T. N. THE TRANSLA- TOR TO THE READER.

Good Reader, here is now offered you the fourth time printed in English, M. Caluines booke of the Institution of Christian Religion, a booke of great labour to the author, and of great profit to the Church of God. M. Caluine first wrote it when he was a yong man, a booke of small volume, and since that season he hath at sundry times published it with new encrease, still protesting at euery edition himselfe to be one of those qui scribendo proficiunt, & proficiendo scribunt, which with their writing do grow in profiting, and with their profiting do procede in writing. At length hauinge in many his other workes trauailed about exposition of sundry books of the Scriptures, & in the same finding occasion to discourse of sundry common places and matters of doctrine, which being handled according to the occasions of the text that were offered him & not in any other methode, were not so ready for the readers use, he therefore entred into this purpose, to enlarge this booke of Institutions & therein to treat of all those titles and common places largely, with this entent, that whensoever any occasion fell in his other bookes to treat of any such cause, he would not newly amplifie his bookes of Commentaries and expositions therewith, but referre his reader wholly to this storehouse and treasure of that sort of diuine learning. As age and weakenesse grew upon him, so he hastened his labour, and according to his petition to God, he in maner ended his life with his worke, for he liued not long after. So great a iewel was meete to be made most beneficiall, that is to say, applied to most common use. Therefore in the very beginning of the Quenes Maiesties most blessed reigne, I translated it out of Latine into English, for the commoditie of the church of Christ, at the speciall request of my dere frendes of worthy memory Reginald Wolfe & Edward Whitchurch, the one her Maiesties Printer for the Hebrew, Greke, & Latine songs, the other her Highnes Printer of the bookes of common Prayer. I performed my worke in the house of my sayd frende Edward Whitchurch, a man well known of upright hart and dealing, an auncient zelous Gospeller, as plaine and true a frend as euer I knew liuing, and as desirous to do any thinge to common good, specially by the aduancement of true religion. At my said first editiō of this booke, I cōsidered how the author thereof had of long time purposely labored to write the same most exactly, and to packe great plenty of matter in small roome of wordes, yea and those so circumspectly and precisely ordered, to auoide the cauillations of such, as for enmity to the truth therein contained, woulde gladly seeke and abuse all aduantages which might be found by any ouersight in penning of it, that the sentences were thereby become so full as nothings might well be added without idle superfluity, & againe so nicely pared that nothing could be diminished without taking away some necessary substance of matter therein expressed. This maner of writinge, beside the peculiar tearmes of artes and figures, and the difficulty of the matters themselves, being throughout entrelaced with the schoolemens controuersies, made a great hardnes in the authors own booke, in that tong wherein otherwise he is both plentiful & easie, insomuch that it suffiseth not to read him once, vnlesse you can be content to read in vaine. This consideration encombred me with great doubtfulnesse for the whole order & frame of my translation. If I should follow the words, I saw that of necessity the hardnesse in the translation must nedes be greater than was in the tong wherein it was originally wrytten. If I should leaue the course of wordes, and graunt my selfe liberty after the naturall maner of my owne tonge, to say that in English which I conceaued to be his meaning in Latine, I plainly perceiued how hardly I might escape error, & on the other side in this matter of faith and religion, howe perillous it was to erre. For I durst not presume to warrant my selfe to haue his meaning without his wordes. And they that wote what it is to translate well and faithfully, specially in matters of religion, do know that not the only grammaticall construction of words suffiseth, but the very buildinge and order to obserue all aduantages of vehemence or grace, by placing or accent of wordes, maketh much to the true setting forth of a wryters minde. In the ende, I rested vpon this determination, to followe the wordes so nere as the phrase of the English tongue would suffer me. Which purpose I so performed, that if the English booke were printed in such paper and letter as the Latine is, it should not exceede the Latine in quantity. Whereby, beside all other commodities that a faithfull translation of so good a worke may bring, this one benefit is moreouer provided for such as are desirous to attaine some knowledge of the Latine tongue (which is at this time to be wished in many of those men for whose profession this booke most firstly serueth) that they shall not finde any more English than shall suffice to construe the Latine withal, except in such fewe places, where the great difference of the phrases of the languages enforced me: so that comparing the one with the other, they shall both profit in good matter, and furnishe themselves with vnderstanding of that speech, wherein the greatest treasures of knowledge are disclosed. In the doing

The Preface

doing hereof; I did not only trust mine owne wit or ability, but examined my whole doinge from sentence to sentence throughout the whole booke with conference & ouerlooking of such learned men, as my translation being allowed by their iudgement, I did both satisfie mine owne conscience that I had done truly, & their approving of it might be a good warrant to the reader, that nothing should herein be deliuered him but sound vnmixed and vncorrupted doctrine, euē in such sort as the author himself had first framed it. All that I wrote, the graue, learned & vertuous mā M. David Whitehead (whom I name with honorable remembrance) did among other, compare with the Latine, examining euery sentence throughout the whole booke. Beside all this, I priuately required many, & generally all men with whom I euer had any talke of this matter, that if they found any thing either not truly translated, or not plainly Englished, they would enforme me thereof, promising either to satisfie them or to amende it. Since which time I haue not bin aduertised by any man of any thing which they would require to be altered. Neither had I my selfe, by reason of my profession beinge otherwise occupied, any leasure to peruse it. And that is the cause, why not only at the second & third time but also at this impression, you haue no change at all in the worke, but altogether as it was before. In dede I perceiued many mē well minded & studious of this booke, to require a table for their ease and furtherance. Their honest desire I haue fulfilled in the second edition, & haue added thereto a plentifull table, which is also here inserted which I haue translated out of the Latine, wherein the principall matters discoursed in this booke are named by their due titles in order of Alphabet, and vnder euery title is set forth a brieue summe of the whole doctrine taught in this booke, concerning the matter belonging to that title or cōmon place: and therewith is added the Booke, Chapter, and Section or disision of the Chapter, where the same doctrine is more largely expressed and proued. And for the readier finding thereof, I haue caused the number of Chapters to be set vpon euery leafe in the booke, and quoted the Sections also by their due numbers with the vsuall figures of Algorithmic. And nowe at this last publishinge, my friendes by whose charge it is nowe newly imprinted in a Romaine letter and smaller volume, with diuerse other Tables, which since my second edition were gathered by M. Marlorate, to be translated and here added for your bsnesfite. Moreouer, whereas in the first edition the euill maner of my scriblinge hande, the enterlininge of my Copy, and some other causes, well knowne amonge workemen of that faculty, made very many faultes to passe the Printer, I haue in the second impression caused the booke to be composed by the printed copy, and corrected by the written: whereby it must needes be that it was much more truly done than the other was, as I my selfe do knowe aboute three hundred faultes amended. And now at this last

The Preface

Printinge, the composinge after a printed copy bringeth some ease, and the diligence used about the correction, having bin right faithfully looked vnto, it can not be but much more truely set forth. This also is performed, that the volume being smaller, with a letter fayre and legible, it is of more easie price, that it may be of more common use, and so to more large communicatinge of so great a treasure to those that desire Christian knowledge for instructiō of their faish, & guiding of their ducties. Thus on the printers behalfe and mine, your ease and commodity (good readers) is provided for. Now resteth your owne diligence for your own profit in studying it. To spend many words in cōmending the worke it selfe, were nedelesse: yet thus much I thinke I may both not vnruely and not vainely say, that though many great learned men haue written booke of common places of our religion, as Melāchton, Sarcerius, and other, whose workes are very good and profitable to the Church of God: yet by the consenting iudgement of those that vnderstande the same, there is none to be compared to this worke of Caluine, both for his substantiall sufficiency of doctrine, the sounde declaration of truth in articles of our religion, the large and learned confirmation of the same, and the most deepe and stronge confutation of all olde and new heresies: so that (the holy Scriptures excepted): this is one of the most profitable booke for all students of Christian diuinity. Wherein (good readers) as I am glad for the glory of God, and for your benefit, that you may haue this profit of my trauell, so I beseech you let me haue this use of your gentlenesse; that my doings may be construed to such good end as I haue meant them: & that if any thinge mislike you by reason of hardnes, or any other cause that may seeme to be my default, you will not forthwith condemne the worke, but read it ofter: in which doing you shall finde (as many haue confessed to me that they haue found by experience) that those thinges which at the first readinge shall displeas you for hardnes, shall be founde so easie as so hard matter would suffer, & for the most part more easie than some other phrase which should with greater loosenes & smoother sliding away deceiue your understandinge. I confesse in dede it is not finely & pleasantly written, nor carrieth with it such delitefull grace of speech as some great wise men haue bestowed vpon some foolisher things, yet it containeth sound truth set forth with faithfull plainnes without wrong done to the authors meaninge: and so if you accept & use it, you shall not faile to haue great profit thereby, and I shall thinke my labour very well employed.

TO THE MOST MIGHTY AND NOBLE PRINCE, FRANCISCE THE MOST CHRIS-TIAN KING THE FRENCH KING his soueraigne Lorde, John Caluine wifheth peace and saluation in Christ.

WHEN I did first set my hand to this worke, I thought nothing lesse (most noble King) than to write any thing that afterwarde should be presented to your maiestie. Onely my minde was to teache certaine introductions whereby they that are touched with some zeale of religion might be instructed to true godlinesse. And this trauaile I tooke principally for my contremen the Frenchemen, of whom I vnderstode very many to hunger and thirst for Christ, but I sawe very few that had rightly receiued so much as any litle knowledge of him. And that this was my meaning, the boke it selfe declareth, being framed after a simple and plaine maner of teaching. But when I perceiued, that the furious rage of some wicked men hath so farre preuailed in your realme, that in it there is no roome for sounde doctrine: I thought I should do a thing worth my trauaile, all in one worke both to geue an instruction for them, and to declare a confession to you: whereby ye may learne what maner of doctrine y^e is, against which those furious men burne in so great rage, who at this day trouble your realme with sward and fier. For I will not feare to cōfesse, that I haue in this worke comprehended in maner the summe of that selfe same doctrine, against which they crie out, that it ought to be punished with prisonment, banishment, condemnation without iudgement, and with fier, that it ought to be chaced away by lande and sea. I knowe in deede with howe hainous informations they haue filled your minde and eares, to make our cause most hatefull vnto you: but this of your clemencie ought you to wey, that there shalbe no innocence, neither in wordes not deedes, if it may be enough to accuse. Truly if any, to bring the same in hatred, shall allege that this Doctrine whereof I nowe go about to yelde accompt vnto you, hath bene long ago condemned by consente of all degrees, and atteinted by many iudgements already geuen in iudiciall courtes: all that he saith shall amount to no more, but that it hath partly bin violently throwen downe by the bandinge and power of the aduersaries thereof, and partly bene traitorously and fraudulently oppressed with their lies and Tutle practises and sclaunders. Herein is violence shewed, that without hearing the cause bloody sentences are pronounced against it: here in is fraude, that it is without deseruing accused of sedition and euell doing. And that none may thinke that we wrongfully complaine of these things, you your selfe can beare vs witnesse, most noble king, with howe lieng sclaunders it is dayely accused vnto you: as, that it tedeth to no other ende but to writh from kings their scepters out of their handes, to throwe, downe all iudges seates and iudgements, to subuerte all orders and ciuile gouernements, to trouble the peace and quiete of the people, to abolish all lawes, to vndo all proprietities and possessions, finally to turne all things vpside downe. And yet you heare y smallest portion. For horrible things they sprede abroad among the people: which if they were true, the whole world might worthily iudge it with the mainteiners thereof, worthy of a thousande fiers and gallows. Who can nowe maruell that a common hatred is kindled against it, where such most wrongfull accusations are beleued. Lo, this is the cause that all degrees agree and conspire to the condemning of vs & our doctrine. They that sit to iudge, being rauished with this affectio pronounce for sentences their foreconceiued determinatiōs which they brought from home with them: and thinke that they haue well enough discharged their duties if they commaunde no man to be drawn to execution, but such as are founde guilty either by their owne confession or by sufficient witnesse. But of what fault of that condemned doctrine, say they. But by what lawe condemned? Herein should haue stande the succor of defentie for them, not to denie the doctrine it selfe, but to mainteine it for true. But here is all libertie onts to mutter vtterly cut of from vs.

Wherefore I do not vniustly require, most victorious King, that it may please you to take into your owne hande the whole hearing of the cause which hether to hath bene troublesomly handled or rather carelessly tossed without all order of lawe, more by outragious heate than iudiciall grauitie. Neither yet thinke, that I here go about to make mine owne priuate defense, whereby I may procure to my selfe a safe

To the French King.

a safe returne into my natiue cōtree, to which although I beare such affection of naturall loue as becometh me: yet as the case nowe is, I not miscōtentedly want it. But I take vppon me the common cause of all the godly, yea and the cause of Christ himself, which at this day hauing bene by all meanes torne & troden downe in your kingdome, lieth as it were in despeired case, and that in deede rather by the tyranny of certaine Pharisees, than by your owne knowledge. But howe that cometh to passe, it is not here needefull to tell: truely it lieth in great distresse. For thus farre haue the vngodly preuailed, that the trueth of Christ, if it be not destroyed being chased away and scattered abroad, yet it lieth hidden as buried and vnregarded: as for the silly poore Church, it is either wasted with cruell slaughters, and so driuen away with banishments or dismayed with threatens and terrors that it dare not ones open her mouth. And yet still they cōtinue with such rage and fercenesse as they are wont, thrusting strongly against the wall already bending & the ruine which themselves haue made. In the meane time no man steppeth fourth, to set himselfe in defense against such furies. And they, if there be any such, that will most of all seeme to fauor the truth, say no more but that it were good to pardon the error and vnskilfulnesse of ignorante men. For thus the good natured men forsooth do speake, calling that error and vnskilfulnesse which they knowe to be the most certaine trueth of God: calling them ignorante men, whoes witt they see that Christ hath not so despised, but that he hath vouchsafed to communicate to them the misteries of his heauenly wisdome. So much are all ashamed of the Gospell. It shalbe your office (most noble King) not to turne away your eares nor your minde from so iust a defense: specially when so great a matter is in question: namely howe the glorie of God may be mainteined safe in earth, howe the trueth of God may kepe her honor, howe Christ may haue his kingdome preserued whole among vs. This is a matter worthy for your eares, worthy for your iudgemēt, worthy for your royall throne. For, euen this thought maketh a true king: to acknowledge himselfe in the gouernance of his kingdome to be the minister of God, Neither doth he nowe vse a kingdome but a robbérie, which reigneth not to this ende that he may serue the glorie of God. And he is deceiued that loketh for a lōg prosperitie of that kingdome, which is not ruled by the scepter of God, that is, by his holy word: forasmuch as the heauenly Oracle can not proue vaine, whereby it is proclaimed, that the people shalbe scattered abroad where prophecie faileth. Neither ought the contempt of our basenesse to withdrawe you frō this purpose. We verily knowe right well, howe poore and abieēt silly men we be, namely in the sight of God miserable sinners, in the sight of men most despised persones, yea and (if you will) certaine excrements and outcastes of the world, or whatsoever viler thing may be named: so that there remaineth nothing for vs to glorie vpon before God, but his onely mercie whereby we are without any our deseruing receiued into the hope of eternall saluation: and before men, nothing but our weaknesse, which amōg them it is taken for a most great shame to cōfesse so much as in countenāce. But our doctrine must be auāced hy aboute all glorie of the world, must stande vnuanquishable aboute all power: because it is not oures, but the doctrine of the liuing God and of his Christ, whom the Father hath appointed king to beare rule euen from sea to sea, and from the riuers euen to the endes of the earth: and so to beare rule, that striking the whole earth with the only rod of his mouth, he may breake it with all the iron and brasen strength, with all the golden and siluer glistening thereof, as it were potters vessells: as the Prophets prophecie of the royaltie of his kingdome. Our aduersaries in deede do crie out to the contrary, and say that we falsely pretende the word of God, whereof we be most wicked corrupters. But how this is not onely a malicious sclander, but also a notable shamelesse, you your selfe by reading our confession, may according to your wisdome iudge. Yet here it is also good to say somewhat, either to moue you to willingnesse and heedfulness, or at the least to prepare you a way to the reading of it. Paule, when he willed all prophecie to be framed to the agreableness of faith, hath set a most sure rule whereby the expōding of Scripture ought to be tried. Nowe if our doctrine be examined by this rule of faith, the victorie is already in our handes. For, what doth better or more fitly agree with faith, than to acknowledge our selues naked of all vertue, that of God we may be clothed? empty of all good, that of him we may be filled? the bonde seruantes of sinne, that of him we may be made fre? blinde, that of him we may be enlightened? lame, that of him we may be made streight? seble, that of him we may be vpholdē? to take from our selues all matter of glorieng, that he alone may be glorious on hy, and in him we may glorie? When we say these and such like things, they interrupt vs & cry out, that by this meane is overthrowen I wote not what blind light of nature, fained preparations, freewill, workes meritorious of eternall saluation, together with their supererogatiōs: because they can not abide that the whole praise & glorie of all goodnesse, vertue, righteousnesse, and wisdome should remaine in God. But we reade not that they were blamed that

haue drawen to much out of the fountaine of liuing water : on the contrary side they are sharply rebuked which haue digged to themselves pittes , broken pittes , which are not able to holde water. Againe what is more agreable with faith , than to promise to themselves that God will be to them a fauorable Father , where Christ is acknowledged to be a brother and procurer of fauor? than assuredly to loke for al things ioiful & prosperous at his hád, whose vnspekable loue toward vs hath proceded so farre , that he hath not spared his onely begotten sonne , but that he gaue him for vs ? than to rest in sure loking for saluation & eternall life, where we thinke vpon Christ geuen of the Father, in whom such treasures are hidden? Here they steppe in against vs, and crie out that this certainty of affiance is not without arrogance and presumption. But as nothing of our selues, so all things ought we to presume of God : and we are for none other reason spoiled of vaine glory , but that we should learne to glorie in the Lorde. What is there more ? Consider (most mighty Prince) all the partes of our cause, and thinke that we are worse than any kinde of wicked men , vnlesse you plainly finde that we are in trouble and railed at, bycause we put our trust in the liuing God: because we beleue that this is the eternall life, to knowe one trewe God, and him whom he hath sent Iesus Christ. For this hope , some of vs are bounde in irons, some are whipped, some are caried about in mockage, some are condemned without iudgement , some are most cruelly tormented, some escape away by flight : but all are distressed with trouble, all are most terribly accursed , torne with slaunders , and handled in most hainous wise. Nowe loke vpó our aduersaries (I speake of the degree of Priests, at whose becke and will : he other exercise ennimities against vs) and consider with me a little while , with what zeale they be caried. As for the trewe religion, which is taught in the Scriptures, and which ought to be holden certaine among all men , they easily geue leaue both to themselves and other to be ignorant of it, to neglect and despise it : and they thinke that it maketh small matter what euery man beleue or not beleue concerning God and Christ, so that he do with an vnexpressed faith (as they call it) submit his minde to the iudgement of the Church : neither are they much moued, if it happen that the glorie of God be defiled with manifest blasphemies , so that no inan lift vp his finger against the supremacie of the Apostolike sea, and authority of our holy mother the Church. Why therefore do they with so great crueltie & feircensse fight for the Masse , Purgatorie, Pilgremages , and such trifles , so farre forth, that they say that without most expressed faith (as I may so call it) of these things, godlinesse can not stande, whereas yet they proue not that any of these things come out of the word of God? Why so, but bycause their belly is their God, their kitchen is their religion: which being taken away, they thinke that they shall not onely be no Christians, but also no men? For though some of them do plenteously glutt themselves, & other some liue with gnawing of poore crustes: yet they liue all of one pot, which without these warming helpes should not onely waxe colde, but also throughly freeze. Therefore how much more euery of thē is carefull for his belly, so much more earnest warriour he is for their faith. Finally they all endeour themselves to this, to kepe still either both kingdome safe, and their belly full: but of pure zeale none of them sheweth any token, be it neuer so little. Neither yet so do they cease to slaunder our doctrine, and by al the colours that they can, to accuse and defame it, whereby they may bring it into hatred or suspicion. They call it newe, and lately forged: they cauill that it is doubtfull, & vncertaine: they demaunde by what miracles it is confirmed: they aske whether it be meete that it should preuaile against the consente of so many holy Fathers, and the most auncient custome: they presse vpon vs to confes it to be schismaticall, which moueth warre against the Church, or that the Church hath lien dead in many ages in which no such thing hath bene hearde of. Last of all they say, that there neede no arguments, for (say they) it may by the frutes be iudged of what sorte it is, namely which hath bredde so huge a heape of sectes, so many turmoiles of seditions, so great licentiousnesse of vices. Trewly full easy it is, for them, to triumph vpo a forsaken cause before the light beleuing and ignorant multitude. But if we might also haue our turne likewise allowed vs to speake, verily this sharpe heate would sone be cooled wherewith they do so with full mouth and as licentiously as vnpunishedly some against vs.

First, wheras they call it newe, they do great wrong to God, whose holy word deserued not to be accused of newnesse. To them in dede I nothing dout that it is newe, to whom Christ is newe, & his Gospel is newe. But they which knewe that preaching of Paule to be olde, Rom. 4. 25. that Iesus Christ died for our sinnes, and rose againe for our iustification, shall finde nothing newe among vs. Wheras it hath long lien hidden vnknownen, and buried: that is the fault of the vngodlinesse of men. Nowe sith it is by the bountifulesse of God restored to vs, it ought at least by right of full restitution to receiue againe the title of auncientie.

Out of the same fountaine of ignorance springeth this, that they take

take it for doubtfull and vncertaine. This verely is it which the Lord by his Prophet complaineth, that the ox knewe his owner, and the asse his maisters stall, but his people knewe not him. But howsoever they mocke at the vncertainty of it: if they were driuen to seale their owne doctrine with their owne blood, and with losse of their life, men might see howe much thy set by it. But farre other is our affiance, which dreadeth neither the terrors of death, nor yet the very iudgement seate of God.

Wheras they require miracles of vs, they deale vnreasonably with vs. For we coyne no new Gospell, but hold fast the selfe same Gospell for confirming of the truth wherof al the miracles do serue that euer Christ & his Apostles haue done. But this thing they haue special aboue vs, that they can euen to this day cōfirme their faith with continuall miracles. Yea but rather they alleage miracles, which may weaken a minde otherwise well stablished: they are so either trifling & worthy to be laughed at, or vaine & lying. And yet, although they were neuer so mōstruous, they ought not to haue bin of any value against the word of God: forasmuch as the name of God ought both in euery place & at euery time to be hallowed, whether it be by miracles or by natural order of things. This false colour might paradeūture haue made the better shew, if the Scripture did not informe vs of y^e lawful end & vse of miracles. For, Marke teacheth that the signes Mar. 16. which followed the preaching of the Apostles were set forth for the 20. confirming of it: Likewise Luke also saith y^e the Lord did beare witness to the worde of his grace, when signes and wonders were shewed by the handes of the Apostles. Wherwith wholly agreeth that saying of Act. 14. the Apostle, that when the Gospell was preached, saluation was cō- 3. Heb. 2. 4. firmed by this, that the Lord did beare witness to it with signes, and wōders, & diuerse powers. But those things which we heare to be the sealings of the Gospell, shall we turne to the destroyinge of the credit of the Gospell? those things which are appointed only to stablish the trueth, shall we apply to confirming of lyes? Therefore it is mete that the doctrine, which (as the Euangelist sayth) goeth before mira- John. 7. 18. and 8. 50. cles, be first examined and tried. If that be allowed, then it may lawfully take confirmation of miracles. But of a true doctrine (as Christ teacheth) this is the marke, if it tende not to the seekinge of the glory of men, but of God. Sith Christ affirmeth this to be the prooffe of doctrine, miracles are wrongefully esteemed which are drawn to any other end than to glorifie the name of God alone. And we ought to remēber that Sathan hath his miracles which although they be iuggling deceites rather thā true powers, yet are such as may deceiue the ignorant and vnskilfull. Magicians and enchaunters haue bin alway famous in miracles : wonderfull miracles haue nourished idolatrie: which yet do not proue to vs, that the superstition of Magicians and idolaters is lawefull. And with this battringe ramme in olde time the Donauistes did shake the simplicity of the common people, for that they excelled in miracles. Therefore we do now make the same answer to our aduersaries, which Augustine then made to the Donauistes: that the Lord hath made vs ware against such miracle workers, when he foretolde that there should come false prophets, which with lying signes and diuerse wonders, should, if it were possible, bring the elect into errour. And Paule hath giuen warning that the kingdome of Antichrist should be with all power, and signes, and lying wonders. But these miracles (say they) are done not of idoils, not of forserers, not of false prophets, but of the Saintes. As though we knew not that this is the craft of Satan, to transfigure himselfe into an Angel of light In olde time the Ægyptians worshipped Ieremy which was buried among them, with sacrifices and other diuine honois. Did not they abuse the holy Prophet of God to idolatry? And yet by such worshiping of his tombe they obtained that they thought the healing of the stinging of serpentes to be the iust reward thereof. What shall we say: but that this hath bin and euer shall be the most iust vengeance of God, to send strength of illusion to them that haue not receaued the loue of truth, that they may beleue lyinge? Therefore we want not miracles, and those certaine, & not subiect to cauillations. As for miracles which they bring forth for themselues, :hey are meere illusions of Satan, forasmuch as they lead away the people from the true worshipping of their God to vanity.

Morouer, they do slaüderously set the Fathers against vs (I meane the auncient Fathers and the writers of the age as yet more vncorrupted) as though they had thē for maintainers of their vngodlinesse: by whose authority if the debate were to be ended, the better parte of the victory (to speake euen most modestly) would bend to our side. But whereas many thinges haue bin excellently well and wisely written of those Fathers, and in some thinges, that hath happened to them which is wont to happen to men: these good naturall children forsooth, according to the rightnes that they haue, both of wit, iudgement, and minde, do worship only their faultes and errours: and those things which are wel spoken, they either marke not, or faine as if they knew them not, or do corrupt them: so as a man may say that their care was altogether to gather dunge in of the golde of the Fathers. Then they oppresse vs with importunate cryinge out against vs, as despisers & enemies of the Fathers. But we do so not despise them, that if it were the matter of my present purpose, I could very easily proue by their consenting voices, the greater part of these things that we say at this day. But we so reade their writings, that we alway remember, that all things are ours, to serue vs, not to haue dominion ouer vs: and that we are Christes alone, whom we must obey in all things without exception. Who so keepeth not this choise, shall haue nothing certaine in religion: forasmuch as those holy men were ignorant of many things, do oftentimes striue one with an other, yea and sometimes fight with themselues. Not without cause (say they) we are warned of Salomon, that we passe not the olde boundes which our Fathers haue set. But there is not all one rule in the boundinge of fieldes, and the obedience of faith, which ought to be so framed that it forget her people and the house of her Father. If they haue so great delite to vse allegories, why do they not rather expounde the Apostles, than any other, to be their Fathers, whose appointed bounds it is not lawfull to plucke vp? for so did Hierome expounde it, whose wordes they haue registred among their Canons. But if they will haue the boundes of the same Fathers, whom they meane, to be steedfastly kept: why do they, so oft as they list, so licentiously passe them? Of the number of the Fathers were they, of whom the one said, that our God eateth not, nor drinketh, and that therefore he needeth neither cuppes nor dishes: the other said, that the holy things require not golde, and that those things please not with golde which are not bought with golde. Therefore they passe the bounde, which are in the holy things so much delited with golde, siluer, iuorie, marble, precious stones & silkes, and thinke that God is not rightly worshipped, vnlesse altogether they be dissolutely set out with exquisite gorgeousnes, or rather with outragious excessse. A Father was he, which said, that he therefore did freely eate flesh on the day in which other abstained, because he was a Christian. Therefore they passe the boundes, when they accurse the soule that tasteth fleshe in Lent. Fathers were they, of whom the one said that a Monke which laboureth not with his handes, is iudged as euill as a violent taker, or (if you wil) a robber: The other said, that it is not lawful for Monkes to liue of other mens goods, although they be continually busied in contemplations, in prayers, in studie. This bounde also they haue passed, when they placed the idle and barrell bellies of Monkes in stewes and brothelhouses to be fatted with other mens substaunce. A Father was he, which said, that it is a horrible abhominacion to see any image painted, either of Christ or of any Sainte in the temples of of many hath bin made a publike error, or rather a cōmon consent of vices, which now these good men would haue to stand for a lawe. Who so haue eyes do see that not only one sea of euils hath ouerflowed, many poysonous pestilences haue innaded the world, that all things runne headlong to ruine: so that either the matters of men must be viterly despeired, or we must lay hand vnto, or rather vse violence vppon so great euils. And remedy is by no other reason driuen away, but because we haue now longe time accustomed vs to euils. But be it that publike error haue place in matters of cōmon weale: yet in the kingdom of God his only trueth is to be heard and regarded, to which by no succeeding course of yeares, by no custome, by no conspired agreement, may any prescription be limited. So in olde time Esay taught the elect of God, that they should not say Conspiringe, to all things in which the people said Cōspiring: that is to say, that they should not conspire together to the wicked agreemēt of the people, nor should feare and dread the peoples feare: but rather that they should sanctifie the Lord of hostes, & he should be their feare & dread. Now therefore let them as much as they list obiekt against vs both passed and present ages, if we sanctifie the Lord of hostes, we wil not be much afraid. For whether it be that many ages haue consented to like vngodlines, he is strong to take vengeance to the third & fourth generation: or if the whole world together conspire into one selfe same wickednesse, he hath by experience taught what is the end of them that offende with the multitude, when he did with a generall ouerflowing destroy the whole kinde of mē, preseruing Noe with a smal household, which should by his faith being but one man condemne the whole world. Finally an euill custome, is none other than a common pestilence, in which they do neuerthelessse dye that dye with company of a multitude. Moreouer they ought to haue considered that which Cyprian sayth in certaine places, that they which sinne by ignorance, although they can not cleare themselues from al fault, yet may seeme after some maner excusable: but who so obstinately refuse the trueth offred by the grace of God, they haue nothing to pretend for their excuse.

As for their double horned argument, they do not driue vs to so hard a streight with it, to cōpell vs to confesse, that either the Church hath lyen dead a certaine time, or that we haue controuersie against the Church. Truely the Church of Christ hath liued and shall liue, so long as Christ shall reigne at the right hande of the Father: by whose hande she is vpholden, by whose succour she is defended, by whose power she keepeth her safetic. For he will vndoubtedly performe that at all. For we do with one consent together with all the people of the faithfull honor and worship the one God and Christ the Lorde, in like sorte as he hath alway been worshipped of all the godly. But they themselues not a litle way erre from the truth, when they acknowledge no Church, but which they see with present eie, and go about to compasse it about with those boundes in which it is not enclosed. Vpon these pointes hangeth our controuersie: First that they affirme that the forme of the Church is alway appearinge and to be scene: then, that they set the same forme in the see of the Church of Rome, & in the order of their prelates. We on the contrary side affirme, both that the Church may consist of no appearinge forme, and that the forme it selfe is not contained in that outward shining shewe, which they foolishly haue in admiration, but hath a farre other marke, namely the pure preachinge of the worde of God, and the right ministracion of Sacramentes. They are in a rage, vnlesse the Church may be alwayes pointed out with a finger. But how oft happened it in the people of the Iewes to be so deformed, that there appeared no forme at all? What forme thinke we to haue shined, when Helias bewailed that he alone was left? How long since the comming 1. King. of Christ hath it lyen hidden without forme? Howe since that time 19. 11. hath it bin so oppressed with warres, seditions, and heresies, that it shined out on no side? If they had liued at y^e time, would they haue beleued that there was any Church? But it was sayd to Helias, that there were preserued seuen thousand mē, which had not bowed their knee before Baal. Neither ought it to be doubtful to vs but that Christ hath alway reigned in earth since he ascended into heauen. But if the godly had then sought any discernable forme with their eies, should they not by and by haue bin discouraged? And verily Hylarie accompted Contra ked not a deadly pestilence lurking vnder that visor. For thus he sayth: One thinge I warne you, beware of Antichrist: for you are ill taken with the loue of wals: ye do ill worship the Church of God in houses and buildinges: vnder them ye do ill thrust in the name of Peace. It is doubtful that in those Antichrist shall sitte? Mountaines and woods, and lakes, and prisons, and caues are safer for me. For in these the Prophetes when they were either abiding or throwen into them, did prophecy. But what doth the worlde at this day honor in his horned Bishoppes, but that it thinketh them to be holy prelates of religion,

The Preface

whom it seeth to be heades ouer great cities? Away therefore with such foolish esteeming. But rather let vs leaue this to the Lord, for as-much as he alone knoweth who be his, & sometime also taketh away from the sight of men the outward knowledge of his Church. That is (I graunt) a horrible vengeance of God vpon the earth. But if the wickednes of men so deserue, why do we seeke to withstand the iust vengeance of God? In such wise the Lord hath in times past taken vengeance of the vnthankfulnessse of men. For because they would not receiue his truth, and had quenched his light, he suffered them being blinded in sense, both to be mocked with lyes full of absurdity, & to be drowned in deepe darkenes, so that there was no face of the true Church to be sene. Yet in the meane time he saued his both being scattered abroad & lying hidden in the midst of errors & darkenesse, from destruction. And no maruel. For he can skill to saue both in the very confusion of Babylon, & in the flame of the burning ouen. But whereas they would haue the forme of the Church to be iudged by I wote not what vaine pompous shew: how perillous that is, I will rather point vnto than declare, least I shoulde drawe out my tale into infinite length. The Pope (say they) which holdeth the Apostolike see, and the Bishoppes that are annoited and consecrate by him, so that they be trimmed with fillets and miters, do represent the Church, and ought to be taken for the Church: & therefore they can not erre. How so? because they are pastors of the church, & cōsecrate to the Lord. And were not Aaron and the other rulers of Israell also Pastors? But Aaron & his sonnes after that they were made priestes, did yet erre when they made the calfe. After this reason, why should not the foure hundred Prophets which lyled to Achab, haue represented the Church. But the Church was on Micheas side, beinge in deede but one man alone, and vnregarded, but out of whole mouth came truth. Did not the false prophetes in resemblance beare both the name and face of the Church, when they did with one violent assault rise vp against Ieremy, & with threatning boasted that it was not possible that the law should perish from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, the word from the Prophet? Ieremy alone was sent against the whole company of the Prophetes, to declare from the Lorde, that it should come to passe, that the law should perishe from the priest, counsell from the wiseman, and the worde from the Prophet. Did not such a glisteringe shewe shine in that Councell which the bishops, Scribes, and Pharisees assembled, to take aduises together for the killing of Christ. Now let them go and sticke fast in the outward visour, that they may make Christ and all the Prophetes of God,

God, schismatikes : and on the other side make the ministers of Satan, the instruments of the holy Ghost. If they speake as they thinke, let them faithfully answer me, in what nation and place they thinke that the Church remained since the time that by the decree of the Council at Basile, Eugenius was thrust downe and deprived from the estate of Pope, and Aymee set in his place. They can not, though they woulde burst for it, deny that the Councell, for so much as concerneth outward solemnities, was lawfull, and summoned not onely of one Pope, but of two. Eugenius was there condemned of schisme, rebellion, and obstinacy, with the whole flocke of Cardinals and Bishops, which had with him practised the dissolution of the Councell. Yet afterward beinge borne vp by the fauour of Princes, he recouered his papacy safe againe. That election of Aymee, which had bin orderly made by the authority of a generall and holy Synode, vanished away in a smoke: sauinge that he himselfe was appeased with a Cardinals hat, as it were a barking dog with a pece of bread cast vnto him. Out of the bosome of these heretikes, rebels, & obstinates, are proceeded all the Popes, Cardinals, Bishops, Abbots, & Priestes that haue bin since. Here they are taken and can go no further. For, to whether side will they giue the name of the Church? Will they deny that the Councell was generall, which wanted nothinge to the outward maiestie: namely, which beinge solemnely summoned by two bulles, and well framed in the order of all thinges, continued in the same dignitie to the last ende? Will they confesse Eugenius with all his company a schismatike, by whom they are all sanctified? Therefore either lette them otherwise define the forme of the Church, or they all as many as are of thē shalbe of vs accompted schismatikes, which wittingly & willingly haue bin ordered of heretikes. If it had neuer before bin knowen, that the Church is not bounde to outward pompes, they themselues may be to vs a large prooffe, which vnder that glorious title of the Church haue so longe so proudly boasted themselues, whereas yet they were the deadly pestilences of the church. I speake not of their maners, and those tragicall doinges wherewith their whole life swarmeth full: because they say that they be the Pharisees which are to be heard, not to be followed. But if ye will spare some of your leasure to read our writings, you shall plainly know that the very doctrine, y^e doctrine it selfe, for the which they say that they be the Church, is a deadly butchery of soules, the firebrand, ruine, & destruction of the Church.

Finally they do not vprightly enough, when they do spitefully rehearse howe great troubles, vprores, and cōtentions the preaching of our doctrine hath drawē with it, and what fruites it now beareth in many. For the blame of these euels is vnworthily laide vpon it, which ought rather to haue bene imputed to y^e malice of Satan. This is as it were a certaine naturall proprietie of the word of God, that whensoever it riseth vp, Satan is neuer quiet or sleeping. This is the most sure and most trusty marke, whereby it is discerned from lieng doctrines, which do easily shewe forth themselues when they are receiued with fauorable eares of all men, and are heard of the world reioising at them. So in certaine ages past, when all thinges were drowned in deepe darknesse, the Lorde of this world made a sport and a play in maner of all men, and lay idle and toke his pleasure like a certaine Sardanapalus in sounge peace. For, what should he els do but laugh and play being in quiet and peisable possession of his kingdome? But when the light shining from aboue somewhat scattered abrode his darknesse, when that strong man troubled and assailed his kingdom, then he began to shake of his wonted drowlines, & hastily to arme himselfe. And first he stirred vp the force of men, whereby he might violently oppresse the truth beginning to shine. By which whē he nothing preuailed, he turned to suttile entrappings. He stirred vp dissentions and disagreements of doctrines by his Catabaptistes, and other monstrous lewde men, whereby he might darken it and at length vtterly quenche it. And now he cōtinueth to assaile it with both engines. For he trauaileth both by the force and power of men to plucke vp that seede, & with his darnell (as much as in him lieth) to choke it, that it may not growe & beare frute. But all this he doth in vaine, if we heare the warning of God, which both hath long before opened his craftes vnto vs, that he should not take vs vnware, & hath armed vs with sufficient defences against all his engines. But how great maliciousnesse is it to lay vpon the word of God the hatred either of the seditions, which noughty and rebellious men do stirre vp, or of the sectes which deceiuers do raise against it? Yet it is no new example. Elias was asked whether it were not he that troubled Israel. Christ was esteemed of the Iewes a seditious man. The Apostles were accused of making a cōmotion among the people. What other thing do they which at this day do father vpon vs all the troubles, vprores and cōtentions that boile vp against vs? But what is to be aunswered to such. Elias hath taught vs: namely that it is not we that scatter errors or stirre vp vprores: but it is they themselues that wraastle against the power of God. But as that one thing alone is sufficient to beate backe their rashnesse, so againe we ought to mete with the weaknesse of other, who oftētimes happen to be moued with such offences,

and in their dismayeng to wauer. But let them, to the ende that they may not faint with this dismayeng and be discouraged, knowe that the Apostles in their time felte by experiēce the same things that nowe happen vnto vs. There were valeried and vnstedfast men, which wrested to their owne destruction, those things the Paul had written by the inspiration of God, as Peter saith. There were despisers of God, which when they heard that sinne abounded to the end that grace might more abounde, by and by obiected, We will then abide in sinne, that grace may abound. When they heard that the faithfull are not vnder the lawe, they by and by, answered, We will then sinne, because we are not vnder the lawe, but vnder grace. There were that accused him as an exhorter to euell. There entred priuily many false Apostles to destroy the Churches which he had builded. Some by enuie and contention, and not purely, yea and maliciously preached the Gospell, thinking to adde more affliction to his bandes. Somewhere the Gospell not much profited. All sought their owne, and not the thinges of Iesus Christ. Some wente backwarde, dogges to their vomite, and swine to their wallowing in the mire. The most parte did drawe the liberty of the Spirit to the licentiousnesse of the flesh. Many brethren crept in, by whom there came afterwarde great dangers to the godly. Amōg the brethren themselues were many strifes raised vp. What should the Apostles haue done in this case? Should they not either haue dissembled for a time, or rather altogether haue geuen ouer and forsaken the Gospell which they sawe to be the sedeploitt of so many contentions, the matter of so many dangers, the occasion of so many offences? No. But for helpe in such distresses this came in their minde that Christ is the stone of stumbling and rocke of offence; set vnto the ruine and rising againe of many, and for a signe that should be spoken against. With which affiance they being armed went forward boldly through all dangers of vprores and offences. With the same thought we also ought to be vpholden, forasmuch as Paul testifieth that this is the perpetuall proprietie of the Gospell, to be the saueur of death vnto death to thē ȳ perish, although it were ordeined to this vse that it should be the saueur of life vnto life, and the power of God vnto the saluation of the faithfull; which verily we should also feele, if we did not with our vnthakfulnes corrupt this so singular a benefit of God, & turne ȳ to our owne destruction which ought to haue bin to vs the only defence of our safetie.

But nowe I returne to you, my souetaigne Lorde. Let those false reportes nothing moue you, by which our aduersaries traueill to cast you in feare of vs, with saying that by this newe Gospell (for so they call it) nothing is hunted for and sought but fit occasion of seditions, and vnpunished libertie of vices. For our God is not the author of diuision, but of peace: and the sonne of God is not the minister of sinne, which came to destroy all the workes of the Deuill. And we are vnworthily accused of such desires, whereof we neuer gaue any suspicion were it neuer so small. It is likely that we forsoth do practise the ouerthrowing of kingdomes, of whom there hath neuer bene heard any one sedicious word, whoes life hath euer bene known quiet and simple, when we liued vnder you, and which now being chased from home yet cesse not to pray for all things prosperous to you and your kingdom. It is likely forsoth that we hunt for licentiousnesse of vices, in whoes behauors although many thinges may be founde faulty, yet there is nothing worthy of so great reproching: neither haue we with so ill successe (by the grace of God) profited in the Gospell, but that our life may be to these backbyters an exemplar of chastitie, liberalitie, mercy, temperance, patience, modestie, and whatsoeuer other vertue. Verily it is by the prooffe it selfe euident that we do vnfeignedly feare and worshippe God, forasmuch as we desire that his name be halowed both by our life and our death, and enuy it selfe is compelled to beare of some of vs a witness of innocence & ciuile vprightnesse, in whom this onely thing was punished with death which ought to haue bene accepted for a singular praise. But if any vnder pretence of the Gospell do stirre vp tumultes (as hetherto it hath not bene founde that there haue bene any such in your Realme) if any pretende the libertie of the grace of God to defende the licentiousnesse of their vices (of which sort I haue knowen many) there be lawes and penalties of lawes, by which they may according to their deseruings be sharply punished: yet so that in the meane time the Gospell of God be not euell spokē of for the wickednesse of naughty men. Thus haue you (O King) the venimous vniustice of the sclauderors largely enough declared, that you may not with an eare of to easy beliefe bende to their reportes. I feare me also least it be to largely set out, forasmuch as this preface is in a manner come to the quantitie of a whole booke of defense. whereby I intended not to make a defense in deede, but onely to mollify your minde aforehande to geue audience to the disclosing of our cause: which your minde, though it be now turned away and estranged from vs, yea and enflamed against vs, yet we trust that we shall be able to recouer the fauor thereof, if you shall ones haue without displeasure and troublous affection red ouer this our confession, which we will to be in steede of a defence for vs to your maiesty. But if the whisper-

inges of the malicious do so possesse your cares, that there is no place for accused men to speake for themselues: and if those outrageous furies do still with your winking at them, exercise cruelty with prisoning, tormenting, cutting, and burning: we shall in dede, as shepe appointed to the slaughter, be brought to all extremities, yet so that in our patience we shall possesse our soules, and waite for the stronge hande of the Lord: which shall without dout be present in time, and stretch forth it selfe armed, both to deliuer the poore out of affliction, and to take vengeance on the despisers, which now triumphe with so great assurednesse.

The Lord the King of Kings stablish your throne with righteousness, and your seate with equity, most noble King.

JOHN CALVINE TO THE READER.

A*The first setting out of this worke, because I did not loke for that successe, which the Lorde of his unmeasurable goodnes hath giue, I had (as me use to do in smal workes) for the more part lightly passed it ouer. But whē I vnderstode that it was receiued with that fauor of al the godly, which I neuer durst haue desired, much lesse haue hoped for: as I verily felt in my hart that much more was giuen to me than I had deserued, so I thought it should be a great vnthankfulness if I shoulde not at the least after my sclēder ability endenor to answeere so fauorable affections toward me, & which of themselues prouoked my diligēce. And this I attempted not only in the second setting forth of it: but how oft since that time the worke hath bin emprinted, so oft it hath bin enriched with some encrease. But although I did not then repent me of the labor that I had employed: yet I neuer held my selfe contented till it was disposed into that order which is now set before you. Now I trust I haue giue you that which may be allowed by all your iudgements. Truely with how great endenor I haue applied my selfe to the doinge of this seruice to the Church of God, I may bring forth for an euident witnessse, that this last winter, when I thought that the feuer Quartane had summoned me to death, how much more the sickenes enforced vpon me, so much lesse I spared my selfe, till I might leaue this booke to ouerliue me, which might make some part of thankfull recompense to so gentle prouoking of the godly. I had rather in dede it had bin done sooner: but it is soone enough if well enough. And I shall then thinke that it is come abroade in good season, when I shall perceiue that it hath brought yet more plentifull frute thā it hath done heretofore to the Church of God. This is my only desire. And truely full ill it were with me, if I did not, holding my selfe contented with the allowance of God alone, despise the iudgements of men, whether they be the foolish & froward iudgements of the vnskilfull, or the wrōgfull & malicious of the wicked. For although God hath throughly settled my minde to the endenor both of enlarging his kingdome, and of helping the common profit: & though I am cleare in mine owne conscience, & haue himselfe & the Angels to witnessse with me, that since I tooke vpon me the office of a teacher in the Church, I haue tended to none other purpose*

but that I might profit the Church in maintaining the pure doctrine of godlines: yet I thinke there is no man, that hath bin snatched at, bitten, & torne in sunder with moe sclaunders than I. When my epistle was now in printing, I was certainly enformed that at Augsburgh where the assēbly of the states of the Empire was holden, there was a rumor spread abroad of my revoltinge to the Papacy, and the same was more greedely receiued in the courtes of Princes than was meete. This forsooth is their thankesfulnes who are not ignorant of many trialls had of my stedfastnes, which trialls as they shake of so fowle a sclaunder, so they should with all indifferēt & gētle iudges haue defended me from it. But the Deuill with his whole rout is deceiued if in oppressing me with filthy lies, he thinke that by his vniust dealinge I shalbe either the more discouraged or made the lesse diligent: because I trust that the Lord of his unmeasurable goodnes will graunt me that I may with euen sufferance continue in the course of his holy calling. Whereof I giue to the godly readers a new prooffe in this settinge foorth of this booke. Now in this traiaill this was my purpose so to prepare and furnish them that be studious of holy Diuinity to the reding of the word of God, that they may both haue an easie entry into it, and go forward in it without stumblinge: for I thinke that I haue in all pointes so knit vp together the summe of religion, and disposed the same in such order, that whosoever shall well haue it in minde, it shal not be hard for him to determine both what he ought chiefly to seeke in the Scripture, and to what marke to apply whatsoeuer is contained in it. Therefore, this as it were a way being once made plaine, if I shall hereafter set forth any expositions of Scripture, because I shall not neede to enter into long disputations of articles of doctrine, & to wander out into common places: I will alway knit them vp shortly. By this meane the godly reader shalbe eased of great paine and tediousnesse, so that he come furnished aforehande with the knowledge of this present worke as with a necessary instrument. But because the entent of this purpose, doth clearly as in mirrors appeare in so many commentaries of mine, I had rather to declare in deede what it is, than to set it out in wordes. Farewell friendly Reader, and if thou receiue any frute of my labors, helpe me with thy prayers to God our Father.

WHAT CHAPTERS ARE CONTAINED IN THE BOOKES OF THIS INSTITUTION.

In the first booke which entreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator: Are contained xviiij. Chapters.

- 1 Hat the knowledge of God, & of our selues, are things conioyned: & how they be lincked the one with the other.
- 2 What it is to knowe God, & to what ende tendeth the knowledge of him.
- 3 That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the mindes of men.
- 4 That the same knowledge is either choked or corrupted, partly by ignorance, & partly by malice.
- 5 That the knoweledge of God doth shiningely appeare in the making of the world, and in the continuall government thereof.
- 6 That to attaine to God the creator, it is needefull to haue the Scripture to be our guide and maistrresse.
- 7 By what testimonie the Scripture ought to be stablished, that is, by the witnessse of the holy Ghost, that the authority thereof may remaine certain: And that it is a wicked inuention to say that the credit thereof doth hange vpon the iudgement of the Church.
- 8 That so faras mans reason may beare, there are sufficient proues to stablish the credit of the Scripture.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF
THE INSTITVTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, WHICH intreateth of the knowledge of God the Creator.

The first Chapter.

That the knowledg of God, and of our selues, are things conioyned: and how they be linked the one with the other.

HE whole summe in a maner of all our wisdom, which onely ought to be accompted true and perfect wisdom, consisteth in two parts, that is to say, the knowledge of God, & of our selues. But wheras these two knowledges be with many bonds linked together: yet whether goeth before or engendreth the other, it is hard to discern. For first no man can looke vpon him selfe, but he must needs by and by turne all his senses to the beholding of God, in whom he liueth & is moued: because it is playne that those giftes wherewith we be indued are not of our selues, yea euen that that we haue being is nothing els but an essence in the one God. Finally, by these good things that are as by dropmeale powred into vs from heauen, we are led as it were by certaine streames to the spring head. And so by our owne needinesse, better appeareth that infinite plentie of good things that abideth in God. Specially that miserable ruine, whereinto the fall of the firste man hath throwen vs, compelleth vs to lift vp our eyes, not onely beyng foodeles and hungry, to craue from thence that which we lacke, but also being awakened with feare, to learne humilitie. For as there is found in man a certaine world of all miseries, & since we haue bene spoyled of the diuine apparell, our shamefull nakednesse discloseth an infinite heape of filthy disgracements: it must needs be that euery man be pricked with knowledge in conscience of his own unhappinesse to make him come at least vnto some knowledge of God. So by the vnderstanding of our owne ignorance, vanitie, beggery weakenes, peruersnes, and corruption, we learne to reknowlege that no where else but in the Lord abideth the true light of wisdom, sound vertue, perfecte abundance of all good things, and puritie of righteousnes. And so by our owne euils we are stirred to consider the good things of God: and we cannot earnestly aspire towarde him, vntill we beginne to mislike our selues. For of all men what one is there, that would not willingly rest in him selfe? yea who doth not rest, so longe as he knoweth not him selfe, that is to say, so long as he is contented with his owne gifts, and ignorāt or vnmindfull of his owne misery? Therefore euery man is by the knowledge of him selfe, not onely pricked forward to seeke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him.

2 Agayne it is certaine, that man neuer commeth vnto the true knowledge of himselfe, vnles he haue first beholden the face of God, and from beholding therof do descend to looke into himselfe. For (such is the pride that is naturally planted in vs) we alway thinke our selues righteous, innocent, wise and holy, vntill that with manifest proues we be cōuincd of our vnrighteousnes, filthines, folly and vncleannes. But we are not conuincd therof, if we looke vpon our selues onely, & not vpon God also, who is the only rule wherby this iudgement ought to be tryed. For because we are naturally inclined to hypocrisie, therefore a certaine vayne resemblance of righteousness doth abundantly content vs in stead of righteousness in deede. And because there appeareth nothing among vs, nor about vs, that is not defiled with much filthines, therefore that which is somewhat lesse filthy pleaseth vs as though it were most pure, so long as we holde our selues within the boundes of mans vncleannes. Like as the eye that is vsed to see nothing but black, thinketh that to be pure white, which yet is but darkish white, or browne. Yea, we may yet more playnely discern by our bodily sense how much we are blinded in considering the powers of the soule. For if at midday we either looke down vpon the ground, or behold those thinges that rounde about lye open before our eyes, then we thinke our selues to haue a very assured and percing force of sight: but when we looke vp to the sunne, & behold it with fixed eyes, then that same sharpnesse that was of great force vpon the ground, is with so great brightnes by and by daseled and confounded, that we are compelled to confesse that the same sharp sight which we had in considering earthly thinges, when it commeth to the sunne is but meere dulnesse. Euen so commeth it to passe in weying our spirituall good thinges. For while we looke no further then the earth, so longe beyng well contented with our own righteousness, wisdom and strength, we do sweetely flatter our selues, and thinke vs in maner halfe gods. But if we once beginne to rayse vp our thought vnto God & to wey what a one he is, and howe exact is the perfection of his righteousness, wisdom and power, after the rule wherof we ought to be framed: then that which before dyd please vs in our selues with false pretence of righteousnes, shall become lothsome to vs as greatest wickednesse: the that which did marueilously deceiue vs vnder colour of wisdom, shall stinke before vs as extreme folly: then that which did beare the face of strength, shall be proued to be most miserable weaknes. So slenderly doth that which in vs seemeth euen moste perfect, answer in proportion to the purenes of God.

3 Hereof proceedeth that trembling & amasednes, wherewith the scripture in many places reciteth that the holy men were stricken and astonished so oft as they perceyued the presence of God. For when we see that they which in his absence did stand assured & vnmoued, so sone as he discloseth his glory, begin so to quake and are so dismayd, that they fall downe, yea are swallowed vp & in maner as destroyed with feare of death: it is to be gathered therby that man is neuer sufficiently touched and inwardly moued with knowledge of his owne basenes, vntill he haue compared himselfe to the maiestie of God. But of such dismayng we haue often examples both in the Iudges & in the Prophets: so that this was a common saying among the people of God: We shall dye because the Lord hath appeared vnto vs. And therefore the history of Iob, to throw men downe with knowledge of their owne folly, weaknes, & vncleannes, bringeth alway his principall prooffe from describing Gods wisdom, strength and cleannes. And that not without cause. For we see how Abraham, the nerer that he came to behold the glory of God, the better acknowledged himselfe to be earth and dust. We see how Elias could not abide to tary his comming to him with vncouered face: so terrible is the beholding of him. And what maie man do that is but corruption & a worme, when euē the Cherubins for very feare muste hide their faces? Euen this is it that the Prophet Esay speaketh of: The sunne shall blushe, & the moone shall be ashamed, when the Lord of hostes shall raigne, that is to say, when he displayeth his brightnes, and bringeth it nearer to sight, then in comparison thereof the brightest thing of all shall be darkened. But howsoeuer the knowledge of God and of our selues, are with mutuall knotte linked together, yet the order of right teaching requireth that first we intreate of the knowledge of God, and after come downe to speake of the knowledge of our selues.

The second Chapter.

What it is to knowe God, and to what ende tendeth the knowledge of him.

