone, in saying that the fleshe it selfe is eaten without fruit. But I would knowe of them, howe long they holde it when they haue eaten it. Here, in my iudgement, they shall haue no way to gett out. But they obiekt, that nothing can be withdrawn or faile of the promises of God by the vnthankfulnessse of men. I graunt in decde, and I say that the force of the misterie remaineth whole; howsoever wicked men do, as much as in them lieth, endeuor to make it voide. Yet it is one thing to be offred, and an other thing to be receiued. Christ reacheth this spirituall meate and offreth this spirituall drinke to all men: some do gredily eate of it, some do lothingly refuse it: shall these men refusinge make the meate and the drinke to lose their nature? They will say that their opinion is holpen by this similitude, namely that the fleshe of Christ, though it be vnfaurie, is neuerthelesse his fleshe. But I denie that it can be eaten without the tast of faith: or (if we list rather to speake as Augustine doth) I say that men beare away no more of this Sacrament, than they gather with the vessell of faith. So nothing is abated from the Sacramēt, yea the truth and effectualnesse therof remaineth vnminished, although the wicked depart emptie from the outward partaking of it. If they againe obiekt that this word, this is my body, is diminished, if the wicked receiue corruptible bread and nothing els: we haue a solution ready, that God will not be acknowen true in the receiuing it selfe, but in the stedfastnesse of his owne goodnesse, when he is ready to geue, yea liberally offreth to the vnworthy that which they refuse, And this is the fulnesse of the Sacrament, which the whole world can not breake, that the fleshe and blood of Christ is no lesse geuen to the vnworthy than to the chosen faithfull ones of God: but therewithall it is true, that as water lighting vpon a hard stone, falleth away, because there is no entrie open into the stone: so the wicked do with their hardnesse driue backe the grace of God that it can not pearce into them. Moreouer, that Christ should be receiued without faith, is no more agreeing with reason, than seede to budde in the fire. Whereas they aske, howe Christ is come to damnation to some, vnlesse they receiue him vnworthily, it is a very colde question: forasmuch as we no where reade, that men do procure death to themselues by vnworthily receiuing Christ, but rather by refusing him. Neither doth Christs parable helpe them, where he saith that seede groweth vp among thornes, and afterwarde being choked is marred: because he there entreateth, of what value the faith is which endureth but for a time, which they do not thinke to be necessary to the eating of Christes flesh and drinking of his blood, that in this behalfe do make Iudas egally fellowe with Peter. But rather by the same parable their error is confuted, where Christ saith that some seede falleth in the hy way, other some vpon stones, and neither of them taketh roote. Whereupon followeth that to the vn-felleuers their owne hardnesse is a let that Christ atteineth not to them. Whosoever desireth to haue our saluation holpen by this misterie, shall finde nothing fitter, than that the faithfull being led to the very fountaine, should drawe life out of the Sonne of God. But the dignitie of it is honorably enough set out, when we keepe in minde that it is a helpe whereby we be grafted into the body of Christ, or being grafted do more & more growe together, till he do fully make himself one with vs in the heauenly life. They obiekt that Paul ought not to haue made them gilty of the body & blood of Christ, vnlesse they were partakers of them. But I aunswere that they are not therefore cōdemned, because they haue eaten them, but only because they haue prophaned the misterie, in treading vnder feete y^e pledge of the holy coniointing with God, which they ought reuerently to receiue.

34 Now because Augustine among the olde writers chiefly hath affirmed that article of doctrine, that nothing is abated from the Sacraments, nor the grace which they figure is made voide by the infidelite or noughtinesse of men: it shalbe profitable to proue clearly by his owne wordes, howe vnfitly and peruersly they do drawe that to this present cause, which cast the body of Christ to dogges to eate. The sacramentall eating, after their opinion, is whereby the wicked receiue the body & blood of Christ without the power of the Spirit, or any effect of grace. Augustine contrariwise weyeng wisely those wordes, He that eateth my fleshe, and drinketh my blood, shall not die for euer, sayeth: Namely the power of the Sacrament, not onely the visible Sacrament: and verily within, not without: he that eateth it with harte, not he that presseth it with tooth. Whereupon at length he concludeth that the sacrament of this thing, that is to say, of the vnity of the body & blood of Christ, is set before men in the Supper of the Lord, to some vnto life, to some vnto destructiō: but the thing it selfe whereof it is a sacrament, to all men vnto life, to none vnto destruction, whosoever be partaker of it. That none should here cauill, that the thing is called not the body, but the grace of the Spirit which may be seuered from the body, the contrarie cōparison betwene these two wordes of addition Visible and Inuisible driueth away all these mistes: for vnder the first of them can not be comprehended the body of Christ. Whereupō followeth that the vnbeleuers do cōmunicate onely of the visible signe. And that all doutinge may be better taken away, after that he had said that this bread requireth the hunger of the inward man, he addeth: Moses and Aaron and Phinees, and many other that did eat Manna, pleased God. Why so? Exo. 14. because the spirituall meate they spiritually vnderstoode, spiritually hungred, spiritually tasted, that they might be spiritually filled. For we also at this day haue receiued spirituall meat: but the Sacramēt is one thing, and the power of the sacramēt is an other. A litle after: and by this he that abideth not in Christ, and in whom Christ abideth nor, without dout neither eateth spiritually his fleshe, nor drinketh his blood, though carnally and visibly he presseth with teeth the signe of the body and blood. We heare againe that the visible signe is set in cōparison as cōtrary to spirituall eating. Whereby that error is confuted, that the body of Christ inuisible is in deede eaten sacramētally, though not spiritually. We heare also that nothing is graūted to prophane & vncleane men beside y visible receiuing of the signe. Herupō Homi in Ioh 59. cometh his famous saying, that the other disciples did eat the bread of the Lord, but Iudas did eat the bread of the Lord: wherein he plainly excludeth the vnbeleuers from the partaking of the body & blood. Neither tēdeth it to any other ende which he saith in an other place: What meruailest thou, if to Iudas was geuen the bread of Christ, by Homi 62. which he might be made bond to the deuel: when thou seest on the 2. Cor 11.7. cōtrary side that to Paul was geuen the Angel of the deuil, by whom Libr. de ba contr Dona 1. Cor 11.29 he might be made perfect in Christ? He saith verily in an other place, that the bread of the Supper was the body of Christ to thē to whom Paul said, He that eateth vnworthily, eateth & drinketh iudgemēt to himselfe: and that they haue not therefore nothing, because they haue receiued noughtily. But in what sense, he declareth more fully in an other place. For (taking in hād purposely to define howe the wicked and euell doers, which professe the Christian faith with mouth but with deedes do deny it, do eate the body of Christ, and that against the opinion of some, which thought that they did not eate in sacrament onely but in very deede.) But neither (saith he) ought it to be said that they eate the body of Christ, because they are not to be reckned among the membres of Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest) they can not together be the membres of Christ, and the membres of a harlot. Finally where himselfe saith, He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him, he sheweth what it is not sacramentally but in very deede to eate y^e body of Christ. For this is to abide in Christ, that Christ may abide in him. For he so said this, as though he had said, he that abideth not in me, and in whom I abide not, let him not say or thinke that he doth eate my body, or drinke my blood. Let the readers wey the things set as contraries in the cōparison to eate, sacramentally, and in very deede: and there shall remaine no dout. He confirmeth the same, no lesse plainly in these wordes: Prepare not your iawes, but your hart: Hereupon is this Supper commended. Loe we beleue in Christ, when we receiue by faith: in receiuing we knowe what to thinke. We receiue a tittle and are fatted in hart. Therefore not that which is scene, but that which is beleued, doth feede. Here also that which the wicked receiue, he restraineth to the visible signe: & teacheth that Christ is none otherwise receiued than by faith. So also in an other place, pronouncing expressly that the good and the euell do communicate together in the signes, he excludeth the euell from y^e true eating of the flesh of Christ. For if they receiued the thing it selfe, he would not vtterly haue left that vnspoken which was more fit for his matter. Also in an other place, entreating of the eating & the frute therof, he cōcludeth thus: Then shall the body and blood of Christ be life to euery man, if that which in the Sacrament is visibly receiued, be in the truth it selfe spiritually eaten, spiritually dronke. Therefore whoso make vnbeleuers partakers of the fleshe and blood of Christ, that they may agree with Augustine, let them shewe vs the visible body of Christ: forasmuch as, by his iudgement, the whole truth is spirituall. And it is certainly gathered out of his wordes, that the Sacramentall eating, when vnbelefe closeth vp the entrie to truth, is as much in effect as visible or outwarde eating. If the body of Christ might be eaten truely and yet not spiritually, what should that meane which he saith in an other place? Ye shall not eate this body which ye see, and drinke the blood which they shall shedde that shall crucifie me. I haue commended a certaine Sacramente vnto you, being spiritually vnderstanded it shall quicken you. Verily he would not deny but that the same body which Christ offered for sacrifice, is deliuered in the Supper: but he did set out the maner of eatinge: namely that beinge receiued into heauenly glory, by the secrete power of the Spirite, it breatheth life into vs. I graunt in dede that there is oftentimes founde in him this maner of speakinge, that the body of Christ is eaten of the vnbeleuers: Homil. in Ioh. 27. but he expounderh himselfe, adding, In Sacrament. And in an other place he describeth spirituall eatinge, in which our bitinges consume not grace. And least mine aduersaries shoulde say, that I fight with them with a heape of places, I would knowe of them howe they can vnwinde themselues from one sayinge of his, where he sayeth that Sacraments do worke in the only elect that which they figure. Truly they dare not deny but that the bread in the Supper figureth the body of Christ. Wherupon foloweth that the reprobate are debarred from the partakinge of it. That Cyrill also thought none otherwise, these wordes do declare. As if a man vpon molten waxe do poure other waxe, he wholly tempereth the one waxe with the other: so is it necessary if any man receiue the fleshe and blood of the Lorde that he be ioyned with him, that Christ may be founde in him and he in Christ. By these wordes I thinke it is euident, that they are bereued of the true and reall eatinge, that do but sacramentally eate the body of Christ, which can not be seuered from his power: and that therefore faileth not the faich of the promises of God, which cesselth not to raine from heauen, although the stones and rockes conceiue not the liquor of the raine.

35 This knowledge shall also easily draw vs away from the carnal worshipping, which some haue with peruerse rashnesse erected in the Sacrament: because they made accompt with themselues in this maner: If it be the body, then both the soule and the Godhead are together with the body, which now can not be seuered: therefore Christ is there to be worshipped. First if their accompanyinge which they pretende be denied them, what will they do? For howe much soeuer they crie out vpo an absurdity, if the body be seuered from the soule and the godhead: yet what soundewitted and sober man can perswade himselfe that the body of Christ is Christ? They thinke themselues in dede gaily to proue it with their logical argumentes. But sith Christ speaketh distinctly of his body and blood, but describeth not the maner of presence: how will they of a doutfull thinge gather certainly that which they woulde? What then? If their consciences chaunce to be exercised with any more greuous feling, shall not they by and by with their logical argumentes be dissolued and melt? namely when they shall see themselues destitute of the certain word of God, vpon which alone our soules do stand fast, whē they are called to accompt, and without which they faint at euery first moment: when they shall call to mind that the doctrine & examples of the Apostles are against them, and that themselues alone are to themselues the authors of it. To such motions shalbe added other not small prickings. What? Shall it be a matter of no importance, to worship God in this forme, where nothing was prescribed vnto vs? When it concerned the true worship of God, ought they with so great lightnesse to haue attempted that of which there is no where read any one worde? But if they had, with such humblenesse as they ought, holden al their thoughtes vnder the word of God, they would truely haue harkened to y^e which he said, Take, eate, drinke, & would haue obeyed this commaundemēt, wherein he biddeth the Sacrament to be receiued, not to be worshipped. But they which, as it is commaunded of God, do receiue it without worshipping, are assured that they do not swarue from Gods cōmaundement: than which assurednes there is nothing better when we take any worke in hand. They haue y^e example of the Apostles, whom we read not to haue fallen downe flat and worshipped it, but euen as they were sitting, to haue receiued it & eaten it. They haue the vse of the Apostolike Church, wherin Luke reporteth that the faithfull did communicate not in worshippinge but in breakinge of bread. They haue the Apostles doctrine, wherewith Paule instructed the Church of the Corinthians, professing that he had receiued of the Lord that which he deliuered.

36 And these things verily tend to this ende, that the godly readers should wey howe perillous it is in so hie matters to wander from the simple worde of God to the dreames of our owne braine. But those things that are aboue said, ought to deliuer vs from all dout in this behalfe. For, that godly soules may therein rightly take holde of Christ, they must needes be lifted vp to heauen. If this be the office of a Sacrament, to help the minde of man which otherwise is weake, that it may rise vpward to reache the height of spirituall mysteries: then they which are holdē downe in the outward signe do stray from the right way of seeking Christ. What then? Shall we deny that it is a superstitious worshippinge, when men do throwe themselues downe before bread, to worship Christ therein? Doubtlesse the Nicene Synode meant to mete with this mischiefe, when it forbade vs to be humbly intentiue to the signes set before vs. And for none other cause was it in old time ordained, that before the cōsecration the people should with a loude voice be put in minde to haue their hartes lifted vpward. The Scripture it selfe also, beside that it diligently declareth vnto vs

the ascension of Christ, whereby he conueyed away the presence of his body from our sight and conuersation: to shake away from vs all carnall thinkinge of him, so oft as it maketh mention of him, commaundeth vs to be in mindes raised vward, and to seke him in heauen sitting at the right hand of the Father. According to this rule he was rather to be spirituallly worshipped in heauenly glorie, than this so perillous a kinde of worshipping to be deuised, full of carnall and grosse opinion of God. Wherefore they that haue inuented the worshipping of the Sacrament, haue not only dreamed it of themselues beside the Scripture, in which no mētion of it can be shewed (which yet should not haue bin ouerpasseed if it had bin acceptable to God.) But also all the Scripture cryinge out against it, they haue framed to themselues a God after the will of their owne lust, leauing the liuing God. For what is idolatry, if this be not, to worshippe the giftes in steede of the giuer himselfe? Wherein they haue doublely offended: For both the honor taken from God was conueyed to a creature: & he himselfe also dishonored in the defiling and prophaninge of his benefit, when of his holy Sacrament is made a cursed idole. But let vs contrariwise, least we fall into the same pit, throughly settle our cares, eies, hartes, mindes, & tongues in the holy doctrine of God. For that is the schole of the holy Ghost, the best scholemaister, in which such profit is attained, that nothing neede more to be gotten frō any where else, but we willingly ought to be ignorāt of whatsoever is not taught in it.

37 But nowe (as superstition, when it hath once passed the right boundes, maketh no end of sinning) they fel a great way further. For they haue deuised Ceremonies altogether straunge frō the institution of the Supper, to this end only that they might giue diuine honors to the signe. We yeelde (say they) this worship to Christ. First, if this were done in the Supper, I would say that that worshipping only is lawfull, which resteth not in the signe, but is directed to Christ sittinge in heauen. But nowe by what pretense do they boast that they worshippe Christ in that bread: when they haue no promise thereof? They consecrate an host, as they call it, which they may cary about in pompe, which they may shewe foorth in a common gazinge to be looked yppon, worshipped, and called vppon. I aske by what power they thinke it to be rightly consecrate. Verily they will bring foorth those words, This is my body. But I will obiect to the contrary, that it was therewithall said, Take and eate. Neither will I do that of nothing. For when a promise is knit to a commaundement, I say that the promise is so contained vnder the commaudemēt, that being seue-

red it is made no promise at all. This shalbe made plainer by a like example. God gaue a commaundement, when he said, Call vpon me: He added a promise, I will heare thee. If any man calling vpon Peter and Paule, do glory vpon this promise, will not all men crie out that he doth wrongfully? And what other thing I pray you, do they which leauing the cōmaundement concerning eating, do catch hold of a maimed promise, this is my body, to abuse it to strange ceremonies from the institution of Christ? Let vs therefore remember that this promise is giuen to them which kepe the commaundement ioined with it: but that they be destitute of all the word, which remoueth the Sacramēt to any other way. We haue heretofore entreated how the mystery of the holy supper serueth our Faith before God. But forasmuch as the Lord doth here not only bringe into our remembrance so great largesse of his bounty, as we haue before shewed, but doth as it were from hande to hande bringe it foorth, and stirreth vs to acknowledge it: he doth therewithall warne vs that we be not vnthankfull to so plentifull liberality: but rather that we should publish it with such praises as it is meete, and aduaunce it with thankesgiuing.

Therefore when he deliuered the institution of the Sacrament it self to the Apostles, he taught them that they shoulde do it in remembrance of him. Which Paule expoundeth, to declare the Lordes death. That is, publikely and altogether with one mouth openly to confesse, that all our affiance of life and saluation is reposed in the death of the Lorde: that we may glorifie him with our confession, and may by our example exhorte other to giue glory to him. Here againe it appeareth whereunto the marke of this Sacrament is directed, namely to exercise vs in the remembrance of the death of Christ. For, this that we are commaunded to declare the Lords death till he come to iudge, is nothing else but that we should publish that with confession of mouth, which our faith hath acknowledged in the Sacrament, that is, that the death of Christ is our life. This is the second vse of the Sacrament, which pertaineth to outward confession.

38 Thirdly the Lorde also willed it to be to vs in steede of an exhortation, thā which none other can more vehemently encourage & enflame vs both to purenes and holines of life, and also to charitie, peace, and agreement. For the Lord doth therein so communicate his body to vs, that he is made throughly one with vs, and we with him. Now sith he hath but one body, whereof he maketh vs all partakers, it is necessary that all we also be by such partakinge made one body. Which vnity the bread which is deliuered in the Sacramēt, representeth: which as it is made of many graines in such sort mingled together together that one can not be discerned from an other: after the same maner we also ought to be conioyned & knit together with so great agreemēt of mindes, that no disagreement or diuision come betwene vs. This I had rather to be expressed with Paules wordes. The cup of blessing (sayth he) which we blesse, is the communicating of the blood of Christ: & the bread of blessing which we breake, is the partaking of the body of Christ. Therefore we all are one body, that partake of one bread. We shall haue very well profited in the Sacrament, if this thought so shalbe emprinted & engraue in our mindes, that none of the brethren can be hurt, despised, refused, abused, or in any wise be offended of vs, but that therewithall we do in so doinge hurt, despise and abuse Christ with our iniurious dealinges: that we can not disagree with our brethren, but that we must therewithall disagree with Christ: that Christ can not be loued of vs, but that he must be loued in our brethren: that what care we haue of our owne body, such also we ought to haue of our brethren which are members of our body: as no part of our body is touched with any feling of griefe, which is not spread abroad into all the other parts, so we must not suffer, our brother to be greued with any euil wherof we should not also be touched with compassion. Therefore Augustine not without cause so oft calleth this Sacrament the bond of charity. For what sharper spur could be put to vs, to stirre vp mutuall charity among vs, than when Christ giuing himselfe to vs, doth not only allure vs with his owne example that we shoulde mutually dedicate and deliuer our selues one to an other: but in so much as he maketh himselfe cōmon to all, he maketh all vs also one in himselfe?

39 But hereby is that very well confirmed which I haue sayd in an other place, that the true ministracion of the Sacramēt standeth not without the word. For whatsoever profit commeth to vs of the Supper, requireth the word: whether we be to be confirmed in Faith, or to be exercised in confession, or to be stirred vp to duety, praier is needefull. Therefore nothinge can be more disorderly done in the Supper, than if it be turned to a dumme action: as hath bin done vnder the tyranny of the Pope. For they would haue the whole force of consecration to hange vpon the intent of the Priest, as though this nothing pertained to the people, to whom it most of all behoued that the mystery should be declared. But thereupon hath growen this error, that they marked not that those promises wherewith the consecration is made, are directed not to the elementes themselues, but to them that receiue them. But Christ speaketh not to the bread, that it may be made his body, but commaundeth his disciples to eate, and promiseth to them the communicating of his body and blood. And none other order doth Paul teach, than that together with the bred and the cup, the promises should be offered to the faithfull. Thus it is truly. We ought not here to imagine any magickall enchantment, that it be sufficient to haue mumbled vp the wordes, as though the elementes did heare them: but let vs vnderstande that those wordes are a liuely preachinge, which may edifie the hearers, which may inwardly pearce into their mindes, which may be emprinted and settled in their hartes, which may shewe foorth effectualnesse in the fulfilling of that which it promiseth. By these reasons it clearely appeareth, that the layinge vp of the Sacrament, which many do earnestly require, that it may be extraordinarily distributed to the sicke, is vnprofitable. For either they shall receiue it without reuerencing of the institution of Christ, or the minister shall together with the signe ioyne the true declaration of the mystery. In silence is abuse & fault. If the promises be rehearsed, and the mysteric declared, that they which shall receiue it may receiue it with frute, there is no cause why we should dout that this is the true consecration. To what end then will that other consecration come, the force whereof commeth not so farre as to the sicke men? But they that do so, haue the example of the old Church. I graunt: but in so great a matter, & in which we erre not without great daunger, nothinge is safer than to folow the truth it selfe.

40 Now as we see that this holy bread of the Supper of the Lord is spirituall meate, no lesse sweete and delicate than healthfull to the godly worshippers of God, by the tast whereof they feele that Christ is their life, whom it raiseth vp to thanksgiuing, to whom it is an exhortation to mutuall charity among themselues: so on the other side it is turned into a most noysome poyson to all them whose Fayth it doth not nourish and confirme, and whom it doth not stirre vp to confession of praise and to charity. For as bodily meate, when it findeth a stomach possessed with euill humors, being it selfe also therby made euill and corrupted doth rather hurt than nourishe: so this spirituall meate, if it light vppon a soule defiled with malice and naughtinesse, throweth it downe headlong with greater fall: verily not by the fault of the meate it selfe, but because to defiled and vnbeleuinge men nothinge is cleane, though otherwise it be neuer so much sanctified by the blessing of the Lord. For (as Paule sayth) they that eate & drinke vnworthily, are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, and do eate and drinke iudgement to themselues, not discerning the body of the Lord. For, such kinde of me as without any sparcle of Faith, without any zeale of charity, do thrust themselues foorth like swine to take the Supper of the Lorde, do not discern the body of the Lorde. For in so much as they do not beleue that that body is their life, they do as much as in them lyeth dishonor it, spoylinge it of all the dignitie thereof, and finally in so receiuinge it they prophane and defile it. But in so much as being estranged and disagreeinge from their brethré, they dare mingle the holy signe of the body of Christ with their disagreements, it is no thanke to them that the body of Christ is not rent in sunder, and limmemeale torne in peeces. And so not vnworthily they are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, which they do with vngodlines full of sacrilege so fowly defile. Therefore by this vnworthy eatinge, they take to themselues damnation. For whereas they haue no Faith reposed in Christ, yet receiuing the Sacrament they professe that there is saluation for them no where else than in him, and do forswear all other affiance. Wherefore they themselues are accusers to themselues, they themselues pronounce witnesse against themselues, and they themselues seale their owne damnation. Againe when they being with hatred and euill will diuided & drawn in sunder from their brethren, that is, from the members of Christ, haue no parte in Christ: yet they do testifie that this is the only saluation to communicate with Christ, & to be made one with him. For this cause Paule commaundeth, that a man proue himselfe, before that he eate of this bread or drinke of this cup. Whereby 1. Cor. 11. 28. (as I expounde it) he meant that euery man should descend into himselfe, and weie with himselfe, whether he do with inward affiance of hart rest vpon the saluatiõ which Christ hath purchaced: whether he acknowledge it with confession of mouth: then whether he do with desirous endeuour of innocence and holinesse aspire to the following of Christ: whether after his example he be ready to giue himselfe to his brethren, & to cõmunicate himselfe to them with whom he hath Christ cõmon to him: whether, as he himselfe is accompted of Christ, he do likewise on his behalfe take all his brethren for members of his owne body: whether he couet to cherish, defende, and helpe them as his owne members. Not for that these duties both of Faith & charity can now be perfect in vs: but because we ought to endeuor this, & with all our desires to long toward it, that we may daily more & more encrease our Faith begon.

41. Commonly when they go about to prepare men to such worthines of eating, they haue in cruell wise tormented and vexed poore consciences: and yet they brought neuer a whit of all those thinges that might serue to the purpose. They said that those did eat worthily which were in state of grace. To be in state of grace they expounded to be pure & cleansed from all sinne. By which doctrine all the men that euer haue at any time bin or now be in earth, were debarred frō the vse of this Sacrament. For if we go about this, to fetch our worthinesse from our selues, we are vtterly vndone: onely despeire and damnable ruine abideth for vs. Though we endeuor with our whole strengthes, we shall nothinge more preuaile, but that then at last we shalbe most vnworthy, when we haue most of all trauailed about seekinge of worthinesse. To salue this sore, they haue deuised a way to attaine worthinesse: that, as much as in vs lieth, making examination, and requiring of our selues accompt of all our doings, we should with contrition, confession, and satisfaction cleanse our vnworthinesse which way of cleansing, what maner of thinge it is, we haue already shewed there where was more conuenient place to speake of it. So much as serueth for our present purpose, I say that these be to hungry and vanishinge comfortes to dismaied and discouraged consciences & such as are stricken with horrour of their sinne. For if the Lord by speciall forbidding, admitteth none to the partakinge of his Supper but the righteous & innocent: there needeth no smal heede that may make a man assured of his owne righteousness which he heareth to be required of God. But whereby is this assurednes confirmed vnto vs, that they are discharged afore God, which haue done so much as in them lay? But although it were so, yet when shall it be that a man may be bold to assure himselfe that he hath done as much as in him lay? So when there is made no certaine assurance of our worthinesse, the entry shall alway remaine shut by that horrible forbidding, whereby is pronounced that they eate & drinke iudgement to themselues, which eate and drinke vnworthily.

42 Now it is easie to iudge what maner of doctrine this is which reigneth in the Papacy, & frō what author it hath proceeded, which with the outragious rigor thereof bereueth and spoyleth, miserable sinners and such as be tormented with feare and sorow, of the comfort of this Sacrament, in which yet all the swete delicates of the Gospell were set before them. Surely the deuill could by no redier way destroy men, than by so making them senselesse, that they coulde not perceiue the tast and sauour of such foode, wherewith it was the will of the most good heauenly Father to feede them. Least therefore we runne into such headlonge downefall, let vs remember that this holy banquet is medicine to the sicke, comfort to sinners, liberall gift to the poore: which bring no profit to the healthy, righteous, and riche, if any such could be found. For wheras in it Christ is giuen vs for meate:

we vnderstande that without him we pync, starue, and faint, like as famine destroyeth the liuely strength of the body. Againe wheras he is giuen vs for life: we vnderstande that without him we are in our selues vtterly dead. Wherefore this is the worthinesse both the on-ly and best that we can bringe to God, if we offer to him our owne vilenesse and (as I may so call it) vnworthinesse, that of his mercy he may make vs worthy of him: if we despaire in our selues, that we may be comforted in him: if we humble our selues, that we may be raised vp of him: if we accuse our selues, that we may be iustified of him: moreouer if we aspire to that vnity which he commendeth to vs in his Supper: and as he maketh vs all, one in himselfe, so if we wish to vs all altogether one soule, one hart one tonge. If we haue these things throughly well weyed and considered, such thoughtes although they shake vs, yet shall neuer ouerthrow vs. As, how should we being needy and naked of al good things, we defiled with filthinesse of sinnes, we halfe dead, eat the body of the Lorde worthily? We will rather thinke that we being poore come to the liberal giuer, we seeke to the Philician, we sinners to the author of righteousnesse, finally we dead men to him that giueth life: that that worthinesse which is commaunded of God, consisteth chiefly of Faith, which repositeth al things in Christ and nothinge in vs: and next of charity, and the selfe same charity which it is enough to offer vnperfect to God, that he may encrease it to better, forasmuch as it can not be giuen perfect. Some other agreeing with vs in this, that the worthinesse it selfe consisteth in Fayth and charity: yet in the measure of worthinesse haue gone farre out of the way, requiringe a perfection of Fayth, whereunto nothing may be added, & a charity egall with that which Christ hath shewed toward vs. But hereby they do none otherwise than those other before, driue all men away from comminge to this holy Supper. For if their sentence shoulde take place, no man shoulde receiue but vnworthily, forasmuch as all without exception shoulde be holden guilty and conuict of their vnperfectnesse. And truly it were a point of too much amazed dulnesse, I will not say foolishnesse, to require such perfection in the Sacrament, as may make the Sacrament voide and superfluous: which was not ordained for the perfect, but for the weake and feeble to awake, to stirre vp, to pricke forward, and exercise the affection of Faith and charity, and to correct the defaut of either of them.

43 But so much as concerneth the outward forme of doing, whether the faithfull receiue it in their hand or no: whether they deuide it, or euery one eate that which is giuen him: whether they put againe

the cup in the hand of the Deacon, or deliuer it to the next: whether the bread be leuened, or vnleuened: whether the wine be redde or white: it maketh no matter. These thinges be indifferent and left in the liberty of the Church. Howebeit it is certaine, that the vsage of the old Church was, that euery one should take it into his hand. And Christ said, Diuide it among you. The histories report, that it was leuened and common breade before the time of Alexander bishoppe of Rome, which first delited in vnleuened bread: but for what reason I see not, vnlesse it were with a newe sight to draw the eies of the common people to wondring at it, rather than to instruct their mindes with good religion. I adiure all thē that are touched with any though but light zeale of godlines, to tell whether they do not euidently see, both how much more brightly the glory of God shineth herein, and how much more abundant sweetenes of spirituall comfort commeth to the faithfull, than in these colde and plaieliklike trifles, which bring none other vse but to deceiue the sense of the amased people. This they call the holdinge of the people in religion, when beinge made foolish and senslesse with superstition it is drawen whether they list. If any man will defende such inuentions by antiquity, I my selfe also am not ignorant how auncient is the vse of chresme, and blowing in Baptisme: Howe nye to the age of the Apostles the Supper of the Lorde was infected with rustinesse: but this verily is the waywardnesse of mans boldenesse, which can not withholde it selfe but that it must alway play and be wanton in the mysteries of God. But lette vs remember that God doth so highly esteeme the obedience of his word, that he willeth vs in it to iudge both his Angels and the whole worlde. Now, bidding farewell to so great a heape of ceremonies: it might thus haue bin most comlyly ministred, if it were oft and at least euery weke sette before the Church, but that first they shoulde begin with publike praiers: then a sermon should be made: then the minister, hauinge bread and wine sette vpon the boorde, shoulde rehearse the institution of the Supper: and then shoulde declare the promises that are in it leste vnto vs: and therewithall shoulde excommunicate all them that by the Lords forbiddinge are debarred from it, afterwarde they shoulde pray that with what liberality the Lorde hath giuen vs this holy foode, he woulde instruct and frame vs also with the same Faith & thankesfulnesse of minde to receiue it, & that forasmuch as we are not of our selues, he would of his mercy make vs worthy of such a banquet: that then either Psalmes should be song, or somewhat red, and the faithful should in semely order cōmunicate of the holy bāket, the ministers breaking the bread & giuing it to the people: that when the Supper is ended, exhortation should be made to pure Faith & confession of Faith, to charity, and to maners mete for Christians: last of all that giuing of thanks should be rehearsed, & praises be song to God: which being ended the congregation should be let go in peace.

44 These things that we haue hitherto spoken of this Sacrament do largely shewe, that it was not therefore ordained, that it should be receiued yearely once, & that slightly for maners sake (as now commonly the custome is) but that it should be in often vse to all Christians, that with often remembrance they should repeate the passion of Christ: by which remembrance they might sustaine and strengthen their Faith, & exhort themselues to sing confession of praise to God, and to publish his goodnes: finally by which they might nourish mutuall charity, and testifie it amonge themselues, whereof they saw the knot in the vnity of the body of Christ. For so oft as we communicate of the signe of the body of the Lord, we do as by a token giuen & receiued, enterchaungeably binde our selues one to an other vnto all dueties of loue, that none of vs do any thing whereby he may offend his brother, nor leaue any thing vndone whereby he may helpe him, when nede requireth and ability sufficeth. That such was the vse of the Apostolike Church, Luke rehearseth in the Actes, when he saith that the faithfull were continuinge in the doctrine of the Apostles, in communicating, in breaking of bread, and in praiers. So was it altogether mete to be done, that there shoulde be no assembly of the Church without the word, praiers, partaking of the Supper and almes. That this order was also institute amonge the Corinthians we may sufficiently gather of Paule: and it is certaine that in many ages afterward it was in vse. For thereupon came those olde Canons, which they father vpon Anacletus & Calixtus, that when the consecration is done, all should communicate, that wil not be without the dores of the Church. And it is red in those olde Canons, which they call the Canons of the Apostles: that they which continue not vnto the end, & do not receiue the holy communion, must be corrected as mē that moue vnquietnes of the Church. Also in the Councell at Antioch, it was decreed that they which enter into y^e Church, & heare the Scriptures, & do abstaine from the communion, shoulde be remoued from the Church, till they haue amended this fault. Which although in the first Councell at Toletum it was either somewhat qualified or at least set forth in milder wordes, yet it is there also decreed, that they which when they haue heard the sermon are found neuer to communicate, should be warned: if after warning they abstaine, they shoulde be debarred from it.

45 Verily by these ordinances the holy men meant to retaine and maintaine the often vse of the Communion, which oftē vse they had receiued from the Apostles themselues, which they sawe to be most holosome for the faithfull, and by litle and litle by the negligence of the common people to growe out of vse. Augustine testifieth of his owne time: The Sacrament (saith he) of this thing, of the vnity of the Lords body, is somewhere daily, somewhere by certaine distances of dayes, prepared vpon the Lordes table, and is there receiued at the table, to some vnto life, to other some vnto destruction. And in the first Epistle to Ianuarius: some do daily communicate of the body and blood of the Lorde: some receiue it at certaine daies: in some places there is no day let passe wherein it is not offered: in some other places onely vppon the Saturday and the Sunday, and in some other places neuer but on the Sunday. But forasmuch as the common people was (as we haue sayd) somewhat slacke, the holy men did call earnestly vpon them with sharp rebukinges, least they shoulde seeme to winke at such slothfulnesse. Such an example is in Chrystome vpon the Epistle to the Ephesians. It is not said vnto him that dishonored the banquet: wherefore didst thou sit downe? but, wherefore didst thou come in? Whosoever is not partaker of the mysteries, he is wicked and shamelesse for that he standeth here present. I beseeche you, if any be called to a banquet, washeth his handes, sitteth downe, seemeth to prepare himselfe to eate, and then doth tast of nothings: shall he not thame both the banquet, and the maker of the banquet? So thou, standing among them that with prayer do prepare themselues to receiue the holy meate, hast euen in this that thou hast not gone away confessed that thou art one of the number of them, at the last thou doest not partake: had it not bin better that thou hadst not bin present. Thou wilt say, I am vnworthy. Therefore neither wast thou worthy of the communion of praier, which is a preparinge to the receiuing of the holy mystery.

46 And truely this custome, which commaūdeth to communicate yeately once, is a most certaine inuention of the deuill, by whose ministry foruer it was brought in. They say that Zepherinus was author of that decree, which it is not likely to haue bin such as we now haue it. For he by his ordinance did peraduenture not after the worst maner prouide for y church, as the times then were. For it is no dout but that then the holy supper was sette before the faithfull so oft as they came together in assembly, neither is it any dout but that a good part of them did communicate. But when it scarsely at any time happened that all did communicate together, and whereas it was necessary

sary that they which were mingled with prophane men & idolaters, shoulde by some outward signe testifie their faith: the holy man for order & policies sake, appointed that day, wherein the whole people of Christians should by partaking of the Lords supper vter a cōfession of their faith. The ordinance of Zepherinus beinge otherwise good hath bin euill wrested of them that came after, whē a certaine law was made of one communicating yearly: whereby it is come to passe, that almost al men whē they haue once cōmunicate, as though they had gaily discharged themselues for al the rest of the yere, slepe soundly on both eares. It ought to haue bin farre otherwise done. E- uery weke at the least, the Lordes table shoulde be set before the as- sembly of y Christians: the promises should be declared, which might feede vs spiritually at it: none should in dede be compelled by neces- sity, but all should be exhorted and pricked forward: the sluggishnesse also of the slothfull should be rebuked. All should by heapes, as hun- gry men, come together to such dainties. Not without rightfull cause therefore at the beginning I complained, that by the craft of the de- uill this custome was thrust in, which when it appointeth one cer- taine day of the yere, maketh men slothfull for all the rest of the yere. We see in deede that this peruerse abuse was crept in euen in the time of Chrysostome: but we may also therewithal see how much it displeased him. For he complaineth with greuous words in the same place which I euen now alleaged, that there is so great inequality of this matter, that often in some times of the yere they came not euen when they were cleane, but at Easter they came euen when they were vn- cleane. Then he crieth out: O custome. O presumption. Then in vaine is the daily offering vsed: in vaine we stande at the altar: there is none that partaketh together with vs. So farre is it of that he allo- wed it by his authority adioyned to it.

47 Out of the same shop proceded also an other ordināce, which hath stolen away or violently taken away the halfe of the supper from the better nūber of the people of God, namely the signe of the blood, which being denied to lay and profane men (for with such titles sor- sooth they set out Gods inheritance) became a peculiar possession to shauen and annointed men. It is the commaundement of the eternall God, that al should drinke: which cōmaundement man dare disconti- nue and repell with a new & contrary law, commaunding that not all should drinke. And that these lawmakers shoulde not seeme to fight without reason against their God, they pretend perils that might hap- pen if this holy cup were commonly giuē to all: as though those dan- gers had not bin foreseene & marked of the eternall wisdom of God.

And then suttelley forsooth they reason, that the one is enough for both. For if (say they) it be the body, it is whole Christ, which cā not now be seuered from his body. Therefore by accompanyinge the body containeth the blood. Loe how our wit agreeth with God, when it hath neuer so litle begon with loose reines, to be wanton & wilde. The Lord shewing bread, saith that it is his body: when he sheweth the cup, he calleth it his blood. The boldnesse of mans reason, crieth out contrariwise that the bread is the blood, and the wine is the body: as though the Lorde had for no cause seuered his body from his blood both in wordes and in signes: or as though it hadde euer bin heard spokē that the body or blood of Christ is called God & man. Verily if he had meant to signifie whole himself, he might haue said it is I: as he is wont to speake in the Scriptures, and not, this is my body, this is my blood. But he willinge to helpe our weakenesse, did set the cuppe seuerally from the bread; to teache that he suffiseth no lesse for drinke than for meate. Now let one part be takē away, then we shall finde but the one halfe of the nourishments in him. Therefore although it be true which they pretend, that the blood is in the bread by way of accompanyinge, and againe the body in the cup, yet they defraude godly soules of the confirmation of faith which Christ deliuereth vs as necessary. Therefore biddinge their suttleties farewell, we must holde fast the profite which is by the ordinance of Christ in the two earnest.

48 I know in deede that the ministers of Sathan do here cauill, as it is an ordinary thing with them to make mockery of the Scriptures. First they alleage that of one bare doinge ought not to be gathered a rule whereby the Church shoulde be bounde to perpetuall obseruinge. But they lye when they say that it was but a bare doinge: for Christ did not only deliuer the cup, but also did institute that his Apostles should in time to come do the same. For they are the words of a commaunder, drinke ye all of this cup. And Paule so rehearseth that it was a deede; that he also commendeth it for a certaine rule. An other startinge hole is, that the Apostles alone were receiued of Christ to the partakinge of this supper whom he had already chosen and taken into the order of the sacrificinge Priestes. But I woulde haue them answere me to fise questions, from which they shall not be able to escape, but that they shalbe easily conuincd with their lies. First, by what oracle haue they this solution reuealed, beinge so straunge from the worde of God? The Scripture reckoneth twelue that satte with Iesus: but it doth not so obscure the dignitie of Christ that it calleth them sacrificinge Priestes of which name we will speake hereafter after in place fit for it. Though he gaue it then to the twelue, yet he commaunded that they should do the same, namely that they should so distribute it among them. Secondly, why in that better age, from the Apostles almost a thousand yeares, were all without exception made partakers of both the signes? was the olde Church ignorant what gestes Christ had receiued to his Supper? It were a point of most desperate shamelesnesse, here to sticke and dally in graunting it to be true. There remaine y^e ecclesiasticall histories, there remaine the bookes of the olde writers, which minister euident testimonies of this matter. The fleshe (saith Tertullian) is fed with the body and blood of Christ, that the soule may be fatted which feeding vpon God. Howe (said Ambrose to Theodosius) wilt thou receiue with such handes the holy body of the Lorde? With what boldnesse wilt thou with thy mouth partake of the cup of the precious blood? And Hierome saith. The priests which make the Thankesgeuing, and do distribute the blood of the Lorde to the people. Chrysostome. Not as in the olde lawe the Priest did eat part, and the people part: but one body is set before all, and one cup. Those things that pertaine to the Thankesgeuing, are all common betweene the Priest and the people. The selfe same thing doth Augustine testifie in many places.

49 But why dispute I about a thing most knowen? Let all the Greke and Latine writers be red ouer: such testimonies shall euewhere offer themselues. Neither was this custome growen out of vse, while there remained one drop of purenesse in the Church. Gregory, whom you may rightly say to haue bene the last Bishop of Rome, teacheth y^e it was kept in his time. What is the blood of the lambe, ye haue nowe learned, not by hearing but by drinking. His blood is poured into the mouthes of the faithfull. Yea it yet endured foure hundred yeares after his death, when all things were growen out of kinde. For neither was that taken onely for an vsage, but also for an inuiolable lawe. For then was in force the reuerence of Gods institutiō, and they doubted not that it was sacrilege, to seuer those things which the Lorde had conioined. For thus saith Gelasius. We haue founde, that some receiuing onely the portion of the holy body, do abstaine from the cup. Let them without dout, bycause they seeme to be bounde with I wote not what superstition, either receiue the Sacraments whole, or be debarred from them whole. For the diuiding of this ministry is not committed without great sacrilege. Those reasons of Cyprian were heard, which truely ought to moue a Christian minde. Howe (saith he) do we teache or prouoke them to shed their blood in the confessing of Christ, if we deny his blood to them that shall fight? Or how do we make them fit for the cup of Martyrdome if we do not first in the church by the right of cōmunion admit the to drinke the cup of the Lorde. Whereas the Canonists do restraine that decree of Gelasius to the Priestes, that is so childish a cauill that it nede not to be confuted.

50 Thirdly, why did he simply say of the bread, that they shoulde eate: but of the cuppe, that they should all drinke? euen as if he had meant of set purpose to mete with the craft of Satan. Fourthly, if (as they would haue it) the Lord vouchtaued to admit to his supper only sacrificing Priestes, what man euer durst call to the partakinge of it; straungers whom the Lord had excluded? yea and to the partaking of that gift, the power whereof was not in their hands, without any cōmaundement of him which only could giue it? Yea vpon confidence of what warrant do they vse at this day to distribute to the common people the Signe of the body of Christ, if they haue neither cōmaundement nor example of the Lord? Fifthly, did Paule lye, when he said to the Corinthians, that he had receiued of the Lord that which he had deliuered to them? For afterward he declareth the thing that he deliuered, that all without differēce should communicate of both the signes. If Paule receiued of the Lord, that all should be admitted without differēce: let them looke of whom they haue receiued which do driue away almost all the people of God: because they can not now pretend God to be the author of it, with whom there is not yea and nay. And yet still for clokinge of such abominations they dare pretende the name of the church, and with such pretence defende it. As though either these Antichristes were the church, which so easily treade vnderfoote, scatter abroad, & destroy the doctrine and institution of Christ: or the Apostolike Church were not the church, in which the whole force of religion flourished.

The xvij. Chapter.

Of the Popish Masse, by v which sacrilege the Supper of Christ hath not onely bin prophaned, but also brought to nought.

With these and like inuentions Satan hath trauailed, as by ouerspreadinge of darkenesse to obscure and defile the holy supper of Christ, y at least the purenesse of it should not be kept still in the church. But the head of horrible abomination was when he aduanced a Signe, by which it might not onely be darkened and peruerted, but beinge vterly blotted and abolished shoulde vanishe and fall out of the remembrance of men: namely namely when he blinded almost the whole world with a most pestilent error, that they should beleue that the Masse is a sacrifice and oblation to obtaine the forgiuenes of sinnes. Howe at the beginning the soulder sort of the scholemé toke this doctrine, I nothing regard: farewell they with their crabbed sutelties: which howsoever they may be defended with cauilling, yet are therefore to be refused of all good men because they do nothing els but spread much darknesse ouer the brightnesse of the Supper. Therefore bidding them farewell, let the readers vnderstande that I here match in fight with that opinion, wherewith the Romishe Antichrist and his Prophets haue infected the whole world, namely that the Masse is a worke whereby the sacrificing Priest which offreth vp Christ, and the other that do partake at the same oblation, do deserue the fauor of God: or that it is a cleansing sacrifice, whereby they reconcile God to themselues. Neither hath this bene receiued onely in common opinion of the people, but the very doing it selfe is so framed, that it is a kinde of pacifying wherewith satisfaction is made to God for the purging of the quicke and dead. The wordes also which they vse, do expresse the same: and no other thing may we gather of the daily vse of it. I knowe howe deepe rootes this pestilence hath taken, vnder howe great seming of goodnesse it lurketh, howe it beareth in shewe the name of Christ, howe in the one name of Masse many beleue that they comprehend the whole summe of faith. But when it shalbe by the word of God most clerely proued, that this Masse, howe much soeuer it be colored and glorious, yet shamefully dishonoreth Christ, burieth and oppresseth his crosse, putteth his death in forgetfulnesse, taketh away the frute that cometh therof vnto vs, doth weaken and destroy the Sacrament wherin was left the memorie of his death: shall there then be any so deepe rootes, which this most strong axe, I meane the worde of God, shall not cutt dowe and ouerthrowe? Is there any face so beautifull, that this light can not bewray the euell which lurketh vnder it?