I Meane by the knowledge of God, not only that knowledge, wherby we conceiue that there is some God, but also that, wherby we learne so much as behoueth vs to know of him, & as is profitable for his glorie, finally so much as is expedient. For, to speake properly, we can not say that God is knowen where there is no religion nor godlinesse. But heere I do not yet touch that speciall kinde of knowledge whereby those men that are in themselves reprobate and accursed do conceiue God the redeemer in Christ the mediator: but I speake onely of that first and simple maner of knowledge, whervnto the very order of nature would haue led vs, if Adam had continued in state of innocēcie. For although no man, sith mankinde is in this ruine, can perceiue God to be eyther a father, or author of saluation, or in any wise fauourable, vnles Christ come as a meane to pacifie him towarde vs: yet it is one thing to feele that God our maker doth by his power sustaine vs, by his prouidence gouerne vs, by his goodnes nourish vs, & endue vs with all kinds of blessings: & an other thing to embrace the grace of reconciliatiō offered vs in Christ. Whereas therefore the Lord first simply appeareth as well by the making of the world, as by the generall doctrine of the scripture, to be the Creator, & then in the face of Christ to be the redeemer: hervpō arise two sorts of knowing him, of which the former is now to be intreated of, & then the other shall orderly follow in the place fit for it. For although our mind can not conceiue the knowledge of God, but that it must giue to him some kind of worship, yet shall it not be sufficient simply to know that it is he only that ought to be honored & worshipped of all men, vnles we be also perswaded that he is the fountaine of all good things, to the end that we should seeke for no thing elsewhere but in him. I meane hereby, not only for that as he hath once created this world, so by his infinite power he susteineth it, by his wisdom he gouerneth it, by his goodnes he preserueth it, & specially mankind he ruleth by his righteousness & iudgement, suffreth by his mercy, & sauegardeth by his defence: but also because there can no where be found any one drop either of wisdom, or of light, or of righteousness, or of power, or of vprightnes, or of sincere truth, which floweth not frō him or whereof he is not the cause: to this end verely, that we should learne to looke for & craue all these things at his hand, & with thanksgeuing accompt them receiued of him. For this feeling of the powers of God is to vs a mete scholemaster of godlines, out of which springeth religion: Godlines I call a reuerence of God ioined with loue of him which is procured by knowledge of his benefits. For men will neuer with willing obedience submit thē selues to God, vntill they perceiue that they owe all things to him, that they are nourished by his fatherly care, that he is to them the author of all good things, so that nothing is to be sought elsewher than in him. Yea they will neuer yeld thē selues truly & with all their heart wholly to him, vnles they assuredly beleue that in him is perfect felicitie reposed for them.

2 Therefore they do but trifle with vaine speculations, which in entreating of this question, do make it their purpose to discusse, what thing God is, where it rather behoueth vs to know what maner one he is, and what agreeth with his nature. For to what end serueth it to confesse as Epicure doth, that ther is a God which doth only delight him selfe with idlenes, hauing no care of the worlde? Finally, what profiteth it to knowe such a God with whom we may haue nothing to do? But rather the knowledge of him ought to serue to this ende, first to frame vs to feare & reuerence: then that by it guiding and teaching vs, we may learne to craue all good things at his hand, & to accompt them receiued of him. For how can any thought of God enter into thy mind, but that thou must therewithall byandby thinke, that forasmuch as thou art his creature, therefore thou art of right subiect and bound to his authoritie, that thou owest him thy life, that whatsoeuer thou enterprisest, whatsoeuer thou doest, ought to be directed to him? If this be true, then truely it foloweth that thy life is peruersely corrupted if it be not framed to obeying of him, forasmuch as his will ought to be our law to liue by. Agayn, thou canst not cleerely see him, but that thou must needs know that he is the fountain and originall of all good things, wherevpon should grow both a desire to cleaue vnto him, and an assured trust in him, if mans owne corruptnes did not drawe his minde from the right searching of him. For first of all, the godly minde doth not as by a dreame imagine to her selfe any God at aduenture, but stedfastly beholdeth the onely one and true God: and doth not falsely forge of him whatsoeuer her selfe liketh, but is content to beleue him to be such a one as he discloseth himselfe, and doth alway with greate diligence beware that with presumptuous rashnesse she passe not beyond his wil, and so wander out of the way. And when she so knoweth him, because she vnderstandeth that he gouerneth all thinges, she assuredly trusteth that he is her safe-keeper and defender, and therefore wholly committeth her selfe to his fayth? Because she vnderstandeth that he is the author of all good thinges, therefore if any thing trouble her, or if shee want any thing, byandby she flyeth to him for succour, looking for helpe at his hand. Because shee is perswaded that he is good and mercifull, therefore with assured confidence shee resteth on him, and doubteth not in all her euills to finde readie remedy in his mercifull kindnesse. Because shee knoweth him to be her Lord and father, therefore shee determineth that he is worthy that shee should in all thinges haue regard to his authoritie, reuerence his maiestie, procure the aduancement of his glorie, and obey his commaundements. Because shee seeth that he is a ryghteous Iudge, & armed with his seueritie to punish sinners, therefore she alway setteth his iudgement feare before her eyes, and with feare of him withdraweth & restrayneth her selfe from prouoking his wrath. Yet is she not so afraide with the feeling of his iudgement, that shee would conuey her selfe from it, although there were a way open to escape it: but rather shee doth no lesse loue him, whyle he extendeth vengeance vpon the wicked, than while he is beneficiall to the godly, forasmuch as she vnderstãdeth that it doth no lesse belong to his glory that he hath in store punishment for the wicked and euill doers, than that he hath reward of eternal life for the righteous. Moreouer shee doth not for onely feare of punishment refraine her selfe from sinning: but because shee loueth and reuerenceth him as her father, attendeth on him and honoreth him as her Lord, therefore although there were no hell at all, yet shee dreadeth his only displeasure. Nowe behold what is the pure and true religion, euen faith ioyned with an earnest feare of God: so that feare may contayne in it a willing reuerence, and drawe with it a right forme of worshipping such as is appointed in the lawe. And this is the more heedfully to be noted, because all men generally do worship God, but fewe doe reuerence him, while ech where is great pompous shewe in Ceremonies, but the purenes of hart is rare to be found.

3 Truly, they that iudge rightly, will alway hold this for certaine, that there is grauen in the mindes of men a certaine feeling of the Godhead; which neuer can be blotted out. Yea that this perswasion, that there is a God, is euen from their generation naturally planted in them, and deeply rooted within their bones, the very obstinacie of the wicked is a substantiall witnesse, which with their furious struiing yet can neuer winde themselues out of the feare of God. Although Dirigoras and such other doe iest and laugh at all that hath in all ages bene beleueed concerning religion: although Dyonisius doe scoffe at the heauenly iudgemēt: yet that is but a laughter from the teeth forward, because inwardly the worme of conscience gnaweth thē much more sharpely than all hot searing irons. I alleage not this that Cicero sayth, that errors by continuance of time growe out of vse, & religion daily more and more encreaseth and waxeth better. For the worlde (as a litle hereafter we shall haue occasion to shew) trauaileth as much as in it lieth to shake of all knowledge of God, and by all meanes to corrupt the worshipping of him. But this only I say, that whē the dull hardnes, which the wicked doe desirously labor to get to despise God withwithall, doth lie piningly in their harts, yet the same feeling of God, which they woulde most of all desire to haue vtterly destroyed, liueth still, and sometime doth vtter it selfe: whereby we gather that it is no such doctrine as is first to be learned in schooles, but such a one whereof euery man is a teacher to himselfe euen from his mothers womb, & such a one as nature suffreth none to forget, although many bend all their endeouore to shake it out of their minde. Now, if all men be borne & do liue to this end, to know God, & the knowledge of God is but fickle and lightly vanisheth away, vnlesse it proceede thus farre: it is euident, that they all swarue out of kinde from the lawe of theyr creation, that doe not direct to this marke all the whole thoughts & doings of their life. Of which the Philosophers themselues were not ignorant. For Plato ment nothing else, when he oftentimes taught, that the soueraign good of the soule is the likenesse of God, when the soule hauing throughly cōceiued the knowledge of him is wholly transformed into him. Therefore very aptly doth Grillus reason in Plutarche, where he affirmeth, that men, if religion be once taken frō their life, are not only nothing better than brute beasts, but also many waies much more miserable, for that being subiect to so many sorts of euils they continually draw forth a troublesome vnquiet life: and that therfore the worshipping of God is the only thing that maketh them better than brute beastes, by which alone they aspire to immortality.

In Phedrone & theocrito.

The iij. Chapter.

That the knowledge of God is naturally planted in the mindes of men.

WE hold it out of controuersie, that there is in the mind of man, euen by naturall instinction, a certaine feeling of the Godhead. For to the ende that no man should flee to the pretence of ignorāce, God himselfe hath planted in all men a certaine vnderstanding of his diuine maiestie: the remembrance whereof, with powring in now and then as it were new droppes, he continually reneweth: that when all, not one excepted, do know that there is a God, and that he is their maker, they may all be condemned by their owne testimonie, for that they haue not both worshipped him, and dedicate their life to his will. But truely if the not knowing of God be any where to be found, it is likely that there can no where else be any example of it more thā among the grossest sorts of peoples and furthest from ciuill order of humanitie. But (as the heathen man sayeth) there is no nation so barbarous, no kinde of people so sauage, in whom resteth not this persuasion that there is a God. And euen they that in other parts of their life seeme very litle to differ from brute beastes, yet do continually keepe a certaine seede of Religion. So throughly hath this common principle possessed all mens mindes, and so fast it sticketh within all mens bowels. Sith then from the beginning of the world there hath bin no countrey, no Citie, yea no house, that could be without religion, in this is emplied a certaine secret confession that a feeling of the Godhead is written in the hearts of all men. Yea and idolatrie it selfe is a substantiall prooffe of this persuasion. For we know how vnwillingly man abaseth him selfe to honor other creatures aboute himselfe. Therefore when he had rather worship a block and a stone, than he would be thought to haue no God, it appeareth that this imprinted persuasion of God is of most great force, which is impossible to be raced out of the mind of man, that it is much more ealie to haue the affectiō of nature brokep, as in deede it is broken whē mā from his own natural swelling pride of his own will stoupeeth downe euen to the basest creatures to honor God.

2. Wherefore it is most vayne which some doe say, that religion was deuised by the sutteltie and craft of a few, by this policie to keepe the simple people in awe, whereas they them selues that procured other to worship God, beleued nothing lesse than that there was any God at all. I graunt in deede that suttle men haue inuented many things in religion, whereby to bring the people to a reuerēce, and cast them in a feare, to make their minds the more pliable to obediēce: But this they could neuer haue brought to passe, vnles the mindes of men had bin already before hand perswaded that there was a God, out of which persuasion as out of seede springeth that ready inclinatio to religion. Neither is it likly that euē they which suttelly deceiued the simple sort with colour of religion, were them selues altogether without knowledge of God. For though in times past there haue bene some, and at this day there arise vp many, that denie that there is any God: yet whether they will or no, they oftentimes feele that which they are desirous not to know. We reade of none that euer did breake forth into more presumptuous and vnbridled despising of God, than Caius Caligula: yet none more miserably trembled when any token of Gods wrath appeared. And so agaynste his will he quaked for feare of him whom of wilfull purpose he endeouored to despise. And the same may a man commonly see to happen to such as he was. For the bolder despiser of God that any man is, the more is he troubled at the very noyse of the falling of a leafe. And whence commeth that, but from the reuengement of Gods maiestie, which doth so much the more vehemently strike their consciences as they more labor to flie away from it? They do in deede looke about for all the starting holes that may be, to hide them selues from the presence of the Lord: but whether they will or no, they are still holden fast tyed. For howsoeuer sometime it seemeth to vanish away for a moment, yet it oft returneth againe, and with new assault doth runne vpon them: so that the rest which they haue, if they haue any at all, from torment of conscience, is much like to the sleepe of drunkards or frantike men, which euen while they sleepe do not quietly rest, because they are at euery momēt vexed with horrible and dreadfull dreames. Therefore the very vngodly themselues serue for an example to proue that there alway lyeth in all mens mindes some knowledge of God.

The iiij. Chapter.

That the same knowledg is cyther choked, or corrupted, partly by ignorance, and partly by malice.

BVt as experience teacheth that God hath sown the seede of religion in all men, so scarcely may be founde the hundreth mā, that hauing it conceyued in his heart doth cherish it, but no mā in whom it ripeneth, so far is it of that any frute appeareth in due time. Therefore whether it be that some become vaine in theyr owne superstitions, or that some do of set purpose maliciously reuolt from God, yet all doe runne out of kind from the true knowledg of him. So commeth it to passe that there remaineth no true godlinesse in the worlde. But whereas I sayd that some by error fall into superstition, I meane not thereby as though their simplicity might excuse them from blame, because the blindnesse that they haue, is commonly alway mingled both with proud vanity, & with stubbornesse. Vanity and the same ioyned with pride appeareth in this, that they miserable men both in the seeking of God do not climbe aboue themselues as they ought to haue done, but measure him according to the proportion of their owne fleshly dulnesse, and also neglecting the sound manner of searching for him, do curiously fly to vayne speculations. And so they conceiue him not such a one as he offreth himselfe, but do imagine him such a one as of their owne rashe presumption they haue forged him. Which gulfe being once opened, what way soeuer they stirre their feete, they must needes alway run hedlong into destruction. For whatsoeuer afterward they goe about toward the worshipping or seruice of God, they can not accompt it done to him, because they worship not him, but rather the deuise of their own heart, & their owne dreame in steade of him. This peruersnes doth Paule expressely touche, where he sayth, that they were made fooles when they coueted to be wise. He had before sayd, that they were made vaine in their imaginations : but least any man should thereby excuse them from blame, he addeth further, that they are worthily blinded because not contented with sobrietie, but presumptuously taking vpon themselves more than they ought, they wilfully bring darknesse vpon them, yea with vaine & froward pride do make themselves fooles. Wherupō followeth, that their foolishnes is not excusable, wherof the cause is not only vaine curiosity, but also a greedines to knowe more than is meete for them, ioyned with a false confidence.

Cap. 4. Of the knowledge of

2 As for this that Dauid sayth, that the wicked & mad mē thinke in their hearts, that there is no God: First that is meant only of those that choking the light of nature, do of purpose make themselves senselesse, as we shall see againe a litle hereafter. Euen as we see that many after that they haue bin hardened with boldenesse and custome of sinning, do furiously put from them all the remembrance of God which yet is by very feeling of nature inwardly ministred vnto their mindes. Nowe Dauid, to make their madnes the more detestable, bringeth them in as though they precisely denied, that there is any God: although they take not from him his being, but because in taking from him his iudgement and prouidence, they shut him vp idle in heauen. For whereas nothing les agreeth with the nature of God, than to throw away the gouernement of the world, and leaue it to fortune, to winke at the sinnes of men, so as they may liue in licentious outrage vnpunished: whosoever he be that quenching the feare of the heauenly iudgement, doth carelesly folow his owne affections, he denieth that there is a God. And this is the iust vengeance of God, to draw a fatnes ouer their hartes, so that the wicked when they haue once closed their eyes, euen in seeing may not see. And Dauid in an other place is the best expounder of his owne meaning, where he sayeth: That the feare of God is not before the eyes of the wicked: Again, that in their euill doinges they proudly reioyce at them selues, because they persuade themselves, that God doth not loke vpon them. Therefore although they be compelled to acknowledge some God, yet they do rob him of his glorie, in withdrawing frō him his power. For as God (as Paule witnesseth) cannot denie himselfe, because he continually abideth like himselfe: so is it truely sayd, that these men in faining God to be a dead and vaine image doe denie God. Moreouer it is to be noted that although they wrastle against their own naturall feeling, and do desire not onely to shake out God from thence, but also to destroy him in heauen: yet their dull hardnes can neuer so farre preuaile, but that God sometime draweth them backe to his iudgement seat. But forasmuch as they are not withholden with any fear from running violently against God: therefore it is certaine that there raigneth in them a brutish forgetfulnes of God, so long as that blind pang of rage doth so forcible carie them.

3 So is that vaine defense ouerthrowne, which manie are wont to pretende for excuse of their superstition. For they thinke, that any deuotion to religion suffiseth, whatsoever it be, though it be neuer so much contrarie to order and truth. But they consider not, that true religion ought to be framed according to the will of God, as by a perpetuall rule: and that God himselfe abideth alway like himselfe, and is no imagined Ghost or fantasie, that maie be diuersly fashioned after euery mannes liking. And truely we may plainly see with how lying deceites superstition mocketh God, while she goeth about to do him pleasure. For catching holde of those things in a manner only, which God hath testified that he careth not for, she eyther contemptuously vseth, or openly refuseth those things that he appoynteth and sayeth to be pleasant vnto him. Therefore whosoever do set vp new inuented formes of worshipping God, they worship & honor their own doting deuises: because they durst not so trifle with God, vnles they had first fayned a God agreeing with the follies of the trifeling toyes. Wherefore the Apostle pronounceth, that that vnstayed and wandering opinion of the maiestie of God, is a very not knowing of God. When (sayeth he) ye knewe not God, ye serued them that in nature were no gods. And in an other place he sayeth that the Ephesians were without a God at such time as they strayed from the right knowledge of the one God. And at least in this case, it differeth not much, whether thou beleue one God or many, because in both cases thou departest from & forsakeest the true God: whom whē thou hast once forsaken, there is nothing left with thee but a detestable Idol. It foloweth therefore, that we must determine with Lactantius, that there is no lawfully allowable religion, but that which is ioyned with truth.

Ga. 4. 9.

Ep. 2. 12

4 There is also a second fault, that they neyther haue at any time any consideration of God, but against their wills, nor do approche toward him, till for all their holding backe they be forcibly drawn to him: and euen then also they haue not a willing feare that proceedeth from reuerence of Gods maiestie, but onely a serule and constrayned feare, which the iudgement of God wringeth out of them: which iudgement because they can not escape, therefore they dread it, but yet so as therewithall they abhorre it. And so that saying of Statius, that feare first made gods in the world, may be fitly spoken of vngodlinesse, and of this kinde of vngodlines onely. They that haue a minde abhorring from the iustice of God, do hartily wish to haue his throne of iudgement ouerthrowen, which they know to stand for punishment of offences agaynst his iustice by which affectiō they warre against God, who can not be without his iudgement. But when they vnderstand that his power impossible to be auoyded, hangeth ouer them: because they can neyther by force remoue it, nor by flight escape it, therefore they feare it So least they should in all things seeme to despise him, whose maiestie still presseth vpon them, they vse a certaine outward forme of religion, such as it is: but in the meane tyme they cease not to defile them selues with all kinde of vices, to ioyne outragious mischeues to mischeues, vntill they haue in all pointes violate the holy lawe of the Lord, and destroyed his whole ryghteousnesse or at least they are not so holden backe with that fayned feare of God, but that they swetely rest in their sinnes, and flatter themselues, and had rather to folow the intemperāce of their flesh than restraine it with the bridle of the holy Ghost. But forasmuch as the same is but a voyde and lying shadowe of religion, yea scarcely worthy to be called a shadow: hereby againe is easily gathered howe much the true godlines, which is powred onely into the heartes of the faithfull, I meane that out of which religion springeth, doth differ from this confuse knowledge of God. And yet the hypocrites would obtaine by crooked compasses to seeme nygh vnto God, whom they flye from. For whereas there ought to haue bin one continuall vnbroken course of obedience in their whole life, they in a maner in all their doinges carelessly rebelling against him, labour with a fewe sacrifices to appease him. Whereas they ought to haue serued him with holines of life and sincerenesse of heart, they inuent triflings and obseruāces of no value, to procure his fauour withall: yea they do the more licentiously lye dull in their owne dreggs, because they trust that they may be discharged against him with their owne mockeries of propiciatory satisfactions. Finally whereas their affiaunce ought to haue bin fastened in him, they neglecting him do rest in themselues, or in creatures. At length they entangle themselues with such a heape of errors, that the darke mist of malice doth choke, and at last vterly quench those sparkes, that glimmeringly shined to make them see the glory of God. Yet that seede still remaineth which can by no meane be plucked vp by the roote, to belue that there is a certaine godhead: but the same seede is so corrupted, that it bringeth forth of it none other but very euill frutes. Yea therby is that which I trauaile to proue more certainly gathered, that there is a feeling of godhead naturally grauen in the heartes of men, forasmuch as the very reprobate themselues are of necessity enforced to confesse it. In quiet prosperitie they pleasantly mocke at God, yea they are full of talke and prating to diminish the greatnesse of his power : but if once any desperation touche thē, it stirreth them vp to seeke the same God, and ministreth them sodaine short prayers : by which it may appeare, that they were not vtterly ignorant of God, but that the same which ought sooner to haue bene vttered, was by obstinacie suppressed.

The fifth Chapter.

That the knowledg of God doth shiningly appeare in the making of the world and in the continuall gouernement thereof.

Moreouer because the furthest ende of blessed life standeth in the knowledg of God : that the way to felicitie should be stopped to none, therefore God hath not only planted in the minds of men that seede of religion which we haue spoken of, but also hath so disclosed himselfe in the whole workemanship of the world, and daily so manifestly presenteth himselfe, that men can not open their eyes but they must needs behold him. His substāce in deede is incomprehensible, so that his diuine maiestie farre surmounteth all mens senses: but he hath in all his works grauen certaine marks of his glorie, and those so plaine and notably discernable, that the excuse of ignorance is taken away from mē, be they neuer so grosse and dull witted. Therefore the Prophet rightfully crieth out, that he is clothed with light as with a garment: as if he should haue sayd, that then he first began to come forth to be seene in visible apparel, since the time that he first displaid his ensignes in the creatiō of the world, by which euen now what way soeuer we turne our eies, he appeareth glorious vnto vs. In the same place also the same Prophet aptly compareth the heauens as they be displaid abroad, to his royall pauillion: he sayth that he hath framed his parlours in the waters, that y^e cloudes are his chariots, that he rideth vpon the wings of the windes, that the winds and lightnings are his swift messengers. And because the glory of his power and wisdom doth more fully shine aboue, therefore commonly the heauen is called his pallace. And first of all, what way soeuer thou turne thy eyes, there is no peece of the world be it neuer so small, wherein are not seene at least some sparkles of his glory to shine. But as for this most large and beautifull frame, thou canst not with one viewe peruse the wide compasse of it, but that thou must needs be on euery side ouerwhelmed with the infinite force of the brightnes thereof. Wherefore the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues doth very well call the ages of the worlde the spectacle of inuisible things, for that the so orderly framing of the worlde serueth vs for a mirror wherein we may behold God which otherwise is inuisible.

Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of

For which cause the Prophet assigneth to the heauenly creatures a language that all nations vnderstand, for that in them there is a more euident testification of the Godhead, than that it ought to escape the consideration of any nation be they neuer so dull. Which thing the
Psa. 19. 1
Apostle declaring more plainly sayth that there is disclosed vnto men so much as was behouefull to be knowen concerning God: because all men without exception, do throughly see his inuisible things euen to his very power and Godhead, which they vnderstand by the creation of the world.

2 As for his wonderfull wisdom, there are innumerable proues both in heauen and in earth that witnesse it: I meane not only that secreter sort of thinges, for the nerer marking whereof Astrologie, Physike, and all naturall Philosophie scructh, but euen those things that thrust them selues in sight of euerie one, euen of the rudest vnlearned man, so that men can not open their eyes but they must needs be witnesses of them. But truely they that haue digested, yea or but tasted the liberall arts, being holpen by the ayd thereof do proceede much further to looke into the secrets of Gods wisdom. Yet is there no man so hindred by lacke of knowledge of those arts, but that he throughly seeth aboundantly enough of conning workmanship in Gods works, to bring him in admiration of the workeman thereof. As for example: to the searching out of the mouings of the starres, appointing of their places, measuring of their distances, & noting of their properties, there needeth art and an exacter diligence: by which being throughly perceiued, as the prouidence of God is the more manifestly disclosed, so it is conuenient, that the mind rise somewhat the hier thereby to behold his glory. But forasmuch as the vnlearned people, yea and the rudest sort of them, such as are furnished with the only helpe of theyr eyes, can not be ignorant of the excellencie of Gods cunning workmanship, which in this innumerable and yet so seuerally well ordered and disposed variety doth of it selfe shewe forth it selfe: it is euident that there is no man to whom God doth not largely open his wisdom. Likewise it requireth a singular sharpenes of wit, to wey with such cunning as Galen doth, the knitting together, the proportionall agreement, the beautie, and vse in the frame of mans body: but by all mens confession, the body of man doth vter in very shewe of it selfe so cūning a compacting together, that for it the maker of it may worthily be iudged wonderfull.

3 And therefore certaine of the Philosophers in olde time did not without cause call man a litle world, because he is a rare representation of the power, goodnesse, and wisdom of God, and containeth in him selfe selfe miracles enowe to occupie our mindes, if we will be content to marke them. And for this reason Paul, after that he had sayd that the very blind men may find out God by groping for him, by and by sayth further, that he is not to be sought farre of, because all men do feele vndoubtedly within themselues the heauenly grace wherewith they be quickned. But if we neede to go no further than ourselues, to finde and take hold of God: what pardon shall his slouthfulnes deserue that will not vouchsafe to descend into himselfe to finde God? And the same is the reason why David, when he had shortly spoken in the aduancement of the wonderfull name & honor of God that do euery where gloriously shine, by and by crieth out: What is man that thou art mindfull of him? Againe, out of the mouth of infantes and sucking babes thou hast stablished strength. For so he pronounceth that not only in the whole kinde of man is a mirror of the workes of God, but also that the very infantes, while they yet hang on their mothers brestes, haue tongues eloquent enough to preache his glory, so that there nedeth no other orators. And therefore he douteth not to set their mouthes in the vauuarde, as being strongly armed to subdue their madnesse that would according to their deuilish pride couet to extinguish the name of God. And herupon riseth that which Paul allegeth out of Aratus, that we are the offspring of God: because he garnishing vs with such excellencie, hath testified that he is our father. Like as euē by cōmon reason, & as it were by information of experience, the prophane Poets called him the father of men. And truly no mā will assentingly and willingly yeelde him selfe to serue God, but he that hauing tasted his fatherly loue, is mutually allured to loue and worship him.

4 And here is disclosed the soule vnthankfulnesse of men, which while they haue within them selues a workehouse gloriously furnished with innumerable workes of God, and also a shop stuffed with inestimable plentie of riches, and whē they ought to burst forth into praying of him, are contrariwise puffed vp and doe swell with so much the greater pride. They feele how diuersly in maruelous wise God worketh in them: they are taught by experience it selfe, how great variety of gifts they possesse by his liberalitie: whether they will or no, they are enforced to knowe that these are the tokens of his godhead: and yet they suppress it close within them. Truly they neede not to goe out of them selues, so that they would not in presumptuously taking vpon them selues that which is giuen from heauen, bury within the ground that which brightly giueth light to their minds to see God. But euen at this day the earth beareth many mōsterous spirites, which sticke not to abuse the whole seede of Godhead that is sown in māns nature, and to emploie it to oppresse the name of God. How detestable, I pray you, is this madness, that man finding God a hundred times in his body and his soule, should by the very same pretence of excellence deny that there is a God? They will not say, that they are by chance made different from brute beast. But they pretend a cloke of nature, whom they accompt the maker of all things, and so do conuey God away. They see that exquisite workmanship in all their members, from their mouth and their eyes euen to the nailes of their toes, and yet here also they put nature in place of God. But specially the so swift motions, the so excellent powers, the so rare gifts of the soule, do represent a diuine nature that doth not easily suffer it selfe to be hid: vnlesse the Epicureans like the Giauntes Cyclopes would bearing them selues bold vpon this hie degree outrageously make warre against God. Do the whole treasures of the heauenly wisdom so meete together, to rule a worme of five feete long: and shall the whole vniuersalitie of the world be without this prerogatiue? First to agree that there is a certaine instrumentall thing that aunswereth to all the parts of man, doth so serue nothing at all to obscure the honour of God, that it rather doth more gloriously set it out. Let Epicure aunswere me, what meeting of vndiuisible bodies, boiling the meat and drinke in man, doth dispose part into excrements and part into blood, and bringeth to passe that there is in all the members of man such an endeuoring: to do their office, euen as if so many seuerall soules did by common aduise rule one bodie.

5 But I haue not nowe to do with that stie of swine. I rather speake vnto them, that being geuen to suttelties would by croked conueyance wryth that cold saying of Aristotle, both to destroy the immortalitie of the soule, and also to take from God his right. For because there are instrumentall powers of the soule, by pretence thereof they bind the soule to the body, that it can not continue without the body & with prayses of nature they do as much as in them is, suppress the name of God. But the powers of the soule are farre from being enclosed in those exercises that serue the body. For what pertaineth it to the body, for a man to measure the skie, to gather the number of the starrs, to learne the greatnesse of one, to know what space they be distant one from an other, with what swiftnesse or slownesse they go their courses, how many degrees they decline this way or that way? I graunt in deed that there is some vse of Astrologie: but my meaning is onely to shew that in this so depe searching out of heauenly things, it is not an instrumentall measuring, but that the soule hath her offices by it self seuerall frō the body. I haue shewed one example, by which it shalbe easie for the readers to gather the rest. Truly the manifold nimbleness of the soule, by which it suruiceth both heauen & earth, ioyneth things past with things to come, kepeth in memorie things heard long before, and expresseth ech thing to it self by imagination, also the ingeniousnes by which it inuēteth things incredible, & which is the mother of so many maruelous arts, are sure tokens of diuine nature in man. Beside that, euen in sleeping it doth not onely roll and turne it selfe, but also conceiueth many thinges profitable, reasoneth of many thinges, and also prophecieth of thinges to come. What shal we in this case say, but that the signes of immortalitie that are emprinted in man, can not be blotted out? Now what reason may beare that man shalbe of diuine nature, and not acknowledge his Creator: Shall we forsoth by iudgement that is put into vs discern betweene right and wrong, and shall there be no iudge in heauen? Shall we euen in our sleepe haue abiding with vs some remnant of vnderstanding, & shall no God be waking in gouerning the world? Shall we be so compted the inuētors of so many artes and profitable thinges, that God shalbe defrauded of his praise, whereas yet experience sufficiently teacheth, that from an other and not from our selues, all that we haue, is in diuerse wise distributed amōg vs? As for that, which some do babble of the secret inspiration that geueth liuelines to the world, it is not only weake, but also vngodly. They like well that famous saying of Vergile:

*First heauen and earth, and flowing fields of seas, The shining globe of Moone, and Titans stars, Spirite feedes within, and throughout all the lims, Infused minde the whole huge masse doth moue,
And with the large bigge bodie mixe it selfe.
Thence come the kindes of men and eke of beasts,
And liues of flying foules, and monsters strange, That water beares within the marble Sea.
A frye liuelinesse and heauenlie race there is Within those sedes. &c.*

Aen. 6.

Forsoth, that the world which was created for a spectacle of the glorie of God, should be the creator of it selfe. So in an other place the same author folowing the common opinion of the Greeks and Latins, sayeth:

*Some say that bees haue parte of minie diuine, And heauenly draughts. For eke they say that God Goeth through the coasts of land, and creeks of sea, And through depe skie. And hence the flocks and herdes:
And men, and all the kindes of sauage beasts,*

Geo. 4.

Cap. 5. Of the knowledge of Ech at their birth receiue their futtle liues.

And therto are they rendered all at last,

And all resolued are retourned againe.

Ne place there is for death:but liuely they,

Flie into number of the starres aboue,

And take theyr place within the lofty skie.

Loe, what that hungry speculatiō of the vniuersall minde that geueth soule and liuelinesse to the world, auaieth to engender & nourish Godlines in the harts of men. Which doth also better appeare by the blasphemous sayings of the filthy dogge Lucretius, which are deriued from the same principle. Euen this is it, to make a shadow with God, to driue farre away the true God whom we ought to feare & worship. I graūt in deede that this may be godlily sayd, so that it proccede from a godly minde, that Nature is God: but because it is a hard & an vnproper maner of spech, forasmuch as Nature is rather an order prescribed by God: therefore in things of so great weight and to which is due a singular religiousnesse, it is hurtfull to wrap vp God confusely with the inferior course of his works. Let vs therefore remember, so oft as any man considereth his owne nature, that there is one God which so gouerneth all natures, that his will is to haue vs to looke vnto him, our faith to be directed to him, and him to be worshipped and called vppon of vs: because there is nothing more against conueniēce of reason than for vs to enioy those excellēt gifts that saouour of diuine nature in vs, and to despise the author that freely doth geue them vnto vs: Now as concerning his power, with how notable examples doth it forceable draw vs to consider it vnlesse perhaps we may be ignorant, of how great a strength it is with his only word to vphold this infinite masse of heauen and earth, with his only beck, sometime to shake the heauen with noise of thunders, to burne vp ech thing with lightnings, to set the aire on fier with lightning flames, sometime to trouble it with diuers sorts of tempests, and by and by the same God whē he list in one moment to make faire wether: to hold in the Sea as if it hanged in the aire, which with his heighth seemeth to threaten continuall destruction to the earth, sometime in horrible wise to raise it vp with outrageous violence of winds, and sometime to appease the waues & make it calme again. For prose hereof do serue all the praises of God gathered of the testamonies of nature, specially in the booke of Job & in Esay, which now of purpose I ouerpasse, because they shal els where haue an other place fitter for them, where I shall entreat of the creation of the world according to the Scriptures. Only my meaning was now to touch, that both strangers & they of the household of God haue this way of seeking God common to them both, that is, to follow these first draughts which both aboue and beneth do as in a shadow set forth a liuely image of him . And now the same power leadeth vs to consider his eternitie . For it must needs be that he from whom all things haue their beginning , is of eternall continuance, and hath his beginning, of himselfe. But now if any man enquire the cause whereby he both was once lead to create all these things, & is now moued to preferue them: we shall finde that his only goodnes was it that caused him . Yea and although this only be the cause, yet ought the same abundantly to suffice to allure vs to the loue of him, forasmuch as there is no creature (as the Prophet sayth) vpon which his mercy is not poured out. Psa. 145.

6 Also in the second sort of his works , I meane those that come to passe beside the ordinary course of nature , there doth appeare no lesse euident prooffe of his powers. For in gouerning the fellowship of men he so ordereth his prouidence, that whereas he is by innumerable means good and bountifull to all men , yet by manifest and daily tokens he declareth his fauorable kindnesse to the Godly, and his seuerity to the wicked and euell doers . For not doutfull are the punishments that he layeth vpon haynous offences : like as he doth openly shew himselfe a defendor and reuenger of innocencie, while he prospereth the life of good men with his blessing, helpeth their necessity, affwageth and comforteth their sorowes, relieueth their calamities, and by all meanes prouideth for their safety . Neither ought it any thing to deface the perpetuall rule of his iustice, that he oftentimes permitteth wicked men and euell doers for a time to reioice vnpunished : and on the other side suffereth good and innocent to be tossed with many aduersities , yea and to be oppressed with the malice and vniust dealing of the vngodly . But rather a much cōtrary consideratiō ought to enter into our mindes : that when by manifest shew of his wrath be punisheth one sinne, we should therefore thinke that he hateth all sinnes : and when he suffereth many sinnes to passe vnpunished , we should thereupon thinke that there shalbe an other iudgement to which they are differred to be then punished. Likewise howe great matter doth it minister vs to consider his mercy, while he oftentimes cesseth not to shew his vnueried bountifulnesse vpon miserable sinners in calling them home to him with more than fatherly tendernesse , vntill he haue subdued their frowardnesse with doing them good?

7 To this end, where the Prophet particularly rehearseth , how God in cases past hope, doeth sodenly and wonderfully and beside all Psa. 107

hope, succour men that are in miserie and in a maner lost, whether he defend them wandering in wildernesse from the wild beastes and at length leadeth them into the way againe, or ministreth soode to the needy and hungry, or deliuereth prisoners out of horrible dongeons and yron bandes, or bringeth men in perill of shipwrack safe into the hauens, or healeth the half dead of diseases, or scorseth the earth with heat and drienesse, or maketh it frutefull with secret watering of his grace, or aduanceth the basest of the rascall people, or throweth downe the noble Peeres from the hie degree of dignitie: by such examples shewed forth he gathereth that those things which are iudged chaunces happening by fortune, are so many testimonies of the heauently prouidēce, and specially of his fatherly kindenesse, and that therby is geuen matter of reioycing to the Godly, and the wicked and reprobate haue their mouthes stopped. But because the greater parte infected with their errors are blinde in so clere a place of beholding, therefore he crieth out that it is a gift of rare and singular wisdome, wisely to wey these works of God: by sight wherof they nothing profit that otherwise some most clere sighted. And truely how much soeuer the glorie of God doeth apparantly shine before them, yet scarcely the hundreth man is a true beholder of it. Likewise his power & wisdome are no more hid in darknesse: wherof the one, his power, doth notably appeare, when the fierce outragiousnesse of the wicked being in all mens opinion vnconquerable is beaten flat in one momēt, their arrogancie tamed, their strongest holdes rased, their weapons and armour broken in pieces, their strengthes subdued, their deuises overthrowne, and themselues fall with their owne weight, the presumptuous boldnesse, that auanced it selfe aboute the heauens is thrown downe euen to the bottome point of the earth: againe, the lowly are lifted vp out of the dust, & the needy raised from the donghill, the oppressed and afflicted are drawn out of extreme distresse, men in despaired state are restored to good hope, the vnarmed beare away the victory from the armed, few from many, the feeble from the strōg. As for his wisdome, it selfe sheweth it selfe manifestly excellent, while it disposeth every thing in fittest oportunitie, confoundeth the wisdome of the world be it neuer so pearcing, findeth out the subtile in their subtiltie, finally gouerneth all things by most conuenient order.

8 We see that it nedeth no long or laborosome demōstration, to fetch out testimonies, to serue for the glorious declaratiō and prooffe of Gods maiestie: for by these few that we haue touched it appeareth that which way soeuer a man chaunce to looke, they are so common and ready that they may be easily marked with eye, and pointed out with

with the finger. And here againe is to be noted, that we are called to the knowledge of God, not such as contented with vaine speculation, doth but flie about in the braine, but such as shalbe sound and frutefull, if it be rightly conceiued and take roote in our harts. For the Lord is declared by his powers, the force whercof because we feele within vs, and doe enioy the benefits of them, it must nedes be that we be inwardly moued much more liuely with such a knowledge, than if we shoulde imagine God to be such one, of whom we should haue no feeling. Wherby we vnderstand that this is the rightest way and fittest order to seek God, not to attempt to enter depely with presumptuous curiositie throughly to discusse his substance, which is rather to be reuerently worshipped then scrupuloufely serched: but rather to behold him in his workes, by which he maketh himselfe nere and familiar, and doth in a maner communicate himselfe vnto vs. And this the Apostle meant, when he sayd, that God is not to be sought a farre of, forasmuch as he with his most present power dwelleth within every one of vs. Wherfore Dauid, hauing before confessed his vnspeakeable greatnesse, when he descendeth to the particular reherfall of his workes, protesteth that the same will shew forth it selfe. Therefore we also ought to geue our selues vnto such a searching out of God, as may so hold our wit suspended with admiration, that it may therewithall throughly moue vs with effectuell feeling. And, as Augustine teacheth in an other place, because we are not able to cōceiue him, it behoueth vs as it were fainting vnder the burden of his greatnesse, to looke vnto his workes, that we may be refreshed with his goodnes.

9 Then such a knowledge ought not only to stirre vs vp to the worshipping of God, but also to awake vs, and raise vs to hope of the life to come. For when we consider that such examples as God sheweth both of his mercifulnesse, and of his seueritie, are but begun and not halfe full: without dout we must thinke, that herein he doth but make a shew aforehand of those things, whereof the open disclosing and full deliuerance is differred vnto an other life. On the other side, when we see that the godly are by the vngodly greued with afflictions, troubled with iniuries, oppressed with sclaunders, and vexed with despitefull dealings and reproches: contrarywise that wicked doers do flourish, prosper, and obtaine quiet with honor, yea and that vnpunished: we must by and by gather that there shalbe an other life, wherein is layd vp in store both due reuenge for wickednesse, and reward for rightuousnesse. Moreouer when we note that the faithfull are often chastised with the rodde of the Lord, we may most certainly determine that much lesse the vngodly shal escape his scourges,

For very well is that spoken of Augustin. If euery sinne should now be punished with open peine, it would be thought that nothing were reserued to the last iudgement. Again, if God should now openly punish no sinne, it would be beleued, that there were no prouidence of God. Therefore we must confesse, that in euery particular woorke of God, but principally in the vniuersall generalitie of them, the powers of God are sette forth as it were in painted tables, by which all mankinde is prouoked and allured to the knowledge of him, and from knowledge to full and perfect felicitie. But where as these his powers do in his workes most brightly appeare, yet what they principally tende vnto, of what valoure they be, and to what end we ought to weie them: this we then only attaine to vnderstand when we descende into our selues, and do consider by what meanes God doth shew forth in vs his life, wisdom, and power, and doth vse toward vs his righteousness, goodnesse, and mercifull kindnesse. For though David iustly complaineth, that the vnbeleuing do dote in folly, because they weie not the deepe counsailes of God in his gouernance of mankinde: yet that is also most true, which he saith in an other place, that the wonderfull wisdom of God in that behaife exceedeth the heares of our heade. But because this point shall hereafter in place conuenient be more largely entreated, therefore I do at this time passe it ouer.

10 But with howe great brightnes soeuer God doth in the mirror of his works shewe by representation both himselfe and his immortall kingdome: yet such is our grosse blockishnesse, that we stand dully amased at so plaine testimonies, so that they passe away from vs without profit. For, as touching the frame and most beautifull placing of the world, howe many a one is there of vs, that when he either lifteth vp his eyes to heauen, or casteth them about on the diuers countries of the earth doth direct his minde to remembrance of the creator, and doth not rather rest in beholding the workes without hauing regard of the workman. But as touching those things that daily happen beside the order of natural course, how many a one is there that doth not more thinke that men are rather whirled about and rowlled by blind vnadvisednesse of fortune, than gouerned by prouidence of God. But if at any time we be by the guiding & directiō of these things driuen to the consideration of God (as all men must needes be) yet so soone as we haue without aduisement conceiued a feeling of some Godhead, we by and by slide away to the dotages or erroneous inuentions of our flesh, and with our vanity we corrupt the pure verity of God. So herein in deede we differ one from an other, that euery man priuately by himselfe procureth to himselfe some peculiar error:

but in this point we all are most like together, that we all, not one excepted, doe depart from the one true God to monstrous trifles. To which disease not onely common and grosse wits are subiect: but also the most excellent and those that otherwise are endued with singular sharpnes of vnderstanding, are entangled with it. How largely hath the whole sect of Philosophers bewraied their owne dullnes and beaulty ignorance in this behalfe? For, to passe ouer all the rest, which are much more vnreasonably foolish, Plato himselfe the most religious & most sober of all the rest, vainly erreth in his round globe. Now what might not chance to the other, when the cheefe of them, whose parte was to geue light to the rest, do themselues so erre and stumble? Likewise where Gods gouernance of mens matters doth so plainly proue his prouidence, that it can not be denied, yet this doth no more preuail with men, than if they beleued that all things are tossed vp and down with the rash will of Fortune: so great is our inclination to vanity and error. I speake now altogether of the most excellent, and not of the common sort, whose madnes hath infinitely wandered in prophaning the truth of God.

II Heereof proceedeth that vnmeasurable sink of errors, wherewith the whole world hath bin filled and ouerflowne. For ech mannes wit is to himselfe as a maze, so that it is no maruell that euery seuerall nation was diuersly drawn into seuerall deuises, and not that only, but also that ech seuerall man had his seuerall gods by himselfe. For since that rash presumption and wantonnes was ioined to ignorance & darkenesse, there hath bin scarcely at any time any one man found, that did not forge to himselfe an idole or fansie in steede of God. Truly euen as out of a wide and large spring do issue waters, so the infinite number of Gods hath flowed out of the wit of man, while euery manouer licenciously straying, erroneously deuisseth this or that concerning God himselfe. And yet I nede not here to make a register of the superstitions, wherewith the world hath bin entangled: because both in so doing I should neuer haue end, and also though I speake not one word of them, yet by so many corruptions it sufficiently appeareth how horrible is the blindnes of mans minde. I passe ouer the rude & vnlearned people. But among the Philosophers, which enterprised with reason & learning to pearce into heauē, how shamefull is the disagreement? With the higher wytte that any of thē was endued, and filled with arte and science, with so much the more glorious coloures he seemed to paint out his opinion. All which notwithstanding, if one do narrowly looke vpon, he shall finde them to be but vanishing false coloures. The Stoickes seemed in their owne con-ceite to speake very wisely, that out of all the partes of nature may be gathered diuers names of God, and yet that God being but one is not thereby torne in sunder. As though we were not already more than enough enclined to vanity, vnlesse a manifold plenty of gods set before vs should further and more violently draw vs into errour. Also the Ægyptians mysticall science of diuinity sheweth, that they all diligently endeouored to this end, not to seeme to erre without a reason. And it is possible, that at the first sight some thing seeming probable, might deceiue the simple and ignorant: but no mortall man euer inuented any thing, wherby religiō hath not bin fowly corrupted. And this so confuse diuersity emboldned the Epicures & other grosse despisers of godlinesse, by little and little to cast of all feeling of God. For when they saw the wisest of all to striue in contrary opiniōs, they sticke not out of their disagreements, & out of the foolish or apparantly erroneous doctrine of ech of them, to gather, that men do in vaine & fondly procure torments to themselues while they serche for God, which is none at all. And this they thought that they might freely do without punishment, because it was better breiefely to deny vtterly, that there is any God, than to fayne vncertaine Gods, and so to raise vp contentions that neuer should haue ende. And to much fondly do they reason, or rather cast a mist, to hide their vngodlinesse by ignorance of men, whereby it is no reason that any thing should be taken away from God. But forasmuch as all do confesse, that there is nothing, about which both the learned and vnlearned do so much disagree, thereupon is gathered that the wittes of men are more than dull and blinde in heauēly misteries, that do so erre in seeking out of God. Some other do praise that answere of Symonides, which being demaunded of king Hieron what God was, desired to haue a dayes respite graunted him to study vpō it. And when the next day following, the king demaunded the same question, he required two daies respite, and so oftentimes doubling the number of dayes at length he answered: How much the more I consider it, so much the harder the matter seemeth vnto me. But graunting that he did wisely to suspend his sentence of so darke a matter, yet hereby appeareth, that if men be only taught by nature, they can know nothing certainly, soundly, & plainly concerning God, but only are tyed to confused principles to worship an vnknown God.

12 Now we must also hold, that all they that corrupt the pure religiō (as all they must needes do that are giuē to their owne opinion) do depart frō the one God. They will boast that their meaning is otherwise: but what they meane, or what they persuaue thēselues maketh not much to the matter, sith the holy Ghost pronoūceth, that all they are Apostates, that according to the darknes of their own minde do thrust deuils in the place of God. For this reason, Paule pronoūceth that the Ephesians were without a God, till they hadde learned by the Gospel, what it was to worship the true God. And we must not thinke this to be spoken of one nation only, for as much as he generally affirmeth in an other place, that all menne were become vaine in their imaginations, sith that in the creation of the world, the Maiestie of the Creator was disclosed vnto them. And therefore the scripture, to make place for the true and one only God, condemneeth of falsehod and lying, whatsoever godhead in old time was celebrate among the Gentiles, and leaueth no God at all, but in the moūte Sion, wher flourished the peculiar knowledge of God. Truely among the Gentiles the Samaritans in Christes time seemed to approche nighest to true godlinesse: and yet we heare it spoken by Christes owne mouth, that they knew not what they worshipped. Whervpon foloweth, that they were deceiued with vaine error. Finally although they were not all infected with grosse faultes, or fell into open idolatries, yet was there no true and approued religion that was grounded only vpon common reason. For all be it, that there were a few that were not so madde as the common people were, yet this doctrine of Paule remaineth certainly true, that the princes of this world conceiue not the wisdom of God. Now if the most excellent haue wandred in darknesse, what is to be said of the very dregges? Wherefore it is no meruayle, if the holy Ghost do refuse as bastard worshippings all formes of worshipping deuised by the will of men. Bycause in heauenly misteries opinion cōceiued by witt of men, although it do not alway brede a heape of errours, yet is alway the mother of errour. And though there come no worse of it, yet is this no small fault, at aduenture to worship an vnknown God: of which fault all they by Christes owne mouth are pronoūced guilty, that are not taught by the law what God they ought to worship. And truly the best lawmakers that euer were, proceeded no further, than to saie that religion was grounded vpon common consent. Yea and in Xenophon Socrates praised the answer of Apollo, wherin he willed that euery man should worship gods after the maner of the countrey, and the custome of his owne citie. But how came mortall men by this power, of their owne authoritie to determine that which farre surmounteth the world? or who can so reste in the decrees of the elders, or common ordinaunces of peoples, as to receaue without douting a God deliuered by mannes deuise? Euery man rather will stand to his owne iudgement, than yeld him selfe to the will of an other. Sith therefore it is to weake and feble a bonde of godlinesse, in worshipping of God to folow either a custom of a citie, or the consent of antiquitie, it remaineth that God him selfe must testifie of him selfe from heauen.

13 In vaine therefore so many lampes lightned do shine in the edifice of the world, to shew forth the glory of the creator, which do so euery way display their beames vpon vs, that yet of them selues they can not bring vs into the right way. In deede they raise vp certaine sparkles, but such as be choked vp before that they can sprede abroad any full brightnesse. Therefore the Apostle in the same place where he calleth the ages of the world images of thinges inuisible, saith further, that by faith is perceyued, that they were framed by the word of God: meaning therby that the inuisible godhead is in deede represented by such shewes, but that we haue no eyes to se the same throughly, vnles they be enlightned by the reuelation of God through faith. And Paule, where he teacheth that by the creation of the world was disclosed that which was to be knowne concerning God, doth not meane such a disclosing as may be comprehended by the wit of men: but rather sheweth, that the same procedeth no further but to make them vnexcusable. The same Paule also, although in one place he saith, that God is not to be sought afarre of, as one that dwelleth within vs: yet in an other place teacheth to what end that nere nesse auayleth. In the ages past (saith he) God suffred the nations to walke in their owne waies: yet he left not him selfe without testimonie, doing good from heauen, geuing showres and fruitfull seasons, fillyng the hartes of men with foode & gladnesse. Howsoeuer therefore the Lord be not without testimonie, while with his greate and manyfold bountyfulnessse he sweetly allureth men to the knowledge of him: yet for all that, they cesse not to folow their owne waies, that is to say, their damnable errors.

14 But although we want natural power, wherby we can not climbe vp vnto the pure and cleare knowledge of God, yet bycause the fault of our dulnesse is in our selues, therefore all colour of excuse is cutte away from vs. For we can not so pretende ignorance, but that euen our conscience doth still condemne vs of slouthfulnessse and vnthankfulnessse. It is a defense forsooth right worthy to be receiued, if man will allege that he wanted eares to heare the truth, for the publishing wherof the very dombe creatures haue lowde voicés: if man shall say that he can not see those thinges with his eyes, which the creatures without eyes do shew him: if man shall lay for his excuse the feblenessse of his wit, where all creatures without reason do instruct him:

Wher-

Wherefore sith all things do shew vs the right way, we are worthily put from all excuse of our wandering and straying out of the way. But how soeuer it is to be imputed to the fault of men, that they do by and by corrupt the seede of the knowledge of God, sown in their mindes by maruelous workmanship of nature, so that it groweth not to good & cleane fruite: yet it is most true, that we are not sufficiently instructed by that bare and simple testimony, that the creatures do honorably declare of Gods glory. For so soone as we haue taken by the beholding of the world a smale tast of the Godhead, we leauing the true God do in steade of him raise vp dreames and fantasies of our own brayne, and do conuey hither and thither from the true fountaine the praise of righteousness, wisdom, goodnesse and power. Moreouer we do so either obscure, or by ill esteeming them, depraue his daily doings, that we take away both from them their glory, and from the author his due praise.

The vj. Chapter.

That, to attaine to God the Creator, it is nedefull to haue the Scripture to be our guide and maistresse.

THerefore although that same brightnesse, which both in heauen and earth shineth in the eyes of all men, doth sufficiently take away all defence from the wickednesse of men, euen so as God, to wrap all mankind in one giltines, doth shew his diuine maiestie to all without exception as it were portrayed out in his creatures: yet is it necessary that we haue also an other & a better helpe that may rightly direct vs to the very creator of the world. Therefore not in vaine he hath added the light of his word, that thereby he mought be knowen to saluacion. And this prerogatiue he hath vouchsafed to giue to vs, whom it pleased him more nerely and more familiarly to draw together to himselfe. For because he saw the mindes of all men to be caried about with wandering and vnstedfast morion, after he had chosen the Iewes to his peculiar flocke, he compassed them in as it were with barres, that they should not wander out in vanity as other did. And not without cause he holdeth vs with the same meane in the true knowledge of himselfe. For otherwise euen they should quickly swarue away that seeme to stand stedfast in comparison of other. For as old men, or poore blind, or they whose eyes are dimme sighted, if you lay a fayre booke before them, though they perceiue that there is somewhat wrytten therin, yet can they not read two words together: but being holpé with spectacles set betwene thé & it, they begin to read distinctly: so the Scripture gathering vp toge-

Cap. 6. Of the knowvledge of ther in our minds the knowledge of God, which otherwise is but cōfused, doth remoue the mist, and plainly shew vs the true God. This therfore is a singular gift, that to the instructiō of his church god vseth not only dumme teachers, but also openeth his own holy mouth: not only publisheth that there is some God to be worshipped, but also therewithall pronounceth that he himselfe is the same God whom we ought to worship: and doth not only teache the elect to looke vpon God, but also presenteth himselfe vnto them to be looked vpon. This order hath he kept frō the beginning toward his church, beside these common instructions to giue them also his word. Which is the rightter & certainer marke to know him by. And it is not to be doubted, that Adam, Noe, Abraham and the rest of the fathers by this helpe attained to that familiar knowledge, which made them as it were seuerally different from the vnbeleuers. I speake not yet of the proper doctrine of faith, wherewith they were enlightened into the hope of eternall life. For, that they might passe from death to life, it was nedcfull for them to know God not onely to be the creator, but also the redemer: as doutlesse they obtained both by the word. For that kinde of knowledge wherby was giuen to vnderstand who is the God by whom the world was made and is gouerned, in order came before the other: and then was that other inward knowledge adioyned, which onely quickneth dead soules, whereby God is knowen not only to be the maker of the world and the only author & iudge of all things that are done, but also to be the redemer in the person of that mediator. But because I am not yet come to the fall of the world and corruption of nature, I will omit also to entreate of the remedy thereof. Therefore let the readers remember that I do not yet speake of the couenaunt whereby God hath adopted to himselfe the children of Abrahā, & of that special parte of doctrine whereby the faithfull haue alway bin peculiarly seuered from the prophane natiōs: because that doctrine was founded vpon Christ: but I speake how we ought to learne by the Scripture, that God which is the creator of the world, is by certaine markes seuerally discerned from the counterfait multitude of falsē Gods. And then the order it selfe shall conueniently bring vs to the redemer. But although we shall alleage many testimonies out of the newe Testament, & some also out of the law & the Prophets, wherein is expresse mencion made of Christ: yet they shall all tend to this end, to proue that in the scripture is disclosed vnto vs God the creator of the world, & in the Scripture is set foorth what we ought to think of him, to the end that we should not seke about the bush for an vncertain godhead.

2 But whether God were knowen to the fathers by oracles & visions, ons, or whether by the mean & ministratiō of mē he informed them of that which they should from hand to hand deliuer to their posterity: yet it is vndoubtedly true that in their harts was engrauen a stedfast certainty of doctrine, so as they might be perswaded & vnderstād, that it which they had learned came frō God. For God alwayes made vndoubted assurance for credit of his word, which farre exceeded all vncertaine opinion. At length that by cōtinuall proceeding of doctrine, the trueth suruiuing in all ages might still remaine in the worlde, the same oracles which he had left with the fathers, his pleasure was to haue as it were enrolled in publike tables. For this entent was the law published, whereunto after were added the Prophets for expositors. For though there were diuerse vses of the law, as herafter shall better appeare in place conuenient: and specially the principall purpose of Moises and all the Prophets was to teach the mannēr of recōciliation betwene God and men, for which cause also Paule calleth Christ the Ro. 10. 4 end of the law: yet, as I say once againe, beside the proper doctrine of faith and repentance which sheweth forth Christ the mediatour, the Scripture doth by certaine marks and tokens paint out the onely and true God, in that that he hath created and doth gouerne the world, to the end he should be seuerally knowen and not reckned in the false number of fained Gods. Therefore although it behoueth man earnestly to bend his eyes to consider the works of God, forasmuch as he is set as it were in this gorgeous stage to be a beholder of them: yet principally ought he to bend his eares to the word, that he may better profit thereby. And therefore it is no maruell that they which are borne in darknesse do more & more waxe hard in their amased dulnes, because very fewe of thē do giue themselues pliable to learne of the word of God, whereby to kepe them within their boundes, but they rather reioise in their own vanity. Thus thē ought we to hold, that to the end true religion may shine amōg vs, we must take our beginning at the heavenly doctrine. And that no man can haue any tast be it neuer so little of true and sound doctrine, vnlesse he haue bin scholer to the Scripture. And from hense groweth the originall of true vnderstanding, that we reuerently embrace whatsoeuer it pleaseth God therein to testifie of himselfe. For not only the perfect & in all pointes absolute faith, but also all right knowledge of God springeth from obedience. And truely in this behalfe God of his singular prouidēce hath prouided for men in and for all ages.

3 For if we consider how slippery an inclinatio mans minde hath to slide into forgetfulnes of God, how great a redines to fall in to all kinde of errors, how great a lust to forge oftentimes new & cōterfait religions, we may thereby perceiue how necessarie it was to haue the heauenly doctrine so put in writing, that it should not either perish by forgetfulness, or grow vaine by error, or be corrupted by boldnes of men. Sith therefore it is manifest that God hath alway vsed the helpe of his word, toward all those whom it pleased him at any time frutefully to instruct, because he foresaw that his image emprinted in y^e most beautiful forme of the world was not sufficiently effectuell: Therefore it behoueth vs to trauaile this straight way, if we earnestly couet to attaine to the true beholding of God. We must, I say, come to his word, wherein God is well and liuely set out by his workes, when his workes be weyed not after the peruersnesse of our owne iudgement, but according to the rule of the eternall trueth. If we swarue from that word, as I saied euen now, although we runne neuer so fast, yet we shall neuer attain to the marke, because the course of our running is out of the way. For thus we must thinke, that the brightnesse of the

26. face of God, which the Apostle calleth such as cannot be attained vnto, is vnto vs like a maze, out of which we cannot vnwrap our selues, vnlesse we be by the line of the word guided into it: so that it is much better for vs to halt in this way, than to runne neuer so fast in another. And therefore Dauid often times when he teacheth that superstitions are to be taken away out of the world, that pure religion may flourish, bringeth in God reigning: meaning by this word reigning, not the power that he hath, but the doctrine wherby he chalengeth to himselfe a lawfull gouernemēt: because errors can neuer be rooted out of the hartes of men, till the true knowledge of God be planted.

4 Therefore the same Prophete, after that he hath recited that the heauens declare the glory of God, that the firmamēt sheweth fourth the workes of his handes, that the orderly succeeding course of daies and nightes preacheth his maiestie, then descendeth to make mentiō of his word. The law of the Lord (saith he) is vndefiled, conuerting soules: the witnesse of the Lord is faithfull, geuing wisdom to little ones: the righteousnesse of the Lord are vpriight, making harts cherefull: the commandement of the Lord is bright geuing light to the eyes. For although he comprehendeth also the other vses of the law, yet in generalitie he meaneth, that forasmuch as God doth in vaine call vnto him all nations by the beholding of the heauen and earth. therefore this is the peculiar schoole of the children of God. The same meaning hath the xxix. Psalme, where the Prophet hauing preached of the terrible voice of God, which in thunder, windes, showres, whirlwindes and stormes, shaketh the earth, maketh the mountaines to tremble, and breaketh the cedre trees: in the ende at last he goeth further and saith, that his praises are song in the sanctuarie; because the vnbeleuers are deafe and heare not all the voices of God that resounde in the aire. And in like manner in an other Psalme, after that he had described the terrible waues of the Sea, he thus concludeth: Ps. 93. thy testimonies are verified, the beauty of thy temple is holynesse for euer. And out of this meaning also proceded that which Christ said to the woman of Samaria, that her nation and the rest did honor that which they knew not, and that onely the Iewes did worship the true God. For whereas the wit of man by reason of the febleness therof can by no meane attain vnto God, but being holpen and lifted vp by his holy word, it folowed of necessitie, that all men, excepte the Iewes, did wander in vanite and error, because they sought God without his word. John 4. 22.

The vij. Chapter.

By what testimonie the Scripture ought to be established, that is by the witnesse of the holy Ghost, that the authoritie therof may remaine certain. And that it is a vicked inuention to say that the credit therof doeth hang vpon the iudgement of the Church.

BV T before I go any further, it is nedefull to say somewhat of the authoritie of the Scripture, not only to prepare mens mindes to reuerence it, but also to take away all dout therof. Now, when it is a matter confessed that it is the word of God that is there sette forth, there is no man of so desperate boldnesse, vnlesse he be voide of all common sense and naturall wit of man, that dare derogate the credit of him that speaketh it. But because there are not daily oracles geuen from heauen, and the only Scriptures remaine wherin it hath pleased the Lord to preserue his truth to perpetual memorie, the same Scripture by none other meanes is of full credit among the faithfull, but in that they do beleue that it is as verely come from heauen as if they heard the liuely voice of God to speake therein. This matter in deede is right worthy both to be largely entreated of and diligently weyed. But the readers shall pardon me if herein I rather regarde what the proportion of the worke which I haue begon may beare, than what the largeness of the matter requireth. There is growen vp among the most part of men a most hurtfull error, that the Scripture hath only so much authority as by common consent of the Church is geuen vnto it: as if the eternall and inuolable trueth of God did rest vpon the pleasure of men. For so, to the great scorne of the holy Gost, they aske of vs who can assure vs that these Scriptures came from God: or who can assertaine vs that they haue conti- Obiect nued vnto our age safe and vncorrupted: who can perswade vs, that this one booke ought to be reuerently receiued, and that other to be striken out of the number of Scripture, vnles the church did appoint a certaine rule of all these things? It hangeth therfore (say they) vpon the determination of the church, both what reuerence is due to the Scripture, & what bookes are to be reckened in the canon therof. So these robbers of Gods honor, while they seeke vnder colour of the church to bring in an vnbrideled tyranny, care nothing with what absurdities they snare both themselues and other, so that they may enforce this one thing to be beleued among the simple, that the church can do all thinges. But if it be so: what shall become of the poore consciences that seeke stedfast assurance of eternall life, if all the promises that remaine thereof stand and be staied onely vpon the iudgement of men? When they receiue such answere, shall they cease to wauer and tremble? Again to what scornes of the vngodly is our faith made subiect? into how great suspicion with all men is it brought, if this be beleued that it hath but as it were a borrowed credit by the fauour of men.

2 But such bablers are well confuted euen with one word of the Apostle. He testifieth that the church is builded vpon the foundation of the Prophets and Apostles. If the doctrine of the Prophets, and Apostles be the foundation of the Church: then must it needes be, that the same doctrine stode in stedfast certaintie, before that the Church began to be. Nether can they well cauil, that although the Church take her first beginning therof, yet it remaineth doutfull what is to be sayed the writings of the Prophetes and Apostles, vnlesse the iudgement of the Church did declare it. For if the Christian Church were at the beginning builded vpon the writings of the Prophetes and preaching of the Apostles: wheresocuer that doctrine shalbe found, the allowed credite therof was surely before the Church, without which the Church it selfe had neuer bin. Therefore it is a vaine forged deuise, that the Church hath power to iudge the Scripture, so as the certaintie of the Scripture should be thought to hang vpon the will of the Church. Wherefore when the Church doth receiue the Scripture and sealeth it with her consenting testimonie, she doth not of a thing doutfull, and that otherwise should be in controuersie, make it autentike and of credit: but because she acknowledgeth it to be the trueth of her God, according to her dutie of godlinesse without delay she doth honor it. Whereas they demaünd, how shall we be perswaded that it came from God, vnlesse we resort to the decree of the Church? This is all one as if a man should aske, how shall we learne to know light from from darknesse, white from blacke, or swete from sower. For the Scripture sheweth in it selfe no lesse apparaunt sense of her trueth, than white and blacke things do of theyr colour, or swete & sower things of their tast.

3 I know that they commonly alleage the saying of Augustine, where he sayth that he would not beleue the Gospell, saue that the authority of the church moued him therto. But how vntruely & cauilously it is alleged for such a meaning, by the whole tenor of his writing it is easy to perceiue, He had to do with the Manichees, which required to be beleued without gainesaying, when they vaunted that they had the truth on their side, but proued it not. And to make their Manicheus to be beleued, they pretended the Gospell. Now Augustine asketh thē what they would do, if they did light vpon a man that would not beleue the Gospell it selfe, with what maner of perswasion they would draw him to their opiniō. Afterward he sayeth. I my self would not beleue the Gospell. &c. saue that the authority of the church moued me therto. Meaning that he himselfe, when he was a straunger fro the faith, could not otherwise be brought to embrace the Gospell for the assured trueth of God, but by this that he was ouercom with the authority of the church. And what maruell is it, if a man not yet knowing Christ, haue regarde to men? Augustine therefore doth not there teach that the faith of the godly is grounded vpon the authority of the church, nor meaneth that the certainty of the gospell doth hang therupon: but simply & only, that there should be no assurednes of the Gospell to the infidels, whereby they might be won to Christ vnlesse the cōsent of the church did driue them vnto it. And the same meaning a little before he doth plainly cōfirme in this saying. Whē I shall praise that which I beleue, & scorne that which thou beleuest, what thinkest thou mete for vs to iudge or do? but that we forsake such men as first call vs to come & know certaine truethes and after commaunde vs to beleue things vncertaine: and that we follow them that require vs first to beleue that which we are not yet able to see, that being made strōg by beleuing we may attaine to vnderstād the thing that we beleue: not men now, but God himselfe inwardly strengthening and giuing light to our minde. These are the very words of Augustine: wherby euery mā may easely gather, that the holy man had not this meaning, to hang the credite that we haue to the Scriptures vpon the will and awarment of the church, but onely to shew this, (which we our selues also do confesse to be true) that they which are not yet lightned with the spirite of God, are brought by the reuerēce of the church vnto a willingness to be taught, so as they can finde in their hartes to learne the faith of Christ by the Gospell : and that thus by this meane the authority of the church is an introduction, whereby we are prepared to beleue the Gospell. For, as we see, his minde is that the assurance of the godly be stayed vpon a far other foundation. Otherwise I do not deny but that he often presseth the Manichees with the consent of the whole church, when he seeketh to proue the same Scripture which they refused. And from hence it came, that he so reproched Faustus for that he did not yeld himselfe to the trueth of the Gospel so grounded, so stablished, so gloriously renomed, & from the very time of the Apostles by certaine successions perpetually commended. But he neuer trauaileth to this end, to teach that the authority which we acknowledge to be in the Scripture, hangeth vpon the determination or decree of men. But only this, which made much for him in the matter y^e disputed of, he bringeth forth the vniuersall iudgement of the church, wherein he had the auau^tage of his aduersaries. If any desire a fuller profe herof, let him reade his booke cōcerning the profit of beleuing. Where he shall finde that there is no other redinesse of beleife commended vnto vs by him, but that which only giueth vs an entrie; and is vnto vs a conuenient beginning to enquire, as he termeth it: & yet not that we ought to rest vpon bare opinion, but to leane to the certaine and sound trueth.

4 We ought to holde, as I before sayd, that the credit of this doctrine, is not established in vs, vntil such time as we be vndoubtedly perswaded that God is the author thereof. Therefore the principall profe of the Scripture is commonly taken of the person of God the speaker of it. The Prophetes and Apostles bo^st not of their owne sharpe wit or any such things as procure credit to men that speake: neither stand they vpon proues by reason, but they bring foorth the holy name of God, therby to cōpell the whole world to obedience. Now we haue to see how not only by probable opinion, but by apparant trueth it is euident, that in this behalfe the name of God is not without cause nor deceitfully pretended. If then we will prouide well for consciences, that they be not cōtinually caried about with vnstedfast douting, nor may wauer, nor stay at euery smale stop, this maner of persuasion must be fetched deper then from either the reasons, iudgements or the cōiectures of men, euen from the secrete testimony of the holy Ghost. True in deede it is, that if we list to worke by way of argumentes, many thinges might be alleged that may easily proue, if there be any God in heauen, that the law, the prophecies and the Gospell came from him. Yea although men learned and of depe iudgement would stand vp to the contrary, and would employ & shew foorth the whole

force of their wits in this disputation : yet if they be not so hardened as to become desperately shamelesse, they would be compelled to cōfesse, that there are seene in the Scripture manifest tokens that it is God that speaketh therein: whereby it may appeare that the doctrine therof is frō heauē. And shortly herafter we shal see, that all the books of the holy Scripture do far excel all other writings what soeuer they be. Yea if we bring thither pure eyes & vncorrupted senses, we shall soorthwith finde there the maiestie of God, which shall subdue all hardnesse of gainesaying and enforce vs to obey him. But yet they do disorderly, that by disputation trauel to establish the perfect credit of the Scripture. And truely although I am not furnished with great dexterity, nor eloquence: yet if I were to cōtend with the most suttile despisers of God, that haue a desire to shew themselues witty and pleasaūt in febling the authority of Scripture, I trust it should not be hard for me to put to silēce their babblings. And if it were profitable to spēd labour in confuting their cauillations, I would with no great busines shake in sunder the bragges that they mutter in corners. But though a man do deliuer the sound word of God from the reproches of men, yet that sufficeth not soorthwith to fasten in their hartes that assurednesse that godlines requireth. Prophane men because they thinke religion standeth only in opiniō, to the end they would beleue nothing fondly or lightly, do couet and require to haue it proued to them by reason, that Moises & the Prophetes spake from God. But I answere that the testimony of the holy Ghost is better than all reason. For as only God is a conuenient witnessse of himselfe in his owne worde, so shall the same word neuer finde credit in the hartes of men, vntill it be sealed vp with the inward witness of y^e holy Ghost. It behoueth therefore of necessity that the same holy Ghost which spak by the mouth of the Prophetes, do enter into our hartes to perswade vs that they faythfully vttered that which was by God commaunded them. And this order is very aptly set soorth by Esay in these wordes. My spirite Esay 51. which is in thee and the words that I haue put in thy mouth & in the 16. mouth of thy sede shall not faile for euer. It greueth some good men, that they haue not ready at hand some cleare profe to allege, when the wicked do without punishmēt murmure against the word of God: As though the holy Ghost were not for this cause called both a seale and a pledge, because vntill he do lighten mens mindes they do alway wauer among many doutines.

5 Let this therefore stand for a certainly perswaded truth, rhat they whom the holy Gost hath inwardly taught, do wholly rest vppon the Scripture, and that the same Scripture is to be credited for it selfe sake, and ought not to be made subiect to demonstration & reasons: but yet that the certainerie which it getteth among vs, it atteineth by the witnessse of the holy Ghost. For though by the only maiesty of it selfe it procureth reuerēce to be giuen to it: yet then only it throughly perceeth our afflictions, when it is sealed in our hartes by the holy Ghost. So being lightened by his vertue, we do then beleue, not by our owne iudgement, or other mens, that the Scripture is from God: but about all mans iudgement we hold it most certainly determined, euen as if we beheld the maiesty of God himselfe there present, that by the ministry of men it came to vs frō the very mouth of God. We seeke not for argumentes & likelihodes to rest our iudgement vpon: but as to a thing without all compasse of cōsideration, we submit our iudgement & wit vnto it. And that not in such sorte as some are wont sometime hastily to take holde of a thing vnknowen, which after being throughly perceiued displeaseth them: but because we are in our consciences well assured that we hold an inuincible trueth. Neither in such sorte, as silly men are wont to yeld their minde in thraldom to superstitions: but because we vndoutedly perceiue therein the strength & breathing of the diuine maiestie, wherewith we are drawn & stirred to obey, both wittingly and willingly, and yet more lively and effectually than mans will or witte can attaine. And therefore for good cause doth God cry out by Esay, that the Prophetes with the whole people do beare him witnessse, because being taught by prophecies they did vndoutedly beleue without guile or vncertainty that God himselfe had spoken. Such therefore is our perswasion, as requireth no reasons: such is our knowledge, as hath a right good reason to maintaine it, eue such a one, wherein the minde more assuredly & stedfastly resteth thā vpon any reasons: such is our feeling, as can not proceede but by reuelation from heauen. I speake now of none other thing but that which euery one of the faithfull doth by experiēce finde in himselfe, sauing that my words do much want of a full declaration of it. I leaue here many things vnspokē, because there wil be elsewhere againe a conuenient place to entreate of this matter. Only now let vs know, that only that is the true faith which the spirite of God doth seale in our hartes. Yea with this only reason will the sober reader and willing to learne, be contented. Esay promiseth, that al the children of the renewed church shalbe the scholers of God. A singular priuilege therein doth God vouchsaue to graunt to his elect onely, whom he seuereth from all the rest of mankinde. For what is the beginning of true doctrine, but a ready cherefulnessse to here the voice of God? But God requireth to be heard by the mouth of Moises, as it is wrytten: say not in thy harte, who shall ascend into heauen, or who shall descend into the depe? the word is euen in thine owne mouth. If it be the pleasure of God that this treasure of vnderstanding be layd vp in store for his children, it is no maruell nor vnlikely, that in the common multitude of men is seene such ignorance and dulnesse. The common multitude I call euen the most excellent of thē, vntil such time as they be grafted into the body of the church. Moreouer Esay giuing warning that the Prophets doctrine should seeme incredible not only to strangers but also to the Iewes that would be accompted of the household of God addeth this reason: because the arme of God shal not be reueled to all men. So oft therefore as the smallnesse of number of the beleuers doth trouble vs, on the other side let vs call to minde, that none can comprehend the misteries of God but they to whom it is giuen.

That so farre as mans reason may beare, there are sufficient proues to stablish the credit of Scripture.

VNlesse we haue this assurance, which is both more excellent & of more force than any iudgement of man, in vaine shall the authority of Scripturē eyther be strengthened with argumentes, or stablished with consent of the church, or confirmed with any other meanes of defence. For vnlesse this foundation be layd, it still remayneth hanging in doute. As on the other side when exempting it from the common state of thinges, we haue embraced it deuoutly and according to the worthinesse of it: then these things become very fit helps, which before were but of small force to grasse and fasten the assurance thereof in our mindes. For it is maruelous, how great establishment groweth hereof, when with earnest study we consider howe orderly and well framed a disposition of the diuine wisdom appeareth therein, how heauenly a doctrine in euery place of it, and nothing sauoring of earthlynnesse, how beautifull an agreement of all the partes among themselues, and such other thinges as auaille to procure a maiesty to wrytings. But more perfectly are our hartes confirmed when we consider, howe we are euen violently caried to an admiration of it rather with dignity of matter, than with grace of words. For this also was not done without the singular prouidence of God, that the hye misteries of the heauēly kingdom should for the most part be vttered vnder a contemptible basenes of wordes, least if it had bin beautified with more glorious speache the wicked should cauill that the onely force of eloquence doth raigne therein. But when that rough and in a maner rude simplicity doth raise vp a greater reuerence of it selfe than any Rhetoricians eloquence, what may we iudge, but that there is a more mighty strength of truth in the holy Scripture, than that it nedeth any art of wordes? Not without cause therefore the Apostle maketh his argument, to proue that the Cor. 2 faith of the Corinthians was grounded vpon the power of God and not vpon mans wisdom, because his preaching among them was set forth not with enticing spech of mans wisdom, but in plaine euidence of the spirite and of power. For the trueth is then sette free from all douting, when not vpholden by foraine aides it selfe alone suffiseth to susteine it selfe. But how this power is properly alone belonging to the Scripture, hereby appeareth, that of all the wrytinges of men, be they neuer so cunningly garnished, no one is so farre able to pearce our afflictions. Read Demosthenes or Cicero, read Plato, Aristotle, or any other of all that sorte: I graunt they shall maruelously allure, delight, moue, and rauish thee. But if from them thou come to this holy reading of Scriptures, wilt thou or not, it shall so liuely moue thy afflictions, it shall so pearce thy hart, it shall so settle within thy bones, that in cōparison of the efficacy of this feeling, all that force of Rhetoricians and Philosophers shall in manner vanish away: so that it is easie to perceiue that the Scriptures, which do far excell all gifts and graces of mans industrie: do in deede breath out a certayne diuinitie.

2 I graunt in deede, that som of the Prophets haue an elegāt cleare yea & a beautifull phrase of speche, so as their eloquence giueth not place to the prophane wryters: & by such examples it pleased the holy Ghost to shew that he wanted not eloquence, though in the rest he vsed a rude and grosse stile. But whether a man reade Dauid, Esay, and such like, who haue a swete and pleasant flowing speech, or Amos, the heardman, Hieremie and Zacharie, whose rougher talke sauoreth of countrey rudenesse: in euery one of them shall appeare that maiesty of the holy Ghost that I spake of. Yet am I not ignorāt, that as Satian is in many things a counterfaiiter of God, that with deceitfull resemblance he might the better creepe into simple mens mindes: so hath he craftily spread abroade with rude and in maner barbarous speech, those wicked errors wherewith he deceiued sely men, and hath oft times vsed discontinued phrases, that vnder such visour he might hide his deceites. But how vaine and vncleanly is that curious counterfaiiting, all men that haue but meane vnderstanding do plainly see. As for the holy Scripture, although froward men labour to bite at many thinges, yet is it full of such sentences as could not be conceiued by man. Let all the Prophetes be looked vpon, there shall not one be found among them, but he hath farre excelled all mans capacity, in such sorte that those are to be thought, to haue no iudgement of tast to whom their doctrine is vnfauorie.

3 Other men haue largely entreated of this argument, wherfore at this time it suffiseth to touch but a fewe thinges, that chiefly make for the principall summe of the whole matter. Beside these points that I haue already touched, the very antiquity of the Scripture is of great weight. For how soeuer the Greke wryters tell many fables of the Ægyptian diuinity: yet there remaineth no monument of any religion, but that is farre inferiour to the age of Moses. And Moses deuifeth not a new God, but setteth foorth the same thing which the Israelites had receiued in long proceffe of time, conueied to them by their fathers as it were from hand to hand concerning the euerlasting God. For what doth he else but labour to call them backe to the couenaut made with Abraham. If he had brought a thing neuer hearde of before, he had had no entrie to begin. But it must needs be that the deliuerance from bondage, wherein they were deteyned, was a thing well and commonly knowen among them, so that the hearing of the mention thereof did foorthwith raise vp all their mindes. It is also likely that they were informed of the number of the CCCC. yeares. Now it is to be considered, if Moses which himselfe by so long distance of time was before all other wryters, do from a beginning so long before himselfe fetch the originall deliuerance of his doctrine: how much the holy Scripture then is beyonde all other wrytinges in antiquity.

4 Vnlesse perhappesome liste to beleue the Ægyptians, that stretch their auncienty to sixe thousand yeares before the creation of the world. But sith their vaine babbling hath bin alway scorned euen of all the prophane wryters themselues, there is no cause why I should spend labour in confuting of it. But Iosephus against Ap-pion, alleageth testimonies worthy to be remembred out of auncient wryters, whereby may be gathered, that by consent of all nations the doctrine that is in the lawe hath bin famous euen from the first ages, although it were neither redde nor truely knowen. Now, that neither there should remaine to the malicious any cause of suspicion, nor to the wicked any occasion to cauill, God hath for both these daungers prouided good remedies. When Moises rehearseth what Iacob almost three hundred yeares before had by heauenly inspiration pronounced vpon his owne posterity, how doth he set foorth his owne tribe? yea in the person of Leui he spotteth it with Ge. 49. 5 eternall infamie. Symeon (sayth he) & Leui the vessels of wickednesse.

My soule come not into their counsell, nor my toug into their secret. Truly he might haue passed ouer that blot with silence, in so doing not onely to please his father, but also not to staine himselfe and his whole family with parte of the same shame. How can that wryter be suspected, which vnconstrainedly publishing by the oracle of the holy Ghost, that the principall auncestor of the family whereof himselfe descended was an abhominable doer, neither priuately provided for his owne honor, nor refused to enter in displeasure of all his owne kinsmen, whom vndoutedly this matter greued? When also he rehearseth the wicked murmuring of Aaron his owne brother, & Mary his sister: shall we say that he spake after the meaninge of the flesh, or rather that he wrote it obeying the commaundement of the holy Ghost? Moreouer sith himselfe was hyest in authority, why did he not leaue at least the office of the hye priesthode to his owne sonnes, but appointeth them to the basest place? I touche hete onely a few thinges of many. But in the law it selfe a man shall eche where mete with many argumentes that are able to bring full profe to make men beleue that Moises without all question commeth from heauen as an Angell of God.

5 Now these so many & so notable miracles that he recompteth, are euen as many establishments of the law that he deliuered, and the doctrine that he published. For, this that he was caried in a cloude vp into the mountayne: that there euen to the foretyeth day he continued without company of men: that in the very publishing of the law his face did shine as it were besette with sonnebeames: that lighteninges flashed rounde about: that thunders and noises were hearde eche where in the ayre: that a trompette sounded being not blowen with any mouth of man: that the entrie of the tabernacle by a cloude sette betweene was kept from the sight of the people: that his authority was so miraculously reuenged with the horrible destruction of Chore; Dathan and Abiron, and all that wicked faction: that the rocke striken with a rodde did byandby powre foorth a riuer: that at his prayer it rayned Manna from heauen: did not God herein commende him from heauen as an vndouted Prophet? If any man object agaynst me, that I take these thinges as confessed, which are not out of controuersie, it is easie to answer this cauillation. For seeing that Moses in open assembly published all these thinges, what place was there to fayne before those witnessses that had themselues seene the thinges done? It is likely forsooth that he would come amonge them, & rebuking the people of infidelity, stubbornes, vnthankfulnes & other sinnes, would haue boasted that his doctrine was established

6 For this is also worthy to be noted, so ofte as he telleth of any miracles, he therewithall odiously ioyneth such thinges as might stirre the whole people to crie out against him, if there had bin neuer so litle occasion. Wherby appeareth, that they were by no other meane brought to agree vnto him, but because they were euer more than sufficiently conuincd by their owne experience. But because the matter was plainlier knowen, than that the prophane coulde deny that miracles were done by Moses: the father of lyeng hath ministred them an other caullation, saying that they were done by Magicall artes and forcerie. But what likely prooffe haue they to accuse him for a forcerer, which so farre abhorred from such superstition, that he commaundeth to stone him to death, that doth but aske counsell of forcerers and soothsaiers? Truly no such deceiuer vseth his iugglinge castes, but that he studieth to amase the mindes of the people to get himselfe a fame. But what doth Moses? by this that he crieth out, that himselfe and his brother Aaron are nothing, but doth onely execute those thinges that God hath appointed, he doth sufficiently wipe away all blottes of thinking euil of him. Now if the thinges themselues be considered, what enchantement coulde bring to passe that Manna dayly raining from heauen, should suffice to feede the people? and if any man kept in store more than his iuste measure, by the very rotting therof he should be taught, that God did punish his want of beleefe? Beside that, with many great proues God suffred his seruaunt so to be tried, that now the wicked can nothing preuaile with prating against him. For how oft did sometime the people proudely and impudently make insurrections, sometime diuers of them conspiryng among them selues wente about to ouerthrow the holy seruaunt of God: how could he haue begyled their furour with illusions? And the end that folowed plainly sheweth, that by this meane his doctrine was stablished to continue to the ende of all ages.

7 Moreouer where he assigneth the chiefe gouernement to the tribe of Iuda in the persone of the Patriarch Iacob, who can denie that this was done by spirite of prophecie, specially if we wey in consideration the thing it selfe, how in commyng to passe it proued true? Imagine Moses to haue bin the first author of this prophecie: yet from the time that he did first put it in writing, there passed fower hundred yeares wherein there was no mencion of the sceptre in the tribe of Iuda. After Saule was consecrate king, it seemed that the kingdom should rest in the tribe of Benjamin. When Dauid was annointed by Samuel, what reason appeared there why the course of inheritaunce of the kingdome should be chaunged? who would haue looked that there should haue come a king out of the base house of a herdman? And when there were in the same house seuen brethren, who would haue said that that honour should light vpon the yongest? By what meane came he to hope to be a king? who can say that this annointment was gouerned by any art,trauaile or policie of man, and not rather that it was a fulfilling of the heauenly prophecie? Likewise those thinges that Moses afore speaketh, albeit darkely, concerning the Gentiles to be adopted into the conuenaunt of God, seing they came to passe almost two thousand yeres after, do they not make it plaine that he spake by the inspiration of God? I ouerskip his other tellinges aforehand of thinges, which do so euidently sauoure of the reuelation of God, that all men that haue their sounde wit may plainly perceiue that it is God that speaketh. To be shorte, that same one song of his, is a clere looking glasse, wherin God euidently appeareth.

8 But in the other prophetes the same is yet also much more plainely seene. I will choose out only a few examples, because to gather them all together were to greate a labour. When in the time of Esaie the kingdom of Iuda was in peace, yea when they thought that the Chaldees were to them some stay and defence, then did Esaie prophecie of the destruction of the citie and exile of the people. But admitte that, yet this was no token plaine enough of the instinct of God, to tell long before of such thinges as at that time seemed false, and afterward proued true: yet those prophecies that he vttereth concerning their delyueraunce, whense shall we say that they proceded but from God? He nameth Cyrus by whom the Chaldees should be subdued, and the people restored to libertie. There passed more than a hundred yeares from the time that Esaie so prophecied before that Cyrus was borne: for Cyrus was borne in the hundreth yeare or therabouts after the death of Esaie. No man could then gesse that there should be any such Cyrus, that should haue warre with the Babyloñiás, that should bring subiect so mightie a monarchie vnder his dominiõ, and make an ende of the exile of the people of Israell. Doth not this bare tellyng without any garnishment of wordes euidently shew, that the thinges that Esaie speaketh, are the vndoubted oracles of God, and not the coniectures of men? Again, when Ieremie a little before that the people was caried awaie, did determine the ende of the captiuitie within threscore and tenne yeares, and promised returne and libertie, must it not needes be that his tongue was gouerned by the spirite of God? What shamelesnesse shall it be to denie, that the credite of the prophetes was stablished by such proues, & that the same thing was fulfilled in dede, which they them selues do reporte to make their sayings to be beleued? Beholde, the former things are come to passe, and new things do I declare: before they come forth, I tell you of them. I leaue to speake how Hieremie and Ezechiell beyng so farre asonder, yet prophecying both at one time, they so agreed in all their sayings as if either one of them had endited the wordes for the other to write. What did Daniel? Doth he not write continuing prophecies of things to come for the space of sixe hundred yeares after, in such sorte as if he had compiled an historie of things already done and commonly knowen? These things if godly men haue well considered, they shall be sufficiently well furnished, to appease the bar-kings of the wicked. For the plaine prooffe hereof is to cleare to be subiect to any cauillations at all.

9 I know what some learned men do prate in corners, to shew the quicknesse of their witte in assaltynge the truth of God. For they demande, who hath assured vs that these things which are red vnder title of their names, were euer written by Moses and the prophetes. Yea, they are so hardy to moue this questiō, whether euer there were any such Moses or no. But if a manne should call in doubt whether euer there were any Plato, or Aristotle, or Cicero, who would not say, that such madnesse were worthy to be corrected with strokes and strypes? The law of Moses hath bin meruaylously preserued rather by heauenly prouidence then by diligence of men. And though by the negligence of the Priestes it laie buried a littell while: yet sins the time that the godly king Iosias found it, it hath still by continuall succession from age to age bin vsed in the handes of men. Neyther did Iosias bring it forth as an vnknown or new thing, but such a thing as had bin euer commonly published, and wherof the remembraunce was at that time famous. The originall booke it selfe was appointed to be sacredly kept in the temple, and a copie written out thereof, to remaine with the keepers of the kinges Recordes. Only this had happened, that the Priestes had ceased to publish the law according to the old accustomed maner, and the people them selues had neglected their wounted reading of it. Yea there in maner passed no age wherin the establishment therof was not confirmed and renued? They that had Dauid in their handes, knew they not of Moses? But to speake of them all at ones, it is most certaine that their writings came to posteritie none otherwise but from hand to hand (as I may terme it) by continuall orderly course of yeres deliuered from their fathers, which had partly heard them speake, & partly while the remembraunce was fresh of it, did lerne of them which herd them that they had so spoken.

10 As for that which they obiekt out of the historie of the Ma-1. Mac. 1 chabees, to minish the credite of scripture, it is such a thing as nothing can be deuised more fitte to stablish the same. But first let vs wipe away the colour that they lay vpon it, and then let vs turne vpon them selues the engine that they raise vp against vs. When Antiochus (saie 2. Mac. they) commaunded all the bookes to be bourned, whence are come 1. 59. these copies that we now haue? On the other side I aske them, in what shop they could so sone be made? It is euident, that after the crueltie appeased they were immediatly abroad again, and were without controuersy knowen to be the same of all godly men, that hauing bin brought vp in the doctrine of them did familiarly know them. Yea when all the wicked men beyng as it were conspired together, did insolently triumphe with reproches vpo the Iewes, yet neuer was there any that durst lay to their charge false changing of their bookes. For what soeuer they thinke the Iewes religion to be, yet still they thinke Moses to be the authour of it. What then do these praters els, but bewraie their owne more then doggish frowardenesse, while they falsely say that these bookes are changed, and new put in their places, whose sacred antiquitie is approued by consente of all histories? But to spende no more labour vainly in cōfuting such foolish cauillations: let vs rather hereby consider how great a care God had for the preseruation of his word, when beyonde the hope of all men, he saued it from the outrage of the most cruell tyrant, as out of a present fire: that he endewed the godly priestes and other with so great cōstancie, that they sticked not to redceme this booke euen with losse of their life if neede were, and so to conuey it ouer to posteritie: that he disappointed the narrow search of so many gouernours and souldiours.
 Who can but acknowledge the notable and miraculous woorke of God, that these sacred monumētes which the wicked verely thought to haue bin vtterly destroyed, byandby came abroad againe as fully restored, and that with a greate deale more honour. For byandby folowed the translating of them into Greke, to publish them throughout the world. And not in this only appeared the miraculous woorking, that God preserved the tables of his couenaunt from the bloody proclamations of Antiochus: but also that among so manyfold miserable afflictions of the Iewes, wherwith the whole nation was som-time worne to a fewe and wasted, and last of all, brought in maner to vtter destruction, yet they remained still safe and extant. The Hebrue tongue lay not only vnesteeded, but almost vnknowen. And surely had not bin Gods pleasure to haue his religion prouided for, it had perished altogether. For how much the Iewes that were since their retourne

retourne from exile, were swarued from the naturall vse of their mother tongue, appeareth by the Prophetes, that liued in that age, which is therefore worthy to be noted, because by this comparison the antiquitie of the law and the prophetes is the more plainly perceyued. And by whom hath God preserued for vs the doctrine of saluation conteyned in the law and the prophetes, to the end that Christ might in his appointed time be openly shewed? euen by the most cruelly bente enemies of Christ, the Iewes, whom Sainct Augustine doeth therefore woorthyly call the keepers of the Librarie of Christian Church, because they haue ministred vnto vs that thing, to reade wherof, themselues haue no vse.

11 Now if we come to the new Testament, with how sounde pillers is the trueth thereof vpholden? The three Euangelistes write the historie in base and simple speach. Manie prowde menne do loeth that simplicitie, because they take no heede to the chiefe pointes of doctrine therin, whereby it were easie to gather, that they entreate of heauenly misteries aboue mannes capacitie. Surely who so euer haue but one droppe of honest shame will be ashamed if they reade the first chapter of Luke. Now, the sermons of Christ, the summe wherof is shortly comprised by these three Euangelistes, do easely deliuer their writings from all contempte. But Ihon thundering from on hie, those whom he cōpelleth not to obedience of faith, he throweth downe their stubbournesse more mightily than any thūderbolt. Now let come forth all these sharpnosed faultfinders, that haue a great pleasure to shake the reuerence of scripture out of their owne and other mens heartes, let them reade Iohns Gospell: Will they or no, they shall there finde a thousande sentences that may at least awaken their sluggishenesse, yea that may printe a horrible brande in their consciences to restraine their lawghyng. The same is to bee thought of Peter and Paul, in whose writings although the more part be blinde, yet the very heauenly maiestie in them holdeth all men bounde, and as it were fast tied vnto it. But this one thing doth sufficiently aduance their doctrine aboue the world, that Mathew being before all geuen to the gaine of his money boorde, Peter & Iohn brought vp in their fisher boates, all grosse vnlearned men, had learned nothing in mens schoole that they might deliuer to other. Paule, not onely from a professed, but also from a cruell and blouddy ennemy conuerted to a new man, with sodaine and vnhoped change doch shew, that being compelled by heauenly authoritie he now maintaineth that doctrine, which before he had fought against. Now let these dogges denie, that the holy Ghost came downe vpon the Apostles, or let them discredit

Cap. 8. Of the knowlledge of the historie: yet still the trueth it selfe openly crieth out, that they were taught by the holy Ghost, which beyng before time despised men among the raskall people, sodeinly began so gloriously to entreate of heauenly misteries.

12 There be yet also furthermore many very good reasons, why the consente of the Church should not be esteemed without weight. For it is to be accompted no smalle matter, that sins the Scripture was first published, the willes of so many ages haue constantly agreed to obey it. And that how soeuer Sathan with all the worlde hath trauallyed by maruaylous meanes, either to oppresse it, or ouerthrow it, or vtterly to blotte and deface it out of mennes remembraunce, yet euer still like a palme tree, it hath risen vp aboue, and remained inuincible. For there hath not lightly bin in old time any sophister or Rhetorician that had any more excellēt wit than other, but he hath bente his force against this Scripture: yet they all haue nothing preuayled. The whole power of the earth hath armed it selfe to destroy it, and yet all their enterprises are vanished away, as in smoke. How coule it haue resisted being so mightyly on eche side assailed, if it hadde had none other defence but mannes? Yea rather it is hereby proued, that it came from God himselve, that all the trauailes of men striuing against it, yet it hath of her owne power still risen vp. Beside that, not one citie alone, nor one onely nation hath agreed to receiue and embrace it: but so farre as the worlde extendeth in length and breadth, the Scripture hath attained her credite, by one holy conspiracie of diuers nations, which otherwise were in nothing agreable one with another. And forasmuch as such agreement of mindes so diuers and disagreeing in maner in all thinges elles, ought much to moue vs, because it appeareth, that the same is brought about none other way, but by working of the heauenly maiestie: no small estimatiō groweth vnto it, when we beholde their godlinesse, that do so agree, I meane not of them all, but only of those, with whom as with lightes it pleased God to haue his Church to shine.

13 Now with what assurednesse of minde ought we to submitte vs to that doctrine which we see stablished and witnessed with the bloude of so many holy menne? They when they had but ones receaued it, sticket not boldely without feare, yea and with great cherefulness to die for it: how should it then come to passe, that we, hauing it conueyed to vs with such an assured pledge, should not with certaine and vnmouable persuasion take holde of it? It is therefore no small cōfirmation of the Scripture, that it hath bin sealed with the bloud of so many witnesses, specially when we consider that they suffred death to bear witness of their faith : and not of a frenzied distemperance of braine, as sometime the erroneous spirites are wont to do, but with a firme and constant and yet sobre zeale of God. There be other reasons and those not fewe nor weake, whereby the Scripture hath her dignitie and maiestie not onely ascertained vnto godly hartes, but also honourably defended against the subtilties of cauillers, yet be they such as be not of them selues sufficiently auaylable to bring stedfast credite vnto it, vntill the heauenly father disclosing therein his maiestie, doth bring the reuerence therof out of all controuersie. Wherefore then onely the scripture shall suffice to that knowledge of God that bringeth saluation, when the certaintie therof shall be grounded vpon the inwarde persuasion of the holy Ghost. So those testimonies of men that serue to confirme it shall not be vaine, if as seconde helpes of our weaknesse they follow that chiefe & hiest testimony. But they do fondly that will haue it perswaded by prooffe to the vnfaithfull, that the scripture is the worde of God, which can not be knowen but by faith. For good reason therefore doth Augustine geue warning, that godlinesse and peace of minde ought to go before, to make a man vnderstand somewhat of so greate matters.

The ix. Chapter.

That those fanaticall men, which forsaking Scripture, resort vnto reuelation, do ouerthrow all the principles of godlinesse.

NOW they that forsaking the Scripture do imagine I wote not what waie to attaine vnto God, are to be thought not so much to be holden with errour, as to be caried with rage. For there haue arisen of late certaine giddy brained men, which most presumptuously pretending a schoole of the spirite, both them selues do forsake all reading, & also do scorne their simplicitie which still follow the dead & slaying letter, as they call it. But I would faine know of these men, what spirite that is, by whose inspiration they are caried vp so hie, that they dare despise the doctrine of the Scripture as childish and base. For if they aunswere that it is the spirite of Christ, then such carelesnesse is woorthy to be laughed at. For I thinke they will graunte, that the Apostles of Christ and other faithfull in the primitiue Church were lightned with none other spirite. But none of them did learne of that spirite to despise the word of God: but rather euery one was moued more to reuerence it, as their writings do most plainly witness. And surely so was it foretold by the mouth of Esaie. For where he saith, My spirite that is vpon thee, and my wordes which I haue put in thy mouth, shall not departe out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seede for euer: he doth not binde the old people to the outwarde doctrine as though they were set to learne to spelle, but rather he teacheth, that this shall be the true and perfect felicitie of the new church vnder the reigne of Christ, that it shall no lesse be ledde by the voice of God, thā by the spirite of God. Wherby we gather, that these lewde menne with wicked sacrilege do seuer asunder those thinges that the Prophet hath ioyned with an inuiolable knotte. Moreouer, Paule beyng rauished vp into the thirde heauen, yet ceassed not to go forward in the doctrine of the law and the Prophetes, euen so as he exhorteth Timothe, a doctour of singular excellence to apply reading. And worthy is that cōmendation to be remembred, wherwith he setteth forth the Scripture, saying, that it is profitable to teach, to admonish and to reprove, that the seruantes of God may be made perfect. How diuelish a madnesse is it to faine, that the vse of Scripture is but transitorie, and lasteth but for a while, which in deede guideth the children of God euen to the last ende? Againe, I would haue them aunswere me this: whether they haue tasted of an other spirite than that, which the Lord promised to his disciples. Although they be vexed with extreme madnesse, yet I thinke they are not caried with such giddinesse, that they dare so boast. But what maner of spirite did he speake of in his promise? euen that spirite which should not speake of it selfe, but should minister and inspire into their mindes those thinges which he the Lord himselfe had taught by his worde. It is not therfore the office of the spirite which is promised vs, to faine new and vnhearde of reuelations, or to coine a new kinde of doctrine, whereby we should be led from the receiued doctrine of the Gospell, but to seale in our mindes the selfe same doctrine that is commended vnto vs by the Gospell.

2 Whereby we plainly vnderstand, that we ought right studiously to apply the reding and hearing of the Scripture, if we list to take any vse and fruite of the spirite of God. As also Peter praiseth their diligence that are hedefull to the doctrine of the Prophetes, which yet might seme to haue geuen place after the rising of the light of the Gospell. On the other side if any spirite leauing the wisdom of the word of God doth thrust vnto vs an other doctrine, that the same spirite ought righteously to be suspected of vanitie and lying. For what? when Sathan transformeth himselfe into an aungell of light, what credite shal the holy Ghost haue amōg vs, if it be not seuerally knowen by some assured marke? And truely it hath bin plainly pointed out vnto vs by the worde of the Lord, but that these miserable men do willingly couete to erre to their owne destruction, while they seeke a spirite spirite rather from them selues than from him. But (say they) it is dishonorable, that the spirite of God, whom all thinges ought to obey, should be subiect to the Scripture. As if this were a dishonour to the holy Ghost to be euery where egall and like to it selfe, to agree with it selfe in all thinges, and no where to varie. In deede if it were to be tried by the rule either of men, or of angels, or any others rule whatsoever, then it might well be thought, that it were brought into obedience, or if ye list so to terme it, into bondage. But when it is compared with it selfe, when it is considered in it selfe, who can therefore say, that there is any wrong done vnto it? But thus it is brought to triall. I graunt, but such a triall wherewith it was his owne pleasure to haue his maiestie established. It ought to content vs so soone as he entreth into vs. But lest vnder his name the spirite of Sathan should creepe in, he wil haue vs to know him by that image of him selfe, which he hath printed in the Scriptures. He is the authour of the Scriptures: he can not be diuers and vnlike him selfe. Therefore it must needs be, that he continually remaine such as he hath shewed him selfe therein. This is no dishonor vnto him, vnlesse perhappe we count it honorable to swarue and go out of kinde from himselfe.

3 Wheras they cauill that we rest vpon the letter that sleieth, herein they suffer punishment for despising of the Scripture. For it is plaine enough that Paule there contendeth against the false Apostles, which commending the law without Christ did call away the people from the benefite of the new Testament, wherin the Lord doth couenant that he will graue his law within the bowels of the faithfull, and write it in their hartes. The letter therefore is dead, and the law of the Lord killeth the readers of it, when it is seuered from the grace of Christ, and not touching the heart, only soundeth in the eares. But if it be effectually printed in our hartes by the holy Ghost, if it present Christ vnto vs: then is it the worde of life, conuerting soules, geuing wisdom to little ones. &c. Also in the same place the Apostle calleth his preaching the ministerie of the holy Ghost: meaning that the holy Ghost doth so sticke fast in his truth which he hath expressed in the Scriptures, that then only he putteth forth and displaieth his force, when the Scripture hath her due reuerence and dignitie. And it disagreeeth not herewith which I before said, that the worde it selfe is not much assured vnto vs, vnlesse it be confirmed by y^e vitnesse of the holy Ghost. For with a certaine mutuall knot the Lord hath coupled together the assurance of his worde and of his spirite, so that perfect reuerence to the word doth then settle in our mindes whē the holy Ghost shineth vpon vs to make vs therein beholde the face of God: and on the other side without all feare of being deceiued we do embrace y^e holy Ghost when we reknowledge him in his owne image, that is in his worde. Thus it is vndoubtedly: God brought not abrode his worde among me for a sodeine shew, meaning at the coming of his spirite by and by to take it away again, but he after sent the same spirite with whose power he had distributed his worde, to make an ende of his worke with effectual confirmation of his worde. In this sorte Christ opened the mindes of the two disciples, not that they should cast away the Scriptures and vaxe wise of themselues, but that they should vnderstand the Scriptures. Likewise Paule when he exhørteth the Thessalonians not to extinguish the spirite, doth not cary them vpon hie to vaine speculations without the worde, but by and by faith further, that prophecies are not to be despised: wherby without dout is meant, that the light of the spirite is choked vp so sone as prophecies come to be despised. What say these proudly swelling men, rauished with the spirite, to these thinges, which reckon this only to be an excellent illumination, when carelessly forsaking and saying farewell to the word of God, they both boldly and rashly do take holde of all that they haue conceiued in their sleepe. Truely a farre other sobrietie becometh the children of God: which as they see that without the spirite of God they are voide of all light of trueth, so do they know that the worde is the instrument wherwith the Lord distributeth to the faithfull the light of his spirite. For they know none other spirite but that which dwelte and spake in the Apostles, by whose oracles they are continually called to the hearing of the worde.

The x. Chapter.

That the Scripture, to correct all supersticion, doth in comparison set the true God against all the gods of the Gentiles, reckening him for none of them.

BVt because we haue shewed, that the knowledge of God which in the frame of the world and all the creatures is somewhat plainely set forth, is yet more familiarly and plainely declared in the worde: now is it good to consider, whether the Lord shew himselfe such in the Scripture as it pleased him first to be represented in his workes. But I shall at this time be contented onely to point vnto it, wherby the godly mindes being admonished may know what is chiefly to be searched in the Scriptures concerning God, and be directed to one certaine marke in their seking. I do not yet touch the peculiar conuenaūte, wherby God seuered the stocke of Abraham from other nations. For euen then he appeared the redemer in recey-

uing to his children by free adopcion those that before were enemies. But we are yet about that knowledge that resteth in the creatiō of the worlde and ascendeth not to Christ the mediatur. And although byandby it shalbe good to allege certaine places out of the new Testament, forasmuch as euen out of it both the power of God the Creator and his prouidence in preferuing of the first nature is approued, yet I warne the readers before, what is now my purpose to do, to the ende that they passe not the appointed boundes. So for this present, let it suffice vs to learne, how God the maker of heauen and earth doth gouerne the worlde by him created. Euery where is renowned both his fatherly bountie and enclined will to do good; and there are also exemples rehearsed of his seueritie, which shew him to be a righteous punisher of wicked doinges, specially where his sufferaunce nothing preuaileth with the obstinate.

2 In certaine places are set forth more plaine descriptions wherin his naturall face is as in an image represented to be seen. For in the place wher Moses describeth it, it semeth that his meaning was shortly to comprehend all that was lawfull for men to vnderstand of God. The Lord (sayeth he) the Lord, a mercifull God, and gracious, patiente and of much mercy, and true, which keepest mercy, vnto thousandes which takest away iniquitie and wicked doinges, before whom the innocente shall not be innocent, which rendrest the wickednesse of the fathers to the children and childrens children. Where let vs marke, that his eternitie & being of himselfe is expressed in the twise repeting of that honorable name: and that then his vertues are rehearsed, in which is described vnto vs, not what he is in respect to himselfe, but what a one he is towarde vs: that this knowledge of him may rather stand in a liuely feling, than in an empty and supernaturall speculation. And here we do heare recited those vertues of his which we noted to shine in the heauen and earth, that is to say, clemencie, bountie, mercie, iustice, iudgement and trueth. For might and power are contained vnder this name Elohim God. With the same names of addition do the Prophetes set him forth when they meane fully to paint out his holy name. But, because I would not heape vp to many examples together, at this present let one Psalmie suffice vs, wherin the summe of all his vertues is so exactly reckened vp, that nothing can seeme to be omitted. And yet is nothing there reharfed, but that which we may beholde in his creatures. So plainly do we perceiue God by informacion of experiēce, to be such as he declareth himselfe in his worde. In Ieremie where he pronounceth, what a one he would haue vs know him to be, he setteth forth a description not altogether

so full, but yet comming all to one effect. He that gloryeth, saith he, let him glory in this that he knoweth me to be the Lord that do mercie, iustice, and iudgement on the earth. Surely these three things are very necessary for vs to know: mercie, in which alone consisteth all our saluacion: Iudgement, which is dayly executed vpon euill doers, and more greuous is prepared for them to eternall destruction: Iustice, wherby the faithful are preserued and most tenderly cherished. Which things when thou hast conceiued, the prophecy saith thou hast sufficiently enough wherof thou maiest glory in God. And yet here are not omitted either his trueth or his power, or his holinesse or goodnesse. For how should the knowledge stand sure which is here required of his iustice, mercie and iudgement, vnlesse it did rest vpon his vn-mouable trueth? And how should we beleue that he doeth gouerne the earth with iustice & iudgement, but vnderstanding his power? And whence cometh his mercie but of his goodnesse? If then all his waies be mercie, iudgement and iustice, in them must holinesse also nedes be seen. And to none other end is directed that knowledge of God that is set forth vnto vs in the Scriptures, thã is that knowledge also which appeareth emprinted in his creatures, that is to say: it first moueth vs to the feare of God, and then to put confidence in him, to the ende we may learne first to honor him with perfect innocency of life and vn-fained obedience, and then to hang altogether vpon his goodnesse.

3 But here I meane to gather a summe of generall doctrine. And first let the readers note, that the Scripture to the ende to direct vs to the true God, doth expressly exclude and cast away all the gods of the Gentiles, because commonly in a manner in all ages religiõ hath bin corrupted. True it is in deede that the name of one God was euey where knowen and renomed. For euen they that worshipped a great number of gods, so oft as they did speake according to the proper sense of nature, they simply vsed the singular name of God as if they were contented with one God alone. And this was wisely marked by Iustine the Martyr, which for this purpose made a booke of the Monarchie of God, where by many testimonies he sheweth that this, that there is but one God, was engrauen in the hartes of all mē. The same thing also doth Tertulliane proue by the common phrase of speech. But forasmuch as all without exception are by their owne vanitie either drawen or fallen to false forged deuises, and so their senses are become vaine, therefore all that euer they naturally vnderstode of the being but one God, auailed no further but to make them inexcusable. For euen the wisest of them do plainely shew the wandering error of their minde, when they wish some god to assist them, and so in their prayers do call vpon vncertaine gods. Moreouer in this that they imagined God to haue many natures although they thought somewhat lesse absurdely than the rude people did of Iupiter, Mercury, Venus, Minerua and other: yet were they not free from the deceites of Satan, and as we haue already sayed els where, whatsoeuer wayes of escape the Philosophers haue suttelly inuented, they cannot purge themselues of rebellion but that they all haue corrupted the trueth of God. For this reason, Habacuc after he had condemned all idoles bid- Hab. 2. deth to seke God in his owne temple, that the faithfull should not admit him to be any other than such as he had disclosed him selfe by his worde.

The xj. Chapter.

That it is vnlawfull to attribute vnto God a visibler forme, and that generally they forsake God, so many as do erect to them selues any images.

BVt as the Scripture prouiding for the rude and grosse wit of mā vseth to speake after the common maner: so when it meaneth to make seuerally knowne the true God from the false gods, it chiefly compareth him with idoles: not that it doth allow these inuentions that are more suttelly and finely taught by the Philosophers, but the plainlier to disclose the foolishnesse of the world, yea rather their madnesse in seking God so long as they cleaue euery one to their owne imaginations. Therefore that exclusiue definition which we commonly heare, bringeth to nought all that maner of Godhead that men frame to themselues by their owne opinion, because God himselfe is the onely conueniente witnesse of himselfe. In the meane time, sith this brutish grossenesse hath possessed the whole world, to couet visible shapes of God, and so to forge themselues Gods of timber, stone, golde, siluer, & other dead and corruptible matter, we ought to holde this principle, that with wicked falshod the glorie of God is corrupted so oft as any shape is fained to represent him. Therefore God in the law, after he had once chalenged the glorie of his deitie to himselfe alone, meaning to teache vs what maner of worshipping him he alloweth or refuseth, addeth immediatly: Thou shalt make thee Exo. 35 no grauen image, nor any similitude, in which woordes he restraineth 4.
our libertie, that we attempt not to represent him with any visible image. And there he shortly reckneth vp all the formes wherwith of long time before, supersticiō had begon to turne his trueth into lying. For we know that the Persians worshipped the sonne, yea and so many starres as the foolish natiōs saw in the skie, so many goddes they fained them. And scarce was there any living creature which was not among the Egyptians a figure of God. But the Grecians were thought to be wiser than the rest, because they worshipped God in the shape of a manne. But God compareth not images one with an other, as though one were more and an other lesse mete to be vsed, but without any exception he reiecteth all images, pictures and other signes, wherby the superstitious thought to haue God nere vnto them.