2 Let vs therefore shewe that which hath bene set in the first place, that in it is intolerable blasphemie and dishonor done to Christ. For he was consecrate of his Father a Priest and Bishop, not for a time as we reade that they were ordeined in the olde testament, whoes life being mortall their priesthode also could not be immortall; for which cause also there needed successors that should from time to time be put in the place of them that died. But in place of Christ, which is immortall, there needeth no vicar to be set after him. Therefore he was ordeined of the Father a priest for euer, according to the order of

Melchisedech, that he shoulde execute an euerlasting priesthode.

Gen. 14. This misterie had bine long before figured in Melchisedech, whom
18. when the Scripture had ones brought in for the priest of the liuing God, it neuer afterwarde made mention of him, as though he had had no ende of his life. After this point of likenesse, Christ was called a priest according to his order. Nowe they that do daily sacrifice, must needes appoint priests to make the oblations, whom they must appoint as it were successors & vicars in the steede of Christ. By which putting in steede of him, they do not onely spoile Christ of his honor, and plucke from him the prerogatiue of eternall priesthode, but also trauaile to thrust him downe from the right hande of his Father, on which he can not sit immortall, but that he must therewithall re-maine the eternall priest. Neither let them lay for themselues, that their pety sacrificers are not put in place of Christ as if he were dead, but onely are helpers of his eternall priesthod, which ceaseth not therefore to continue. For they are more strongly holden fast with Hebr. 7. the wordes of the Apostle, than that they may so escape: namely, 13. that there were many other priests made, because they were by death letted to continue. Therefore there is but one that is not letted by death, and he needeth no cōpanions. Yet, such is their frowardnesse, they arme themselues with the example of Melchisedech to defend their wickednesse. For, because it is said that he offred bread & wine, they gather that he was a foreshewing of their Masse: as though the likenesse betweene him and Christ were in the offering of bread and wine. Which is so emptie and trifling that it needeth no cōfutation.
Melchisedech gaue bread and wine to Abraham and his companiōs, to refreshe them being weary after their iorney and battail. What is this to a sacrifice? Moses praiseth the gentlenesse of the holy king: these fellows vnseasonably coine a misterie whereof no mention is made:
Yet they deceitfully paint their error with an other color, because it followeth by and by after, And he was the priest of the hiest God.
I aunswere, that they wrongfully drawe to the bread and wine that Hebr. 7. which the Apostle referreth to the blessing. Therefore when he was
7. the priest of God he blessed Abraham. Wherupon the same Apostle (than whom we neede to seke no better expositor) gathereth his excellence, because the lesser is blessed of the greater. But if the oblation of Melchisedech were a figure of the sacrifice of the Masse, would the Apostle, I pray you, which searcheth out all euen the least things, haue forgotten so earnest & weightie a thing? Nowe (howe-soeuer they trifle) they shall in vaine go about to ouerthrowe the reason which the Apostle himselfe bringeth, that the right and honor of sacrifi-

sacrificing priesthode ceaseth among mortall men, because Christ which is immortall, is the onely and perpetuall sacrificing priest.

3 An other vertue of the Masse was, that it oppresseth and burrieth the crosse and passion of Christ. This verily is most certaine, ^{Hebr. 9.} that the crosse of Christ is ouerthrowen so sone as the altar is set vp. ^{12.} For if he offered himselfe for a sacrifice vpon the crosse, that he might sanctifie vs for euer, and purchase to vs eternall redemption: vndoubtedly the force and effectualnesse of that sacrifice continueth without any ende. Otherwise we should thinke nothing more honorably of Christ, than of oxen and calues which were sacrificed vnder the lawe: the offerings whereof are proued vneffectuall and weake by this that they were oft renewed. Wherfore either we must confesse, that the sacrifice of Christ, which he fulfilled vpon the crosse, wated the force of eternall cleansing, or that Christ hath made an ende of all with one sacrifice ones for euer. This is it that the Apostle saith, ^{Hebr. 9.} that this chiefe Bishop Christ ones appered by offering vp of himselfe ^{16. and} before the ending of the world, to the driuing away of sinne. ^{10. 10.} Againe, That we are sanctified by the will of God, by the offering of the body of Iesus Christ ones. Againe, That Christ with one oblation for euer hath made perfect them that are sanctified: wherunto he adioineth a notable sentece that forgeuennesse of sinnes being ones purchaced, there remaineth no more any oblation. This also Christ signified by his last saying and vttered among his last gaspings, when he said. It is ^{Ioh. 19.} ended. We are wont to nore the last sayings of men when they are ^{19.} dieng, for oracles. Christ dieng testifieth that by his one sacrifice is perfited & fulfilled whatsoeuer was for our saluatiō. Shall it be lawfull for vs daily to patch innumerable sacrifices to such a sacrifice, (the perfection whereof he hath so shiningly set forth) as though it were vnperfect? When the holy word of God not onely affirmeth, but also crieth out, and protesteth, that this sacrifice was ones fully done that the force thereof remaineth euerlasting: whoso require an other sacrifice, do they not accuse this of imperfection and weakenesse? But as for the Masse, which hath bene deliuered in such sort that there may euery day be made a hundred thousand sacrifices, to what ende tendeth it, but that the passion of Christ, whereby he offered him an onely sacrificed oblatiō to the Father, should ly buried and drowned? Who, vnlesse he be blinde, can not see that it was y boldnes of Satan which wraстled against so open and clere truth? Neither am I ignorant with what deceites that Father of lying vseth to color this his fraude, saying that there are not sondry nor diuerse sacrifices, but that one selfe same sacrifice is repeted. But such smokes are easily blowen.

away. For in the whole discourse the Apostle trauaileth to proue: not only that there are no other sacrifices, but that that one sacrifice was once offered vp, and shall no more be repeated. The sutteller men do yet slip our at a narrower hole, saying that it is not a repeating but an applying. But this Sophisticall argument also is no lesse easily confuted. For neither did Christ once offer: vp himselfe with this condition, that his sacrifice shoulde be daily confirmed with newe oblations: but that by the preaching of the Gospel, and ministring of the holy Supper, the frute thereof shoulde be communicated vnto vs.

7. So Paul saith that Christ our Passeouer was offered vp, and biddeth vs to eate of him. This (I say) is the meane whereby the Sacrifice of the Crosse is rightly applied to vs, when it is communicated to vs to take the vse of it, and we with true faith receiue it.

4 But it is worth the labour to heare, with what other foundation beside these they vpholde the sacrifice of the Masse. For they draw to this purpose the prophecy of Malachie, whereby the Lorde promisseth that the time shall come when throughout the whole world there shalbe offered to his name incense and a cleane sacrifice. As though it were a new or vnwonted thing among the Prophets, when they speake of the calling of the Gentils to expresse by the outward ceremony of the law the spiritual worshipping of God, to which they exhort thē: that they might the more familiarly declare to y men of their age, that the Gentils should be called into the true felowship of religion. Like as also they are wont altogether to describe by figures of their law, the truth that was deliuered by the Gospell. So they set

Esa. 19.
21. like vnto an other prophecy of Esay, where the Prophet foretelleth of three altars to be set vp in Assiria, Ægipt, & Iury. For first I aske, whether they do not graunt that the fulfilling of this prophecy is in the kingdome of Christ. Secondly, where be these altars, or when they were euer sette vp. Thirdly whether they thinke that to euery seuerall kingdome is appointed a seuerall temple, such as was that at Ierusalem. These thinges if they wey, I thinke they will confesse, that the Prophet vnder figures agreeable with his time, prophecieth of the spirituall worship of God to be spread abroad into the whole worlde. Which we giue to them for a solution. But of this thing sith there do euery where examples commonly offer themselues, I will not busie my selfe in longer rehearsall of them. Howbeit herein also

they are miserably deceiued, that they acknowledge no sacrifice but of the Masse, whereas in deede the faithfull do nowe sacrifice to the Lorde, & do offer a cleane offering, of which shalbe spoken by and by.

5 Nowe I come downe to the third office of the Masse, where I must declare howe it blotteth out the true and onely death of Christ, and shaketh it out of the remembrance of menne. For as among men the strength of a testament hangeth vppon the death of the testator: so also our Lorde hath with his death confirmed the testament whereby he hath geuen vs forgeuennesse of sinnes & eternall righteousnesse. They that dare varie or make newe any thing in this testament, do deny his death, and holde it as it were of no force. But what is the Masse, but a newe and altogether diuerse testament? For why? Doth not euery seuerall Masse promise newe forgeuennesse of sinnes, newe purchasing of righteousness: so that nowe there be so many testaments, as there be Masses? Let Christ therefore come again, and with an other death confirme this testament, or rather with infinite deathes confirme innumerable testaments of Masses. Haue I not therefore said true at the beginning, that the only and true death of Christ is blotted out by Masses? Yea what shall we say of this that the Masse directly tendeth to this ende, that if it be possible, Christ should be slaine againe? For where is a testament (sayeth the Apostle) ^{Heb. 9.} there of necessitie must be the death of the testator. The Masse sheweth it selfe to be a new testament of Christ: therefore it requireth his death. Moreouer the holste which is offred, must necessarily be slaine and sacrificed. If Christ in euery seuerall Masse be sacrificed, then he must at euery moment be in a thousand places cruelly slaine. This is not mine, but the Apostles argument, If he had needed to offer himselfe ofte, he must ofte haue died sins the beginning of the world. I knowe that they haue an aunswere in redinesse, whereby also they charge vs with sclāder. For they say that that is obiected against them which they neuer thought, nor yet canne. And we knowe, that the death & life of Christ is not in their hande. We loke not whether they go about to kill him: onely our purpose is to shewe, what maner of absurdity followeth of their vngodly and wicked doctrine. Which selfe thing I proue by the Apostles owne mouth. Though they crie out to the contrarie a hundred times, that this sacrifice is vnblōdy: I will deny that it hangeth vpon the will of men, that sacrifices should change their nature, for by this meane the holy and inuiolable ordinance of God should faile. Wherupon followeth that this is a sure principle of the Apostle, that there is required sheding of blood, that washing may not be wanting. ^{16.}

6 Nowe is the fourth office of the Masse to be entreated of, namely to take away from vs the fruit that came to vs of the death of Christ, while it maketh vs not to acknowledge it and thinke vpon it. For who can call to mind that he is redemed by \bar{y} death of Christ when he seeth a newe redemption in the Masse? Who can trust that sinnes are forgeuen him, when he seeth a newe forgeuenesse? Neither shall he escape that shall say, that we do for no other cause obtaine forgeuenesse of sinnes in the Masse, but because it is already purchased by the death of Christ. For he bringeth nothing els than as if he should bott, that Christ hath redemed vs with this condition that we should redeme our selues. For such doctrine hath bene spred by the ministers of Satan, and such at this day they mainteine with cryings out, with sward and fier, that we when in the Masse we offer vp Christ to his Father, by this worke of offering do obtaine forgeuenesse of sinnes, and are made partakers of the passiō of Christ. What nowe remaineth to the passion of Christ, but to be an example of redemptiō, whereby we may learne to be our owne redemers? Christ himselfe, when in the Supper he sealeth the confidence of pardon, doth not bid his disciples to sticke in that doinge, but sendeth them away to the sacrifice of his death: signifying that the Supper is a moniment or memoriall (as the common spech is) whereby they may learne that the satisfactorie clesing sacrifice, by which the Father was to be appeased, must haue bene offred but ones. For neither is it enough to know that Christ is the onely sacrifice, vnlesse the onely sacrificing be ioined with it, that our faith may be fastened to his crosse.

7 Nowe I come to the conclusion, namely that the holy Supper, in which the Lorde had left the remembrance of his passion grauen and expressed, is by the setting vp of the Masse, taken away, defaced, and destroyed. For the Supper it selfe is the gift of God, which was to be receiued with thankesgeuing. The sacrifice of the Masse is famed to pay a price to God, which he may receiue for satisfaction. Howe much difference there is betweene to geue and to receiue, so much doth the sacrifice differ from the Sacramēt of the Supper. And this truely is the most wretched vnthankfulnesse of man, that where the largesse of Gods bountie ought to haue bene acknowledged, and thanks to be geuen, therein he maketh God his dettor. The Sacrament promised, that by the death of Christ we are not onely ones restored into life, but are continually quickned, because then all the partes of our saluation were fulfilled. The sacrifice of the Masse singeth a farre other song, that Christ must be daily sacrificed, that he may somewhat profit vs. The Supper should haue bene distributed in the common assemblie of the Church, that it might enforme vs of the communion whereby we all cleaue together in Christ Iesus. The sacrifice of the Masse dissolueth and plucketh in sonder this communitie. For after that the error grewe in force, that there must be sacrificers that should sacrifice for the people, the Supper of the Lorde as though it were posted ouer to them, cessed to be communicated to the congregation of the faithfull according to the commaundement of the Lorde. An entrie was made open to priuate Masses, which might rather resemble a certaine excommunication, than that same communitie ordeined of the Lorde, when the pety sacrificer willing seuerally by him selfe to deuoure his sacrifice, doth seuer himselfe frō the whole people of the faithfull. I call priuate Masse (least any man be deceiued) wheresoeuer there is no partaking of the Lordes Supper among the faithfull, although otherwise a great multitude of men be present.

8 And whense the very name of Masse first sprong, I could neuer certainly iudge: sauing that it seemeth to me likely that it was taken of the offrings that were geuen. Whereupon the olde writers vse it commonly in the plurall number. But, to leaue struing about the name, I say that priuate Masses are directly against the ordinance of Christ, and therefore they are a wicked prophaning of the holy Supper. For what hath the Lord commaunded vs? not to take, and diuide it among vs? What maner of obseruing of the commaundement doth Paul teach? not the breaking of bread, which is the cōmunion of the body and blood? Therefore when one taketh it without distributing, what likenesse is there? But that same one man doth it in the name of the whole Church. By what commaundement? Is not this openly to mocke God, when one man priuatly taketh to him selfe that which ought not to haue bene done but amōg many? But because the words of Christ and Paule are plaine enough, we may brefely cōclude, that whersoeuer is not breaking of bread to the cōmunion of the faithful, there is not the Supper of the Lord, but a false and wrongful counterfaiting of the Supper. But a false counterfaiting is a corrupting. Nowe the corrupting of so great a misterie is not without wickednesse. Therefore in priuate Masses is a wicked abuse. And (as one fault in religion from time to time bredeth an other) after that that maner of offering without cōmunion was ones crept in, by litle and litle they beganne in euery corner of Churches to make innumerable Masses, and diuersly to drawe the people hether and thether, which should haue come together into one assembly, y they might reknowledge the misterie of their owne vnitie. Nowe let them go and deny it to be ydolatrie, that in their Masses they shewe forth bread to be worshipped in steede of Christ. For in vaine they boast of those promises of the presence of Christ; which howsoever they be vnderstode, verily were not geuen to this purpose, that wicked and prophane men, so oft as they will, and to whatsoeuer abuse they list, may make the body of Christ: but that the faithfull, when with religious obseruation they do in Celebrating of the Supper followe the commaundement of Christ, may enjoy the true partaking of him.

9 Beside that, this peruersnes was vnknowen to y purer Church. For howsoever the more shamelesse sort among our aduersaries do here go about to diguise the matter with false colors, yet it is most sure that all antiquitie is against them, as we haue afore proued in other things, and it may more certainly be iudged by the continuall reding of olde writers. But ere I make an ende of speakinge of it, I aske our Massing doctors, sith they knowe that obedience is more esteemed of God than oblations, and that he more requireth that his voice be harkened to, than that sacrifices be offred: howe they beleue that this maner of sacrificing is acceptable to God, whereof they haue no certaine commaundement, and which they see not to be allowed by any one sillable of the Scripture. Moreouer when they heare the Apostle say, that no man taketh to himselfe the name and honor of sacrificing priesthode, but he that is called as Aaron was: yea & that Christ himselfe did not thrust in himselfe, but obeted the calling of his Father: either they must bring forth God the author and ordeiner of their sacrificing priesthode, or they must cōfesse that the honor is not of God, into which they haue with wicked rashnes broken in vncalled. But they can not shewe one titie of a letter that mainteineth their sacrificing priesthod. Why therefore shall not their sacrifices vanish away, which can not be offred without a priest?

10 If any man do thrust in short sentences of the olde writers gathered here and there, and do by their authoritie trauaill to proue that the sacrifice which is done in the Supper is farre otherwise to be vnderstanded than we do expounde it: let him be bressly aunswered thus: if the question be of allowing the forged deuise of sacrifice, such as the Papistes haue fained in the Masse, the olde writers do neuer speake in defense of such sacrilege. They do in deede vse the word Sacrifice: but therewithall they expounde, that they meane nothing els but the remembrance of that true and onely sacrifice, which Christ our onely sacrificing priest (as they eche where report of him) made on the crosse. The Hebrues (sayeth Augustine) in the sacrificisacrifices of beastes which they offered to God, did celebrate a prophetic of the sacrifice to come, which Christ offered: the Christians do with the holy oblation and partaking of the body of Christ celebrate a remembrance of the sacrifice already made. Here verily he teacheth altogether the same thing, which is writtē in moe words in the booke of faith to Peter the Deacon, whosoever be the author: of it. The words be these, Beleeve most steadfastly and dout not at all, that the onely begotten himselfe, being made fleshe for vs, offered himselfe for vs a sacrifice and oblation to God into a sauer of swetenesse: to whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost in the time of the olde testament beastes were sacrificed: and to whom nowe with the Father and the Holy Ghost (with whom he hath one Godhed) the holy Church throughout y whole world cesselth not to offer the sacrifice of bred and wine. For in those fleshy sacrifices was a figuring of the fleshe of Christ which he should offer for our sinnes, and of his blood which he should shed to the forgeuenes of sinnes. But in this sacrifice is thankesgeuing and rehearsall of the fleshe of Christ which he offered for vs, and of his blood which the same he hath shed for vs. Whereupon Augustine himselfe in many places expoundeth it to be nothing els but a sacrifice of praise. Finally you shall cōmonly finde in him, that the Supper of the Lorde is for no other reason called a sacrifice, but because it is the remembrāce, image, and witnesse of that singular, true, and onely sacrifice wherewith Christ hath cleansed vs. Also there is a notable place in his fourth booke of the Trinitie the xxiiij. Chapter, where after that he hath discoursed of the onely sacrifice, he thus concludeth: because in a sacrifice fower things are cōsidered, to whom it is offered, & of whom, what is offered, & for whom. The same he himselfe the one and true mediator reconciling vs to God by the sacrifice of peace, remaineth one with him to whom he offered: maketh them one in him for whom he offered: is one himselfe which offered, and the thing which he offered. To the same effect also speaketh Chrysostome. But they so chalenge the honor of sacrificing priesthode to Christ, that Augustine testifieth it to be y voice of Antichrist if any man make a Bishop intercessor betwene God and men.

II Yet do we not deny but that the offering vp of Christ is there so shewed in vs, that the spectacle of the crosse is in a maner set before our eyes: as y Apostle saith that Christ was crucified in the eyes of the Galathians, when the preaching of the crosse was set before them. But forasmuch as I se that those olde Fathers also wrested this remembrance an other way than was agreeable with the institution of the Lorde (because their Supper contained I wote not what repeted or at least renewed forme of sacrificing) the safest way for godly hartes shalbe to rest in the pure and simple ordinance of God: whoes also the Supper is therfore called, because in it his authority alone ought to be in force. Truely sith I finde that they haue kepte a godly & true sense of this whole misterie, and I do not perceiue that they meante to abate any thing were it neuer so litle from the only sacrifice of the Lord, I can not cōdemne them of vngodlinesse: yet I thinke that they can not be excused, but that they haue offended somewhat in y^e maner of the celebration. For they counterfaieted the Iewishe maner of sacrificing more nerely than either Christ had ordeined, or the nature of the Gospell did beare. Therefore that same ouerthwart appliance to heauenly things is the onely thing wherein a man may worthily blame them, for that being not cōtented with the simple and naturall institution of Christ, they swarued to the shadowes of the lawe.

12 If a man do diligently wey, that this difference is put by the word of the Lorde betwene the sacrifices of Moses, and our Thankesgeuing, that whereas those did represent to the Iewishe people, the same effectualnesse of the death of Christ, which is at this day deliuered to vs in the Supper, yet the maner of representinge was diuerse. For in those, y^e Leuiticall Priests were cōmaunded to figure that which Christ should performe: there was brought a sacrifice which should be in the steede of Christ himself: there was an altar wherupō it should be offred: Finally all things were so done, that there was set before their eyes an image of the sacrifice which was to be offred to God for a satisfactorie cleansing. But sūns the time that the sacrifice is ended, the Lorde hath apointed to vs an other order: namely that it should cōuey to the faithfull people the frute of the sacrifice offred to him by the Sonne. Therefore he hath geuen vs a table whereat we should eate, not an altar wherupon sacrifice should be offred: he hath not cōsecrated priests to sacrifice, but ministers to distribute the holy banquet. Howe much more hy and holy the misterie is, so much more religiously and with greater reuerēce it is mete to be handled. Therefore there is no way safer, than putting away all boldnesse of mā's vnderstanding, to sticke fast in that alone which the Scripture teacheth. And truely if we cōsider that it is y^e Supper of the Lotd & not of men, there is no cause why we should suffer our selues to be remoued one heare bredth frō it by any authority of men or prescription of yerēs. Therefore when y^e Apostle minded to cleanse it from all faultes which had already crept into the church of the Corinthiās, he vseth the rediest way therunto, that is, he calleth it backe to the only institution of it, from whence he sheweth y^e a perpetuall rule ought to be fetched.

13 Nowe least any wrangler should stirre vs vp strife by reason of the names of sacrifice and sacrificing priest, I will also declare, but yet bresely, what in the whole discourle I haue meant by a sacrifice, and what by a Sacrificing priest. Whoso stretche the word sacrifice to all holy Ceremonies and doings of religion, I se not by what reason they do it. We do knowe that by the continuall vse of the Scripture a sacrifice is called that which the Grekes call sometime Thusia, sometime Prosphora, sometime Telete. Which being generally taken comprehendeth whatsoeuer is in any wise offered to God. Wherefore we must make distinction: but yet so that this distinction may haue a supernall appliance of similitude from the sacrifices of the lawe of Moses: vnder the shadowes whereof the Lorde willed to represent to his people the whole truth of sacrifices. Of those although there were diuerse formes, yet they may all be referred to two sortes. For either there was oblation made for sinne after a certaine maner of satisfaction, whereby guiltinesse was redemed before God: or it was a signe of the worshipping of God, and a testifying of religiõ: sometime in steede of supplication, to craue the fauor of God: sometime in steede of thankesgeuing, to testifie thankfulness of minde for benefites receiued: sometime onely for an exercise of godlinesse, to renewe the stablishinge of the couenant: to which latter sort pertained burnt offrings, drinke offrings, oblatiõs, first frutes, and peace offrings. Wherefore let vs also diuide ours into two kindes: and for teachinges sake let vs call the one the sacrifice of worship and of godly deuotion, because it consisteth in the honoring and worshipping of God, which the faithfull both owe and yelde vnto him: or, if you will, the sacrifice of Thankesgeuing: forasmuch as it is geuen to God of none but of them the being laden with immeasurable benefites, do render to him themselues with all their doinges. The other may be called propitiatorie or of expiation. The sacrifice of expiation is that which tenderth to appease the wrath of God, to satisfie his iudgement, and so to wash and wipe away sinnes: whereby the sinner cleansed from the filthy spottes of them and restored into puritie of righteousness, may returne into fauor with God himselfe. So in the lawe those were called sacrifices that were offered for the purging of sinnes: not for that they were sufficient to recouer the fauor of God, or to put away iniquitie: but for that they shadowed out such a true sacrifice which at length was fully done by Christ alone: & by him alone, because it could be done by none other: and ones, because the effectualnesse and force of that one sacrifice which Christ hath fully done, is eternall, as he himself hath testified with his own mouth, whẽ he said ȳ it was ended & fulfilled: that is to say, that whatsoever was necessarie to the reconciling of the Fathers fauor, to the obtaining of the forgeueneffe of finnes, to righteousnesse and to saluation, all the same was performed and fulfilled with that his onely oblatiō, and there so nothing wanted thereof, that there was afterward no place left to any other sacrifice.

14 Wherefore I determine, that it is a most wicked reproch, and blasphemy not to be suffered, as well against Christ as against the sacrifice which he hath fully done by his death vpon the crosse for vs, if any man by renewinge an oblation thinke to purchase the pardon of finnes, to appease God, and to obtaine righteousnesse. But what is els done by Maisting, but that by deseruing of newe oblation we may be made partakers of the passion of Christ? And, that there might be no measure of madding, they thought it but a smal thing to say that there is made indifferently a cōmon sacrifice for the whole Church, vnlesse they further said that it is in their choise to apply it peculiarly to this man or that man to whom they would, or rather to euey one whosocuer he were that would buy for himselfe such ware with redy money. Nowe because they could not reache to the price that Iudas had, yet that they might in some marke resemble their author, they kepte the likenesse of number. Iudas solde him for thirty siluer pens: these feilowes sell him, after the French accompt, for xxx. brasen pens: but Iudas solde him ones, these feilowes sell him as oft as they can finde a bier. In this sence also we deny that they be sacrificing prielts, that is to say, they that with such an oblation are meanes to God for the people, they that appeasing God, may purchase the satisfactorie purging of finnes. For Christ is the onely Bishop and sacrificing priest of the newe Testamēt, into whom all Priesthodes are removed, and in whome they be shut vp and ended. And if the Scripture had made no mention of the eternall Priesthode of Christ: yet forasmuch as God, sins that he hath taken away those olde Priesthodes, hath ordeined none, the Apostles argument remaineth inuincible, that no man taketh honor to himselfe but he that is called of God. By what affiance therefore dare these robbers of God, that boast themselves for the butchers of Christ, call themselves the sacrificing Priests of the liuing God?

15 Plato hath an excellent place in his seconde boke of Cōmon weale. Where when he entreateth of the olde maners of expiation, and laugheth to scorne the foolish confidence of euill men & wicked doers, which thought that their wicked doings were by these as by coveringes hidden that the gods could not se them, and did, as if they had gotten warrant of the gods by couenant, more carelesly folowe their owne lustes : he seemeth throughly to touche the maner of satisfactorie purging of the Masse , such as is at this day in the world. To beguile and vndermine an other man, all men knowe to be vn-lawfull. To greue widowes with wrongful dealings, to robbe the fatherlesse, to troble the poore , by euill crafty meanes to catch other mens goods to themselues , with forswerings and deceites to enter forceably into any mans possessions , to oppresse any man with violence and tyrannous feare, all men cōfesse to be wicked. Howe therefore dare so many commonly do all these thinges , as though they should freely be bolde to do them? Truely , if we rightly wey it, no other cause doth so much encourage them , but because they haue confidence, that by the sacrifice of a Masse, as by paiment of full price for recompense , they shall satisfie God , or at the least that this is an easy way to compoude with him. Then Plato procedeth further to scorne their grosse blockishnesse, which thinke that by such satisfactorie cleansings those peines are redemed that otherwise they should suffer in hell. And wherto serue at this day the yerely obites, and the greater part of Masses , but that they which throughout all their life haue bene most cruell tyrantes, or most rauenous robbers, or geue foorth to all mischeuous doings, should as though they were redemed by this price, escape the fier of purgatorie?

16 Vnder the other kinde of sacrifice, which we haue called the sacrifice of Thankesgeuing, are contained all the dutiefull workes of charitie, which when we extēde to our brethren, we honor the Lord himselfe in his members: then, all our prayers, praisinges, geuinges of thanks, and whatsoever we do to the worshipping of God. All which things finally do hang vpon the greater sacrifice , whereby we are in soule & body hallowed to be a holy temple to the Lord. For neither is it enough, if our outward doings be applied to the obeying of him: but first our selues , and then all that is ours ought to be consecrate and dedicate to him: that whatsoever is in vs, may serue his glory, and may saūor of zelous endeuor to aduance it. This kinde of sacrifice tendeth nothing at all to appease the wrath of God, nothing at all to obteine forgeuennesse of sinnes, nothing at all to deserue righteoussnesse: but is occupied onely in magnifying and extolling of God. For it can not be pleasant and acceptable to God , but at their handes, whom by forgeuennesse of sinnes already recciued he hath by other meanes reconciled to himselfe , and therefore acquitted them from guiltinesse. But it is so necessary for the Church, that it can not be away from it. Therefore it shalbe euerlasting, so long as the people of God shall cōtinue, as we haue before already shewed out of the Prophet:

for in that meaning I will take this prophetic, For from the rising of the sunne to the going downe thereof, great is my name among the Gentiles, and in euery place incense shalbe offred to my name, and a cleane offering: because my name is terrible among the Gētiles, saith the Lorde: to farre is it of, that we would put it away. So Paul biddeth vs to offer our bodies, a sacrifice liuing, holy, acceptable to God, a reasonable worship. Where he spake very pithily, when he added that this is our reasonable worshipping: for he meant the spirituall maner of worshipping of God, which he did secretely set in comparison against the carnall sacrifices of the lawe of Moses. So liberall doing of good and communicating are called sacrifices by which God is pleased. So the liberalitie of the Philippians, whereby they had releued the pouertie of Paule, is called a sacrifice of swete smelling. So all the good workes of the faithfull are called spirituall sacrifices.

17 And why do I seke out many examples? For commonly this maner of speaking is often founde in the Scriptures. Yea and while the people of God was yet holden vnder the outward schooling of the law, yet the Prophets did sufficiently expresse, that vnder those carnall sacrifices was the truth, which the Christian Church hath common with the nation of the Iewes. After which maner Dauid prayed, that his prayer might as incense ascēde into the sight of God. And Osee called geuings of thanks, the calues of lippes, which in an other place Dauid calleth the sacrifices of praise. Whom the Apostle himselfe following, calleth them also the sacrifices of praise, and expoundeth them the frutes of lippes confessing to his name. This kinde of sacrifice the Supper of the Lord can not want: wherein when we declare his death and render thanksgeuing, we do nothing but offer the sacrifice of praise. Of this office of sacrificing, all we Christians are called a kingly Priesthode: because by Christ we offer to God that sacrifice of praise of which the Apostle speaketh, the frute of lippes that confesse to his name. For neither do we with our giftes appeare in the sight of God without an intercessor. Christ is he, which being the mediator cōming betwene, we offer vs and ours to the Father. He is our Bishop, which being entred into the sanctuary of heaven, hath opened the entry to vs. He is the altar, vpon which we lay our giftes, that in him we may be bolde all that we are bolde. It is he (I say) that hath made vs a kingdom and Priests to the Father.

18 What remaineth, but that the blinde may se, the desse may heare, children themselues may vnderstāde this abomination of the Masse? which being offred in a golden cup, hath made dronke the kings kings and peoples of the earth, from the hiest to the lowest, hath so striken them with drowfinesse and giddinesse, that being become more senselesse than brute beastes, they haue set the whole ship of their safetie onely in this deadly deuouring gulf. Truely Satan neuer did bende himselfe with a stronger engine than this to assaile and vanquish the kingdome of Christ. This is the Helene, for whom the enemies of the trueth fight at this day with so great rage, so great furiousnesse, so great crueltie: & a Helene in deede, with whom they so defile themselues with spiritual whordome, which is the most cursed of all. I do not here so much as ones touch with my litle finger those grosse abuses, wherwith they might color the vnholly purenesse of their holy Masse: howe filthy markettings they vse, howe vn honest gaines they make with their massinges, with howe great rauening they fill their couetousnesse. Onely I do point vnto, and that with fewe and plaine wordes, what maner of thing is euen the very holiest holinesse of the Masse, for which it hath deserued in certain ages past to be so honorable and to be had in so great reuerence. For, to haue these so great misteries set out according to their worthinesse, requirerh a greater worke: and I am vnwilling to mingle herewith those filthy vncleanneses that cōmonly shewe themselues before the eyes & faces of all men: ȳ all men may vnderstand, that the Masse taken in her most piked purenesse, and wherewith it may be set out to the best shewe, without her appendāces, from the roote to the topp swarmeth full of all kinde of wickednesse, blasphemie, idolatrie, and sacrilege.

19 The Readers now haue in a maner almost all those things gathered into an abridgement, which we haue thought behouefull to be known concerning these two Sacramēts: the vse of which hath bene deliuered to the Christian Church from the beginning of the newe testament, to continue to the very ende of the world: namely, that Baptisme should be as it were a certain entry into it, & an admission into faith: & the Supper should be as it were a continual foode, wherewith Christ spiritually fedeth the familie of his faithfull. Wherfore as there is but one God, one faith, one Christ, one Church his body: so there is but one Baptisme, and is not ofte ministred againe. But the Supper is frō time to time distributed, that they which haue bene ones receiued into the Church, may vnderstand that they be continually fed with Christ. Beside these two as there is no other Sacramēt ordeined of God, so neither ought the Church of the faithful to acknowledge any other. For, that it is not a thing that lieth in the choise of man, to raise & set vp newe Sacramēts, he shall easily vnderstand ȳ remēbreth that which hath bene here before plainly enough declared, that is, that Sacraments are appointed of God to this ende, that they should instruct vs of some promise of his, and testifie to vs his good will towarde vs: and he also that calleth to minde, that none hath bene Gods counsellor, that might promise vs any certaintie of his will, or assure vs & bring vs out of care, what affection he beareth toward vs, what he will geue, or what he will deny vs. For therewith is also determined, that no man can set fourth a signe to be a testimonie of any will or promise of his: it is he himself alone, that can by a signe geuen testifie to vs of himselfe. I will speake it more brefely, and peradventure more grossly, but more plainly, A Sacrament can neuer be without promise of saluation. All men gathered on a heape together can of themselues promise nothing of our saluatiō. Therefore neither can they of themselues set fourth or set vp a Sacrament.

20 Therefore let the Christian Church be contented with these two, and let her not onely not admitt or acknowledge any third for the present time, but also not desire or loke for any to the ende of the world. For whereas certaine diuerse Sacraments, beside those their ordinarie ones, were geuen to the Iewes, according to the diuerse course of times, as Manna, Water springing out of the rocke, the Brasen serpent and such other: they were by this change put in minde that they should not stay vpon such figures, whoes state was not very steadfast: but that they should loke for some better thing from God, which should continue without any decaying, and without any ende. But we are in a farre other case, to whom Christ is openly shewed: in whom all the treasures of knowledge and wisdom are hidden with so great abundance and plentie, that either to hope for or loke for any newe encrease to these treasures, is verily to moue God to wrath, & to prouoke him against vs. We must hunger for, seke, loke vpon, learne, and throughly learne Christ alone, vntill that great day shall appeare, wherein the Lord shall openly shewe to the full the glory of his kingdome, & himselfe such as he is, to be beholden of vs.

And for this reason this our age is in the Scriptures signified by the last houre, the last dayes, the last times, that no man should deceiue himselfe with vaine loking for any newe doctrine or reuelation. For many times and in many sortes he spake before by his Prophetes: in these last dayes the heauenly Father hath spoken in his beloued Sonne, which only can manifestly shewe the Father: and in deede he hath manifestly shewed him to the full, so much as behoueth vs, while we nowe beholde him by a glasse. As therefore this is nowe taken away from men, that they can not make newe Sacramentes in the Church of God: so it were to be wished, that as litle as were possible of mans inuention might be mingled with those Sacramentes that are of God. For like as when water is poured in, the wine departeth and is delaied: and as with leauen scattered amonge it, the whole lumpe of doae waxeth sower: so the purenesse of the mysteries of God is nothing else but defiled when man addeth any thing of his owne. And yet we see how farre the Sacramentes are swarued out of kinde from their naturall purenesse, as they be handled at this day. There is echwhere too much of pompes, ceremonies, and gesturings: but of the worde of God in the meane time there is neither any consideration nor mention, without which euen the Sacramentes themselues are not Sacramentes. Yea and the very ceremonies that are ordayned of God, in so great a rout can not once lift vp their head, but lye as it were oppressed. Howe litle is that seene in Baptisme, which onely ought there to haue shined and bin looked vpon, as we haue in an o-ther place rightfully complained, euen Baptisme it selfe? As for the Supper, it is vtterly buried, since that it hath bin turned into y^e Masse, saminge that it is seene once euery yeare but in a manged and halfe torne fashion.

The xix. Chapter.

Of the fise falsely named Sacramentes: vvhert is declared, that the other fise vvhich haue bin hitherto commonly taken for Sacramentes, are not Sacramentes: and then is shewved vvhats maner of thinges they be.

OVr former discourse concerninge Sacramentes might haue obtained this with the sober and willing to learne, that they should not ouer curiously procede any further, nor shoulde without the word of God embrace any o:her Sacramentes beside those two which they knew to be ordained of the Lorde. But forasmuch as that opinion of the seuen Sacraments, being commonly vsed in all mens talke, hauinge wandered through all schooles and preachings, hath by very auncienty gathered rootes, and is yet still settled in the mindes of mē: I thought that I should do a thing worth the trauell, if I shoulde seuerally and more neerely search those other fise that are commonly adnubred amonge the true and naturall Sacramentes of the Lord, and wiping away all deceitfull colour, shoulde set the forth to be seene of the simple such as they be, & how falsely they haue bin hitherto taken for Sacramentes. First, I here protest to all the godly, that I do not take in hande this contention about the name for any desire of striuing, but that I am by weighty causes led to fight against the abuse of it. I am not ignorant that Christians are Lords; as of words, so of all things also, & therefore may at their wil apply words to thinges, so that a godly sense be kept, although there be some vnpropernesse in the speaking. All this I graunt: although it were better that the wordes should be made subiect to thinges, than thinges to the words. But in the name of Sacrament there is an other consideration. For they which make seuen Sacraments, do therewithall giue to them all this definition, that they be visible formes of inuisible grace: they make them altogether vessells of the holy Ghost: instrumentes of giuing of righteousnesse, causes of the obtaininge of grace. Yea and the Maister of the sentences himselfe denieth that the Sacramentes of the lawe of Moses are properly called by this name, because they did not deliuer in dede the thing that they figured. Is it, I beseech you, to be suffered, that those signes which the Lorde hath hallowed with his owne mouth, which he hath garnished with excellent promises, should not be accompted for Sacramentes: and in the meane time this honor shold be coueied away to those vsages which mé either haue deuised of themselves, or at least do obserue without expresse commaundement of God? Therefore either let them change the definition, or let them abstaine from the wrongfull vsinge of this word, which doth afterward engender false opinions & full of absurdity. Extreme anointinge (say they) is a figure and cause of inuisible grace, because it is a Sacrament. If we ought in no wise to graunt that which they gather vpon it, then truely we must resist thē in the name it selfe, least therby we admit that it may giue occasion to such an error. Againe when they would proue it to be a Sacrament, they adde this cause, for that it consisteth of the outward signe and the word. If we finde neither commaundement nor promise of it, what can we do else but crie out against them?

2 Now appeareth that we brawle not about ſ̄ word, but do moue a controuersie not superfluous cōcerning the thing it selfe. Therefore this we must strongly hold fast, which we haue with inuincible reson before confirmed, that the power to institute a Sacrament is in the hande of none but of God only. For a Sacrament ought with a certaine promise to raise vp and comfort the consciences of the faithfull: which could neuer receiue this certainty from man. A Sacramēt ought to be to vs a witnessinge of the good will of God towarde vs, whereof none of all men or Angels can be witnes, forasmuch as none hath bin of Gods counsell. Therefore it is he alone which doth with right authority testifie of himselfe to vs by his word. A Sacrament is a seale, wherewith the testament or promise of God is sealed. But it could not be sealed with bodily thinges & elementes of this world, vnlesse vnlesse they be by the power of God framed and appointed there-unto. Therefore man can not ordaine a Sacrament, because this is not in the power of manne, to make that so great mysteries of God should lye hidden vnder so base thinges. The word of God must go before, which may make a Sacrament to be a Sacrament, as Augustine very well teacheth: Moreouer it is profitable that there be kept some difference betwene the Sacramentes and other ceremonies, vnlesse we will fall into many absurdities. The Apostles prayed kneeling: therefore men shall not kneele without a Sacrament. It is sayd that the disciples praied toward the East: therefore the lookinge into the East shalbe a Sacrament. Paule willeth men in euery place to lift vppe pure handes, & it is rehearsed that holy men oftentimes prayed with their handes lifted vp: then let the lifting vp of handes also be made a Sacrament. Finally let all the gestures of the holy ones turne into Sacramentes. Howebeit I woulde not also much passe vppon these thinges, if so that they were not ioyned with those other greater dis-commodities.

3 If they will presse vs with the authority of the old Church, I say that they pretend a false colour. For this number of seuen is no where founde among the Ecclesiasticall writers: neither is it certaine at what time it first crept in. I graunt in dede that sometime they be very free in vsing the name of a sacrament: but what meane they thereby? euen all ceremonies and outward rites, and all exercises of godlinesse. But when they speake of those signes, that ought to be witnesses of the grace of God toward vs, they are contented with these two, Baptisme, and the Supper. Least any man shoulde thinke that I falsely boast of this, I will here rehearse a few testimonies of Augustine. To Ianuarius he sayth: First I would haue thee to hold fast that which is the chiefe point of this disputation, that our Lord Christ (as he himselfe sayth in the Gospell) hath made vs subiect to a light yoke and a light burden.
 Wherefore he hath bound together the felowship of the new people with Sacramentes very fewe in number, very easie in obseruinge, very excellent in signification. As are Baptisme hallowed in the name of the Trinity, and the Communicating of the body and blood of the Lord, and whatsoever else is sette foorth in the Canonickall Scriptures. Againe, in his booke of Christian doctrine, Since the Lordes resurrection, the Lorde himselfe and the doctrine of the Apostles hath de-liuered certaine few signes in steede of many, and those most easie to be done, most reuerende in vnderstandinge, most pure in obseruinge: as is Baptisme, and the Celebratinge of the body and blood of the Lord, Why doth he here make no mention of the holy number, that is, of the number of seuen? Is it likely that he would haue passed it ouer, if it had bin at that time ordained in the Church, specially sith he is otherwise in obseruinge of numbres more curious than neede were? Yea, when he nameth Baptisme and the Supper, and speaketh nothings of the rest: doth he not sufficiently signifie, that these two mysteries do excell in singular dignity, & that the other ceremonies do rest beneth in a lower degree? Wherefore I say that these Sacramentarie Doctors are destitute not onely of the worde of the Lord, but also of the consent of the olde Church, howe much soeuer they glory of this pretence. But nowe lette vs come downe to the speciall things themselues.

Of Confirmation.

4 This was the maner in olde time, that the children of Christians, when they were growen to age of discretion, should be brought before the Bishop: that they shoulde fulfil that duety which was required of those that being growen in yeares did offer themselues to Baptisme, For these sate amonge those that were to be catechised, till beinge fully instructed in the mysteries of the faith, they coulde make a confession of their faith before the Bishop and the people. Therefore they that were baptised beinge infantes, because they had not then made confession of their faith before the Church, were about the end of their childhoode or in the beginning of their yeres of discretion presented againe by their parentes, and were examined of the Bishop according to the forme of the Catechisme, which they had then certaine and common. And that this doing, which otherwise ought worthily to be graue and holy, might haue the more reuerence and dignity, there was added also the Ceremony of laying on of handes. So that same childe, his faith beinge allowed, was let go with solemne blessing. The olde wryters do oft make mention of this maner. Leo the Pope wryteth: If any returne from heretikes, let him not be baptised againe: but (which he wanted amonge the Heretikes) let the vertue of the Spirite be giuen him by the Bishops laying on of his handes. Here our aduersaries will crie out, that it is rightfully called a Sacrament, in which the holy Ghost is giuen, but Leo himselve doth in an other place declare what he meaneth by those words: Who so (saith he) is baptised amonge heretikes, let him not be rebaptised, but with calling vpon the holy Ghost, let him be confirmed with laying on of handes: because he receiued only the forme of baptisme without sanctifying. Hierom also maketh mention of it, wryting against the Luciferiās. But although I do not deny that Hierom somewhat erreth therein, for that he sayth that it is an obseruation of the Apostles;

Apostles;

Apostles: yet he is most farre from these mens follies. And the very same also he qualifieth, when he addeth, that this blessing is giuen to the bishops onely, rather in honor of their priesthoode than by the necessity of law. Therefore such laying on of handes, which is done simply in stede of blessing, I praise and would that it were at this day restored to the pure vse thereof.

5 But the later age hauinge in a maner blotted out the thinge it selfe, hath set I wote not what fained confirmation for a Sacrament of God. They haue fained that the vertue of Cōfirmation is, to giue the holy Ghost to the encrease of Grace, which in baptisme was giuen to innocency: to strengthen them to battaile, which in baptisme were new begotten to life. This Confirmation is celebrate with anointinge, and with this forme of words, I signe thee with the signe of the holy crosse, and confirme thee with the chresme of saluation, in the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost. All this is gaiely and trimly done. But where is the word of God, that may promise here the presence of the holy Ghost? They can not bringe foorth one title. Whereby then will they certifie vs that their chresme is the vessel of the holy Ghost? We see oyle, that is, a thicke and fat liquor and nothing else. Let the word (saith Augustine) be added to the element, and there shalbe made a Sacrament. Let them (I say) bringe foorth this word, if they will haue vs in the oyle to looke vpo any thing but the oyle. If they did acknowledge themselues ministers of the Sacramentes, as they ought, we needed to striue no longer. This is the first law of a minister, that he do nothing without commaundement. Go to, let them bring forth any commaundement of this point of ministry, & I will not speake one word more. If they haue no commaundement, they can not excuse their boldnesse full of sacrilege. After this maner the Lorde asked the Pharisees, whether Mat. 12 the Baptisme of Iohn were from heauen or from men: if they had 25. answered, from men, thē he had made them confesse that it was triflinge and vaine: if from heauen, then were they compelled to acknowledge the doctrine of Iohn. Therefore least they shoulde too much sclaunder Iohn, they durst not confesse that it was from men. If therefore Confirmation be from men, it is proued to be vaine and triflinge: if they will perswade vs that it is from heauen, lette them proue it.