2 This is easy to be gathered by the reasons which he ioyneth to the prohibition. First with Moses. Remember that the Lord hath spoken to thee in the vale of Horeb. Thou heardest a voice, but thou sawest no body. Therefore take hede to thy selfe, least peradventure thou be deceiued and make to thy selfe any likenesse. &c. We see how openly God setteth his voice against all counterfaiete shapes, that we may know that they forsake God whosoever do couet to haue visible formes of him. Of the Prophetes onely Esay shalbe enough which speaketh oft and much hereof, to teache that the maiestie of God is defiled with vncomely and foolish conterfaiting, whē he being without body is likened to bodily matter: being inuisible, to a visible image: being a spirite, to a thing without life: being incomprehensible, to a small lompe of timber, stone or golde. In like manner reasoneth Paule: For asmuch as we are the generacion of God, we ought not to thinke that the godhead is like vnto golde, or siluer or stone grauen by art and the inuention of man. Wherby it certainly appeareth, whatsoeuer images are erected or pictures painted to expresse the shape of God, they simply displease him as certaine dishonors of his maiestie. And what maruel is it if the holy Ghost do thonder out these oracles from heauen, sith he compelleth the very wretched and blinde idolaters themselues to confesse this in earth? It is knowen how Seneca complained as it is to reade in Augustine. They dedicate (saith he) the holy immortal and inuiolable Gods in most vile and base stufte, and put vpon them the shapes of men & beastes, and some of them with kinde of man and woman mingled together, and with sondryshapen bodies, and such they call Gods which if they should receiue breth and mete them would be reckened monsters. Wherby againe plainly appeareth, that it is a fonde cauillacion wherewith the defenders of images seke to escape, which say that the Iewes were forbidden images, because they were inclinable to superstitiō. As though that thing pertained to one nation onely which God bringeth forth of his eternall being and the continuall order of nature. And Paule spake not to the Iewes but to the Athenienses when he confuted their error in conterfaiting a shape of God.

3 God in dede, I graunt, sometime in certaine signes hath geuen a presence of his godhead, so as he was sayed to be beholden face to face, but al these signes that euer he shewed did aptly serue for meanes to teache, and withall did plainly admonish men of an incomprehensible essence. For the cloude and smoke and flame, although they were tokens of the heauenly glory, yet did they as it were bridle and restraine the mindes of men that they should not attempt to passe any further. Wherfore not Moses himselfe, to whom God disclosed himselfe most familiarly in comparison of other, obtained by prayer to see that face, but receyued this answere that man is not able to susteine so great brightnesse. The holy Ghost appeared vnder the likenesse of a doue, but sith he immediatly vanished away, who doeth not see that by that token of so short a continuance of a moment the faithfull are put in minde that they ought to beleue him to be an inuisible spirite, that holding them contented with his vertue and grace, they should make him no outward shape. This, that God appeared sometimes in forme of a mā, was a foreshewing of the reueling that was to be made of him in Christ. And therefore it was not lawfull for the Iewes to abuse this pretense to erect to themselues a representaciō of the godhead in the shape of man. Also the mercy seate wherin God shewed forth the presence of his power in the time of the law, was so made as it might teach that the best beholding of the godhead is this, when mens mindes are caried beyond them selues with administration of it.
 For the Cherubins with their winges stretched abrode did couer it, the veile did hide it, and the place it selfe being set faire inwarde did of it selfe sufficiētly kepe it secrete. Therefore it is very plaine that they be very mad that go about to defende the images of God & of Saintes with the example of these Cherubins. For, I pray you, what meant these litle images, but to shew that images are not mete to represent the misteries of God? forasmuch as they were made for this purpose, that hiding the mercy seate with their winges they should not onely kepe backe the eyes of man, but also all his senses from the beholding of God, and so to correct his rash hardinesse. For this purpose maketh it that the Prophetes described the Seraphins shewed thē in visiō, with their face vncouered: wherby they signifie, that so great is the bright-nesse of the glory of God that the Angels themselues are kept from direct beholding it, and the small sparkes therof that shine in the Angels are withdrawn from our eyes. Although yet so many as rightly iudge, do acknowledge that the Cherubins of whom we now speake, pertained only to the old maner of introduction as it were of children vsed in the law. So to draw them now for an example to our age, is an absurditie. For that childish age, as I may so terme it, is passed, for the which such rudimentes were appointed. And it is much shame, that the painime writers are better expounders of the law of God than the Papistes are. Iuuenale reprocheth the Iewes as it were in scorne that they honor the white cloudes & the deitie of the heauen. I graunt he speaketh peruerfly and wickedly: & yet he speaketh more truely in saying that they haue among them no image of God, than the Papistes do which prate that they had a visible image of God. And wheras that people with a certaine hote hastinesse, brake out oftentimes to seke them idols, euen as waters out of a great fresh spring boile out with violent force: hereby rather let vs learne how great is the inclination of our nature to idolatry, least throwing vpon the Iewes the blame of that fault which is common to all, we slepe a deadly slepe vnder vaine allurementes to sinne.

4 To the same purpose serueth this saying. The idols of the Gentiles are golde and siluer, euen the workes of mens handes. Because the Prophete doth gather of the stufte it selfe, that they are no gods that haue a golden or siluer image: and he taketh it for cōfessed truth, that it is a foolish fained inuencion whatsoeuer we cōceiue of our owne sense concerning God. He nameth rather gold and siluer than clay or stone, that the beautie or the price should not serue to bring a reuerence to idols. But he cōcludeth generally that nothing is lesse allowable, than gods to be made of dead stufte. And in the meane while he standeth as much vpon this point, that men are caried away with to mad a rashnesse, which themselues bearing about with them but a borrowed breath, ready to vanish away at euery moment, yet dare geue the honor of God to idols. Man must nedes confesse that himselfe is but a creature of a daies continuance, and yet he will haue a pece of metall to be compted God to which himselfe gaue the beginning to be a God. For whense came the beginning of idols but from the will of men? Very iustly doeth the heathen Poet geue them this taunt:

m. 1.
.8.
*I was sometime a fig tree log, a blocke that serud for nought:
The workeman doubted what of me were fittest to be wrought:
A fourme to sit vpon, or els a Priap God to be.
At length he thought the better was a God to make of me.*

Forsooth an earthly silly man that breatheth out his owne life in maner euery moment, by his workmanship shall conuey the name & honor of God to a dead stocke. But forasmuch as Epicure in scoffingly iesting hath cared for no religion, let vs leaue the tauntes of him & such as he is, and let the rebuking of the Prophete pricke vs or rather thrust thrust vs through where he sayeth, nat they are to much beastly wited that with one selfe peece of wood do make a fier & warme themselves, do heate the ouen to bake bread, do rost or seeth flesh, and do make thē a God before which they fall down humbly to pray. Therefore in an other place he doth not onely accuse them by the law, but also doth reproch them that they haue not learned of the foundations of the earth: for that there is nothing lesse conuenient than to bring God to the measure of siue foote which is aboue all measure and incōprehensible. And yet this same monstrous thing which manifestly repugneth against the order of nature, custome sheweth to be natural to men. We must moreouer holde in minde, that superstitions are in Scripture commonly rebuked in this phrase of speech, that they are the workes of mens hand which want the authority of God: that this may be certaine, that all these manners of worshipping that men do deuise of themselues are detestable. The Prophet in the Psalme doth amplifie the madnesse of them that therefore are endued with vnderstanding, that they should know that all thinges are moued with the only power of God, and yet they pray for helpe to thinges dead and senselesse. But because the corruption of nature carieth as well all nations, as eche man priuately to so great madnesse, at last the holy Ghost thundreth with terrible curse against them saying: let thē that make them become like to them and so many as trust in them. And it is to be noted that a similitude is no lesse forbidden than a grauen image, whereby the fond suttelty of the Greekes is confuted. For they thinke they are well discharged if they graue not a God; while in painting they do more licentiously outrage than any other nations. But the Lord forbiddeth an image not only to be made by the grauer but also to be counterfaited by any other workeman, because such counterfaiting is euill and to the dishonor of his maiesty.

Ha. 2. 18

5 I know that it is a saying more than common among the people, that images are lay mens bookes. Gregory so sayd, but the spirite of God pronounceth farre otherwise, in whose schoole if Gregory had bin taught, he would neuer so haue spoken. For whereas Hieremy plainly sayeth that the stocke is a doctrine of vanity: and whereas Habacuc teacheth that the molten image is a teacher of lyes: surely hereof is a generall doctrine to be gathered, that it is vaine and lying whatsoeuer men learne by images concerning God. If any man take exception, and say that the Prophetes reprove them only which abused images to wicked superstition: I graunt that to be true. But I adde further that which is easie for all men to see, that they condemne that thing wholly which the Papistes take for an assured principle, that images are in stede of bookes. For they do in comparison set images against God as thinges directly contrary & such as neuer can agree together. This comparison I say is made in those places which I haue alleged. Sith there is but one true God whom the Iewes did worship, it is amisse & falsely don to forge visible shapes to represent God and men are miserably deceiued, that thereby seeke for knowledge of God. Finally if it were not true that it is a deceitfull & corrupt knowledge of God that is learned by images, the Prophetes would not so generally condemne it. At least thus much I winne of them when we shew that it is vanity & lying that men do attempt to represent God with images, we do nothing but rehearse word for word that which the Prophetes haue taught.

6 Let be red what Lactantius and Eusebius haue wrytten of this matter which sticke not to take it for certaine that they were all mortall of whom images are to be seene. Likewise Augustine: which without douting pronounceth that it is vnlawfull not onely to worship images, but also to sette vppe images to God. And yet sayeth he none other thing but the same which many yeares before was decreed by the Elibertine councell whereof this is the xxxvi. Chapter. It is ordained that no pictures be had in the church, that the thing which is honored and worshipped be not painted on the wales. But most notable is that which in an other place Augustine allegeth out of Varro, and confirmeth it with his owne assent, that they which first brought in the images of Gods, both tooke away the feare of God, and brought in error. If Varro alone should say this, peradventure it should be but of smale authority. Yet ought it of right to make vs ashamed that a heathen man groping in darkenesse came to this light, to see that bodily images are therefore vnmete for the maiesty of God, because they diminish the feare of God and encrease error in men. The prooffe it selfe witnesseth that this was no lesse truly than wisely spoken. But Augustine hauing borrowed it of Varro, bringeth it foorth as of his own minde. And first he admonisheth, that the first errors wherwith men were entangled concerning God, beganne not of images, but as with newe matter added encreased by them. Secondly he expoundeth that the feare of God is therefore diminished or rather taken away therby, because his maiesty may easely in the foolishnesse and in the fond and absurde forging of images grow to contépt. Which second thing I would to God we did not by proufe find to be so true. Whosoever therefore wil couet to be rightly taught, let him elsewhere learne than of images, what is mete to be knowen concerning God.

7 Wherefore if the Papistes haue any shame, let them no more vse this shift to say that images are lay mens bookes, which by many testimonies of Scripture are so openly confuted. And although I graunt the so much, yet should they not much get therby for defense of their idols. What monsters they thrust in, in the place of God, is well known. The pictures and images that they dedicate to Sainctes, what are they but examples of extreme riot and vnclennesse, whereunto if any would fashiõ himse, he were worthy to be beatẽ with stauces? Surely the brothelhouses, can shew harlots more chastly and soberly attyred, thã their temples shew images of these whom they would haue called virgins. Euen as vncomly array giue they to the martirs. Let them therefore fashiõ their idols at least to some honest shew of shamefastnes, that they may somewhat more colourably lye in saying, that they are the books of some holinesse. But if it were so, yet then would we answer, that this is not the right way to teach the faithfull people in holy places, whom God would haue there instructed with farre other doctrine than with these trifles. God commaunded in the churches a common doctrine to be set forth to all men in preaching of his word and in his holy misteries: whereunto they shew them selues to haue a minde not very hede full, that cast their eyes about to behold images. But whom do the Papistes call lay and vnlearned men whole vnskillfulnesse may beare to be taught only by images? forsooth euen those whom the Lord knowledgeth for his disciples, to whom he voucheth to reuele the heauely wisdom, whom he willeth to be instructed with the holsome misteries of his kingdom. I graunt in dede as the matter standeth that there are at this day many which cannot be without such boks. But whense I pray you groweth that dulnesse but that they are defrauded of that doctrine which only was mete to instruct them with? For it is for no other cause that they which had the cure of churches gaue over their office of teaching to idols, but because the selues were dumme. Paul testifieth that Christ is in the true preaching of the Gospell, painted out and in a maner crucified before our eyes. Gal. 3.1. To what purpose then were it to haue commonly set vp in churches so many crosses of wood, stone, siluer & gold, if this were wel & faithfully beatẽ into the peoples heads, that Christ died to beare our curse vpon the crosse, to cleanse our sinnes with the Sacrifice of his body, and to wash them away with his bloud, and finally to reconcile vs to God the father? Of which one thing they might learne more than of a thousand crosses of wood or stone. For parhaps the couetous do set their mindes & eyes faster vpon the golden and siluer crosses than vpon any wordes of God.

8 As concerning the beginning of idols, that is by common consent thought to be true which is wrytten in the booke of wisdom, that they were the first authors of them, which gaue this honor to the deade, superstitiously to worship their memory. And truly I graūt that this euil custome was very auncient, & I deny not that it was the fierbrād wherwith the rage of men being kindled to idolatry did more and more burne therein. Yet do I not graunt that this was the first original of this mischiefe. For it appereth by Moyses that images were vsed before that this curiosity in dedicating the images of dead men, wherof the prophane wryters make often mention, were come in v̄re.

Gen. 31. When he telleth that Rachell had stolē her fathers idols, he speaketh it as of a common fault. Whereby we may gather that the wit of man is, as I may so call it, a continuall worship of idols. After the generall floud, there was as it were a new regeneration of the world, and yet there passed not many yeares but that men according to their owne lust fained them Gods. And it is likely that the holy Patriarch yet liuing, his childrens children were giuen to idolatry, so that to his bitter grieffe he saw the earth defiled with idols, whose corruptions the Lord had but late purged with so horrible iudgement. For Thare and Nachor euē before the birth of Abraham were worshippers of false Gods, as Iosue testifieth. Seeing the generation of Sēm so soone swarued, what shall we iudge of the posterity of Cham, who were already cursed in their father? The minde of men, as it is full of pride and rash boldnesse, presumeth to imagine God according to her owne conceit: and as it is possessed with dullnesse, yea ouerwhelmed with grosse ignorance, so it cōceiueth vanity and a fond fantasie in stede of God.

And to these euils is added a new mischiefe, that man attempteth to expresse in workmanship such a God as he inwardly conceiueth. Thus the minde begetteth the idole, and the hand bringeth it forth. The example of the Israelites proueth that this was the beginning of idolatry, that men do not beleue that God is among them, vnlesse he shew himselfe carnally present. We know not (sayd they) what is become of this Moses: make vs Gods that may go before vs. They knew that there was a God whose power they had had experience of in so many miracles: but they did not beleue that he was nie vnto the vnlesse they did see with their eyes a corporall representation of his face, to be a witnessse vnto them of the God that gouerned the. Their minde was therefore to know by the image going before them, that God was the guide of their iourney. This thing daily experience teacheth, that the flesh is alway vnquiet till it hath gotten some counterfaite deuise like it selfe, wherein it may vainly delite as in an image of God. In a manner in all ages since the creation of the world, men to obey this blinde desire haue erected signes wherein they imagined God to be present before theyr carnall eyes.

9 After such inuention forged, byandby followeth worshipping. For whē men thought that they beheld God in images, they did also worship him in them. At length being both with mindes and eyes altogether fastened theron, they beganneto waxe more and more brutish, and to wonder at them and haue them in admiration, as if there were some nature of godhead in them. So appeareth that men brake not out into the worshipping of images, till they were perswaded in some grosse opinion: not to thinke the images to be Gods, but to imagine that there did a certaine force of Godheade abide in them. Therefore whether thou represent to thy selfe either God or a creature in the image, when thou fallest downe to worship, thou art already bewitched with some superstition. For this reason the Lord hath forbidden not onely images to be erected that are made to expresse a like nesse of him, but also any titles or stones to be dedicated, that should stand to be worshipped. And for the same reason also in the cōmaundement of the law, this other point is added concerning worshipping. For so soone as they haue forged a visible forme for God, they also tye the power of God vnto it; So beaulty foolish are men, that there they fasten God where they counterfaite him, and therefore must they needes worship it. Neither is there any difference whether they simply worship the idole, or God in the idole. This is alway idolatry when honoures due to God are giuen to an idole, vnder what colour soeuer it be. And because God will not be worshipped superstitiously, therefore whatsoeuer is giuen to idols is taken from him. Lette them take heede hereunto that seeke for pretenses to defende the abhominable idolatry, wherewith, these many ages past, true religion hath bin drowned and ouerthrowen. But (say they) the images are not taken for Gods. Neither were the Iewes themselues so vnaduised to forgette that it was God by whose hande they hadde bin brought out of Ægypt before they made the calfe. Yea when Aaron sayd, that those were the Gods by whom they were deliuered out of the land of Ægypt, they boldly assented, shewing a plaine tokē of their meaning, that they would still kepe that God that was their deliuerer, so that they might se him go before them in the calfe. Neither is it to be beleued that the heathē were so grosse as to beleue, that God was no other thing but stocks and stones. For they changed their images at their pleasure, but still they kept the same Gods in their minde: & there were many images of one God, and yet they did not according to the multitude of images faine them many God. Beside that they did daily cōsecrat new images, yet did they not thinke that they made new Gods. Lette the excuses be read which Augustine sayeth were pretended by the Idolaters of his age. When they were rebuked, the common sorte answered, that they did not worshippe that visible thing, but the deity that did in it inuisibly dwell. And they that were of somewhat better religiō, as he calleth it, did say that they did neither worshippe the image nor the spirite in it, but by the corporall image they did behold the signe of that thing which they ought to worship. How then? All idolaters, whether they were of the Iewes, or of the gentiles, were none otherwise minded than as I haue sayd: being not contēted with a spirituall vnderstanding of God, they thought by the images he should be more sure & nerer imprinted in thē. After once that such disordered counterfairing of God well liked them, they neuer ended, till daily more and more deluded with new deceites they imagined that God did shew foorth his power in images. And neuerthelesse, both the Iewes were perswaded that vnder such images they did worshippe the one true Lord of heauen and earth: and likewise the gentiles, their false Gods, whom yet they fayned to dwell in heauen.

10 Whosoever deny that it hath thus bin done in time past, yea within our owne remembraunce, they impudently lye. For, why fall they down before them? And when they pray, why turne they toward them as to the eares of God? For it is true that Augustine sayeth, that noman prayeth or worshippingeth when he so beholdeth an image but he is so affected in minde that he thinketh himselfe to be heard of it, or that it wil do for him what he desireth. Why is there such differēce betwene the images of one God, that passing by one image with litle reuerence or none done to it they honor an other solemnly? Why do they wery themselues with vowed pilgremages to visite those images whereof they haue like at home? Why do they at this day in defense of them as it were for their religion and countrey, fight to slaughter & destructiō, in such sorte as they would better suffer to haue the one only God than their idols to be taken from them? And yet I do not reckon vp the grosse errors of the cōmon people, which are almost infinite, & do in maner possesse the hartes of all men. I do only shewe what themselues do confesse when they meane most of all to excuse themselues of idolatry. We do not call them (say they) our Gods. No more did the Iewes nor the Gentiles call them theirs in time past: & yet the Prophetes ech where cesse not to cast in their teeth their fornication with stockes and stones, for doing no more but such things as are daily done by them that would be compted Christiāns, that is to say, that they carnally worshipped God in stocks and stones.

11 Although I am not ignoraunt, nor thinke good to passe it o-uer as if I knewe it not, how they seeke to escape with a more suttle distinction, wherof I shall againe make mention more at large her-after. For they pretend that the worship which they giue to images is Idolodulia which is seruice of images, and not Idololatria which is worship of images. For so they rearme it when they teach that they may lawfully without any wrong done to God giue vnto images and pictures that worshipp which they call Doulia or seruice. And so they thinke themselues without blame if they be but the seruaunts & not also the worshippers of idols: as though it were not a litle lighter matter to worship than to serue. And yet while they seeke a hole to hide them in the Greeke word, they childishly disagree with themsel-ues, For seeing Latreuein in greeke signifieth nothing but to worship, their saying commeth but to this effect, as if they would say that they worship in dede their images, but without any worshipping. And ther is no cause why they should say that I seeke to catch them in words: but they themselues while they seke to cast a mist before the eyes of the simple, do bewray their owne ignoraunce. And yet though they be neuer so eloquent, they shall not atteine by their eloquence to proue vnto vs that one selfe same thing is two sundry things. Let them (say I) shew me a differēce in y^e thing it selfe wherby they may be thought to differ from the old idolaters. For as an adulterer ora murderer cannot escape giltinesse of his fault, by giuing his sinne a newe deuised name: so it is a very absurdity to thinke that these men be quit by new deuise of a name, if in the matter it selfe they nothing differ frō those idolaters whom they themselues are compelled to cōdemne. But so far are they frō prouing that their case differeth frō the case of those idolaters, that rather the fountaine of all this whole mischiefe is an vnorderly counterfaiting, wherin they haue striued with them while both with their owne wit they deuise, & with their owne handes they frame them signifying formes to expresse them a fashion of God.

12 And yet am I not so superstitious that I thinke no images may be suffred at all. But forasmuch as caruing and painting are the giftes of God, I require that they both be purely and lawfully vsed. Least these things which God hath giue vs for his glory & for our own benefit, be not only defiled by disordered abuse, but also turned to our own destructiō. We thinke it vnlawful to haue God fashioned out in visible forme, because himself hath forbiddē it, & because it cānot be done without some defacemēt of his glory. And least they thinke that it is onely we that are in this opinion, they that haue bin traueled in their workes shall finde that all sound wryters did alway reprove the same thing, if thẽ it be not lawfull to make any bodily image of God, much lesse shall it be lawfull to worship it for God, or God in it. It remaineth therefore lawfull that onely those thinges be painted and grauen whereof our eyes are capable: but that the maiesty of God which is farre aboue the sense of our eyes, be not abused with vncomly deuised shapes. Of this sorte are partely histories and thinges done, partely images and fashions of bodies, without expressing of any thinges done by them. The first of these haue some vse in teaching or admonishing a man: but what profit the second can bring saue only delectatiõ, I see not. And yet it is euident, that euen such were almost all the images that heretofore haue stand vp in churches. Whereby we may iudge that they were there set vp not by discrete iudgement or choise, but by foolish and vnaduised desire. I speake not much amisse & vncomely they were for the most parte fashioned, nor how licentiously Painters and Caruers haue in this point shewed theyr wantonneffe, which thing I haue already touched. Onely I speake to this end, that though there were no fault in them, yet do they nothing auaille to teach.

13 But leauing also that difference, let vs by the way consider whether it be expedient in Christian temples to haue any images at all, that do expresse either things done or the bodyes of men. First if the authority of the aunciẽt church do any thing moue vs, let vs remember that for about v.C. yeares together, while religion yet better flourished, and sincere doctrine was in force, the Christian churches were vniuersally without images. So they were thẽ first brought in for the garnishment of churches, when the sincerity of ministratiõ was not a little altered. I will not now dispute what reason they had with them that were the first authors therof. But if a mā compare age with age, he shall see that they were much swarued from that vprightnesse of them that were without images. What? do we thinke that those holy fathers would haue suffered the church to be so long without the thing which they iudged profitable & good for them? But rather because they saw either little or no profit in it, & much daunger to lurke vnderneath it, they did rather of purpose and aduisedly reiect it, than by ignorance or negligence omitte it. Which thing Augustine doth also in expresse words testifie. When they be set in such places (sayeth he) honorably on hye, to be seene of them that pray & do Sacrifice, although they want both sense and life, yet with the very likenesse that they haue of liuely members and senses, they so moue the weakemindes, mindes, that they seeme to liue & breath. &c. And in an other place. For that shape of members doth worke and in manner enforce thus in psal. much, that the minde liuing within a body doth thinke that body to 113. haue sense, which he seeth like vnto his owne. And a litle after, Images do more auaille to bow downe an ynhappy soule, by this that they haue mouth, eyes, eares, and fecte, than to amend it by this that they neither speake nor see nor heare nor go. This truely seemeth to be the cause why Iohn willed vs to beware not onely of worshipping 1. Ioh. 5 of images, but also of images themselues. And we haue found it to 21. much in experience, that through the horrible madnesse which hath heretofore possessed the world, to the destruction in manner of all godlinesse, so soone as images be set vp in churches, there is as it were a signe set vp of idolatry, because the folly of men cannot refrayne it selfe, but it must foorthwith runne on to superstitious worshippings. But if there were not so much daunger hanging thereby: yet when I consider for what vse temples are ordayned, me thinkes it is very ill beseeming the holinesse thereof to receiue any other images than these liuely and naturall images, which the Lord by his word hath consecrate, I meane Baptisme and the Lordes supper, and other ceremonies wherewith our eyes ought both more earnestly to be occupied and more liuely to be moued, than that they should nede any other images framed by the witte of men. Loe this is the incomparable commodity of images, which can by no value be recompensed, if we beleue the Papistes.

14 I thinke I had spokē enough of this thing already, but that the Nicene Synode doth as it were lay hand on me to enforce me to speake more. I meane not that most famous Synode which Constantine the Great assembled, but that which was holden eight hundred yeares ago, by the commaundement and authority of Irene the Emperesse. For that Synode decreed, that images should not only be had in churches, but also worshipped. For whatsoeuer I should say, the authority of the Synode would make a great preiudice on the other side. Although to say truth, that doth not so much moue me, as make it appeare to the readers howe farre their rage extended, that were more desirous of images than became Christians. But first lette vs dispatche this. They that at this day maintaine the vse of images, allege the decree of that Nicene Synode for their defense. But there is extāt a booke of confutation bearing the name of Charles the Great, which by the phrase we may gather to haue bin wrytten at the same time. Therein are recited the sentences of the Bishoppes that were present at that councill, and the argumentes wherewith they contended.

John the Legate of the east partes sayed : God created manne after his owne image : and thereupon gathered that we ought to haue images. The same man thought that images were commended vnto vs in this sentence: shew me thy face because it is beautifull. An other to proue that images ought to be sette vppon altares , cited this testimony : no man lighteth a candell and putteth it vnder a bushell. An other , to shew that the beholding of them is profitable for vs, brought foorth a verse out of the Psalme : the light of thy countenance is sealed vpon vs. An other tooke this similitude : As the Patriarches vsed the Sacrifices of the Gentiles , so must Christian men haue the images of Saintes in steade of the images of the Gentiles. To the same purpose haue they wrythed this saying: Lord, I haue loved the beauty of thy house . But specially witty is the exposition of this place, As we haue heard so haue we seen, that God is not knowē by onely hearing of his word, but also by looking vppon images. Like is the sharpe deuise of Bishoppe Theodore . Maruelous (sayeth he) is God in his Saintes . And in an other place : In the Saintes that are in the earth : therefore this ought to be referred to images . Finally so filthy are their vnsauory follies that it greueth me to rehearse them.

15 When they talke of the worshipping: then are brought foorth the worshipping of Pharao, and of the rod of Ioseph, & of the pillar that Iacob set vp. Albeit in this last example, they do not only deprauē the meaning of the Scripture , but also bring in that which is no where to be read. Then these places seeme to them maruelous strong and meete proues. Worship his footestole. Againe worshippe on his holy hill. Againe all the richemen of the people shall worship thy countenance. If a man would in scorne putte the personage of a riding foole vppon the patrones of Images , could he gather together greater and grosser follies? But to putte all out of doute, Theodosius Bishoppe of Mira , doth so earnestly confirme by the dreames of his Archedeacō, that images ought to be worshipped, as if he had an oracle from heauen to shewe for it. Now lette the fauourers of images go and presse vs with the decree of that Synode . As though those reuerend fathers do not altogether discredit themselues , in either so childishly handeling , or so vngodly and fowly tearing the Scriptures.

16 Now come I to those monstrous impieties, which it is maruell that euer they durst vomit , and twise maruellous that they were not cried out agaynst with hie detestation of all men . And it is good that this outragiously wicked madnesse be bewrayed, that at least the false

false colour of antiquity may be taken away, which the Papistes pretend for the worshipping of images. Theodosius the Bishop of Amorum pronounceth curse against all them that will not haue images worshipped. An other imputeth all the calamities of Grecia and the east part to this, that images were not worshipped. What punishment then were the Prophetes, the Apostles and the Martirs worthy to suffer in whose time there were no images? They adde further. If the Emperoures image be met with perfume and censing: much more is this honor due to the images of Saintes. Constantius Bishop of Constance in Ciprus, professeth that he reuerently embraceth images, and affirmeth that he will giue to them the same honorable maner of worshippe that is due to the Trinity that giueth life. And whosoever refuseth so to do, he curseth him and sendeth him away with the Manichees and Marcionites. And, that ye should not thinke that this was the priuate sentence of one man, they did all assent vnto it. Yea Iohn the Legate of the east partes being further caried with heate, sayed it were better to bring all brothelhouses into the city than to deny the worshipping of images. At length by consent of them all it was decreed, that worse than all Heretickes are the Samaritans, and worse thā the Samaritans are the enemies of images. And because the play should not be without his solemne farewell, this clause was added, let thē be glad & reioyse that hauing the image of Christ do offer Sacrifice vnto it. Where is now the distinction of Latria and Dulia, where-with they are wont to seeke to blinde the eyes both of God & men? For the councell without any exception doth giue euen as much vnto images as vnto the liuing God himselfe.

The xij. Chapter.

That God is severally discerned from idols, that he may be only and wholly vvorshipped.

WE sayed in the beginning that the knowledge of God standeth not in bare speculation, but draweth with it the worshipping of him, and by the way we touched howe he is rightly worshipped, which point shalbe in other places more largely to be sette foorth. Now I do but shortly reapeate, that so oft as the Scripture affirmeth that there is but one God, it striueth not for thē bare name of God, but withall commaundeth this, that whatsoever belongeth to the Godhead be not giuen to any other. Whereby also appeareth what pure religion doth differ from superstition. Eusebeia, in Greeke signifieth as much as true worship, because alway euen the blinde themselues groping in darkeness he haue found that this rule ought to be holden, that God be not vnorderly worshipped. The name of religion although Cicero truly and well deriueth from relegere, to recorde, or gather vp together: yet is the reason that he assigneth enforced and farre fette, that good worshippers did often recorde and diligently wey what was the trueth. I rather thinke that that name is sette as a contrary to wandring liberty, because the greater parte of the world vnaduisedly taketh hold of that which they first mete withall, and flieth about hither and thither: but true godlinesse, to the end it may stand in stedfast state, Religit, that is to say doth gather vp it self together within her bonds. Like as I thinke supersticion to haue her name hereof, that not being contented with the maner and order prescribed, she heapeth vp together a superfluous number of vaine thinges. But to leaue the wordes it hath alway bin agreed by consent of all ages, that religion is with false errorrs corrupted and peruerted. Whereupon we gather that it is a very fond colour which the superstitious do pretend, when with vndiscrete zeale we giue our selues leaue to do all thinges. And although this confession sound in the mouthes of all men: yet herein a shamefull ignoraunce bewrayeth it selfe, that neither they cleaue to the one God, nor haue any regarde of order in the worshippinge of him, as we haue already shewed. But God, to claime his owne right vnto himselfe, crieth out that he is ielous, and that he will be a seuerer reuenger if he be mingled with any fayned God. And then he setteth forth the lawful maner of worshippinge, to hold mākinde in obediēce. He conteineth both these pointes in his law, when first he bindeth the faithfull vnto himselfe that he only may be their lawmaker: and then he prescribeth a rule whereby to be worshipped after his owne minde. Of the law, because the vses and endes thereof are many, I will entreate in place fitte for it. Now I only touch this point, that thereby me are brided that they run not out of the way to wrong worshippinges. Now as I first sayd, we must hold in minde, that if all that euer properly belongeth to godhead do not rest in God alone, he is spoyled of his honor, and his worshippe broken. And there must we somewhat hedefully marke with what suttelties superstitiō deceiueth. For it doth not so reuolte vnto straunge gods that it seemeth to forsake the hiest God, or to bring him downe into the number of other gods: but while she graūteth vnto him the hiest place, she setteth roūd about him a number of lesser gods, among whom she diuideth his offices? And so (albeit clokedly and craftily) the glory of the godhead is cut in partes, that it remaineth not whole with him. So in the old time, as well they of the Jewes as of the Gentiles did set beneth the father & iudge of gods a great rout of gods which should euery one according to his degree in cōmon haue with y^e hiest God the government of the heauen and earth. So the Saintes that in a few ages past departed this life, are aduaunced to the fellowship of God, to be worshipped, called vpon, & honored in steade of him. And yet with such abomination we thinke that the maiesty of God is not so much as diuided, when in deede it is a great parte suppressed and extinguished, sauing that we retaine still a poore opinion of his supreme power: & in the meane time deceiued with entangled suttelties we are sunderly caried to diuers gods.

2 For this purpose also was inuented the distinction of Latria and Dulia, as they terme them, that is worshippe and seruice, whereby they might freely seeme to giue away the honors of God to angels and dead men. For it is euident, that the worshippe which the Papistes giue vnto saintes differeth nothing in deede from the worshippe of God. For all alike without diuersity they worship both God and them: sauing that when they be charged with it, they winde away with this exception, that they kepe still for God the honor that is due vnto him inuiolate, because they leaue vnto him the worshippe that they call Latria. But sith the question standeth vpon the matter, and not the word, who would permitte them so carelessly to mocke in a matter of all matters most weighty? But to lette that also passe, yet winne they nothing by this distinction, but to proue, that they giue worshippe to one God and seruice to an other. For Latria in greeke signifieth as much as in Latin Cultus, and in English worshippe. Dulia, properly signifieth seruice. And yet sometime in scripture this difference is confounded together without diuersity. But graunt it be a perpetuall difference, then must we search what both the words may meane. Dulia is seruice, Latria is worshippe. Now no man douteth that to serue, is more then to worship. For many times a man could hardly beare to serue him whom he would not sticke to worshippe. So is it an vnegall dealing to giue to the saintes that which is the greater, and to leaue to God that which is the lesser. But many of the auncient authors haue vsed this distinction. What maketh that matter, if all men do perceiue it to be not onely vnfit, but all together very fond?

3 Now leauing nice suttelties, let vs wey the matter it selfe. When Paule putteth the Galathians in remembrance what they were before that they were lightened in the knowledge of God, he saieth that they gaue Duliam seruice to those that of nature were no gods. Although he name not Latriam or worship, is therefore their superstitiō excutable? He doth neuerthelesse condemne their peruerse superstition, which he termeth by the name of Dulia seruice, than if he had expressed the name of Latria, worship. And whē Christ repulseth the assault of Sathan with his buckler, that it is wrytten, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, the name of Latria was not brought in question. Sathan required but an adoration. Likewise when the angell reproued Iohn, because he fell down on his knees before him, we ought not to thinke that Iohn was so madde that he would giue vnto the angell the honor that was due onely to God. But because it was not possible, but that all worship that is ioyned with religion sauoureth somewhat as pertaining to God, therefore he could not adore the angell, but that he must take away somewhat from the glory of God. We read in deede often, that men haue bin honored: but that was a ciuile honor, as I may so call it. But religion hath an other rule, which so soone as it is ioyned with worshippe, bringeth with it a prophane abuse of the honor of God. The same may we see in Cornelius. He had not so slenderly profited in godlinesse, but that he had learned to giue the soueraigne worship to God alone. Therefore when he fell downe before Peter, he did it not of this meaning to worship him in the steede of God. And yet did Peter earnestly forbid him to do that which he did. And why so? but because men do neuer so narrowly put difference betwene y^e worship of God & of his creatures: but that without diuersity they giue away that vnto the creature, which belongeth vnto God. Wherefore if we haue one God, we must remember that nothing be it neuer so little must be taken away from his glory, but that he keepe still that which is properly his. Therefore Zachary when he preacheth of the repairing of the Church, in plaine words expresseth: That there shall not only be one God, but also that there shalbe one name of that God, to the end that he haue nothing in common with Idols. What maner of worship God requireth, we shal see in an other place when it falleth in order. For it pleased him in his law to prescribe vnto men what is lawfull and right, and so to binde them to a certaine rule, that euery man should not geue himselfe leaue to deuise what forme of worshippe he list. But because it is not expedient to loade the readers with heaping many matters together, I will not touche that point yet. Onely lette it suffise for this time to kepe in minde, that euery carying away of the ductyfull behauiours of Godlinesse to any other than to God alone, is not without robbery of God. And first superstition deuised to giue diuine honors to the Sonne, or other starres or idols: then followed ambitious pride, which garnishing mortall men with spoyles taken from God, presumed to prophane all that euer was holy. And although this principle remained among them, to honour the soueraigne deity, yet grewe it in vse indifferently to offer sacrifices to spirites, lesser gods, or deade men of honor. So slippery is the way to slide into this fault, to make common to a number that which God seuerely chalengeth to himselfe alone.

That there is taught in the Scriptures one essence of God from the very creation, vvhich essence containeth in it three persons.

THat which is taught in the Scriptures concerning the incomprehensible and spirituall essence of God, ought to suffice not onely to ouerthrow the foolish errors of the common people, but also to confute the fine suttelties of prophane philosophie. One of the old wryters seemed to haue sayd very well, That God is all that we do see, and all that we do not see. But by this meane he hath imagined the godheade to be powred into all the partes of the world. Although God, to the intent to kepe men in sober minde, speaketh but sparsely of his owne essence, yet by those two names of addition that I haue rehearsed, he doth both take away all grosse imaginations, and also repress the presumptuous boldnesse of mans minde. For surely his immeasurable greatnesse ought to make vs afraide, that we attempt not to measure him with our sense: and his spirituall nature forbiddeth vs to imagine any thing earthly or fleshly of him. For the same cause he often assigneth his dwelling place to be in heauen. For though, as he is incomprehensible, he tilleth the earth also: yet because he seeth our mindes by reason of their dullnesse to lye still in the earth, for good cause he listeth vs vp about the world, to shake of our slouth and sluggishnesse. And here falleth to ground the error of the Manichees, which in appointing two originall beginnings haue made the diuell in a manner egall with God. Surely this was as much as to breake the vnity of God and restraine his vnmeasurablenesse. For where they haue presumed to abuse certaine testimonies: that sheweth a fowle ignoraunce, as their error it selfe sheweth a detestable madnesse. And the Anthropomorphites are also easily confuted which haue imagined God to consist of a body, because oftentimes the Scripture ascribeth vnto him a mouth, eares, eyes, handes, and feete. For what man yea though he be slenderly witted dooth not vnderstand that God doth so with vs speake as it were childishly, as nurses do with their babes? Therefore such maners of speeche do not so plainly expresse what God is, as they do apply the vnderstanding of him to our slender capacity. Which to do, it behoued of necessity that he descended a great way beneath his owne height.

2 But he also setteth out himselfe by an other special marke, wherby he may be more nerely knowē. For he so declareth himselfe to be but one, that he yet giueth himselfe distinctly to be considered in three persons: which except we learne, a bare & empty name of God without any true God flieth in our braine. And that no man should thinke that he is a threhold God, or that the one essence of God is diuided in three persons, we must here seeke a short and easie definition to deliuer vs from all errour. But because many do make much a do about this word Person, as a thing inuented by man: how iustly they do so, it is best first to see. The Apostles naming the sonne, the engra-Heb. 1.3ued forme of the Hypostasis of his father, he vndoubtedly meaneth, that the Father hath some being, wherin he differeth from the sonne. For to take it for Essence (as some expositours haue done, as if Christ like a peece of waxe printed with a seale did represent the substance of the Father) were not onely hard but also an absurdity. For sith the Essence of God is single or one and vndiuisible, he that in himselfe contayneth it all and not by pecemeale, or by deriuation, but in whole perfection, should very vnproperly yea fondly be called the engraued forme of him. But because the father although he be in his owne property distinct, hath expressed himselfe wholly in his sonne, it is for good cause sayd, that he hath giuen his Hypostasis, to be seene in him. Wherwith aptly agreeth that which by and by followeth, that he is the brightnesse of his glory. Surely by the Apostles wordes we gather, that there is a certaine proper Hypostasis in the father, that shineth in the sonne: whereby also againe is easely perceiued the Hypostasis of the sonne that distinguisheth him from the Father. Like order is in the holy ghost. For we shall by and by proue him to be God, and yet he must nedes be other than the father. Yet this distinctiō is not of the essence, which it is vnlawfull to make manifold. Therefore if the Apostles testimony be credited, it followeth that there be in God three Hypostases. This terme seeing the Latines haue expressed with the name of Persō, it were to much pride & waywardnesse to braule about so cleare a matter. But if we list word for word to translate, we may call it Subsistence. Many in the same sense haue called it substāce. And the name of Person hath not bin in vse among the Latines onely: but also the Grecians, perhaps to declare a consent, haue taught that there are three Prosopa, that is to say Persons in God. But they, whether they be Grekes or Latins that differ one from an other in the worde,

worde, do very well agree in the summe of the matter.

3 Now howsoever the heretikes barke at the name of persone, or some ouermuch precise men do carpe that they like not the worde fained by deuise of men: sith they can not get of vs to say, that there be three, wherof euery one is wholly God, nor yet that there be many goddes: what vnreasonableness is this, to mislike wordes, which expresse none other thing but that which is testified and approued by the Scriptures? It were better (say they) to restraine not only our meanings but also our wordes within the boundes of Scripture, than to deuise straunge names that may be the beginnings of disagreement and brawling: so do we tier our selues with strife about wordes: so the truth is lost in contending: so charitie is broken by odiously brawling together. If they call that a straunge worde, which can not be shewed in Scripture, as it is written in nombre of sillables: then they binde vs to a hard law, wherby is condemned all exposition that is not pieced together, with bare laying together of textes of Scripture. But if they meane that to be straunge, which beyng curiously deuised, is superstitiously defended, which maketh more for contention than edification, which is either vnaptly, or to no profite vsed, which withdraweth from the simplicitie of the word of God, then with all my hart I embrace their sobre minde. For I iudge that we ought with no lesse deuout reuerence to talke of God than to thinke of him, for as much as what soeuer we do of our selues thinke of him, is foolish, and what soeuer we speake is vnfaury. But there is a certaine measure to be kept. We ought to learne out of the Scriptures a rule both to thinke and speake, wherby to examine all the thoughtes of our minde & wordes of our mouth. But what withstandeth vs, but that such as in Scripture are to our capacitie doutfull and entangled, we may in plainer wordes expresse them, being yet such wordes as do reuerently and faithfully serue the truth of the Scripture, and be vsed sparely, modestly, and not without occasion. Of which sort there are examples enow. And where as it shal by prooffe appere that the Church of great necessitie was enforced to vse the names of Trinitie, and Persones, if any shall then finde fault with the newnesse of woordes, shall he not be iustly thought to be greued at the light of the truth, as he that blameth only this that the truth is made so plaine and cleare to discern?

4 Such newnesse of wordes, if it be so to be called, commeth then chiefly in vse, when the truth is to be defended against wranglers that do mocke it out with cauillations. Which thing we haue at this day to much in experience, who haue great businesse in vanquishing the enemies of true and sounde doctrine. With such folding and crooked winding these slippery snakes do slide away, vnlesse they be strongly griped and holden hard when they be taken. So the old fathers being troubled with contending against false doctrines, were compelled to shew their meaninges in exquisite plainnesse, least they should leaue any crooked bywayes to the wicked, to whom the doutefull constructions of wordes were hidingholes of errors. Arrius confessed Christ to be God, and the sonne of God, because he coulde not againsay the euident wordes of God, and as if he had bin so sufficiently discharged did faine a certaine consent with the rest. But in the meane while he ceased not to scatter abroad that Christ was create, and had a beginning as other creatures. But to the ende they might draw forth his winding sutteltie out of his denne, the auncient fathers went further, pronouncing Christ to be the eternall sonne of the father and consubstanciall with the father. Hereat wickednesse began to boile, when the Arrians began to hate and deteste the name Omooufion, consubstanciall. But if in the beginning they had sincerely and with plaine meaning confessed Christ to be God, they would not now haue denied him to be consubstantiall with the father. Who dare now blame these good men as brawlers and contentious, bycause for one litle wordes sake, they were so whote in disputatiō, and troubled the quiete of the Church? But that little worde shewed the differēce betwene the true beleuing Christians, and the Arrians that were robbers of God. Afterward rose vp Sabellius which accompted in a maner for nothing the names of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost, saying in disputation that they were not made to shew any maner of distinction, but onely were seuerall additions of God, of which sorte there are many. If he came to disputatiō, he confessed, that he beleued the father God, the sonne God, the Holy ghost God. But afterward he would redely slippe away with saying that he hadde in no other wise spoken than as if he had named God, a strong God, iust God, and wise God: and so he song another song, that the Father is the Sonne, and the Holy ghost is the father, without any order, without any distinctiō. The good doctors which then had care of godlinesse, to subdew his wickednesse, cried out on the other side that there ought to be acknowledged in one God three propreties. And to the end to fense themselues against the crooked writhe suttelties with plaine and simple truth, they affirmed, that there did truely subsist in one God, or (which came all to one effect) that there did subsist in the vnitie of God a Trinitie of persons.

§ If then the names haue not bin without cause inuēted, we ought to take hede, that in reiecting the we be not iustly blamed of proude presumptuousnesse. I would to God they were buried in dede, so that this faith were agreed of all men, that the Father and the Sonne, and the Holy ghost be one God: and yet that the Father is not the Sonne, nor the Holy ghost the Sonne, but distinct by certaine proprietie. Yet am I not so precise, that I can finde in my harte to strue for bare wordes. For I note, that the olde fathers, which otherwise speake very religiously of such matters, did not euery where agree one with another, nor euery one with himselfe. For what formes of speech vsed by the counsels doth Hilarie excuse? To how greate libertie doth Augustine sometime breake forth? How vnlike are the Grekes to the Latins? But of this variance one example shall suffice for this time. Whē the Latins mēt to expresse the worde Omoouision, they called it Consubstanciall, declaring the substance of the Father and the Sonne to be one, so vsing the word substance for essence. Whervpō Hierome to Damasus saith, it is sacrilege to say, that there are three substances in God: and yet aboue a hundred times you shall finde in Hilarie, that there are three substances in God. In the worde Hypostasis, how is Hierome accombred? For he suspecteth that there lurketh poison in naming three Hypostases in God. And if a man do vse this word in a godly sense, yet he plainly saith that is an improprie speech, if he speake vnfainedly, and did not rather wittingly and willingly seeke to charge the bishoppes of the Eastlandes, whom he sought to charge with an vniust sciauder. Sure this one thing he speaketh not very truely, that in all prophane schooles, ouisia, essence is nothing els but hypostasis, which is proued false by the common and accustomed vse. Augustine is more modest and gentill, which although he say, that the worde hypostasis in that sense is strange to latine eares, yet so farre is it of that he raketh from the Grekes their vsuall maner of speaking, that he also gently beareth with the Latins that had followed the Greke phrase. And that which Socrates writeth in the sixte booke of the Tripartite historie, tendeth to this end, as though he ment that he hadde by vnskilful men bin wrongfully applied vnto this matter. Yea and the same Hilarie himselfe layeth it for a great fault to the heretikes charge, that by their waywardnesse he is compelled, to put those things in perill of the speech of men, which ought to haue bin kept in the religiousnesse of mindes, plainly confessing that this is to do thinges vnlaufull, to speake that ought not to be spoken, to attempt thinges not licensed. A little after, he excuseth himselfe with many wordes, for that he was so bolde to vtter new names For after he had vsed the naturall names Father, Sonne, and Holy ghost, he addeth that what soeuer is sought further, is beyond the compasse of speech, beyond the reach of sense, and beyonde the capacitie of vnderstanding. And in an other place he saith, that happy are the bishops of Gallia, which neither had nor receiued nor knew any other confession, but that olde and simple one, which frō the time of the Apostles was receiued in all Churches. And much like is the excuse of Augustine, that this worde was wrong out of necessitie by reason of the imperfectiō of mens language in so great a matter: not to expresse that which is, but that it should not be vnspoken how the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost are three. This modestie of the holy menne ought to warne vs, that we do not forthwith so seuerely like Censors, note them with infamie that refuse to subscribe and sweare to such wordes as we propounde them: so that they do it not of pride, of frowardnesse, or of malicious craft. But let them againe consider, by how great necessitie we are driuen to speake so, that by little and little; they may be enured with that profitable maner of speach. Let them also learne to beware, least sith we must mete on the one side with the Arrians, on the other side with Sabellians, while they be offended that we cut of occasion from them both to caull, they bring themselues in suspicion, that they be the disciples either of Arrius or of Sabellius. Arrius saith that Christ is God, but he muttereth that he was create, and had a beginning. He saith Christ is one with the Father, but secretely he whispereth in the eares of his disciples, that he was made one as the other faithfull be, although by singular prerogatiue. Say ones that Christ is Consubstanciall with his father, then plucke you of his visour from the dissembler, and yet you adde nothing to the Scripture, Sabellius saith, that the seuerall names, Father, Sonne, and Holy ghost signifie nothing in God seuerally distinct: say that they are three: and he will cry out that you name three gods. Say that there is in one essence a Trinitie of persons, then shall you in one word both say, what the Scripture speaketh, and stop their vaine babbling. Now if any be holden with so curious superstition, that they can not abide these names: yet is there no man, though he would neuer so faine, that can deny but that when we heare of one, we must vnderstand an vnitie of substance: when we heare of three in one essence, that it is ment of the persons in the trinitie. Which thing being without fraude confessed, we stay no longer vpon wordes. But I haue long ago found, and that often, that who soeuer do obstinately quarell about wordes, do keepe within them a secrete poison: so that it is better willingly to prouoke them, than for their pleasure to speake darkly.

6 But leauing disputation of wordes I will now begin to speake of the matter it selfe. I call therefore a Person, a subsistence in the essence of God, which hauing relatiō to the other is distinguished from them with vncōmunicable propertie. By the name of Subsistēce we meane an other thing than the essence. For if the worde had simply bin God, and in the meane time had nothing seuerally propre to it selfe, Iohn hadde said amisse, that is was with God. Where he forthwith adderth, that God himselfe was the same worde, he calleth vs backe againe to Iohn. 1.
with

1. y one single essence. But because it coulde not be with God, but that it must rest in the father: hereof ariseth that subsistēce, which though it be ioyned to the essence with an vnseparable knot, yet hath it a speciall marke, wherby it doth differ from it. So of the three subsistēces, I say that eche hauing relation to other is in propertie distinguished. Relation is here expressely mencioned. For when there is simple and indefinite mencion made of God, this name belongeth no lesse to the Sonne and the Holy ghost, than to the Father. But when the Father is compared with the Sonne, the seueral propertie of either doth discerne him from the other. Thirdely, what soeuer is propre vnto eue-ry of them is vncōmunicable. For that which is geuen to the Father Lib. cō-
xam. for a marke of difference, can not agree with, nor be geuen to the Sonne. And I mislike not the definition of Tertullian, so that it be rightly taken, That there is in God a certaine disposition or distribution, which yet chaungeth nothing of the vnitie of the essence.

7 But before that I go any further, it is good that I proue the Godhead of the Sonne and of the Holy ghost. Then after we shal see, how they differ one from an other. Surely whē the Worde of God is spoken of in the Scripture: it were a very greate absurditie to imagine it only a fading and vanishing voice, which sente into the ayre, cometh out of God himselfe, of which sort were the oracles geuen to the fathers, and all the prophecies: when rather the worde is mente to be the perpetuall wisdom abiding with the Father, from whens all the oracles and prophecies proceded. For as Peter testifieth, no lesse didde the 1. Pet. 1.
11. olde prophetes speake with the spirite of Christ, than did the Apostles and all they that after them did distribute the heauenly doctrine.
But because Christ was not yet openly shewed, we must vnderstand that the Worde was before all worldes begotten of the Father. And if the Spirite was of the Worde, whose instrumentes were the prophetes, we do vndoutedly gather that he was true god. And this doth Moses teach plainly enough in the creation of the worlde, when he setteth the worde as the meane. For why doth he expressely tell, that God in creating of all his workes said. Be this done: or that done: but that the vnserchable glory of god may shiningly appere in his images?
The suttlenosed & babbling men do easily mocke our this, with saying that the name Worde, is there taken for his bidding or commaunde-

Heb. 1. mente. But better expositors are the Apostles, which teach that the 2. worldes were made by the same, and that he susteineth them all with his mighty Worde. For here we see that the Worde is taken for the bidding or commaundement of the Sonne, which is himselfe the eter-Eccles. 24. 14. nall and essentiall Worde to the Father. And to the wise and sobre it is not darke that Salomō saith, where he bringeth in Wisdom begotten of God before all worldes, and bearing rule in the creation of thinges, and in all the workes of God. For to say that it was a certaine commaundement of God, seruing but for a time, were very foolish and vaine: where as in deede it was Goddes pleasure at that time to shew forth his stedfast and eternall purpose, yea and some thing more secrete. To which entente also maketh that saying of Christ: My Fa-John. 5. 17. ther and I do worke euen to this daie. For in saying, That from the beginning of the worlde he was continually working with his Father, he doth more openly declare that which Moses hadde more shortely touched. We gather then that the meaning of Goddes speaking was this, that the Worde hadde his office in the doing of thin-ges, and so they both had a common woorking together. But most plainly of all doth Iohn speake, whē he sheweth that the same Word, which from the beginning was God with God, was together with God the Father the cause of all thinges. For he both geueth to the Iohn. 1. 3. Worde a perfect and abiding essence, and also assigneth vnto it some thing peculiar to it selfe, and plainly sheweth how God in speaking was the creator of the worlde. Therefore as all reuelacions proceding from God do well beare the name of the worde of God, so ought we yet to set in the hyest place that substanciall Worde, the wellspring of all Oracles, which being subiect to no alteration, abideth alwaies one and the selfe same with God, and is God himselfe.

8 Here many dogges do barke against vs, which when they dare not openly take from him his Godhead, do secretly steale from him his Eternitie. For they say, that the Worde then began first to be, when God in the creation of the world opened his holy mouth. But verie vndiscretly do they to imagine a certaine innouacion of the substance of God. For as those names of God that haue relacion to his outward worke, began to be geuen vnto him after the being of his worke, as for example, this that he is called the creator of heauen and earth: so doth Godlinesse know or admitt no name that should signifie any new thing in himselfe to haue chaunced vnto God. For if any should come to him from els where than in himselfe, then this saying of Iames should faile, that euey good. geuing and euey perfect gift is from aboue, and commeth downe from the Father of lightes, lightes, with whom is no variablenesse neither shadowing by turning. Therefore nothing is lesse to be suffred, than to faine a beginning of that Worde, which both alway was God, and afterwarde was creator of the worlde. But full suttelly forsooth they reason, that Moses in saying that God then first spake, doth secretly shew that there was no Worde in him before. Which is a most tryfling argument. For it followeth not, because a thing at some one certaine time beginneth to be shewed openly, that therefore it had neuer any beyng before. But I cōclude farre otherwise and say: seyng that in the same momente Gen. 1. that God saied, let light be made, the power of the worde appeared 3. and shewed it selfe: the same Worde was long before. but if a man aske how long before, he shall finde no beginning. For he appointed no certaine space of time when him selfe saied: Father glorifie me with the glory which I had with thee before the worlde was. And this thing Iohn also left not vntouched, because he first sheweth that Ioh. 17. in the beginning the worde was with God, before that he commeth 5. to the creation of the worlde. We say therefore againe, that the Worde which was conceiued of God before any beginning of time, was continually remaining with him. Wherby both his eternitie, true essence, and Godhead is proued.

9 Although I do not yet touch the person of the Mediator, but do deferre it to that place where we shall specially entreate of the Redemption: yet because it ought to be certainly holden without controuersie among all men, that Christ is the same Worde clad with flesh, in this place will be very fitte to recite all those testimonies that proue Christ to be God. Whē it is sayed in the xlv. Psalme, thy throne O God is for euer and euer: the Iewes do cauill and say, that the Psa. 45. name Elohim is also applied to the Angels and soueraigne powers. 6. But in all the Scripture there is not a like place, that raiseth an eternall throne to any creature. For he is here not simply called God, but also the eternall Lord. Againe, this title is giuen to none but with an addicion, as it is saied: that Moses shalbe for a God to Pharao. Exo. 7.1 Some rede it in the Genitiue case which is very foolish. I graunt in dedde that oftentimes a thing is called Diuine or of God, that is notable by any singular excellence: but here by the tenour of the texte it appeareth, that such a meaning were harde and forced, and will not agree. But if their stubbornesse will not so yelde: In Esaie is very plainly brought in for all one both Christ and God, and he that is adorned with the soueraigne power, which is properly belonging to God alone. This (saie they) is the name wherby they shall call him, Esa. 9.6 the strong God, the Father of the world to come, &c. Here the Iewes barcke againe, and turne the texte thus : this is the name whereby the stronge God the father of the worlde to come shall call him : so that they leaue this onely to the Sonne to be called the Prince of peace. But to what purpose should so many names of addicion in this place be heaped vpon God the Father, seyng it is the purpose of the Prophete to adorne Christ with such speciall notes as may builde our Faith vpon him? Wherefore it is out of dout that he is here in like sorte called the strong God, as he is a little before called Immanuel. But nothing can be founde plainer than that place of Hieremie where he sayeth, that this shall be the name whereby the sede of David shall be called Iehouah our righteousnesse. For where the Iewes themselves do teach, that all other names of God are but adiectiue names of addicion, and that this onely name Iehouah which they call vn-speakable is a substantiue name to expresse his essence: we gather that the Sonne is the onely and eternall God, which saith in an other place that he will not geue his glory to an other. But here also they seke to scape away because that Moses gaue that name to the Altare that he bilded, and Ezechiel gaue it to the new citie Hierusalem. But who doth not see that the Altare was bilded for a monumente that God was the auancement of Moses, and that Hierusalem is not adorned with the name of God, but onely to testifie the presence of God? For thus sayeth the Prophete. The name of the citie from that day shall be Iehouah there. And Moses saith thus. He bilded an altare and called the name of it, Iehouah my exaltacion. But more businesse ariseth by an other place of Hieremie, where the same tittle is applied to Hierusalem in these wordes: this is the name whereby they shall call her Iehouah our righteousnesse. But this testimony is so farre from making against the trueth which we defende, that it rather confirmeth it. For wheras he had before testified that Christ is the true Iehouah from whom floweth righteousnesse, now he pronounceth that the Church shall so verely fele the same, that she may gloriously vse the very name it selfe. And so in the first place is set the fountaine and cause of righteousnesse, in the other the effect.

10 Now if this do not satisfie the Iewes, that Iehouah is so oft presented in the personne of an Angell, I see not with what caillations they can mocke it out. It is saied that the Angell appeared to the holy fathers: and the same Angell chalengeth to himselfe the name of the eternall God. If any take exception and say, that this is spoken in respect of the Person that he representeth: this knotte is not thus losed. For being a seruante he would not suffer Sacrifice to be offered to him and take from God his due honour. But the Angell refusing fusing to eate bread, commandeth Sacrifice to be offered to Iehouah. And then he proueth that himselfe in deede was the same Iehouah, and therefore Manoah and his wife by this token did gather, that they had seen not an only Angell but God. And thence came it that he sayed: we shall die because we haue seen God. And when his wife aunswereth, if Iehouah would haue slayen vs, he would not haue receaued Sacrifice at our handes: in this she doth confesse that he was God which before was called the Angell. Beside this, the aunswere of the Angell himselfe taketh away all doubt of it, saying: why doest thou aske me of my name, which is maruellous? So much the more detestable was the wickednesse of Seruetto, when he affirmed that God neuer appeared to Abraham and the other fathers, but that an Angell was worshipped in place of him. But truely and wisely haue the true teaching doctors of the Church expounded, that the same principall Angell was the worde of God, which then as aforehande began to execute the office of Mediatour. For though he was not yet clothed with flesh, yet he came downe as a meane betwene God and men, to come more familiarly to the faithfull. Therefore his nie communicating himselfe made him to be called an Angell: yet still in the meane time he retained that which was his own, to be the God of vnspeakable glory. The same thing meaneth Oseas, which after he had recited the wrastring of Iacob with the Angell, sayeth: Iehouah the God of hostes, Iehouah, worthy of memory is his name. Here againe Seruetto carpeth, that God did beare the person of an Angell. As though the Prophete did not cōfirme that which Moses had saied: why doest thou aske me of my name? And the confession of the holy Patriarche doeth sufficiently declare that he was not a created Angell, but one in whom the full godhead was residente, when he said: I haue seen God face to face. And for this cause Paule sayeth, that Christ was guide of the people in the wildernesse. For though the time was not yet come of his abacemente: yet that eternall worde shewed a figure of that office to which he was appointed. Now if the seconde Chapter of Zacharie be weyed without contencion, the Angell that sente an other Angell was byandby pronounced to be the God of hostes, & to him is soueraigne power ascribed. I omitte innumerable testimonies on the which our Faith safely resteth, although they do not much moue the Iewes. For when it is saied in Esaie. Beholde this is our God, this is Iehouah, we shall waite vpon him, and he shall saue vs, they that haue eyes may see, that herein is meant God which ryseth vp for the saluation of his people. And these vehement demonstrations twise repeted suffer it to be drawn no otherwhere but to

12. 3. 1. Christ. And yet plainer and fuller is the place of Malachie where he promiseth that he shall come the Lord that was then desired, to his owne temple. But to none but to the onely soueraigne God was the temple dedicate; which temple yet the Prophet dothe claime for Christ. Wherevpon followeth that Christ is the same God that was euer honored among the Iewes.

11. As for the newe Testament, it swarmeth with innumerable testimonies, therefore we must trauaile rather shortly to choose out fewe, than largely to heape vp all. For though the Apostles speake of him since he was now become the Mediatour in flesh: yet all that I shall bring forth shall aptly serue to proue his godhead. First this is worthy to be singularly marked, that those thinges which were before spoken touching the eternall God, the Apostles do shew that they are either already performed, or hereafter to be performed in Christ. For where

Esai. 55. 3. ones be brought to appeare before the iudgement throne of Christ. For it is written, to me shall all knees bow, and to me shall all tongues swere. Seing God in Esay speaketh this thing of himselfe, and Christ in dede performeth it in himselfe, it followeth that he is the selfe same God whoes glory may not be withdrawn to an other. And that thing

Psal. 57. 9. he hath caried captiuitie captiue; meaning that such ascending was in shadowe shewed, when God in notable victory against forein nations did shewe forth his power, but he declareth that in Christ it was more fully performed. So Iohn testifieth that it was the glory of

Iohn. 1. 4. the Sonne that was reueled to Esay by a vision, whereas in dede the Esai. 6. 1. Prophet himselfe wryteth that the maiestie of God appeared vnto him. And it is euident that those thinges which the Apostle wry-

6. God, as: Thou Lord in the beginning diddest laie the foundations of heauen and earth. &c. Againe worship him all ye his Angels. And yet he abuseth not those titles when he draweth them to Christ. For all those thinges that are spoken of in those Psalmes; he himselfe alone hath fulfilled. For it was he that rose vp and had mercy on Siō. It was he that claimed to himselfe the kingdome of all the nations

Ioh. 1. 1. and islandes. And why should Iohn sticke to apply the maiestie of God to Christ which in his preface had sayed that the worde was alwaie

God? Why should Paule feare to set Christ in the iudgement throne of God, hauing before with so open proclamaciō declared his Godhead, where he saied that he was God blessed to the ende of worldes? And to make appeare, how well he agreeth in this pointe with himselfe, in an other place he writeth that Christ is God openly shewed in the flesh. If he be God to be prayesd to the ende of worldes, then he is the same he to whom in an other place he affirmeth all glorie and honour to be due. And thus he hideth not, but plainely crieth out, that he would haue counted it no robbery if he had shewed himselfe egall with God, but that he willingly abaced himselfe. And that the wicked should not carpe that he is some made God, Iohn goeth further and saith. He is the true God and the eternall life. Although it ought aboundantly to satisfie vs, that he is called God, specially of that witnesse which expresly affirmeth vnto vs that there are no moe goddes but one. That same witnesse is Paule, which saith thus: How many soeuer be called goddes either in heauen or in earth, to vs there is but one God from whom are all thinges. When we heare of the same mouth, that God was openly shewed in the flesh, that God with his owne blood purchased the Church to himselfe: why should we imagine a seconde God which he himselfe acknowledgeth not? And it is no doute that all the godly were of the same meaning. Likewise Thomas in protesting him to be his Lorde and his God, doth professe that he is that onely one God whom he had alway worshipped.

12 Now if we esteeme his Godhead by the workes that in the Scripture are ascribed vnto him, it shall thereby more euidentlie appeare. For when he saied that from the beginning he was therterto working with his father: the Iewes which were most dull in vnderstanding of all his other sayinges, yet then perceiued that he toke vpon him the power of God. And therefore, as Iohn telleth, they sought the more to kill him, because he didde not onely breake the Sabbat, but also did call God his father, making himselfe egall with God. How dull shall we be thē, if we do not perceiue that his godhead is herein plainly affirmed? And truely to order the worlde with prouidence and power, and to gouerne all thinges with the authoritie of his owne might, which the Apostle ascribeth vnto him, belongeith to none but onely to the creator. And he not onely enterparteneth the gouernement of the worlde with his Father, but also all other offices which can not be made cōmon to God with his creatures. The Lord crieth out by the Prophet: I am he, I am he, that doe away thine offences for mine owne sake. According to the meaning of this sen-

 But the same had Christ: wherby is gathered that he is God.

13 Now, in his miracles how plainly and clerely doth he appeare?
 And though I graunte that as well the Prophetes as the Apostles did is there, that they by their ministracion disposed the giftes of God, he shewed forth his owne power. He vsed sometime prayer, to the owne power shewed vnto vs. And how coulde it otherwise be but that he was the very author of miracles that by his owne authorite

 5. 12. for

for this matter, when we so often mete with this sentence? He that beleueth in me hath euerlasting life. Morcouer the inuocation which hangeth vpon Faith belongeth also to him, which yet is proper to the maiestie of God if he haue any thing at all proper to himselfe. For one Prophete sayeth: whosoever calleth vpon the name of Iehoua shalbe saued: and another sayeth: a most stronge toure is the name of Iehouah: to it the righteous shall flee and he shalbe saued, but the name of Christ is called vpon for saluacion: it followeth therefore that he is Iehouah. As for inuocacion, we haue an example of it in Stephen, when he sayeth, Lord Iesu receiue my spirite. Againe in the whole Church, as Ananias testifieth in the same booke. Lord (sayeth he) thou knowest how great euills this man hath done to thy Saintes that call vpon thy name. And that it may be more plainly vnderstanded that the whole fulnesse of the Godhead doth corporally dwell in Christ, the Apostle doth confesse that he brought no other doctrine among the Corinthians but the knowledge of him, and that he preached no other thing but that knowledge. What, I pray you, and how great a thing is this, that the name of the Sonne onely is preached vnto vs whom he willet to glory in the knowledge of himselfe alone? Who dare say that he is but a creature, of whom the onely knowledge is our whole glorie? Beside that, the salutacions set before the Epistles of Paule, with the same benefites from the Sonne which they do from the Father, wherby we are taught not onely that those thinges which the Father geueth vs do come vnto vs by his intercession, but also by communitie of power, he is the author of them. Which knowledge by practise is without doute more certaine and perfect than any idle speculacion. For there the godly mynde doth beholde God most present, and in maner handle him, where it feeleth it selfe to be quickened, lightened, saued, iustified and sanctified.

14 Wherefore out of the same fountaines we must fetch our meane of prouing to confirme the Godhead of the Holy ghost. Very plaine is the testimonie of Moses in the history of the creacion, that the spirite of God was vpon the depthes, or vpon the vnfashioned heape: because he sheweth that not onely the beautie of the worlde that is now to be seen is preserued by the power of the Spirite, but ere this beautie was added, the Spirite was then busied in preseruing that confused lumpe of thinges. And that saying of Esaie cannot be cauilled against. And now Iehouah and his Spirite hath sent me. For he communiceth with the Holy ghost his chiefe power in sending of Prophetes. Whereby appeareth the diuine maiestie of the Holy ghost.

But our best proufe, as Lhaue said, shalbe by familiar vse. For that which the Scriptures impute vnto it, is farre from the propertie of creatures, and such a thing as we our selues do learne by assured experience of godlinesse. For he it is that being eche where poured abrode, doth susteine and geue:h growing and life to all thinges in heauen and in earth. An by this pointe he is proued to be none of the number of creatures, for that he is not comprehended within any boundes: but by pouring his liuely force into all thinges to breath into them life and mocion, this is the very worke of God. Moreouer if regeneracion into an incorruptible life be better and more excellēt than any present quickening: what shall we iudge of him from whose power the same procedeth? And that he is the author of regeneraciō, not by a borrowed, but by his owne force, the Scripture in many places teacheth: and not of that onely, but also of the immortalitie to come. Finally, as vnto the Sonne, so vnto him also are applied all those offices that are most of all properly belonging to the God-head. For he searcheth the depe secretes of God, wherewith none of all the creatures is of counsel. He geueth wisdome and skill to speake, wheras yet the Lord pronounceth to Moses that it is onely his worke to do it. So by him we come to a partaking of God, so that we may fele his power as it were working life in vs. Our iustification is his worke. From him is power, sanctification, truth, grace, and what good thing soeuer may be thought of, because it is the Holy ghost onely from whom procedeth all kinde of giftes. For that sentence of Paule is righte worthy to be noted. Although there be diuerse giftes, and manifolde and sondry is the distribution of them, yet is there but one holy Spirite: because he maketh him not onely the originall or beginning, but also the author. Whiche a little after is more plainely expressed in these woordes. One and the same Spirite distrybuterh all thinges as he will. For if he were not some thing subsisting in God, he woulde not attribute vnto him choise of minde and will. Therefore moste evidently doth Paule geue to the Holy ghost diuine power, and sheweth that he is substantially resident in God.

15 And the Scripture it selfe, when it speaketh of him, forbeareth not the name of God. For Paule hereby gathereth that we are the temple of God, because his spirite dwelleth in vs: which thing is not lightly to be passed ouer. For wheras God so often promiseth that he wil chose vs for a temple to himselfe, that promise is no other way fulfilled, but by his spirite dwelling in vs, Surely, as Augustine very well saith: if we were commaunded to make vnto the Holy ghost a temple of timber and stone because such worship is due to God onely, it were a cleare argument that he is God: now therefore how much clearer is this, that we ought, not to make a temple, but our selues to be a temple for him? And the Apostle himselfe calleth vs sometime the temple of God, sometime the temple of the Holy ghost. both in one meaning. And Peter reprehending Ananias for that he had lied to the Holy ghost, said that he lied not vnto men but vnto God. And where Esay bringeth in the Lord of hostes speaking, Paule teacheth that it is the Holy ghost that speaketh. Yea where commonly the Prophetes say, that the wordes which they vtter are the wordes of the Lord of hostes, Christ and the Apostles do referre them to the Holy ghost. Wherby it followeth that he is the true Iehouah that is the chiefe author of prophecies. Againe where God complaineth that he was prouoked to wrath by the stubbornesse of his people, in steade of that Esay saith that his holy Spirite was greued. Laste of all, if blasphemie against the Holy ghost be not forgeuen in this worlde nor in the worlde to come, whereas he may obteine pardon that hath blasphemed against the Sonne: his diuine maiestie is here plainly proued, the offense or diminishment wherof is an vnardonable crime. I do wittingly and of purpose omitte many testimonies that the auncient writers haue vsed. They haue thought it a maruellous mete place to alleage out of Dauid: with the worde of the Lord the heauens were stablished, and all the power of them with the spirite of his mouth, to proue that the worlde was no lesse the worke of the Holy ghost than of the Sonne. But forasmuch as it is commonly vsed in the Psalmes to repete one thinge twice: and in Esay the spirite of his mouth is as much to say as his worde, that reason is very weake. Therefore I thought good to touche a fewe suche thinges as godly mindes might soundly rest vpon.

16 And as God hath more plainly disclosed himselfe by the coming of Christ, so is he also in the three Persons become more familiarly knowen. But of all the testimonies lette this one suffice vs for this present. Paule so knitteth these thre together, God, Faith, and Baptisme, that he reasoneth from the one to the other in this maner. Because there is but one Faith, he thereby sheweth that there is but one God. And because there is but one God, he therby proueth that there is but one Faith. Therefore if we be entred into the Faith and religion of one God by Baptisme: we must nedes thinke him the true God in whose name we are baptised. And it is not to be doubted, but that in this solemne protestacion, Christ meant to testifie that the perfect light of Faith was already deliuered, when he saied: Baprise

Mat. 28 them in the name of the Father and of the Sonne and of the Holy
2. ghost. For it is as much in effect as to be baptised in the name of the one God; which with perfect brightnesse hath appeared in the Father, the Sonne and the Holy ghost. Wherby is euident that in the essence of God abide three Persons in which the one God is knowen.
And surely, forasmuch as our Faith ought not to looke hether & the-ther, nor diuersly to wader about, but to haue regard to the one God, to be applied to him, & to sticke fast in him: it is hereby easily proued, that if there be diuerse kindes of faith, there must also be many gods.
Now wheras baptisme is a Sacrament of faith: it proueth vnto vs the vnitie of God, because it is but one. And hereof also followeth, that it is not lawfull to be baptised but into one God, bycause we embrace the Faith of him, into whose name we are baptised. What meant Christ then, when he commaunded to be baptised, in the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost, but that we ought with one Faith to beleue in the Father, Sonne, and the Holy ghost? Therefore sith this remaineth certain, that there is but one God, and not many, we determine that the Worde and the Spirite are nothing els but the very selfe essence of God. And very foolishly did the Arrians prate, which confessing the godhead of the Sonne did take from him the substance of God. And such a like rage vexed the Macedoniās, which would haue to be vnderstāded by the Spirite, only the giftes of grace that are poured forth into men. For as wisdom, vnderstanding, prudence, fortitude, feare of God do procede from him: so he onely is the spirite of wisdom, prudence, fortitude, and godlinesse. Yet is not he diuided according to the distribution of his graces: but how soeuer they be diuersely dealt abroad, yet he remaineth one and the same, as the Apostle saith.

17 Againe, there is shewed in the Scriptures a certaine distinction of the Father, from the Worde, and of the Worde from the Spirite.
In discussing whereof, howe greate religiousnesse and sobrietie we oughte to vse, the greatnesse of the misterie it selfe doth admonish vs. And I very well like that saying of Gregorie Nazianzene: I can not thinke vpon the one, but by and by I am compassed about with the brightnesse of the three: And I can not seuerally discern the three, but I am sodeinly dryuen backe to one. Wherfore lette it not come in our mindes ones to imagine such a Trinitie of Persons as may hold our thought withdrawen into seueralties, and doth not forthewith bringe vs againe to that vnitie. The names of Father, Sonne, and Holy ghost, do proue a true distinction, that no man shoulde thinke them to be beare names of addition, wherby God according to

to his workes is diuersly entituled: but yet it is a distinction, not a diuision. The places that we haue already cited, do shew that the Sonne hath a property distinct from the Father, because the Word had not bin with God, if he had not bin an other thing than the Father: neither had he had his glory with the Father, but being distinct from him. Likewise he doth distinguish himselfe from the Father, when he sayth, that there is an other which beareth him witnesse. And for this purpose maketh that which in an other place is sayd, that the Father created all thinges by the Word, which he could not, but being after a certaine maner distinct from him. Moreouer the Father came not downe into the earth; but he that came out from the Father. The Father died not nor roase againe, but he that was sent by him. Neither yet did this distinction beginne at the taking of flesh: but it is manifest that he was also before, the onely begotten in the bosome of the Father. For who can abide to say, that then the Sonne entred into the bosome of the Father, when he descended from heauen to take man-hode vpon him? He was therefore before in the bosome of the Father, and enioyed his glory with the Father. As for the distinction of the Holy ghost from the Father, Christ speaketh of it when he sayth, that it proceedeth from the Father. And how oft doth he shew it to be an other beside himselfe? as when he promiseth that he will send an other confortour, and often in other places.

18 But to borow similitudes from matters of men, to expresse the force of this distinction, I know not whether it be expedient. In dede the olde fathers are wont so to do sometime: but withall they do confesse, that whatsoeuer they bring foorth for like, doth much differ. For which cause I am much afraid to be any way bold; least if I bring foorth any thing vnfitly, it should giue occasion either to the malicious to cauill, or to the vnskilfull to be deceiued. Yet such distinction as we haue marked to be sette out in Scriptures, it is not good to haue left vnspoken. And that is this, that to the Father is giuen the beginning of working, the fountayne and spring of all thinges: to the Sonne wisdom, counsell, & the very dispositiō in the doing of things: to the holy Holy ghost is assigned power and effectuell working. And although eternity belong vnto the Father, and eternity to the Sonne and to the Holy ghost also, for as much as God could neuer haue bin without his wisdom & power, and in eternity is not to be sought, which was first or last: yet this obseruation of order is not vayne or superfluous, wherein the Father is reckened first, and then of him the Sonne, & after of them both the Holy ghost. For euery mans minde of it selfe enclineth to this, first to consider God, then the wisdom

rising out of him, and last of all the power wherewith he putteth the decrees of his purpose in execution. In what sorte the Sonne is sayd to be of the Father onely, and the Holy ghost both of the Father and the Sonne, is shewed in many places, but no where more plainly than in the viii. chapter to the Romanes, where the same Spirite is without difference sometime called the Spirite of Christ, & sometime of him that raised vp Christ from the dead: and that not without cause. For Peter doth also testifie that it was the Spirite of Christ wherewith the Prophetes did prophecy, where as the Scripture so often teacheth, that it was the Spirite of God the Father.

19 Now this distinctiō doth so not stand against the single vnity of God, that thereby we may proue that the Sonne is one God with the father, because he hath one Spirit with him, & that the Holy Spirit is not a thing diuers from the Father and the Sonne. For in ech Hypostasis is vnderstanded the whole substance, with this that euery one hath his own propriety. The Father is whole in the Sonne, & the Son is whole in the Father, as himselfe affirmeth. I am in the Father & the Father is in me. And the Ecclesiasticall wryters do not graunt the one to be seuered frō the other by any differēce of essence. By these names that betoken distinction (sayth Augustine) that is ment wherby they haue relation one to an other, & not the very substance wherby they are all one. By which meaning are the sayinges of the old wryters to be made agree, which otherwise would seeme not a little to disagree. For sometime they say that the Father is the beginning of the Sonne, & somtime that the Sonne hath both godhead & essence of himselfe, and is all one beginning with the Father. The cause of this diuerfity Augustine doth in an other place wel & plainly declare, whē he saith: Christ hauing respect to himselfe, is called God, & to his Father is called the Sonne. And againe, the Father as to himselfe is called God, as to his Sonne is called the Father, where hauing respect to the Sonne he is called the Father, he is not the Sonne: & where as to the Father he is called the Sonne, he is not the Father: & where he is called as to himselfe the Father, and as to himselfe the Sonne; it is all one God. Therefore when we simply speake of the Sonne: without hauing respect to the Father, we do well & proprely say, that he is of himselfe: & therefore we call him but one beginning: but when we make mentiō of the relation betwene him and his Father, then we rightly make the Father the beginning of the Sonne. All the whole fifth booke of Augustine concerning the Trinity doth nothing but set fourth this matter. And much safer it is to rest in that relation that he speaketh of, than in to suttelly pearfing vnto the hie mistery to wander abroad by many vayne speculations.

20 Let them therefore that are pleased with sobernesse, and contented with measure of Faith, shortly learne so much as is profitable to be knowen: that is, when we professe that we beleue in one God, vnder the name of God, we vnderstand the one onely & single essence in which we comprehend three Persons or Hypostascs. And therefore so oft as we do indefinitely speake of the name of God, we meane no lesse the Sonne and the Holy ghost than the Father. But when the Sonne is ioyned to the Father, then commeth in a relation, and so we make distinctiō betwene the Persons. And because the proprietes in the Persons bring an order with them, so as the beginning and originall is in the Father: so oft as mention is made of the Father and the Sonne, or the Holy ghost together, the name of God is peculiarly giuen to the Father. By this meane is retayned the vnity of y^e essence, and regarde is hadde to the order, which yet doth minish nothing of the godhead of the Sonne and of the Holy ghost. And whereas we haue already seene that the Apostles do affirme, that the Sonne of God is he, whom Moses and the Prophetes do testifie to be Iehouah the Lord, we must of necessity alway come to the vnity of the essence. Wherefore it is a detestable sacrilege for vs to call the Sonne a seuerall God from the Father, because the simple name of God, doth admitte no relation, and God in respect of himselfe can not be sayd to be this or that, Now, that the name of Iehouah 1. Cor. the Lord indefinitely taken is applied to Christ, appeareth by the 12. 9. wordes of Paule, where he sayeth: Therefore I haue thryse prayed the Lord, because that after he hadde receiued the aunswere of Christ, My grace is sufficient for the: he sayeth byandby, that the power of Christ may dwell in me. It is certayne that the name Lord is there sette for Iehouah, and therefore to restrayne it to the person of the Mediatour were very fond and childish, for so much as it is an absolute sentēce that compareth not the Father with the Sonne. And we know that after the accustomed maner of the Greekes, the Apostles do commonly sette the word Kyrios, Lord, in steede of Iehouah. And, not to fetch an example farre of, Paule didde in no other sense pray to the Lord, than in the same sense that Peter citeth the A& 2. place of Ioell: whosoever calleth vppon the name of the Lord shall 16. be saued. But where this name is peculiarly giuen to the Sonne, we Ioel. 2. shall see that there is an other reason therof, whē we come to a place 28. fitte for it. Now it is enough to haue in minde, when Paule had absolutely prayed to God, he byandby bringeth in the name of Christ. Euen so is the whole God called by Christ himselfe the Spirite.

Cap. 13. Of the knowledge of
For there is no cause against it, but that the whole essence of God may be spirituall, wherein the Father, the Sonne & the Holy ghost be comprehended: Which is very playne by the Scripture. For euen as there we heare God to be made a Spirite : so we do heare the Holy ghost, for so much it is an Hypostasis of the whole essence, to be called both God, and proceeding from God.

21. But for as much as Sathan, to the end to roote out our Faith, hath alway moued great contentions, partly concerning the diuine essence of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost, and partly concerning theyr distinction of Persones. And as in a maner in all ages he hath stirred vp wicked spirites to trouble the true teachers in this behalfe: so at this day he trauaileth out of the old embres to kindle a new fire: therefore here it is good to answer the peruerse foolish errors of some. Hitherto it hath bin our purpose, to leade as it were by the hand those that are willing to learne, and not to striue hand to hand with the obstinate and contentious. But now the trueth which we haue already peaceably shewed, must be reskued from the cauillations of the wicked. All be it my chiefe trauaile shall yet be applied to this end, that they which giue gentill and open eares to the word of God, may haue whereupon stedfastly to rest their foote. In this point, if any where at all in the secreete mysteries of Scripture, we ought to dispute soberly, and with great moderation, and to take great hede that neither our thought nor our tongue proceede any further than the boundes of Gods word do extende. For how may the minde of man by his capacity define the immeasurable essence of God, which neuer yet could certainly determine how great is y^e body of the Sunne which yet he daily seeth with his eyes? yea how may she by her owne guiding attaine to discusse the substaunce of God, that can not reache to know her owne substaunce? Wherefore let vs willingly giue ouer vnto God the knowledge of himselfe. For he only, as Hilarie sayeth, is a conuenient witnesse to himselfe, which is not knowē but by himselfe. We shall giue it ouer vnto him, if we shall both conceiue him to be such as he hath opened himselfe vnto vs, and shall not else where search to know of him, than by his owne word. There are to this end wrytten fise homelies of Chrysofome against the Anomei. Yet the boldnesse of Sophisters could not be restrayned by them from babbling vnbridledly. For they haue behaued themselues in this belialfe no whit more modestly than they are wonted in all other. By the vn-happie successe of which vndiscretion, we ought to be warned to take care that we bend our selues to trauale in this question rather with tractable willingnesse to learne, than with sharpnesse of witte, and neuer uer haue in our minde either to search for God any where else than in his holy Worde, or to thinke any thing of him, but hauing his Worde going before to guide vs, or to speake any thinge but that which is taken out of the same Word: The distinction that is in the one Godhead of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghost, as it is very hard to know, so doth it bring more businesse and comberance to some wittes than is expedient. Lette them remember that the mindes of men do enter into a mase when they follow their owne curiosity, and so lette them suffer themselues to be ruled with the heauenly oracles, how soeuer they can not attaine the height of the mystery.

sayth, that the eternall Word of God was the Spirite of Christ with God, & the bright shining of his forme. Againe, that the Holy ghost was the shadow of the godhead, yet afterward he bringeth the godhead of them both to nothing, affirming that after the rate of distribution there is both in the Sonne and in the Holy Spirite a parte of God, euē as the same Spirite in vs, and also in wood and stones is substantially a portion of God. What he babbleth of the Person of the Mediatour, we shall herafter see in place conuenient. But this monstrous forged deuise, that a Person is nothing else but a visible forme of the glory of God, needeth no long confutation. For where as Iohn pronouēth, that the Word was God before the world was yet creat, he maketh it much differing from a conception of forme. But if then also, yea and from farthest Eternity of time, that Word which was God was with the Father, & had his owne proper glory with the Father, he could not be an outward or figuratiue shining: but it necessarily followeth that he was an Hypostasis that did inwardly abide in God. And although there be no mention made of the Spirite, but in the Historie of the creation of the world: yet he is not there brought in as a shadow, but an essentiall power of God, when Moses sheweth that the very vnfashioned lump was susteined in him. Therefore it then appeared, that the eternall Spirite was alwayes in God, when he preserued and susteined the confused matter of heauen and earth, vntill beauty and order were added vnto it. Surely he could not yet be an image or representation of God as Seruetto dreameth. But in other pointes he is compelled more openly to disclose his wickednesse, in saying that God by his eternall purpose appointing to himselfe a visible Sonne, did by this meane shew himselfe visible. For if that be true there is no other godhead left vnto Christ, but so far as he is by the eternall decree of God ordeined his Sonne. Moreouer he so transformeth those imagined shapes that he sticketh not to faine new accidents in God. But this of all other is most abhominable, that he confusedly mingleth as well the Sonne of God, as the Holy ghost, with all creatures. For he plainly affirmeth, that there be partes and partitions in the Essence of God, of which euery portiō is God. And namely he sayth, that the Spirites of the faithfull are coeternall and consubstantiall with God: albeit in an other place he assigneth the substantiall Deity, not onely to the soule of man, but also to other creatures.

sons, but adding a manner how: that the Father which truly and properly is the one onely God, in forming the Sonne & the Holy ghost, hath powred his godhead into them. Yea they forbear not this horrible matter of speech, that the Father is by this marke distinguished from the Sonne and the Holy ghost, that he is the only essentiatour or maker of the essence. First they pretende this colour, that Christ is echewhere called the Sonne of God : whereof they gather, that there is none other properly God but the Father. But they marke not, that though the name of God be also common to the Sonne, yet by reason of preeminence it is sometime giuen to the Father onely, because he is the fountaine and originall of the Deity, and that for this purpose, to make the single vnity of the essence to be therby noted. They take exception and say: If he be truly the Sonne of God, it is inconuenient to haue him reckened the Sonne of a Person. I answer that both are true: that is, that he is the Sonne of God, because he is the Word begotten of the Father before all worldes (for we come not yet to speake of the Person of the Mediatour) and yet for explications sake we ought to haue regard of the Person, that the name of God simply be not taken, but for the Father onely. For if we meane none to be God but the Father, we plainly throw downe the Sonne from the degree of God. Therefore so oft as mention is made of the godhead, we must not admit a comparison betwene the Sonne and the Father, as though the name of God did belong onely to the Father. For truly the God that appeared to Esay was the true and onely God, and yet Iohn affirmeth that the same was Christ. And he that by the mouth of Esay testified, that he should be a stumbling stone to the Iewes, was the onely God: and yet Paule pronounceth that the same was Christ. He that crieth out by Esay, I lue, and to me all knees shall bowe, is the onely God: and yet Paul expoundeth that the same was Christ. For this purpose serue the testimonies that the Apostle reciteth: Thou O God hast layd the foundations of heauen & earth. Againe, let all the angels of God worship him, which thinges belong to none, but to the onely God. And yet he sayth, that they are the propre titles of Christ. And this cauillation is nothing worth, that that is giuen to Christ, which is proper to God because Christ is the shining brightnesse of his glory. For because in eche of these places is sette the name of Iehouah, it followeth, that it is so sayd in respect that he is God of himselfe. For if he be Iehouah, it can not be denied that he is the same God that in an other place crieth out by Esay: I, I am, and beside me there is no God. It is good also to consider that saying of Hieremy: The gods that haue not made the heauen & earth, let them perish out of the earth that is vnder the heauen. Where as on the other side we must needs confesse, that the Sonne of God is he, whose godhead is oft proued in Esay by the creation of the world. And how can it be that the Creator, which giueth being to all things, shall not be of himselfe, but borow his being of another. For whosoeuer sayth that the Sonne was essentiate or made to be of his Father, denieth that he is of himselfe. But the Holy ghost sayth the contrary, naming him Iehouah. Now if we graunt that the whole essence is in the Father onely, either it must be made partable, or be taken from the Sonne, and so shall the Sonne be spoyled of his essence, and be a God only in name and title. The essence of God, if we beleue these triflers: belongeth onely to the Father, for as much as he is onely God, and is the essence-maker of the Sonne. And so shall the godhead of the Sonne be an abstract from the essence of God, or a deriuation of a parte out of the whole. Now must they needs graunt by their owne principle, that the holy ghost is the Spirite of the Father only. For if he be a deriuation from the first essence, which is only proper to the Father, of right he can not be accompted the Spirite of the Sonne: which is confuted by the testimony of Paul, where he maketh the Spirite common to Christ and the Father. Moreouer if the Person of the Father be wiped out of the Trinity, wherein shall he differ from the Sonne and the Holy ghost, but in this, that he only is God? They cōfesse Christ to be God, and yet they say he differeth from the Father. Againe, there must be some marke of difference to make that the Father be not the Sonne. They which say that marke of difference to be in the essence, do manifestly bring the true godhead of Christ to nothing, which can not be without essence, yea and that the whole essence. The Father differeth not from the Sonne, vnlesse he haue something proper to himselfe that is not common to the Sonne. What now will they finde wherein to make him different? If the difference be in the essence, let them answer if he haue not communicated the same to the Sonne. But that could not be in parte, for to say that he made halfe a God were wicked. Beside that by this meane they do fowly teare in sunder the essence of God. It remaineth therefore that the essence is whole, and perfectly common to the Father and the Sonne. And if that be true, then as touching the essence there is no difference of the one of them from the other. If they say that the Father in giuing his essence, remaineth neuerthelesse the only God, with whom the essence abideth: then Christ shall be a figuratiue God, and a God onely in shew and in name but not in deede: because nothing is more propre to God thã to be, according to this saying: He that is, hath sent me vnto you. Exod. 5

24 It is easie by many places to proue that it is false which they hold, that so oft as there is in Scripture mention made absolutely of God, none is ment thereby but the Father. And in those places that they themselues do allege, they fowly bewray their owne want of cōsideration, because there is also sette the name of the Sonne. Whereby appeareth, that the name of God is there relatiuely takē, and therefore restrained to the Person of the Father. And their obiection where they say, If the Father were not only the true God, he should himself be his owne Father, is answered with one word. It is not inconuenient for degree and orders sake, that he be peculiarly called God which hath not onely of himselfe begotten his wisdom, but also is the God of the Mediatour, as in place fitte for it, I will more largely declare. For sith Christ was openly shewed in the flesh, he is called the Sonne of God, not onely in respect that he was the eternall Word before all worldes begotten of the Father: but also because he tooke vpon him the Person and office of the Mediatour to ioyne vs vnto God. And because they dō so boldly exclude the Sonne from the honor of God, I would fayne know whether the Sonne when he pronounceth, that none is good but God, do take goodnesse from himselfe? Mat. 19.
17. I do not speake of his humaine nature, least perchappes they should take exception, and say, that whatsoever goodnesse was in it, it came of free gift. I aske whether the eternall Word of God be good or no? If they say nay, then we hold their vngodlinesse sufficiently cōuincid: in saying yea, they confound themselues. But where as at the first sight, Christ seemeth to put from himselfe the name of Good, that doth the more confirme our meaning. For sith it is the singular title of God alone, forasmuch as he was after the common maner saluted by the name of Good, in refusing false honor, he did admonish them, that the goodnesse wherein he excelled, was the goodnesse that God hath. I aske also, where Paule affirmeth that onely Tim. 11.
17. God is immortall, wise, and true, whether by these wordes Christ be brought into the number of men mortall, foolish, and false? Shall not he then be immortall, that from the beginning was life to giue immortality to angels? Shall not he be wise that is the eternall wisdom of God? Shall not the trueth it selfe be true? I aske furthermore, Phil. 2.
10. whether they thinke that Christ ought to be worshipped or no? For he claimeth this vnto himselfe, to haue all knees bowe before him: it followeth that he is the God which did in the law forbid any other to be worshipped but himselfe. If they will haue that meant of the

Esa. 44.
6. Father only which is spoken in Esay : I am, and none but I: this testimonie I turne against themselues, for as much as we see, that whatsoever pertayneth to God is giuen to Christ. And their cauillation hath no place, that Christ was exalted in the flesh, wherein he had bin abased, and that in respect of the flesh, all authority is giuen him in heauen and in earth : because although the maiestie of king and Iudge extende to the whole Person of the Mediatour, yet if he hadde not bin God openly shewed in flesh, he could not haue bin auanced to such heighth, but that God should haue disagreed with himselfe. But this controuersie Paule doth well take away, teaching that he was egall with God before that he didde abase himselfe vnder the shape of a seruaunt. Nowe howe coulde this equalitie haue stande together, vnlesse he hadde bin the same God whose name is Iah and Iehouah : that rydeth vppon the Cherubin, that is kinge of all the earth and Lord of the worldes? Nowe howe soeuer they babble against it, it canne not be taken from Christ which Esaie sayeth in an other place : He, he, is our God, for him we haue wayted, whereas in these wordes he describeth the comming of God the redeemer, not onely that shoulde bring home the people from the exile of Babylon, but also fully in all poyntes restore the Church. And with theyr other cauillation they nothinge preuayle, in saying, that Christ was God in his Father. For though we confesse that in respect of order and degree the beginning of the godheade is in the Father, yet we say that it is a detestable inuention to say that the essence is onely propre to the Father, as though he were the onely Godmaker of the Sonne. For by this meanes eyther he shoulde haue moe essence than one, or else they call Christ God onely in title and imagination. If they graunt that Christ is God, but next after the Father, then shall the essence be in him begotten and fashioned, which in the Father is vnbegotten and vnfashioned. I knowe that many quicke nosed men do laugh at this that we gather the distinction of Persons out of the wordes of Moses, where he bringeth in God speaking thus : Lette vs make manne after our image. But yet the godly readers do see how vaynely and fondely Moses should bring in, this as a talke of diuerse together, if there were not in God moe Persons than one. Nowe certayne is it, that they whom the Father spake vnto, were vncreate : but nothing is vncreate but God himselfe yea the one onely God. Nowe therefore vnlesse they graunt that the power of creating was common, and the authoritie of commaunding common, to the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost : it shall followe followe that God didde not inwardly thus speake to himselfe, but directed his speeche to other foreyne worke menne. Finally one place shall easly aunswere two of theyr obiections. For where as Christ himselfe pronounceth that God is a Spirite, this were not conuenient to be restrayned to the Father onely, as if the Worde himselfe were not of Spirituall nature. If then the name of Spirite doth as well agree with the Sonne as with the Father, I gather that the Sonne is also comprehended vnder the indefynite name of God. But he addeth byandby after that, none are allowed for good worshippers of the Father, but they that worshippe him in Spirite and trueth, whereupon followeth an other thinge, because Christ doth vnder a heade execute the office of a teacher, he doth giue the name of God to the Father, not to the intent to destroye his owne godheade, but by degrees to lift vs vppeto it.

25 But in this they are deceiued, that they dreame of certayne vndiuided singular thinges whereof ech haue a parte of the essence. But by the Scriptures we teach, that there is but one essentially God, and therefore that the essence as well of the Sonne as of the Holy ghost is vnbegotten. But for so much as the Father is in order first, and hath of himselfe begotten his wisdom, therefore rightfully as is aboue sayd, he is counted the originall and fountrayne of all the godhead. So God indefinitely spoken, is vnbegotten, and the Father also in respect of Person is vnbegotten. And foolishly they thinke that they gather, that by our meaning is made a quaternity, because falsely and cauillously they ascribe vnto vs a deuise of their owne brayne; as though we did fayne that by deriuation there come three Persons out of one essence: whereas it is euident by our wrytinges that we do not draw the Persons out of the essence, but although they be abiding in the essence we make a distinctiō betwene them. If the Persons were seuered from the essence, then peradventure theyr reason were like to be true. But by that meane it should be a Trinity of goddes and not of Persons, which one God conteyneth in him. So is their fonde question aunswered, whether the essence do mete to make vp the Trinity as though we did imagine that there descende three gods out of it. And this exception groweth of like foolishnesse where they say, that then the Trinity should be without God. For though it mete not to make vppe the distinction as a parte or a member, yet neither are the Persons without it nor out of it. Because the Father if he were not God could not be the Father, and the Sonne is none otherwise the Sonne but because he is God. We say therefore, that the godhead is absolutely of it selfe. Whereby we graunt that the Sonne in so much as he is God, is of himselfe without respecte of his Person, but in somuch as he is the Sonne, we say that he is of the Father. So his essence is without beginning, but the beginning of his Person is God himselfe. And the true teaching wryters that in old time haue spoken of the Trinity, haue onely applied this name to the Persons, for somuch as it were not onely an absurde errour but also a grosse vngodlinesse to comprehend the essence in the distinction. For they that will haue these three to mete, the essence, the Sonne and the Holy ghoft, it is playne that they do destroy the essence of the Sonne and the Holy ghoft, for else the partes ioyned together would fall in sunder, which is a fault in euery distinction. Finally if the Father and the Sonne were Synonimes or seuerall names signifying one thing, so the Father should be the Godmaker and nothing should remayne in the Sonne but a shadowe, and the Trinity should be nothing else, but the ioyning of one God with two creatures.

26 Whereas they obiect, that if Christ be properly God, he is not rightfully called the Sonne, to that we haue already answered, that because in such places there is a comparison made of the one Person to the other, the name of God is not there indefinitely taken, but restrayned to the Father onely, in so much as he is the beginning of the Godheade, not in making of essence as the madde men do fondly imagine, but in respect of order. In this meaning is construed that saying of Christ to the Father: this is the eternall life, that men beleue in thee y^e one true God, & Iesus Christ whom thou hast sent. For speaking in the Person of the Mediatour, he keepeth the degree that is meane betwene God and men: and yet is not his maiesty thereby diminished. For though he abaced himselfe, yet he left not with the Father his glory that was hidden before the world. So the Apostle in the second Chapter to the Hebrues, though he confesseth that Christ for a shorte time was abaced beneth the Angels, yet he sticketh not to affirme withall, that he is the same eternal God that founded the earth. We must therefore hold, that so oft as Christ in the Person of the Mediatour speaketh to the Father, vnder this name of God is comprehended the godhead which is his also. So whē he sayed to the Apostles: it is profitable that I go vp to the Father, because the Father is greater. He giueth not vnto himselfe onely the second degree of godhead to be as touching his eternall essence inferior to the Father, but because hauing obtayned the heauēly glory, he gathereth together the faithfull to the partaking of it. He setteth teth his Father in the hier degree , insomuch as the glorious perfection of brightnesse that appeareth in heauen, differeth frō that measure of glory that was scene in him being clothed with flesh. After like maner in an other place, Paul sayth: that Christ shall yeld vp the kingdom to God and his Father, that God may be all in all. There is nothing more absurd than to take away eternall continuance from the godhead of Christ. If he shall neuer cease to be the Sonne of God, but shall alway remayne the same that he was from the beginning, it followeth that vnder the name of the Father is comprehēded the one essence that is common to them both. And surely therefore did Christ descende vnto vs, that lifting vs vppe vnto his Father, he might also lift vs vp vnto himselfe, inasmuch as he is all one with his Father. It is therefore neither lawfull nor right so exclusiue to restraine the name of God to the Father, as to take it from the Sonne. For, Iohn doth for this cause affirme that he is true God, that no man should thinke that he resteth in a second degree of godhead beneath his Father. And I maruell what these framers of new Gods do meane, that while they confesse Christ to be true God, yet they forth with exclude him from the godhead of his Father. As though there could any be a true God but he that is the one God, or as though the godhead powred from one to an other, be not a certaine new forged imagination.

27 Whereas they heape vp many places out of Ireneus, where he affirmeth that the Father of Christ is the onely and eternall God of Israel: that is either done of a shamefull ignoraunce, or of an extreme wickednesse. For they ought to haue considered, that then the holy man hadde to do in disputation with those frenlike men that denyed that the Father of Christ was the same God that in old time spake by Moses and the Prophetes, but that he was I wote not what imagined thing brought out of the corruption of the world. Therefore he altogether trauaileth in this point, to make it playne that there is no other God preached of in the Scripture but the Father of Christ, and that it is amisse to deuise any other, and therefore it is no maruell if he so oft conclude that there was no other God of Israel, but he that was spoken of by Christ and the Apostles. And in like manner now, whereas we are to stand against an other sorte of errour, we may truly say that the God which in old time appeared to the Fathers, was none other but Christ. But if any manne obiect that it was the Father, our aunswere is in redinesse, that when we striue to defende the Godhead of the Sonne, we exclude not the Father. If the readers take heede to this purpose of Ire-neus, all that contention shall ceasse. And also by the sixt Chapter of the third booke, this whole strife is ended, where the good man standeth all vpon this point, to proue that he which is in Scripture absolutely and indefinitely called God: is verely the one onely God, and that Christ is absolutely called God. Let vs remember that this was the principall point whereupon stode all his disputation, as by the whole proesse thereof doth appeare: and specially the 46. Chapter of the second booke, that he is not called the Father by darke similitude

Lib. 3. or parable, which is not very God in deede. Moreouer in an other cap. 9. place he sayth, that as well the Sonne as the Father were ioyntly called God by the Prophetes and Apostles. Afterward he defineth how Christ which is Lord of all, and king, and God, and Iudge, receiued power from him which is the God of all, that is to say in respect of his subiection, because he was humbled euen to y^e death of the crosse. Cap 12. eiusd. li.
Cap 16. eiusd. li. And a little after he affirmeth, that the Sonne is the maker of heauen and earth, which gaue the law by the hande of Moses and appeared to the Fathers. Now if any man do prate that with Ireneus onely the Father is the God of Israel, I will turne againe vpon him that which the same wryter playnely teacheth, that Christ is all one and the same: as also he applieth vnto him the Prophecie of Habacuc.

Ibi. ca. God shall come out of the South. To the same purpose serueth that 18. & 23 which is read in the ninth Chapter of the fourth booke. Christ himselfe therefore with the Father is the God of the liuing. And in the twelue Chapter of the same booke he expoundeth that Abraham beleued God, because Christ is the maker of heauen and earth and the onely God.

28 And with no more trueth do they bring in Tertulliane for theyr defender. For though he be rough sometime and crabbed in his manner of speech, yet doth he plainly teach the summe of that doctrine that we defende. That is to say, where as he is the one God, yet by disposition and order he is his Worde: that there is but one God in vnity of substance, and yet that the same vnity by mistery of orderly distribution is disposed into Trinity, that there are three, not in state, but in degree, not in substance, but in forme: not in power, but in order. He sayeth that he defendeth the Sonne to be a seconde next to the Father, but he meaneth him to be none other than the Father, but by way of distinction. In some places he sayeth that the Sonne is visible. But when he hath reasoned on both partes he defineth that he is inuisible in so much as he is the Worde. Finally where he affirmeth that the Father is determined in his owne person, he proueth himselfe farre from that error which which we confute. And though he doth acknowledge none other God but the Father, yet in the next peece of his wryting expounding himfelfe, he fayth, that he speaketh not excluſiuely in reſpect of the Sonne, becauſe he denieth that y^e Sonne is any other God beſide the Father, and that therefore their ſole gouernement is not broken by diſtinction of Perſon. And by the perpetuall courſe of his purpoſe it is eaſie to gather the meaning of his words. For he diſputeth againſt Praxeas, that though God be diſtinguiſhed into three perſons, yet are there not made many gods nor the vnity torne in ſunder. And becauſe by the imagination of Praxeas Chriſt could not be God, but he muſt alſo be the Father, therefore he ſomuch laboureth about the diſtinction. Whereas he calleth y^e Word & the Spirit a portiō of the whole although it be a hard kinde of ſpeech, yet is it excuſable, becauſe it is not referred to the ſubſtaunce, but only ſheweth the diſpoſition & order that belongeth only to the Perſons, as Tertulliane himſelfe witeſſeth. And herof hangeth that. How many Perſons thinkeſt thou there are, O moſt frowarde Praxeas, but euen ſo many as there be names? And ſo a little after that, they may beleue the Father and the Sonne ech in their names and perſons. Hereby I thinke may be ſufficiently cōfuted their impudency that ſeeke to begyle the ſimple with colour of Tertullians authority.

29 And ſurely whoſoeuer ſhall diligētly compare together y^e wrytinges of the old authors, ſhall finde no other thing in Ireneus, than that which hath bin taught by other that came after. Juſtine is one of the auncienteſt, and he in all things doth agree with vs. Yet lette them obiect that he as the reſt do, calleth the Father of Chriſt the only God. The ſame thing doth Hilary teach, yea and ſpeaketh more hardly, that the eternity is in the Father. But doth he that to take away the eſſence of God from the Sonne? And yet is he altogether in defence of the ſame Faith that we followe. Yet are they not aſhamed to picke out certaine mangled ſentences whereby they would perſwade that Hilary is a Patrone of their errour. When they bring in Ignatius: if they will haue that to be of any authority, let them proue that the Apoſtles made a law for lent & ſuch like corruptions of religion. Nothing is more vnſauery than thoſe ſonde trifles that are publiſhed vnder the name of Ignatius. Wherefore their impudence is ſo much leſſe tolerable that diſguiſe themſelues with ſuch viſers to deceiue. Moreouer the conſent of the auncient Fathers is plainely perceiued by this, that at the councell of Nice, Arrius neuer durſt allege for himſelfe the authority of any one allowed writer. And none of the Greks or Latins doth excuſe himſelfe and ſay, that he diſſenteth from them that were before. It needeth not to be spoken how Augustine, whom these losells do most hate, hath diligently searched the wrytinges of them all, and how reuerently he did embrace them. Truly euen in matters of least weight he vseth to shew what compelleth him to dissent from them. And in this matter, if he haue read any thing doutfull or darke in other, he hydeth it not. But the doctrine that these méstrue against, he taketh it as confessed, that from the farthest time of antiquity it hath bin without cōtrouersie receiued. And by one word it appeareth that he was not ignorant what other had taught before him, where he sayeth that in the Father is vnity, in the first booke of Christian doctrine, will they say that he then forgate himselfe? But in an other place he purgeth himselfe from such reproch, where he calleth the Father the beginning of the whole godhead, because he is of none: considering in dede wisely that the name of God is specially ascribed to the Father, because if the beginning should not be reckened at him, the single vnity of God can not be conceiued. By this I trust the godly reader will perceiue that all the caullations are confuted wherewith Satan hath hitherto attépted to peruert or darken the pure trueth of doctrine. Finally I trust that the whole summe of doctrine in this point is fully declared, if the readers will temper them of curiosity, and not more greedely than mete is seke for combersome & entangled disputations. For I take not in hand to please them, that do delite in an yntemperate desire of speculation. Truly I haue omitted nothing of suttle purpose that I thought to make against me. But while I study to edifie the church, I thought it best, to leaue many things vntouched which both smally profited, and would greue the readers with superfluous tediousnesse. For to what purpose were it to dispute, whether the father do alway beget? Forasmuch as it is folly to fayne a continuall act of begetting, sith it is euident that from eternity there haue bin three Persons in God.

Although Esay doth worthily reproche the worshippers of false Goddes with slouthfullnesse, for that they haue not learned by the very foundations of the earth, and rounde compasse of the heauens, which is the true God: yet such is the dullnesse and grossenesse of our witte, that least the faythfull shoulde fall away to the inuentions of the Gentiles., it was necessary necessary to haue God more expressly painted out vnto them. For whereas the saying that God is the minde of the worlde, which is compted the most tolerable description that is founde among the Philosophers, is but vaine, it behoueth vs more familiarly to know him, least we alway wauer in doutefulnesse. Therefore it was his pleasure to haue an history of the creacion remaining, wherupon the Faith of the Church might reſte, and ſeke for no other God but him, whom Moſes hath declared to be the maker and bilder of the world. There is firſt ſet forth the time, that by continuall proceeding of yeres the faithfull might come to the firſt original of mankind, and of all thinges. Which knowledge is very neceſſary, not onely to confute thoſe monſtrous fables that ſometime were ſpred in Egypte & other partes of the worlde, but alſo, that the beginning of the worlde ones being knowen, the eternitie of God may more clerely ſhine forth and rauish vs in admiraciõ of it. Neither ought we to be any thing moued with that vngodly mocke, that it is maruell why it came no ſoner in the minde of God to make the heauē and the earth, & why he ſitting idle did ſuffer ſo immeaſurable a ſpace to paſſe away, ſith he mought haue made it many thouſande ages before: wheras the whole continuance of the worlde that now draweth to an end, is not yet come to ſixe thouſande yeres. For why God ſo long differred it, is nether lawful nor expedient for vs to enquire. Becauſe if mans minde will traualle to attein thereunto, it ſhall faile a hundred times by the way, neither were it profitable for vs to know that thing which God himſelfe to proue the modeſtie of our Faith, hath of purpoſe willed to be hidden. And well did that godly olde man ſpeake, which when a wanton fellow did in ſcorne demaunde of him, what God had done before the creatiõ of the world, answered that he builded hel for curious fooles. Let this graue & ſeuere warning repreſſe the wantonneſſe that tickleth many yea and driueth them to euill and hurtefull ſpeculatiõs. Finally let vs remember that the ſame inuiſible God whoes wiſdom power and iuſtice is incomprehenſible, doth ſet before vs the hitoriẽ of Moſes as a loking glaſſe, wherin his liuely imagine appeareth. For as the eyes that either are growen dimme with age, or dilled with any diſeaſe, do not diſcerne any thing plainly vnleſſe they be holpen with ſpectacles: ſo, ſuch is our weakenefſe, that vnleſſe the Scripture direct vs in ſeking of God, we do forthwith runne out into vanitie. And they that follow their owne wantonneſſe, becauſe they be now warned in vaine, ſhall all to late ſele with horrible deſtruction, how much it had bin better for them reuerētly to receiue the ſecrete counſels of God, than to vomite out blaſphemies, to obſcure the heauen with all. And De ciui. moue question of immeasurable spaces of times than of places. For dei lib. how brode soeuer the circuit of the heauen is, yet is there some mea-40. sure of it. Now if one should quarel with God for that the emptinesse wherin nothing is contained, is a hundred times more, shall not all the godly abhorre such wātonnesse? Into like madnesse runne they that busie them selues about Gods sitting still, because at their appointmēt he made not the worlde innumerable ages soner. To satisfie their owne gredinesse of minde, they couet to passe without the compasse of the worlde, as though in so large a circuite of heauen & earth, they coulde not finde thinges enough that with their inestimable bright-nesse may ouerwhelme all our senses: as though in six thousand yeres God hath not shewed examples in continuall consideracion, wherof our mindes may be exercised. Let vs therefore willingly abide enclosed within those boundes wherwith it pleased God to enuiron vs, and as it were to penne vp our mindes that they should not stray abroad with liberty of wandring.