6 They do in deede defende themselues with the example of the Apostles, whom they thinke to haue done nothinge rashly. That is well in deede: neither would we blame them, if they shewed themselves followers of the Apostles. But what did the Apostles? Luke re- Act 8.

porteth in the Actes, that the Apostles which were at Hierusalem, when they heard that Samaria had receiued the worde of God, sent thither Peter and Iohn: they prayed for the Samaritans, that they might receiue the holy Ghost, which was not yet come into any of them, but they were baptised onely in the name of Iesus: when they had praied, they laid their hands vpon them: by which laying on, the Samaritans receiued the holy Ghost. And of this laying on of hands he diuerse times maketh mention. I heare what the Apostles did: that is, they faithfully executed their ministry. The Lord willed that those visible and wonderfull graces of the holy Ghost, which he then poured out vpon his people, should be ministred & distributed of his Apostles by the laying on of hands. But vnder this laying on of hands: I thinke there was not contained any hier mystery: but I expound it, that they adioyned such a ceremonie, that by the very outward doing they might signifie, that they commended and as it were offered to God him vpon whom they laid their hands. If this ministry which the Apostles then executed, were yet still remaininge in the Church, the laying on of hands also ought to be kept. But since that same grace hath ceased to be giuen, whereto serueth the laying on of hands? Truly the holy Ghost is yet present with the people of God, without whom being guider & directer, the Church of God can not stand. For we haue the eternall promise and which shall euer stand in force, by which Christ calleth to himself them that thirst, that they may drinke liuing waters. But those miracles of powers, & manifest workinges, which were distributed by the laying on of hands, haue ceased, neither behoued it that they should be, but for a time. For it behoued that the preaching of the Gospell while it was new, should be gloriously set forth & magnified, with vnheard of and vnwonted miracles. From which when the Lord ceased, he did not by and by forsake his Church, but taught that the royalty of his kingdom & the dignity of his word was excellently enough disclosed. In what point therefore will these stageplaiers say that they folow y^e Apostles? They should haue done it with laying on of hands, that the euident power of the holy Ghost might by and by shewe foorth it selfe. This they bring not to passe: why therefore do they boast that the laying on of hands maketh for them, which we read in dede that the Apostles vsed, but altogether to an other end?

7 This hath like reason as if a mā should teach that that breathing wherwith the Lord breathed vpon his disciples, is a Sacrament wherby the holy Ghost is giuen. But wheras the Lord did this once, he did not also will that we shoulde do the same. After the same maner also the Apostles laid on their handes, during the time that it pleased the Lord that the visible graces of the holy Ghost shoulde be distributed at their praiers: not that they which come after, should onely plaier-like & without the thing in dede counterfait an empty & cold signe, as these apes do. But if they proue that in layinge on of handes they folow the Apostles, (wherein they haue no like thing with the Apostles, sauing I wote not what ouerthwart wrongfull counterfayinge) yet when se commeth their oyle which they cal the oyle of saluation? Who taught them to seeke saluation in oyle? Who taught them to giue to it the power of strengthening? Did Paule, which draweth vs farre away from the elements of this world, which condemneth nothinge more than the stickinge to such pety obseruations? But this I bodily pronounce, not of my selfe, but from the Lorde. Who so call oyle the oyle of saluation, they forswear the saluation which is in Christ, they deny Christ, they haue no part in the kingdom of God. For oyle is for the belly, and the belly for oyle: the Lorde shall destroy both. For all these weake elementes, which decay with very vse, belong nothinge to the kingdom of God, which is spirituall and shall neuer decay. What then? will some mē say: do you measure with the same measure, the water wherewith we be baptised, and the breade and wine vnder which the Supper of the Lorde is giuen? I answere that in Sacramentes giuen of God, two thinges are to be looked vnto: the substance of the bodily thing which is sette before vs, and the forme that is by the word of God printed in it, wherein lyeth the whole strength. In respect therefore that the bread, wine, and water that are in the Sacramentes offered to our sight, do keepe their owne substance, this sayinge of Paule alway hath place, Meate for the belly, and the belly for meates: God shall destroy them both. For they passe and vanish away with the fashion of this worlde. But in respect that they be sanctified by the worde of God, that they may be Sacramentes, they do not holde vs in the flesh, but do truely and spirituallly teach vs.

8 But let vs yet more neerely looke into it, howe many monsters this far liquor fostereth and feedeth. These anoynters say, that the holy Ghost is giuen in baptisme, to innocence: in Confirmation, to increase of grace, that in Baptisme, we are new begotten into life: in confirmation, we are prepared to battell. And they are so past shame, that they deny that baptisme can wel be done without confirmation. O wickednesse. Are we not therefore in baptisme buried together with Christ, being made partakers of his death, that we may be also parteners of his resurrection. But this fellowship with the death and life of Christ Paule expoundeth to be the mortifying of our flesh, & quickeninge of our spirit: for that our olde man is crucified, that we may walke in newnesse of life. What is to be armed to battell if this be not? If they compted it a matter of nothing, to tread vnder fecte the word of God: why did they not yet at least reuerence the Church, to whom they will in euery point seeme so obedient. But what can be brought forth more stronge against their doctrine, than that decree of the Mileuitane council? Who so sayth that baptisme is giuen only for forgiuenesse of sinnes, and not for a help of grace to come, accursed be he. But whereas Luke, in the place which we haue alleaged, sayth that they were baptised in the name of Iesus Christ, which had not receiued y^e holy Ghost: he doth not simply deny that they were endued with any gift of the holy Ghost, which beleued in Christ with hart, and confessed him with mouth: but meaneth of that receiuing of the holy Ghost, whereby the open powers and visible graces were receiued. So is it sayd that the Apostles receiued the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, whereas it had bin long before said vnto them of Christ, It is not you that speake, but the Spirite of my Father which speaketh in you. Beholde all ye that are of God, the malicious and poysonous deceite of Sathan. That thing which was truly giuen in baptisme, he lyingly sayth to be giuen in his confirmation, that he may by stealth leade you vnware from baptisme. Who now can dout that this is the doctrine of Sathan, which cuttinge away from baptisme the promises properly belonging to baptisme, doth conuey away & remoue them, to an other thing? It is founde (I say) vpon what maner of foundation this godly anointing standeth. The word of God is, that al they which are baptised in Christ, haue put on Christ with his gifts. The word of the annointers is, y^e they receiued in baptisme no promise, by which they may be armed in battails. That is the voice of trueth, therefore this must be the voice of lyinge. Therefore I can more truly define this Confirmation than they haue hitherto defined it: namely, that it is a notable sclaunder of baptisme, which darkeneth, yea aboliseth the vse thereof: that it is a false promise of the deuil, which draweth vs away from the trueth of God. Or, if you wil, it is oyle defiled with the lying of the deuill, which as it were by ouerspreadinge of darkenesse, deceiueth the eies of the simple.

9 They adde furthermore, that all the faithfull ought after baptisme to receiue the holy Ghost by layinge on of handes, that they may be founde full Christians: because he shall neuer be a Christian, that is not chresmed with the bishops Confirmation. These be their owne sayinges worde for worde. But I had thought that whatsoeuer things things pertained to Christianity, were all set forth in wrytinge and comprehended in Scriptures. Now, as I perceiue, the true forme of religion is to be sought and learned from else where than out of the Scriptures. Therefore the whole wisdom of God, the heauenly truth, the whole doctrine of Christ, doth but beginne Christians, and oyle maketh them perfect. By this sentence are damned all the Apostles, and so many Martyrs, whome it is most certaine to haue neuer bin chresmed: forasmuch as the oyle was not yet made, which being poured vpon them, they might fulfil all the partes of christianty, or rather might be made Christians which yet were none. But, though I holde my peace, they do largely confute themselues. For, how many of the number of their owne people do they annoynt after baptisme? why therefore do they suffer such halfe christians in their flocke, whose imperfection might easily be holpen? Why do they with so careles negligence suffer the to omit that which was not lawfull to be omitted without greuous offense? Why do they not more seuerely call vpon the keping of a thing so necessary, & without which saluatiō can not be obtained, vnlesse peradventure some be preuented by death? Verily when they so freely suffer it to be despised, they secretly cōfesse that it is not of so great value as they boast it.

10 Last of all they determine that this holy annoyntinge is to be had in greater reuerence thā baptisme: because this anointing is peculiarly ministred by the handes of the chiefe bishops, but baptisme is commonly distributed by euery Priest. What may a man here say, but that they are vtterly mad, which so flatter their owne inuentions, that in comparison of them they carelessly despise the holy ordinances of God? O mouth that robbest God, darest thou set a fat liquor onely defiled with the stinke of thine owne breath, and enchaunted with murmuring sounde of wordes, against the Sacrament of Christ, and to compare it with water hallowed with the worde of God? But thy wickednesse accompted this but a smal matter, vnlesse thou didst also preferre it aboue the same. These be the answers, of the holy see, these be the Oracles of the Apostolike trestle. But some of them, euen in their owne opinion, begonne somewhat to qualifie this vnbridled madnes. It is (say they) to be worshipped with greater reuerence: peradventure not for the greater vertue and profit that it giueth: but because it is giuen of the worthier men; and is made in the worthier parte of the body, that is, in the forehead: or because it bringeth a greater encrease of vertues, although baptisme auaille more to forgiveness. But in the first reason do they not bewray themselues to be Donatistes, which measure the force of the Sacrament by the wor-

Diff. 7. But if a man aske of them, from whence so great prerogatiue hath lust? The Apostles alone vsed that power, which alone distributed the holy Ghost? Are the bishops alone Apostles? Yea, are they Apostles at all? But let vs also graunt them that: why do they not by the same argument affirme, that bishops alone ought to touche the Sacrament of the blood in the Supper of the Lord: which they therefore deny to lay mē, because the Lord gaue it to the Apostles alones?

If to the Apostles alone, why do they not conclude: therefore to the bishops alone? But in y place they make the Apostles, simple priests:
but now the giddines of their hed carieth thē an other way, suddenly cap. Per uenit. law of God this was the proper office of bishops, why haue they bin so bold to giue it away to common priestes? as we read in a certaine epistle of Gregory.

11 As for their other reason, how trifling, fond, and foolish is it, to call their Confirmation worthier than the baptisme of God, because in it the forehead is anointed with oyle, and in baptisme the hinder parte of the head, as though baptisme were done with the oyle and not with the water? I cal all the godly to witnes, whether these losels do not endeuour themselues to this only ende, to corrupt the pure-nesse of the Sacraments with their leuen. I haue already spoken this in an other place, that in the Sacramēts, that which is of God scarcely glimmereth through at holes, amonge the rout of the inuentions of men. If any man did not beleue me therein, let him nowe at least beleue his owne maisters. Loe passinge ouer the water, and makinge no accompt of it, they hiely esteeme the onely oyle in baptisme. We therefore on the contrary side do say, that in baptisme the forehead also is dipped in water. In cōparison of this, we esteeme not your oyle worth one piece of dong, whether it be in baptisme or in confirmation. If any alleage that it is sold for more: by this adding of price, the goodnes (if any were in it) is corrupted: so much lesse may they cōmende a most filthy deceit by theft. In the third reason they bewray their own vngodlines, while they prate that in confirmation is giuen a greater encrease of vertues than in baptisme. By the layinge on of handes y Apostles distributed the visible graces of the Spirit. In what thinge do these mens fat liquor shew it selfe frutefull? But away with these

these qualifiers, that couer one sacrilege with many sacrileges. It is like the Gordian: which it is better to breake in sunder, than to labor so much in vndoing it.

12 But nowe when they see themselues destitute of the worde of God and probable reason, they pretende as they are wont, that it is a most auncient obseruation & Itablised by consent of many ages. Although that were true, yet they winne nothings thereby. A Sacrament: is not from the earth, but from heauen: not from men, but from God alone. They must proue God to be the author of their confirmation if they will haue it taken for a Sacrament. But why do they obiekt antiquitie, whereas the olde wryters, when they minde to speake properly, do no where reckon moe Sacramentes than two? If a fortresse of our faith were to be sought from men, we haue an inuincible tower, that the olde Fathers neuer acknowledged those for Sacramentes which these men do lyingly faine to be Sacramentes. The olde wryters speake of the laying on of handes: but do they call it a Sacrament? Augustine plainly affirmeth that it is no other thing than praier. Neither let them here barke against me with their stinking distinctions, that Augustine meant that not of the laying on of handes vsed to confirmation, but which was vsed to healing or reconciliation. The booke remaineth & is abroad in the handes of men. If I wrest it to any other sense than Augustine himself wrote it, I giue them leaue after their ordinary maner to oppresse me not only with railing, but also with spitting at me. For he speaketh of them that returned frō Schisme to the vnity of the Church. He denieth that they needed to be newly baptised: for he saith, that the laying on of hands sufficeth, that by the bond of peace the Lord may giue them the holy Ghost. But forasmuch as it might seeme an absurdity, that the laying on of hands should be done of new rather than baptisme: he sheweth a differēce. For (saith he) what other thing is the laying of hands, than praier vpon a man? And that this is his meaning, appeareth by another place, where he saith: Hande is laid vpon heretikes amended, for the coupling of Charity, which is the greatest gift of the holy Ghost, without which whatsoeuer holy things are in man they auaille not to saluation.

13 But I would to God we did kepe still the maner which I haue said to haue bin in the olde time, before that this vntimely deliuered image of a Sacrament was borne: not that it should be such a confirmation as they faine, which can not once be named without iniury to baptisme: but a catechising, whereby children or they that were nere to the age of discretion did declare an accompt of their faith before the Church. But it should be the best maner of Catechising, if a forme were written to that vse, containing & familiarly setting out a summe in a maner of all y articles of our religion, in which the whole church of the faithfull ought without controuersie to agree: that a childe being ten yeres old should offer himselfe to the Church to declare a confession of his faith, should be examined of euery article, & answered to euery one: if he were ignorant of any thing, or did not vnderstand it, he might be taught. So should he, before the Church witnessing & beholding it, professe the only, true, & pure faith, wherewith the people of the faithfull doth with one minde worship the one God. If this discipline were at this day in force, truly the slothfulnes of some parentes would be whetted, who do carelesly neglect the instruction of their children as a thing nothing belonging to the, which then without open shame they could not omit: there should be among Christiã people a greater cõsent of faith, & not so great ignorance & rudenes of many: some should not be so rashly caried away with new & strange doctrines: finally all should haue as it were a certaine orderly instruction of christian learning.

Of Penance.

14. In the next place they set Penance, of which they entreate so confusely & disordredly, that consciences can beare away no sure or founde thinge of their doctrine. We haue already in an other place declared at large, what we had learned out of the Scriptures concerning repentance, and then what they also teach of it. Nowe we haue this onely to touch, what reason they had that raised vp the opinion, which hath heretofore reigned in Churches and schooles, that it is a Sacrament. But first I will briefly say somewhat of the vsage of the olde Church, the pretense wherof they haue abused to stablish their fained inuention. This order they kept in publike penance, that they which had fully done the satisfactions enioyned them, were recõciled with solemne laying on of handes. That was the Signe of absolution, whereby both the sinner himselfe was raised vppe before God with trust of pardon; and the Church was admonished gently to receiue him into fauour, putting away the remembrance of his offence. This

pi. 1. Ciprian oftentimes calleth, to giue peace. That this doing might be of
cap. 2. greater dignity, and haue more commendation amonge the people, it was ordained that the bishops authority should alway be vsed for the meane herein. From hense came that decree of the second council at Carthage: Be it not lawful to a priestt at the Masse publikely to reconcile a penitent. And an other decree of the council at Arausum, Let thole, which in time of their penãce depart out of this life, be admitted ted to the Communion without the laying on of handes vsed in reconcilinge: if they recouer of their sicknesse let them stande in the degree of penitentes, and when the time is fully expired, let them receiue of the bishop the laying on of handes vsed in reconciling. Again Cap. 33 the decree of y^e third councel at Carthage: Let not the priest without the authority of the bishop, reconcile a penitent. All these tended to this ende, that the seuerity which they would haue to be vsed in that behalfe, shoulde not with too much lenity grow in decay. Therefore they willed y^e bishop to be iudge of it, which was likely that he would be more circumspect in the examination therof. Howbeit Ciprian in a certaine place sheweth, that not only the bishop, but also the whole Clergie layd their handes on him. For thus he saith. At the full time they do penance, then they come to the Communion, & by the laying on of handes of the bishop and the clergy, they receiue power to partake of the Communion. Afterwarde by processe of time it came to this point, that beside publike penance they vsed this ceremonie also in priuate absolutions. Hereupon came that distinction in Gratian Decret. 26. que. 6. betwene publike & priuate reconciliation. I iudge that same olde vsage of which Cyprian maketh mention, to haue bin holy & healthfull for the Church, and I woulde that it were at this day restored. As for this later, although I dare not disallowe it, or at least speake more sharply against it, yet I thinke it to be lesse necessary. Howsoever it be, yet we see that the laying on of handes in penance is a ceremony ordained of men, not of God, which is to be set among meane things & outward exercises: & those verily which are not to be despised, but which ought to be in a lower degree, than those that are commended vnto vs by the word of the Lord.

15 But the Romanistes and the schoolemen, (which haue an ordinary custome to corrupt all thinges with wrong expounding them) do here very carefully trauail in findinge out a Sacrament. Neither ought it to seeme any maruell, for they seeke a knot in a rushe. But where they haue it best, they leaue a thing entangled in suspense, vncertaine, and confounded and troubled with diuersity of opinions. They say therefore either that the outward penance is a Sacrament, Lib. 4. Sen. di. 12. ca. 2 and if it be so, that it ought to be taken for a signe of the inwarde penance, that is, of the contrition of hart, which shalbe the thing of the Sacrament: or that they both together are a Sacrament; not two Sacramentes, but one full one. But, that the outward penance is only the Sacrament: the inward is both the thing and the Sacrament: and that the forgiuenes of sinnes is the thing and not the Sacrament. Let them which keepe in remembrance the definition of a Sacrament which we haue aboue set, examine thereby that which these men call a Sacrament, and they shall finde that it is not an outward ceremony ordained of the Lorde for the confirminge of our faith. If they caull that my definition is not a lawe which they neede to obey: let them heare Augustin, whom they faine that they esteeme as most holy. Visible Sacramentes (sayth he) were ordained for carnall mens sakes, that by degrees of Sacramentes they may be conueied from those things that are seene with eies to those things that are vnderstanded. What like thinge do either they themselues see, or can they shew to other in that which they call the Sacrament of Penance? The same Augustine saith in an other place: It is therefore called a Sacramēt, because in it one thing is seene, & an other other thing is vnderstanded. That which is seene, hath a bodily forme: that which is vnderstanded, hath a spirituall frate. Neither do these things in any wise agree with the Sacrament of penance, such as they faine it, where there is no bodily forme that may represent a spiritual frute.

16 And, to kil these beasts vpon their owne fighting place, if there be any Sacrament here to be sought, may it not be much more colerably said that the absolutiō of the priest is a Sacramēt, than penance either inward or outward? For it might readily be sayd, that it is a ceremony to assure our faith of the forguenes of sinnes, & hath a promise of the keies as they call it, Whatsoeuer ye shall binde or loose vpon earth, shalbe bounde or loosed in heauen. But some man would haue obiected, that the most parte of them that are absolued of the priestes, obtaine no such thing by such absolutiō: whereas by their doctrine the Sacramentes of the new law ought to worke in deede that which they figure. This were but to be laughed at. For, as in the Supper, they make a double eating, a Sacramentall eating which is equally common to good & to euill, & a spiritual eating which is only proper to the good: why might they not also faine that absolution is receiued two wayes? Yet coude I not hitherto vnderstande what they meant with this their doctrine, which we haue already taught howe far it disagreeeth from the truth of God, whē we purposely entreated of that argumēt. Here my minde is only to shew, that this dout withstandeth not, but that they may call the absolution of the priest a Sacrament. For they might aunswere by the mouth of Augustine, that sanctification is without the visible Sacrament, & the visible Sacramēt without inward sanctification. Againe, that the Sacraments do worke in the only elect that which they figure. Againe, that some do put on Christ so far as to the partaking of the Sacramēt, other some to sanctification: the one, the good and euill egally do: this other, the good only.

onely. Truly they haue more than childishly erred & be blinded in the cleare sunne, which traouailing with great hardnes, yet espied not a thing so plaine and open to euery man.

17 Yet least they shoulde waxe too proude, in what parte soeuer they set the Sacrament, I deny that it ought rightfully to be taken for a Sacrament. First, because there is no speciall promise to it, which is the only substance of a Sacrament. Againe, because whatsoeuer ceremony is here shewed foorth, it is the mere inuention of menne: wheras we haue already proued that the ceremonies of Sacraments can not be ordained but of God. Therefore it was a lye and a deceite which they haue inuented of the Sacrament of penance. This fained Sacrament they haue garnished with a meete commendation, calling it a seconde boord after shipwrecke: because if a man haue by sinning marred the garment of innocence which he receiued in baptisme he may by penance repaire it. But it is the saying of Hierom. Whose soeuer it be, it can not be excused but y^e it is vtterly wicked, if it be expoüded after their meaning. As thogh baptisme be blotted out by sinne, & is not rather to be called to remembrance of euery sinner, so oft as he thinketh of the forgiuenesse of sinne, that he may thereby gather vp himselfe, and recouer courage, and strengthen his Faith, that he shall obtaine the forgiuenes of sinnes which is promised him in baptisme. But that which Hierome hath spoken hardly and vnproperly, that by penance baptisme is repaired (from which they fall away that deserue to be excommunicate from the Church) these good expositours drawe to their wickednesse. Therefore you shall most fitly speake, if you cal baptisme the Sacrament of penance, sith it is giuen for a confirmation of grace, and seale of confidence, to them that purpose repentance. And least you shoulde thinke this to be our deuise, beside this that it agreeth with the wordes of the Scripture, it appeareth that it was in the old Church commonly spoken like a most certaine principle. For in the booke of Faith to Peter, which is said to be Augustines, it is called the Sacrament of Faith & of penance. And why flee we to vncertaine sayings? As though we could require any thing more plaine, than that which the Euangelist reciteth: that Iohn preached y^e baptisme of repentance vnto forgiuenes of sinnes?

Of extreme vnction as they call it.

18 The third fained Sacrament is extreme vnction, which is not done but of the Priest, & that in extremes, (so they terme it) & with oyle consecrate of the bishop, & with this forme: By this holy anointing, & by his most kind mercy, God pardō thee whatsoeuer thou hast offended by seeing, by hearing, by smelling, feeling, tasting. They saie that there be two vertues of it, y^e forgiuenes of sinnes, & ease of bodily sicknesse if it be so expedient: if not, the saluation of the soule. They say that the institution of it is set of Iames, whose wordes are these. Is any sicke amonge you? Let him bringe in the Elders of the Church, & let them pray ouer him, anointinge him with oyle in the name of the Lord: & the praier of Faith shall saue the sicke man, and the Lord shall raise him vp: & if he be in sinnes, they shalbe forgiuen him. Of the same sort is this anointing, of which we haue aboue shewed that y^e other laying on of hands is, namely a playerlike hipocrisie, whereby without reason and without frute they would resemble the Apostles. Marc rehearseth that the Apostles at their first sending, accordinge to the commaundement which they haue receiued of the Lorde, raised vp dead men, cast out deuils, cleansed leprous men, healed the sicke, & that in healing of y^e sicke they vsed oyle. They anointed (saith he) many sicke men with oyle, & they were healed. Hereunto Iames had respect, when he commaunded the Elders to be called together to anoint the sicke man. That vnder such Ceremonies is contained no hier mystery, they shall easily iudge which marke howe great liberty the Lord & his Apostles vsed in these outward thinges.

The Lord goinge about to restore sight to the blinde man, made cley of dust & spittle, some he healed with touchinge, other some with his word. After the same maner y^e Apostles healed some diseases with the word only, some with touchinge, other some with anointing. But it is likely that this anointing was not (as all other thinges also were not) causelessly put in vre. I graunt: yet not that it shoulde be a meane of healing, but only a signe, that the dulnes of the vnskilfull might be put in minde from whence so great power proceeded, to this ende that they should not giue the praise therof to the Apostles. And, that the holy Ghost & his giftes are signified by oyle it is a common & vsuall thing. But that same grace of healings is vanished away, like as also the other miracles, which the Lord willed to be shewed for a time, whereby he might make the new preaching of the Gospel maruelous for euer. Therefore though we graunt neuer so much, that anointing was a Sacrament of those powers which were then ministred by the hands of the Apostles, it now nothings pertaineth to vs to whom the ministration of such powers is not committed.

19 And by what greater reason do they make a Sacrament of this anointing, thā of all other signes that are rehearsed to vs in the Scripture? Why do they not appoint some Siloah to swim in, whereinto at certaine ordinary recourses of times sicke menne may plunge themselves themselves? That (say they) should be done in vaine. Truly no more in vaine than anointing. Why do they not lie along vpon dead men, because Paul raised vp a dead childe with lying vpon him? Why is not cley made of spittle and dust, a Sacrament? But the other were but singular examples: but this is geuen of Iames for a commaundement. Verily Iames spake for the same time, when the Church yet still enjoyed such blessing of God. They affirme in dede that there is yet still the same force in their anointing: but we finde it otherwise by experience. Let no man nowe maruell howe they haue with such boldnesse mocked soules, which they knowe to be senselesse & blinde when they are spoiled of the word of God, that is, of their life and light: sith they are nothing ashamed to go about to mocke the liuing and feling senses of y^e body. Therefore they make themselues worthy to be scorned, while they boast that they are endued with the grace of healings. The Lorde verily is present with his in all ages, and so oft as neede is he helpeth their sicknesses no lesse than in olde time: but he doth not so vtter those manifest powers, nor distributeth miracles by the handes of the Apostles: because this gift both was but for a time, and also is partly fallen away by the vnthankfulnesse of men.

20 Therefore as not without cause the Apostles haue by the signe of oile openly testified, that the grace of healings committed to them was not their own power, but the power of the holy Ghost: so on the other side they are wrongdoers to the Holy Ghost, which make a stinking oile and of no force, to be his power. This is altogether like as if one would say that all oile is the power of the Holy Ghost, because it is called by that name in Scripture: that euery doue is y^e holy Ghost, because he appered in that forme. But these things, let them loke to. So much as for this present is enough for vs, we do most certainly perceiue that their anointing is no Sacramēt: which is neither a Ceremonie ordeined of God, nor hath any promise. For when we require these two things in a Sacrament, that it be a ceremonie ordeined of God, and that it haue a promise of God: we do therewithall require that the same Ceremonie be geuen to vs, and that the promise belong vnto vs. For no man doth affirme that Circumcision is nowe a Sacrament of the Christian Church, although it both was an ordinance of God, and had a promise knitt vnto it: because it was neither commaunded to vs, nor the promise which was adioined to it was giuen to vs with the same cōdition. That the promise wich they proudly boast of in their anointinge, is not geuen to vs; we haue euidently shewed, and they themselues declare by experience. The Ceremonie ought not to haue bene vsed, but of them that were endued with the grace of healings, not of these butchers that can more skill of slaying and murdering than of healing.

21 Howbeit although they obtaine this, that that which Iames commaundeth concerning annointing, agreeth with this age (which they are most farre from) yet euen so they shall not haue much preuailed in prouing of their vnction wherewith they haue herherto annoointed vs. Iames willeth that all sicke men be annoointed: these men infect with their fat liquor, not sicke men, but corpses half dead, when the life lieth already laboring at the toppe of their lippes, or (as they themselues terme it) in extremes. If they haue in their Sacrament a present medicine, whereby they may either ease the sharpnesse of diseases, or at the least may bring some comfort to the soule, they are to cruel that do neuer heale in time. Iames willeth that the sicke man be annoointed of the Elders of the Church: these men allowe no annointer but the pety sacrificing Priest. Whereas they expounde in Iames presbyteras the Elders to be Priests, and fondly say that the plurall number is there set for comliness sake: that is but trifling: as though the Churches at that time abounded with swarmes of sacrificing Priests, that they might go in a long pompous shewe to carrie a pageante of holy oile. When Iames simply biddeth that sicke men be annoointed, I vnderstande by it none other annointing but of common oile: and none other is found in Markes relieasall. These men vouchesaue to haue none other oile, but that which is hallowed of the Bishop, that is to say, warmed with much breathing on it, enchanted with much mumbling, and with the knee bowed nine times saluted in this maner: thrise Haile holy oile: thrise Haile holy chresme: thrise Haile holy balme. Out of whom haue they sucked such coniurations? Iames saith: that when the sicke man is annoointed with oile, and prayer hath bene pronounced ouer him, if he be in sinnes they shalbe forgeuen him: namely, that the giltinesse being taken away, they may obtaine release of the peine: not meaning that sinnes are put away with fat liquor, but that the prayers of the faithfull whereby the afflicted brother is commended to God, shall not be vaine. These mē do wickedly ly, that by their holy, that is to say, abominable annointing, sinnes are forgeuen. Lo howe gaily they shall preuaile, when they haue bene at large suffred to abuse the testimonie of Iames at their pleasure. And least we should neede to trauaile long in profe hereof, their owne chronicles do discharge vs of this hardnes. For they report that Pope Innocentius, which in Augustines time gouerned the Church of Rome, ordeined that not onely Priests, but also all Christians should vse oile to annoint for their owne necessitie and others. Author hereof is Sigebert in his Cronicles.

Of Ecclesiasticall Orders.

22 The fourth place in their register hath the Sacrament of Order: but the same so frutefull, that it bredeth out of it selfe seuen litle Sacraments. But this is very worthy to be laughed at, that wheras they affirme that there be seuen Sacraments, when they go about to rehearse them they reckon vp thirtene. Neither can they allege for themselues, that they are but one Sacrament, because they tende all to one Priesthode, and are as it were certaine degrees vnto it. For sith it is euident that in euery one of them are seuerall Ceremonies, and they themselues say that there be diuerse graces: no mā can dout but that they ought to be called seuen Sacraments, if their opinions be receiued. And why strue we about it as though it were a thing doubtful, forasmuch as they themselues do plainly and seuerally declare seuen? But first we will brefely knitt vp by the way, howe many and howe vnfauorie absurdities they thrust in vnto vs, whē they go about to commend to vs their Orders in steede of Sacraments: and then we wil se whether the Ceremony which Churches vse in ordering of ministers, ought to be called a Sacrament at all. They make therefore seuen ecclesiasticall Orders or degrees, which they garnish with the name of a Sacrament. Those be, dorekeepers, Reders, Exorcistes, Acoluthes or followers, Subdeacons, Deacons, Priests. And vii they say that they be, for the seuenfolde grace of the Holy ghost, wherewith they ought to be endued that are promoted vnto them. But it is encreased and more largely heaped to them in their promotion. Nowe the number it selfe is hallowed with a wrongfull expounding of Scripture, when they thinke that they haue red in Esai vii vertues of the Holy ghost whereas both in deede Esay there rehearseth but six, and also the prophet ment not to comprehend them all in that place: for he is els where as well called the Spirit of life, of sanctification, of adoption of the children, as he is in that place called the Spirit of wisdom, of vnderstanding, of counsell, of strength, of knowledge, & of the feare of the Lorde. Howbeit some sutteler men make not seuen orders, but nine, after the likenesse (as they say) of the Church triumphing. But among them also there is strife: because some would haue the shauing of the clergie to be the first order of all, and Bishoprike the last: other some excluding shauing altogether, reckon Archebishoprike among the orders. Isidore otherwise diuideth them? For he maketh Psalmistes and Reders to be diuerse: he appointeth the Psalmistes for songes, and the Reders to the reding, of the Scriptures, wherewith the people may be instructed. And this

 26. heard without laughing, that I maruel that they were writte without

 50. their sutteltie wherewith they play the Philosophers about the name Eph. 5. of Acoluth, calling him a Ceroferar, a taper bearer with a word (as
 2. I thinke) of sorcerie, truely such a one as was neuer heard of in all natiōs and languages, whereas Acoluthos in Greke simply signifieth a follower. Howbeit if I should earnestly tarry in confuting these men, I should my selfe also worthily be laughed at, they are so trifling and very mockeries.

24 But that they may not be able yet still with false colors to de-ceieue euen very silly womē, their vanitie is by the way to be vttered.
 They create with great pompe and solemnitie their Reders, Psalmistes, Dorkeepers, Acoluthes, to execute those offices, wherunto they appoint very children, or those whome they call lay men. For who for the most part lighteth the candels, who poureth wine and water into the cruet, but a childe or some base fellowe of the laitie, that maketh his gaine thereof? Do not the same men sing, Do they not shutt and open the Church dores? For who euer sawe in their temples an Acoluth, or a Dorekeeper executing his office? But rather he that whē he was a boy did the office of an Acoluth, when he is ones admitted

admitted into the order of Acoluthes, cesserh to be that which he beginneth to be called, that they may seeme to will of purpose to cast of the office when they take vpon them the title. Beholde why they haue neede to be consecrate by Sacraments, and to receiue the Holy ghost, namely, that they may do nothing. If they allege for exercise, that this is the frowardnesse of times, that they forsake and neglect their ministeries: let them therewithall confesse that there is at this day in the Church no vse nor frute of their holy Orders, which they maruelously aduance, and that their whole Church is full of curse: because it suffreth tapers & cruets to be handled of children and prophane men, which none are worthy to touch but they that are consecrate Acoluthes: and because it committeth the songes to children, which ought not to be heard but of a hallowed mouth. As for their Exorcistes, to what ende do they consecrate them? I here that the Iewes had their Exorcistes: but I se that they were so called of the exorcismes or coniurations which they vsed. Of these counterfeit exorcistes who euer heard it spoken, that they shewed any example of their profession? It is fained that they haue power geuen them to lay their handes vpon mad men, them that are to be catechised, and men possessed with deuils: but they can not perswade the deuils that they haue such power, because the deuils do not only not yelde to their commaundements, but also vse commaunding authoritie ouer them. For a man can scarcely finde euery tēth of them, that is not led with an euill Spirit. Therefore whatsoever things they babble concerning their pety Orders, are patched together of foolish and vsauory lies. Of the olde Acoluthes, and Dorekeepers, and Reders, we haue spoken in an other place, when we declared the order of the Church. Our purpose here is onely to fight against that newe founde inuention of the seuenfold Sacrament in ecclesiasticall Orders. Of which there is no where any thing red, but among these foolish praters the Sorbonistes and Canonistes.

25 Nowe let vs cōsider of the ceremonies which they vse about it. First whomsoever they receiue into their order of soldiars, they do with one cōmon signe entre them into Clergie. For they shaue them in the crowne, that the crowne may betoken kingly dignitie, because Clerkes ought to be kinges, that they may rule themselues and other. For Peter speaketh thus of them; Ye are a chosen kinde, a kingly priesthode, a holy nation, a people of purchace. But it was sacrilege to rake to themselues alone that which is geuē to the whole Church, and proudly to glory of the title which they had taken from the faithfull. Peter speaketh to the whole Church; these fellowes wrest it temporall things, and the heary compasse about the crowne are the remnantes of goodes that are retained for their sustenance. All in signes: because forsoth the veile of the tēple is not yet cut in sonder.

 Therefore being persuaded that they haue gaily discharged their duties, because they haue figured such things by their crowne, of the very things in deede they performe nothing at all. Howe long will they mocke vs with such false colors and deceites? The clergie by shearing of a fewe heares do signifie that they haue cast away the a-that they haue mortified the lust of the eares and eyes: but there is no kinde of men more rauening, more senselessly dull, more lustfull?

 Why do they not rather truly performe holinesse, than with false

26 Moreouer when they say that the crown of the Clergie hath the beginning and reason from the Nazarites: what other thing do they allege, than that their misteries are sprong out of the Iewish Ceremonies, or rather that they are mere Iewishnesse? But whereas they further say, that Priscilla, Acila, and Paul himselfe, taking a vowe bewray their grosse ignorance. For it is no where red of Priscilla: and of Acila also it is doutfull: for that same shearing may as well be referred to Paule as to Acila. But, that we may not leaue to them that which they require, that they haue an example of Paule: the simpler must note, that Paul did neuer sheare his head for any sanctification, but onely to serue the weakenesse of his brethren. I am wont to call such voves the voves of charitie not of godlinesse: that is to say, not taken in hande for any seruice of God, but to beare with the rude-nesse of the weake: as he himselfe saith, that he was made a Iewe to the Iewes, &c. Therefore he did this, and the same but ones, and for a shorte time, that he might for a time fashion himselfe to the Iewes.

 These men, when they will without any vse couterfait the purifyings when they wrongfully couet to followe the olde Iewishnesse? With the same religiousnesse was that decretall Epistle made, which, according to the Apostle, forbiddeth clerkes that they should not suffer their heare to growe, but there it rounde like a boowle. As though the Apostle, when he teacheth what is comly for all men, were careful for the rounde shearinge of the Clergie. Hereby let the reders consider, of what force and worthinesse are those other misteries that followe, into which there is such an entrie.

27 Whense the shearing of Clerkes toke beginning, appeareth sufficiently euen by Augustine alone. Whereas at that time none suffered their heare to grow, but nice men, & such as coueted a smothernesse & trimnesse not mete enough for men: it seemed to be a point of no good example, if that were permitted to the clergie. Therefore Clerkes were comanded either to sheare their head or to shau it, that they should not beare any shewe of womanlike trimming. But this was so common, that certaine monkes, that they might the more set out their owne holinesse with notable & seuerall attire from other men, did let their heare growe long. But afterward when the fashion turned to wearing of heare, and certain nations were added to Christiandome which alway vsed to weare long heare, as Fraunce, Germany, & England: it is likely that clerkes did euery where sheare their hedes, least they should seeme to couet the gainesse of heare. At the last in a corrupter age, when all olde ordinances where either peruertered or gone out of kinde into superstition, because they sawe no cause in the shearing of the clergie (for they had reteined nothing but a folishe counterfating) they fled to a misterie, which nowe they superstitiously thrust in vnto vs for the approving of their Sacrament. The dorekeepers at their consecration receiue the keyes of the Church, whereby they may vnderstand that the keping of it is committed to them. The reders receiue the holy Bible. The exorcistes receiue the formes of exorcismes, which they shoulde vse ouer mad & them that are to be catechised. The Acoluthes receiue the tapers and cruet. Lo these are the ceremonies, wherein (if God will) there is so much secret power, that they may be not only signes and tokens, but also causes of inuisible grace. For this they require by their definition, when they will haue them taken among the Sacraments. But to make an ende in fewe wordes, I say it is an absurditie that in their scholes and canons they make these lesser orders Sacraments: whereas euen by their owne confession that teache this, they were vnknown to the primitiue Church, and deuised many yeares after. For Sacraments, sith they conteine the promise of God, can not be ordeined of Angels, nor of men, but of God alone, whoes office alone it is to geue promise.

28 There remaine three orders, which they call the greater. Of the which, Subdeaconrie (as they call it) was remoued into that number, fims that the route of the smaller ones beganne to growe. But because they seeme to haue a testimonie for these out of the word of God, they do peculiarly for honors sake, call them holy orders. But nowe it is to be sene, howe crokedly they abuse the ordinances of God to their pretence. We will begin at the order of Priesthode or the sacrificers office. For by these two names they signifie one thing, and so they call them to whom they say that it pertaineth to offer vpon the altar the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ, to pronounce prayers, and to blesse the giftes of God. Therefore at their consecration they receiue the patine with the hostes, for tokens of power geuen to them, to offer acceptable sacrifices to God. And their handes are annointed: by which signe they are taught, that they haue power geuen them to consecrate. But of the Ceremonies we shall speake hereafter. Of the thing it selfe I say: it so hath no title of the word of God which they pretende, that they could not more wickedly corrupt the order set by God. First verily this ought to stande for a thing confessed (which we haue affirmed in entreating of the Popishe masse) that they are all wrong doers to Christ, which call themselues sacrificing priests, to offer a sacrifice of appeasement. He was appointed and consecrate of the Father a priest with an othe, according to the order of Melchisedech, without any ende, without any successor. He ones offered a sacrifice of eternall satisfactorie cleansing, and reconciliation: and nowe also being entred into the Sanctuarie of heauen, he maketh intercession for vs. In him we are all sacrificing priests, but to praises and geuings of thanks, finally to offer vs and ours to God. It was his singular office alone, with his offering to appease God, and to purge sinnes. When these men take that vpon them, what remaineth but that their sacrificing Priesthode is vngodly and full of sacrilege? Truely they are to wicked, when they dare garnish it with the name of a Sacrament. As touching the true office of Priesthode, which is commended to vs by the mouth of Christ, I willingly accompt it in that degree. For therein is a ceremonie, first taken out of the Scriptures, then such a one as Paule testifieth not to be vaine nor superfluous, but a faithfull Signe of spirituall grace. But whereas I haue not set it for a thirde in the number of Sacraments, I did it because it is not ordinarie and common among all the faithfull, but a speciall rite for one certaine office. But sith this honor is geuen to the Christian ministerie, there is no cause therefore why the Popish sacrificers should be proude.

For Christ commaunded distributers of his Gospell and misteries to be ordeined, not sacrificers to be consecrated. He gaue them commaundement to preache the Gospell and to feede the flocke, not to offer sacrifices. He promised thē the grace of the holy Ghost, not to make satisfactorie purging of sinnes, but rightly to execute and to mainteine the gouernement of the Church.

29 The ceremonies agree very well with the thing it selfe. Our Lorde when he sent forth the Apostles to preache the Gospell, did blowe vpon them. By which Signe he represented the power of the holy Ghost which he gaue vnto thē. This blowing these good men haue retained, and as though they did put forth the holy Ghost out at their throte, they whisper ouer their silly priests that they make, Receiue the holy Ghost. So leaue they nothing which they do not ouerthwartly counterfait: I will not say like players (which vse their gesturings neither without arte nor without significatiō) but like apes, which counterfait euery thing wantonly and without any choise. We kepe (say they) the example of the Lorde. But the Lorde did many things which he willed not to be examples to vs. The Lorde said to the disciples, Receiue y^e holy Ghost. He said also to Lazarus, Lazarus come forth. He said to the man sicke of the palsey, Rise and walke. Why do not they say the same to all dead men & sicke of the palsey? He shewed a profe of his diuine power, when in blowing vpon the Apostles he filled them with the grace of the holy Ghost. If they go about to do the same thing, they enuiously counterfait God, and do in a maner challenge him to striue with them: but they are farre from the effect, & do nothing with this foolish gesturing but mock Christ. Verily they be so shamelesse, that they dare affirme that they geue the holy Ghost. But howe true that is, experiēce teacheth, which crieth out that so many as be consecrated priests are of horses made asses, of fooles made madmen. Neither yet do I striue with them for that: onely I condemne the ceremonie it selfe, which ought not to haue bene drawen to be an example, forasmuch as it was vsed of Christ for a singular signe of one miracle: so farre is it of, that the excuse of following his example ought to defend them.

30 But of whom receiued they the annointing? They aunswere that they receiued it of the sonnes of Aaron, from whom their order also toke beginning. Therefore they had rather alway to defend them selues with wrongfull examples, than to cōfesse that themselues haue deuised that which they vse without cause. But in the meane time they consider not, that while they professe themselues the successors of the sonnes of Aaron, they are wrongdoers to the priesthode of Christ, which alone was shadowed and figured by all the olde sacrificing priesthodes. In him therefore they were all contained and fulfilled, in him they ceased, as we haue somtimes already repeted, and the Epistle to the Hebrues without helpe of any gloses testifieth. But if they be so much delited with the ceremonies of Moses, why do they not hastily take oxen, calues, and lãbes to make sacrifices? They haue in deede a good part of the olde tabernacle and of the whole Iewish maner of worshipping: but yet this wanteth in their religion, that they do not sacrifice calues and oxen. Who can not see, that this obseruatiõ of annointing is much more hurtfull than Circumcision, specially when there is adioined superstition and Pharisaicall opinion of the worthinesse of the worke? For the Iewes did set in Circumcision, trust of righteousnesse: these men do set in annointing, spirituall graces. Therefore while they couet to be counterfaiters of the Leuites, they are made Apostataes from Christ, and do put themselves from the office of Pastors.

31 This is (if God wil) the holy oile that printeth the marke that can not be raced out. As though oile could not be wiped away with dust and salt, or if it sticke faster, with sope. But this marke is spirituall. What hath oile to do with the soule? Haue they forgottẽ that which they oft chaunt to vs out of Augustine, that if the word be taken from the water, it shalbe nothing but water, and that it hath this from the word that it is a Sacrament? What word will they shewe in their fat liquor? Will they shewe the commaundement the was geuen to

Moses, concerning the annointing of the sonnes of Aaron? But there is also commaudemẽt geuen, of the coate, the ephod, the hatt, the crowne of holinesse, with which Aaron was to be garnished, and of the coates, girdles, and miters, wherewith the sonnes of Aaron were to be clothed. There is commaundement geuen to kill a calfe, and burne the fat of him for incense, to cut rammes and burne them, to sanctifie their cares and garments with the blood of an other ramme, and innumerable other obseruations, which being passed ouer, I maruell why the onely annointing of oile pleaseth them. But if they loue to be sprinkled, why are they rather sprinkled with oile than with blood? Forsoth they go about a witty thing, to make one religion of Christianitie, Iewishnesse, and Paganisme, as it were of patches sowed together. Therefore their annointing stinketh which is without the salt, that is, the word of God. There remaineth laying on of handes, which as I graunt in true and lawfull Orderings to be a Sacrament, so I deny that it hath any part in this play, where they neither obey the commaundement of Christ, nor haue respect to the

ende whereunto the promise ought to leade vs. If they will not haue the signe denied them, they must apply it to the thing it selfe, wherunto it is appointed.