2 For like reason is it that Moses declareth, that the worke of God was not ended in a moment but in six dayes. For by this circumstance we are withdrawen from forged inuēcions to the one onely God that diuided his worke into six dayes, that it should not greue vs to be occupied all the time of our life in considering of it. For though our eyes, what way soeuer we turne them, are compelled to looke vpon the workes of God, yet see we how fickle our hede is, and if any godly thoughtes do touch vs, how sone they passe away. Here againe mā's reason murmureth as though such procedinges were disagreeing from the power of God, vntill such time as being made subiect to the obedience of Faith, she learne to kepe that reste wherunto the hallowing of the seuen day calleth vs. But in the very order of thinges, is diligently to be considered the Fatherly loue of God towarde mankinde, in this: that he did not create Adam vntill he had stored the world with all plenty of good thinges. For if he had placed him in the earth while it was yet barren and emptie, if he had geuen him life before that there was any light, he shoulde haue semed not so well to prouide for his commoditie. But now where he first disposed the motions of the Sunne and the Planets for the vse of man, and furnished the earth, the waters and the aire with liuing creatures, and brought forth abundance of fruites to suffice for foode, taking vpon him the care of a diligent & prouident householder, he shewed his marvellous

boontie towarde vs. If a man do more hedefully weye with himselfe those things that I do but shortly touch, it shall appeare that Moses was the sure witnesse & publisser of the one God the creator. I omitt here that which I haue already declared, that he speaketh not there onely of the bare essence of God, but also setteth forth vnto vs his eternall Wisdom and Spirite, to the ende we should not dreame that God is any other, than such as he will be knowen by the image that he hath there expressed.

3 But before that I begin to speake more at large of the nature of man, I must say somewhat of Angels. Because though Moses applying himselfe to the rudenesse of the common people reciteth in his history of the creaciō no other workes of God but such as are seen with our eyes, yet wheras afterwarde he bringeth in Angels for ministers of God, we may easily gather that he was the creator of them in whoes seruice they employ their trauaile and offices. Though therefore Moses speakeing after the capacity of the people doth not at the very beginning rehearse the Angels among the creatures of God: yet that is no cause to the contrary, but that we may plainly and expressly speake those things of them, which in other places the Scripture commonly teacheth. Because if we desire to know God by his workes, so noble and excellent an example is not to be omitted. Beside that this pointe of doctrine is very necessary for the confuting of many errors. The excellence of the nature of Angels hath so daselled the mindes of many, that they thought the Angels had wrong offred them, if they should be made subiect to the authoritie of one God, & brought as it were in obedience. And here vpon were they fained to be Gods. There rose vp also one Manicheus with his secte, which made themselves two originall beginnings of thinges, God, and the Deuell, and to God he assigned the beginning of good thinges, and of thinges of euill nature he determined the Deuill to be the author. If our mindes should be entangled with this error, God should not kepe whole his glory in the creacion of the world. For where as nothing is more proper to God than eternitie and a being of himselfe as I may so terme it, they which geue that vnto the Deuill, do they not in a maner geue him the title of Godhead? Now where is the almightinesse of God become, if such authoritie be graunted to the deuill, that he may put in execucion what he will though God say nay and withstande it? As for the onely fundation that the Manichees haue, that it is vnlawfull to ascribe vnto God that is good, the creation of any thing that is euil: that nothing hurteth the true Faith, which admitteth not that there is any thing naturally euill in the whole vniuersalitie of the worlde, because neither the frowardnesse and malice both of man and the deuell, nor the finnes that procede therof, are of nature, but of the corruption of nature. Neither was there any thing from the beginning, wherein God hath not shewed an example both of his wisdom and iustice. Therefore to aunswere these peruerse deuises: it behoueth vs to lift vp our mindes hier than our eyes can atteine to see. For which cause it is likely, that where in the Nicene crede God is called the creator of all thinges, thinges inuisible are expressed. Yet will we be carefull to kepe the measure that the rule of godlinesse appointeth, least the readers with searching to vnderstande further than is expedient, should wander abroad, being ledde awaie from the simplicitie of Faith. And surely for as much as the Holy ghost teacheth vs alwaie for our profite, and such thinges as are smally auaylable to edifie, he doth either leaue wholly vnspoken, or but lightly, and as it were ouer-runningly touch them: it shall be also our duetie to be content not to know those thinges that do not profite vs.

4 That the Angels, for as much as they are the ministers of God ordeined to execute his commaundementes, are also his creatures, it ought to be certainly out of all question. To moue doute of the time and order that they were created in, shoulde it not rather be a busy waywardnesse than diligence? Moses declareth that the earth was made, and the heauens were made, with all their armies, to what purpose thā is it, curiously to search, what day the other more secrete armies of heauen beside the starres and planettes first began to be? But, because I will not be long: let vs, as in the whole doctrine of religion, so here also remembre that we ought to kepe one rule of modestie & sobrietie, that of obscure thinges we neither speake, nor thinke, nor yet desire to know any other thinges than that hath bin taught vs by the worde of God: and an other point, that in reading of Scripture we continually rest vpon the searching and studying of such thinges as pertaine to edification, and not geue our selues to curiositie or study of thinges vnprofitable. And because it was Gods pleasure to instruct vs, not in triflyng questions, but in sounde godlinesse, feare of his name, true confidence, and duties of holinesse: let vs rest vpon such knowlledge. Wherefore, if we will be rightly wise, we must leaue those vanities that ydle men haue taught without warrāt of the worde of God, concerning the nature, degrees, and multitude of Angels. I know that such matters as this, are by many more gredily taken holde of, and are more pleasant vnto them thā such thinges as lie in dayly vse. But if it greue vs not to be the scholers of Christ, let it not greue vs to follow that order of learning that he hath appointed. So shall it so come to passe, passe, that being contented with his scholing, we shall not onely forbear but also abhorre superfluous speculations, from which he calleth vs away. No man can deny, that the same Denyse, what soeuer man he was, hath disputed many things both subtilly and wittily in his Hierarchie of heauen: but if a man examine it more neerely, he shall finde that for the most parte it is but mere babbling. But the dutifull purpose of a diuine is, not to delite eares with prating, but to stablish consciences with teaching things true, certaine, and profitable. If one should reade that booke, he would thinke that the man were slipped downe from heauen, and did tell of things not that he had learned by heresay, but that he had seen with his eies. But Paule which was rauished about the thirde heauen, hath vttered no such thing, but also protesteth, that it is not lawful for man to speake the secretes that he had seen. Therefore bidding farewell to that triflyng wisdom, let vs consider by the simple doctrine of the Scripture, what the Lord would haue vs know concerning his Angels.

It is comonly read in the Scripture, that the Angels are heauenly Spirites, whose ministracion & seruice God vseth for putting in execution of those things that he hath decreed. For which reason that name is geuen them, because God vseth them as messengers, to shewe him selfe vnto men. And vpon like reason are deriued the other names that they are called by. They are named armies, because they do like a garde enuiron their prince, and do adorne and set forth the honourable shew of his maiestie, and like souldiours they are alway attending vpon the ensigne of their capitaine, and are cuer so prepared and in readynesse to do his commaundementes, that so sone as he doth but becken to them, they prepare the selues to worke, or rather be at their worke alredy. Such an image of the throne of God to set out his roialtie, the other prophetes do describe, but principally Daniel where he saith, that when God sate him down in his throne of iudgement, there stode by a thousande thousande, and ten thousande companies of ten thousandes of Angels. And because God doth by them maruailously shew forth and declare the might and strength of his hand, therefore they are named strengths, because he exerciseth & vseth his authorite in the worlde by them, therefore they are sometime called Principalties, sometime powers, sometime Dominions. Finally because in them as it were sitteth the glory of God, for this cause also they are called Thrones: though of this last name I will not certainly say, because another exposition doth either as well or better agree with it. But (speaking nothing of that name) the Holy ghost often vseth those other former names to auance the dignitie of the ministerie of Angels. For it were not reason that those instrumentes should be let passe without honor, by whom God doth specially shew the presence of his maiesty. Yea for that reason they are many times called Gods, because in their ministry as in a looking glasse, they partly represent vnto vs the god-head. Although in deede I mislike not this that the olde writers do expound, that Christ was the Angel, wher the Scripture saith, that the angel of God appered to Abraham, Iacob, Moses, & other, yet oftentimes where mention is made of all the Angels in deede this name is geuen vnto them. And that ought to seme no meruaile. For if this honour be geuen to princes and gouernors, that in their office they stand in the stede of God that is soueraigne king and iudge, much greater cause there is why it should be geuen to the Angels, in whom the brightnes of the glory of God much more abundantly shineth.

6 But the Scripture standeth most vpon teaching vs that, which might most make to our comforte and confirmacion of Faith: that is to wete, that the Angels are the distributers and administratours of Goddes bountie towarde vs. And therefore the Scripture reciteth, that they watch for our safetic: they take vpon them the defence of vs, they directe our wayes, they take care that no hurtfull thing betide vnto vs. The sentences are vniuersall, which principally pertaine to Christ the head of the Church, and then to all the faithfull. He hath geuen his Angels charge of thee, to kepe thee in all thy wayes. They shall beare thee vp in their handes, least thou chaunce to hitte thy feete against a stone. Againe, The Angell of the Lord standeth rounde about them that feare him, and he doth deliuer them. Wherby God sheweth that he apointeth to his Angels the defence of them, whom he hath taken in hand to kepe. After this order the Angel of the Lord doth comfort Agar when she fled away, and commandeth her to be reconciled to her maistresse. God promiseth to Abraham his seruant an Angell to be the guide of his iourney. Iacob in blessing of Ephraim and Manasses praieth, that the Angell of the Lorde by whom he himselfe had bin deliuered from all euell, may make them prosper. So the Angell was set to defende the tentes of the people of Israell. And so oft as it pleased God to reskue Israell out of the handes of their enemies, he raised vp reuēgers by the ministerie of Angels. So finally (to the ende I nede not to reherse many mo) the Angels ministred to Christ, and were ready assistent to him in all necessities. They brought tidinges to the women of his resurrection, and to the disciples of his glorious comming. And so to fulfill their office of defending vs, they fight against the deuill and all enemies, and do execute the vengeance of God vpon them, that are bent against vs. As we saith that the Angels of children do alway beholde the face of the Father, he seemeth to meane, that there are certaine Angels to whom the preseruacion of them is geuen in charge. But I can not tell whether we ought thereby to gather, that euery one hath his Angell set ouer him. But this is to be holden for certaintie, that not one Angell only hath care of euery one of vs, but that they all by one consent do watche for our safetie. For it is spoken of all the Angels together, that they more reioyce of one sinner cōuerted to repētance, than of nyntie Luc. 15 when they coulde not imagine that it was he, they said it was his Angel. It should seeme that this came in their minde by the commō opinion, that to euery of the faithfull are assigned their Angels for gouernours. Albeit yet here it may be answered that it may wel be, notwithstanding any thing that there appeareth, that we may thinke it was any one Angell, to whom God had geuen charge of Peter for that time, and yet not to be his cōtinuall keeper: as the common people do imagine that there are appointed to euery one two Angels, as it were diuers ghostes, a good Angell and a badde. But it is not worth trauaile, curiously to search for that which doth not much importe vs to know. For if this do not content a man, that all degrees of the armie of heauen do watch for his safetie, I do not see what he can be the better, if he vnderstand that there is one Angell peculiarly appointed to kepe him. And they which restraine vnto one Angell the care that God hath to euery one of vs, do great wrōg to them selues, and to all the membres of the Church: as if that power to succour vs had bin vainely promised vs, wherwith being enuironed and defended, we should fight the more boldly.

8 They that dare take vpon them to define of the multitude and degrees of Angels, let them looke well what foundation they haue. I graunt Michael is called in Daniel, the Great prince, and with Iude, the Archangell. And Paule saith, it shall be an Archangell that shall with sounde of trumpet call men to the Iudgemēt. But who can thereby appoint the degrees of honours between Angels, or discern one from an other by speciall markes, and appoint euery one his place and standing? For the two names that are in Scripture, Michaell, and Gabriel: & if you list to adde the thirde out of the historie of Thobie, may by their signification seme to be geuen to the Angels, according to the capacite of our weakenesse, although I had rather, leaue that exposition at large. As for the numbere of them, wee heare by Christes mouth of many Legions, by Daniell many companies of ten thousandes, the seruant of Elizeus saw many chariottes full: and this declareth that they are a great multitude, that it is said, they do campe rounde about them that feare God. As for shape, it is certaine, that Spirites haue none, and yet the Scripture for the capacite of our wit doth not in vaine vnder Cherubin and Seraphin paint vs out Angels with winges, to the intent we should not dout that they will be euer with incredible swiftnesse, ready to succour vs, so sone as neede shall require, as if the lightning sent from heauen should flie vnto vs with such swiftnesse as it is wonted. What soeuer more than this may be sought of both these pointes, let vs beleue it to be, of that sort of mysteries, wherof the full reuelation is differred to the last day. Wherefore let vs remembre to take hede both of to much curiositie in searching and to much boldnesse in speaking.

9 But this one thing which many troublesome do call in doubtr, is to be holdē for certaintie, that Angels are ministring spirites, whose seruice God vseth for the defence of his, and by whom he both distributeth his benefites among men, and also putteth his other workes in execution. It was in the olde time the opinion of the Sadduces, that by Angels is meant nothing els, but either the motiōs that God doth inspire in men, or the tokens that he sheweth of his power. But against this error crie out so many testimonies of Scripture, that it is meruaile that so grosse ignorance could be suffred in that people. For to omit those places that I haue before alleged, where are recited thousandes and Legions of Angels: where ioy is geuen vnto them: where it is said that they vpholde the Faithfull with their handes, & cary their soules into rest: that they see the face of the Father, and such like: there are other places wherby is clerely proued, that they are in deede Spirites of a nature that hath substance. For where as Stephen and Paule do say,

say, that the law was geuen by the hande of Angels, and Christ saith, Gal. 3. that the elect after the resurrection shall be like vnto Angels: that the day of iudgement is not knowen to the very Angels: that he shall the come with his holy Angels: how soeuer they be writhed, yet must they so be vnderstanded. Likewise when Paule chargeth Timothe before Christ and his chosen Angels, to keepe his commaundementes, he meaneth not qualities or inspirations without substance but very spirites. And otherwise it standeth not together that is written in the Epistle to the Hebrues, that Christ is become more excellent than Angels, that the world is not made subiect to them: that Christ toke vpon him not their nature, but the nature of man. If we meane not the blessed spirites, to whom may these comparisons agree? And the author of that Epistle expoundeth him selfe where he placeth in the kingdome of heauen the soules of the faithfull and the holy Angels together. Also the same that we haue already alleged, that the Angels of children do alway behold the face of God, that they do reioyce at our safetie, that they maruell at the manifolde grace of God in the Church, that they are subiect to Christ, the hedde. To the same purpose serueth this, that they so oft appered to the holy Fathers in the forme of mē, that they talked with them, that they were lodged with them. And Christ him selfe for the principall preminence that he hath in the person of the Mediator is called an Angel. This I thought good to touch by the way, to furnish the simple with defence against those foolish and reasonlesse opinions, that many ages ago raised by Sathan do now and then spring vp againe.

10 Nowe it resteth, that we seeke to mete with that superstition which is commonly wont to crepe in, where it is said: that Angels are the ministers and deliuerers of all good thinges vnto vs. For by and by mans reason falleth to this point, to thinke that therefore all honour ought to be geuen them. So cometh it to passe that those thinges which belong only to God and Christ, are conueied away to Angels. By this meane we see that in certaine ages paste, the glory of Christ hath bin many waies obscured, whē Angels without warrant of Gods worde were loden with immeasurable titles of honor. And of all the vices that we speake against, there is almost none more auncient than this. For it appereth, that Paule him selfe had much to do with some which so auanced Angels, that they in maner would haue brought Christ vnder subiection. And therefore he doth so carefully presse this point in his Epistle to the Colossians, that Christ is not only to be preferred before all Angels, but that he is also the author of all the good thinges that they haue: to the ende we should not forsake him and turne vnto them, which can not sufficiently helpe them selues, but are faine to draw out of the same fountaine that we do. Surely forasmuch as there shineth in them a certaine brightnesse of the maiesty of God, there is nothing wherunto we are more easily enclined, than with a certaine admiration to fall downe in worshipping of them, and to geue vnto them all things that are due only to God. Which thing Iohn in the Revelation confesseth to haue chaunced to himselfe, but he addeth withall, that he receiued this aunswere. See thou do it not. For I am thy fellow seruant, Worship God.

11 But this daunger we shall well beware of, if we do consider why God vseth rather by them than by himselfe without their seruice to declare his power, to prouide for the safetie of the faithfull, and to communicate the gistes of his liberalitie amōg them. Surely he doth not this of necessitie, as though he coulde not be without them: for so oft as pleaseth him, he letteth them alone, & bringeth his worke to passe with an onely becke: so farre is it of, that they be any aide to him, to ease him of the hardnesse therof. This therefore maketh for the comfort of our weakenesse, so that we want nothing that may auaille our mindes, either in raising them vp in good hope, or confirming them in assurance. This one thing ought to be enough and enough againe for vs, that the Lord affirmeth that he is our protectour. But while we see our selues besieged with so many daungers, so many hurtefull things, so many kindes of enemies: it may be (such is our weakenesse & frailtie) that we be sometime filled with trembling feare, or fall for despaire, vnlesse the Lord after the proporcion of our capacitie do make vs to conceiue his presence. By this meane he not only promiseth that he will haue care of vs, but also that he hath an innumerable garde to whom he hath giuen in charge to trauaile for our safetie, and that so long as we be compassed with the garrison & supporte of them, whatsoever daunger betideth, we be without all reach of hurte. I graunt we do amisse that after this simple promise of the protection of God alone, we stil looke about from whence other helpe may come vnto vs. But for as much as it pleaseth the Lord of his infinite clemencie and gentilnesse to helpe this our fault, there is no reason why we should neglect his so great benefite. An example therof we haue in the seruant of Elzeus, which when he saw the hill besieged with the army of the Syrians, and that there was no way open to escape, was striken downe with feare, as if his maister and he were then vtterly destroyed. Then Elizeus praied God to open his seruantes eies, and by and by he sawe the hill furnished with horses and fiery chariots, that is with a multitude of Angels to kepe him and the prophet safe. Encouraged with this vision he gathered vp his harte againe, and was able with a dredelesse minde to looke down vpon his enemies, with sight of whom he was before in a maner driuen out of his witte.

12 Wherefore whatsoeuer is said of the ministerie of Angels, let vs applie it to this ende, that ouercomming all distrust, our hope may be the more strongly stablished in God. For these succours are herfore prouided vs of God, that we should not be made afrayde with multitude of enemies, as though they coulde preuaile against his helpe, but should flie vnto that saying of Elizeus, that there be mo on our side than be against vs. How much then is it against order of reason, that we shoulde be led away from God by Angels which are ordeined for this purpose, to testifie that his helpe is more present among vs? But they do leade vs away in dede, if they do not streight leade vs as it were by the hande to him, that we may haue eye vnto, call vpon, & publish him for our onely helper: if we consider not them to be as his handes that moue themselues to no worke but by his direction: if they do not holde vs fast in the one Mediatour Christ, so that we may hang wholly of him, leane all vpon him, be caried to him, and reste in him. For that which is described in the vision of Iacob ought to sticke and be fastened in our mindes, how Angels descende down to the earth vnto men, and from men do go vp to heauen by a ladder, wherupon stādeth the Lord of hostes. Wherby is meant, that by the only intercession of Christ it cometh to passe, that the ministeries of the Angels do come vnto vs, as he him selfe affirmeth, saying: Hereafter ye shall see the heauens open and the Angelles descending to the Sonne of man Ioh. 1.11. Therefore the seruant of Abraham being comitted to the custody of the Angell, doth not therefore call vpon the Angell to helpe him, but holpen with that commendation, he praieth to the Lord, and besecheth him to shew his mercy to Abraham. For as God doth not therefore make them ministers of his power and goodnesse, to the intēt to parte his glory with them: so doth he not therefore promise vs his helpe in their ministrations, that we shoulde diuide our confidence betwene him and them. Let vs therefore forsake that Platonick philosophy, to seeke the way to God by Angels, and to honour them for this purpose that they may make God more gentill vnto vs: which superstitious and curious men haue from the beginning gone about, and to this day do continue to bring into our religion.

13 As for such thinges as the Scripture teacheth concerning deuilles, they tend in a maner all to this ende, that we may be carefull to beware aforehande of their awaites and preparations, and furnish our selues with such weapons as are stronge and sure enough to driue away euen the strongest enemies . For where as Sathan is called the God and prince of the worlde , where as he is named the strong armed man, the Spirite that hath power of the ayre, and a roaring lyon: these descriptions serue to no other purpose : but to make vs more ware and watcheful, and readier to entre in battaile with him. Which is also sometime set out in expresse wordes . For Peter after he had said , that the diuell goeth about like a roaring lyon , seeking whom he may deuoure, by and by addeth this exhortation , that we strongly resiste him by Faith . And Paule after he had geuen warning that we wraastle not with flesh and bloud, but with the princes of the ayre, the powers of darkenesse , and spirituall wickednesses , by and by biddeth vs put on such armour as may serue for so great & daungerous a battaile. Wherefore lette vs also applie all to this ende , that being warned how there doth continually approche vpon vs an enemy , yea an ennemy that is in courage most hardy, in strength most mighty, in policies most suttle, in diligence and celeritie vnueriable, with all sortes of engins plenteously furnished, in skill of warre most ready, we suffer not our selues by slouth and cowardise to be surprised , but on the other side with bolde and hardy mindes set our foote to resist him : & (because this warre is onely ended by Death) encourage our selues to continue . But specially knowing our owne weaknesse and vnskillfulnesse let vs call vpon the helpe of God and enterprise nothing but vpon trust of him , for as much as it is in him onely to geue vs policie, strength, courage and armour.

14 And that we should be the more stirred vp and enforced so to do, the Scripture warneth vs , that there are not one or two or a fewe enemies, but great armies that make warre with vs . For it is said, that

Mar. 16. Mary Magdalene was deliuered from seuen deuils, wherwith she was 9. possessed. And Christ saith, that it is the ordinary custome, that if after a deuill be ones cast out, a man make the place open againe, he bringeth Mat. 12. seuen spirites worse than him selfe , and returneth into his possession, 42. finding it empty. Yea it is said that a whole legion besieged one Luc. 8. man. Hereby therefore we are taught, that we must fight with an infinite 30. multitude of enemies, least despising the fewenesse of them we should be more slacke to enter in battaile , or thinking that we haue some respire in the meane time graited, we should geue our selues to idelnesse. Where as many times Sathan or the diuell is named in the singular numbere , thereby is meant that power of wickednesse which standeth against the kingdome of Iustice . For as the Church and the fellowship of saintes haue Christ to their head , so the faction of the wicked is painted out vnto vs with their prince , that hath the chiefe

authoritie among them. After which maner this is spoken. Go ye cursed into eternall fire that is prepared for the deuill and his angels. Mat. 25.
41.

15 Here also this ought to stirre vs vp to a perpetuall warre with the deuill, for that he is euery where called the enemy of God and of vs. For if we haue regarde of Goddes glory, as it is mete we should, then ought we with all our force to bende our selues against him, that goeth about to extinguish it. If we be affectioned to maintaine the kingdome of Christ as we ought, then must we nedes haue an vnapp-peasable warre with him that conspireth the ruine therof. Againe, if any care of our owne safetie do touch vs, then ought we to haue neither peace nor truce with him that continually lieth in waite for the destruction of it. Such a one is he described in the 3. chap. of Genesis where he leaderth man away from the obedience that he did owe to God, that he both robbeth God of his due honor, and throweth mā him selfe headlong into destruction. Such a one also is he set forth in the Euangelistes, where he is called an enemy, and is said to scatter Mat. 13.

tares, to corrupt the sēde of eternall life. In a summe, that which Iohn 8.
44.
Christ testifieth of him, that from the beginning he was a murtherer, and a lier, we finde by experience in all his doinges. For he assaileth the trueth of God with lies, obscureth the light with darkenesse, en-rangleth the mindes of men with errors, raiseth vp hatrēdes, kindleth contentions and strifes, doth all thinges to this ende to ouerthrow the kingdome of God, and drowne men with himselfe in eternall destruction. Wherby appereth, that he is of nature froward, spitefull and malicious. For nedes must there be great frowardnesse in that wite, that is made to assaile the glory of God and saluation of men. And that doth Iohn speake of in his epistle, when he writeth, that he sinneth from the beginning. For he meaneth that he is the author, captaine and principall workeman of all malice and wickednesse.

16 But forasmuch as the deuill was created by God, let vs remembre that this malice which we assigne in his nature, is not by creation but by deprauiō. For what so euer damnable thing he hath, he hath gotten to himselfe by his owne reuolting and fall. Which the Scripture therefore geueth vs warning of, least thinking that he came out such a one from God, we should ascribe that to God himselfe which is farthest frō him: For this reason doth Christ say that Sathā speaketh of his owne when he speaketh lies, and addeth a cause why, for that he stode not still in the trueth. Now when he saith that he stode not still in the trueth, he sheweth that ones he had bin in the trueth. And Iohn 8.
when he maketh him the Father of lying, he taketh this from him,

himselfe. Although these things be but shortly and not very plainly spoken, yet this is enough for this purpose to deliuer the maiestie of God from all sleaude. And what maketh it matter to vs, to know more or to any other purpose concerning deuils? Many perhaps do grudge, that the Scripture doth not orderly and distinctly in many places set forth that fall and the cause, manner, time, and fashion thereof. But because these things do nothing pertain to vs, it was better, if not to be suppressed wholly, yet to be but lightly touched, and that partly, because it was not becoming for the Holy ghost to feede curiositie with vaine histories without any frute: and we see that it was the Lordes purpose to put nothing in his holy oracles but that which we should learne to edification. Therefore, lest we our selues should tary long vpon things superfluous, let vs be content shortly to know thus much concerning the nature of deuils, that at the first creatiō they were the Angels of God: but by swaruing out of kinde they both destroyed themselves and are become instrumentes of destructiō to other. Thus much, because it was profitable to be knowen, is plainly taught in Peter and Iude. God spared not (say they) his Angels which had sinned, and not kept their beginning, but had forsaken their dwelling place. And Paule naming the elect Angels doth without dout secretly by implication set the reprobate Angels in comparison against them.

17 As for the discorde and strife that we say is betwene God and Satan, we must so take it that still we holde this for certaine, that he can do nothing but by the will and sufferance of God. For we reade in the historie of Iob, that he presented himselfe before God to receiue his commaundemētes, and durst not go forwarde to do any enterprise till he had obtained licence. So when Achab was to be deceiued, he toke vpon him that he would be the Spirite of lying in the mouth of all the Prophetes, and so being sente of God he performed it. For this reason is he called the euill Spirite of the Lord that tormēted Saul, because by him as with a scourge the sinnes of the wicked king were punished. And in an other place it is written, that the plagues were laied vpon the Egyptians by the euil angels. According to these particular examples Paule doeth generally testifie, that the blinding of the wicked is the worke of God, whereas before he had called it the working of Satan. It is euident therefore that Satan is vnder the power of God, and so gouerned by his authoritie that he is compelled to do him seruice. Now whē we say that Satā resisteth God, that the workes of Satan disagree with the workes of God, we do therewithall affirme that this disagreement and strife hangeth vpon the sufferance of God. I speake not now of his will, nor of his endeuour, but of the effect onely.

onely. For sith the deuill is wicked of nature, he is not enclined to obey the will of God, but is wholly carryed to stubbornesse and rebellion. This therefore he hath of himselfe and of his owne wickednesse, that of desire and purpose he withstandeth God. And by this wickednes he is stirred vp to the enterprising of those things that he knoweth to be most against God. But because God holdeth him fast tied and restrained with the bridle of his power, he executeth onely those thinges that are graunted him from God. And so doth he obey his creator whether he will or no, because he is constrained to applie his seruice whether soeuer God compelleth him.

der your feete. This victorie hath alway fully bin in our head Christ, because the Prince of the worlde had nothing in him, but in vs that are his members it doth now partly appeare and shalbe perfited, whē being vncliothed of our flesh by which we are yet subiect to weaknesse, we shalbe full of the power of the Holy ghost. In this manner when the kingdome of Christ is raysted vp and aduanced, Satan with his power falleth downe as the Lord himselfe saith. I saw Satan fall as a lightening downe from heauen. For by this aunswere he confirmeth that which the Apostles had reported of the power of his preaching. Againe, When the Prince possesseth his owne palace, all thinges that he possesseth are in peace, but when there commeth a stronger, he is throwen out. &c. And to this ende Christ in dying, ouercame Satan which had the power of death, and triumphed vpon all his armies that they should not hurt the Church, for otherwise they would euery moment a hundred times destroy it. For (considering what is our weaknesse, and what is his furious strength) how coulde we stande, yea neuer so little time against his manifolde and continuall assaultes, but being supported by the victory of our captaine? Therefore God suffereth not the deuill to reigne over the soules of the faithfull, but onely deliuereth him the wicked and vnbeleuing to gouerne, whom God doth not vouchesauē to haue reckened in his flocke. For it is said that he possesseth this worlde without controuersie till he be thrust out by Christ. Againe, that he doth blinde all them that beleue not the Gospel, againe, that he performeth his worke in the stubborne children, and worthily, for all the wicked are the vessels of wrath. Therefore to whom should they be rather subiect than to the minister of Goddes vengeance? Finally they are saied to be of their Father the deuill, because as the faithfull are hereby knowen to be the children of God because they beare his image: so they by the image of Satan into which they are gone out of kinde, are properly discerned to be his children.

19 As we haue before confuted that trifling philosophic concerning the holy Angels, which teacheth that they are nothing els but good inspirations or motions, which God stirreth vp in the mindes of men: so in this place must we confute them that fondly say that deuils are nothing els but euill affections or perturbations of minde, that are thrust into vs by our flesh. That may we shortly do, because there be many testimonies of Scripture, & those plaine enough vpon this point. First wher the vncleane Spirites are called, Angels Apostataes, which haue swarued out of kinde from their beginning, the very names do sufficiently expresse that they are not motions or affections of mindes,

but rather in dede as they be called mindes or Spirites endued with sense and vnderstanding. Likewise whereas both Christ and Iohn do compare the children of God with the children of the deuill: were it not an vnfit comparison, if the name of the deuill signified nothing else but euill inspirations? And Iohn addeth somewhat more plaine-ly, that the deuill sinneth from the beginning. Likewise when Iude bringeth in Michael the archangell fighting with the deuill, doutlesse he setteth against the good Angell an euill and rebellious Angell. Wherewith agreeth that which is read in the history of Iob, that Sa- tan appeared with the holy Angels before God. But most playne of all are those places that make mētion of the punishment which they begin to fele by the iudgement of God, and specially shall fele at the resurreccion. Sonne of Dauid why art thou come before the time to torment vs? Againe, Go ye cursed into the eternall fire that is prepa- red for the deuill and his Angels. Againe, If he spared not his owne Angels that had sinned, but cast them downe into hell and deliuered them into cheines of darkenesse to be kept vnto damnation. &c. How fond should these speeches be, that the deuills are ordayned to eternall iudgement, that fier is prepared for them, that they are now already tormented and vexed by the glory of Christ: if there were no deuils at all? But because this matter needeth no disputation among them that beleue the word of the Lord, and little good is done with testimonies of Scripture among those vayne studentes of speculation, whom nothing pleaseth but that which is new: I suppose I haue performed that which I purposed, that is that the godly mindes should be furnished against such fond errours, wherewith vnquiet mē do trouble both themselues and other that be more simple. But it was good to touch this, least any entangled with that errour, while they thinke they haue none to stand against them, should waxe more slow and vnprovided to resist.

20 In the meane time lette it not be werysome vnto vs, in this so beautifull a stage to take a godly delight of the manifest and ordina-ry workes of God. For, as I haue elsewhere already sayd, though this be not the chiefe, yet is it in order the first doctrine of Faith, to re- member that what way soeuer we turne our eyes, all that we see are the workes of God, and with godly consideration to wey for what end God did make them. Therefore that we may conceiue by Faith so much as behoueth vs to know of God, it is good first of all to learne the history of the creation of the world, how it is shortly re- hearded by Moses, and afterward more largely sette out by holy men, specially by Basile and Ambrose. Out of it we shall learne that God by the power of his word and Spirite created heauen and earth of nothing, and thereof brought forth all liuing creatures and thinges without life, with maruellous order disposed the innumerable variety of thinges, to euery thing he gaue the propre nature, assigned their offices, appointed their places and abidinges, and where all thinges are subiect to corruption, yet hath he so prouided that of all sortes some shalbe preserued safe to the last day, and therefore some he cherisheth by secrete meanes, and powreth now and then as it were a new liuelinesse into them, and to some he hath giuen the power to encrease by generation, that in their dying that whole kinde should not dye together. So hath he maruellously garnished the heauen and the earth, with so absolutely perfect plenty, variety and beauty of all thinges as possibly might be, as it were a large and gorgeous house furnished and stored with abundance of most finely chosen stuffe, last of all how in framing man and adorning him with so godly beauty, and with so many and so great giftes, he hath shewed in him the most excellent example of all his workes. But because it is not my purpose at this present to set forth at large the creation of the world, let it suffice to haue ones agayne touched these few thinges by the way. For it is better, as I haue already warned the readers, to fetch a fuller vnderstanding of this matter out of Moses and other, that haue faithfully and diligently conueyed the history of the world by writing to perpetuall memory.

21 It is to no purpose, to make much a do in disputing, to what end this consideration of the workes of God ought to tende, or to what marke it ought to be applied: forasmuch as in other places already a great parte of this question is declared, and so much as belongeth to our present purpose may in few wordes be ended. Truely if we were minded to set out as it is worthy, how inestimable wisdom, power, iustice and goodnesse of God appeareth in the framing of the world, no eloquence, no garnishmēt of speech, could suffice the largenesse of so great a matter. And no dout it is Gods pleasure that we should be continually occupied in so holy a meditatio, that while we behold in his creatures as in looking glasses the infinite richesse of his wisdom, iustice bountie and power, we should not runne ouer thē as it were with a flying eye, or with a vayne wandring looke as I may so call it, but that we should with consideration rest long vpon them, cast them vp and downe earnestly and faithfully in our mindes, and oft repeate them with remembrance. But because we are now busied in that kinde that pertayneth to order of teaching, it is mete that we omit those thinges that require long declamations. Therefore, to be short,

short, let the readers know, that then they haue conceiued by Faith, what this meaneth, that God is the creator of heauen & earth, if they first follow this vniuersall rule, that they passe not ouer with not considering or forgetfulnesse of those vertues, that God presenteth to be seene in his creatures, then, that they so learne to apply themselues that they may therewith be throughly moued in their hartes. The first of those we do when we consider how excellent a workmans worke it was, to place and aptly set in so well disposed order the multitude of the starres that is in heauen, that nothing can be deuised more beautifull to behold: to sette and fasten some of them in their standings so that they can not moue, and to othersome to graunt a free course, but so that in mouing they wander not beyond their appointed space, so to temper the motion of them all that it may diuide in measure the dayes and nightes, monethes, yeares and seasons of the yeare, and to bring this inequality of dayes which we dayly see to such a tempered order that it hath no confusion. Likewise, when we marke his power in susteyning so great a body, in gouerning the so swift whirling about of the engine of heauen, and such like. For these few examples do sufficiently declare what it is to record the power of God in the creation of the world. For else if I should trauaile as I sayed to expresse it all in wordes, I should neuer make an end, forasmuch as there are so many miracles of the power of God, so many tokens of his goodnesse, so many examples of his wisdom, as there be formes of thinges in the world, yea as there be things either great or smale.

22 Now remaineth the other part which commeth nerer to Faith, that while we consider that God hath ordayned all thinges for our garde and safety, and therewithall do fele his power and grace in our selues, and in so great good things that he hath bestowed vpon vs: we may thereby stirre vp our selues to the trust, inuocation, prayse and loue of him. Now as I haue before sayd, God himselfe hath shewed in the very order of creation, that for mans sake he created all thinges. For it is not without cause that he diuided the making of the world into six dayes, whereas it had bin as easie for him in one moment to haue in all pointes accomplished his whole worke, as it was by such proceeding from peece to peece to come to the end of it. But then it pleased him to shew his prouidēce & fatherly carefulnesse toward vs, that before he made man he prepared all that he foresaw should be profitable for him, and fitte for his preseruatiō. How great vnthankfulnessse now should it be to dout whether this good Father do care for vs, whom we see to haue bin carefull for vs ere that we were born? How wicked were it to tremble for distrust least his goodnesse would at any time leaue vs destitute in necessity, which we see was displayed for vs being not yet borne, with great abundance of al good things. Beside that we heare by Moses that by his liberality all that euer is in the world is made subiect to vs. Sure it is that he did it not to mocke vs with an empty name of gift. Therefore we shall neuer lacke any thing, so farre as it shall be auaylable for our preseruatiō. Finally to make an end, so oft as we name God the creator of heauen & earth, lette this come in our mindes withall, that the dispositiō of all things which he hath create, is in his hand and power, and that we are his children whom he hath taken into his owne charge and keeping to foster and bring vp: that we may looke for al good things at his hand, and assuredly trust that he will neuer suffer vs to lacke things needefull for our safety, to the end our hope should hang vpon none other: y whatsoeuer we desire our prayers may be directed to him: of what thing soeuer we receiue profit we may acknowledge it to be his benefit, and confesse it with thankes giuing: that being allured with so great sweetnesse of his goodnesse and liberality, we may study to loue and honor him with all our hart.

What a one man vvas created: vvherein there is entreated of the pouuers of the soule, of the image of God, of free vwill & of the first integrity of nature.

NOW must we speake of the creation of man, not onely because he is among all the workes of God the most noble and most excellent example of his iustice, wisdom and goodnes: but also because as we haue sayd in the beginning, we cannot plainly and perfectly know God, vnlesse we haue withal a mutuall knowledge of our selues. Although y same knowledge be of two sorts, the one to know what we were created at the first beginning, the other to know what our estate began to be after the fall of Adam (for it were but to small profit for vs to know our creation, vnlesse we did also in this lamentable fall know what is the corruption and deformity of our nature:) yet at this time we will be content with description of our nature when it was pure. And before we descend to this miserable estate whereunto man is now in thraldome, it is good to learne what a one he was created at the beginning. For we must take hede that in precisely declaring onely the naturall euils of man, we seme not to impute thē to the author of nature. For vngodlines thinketh her selfe to haue sufficient defense in this colour, if it may lay for her selfe that whatsoeuer fault she hath, the same did after a certaine manner manner proceede from God, and sticketh not if she be accused, to quarell with God, and to lay the fault vpon him whereof she is worthely accused. And they that would seeme to speake somewhat more reuerētly of the maicesty of God, yet do willingly seeke to excuse their owne wickednesse, by nature, not considering that therein though not opely they blame God also, to whose reproch it should fall if it were proued that there is any fault in nature. Sith then we see that our flesh gapeth for all the wayes to escape, wherby she thinketh the blame of her owne euils may any way be put of from her, we must diligently trauaill to mete with this mischiefe. Therefore we must so handle the calamity of mankinde that we cut of all excuse, and deliuer the iustice of God from all accusation. Afterward in place conuenient we shall see how far men be now from that purenesse that was giuē to Adam. And first we must remember, that in this that man was taken out of earth and clay, a bridle was put vpon his pride, for there is no greater absurdity, than for them to glory in their excellency that do not onely dwell in a cottage of clay, but also are themselues in parte but earth and ashes. But forasmuch as God did not onely vouchsaue to giue life vnto an earthen vessell, but also it was his pleasure that it should be the dwelling house of an immortall Spirite, Adam might iustly glory in so great liberality of his maker.

2 Now it is not to be doubted that man consisteth of soule and body, and by the name of soule I meane an immortall essence, and yet created, which is the nobler parte of him. Sometime it is called the Spirite. Albeit when these two names Soule and Spirite are ioyned together, they differ one from the other in significatiō, yet when Spirite is sette by it selfe it meaneth as much as Soule. As, when Salomon speaking of death, sayth that then the Spirite returneth to him that gaue it. And Christ commending his Spirite to his Father, and Stephen his Spirite to Christ do both meane none other thing but that when the Soule is deliuered from the prison of the flesh, God is the perpetuall keeper of it. As for them that imagine that the Soule is therefore called a Spirite because it is a breath or a power by God inspired or poured into bodies which yet hath no essence: both y^e thing it selfe & all the Scripture sheweth that they do to much grossly erre. True it is that while men are fastened to the earth more than they ought to be, they waxe dull, yea because they are estranged from the Father of lightes they are blinded with darkenesse, so that they do not thinke vpon this, that they shall remaine aliuie after death. And yet is not that light so quenched in darkenesse, but that they be touched with some feling of immortality. Surely the conscience which discerning betwene good and euill answereth the iudgement of God, is an vndouted signe of an immortall Spirite. For how could a motiō without essence attaine to come to the iudgement seate of God, & throw it selfe into feare by finding her owne gultinesse? For the body is not moued with feare of a Spirituall peine, but that falleth onely vppon the soule. Wherby it followeth that the soule hath an essence. Moreover the very knowledge of God doth proue that the soules which ascende vp aboute the world are immortall: for a vanishing liuelinesse were not able to attayne to the fountayne of life. Finally forasmuch as so many excellent gifts wherewith mans minde is endued, do cry out that there is some diuine thing engrauen it, there are euen so many testimonies of an immortall essence. For that sense which is in brute beastes, goeth not out of the body, or at least extendeth no further than to things presently set before it. But the nimblenesse of the minde of man which veweth the heauen and earth and secretes of nature, & comprehending all ages in vnderstanding and memory, digesteth euery thing in order and gathereth thinges to come by thinges past, doth plainly shew that there lyeth hidden in man a certaine thing seuerall from the body. We conceiue by vnderstanding the inuisible God and Angells, which the body can not do. We know thinges that be right, iust, & honest, which are hidden frō the bodily senses. Therefore it must needs be that the Spirite is the seate of this vnderstanding. Yea and our sleepe it selfe, which astonieth a man and seemeth to take life away from him, is a plaine witnesse of immortality, forasmuch as it doth not only minister vnto vs, thoughtes of those thinges that neuer were done, but also foreknowinges of thinges for time to come. I touch these thinges shortly which euen prophane wryters do excellently sette out with more gorgeous garnishment of wordes: but with the godly readers a simple putring in minde of them shall be sufficient. Now if the soule were not a certaine thing by it selfe seuerall from the body, the Scripture would not teach that we dwell in houses of clay, that by death we remoue out of the Tabernacle of the flesh, that we do put of that which is corruptible, that finally at the last day we may receiue reward euery man as he hath behaued himselfe in his body. For these places and other that we do ech where cōmonly light vpon, do not only manifestly distinguish the soule from the body, but also in giuing to the soule the name of man do shew that it is the principall parte. Now whereas Paule doth exhort the faithfull to clense themselves from all defiling of the flesh and the Spirite, he maketh two partes of man wherein abideth the filthinesse of sinne. And Peter where he calleth Christ the shepherde & bishop of soules, should haue haue spoken fondly if there were no soules about whom he might execute that office. Neither would that conueniently stand together which he sayth of the eternal saluation of soules, and where he biddeth to cleanse our soules, and where he sayth that euil desires do fight against the soule, and where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues sayeth, that the Pastors do watch that they may yeld accompt for our soules, vnlesse it were true that soules had a proper essence. To the same purpose serueth it that Paul calleth God for witness to his own soule, because it could not be called in iudgement before God vnlesse it were subiect to punishment. And this is also more plainly expressed in the wordes of Christ, when he biddeth vs to feare him which after that he hath killed the body, can throw the soule into hell fier. Now where the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues doth distinguish the Fathers of our flesh frō God, which is the only Father of Spirits, he would not otherwise more plainly affirme the essence of soules. Moreouer, if the soules remayned not aliue being deliuered from the prisōs of their bodies, Christ should very fondly haue brought in the soule of Lazarus ioying in the bosome of Abraham, and agayne the soule of the richman subiect to horrible tormentes. The same thing doth Paul confirme when he teacheth that we wander abroad from God, so long as we dwell in the flesh, and that we enjoy his presence being out of the flesh. But, because I will not be long in a matter that is not obscure, I will adde only this out of Luke, that it is reckened among the errorrs of the Sadduces that they did not beleue that there were any Spirites and Angels.

3 Also a strong proufe hereof may be gathered of this where it is sayd, that man is create like to the image of God. For although the glory of God do appeare in the outward shape of man, yet is it no dout that the prope seate of the image of God is in the soule. I do not deny that as concerning our outward shape, in asmuch as the same doth distinguish and seuer vs from brute beastes, we do also therein more nerely approach to God than they: neither will I much stand against thē which thinke that this is to be accōpted of the image of God, that where al other liuing creatures do grouellingwise behold the ground, to man is giuen an vpright face, and he is commaunded to looke vpon the heauen, and to aduaunce his countenance toward the starres: so that this remayne certaine, that y image of God which is seene appeareth in these outward signes, is spirituall. For Osiander (whom his writings declare to haue bin in fickle imaginations fondly witty) referring the image of God without difference as well to the body as to the soule, mingleth heauen & earth together. For he sayth, that the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy ghost did settle their image in man, because though Adam hadde stand without falling, yet should Christ haue become man. And so by their opinion the body that was appoynted for Christ, was but an example or figure of that bodily shape which then was formed. But where shall he finde that Christ is the image of the Spirite? I graunt in deede that in the Person of the Mediatour shineth the glory of the whole Godheade. But how shall the eternall worde be called the image of the Spirite whom he goeth before in order? Finally it ouerthrowerh the distinction betwene the Sonne and the Holy ghost, if he do here call him his image. Moreouer I would fayne learne of him how Christ doth resemble the Holy ghost in the flesh that he tooke vpon him, and by what markes and features he doth expresse the likenesse of him. And where as this saying: Let vs make man after our image, doth also belong to the Person of the Sonne, it followeth, that he must be the image of himselfe: which is against all reason. Beside that, if Osianders inuention be beleued, man was fashioned onely after the figure and paterne of Christ in that he was man, and so that forme out of which Adam was taken, was Christ, in that that he was to be clothed with flesh, where as the Scripture in a farre other meaning teacheth, that he was create in the image of God. But their suttel inuention is more colourable which do thus expound it, that Adam was create in the image of God, because he was fashioned like vnto Christ, which is the onely image of God. But that exposition also is not sound. Also some interpreters make a great disputation about Image and Likenesse, while they seeke a difference betwene those two wordes, where is no difference at all, saying that this word Likenesse is added to expound the other. First we know that among the Hebrues such repetitions are common, wherein they expresse one thing twise: and in the thing it selfe there is no dout, but that man is therefore called the image of God, because he is like to God. Wherby appeareth that they are to be laughed at, which do so suttelly argue about the wordes, whether they appoint Zelem, that is to say, Image in the substance of the soule, or Demuth, that is to say, Likenesse in the qualities, or what other thing soeuer it be that they teach. For where as God determined to create man after his own image, this being somewhat darkely spoken he doth as by way of explicatiō repete it in this saying, After his likenesse, as if he would haue sayd, that he would make man, in whom he would represent himselfe, as in an image, because of the markes of likenesse grauen in him. And therefore Moses a little after reciting the same thing, doth repete the Image of God twise, leauing out the name of Likenesse. And it is a trifling obiection that Ofeander maketh, that not a parte of man, or the soule only with the giftes therof, is called the Image of God, but the whole Adam which had his name giuen him of the earth, from whence he was taken. Trifling, I say, will all readers that haue theyr found wit iudge this obiection. For where whole man is called mortall, yet is not y^e soule therby made subiect to mortality. Againe where he is called a liuing creature endued with reasoⁿ, it is not therby meant that the body hath reason and vnderstanding. Although therfore the soule is not the whole man, yet is it not inconuenient, that man in respect of the soule be called the image of God, albeit I hold still that principle which I haue before stablished, that the Image of God extendeth to the whole excellēce, wherby the nature of man hath preeminence among all kindes of liuing creatures. Therefore in that word is noted the integrity that man had when he was endued with right vnderstanding, when he had his affection framed according to reason, and all his senses gouerned in right order, and when in excellent gifts he did truely resemble the excellence of his Creator. And though the principall seate of the image of God were in the minde & hart, or in the soule and the powers therof, yet was there no parte of man, not so much as the body, wherin did not some sparkes thereof appeare. Certaine it is, that also in all the partes of the world, there do shine some resemblances of the glory of God: wherby we may gather that where it is sayd, that his Image is in man, there is in so saying a certain secret comparison, that auunceth man aboue all other creatures, & doth as it were seuer him from the commoⁿ sorte. Neither is it to be denied, Mat. 32

36. that the Angels were create after the likenesse of God, sith (as Christ himselfe testifieth) our chiefe perfection shall be to become like vnto the. But not without cause doth Moses by that peculiar title set forth the grace of God toward vs, specially where he compareth only visible creatures with man.

4 But yet it seemeth that there is not giuen a full definition of the image of God, vnlesse it plainlier appeare in what qualities mā excelleth: & wherby he ought to be compted a glasse, resembling the glory of God. But that can be by no other thing better knowen, than by the repaying of mans corrupted nature. First it is doutlesse, that when Adam fell from his estate, he was by that departure estraged from God. Wherefore although we graunt that the Image of God was not altogether defaced and blotted out in him, yet was it so corrupted, that all that remayneth, is but vggly deformity. Therefore the beginning of recouery of safety for vs, is in that restoring which we obtayne by Christ, who is also for the same cause called the seconde Adam, be-

1. Cor. 15. 45. cause he restored vs vnto true and perfect integrity. For although where Paule doth in comparison sette the quickening Spirite that Christ giueth to the faythfull, against the liuing soule wherein Adam was created, he setteth foorth the more abundant measure of grace in the regeneration: yet doth he not take away this other principall point, that this is the end of our regeneration, that Christ should new fashion vs to the image of God. Therefore in an other place he teacheth, that the newe man is reued according to the image of him that created him. Wherewith agreeth this saying: put on the new man which is create according to God. Now it is to be seene what Paule doth principally comprehend vnder this reuing. First he speaketh of knowledge and after of pure righteousnesse and holynesse. Whereby we gather that the image of God was first of all to be seene in the light of the minde, in the vprightnesse of hart, and soundnesse of all the partes. For although I graunt that this is a figuratiue phrase of speech to set the parte for the whole: yet can not this principle be ouerthrowen, that that thing which is the chiefe in the reuing of the image of God, was also the principall in the creation of him. And for the same purpose maketh it that in an other place he teacheth, that we beholding the glory of God with open face, are transformed into the same image. Now do we se how Christ is the most perfect image of God, according to the which we being fashioned are so restored, that in true godlinesse, righteousnesse, purenesse and vnderstanding, we beare the image of God. Which principle being established, Oslanders imagination of the shape of our body doth easily vanish away of it selfe. Where as the man alone is in Paule called the Image and glory of God, and the woman is excluded from that degree of honor, it appeareth by the rest of the text, that the same is to be applied only to ciuile order of policy. But that vnder the name of image, whereof we speake, is comprehended all that belongeth to the spirituall and eternall life, I thinke it be already sufficiently proued. And the same thing doth Iohn cōfirme in other wordes: saying that the light which was frō the beginning in the eternal word of God was ȳ light of mē. For where his purpose was to praise ȳ singular grace of God, whereby man excelleth all other liuing creatures to seuer him frō the common sorte, because he hath attayned no commō life, but ioyned with the light of vnderstanding, he therewithall sheweth how he was made after the image of God. Therefore sith the image of God is the vncorrupted excellence of the nature of man, which shined in Adam before his fall, and afterwarde was so corrupted and almost defaced, that nothing remayneth sins that ruine, but disordered, mangled, and filthily Althily spotted : yet the same doth in some parte appeare in the elect, insomuch as they are regenerate, and shall obtrayne her full brightnes in heauen. But that we may know on what partes it consisteth, it shall be good to entreate of the powers of the soule . For that speculatiue deuise of Augustine is not sounde, where he sayeth that the soule is a glasse of the Trinity, because that there are in it vnderstanding, will, & memory. Neither is their opinion to be approued, which sette the Image of God in the power of dominion giuen vnto him, as if he resembled God onely in this marke, that he is appointed lorde and possessor of all thinges, where as in deede the Image of God is properly to be sought within him, and not without him, and is an inward good gift of the soule.

5 But before I go any further, it is needefull that I meeete with the doting error of the Manichees, which Seruetto hath attempted to bring in agayne in this age . Where it is sayd, that God breathed the breath of life into the face of man, they thought that the soule didde conuey into man the substance of God, as if some portion of the immeasurable God were come into man. But it is easie euen shortely to shew how many grosse and foule absurdities this deuillish error draweth with it. For if the soule be by deriuation parte of the essence of God, it shall follow that y nature of God is subiect, not only to chaunge and passions, but also to ignorance, euill lustes, weakenesse, and all kindes of vices. Nothing is more inconstant than man, because contrary motions do tosser and diuersely draw his soule, oftentimes he is blinde by ignorance, oft he yeldeth as vanquished euen to smale tentations, and we know that the soule it selfe is the sinke and receiuer of all filthinesse, al which things we must ascribe to the nature of God, if we graunt that the soule is of the essence of God, or a secrete infloving of Godheade. Who would not abhorre this monstrous deuise? Truly in deede doth Paule allege out of Aratus, that we are the offspring of God, but in quality and not in substance, inasmuch as he hath garnished vs with godly giftes. But in the meane time to teare in sunder the essence of the Creator, as to say, that euery mā doth possesse a part of it, is to much madnes. Therefore we must certainly hold, that the soules, although the image of God be grauen in them, were no lesse created than the angels were. And creation is not a pouring out of one substance into an other, but a beginning of essence made of nothing. And although the spirite of man came from God, and in departing out of the flesh returneth to God, yet is not forthwith to be sayd, that it was taken out of his substance. And in this poynt also Oslander, while he glorieth in his illusions, hath entangled himselfe with an vngodly error, not acknowledging the image of God to be in mā without his essentiall iustice, as though God by the inestimable power of his holy spirite could not make vs like vnto himselfe, vnlesse Christ should substantially poure himselfe into vs. With whatsoeuer colour many do go about to disguise these deccites, yet shal they neuer so begile the eyes of the readers, that are in their right wittes, but that they will easily see that these things fauour of the Manichees error. And where saint Paule entreateth of the restoring of this image, it may be readily gathered out of his wordes, that man was made of like forme to God, not by inflowing of his substance, but by grace and power of his Spirite. For he sayeth, that in beholding the glory of Christ we are transformed into the same Image, as by the Spirite of God, which surely so worketh in vs, that it maketh vs of one substance with God.