32 About the order also of Deaconrie I would not striue with them, if that same ministerie which was in the Apostles time and in the purer Church were restored to the vncorrupted state thereof. But what like thing haue they whom those men saie to be deacons? I speake not of the men (least they should cōplaine that the doctrine is wrongfully weyed by the faultes of the menne) but I affirme that for those whom they deliuer vs by their doctrine, they vnworthily fetche testimonie from the example of them whom the Apostolike Church ordeined Deacons. They say that it pertaineth to their deacons to stand by the priests, to minister in all things that are done in the Sacraments, namely in Baptisme, in the chresme, in the patine, in the chalice: to bring in the offrings and lay them vpon the altar, to make ready the Lordes table, and to couer it: to carry the Crosse, to pronounce and sing the Gospell and Epistle to the people. Is here any one word of the true ministerie of Deacons? Nowe let vs heare the instituting of them. Vppō the Deacon that is ordered, the Bishop alone layeth his hande. He layeth a prayer boke and a Stoale vpon his lefte shoulder, that he may vnderstande that he hath receiued the light yoke of the Lorde, whereby he may subdue to the feare of God those thinges that pertaine to the left side. He geueth him the texte of the Gospell, that he may perceiue himselfe to be a publisher of it. And what belong these things to Deacons? They do euen like as if a man would say that he ordeined them Apostles whom he appointed onely to burne frankincense, to trimme the Images, to swepe the Churches, to catche mise, to driue away dogs. Who could suffer such kinde of men to be called Apostles, and to be compared with the very Apostles of Christ? Therefore let them not hereafter liengly say that those be Deacons, whom they institute onely for their enterludelike playes. Yea & by the very name it selfe they sufficiētly declare what maner of office they haue. For they call them Leuites, and will haue their order and beginninge referred to the children of Leui. Which I geue them leaue to do, so that they do not afterward garnish them with the fethers of other.

33 Of Subdeacons to what purpose is it to speake? For whereas in deede they were in olde time appointed for care of the poore, they assigne to them I wote not what trifling businesse, as to bring the chalice and the patine, the litle cruet with water, and the towel to the altar, to powre water to washe handes, &c. Nowe wheras they speake of receiuing and bringing in of offrings, they meane those which they deuoure as abandoned to their holy vse. With this office very well agreeth the forme of their consecrating. That he receiue of the Bishop, the patine and the chalice: of the Archdeacon, the cruet with water, the manuale, and such other baggage. Within these trifles they require to haue vs confesse that the holy Ghost is enclosed. What godly man can abide to graunt this? But, to make ones an ende, we may determine the same of them that we do of the rest. Neither neede we to repete further those things that are aboue declared. This may be enough to teach the sober and willing to learne (whom I haue taken in hand to instruct) that there is no Sacrament of God but where is shewed a Ceremonie ioined with a promise: or rather verily but where is a promise sene in a Ceremonie. Here is not found one syllable of any certain promise: therefore it were in vaine to seke a Ceremonie to confirme the promise. Againe of those Ceremonies that they vse, it is not red that any one is institute of God. Therefore here can be no Sacrament.

Of Matrimonie.

34 The last is Matrimonie, which as all men confesse to be ordeined of God, so no man vntill the time of Gregorie euer sawe that it was geuen for a Sacrament. And what sober man would euer haue thought it? It is a good and a holy ordinance of God: so tillage, carpentrie, shoemakers craft, barbers craft, are lawfull ordinances of God, and yet they are no Sacraments. For there is not onely this required in a Sacrament, that it be the worke of God, but that it be an outward Ceremonie appointed of God to confirme a promise. That there is no such thing in Matrimonie, very children also can iudge. But (say they) it is a Signe of a holy thing, that is, of the spirituall conioining of Christ with the Church. If by this word Signe, they vnderstande a Token set before vs of God, to this ende to raise vp the assurednesse of our faith, they are farre beside the truth. If they simply take a Signe for that which is brought to expresse a similitude, I will shewe howe wittily they reason. Paule saith, As one starre differeth from an other starre in brightnesse, so shalbe the resurrection of the dead. Lo here is one Sacrament. Christ saith, The kingdome of heauen is like to a grain of mustardsede. Lo here is an other. Againe, The kingdome of heauen is like vnto leauen. Lo here is the third. Esay saith, Behold, the Lord shall feede his flocke as a shepherd. Lo here is the fowerth. In an other place, The Lorde shall go forth as a Giant. Lo here is the fifth. Finally what ende or measure shall there be? There is nothing but by this meane it shall be a Sacrament.

Howe

Howe many parables and similitudes are in the Scripture, so many Sacraments there shalbe. Yea and theft shalbe a Sacrament, because it is written, the day of the Lord is like a thefe. Who can abide these sophisters prating so foolishly? I graunt in deede that so oft as we see a vine, it is very good to call to remembráce that which Christ saith, I am a vine, ye be branches, my Father is the vinedresser. So oft as a shepherde with his flocke cometh toward vs, it is good also that this come to our minde, I am a good shepherd, my shepe heare my voice. But if any man adde such similitudes to the number of Sacramentes, he is mete to be sent to Antycira.

35 But they still lay fourth the wordes of Paule, in which he geueth to Marrisonie the name of a Sacrament: he that loueth his wife, loueth himselfe. No man euer hated his owne flesh, but nourisheth it and cherisheth it, euen as Christ doth the Church: because we are members of his body, of his fleshe and of his bones. For this a man shall leaue his Father and mother, and shall cleaue to his wife, and they shalbe two into one fleshe. This is a great Sacrament: but I say in Christ and the Church. But so to handle the Scriptures, is to mingle heauen and earth together. Paule, to shewe to married men, what singular loue they ought to beare to their wiues, setteth fourth Christ to them for an example. For as he poured fourth the bowels of his kindenesse vpon the Church which he had espoused to himselfe: so ought euery man to be affectioned toward his owne wife. It followeth after, He that loueth his wife, loueth himselfe: as Christ loued the Church. Nowe, to teache howe Christ loued the Church as himselfe, yea howe he made himselfe one with his spouse the Church, he applieth to him those things which Moses reporteth that Adam spake of himselfe. For when Eue was brought into his sight, whom he knewe to haue bene shapen out of his side: This woman (saith he) is a bone of my bones, and fleshe of my fleshe. Paule testifieth that all this was spirituallly fulfilled in Christ and vs, when he sayeth that we are membres of his body, of his fleshe, and of his bones, yea and one fleshe with him. At length he addeth a cōcluding Sentéce, This is a great misterie. And least any man should be deceiued with the double signifying of the wordes, he expresseth that he speaketh not of the fleshely conioining of man and woman, but of the spirituall marriage of Christ and the Church. And truely it is in deede a great misterie, that Christ suffred a ribbe to be takē from himselfe, whereof we might be shapen: that is to say, when he was strōg, he willed to be weake, that we might be strengthened with his strength: that nowe we may not our selues liue, but he may liue in vs.

36 The name of Sacrament deceiued them. But was it rightfull that the whole Church should suffer the punishment of their ignorance? Paule said Misterie: which word when the translater might haue leste being not vnused with Latin eares, or might haue translated it a Secret: he chose rather to put in the word Sacrament, yet in no other sense than Paul had in Greke called it Misterie. Now let them go and with crying out raile against the skill of tongues, by ignorance whereof they haue so long most fowly bene blinde in an easy matter, and such as offreth it selfe to be perceiued of euery man. But why do they in this one place so earnestly sticke vpon this litle word Sacrament, and some other times do passe it ouer vnregarded? For also in the first Epistle to Timothee the Translater hath vsed it, and in the selfe same Epistle to the Ephesians: in euery place for Misterie. But let this slipping be pardoned them: at least the liers ought to haue had a good remembrance. For, when they haue ones set out Matrimonie with title of a Sacrament, afterward to call it vncleanesse, defiling, and fleshly filthinesse, howe gidly lightnesse is this? Howe great an aburditie is it to debarre priests from a Sacrament? If they deny that they debarre them from the Sacrament, but from the lust of copulation: they escape not so away from me. For they teache that the copulation it selfe is a part of the Sacrament, and that by it alone is figured the vniting that we haue with Christ in conformitie of nature: because man and woman are not made one but by carnall copulation. Howbeit some of them haue here founde two Sacraments: the one of God and the soule, in the betrouthed man and woman: the other of Christ and the Church, in the husband and the wife. Howsoeuer it be, yet copulation is a Sacrament, from which it was vnlawfull that any Christian should be debarred: Vnlesse peraduenture the Sacraments of Christians do so ill agree, that they can not stand together. There is also an other absurditie in their doctrines. They affirme that in the Sacrament is geuen the grace of the holy Ghost: they teache that copulation is a Sacrament: and they denie that at copulation the holy Ghost is at any time present.

37 And, because they would not simply mocke the Church, howe long a roawe of errors, lies, deceites, and wickednesses haue they knitte to one error? so that a man may say, that they did nothing but seke a denne of abominations, when they made of matrimonie a Sacrament. For when they ones obtained this, they drew to themselues the hering of causes of matrimony: for it was a spirituall matter, which profane iudges might not medle with. Then they made lawes, whereby they stablished their tyrannie, but those partly manifestly wicked against God, and partly most vniust toward men. As are these: That mariages made betweene yong periones without consent of their parentes, shoulde remaine of force and stablished. That the mariages be not lawfull betweene kinsfolkes to the seuenth degree: and if any such be made, that they be diuorced. And the very degrees they faine against the lawes of all nations, and against the ciuile gouernment of Moses. That it be not lawfull for a manne that hath put away an adulteresse, to mary another. That spirituall kinsfolkes may not bee coupled in mariage. That there be no mariages celebrate, from Septuagesime to the vtas of Easter, in three weekes before Midsommer, nor from Aduent to Twelstide. And innumerable other like, which it were long to rehearse. At length we must crepe out of their mite, wherein our talke hath nowe taried longer than I would. Yet I thinke I haue somewhat profited, that I haue partly plucked the lions skinnies from these asses.

The xx. Chapter.

Of ciuile Gouernement.

NOwe whereas we haue aboue set two kindes of gouernement in man: and whereas we haue spoken enough of the one kinde which consisteth in the soule or in the inward man, and hath respect to eternall life: this place requireth that we speake somewhat also of the other, which pertaineth onely to the ciuile and outward righteousnesse of maners. For the course of this matter seemeth to be seuered from the spirituall doctrine of faith, which I toke in hande to entreate of: yet the proceeding shall shewe that I do rightfully ioine them together, yea that I am of necessity compelled to do it: specially sith on the one side, mad and barbarous men do furiously go about to ouerthrowe this order stablished by God: and on the other side the flatterers of princes, aduancing their power without mesure, sticke not to set it against the empire of God himselfe. Vnlesse both these mischeues be met withal, the purenesse of faith shall be lost. Beside that it is not smally for our behofe, to knowe howe louingly God hath in this behalfe prouided for mankinde, that there may florish in vs a greater desire of godlinesse to witnesse our thankfulnesse, first, ere we enter into the thing it selfe, we must holde fast that distinction which we haue aboue set, least (as it commonly happeneth to many) we vnwisely mingle these two things together, which haue altogether diuerse consideration. For whē they heare that liberty is promised by y^e Gospel, which acknowledgeth amonge men no king and no magistrate, but hath regarde to Christ alone: they thinke that they can take no fruit of their libertie, so long as they see any power to haue preeminēce ouer them. Therefore they thinke that nothing shalbe safe, vnlesse the whole world be reformed into a newe fashion: where may neither be iudgements, nor lawes, nor magistrats, nor any such thing which they thinke to withstande their libertie. But whosoeuer can put differēce betwene the body and the soule, betwene this present and transitorie life, and that life to come and eternall: he shall not hardly vnderstande that the spirituall kingdome of Christ, and the ciuile gouernement are thinges far a sonder. Sith therefore that is a Iewish vanitie, to seke & enclose the kingdome of Christ vnder the elements of this world: let vs rather thinking, as the Scripture plainly teacheth, that it is a spirituall fruit, which is gathered of the benefite of Christ, remember to kepe within the boundes thereof this whole libertie which is promised & offred vs in him. For, what is the cause why the same Apostle which biddeth vs to stande, and not to be made subiecte to the yoke of bondage, in an other place forbiddeth bond seruantes to be carefull of their state: but because spirituall libertie may very well agree with ciuile bondage? In which sense also these his sayings are to be taken: In the kingdome of God there is no Iewe, nor Grecian, no male nor female, no bondeman nor freeman. Againe, There is no Iew nor Grecian, Circumcision, Vncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, Bondman, Freman: but Christ is all in all. Whereby he signifieth, that it maketh no matter in what estate thou be among men, nor vnder the lawes of what nation thou liuest: forasmuch as in these things consisteth not the kingdome of Christ.

2 Yet doth not this distinction tende hereunto, that we should thinke that the whole order of policie is an vnclane thing, not pertaining at all to Christiā men. So in deede do the phrentike men, that are delited with vnbridled licentiousnesse, crie out and boist. For sith we be dead by Christ to the elements of this world, & being remoued into the kingdome of God do sit among the heauenly ones: they thinke that it is vnworthy for vs, and farre beneth our excellence, to be occupied with these prophane and vnclane cares that are busied about affaires not pertaining to a Christian man. To what purpose (say they) are lawes without iudgements and iudgement seates? But what hath a Christian man to do with iudgements themselues? yea if it be not lawfull to kill, wherto serue lawes and iudgements among vs? But as we haue euen nowe geuen warning, that this kinde of

gouernment is feuerall from that spirituall and inward kingdome of Christ:so it is also to be knowen that they nothing disagree together. For the Ciuile gouernment doth now beginne in vs vpon earth certaine beginnings of the heauenly kingdom, and in this mortall and vanishing life,doth as it were entre vpon an immortall and incorruptible blessednesse: but the entent of this spirituall gouernment is, so long as we shall liue amonge men, to cherish and maintaine the outward worshipping of God, to defend the sound doctrine of godlines and the state of the Church, to frame our life to the fellowship of mē, to fashio our maners to ciuil righteousnes, to procure vs into frendship one with an other, to nourishe common peace and quietnes:all which I graunt to be superfluous,if the kingdom of God,such as it is now among vs, do destroy this present life. But if the will of God be so,that we while we longe toward the heauenly countrey, should be wayfaringe from home vpon the earth: & sith the vse of such wayfaringe nedeth such helpes: they which take them from man, do take from him his very nature of man.For whereas they alleage that there is so great perfection in the Church of God,that her owne moderate gouernment suffiseth it for a law:they theselues do foolishly imagine that perfection which can neuer be found in the common fellowship of men.For sith of naughty men the pride is so great, & the wickednes so obstinate,as cā not be restrained with great sharpnes of lawes: what thinke we that they will do, if they see vnpunished liberty lye open to their lewdnes, which can not euen with force be sufficiently compelled not to do euill?

3 But of the order of policy, there shalbe an other fitter place to entreate. Now our meaning is to haue this onely vnderstanded,that to thinke to diue it away,is outragious barbarousnesse,the vse wherof is no lesse amonge men,than of bread,water,the sunne,& aire, but the dignity much more excellent. For it tendeth not only hereunto (which is the onely commodity of all those thinges) that men may breath,eate,drinke & be cherished (although in dede it comprehendeth all these thinges, while it maketh that they liue together) yet I say,it tedeth not hereunto only:but also y idolatry, sacrileges against the name of God, blasphemies against his trueth, and other offences of religion may not rise vp and be scattered amonge the people,that common quiet be not troubled, that euery man may keepe his owne safe and vnappaired, that men may vse their affaires together without hurt, that honesty and modesty be kept among them:finally that amonge Christians may be a common shew of religion,and amonge men may be manlike ciuility. Neither let any mā be moued,for that I do now referre the care of stablishinge of religion to the policy of men, which I seme before to haue set without the iudgement of mē. For I do no more here, than I did before, giue men leaue after their owne will to make lawes concerning religion and the worshippinge of God, when I allowe the ordinance of pollicy, which endeuoreth hereunto, that y true religion which is contained in the law of God, be not openly and with publike sacrileges freely broken and defiled. But the readers beinge holpen by the very plainnesse of order, shall better vnderstande what is to be thought of the whole kinde of ciuile gouernment, if we seuerally entreat of the partes thereof. There be three parts of it: the magistrate, which is the gouernour and keper of the lawes, y lawes according to which he gouerneth: y people, which are gouerned by the lawes, & obey y magistrate. Therefore let vs first consider of the office of the Magistrate, whether it be a lawfull vocation & allowed of God, what maner of office he hath, & how great is his power: then with what lawes a Christian ciuile state is to be ordered: then last of all, what profite of the lawes commeth to the people, what reuerence is due to the Magistrate.

4 The Lorde hath not only testified that the office of magistrates is allowed & acceptable to him, but also setting out the dignity thereof with most honorable titles, he hath maruelously commended it vnto vs. That I may rehearse a fewe of them. Whereas whosoever be in place of magistrates are named gods, let no mā thinke that in that naminge is small importance: For thereby is signified that they haue commaudemēt from God, that they are furnished with the authority of God, & do altogether beare the person of God, whose steede they do after a certaine maner supply. This is not my cauillation, but the exposition of Christ. If the Scripture (saith he) called them gods to whom the word of God was giuen: What is this else, but that God hath committed his businesse to them, that they shoulde serue in his office, & (as Moses and Iosaphat said to their iudges whom they appointed in euery seuerall city of Iuda) that they should sit in iudgement, not for mā but for God? To the same purpose maketh this that the wisdom of God affirmeth by the mouth of Salomon, that it is his worke, that kinges reigne, and counsellors decree righteous thinges, that Princes beare principality, and al the iudges of the earth execute iudgement. For this is all one in effect as if it had bin sayd, that it cometh not to passe by the peruersenesse of men, that the gouernment of al things in earth is in the hād of kinges & other Rulers, but by the prouidence and holy ordinance of God, to whom it so seemed good to order the matters of menne: forasmuch as he is both present and president

president among them in making of lawes and in executing vprightnesse of iudgementes. Which Paul also plainely teacheth, when he reckoneth Governementes among the giftes of God, which being diuersly distributed accordinge to the diuersity of grace, ought to be employed of the seruants of Christ to the edification of the Church. For although he there properly speaketh of a councell of graue men, which in the Primitiue Church were appointed that they shoulde haue the rule of orderinge the publiké discipline (which office in the Epistle to the Corinthians he calleth Governmēt) yet forasmuch as we see that the ende of ciuile power commeth to the same point, it is no dout but that he commendeth vnto vs all kinde of iust Government. But he speaketh more plainely, where he purposely maketh a full discourse of that matter. For he both sheweth that Power is y ordinance of God, and that there are no powers, but they are ordained of God: and that the Princes themselues are the ministers of God, to the wel doers vnto praise: to y euil, reuengers vnto wrath. Hereunto may be added also the examples of holy menne: of which some haue possessed kingdomes, as Dauid, Iosias, Ezechias: other some, Lordships, as Ioseph and Daniell: other some, Ciuile gouernementes in a free people, as Moses, Iosue, and the Iudges: whose offices the Lorde hath declared that he alloweth. Wherefore none ought now to dout that the ciuile power is a vocation not only holy and lawfull before God, but also the most holy, and the most honest of all other in the whole life of men.

5 They which couet to bring in a state without Rulers, take exception and say that although in old time there were kings & Iudges ouer the rude people, yet at this day that seruile kinde of gouerninge agreeth not with the perfection which Christ hath brought with his Gospell. Wherein they bewray not onely their ignorance, but also their deuilish pride, while they take vpon themselues perfection, of which not so much as the hundreth part is seene in them. But what maner of men soeuer they be, it is easie to confute it: because where Dauid exhorteth all kinges and Rulers to kisse the sonne of God, he doth not bid them, giuinge ouer their authority, to stake themselues to a priuate life, but to submit the power that they beare to Christ, that he alone may haue preeminence aboue all. Likewise Esay, when he promiseth y kinges shalbe fosterfathers of the Church, & Quenes shalbe nourses, he doth not depose them from their honor: but rather doth by an honorable title make them defenders to the godly worshippers of God? For, that prophecy pertaineth to the comminge of Christ. I do wittingely passe over many testimonies which do eche where offer themselves, & specially in the Psalmes wherein all gouernours haue their right maintained. But most cleare of all is the place of Paul, where admonishing Timothee that in the common assembly praier must be made for kings, he by and by addeth a reason, 1. Tim. 2 That we may vnder them lead a quiet life with all godlines & honesty: in which wordes he committeth the state of the Church to their defense and saueguarding.

6 Which consideration ought continually to busie the magistrates themselves, forasmuch as it may put a great spurre to them whereby they may be pricked forward to their duety, and bring them a singular comfort whereby they may mitigate the hardnesse of their office, which truely are both many and great. For with howe great an endeouour of vprightnesse, wisdom, mildnesse, continence, and innocency, ought they to charge themselves, which know themselves to be appointed ministers of the righteousnes of God? By what affiance shall they admit vniustice to their iudgement seate, which they heare to be the throne of the liuinge God? By what boldenesse shall they pronounce a wrongful sentence with that mouth, which they vnderstand to be appointed an instrumēt for the truth of God? With what conscience shall they subscribe to wicked decrees with the hande, which they knowe to be ordained to wryte the actes of God? In a summe, if they remember that they be the vicegerentes of God, they must watch with all care, earnestnesse, and diligence, that they may represent in themselves vnto men a certaine image of the prouidēce, preferuation, goodnesse, good will, and righteousnesse of God. And they must continually set this before their eies, that if all they be accursed, that do execute in deceite the worke of the vengeāce of God, they are much more greuouly accursed, that vse themselves deceitfully in a rightfull vocation. Therefore when Moses & Iosaphat minded to exhort their iudges to their duty, they had nothing more effectuell to moue their mindes withall, than that which we haue before rehearsed, Looke what ye do. For ye sit in iudgement not for man but for God: namely he which is neere to you in the cause of iudgement. Now therefore let the feare of the Lorde be vpon you. Looke & be diligent: because there is no peruersenes with y^e Lord our God. And in an other place it is said, y^e God stode in y^e assembly of the gods, & sitteth iudge in the midst of the gods, that they may be encouraged to their duety when they heare y^e they be the deputies of God, to whome they must one day yeelde accompt of the government of their charge. And worthily this admonitiō ought to be of great force with them. For if they make any default, they are not onely wronge

does to men whom they wickedly vexe, but also sclaūderers to God himselfe, whose holy iudgementes they defile. Againe they haue also whereupon they may singularly comfort themselues, when they cōsider with themselues that they are not busied in prophane affaires & such as are not fitte for the seruant of God, but in a most holy office, namely forasmuch as they are the deputies of God.

7 As for them that are not moued with so many testimonies of Scripture from being bolde to raile at this holy ministry, as a thinge disagreeing with Christian religion and godlinesse: what do they else but raile at God himselfe, the dishonor of whom can not but be ioined with the reproche of his minister? And verily they do not refuse the magistrates, but do cast away God, that he shoulde not reigne ouer them. For if the Lord sayd this truely of the people of Israel, because they had refused the gouernment of Samuel: why shal it be lesse truely sayd at this day of them that giue themselues leaue to rage against all gouernmentes ordained of God? But sith the Lord sayd to the disciples, that the kings of nations beare rule ouer them, but that amonge them it is not so, where he that is the first must be made the least: by this sayinge it is forbidden to all Christians that they shoulde not take kingdomes or gouernmentes vpon them. O handsome expositors. There rose a strife among the disciples, which of them excelled other: the Lord, to suppressse this vaine ambition, taught them that their ministry is not like vnto kingdomes, in which one manne hath preeminence aboue the rest. I beseeche you, what doth this comparison make to y^e dishonor of kingly dignity? yea what doth it proue at all, but that the ministry of an Apostle is not the office of a kinge? Moreouer although among the magistrates themselues there be diuerse formes, yet there is no difference in ths behalfe, but y^e we ought to take them all for the ordinances of God. For Paul also doth comprehend them altogether, when he sayth that there is no power but of God: and that which best liked him of all, is commended with notable testimony aboue the other, namely the power of one: which because it bringeth with it a common bondage of all, (except that one man, to whose will it maketh all thinges subiect) in olde time coulde lesse be allowed of noble and the excellent sorte of natures. But the Scripture, to meete with their vniust iudgementes, expressly by name affirmeth, that it is the prouidence of Gods wisdome that kinges do reigne, and peculiarily commaundeth the king to be honored.

8 And truely it were very vaine that it shoulde be disputed of private men, which shoulde be the best state of policy in the place where they liue: for whome it is not lawfull to consult of the framing of any common weale. And also the same could not be simply determined without rashnes, forasmuch as a great parte of the order of this question consisteth in circumstances. And if thou compare also the states themselues together without circumstances, it shall not be easie to discern which of them ouerweighth the other in profitableness, they match so egally together. There is an easie way to fall from kingdom into tyranny: but not much harder is it to fall from the rule of the chiefeest men to the faction of a fewe: but most easie of all, from the peoples government, to sedition. Truly, if those three formes of governments which the Philosophers set out, be considered in themselves, I will not deny that either the government of the chiefeest men, or a state tempered of it and common government far excelleth all other: not of it selfe, but because it most seldom chaunceth that kings so temper themselves, that their wil neuer swarueeth from that which is iust and right, againe, that they be furnished with so great sharpnesse of iudgement and wisdom, that euery one of the seeth so much as is sufficient. Therefore the fault or default of men maketh, that it is safer & more tolerable that many should haue the government, that they may mutually one helpe an other, one teach and admonish an other, and if any aduance himselfe hier than is mete, there may be ouerseers and maisters to restraine his wilfulnesse. This both hath alway bin approued by experience, and the Lord also hath confirmed it with his authority, whē he ordained among the Israelites a government of the best men very neere vnto common government, at such time as he minded to haue them in best estate, till he brought forth an image of Christ in Dauid. And as I willingly graunt that no kinde of government is more blessed than this, where liberty is framed to such moderation as it ought to be, and is orderly stablished to continuance: so I compt them also most blessed, that may enioy this estate: & if they stoutly and constantly trauaill in preserving and retaininge it, I graunt that they do nothing against their duety. Yea & the magistrates ought with most great diligence to bend themselves hereunto, that they suffer not the liberty of the people, of which they are appointed gouernours, to be in any part minished, much lesse to be dissolved: if they be negligent & litle careful therein, they are false Faith-breakers in their office, & traiters of their contree. But if they would bring this kinde to themselves, to whom the Lord hath appointed an other forme of government, so that thereby they be moued to desire a change, the very thinking thereof shall not only be foolish & superfluous, but also hurtfull. But if thou bende not thine eyes only to one city, but looke about or behold the whole world together, or at least spread abroade thy sight into farther distances of contrees, without doubt thou shalt finde that this is not vnprofitably appointed by the prouidence of God, that diuerse contrees should be ruled by diuerse kindes of gouernment. For as the elementes hange together but by an vnegall temperature, so contrees, also are with their certaine inequality very well kept in order. Howbeit all these things also are spoken in vaine to them whom the will of the Lord shall satisfie. For if it be his pleasure, to set kinges ouer kingdomes, Senates or officers ouer free cities, whomsoever he maketh rulers in the places where we are conuersant, it is our duty to shew our selues yielding & obedient vnto them.

9 Now y office of Magistrats is in this place to be declared by the way, of what sort it is described by y word of God, & in what thinges it consisteth. If the Scripture did not teach, that it extendeth to both the tables of the law, we might learne it out of the prophane writers. For none hath entreated of the duty of magistrates, of makinge of lawes & of the publike weale, that hath not begon at religion and the worshipping of God. And so haue they all cōfessed, that no policy can be happily framed, vnlesse the first care be of godlines: and that those lawes be preposterous which neglecting the right of God, do provide only for men. Sith therefore with all the Philosophers religiō hath the first place, and sith the same hath alway bin obserued by the vniuersall consent of al nations, Let Christiā Princes & magistrates be ashamed of their slothfulness, if they endeuor not themselues to this care. And we haue already shewed, that this duty is specially enioyned them of God: as it is mete, that they should employ their trauail to defende & maintaine his honor, whose vicegerentes they be, & by whose benefit they gouerne. For this cause also chiefly are the holy kings praised in Scripture, for that they restored the worship of God being corrupted or ouerthrowen, or tooke care of religiō, that it might flourish pure and safe vnder them. But contrariwise the holy historie reckoneth states without gouernours, amonge faults, saying that there was no king in Israell, and that therefore euery man did what pleased himselfe. Whereby their follie is confuted, which would haue them, neglecting the care of God, only to apply themselues to be iudges of law amonge men. As though God appointed gouernours in his name to decise cōtrouersies, & omitted that which was of much weightier importāce, that he himselfe should be worshipped according to the prescribed rule of his law. But a desire to innouate all things without punishment, moueth troublesome men to this point, that they wishe all reuengers of the breach of peace to be takē away. As for so much as Jer. 22.

3. pertaineth to the second table, Jeremy warneth kinges, to do iudgement and righteousnesse, to deliuer the forceably oppressed from the hande of the false accuser, not to greue the straunger and widowe, not to do wrong, and not to shed innocent blood. To the same purpose maketh the exhortation which is read in the 82. Psalme, that they should render right to the poore and needy, acquite the poore and needy, deliuer the poore and needy from the hande of the oppressor. And Moses giueth charge to the Princes whom he had sette in his stede: let them heare the cause of their brethren, and iudge betwene a man and his brother and a straunger, and not know faces in iudgement, let them heare as well the litle as the great, and be not afraid of any man: because it is the iudgement of God. But I speake not of these things: that kinges should not get to themselves multitudes of horses, not cast their mindes to couetousnesse, not be lifted vp about their brethren: that they may be continually busied in studying vpon the law of the Lord all the dayes of their life: that Iudges swarue not to the one side, nor receiue gistes: because in declaringe here the office of magistrates, my purpose is not so much to instruct the magistrates themselves, as to teach other what Magistrates be, & to what ende they are set of God. We see therefore that they be ordained defenders and reuengers of innocence, modesty, honesty, and quietnesse, whose only endeuor shoulde be to prouide for the common safety and peace of all men. Of which vertues Dauid professeth that he will be an exemplar, when he shalbe aduanced to the royall seate: that is, that he will not consent to any euill doinges, but abhorre wicked men, sclaundersers, and proude men, and get to himselfe from echewhere honest and faithfull men. But sith they can not performe this, vnlesse they defende good men from the wronges of the euill, let them helpe the good with succour and defense, let them also be armed with power wherby they may seuerely suppressie open euil doers and wicked men by whose lewdnesse the common quiete is troubled or vexed. For we throughly finde this by experiece which Solon said, that common weales consist of reward and punishment; & that when those be taken away, the whole discipline of cities faileth & is dissolued, For the care of equity and iustice waxeth colde in the mindes of many, vnlesse there be due honor ready for vertue: neither can the wilfulnesse of wicked men be restrained but by seuerity and chastisement of paines. And these two partes the Prophet comprehendeth, when he biddeth kinges and other gouernours to do iudgement and righteousnesse. Righteousnes is, to take into charge of tuition, to embrace, to defende, to reuenge, to deliuer the innocent. Iudgement is,

to withstand the boldnes of wicked men, to repress their violence, to punish their offences.

10 But here, as it seemeth, doth arise a hie and hard question: If by the law of God all Christians are forbidden to kill: and the Prophet prophecieth of the holy mount of God, that is, the Church, that in it they shal not afflict nor hurt: how many magistrates be together both godly and blood sheders? But if we vnderstande, that the Magistrate in executing of punishmentes, doth nothing of himselfe, but executeth the very selfe iudgements of God; we shall be nothinge combred with this dout. The lawe of the Lorde forbiddeth to kill: least manslaughter should be vnpunished, the law maker himselfe giueth to the ministers the swerd in their hand, which they shold draw foorth against all manslayers. To afflict and to hurt, is not the doing of the godly: but this is not to hurt, nor to afflict, by the Lordes commaudemēt to reuenge the afflictions of the godly. I would to God that this were alway present before our mindes, that nothing is here done by the rashnesse of man, but all thinges by the authority of God that commaundeth, which goinge before vs, we neuer swarue out of the right way. Vnlesse perhappes there be a bridle put vpon the righteousnes of God, that it may not punish wicked doings. But if it be not lawfull to appoint any law to it, why shall we cauill against the ministers of it? They beare not the swerd in vaine, saith Paule: for they be the ministers of God to wrath, reuengers to euil doers. Therefore if Princes and other rulers know that nothing shalbe more acceptable to God than their obedience, let them apply this ministerie, if they desire to shew their godlinesse, righteousnesse, & vncorruptnesse allowable to God. With this affection was Moses ledde, when knowing himself appointed by the power of the Lord to be the deliuerer of his people; he laid his hāds vpon the Ægyptiā. Againe, when by slaying of three thousand men in one day, he tooke vengeance of the sacrilege of the people. Dauid also, when nye to the ende of his life he gaue commaundement to Salomon his sonne to slay Ioab & Semei. Whereupon he also rehearseth this amonge the vertues of a king, to slay the wicked of the lande, that all workers of wickednesse, may be driuen out of the city of God. To which purpose also pertai- neth ȳ praise that is giuē to Salomon, Thou hast loued righteousnes and hast hated wickednesse. Howe doth that milde and gētle nature of Moses burne out into so great cruelty, that beinge sprinkeled and embrued with the blood of his brethren; he runneth throughout the campe to new slaughters? How doth Dauid, a man of so great gentle- nes in al his life, among his last breathings make that bloody testamēt, that his sonne shoulde not bringe the hoare heare of Ioab and Semei in peace to the graue ? But they both when they executed the vengeance committed to them of God, so sanctified with cruell dealinge their handes which they had defiled with sparinge. It is an abhomination with kinges, sayth Salomon, to do iniquity, because his throne is stablished in righteousnesse. Againe, The king which sitteth in the throne of iudgement, spredeth his eyes vpon euery euill man. Againe, A wise king scattereth the wicked and turneth them vpon the whele. Againe, Take away the drosse from the siluer and there shall come foorth a vessell to the melter: take away the wicked man from the sight of the king, and his throne shalbe fast set in righteousnesse. Againe, He that iustificieth the wicked, and he that con-demneth the righteous, both are abomination to the Lord. Againe, A rebellious man purchaseth euill to himselfe, and a cruel messenger is sent vnto him. Againe, who so saith to the wicked man, thou art righteous, him peoples and nations do curse. Now if their true righteousnesse be, with drawen sword to pursue guilty and wicked men:

 let them put vp their sword, and holde their hands pure from blood, while in the meane time desperate menne do range with murthers and slaughters: then they shall make themselues guilty of most great wickednesse, so much lesse shall they gette thereby the praise of goodnesse and righteousnesse. Only let there be no precise and cruel rigorousnesse, and that iudgement seate which may worthily be called the rocke of accused men. For I am not he that either fauour extreme crueltie, or do thinke that righteous iudgement can be pronounced, but while clemency the best & surest counsellor of kings, as Salomon affirmeth, the preseruer of the kinges throne is assistent, which a certaine man in olde time truely said to be the principal gift of Princes. Yet a magistrate must take hede to both, that he do neither with rigorousnesse of minde wound rather than heale, or by superstitious affectation of clemency fall into a most cruell gentlenes, if with soft and loose tendernes he be dissolute to the destruction of many mē. For this was in old time not without cause cōmonly spokē vnder y^e empire of Nerua, that it is in dede euill to liue vnder a prince vnder whom nothing is lawful, but much worse vnder whom al things are lawfull.

II But sith sometime kinges and peoples must of necessity take sword in hande to execute such publike vengeance, by this reason we may also iudge that the warres are lawful which are so taken in hand.
 For if there be power deliuered them, whereby they may maintaine quiet to their dominion, whereby they may keepe downe the sedi-

tious stirres of vnquiet men, whereby they may help the forceably oppressed, whereby they may punish euill doinges: can they at fitter season vtter it, than to suppress his rage which troubleth both priuately the rest of euery man, & the common quiet of all men, which seditiously maketh vprores, which committeth violent oppressions and haynous euill doinges? If they ought to be preseruers and defenders of the lawes, they must also ouerthrowe the enterprises of all them by whose wicked doinge the discipline of lawes is corrupted. Yea if they worthily punish those theecues whose iniuries haue extended onely to a few: shall they suffer a whole contree to be without punishment vexed and wasted with robberies? For it maketh no difference whether he be a king or one of the basest of y^e cōmonalty, that inuadeth an others contree into which he hath no right, & spoileth it like an enemy: all are alike to be taken and punished for robbers. This therefore both naturall equitie, and the rule of duetic teacheth that Princes are armed not onely to restraine priuate dueties with iudiciall punishmentes, but also to defend with warre the dominions committed to their charge, if at any time they be enuie like assailed. And such warres the holy Ghost by many testimonies of Scripture declareth to be lawfull.

12 If it be obiected against me, that in the new Testament is neither witness nor example which teacheth that warre is a thing lawfull for Christians: first I answere, that the same rule of making warre which was in old time remaineth also at this day, & that on the contrary side there is no cause that may debarre magistrates from defending of their subiects. Secondly that an expresse declaration of these matters is not to be sought in the writings of the Apostles, where their purpose is not to frame a ciuile state, but to stablish the spirituall kingdome of Christ. Last of all I say that in them also is shewed by the way, that Christ hath by his comming chaunged nothings in this behalfe. For if Christian doctrine (that I may speake in Augustines owne words) condemned all warres, he would rather haue said this to soldiars when they asked counsell of saluation, that they shoulde cast away their weapons, & vtterly withdraw themselues from the warre. But it was said to the: strike no man, do no man wrong, let your wages suffice you. Whom he taught that their wages ought to suffice them, he did verily not forbid them to be warriors. But al magistrates ought here to take great hede, that they nothing at all folow their owne desires: but rather, if they must punish, let them not be borne away with a headlong angrinesse, let them not be violently carried with hatred, let the not broile with vnappeasable rigor, yea let them (as Augustine saith) pity common nature in him in whom they punish his private fault. Or if they must put on armour against the enemy, that is, the armed robber, let them not lightly seeke occasion thereof, nor take it beinge offered vnlesse they be driuen to it by extreme necessity. For if we ought to performe much more than that heathen man required, which would haue warre to seeme a seeking of peace: truely we ought first to attempt all thinges ere we ought to trie the matter by warre. Finally in both kindes lette them not suffer themselues to be caried with any priuate affection, but be led only with common feeling. Otherwise they do very ill abuse their power, which is giuen them, not for their own commodity, but for others benefit & ministry. Moreover of the same rightfull rule of makinge warre hangeth the order both of garrisons, and leagues, & other ciuile fortifications. Garrisons I call those that are placed in townes to defende the borders of the contree: Leagues, which are made with Princes adioining for this couenant that if any trouble happen in their landes they may mutually help them, and ioyne their forces in common together to suppress the common enemies of mankinde: Ciuile fortification, whose vse is in the art of warre.

13 This also I will last of all adde, that tributes and taxes are the lawfull reuenues of princes, which they may chiefly employ to sustain the common charges of their office: which yet they may likewise vse to their private royalty which is after a certaine maner coïoined with honor of the princely state that they beare. As we see that Dauid, Ezechias, Iosias, Iosaphat, and other holy kinges, and Ioseph also and Daniell, according to the state of the person that they did beare, were without offense of godlines sumptuous of the common charge, and we read in Ezechiell that there was a very large portion of land assigned to the kinges. Where although he paint out the spirituall kingdome of Christ, yet he fetcheth the examplar of his similitude from the lawfull kingdom of men. But yet so, that Princes againe on their behalues shoulde remember, that their treasure chambers are not so much their owne private cofers, as the treasuries of the whole people (for so Paule testifieth) which they may not without manifest wrog prodigally wast or spoyle: or rather that it is the very blood of the people, which not to spare, is most cruell vnnaturallnesse: and let them thinke, that their impositions, and subsidies, and other kindes of tributes, are nothing but the supportes of publike necessity, wherewith to wery the poore communitie without cause, is tyrannicall extortion. These thinges do not encourage Princes to wastfull expensc and riot, (as verily there is no neede to adde a fierbrande to their lustes that are of theselues too much already kindled) but sith it much behoueth that they should with pure cōscience before God be bold; to do alý they are bold to do, least with wicked boldner they come into despising of God, they must be taught how much is lawful for them. Neither is this doctrine superfluous for priuate men, that they should not rashly & stubbornly giue themselues leaue to grudge at any expenses of Princes, although they exceede common & ciuile measure.
their

14 Next to the magistrate in ciuile states are lawes, the most stronge sinewes of common weales, or (as Cicero calleth them according to Plato) the soules, without which the Magistrate can not stande, as they againe without the Magistrate haue no liuely force. Therefore nothinge could be more truly said, than that the law is a dumme Magistrate, and that the Magistrate is a liuing law. But whereas I promised to speake, with what lawes a Christian ciuil state ought to be ordered, there is no cause why any mã should looke for a long discourse of the best kinde of lawes, which both should be infinite, & pertained not to this present purpose and place: yet in a few wordes, and as it were by the way, I will touche what lawes it may vse godlily before God, and be rightly gouerned by them amonge men. Which selfe thinge I had rather to haue vtterly passed ouer with silence, if I did not vnderstande that many do herein perillously erre. For there be some that deny that a common weale is well ordered, which neglecting the ciuile lawes of Moses is gouerned by the common lawes of nations. Howe dangerous and troublesome this sentence is, let other menne consider, it shall be enough for me to haue shewed that it is false and foolishe. That common diuision is to be kept, which diuideth the whole lawe of God published into morall, ceremoniall, and iudiciall lawes: and all the partes are to be seuerally considered, that we may knowe what of them pertayneth to vs, and what not. Neither in the meane time lette any manne be combred with this dout, that iudicialls and ceremonialls also pertayne to the morall lawes. For although the olde wryters which haue taught this diuision, were not ignorant that these two later partes hadde their vse about maners, yet because they might be changed and abrogate, the moralls remaininge safe they did not call them moralls. They called that first part peculiarly by that name, without which can not stande the true holinesse of manners, and the vnchangeable rule of liuinge rightly.

15 Therefore the Morall law (that I may first beginne thereat) sith it is cōtained in two chiefe pointes, of which the one commaundeth

Gal. 4.4 simply to worship God with pure faith and godlinesse, & the other to embrace men with vnfaigned loue, is the true and eternall rule of righteousnes, prescribed to the men of all ages & times that will be willing to frame their life to the will of God. For this is his eternal & vnchangeable will, that he himselfe should be worshipped of as all, & that we should mutually loue one an other. The Ceremonial law was the schooling of the Iewes, wherewith it pleased the Lord to exercise the certaine childhoode of that people, till that time of fulnes come, wherin he would to the ful manifestly shew his wisdom to the earth, & deliuer the trueth of those things which then were shadowed with figures. The iudiciall law giuen to them for an order of ciuile state, gaue certaine rules of equity & righteousnes, by which they might behaue themselues harmlesly & quietly together. And as that exercise of ceremonies properly pertained in dede to the doctrine of godlinesse (namely which kept the Church of the Iewes in the worship & religion of God) yet it might be distinguished from godlinesse it selfe: so this forme of iudiciall orders (although it tended to no other ende, but how the selfe same charity might best be kept which is commaunded by the eternall law of God) yet had a certaine thing differing from the very commaundement of louing, As therfore the Ceremonies might be abrogate, godlinesse remaining safe and vndestroyed: so these iudiciall ordinances also being takē away, the perpetual duties & commaundementes of charity may continue. If this be true, verily there is liberty left to euery nation to make such lawes as they shall foresee to be profitable for them: which yet must be framed after y^e perpetual rule of charity, that they may in dede vary in forme, but haue the same reason. For I thinke that those barbarous & sauage lawes, as were those that gaue honor to theues, that allowed common copulations, & other both much more filthy & more against reason, are not to be taken for lawes: forasmuch as they are not only against all righteousnes, but also against naturall gentilnes and kindenesse of men.

16 This which I haue sayd shalbe playne, if in all lawes we behold these two things as we ought, the making and the equity of the law, vpon the reason wherof the making it selfe is founded & staieth. Equity, because it is naturall, can be but one of all lawes: and therefore one law, according to the kinde of matter, ought to be the propounded ende to all lawes. As for makings of Lawes, because they haue certaine circūstances vpon which they partly hang, if so y^e they tend al together to one marke of equity, though they be diuerse it maketh no matter. Now sith it is certaine that the law of God which we call moral is nothing else but a testimonie of the natural law, and of that conscience which is engrauen of God in the mindes of menne, the whole rule of this equity whereof we now speake is set forth therein. Therefore it alone also must be both the marke and rule and end of all lawes. Whatsoever lawes shalbe framed after that rule, directed to that marke, and limited in that ende, there is no cause why we should disallow them, howsoever they otherwise differ from the Iewishe law or one from an other. The lawe of God forbiddeth to steale. What peine was appointed for thefts in the ciuile state of the Iewes, is to be seene in Exodus. The most auncient lawes of other nations punished theft with recompence of double: the lawes that followed afterwarde, made difference betwene manifest theft and no manifest. Some proceeded to banishment, some to whippinge, some at last to the punishment of death. False witnessse was among the Iewes punished with recompence of egall paine, in some places onely with great shame, in some places with hanginge, in other some with the Crosse. Manslaughter al lawes vniuersally do reuenge with blood, yet with diuerse kindes of death. Against adulterers in some places were ordained seuerer paines, in some places lighter. Yet we see how with such diuersity all tende to the same ende. For with one mouth they al together pronounce punishment against all the offences which haue bin condemned by the eternall law of God, as manslaughters, thefts, adulteric, false witnessings: but in the maner of punishment they agree not. Neither is the same needefull, nor yet expedient. There is some contree, which vnlesse it shew rigor with horrible examples against manslayers, should immediatly be destroyed with murders & robberies. There is some time that requireth the sharpnesse of paines to be increased. If there arise any trouble in a common weale, the euills that are wont to growe thereof must be amended with newe ordinances. In time of warre all humanitie woulde in the noyse of armure fall away, vnlesse there were cast into men an vnwonted feare of punishments. In barennesse, in pestilence, vnlesse greater seueritie be vsed, all thinges will come to ruine. Some nation is more bent to some certaine vice, vnlesse it be most sharply suppressed. How malicious and enuious shall he be against the publike profite, that shalbe offended with such diuersitie which is most fitte to holde fast the obseruinge of the lawe of God? For, that which some say, that the Lawe of God giuen by Moses is dishonored, when it beinge abrogate, newe are preferred aboue it, is most vaine. For neither are other preferred aboue it, when they are more allowed, not in simple comparison, but in respect of the estate of the times, place, and nation:

neither is that abrogate which was neuer made for vs. For the Lord gaue not that law by the hande of Moses, which should be published into al nations, and flourish euery where: but when he had receiued the nation of the Iewes into his faith, defence, & protection, he willed to be a lawemaker peculiarly to them, and like a wise lawemaker, he hadde in makinge of his lawes a certaine singular consideration of them.

17 Now remaineth that we consider that which we haue set in the last place, what profit of lawes, iudiciall orders, and magistrates, cometh to the common felowshippe of Christians. Wherewith also is coupled an other question, howe much priuate men ought to yeelde to magistrates, and howe farre their obedience ought to proceede. Many thought the office of magistrate to be superfluous among Christians, because forsooth they can not godly craue their aide, namely sith they are forbidden to reuenge, to sue in the law, & to haue any controuersie. But whereas Paule contrariwise plainly testifieth, that he is the minister of God to vs for good: we thereby vnderstand, that he is so ordained of God, that we beinge defended by his hande and succours against the maliciousnes & iniuries of mischieuous mé, may liue a quiet and assured life. If he be in vaine giuen vs of the lord for defence, vnlesse it be lawfull for vs to vse such benefite: it sufficiently appeareth that he may also without vngodlinesse be called vpon and sued vnto. But here I must haue to do with two kindes of menne. For there be many men that boyle with so great rage of quarelling at the lawe, that they neuer haue quiet with themselues vnlesse they haue strife with o^{ther}. And their controuersies they exercise with deadly sharpnesse of hatred, and with mad greedines to reuenge and hurt, & do pursue them with vnappeasable stiffenesse euen to the very destruction of their aduersarie. In the meane time, that they may not be thought to do any thing but rightfully, they defend such peruersenes with colour of law. But though it be graunted thee to go to law with thy brother, yet thou maist not by and by hate him, not be carried against him with furious desire to hurt him, not stubbornly to pursue him.

18 Let this therefore be said to such men, that the vse of lawes is lawfull, if a man do rightly vse it. And that the right vse both for the pleintife to sue, and for the defendant to defende, is if the defendant beinge summoned do appeare at an appointed day, and doth with such exception as he can, defende his cause without bitterness, but onely with this affection to defend that which is his owne by law: & if the pleintife being vnworthily oppressed either in his person or his goodes, goodes, do resort to the defence of the Magistrate, make his complainte, and require that which is equitie and conscience, but farre from all greedy will to hurte or reuenge, farre from sharpnesse and hatred, farre from burning heate of contention, but rather redy to yeld of his owne and to suffer any thing, than to be caried with an enemilike minde against his aduersarie. Cōtrariwise when being filled with malice of minde, corrupted with enuie, kindled with wrath, breathing out reuenge, or finally so enflamed with the heate of the contention, they geue ouer any parre of charitie, the whole proceeding euen of a most iust cause can not but be wicked. For this ought to be a determined principle to all Christians, that a controuersie though it be neuer so righteous, can neuer be rightly pursued of any man, vnlesse he beare as good will and loue to his aduersarie, as if the matter which is in controuersie were already concluded and ended by composition. Some man will here peradventure say, that such moderation is so neuer vsed in going to lawe, that it should be like a miracle if any such were founde. I graunt in deede, as the maners of these times be, that there is seldome sene an example of a good con- tender in lawe, yet the thing it selfe being defiled with addition of no euell, ceasseth not to be good and pure. But when we heare that the help of y Magistat is a holy gift of God: we must so much the more diligently take hede, that it be not defiled by our faulte.

19 As for them that precisely condemne al contendings at law, let them vnderstande that they do therewithall despise the holy ordinace of God, and a giste of that kinde of gistes which may be cleane to the cleane: vnlesse peradventure they will accuse Paule of wicked doing, which did both put away from himselfe the sclanders of his accusers with declaring also their deceite and maliciousnesse, and in iudgemēt claimed for himselfe the prerogatiue of the citie of Rome, and when neede was he appelled from an vnrighteous gouernor to the Emperors iudgemēt seate. Neither withstandeth it, that all Christians are forbidden to desire reuenge, which we also do driue farre away from Christian iudgemēt seates. For, if the contention be about a common case, he goeth not the right way that doth not with innocent simplicitie, commit his cause to the iudge as to a common defender, thinking nothing lesse than to render mutuall recompence of euill, which is the affection of reuenge: or if any matter of life and death, or any greate criminall action be commenced, we require that the accuser be such a one, as commeth into the court being taken with no boiling heate of reuenge, and touched with no displeasure of priuate iniurie, but onely hauing in minde to withstande the enterprises of a mischeuous manne , that they may not hurt the common weale. But if thou take away a reuenging minde , there is no offence done against that commaundement whereby reuenge is forbidden to Christians. But they are not onely forbidden to desire reuenge, but they are also commaunded to wait for the hande of the Lorde, which promiseth that he will be a present reuenger for the oppressed and afflicted: but they do preuent all reuenge of the heauenly defendor, which require helpe at the Magistrats hande either for themselues or other. Not so. For we must thinke that the Magistrats reuenge is not the reuenge of man but of God, which (as Paule saith) he extendeth and exerciseth by the ministerie of man for our good.

20 And no more do we disagree with the wordes of Christ, by which he forbiddeth to resist euell, and commaundeth to turne the righte cheke to him that hath geuen a blowe on the left, and to suffer him to take away thy cloke that taketh away thy coate. He willet in deede there that the mindes of his should so much abhorre from desire of recompensing like for like, that they should soner suffer double iniurie to be done to themselues, than desire to reacquite it: from which patience neither do we also leade them away. For Christians truely ought to be a kinde of men made to beare reproches and iniuries, open to the malice, deceites, and mockages of noughty men: and not that onely, but also they must be bearers of all these euilles, that is to say so framed with all their hartes, that hauing receiued one displeasure they make themselues redy for an other, promising to themselues nothing in their whole life but the bearing of a continual Crosse. In the meane time also they must do good to them that do them wrong, and wishe well to those that curse them, and (which is their onely victorie) striue to ouercome euill with good. Being so minded they will not seke eye for eye, tooth for tooth, as the Pharises taught their disciples to desire reuenge, but (as we are taught of Christ) they will so suffer their body to be mangled, and their goodes to be maliciously taken from them, that they will forgeue and of their owne accorde pardon those euels so sone as they are done to them. Yet this euennesse and moderation of mindes shall not withstande, but that the frendship toward their ennemies remaining safe, they may vse the helpe of the magistrat to the preseruing of their goodes, or for zeale of publike commoditie may sue a giltie and pestilent man to be punished, whom they knowe that he can not be amended but by death. For Augustine truely expoundeth that all these commaundements tende to this ende, that a righteous and godly man should be ready to beare patiently the malice of them whom he seeketh to haue haue made good men, that rather the number of the good may encrease, not that he should with like malice adde himselfe also to the nombre of the euell: then, that they more pertaine to the preparation of the hart, which is inwardely, than to the worke which is done openly: that in secret may be kept patience of minde with good will, but openly that may be done which we see may be profitable to them to whom we ought to beare good will.

21 But this which is wonte to be obiected, that contendings in lawe are altogether condemned of Paule, is also false. It may easily be perceiued by his wordes, that there was an immeasurable rage of struing at lawe in the Church of the Corinthians: so farre forth that they did make the Gospell of Christ and the whole religion which they professed, open to the cauillations and euell speaking of the wicked. This is the first thing that Paule blameth in them, that by their intemperaunce of contentions they brought the Gospell in sclander among the vnbeleuers. And then this point also, that in such sort they strued amōg themselues brethren with brethren. For they were so farre from bearing of wronges, that they greedily gaped one for an others goodes, prouoked one an other, and being vnprouoked did hurte. Therefore he inueyeth against that rage of contending, and not simply against all controuersies. But he pronounceth that it is a fault or a weakenesse, that they did not rather suffer losse of their goodes than to trauaile euen to contentions for the preseruing of them: namely when they were so easily moued with euery damage, and for most small causes did runne to the court of lawe and to controuersies, he saith that this is a profe that they were of a minde to ready to anger and not well framed to patience. Christians verily ought to do this, that they had alway rather to yelde of their owne right than to go to lawe, from whēs they can scarcely get out againe but with a minde to much moued and kindled to hatred of their brother. But when a man seeth that without losse of charitie he may defend his owne, the losse whereof should be a sore hindrance vnto him: if he do so he offendeth nothing against this saying of Paule. Finally (as we haue taught in the beginning) charity shall geue euery man best counsell, without which whatsoever controuersies are taken in hande, and beyonde which whatsoever do procede, we holde it out of controuersie that they be vniust and wicked.

22 The first dutie of subiectes toward their magistrates is, to thinke most honorably of their office, namely which they acknowledge to be a iurisdiction comitted of God, and therefore to esteeme them and reuerence them as the ministers and deputies of God.

For a man may finde some, which yelde themselues very obedient to their magistrats, and would not that there were not some whom they should obey, because they so knowe it to be expedient for the common benefit: but of the magistrats themselues they thinke no otherwise than of certaine necessaric euills. But Peter requireth somewhat more of vs, when he commaundeth that the king be honored: and Salomon, when he commaundeth God and the king to be feared. For Peter vnder the word of Honoring cōteineth a sincere and well deming estimation: & Salomon ioining the king with God, sheweth that he is full of a certaine holy reuerence and dignitie. This is also a notable commendation in Paule, that we obey not onely for wrath but for conscience. Whereby he meaneth that subiectes ought to be ledde not onely with feare of princes and rulers to be holden in their subiection (as they are wont to yeld to their armed enemy, which see that vengeance shall redily be taken vpon them if they resist) but because the obediences that are shewed to them are shewed to God himselve, forasmuch as their power is of God. I speake not of the men, as if the visor of dignitie did couer foolishnesse, or sluggishnesse, or cruelties, or wicked maners and full of mischeuous doing: but I say that the degree it selfe is worthy of honor and reuerence: that whosoeuer be rulers may be esteemed with vs, and haue reuerence, in respect of their being rulers.

23 Of this then also followeth an other thing: that with mindes bent to the honoring of the, they declare their obedience in profe to them: whether it be to obey their proclamations, or to paye tribute, or to take in hande publike offices and charges that serue for comon defence, or to do any other of their commaundements. Let euery soule (saith Paule) be subiect to the hier powers. For he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. The same Paule writeth to Titus: Warne them that they be subiect to rulers and powers, that they obey the Magistrats, that they be redy to euery good worke. And Peter saith, Be ye subiect to euery humaine creature (or rather as I translate it, Ordinance) for the Lordes sake, either to the king as most excellent, or to the rulers that are sent by him, to the punishment in deede of euell doers, but to the praise of well doers. Moreouer that they should testifie that they do not faine subiection, but are sincerely and hartily subiect, Paule addeth that they should commend to God the safetic and prosperitic of them vnder whom they liue. I exhorte (saith he) that there be made prayers, beseechings, intercessions, thankesgeuings for all men, for kings and for all that be set in superiority, that we may liue a peafable and quiet life with al godlinesse and honestie. Neither let any man here deceiue himselfe. For sith the magistrat can not be resisted, but that God himselfe must also be resisted: although it may be thought that an vnarmed magistrat may frely be despised, yet God is armed which will strongly take vengeance on the despising of himselfe. Moreouer vnder this obedience I conteyne moderation, which priuate men ought to binde themselues to kepe in cases touching the publike state, that they do not of their owne head entermedle in publike businesses, or rashely breake into the office of the Magistrat, and enterprise nothing publikely. If any thing shall in a publike ordinace be behouefull to be amēded, let not themselues raise vprores, nor put their hands to the doing of it, which they all ought to haue fast bounde in this behalfe: but let them commit it to the iudgement of the magistrat, whose hand alone is herein at libertie. I meane, that they presume to do nothing vncommaunded. For when the commaundement of the ruler is adioined, then are they also furnished with publike authority. For as they are wont to call the counsellors of a king, his eares and eyes: so not vnfitly a man may call them the handes of the prince, whom by his commaundement he setteth in authoritie for the doing of things.

24 Nowe forasmuch as we haue hetherto described a magistrat such as is in deede the same that he is called, namely the father of the contree, and (as the Poete calleth him) the pastor of the people, the keeper of peace, the protector of righteousnesse, the reuenger of innocence: he is worthily to be iudged a madde man, that alloweth not such a gouernement. But whereas this is in a maner the experience of all ages, that of princes some being carelesse of all things to the foreseeing whereof they ought to haue bene hedefully bent, do without all care slouthfully wallowe in delites: other some addicted to their gaine, do set out to sale all lawes, priuileges, iudgements, and grauntes: other some spoile the pore communaltie of money which they may after waste vpon mad prodigall expendings: other some exercise mere robberies, in pilling of houses, defiling of virgins and matrones, murthuring of innocentes: many can not be perswaded that such should be acknowledged for princes, whoes authoritie they ought to obey so farre as thiomay. For in so great hainous vnworthinesse, among doings so much contrarie to the duerie not onely of a magistrat, but also of a man, they beholde no forme of the image of God which ought to shine in a Magistrat: when they see no token of that minister of God, which was geuen for praise to the good and for vengeance to the euill: so neither do they also acknowledge such a Governour, whoes dignitie and authoritie the Scripture commendeth vnto vs. And truely this feeling of affection hath alway bene naturally planted in the mindes of men, no lesse to hate and abhorre tyrantes, than to loue and honor lawfull kings.

25 But if we loke to the word of God, it will leade vs further, that we be subiect not onely to the gouernement of those princes which execute their office toward vs well and with such faithfulnessse as they ought, but also of all them, which by what meane soeuer it be, haue the dominion in possessiō although they performe nothing lesse than that which pertaineth to the duetic of princes. For though the Lorde testifieth that the magistrat is a speciall great gift of his liberalitie for preseruing of the safetie of men, and appointeth to magistrats themselues their boundes: yet he doth therewithall declare, that of what sort soeuer they be, they haue not their authoritie but from him: that those in deede, which rule for benefite of the cōmon weale, are true exemplars and paternes of his bountifulnesse: that they that rule vniustly & willfully, are raised vp by him to punish the wickednesse of the people: that all egally haue that maiestie wherewith he hath furnished a lawfull power. I will procede no further, till I haue added some certaine testimonies of that point. Yet we neede not much to labor to proue that a wicked King is the wrath of God vpon the earth, for asmuch as I thinke that no man will say the contrary, and otherwise there should be no more sayed of a King than of a common robber that violently taketh away thy goods, and of an adulterer that defileth thy bed, of a murderer that seketh to kill thee, whereas the Scripture reckoneth all such calamities among the curses of God. But let vs rather tary vpon prouing that, which doth not so easily settle in the mindes of mē: that in a most noughty man, and most vnworthy of all honor, if so that he haue the publike power in possession, remaineth that noble and diuine power which the Lorde hath by his word geuen to the ministers of his righteousnesse and iudgement: and therefore that he ought of his subiects to be had in as great reuerence and estimation, so much as pertaineth to publike obedience, as they would haue the best King if he were geuen them.

26 First I would haue the Readers to perceiue and diligently marke that providence and singular doings of God, which is in the Scripture not without cause so oft rehearsed vnto vs, in distributing of kingdomes and making Kings whom it pleaseth him. In Daniel, it is said: The Lorde changeth times and courses of times, he casteth away and maketh Kings. Againe: That the liuing may knowe that the Hiest is mighty in the kingdome of men, and he shall geue it to whom he will. With which maner of sentences whereas the whole Scripture aboundeth, yet that same prophecy of Daniel specially swarmeth full. Nowe what maner of king was Nabuchadonezar, he that cōquered Hierusalem, it is sufficiently knowen, namely a strong inuader and destroyer of other. Yet in Ezechiel the Lorde affirmeth that he gaue him the lande of Egypt for the seruice that he had done to him in wasting it. And Daniel said to him: Thou king arte the king of kings, to whom the king of heauens hath geuen a mighty, & strōg, and glorious kingdome: to thee, I say, he hath geuen it, and all the landes where dwell the children of men, the beasts of the wood, and fowles of the aire: he hath deliuered them into thy hande, and hath made thee to beare rule ouer them. Againe he sayed to his sonne Belsasar: The hiest God hath giuen to Nabuchadonezar thy Father kingdome and royaltie, honor and glory: & by reason of the royaltie that he gaue him, all peoples, tribes, & languages were trembling and fearfull at his sight. When we heare that a king is ordeined of God, let vs therof call to remembrance those heauenly warnings cōcerning the honoring and fearing of a king: then we shall not dout to accōpt a most wicked tyrāt in the same place wherin the Lord hath vouchsafed to sette him. Samuell, when he gaue warning to the people of Israell, what maner of things they should suffer at the hands of their kinges, said: This shalbe the right of the king that shall reigne ouer you: he shall take your sonnes and put them to his chariot, to make them his horsmen, and to plowe his land, and reape his croppe, and to make instruments of warre. He shall take your daughters, that they may be his dressers of ointmentes, his cookes and bakers. Your lands, your vineyardes, and your best Oliue plantes he shall take away and geue to his bonde seruantes. He shall take tithes of your feedes and vineyardes, and shall geue them to his eunuches and bonde seruantes. He shall take away your bonde men, your bonde womē & your asses, and set them to his worke. Yea and he shall take tithes of your flockes: and ye shalbe his bonde seruantes. Verily kings should not haue done this of right, whom the Lawe did very well instruct to all continence: but it was called a right ouer the people which it behoued them of necessitie to obey, and they might not resist it: as if Samuell had said. The wilfulnesse of kings shall runne to such licenciousnesse, which it shall not be your part to resist, to whom this onely thing shalbe left, to obey their commaundements and harken to their word.

27 But chiefly there is in Ieremie a notable place and worthy to be remēbred, which although it be somewhat long, yet I will be cōtent to rehearse, because it most plainly determineth this whole question. I haue made the earth and men, saith the Lorde, and the liuing creatures that are on the ouerface of the earth in my great strength and stretched out arme, and I will deliuer it to him whom it pleaseth in mine eyes. And nowe therefore I haue geuen all these landes into the hande of Nabuchadnezar my seruante, and all nations and great kings shall serue him, till the time shall come of that lande. And it shalbe as a nation and a kingdome that hath not serued the king of Babell, I will visit that nation in swerde, famine, & pestilence. Wherefore, serue ye the king of Babell and liue. We se with howe great obedience the Lorde willed that cruell and proude tyrant to be honored, for no other reason but because he possessed the kingdome. And the same was by the heauenly decree, that he was set in the throne of the kingdome, and taken vp into kingly maiestie, which it was vnlawful to violate. If we haue this cōtinually before our mindes and eyes, that euen y^e worst kings are ordeined by the same decree by which the authoritie of kings is stablyshed: these seditious thoughtes shall neuer come into our minde, that a king is to be handled according to his deseruings, and that it is not mete that we should shewe our selues subiectes to him that doth not on his behalfe shewe himselfe a king to vs.

28 In vaine shall any man obiect that this was a peculiar commaundement to the Israelites. For it is to be noted with what reason the Lorde confirmeth it. I haue geuen (sayeth he) the kingdome to Nabuchadnezar. Wherefore serue ye him and liue. To whom soeuer therefore it shalbe certaine that the kingdome is geuen, let vs not dout that he is to be obeyed. And so sone as the Lorde aduanceth any man to the royall estate, he therein declareth his will to vs that he will haue him reigne. For thereof are generall testimonies of the Scripture. Salomon in the xxviij. Chapter, Many Princes are because of the wickednesse of the people. Againe Iob in the xij. chap. He taketh away subiection from kings, and girdeth them againe with the girdle. But this being confessed, there remaineth nothing but that we must serue and liue. There is also in Ieremie the Prophet an other commaundement of the Lorde, wherein he commaundeth his people to seke the peace of Babilō, whither they had bene led away captiue, and to pray to him for it, because in the peace of it should be their peace. Behold the Israelites being spoiled of all their goods, plucked out of their houses, led away into exile, and cast into miserable bondage, are commaunded to pray for the safetie of the Conqueror: not as in other places we are commaunded to pray for our perse-persecuters : but that the kingdome may be preserued to himselfe and quiet, that they themselues may also liue prosperously vnder him. So Dauid being already appointed king by the ordinance of God, and annoited with his holy oile, when he was without any his deseruing vnworthily persecuted of Saul, yet the hed of him that layed waite for his life, he esteemed holy, which the Lorde had hallowed with the honor of kingdome. Farre be it from me (said he) that I should before the Lorde do this thing to my Lorde the annoited of the Lorde, that I should lay my hande vpon him, because he is the annoited of the Lorde. Againe, My soule hath spared thee, and I haue said, I will not lay my hande vpon my Lorde, because he is the annoited of the Lorde. Againe, Who shall lay his hande vpon the annoited of the Lorde, and shalbe-innocent? So sure as the Lorde liueth, vnlesse the Lorde strike him, or his day be come that he dy, or he go down into battell : farre be it from me that I should lay my hande vpon the annoited of the Lorde.

29 Finally we owe this affection of reuerence yea and deuotion to all our rulers, of what sort soeuer they be, Which I do therefore the oftener repete, that we may learne not to searche what the men themselues be, but take this for sufficiente, that by the will of the Lorde they beare that personage, in which the Lorde himselfe hath emprinted and engraued an inuolable maiestie. But (thou wilt say) Rulers owe mutuall duties to their subiectes. That I haue already cōfessed. But if thou therupon conclude, y obediencies are to be rendered to none but to iuste gouernements, thou art a foolish reasoner. For, husbandes also are bounde to their wiues and parentes to their children with mutuall duties. Let parentes shewe themselues so hard and vnpleasable to their children, whom they are forbidden to prouoke to anger, that with their peuisness they do vnmeasurably wery them: let the husbandes most despitefully vse their wiues, whom they are commaunded to loue, and to spare them as weake vessels: shall yet therefore either children be lesse obediēt to their parentes or wiues to their husbandes? But they are subiect both to euill parentes and husbandes and such as do not their dutie. Yea, whereas all ought rather to endeavor themselues not to looke behinde thē to the bagge banging at their backe, that is, not to enquire one of an others duties, but euery man set before him that which is his owne dutie: this ought chiefly to haue place amonge those y are vnder the power of other. Wherefore if we be vnmercifully tormēted of a cruel Prince, if we be rauenously spoiled of a couetous or riotous Prince, if we be neglected and by the Persians when Cyrus hadde subdued the Medians: And the vnthankfulnesse of the kings of Iuda and Israell, and their wicked obstinatie toward his so many benefices, he did beate downe and bring to distresse sometime by the Assyrians, sometime by the Babilonians, albeit not all after one maner. For, the first sort of men when they were by the lawfull calling of God sent to do such actes:

 in taking armure against kinges, they did not violate that maiestie which is planted in kinges by the ordinance of God: but being armed from heauē they subdued the lesser power with the greater: like as it is lawfull for kinges to punish their Lordes vnder them. But these later sort, although they were directed by the hand of God whether it pleased him, and they vnwittingly did his worke, yet purposed in their minde nothing but mischefe.

31 But howsoeuer the very doings of men be iudged, yet the Lorde did as well execute his worke by them, when he did breake the bloody scepters of proude kinges, and ouerthrewe their intolerable gouern-

gouernementes. Let Princes heare and be affraide. But we in the meane time must take greate hede, that we do not despise or offende that authoritie of Magistrates full of reuerend maiestie, which God hath stablished with most weighty decrees, although it remaine with most vnworthy men, and which do with their wickednesse, so much as in them is, defile it. For though the correcting of vnbridled gouernment be the reuengement of the Lorde, let vs not by and by thinke that it is committed to vs, to whom there is geuen no other commaundement but to obey and suffer. I speake alway of priuate men. For if there be at this time any Magistrates for the behalfe of the people, (such as in olde time were the Ephori, that were set against the kings of Lacedemonia, or the Tribunes of the people, against the Romane Consuls: or the Demarchy, against the Senate of Athenes: and the same power also which paraduenture, as things are nowe, the three estates haue in euery realme, when they holde their principall assemblies) I do so not forbidde them according to their office to withstande the outraging licentiousnesse of kings, that I affirme that if they winke at kings willfully raging ouer and treading downe the poore communitie, their dissembling is not without wicked breache of faith, because they deceitfully be tray the libertie of the people, whereof they knowe themselues to be appointed protectors by the ordinance of God.

Parla-
ments.

32 But in that obedience which we haue determined to be due to the authorities of Gouvernors, this is alway to be excepted, yea chiefly to be obserued, that it do not lead vs away from obeying of him, to whoes will the desires of all kinges ought to be subiect, to whoes decrees all their commaundements ought to yelde, to whoes maiestie their maces ought to be submitted. And truely howe vnorderly were it, for the satisfying of men to runne into his displeasure for whom men themselues are obeyed? The Lorde therefore is the kings of kings: who, when he hath opened his holy mouth, is to be heard alone for altogether and aboue all: nexte to him we be subiect to those men that are set ouer vs: but no otherwise than in him. If they commaunde any thing against him, let it haue no place and let no accompt be made of it: neither let vs herein any thing stay vpon all that dignitie wherewith the Magistrates excell, to which there is no wrong done, when it is brought into order of subiection in comparison of that singular and truely soueraigne power of God. After this reason Daniell denied that he had any thing offended against the king, when he obeyed not his wicked proclamation: because the king had passed his boundes, and had not onely bene a wrong doer

Dan. 6.

Cap. 20. Of the outwarde meanes

to men, but in lifting vp his hornes against God he had taken away power from himselfe. On the other side the Israelites are condemned, because they were too much obedient to the wicked commaundement of the king. For when Ierobeam had made golden calues, they forsakinge the temple of God, did for his pleasure turne to newe superstitions. With like lightnesse their posterity inclined themselves to the ordinances of their kings. With this the Prophet sharply reprocheth them, that they embraced the commaundements of the king: so farre is it of, that the pretense of humilitie may deserue praise, wherewith the flatteres of the court do couer themselves and deceiue the simple, while they say that it is not lawfull for them to refuse any thing that is commaunded them of their Princes: as though God had resigned his right to mortall men, geuing them the rule of mankinde: or as though the earthly power were minished, when it is made subiect to the author of it, before whom euen the heauenly powers do humbly tremble for feare. I knowe howe great and howe present perill hangeth ouer this constantie, because kings do most displeasantly suffer themselves to be despised, whoes displeasure (saith Salomon) is the messenger of death. But sith this decree is proclaimed by the heauenly harald Peter: That we ought to obey God rather than men, let vs comfort our selues with this thought, that we then performe that obedience which the Lorde requireth, when we suffer any thing rather whatsoeuer it be, than swarue from Godlinesse. And that our courages should not faint. Paule putteth also in other spurre to vs: That we were therefore redemed of Christ with so great a price as our redemption cost him, that we should not yelde our selues in thraldome to obey the peruerse desires of men, but much lesse should be bonde to yngodlinesse

Praise be to God.

Adams fall.

The fall of Adam proceded not of intemperance of gluttony, but of infidelitie: for he despising the word & trueth of God, turned out of the way to the lyes of Sathan: which infidelitie opened the gate to ambition & pride, wherunto was adioyned vnthankfulnessse: & ambition was the mother of disobedience. 2. 1. 4.

By the fall of Adam sith other creatures haue bin after a sort deformed, it is no maruel, that all mākinde was corrupted, that is to say: swarued out of kinde from his first originall, & made subiect to curse. This the old Doctors called Originall sinne, but yet did not so plainly set foorth this point of Doctrin as was conueniēt. In the meane time it is proued by reasons and testimonies of Scripture, y^e Pelagius sowly erred when he sayd that by imitation only, not by propagation, sinne passed from the first manne into all his posterity. 2. 1. 5, 6.

And though the pestilence of sinne do principally abide in the soule, yet it doth not therefore pertaine to the discussinge of this Doctrin, to dispute whether the soule of the childe commeth of the engendringe substance of the father: forasmuch as the cause of the infection is not in the substance of the flesh or of the soule, but because it was ordained of God, that those gifts which he at the first had giuen to man, man shoulde haue and lose them for him and his. Finally it maketh not against this doctrine, that the children of the faithful are sanctified. 2. 1. 7.

That by the fall of Adam the naturall gifts in man were corrupted & the supernaturall were taken away, is a sayinge that many haue vsed, but few haue vnderstoode. 2. 2. 4, 16. which sayinge is expounded. 2. 2. 12. that is to say, that the supernaturall gifts, faith, the loue of God, charity toward our neighbours, defiuous endeuor of holines & righteousnes were taken away, but are restored by Christ: & that the naturall gifts, namely the vnderstanding minde, & the heart are corrupted, because the soundnes of vnderstanding & the vprightnes of hart were both taken away: Also that reason in mā was not vterly blotted out, but partely weakened and partely corrupted: and so Will, because it can not be leuered from the nature of man, was not vterly destroyed, but made thrall to corrupt desires. 2. 2. 12.

It is proued by the testimonies of Augustine and of the Scripture, y^e God not only foresaw or suffred, but also by his will disposed the fall of the first man, & in him the vaine of his posterity. 3. 23. 7, 8.

Angels.

Angels are creatures of God, although Moses do not expresse the in the history of the creation. 1. 14. 3

Of the time or order wherein they were created, it is not expedient to enquire, forasmuch as y^e Scripture (which we ought to follow for our rule) declareth nothinge thereof. 1. 14. 4.

Why the heavenly Spirites are called Angels, Armies, Vertues, Principalities, powers, Dominatiōs, Thrones, Goddes. 1. 14. 5.

Concerninge Angels the Scripture teacheth so much as is auayleable for our comfort & for the cōfirminge of our fayth, namely that they are distributeis & ministers of Gods bountifulnes towarde vs, and the same by diuerse wayes. 1. 14. 6, 9.

Not only one Angel hath seuerall care of euery one of vs, but they all with one consent do watch for our safety: & therefore it is superfluous to enquire whether euery mā haue his seuerall angel assigned to be his keper. 1. 14. 7.

Of the number and degrees of Angels, it is curiousnes to enquire, & rashnes to determine: And why, whereas they be Spirites, the Scripture painteth them with wings vnder Cherubin and Seraphin. 1. 14. 8.

Against the Sadduces and such other fantastick men, it is proued by sundry testimonies of the Scripture, that Angels are not qualities or inspirations without substance, but very spirites in deede. 1. 14. 9.

That superstition is herein to be auoyded, and that we giue not to Angels those thinges that belonge only to God and Christ. 1. 14. 10.

For auoydinge of this perill, we must consider that whereas God vseth their seruice, he doth it not of neede, as though he coulde not be without them, but for the comfort of our weakenesse. 1. 14. 11. And therefore whatsoeuer is sayd of the ministry of Angels, ought to be referred to this end, that ouercominge all distrust, our trust in God should be thereby the more strongly stablished, and not y^e they should lead vs away from God. 1. 14. 12.

That the Angels also were created after the likenes of God. 1. 15. 3.

Heaven.*

Although Christ in his rising againe beganne more fully to shew forth his glory & power: yet in his Ascending into heauē he first truly beganne his kingdom, because he then powred out greater abundance of his Spirit, more royally advanced his reigne, & shewed greater power both in helpinge them that are his, and in ouerthrowinge his enemies. And yet that he is so absent accordinge to the presence of his fleshe, that he is alway euery where accordinge to the presence of his maiesty, and with the faithful according to his vnspeakable & invisible grace. 2. 16. 14.

Baptisme.

THe definition of baptisme. The first end thereof is to serue our faith before God, the other ende, to serue our confessiō before mē. It bringeth to our faith three things, first y it is a ligue of our cleansing, assuring vs that all our sinnes are done away. 4. 15. 1. which is proued by testimonies of y Scripture, & y it is not the water that clenseth vs, but the blood of Christ. Sect. 2.

The force of baptisme is not restrained to the time past: but we are by it washed and cleansed once for all our life: & yet that we may not hereof take a liberty to sinne from thence forward. 4. 15. 3.

The power of the keies (as they call it) that is to say, the ministerie of the Church, by which the forgiveness of sinnes is dayly preached vnto vs, is not to be seuered from baptisme. 4. 15. 4.

The seconde fruite of fayth by baptisme, is that it sheweth to vs our mortifyinge in Christ, & a new life in him. 4. 15. 5. The thirde frute is, that it testifieth that we are so vnited to Christ, that we are partakers of all his good things. For which cause Christ is called the proper object of baptisme, and the Apostles baptised into the name of Christ, in whom we do so obtaine the matter both of our cleansing and of our regeneration, as we obtaine the cause thereof in the father, & y effect in the holy Ghost. 4. 15. 6.

It is proued that the baptisme was all one which was ministred of Iohn and of the Apostles, although some of the olde Doctores thought otherwise. 4. 15. 7. and that it maketh not to the contrary, that more abundant graces of the Spirite are poured out, since the resurrection of Christ. But yet there is in baptisme a difference to be made of the person of Christ from Iohn, & frō the Apostles and other ministers. 4. 15. 8.

Both our mortifying & our cleansing were as by shadow signified amōg the people of Israel, by the passage through the sea, and the comfortable calling of the cloude. 4. 15. 9.

It is false whiche some haue taught, that by Baptisme we are restored to the same righteousnesse & purenesse of nature which Adā had at the beginning. And there is shewed that in the children of God do remaine yet some leauinges of sin, although the same reigne not in them: which doth whet their endeuors, and doth not geue them occasion to flatter themselues. 4. 15. 10. 11. the same is proued by Paule. Sect. 12.

Howe Baptisme serueth our confession before men. 4. 15. 13.

What is the order to vse Baptisme, both for confirmation of our faith, and for a confession before men. Where it is shewed that the graces of God are not enclosed in the Sacrament, so as they be geuen to vs by the vertue thereof. 4. 15. 14, 15.

Baptisme is nothing encreased by y^e worthinesse of him that doth minister it, nor diminished by his vnworthinesse: against the Donatistes, and our Catabaptistes which require a rebaptising, because we haue bin baptised in the kingdome of the Pope. 4. 15. 16. their argumētts are confuted. Sect. 17, 18.

Baptisme is a continuall Sacrament of repentaunce for all our life, so that we neede no other Sacrament of penance. 4. 19. 17.

Of the coniuring of the water, the waxe Candell, the Chresme, the blowing, the spittle, and such other trifles added to the simple ceremonie of Christ: and the other of purely ministring it in the Church is shewed. 4. 15. 19.

It is shewed that to minister Baptisme pertaineth to the ministers of the Church & not to priuate men, much lesse to women: and the contrary obiections are confuted. 4. 15. 20, 21, 22.

Baptisme of Infantes.

The Baptising of Infantes doth very wel agree with Christes institution, and with the nature of the signe. 4. 16. &c.

Baptisme succeeded in the place of Circumcision, Wherein they be like, and wherein they be vnlike. 4. 16. 3, 4.

Infantes are not to be debarred from baptisme, sith the Lorde doth make them partakers of the thing signified in Baptisme. 4. 16. 5. and that the Lord doth regenerate Infantes. Sect. 17, 18, 19.

Sith it is certaine that the same couenaunt, which it pleased God to make with Abraham, is sealed in infantes with the outwarde Sacrament, therefore ought baptisme also to haue place among them. 4. 16. 6.

Baptising of infantes is well proued by this that Christ embraced children and layed his handes vpon them. 4. 16. 7.

A confutation of certaine arguments of the enemies of infantes baptisme. 4. 16. 8, 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, 29 the faithfull parentes and to the children. 4. 16. 9. which fruit Satan trauaileth by the Anabaptistes to take from vs. 4. 16. 32.

A cōfutation of the aduersaries arguments, saying, that there be other things signified in Baptisme than there are in Circumcisiō: that our couenaunt differeth from the olde couenaunt: that other are called children at this day than were at that time. 4. 16. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15.

A confutation of their other fained differences betweene Circumcision and baptisme. Sect. 16. Also of this obiection, that baptisme is a Sacrament of repentance and of faith: neither of which can be in tender infancy. 4. 16. 20, 21.

In them of ripe age, faith and vnderstanding ought to go before baptisme: but in infantēs, the baptisme of the faithfull goeth before vnderstanding. 4. 16. 24.

A confutation of their error, which condemne to eternall death all that are not baptised. 4. 16. 26.

This, that Christ was not baptised till his age of 30. yeares, was for a good cause, and maketh nothing for the enemies of infantēs baptisme. 4. 16. 29.

Why the Supper is not to be ministred to ȳ infantēs of the faithfull, and baptisme not to be denied them. 4. 16. 30.

A long rehearfall of the arguments wherwith wicked Seruettus did fight against the baptisme of infantēs, and a confutation of the same arguments. 4. 16. 31.

Of Baptising of infantēs. 4. 8. 16.

Bearing of the Crosse.

It behoueth that we deny our selues, that we may beare ȳ Crosse, because it is Gods will to exercise all his vnder the crosse, beginning at Christ his first begotten sonne. Which fellowship with Christ doth already geue vs great grounde of patience and comforte. 3. 8. 1.

It is for many causes necessary for vs to leade our life vnder a continuall crosse: first to beate downe our arrogāce and trust of our owne strength. And this remedy euen the most holy do neede, as is proued by the exāple of Dauid: 3. 8. 2. Hereby our trust in God is confirmed, & our hope encreased. Sect. 3.

Secondly, that our patience may be tried, and we may be framed to obedience. 3. 8. 4. Which is most needefull for vs, sith the wātonnes of our fleshe is so great to make vs shake of the yoke of God when he doth once handle vs gently. Sect. 5.

Sometime also to punish our offences committed: wherein we acknowledge that he doth the office of a good father rowarde vs, but contrariwise the vnfaithfull are oftentimes made more obstinate. 3. 8. 6.

A singular cōferte when we suffer either shame, or losse, or any other calamitie for righteousnesse: which crosse most properly belongeth to the faithfull. 3. 8. 7.

How necessary it is for the faithfull, in the bitternesse of afflictions, to be furnished with this thought, that God loueth them, but is angry with their faults. 3.4.34.

Bishops.

The name of Bishop in the old Church was giuen to some one in euery seuerall company of ministers; for politike order, and not that they shoulde beare a Lordely rule ouer other. 4.4.2.

It was the office as well of the bishop as of other Priests, to preach and minister the Sacramentes. 4.4.

Calling.

Of y^e effectual or inward Calling, which is a sure testimony of election, & hangeth vpon y^e only free mercy of God. 3.24.1, 2.

Against them, which in predestinatioⁿ do make man a worker with God. Also against them that hang election vpon that which foloweth election. 3.24.3.

The certaintey of our election is to be knowen by the word and callinge of God, and we ought not to preace into the eternall councill of God. 3.24.4.

The father hath chosen vs onely in Christ, in him therefore let vs behold the stedfast grounde of our election. 3.24.5. and so, that there of also we may conceiue a sure confidence of perseuerance to the end. 3.24.6, 7, 8, 9.

Two kindes of calling, vniuersal, and special. 3.24.8.

The Table.

It is proued by diuerse examples and testimonies of Scripture, that the elect before their Callinge do differ nothinge from other menne : and that it is false which some men do dreame, that there is a certaine seede of election planted in their hartes euen from their natiuity. 3. 24. 10, 11.

It is shewed at large that as God doth by the effectuallnesse of his Callinge towarde the elect, make perfect the saluation to which he hadde by his eternall counsell appointed the: so he hath his iudgements against the reprobate, whereby he putteth his purpose concerning them in execution, and maketh a way for his predestination. 3. 24. 12, 13, 14. &c.

Cardinals.

When the name of Cardinals first began, and howe they haue so suddenly start vp to so great honor. 4. 7. 30.

Ceremonies.

The old Ceremonies are taken away, as touchinge their vse onely, but not as touchinge their effect, for we haue the same effect at this day most euidently and effectually in Christ. And this doth nothinge diminishe their holinesse, as it is proued. 2. 7. 16. and beinge weyed by themselues and without Christ, they are worthily called of Paule handewrytinges against vs. 2. 7. 17.

The ordinances concerninge Ceremonies in the Popes lawe, do commaunde obseruation for the most parte vnprofitable, and sometime also foolishhe although they haue a great seeming of wisdom: moreouer they oppresse consciences with their infinite multitude. 4. 10. 11, 12, 13.

The popish Ceremonies can not be executed by this color, that they be ordained for the instruction of y ignorant, as y Ceremonies of the law were: because there appeareth in this point a manifest difference betwene vs and the people before Christ. 4. 10. 14.

The popish ceremonies are beleued to be Sacrifices clesing sinnes, & deseruinge eternall life: they are without doctrine, and are snares to catch mony. 4. 10. 15.

Charity towarde our neighbour.

It is proued, against the Sorbonistes, that Charity is y loue of our neighbour and not of our selues. 2. 8. 54.

Vnder the name of neighbour is contained euery man, be he neuer so much a straunger to vs, and our enemy. 2. 8. 55. & therefore the Schoolemen are condemned of ignorance, which of the commaundementes of God, not to desire reuenge, & to loue our enemies, haue made counsels, to the necessary keepinge whereof monkes alone do binde themselues: and it is proued that the old doctors of the Church, yea & Gregory himselve, thought otherwise. 2. 8. 56, 57.

We haue neede of patience, that we be not weary of doing good to other. And we ought not to haue respect to y vnworthinesse or other qualities of me which might withdraw vs, but to God which so commaundeth vs. 3. 7. 6.

To the fulfilling of all the partes of Charitie, it is not enough if we performe all the dutifull deedes of Charitie, but we must do it with a sincere affection of harte. Wherein the chiefe point is, that we take vppon our selues the person of him whom wee see to neede our helpe. So shall wee auoide disdainfull pride and other corruptinges of Charity. 3. 7. 7.

Christ & the Apostles in rehearsing the summe of the lawe do sometime leaue out the first table: not for that it more auaieth to the summe of righteousness to liue innocently with men, than to honor God with Godlinesse: but bycause vnfaigned Charity is y^e prooffe of true Godlinesse. 2. 8. 52, 53.

A confutation of the Pharisees of our time, which holde that we are iustified by Charity, bycause Paul sayeth that Charity is greater then faith and hope. 3. 18. 8.

An exposition of the tenth commaundement, wherein (as in the former commaundements) is forbidden not onely all purpose to hurt our neighbour, but also all lust or desire against Charity. 2. 8. 49. 58. God doth for good cause & worthily require of vs so greate feruentnesse and vprightnesse of loue. 2. 8. 50.

An exposition of the sixt commaundement, wherein not onely the slaughter or hatred of our neighbour is forbidden vs, but also the preserving of his life is commaunded vs, because man is both our fleshe and the Image of God. 2. 7. 39, 40.

Church.

The Church the mother of the faithfull. 4. 1. 1, 4, 5.

An exposition of this Article of the Creede, I beleue y^e holy Church 4. 1. 2, 3.

The holinesse of the Church is not yet perfited. 4. 8. 12.

Of the inuisible Church: and of the visible Churche, the signes whereof are the pure preaching of the worde and ministratiō of Sacraments. 4. 8. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

Wherefoeuer those signes are, we ought not to departe from that fellowship. 4. 8. 12.

There may some faulte crepe in, either in doctrine or in ministratiō of Sacraments, for the which yet we ought not to cast of the communion of that Church, and much lesse for the imperfectiō of life and corruptnesse of maners: And herein the Anabaptistes are reproued 4. 1. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16.

The Church is none otherwise holy, but that it alway hath many faultes, and yet it ceasserh not to be the Church, as is proued by testimonies of Scripture and the experience of all ages. 4. 1. 17, 18, 19.

See Ministry of the Church.

Churches

The Table.

Churches power as touching Articles of faith.

It is proued by the example of the Apostles and Prophets, and of Christ himself, that whatsoever authoritie the Church hath, is properly not geuen to men, but to the word, the ministracion whereof is committed to them: And therefore it was neuer lawfull for the Church, to teache any other thing, than that which she receiued of the Lorde. 4.8.1,2,3,4,8,9.

Christ hath euer taught his Church: & yet hee hath vsed diuers maners of teaching according to the diuersitie of times, ere the law was written, in the time of the law and the Prophets, & last of all since that he himself was openly shewed in the fleshe. 4.8.5,6,7.

False Church.

Where lying and falsehode hath gotten the vpperhande & reigneth, there is not the Church: And this is proued to be in the papacie, although they there boast of a perpetuall succession of Bishops. 4.2.1,2,3,4.

They are not heretikes or schismatikes that depart from the papacie. 4.2.5,6.

Howe much soeuer a man make the best of the faultes of the popishe Church, yet the state thereof is no better than was in the kingdome of Israell vnder Ierobeam. 4.2.7,8,9,10.

Yet by the goodnesse of God there remaine in the papacie certaine foote-steppes of the Church:

and so is that fulfilled which hath bene writtē, that Antichrist should sit in the temple of God. 4.2.11,12.

A cōparison of the power which the trew Church hath in teaching, with the tirrany of the Pope and his ministers in forging newe articles of faith. 4.8.10. Of the papistes principle, that the Church cannot erre. 4.8.13.

It is false to say that it behoued that the Church should ad to the writings of y^e Apostles. 4.8.14,15,16.

A confutation of the arguments which the papistes make, to proue that there is power geuen to the Church to coine newe articles of faith. 4.8.11.12.

Christ.

Diuerse testimonies of Scripture, which affirme Christ to be God, and first out of the olde testament. 1.13.9,10. then out of the newe testament. Sect. 11.

A profe of the same Godhed, by the workes that are in the Scriptures ascribed vnto him. 1.13.12, also by his miracles and certaine other things. Sect. 13.

A difference betwene Christs working of miracles, and the Prophets or Apostles doing of the like. 1.13.13.

The Table.

It is proued by many and most stronge testimonies of Scripture, that Christ toke vppon him a true substance of mans flesh, and not a Ghost or couterfaite shape of mā; as the Marcionites, fained, nor yet a heauenly body as the Manichees lyingly affirmed. 2. 13. 1.

An exposition of the places of Scripture, which Marcion writhed to the confirmation of his error, and also of those which Manicheus wrested, and many of their disciples do wrest at this day. 2. 13. 2, 3. where also are confuted the newe Marcionites, which to proue that Christ toke his body of nothing, do holde that women haue no seede: There are also certaine other things confuted, which are objected as absurdities. 2. 13. 4.

4. 4. 9.

Concupiscence or Luste.

The difference betweene concupiscence and counsell. 2. 8. 49.

That all the concupiscences of men are euill and gilty of sinne, not inso much as they are naturall, but because they are all inordinate by reason of the corruption of nature. And so did Augustine thinke, if he be diligently weyed. 3. 3. 12. and this is proued by many places of his writings. 3. 3. 13.

Confession, Auricular.