6 It were but folly to borow of the Philosophers a definitiō of the soule, of whom almost none, except Plato, hath perfectly affirmed it to be an immortall substance. In dede some other also, that is the Socratians do touch it, but so as none doth playnly teach that to other, which himselfe was not perswaded. But therefore is Plato of the better iudgement, because he doth in the soule consider y image of God. Some other do so binde the powers and vertues of the soule to this present life, that being out of the body they leaue to it nothing. Now we haue already taught by the Scripture, that it is a bodiless substance: now must we adde that although properly it is not comprehended in place, yet it is set in the body, and doth there dwell as in a house, not onely to minister life to all the partes of the body, and to make the instrumentes thereof mete and fitely seruing for the actions that they are appoynted for, but also to beare the chiefe office in gouerning the life of man, & that not onely about the dueties in this earthly life, but also to stirre vs vp to the seruice of God. Although this later point in this corruption is not playnely perceiued, yet euen in the vices themselues there remayne emprinted some leauings therof. For whense commeth it but of shame, that menne haue so great care what be reported of them? And whense commeth shame, but of regarde of honesty? Whereof the beginning and cause is, that they vnderstād that they are naturally borne to obserue Iustice, in which persuasion is enclosed the sede of religion. For as without all controuersy man was made to meditation of the heauēly life: so is it certayne that the knowledge thereof was engrauen in his soule. And surely manne should want the principall vse of his vnderstanding, if he should be ignorant of his owne felicity, wherof the perfection is that he be ioyned

ned with God, and therefore it is the chiefe action of the soule to aspire therunto. And so the more that euery man studieth to approach vnto God, the more he therby proueth himselfe to be endued with reasoⁿ. As for thē that would haue diuers soules in man, that is, a feling soule, & a reasonable soule, although they seeme to say somewhat by reason proueable, yet because there is no stedfast certaintie in their reasons, we must reiect thē, vnlesse we list to accombre our selues in thinges trifling & vnprofitable. A great disagreement say they, there is betwen the instrumentall motions and the parte of the soule endued with reason. As though reason it selfe did not also dissent from it selfe, & some deuises of it do striue with other some, as they were armies of enemies. But forasmuch as that troublesomnesse proceedeth of the corruption of nature, it were amisse to gather therby, that there are two soules, because the powers of the soule do not agree together, in such well framed order as they ought. But as for more suttle disputation of the Powers themselues, I leaue that to the Philosophers. A simple definition shall suffice vs for edification of godlinesse. I graunt that the things that they teach are true, and not only pleasaunt but also profitable to be knowen, & well gathered of them, and I forbid not such as are desirous to learne to study them. First therefore I admitte that there are five Senses, which Plato better liked to call Instrumentes, whereby all obiectes, are powred into Common sense, as into a place of receite: then followeth Phantasie, which iudgeth those thinges one from other that Common sense hath conceiued, next is Reason, to which belongeth the vniuersall iudgement of thinges: last, is the Vnderstanding minde, which with earnestly bent and quiete vewing beholdeth all those thinges, that Reason is wont to discourse ypon, and consider. And to the Vnderstanding minde, Reason, and Phantasie, which are the three powers of the soule, that rest in knowledge, there do answere three other that do rest in Appetite, that is to say, Will, the partes whereof are to couete those thinges that the Vnderstanding minde and Reason do lay before it: the Power of Anger, which catcheth those thinges that Reason and Phantasie do minister vnto it. The power of Desiring, which taketh holde of those thinges that Phantasie & Sense, presenteth it. Although these things be true, or at least likely to be true, yet because I feare that they shall more entangle vs with obscurenesse than further vs, I thinke it best to ouerpasse them. If any man list otherwise to diuide the powers of the soule, and to call the one the power of Appetite, which although it be without reason it selfe, yet doth obey reason, if it be by other meane directed, and to call the other the power of vnderstanding,

which is by it selfe partaker of reason, I am not much agaynst it, neither will I confute this opinion, that there are three beginnings of doing: that is to say, Sense, Vnderstanding, and Appetite. But lette vs rather choose a diuision, that is within the capacity of all men, which can not be hadde of the Philosophers. For they when they meane to speake most playnely, do diuide the soule into Appetite and Vnderstanding, but either of these they make of two sortes. Vnderstanding, they say, is sometime Comtemplatiue, which being contented with onely knowledge, hath no mouing of action, which thing Cicero thinketh to be expressed by this word ingenium, witte. Sometime they say it is practicall, which by cōceiuing of good or euill doth diuersly moue the Will. And appetite they do diuide into Will, and Lust. Will they call that when Appetite which they call Horne, obeyeth to reason, and Lust they call that when the appetite shaking of the yoke of reason, runneth out to intemperance. So alwayes they imagine reason to be that in man, whereby man may rightly gouerne himselfe.

7 But we are constrayned somewhat to swarue from this maner of teaching, because the Philosophers which knew not the corruption of mans nature, which came for punishment of his fall, do wrongfully confound the two very diuerse states of man. Lette vs therefore thus thinke of it, that there are in the soule of man two partes, which shall serue at this time for our present purpose, that is to say, Vnderstanding & Will. And let it be the office of Vnderstanding, to discern betwene obiectes, or things set before it, as ech of them shall seeme worthy to be liked or misliked: and the office of Will to choose and follow that which Vnderstanding sayeth to be good, and to refuse and flee that which Vnderstanding shall disalowe, Lette vs not here be stayed at all with the nice subtelties of Aristotle, that the minde hath of it selfe no mouing, but that it is choise which moueth it, which choise he calleth the desiringe vnderstandinge. But, to the ende we be not entangled with superfluous questions, lette this suffice vs, that the Vnderstanding is as it were the guide and gouernour of the soule, and that Wil hath alwayes regarde to the appoyntment of Vnderstanding, and abideth the iudgement thereof in her desires. According wherunto, Aristotle himselfe hath truly sayd, that fleeing or following is in Appetite such a like thing, as in the vnderstanding minde is affirming and denying. Now howe certayne the gouernement of Vnderstanding is to direct the Will: that we will consider in an other place. Here we meane onely to shew that there can be found no power in the soule but that may well be sayd to belong to the one of these two members. And in

this sorte vnder Vnderstanding we comprehend Sense, which other do so distinguish, that they say Sense is enclined to pleasure, for which Vnderstanding followeth that which is good: and that so it commeth to passe, that the Appetite of sense is Concupiscence and Lust, the affection of vnderstanding is Will. Againe in steede of the name of Appetite, which they better like, I set the name of Wil, which is more commonly vsed.

8 God therefore hath furnished the soule of man with an vnderstanding minde, wherby he might discern good from euill, and right from wrong, and hauing the light of reason going before him, might see what is to be followed or forsaken. For which cause the Philosophers haue called this directing parte the Guider. To this he hath adioyned Will, to which belongeth choise. With these noble gistes the first state of man excelled, so that he not onely had enough of reason, vnderstanding, wisdom, and iudgement, for the gouernement of this earthly life, but also to clime vp euen to God and to eternall felicity. Thē to haue Choise added vnto it, which might direct the appetites, and order all the instrumentall motions, & that so the Wil might be altogether agreeable to the gouernement of reason. In this integrity, man had freewill, wherby if he would he might haue attained eternall life. For here it is out of place to moue questiō of the secrete predestinatiō of God: because we are not now about to discusse what might haue chaunced or not, but what at that time was the nature of man. Adam therefore might haue stand if he would, because he fell not but by his owne will. But because his will was pliable to either side, and there was not giuen him constancy to continue, therefore he so easely fell. Yet his Choise of good & euil was free. And not y only, but also in his vnderstanding minde, and in his will was most great vprightnesse, and all his instrumentall partes orderly framed to obediēce, vntill by destroying himselfe he corrupted the good things that were in him. From hense commeth it that all the Philosophers were so blinded, for that in a ruine they sought for an vpright building, and for strong ioyntes in an vniōynted ouerthrowe. This principle they helde, that man could not be a liuing creature, endued with reason, vnlesse there were in him a free choise of good and euil: and they considered, that otherwise all the difference should be taken away betwene vertues and vices, vnlesse man did order his owne life by his owne aduise. Thus farre hadde they sayd well if there hadde bin no change in man, which change because they knewe not of, it is no meruaile though they confounde heauen and earth together. But as for them which professing themselues to be the disciples of Christ, do yet seeke for free will in man, that hath bin lost and drowned in spirituall destruction, they in goinge meane betwene the Philosophers opinions and heuently doctrine are playnely deceyued, so that they touch neither heauen nor earth. But of these thinges we shall better speake in place fitte for them: now onely this we haue to hold in minde, that man at his first creation was farre other than his posterity euer sins, which taking their beginning from him being corrupted, hath from him receiued an infection deriued to them as it were by inheritaunce. For then all the partes of his soule were framed to right order, then stood safe the soundnesse of his vnderstandinge minde, and his will free to choose the good. If any do obiekt that it stood but in slippery state, because his power was but weake, I answer that that state was yet such as sufficed to take from him all excuse, neither was it reasonable to restraime God to this point, to make man such a one as either could not or would not sinne at all, I graunt such a nature hadde bin better, but therefore precisely to quarel with God, as though it hadde bin his duety to haue giuen that vnto man, is to much vniustice, forasmuch as it was in his owne choise to giue howe much pleased him. But why he did not vphold him with the strength of stedfast continuance, that resteth hidden in his owne secrete counsell: it is our parte onely to be so farre wise as with sobriety we may. Man receaued in deede to be able if he would, but he hadde not to will & he might be able. For of this will should haue followed stedfast cōtinuance. Yet is he not excuseable, which receiued so much that of his owne will he hath wrought his owne destruction. And there was no necessity to compell God to giue him any other than a meane will and a frayle will, that of mans fall he might gather matter for his owne glory.

The xvj. Chapter.

That God by his power doth nourish and maintaine the world, which himselfe hath created, and by his prouidence doth gouerne all the partes thereof.

BVt it were very fonde and bare to make God a creator for a moment, which doth nothing sins he hath once made an ende of his worke. And in this point principally ought we to differ frō the prophane men, that the presence of the power of God may shine vnto vs no lesse in the continuall state of the world, than in the first beginning of it. For though the mindes of the very wicked in onely beholding of the heauen and earth are compelled to rise vp vnto the creator, yet hath sayth a certayne peculiar maner by it selfe

whereby it geueth to God the whole praise of creation. And therefore serueth that saying of the Apostle, which we before alleged, that we do not vnderstand but by faith, that the world was made by the word of God. For vnlesse we passe forward euen vnto his prouidence, we do not yet rightly conceiue what this meaneth that God is the creator, how soeuer we do seeme to comprehend it in minde, and confesse it with tongue. When the sense of the flesh hath ones set before it the power of God in the very creation, it resteth there, and when it procedeth furthest of all, it doth nothing but wey and consider the wisdom, power, and goodnesse of the workemā in making such a piece of worke (which thinges do of them selues offer and thrust them selues in sight of men whether they will or no) and a certaine generall doing in preseruing and gouerning the same, vpon which dependeth the power of mouing. Finally it thinketh that the liuely force at the beginning put into all thinges by God, doth suffice to susteine them. But faith ought to perce deper, that is to say, whom it hath learned to be the creator of all thinges, by and by to gather that the same is the perpetuall gouernor and preseruer of them: and that, not by stirring with an vniuersall motion as well the whole frame of the worlde, as all the partes therof, but by susteyning, cherishing and caring for, with singular prouidence euery one of those thinges that he hath created eue to the least sparrow. So Dauid after he had first said that the world was created by God, by and by descendeth to the continuall course of his prouidence. By the worde of the Lord (saith he) the heauens were Psal. 33 stablised, and all the power therof by the spirite of his mouth. By and 6. by he addeth, The Lord looked downe vpon the sonnes of men, and so the rest that he saith further to the same effect. For although they do not all reason so orderly, yet because it were not likely to be beleued that God had care of mens matters; vnlesse he were the maker of the worlde, nor any man doeth earnestly beleue that God made the worlde, vndesse he be perswaded that God hath also care of his workes: therefore not without cause Dauid doth by good order conueye vs from the one to the other. Generally in dede both the Philosophers do teach, and mens mindes do conceiue that all partes of the worlde are quickened with the secrete inspiratiō of God. But yet they atteine not so farre as Dauid both himselfe procedeth and carrieth all the godly with him, saying: all thinges wayte vpon thee, that thou mayest geue them foode in due season. Thou geuest it to them and Psal. 109 they gather it. Thou openest thy hand and they are filled with good 27. thinges. But if thou hide thy face they are troubled. If thou take away their breath, they die and returne to their dust. Againe if thou sende

8. 17. 8. forth thy Spirite, they are created and thou renewest the face of the earth. Yea although they agree to the saying of Paule, that we haue our being and are moued, and do liue in God, yet are they farre from that earnest feling of grace, which he commendeth vnto vs: because they taste not of Gods special care whereby alone his fatherly fauor is known.

2 That this difference may the better appeare, it is to be knowen, that the Prouidence of God, such as it is taught in the Scripture, is in comparison set as contrary to fortune and chaunces that happen by aduerture. Now forasmuch as it hath bin commonly beleued in all ages, and the same opinion is at this day also in a manner in all men, that all thinges happen by fortune, it is certaine, that that which ought to haue bin beleued concerning Prouidence, is by that wrong opinion not onely darkened but also in manner buried. If a man light among sheues, or wilde beastes, if by winde sodenly risen he suffer shipwracke on the sea, if he be kyled with the fall of a house or of a tree if an other wandring in deserte places finde remedy for his pouertie, if hauing bin tossed with the waues, he atteine to the hauen, if miraculouly he escape but a finger bredth from death: all these chaunces as well of prosperitie as of aduersitie the reason of the flesh doth ascribe to fortune. But whosoever is taught by the mouth of Christ, that all the heares of his hed are numbred, will seke for a cause further of, and wil firmly beleue that all chaunces are gouerned by the secrete counsell of God: And as cōcerning thinges without life, this is to be thought, that although every one of them haue his owne propertie naturally put into it, yet do they not put forth their power but only so farre, as they be directed by the present hande of God. They are therefore nothing els but instrumentes, whereby God continually poureth in so much effect as pleaseth him, and at his will boweth and turneth them to this or that doing. Of no creature is the power more maruellous or more glorious than of the sunne. For beside that it geueth light to the whole worlde with his brightnesse, how great a thing is this that he cherisheth and quickeneth all lyuing creatures with his heate? that he breatheth frutefulnesse into the earth with his beames? that out of sedes warmed in the bosome of the grounde, he draweth a budding grenenesse, and susteyning the same with new nourishmētes doth encrease and strengthen it, till it rise vp in stalkes? That he fedeth it with continual vapour till it growe to a floure, and from a floure to fruite? That then also with baking it he bringeth it to ripenesse? That trees likewise & vines being warmed by him, do first budde & shoote forth branches, and after sende out a flower, and of a flower do engender frute?

frute? But the Lord because he would claime the whole glory of all theses thinges to himselfe, made the light first to be, and the earth to be furnished with all kindes of herbes and fruites before that he created the sunne. A godly man therefore will not make the sunne to be either a principall or a necessary cause of those thinges which were before the creation of the sunne, but onely an instrument which God vseth because it so pleaseth him, whereas he might leaue it and do all thinges as easily by himselfe. Then whē we reade that the sunne stode still two daies in one degree at the praier of Iosua, & that the shadow therof went backe ten degrees for Ezechias his sake, by those few miracles God hath declared that the sunne doth not daily so rise and go down by blinde instinct of nature, but that he to renew the remembrance of his fatherly fauour towarde vs, doth gouerne the course therof. Nothing is more naturall than spring tide to come immediatly after winter, sommer after spring, & haruest in course after sommer. But in this orderly course is plainly seen so great and so vnegall diuersitie, that it may easily appere that euery yere, moneth and day, is gouerned by a new and speciall Prouidence of God.

3 And truely God doth claime and will haue vs geue vnto him an almightinesse, not such as the Sophisters do imagine, vaine, idle, and as it were sleping, but waking, effectuall, working and busied in continuall doing. Nor such a one as is only a generall beginning of a confused motion, as if he woulde commaunde a riuier to flow by his appointed chanel, but such a one as is bent and redy at all his particular mouinges. For he is therefore called almightie, not because he can do and yet sitteth still and doth nothing, or by generall instinct only continueth the order of nature that he hath before appointed: but because he gouerning both heauen and earth, by his Prouidence so ordereth all thinges that nothing chaunceth but by his aduised purpose. For whereas it is saied in the Psalme that he doth whatsoever he will, therein is meant his certaine and determined wil. For it were very fonde to expounde the Prophets words after the Philosophers manner, that God is the first Agent or doer, because he is the beginning and cause of all mouing: whereas the faithfull ought rather in aduersitie to ease themselues with this comfort, that they suffer nothing but by the ordinance and commaundement of God, because they are vnder his hand. If then the gouernemēt of God do so extende to all his workes, it is a very childish cauillatiō to enclose it within the influence of nature. And yet they do no more defraude God of his glory than themselues of a most profitable doctrine, whosoeuer do restraine the Prouidence of God within so narrow boundes, as if he suffred all thinges to be carried with an vngouerned course according to a perpetuall law of nature. For nothing were more miserable than man if he should be left subiect to euery motion of the heauen, the aire, the earth and the waters. Beside that by that meane the singular goodnesse of God towarde euery man is to much vnhonorably diminished. David crieth Psa. 8. 3. out that babes yet hanging on their mothers brestes are eloquent enough to magnifie the glory of God, because euen so sone as they be come out of the wombe, they finde food prepared for thé by his heauenly care. This is in deede generally true, so that yet our eyes and senses ouerpasse not that vnmarked which experiēce plainly sheweth, that some mothers haue full and plentifull brestes, some other almost dry, as it pleaseth God to fede one more liberally, and an other more scarcely. But they which geue the due praise to the almightinesse of God, do receiue double profit therby, the one that he hath sufficiently large abilitie to do them good, in whoes possession are both heauen and earth, and to whoes becke all creatures do attend vpon, to yeld themselues to his obedience: the other, that they may safely reste in his protection, to whoes will are subiect all these hurtfull thinges that may any way be feared, by whoes authorite as with a bridle Satan is restrained with all his furies and all his preparation, vpon whoes becke doth hang all that euer is against our safetic. And no other way but this can the immesurable and superstitious feares be corrected or appeased, which we ostentimes conceiue by daungers happening vnto vs. Superstitiously fearful I say we be, if where creatures do threaten vs or geue vs any cause of feare, we be so afrayed therof, as if they had of themselues any force or power to do vs harme, or did vnforeseen or by chaunce hurt vs, or as if against the hurtes that they do, there were not sufficient helpe in God. As for example. The Prophet forbiddeth the children of God that they should not feare the starres and signes of the heauen, as the vnbeleuers are wont to do. He condemneth not euery kinde of feare. But when the vnbeleuers to geue away the gouernement of the worlde from God vnto Planets, do faine that their felicitie or miserie doth hang on the decrees and foreshewinges of the starres, and not on the will of God, so commeth it to passe that their feare is withdrawen away from that onely one, whom they ought to haue regarded, vnto the starres and comets. Whoso therefore will beware of this vnfaithfulnesse, let him kepe alwayes in remembrance that there is not in the creatures a wandring power, working or motion, but that they are gouerned by the secrete counsell of God, so that nothing can chauce but that which is decreed by him both witting and willing it so to be.

4 First therefore let the readers learne, that Prouidence is called that, not wherwith God idly beholdeth from heauen what is done in the worlde, but wherwith as guiding the sterne he sitteth and ordreth all thinges that come to passe. So doth it no lesse belong to his handes than to his eyes. For When Abraham saied vnto his sonne. God shall provide, he meant not onely that God did forknow the successe then to come, but that he did cast the care of a thing to him vnknown vpon the will of God, which is wont to bring thinges doutefull and confused to a certaine end. Wherby foloweth that Prouidence consisteth in doing: for to much fondely do many trifle in talking of bare forknowledge. Their error is not altogether so grosse which geue vnto God a gouernement but disordered, and without aduised choise, (as I haue before said,) that is to say such as whirleth and driueth about with a generall motiō the frame of the world with all the partes therof, but doth not peculiarly direct the doing of euery creature. Yet is this error not tolerable. For as they teach, it may be (notwithstanding this Prouidence which they call vniuersall) that all creatures may be moued by chaunce, or man may turne himselfe hether or thether by free choise of his will. And so do they parte the gouernement betwene God and man, that God by his power inspireth into mā a motion wherby he may worke according to the nature planted in him, and man ordereth his owne doinges by his owne voluntarie aduise: Briefely they meane that the worlde, mens matters, and men themselves are gouerned by the power, but not by the appointment of God. I speake not of the Epicureans (which pestilēce the worlde hath alway bin filled with) which dreame of an idle and slouthfull God: and other as mad as they, which in olde time imagined that God did so rule aboue the middle region of the ayre, that he left thinges beneth to Fortune: for against so euidēt madnesse the dumme creatures themselves do sufficiently crie out. For now my purpose is to confute that opinion that is in a manner commonly beleued, which giuing to God a certaine blinde, and I wote not what vncertaine motion, taketh from him the principall thing, that is by his incomprehensible wisdom to direct and dispose all thinges to their ende: and so in name onely and not in deede it maketh God a ruler of the worlde, because it taketh from him the gouernement of it. For what (I besech you) is it els to gouerne, but so to be ouer them that are vnder thee, that thou mayest rule thē by appointed order? Yet do I not altogether reiect that which is spoken of the vniuersall Prouidence: so that they will againe graunt me this, that the world is ruled by God, not onely because he mainreinethe the order of nature which himselfe hath set, but also because he hath a peculiar care of euery one of his workes . Trew it is that all sortes of thinges are moued by a secret instinct of nature , as if they did obey the eternall commaundement of God , and that that which God hath ones determined doth of it selfe procede forward . And hereunto may that be applied which Christ saith, that he and his father were euen from the beginning alway working . And that which Paule teacheth that in him we liue , are moued and haue our beyng, and that which the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues , meaning to proue the Godhead of Christ saith, that by his mightie cōmaundement all thinges are susteyned. But they do wrong which by this colour do hide and darken the special Providence, which is cōfirmed by so certaine and plaine testimonies of Scripture , that it is maruell that any man coulde doute of it. And surely they themselues that drawe the same veile which I speake of to hide it , are compelled by way of correction to adde , that many thinges are done by the peculiar care of God , but then they do wrongfully restraine the same onely to peculiar doinges. Wherefore we must proue that God doth so geue hede to the gouernement of the succeses of all thinges , and that they all do so procede from his determined counsell that nothing happeneth by chaunce.

5 If we graunt that the beginning of motion belongeth to God, but that all thinges are either of themselues or by chaūce caried whether the inclination of nature driueth them, the mutuall succeding by turnes of daies and nightes , of winter and sommer , shalbe the worke of God, insomuch as he appointing to euery one their duties hath set them a certaine law , that is if they shoulde alway kepe one measure in egall proportion, as well the dayes that come after the nightes , the monethes after monethes, and yeres after yeres. But when sometime immoderate heates with drinesse do burne vp all the graine, somtime vnseasonable raines do marre the corne, whē sodeine harme cōmeth by haile and tempestes : that shall not be the worke of God , vnlesse parhap it be because the cloudes or faire whether or coulde or heate haue their beginning of the meting of the planetes or other naturall causes. But by this meane is there no rounge left, neither for the fatherly fauour nor for the iudgementes of God . If they say that God is beneficiall enough to mankinde because he poureth into the heauē and earth an ordinarie power, wherby they do finde him nourishmēt: that is to vaine & prophane an inuention, as though the frutefulnessse of one yeare were not the singular blessing of God , and dearth and famine were not his curse and vengeance? But because it were to lōg to gather together all the reasons that serue for this purpose , let the authoritie of God himselfe suffice vs. In the law and in the Prophetes he doth oftentimes pronounce, that so ofte as he watereth the earth with deaw and raine, he declareth his fauor, and that when by his cōmaundement the heauen is hardened like yron, when corne is consumed with blasting and other harmes, when the fieldes are striken with haile & tempestes, it is a token of his certaine & speciall vengeance. If we graunt these thinges, then is it assured that there falleth not a drop of raine but by the certaine commaundement of God. Dauid prayseth the general Prouidence of God, that he geueth meate to the rauens birdes that call vpon him: but when God himselfe threatneth famine to lyuing creatures, doth he not sufficiently declare that he fedeth all liuing thinges sometime with scarce & sometime with more plentifull portion as he thinketh good? It is a childish thing as I said before, to restraine this to particular doings, wheras Christ speaketh without exception, that not a sparrow of neuer so small a price doth fall to the ground without the will of his father. Surely if the flying of birdes be ruled by the purpose of God, then must we nedes confesse with y^e Prophet, that he so dwelleth on hie, that yet he humbleth himselfe to loke vpon all thinges that chaunce in heauen and earth.

6 But because we know that the worlde was made principally for mankindes sake, we must therfore cōsider this ende in the gouernance of man. The prophet Hieremie crieth out. I know, Lorde, that the way of man is not his owne, neither belongeth it to man to direct his owne steppes. And Salomon saieth, the steppes of man are ruled by the Lord, and how shall a man dispose his owne way? Now let them say that man is moued by God according to the inclination of his owne nature, but that man himselfe doth turne that mouing whether it pleaseth him. But if that were truely said, then shoulde man haue the free choise of his owne wayes. Paraduventure they will deny that, because he can do nothing without the power of God. But seing it is certaine that the Prophet and Salomon do geue vnto God, not onely power but also choise and appointment, they can not so escape away. But Salomon in an other place doth finely rebuke this rashnesse of men, that appoint vnto themselues an other ende without respect of God, as though they were not led by his hande. The preparations (saith he) of the harte are in man, but the aunswere of the tongue is of the Lord. It is a fonde madnesse that men will take vpon them to do thinges without God, which can not so much as speake but what he will. And the Scripture to expresse more plainly that nothing at all is done in the worlde but by his appointment, sheweth that those thinges whiche seme molte happening by chaunce are

 Lord suffereth it not which claimeth the iudgement of them to himselfe: for he saith that it cometh not to passe by a mans owne power Pro. 16. that stones are cast into the lap and drawen out againe, but that thing 13. which onely might be saied to come of chaunce he testifieth to come from him selfe. For the same purpose maketh that saying of Salomon.
 The poore man and the vsurer mete together, God lighteneth both their eyes. For although poore men & riche be mingled together in the worlde, while euery one hath his state assigned him from God, he admonisheth that God which geueth light to all men is not blinde, & so he exhorteth the poore to pacience, because whosoever are not contented with their owne state, they seke to shake of the burden that God hath laied vpon them. So an other Prophet rebuketh the vngod-ly men, which ascribe to the diligēce of men or to Fortune, that some lie in miserie and some arise vp to honor. To come to preferment is neither from the east nor from the west nor from the south, for God Psa. 75. is the iudge; he maketh low and he maketh hie. Because God can not 7. put of the office of a iudge, therupon the Prophet proueth that by his secret purpose some are in honor, & other some remaine in cōtempt.

7 And also I say that the very particular successses are generally witnesses of gods singular prouidēce. God raised in the desert a south Exo. 19. winde to bring the people plenty of foules: when his pleasure was to 13. haue Ionas throwen into the sea, he sent out a winde to raise vp a tem-Ion. 1. pēste. But they that thinke that God gouerneth not the worlde, will 4. say that this chanced beside commō vse. But therby I do gather that neuer any winde doth rise or encrease but by the special commaunde-ment of God. For otherwise it shoulde not be true, that he maketh Psa. 104 the windes his messangers, and fiery flame his ministers, that he ma-4. keth the cloudes his chariots and rideth vpon the winges of the winde, vnlesse he did by his will driue aboute the cloudes and windes, and shew in them the singular presence of his power. So in an other place Psa. 107 we are taught that so ofte the sea swelleth with blast of windes, those 25. violences do testifie a singular presence of God. He commaūdeth and raiseth vp the stormy windes and it listeth vp the waues therof, and thē he turneth the storme to calme, so that the waues therof are still. As in an other place he saith, that he scourged the people with burning windes. So wheras the power of engendring is naturally geuen to men, yet God willeth it to be imputed to his speciall grace, that he leaueth some in barrenesse, and vouchsaueth to graunt issue to other some, the frute of the wombe is his gift. Therefore said Iacob to his wife, am Ge 30.

 I as God that I can geue thee children? But to make an ende: there 2.
 is nothing more ordinary in nature than that we be fed with bread. But the Holy ghost pronounceth that not onely the growing of the fruites of the earth is the speciall gift of God, but also that men liue not by onely bread, because it is not the very full feding that nourisheth, but the secret blessing of God: as on the other side he thretneth that he wil breake the itay of bread. Neither coulde we earnestly pray for our dayly bread, vnlesse God did geue vs foode with his fatherly hande. Therefore the Prophet, to perswade the faithfull, that God in feding them doth fulfil the office of a good father of household, doth put them in minde that he geueth meate to all flesh. Finally when we haue on the one side: The eyes of the Lord are vpon the righteous, and his eares bent to their prayers: on the other side: The eye of the Lord is vpon the vngodly to destroy the memory of them out of the earth: let vs know that all creatures both aboue and beneth are ready to obedience that he may apply them to what vse soeuer he will, wherupon is gathered that not onely his generall prouidence remaineth in his creatures to continue the order of nature, but also by his maruellous counsell is applied to a certaine and proper ende. Esa. 3. 1.

8 They which would bring this doctrine in hatred, do caull that this is the learning that the Stoikes teach of fatum or Destenie, which also was ones laied for reproch to Augustine. As for vs, although we be loth to striue about wordes, yet we allow not this word fatum, both because it is one of those whoes prophane noueltie S. Paul teacheth vs to flie, and because some men go about with the odiousnesse therof to bring Gods truth in hatred. As for the very opinion of the Stoikes, it is wrongfully laid to our charge. For we do not, as the Stoikes do, imagine a necessitie by a certaine perpetuall knot and entangled order of causes which is contened in nature: but we make God the iudge and gouernour of all thinges, which according to his wisdom hath cuen from furthest ende of eternitie decreed what he woulde do, and now by his power putteth in execution that which he hath decreed. Wherupon we affirme that not only the heauen and earth and other creatures without life, but also the purposes and willes of men are so gouerned by his Prouidence, that they be directly caried to the ende that it appointeth. What then? will one say, doth nothing happen by fortune or by chaunce? I aunswere that Basilius magnus hath truely said that fortune and chaunce are heathen mens wordes, with the signification wherof the mindes of the godly ought not to be occupied. For if euery good successe be the blessing of God, and euery calamitie and aduersitie be his curse, now is there in mens matters no place left for fortune or chaunce. We ought also to be moued with this saying of Augustine. In his boks against the Academikes he saith. It doth displease me that I haue so oft named fortune, albeit my meaning was not to haue any goddesse meant therby, but only a chaunceable happening in outward thinges ether good or euil. Of which word Fortune are deriued those wordes which no religion forbiddeth vs to vse, forte, forsan, forsitan, fortasse, fortuito, that is parhap, paraduerture, by fortune and by chaunce, which yet must all be applied to the Prouidence of God. And that did I not leaue vnspoken when I said, for parchaunce eue the same that is commonly called Fortune is also ruled by secret order. And wee call chaunce in thinges nothing els but that wherof the reason and cause is vnknown. I said this in dede, but it repenteth me that I did there so name Fortune. Forasmuch as I se that men haue a very euill custome, that where they ought to say, thus it pleased God, they say, thus it pleased fortune. Finally he doth commonly in his bookes teach, that the world should be vnorderly whirled about if any thing were leste vnto Fortune. And although in an other place he determineth that all things are done partly by the free will of man, and partly by the Prouidence of God, yet doth he a little after sufficiently shew that men are subiect vnto and ruled by Prouidence, taking this for a principle, that nothing is more against conuenience of reason, than to say that any thing chaunceth but by the ordinance of God, for els it shoulde happen without cause or order by which reason he also excludeth that happening that hangeth vpon the will of men: and by and by after he plainlier saith that we ought not to seke a cause of the will of God. And so ofte as he maketh mention of sufferance, how that is to be vnderstanded shall very well appeare by one place where he proueth that the will of God is the soueraigne and first cause of all thinges, because nothing happeneth but by his commaundement or sufferance. Surely he faineth not God to sit still idle in a watch tour, when it is his pleasure to suffer any thing, wheras he vseth an actuall will (as I may so call it) which otherwise coulede not be called a cause.

9 But forasmuch as the dullnesse of our vnderstanding can not by a great way atteine to the height of Gods prouidēce, we must vse a distinctiō to helpe to lift it vp. I say therefore, how soeuer all thinges are ordeined by the purpose and certaine disposition of God, yet to vs they are chaunfable, not that we thinke that fortune ruleth the world and men, and vnaduisedly tosseth all thinges vp and downe (for such beastlynesse ought to be farre from a Christian harte) but because the order, meane, ende and necessitie of those thinges that happen, doth for the most parte lie secrete in the purpose of God, and is not comprehended with opinion of man, therefore those thinges are as it were chaũfable, which yet it is certaine to come to passe by the will of God. For they seme no otherwise, whether we consider them in their owne nature, or whether we esteeme them according to our knowledge and iudgement. As for an example, let vs put the case, that a marchaunt being entred into a wood in cõpanie of true men, doth vnwisely stray away from his felowes, and in his wandring chaunceth vpon a denne of robbers, lighteth among theues and is killed, his death was not on-ly foreseen with goddes eye, but also determined by his decree. For it is not saied that he did foresee how farre ech mans life should extende, but that he hath sette and appointed markes which can not be passed. And yet so farre as the capacitie of our minde conceiueth, all thinges herein seme happening by chaunce. What shall a Christian here thinke? euen this, whatsoeuer happened in such a death; he will thinke it in nature chauncing by fortune as it is in dede, but yet he wil not doubt that the prouidence of God did gouerne to direct fortune to her ende. In like manner are the happeninges of thinges to come. For as all thinges that be to come are vncertaine vnto vs, so we hang them in suspense, as if they might fall on either parte, yet this remaineth settled in our hartes, that nothing shal happẽ but that which God hath already foreseen. In this meaning is the name of chaunce oft re- pered in Ecclesiastes, because at the first sight mē do not attein to see the first cause which is farre hidden from them. And yet that which is declared in the Scriptures concerning the secret prouidence of God, was neuer so blotted out of the hartes of men, but that euen in the darkenesse there alway shined some sparkes therof. So the sothiayers of the Philistiãs, although they wauer in doubtfulnesse, yet they ascribe aduersitie partly to God partly to fortune. If (say they) the arke go that way, we shall know that it is God that hath striken vs: but if it go the other way, then a chaũce hath light vpon vs. In dede they did foolishly, when their conning of soth saying deceiued them, to flee to fortune, but in the meane while we se them constrained, so that they dare not thinke that the euil happe which chaũced vnto them did come of fortune. But how God with the bridle of his prouidence turneth all succeses whether pleaseth him, may appeare by one notable example. Beholde euen at one moment of time, when Dauid was founde out & nere taken in the desert of Mahon, euen then the Philistines inuaded the lande, and Saul was compelled to depart. If God meaning to provide for the safetie of his seruauant did cast this let in Saules way, surely although the Philistines going to armes were sodein and beside the expectation of men, yet may we not say that it came by chaunce. But those things that seme to vs to happen by chaunce, faith wil acknowledge to haue bin a secret mouing of God. I graunt there doth not alwaie appeare the like reason, but vndoubtedly we ought to beleue that whatsoeuer changes of thinges are seen in the worlde, they come by the secret stirring of the hand of God. But that which God purposeth is so of necessitie to come to passe, that yet it is not of necessitie precisely nor by the nature of it selfe. As therof is a familiar example in the bones of Christ. Forasmuch as he had put on a bodie like vnto ours, no wise man will deny that his bones were naturally able to be broken, yet was it impossible that they should be broken: wherby we see againe that not without cause were in scholes inuented the distinctions of necessitie in respect, and necessitie absolute, of consequent and consequence, where as God had subiect to bricklenesse the bones of his sonne, which he had exempted from being able to be broken, and so brought to necessitie by reason of his owne purpose, that that thing coulde not be, which naturally might haue bin.

The xvij. Chapter.

Wherto and to what ende this doctrine is to be applied, that vve may be certaine of the profite therof.

Now forasmuch as mē's wits are bent to vaine curious subtleties, it is scarcely possible but that they shall encombe themselves with entangled doubtles, whosoever do not know the true and right vse of this Doctrine. Therefore it shall be expedient here to touch shortly to what ende the Scripture teacheth, that all thinges are ordred by God. And first of all is to be noted, that the Prouidence of God ought to be considered as well for the time to come as for the time past: secondarily that the same is in such sorte the gouernour of all thinges, that sometime it woorketh by meanes, sometime without meanes, and sometime against all meanes. Last of all, that it tendeth to this ende, that God may shew that he hath care of all mankinde, but specially that he doth wathe in ruling of his Church, which he vouchesaueth more nerely to looke vnto. And this is also to be added, that although either the fatherly fauour & bountyfulness of God, or oftentimes the seueritie of his iudgemēt do brightly appere in the whole course of his Prouidence: yet sometime the causes of those thinges that happen are secrete, so that this thought

crepeth into our mindes, that mens matters are turned and whirled about with the blinde sway of fortune, or so that the flesh stirreth vs to murmure, as if God did to make him selfe pastime tosse men like tennise balles. True it is that if we were with quiet and still mindes ready to learne, the very successe it selfe woulde at length plainly shew, that God hath an assured good reason of his purpose, either to traine them that be his to pacience, or to correct their euill affections and tame their wantonnesse, or to bring them downe to the renouncing of them selues, or to awake their drowsinesse: on the other side to ouerthrow the prowde, to disappoint the suttletie of the wicked, to confounde their deuises. But howsoeuer the causes be secrete and vnknownen to vs: we must assuredly holde that they are laid vp in hidden store with him, and therefore we ought to crie out with Dauid, God, Psa. 40. thou hast made thy wonderfull workes so many, that none can count in order to thee thy thoughts towarde vs. I woulde declare and speake of them, but they are more than I am able to expresse. For although alwaies in our miseries we ought to thinke vpon our sinnes, that y very punishment may moue vs to repentance, yet do we see how Christ geueth more power to the secret purpose of his father, than to punish euery one according to his deseruing. For of him that was borne blinde he saith: neither hath this man sinned nor his parentes, but that the glorie of God may be shewed in him. For here naturall murmureth when calamitie commeth euen before birth, as if God did vnmercifully so to punish the sely innocent, that had not deserued it. But Christ doth testifie that in this looking glasse the glory of his father doth shine to our sight, if we haue cleere eyes to beholde it. But we must kepe modestie, that we draw not God to yelde cause of his doinges, but let vs so reuerence his secret iudgementes, that his will be vnto vs, a most iuste cause of all thinges. When thicke cloudes do couer the heauen, and a violent tempest ariseth, then by cause both a heauysome mistynesse is cast before our eyes, & the thunder troubleth our eares, and all our senses are amased with terrour, we thinke that all thinges are confouled and tomblod together: and yet all the while there remaineth in the heauen the same quietenesse and calmenesse, that was before. So must we thinke that while the troublesome state of thinges in the worlde taketh from vs abilitie to iudge, God by the pure light of his righteousnesse and wisdom, doth in well framed order gouerne and dispose euen those very troublesome motions themselves to a right ende. And surely very monstrous is the rage of many in this behalfe, which dare more boldly call the workes of God to accompt and examine his secret meaninges, and to geue vnaduised sentence of thinges vnknownen, than they will do of the deedes of mortall men. For what is more vnorderly than to vse such modestie towards our egals, that we had rather suspende our iudgement than to incurre the blame of rashnesse, and on the other side proudly to triumph vpon the darke iudgementes of God, which it became vs to regarde with reuerence.

2 Therefore no man shall well and profitably wey the Prouidence of God but he that considering that he hath to do with his creator and the maker of the world, doth with such humility as he ought submit himselfe to feare and reuerence. Hereby it cometh to passe, that so many dogs at this day do with venimed bitinges, or at least barking assaile this doctrine, because they will haue no more to be lawfull for God, than their owne reason informeth them. And also they raile at vs with all the spitefulnesse that they are able, for that not contented with the cōmaundementes of the law, wherein the will of God is comprehended, we do further say, that the worlde is ruled by his secret counsels. As though the thing that we teach were an inuention of our owne brayne, and as though it were not true that the holy Ghost doth euery where expressely say the same, and repeteth it with innumerable formes of speech. But because some shame restraineth them, that they dare not vomire out their blasphemies against the heauen: they faine that they contende with vs, to the ende they may the more freely play the madmen. But if they do not graunt that what soeuer happeneth in the worlde, is gouerned by the incomprehensible purpose of God, let them aunswere to what ende the Scripture saith, that his iudgementes are a depe bottomlesse deapth. For where as Moses crieth out that the will of God is not to be sought afarre of in the cloudes, or in the deapthes, because it is familiarly set forth in the law: it foloweth, that his other hidden will is compared to a bottomlesse deapth. Of the which Paule also saith: O deapth of the richesse and of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God: how vnsearchable are his iudgementes, and his waies past finding out? for who hath knowen the minde of the Lord, or who hath bin his counsellour? And it is in deede true, that in the Gospell and in the law are contened misteries which are farre aboue the capacitie of our sense: but forasmuch as God for the comprehēding of these misteries which he hath vouchesaued to open by his woorde, doth lighten the mindes of them that be his, with the Spirite of Vnderstanding: nowe is therin no bottomlesse deapth, but a way wherein we must safe walke, and a candell to guide our feete, and the light of life, and the schoole of certaine and plainly discernable truth. But his meruailous order of gouerning the worlde is worthily called a bottomlesse deapth : because while it is hidden from vs , we ought reuerently to worshippe it. Right well hath Moses expressed them both in fewe woordes. The secret thinges (saith he) belong to the Lorde our God : but the thinges reueled belong to vs and to our children for euer. We see how he biddeth vs not onely to studie in meditation of the law, but also reuerently to looke vp vnto the secret Prouidence of God. And in the booke of Iob is reherfed one title of this deapth, that it humbleth our mindes . For after that the author of that booke in surueying vp and downe the frame of the worlde, had honourably entreated of the woorkes of God , at length he addeth : Lo , these be part of his waies , but howe littel a portion heare we of him ? According to which reason in an other place he maketh difference betwene the wisdom that remaineth with God, and the measure of wisdom that he hath appointed for men. For after he hath preached of the secretes of nature , he saith that wisdom is knowen to God onely, and is hidden from the eyes of all liuyng creatures. But by and by after he saith further , that it is published to the ende it should be serched out, because it is said vnto mā, beholde the feare of God is wisdom. For this purpose maketh the saying of Augustine : Bycause we know not all thinges which God doth concerning vs in most good order, that therefore in only good will we do according to the law, because his Prouidence is an vnchaungeable law . Therefore sith God doth claime vnto him selfe the power to rule the world, which is to vs vnknown, let this be to vs a law of sobrenesse and modestie, quietly to obey his soueraigne authoritie , that his will may be to vs the only rule of iustice, and the most iust cause of all thinges. I meane not that absolute will , of which the Sophisters do babble, separating by wicked and prophane disagreement his iustice from his power , but I meane that Prouidence ; which is the gouernesse of all thinges, from which procedeth nothing but right : although the causes therof be hidden from vs.

3 Whosoever shalbe framed to this modestie , they neither for the time paste will murmure against God for their aduersities ; nor lay vpon him the blame of wicked doinges , as Agamemnon in Homer did, saying , I am not the cause , but Iupiter and Destenie : nor yet againe as caried awaie with Destenies, they will by desperation throw them selues into destruction , as that yong man in Plautus which said: Vnstable is the chaunce of thinges : the Destenies driue men at their pleasure , I will get me to some rocke there to make an ende of my goodes and life together. Neither yet (as an other did) they will pretende the name of God to couer their owne mischeuous doinges : for so saith Lyconides in an other comedie: God was the mouer. I beleue it was the will of the gods: for if it had not bin their will, I know it shoulde not so come to passe. But rather they will search and learne out of the Scripture what pleaseth God, that by the guiding of the Holy ghost they may trauaile to atteine therunto. And also being ready to folowe God, whether soeuer he calleth, they shewe in dede that nothing is more profitable then the knowledge of his doctrine.

 Very foolishly do prophane men turmoile with their fondnesses, so that they in maner confound heauen & earth together as the saying is: If God haue marked the point of our death, we can not escape it: then it is labour vainely lost in taking hede to our selues. Therefore where as one man dareth not venture to go the way that he heareth to be daungerous, least he be murdered of theues: an other sendeth for Phisitians, and werieth himselfe with medicines to succour his life: an other forbearth grosse meates for feare of appeiring his feble health: an other dreadeth to dwell in a ruinous house: Finally where as men deuise all waies & endeuour with all diligence of minde wher-by they may atteine that which they desire: either all these remedies are vaine, which are sought, as to reforme the will of God, or els life and death, health and sickenesse, peace and warre, and other thinges, which men as they couet or hate them, do by their trauaile endeuour to obtaine or escape, are not determined by his certaine decree. And further they gather, that the praiers of the faithfull are disordered, or at the least superfluous, wherin petition is made that it will please the Lord to provide for those thinges which he hath already decreed frō eternitie. To be short, they destroy all counsels that men do take for time to come as thinges against the Prouidence of God, which hath determined what he would haue done, without calling them to counsell. And thē what soeuer is already happened, they so impute it to the Prouidence of God, that they winke at the man whom they know to haue done it. As hath a ruffian slaine an honest citezen? he hath executed (say they) the purpose of God. Hath one stolen, or committed fornication? because he hath doen the thing that was for-seene and ordeined by the Lord, he is a minister of his Prouidence.
 Hath the sonne carelessly, neglecting al remedies, waited for the death of his father? he coulde not resist God that had so before appointed from eternitie. So all mischeuous doinges they call vertues because they obey the ordinance of God.

4 But as touching thinges to come, Salomon doth well bring in agreement together the purposes of men with the Prouidēce of God.
 For as he laugheth to scorne their folly, which boldly do enterprise any

any thing without the Lorde, as though they were not ruled by his hand: so in an other place he speaketh in this maner. The hart of man purposeth his way, but the Lord doth direct his steppes, meaning that we are not hindered by the eternall Decrees of God, but that vnder his will we may both prouide for our selues, and dispose all things belonging to vs. And that is not without a manifest reason. For he that hath limited our life within appointed boundes, hath therewithall left with vs the care thereof, hath furnished vs with meanes and helpes to preserue it, hath made vs to haue knowledge before hand of daungers, and that they should not oppresse vs vnware, he hath giuen vs prouisions and remedies. Now it is playne to see what is our duety: that is to say: If God hath committed to vs our owne life to defende, our duety is to defende it. If he offer vs helpes, our duety is to vse them. If he shew vs daungers before, our duety is not to runne rashly into them. If he minister vs remedies, our duety is not to neglect them. But no daunger shall hurt, vnlesse it be fatall, which by all remedies can not be ouercome. But what if daungers be therefore not fatal, because God hath assigned thee remedies to repulse & ouercome them? See howe thy manner of reasoning agreeth with the order of Gods disposition. Thou gatherest that daunger is not to be taken heede of, because forasmuch as it is not fatall, we shall escape it without taking heede at all: but the Lord doth therefore enioyne thee to take heede of it, because he will not haue it fatall vnto thee. These madde men do not consider that which is playne before their eyes, that the skil of taking counsell & heede is enspired iinto men by God, whereby they may serue his Prouidence in preseruing of their owne life: as on the other side by negligence & slouth they procure to them selues those euils that he hath appointed for them. For how commeth it to passe, that a circumspect man while he prouideth for himselfe, doth winde himselfe out of euils that hang ouer him, and the foole perisheth by vnadvised rashnesse, but for that both folly and wisdom are the instrumentes of Gods disposition on both partes? Therefore it pleased God to hide from vs all thinges to come, to this ende that we should meete with them as thinges doutefull, and not ceasse to sette prepared remedies agaynst them, till either they be ouercome or be past all helpe of care. And for this cause I haue before admonished that the Prouidence of God doth not alway shewe it selfe naked, but as God by vsing of meanes doth in a certayne maner cloth it.

5 The same men do vnorderly & vnadvisedly draw the chaunces of time past to the naked prouidence of God. For because vpon it do hang all thinges whatsoever happen, therefore (say they) neither robberies, nor adulteries, nor manslaughters are committed without the will of God. Why then (say they) shall a thiefe be punished, for that he spoyled him whom the Lordes will was to punish with poverty? Why shall the murtherer be punished which hath slayne him whose life the Lorde had ended? If all such men do serue the will of God, why shall they be punished? But I deny that they serue the will of God. For we may not say that he which is caried with an euill minde doth seruice to God as commauder of it, where in deede he doth but obey his owne wicked lust. He obeyeth God, which being enformed of his will doth labour to that end, whereunto Gods will calleth him. But wherby are we enformed of his will, but by his word? Therefore in doinge of thinges we must see that same will of God, which he declareth in his word. God requireth of vs only that which he commaundeth. If we do any thing agaynst his commaundement, it is not obedience but obstinacy & transgressiō. But vnlasse he would, we should not do it. I graunt. But do we euill thinges to this end to obey him? But he doth not commaund vs to do them, but rather we runne on headlong, not minding what he willeth, but so raging with the intemperance of our owne lust, that of set purpose we bende our trauaile agaynst him. And by these meanes in euill doing we serue his iust ordinance, because according to the infinite greatnesse of his wisdom, he hath good skill to vse euill instrumentes to do good. And see how foolish is their maner of arguing. They would haue y^e doers unpunished for mischeuous actes, because they are not comitted but by the disposition of God. I graunt more: that theeues and murtherers & other euill doers are the instrumentes of Gods Prouidence, whom the Lord doth vse to execute those iudgementes which he hath with him selfe determined. But I deny that their euill doings ought to haue any excuse therby. For why? shal they either entagle God in the same wickednesse with them, or shall they couer their naughtines with his righteousnesse? They can do neither of both. Because they should not be able to excuse themselues, they are accused by theyr owne conscience. And because they should not be able to blame God, they finde all the euill in themselues, & in him nothing but a lawfull vse of their euilnesse. But he worketh by them. And whence I pray you, commeth the stinke in a dead carrion, which hath bin both rotted & disclosed by heate of the sunne? All men do see that it is raised by the beames of the sunne. Yet no man doth therefore say, that the sunbeames do stinke. So when there resteth in an euill man, the matter and giltinesse of euill, what cause is there why it should be thought that God is any thing thing defiled with it, if he vse their seruice at his pleasure. Away therefore with this doggish frowardnesse, which may in dede a far of barke at the iustice of God, but can not touch it.

6 But these caullations or rather doting errours of phrenetike men, shall easily be shaken away, by godly and holy meditation of the Prouidence, which the rule of godlinesse teacheth vs, so that thereof may grow vnto vs a good and most pleasant fruite. Therefore a Christian hart when it is most assuredly perswaded, that all things come to passe by the disposition of God, and that nothinge happeneth by chaunce, will alway bend his eyes to him as to the principall cause of things, and yet will consider the inferiour causes in their place. Then he will not dout that the singular prouidence of God doth watch for his preservation, which Prouidence will suffer nothing to happen, but that which shall turne to his good and saluation. And because he hath to do first of all with men, and then with the other creatures, he will assure himselfe that Gods Prouidence doth reigne in both. As touching men, whether they be good or euill, he will acknowledge that all their counselles, wilies, enterprises and powers are vnder the hand of God, so that it is in Gods will to bow them whether he list, and to restrayne them so oft as pleaseth him. That the singular Prouidence of God doth kepe watch for the safety of the faithfull, there are many and most euident promises to witnesse. Cast thy burde vpon the Lord, and he shall nourish thee, and shall not suffer the righteous to fall for euer, because he careth for vs. He that dwelleth in the helpe of the hiest, shall abide in the protection of the God of heauen. He that toucheth you, toucheth y^e apple of mine eie. I will be thy shield, a brasen wall: I will be enemy to thy enemies. Although the mother forget her childre, yet will I not forget thee. And also this is the principall entent in the histories of the Bible, to teach that the Lord doth with such diligence keepe the wayes of the Saintes, that they do not so much as stumble against a stone. Therefore asa litle before we haue rightfully reiected their opinion which do imagine an vniuersall Prouidence of God, that stoupeth not specially to the care of euery creature: yet principally it shal be good to reknowledge the same speciall care toward our selues. Whereupon Christ after he had affirmed that not the sparrow of least value, doth fall to the ground without the will of the Father, doth by and by apply it to this ende, that we should consider that howe much we be more worth than sparrows, with so much nyer care doth God prouide for vs, and he extendeth that care so farre that we may be bold to trust that the heares of our head are numbred. What can we wish our selues more, if not so much, as a heare can fall from our head but by his will? I speake not only of all mankinde, but because God hath chosen his church for a dwelling house for himselfe, it is no doute but that he doth by singular exâples shew his care in gouerning of it.

7 The seruauant of God being strengthened with these both, promises & examples, will ioyne with them the testimonies which teach that all men are vnder Gods power, whether it be to winne their mindes to good will, or to restrayne their malice that it may do no hurt. For it is the Lord that giueth vs fauour not onely with them that will vs well, but also in the Ægyptians, and as for the maliciousnesse of our enemies, he knoweth how by diuerse wayes to subdue it. For sometime he taketh away their wit from them, so that they can conceiue no sound or sober aduise, like as he sent foorth Sathan to fill the mouthes of all the Prophetes with lying to deceiue Achab. He made Rechabeam made by the yong mens counsell, that he might be spoyled of his kingdome by his owne folly. Many times when he graunteth them wit, yet he maketh them so afraid & astonished, that they can not will or go about that which they haue conceiued. Sometime also when he hath suffered them to go about that which lust & rage did counsell them, he doth in conuenient time breake of their violences, & suffereth them not to proceede to the end that they purposed. So did he before the time bring to nought the counsell of Achitophell that should haue bin to Dauids destruction. So also he taketh care to gouerne all his creatures for the benefite and safety of them that be his, yea and to gouerne the deuill himselfe, which as we see durst enterprise nothing against Iob without his sufferaunce and cōmaundement. Of this knowledg necessarily ensueth both a thankfulnesse of minde in prosperous successe of thinges, and also patience in aduersity, and an incredible assurednesse against the time to come. Whatsoeuer therefore shall betide vnto him prosperously and according to his hartes desire, all that he will ascribe vnto God, whether he feele the bounty of God by the ministry of men, or be holpen by liuelesse creatures. For thus he will thinke in his minde: Surely it is the Lord which hath enclined their mindes to me, which hath ioyned them vnto me to be instrumentes of his goodnesse toward me. In plenty of the frutes of the earth, thus he wil thinke, that it is the Lord which heareth the heauen, that the heauen may heare the earth, that the earth also may heare her frutes. In other thinges he will not dout that it is the onely blessing of the Lord, whereby all things prosper, and being put in minde by so many causes he will not abide to be vnthankfull.