Concerning Confession, the Schooledmines do fight against the Canonistes, affirming that it is not by the commaundement of God. A confutation of the arguments whereupon the first fore do stand, first because the Lorde in the Gospell did send y Leprous whom he had cleansed to the priests: and there is shewed the true meaninge of that doing. 3. 4. 4.

our finnes one to an other. 3.4.6.

The vse of confessing to a priest was very auncient, but yet free as a politike order, not as a lawe set by Christ or his Apostles: and afterwarde the same was abrogate by Nestarius Bishop of the Church of Cōstantinople, because of a Deacō which had vnder y pretence abused a woman. This tyrannous lawe was not laid vpon Churchēs before the time of Innocent the third, about three hundred yeares past, and the foolishnesse and barbarousnesse of that ordinance is declared. 3.4.7.

Witnesses of the said abrogatiō, out of Chrysostome Bishop of Cōstantinople. 3.4.8.

An exposition of Innocētes lawe concerning the confession of all finnes, where are rehearsed the diuerse opinions of the Romishe diuines cōcerning the number and vse of keyes, and the power of binding and loosing. 3.4.15.

By a similitude is described howe a great part of the world hath hether to obeyed such illusions. That it is an impossible lawe, & maketh men hypocrites. And thē is shewed a mōst certaine rule of confession according to the example of the Publicane. 3.4.18.

A confutation of this article, that finnes are not forgeuen, and that the gate of paradise is shut. &c. vnlesse there be first firme y cōceiued a vowe of confessing, where also their obiectiō is cōfuted, that iudgment can not be pronounced till the cause be heard, that is to say, that absolutiō can not be geuen till all the finnes be rehearsed. 3.4.18.

It is no maruell that we cōdemne and abolish auricular confession, and our aduersaries do falsly assigne so great profit vnto it, forsomuch as on the other side it armeth men to boldnesse of sinning. 3.4.19.

They do falsly pretēd that they haue the power of the keyes, sith they are not the successors of the Apostles, nor haue the holy Ghost, forsomuch as they do daily without consideration loose those thinges which the Lorde hath cōmaunded to be bound, and bind what he hath commaunded to be loosed. 3.4.20.

It is proued false that they say y the power of the keyes may sometime be vsed without knowledge, forasmuch as by that meane the absolution should be vncertaine. Where also is spoken of the absolution or condēnation which the ministers of the Gospel, or the church do pronouce according to y word, and of the certaintie therof. 3.4.21.

The absolution of the priests in the Papacie is vncertaine, as well on the behalfe of him that assoileth as of him that confesseth: but cōtrariwise it is in the absolution of the Gospell, which hangeth vpon this onely condition, if the sinner seke his purging in the onely sacrifice of Christ, and do yelde to the grace offred vnto him. 3.4.22.

The Popish Doctors, when they allege for themselves the power of loosing geuen to the Apostles, do wrongfully wrest to auricular confession those sayings which Christ spake partly of preaching of the Gospell, and partly of excommunication. True Confession.

What kinde of cōfessiō is taught vs by the word of God, namely to confesse to God the knower of our hartes & of all our thoughtes. 3.4.9.

Out of this secret confession made to God, foolloweth a voluntary confession before men, so oft as it is behouefull for the glory of God or the humbling of our selues. And of this secōd kinde there was an ordinary vse in the old Church, & is also in the Church at this day. But yet extraordinarily it ought after a speciall maner to be vsed, whensoever it shall happē that the people be gilty in any generall offence, or to be plaged with any calamitie. Of the profite of such confession. 3.4.10, 11.

Of two other sorts of priuate cōfession: of which the first is vsed for our owne cause, when we require comfort of our brethren, because the feling of sinnes doth vex and trouble vs: in which case we must chiefly resort to our pastors: and this remedy is warely & moderately to be vsed, that no bondage be brought in. The other sorte is to appease and reconcile our neighbour, if he be in any thing offended by our fault, vnder which kinde is contened their Cōfession which haue sinned so farre as to the offence of y whole Church. 3.4.12.13.

The power of the keyes hath place in the three kindes of Confessiō Of the frute which they that confesse do receiue thereby, because they knowe that forgeuenes of sinnes is declared to them by the messenger of Christ. 3.4.14.

Of cōfession of sinnes one sorte is generall an other speciall. 3.20.9.

Conscience.

Consciences, when they seke assistance of their iustification before God, ought to forgette all the righteouſnesse of the lawe. 3. 19. 2, 3.

The Cōsciences of the faithfull do not follow the law as cōstrained by necessity of the lawe, but being free frō y^e yoke of the lawe, do volūtarily obey y^e will of god. 3. 19. 4, 5, 6.

Of y^e freedom of Cōsciēce in outward & indifferent things. 3. 19. 7, 8.

The Consciences of the faithfull being set at liberty by the benefit of Christ, are made free from the power of all men: and howe this is to be vnderstode: where also is spoken of the spirituall and ciuill gouernement, and what difference is to be put betwene thē. 3. 19. 14, 15.

Of Councils.

We must keepe a meane in honoring of Councils, that we take nothing away from Christ, and our doctrine for the most parte is confirmed by auncient Coucels. 4. 9. 1.

By the Scriptures the Councils

haue no authority, vnlesse they be assembled in the name of Christ: and what that is. 4. 9. 2.

It is false which the Papistes affirme: y^e truth remaineth not in the Church vnlesse it be among the pastors, and that the Church it selfe is not, vnlesse it remaine to be sene in generall Councils. 4. 9. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.

Creation of the World.

Although God ought to be known by the Creation of things, yet least the faithfull should fall away to the fained inuētiōs of the heathen, his will was that the history of the Creatiō should remaine written, & the time thereof expressed in the Scripture. 1. 14. 1. where their vngodly scoffing is confuted, which aske why it came not sooner in Gods mind to creat heauē & earth 1. 14. 1.

For the same purpose it is rehearsed, that God ended his worke, not in a moment, but in six dayes: and likewise the order is set forth, namely that Adā was not created till God had firste furnished the worlde with all plenty of good things. 1. 14. 2, 22.

The substance of God is incomprehensible: but in his workes, by engrauing certaine pointes of his glory therein, he hath after a certaine maner presented himselfe to be seene. 1. 5. 1.

The wisdom of God is testified, not onely by those thinges which philosophers and learned men do finde by speculation in heauen and earth, but also which common men do perceiue by the onely helpe of their eyes. 1. 5. 2.

That we māy with trewe faith conceiue so much as behoueth vs to know cōcerning God, it is good to learne y^e history of the Creation of the world, in such sort as Moses hath set it forth, the chiefe pointes wherof are briefly rehearsed. 1. 14. 20.

The cōsideration of the workes of God, that is to say, of the Creation of all things, ought to be applied to two principall endes: first that we do not with vnthankfull neglectinge or forgetfulnes passe ouer his vertues which he presenteth apparantly to be seene in his creatures. 1. 14. 21. secondly, that we may learne to apply them to our selues, whereby wee may stirre vp our selues to the trust, inuocation, praise, and loue of him. 2. 14. 22.

Death of Christ.

Although christ hath by ſy whole course of his obedience, that is to ſay by his whole life & all the partes thereof, redeemed vs, yet the Scripture to ſet forth more planely the maner of our ſaluatiō, doth aſcribe the ſame as peculiar and proper to the Death of Christ. In the which the voluntarie yeldinge of Christ hath the firſt place, which yet was ſo volūtary as he gaue ouer his owne affectiō not without ſtrife. Also his cōdemnation is to be conſidered: Wherein two things are to be noted, namely that Christ was reputed among the wicked, and yet that his innocēcy was oftētimes testified eue by the iudges owne mouth. 2. 1. 5.

The maner of his Death is to be marked, that is to ſay, the accursed croſſe. And it is declared by many testimonies of Esay & the Apostles, that this behoued ſo to be, that the curſe which was dewe to vs being caſt vpon him and ſo overcome & taken away, wee ſhould be deli-uered. And this was figuratiuely represented in the ſacrifices of Moſes lawe, which at the laſt was performed in Christ the originall truth of all figures. 2. 1. 6.

Both in the Death and buriall of Christ a double benefit is ſet before vs, ſy is to ſay, deliuerāce frō Death whereunto we were in bondage, & the mortifying of our fleſhe. 2. 1. 6.

A trewe, godly, holy and comfortable expoſition thereof out of the word of God, which is alſo confirmed by the testimony of the olde Doctōrs, that Christ did not onely ſuffer a bodily death, but alſo did ſeele the rigor of Gods vengeāce, whereby he might both appeaſe his wrath and ſatiſfie his iuſt iudge-mēt: and therefore it behoued that he ſhould, as it were hāde to hande, wreſtle with the power of Hell and with ſy horror of euerlaſting death, yet was God not at any time either his enemy, or angry with him. But he did ſuffer the greuouſneſſe of Gods ſeuerity, in reſpect that hee being ſtricken and beaten with the hande of God, did ſeele all the tokens of Gods wrath and puniſhment. 2. 16. 10. 11.

A cōſutation of certaine wicked and vnlearned men, which at this day do finde faulte with this expoſition, crying out that the ſonne of God hath wronge done to him, and that he is charged with deſperatiō, which is contrary to faith. Therefore it is proued againſt them with maniſteſt testimonies, that theſe two things do very well ſtāde together, that Christ feared, was troubled in ſpirit, was afraid, was tempted in euery pointe as we are, and yet that hee is without ſinne. 2. 16. 12.

The Table.

Those things that the Scripture teacheth concerning Deuels, tende commonly to this ende, that wee shoulde be carefull to beware of their deceites, & furnish our selues with those weapons which may be able to beat back the most mighty enemies. 1. 14. 13.

That we should be y more stirred vp to do so, it sheweth vs that there is not one or two Deuels, but great armies of euell spirites that make warre against vs: and in what sence it sometime speaketh of the Deuell in the singular number. 1. 14. 14.

This ought to enflame vs to a continuall warre with the Deuell, for y he is euery where called enemy to God and vs. 1. 14. 15.

The Deuell is naturally wicked, a murderer, a liar, and forger of all malitiousnes. 1. 14. 15. But this euellnesse of nature is not by creation, but by corruption. 1. 14. 16.

It is curiosity to enquire of the cause, maner, time and fashion of the fall of the euell Angels, forasmuch as the Scripture leaueth it vnspoken. 1. 14. 16.

This the Deuell hath of himselfe and of his owne naughtinesse, desirously and purposely to strue against God, but hee can do and performe nothing vnlesse God be willing and graunt it 1. 14. 17.

God so tempereth this gouernment, that hee geueth Satan no reigne ouer the soules of the faithfull, forasmuch as in the ende they euer obteine the victorie, although in some particular doings they be wounded and beaten downe: but he onely geueth the wicked to him to gouerne, and to vse his power vpon their soules and bodies 1. 14. 18.

This power of the Church is distincte from the ciuile power, and the one is a helpe to the other. Therefore the opiniõ of some men is false, which thinke that it ought to haue no place where are Christian magistrates. 4. 11. 1, 3, 8.

In Excommunication severity ought to be tempered. And in this behalfe is noted the extreme rigorousnesse of the in olde time. 4. 12. 8.

Euery priuate man ought to esteeme them that be Excommunicate as strangers from the Church, but not to accompt the past hope, but to endeouour to the vttermost of their power to bringe them into the way againe. 4. 12. 9, 10.

If the benche of elders do not so diligently correct faultes as they ought, or if the pastors can not amende all things as they would, yet priuate men ought not to departe from the Church, neither ought the pastors to shake of their ministerie. 4. 12. 11.

Faith.

THe name of Faith otherwise taken among holy writers than it is among the prophane. 4. 12. 13.

Howe it is to be vnderstode that God is the obiecte of faith. 2. 6. 4.

Of faith. And heere the Sophisters are reprovèd, which vnderstande nothing els by this worde faith, but a common assente to the history of the Gospell, & do simply call God the obiect of faith, in the meane time leauing out Christ, without whom there is no faith, nor any accesse to God. 3. 2. 1.

A confutation of the Scholemennes doctrine cōcerning vnexpressed faith, wheras faith requireth an expresse reknewledginge of the goodnesse of God, in which standeth our righteousnesse. 3. 2. 2.

Our faith, so longe as wec are waueringe in the world, is enwrapped with many remnautes of ignorance, and in all things infidelity.

is euer mingled with faith, whereof many examples are scene in the disciples of Christ before that they came to perfecte light, yet this is still most trewe, that vnderstanding is euer ioined with faith. 3.2.3.4.

There is a certaine obedience to Christ, & aptnesse to learne, with a desire to profit, which is called by the name of faith, whereas it is but a preparatiō to faith, and that same may be called an vnexpressed faith: yet it farre differeth from the papistes inuention. 3.2.5.

The trewe faith or knowledge of Christ, is when we cōcciue him in such sorte as he is offered of the Father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. And faith hath a mutuall relation to the word, and the word to faith, because the worde is the fountaine of faith, the grounde of faith, and the mirroure in which faith beholdeth God. 3.2.6.

Faith, although it assente to all the partes of the word of God, yet most properly it hath regarde therein to the good will and mercy of God, that is to say, the promises of grace grounded vpon Christ, for the vnderstanding and certainty whereof, the holy Ghost lighteneth our mindes and strengtheneth our hartes: Hereupon is gathered the definition of faith. 3.2.7.

A confutation of the Sophisters distinction of faith, formed & formlesse: whereby it appeareth that they neuer thought of the singular gifte of the holy Ghost; forasmuch as faith can in no wise be scuered from a Godly affection. 3.2.8.

This worde faith hath diuerse significatiōs, and is sometime taken for the power to do miracles, with which gift of God, sometime y wicked are endued: Sometime it is figuratiuely taken for that knowledge of God which is in some wicked men, which is rather a shadowe & ymage of faith, of which faith there are diuerse sortes in them. 3.2.9.10.

The reprobate haue also sometime such a like feeling as the elect haue, yet they do not fully conceiue y force of spirituall grace, but only confusely. Neuerthelesse the same is a certaine inferior working of the holy Ghost. But this feling differeth farre from the peculiar testimony which he geueth to the elect. 3.2.11.

Yet is not the Spirit deceitfull, which lightly sprinkleth the reprobate sometime with such a knowledge of the Gospell, and feling of the loue of God as afterward doth vanish away. Sometime also there is stirred vp in their hartes a certaine desire of mutuall loue toward God; but such a loue as is a hired and not a hartly loue: At lengthe it is concluded that there be some which do not faine a faith, & yet do lacke the trewe faith: Which is also proued by testimonies. 3.2.12. and such a feling is in the Scripture called faith, although it be vnproperly so called. 3.2.13.

Faith is sometime taken for the sounde doctrine of religion, and the whole summe therof: contrariwise sometime it is restrained to some particular object, & sometime it signifieth y^e ministry of the Church 3.2.13.

Faith is most rightfully called knowledge and science, and yet is such a knowledge as rather consisteth of certaine perswasion than of vnderstandinge, forasmuch as that which our minde conceyueth, by Faith is most infinite. 3.2.14.

Faith is not cōtent with a doubtful opinion or a darke conceiuing, but requireth a full and settled assurednesse: & hereunto are to be referred all those titles of commendation wherewith the holy Ghost setteth foorth the authority of the word of God. 3.2.15.

Many do so conceiue the mercy of God, that they receiue very litle comfort thereof, because they doubt whether he wil be merciful to themselves or no: but there is a far other feelinge of the aboundant store of Faith, the chiefe ground whereof is that we do not thinke the promises to be true without our selues onely, but rather that by inwardly embracing them we may make them our owne: Hereupon is gathered, who may truely be called Faithfull, 3.2.15, 16.

Though the Faithful in reknowledginge the goodnesse of God toward them are not only oftentimes tempted with vnquietnesse, but also are sometime shaken with most greuous terrours: yet this withstandeth not but that Faith bringeth assurednesse with it, because howsoeuer they be troubled, yet they neuer fall and depart from that sure affiance which they haue conceiued of the mercy of God, but struinge with their owne weakenesse they alway get the vpper hande at last: which is proued by many examples in Dauid. 3.2.17.

A description of the battell of the flesh & the spirite within a faithfull soule. 3.2.18.

The assurednesse of Gods good will. 3.2.18.

A confutation of the most pestilent suttile reasoninge of certaine halfe papistes, which although they confesse that so oft as we looke vpon Christ, we finde plentiful matter to hope wel, yet wil nedes haue vs to wauer and doubt in consideration of our owne vnworthines. And it is proued that we ought neuertheless to looke for assured saluation, forasmuch as Christ by a certaine maruelous communion doth daily grow together more & more into one body with vs. 3.2.24.

So soone as we haue any one drop of Faith we begin to beholde God mercifull vnto vs, although a farre off in dede, yet with so assured sight, as we knowe we are not deceiued: Both these pointes are proued by testimonies of Paul. 3.2.19, 20.

It is shewed by examples, howe Faith armeth and fortieth it selfe with the word of God to beare the violent assaultes of tentations, and howe the godly minde neuer suffereth the affiance of Gods mercy to be plucked away from it, although it be assailed with many remnantis of vnbeliefe and distrust. 3.2.21.

In the good will of God, which Faith is sayd to haue respect vnto, although Faith do chiefly looke vnto the assured expectation of eternall life, yet there are also contained promises of this present life and a perfect suretie of all good thinges, but the same such as may be gathered of y word: Both these poyntes are confirmed by testimonies of Scripture. 3.2.28.

Faith, although it embrace the word of God in euery point, that is to say in the commaundementes also and in the prohibitions and thretnings, yet hath her foundation and proper marke whereunto it is directed, in y free promise of mercy: and for this reason the Gospell is called the worde of Fayth, and is set as contrary to the law. 3.2.29.

Yet do we not by this distinction teare Faith in sonder as Pyghius shamefully cauilleth. 3.2.30.

Faith doth no lesse neede the worde of God, than the frute doth neede the liuely roote of the tree, & with the worde must be ioyned a consideratiõ of the power of God, without the which, mens eares will either not willingly heare y worde, or not esteeme it worthily. His power is to be considered, in that that it is effectuell, that is to say by the workes of God, & by his benefites either particular or ancient & such as he hath bestowed vpon y whole Church. 3.2.31.

The Faithfull oftentimes so behaue themselues, that some errors are mingled with their Faith, and they seme to passe the boudes of the word, but yet so, that Fayth hath alway the vpper hand: This is proued by the examples of Sara & Rebecca, whome in the crooked turninges of their minde, God did by a secret bridle holde fast in the obedience of his word. 3.2.31.

By reason of our blindenesse and stiffneckednes, the word suffiseth not to make vs haue Fayth, vnlesse the Spirit of God do enlighte our minde, & strengthen our hart with his power: & the same Spirit is not only the beginner of our Faith, but also doth encrease it by degrees. 3.2.33.

Although it seme to the most parte of men a most straunge doctrine, that no mann can beleue in Christ, but he to whom it is giuen, yet, it is proued to be most true by reasons, testimonies of Scripture, and examples. 3.2.34.

Therefore Faith is called the Spirit of Faith, the worke and good pleasure of God: and it is a singular gift, which he giueth by singular priuilege to whom he will: as it is proued by notable sentences taken out of Augustine. 3.2.35.

It is not enough that the minde be enlightened with vnderstanding of the worde, vnlesse also the assurednesse of the word be poured into y very heart: both which thinges y Spirit worketh: which is therefore called the seale, the pledge, and the Spirit of promise. 3.2.36.

Although

The Table.

Although Faith be tossed with diuerse doutings, yet it alway at the last escapeth out of the gulfe of tē-tations, and recciueh most sweete quietnes. 3.2.37.

A confutation of the damnable doctrine of the Schoolemē, which say that we can none otherwise determine of the grace of God toward vs, than by morall coniecture 3.2.38.

They are proued to be miserably blinde, in saying that it is rashnes for vs to conceiue an vndouted knowledge of the will of God: A good comparison of them and Paule in this point of doctrine. 3.2.39.

A confutation of their ruffling shift, that although we may take v-pō vs to iudge of the grace of God accordinge to the present state of righteousnes, yet the knowledge of persevering to the ende abideth in suspense. 3.2.40.

It is proued that the definitiō of Faith taught in this chapter Sect.7. agreeth with the Apostles definition. Heb. Cap. 11. And the error of the Schoolemen, that charitie is before Faith and Hope, is confuted by the testimony of Bernarde. 3.2.41.

Hope is alway engendred of Faith, & is the vndeuided companion of Faith, so that whosoever lacketh hope, is proued also to haue no faith. Also Faith is nourished and strengthened by hope: and how necessary are the helpes of hope to stablishe Faith, which is assayed with so many sortes of tentations, 3.2.42.

By reason of this conioyning & alliaçe of Faith & hope, the Scripture doth many times vse those two wordes without difference, and sometime ioyneth them together. Feare.

The faithful are oftentimes troubled with Feare & distrust by reason of the feelinge of their owne weakenes. 3.2.17.

An other kinde of Feare conceived in a godly heart, either by examples of Gods vengeaunce against the wicked, or by consideration of his own misery: Such Feare is so much not contrary to faith, that the faithfull are much exhorted to haue it. Neither is it any maruell, if there be in a Faithfull soule both Feare and Faith, sith on the other side in the wicked there are both dull negligēce and carefulnesse. 3.2.22,23.

The Feare of God procedeth out of a double feling, namely whē we honor God as our father, and feare him as our Lord: Neither is it any maruell if one minde haue both those affections. 3.2.26.

This Feare differeth from the Feare of the vnfaithful, which they cōmonly cal a seruile Feare. 3.2.27

Of forsaking of our selues.

The first beginning of framing our life after the rule set foorth in the lawe, is to consider that we are not at our own liberty, but hallowed & dedicate to God. And therefore we ought to forsake our selues, and our own reason (which as the Philosophers thinke, ought alone to be obeyed) to the ende that we may be gouerned by the word & Spirite of the Lord. 3.7.1.

Also that we ought not to seeke those thinges that are our owne, but those thinges that are according to the will of the Lord, and do serue to aduaunce his glorie. And that this is the forsaking of our selues, without the which there is a world of vices enclosed in the soule of man, and if there be any seming of vertue at all, the same is corrupted with wicked desire of glory. 3.7.2.

The forsaking or mortifyinge of our selues, is partly in respect of mē, and partely, yea, and chiefly in respect of God. Toward other men, the Scripture commaundeth vs to do two thinges: namely to preferre them in honor before our selues, & with vnfained truth to employ our selues wholly to procure their commodities. Howe the first of these points is to be performed, is taught in the 3.7.4. & also how the Scripture leadeth vs by the hand to the seconde point is shewed in the 3.7.5.

Freewill.

Man was endued with Freewill in the first estate of his creation. 1.15.8. which he lost by his fall. Of this the Philosophers were ignorant, and so all such as follow them, giuing Freewill to man, are vtterly deceiued. 1.15.8.

The pliability or weake power of Freewill, which was in the first man, doth not excuse his fall. 1.15.8.

It is as well for our profit, as for the glory of God, to acknowledge all our strength to be but a staffe made of a reede, yea, but a smoke. In the meane time we must beware, that while we take al vprightnesse from man, we do not thereof take occasion of slothfulnesse. But rather we ought thereby to be stirred vppe to seeke in God all the goodnes whereof we our selues are voide. The defenders of Freewill do rather throw it downe hedlong than stablish it. 2.2.1.

The Philosophers determine three powers of the soule, Vnderstanding, Sense, & Wil or Appetite: and they thinke that the reason of mans vnderstandinge suffiseth for his good gouernance: that wil is by sense moued to euill, so that it doth hardly yeelde it selfe to reason, and sometime is diuersly drawn from the one to y other, but yet y it hath a free election & can not be stopped, that it may followe reason her guide in all things: finally that vertues and vices are in our powers. 2.2.2, 3.

The Ecclesiasticall wryters, although they acknoweledged the foundenesse of vnderstanding, and the freedome of will to haue binfore wounded by sinne, yet haue spoken too much philosophically of this matter. The old wryters did it for this purpose, first because they were loth to teache a thinge that shoulde be an absurdity in the common iudgement of men, & also specially least they shoulde giue a new occasion of slothfulnes to the flesh beinge already too much dull to goodnes, as appeareth by many sayinges of Chrysofostome and Hierome. The Greeke doctors aboute all other, & specially Chrysofostome, do exceede measure in aduancing Freewill. But all the olde wryters generally, except Augustine, do so vary and wauer in this point of doctrine, that there can almost no certaintie be gathered of their wrytinges. They which came after the, fell one after an other to worse & worse. The definitions of Freewill out of Origen, Augustine, Bernard, Anselme, Peter Lombard, & Thomas. 2.2.4.

In what things they do commonly giue Freewill to man, and of the three sortes of mans will. 2.2.5.

Also of the common distinction of the three sortes of libertie. 2.2.5.

Whether man be wholly deprived of power to do good, or whether he haue yet some power thought it be weake: where it is spoken of the common distinction of grace working and grace workinge together, and what is amisse in the same distinction. 2.2.6.

Forasmuch as it can not otherwise be said that man hath Freewill, but bicause he doth euil of his own will, & not by cōpulsion, it had bin very good for the church that this word Freewill had neuer bin vsed, which had raised vp men to a damnable trust of themselues. The old wryters also do oft declare what they meane by that word, specially Augustin, out of whom there are many places alleged, where he weakeneth and mocketh the strength thereof, both when he calleth it

The Table.

Bondwill, & when he expoundeth the thing it selfe as it is at large. 2. 2. 7, 8.

Although the old Ecclesiasticall writers do sometime too much aduance Freewill, and haue spoken doutfully and diuersly in that matter: yet it appeareth by very many of their sayinges, that they litle or nothings esteeming mans power, gaue the whole praise of al goodnes to the holy Ghost. Many such sentences are rehearsed out of Cypriã, Augustine, Eucherius, Chrysostom. 2. 2. 9.

The power of mans will is not to be weyed by the successe of things, but by the choise of iudgement and the affection of will. 2. 4. 8.

It is proued against the defenders of Freewill that sinne is of necessity, & yet neuertheles ought to be imputed: also that it is voluntary, and yet can not be auoided. 2. 5. 1.

A solution of an other obiection of theirs, where they say that vnlesse both vertues & vices proceede of Free election of will, it were no reason that man shoulde either be punished or rewarded. 2. 5. 2.

Also an other obiection, where they say that if this were not the power of our will, to choose good or euill, then of necessity either all men should be good, or all men euill. 2. 5. 3.

Against the same men also it is proued that exhortations, admonitions & rebukings are not in vaine, although it be not in the power of the sinner to obey: and there is shewed what effect the same do worke both in the wicked & in the faithfull. 2. 5. 4, 5.

It is not to be gathered by the commaundementes & law of God, that man hath Freewill & strength to performe them, for God doth not only commaunde what ought to be done, but also promiseth grace to obey. 2. 5. 6, 7, 9.

This is proued as well in the commaundementes which require the first conuersion to God, as also in those which speake simply of the obseruinge of the lawe, and those which commaund men to continue in the receiued grace of God. For the same God which requireth those things, doth testifie that the conuersion of a sinner, holinesse of life, stedfastnes of continuance, are his Free gifts, and the praise thereof is not to be parted betwene God and man. 2. 5. 8, 9, 11.

The conditionall promises, as, If ye will, If ye heare, and such like, do not proue that there is in manne a Free power of willing or hearinge: yet it is proued that God doth not mocke manne in so bargayninge with them. Also what is the vse of such protestations, both toward the godly and toward the vngodly. 2. 5. 10.

The reprochings, wherein God sayth to his people that they were the cause that they receiued not al kinde of good things at his hande, do not proue that it was mans power to escape the euils wherewith they

they were afflicted. And there is spoken of the vse of such reprochings as well toward thē that obstinately go forward in their faults, as towarde the conformable that are conuerted to repentance. Also whereas the Scripture doth sometime giue to vs the office of doing, it doth so for no other reason but to awaken the slothfulnes of the flesh. 2.5.11.

The saying of Moses, The commaundement is nere to thee, in thy mouth & in thy heart. &c. maketh nothing for the defenders of Freewil, forasmuch as he there speaketh not of the bare commaundements, but of the euangelicall promises of the law. 1.5.12.

No more do those places make for them, where it is sayd that the Lorde looketh and watcheth to see what men wil do. 2.5.13.

Also those places where good workes are called ours, and we are sayd to do that which is holy and pleasinge to the Lorde. And here is shewed that the onely Spirit of God worketh all good motions in vs, but yet not as in stockes. 2.5.14, 15.

Gospell.

Christ, although he were knowē to the Iewes in time of the law, was yet shewed in dede only by the Gospell: & the holy fathers tasted of that grace, which is now offered to vs with ful aboundance, they saw ȳ day of Christ, albeit with adimmed sight, the glory whereof nowe shineth in the Gospell, without any veile betwene vs and it. 2.9.1, 2.

In the same place also is shewed, that the Gospell is properly and specially called the publishing of the grace giuen in Christ, and not the promises that are written by the Prophets concerning the remissiō of sinnes. Against the doctrine of Seruettus, which taketh away the promises vnder this pretence ȳ by the faith of the Gospel we haue the fulfillinge of all the promises, it is proued that though Christ offer to vs in the Gospell a present fulnesse

Holy Ghost.

Testimonies whereby the Godhed of the holy Ghost is proued. 13.14,15.

The holy Ghost is the bonde wherewith Christ doth effectually binde vs to him, and without it, all that Christ hath suffered and done for the saluation of mankinde doth nothing profit vs. 3.1.1,3.

Christ came after a singular manner furnished with the holy Ghost; to seuer vs frō the world, & therefore he is called the Spirit of sanctification. Why he is sometime called the Spirit of the father, & som-time the Spirit of the Sonne. He is called the Spirit of Christ, not only in respect that Christ is the eternal Worde, but also accordinge to his person of Mediator. 3.1.2.

An exposition of the titles wherewith the Scripture setteth forth the holy Ghost; & there is entreated of the beginning and whole restoring of our saluation: The titles be these: the Spirite of adoption, the earnest and seale of our inheritaunce, life, water, oyle, oynment, fire, a fountaine, the hande of God. &c. 3.1.3.

Faith is the chiefe worke of the holy Ghost, and therefore to it for the most part are all those things referred which are commonly founde in the Scripture to expresse the force & effectuall power of the holy Ghost. 3.1.4.

Humility.

It is not the true Humility which God requireth of vs, vnlesse we acknowledge our selues vtterly void of al goodnesse and righteousnesse. 3.12.6.

The glory of God is corrupted with false lying, when any forme is appointed to it. 1.11.1.

It is proued by textes & reasons, that God generally misliketh all Portraytures and Images that are made to expresse a figure of him, & this prohibitiō pertained not to the Jewes only. 1.11.2.

God did in olde time so shewe his presence by visible signes either to the whole people, or to certaine chosen men, that the same signes admonished thē of the incomprehensible substance of God. 1.11.3.

The antiquity and beginninge of Idolatry, for that men thinkinge God not to be neere them, vnlesse he did shew himselfe carnally present, raised vp signes in which they beleued that he was carnally conuersant before their eyes. 1. 11. 8.

After such an inuentiō by and by followeth the worshippinge of the Image, like as of God or of any other creature in the Image: both which the law of God forbiddeth.

1. 11. 8, 9.

Against them, which for defence of abominable Idolatry, do pretende that they do not take the Images for Gods, it is proued that neither the Jewes did thinke their calfe to be God, nor the heathen when they made to themselues Images did euer thinke y^e same to be God, whō yet no man excuse. 1. 11. 9.

The Papistes are so perswaded as the heathen and the Idolatrous Jewes were, that they worship God himself vnder Images. 1. 11. 10. Neither can they escape away with their distinction of seruice & worship. 1. 11. 11, 16. & 1. 12. 2.

It is proued by the Scripture against the Sophisters, that this is a sure principle, that we are Iustified by faith only. 3. 11. 19, 20.

Knowledge of God.

To Knowe God, is not onely to conceiue that there is some God, but to vnderstande so much as behoueth vs to knowe of him, and so much as auaieth for his glory, and is expedient. 1. 2. 1.

The Knowledge of God ought to tende to this ende, first to frame vs to feare and reuerence: & then that by it guiding & teaching vs we may learne to aske all good things of him, & to accompt the same receiued at his hande. 1. 2. 2. & 1. 5. 8.

Law.

The Law, that is to say the forme of religion set forth by Moses, was not giuen to holde the olde people still in it, but to nourishe in their hearts the hope of saluatiō in Christ vntil his comming: which is proued by this that Moses repeateth the mētion of the couenāt: & by the order of the ceremonies appointed as well in sacrifices as in washings, also by the office of priesthode in the tribe of Leui, and the honor of kingdom in Dauid & his posterity. The Law also of the ten commaūdements was giuen to prepare men to seeke Christ. 2. 7. 1, 2. and that is done, whē it maketh vs vnexcusable being on euery side cōuicted of our sinnes, to moue vs to seeke for pardon of our giltines. 2. 7. 3. 4.

It is proued by the Scripture & declared, that the obseruing of the Law is impossible. 2. 7. 5.

There are three vses and offices of the morall Law: The first is, that shewing vnto vs the righteousnes which onely is acceptable vnto God, it may be as a glasse for vs, wherein we may behold our weaknesse, & by it our wickednes, and finally by them both, our accursednesse: Neither turneth this to any dishonor of the Lawe, but maketh for the glory of the bountifullnes of God, which both with helpe of grace aideth vs to do that which we are commaūded, and by mercy putteth away our offences. Neither yet doth this office altogether cease in the reprobate. 2. 7. 6, 7, 8, 9.

The second office, is to restraine the reprobate with feare of punishment, least they vnbrideledly commit the wickednesse which inwardly they alway nourishe and loue: & also to drawe backe the children of God before their regeneration from outwarde licentiousnesse. 2. 7. 10, 11.

The third office, concerneth ^{ye} ^{ay} faithfull: for the Law although it be already wrytten with the finger of God in their heartes, yet profiteth them two wayes: For by studyinge vpon it, they are more confirmed in the vnderstanding of the will of the Lord, & are stirred vp & strengthened to obedience, that they go not out of kinde by the sluggishnes of the fleshe. 2. 7, 12, 13. For, as touching the curse of the Law, it is taken away from the faithfull, that it can no more extend it self against them in damning and destroyinge them. 2. 7. 14.

By the ten commaundements of the Law we learne the same things which we but slenderly tast by instruction of the law of nature: First that we owe to God reuerēce, loue, & feare, y^e righteousnesse pleaseth him, & wickednes displeaseth him: finally, that examininge our life by the rule of the Law, we are vnworthy to be accompted amonge the creatures of God, & that our power is vsufficiēt, yea, no power at all to performe y^e Law. Both these pointes engendre in vs humility & abacing of our selues, which teacheth vs to flye to the mercie of God, and to craue the helpe of his grace. 2. 8. 1, 2, 3.

Forasmuch as God the Lawmaker is spirituall, that is to say, speaketh as well to the soule as to the body, therefore the law likewise requireth not only an outward honesty, but also an inward and spiritual righteousnesse, & a very angelike life. 2. 8. 6. which is proued by Christes owne exposition, when he confuted the Pharisees wrong interpretation, which required only a certaine outward obseruatiō of the Law. 2. 8. 7.

There is alway more in the commaundementes and prohibitions of the Law, than is expressed. Therfore for the right and true expoundinge of them, it behoueth to wey what is the entent or ende of eue-ry of them: Then from that which is commaunded or forbidden, we must draw an argument to the contrarie, that we may vnderstande, that not only an euill is forbidden, but also the good is commaunded which is contrary to that euill. 2. 8. 8, 9.

An exposition of the commaundements of God: Where is declared that the Lord in the beginning of the Law, to stablish his own maiesty, vseth three argumentes: First by chalenging to himselfe the so-ueraigne power and right of dominion ouer vs, he doth as it were by necessity drawe vs to obey him: secondly he allureth vs with y^e sweetness of the promise of grace: thirdly he moueth vs to obediēce with re-hearfall of the benefit that we haue receiued. 2. 8. 13, 14, 15.

The Law teacheth not only cer-taine introductions & principles of righte-

Lawes Politike.

Neither can Lawes be without the Magistrate, nor the Magistrate without Lawes. A confutation of them which say that a common weale is not well ordered, vnlesse it be gouerned by the politike Lawes of Moses. For this purpose is rehearsed a diuision of the Lawes of Moses into morall Lawes, ceremonies, & iudiciall Lawes, and the ende of euery one of them beinge discussed, it is proued y^e it is lawfull for euery seuerall nation to make politike Lawes, 4.20.14, 15. so that they agree with that natural equity, the reason whereof is set foorth in the moral Law of Moses. Therefore it is shewed by examples that they may alter the ordinances of penalties accordinge to the diuersity of the cuntrie, time, & other circumstances. 4.20.16.

Herein the Scripture doth two things: it stirreth vs vp to the loue of righteousness and teacheth a rule how to followe the same. Magiſtrates.

THe office of Magiſtrates is not only holy and lawefull before God, but alſo the moſt holy and honorable degree in all the life of men, and this is proued by diuerſe titles wherwith the Scripture doth ſet it forth, and by the examples of holy men, which haue borne ciuile power. 4. 20. 4.

They erre which exclude the Magistrates from the charge of religion, forasmuch as their office extendeth to both the tables of the lawe: It is proued by Scripture, that they are ordeined protectors & defenders as well of the worshipping of God as of common peace and honesty, which they cannot thorowly performe without the power of the swerd. 4. 20. 9.

A declaration of this question by Scripture, howe the magistrats may be godly, and also drawe their swerde, & shed the blood of men, and it is proued that they are so farre from sinning in punishing offenders, that this is one of the vertues of a King, and a profe of their godlinesse. Herein the Magistrates must beware of two faultes, namely extreme rigorousnesse, and superstitious desire of pitie. 4. 20. 10.

It is the duty of subiectes toward Magistrates, to thinke honorably of them as of the ministers and deputies of God, forsomuch as concerneth their degree, but not that they should esteeme the vices of men for vertues. 4. 20. 22.

It is also their duty with mindes hartily bente to the honoring of them to declare their obedience towarde them, whether it be in following their decrees, or in paying of tributes, &c. to pray to God for their safety and prosperity, to raise no tumultes & not to thrust themselves into the office of the Magistrate. 4. 20. 23.

Which is proued by diuerse testimonies and examples of Scripture: and there is shewed with what considerations those subiects ought to bridle their owne inpatience which liue vnder such vngodly and wicked tyrants. 4. 20. 26, 27, 28, 29, 31.

It is not lawfull for priuate men to rise vp against tyrantes, but only for them which by the lawes of the kingedome or of the coutry, are the defenders of the liberty of the people. 4. 20. 31.

The Lorde by his maruellous goodnesse and prouidence, doth sometime raise vp some of his seruantes to punish tyrauntes, and sometime also he directeth thereunto the rage of wicked men while they intende an other thing. 4. 20. 30.

In the obedience which is due to the commaundements of kings and rulers this is alway to be excepted, that it drawe vs not away fro the obedience of God: Neither is any wrong done to them when we refuse to obey them in suche things as they commaunde against God: And this is our duty, howe great and present perill soeuer do hang vpon such costancy. 4. 20. 32.

Man.

Man is by knowledge of himselfe not only moued to seke, God, but also led as it were by the hande to finde him. 1. 1. 1.

The creatiō of Man is a notable shewe of the power, wisdome, and goodnesse of God: wherefore Man is by some of the Philosophers called a little world. 1. 5. 3.

The vnthankfulnessse of Men, which feeling tokens of the prouidence of God both in their soule and body, yet do not geue God praise. 1. 5. 4.

Two sortes of knowledge of our selues, the one in our first originall estate, the other after Adams fall, and the latter is not to be receiued without consideringe the first, least we shoulde seeme to impute corruption to God the author of nature. 1. 15. 1.

The knowledge of himselfe is most necessary for Man, which consisteth in this, (as the truth of God prescribeth) that first consideringe to what ende he is created, and endued with excellēt giftes, he should hang altogether vpon God, of whom he hath all thinges by gift: then, that weyinge his owne miserable estate after the fall of Adā, hee should trewely loth himselfe and conceiue a newe desire to seke God, that in him he may recouer these good thinges, of which he himselfe is found viterly void and empty. Wherefore we must beware that in this pointe we hearken not to the iudgement of the fleshe and to y^e bookes of Philosophers, which while they withholde vs in considering onely our good thinges, would carry vs away into a most wicked ignoraunce of our selues. 2. 1. 1, 2, 3.

Man can neuer come to the trewe knowledge of himselfe, vnlesse he haue first beholdē the face of God, that is to say, till he haue begonne to knowe and weigh by the worde of God, what and howe exacte is the perfection of his righteousnes, wisdome and power, to the which we ought to be made of like forme. 1. 1. 2.

That whole man is corrupted in both partes of him, (that is to say both in vnderstanding minde, and in harte or will) is proued by diuerse titles wherewith the Scripture describeth him, specially when it sayeth that he is fleshe: And there is declared that this word fleshe is not referred onely to the sensuall parte but also to the superior parte of the soule. 2. 3. 1.

That Men do in vaine seke for any good thing in their owne nature, is proued by Paule, which entreating of the vniuersal kindred of the children of Adam, and not rebuking the corrupted maners of some one age alone, but accusinge the perpetuall corruptiō of nature, taketh from men righteousnessse, that that is to say vprightnesse, & purenesse, and then vnderstanding, and last of all the feare of God. 2. 3. 2.

A confutation of the obiection concerning certaine heathen Men, which forasmuch as they were all their life long by the guiding of nature bent to y^e endeour of vertue and honesty, do seeme to warne vs, that we should not esteeme the nature of Man altogether corrupt. Therefore it is declared that in the vnbeleuers God doth not inwardly cleanse the corruption of nature wherwith Man is in eche parte defiled, (as hee doth in the elect) but by his prouidence sometime hee bridleth it in them, that it breake not forth into deedes, and restraineth it by diuerse wayes, so much as he knoweth to be expedient for preferuing of the vniuersall state of things. 2. 3. 3.

Those vertues which wee reade to haue bene in heathen Men, are not sufficiēt proues of the purenesse of nature, forasmuch as their mind was inwardly not vpright, being corrupted with ambition or some other poison, and not directed with desire to set forth the glory of God: and also forasmuch as those vertues are not the common giftes of nature, but the speciall graces of God, which he diuersly and by a certaine measure geueth to profane Men, as oftentimes to kings, and sometime to priuate Men. 2. 3. 4.

cōmaundement, wherein the Lord forbiddeth fornication, and requireth chastity and cleannesse, which wee ought to kepe and preferue both in our minde, and in our eyes, and in the apparrell of our body, and in our tonge, and in the moderate vse of meate and drinke. 2. 8. 41, 44.

Continence is a singular giste of God, which he geueth not to all men, but to some, yea & that sometime for a season: As for them to whom it is not graunted, let them alway flee to Mariage, which is ordeined of the Lord for the remedy of mans necessity. 2. 8. 41, 42, 43.

Maried persons must beware that they committe nothing vnbeseming the honesty and temperance of Mariage: Otherwise they seeme to be adulterers of their own wiues, and not husbands. 2. 8. 44.

The papistes do wrongfully call Mariage a Sacrament: And their reasons are confuted. 4. 19. 34 It is proued that the place of Paule, wherwith they seeke to cloke themselves, maketh nothing for them. 4. 19, 35.

In the meane they disagree with theselues when they exclude priests from this Sacrament, and do say that it is vncleannesse and defiling of the fleshe. 4. 19, 36.

By this false colour of Sacramēt, the Pope with his cleargy haue drawen to themselves the hearing of causes of Matrimony, and haue made lawes of Mariage, which partly are manifestly wicked against

God, & partely most vniust toward men, which lawes are rehearsed, 4.19.37.

Mediator Christ.

It behoued that Christ, to the ende that he might performe the office of Mediator, should be made man, forasmuch as God had so ordeined, bycause it was best for vs, sith none other could be the meane for restoring of peace betweene God and vs, none other coulde make vs the children of God, none other could assure vnto vs y^e inheritance of the heauēly kingdome, none other could for remedy set mannes obedience against mannes disobedience. 2.12.1,2,3.

A confutation of their fantastical conceit, which affirme that Christ should haue become man, although there had needed no remedy for the redeming of mankinde. And it is proued by many reasons and textes, that forasmuch as the whole Scripture crieth out that he was clothed with flesh, to the ende that he might be the redemer, therefore it is to great rashnesse to ymagine any other cause or purpose. 2.12.4.

Neither is it lawfull to searche further concerning Christ: & those that do search further, do with wicked boldnesse runne forward to the faining of a newe Christ: And herein Osiāder is reprovēd, which hath at this time renued this question, and affirmeth that this error is confuted by no testimonie of Scripture. 2.12.5.

And the principle is ouerthrowē which he buildeth on, that man was create after the ymage of God, because he was formed after the likenesse of Christ to come, that he might resemble him whom the Father had already decreed to cloth with flesh: And there is shewed that the ymage of God in Adam, was the marks of excellēcie wherewith God had garnished him, which doth also shine in the Angels. 2.12.6,7.

A solution of other obiections or absurdities which the same Osiāder feareth: namely, that then Christ was borne & creat after the ymage of Adam but as it were by chaunce: and that the Angels should haue lacked their hed, and men should haue lacked Christ their kinge. 2.12.6,7.

Howe the two natures do make one person of y^e Mediator in Christ: Which is shewed by a similitude taken of the ioining of the soule and body in one man: And then it is proued by diuerse places that the scripture doth many times geue vnto Christ those thinges which properly belongeth to the godhed, & sometime those thinges which must be referred onely to the manhode, and sometime geueth to the one nature that which is proper to the other: which figuratiue maner of speache is called Communicating of properties, 2.14.1,2. and sometime also geueth to Christ those thinges which do comprehend both natures together, but do seuerally well agree with neither of them,

Which

The Table.

Which last point the most part of the olde writers haue not sufficiētly marked: Yet it is good to be noted, for the dissoluing of many doubts, and for auoidinge of the errors of Nestorius and Eutiches.

A confutation of the error of Seruettus, which had put in the stede of y^e sonne God, an imagined thing made of the substāce of God, spirit, fleshe, and three elementes vncreate: His sutteltie is disclosed, and there is proued (which thing he denieth) that Christ was the sonne of God, euen before that he was borne in the flesh, because he is that word begotten of the father before all worldes. 2.14.5.

Also it is proued that he is truely and properly the sonne of God in flesh, that is to say in the nature of Man, but yet in respect of his godhed, and not of his flesh, as Seruettus babbleth. 2.14.6.

An exposition of certaine places which Seruettus and his disciples do enforce for defence of their error: There is also another cauillation of his disclosed, that Christ before that he appeared in the flesh, is in no place called the sonne of God but vnder a figure. 2.14.7.

Also there is opened the error of all them which do not acknowledge Christ the sonne of God but in the flesh: And there are brefely rehearsed y^e grosse suttelties of Seruettus, wherewith he hath bewitched himselfe and other, ouerthrowing y^e which pure faith beleueth cōcerning the person of the sonne of God: And therupon is gathered that with the crafty darke suttelties of that filthy dog, the hope of saluatiō is viterly extinguished. 2.14.8.

Merit of Christ.

It is truely & properly sayd that Christ Merited for vs the grace of God and saluatiō: Where it is proued that Christ was not onely the instrument or minister of saluation, but also the author and principall doer thereof: And in so saying, the grace of God is not defaced, because the Merit of Christ is not set against mercy, but hangeth vpon it. And those things which are Subalterna, fight not as contraries. 2.17.1.

The distinction of the Merit of Christ and of the grace of God is proued by many places of Scripture. 2.17.2.

There are alleged many testimonies of Scripture, out of which it is certainly & soundly gathered, y^e Christ by his obediēce hath truely purchaced and deserued fauor for vs with his father. 2.17.3,4,5.

It is a foolishe curiositie to enquire, whether Christ hath deserued any thing for himselfe: and it is rashnesse to affirme it. 2.17.6.

Merites of Workes.

The boastinges that are made of the Merites of workes, do ouerthrowe as well the praise of God in geuing righteousnesse, as also the certainty of saluation. 3.15.

Whosoever first applied the name of Merit to good workes in the sight of Gods iudgement, he did against the purenesse of faith. And though the olde fathers vsed that name, yet they so vsed it that they haue in many places shewed that they attribute nothing to workes. 3. 15. 2.

An exposition of certaine places, wherewith the Sophisters go about to proue that the name of Merit toward God is found in the Scripture. 3. 15. 4.

It is proued by authoritie of the Apostles and Augustine, that the rewardes of righteousnes do hang vpon the mere liberalitie of God. 2. 5. 2.

It is proued that this is a false saying, that Christ Merited for vs onely the first grace, and that afterwarde we do Merit by our owne workes. 3. 15. 6, 7.

There be certaine things touching merites in the title of Iustification by faith.

Ministry of the Church.

Of the Ministry of the Church, and of them which despise this manner of learning. 4. 1. 5.

Of the efficacy of the Ministry. 4. 1. 6.

God, which might teache the Church either himselfe alone or by Angels, yet doth it by the Ministry of Men for three causes. 4. 3. 1.

The Ministry of the Church is garnished with many notable titles of commendation in the Scripture. 4. 3. 2, 3.

Of Apostles, Prophetes, Euan-gelistes, Pastors and Teachers: and what is the feuerall office of euery of them. 4. 3. 4, 5.

The chiefe partes of the office of Apostles and pastors are to preache the Gospell, and Minister the Sacraments. 4. 3. 6.

Pastors are so bounde to their Churches, that they may not remoue to any other place without publike authoritie. 4. 3. 7.

They are called in the Scripture, Bishops, Priests, Pastors and Ministers, which gouerne Churches. 4. 3. 8.

No man ought to thrust in himselfe in the Church to teache or gouerne: But there is a callinge required. 4. 3. 10.

The preaching of the worde of God is compared to seede which is scattered in the ground: Whereby we vnderstand that the whole increase procedeth of the blessing of God and the effectuall working of the holy Ghost. 4. 14. 11.

What maner of men ought to be chosen Bishops, and in what sorte and of whom they are to be chosen, and with what forme or ceremony they are to be ordred. 4. 3. 11, 12, 13, 14. 15, 16.

The olde Church before the papacy, diuided all their Ministers into three degrees, Pastors, Elders, and Deacons. 4. 4. 1.

Of the commission to remit and retaine sinnes, or to binde & loose, which is a parte of the power of the keys, and pertaineth to the Ministry of the word. 4. 11. 1.

Monkery.

Monasteries in olde time were the seedepottes of ecclesiasticall orders:

orders : And there is described out of Augustine the forme of the olde Monkerie, & howe they were wont at that time to get their liuing with the labor of their handes. Wherby appeareth that at this day the manner of popishe Monkerie is farre otherwise. 4.13.8,9,10.

Of the proude title of perfectiō wherewith the Monkes do set out their kinde of life. 4.13.11. bycause they binde themselues to keepe the counsels of the Gospell (as they call them) whereunto other Christian men are not bounde. Sect. 12. and because they haue forsaken all their possessions. Sect. 13.

As many as go into Monasteries, do departe from the Church, sith they openly affirme that their Mōkerie is a forme of secōd Baptisme. 4.13.14.

The popish Mōkes do in maners much differ from the olde Monkes. 4.13.15.

Some things are to be misliked euen in the profession of the olde Monkerie, and they that were the authors therof brought a perilous example into the Church. 4.13.16.

Monkes with their vowes do cōsecrate themselues not to God but to the Deuell. 4.13.17.

As all vowes vnlawefull and not rightly made, are of no value before God, so they ought to be void to vs. 4.13.20.

Therefore they which departe frō Monkerie to some honeste trade of life, are wrongfully accused of faith breaking and periury. 4.13.21.

Obedience of children to parentes.

AN exposition of the fifth commaundement : The ende and summe thereof. 2.8.35.

Howe farre this word honoring extēdeth: and there be three partes thereof, Reuerēce, Obedience, and Thankfulness. 2.8.36.

Of the promise adioined to the fifth commaundement, concerning long continuance of life, and howe farre the same pertaineth to vs at this day. 2.8.37.

How & by howe diuerse meanes, God sheweth his vengeance vpon the disobedient: Yet obedience is not due to parentes and other, but sauing the lawe of God. 2.8.38.

Offences.

What Offences are to be auoided, and what to be neglected: what is an Offence geuen, and what an offence taken. 3.19.11.

It is declared by the doctrine & example of Paule who be weake, to whom wee must beware that wee geue no offence. 3.19.12.

Whereas we are cōmaunded to beware that wee Offende not the weake, the same is meant onely in things indifferent: Therefore they do wrongfully abuse this doctrine which say that they heare masse for the weakes sake. 3.19.13.

Officials.

Of popishe Bishops Officials, as they call them. 4.11.7,8.

Orders Papisticall.

The Table.

The Sacrament of Order breedeth to the papistes seuen other petie Sacraments, of whose names and differences they themselues be not yet agreed. 4. 19. 22.

Their sonde and vngodly foolishnesse, forasmuch as they make Christ felowe Officer with them in euery one of them. 4. 19. 23.

Of Acolithes, Dorekeepers and Reders, whom the papistes do make Orders of the Church and Sacraments, 4. 19. 24. and with what ceremonies they consecrate them. Sect. 27.

Of Exorcistes or Coniurers an order of the popish church. 4. 19. 24.

The orders of Psalmistes, Dorekeepers and Acolithes, are vaine names among the papistes, forasmuch as they themselues do not execute the Offices, but some boy, or any laiman. 4. 19. 24.

Of the shauing of the Clergie, and the signification thereof by the doctrine of the Papistes. 4. 19. 25.

They do wrongfully apply it to Paules example, which shaued his head when he toke a vowe, or to the olde Nazarites. 4. 19. 26.

It is shewed out of Augustine whence it first began. 4. 19. 27.

Of the three hier orders: and first of Priesthode or sacrificership: where is shewed that the papistes haue most wickedly peruered the order appointed by God, and do wrong to Christ the only & eternal sacrificing priest. 4. 19. 28.

Of their blowing at the making of popish Priests, and howe in that ceremonie they do wrōgfully counterfeit Christ: Where is declared that the Lorde did many thinges which he woulde not haue to be examples for vs to followe. 4. 19. 29.

Of the vndelible character or vndefaceable marke of y^e oile wherewith popishe Priests are anointed at their creatiō: And howe the same is wrōgfully applied to the childrē of Aaron. But these Priests in coueting to be like the Leuites, are apostates from Christ. 4. 19. 30, 31.

Originall sinne.

A definition and expounding of Originall sinne. 4. 15. 10, 11, 12.

A true definition of Originall and a declaration of the same definition: Wherein is shewed, that not only punishment came from Adam vpon vs, but also that the infection destilled from him remaineth in vs, and howe it is the sinne of an other and also oure owne sinne: Finally that such infectiō pearced not only into the inferior desire, but also into the very vnderstanding minde and bottome of the heart, so that there is no part of the soule free from corruption. 2. 1. 8, 9.

A confutation of them that dare charge God with their faultes, by cause we say that men are naturally faulty: And there is proued, that man is corrupt by naturall viciousnesse: (to the ende that no man should think it to be gotten by euill custome) but yet such as proceeded not from nature, but is an acciderall qualitie, and not a substanciall proprietie from the beginning. 2. 1. 10, 11.

Patience.

A Part of the forsaking of our selues, in respect of God, is cōtentation of minde and sufferance: Which we shall performe, if in seeking the commoditie or quietnesse of this present life we yelde our selues wholly to the Lorde, and do not desire, hope for, or thinke vpon any other meane of prosperinge than by his blessing. 3. 7. 8.

So shall it come to passe that we shall neuer seke our owne commodities by vnlawfull meanes or with wronging of our neyghbours: also that we shall not burne with vnmeasurable desire of richesse or of honors: finally if things prosper well with vs, we shall yet be holden from pride, and if they happen ill, we shall yet be restrained from impatience, 3. 7. 9. Which extendeth to all chaunces whereunto our present life is subiect, whereof the faithfull do alwayes acknowledge the hande of God their father, and not fortune, to be the gouernor. 3. 7. 10.

The Patience of the faithfull is not such as is without all feeling of sorowe, but such as being vpholden by Godly comfort, fighteth against the naturall feling of sorow. Therefore the Patience of the Stoikes is to be reiected: neither is it in it selfe any fault to wepe or feare. 3. 8. 8, 9.

A description of y^e striuing which is engendred in the hartes of the faithfull by y^e feling of nature, which feling can not be cleane done away, and by the affection of godlinesse wherewith that same feling must be subdued & ramed. 3. 8. 10.

There is great differēce betwene Philosophicall and Christian patience: Forasmuch as the Philosophers do teache vs to obey because we so must of necessitie: but Christ teacheth it, because it is righteous, and also bycause it is profitable for vs. 3. 8. 11.

Pardons.

The so long cōtinuing of Pardōs, declareth in howe depe darkenesse of errors men haue bene drowned these certaine ages past. 3. 5. 1.

What Pardons are by the papistes doctrine: Wherby is proued that they are a dishonoring of the bloud of Christ: A comparison of Christ and popish Pardons. 3. 5. 1.

A cōsutation of the wicked doctrine of Pardons, by the notable sayinges of Leo bishop of Rome, & of Augustine. And there is shewed that the bloud of martirs is not vnlawfull, although it haue no place in foregouernesse of sinnes. 3. 5. 3, 4.

Either the Gospell of God must ly, or Pardōs must be lieng deceites: And there is shewed what seemeth to haue bin the beginning of them. 3. 5. 5.

Penaunce, the Popish Sacrament.

Of the vsage of the olde Church in publike Penaunce: and of the laying on of handes at reconciliation. Also howe in processe of time the laying on of handes was vsed in private absolutions. 4. 19. 14.

The diuerse opiniōs of y^e Scholemen howe Penaunce is a Sacrament: And there is shewed that the definition of a Sacrament doth not agree with it. 4. 19. 15, 16.

It is a ly, and a deceitfull error which they haue inuented concerning the Sacrament of Penaunce: and it is a wicked and blasphemous title wherwith they haue garnished it, a second boorde after shipwracke from Baptisme. 4. 19. 17.

Perseueraunce.

See Booke. 2. Chap. 5. Sect. 3.

A confutation of the most wicked error, that Perseueraunce is geuen of God according to the Merit of men, so as euery man hath shewed himselfe not vnthankfull for the first grace: and in this opinion is shewed a double error. Of the cōmon distinction of grace working, and working together: and howe Augustine vied it, qualifying it with an apt definition. 2. 3. 11.

Politike gouernement.

There is a differēce to be made betwene Policie, and the inwarde gouernement of the soule. Their doctrine is to be reiected which go about to ouerthrowe Policie as a thing not necessary for Christians, or as a thing that ouerthroweth the spirituall libertie of the soule. Also those flatterers are to be reiected, which do geue to much vnto it, and do set it in cōparison against the authoritie of God. 4. 20. 1, 2.

Policie is the gifte of God, which bringeth great cōmodities to mankinde, and no small helpe to the defence of the state of religion. Politike gouernmēt hath three partes, the Magistrat, the Lawes, and the people. 4. 20. 3.

Of three formes of Ciuile gouernmēt, Aristocracie the gouernment of the best chosen men, Democracie the gouernement of the people, Monarchie the gouernement of one: it can not simply be determined which of these is the best: yet it commeth to passe by the fault of men, that it is safer & more tollerable to haue many to gouerne than one to reigne: But all these formes are of God, and diuersly disposed by him, therefore it is y^e duty of priuate men to obey, and not to make innouatiō of states after their owne will. 4. 20. 8.

Of the immunitie that the Romishe clergy take to themselues, which was altogether vnknownen to the Bishops of the olde Church. 4. 11. 15.

In matters of Faith, the iudgement in the olde time pertained to the Church, and not to Princes, although sometime Princes entremedled their authoritie in ecclesiasticall matters, but the same was done to preferue & not to trouble the order of the Church. 4. 11. 15, 16.

Of the authoritie of the sward vsurped by the bishops in the papacie: and howe they haue by litle & litle frō so small beginnings growē to so great encrease. 4. 11. 9, 10.

Pope.

It is proued that the supremicy of

The Table.

of the see of Rome is not by the institution of Christ. 4.6. 1,2,3,4.

Neither had Peter any principallitie in the Church or among the Apostles. 4.6.5,6,7.

Neither is it profitable nor may be, that one man should beare rule ouer the whole Church. 4.6.8,9,10.

Although Peter had had a supremicy in the Church, yet it followeth not that the seat of that supremicie ought to be at Rome. 4.6.11,12,13.

It is proued by many arguments that Peter was not bishop of Rome. 4.6.14,15.

The supremicie of the see of Rome, is not according to the vse of the olde Church. 4.6.16,17.

Of the beginning and encreasings of the Romish papacie, vntill it aduauced it selfe to that height, whereby both the liberue of the Church is oppressed, and all moderate gouernement hath bene ouerthrowen. 4.7.

In the most parte of the councels, the Bishop of Rome nor his legates had not the chiefe place, but some other of the bishops had it at the Councell of Chalcedon: but yet without order. 4.7.1,2.

Of the title of supremicie and other titles of pride wherewith the Pope boasteth himselfe: and when and howe they crept in. 4.7.3.

Gregory pronounceth that the title of vniuersall bishop was deuised by the deuell, and published by the crier of Antichrist. 4.7.4.

It is proued by the vse of the old

Church, that it is false which the bishop of Rome boasteth, that he hath iurisdiction ouer all Churches, 4.7.5. Whether ye consider the ordering of Bishops, Sect.6. or ecclesiasticall admonitions and censures, Sect.7. or summoning of Councels, Sect.8. or authoritie of higher appeales. Sect.9, 10.

The olde Bishops of Rome in the most part of their Epistles did ambitiously set fourth y^e glory of their see, but those Epistles at that time had no credite: Also they did thrust in certaine forged things as though they had bene written in the olde time by holy men. 4.7.11,20.

Although in the time of Gregory the authoritie of the bishop of Rome vs greatly encreased: yet it is proued by his writings that it was then farre from vnbridled dominion and tyranny. 4.7.12,13,22.

There was strife for the supremacy betwene the bishop of Constantinople and the bishop of Rome. 4.7.14,15,16. vntill Phocas graunted to Boniface y^e thirde, that Rome should be the head of all Churches: which afterwarde Pipine confirmed, when hee gaue to the see of Rome iurisdiction ouer the Churches of Fraunce. 4.7.17.

From thenceforth the tyranny of the see of Rome encreased more and more, partly by ignorance and partly by negligence of Bishops: which destruction of the whole order of the Church Bernarde lamenteth and layeth to the Popes charge. 4.7.18,22.

The Table.

The insolēce and shamelesnesse of the bishops of Rome in setting forth their owne supreme authoritie: 4.7.19,20. which is reprov'd by sayings of Cypriane and Gregorie. Sect. 21.

Rome can not be the mother of all Churches, forasmuch as it is no Church. Neither can the bishop of Rome be head of bishops, sith he is no bishop. 4.7.23,24.

It is proved by Paule, that the Pope is Antichrist. 4.7.25.

Although the Church of Rome in olde time had had the honor of supremacie, yet the same is not to be bounde to a place. 4.7.26,29.

Of the maners of the citie of Rome, of the Pope, and of the Cardinals and their diuinity. 4.7.27,28.

The Bishop of Rome first layed hand vpon kingdomes, & then vpon the Empire: Which is proved by most sharpe reprehensions of Bernarde to be vnmete for him that boasteth himselfe the successor of the Apostles. 4.11.11.

Of the gift of Cōstantine, wherewith he laboreth to hide his robbery, 4.11.12. and howe there are not yett hūe hundred yeare past, since the Popes were in subiectiō of Princes, and by what occasion they haue shaken it of, Sect. 13. and how they brought the citie of Rome into their power, but about a hundred and thirty yeare ago. Sect. 14.

Prayer.

Trew faith can not be ydle from callinge vpon God. 3.20.1.

Howe necessary and howe many wayes profitable is the exercise of Praying, 3.20.2. although the Lord will not ceasse while we craue nor, nor nedeth any to put him in mind. Sect. 3.

The first rule of well framinge our Prayer, is that we be no otherwise disposed in harte and minde than becommeth them that enter into talke with God. 3.20.4,5.

The seconde rule is, y in Praying we alway feele our owne nedinesse, and that earnestly considering that we wante all these things that we aske, we ioine with our Prayer an earnest and feruent desire to obtaine. 3.20.6.

We ought to pray at all times, and in the greatest quietnesse of our estates, the onely remēbraunce of our sinnes ought to be no small prouocatiō to moue vs to that exercise. 3.20.7.

The thirde rule of Praying well, is that we forsake all confidence of our owne glory, lest if wee presumptuously take any thing, be it neuer so little, vnto our selues, wee with our vaine pride, fall downe from his face. 3.20.8.

The beginning of Praying well, is the obtaining of pardon, with an humble and plaine confession of offence. 3.20.9.

In what sense the Prayers of certaine holy men are to be taken, in which to entreate God, they seeme to alledge their owne rightednesse. 3.20.10.

The fourth rule of Praying well, is that being so ouerthrowen and beaten downe with trewe humilitie, we be neuerthelesse encouraged to Pray with an assured hope to obtaine: So in our Prayers, faith and repêtaunce do mete together. 3.20.11.

Of the certainty of faith, whereby the faithfull do determine that God is fauorable vnto them: And howe necessary y^e same is in Prayer: Neither is that certainty weakened, when it is ioined with acknowledging of our own misery. 3.20.12.

God cōmaundeth vs to call vpon him: hee promiseth, that we shalbe heard: both these things are necessary, that we may Pray in faith. 3.20.13.

There are rehearsed diuerse promises of God, with the swetenesse whereof they that are not stirred vp to Pray, are altogether vnexcusable. 3.20.14.

An exposition of certaine places, wherein God semeth to haue assented to some mennes Prayers which yet were grounded vpon no promise. 3.20.15.

These foure rules of Praying well, are not examined with so extreme rigor, but that God herein doth beare with many infirmities, yea many intemperances in them that be his, which is proued by many examples. 3.20.16.

We must alway Pray in the name of Christ onely, 3.20.17. neither were the faithfull euer hearde any otherwise. Sect. 18.

They which Pray otherwise, haue nothing lefte for thē at the throne of God, but wrath & terror. 3.20.19.

It is not against Christes office of mediator: that we be commaunded to Pray one for an other. 3.20.19.

A confutation of the Sophisters deuise, which say that Christ is the mediator of redemption, and the faithfull are mediators of intercession. 3.20.20.

Against them, which make dead Sainctes intercessors to God for them, or do mingle the intercession of Christ, with the Prayers and merites of dead men. 3.20.21.

This foolishnesse hath proceeded in the papacie to grosse monstrousnesse of vngodlinesse, and to horrible sacrileges. 3.20.22.

A confutation of the arguments wherewith the papistes labour to confirme the intercession of dead Sainctes. 3.20.23, 24, 25, 26.

It is vnlawefull to directe our Prayers to dead Sainctes, forasmuch as this kinde of worshippinge doth most properly belong to God alone. 3.20.27.

Of the sorts of Prayer, & chiefly of thankesgeuing: Also of the continuall exercise of the faithfull in Prayer and thankesgeuing. 3.20.28, 29.

Of the babbling of the papistes, & of auoiding all boasting in Prayers, of departing into secret places, and of publike Prayers. 3.20.29.

Publike Prayers must be made in the common and natiue speache of the lande. And there is entreated of kneeling and vncouering of the hed at Prayer. 3.20.33.

An exposition of the same prayer. 3.20.36.

The same in euery point is a perfect and vpright prayer, 3.20.48. wherunto nothing ought to be added, although we may vse other wordes in making our prayers. Sect. 49.

Of the confidence which the name of the children of God doth bring vnto vs, which euen the conscience of our sinnes ought not to ouerthrowe. 3.20.36,37.

Although we ought to pray for all men, and specially for them of the householde of faith, yet this withstandeth not, but that we may praye specially, both for our selues and certain other. 3.20.38,39,47.

Of the boldnes of asking which the Lorde graunteth to his, and the trust of obtaining. 3.20.47.

It is good that euery one of vs for exercise, appoint to himselve certaine peculiar houres to praye, so that it be done without superstitious obseruation. 3.20.50.

In all our prayer we ought diligently to beware that we go not about to binde God to certaine circumstances. 3.20.50.

Of perseueraunce and paciēce in the exercise of prayer. 3.20.51,52.

Predestination.

It is proued that the doctrine of Predestinatiō is a doctrine of most swete frute. There are rehearsed three principall profites thereof: and they are admonished which being moued with a certain curiositie do beyond the boundes of Scripture breake into the secretes of the wisdome of God: 3.1.1,2. and also they which would haue all mention of Predestination to be buried. Sect. 3.4.

What is Predestination, and what is the foreknowledge of God, and howe the one of them is wrongfully set after the other. The example of Predestination in all the offspring of Abraham in respect of other nations, is cōfirmed by many testimonies of Scripture. 3.21.5.

Also there is shewed a speciall Predestinatiō, wherby euen among the Children themselues he hath made difference betwene some and other some. Sect. 6.7.

God as well in election as in reprobatiō hath no respect of workes neither passed nor to come, but his good pleasure is the cause of both, 3.22.2,3,4,5,6.7.11.

This is proued by Augustine, Sect. 8.

Against those hoggs which vnder color of Predestination do go carelessly forward in their sinnes: and against all them which say that if this doctrine take place, all endeuor of well working decayeth. 3. 23. 12.

Against them which say that this doctrine ouerthroweth all exhortations to godly life, it is proued by Augustine that preaching hath his course, and yet the knowledge of Predestination is not hindred thereby, 3. 23. 13.

In this point of doctrine we must so temper our maner of teaching the truth, that so farre as we may, we wisely beware of Offence. 3. 23. 14.

Whereas some obey the preaching of the worde of God, and other some despise it, or be more blinded and hardened thereby, although this come to passe by their owne malice and vnthankfulnesse, yet we must therewith also knowe, that this diuersitie hāgeth vpon the secret counsell of God, than which, it is vnlawfull for to search for any further cause. 3. 24. 12, 13, 14.

An exposition of certaine places wherein God seemeth to deny that it commeth to passe by his ordinance that the wicked perishe, but inasmuch as against his will they wilfully bring destruction vpon themselues. And there is shewed that those places make nothing against the doctrine of Predestination. 3. 24. 15, 16.

The vniuersalnesse of the promises of saluation, maketh nothing against the doctrine of the Predestination of the reprobate: and yet not without cause are they framed vniuersally. 3. 24. 16.

Here also are confuted certaine obiections of them which deny this point of doctrine.

The Table.

Priesthode, Kingdome, and Propheticall office of Christ.

That wee may knowe to what end Christ was sent of his father, & what he brought vnto vs, three things are chiefly to be considered in him, his Propheticall Office, his Kingdome, and his Priesthode: and therefore is geuen to him the title of Christ (or Messias which signifieth annointed) although he be specially so called in respect of his kingdome. Albeit that God alway gaue Prophets and teachers to his Church, yet it is proued that all the Godly looked for full light of vnderstanding, onely at the comming of Messias: and that he when he appeared was annointed a Prophet, not onely for himselfe, but also for all his body. 2. 15. 1, 2.

As touching his kingdome, first we must note the spirituall nature thereof, whereuppon also is gathered the eternall continuance of it, which is of two sortes: the one pertaineth to the whole body of the Church, the other is propre to euery member: Both sortes are declared and plainly set forth by testimonies of Scripture. 2. 15. 3.

It is declared that the profit of the kingdome of Christ can not otherwise be perceiued of vs, but when we knowledge it to be spirituall: And the same profit consisteth in two things, namely that it enricheth vs with all good things necessary to eternall saluation, secondly that it fortifieth vs with strength and vertue against the deuill and all his assaults: And so Christ reigneth for vs rather than for himselfe, whereupon we are rightfully called Christians: Where it is said that at the last day he shall yelde vp his kingdome to God and his Father, and such like sayings the same maketh nothing against the eternity of his kingdome. 2.

15. 4, 5.

As touching his Priesthode, that the efficacy and profit thereof may come to vs, it is shewed that we must begin at the death of Christ. Hereupon it followeth that hee is an euerlasting intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine fauor, whereby ariseth to Godly consciences both boldnesse to pray, and quietnesse: finally that he is so a Priest, that he ioineth vs in the fellowship of so great an honor, to the ende that the Sacrifices of prayers and praise which came from vs, may be acceptable to God. 2. 15. 6.

Promises.

Not without cause all the Promises are concluded in Christ: forasmuch as euery Promise is a testifying of the lawe of God toward vs, and none of vs is beloued of God without Christ. Neither was Naaman the Syrian, Cornelius the captaine, nor y Eunuiche to whom Philip was carried, without knowledge of Christ, although they had but a very small tast of him, and a faith in some parte vnexpressed. 3. 2. 3 2.

hearte with loue of righteousnesse and hatred of wickednesse, was not content to set forth bare commaundementes only, but added Promises of blessings both of this present life and of eternall blessednesse, & also threatninges both of present miseries, and of eternall death: The threatnings declare the great purenes of God: the Promises do shew his great loue to righteousnes, and his wonderful goodnes toward me. 2.8.4.

Providence of God.

Prophane men, by fleshly vnderstanding do confesse God the creator, otherwise than we do by faith: forasmuch as faith doth teach that he is also the gouernour of all things, not by a certaine vniuersal motiō, but by a singular Providēce, which extendeth euen to the least sparrow. 1.16.1.

They which giue any thinge to fortune, do bury the Providence of God, by whose secrete counsell all successēs are gouerned. 1.16.2.

Things without life, although eche of thē haue their property naturally planted in them, yet do not put forth their force, but so farre, as they be directed by y^e present hand of God: Which is proued by the sonne, before which he would both light to be, and the earth to abound with all kinde of good things: which also we read to haue stand stīl by the space of two daies, and gone backe two degrees at the commaundement of God. 1.16.2. also by the starres and signes of the heauen, which the vnbeleuers do feare. Sect. 3.

The almightines of God is busied in continuall doinge, so that it extendeth to euery particular act, and nothings happeneth but by his counsell: Which who so do not acknowledge, they defraude God of his glorie and do extenuate his goodnes: But we on the other side do receiue double frute therof. 1.16.3.

It is proued that the Providence of God doth not onely beholde things that are done, but gouerneth all successēs: Whereby is ouerthrowen the fained inuention of bare foreknowledge & of vniuersal Providence only: Also the error of the Epicures is cōfuted, & of thē which giue to God a gouernaunce onely aboute the middle region of the aire. Yet there may a certaine vniuersall Providēce be graunted, but so, that y^e speciall Providence be not darkened, which doth gouerne not onely certaine but all particular doinges. 1.16.4, 5.

That not only the beginning of motion is in the disposing of God, is proued by the plentifulnesse of one yeare and the barrennesse of another, for whereas God calleth the one his blessinge, and the other his curse and vengeance. 1. 16. 5.

The Prouidence of God in gouerning the worlde, is chiefly to be considered in mankinde, and in the diuerse estate of all men, & diuerse disposing of succeses. 1. 16. 6, 7. Against them which cauilt, that this doctrine of the Prouidence of God, is the Stoikes doctrin of fate or destinie. 1. 16. 8.

Whether any thinge happen by fortune or chaunce: Where is rehearsed the sayinge of Basilus Magnus, that Chaunce and Fortune are words of heathen men: also the saying of Augustine, that he repented that he hadde vsed the name of Fortune. Yet those thinges may be said to happē by fortune in respect of vs, which beinge considered in their nature, or weyed according to our knowledge, do seme so, although in the secret councell of God they be necessary: Also all thinges that are to come, may be said to be happening, inasmuch as they be vncertaine to vs. 1. 16. 8, 9.

What thinges are to be considered, that the doctrine of the Prouidence of God may be referred to a right hande, that we haue the profit thereof: And where the causes of those thinges that happen, appeare not vnto vs, we must beware that we do not thinke, that thinges are rolled by the sway of fortune: but we must so reuerence his secreete iudgements, that we esteeme his wil the most iust cause of al thinges. 1. 17. 1.

Against certaine dogges, which at this day do barcke against y^e Prouidence of God, it is proued by the Scripture that wheras God hath so reuealed his will in the lawe & the gospel, y^e he illuminateth the minds of them that be his with the spirite of vnderstandinge, to perceiue the mysteries therein contained, which otherwise are incomprehēfible, yet the order of gouerning the worlde is called a bottōlesse depth, because when we know not the causes thereof, yet we ought reuerētly to honor it. 1. 17. 2.

Such prophane men do foolishly comber themselues, when they alleage that if the doctrine of the Prouidence of God be true, then the prayers of the faithful in which they aske any thinge for time to come, are vaine, no counsell is to be taken for things to come, & then men which do any thing against the lawe of God, do not sinne: These dangerous errors they shall auoid, which in consideringe the Prouidence of God, shall frame themselues to true modesty. 1. 17. 3.

As concerning things to come, it is proued that the Scripture doth well ioyne the aduisements of men with the Prouidence of God: because we are not hindered by his eternall decrees, but that vnder his will, we may both foresee for our selues, and order our owne thinges: For the knowledge of consultinge and taking heede, are inspired into men by the Lord, whereby we may serue his Prouidence, in the preser-

uing of our owne life. 1. 17. 4.

In all successe of time past the will of God doth governe: and yet the doers of wicked dedes are not excused, because they are accused by their owne conscience, and do not obey the wil of God, but their owne lust: They are in dede the instruments of Gods Prouidence, but so, that they finde the whole euil in themselves, & in God is found nothing but a lawfull vse of their euilnesse, 1. 17. 5. & 1. 18. 4. Where also the same thing is shewed in the election of kinge Iarobeam, the ten tribes forsakinge the house of Dauid, the slaughter of the sonnes of Achab, & in the betrayinge of the Sonne of God.

A Godly and holy meditation of the Prouidence of God, which is taught by the rule of godlinesse: first that beinge certainly perswaded that no thinge happeneth by fortune, we alway cast our eyes to God the chiefe cause of al thinges: then that we dout not that his singular Prouidence watcheth for vs, whether we haue to do with men as well euil as good, or with his other creatures: To which vse we must apply the promises of God in the Scripture which testifie y^e same, the examples whereof are rehearsed. 1. 17. 6.

We must also adioyne those testimonies of Scripture which teach that al men are vnder the power of God, whether we nede to get their good wils or restraine the malice of our enemies: which last point God worketh diuerse waies, somtime by takinge away their wit, sometime when he graunteth them witte, he frayeth them that they dare not go about that which they haue conceiued: and somtime also when he suffereth them to go about it, he breaketh their enterprises: Vppon which knowledge necessarily foloweth a thankefulnesse of minde in so prosperous successe of thinges. 1. 17. 7.

In aduersity when we are hurt by men, is required patience and quiet moderation of minde: Which is shewed in the examples of Ioseph beinge afflicted of his brethren, Iob persecuted of y^e Chaldees, & Dauid rayled vpon of Semet. If we happen to be distressed with any misery without the worke of men, this selfe same doctrine is the best remedy against impatience, because the Scripture testifieth, that euen aduersities also do come frō God. 1. 17. 8.

A Godly man principally regarding the prouidence of God, yet will not leaue inferiour causes vnmarked. Therefore if he haue receiued a benefite of any man, he will hartily know and confesse himselfe to be bounde vnto him. If he haue taken harme or done harme to any other by his negligence or wāt of heede, he will impute it vnto himselfe, much lesse will he excuse his owne offences. In thinges to come chiefly he will haue consideration of inferiour causes, but yet so, that in determinge he will not be caried away with his owne wit, but committe himfelfe to the wifedom of God: neither fhall his truſt ſo ſtay vpon outwarde helpes, that he will careleſely reſt vpon them if he haue them, nor be diſmaied for feare if he want them. 1. 17. 9.

A large deſcription of the ineſtimable felicitie of a Godly minde which reſteth vpon the Prouidēce of God: and on the other ſide the miſerable carefulneſſe wherewith we muſt needes be diſtreſſed when the weakenes of this earthly cotage maketh vs ſubiect to ſo many diſeaſes, ſith our life and ſafety is beſieged with infinite daungers at home, abroad, vpon the lande, in the water, by men, & by deuils. 1. 17. 10, 11.

Thoſe places of Scripture where it is ſaid that God repented him: make nothing againſt the doctrine of providence, forasmuch as therein (like as alſo when he is ſayd to be angry) the Scripture applying it ſelf to our capacity deſcribeth him, not ſuch as he is, but ſuch as we feele him to be. Likewise, where he ſpared the Niniuites, to whom he had threatned deſtruction within forty dayes: whereas he prolonged the life of Ezechias for many yeres, to whom he had declared preſent deathe: becauſe ſuch threatnings containe an vnexprefſed condition. Which is well proued by a like example in King Abimelech, which was rebuked for Abrahams wife. 1. 17. 12, 13, 14.

A confutation of them, which coueting to get a praiſe of modeſty, go about to maintaine y^e righteouſneſſe of God with a lying defence, when they ſay: that thoſe thinges which Sathan and all the reprobate do naughtily, are done by the ſuffe-rance of God, and not by his prouidence and will. And it is proued by the affliction of Iob, the deceiuing of Achab, the killing of Chriſt, the inceſtuouſ adultery of Abſolon, and many other examples, that men do worke nothings but that which he hath alre-dy decreed with himſelfe, and doth appoynt ſo to be by his ſecrete direction. 1. 18. 1.

And this hath place, not only in outward doinges, but alſo in ſecrete motiōs. For it is proued by the hardening of Pharao and other teſtimonies, that God worketh euen in the mindes alſo and hartes of the wicked: Neither maketh it any thing to the contrary, that oftentimes the worke of Sathan is vſed therein: For God worketh neuertheleſſe, but after his owne manner, vſinge a iuſt reuenge, 1. 18. 2. and therefore God is not the author of ſinnes. Sect. 4.

They are proued guilty of intolerable pride, which reſuſe this doctrine vnder pretence of modeſty. A confutation of their obiection whē they ſay, that if nothing happē but with the will of God, then hath he in himſelfe two contrary wils, forasmuch as he doth appoynt thoſe thinges to be done by his ſecrete counſell, which he hath openly forbidden by his law. And there is ſhe-wed, that God doth not disagree with himselfe, that the will of God is not chaunged, that he doth not faine himselfe to nill that which he willeth: but wheras there is in God, but one simple will, the same to vs appeareth diuerse, because for the weakenesse of our vnderstandinge, we conceiue not howe he diuersly both willeth not, and willeth one selfe thing to be done. Finally it is proued by Augustine, that man sometimes with good will willeth somthinge which God willeth not: & sometime willeth that thing with euill will, which God willeth with good wil. 1. 18. 3.

The consideration of Gods power in gouerning this frame of heauen & earth, and all the partes that are in them. 1. 5. 5.

The felowship of men is so gouerned by the prouidence of God, that he sheweth himselfe liberall, mercifull, righteous, and seuer. 1. 5. 6.

Those thinges which in the life of men are cōpted chaunces, as well of prosperity as aduersity, are so many tokens of the heauenly Prouidence, 1. 5. 7. and ought to awaken vs to the hope of the life to come. Sect. 9.

How God worketh in the hartes of thē that be his: & Sathan in them that be his, but yet so, that they are nor excused. 2. 4. 1.

God worketh also in the wicked, & euen in the same worke wherin Sathan worketh, and yet is not God so said to be ȳ author of sinne, neither is Sathan or the wicked excused, but there is difference betwene the one & the other, both in the ende and maner of doing. 2. 4. 2, 5.

The old writers oftentimes referred these things, not to the working of God, but to his foreknowledge or sufferance, least the wicked shoulde thereby take occasion to speake irreuerently of the works of God. But the Scripture, when it saith that God blindeth, hardeneth and such like, declareth somewhat more than a sufferance: although God do worke two wayes in the reprobate, namely by forsakinge them, and takinge his spirite from them, and also by deliueringe them to Sathan the minister of his wrath. 2. 4. 3, 4.

The ministry of Sathan is vsed to stirre forward the reprobate, whensoever the Lorde by his prouidence directeth them hither or thither. 2. 4. 5.

Redemer Christ.

THe knowledge of God y Creator is vnprofitable vnto vs, vnlesse faith do also folow, setting him forth in Christ a father & Redemer to vs; and this doctrine from the beginning of the world in all ages hath bin holden amonge the children of God. 2. 6. 1.

It is proued by diuerse argumentes and testimonies of Scripture, that the happy state of the Church hath alway bin grounded vpo the person of Christ. For both the first adoptiō of the chosen people, & the preseruing of the church, the deliuerance of them in perils, and the restoringe after their dissipation, did alway hange vpon the grace of y mediator. And the hope of all the Godly was neuer reposed any other where than in Christ. 2. 6. 2, 3, 4.

It is to be diligently considered how Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redemer, that we may finde in him all thinges necessary for vs, sith (as Bernard sayth) he is to vs light, meate, oyle, salt, &c. 2. 16. 1.

An exposition howe we shoulde say that God was our enemy vntill he was reconciled to vs by Christ, whereas to giue Christ to vs, and to preuent vs with mercy, were signes of the loue wherewith he before embraced vs. And there is shewed that the Scripture vseth this speach and such other, to apply it selfe to our capacity: and yet it doth not say the same falsely. And all this is proued by the authority of Scripture, & the testimony of Augustine. 2. 16. 2, 3.

Regeneration.

Against certaine Anabaptistes which inuēt a phrentike intemperance in stede of spirituall Regeneration, namely that the children of God beinge now restored into the state of innocency, ought no more to be carefull to bridle the lust of the flesh, but only to folow the Spirit for their guide. 3. 3. 14.

Of the distinction of fault and peine:wherewith most strong testi-monies of Scripture, the dotinge error of the papistes is confuted, namely that when the fault is for-giuen yet God retayneth the peine, which remaineth to be redeemed with satisfactiōs:3.4.29,30.& there also is shewed that they can not scape away with their distinction betwene euerlasting peine & tem-porall peines.

Of certaine places of Scripture wherewith they go about to con-firme their error:where is declared that there are two kindes of the iudgement of God:the one of ven-geance, the other of chastisement; which are wisely to be distingui-shed a sunder.3.4.31.

The first of these, that is to say vengeance, the faithfull haue al-way earnestly prayed to escape:the other, that is to say chastisement, they haue receyued with quiete minde, because it hath a testimo-ny of loue. And where it is said that God is angry with his Saintes, the same is not meant of his purpose or affection to punishe them, but is spoken of the vehement feelinge of sorowe wherewith they are stri-ken so soone as they beare any parte of his seuerity : and this is profitable for them. On the other side the reprobate, when they are striken with the scourges of God, do already after a certaine manner beginne to feele the peynes of his iudgement. All which thinges are proued by testimonies of the Scrip-ture, and also by the expositions of Chrysofome and Augustine.3.4.32

This doctrine is proued by testi-monies of Scripture against the Nouatians & certaine of the Ana-baptistes, which faine that the peo-ple of God are by baptisme rege-nerate into an angelike life, and af-terward there remaineth no pardō for them that fall. 4.1.23,24,25,26, Repentance.

Repentāce commeth of faith;&

goeth not before it. 3. 3. 1.

A confutation of their reasons which thinke otherwise, but hereby is not signified any space of time wherein faith bredeth repentance: but only is shewed that no man can earnestly endeour himselfe to Repentance vnlesse he know himselfe to be Gods. Of the errour of certaine Anabaptistes, Iesuites, and such other which appoint to their nouices, certaine dayes for Repentance. 3. 3. 2.

Certaine learned men long before this time, made two partes of Repentance, namely Mortification, which they commonly call contrition, and Viuification which they wrongfully expound to be comfort by the feling of the mercy of God, whereas it rather signifieth a desire to liue well. 3. 3. 3.

They do also make two other sortes of Repentance, the one of the lawe, the other of the Gospell: where also are shewed examples of either sorte out of the Scripture. 3. 3. 4.

A true definition of Repentance take out of the Scripture, And how Repentance though it can not be seuered, yet ought to be distinguished from faith. 3. 3. 5.

A plainer declaration of the definition of Repentance: where first is shewed y there is requiringe a turning to God, that is to say an alteration, not only in outward workes, but also in the soule it self, 3. 3. 6. the that it procedeth of an earnest feare of God: Where also is entreated of the sorowfulness that is accordinge to God. 3. 3. 7.

Thirdly that sayinge is declared that Repentance consisteth of two parts, the Mortification of the flesh, and the quickening of the Spirite. 3. 3. 8.

Both these things do we obtaine by partakinge of Christ, the first by communicating of his death, the seconde of his resurrection. Therefore Repentance is a new iorminge of the image of God in vs, & a restoringe into the righteoufnesse of God by the benefit of Christ: And this restoring is not fulfilled in vs in one moment. 3. 3. 9.

But there remaineth in all the saintes, while they liue in mortall body, matter of strif with their flesh, and so thought all the ecclesiastical wryters that haue bin of sounde iudgement: & specially Augustine, which calleth this nourishment of euill and disease of lustinge in the elect, weakenes, and sometime sinne: And in deede it is sinne. 3. 3. 10.

This is confirmed by the testimony of Paule, & by the summe of the commaundements. Whereas it is sayd y God cleanseth his church from all sinne, the same is spoken rather of the guiltinesse of sinne thã of the matter of sinne it self, which ceaseth not to dwell in the regenerate (but ceaseth to reigne in them) though it be not imputed. 3. 3. 11.

A declaratiõ of the seven causes or effects, or partes or affections of Repentance, which Paul rehearseth: Those

The Table.

Those be study or carefulnesse, excusing, displeasure, feare, desire, zeale, reuenge. Whereunto also is added out of Paul, and declared by an excellent admonition of Bernard, that in such reuenge we must keepe a measure. 3. 3. 15.

The frutes of Repentance are, deuotion towarde God, charity toward men, holines and purenes in all our life: but al these ought to beginne at the inwarde affectiō of the heart, from whence outwarde testimonies may afterwarde springe forth: Where also is spoken of certaine outward exercises of Repentance, which the olde writers seme to enforce somewhat too much. 3. 3. 16.

Turninge of the heart to God, is the chiefe point of Repentance: sackcloth and ashes, weping & fasting, were vsed of them in the olde time before Christ, as tokens of publike Repentāce: of which the two last may yet be vsed to appease the wrath of God in ȳ miserable times of the Church. 3. 3. 17.

The name of Repentance or penance is vnproperly drawn from his naturall sente to this outwarde profession. Publike cōfession is not alway necessary in sinnes: but priuate confession to God may neuer be omitted, wherein we ought to confesse not onely those thinges that we haue lately committed, but the displeasure of our greuous fall ought also to cal vs backe to remembrance of our passed offences. Of speciall penance which is required of haynous offenders and certaine other: and of the ordinary penance which the children of God, euen the most perfect, ought to vse all their life long. 3. 3. 18.

God doth therefore freely iustifie them that be his, that he may also with the Sanctificatiō of his spirit restore them into true righteousness: Therefore Iohn, Christ and the Apostles, preached Repentance and remission of sinnes. The effect of which saying is declared. 3. 3. 19.

Christians ought to exercise themselves in a continuall Repentance, & he hath most profited, that hath learned most to mislike himselfe. 3. 3. 20.

Repentance is a singular gift of God, vnto which he calleth all men, which he giueth to all them whom he purposeth to saue, and which the Apostle pronounceth ȳ it shall neuer be given to wilfull apostataes whose wickednesse is vn-pardonable, that is to say, such as haue sinned against the holy ghost 3. 3. 1.

Although fained Repentance doth not please God, yet he sometime for a season spareth hypocrites which make a shewe of some conuersion, which he doth not for their sakes, but for common example, that we may learne more cherefully to giue our mindes to vnfained Repentance: And this is proued by the examples of Achab, Esau, & the Israelites. 3. 3. 25.

erre in those definitiōs which they make of Repentance, and no better do they diuide it, when they parte it into contrition of heart, confessiō of mouth, & satisfaction of worke: Where is entreated of certaine questiōs which they moue: whereupon is easily gathered, that they babble of thinges which they know not, whē they speake of Repentance. 3.4.1.

When they require those three thinges in Repentance, they must needes binde thereunto forgiuenesse of sinnes: And if it be so, then are we most miserable, forasmuch as we can neuer haue quietnes of cōscience: Which is proued first in that cōtrition of heart such as they require. 3.4.2.

There is great differēce betwene the doctrine of such contrition, & that cōtrition which the Scripture requireth of sinners, that they truly hunger & thirst for the mercy of God. 3.4.3.

In what sense the olde wryters thought that solemne penance, which was then required for haynous offences, might no more be eftsoones done than Baptisine. 4.1. 29.

Reason of Man.

Mans vnderstanding is not so to be condemned of perpetuall blindness, that we leaue it no whit of vnderstanding in any kinde of thing: but it hath some knowledge inasmuch as he is naturally caried with desire to searche out trueth. And yet this desire by and by falleth into vanity, because the minde of man can not for dulnes, keepe the right way to search out trueth, & for the most part he discerneth not of what thinges it is behouefull for him to seeke the true knowledge. 2.2.12.

As touching earthly things, it is proued by exāples that the minde of man hath a sharp vnderstanding, as first of all in ciuile policy and in gouernance of householdes, sith euery man vnderstandeth that the felowships of men must be holden together by lawes, and comprehendeth in minde y principles of those lawes. 2.2.13.

Also in liberall artes and handy craftes, for learninge whereof, yea for amplifyinge and garnishinge of the same, there is in man a certaine aptnesse, although some be more apt thā other. But the light of Reason and vnderstanding in men is so a generall good qualitic in all men, that yet it is a free gift of Gods liberalitie towarde euery man: which thing God sheweth when he createth some Idiotēs and dull witted: also when he maketh one man to excell in sharp inuention, an other in iudgement, an other in quicquesse of minde, againe when he poureth into men singular motions according vnto euery manes calling, and according to the time and matter that is to be done. 2.2.14, 17.

The inuention of artes, the orderly teaching or depe & excellent knowledge thereof, which appeare to haue bin in y olde Lawyeres, Philosophers,

The Table.

Iosophers, Phisitians, being profane men, do declare vnto vs that the minde of men how much soeuer it be fallen from his first vprightnes, is yet still garnished with excellent gifts of God. 2.2.15.

They are the giftes of the holy Ghost which the Lorde giueth to whom he will, euen to the vngodly for the publike benefite of mankinde. Therefore we ought to vse them although they be communicate vnto vs by the ministry of the wicked, to whom they are but transitory and fleting, because they are without the founde foundation of truth. 2.2.16.

It is shewed in the first two points, that mans Reason seeth nothinge that concerneth the kingdome of God and heauenly matters, which are contained in three things, that is to say, to know God, his fatherly fauour towarde vs, and the way to frame our life accordinge to the rule of his lawe. 2.2.18. and to that purpose are alleaged diuerse testimonies of Scripture. Sect. 19, 20, 21 In the third it seemeth that he hath some more vnderstandinge than in the other, forasmuch as man is instructed by the lawe of nature to a right rule of life. But such knowledge is vnperfect in y vnbeleuers, & auayleth to no other end, but to make them vnexcusable: neither do they by that naturall light, see the truth in euery thinge. And here is expounded the sayinge of Themistius, that vnderstanding in the vniuersall definition is seldome decei-ued, but the error is when it descēdeth to particular causes, and there is shewed, that más vniuersal iudgement in the difference of good and euil, is not alway sound and vpright. For it attaineth not those which are the chiefe things in the first table of the law, namely of cōfidence in God. &c. In the second table, although it haue some more vnderstandinge, yet it appeareth that it somtime erreth, as when it iudgeth that it is an absurditie to suffer to imperious gouernment, and not to reuenge wronges: also it knoweth not the diseale of desire in the whole obseruation of the lawe. 2.2.22, 23, 24.

It is proued by the Scripture, that the sharpnes of our Reason in all the partes of our life, is nothing before the Lord: & our mindes do read the grace of enlightening, not only at the beginninge, or for one day, but at euery moment. 2.2.25. See under the title of Freewill, certaine thinges pertaininge to this matter.

Resurrection of Christ.

Without the Resurrection of Christ, all is vnperfect that we beleue concerning his crosse, Death, & Burial. Thereof we receiue three profites: forasmuch as it hath both purchased vs righteousnes before God, & is to vs a pledge of the Resurrection to come, & by his life, we are now regenerate into newnesse of life. 2.16.13.

The article concerning the last Resurrection, cōtaineth a doctrine of great weight, graue and hard to beleue : for the ouercomminge of which hardnes by faith, the Scripture giueth twō helps, the example of Christ, and the almightinesse of God. 3.25.3,4.

Sabbath.

AN exposition of the fourth cōmaundement, the ende thereof, and the three causes whereupon we must note that it consisteth. 2.8.28.

The first cause is a shadowing of spirituall rest, that is to say, of our sanctification: This is proued by diuerse places to haue bin the chiefe thing in the Sabbath. 2.8.29.

Why the Lorde appointed the seuenth day. 2.8.30,31.

This part, forasmuch as it was ceremonial, is takē away by the death of Christ. 2.8.31.

The two latter causes, that is to say, that there shoulde be certaine dayes appointed for assemblies in the Church, and that there should be giuen to seruantes a rest from their labour, do serue for all ages. 2.8.32.

Of daies of meting in the church to heare the word of God & common praiers : Where is spoken of obseruing of the Sunday, 2.8.32,33 and of superstition to be auoyded in this behalfe. 2.8.34.

Sacraments.

What is a Sacrament. 4.14.1.

For what reason the old writers vsed this word in that sense. 4.14.2, 13.

A Sacrament is neuer without a promise going before, which the Lord sealeth by that meane, wherein he prouideth helpe for our ignorance and dulnesse, and also for our weakenes. 4.14.3,5,6,12.

A Sacrament consisteth of the worde & the outward signe: But the Sacramentall worde is to be taken otherwise than the papistes thinke. 4.14.4.

Sacramentes ceasse not to be testimonies of the grace of God, although though they be giuen also to the wicked, which do gather to themselves more greuous dānation thereby. 4. 14. 7.

Our faith is so confirmed by Sacraments, that yet it hangeth vpon the inwarde effectuall working of the Spirite, 4. 14. 9, 10, 11. and no vertue is to be put in the creatures. Sect. 12.

A confutation of the deuclishe doctrine of the Sophistical scholes, that the Sacramentes of the newe law do iustifie and do giue grace, so that we do not stop it with deadly sinne. 4. 14. 14.

Augustines good distinction betwene a Sacrament and the thinge of the Sacrament, whereby is proued that though God in Sacramēts do truely offer Christ, yet the wicked receiue nothinge but the Sacrament, y is to say, the outward signe. 4. 14. 15, 16.

We must not thinke that there is ioyned or fastened to the Sacraments any secrete vertue, whereby they by themselves do giue vs the graces of the holy Ghost. 4. 14. 17.

In the olde time God gaue vnto his people some Sacraments in miracles, and some in natural thinges. And there is spoken of the tree of life and of the raynebowe. 4. 14. 18.

Sacramentes are on the Lordes behalfe testimonies of grace & saluation, & on our behalfe tokens of our profession. 4. 14. 19.

The Sacramentes of the olde Church vnder the lawe, tended to the same end that our Sacramentes do, that is to say, Christ: whom yet our Sacramēts do more plainly represent. Wherefore the scholemens doctrine is to be reiected, which say, that the olde Sacraments did shew a shadow of the grace of God, and ours do giue it presently. 4. 14. 20, 21, 22, 23. &c.

The five falsely called Sacraments.

When we deny those five to be Sacraments which are inuented by men, we strive not about the name but the thing: because the papistes will haue them to be visible formes of inuisible grace. 4. 19. 1.

Many reasons are brought, why it is not lawfull for men to make Sacraments. Also there is a difference to be put betwene Sacraments, and other ceremonies. 4. 19. 2.

The nūber of seuen Sacraments can not be proued by the authority of the old Church. 4. 19. 3.

Although the old Church vnder the law, had mo Sacraments, yet at this day, the Christiā church ought to be cōtent with those two, which Christ hath ordained: And it is not lawfull for men to make other, nor to adde vnto these any thinge of their owne. 4. 18. 20.

Sacrifices.

A difference betwene the Sacrifices of Moses his law, & the supper of the Lord in the Christiā church 4. 18. 12.

What the name of a Sacrifice properly signifieth: and of the diuerse kindes of Sacrifices vnder the lawe: which may be deuided into two sortes, whereof some may be called of thanksgiuinge, and other some propitiatory or of cleansinge. 4.18.13.

Our only propitiatory Sacrifice, is the death of Christ. Sacrifices of thanksgiuing we haue many, as all the duties of charity, praiers, praises, giuinge of thanks, and all that we do to the worshipping of God. 4.18.13, 16, 17.

This maner of Sacrificing is daily vsed in the church, & in the supper of the Lord: And thereupon all Christians are Sacrificing Priestes.

Satisfactions Papisicall.

Of Satisfaction, which they make the third thinge in penance, of retaininge the paine, the fault beinge forgiuen, & such like lies, which all are ouerthrowen, by setting against the free forgiuenes of sinnes, by the name of Christ. 3.4.25.

A confutation of the blasphemous error of the schoolemen, that forgiuenes of sinnes, and reconciliation is once done in Baptisme, but after Baptisme, we must rise againe by Satisfactions. 3.4.26.

By such error, Christ is spoyled of his honor, & the peace of consciences is troubled, forasmuch as they can nener certainly determine, that their sinnes are forgiuen them. 3.4.27.

In Daniel, when Nabuchadonefer is commaunded to redeeme his sinnes with righteousnesse, that same redeming is referred to God, rather than to men, and the cause of pardon is not there set foorth, but rather the maner of true conuersion. The same is to be said of certaine other places of Scripture. 3.4.36.

An exposition of that place in the gospel, Many sinnes are forgiuen her, because she hath loued much: Meaning that loue is not the cause, but the profe of forgiuenes. 3.4.37

The olde wryters of the church did not speake of Satisfactions in such sense as y papistes do: for they vnderstoode, that the penitent do make Satisfaction to the Church, and not to God. 3.4.38, 39.

Scripture, the Worde of God, and the authority thereof.

Men do not sufficiently knowe God the creator, and discern him from fained gods, by consideration of his creatures, vnlesse they be also holpē by the light of his Word. And God hath kept this order in teaching them that be his, not onely since that he chose the Iewes for his peculiar people, but also from the beginning, euen toward Adam, Noe, and the other fathers. 1.6.1.

Either by oracles, or by visions, or by the ministry of other, the fathers had the Worde which they were certainly perswaded to be the word of God, whereby they knew the true God the creator and gouernour of all things: which Word afterwarde, that he might provide for men in all ages, he caused to be written in the law & the Prophets, as it were in publike registers, 1.6.2, 3. in which place also is produced ued by testimonies of Scripture, y^e the doctrine of the Word, must be ioyned to the consideratiō of creatures, least we conceiue a fickle knowledge of God.

Of them which say that the authority of Scripture hangeth vpon the iudgement of the Church, & in how ill case we should be, if it were so. 1.7.1.

This errour is well confuted by the place of Paule in the seconde chapter to the Ephesians, where he saith that the faithfull are builded vpon the fundation of the Apostles and Prophets. 1.7.2.

In what sense Augustine sayeth, that he woulde not haue beleued the Gospell, vnlesse the authority of the church, did moue him: which place they do cauillously wrest to the confirmation of their errour. 1.7.3.

Although there be many other arguments, which do proue, yea, & do enforce the wicked to confesse, that the Scripture came from God: yet by none other meane, than by the secrete testimony of the holy Ghost, our hearts are truely perswaded that it is God, which speaketh in y^e law, in the prophetes, & in the gospel: And this is proued by many places of Esay. 1.7.4,5.

The orderly disposition of the wisdom of God, the doctrine sauoringe nothinge of earthlinesse, the goodly agreement of all the partes among themselues, & specially that basenesse of contemptible wordes, vsuringe the hie mysteries of y^e hea-uenly kingdome, are seconde helps to stablish the credit of Scripture. 1.8.1,2.11.

Also the antiquity of the Scripture, whereas the bookes of other religions, are later than the bookes of Moses, which yet doth not himselfe inuent a new God, but setteth foorth to the Israelites, the God of their fathers. 1.8.3,4.

Whereas Moses, doth not hide the shame of Leuy his father, nor y^e murmuring of Aarō his brother, and of Mary his sister, nor doth aduance his owne children: the same are arguments, that in his bookes is nothinge fained by man. 1.8.4.

Also the miracles which happened, as well at the publishinge of the lawe, as in all the rest of time. 1.8.5.

Which miracles, when the prophane writers could not deny, they cauilled, that Moses did them by Magicall artes. Which sclaunder, is confuted by most strong reasons. 1.8.6.

Also whereas Moses speaking in the person of Iacob, assigneth the government to the tribe of Iuda, and where he telleth before of the callinge of the Gentiles, whereof the one came to passe foure hundred yeares after, and the other almost two thousand yeares: these are argumentes, that it is God himselfe which speaketh in the bookes of Moses. 1.8.7.

Whereas Esay telleth before of the captiuity of the Iewes, and their restoringe by Cyrus (which was borne a hundred yeares after the death of Esay) and where Jeremy before that the people was led away appointeth their exile to continue three score & ten yerres, whereas Jeremy & Ezechiell, being farre distant in places the one from the other, do agree in all their sayings: where Daniell telleth before of thinges to come, for six hundred yeares after: these are most certaine proues, to stablish the authority of the bookes of the Prophets. 2. 8. 8.

Against certaine vngodly scofers which aske how we know that those are the writings of Moses and the Prophetes, which are red in their names: and how we knowe that there was euer any such Moses. 1. 8. 9.

Also of them that aske, from whence the copies of the bookes of the Scripture came to vs, forasmuch as Antiochus commaunded them all to be burned. And there is spoken of the wonderfull Prouidence of God in preferuinge them so many ages, among so many enemies, and so cruell persecutions. 1. 8. 10.

The simplicity of speeche of the first three Euangelistes, containing heauenly mysteries, the phrase of Iohn thondering from on hie with weighty sentences, the heauenly maiesty shining in the writings of Peter and Paule, the sudden calling of Mathew frō the boorde, the callinge of Peter and Iohn from their fisherbootes to the preaching of the Gospell, the conuersion and calling of Paule beinge an enemy to Apostleshyp, are signes of y^holy Ghost speaking in them. 1. 8. 11.

The consent of so many ages, of so sondry nations, and of so diuerse mindes in embracinge the Scripture, & the rare godlines of some, ought to stablish the authoritie thereof among vs. 1. 8. 12.

Also the blood of so many martyrs, which for the confession thereof, haue suffered death with a constant and sober zeale of God. 1. 8. 13.

Against certaine phrentike men, which forsakinge the readinge of Scripture and learninge, do boast of the Spirite, & do flie to reuelations. 1. 9. 1, 2.

Against the false imagination of the Sophisters concerning veniall sinnes, which they call desires without a determind assent, which do not long rest in the hart: it is proued that euery sinne, euen y^e lightest desire deserueth death, and is deadly, except in the saints which obtaine pardon by the mercy of God. 2.8.58,59.

Sinne against the holy Ghost.

The true definition of Sinne against the holy Ghost, and exāples therof out of the Scripture. 3.3.22.

It is not one or an other particular falling, but a generall forsaking, the description whereof is declared by the Apostle. Neither is it any maruell if God will be alwayes vnappeasable to them that haue so fallen, 3.3.23. forasmuch as he promisseth pardon onely to them that repent, which they shall neuer do. And though the Scripture do say that some such haue groned and cried, yet that was not repentance or conuersion, but rather a blinde torment by desperation. 3.3.24.

Of the Soule.

That the Soule or Spirit of man is not onely a breath, but an immortal substance, although it were created, is proued by conscience, by the knowledge of God, and by so many excellent giftes wherewith the minde of man is endued, yea, and by those things which it conceiueth in sleepe, and also by many argumētis taken out of the scripture. 1.15.2. Finally by this that it is said, that man was created after y image of God. Sect. 3.

Against them that vnder the colour of Nature do denie the prouidence and gouernaunce of God vttering it selfe in the maruellous & in a maner innumerable powers of the Soule. 1.5.4,5.

A confutation of the errour of the Manichees and of Seruetto, that the Soule is a deriuation of the substance of God: also of the error of Oslander, which acknowledgeth no image of God in man without an essentiall righteousness. 1.15.5.

Concerning the immortalitie of the Soule, in a maner none of the Philosophers hath certainly spokē: but they do bind the powers therof to this present life, whereas the Scripture doth so geue to it the chiefe rule in gouernaunce of life, that it also stirreth vp man to the worshipping of God. Also of the diuersity of Soules, & of the deuision of the powers of the soule according to the Philosophers. 1.15.6.

say, that the powers of the soule are vnderstanding and will: and the office and force of either of them in mans first estate. 1.15.7,8.

Superstition.

The simplicities of the superstitious doth not excuse them, because their blindenesse is found to be mingled with vanitie, pride, and obstinacie. 1.4.1,3.

When superstition goth about to please God, it mocketh him with lying colours. 1.4.3.

The superstitious do not approche vnto God but against their will and with seruile feare. 1.4.4.

Supper of the Lorde.

Of the bread & wine the signes in the holy Supper: and it is declared by his owne wordes at his Supper, why the Lorde willed that we should vse them. 4. 17. 1.

We gather a great fruit of confidence and swetenesse out of this sacrament, which testifieth that we are so growen together into one body with Christ, that whatsoeuer is his, we may lawfully call it oures, 4. 17. 2.

This is declared by the wordes of the Supper. 4. 17. 3.

The chiefe office of the sacraments is not to geue vnto vs the body of Christ without any hier consideration, but rather to seale that promise wherein he testifieth that his flesh is verely meate. 4. 17. 4.

The Supper maketh not Christ then first to begin to be the bred of life, but that we should fele y^e force of that bred. He once gaue his flesh for the life of the world, and daily geueth it to them that be his. We must beware that we do not to much abace, or aduaūce the signes. The eating of the fleshe of Christ is not faith, but rather the effect of faith. 4. 17. 5.

So thought Chrysostome and Augustine: and in what sense Augustine said, that in beleuing we eate the fleshe of Christ. 4. 17. 6.

They do not say enough, which passing ouer the mention of fleshe and blood, do thinke that we are made pertakers onely of the spirit of Christ. The misterie of the Supper is so great, that neither the tōge can expresse with speaking, nor the harte comprehēd with thinking the greatnesse thereof. 4. 17. 7.

Howe farre the perfect communicating of Christ extēdeth. Where is declared that Christ, which from the beginning was the lifegeuing word of the father, made the fleshe which he toke vpon him to be also lifegeuing to vs. 4. 17. 8, 9.

The faithfull do truely eate of the same fleshe howe great distance of places soeuer there be betwene them and it. 4. 17. 10.

The mystery of the Supper consisteth of two things, the bodily signes, and the spirituall truth: Which spirituall truth conteineth three things, signification, matter, and effect. 4. 17. 11.

Of some men, which though they do at one word graunt that the substance of the signes remaineth, yet placing the body of Christ in bread and vnder bread, they fall backe into the locall presence, and faine a being euery where. 4.17.16, 17,18,20.

A confutation of their obiections. 4.17.21,22,23;&c.

It is proued that this doctrine is not mainteined, neither by the testimonies of Augustine, nor by authoritie of Scripture. 4.17.28,29, 30,31.

A confutation of certaine other of their obiections, and chiefly of this that they say, that whatsoeuer we teache of spirituall eating, is against the trewe and reall eating: where also is declared that y^e body of Christ is in the Supper offered to the infidels, but they receiue it not. 4.17.33.

Neither can the saying of Augustine be drawn to this purpose, that the Sacraments are nothing appaired by the infidelitie of men. Which is proued by diuerse other testimonies of the same man. 4.17.34.

Howe the body and blood of Christ is geuen to vs in the Supper, & what maner of presence of Christ we ought to holde therein. 4.17.

18,19,32.

Of the exposition of the wordes of Christ in the Supper. 4.17.20,21.

The body of Christ is contained in quantity, and comprehended in heauen, vntill the last day, as it is proued by the scriptures. 4.17.26,27.

Of the papistes carnall adoration, and concomitance, and consecration of the host (as they call it) and carrying it about in pompe. 4.17.35,36,37.

The mystery of y^e Supper ought to stirre vs vp to geuing of thankes, to exercise vs in remembring the death of Christ, to kindle vs to holinesse of life, and chiefly to charity. 4.17.37,38.

In the papacie the Supper (the trewe ministracion whercof is not without the word) is turned into a dumme action. And here is spoken of the laying vp of the Sacrament to be extraordinarily distributed to sicke men. 4.17.39.

The doctrine of the papistes, whē they go about to prepare men to the worthinesse of eating the body of Christ, doth in cruell wise torment cōsciences: And the deuell could not by any readier way destroy men. Of the best remedie to auoide this destruction. They erre which in the Supper do require of the faithfull perfection of faith. 4.17.41,42.

As touching the outward vsage of the ministracion of the Supper, there are many things indifferent: And how it ought to be ministred most comely. 4.17.43.

Of

The Table.

Of the small assembly at this day at y^e pertaking of the Supper, which is a token of contempt, wherewith the holy fathers in olde time were much displeas'd : And howe the custome which commaundeth men to communicate once euery yeare, was a most certaine inuention of the deuell. 4. 17. 44, 45, 46.

It is proued by authority of the Scripture and by the vsage of the olde Church, foure hundred yeares before the death of Gregorie, and by many other arguments, that the cōstitution which toke away from lay men the cup of the Lorde, came out of the deuels workshop. 4. 17. 47, 48, 49, 50.

Of the concomitance of the blood in the flesh of Christ, which is a popishe inuention. 4. 17. 47.

The Supper of the Lorde is profanely abused, if it be geuen to all men without choise. Of the duty of ministers in reiecting the vnworthy. 4. 12. 5.

A brieve summe of those things which we ought to knowe concerning the two Sacraments. And why the Supper is oftentimes ministr'd, and Baptisme but once. 4. 18. 19.

Swearinge.

An exposition of the thirde cōmaundement, in which these three things are cōteined, that we neither think nor speake any thing of God, nor of his word and honorable misteries, nor yet of any of his workes, otherwise than reuerently. 2. 8. 22.

A definition of Swearing: where is declared y^e it is a kinde of worshipping of God : And therefore we must beware that our othes cōteine not any dishonor to the name of God, which is done in Forswearing: or any cōtempt of it, which is done in superfluous othes, or in which the name of any other thã of God is vsed. 2. 8. 23, 24, 25.

It is proued by Scripture against the Anabaptistes, that all othes are not forbidden vs, and that Christ in the Gospell cinauged nothing as touching the rule of Swearing, set forth in the lawe. 2. 8. 26. Which is proued by his owne example: and not onely publike, but also priuate othes are permitted, keping the moderation which the lawe cōmaundeth. 2. 8. 27.

Temples.

OF Temples of Christian men for assemblies of the congregation. 3. 20. 30.

It is proued by the authority of the olde Church, and the reasons of Augustine, that it is not expedient, that there should be any images in Christian temples. 1. 11. 13.

The preaching of the word and the Sacraments, are liuely images which onely are fit to be in Christian Temples. 1. 11. 7, 13.

The wickednes of the Nicene Synode which was holden by the commaundement of Irene the Emperesse, and the filthy follies thereof in allowing images in Temples, and the worshipping of them. 1. 11. 14, 15, 16.

Temptations.

Of diuerse kindes of Temptations: and in what sense it is said that God tempteth vs. 3.20.46.

Testament, olde, and newe.

Of the likenesse of the olde and newe Testamēt: Where is declared, that they are all one in substance and matter, but onely do differ in ministracion. The likenes standeth chiefly in three pointes. 2.10.1,2.

The first point is, that the olde Testamēt did not holde the fathers in earthly felicitie, but had chiefe regard to the life to come. Which is proued by Paule, which saith that the promises of the Gospell are contained vnder it. 2.10.3.

The same also is proued by the lawe and the Prophets: First, by considering the wordes of the couenaut: I am your God. 2.10.7,8.

Againe, I will be the God of your seede after you: Sect. 9. Also by the life of the holy fathers, as Adam, Abell, Noe, Sect. 10. Abraham, Sec. 11. Isaak, Iacob. Sect. 12, 13, 14. And by many testimonies of Dauid. Sec. 15, 16, 17, 18. Of Iob. Sect. 19: Generally of all the latter Prophets. Sect. 20. But namely of Ezechiell. Sect. 21. Of Esaye and Daniell. Sect. 22. A conclusion of this point with rehearsing certaine testimonies out of the newe Testament. Sect. 23.

The seconde point is that the olde Testamēt did not stande vpon the merites of men, but vpon the free mercy of God. The third point is that the couenant of the fathers with God, did then stande vpon like knowledge of Christ the Mediator. 2.10.4.

Also in signification of Sacraments, the Israelites vnder the lawe were egall with y^e Christian people. 2.10.5,6.

There are foure differences of the olde Testament from the newe, wherunto we may also adde a fifth. The first is, that although in the olde time also the Lordes will was to directe the soules of his people to the heauenly inheritaunce: Yet to the ende that they might be the better nourished in y^e hope therof, he gaue it them to be beholden, and after a certaine maner tasted vnder earthly benefites: But nowe the grace of the life to come, being more clerely reueled by y^e Gospell, hee directeth our mindes y^e streight way to the meditation thereof, leauing the inferior maner of exercising which he vsed among the Israelites. 2.11.1.

Therefore y^e olde Church is compared to an heire vnder age, which is governed by Gardians. 2.11.2.

For this reason, the fathers so much esteemed this life, and the blessings thereof. 2.11.3.

The second difference is in figures, wherewith the olde Testamēt did shewe forth the image and shadowe of spirituall good things: The new testamēt geueth the present truth and perfect body. There is also a reason shewed why the Lorde

The Table.

Lorde kept this order: And a definition of the olde testament. 2. 11. 4.

In this sense it is said, that the Jewes were by the introduction or schooling of the law led vnto Christ. before that he was deliuered in the fleshe: 2. 11. 5. which appeared in the most excellent Prophets that were endued with singular grace of the spirit. Sect. 6.

The thirde difference, is taken out of the one and thirty chapter of Jeremy, and the thirde chapter of the seconde Epistle to the Corinthians, that the olde testament is literall, and the newe testament is spirituall: the olde bringeth death, the new is the instrument of life. 2. 11. 7, 8.

The fourth difference is, that the scripture calleth the olde testament, the testament of bondage, bycause it engēdreth feare in mens mindes: but the newe is called the Testament of liberty, bycause it raiseth them vp to confidence and surety. The three latter differences are comparisons of the lawe and the Gospel. The first, containeth also the promises made before the lawe. The fathers liued so vnder the lawe and the olde testament, that they stayed not there, but alwayes aspired to the newe, yea and embraced a certaine cōmunicating therof. 2. 11. 9, 10

The fifth difference is, that before the comming of Christ, the Lorde had seuered one nation, in which he would kepe the couenāt of his grace, in the meane time neglecting all other nations. So the calling of the Gentiles, is a certaine signe, wherewith the excellencie of the newe testament is set foorth aboute y^e olde: a thing so incredible, that it seemed yet newe to the Apostles themselues, being exercised in reading of the Prophets, and endued with the holy Ghost. 2. 11. 11, 12.

A conclusion of this matter, and an aunswere to diuers obiections of some mē, which say that this variety in the Church, this diuers maner of teaching, so great change of vsages and ceremonies, is a great absurditie. Where is declared that the constancy of God appeareth in this chaunging, and he hath done nothing but wisely, righteously, and in mercy, when he gouerneth his Church, after one sorte in childehode, & after an other sort in riper age, & also when he did keepe close in one people the shewing forth of his grace before the comming of Christ, which afterwārd he poured forth vpon all nations. 2. 11. 13, 14.

Thefts.

An exposition of the 8. Commaundement: where is entreated of diuerse kindes of Thestes, and some which although mē iudge otherwise, yet are accōpted Thestes before God: And so he that doth not performe that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other, is a Thefe. 2. 8. 45.

What we ought to do, that we may obey this commaundement, is shewed by diuerse examples according to the diuersity of persons and offices. 2. 8. 46.

The Table.

Traditions.

Forasmuch as the Lorde, willing to teache a rule of trewe righteoutnesse, hath drawn all the partes thereof to his owne will, thereby it appeareth, that all the good workes which men deuise of their owne wittes, are nothing worth before him: But the trewe worshipping standeth vpon obedience onely, which is the beginning, mother, and preseruer of all vertues. 2. 8. 5.

Of Traditions of men, that is to say, ordinaunces proceeding from men, concerning the worshipping of God: And of the vngodlinesse and necessitie of them. 4. 10. 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8.

A diuision of popishe constitutions, which they call Traditions of the Church, into such as conteine ceremonies, and other which are said to pertaine to discipline. The wickednesse of both sortes, bycause they place the worship of God in them, and consciences are bounde with precise necessity of the. 4. 10. 9.

For them the commaundement of God is made voide. 4. 10. 10.

A trewe marke of mens Traditions, which ought to be reiected of the Church, and of all Godly men. 4. 10. 16.

A confutation of the pretence which some men vie that defende popishe Traditions to be of God, bycause the Church cannot erre, and is gouerned by the holy Ghost. 4. 10. 17.

It is a meere mockery to say, that the Apostles were authors of the Traditions, wherewith the Church hath heretofore bene oppressed. 4. 10. 18, 19, 20.

The example of the Apostles, when they commaunded the Gentiles to abstaine from things offered vnto Idols, from strangled, and from blood, is falsely alledged to excuse the tyranny of the popes lawes. 4. 10. 21, 22.

The Lordes kingdome is taken from him, when he is worshipped with the lawes of mennes Traditions: which is proued by examples and testimonies of Scripture, to haue alway bene a most hainous offence in the sight of God. 4. 10. 23, 24.

The inuentions of men can not be defended by the example of Menoha, which being a priuate mā offered sacrifice, nor of Samuel which sacrificed in Ramath, 4. 10. 25. nor of Christ, which willed men to beare the burdens that the Scribes and Pharisees did binde together. 4. 10. 26.

Of holy & profitable ordinances of the Church, and the ende that they tende vnto. 4. 10. 1.

Of such ordināces of the Church, as ought to be accompted holy, namely those which serue for comelinesse, or do preserue order and peace in the Church. 4. 10. 27, 28, 29. We must wisely consider, which be of that sorte. 4. 10. 30.

It is the duty of Christiā people, to obserue such ordinances: And what errors herein are to be taken heede of: And howe in the meane time,

A confutation of them which in this matter do condemne the name of person, and reiect it for newnesse. 1. 13. 3, 4, 5.

The holy doctors haue bin compelled to inuente certaine newe words, to defende the truth of God against certaine subtle men, which mocked it out with shifting: As against Arrius they inuented this word homoousson Consubstātiāll, and against Sabellius the name of three properties or persons. 1. 13. 4, 16.

Testimonies of scripture, whereby is shewed the distinction of the father from the Worde, and of the Word from the Spirit. 1. 13. 17.

Also in the scripture there is a distinction made of the father, from the Word and the Spirit, and of the Spirit from them both, as well by obseruatiō of order, as by prophecies ascribed to them. 1. 13. 18.

This distinction of persons maketh not against the most simple vnitie of God. 1. 13. 19.

In what sense the fathers say, that the father is the beginning of the sonne, and yet that the sonne hath his essence of himselfe. 1. 13. 19.

A breife summe of those things which we ought to beleue concerning the one essence of God and the three persons. 1. 13. 20.

And herein we must dispute soberly, and with great moderation, that neither our thought, nor our tong, do passe beyond the boundes of the word of God. 1. 13. 21.

A confutatiō of the doting errors of Seruettus in this point of doctrine. 1. 13. 22.

A confutation, of the error of certaine lewde men, which say, that the father is trewly and properly the one only God, which in making the sonne and the holy Ghost, did poure his Godhed into thē. 1. 13. 23.

It is false which they say, that when mention is made of God in the scripture, onely the father is meant thereby. 1. 13. 24.

Also it is false which they dreame of vndeuided substances, of which euery one hath a parte of the essence. 1. 13. 25.

Forasmuch as the grace of healing which was in olde time geuen to y^e Apostles, hath long ago ceased in the Church. Sect. 19, 20. And though it still remained, yet this their wicked obseruation is farre from that holy ceremony of the Apostles. Sect. 4.

Of the Priests, Monkes, and Nonnes Vowe of single life. 4. 13. 3, 17, 18, 19.

Of Warres.

Warres are lawfull, when Magistrates are driuen of necessity to take weapon in hand, to execute publike reuenge vpon those that trouble the peace of their dominion, whether they be ciuile or fo-reine enemies. 4. 20. 11.

It maketh not to the contrary hereof, which many alledge, that there is not in the newe Testament any testimony or example which proueth that Warre is a thing lawfull full for Christians. But Magistrates ought to take great heede, that in taking of weapon in hand, they nothing at all followe their owne lustes. As Warre, so garisons also, leagues and ciuile fortifications, are things lawfull for Christians to vse. 4.20.12.

Will of God.

Of the secret Will of God. Also of an other Will, whereunto aunswereth Willing obedience. 3. 20. 43. and 3. 24.1,7.

Will of Man.

Whether the Will of man be in euery part through defiled and corrupted so that it bringeth forth nothing but euell: Or whether it yet reteine some liberty of choise. Where is declared the common saying taken out of the Philosophers, that all thinges by naturall dispositiō couet that which is good. And there is shewed that the liberty of Will can not be proued thereby. 2.2.26.

The soule hath not onely a weake power but no power at all of it selfe to aspire to goodnesse. And sith the whole man is subiect to the dominion of sinne, it is proued by testimonies of Scripture and of Augustine, that the Will of man is bound with most streight bōdes. 2.2.27.

Man by his fall lost not his will, but the soundnesse of his Will, so that he can not moue, much lesse apply himselfe to goodnesse, but is necessarily drawen or led into euell, howbeit not by compulsion but voluntary. Which is proued by Augustine and Bernarde. A large declaration of the difference betwene compulsion and necessitie. 2.3.5.

Sith the Lorde both beginneth and perfiteth good in our hartes, sith he worketh in vs to will, that is to say the good will, sith he createth a newe harte, taketh away the stony harte and geueth a fleshy hart, it followeth, that the Will of man is vterly corrupted and hath no goodnesse at all. 2.3.6.

It is clerely proued by reasons and diuerse testimonies of Scripture, that God worketh good will in them that be his, not onely in preparing or turning them from the beginning so as it may afterward do some good of it selfe: But bycause it is his onely worke that Will conceiueth a loue of goodnesse, that it is enclined to the study thereof, that it is stirred and moued to an endeuour to followe it, and againe that the choise, studie, and endeuour do not fainte, but procede to effect, finally that man goeth constantly forward in them and continueth to the ende. 2.3.7,8,9.

Therefore it is proued by the authority of Scripture and of Augustine that this which hath bene taught these many ages, that God so moueth our Will, that it is afterward in our owne choise, to obey or disobey his motion, and other like sayings are vterly false. 2.3.10, 11,12,13,14.

The Table.

Also in doinges, which of themselves are neither righteous nor vnrighteous, and belonge rather to the bodily than the spirituall life, the will of man is not free, but by the speciall motion of God is inclined to clemency, mercy, wrath, feare, and other diuerse effections, when it pleaseth him to make way for his prouidence. Which is proued by Scripture, by daily experience, and by the authority of Augustine. 2. 4. 6, 7.

Workes.

A comparison of the purenesse of God with all the righteousnesse of men. 3. 12. 4, 5.

Al the offspring of Adam being deuided into foure kindes of men, it is proued that they haue no holinesse or righteousnes: First in them which are endued with no knowledge of God, in whom although there do sometime appeare excellent qualities (which are the giftes of God) yet there is in them nothing pure. 3. 14. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

The same is shewed in them, which being professed by Sacraments, are Christiãs onely in name, denying God in their deedes: Also in hypocrites which with vaine false colours do hide the wickednesse of their heart. 3. 14. 7, 8.

Finally, it is proued that euen the children of God trewly regenerated by his Spirit, can not stande by any righteousnes of their owne Workes before the iudgement of God, because they can bringe forth no good Worke y^e is not sprinkled with some vncleannes of the flesh, and therefore damnable. Moreouer although they coulde bringe forth any such Worke, yet one sinne is enough to blot out the remembrance of all former righteousnes. 3. 14. 9, 10, 11.

A confutation of the papistes shiftes concerning the righteousnesse of Workes: And specially of the same horrible môster of Works of supererogatiõ. 3. 14. 12, 13, 14, 15.

When we entreate of Workes, we must thrust two pestilences out of our mindes: that we put no trust in the righteousnesse of our owne Workes, and that we ascribe no glory vnto them. 3. 14. 16.

The Scripture setteth out and declareth foure kindes of causes in stablishing our saluation: And it is proued that in them all there is no regard of Workes. 3. 14. 17.

Where sometime the saintes do bolden themselves with remembrance of their owne innocence and vprightnesse: howe the same is to be taken: and howe it doth in no wise abate any thing from the free righteousnesse in Christ. 3. 14. 18, 19, 20.

Where the Scripture saith that the good Works of the faithfull do moue God to do them good, the order is therein rather expressed than the cause. 3. 14. 21.

Why the Lorde in the Scripture calleth good Workes oures, and promiseth rewarde to them. 3. 15. 3.

A confutation of the Sophisters inuention, concerning morall Workes, Workes, whereby men be made acceptable to God, before that they be grafted in Christ. 3. 15. 6. and 17. 4.

Those rewardes are geuen to the Workes of the faithfull, which the Lorde in his lawe hath promised to the followers of righteousnesse: but thereof there are three causes to be considered. 3. 17. 3.

We may note in the scripture two acceptances of man with God, of which the latter although it haue respect to the good Workes of the faithful, yet is also of the free mercy of God. 3. 17. 4, 5.

When it is said that God doth good to them that loue him, here is not rehearsed a cause why he should do them good, but rather the maner of what sorte they be by his grace. 3. 17. 6.

An exposition of certaine places wherein y^e scripture geueth to good Workes the name of righteousnes. And there is shewed that those places are not against the doctrine of justification of faith. 3. 17. 7.

One good Worke or many do not suffice for righteousnesse before God, although one sinne suffice to condemne. And here the principle hath no place, the contraries haue all one rule. 3. 18. 10.

Why the Lorde said that he rendereth to Workes that which hee had freely geuen before Workes. 3. 18. 3. And therein he helpeth our weakenesse least we should be discouraged. 3. 18. 4, 6, 7.

Hereuppon hangeth the righteousnes of the good Workes which the faithfull do, that by pardō they are allowed of God. 3. 18. 5.

THE ENDE OF THE TABLE.

TO THE CHRISTIAN AND STUDIOVS READERS OF

THIS BOOKE, AVGVSTINE

Marlorate Wiffheth Health.

Ho so euer shall reade and peruse these two Tables following, and especially the latter, may maruell what I meant (after so many impressions and corrections of this worke) to collect and gather all the places of holy scripture therein alledged: and a great parte of the authorities therein expounded, wheareas if any frute or proffit thereof were to be had, the same longe before might haue bene done: and especially about there yeares past, when the author him selfe was so diligent therein: who besides the many and profitable additions (which it containeth) he himselfe setting the same in order, with his owne handes, and reducing it to a most exacte perfection, did then set and publish it forth, in such sorte, that in fower booke being devided into chapters and diuerse sections, he hath right worthely and in familier maner, comprised the summe of the whole Christian religion. And certainly I cannot denie but it woulde haue bene very good and commodiose, if that any one man would haue taken the paine, faithfully and trewly to haue collected those places: which thing I thought ones to haue donne by the aduise of the imprinter, sauing that my chardge and office did else where call me: as also when I had perused and set it in an other order then it was before, and had euen finished it, I was compelled to omit it, or at the least, to surcese for the time. And after that this booke being put forth both in Latine and French, was set to sale in euery place, because I sawe no man, who then did take the paine, to reduce the places of Scripture to a Table, and understanding howe profitable the same would be to all men: I could not choose but after my power, and as leasure serued in those troublesome times, to employ my whole care & trauell therein. And because all things should be done and come forth more certaine and in better order: I would not geue credite, nor trust to the numbers which the imprinter had before set and made: for when I had diligently conferred them all, I found many false, many omitted, and some disorderly set. And surely that happeneth very sone to such as are not best skilfull in examining and perusing the places of holy Scripture to be sone deceaued. Wherefore all things diligitly restored, & that supplied which seemed to want, I did so order the places of Scripture collected out of the olde and newe testament, that if there were any, through forgetfulnesse, or by any other meanes omitted or ouerskipped: (as it can not be but that in a great haruest some one eare of corne shall escape the reapers hande) I durst warrant so fewe shall be found, that this Table being brought to triall you shall not finde one much more plentifull or larger. Neuerthelesse I do pray and request the readers, that if they do finde any, they will aduertise the imprinter, wherby the same may better be examined and corrected. And this is to be noted, that such whole verses as I haue comprised in this table, they were not wholly but in part alleged, much lesse expounded in the Institution: which thing I did upon good consideration. For ofentimes it happeneth that in diuerse places of the Institutions, some authorities are alleged, which are proued but by some part of the verse. And because in noting the places and numbers, we must vse repetitions (which for the most part bring a lothsomnesse to the reader) I thought it better to put in the whole verse, then by ofien diuisions, to vse vaine and superfluous repetitions. And as concerning the commoditie which the reader may gather by this my trauell: (besides that which by vse and experience I am taught by those Tables, which for mine owne priuate study and exercise I wrote upon the Institutions heretofore set forth) I durst to affirme this much, that they which are not exercised exercised in entreating the holy Scriptures, and yet desirous to serue the Church of God, do diligently endeour themselves thereunto, they shall finde a large and a plaine way, both with dexteritie to expound the writings of the Prophets and Apostles, as also aptly to apply the authorities here alleged, and such like to the edifying of the Church, which is the very ende of the whole. And although we want not good Commentaries to discouer vnto vs the naturall sense of the Scripture, which we do nowe study and apply: yet because they who wrote the same, and who with good successe haue trauelled therein, were contented with the plaine and sincere exposition of the text: none could tell by the vse of the said Commentaries onely (vnlesse they were well practised in the principales of religion) howe and to what common place they ought to apply the argument then in hande. But who so can be contented to vse this Table, whensoever he shall finde the places which he entreateth, he shall see howe and to what ende the same is to be applied, whether to the confirmation of true doctrine, or to the confuting of the aduersaries, or to the reconciling of such places as seeme to be repugnant. And this shalbe very commodious and profitable, not onely for the amplifying of any argument, but also to satisfie them, which are desirous to be confirmed in the principall pointes of Christian Religion. For it is manifest howe simple and slender is their oration and speech, which bring and allege nothing els, but as they read in the Commentaries: where the authors themselves (being most worthy and well learned) do cheefly desire breuitie, because the readers should vse and study the common places themselves, to the ende they should the more largely be applied to those things which in the Cōmentaries are but breefly expounded. Againe, forasmuch as we haue not alwayes in readinesse, what good authors haue written upon the scriptures: and very fewe commentaries upon some bookes, and namely upon this Institution, are to be founde or had. This Table expoundinge the obscure and harde authorities, shall greatly further and helpe the readers: For they shall either finde some ready interpretation, or some entrance whereby to searche and finde out the trew sentence. And as touching the translation, I trust it shall not seeme straunge to the reader, in that I haue rather followed the selfe same wordes, as they be in the Bible, then as they be alledged by Calvin in this his institution: For he being a man most excellently well learned, and of great reading (as by his works it doth appeare, how ready and familier the Scriptures were to him) had not alwayes the bookes in readines, or lying open before him, when he wrote: neither was it necessary that whatsoeuer he did auouche out of the olde or new Testamēt, he should expresse or write it in the selfe same words: for it is sufficiēt, that the sense be faithfully retained, & the trew propriety of the words obserued, & so to eschew the caulings of all men, sauing such as will finde fault in that, which in the least parte cannot be followed nor obserued. Being therefore perswaded, that neither he himself will be offended, nor the reader mislike, if the sentences in the Bible be translated

according to the Hebrews, as concerning the olde Testament, and according to the Greeke, as touching the newe Testament: I have aduenced to aduouche the authorities of the Scriptures in an other order (as concerning the wordes) then they are alledged in this booke of Institutions. And therefore sometimes that which is recied in the thirde person, this Table doth expresse it in the seconde, and so contrariwise: but yet so, that the sense and meaning is alwayes reserued, which thing euery man shall easily perceauē, if diligently and without hasty iudgement, he do conferre euery thing together: for else curiose heades do lose that fruiēt, which by aduised reading they might haue and receiue. And as concerning the names and numbers of the bookes, and of the Chapters of the olde Testament, we haue not followed the common translation, but that which is most agreeable to the Hebrew. And therefore we do aduertise the readers, that they do not take the first booke of the Kinges, for the first of Samuell: nor the seconde of Kinges, for the seconde of the same Prophete: which is so done by them, who heretofore haue coted the Chapters in this imprinted Booke, bycause they followed the Concordances of the Bible, called the great Cōcordances, which is collected according to the common translation: and by that meanes, as it may evidently appeare to all men, some bookes of the olde Testament, are not rightly intituled: and the Psalmes otherwise and in an other order deuided, then did the Hebrewes. And forasmuch as all the principall pointes of religion, are in this booke copiously and faithfully expounded, we may easily refute the false opiniōs of the aduersaries. VVhosoever shall come to the reading thereof, either with a minde to learne, or a desire to proffit: there is no doubt, but he shall very much proffit himselfe, and helpe others: whose consciences he may so strengthen and assure, as they neede not to quaike in any pointe, bycause they be assured, that their faith is grounded vpon the firme foundation of the Prophets and Apostles, who wrate and spake, being inspired by the holy Ghost, who hath willed and commaunded his most pretiose and deere word, to be redde, heard, and handled, in all feare and reuerence, without adding thereunto, or takinge from the same: least we be worthily reprovēd of our folly. Let vs therefore, in all simplicity and feare of God, reade so wholsome and necessary thinges, and daily proceede therein, in the grace and knowledge of God, who onely is the sauior, hedde and Doctōr of the Church: To whom nowe and for euer be all glory.