8 If any aduersity happen, he will by and by therein also lift vp his minde to God, whose hand auayleth much to emprint in vs a paciēce and quiete moderation of hart. If Ioseph had still continued in recording the falsehode of his brethren, he could neuer haue taken a brotherly minde toward them. But because he bowed his minde to the Lord, he forgate the iniurie, and inclined to mekenesse and clemency, so farrefoorth that of his owne accord he comforted his brethren & sayd: It is not you that sould me into Ægypt, but by the will of God I was sent before you to saue your liues. You in deede thought euill of me, but the Lord turned it to good. If Iob had had respect to the Chaldees, by whom he was troubled, he woulde forwith hane bin kindled to reuenge. But because he did therewithall acknowledge it to be the worke of God, he comforted himselfe with this most excellent saying: The Lord hath giuen, the Lord hath taken away, the Lords name be blessed. So Dauid: when Semei had railed and cast stones at him, if he had looked vpon man, he would haue encouraged his soldiers to reacquite the iniury. But because he vnderstoode that Semei did it not without the mouing of the Lord, he rather appeased them. Let him alone (said he) for the Lord hath commaunded him to curse. With the same bridle in an other place doth he restrain the intemperance of sorow. I held my peace (sayth he) and became as domme, because thou O Lord, diddest it. If there be more effectuell remedy against wrath & impatience: surely he hath not a little profited which hath learned in this behalfe to thinke vpon the Prouidence of God, that he may alway call backe his minde to this poynt. It is the Lords will, therefore it must be suffered, not onely because it is not lawfull to striue against it, but also because he willet nothing but that which is both iust & expedient. In summe this is the end, that being wrongfully hurt by men, we leauing their malice (which would do nothing but enforce our sorow, and whet our mindes to reuenge) shoulde remember to climbe vp vnto God, and learne to beleue assuredly, that whatsoeuer our enemy hath mischicuously done against vs, was both suffered and sent by Gods disposition. Paule, to refraine vs from recōpensing of iniuries doth wisely putte vs in minde, that we are not to wrastle with flesh and bloud, but with the spirituall enemy the deuill, that we may prepare our selues to striue with him. But this is the most profitable lesson for the appeasing of all rages of wrath, that God doth arme as well the deuill as all wicked men to striue with vs, & that he sitteth as iudge to exercise our patience. But if the misfortunes & miseries that oppresse vs, do chaunce without the worke of men, let vs remēber the doctrine of the law: whatsoeuer is prosperous floweth from the fountayne of Gods blessing, and that all aduersities are his cursings: and let that most terrible warning make vs afrayd: If ye walke stubbornly against me, I will also walke stubbornly against you. In which is rebuked our sluggishnesse, when according to the common sense of the flesh accompting all to be but chaunce that happeneth, of both sortes we are neither encouraged by the benefites of God to worship him, nor pricked forward with his scourges to repentaunce.

9 And yet in the meane time a godly man will not winke at the inferiour causes. Neither will he, because he thinketh them the ministers of Gods goodnes by whom he hath receiued benefite, therefore let the^m passe vnconsidered, as though they had deserued no thake by their getlenesse: but he will hartily thinke himselfe bound vnto them, & will willingly confesse his bond, & trauail as he shall be able and as occasion shal serue, to recompence it. Finally in benefites receiued he will reuerence and prayse God as the principall author, but he will honor men as the ministers, & as the trueth is in dede he will vnderstand that he is by the will of God bound to them, by whose hand it was Gods will to be beneficiall vnto him. If he suffer any losse by negligence or want of foresight, he will determine in his minde that the same was done in dede with the will of God, but he will impute it also to himselfe. If any man be dead by sicknesse whom he hath negligently handled, wheras of duety he should haue taken good hede vnto him although he be not ignoraunt that the man was come to his apointed time beyond which he could not passe, yet wil he not thereby lessen his offense, but because he had not faithfully discharged his duety toward him, he will so take it as if he had perished by fault of his negligence. Much lesse when there is vsed any fraude, and conceiued malice of minde in committing either murther or theft, will he excuse it vnder pretence of Gods Prouidence, but he will in one selfe euill act seuerally behold both the righteounesse of God & the wickednes of mā, as both doth manifestly shew theselues. But principally in things to come he wil haue consideration of such inferiour causes. For he will reckon it among the blessings of God if he be not disappointed of the helpes of men which he may vse for his safety. And so he neither will be negligent in taking of counsell, nor slouthfull in craving their helpe whom he seeth to haue sufficient wherof he may be succoured:

succoured: but thinking that whatsoever creatures can any thing profit him, the same are offered into his hand by God, he will apply them to his use as the lawful instruments of Gods Providence. And because he doth not certainly know what successe the busines will haue that he goeth about, (sauiug that in all things he knoweth that the Lord will provide for his benefit) he will with study rrauaile to y which he shall thinke expedient for himselfe, so far as he can cōceiue in minde & vnderstanding. And yet in taking of counsels he will not be caried on by his owne wit, but will cōmit & yeld himselfe to the wisdom of God, that by the guiding therof he may be directed to the right end. But his confidence shall not so stay vpon outward helpes, that if he haue thē he will carelesly rest vpon them, or if he want them he will be afraid as left destitute, for he will haue his minde alway fastened vpon the Providence of God, neither will he suffer himselfe to be drawn away from the stedfast beholding therof, by cōsideration of present things. So though Ioab acknowledged that y successe of battaill is in the wil & hand of God, yet he gaue not himselfe to slouthfulness but did diligently execute that which belonged to his calling, but he leaueth it vnto y Lord to gouerne the end. We wil stand valiant (saith he) for our natiō, & for the cities of our God. But the Lord do what is good in his eyes. This knowledge shal despoile vs of rashnes & wrōgful cōfidence, & shall driue vs to continuall calling vpon God: & also shal vphold our mindes with good hope, so as we may not dout assuredly and boldly to despise those daungers that compasse vs about.

10 In this point doth the inestimable felicity of a godly minde shewe foorth it selfe. Innumerable are the euils that do beseege mans life, & do threatē him so many deathes. As, not to go further than our selues: forasmuch as our body is a receptacle of a thousand diseases, yea hath enclosed & doth nourish within it the causes of diseases, man can not cary himselfe but he must needes also cary about with him many formes of his owne destruction, and draw foorth a life as it were entangled with death. For what may it else be called, where he neither is cold, nor sweateth without perill? Now whether soeuer thou turne thee, al things y are about thee are not only vntrusty friendes to thee, but do in maner openly threaten & seme to shew thee present death. Go into a ship, there is but a fote thicknes betwene thee & death. Sit on horsebacke in the slipping of one foote thy life is in daunger. Go through the stretes of the city: euē how many tyles are vpon y houses to so many perils art thou subiect. If there be an iron tole in thy hand or thy friendes, the harme is ready prepared. Howe many wild beastes thou seest, they are all armed to thy destruction. If thou meane to shutte vp thy selfe, euen in a garden well fenced, where may appeare nothing but pleasauntnesse of ayre and ground, there sometime lurketh a Serpent. The house which is continually subiect to fier doth in the day time threaten thee with pouerty, & in the night time with falling vpon thy head. Thy feeld forasmuch as it lyeth open to hayle, frost, drowth and other tempestes it warneth thee of barrennesse, and thereby famine. I speake not of prisoninges, treasons, robberies, open violence, of which parte do bescege vs at home, and parte do follow vs abroade. In these streightes must not man needes be most miserable, which euen in life halfe dead doth painfully draw foorth a carefull and fainting breath as if he had a swerde continually hanging ouer his necke. But thou wilt say that these thinges chaunce seldom, or at the least not alwayes, nor to all men, and neuer all at ones. I graunt, but seeing we are put in minde by y^e examples of other, that the same thinges may happen to our selues, and that our life ought of duety no more to be free than theirs, it can not be but that we must dred and feare them as thinges that may light vpon vs. Now what can a man imagine more miserable than such a fearefulnesse? Beside that, it is not without dishonorable reproch of God to say, that he hath set open man the noblest of all his creatures to their blinde and vnadvised strokes of fortune. But here my purpose is to speake only of the misery of man, which he should feele if he should be brought subiect vnder fortunes dominion.

II But when that light of Gods Prouidence hath ones shined vpon a godly man: he is now releued and deliuered not only from the extreme anguish and feare wherewith he was befote oppressed, but also from all care. For as iustly he feareth fortune, so he dare boldly committe himselfe to God. This is (I say) his comfort, to vnderstand that the heauenly father doth so hold in all thinges with his power, so ruleth them with his authority and countenance, so ordreth them with his wisdom, that nothing befalleth but by his apointment: and that he is receiued into Gods tuition, and committed to the charge of Angels, and can not be touched with any hurt of water, nor fier, nor weapon, but so farre as it shall please God the gouernour to giue them place. For so is it song in the Psalm. For he shal deliuer thee from the hunters snare, and from the noysom pestilence. He wil couer thee vnder his winges, and thou shalt be sure vnder his fetters. His trueth shal be thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraid of the feare of the night, nor of the arrow that flyeth by day, nor of the pestilence that walketh in the darkenesse, nor of the plague that destroyeth at none day. And fro^t thense proceedeth that boldnesse of the Saintes to glory:
The

The Lord is my helper, I will not feare what flesh may do to me. The Lord is my protector, why shall I be afraid? If whole campes stand vp against me, if I walke in the middest of the shadow of death, I will not cease to hope well. Whence, I pray you, haue they this that their assurednesse is neuer shakē away from them, but hereby, that where the world semeth in shew to be without order whirled about, they know that God worketh euery where, whose worke they trust shalbe for their preseruatiō. Now if their safety be assailed either by the deuill or by wicked men, in that case if they were not strengthened with remembrance & meditation of Prouidence, they must needs by and by be discouraged. But when they call to minde, that the deuill and all the route of the wicked, are so euery way holden in by the hand of God as with a bridle, that they can neither conceiue any mischuefe against vs, nor go about it when they haue conceiued it, nor if they go neuer so much about it, can stirre one finger to bring it to passe but so far as he shall suffer, yea so far as he shall commaunde, & that they are not only holdē fast bound with fetters, but also compelled with bridle to do seruice: here haue they abouđantly wherewith to comfort themselves. For as it is the Lordes worke to arme their fury and to turne & direct it whether it pleaseth him, so is it his worke also to appoint a measure and end, that they do not after their owne will licentiously triumphe. With which perswasion Paule being stablished, did by the sufferance of God appoint his journey in an other place which he said was in one place hindered by Satan. If he had onely sayd that he had bin stopped by Satan, he should haue seemed to giue him too much power, as if it had bin in Satans hande to ouerthrow the very purposes of God: but when he maketh God the iudge, vpon whose sufferance all iourneyes do hang: he doth therewithall shew, that Satan whatsoeuer he go about, can attaine nothing but by Gods will. For the same reason doth Dauid because for the sundry chaunges wherewith mans life is tossed and as it were whirled about, he doth flee to this sanctuary, sayeth that his times are in the hande of God. He might haue said either v̄ course of his life, or time in the singular number. But by the word Times, he meant to expresse that howsoeuer the state of man be vnstedfast, whatsoeuer alterations do nowe and then happen, they are governed by God. For which cause Rafin & the king of Israell, when ioyning their powers to the destruction of Iuda, they seemed as fierbrands kindeled to wast and consume the land, are called by the Prophete smokinge brandes, which can do nothinge but breath out a litle smoke. So when Pharao was terrible to all men by reason of his richesse, strength and number of men, he himselfe is compared to a beast of the Sea, and his army to fishes. Therefore God sayth that he will take the Captaine and the army with his hooke and draw them whither he list. Finally because it will not tary long vpon this point, if a man marke it he shall easily see that the extremity of all miseries is the ignorance of Gods Prouidence, and the chiefe blessednesse standeth in the knowledge thereof.

12 Concerning the Prouidence of God, this that is sayd were enough for so much as is profitable both for the perfect learning and comfort of the faithfull, (for to fill the vaine curiosity of men, nothing can be sufficient, neither is it to be wished that they be satisfied) were it not for certaine places, which seme to meane otherwise than is aboue declared, that God hath not a stedfast and stable purpose but changeable according to the disposition of inferiour thinges. First, in some places is spoken of the repentance of God, as that he repented him of the creating of man, of the aduancing of Saul to the kingdom. And that he will repent him of the euill that he had determined to lay vpon his people, so soone as he perceiueth any conuersiō of thē. Againe there are rehearsed diuerse repelles of his decrees. He had declared by Ionas to the Niniuites that after 40. dayes once past Niniue should be destroyed, but by and by he was turned with their repentaunce to a more genile sentence. He had by the mouth of Esay pronōunced death to Ezechias, which he was moued by his teares & prayers to differre. Herupon many do make argument, that God hath not appointed mens matters by eternall decree, but yearely, daily and houely decreeth this or that, as euery mans deseruings are, or as he thinketh it equity and iustice. Concerning his repentaunce this we ought to hold, that the same can no more be in God, than ignorance errour and weakenesse. For if no man do wittingly & willingly throw himselfe into the case that he nede to repēt, we can not say that God doth repent, but that we must also say, that God is ignorant what will come to passe, or that he can not auoide it, or that he headlong & vnadvisedly runneth into a purpose wherof he by and by forthinketh him. But that is so far frō the meaning of the holy Ghost, that in the very mentiō making of repentance he denieth that God had any repenting at all, because he is not a man that may repent. And it is to be noted that in y same chapter they are both so ioyned together, that the cōparison doth very well bring the shew of repugancy to agreement. His changing is figuratiuely spoken, that God repented that he had made Saul king, by and by after it is added. The strength of Israell shall not lye, nor shalbe moued with repenting. Because he is not a man that he may repent. In which wordes his vnchangeableness is affirmed med plainly without any figure. Therefore it is certaine that the ordinance of God in disposing the matters of men, is perpetuall & aboue all repentance. And that his constance should not be doutfull, his very aduersaries haue bin cōpelled to beare him witnes. For Balaam whether he would or no, could not choose but burst out into this saying: that he is not like a man to lye: nor as a sonne of man to be changed, & that it is not possible that he should not do that he hath sayd, and not fulfill whatsoeuer he hath spoken. Nu. 23.

13 What meaneth then this name of Repentance? euen in the same sort that all the other phrases of speach which do describe God vnto vs after the maner of men. For, because our weakenesse doth not reach to his hiennesse, that description of him which is taught vs, was meete to be framed lowe to our capacity that we might vnderstande it. And this is the manner how to frame it low for vs, to paint out him selfe not such a one as he is in himselfe, but such a one as he is perceued of vs. Where as he himselfe is without al mouing of a troubled minde, he yet testifieth that he is angry with sinners. Like as therefore when we heare that God is angry, we ought not to imagine that there is any mouing at all in him, but rather to cōsider that this spech is borrowed of our cōmon sense, because God beareth a resemblance of one chafed and angry so oft as he exerciseth iudgement: so ought we to vnderstand nothing else by this word of Repentance but a changing of deedes, because men by changing of their deedes are wont to declare that they mislike them. Because then euery chāge among men is an amendement of that which misliketh them, & amendement cōmeth of repentance: therefore by the name of repentance is meant that, that God chaungeth in his workes. In the meane time yet neither is his purpose nor his will turned, nor his affection changed, but he foloweth on with one continual course that which he had from eternity foreseene, allowed & decreed, howsoeuer the alteration seeme sōden in the eyes of men.

14 Neither doth the holy history shew that Gods decrees were repelled when it sheweth that the destruction was pardoned to the Niniuites which had bin before pronounced, & that the life of Ezechias was prolonged after warning giuen him of death. They that so construe it are deceiued in vnderstanding of thretenings: which although they do simply affirme, yet by ŷ successe it shalbe perceiued that they contayned a secret condition in them. For why did God send Ionas to the Niniuites to tell them aforehande of the ruine of their city? Why did he by: say giue Ezechias warning of death? For he might haue brought to nought both him and them without sending them any Ion. 3.

word of their destruction. He meant therefore an other thing, than to make them by foreknowing of their death to see it coming a far of. Euen this he meant: not to haue thē destroyed, but to haue them amended that they should not be destroyed. Therefore this that Ionas prophesied that Ninieue should fall after 40. dayes, was done to this end that it should not fall. That hope of longer life was cut of from Ezechias, was done for this purpose that he might obtaine longer life. Now who doth not see that God meant by such threatninges to awake them to repentaunce, whom he made afrayd to the ende that they might escape the iudgement which they had deserued by theyr sinnes? If that be so agreed, the nature of the things themselues doth lead vs to this, to vnderstand in the simple threatening a secrete emplied condition, which is also confirmed by like examples. The Lord rebuking the king Abimelech for that he had taken away Abrahams wife from him, vseth these wordes. Behold thou shalt die for the woman that thou hast taken, for she hath a husband. But after he had excused himselfe, God sayd thus. Restore the wife to her husband, for he is a Prophete and shall pray for thee that thou maiest liue. If not: know that thou shalt die the death and all that thou hast. You see how in his first sentence he vehemently striketh his minde to bring him to be more hede fully bent to make amends, & in the other doth plainly declare to him his will. Seing the meaning of other places is like: do not gather of these that there was any thing withdrawē from the first purpose of God, by this that he made void the thing which he had before pronouced. For God doth prepare the way for his eternal ordinance, when in giuing warning of the punishmēt he moueth those to repentaunce whom his wil is to spare, rather than varieth any thing in his will, no not in his word, sauing that he doth not expresse the same thing in sillables which it is yet casie to vnderstād. For that saying of Esay must needes remayne true: The Lord of Hostes hath determined, and who shall be able to vndo it? His hand is stretched out, and who shall turne it away?

The xvij. Chapter.

That God doth so vse the seruice of vicked men, and so bowueth their mindes to put his iudgements in execution, that yet still himselfe remayneth pure from all spot.

THere ariseth a hard questiō out of other places, where it is said that God boweth and draweth at his will, Satan himselfe & all the reprobate. For the sense of the flesh scarcely conceiueth how he working by thē, should not gather some spot of their fault, fault, yea in his common working be free from all fault, & iustly cōdemne his ministers. Vpon this was deuised y^e distincō betwene Doing & Suffering: because many haue thought this dout vnpossible to be dissolued: that both Satan and all the wicked are so vnder the hand & power of God, that he directeth their malice vnto what end it pleaseth him, & vseth their wicked doings to the executing of his iudgements. And their modesty were peradventure excusable, whom the shew of absurdity putteth in feare, if it were not so that they do wrōgfully with a lying defense go about to deliuer the iustice of God frō all vnrightfull blame. It semeth to thē vnreasonable, that man should by the will & commaudemēt of God be made blinde, & so by and by be punished for his blindnesse. Therefore they seke to scape by this shift, that this is done by the sufferance, but not by the will of God. But he himselfe plainly pronouncing that he doth it, doth reiect that shift. As for this that mē do nothing but by the secret cōmaundement of God, & do trouble themselues in vaine with deliberating, vnto he do by his secret direction stablish that which he hath before determined, it is proued by innumerable and plaine testimonies. It is certayne that this which we before alledged out of the Psalme, that God doth all things that he will, belongeth to all the doings of men. If God be the certayne appointer of war & peace, as it is there sayd, & that without exception: who dare say that men are caried causelessly wth blinde motion while God knoweth not of it, & sitteth still? But in special examples will be more lightsom plainnes. By the first chapter of Iob we know, that Satan doth no lesse appere before God to receiue his cōmaundementes than do the Angels which do willingly obey. In dede it is after a diuers maner & for a diuers end, but yet so that he cā not go about any thing but with the will of God. Although there seeme afterward to be added a bare sufferāce of him to afflict the holy man: yet because that saying is true: The Lord hath giuen, the Lord hath taken away, as it pleased God so is it come to passe. We gather that God was the author of that triall of Iob, wherof Satan & the wicked thecues were ministers. Satan goeth about to driue the holy man by desperation to madnes. The Sabees cruelly & wickedly do invade & rob his goods that were none of theirs. Iob knowledgeth that he was by God stripped of all his goods and made poore, because it so pleased God. Therefore whatsoeuer men or Satan himselfe attempt, yet God holdeth the sterne to turne all their trauailes to the executing of his iudgements. It was Gods will to haue the false king Achab deceived: the deuill offered his seruice thereunto: he was sent with a certayne commaundement, to be a lying spirite in the mouth of all the Propinets. If the blinding and madnes of Achab be the iudgement of God, then the deuise of bare Sufferance is vaine. For it were a fond thing to say, that the iudge doth only suffer and not also decree what he will haue done, and commaunde the ministers to put it in executiō. It was the Iewes purpose to destroy Christ, Pilate and the souldiers do follow their raging lust, and yet in a solemne prayer the disciples do confesse, that all the wicked men did nothing else but that which the hand and counsell of God had determined: euen as Peter had before preached, that Christ was by the decreed purpose and foreknowledge of God deliuered to be slayne. As if he should say: that God from whom nothing is hidden from the beginnige did wittingly and willingly appoint that which the Iewes did execute, as in an other place he rehearseth, y God which shewed before by all his Prophets that Christ should suffer, hath so fulfilled it. Absolon defiling his fathers bed with incestuous adultery, committed detestable wickednes. Yet God pronounceth that this was his owne worke. For the wordes are these. Thou hast done it secretly, but I will do it openly, and before the sunne. Hieremy pronounceth that all the cruelty that the Chaldees vsed in Iury, was the worke of God. For which cause Nabucadnezer is called the seruaunt of God. God euery where crieth out that with his hissing, with the sound of his trumpet, with his power & commaundement the wicked are stirred vp to war, He calleth the Assirian the rod of his wrath, and the axe that he moueth with his hand. The destruction of the holy city and ruine of the Temple he calleth his worke. Dauid not murmuring against God, but acknowledging him for a righteous iudge, yet confesseth that the cursings of Semei proceeded of the commaundement of God. The Lord (sayth he) commaunded him to curse. We often finde in the holy history, that whatsoever happeneth it cometh of the Lord, as the departing of the ten tribes, the death of the sonnes of Hely, and very many things of like sort. They that be meanly exercised in the Scriptures do see, that for shortnesses sake, I bring forth of many testimonies but a few, by which yet it appeareth plainly enough, that they do trifle & talke sondly, that thrust in a bare Sufferace in place of the Prouidēce of God, as though God sate in a watch tower wayting for the chaunces of Fortune, & so his iudgements should hang vpon the will of men.

2 Now as cōcerning secret motions, that which Salomō speaketh of y hart of a king, that it is bowed hither or thither as pleaseth God, extendeth surely to all mankindē, and is as much in effect as if he had sayd: whatsoever we conceiue in mindes, is by the secret inspiration of God directed to this end. And truely if he did not work in the mindes of men, it were not rightly sayd, that he taketh away the lip from the true speakers, and wisdom from aged men, that he taketh the hart from the Princes of the earth, that they may wander where is no beaten way. And herto belongeth that which we oft read, that men are fearefull so far forth as their harts be taken with his feare. So Dauid went out of the campe of Saule and none was ware of it, because the slepe of God was come vpon them all. But nothing can be desired to be more plainly spoken, than where he so oft pronounceth, that he blindeth the eyes of men, and striketh them with giddinesse, that he maketh them drunke with the spirite of drowlinesse, casteth them into madnes, & hardneth their harts. These things also many do referre to Sufferance, as if in forsaking the reprobate, he suffred them to be blinded by Satan. But that solution is to fonde, forasmuch as the Holy ghost in playne wordes expresseth, that they are striken with blindness and madnesse by the iust iudgement of God. It is sayd, that he hardned the hart of Pharao, also that he did make dull & strengthen it. Some do with an vnfauoury cauillation mocke out these phrascs of spech, because where in an other place it is sayd, that Pharao did harden his owne hart, there is his owne will set for the cause of his hardening. As though these things did not very well agree together, although in diuers maners, that man while he is moued in working by God, doth also worke himselfe. And I do turne backe their obiection against themselues. For, if to harden do signifie but a bare Sufferance then the very motion of obstinacy shall not be properly in Pharao. Now how weake and foolish were it so to expounde, as if Pharao did only suffer himselfe to be hardened? Moreouer the Scripture cutteth of all occasions from such cauillations. For God sayth, I will holde his hart. So of the inhabitauntes of the land of Canaan Moses sayth, that they went forth to battaile, because the Lord had hardened their harts. Which same thing is repeted by an other Prophet, saying: He turned their harts that they should hate his people. Againe in Esay he sayth, that he will send the Assirians against the deceitfull nation, & will commaund them to cary away the spoyles, and violently take the pray, not meaning that he will teache wicked and obstinate men to obey willingly, but that he will bow them to execute his iudgements as if they did beare his commaundementes grauen in theyr mindes. Wherby appeareth that they were moued by the certain appointment of God. I graunt that God doth oftentimes worke in the reprobate by Satans seruice as a meane, but yet so that Satan doth his office by Gods mouing, and proceedeth so farre as is giuen him. The euill Spirite troubled Saule, but it is sayde that it was of God, that we may know that the madnesse of Saule, came of the iuste vengeance of God. It is also sayd, that the same Satā doth blind the mindes of the vnfaithfull: but how so, but only because the effectuall working of errour cometh from God himselfe, to make them beleue lyes that refuse to obey the trueth? After the first maner of speaking it is sayd, If any Prophet shall speake lyingly, I God haue deceiued him. According to the other maner of spech it is sayd, that he geueth men into a reprobate minde: & to cast them into filthy desires, because he is the chiefe author of his owne iust vengeance, & Satan is but only a minister therof. But because we must entreate of this matter againe in the second booke, where we shall discourse of free or bond wil of mā, I thinke I haue already shortly spoken so much as this place required. Let this be the summe of all, that forasmuch as the wil of God is said to be the cause of all things, his Prouidence is thought the gouernes in all purposes & workes of men, so as it sheweth forth her force not only in the elect, which are gouerned by the holy Spirit, but also cōpelleth the reprobate to obedience.

3 Forasmuch as hitherto I haue recited onely such things as are wrytten in the Scriptures, plainly & not doutfully, let them that feare not wrongfully to sclander the heauenly oracles, take hede what maner of iudgement they take vpon them. For if by fayned pretending of ignorance they seeke a praise of modesty, what can be imagined more proudly done, than that to sette one small word against the authority of God? as I thinke otherwise, I like not to haue this touched. But if they openly speake euill, what preuaile they with spitting agaynst the heauen? But this is no new example of waywardnesse, because there haue bin in all ages wicked & vngodly men, that with raging mouth barked against this point of doctrine. But they shall feele that thinge in deede to be true, which long ago the holy Ghost spake by the mouth of Dauid, that God may overcome when he is iudged. Dauid doth by the way rebuke the madnesse of men in this so vnbridled licentiousnesse, that of their owne filthinesse they do not onely argue against God, but also take vpon them power to condemne him. In the meane time he shortly admonisheth, that the blasphemies which they vomite vp against the heauen do not reach vnto God, but that he driuing away the cloudes of cauillations doth brightly shew forth his righteousnesse, and also our faith (because being grounded vpon the word of God, it is aboue all the worlde) doth from her hye place contemptuously looke downe vpon these mystes. For first where they obiect, that if nothing happen but by the will of God, then are there in him two contrary willes, because he decreeth those thinges by secret purpose, which he hath openly forbidden by his law, that is easily wiped away. But before I aunswere it, I will ones againe geue the readers warning that this caullation is throwen out not against me, but against the holy Ghost, which taught the holy man Iob this confession: As it pleased God, so it came to passe. When he was spoiled by theues, he acknowledged in the iniurie and hurte that they did him, the iust scourge of God. What saith the Scripture in other places? The sonnes of Hely obeyed not their Father, because it was Gods will to kill them. Also an other Prophet crieth out, that God which sitteth in heauen doth what so euer he will. And now I haue shewed plainly enough that God is the author of all those things which these iudges woulde haue to happen onely by his idle sufferance. He testifieth that he createth light and darkenesse, that he formeth good and euill, that no euill happeneth which he himselfe hath not made. Let them tell me, I besech them, whether he do willingly or against his will execute his owne iudgements? But as Moses teacheth, that he which is slaine by the falling of an axe by chaunce, is deliuered by God into the hand of the striker: so the whole church saith in Luke, that Herode and Pilate conspired to do those thinges, whiche the hande and purpose of God had decreed. And truly if Christ were not crucified with the will of God, whense came redemption to vs? And yet the will of God neither doth striue with it selfe, nor is changed, nor faineth that he willeth not the thing that he will: but where it is but one and simple in him, it semeth to vs manyfolde, because according to the weakenesse of our wit we conceiue not how God in diuers maner willeth and willeth not one selfe thing. Paule, after that he hath said, that the calling of the Gētiles is a hiddē misterie, within a litle after saith further, that in it was manifestly shewed the manyfolde wisdom of God: because for the dullnesse of our witte the wisdom of God seemeth to vs manyfolde, or (as the olde interpretour hath translated it) of many fashions: shall we therefore dreame that there is any varietie in God himselfe, as though he either chaungeth his purpose, or dissenteth from himselfe? Rather when we conceiue not how God will haue the thing to be done, which he forbidde to do, let vs call to minde our owne weakenesse, and therewithall consider that the light wherin he dwelleth, is not without cause called Inaccessible, bycause it is couered with darkenesse. Therefore all godly and sobre men will easily agree to this sentence of Augustine, that sometime mā with good will willeth that which God willeth not. As if a good sonne willeth to haue his father to liue, whom God will haue to die. Again, it may come to passe, that man may will the same thing with an euill will, which God willeth with a good will. As if an euill sonne willeth to haue his father to die, and God also willeth the same. Now the first of these two sonnes willeth that which God willeth not, & the other sonne willeth that which God also willeth, and yet the naturalnesse of the first sonne doth better agree with the will of God, although he willeth a contrary thing, than the vnnaturalnesse of the other sonne that willeth the same thing. So great a difference is there what to will doth belong to man, and what to God, & to what ende the will of euery one is to be applied, to haue it either allowed or disallowed. For those thinges which God willeth well he bringeth to passe by the euill willes of euill men. But a littel before he had said, that the Angels apostataes in their falling away, and all the reprobate, in as much as concerneth them selues, did that which God woulde not, but in respect of the omnipotencie of God, they coulede by no meanes so do, because while they did against the will of God, the will of God was done vpon them. Whervpon he crieth out: Great are the workes of God, and ought to be sought out of all them that loue them: that in meruailous maner the same thing is not done without his will which is also done against his wil, because it coulede not be done if he did not suffre it: and yet he doth it not against his will, but willingly: and he being good, would not suffer a thing to be done euill, vnlesse for that he is omnipotent, he coulede of euill make good.

4 In the same maner is assoiled or rather vanisheth away the other obiection: that if God do not onely vse the seruice of wicked men, but also gouerneth their counsels and affections, he is the author of all wicked doinges, and therefore men are vnworthily condemned, if they execute that which God hath decreed, because they obey his will: for it is done amisse to confound his will and commaundement together, which it appeareth by innumerable examples to differ farre asunder. For though when Absalon abused his fathers wiues, it was Gods will to punish Dauids adulterie with that dishonor: yet did he not therefore commaunde the wicked sonne to committe inceste, vnlesse perhaps you meane it in respect of Dauid, as he speaketh of the railinges of Semei. For when he confesseth that Semei railleth at him by the commaundement of God, he doth not therein commende his obedience, as if that froward dogge did obey the commaundement of God, but acknowledging his tongue to be the scourge of God, he patiently suffreth to be corrected. And this is to be holden in minde, that when God performeth by the wicked that thing which he decreed by his secret iudgemēt, they are not to be excused, as though they did obey his commaundement, which in dede of their owne euill lust they do purposely breake. Now how that thing is of God, and is ruled by his secret Prouidence, which men do wickedly, the election of king Iarobeam is a plaine example, in which the rashnesse and madnesse of the people is seuerly condemned, for that they peruerred the order apointed by God, and falsely feil from the house of Dauid, and yet we know it was his will that he shoulde be annointed. Whervpon in the very wordes of Osee there appereth a certaine shew of repugnancie, that where God complayned that that kingdome was erected without his knowledge, and against his will, in an other place he saith, that he gaue the kingdome to Iarobeam in his rage. How shall these sayinges agree? that Iarobeam reigned not by God, and that he was made king by the same God? Euen thus, because neither coulde the people fall from the house of Dauid, but that they must shake of the yoke which God had layed vpon them: neither yet had God his libertie taken away, but that he might so punish the vnthankfulnesse of Salomon. We see therfore how God is not willing false breach of allegeance, yet to an other end iustly willeth a falling away from their prince, whervpon Iarobeam beside all hope was by holy annointing driuen to be king. After this maner doth the holy historie say, that there was an ennemie raised vp to spoile Salomons sonne of part of his kingdome. Let the readers diligently wey both these thinges, because it had pleased God to haue the people gouerned vnder the hand of one king. Therefore when it was diuided in two partes it was done against his will. And yet the diuision tooke beginning of his will. For surely, where as the Prophet both by wordes and ceremonie of annointing did moue Iarobeam when he thought of no such thing, to hope of the kingdome, this was not done without the knowledge or against the will of God, which commaunded it so to be done: and yet is the rebellion of the people iustly condemned, for that as it were against the will of God, they fell from the posteritie of Dauid. In this maner it is also afterward further said, that where Rehabeam proudly despised the requeste of the people, this was done by God to confirme the word which he had spoken by the hand of Ahiha, his seruant. Lo how against Gods will the sacred vnitie is torne in sunder, and yet with the will of the same God tenne tribes do forsake Salomons sonne. Let vs adde an other like example. Where the people consenting, yea laying their handes vnto it, the sonnes of Ahab were slaine, & all his offspring rooted out. Iehu said in deede truely, that nothing of the wordes of God were fallen to the ground, but that he had done all that he had spoken by the hande of his seruant Elias. And yet not vniustly he rebuketh the citezens of Samaria, for that they had put their handes vn-

to it. Are ye righteous, saith he, If I haue conspired against my lord, who hath killed all these? I haue before (as I thinke) already declared plainly, how in one selfe worke both the faulte of man doth bewray it selfe, and also the righteousnesse of God gloriously apeareth.

Episto. 48. ad Vincen. And for modest wittes this aunswere of Augustine shall alway suffice: where as the father deliuered the sonne, & Christ deliuered his body, & Iudas deliuered the Lord: why in this deliuering is God righteous, and man faultie? because in the same one thing which they did, the cause was not one, for which they did it. If any be more combered with this that we now saie, that there is no consent of God with man, where man by the righteous mouing of God doth that which is not lawfull, let them remember that which Augustine saith in an other place: Who shall not tremble at these iudgementes, where God worketh euen in the hartes of euill men what so euer he will, and yet rendereth to them according to their deseruinges? And truely in the falsehood of Iudas, it shall be no more lawfull to laie the blame of the wicked deede to God, because he himselfe willed him to be deliuered, and did deliuer him to death, then it shalbe to geue away the praise of our redemption to Iudas. Therefore the same writer doth in an other place truely tel vs, that in this examinatio God doth not enquire what men might haue done, or what they haue done, but what their will was to do, that purpose and will may come into the accompt. They that thinke this harde, let them a litle while consider, how tolerable their owne waywardenesse is, while they refuse a thing witnessed by plaine testimonies of Scripture, because it exceedeth their capacitie, and do finde faulte that those things are vttered, which God, vnlesse he had knowen them profitable to be knowen, woulde neuer haue commaunded to be taught by his Prophetes and Apostles. For our being wise ought to be no more but to embrace with meke willingnesse to learne, and that without exception whatsoeuer is taught in the holy Scriptures. As for them that do more frowardly outrage in prating against it, sith it is euident that they babble against God, they are not worthy of a longer confutation.

The first Chapter.

That by Adames sinne and falling away, mankinde became accursed, and did degenerate from his first estate: vtherin is intreated of Originall sinne.

NOT without cause hath the Knowledge of himselfe bin in the olde prouerbe so much commended to man. For if it be thought a shame to be ignorant of all things that pertaine to the course of mans life, then much more shameful is the Not knowing of our selues, whereby it commeth to passe, that in taking counsell of any thing necessary, we be miserably daseled, yea altogether blinded. But how much more profitable this lesson is, so much more diligently must we take heede, that we do not disordrely vse it, as we see some of the Philosophers haue done. For they in exhorting man to know him selfe, do withall appoint this to be the ende, why he shoulde know him selfe, that he shoulde not be ignorant of his owne dignitie and excellencie: and nothing els do they will him to beholde in himselfe, but that wherby he may swell with vaine confidence, and be puffed vp with pride. But the knowledge of our selues, first standeth in this pointe, that considering what was geuen vs in creation, and how bountifully God continueth his gracious fauour toward vs, we may know how great had bin the excellencie of our nature, if it had cōtinued vncorrupted: and we may withall thinke vpon this, that there is nothing in vs of our owne, but that we haue as gotten by borrowing all that God hath bestowed vpon vs, that we may alwaies hang vpon him. Then, that we call to minde our miserable estate after the fall of Adam, the feeling wherof may throw downe all glorying and trust of our selues, ouerwhelme vs with shame and truely humble vs. For as God at the beginning fashioned vs like his owne image, to the ende to raise vp our mindes both to the study of vertue and to the meditation of eternall life, so least the so great noblenesse of our kinde, which maketh vs different from brute beastes, shoulde be drowned with our slothfulnesse, it is good for vs to know, that we are therefore endued with reason and vnderstanding, that in keping a holy and honest life, we shoulde procede on forward to the appointed ende of blessed immortalitie. But the first dignitie can not come in our minde, but by and by on the otherside the heavy sight of our filthinesse and shame doth thrust it selfe in presence, since we in the person of the first man are fallen from our first estate, where vpon groweth the hatred and lothing of our selues, and true humilitie, & there is kindeled a new desire to seeke for God, in whom euery of vs may recouer those good thinges, wherof we are founde altogether voide and emptie.

2 This thing surely the truth of God appointeth to be sought in examining of our selues, I meane, it requireth such a knowledge as may both call vs away from all confidence of our owne power, and making vs destitute of all matter to glory vpon, may bring vs to submission. Which rule it behoueth vs to keepe, if we will attaine to the true marke both of right knowledge and welldoing. Neither yet am I ignorant how much more pleasant is that other opinion that allureth vs rather to consider our good thinges, than to looke vpon our miserable nedynesse and dishonor, which ought to ouerwhelme vs with shame. For there is nothing that mans nature more coueteth, than to be stroked with flatterie: and therefore when he heareth the giftes that are in him to be magnified, he leaneth to that side with ouermuch lightnesse of belefe: wherby it is so much lesse to be maruelled, that herein the greatest parte of men haue perniciously erred. For sith there is naturally planted in all mortal men a more than blinde loue of them selues, they do most willingly perswade them selues, that there is nothing in them that they ought worthyly to hate. So without any maintenance of other, this most vaine opinion doth ech where get credit, that man is abundantly sufficient of him selfe to make him selfe liue well and blessedly. But if there be any that are content to thinke more modestly, howe soeuer they graunt somewhat to God, least they shoulde seeme arrogantly to take all to them selues, yet they so parte it, that the principall matter of glory and confidence alway remaineth with them selues. Now if there come talke, that with her allurementes tikeleth the pride that already of it selfe itcheth within the bones, there is nothing that may more delite them. Therefore as any hath with his extolling most fauourably aduanced the excellencie of mans nature, so hath he bin accepted with the well lyking reioicement in manner of all ages. But what soeuer such commendacion there be of mans excellencie that teacheth man to reſte in him ſelfe, it doth nothing but delite with that her ſweteneſſe, and in dede ſo deceiueth, that it bringeth to moſt wretched deſtruction all them that aſſent vnto it. For to what purpoſe auaieth it for vs, ſtanding vpon all vaine confidence to deuife, apoint, attempt and go about thoſe thinges that we thinke to be for our behoofe, and in our firſt beginning of enterpriſe to be forſakē and deſtitute of ſounde vnderſtanding and true ſtrength, and yet to go on boldely till we fall downe into deſtruction? But it can not otherwiſe happen to them that haue affiaunce that they can do any thing by their owne power. Therefore if any man geue heede to ſuch teachers that holde vs in conſidering onely our owne good thinges, he ſhall not profite in learning to know him ſelfe, but ſhall be carried violently away into the worſt kinde of ignoraunce.

3. Therefore, where as in this point the trueth of God doth agree with the common naturall meaning of all men, that the ſecond part of wiſedome conſiſterth in the knowledge of our ſelues, yet in the very manner of knowing there is muche diſagreement. For by the iudgement of the fleſh, a man thinketh that he hath then well ſearched himſelfe, when truſting vpon his owne vnderſtanding and integritie, he taketh boldeneſſe, and encourageth him ſelfe to doing the dueties of vertue and bidding battell to vices, trauaileth with all his studie to bende himſelfe to that which is comly and honeſt. But he that loketh vpon and trieth himſelfe by the rule of Gods iudgement, findeth nothing that may raiſe vp his minde to good affiance: and the more inwardely that he hath examined him ſelfe, the more he is diſcouraged, till being altogether ſpoiled of all confidence, he leaueth to himſelfe nothing towarde the well ordering of his life. And yet woulde not God haue vs to forgette the firſt nobleneſſe that he gaue to our father Adam, which ought of good right to awake vs to the studie of righteousneſſe and goodneſſe. For we can not conſider either our owne firſt eſtate, or to what ende we are created, but we ſhalbe pricked forward to studie vpon immortalitie, and to deſire the kingedome of God. But that conſideration is ſo farre from putting vs in courage, that rather diſcouraging vs, it throweth vs downe to humbleneſſe. For what is that firſt eſtate of ours? euen that from whence we are fallen. What is that ende of our creation? euen the ſame from which we are altogether turned away: ſo that lothing our owne miſerable eſtate, we may grone for ſorrowe, and in groning may alſo ſigh for the loſſe of that dignitie. But now when we say that man ought to beholde nothing in himselfe that may make him of bolde courage, we meane that there is nothing in him vpon affiance wherof he ought to be proude. Wherefore, if any list to heare what knowledge man ought to haue of himselfe, let vs thus diuide it, that first he consider to what ende he is created, & endued with giftes that are not to be despised, by which thought he may be styrred vp to the meditatioⁿ of the hearing of God and of the life to come. Then let him weye his owne strength, or rather needy want of strength, by perceiuing whereof he may lie in extreme confusion, as one vtterly brought to naught. The first of these considerations tendeth to this ende, that he may know what is his duetie: and the other, how much he is able to do towarde the performing of it. We will entreate of them both, as the order of teaching shall require.

4 But bicause it must nedes be that it was not a light negligence, but a detestable wicked acte which God so seuerely punished, we must consider the very fourme of the same in the fall of Adam; that kindled the horrible vengeance of God vpon all mankinde. It is a childish opinion that hath commonly bin receiued, concerning the intemperance of glottonie, as though the summe and head of all vertues consisted in the forbearing of one only frute, when there flowed on euery side store of all sortes of deinties that were to be desired, and when in that blessed frutefulnessse of the earth, there was not onely plenty, but also varietie to make fare for pleasure. Therefore we must looke further, bicause the forbidding him from the tree of the knowledge of good and euill, was the triall of obedience, that Adam in obeying might proue that he was willingly subiect to the gouernemēt of God. And the name of the tree it selfe sheweth, that that commaundement was geuen for none other ende, than for this that he contented with his owne estate, shoulde not with wicked lust aduaunce himselfe higher. But the promise whereby he was bidden to hope for eternall life, so long as he did not eate of the tree of life, and againe the horrible threatening of death so sone as he shoulde taste of the tree of knowledge of good and euill, serued to proue and exercise his faith. Herof it is not harde to gather, by what meanes Adam prouoked the wrath of God against him selfe. Augustine in deede saieth not amisse, when he saieth, that pride was the beginning of all euils. For if ambitioⁿ had not listened vp man higher than was lawfull and than was permitted him, he might haue continued in his estate: but we must fetch a more full definition from the maner of the tentation that Moses describeth. For sith the woman was with the deceit of the Serpent lead away by infidelitie, now it appeareth that disobedience was the beginning ginning of the fall. Which thing Paule confirmeth, teaching that all men were losse by one mans disobedience. But it is withall to be noted, that the first man fell from the subiection of God, for that he not onely was taken with the entisementes of Satan, but also despising the trueth, did turne out of the waie to lying. And surely Gods worde being ones despised, all reuerence of God is shaken of. Bicause his maiestie doth no other waies abide in honor among vs, nor the worship of him remaine inuiolate, but while we hang vpon his mouth. Therefore infidelitie was the roote of that falling away. But therupon arose ambition and pride, to which was adioyned vnthankfulnesse, for that Adam in coueting more than was graunted, did vnreuerently despise the so great liberalitie of God wherwith he was enriched. And this was a mōstruous wickednesse, that the sonne of the earth thought it a small thing that he was made after the likenesse of God, vnlesse he might also be made egall with God. If Apostasie be a filthy and detestable offence, wherby man withdraweth him selfe from the allegiance of his creatour, yea outrageously shaketh of his yoke: then it is but vaine to extenuate the Sinne of Adam. Albeit it was no simple Apostasie, but ioyned with shamefull reproches against God, while they assented to the sclanders of Satan, wherin he accused God of lying, enuie, and niggardly grudging. Finally, infidelitie opened the gate to ambition, ambition was the mother of obstinate rebellion, to make men cast away the feare of God, and throw themselues whether their lust caried them. Therefore Bernard doth rightly teach that the gate of saluation is opened vnto vs, when at this day we receiue the Gospell by our eares: euen as by the same windowes, when they stode open to Satan, death was let in. For Adam woulde neuer haue bin so bolde, as to do against the commaundement of God, but for this that he did not beleue his worde. Truely this was the best bridle for the right keping of all affections in good order, to thinke that ther is nothing better than to kepe righteousnesse in obeying the commaundementes of God, and then that the chiefe ende of happy life is to be beloued of him. He therefore being carried away with the blasphemies of the Deuill, did (asmuch as in him lay) extinguish the whole glory of God.

5 As the spirituall life of Adam was, to abide ioyned and bounde to his creatour, so his alienation from him was the death of his soule. Neither is it maruell if he by his falling away, destroyed all his owne posteritie, which peruerted the whole order of nature in heauen and in earth. All the creatures do grone, saith Paule, being made subiect to corruption against their will. If one should aske the cause: no doubt

Cap. i. Of the knowlledge of it is for that they beare parte of that punishment that man deserued, for whose vse they were created. Sith the curse that goth throughout all the coastes of the worlde proceeded from his fault both vpward and downewarde, it is nothing against reason, if it spread abrode into all his issue. Therefore after that the heavenly image in him was defaced, he did not alone suffer this punishment, that in place of wisdom, strength, holynesse, truth, and iustice (with which ornamentes he had bin clothed) there came in the most horrible pestilences, blindnesse, weakenesse, filthinesse, falsehood, and iniustice, but also he entangled and drowned his whole offspring in the same miseries. This is the corruption that cometh by inheritaunce, which the olde writers called original sinne, meaning by this worde sinne, the corruption of nature, which before was good and pure. About which matter they haue had much contention, bycause there is nothing farther of from common reason, than all men to be made guiltie of one mans fault, and so the sinne to become common. Which semeth to haue bin the cause why the oldest Doctors of the Church did but darkely touch this point, or at least did not set it out so plainly as was conuenient. And yet that fearefulnesse could not bring to passe, but that Pelagius arose, whose prophane inuention was that Adam sinned onely to his owne losse, and hurted not his posteritie. So through this sutteltie, Satan went about by hiding the disease, to make it incurable. But when it was proued by manifest testimonie of Scripture, that sinne passed from the first man into all his posteritie, he brought this cauillation, that it passed by imitation, but not by propagation. Therefore good men trauelled in this point, and aboue all other Augustine, to shew that we are corrupted not by forrein wickednesse, but that we bring with vs from the wombe of our mother a viciousnesse planted in our begetting, which to deny was to great shamelesnesse. But the rashnesse of the Pelagians and Celestians will not seeme maruelous to him, which by the writings of the holy man shal perceauce, how shamelesse beastes they were in all other things. Surely it is not doutefully spoken that Dauid confesseth that he was begotten in iniquities, and by his mother conceaued in sinne. He doth not there accuse the sinnes of his father or mother, but the better to set forth the goodnesse of God towarde him, he beginneth the confession of his owne wickednesse at his very begetting. Forasmuch as it is euident that that was not peculiar to Dauid alone, it followeth that the common estate of all mankinde is noted vnder his example. All we therefore that descend of vncleane sede, are borne infected with the contagion of sinne, yea before that we see the light of this life, we be in the sight of God filthy and spotted.

For

7.

Joh. 14.

For who coulde geue cleane of the vncleannesse? not one: as it is in the booke of Iob.

6 We heare that the vncleannesse of the parentes so passeth into the children, that all without any exception at their beginning are defiled. But of this defiling we shall not finde the beginning, vnlesse we go vp to the first parent of all vs, to the well head. Thus it is therfore, that Adam was not only the progenitor, but also the roote of mans nature, and therefore in his corruption was all mankinde worthely corrupted: which the Apostle maketh plaine by comparing of him and Christ. As (saith he) by one man sinne entred into the whole world, and death by sinne, and so death went ouer all men, forasmuch as all haue sinned: so by the grace of Christ, righteousnesse and life is restored vnto vs. What will the Pelagians here prate? that Adams sinne was spread abroad by imitation? Then haue we no other profit by the righteousnesse of Christ, but that he is an example set before vs to follow? Who can abide such robbie of Gods honor? If it be out of question that Christes righteousnesse is ours by communication, and therby life: it followeth also, that they both were so lost in Adam, as they be recouered in Christ: and that sinne and death so crept in by Adam, as they are abolished by Christ. The wordes are plaine, that many are made righteous by the obediēce of Christ, as by the disobedience of Adam they were made sinners: and that therfore betwene them two is this relation, that Adam wrapping vs in his destruction, destroyed vs with him, & Christ with his grace restored vs to saluation. In so cleare light of truth, I thinke we nede not a longer or more laborous prooffe. So also in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, when he goeth about to stablish the godly in the trust of the resurrectiō, he sheweth that the life is couered in Christ that was lost in Adam, he that pronounceth, that we all are dead in Adam, doth also therwithall plainly testifie, that we were infected with the filth of sinne. For damnation coulde not reach vnto thē that were touched with no giltinesse of iniquitie. But it can be no way plainlyer vnderstāded what he meanneth, than by relation of the other member of the sentence, where he teacheth that hope of life is restored in Christ. But it is well enough knowen that the same is done no other way, than whē by maruellous maner of cōmunicating, Christ poureth into vs the force of his righteousnesse. As it is written in an other place, that the spirite is life vnto vs, for righteousnesse sake. Therfore we may not otherwise expounde that which is said that we are dead in Adam, but thus, that he in sinning did not onely purchase mischeefe and ruine to himselfe, but also threw downe our nature headlong into like destruction. And that not onely to the corruption of himfelfe, which pertaineth nothing to vs, but because he infected all his fede with the same corruption wher-into he was fallen. For otherwise the saying of Paule coulde not stand true, that all are by nature the sonnns of wrath, if they were not already accursed in the wombe. And it is easily gathered, that nature is there meant not such as it were create by God, but such as it was corrupted in Adam. For it were not cōuenient, that God should be made the author of Death. Adam therefore so corrupted himfelfe, that the infectiō passed from him into all his offspring. And the heauēly iudge himfelfe Christ, doth also plainly enough pronouice, that all are borne euill and corrupted, where he teacheth, that what soeuer is borne of flesh, is flesh, and that therefore the gate of life is closed against all men, vntill they be begotten againe.

7 Neither for the vnderstanding thereof is any curiouse disputa-tion nedefull, which not a litle combred the olde writers, whether the soule of the sonne do procede by deriuation from the soule of the father, bycause in it the infection principally resteth. We must be content with this, that such giftes as it pleased the Lord to haue bestowed vpon the nature of man, he left them with Adam, and therefore when Adam lost them after he had receiued them, he lost them not onely from himfelfe, but also from vs all. Who shall be carefull of a conueyance from soule to soule, when he shall heare that Adam re-ceiued these ornamentes which he lost, no lesse for vs than for himselfe? that they were not geuen to one man alone, but assigned to the whole nature of man? Therefore it is not against reason, if he being spoiled, nature be left naked and poore: if he being infected with Sinne, the infection crepeth into nature. Therefore from a rotten roote arose vp rotten branches, which sent their rottenesse into the other twigges that sprong out of them. For so were the children corrupted in the father, that they also were infectiue to their children: that is to say, so was the beginning of corruption in Adam, that by continuall flowyng from one to an other, it is conueyed from the auncesters into the posteritie. For the infection hath not her cause in the substaūce of the flesh or of the soule, but bycause it was so ordeyned of God, that suche giftes as he had geuen to the first man, man shoulde both haue them, and lose them as well for himfelfe as for his. As for this that the Pelagians do cauill, that it is not likely that the children do take corruption from godly parentes, sith they ought rather to be sanctified by their cleaunesse, that is easily confuted. For they des-cende not of their spirituall regeneration, but of their carnall generation.* Therefore, as Augustine sayeth, whether the vnbeleuer be condemned as gilty, and the beleuer quitte as innocent, they both do beget not innocentes, but gilty, bycause they beget of the corrupted nature. Now where as they do in manner partake of the parentes holinesse, that is the speciall blessing of the people of God, which proueth not but that the first and vniuersall curse of mankinde went before. For of nature is giltyesse, and sanctification is of supernaturall grace.

8 And to the ende that these thinges be not spoken of a thing vncertaine and vnknown, lette vs define Originall sinne. But yet I meane not to examine all the definitions that are made by writers, but I will bring forth one onely, which I thinke to be most agreeable with trueth. Originall sinne therefore semeth to be the inheritably descending peruersnesse and corruption of our nature, poured abroade into all the partes of the soule, which first maketh vs gilty of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth these workes in vs, which the Scripture calleth the workes of the flesh: and that is it properly that Paule oftentimes calleth Sinne. And these workes that arise out of it, as are adulteries, fornications, thestes, hatreds, murders, banketinges, after the same manner he calleth the fruites of sinne, albeit they are likewise called sinnes both commonly in the Scripture, and also by the same Paule him selfe. Therefore these two thinges are distinctly to be noted: that is, that being so in all partes of our nature corrupted and peruerted, we are now euen for suche corruption onely holden worthily damned and conuicted before God, to whom is nothing acceptable but righteousnesse, innocencie and purenesse. And yet is not that bonde in respect of an others faulte. For where it is said, that by the sinne of Adam we are made subiect to the iudgement of God, it is not so to be taken, as if we innocent and vnderferuing did beare the blame of his faulte. But bycause by his offending we are all clothed with the curse, therefore it is said that he hath bounde vs. Neuerthelesse, from him not the punishment onely came vpon vs, but also the infection distilled from him, abideth in vs, to the which the punishment is iustly due. Wherefore howe so euer Augustine doeth oftentimes call it an others sinne, (to shewe the more plainely, that it is conueyed into vs by propagation) yet doeth he also affirme withall that it is propre to euery one. And the Apostle him selfe expressely witnesseth, that therefore death came vpon all menne, bycause all men haue sinned, and are wrapped in Originall sinne, and defiled with the spottes thereof. And therefore the very infantes themselues, while they bring with them their owne damnation from their mothers wombe, are bounde,

Gal. 5.

Cap. I. Of the knowlledge of not by an others, but by their owne faulte. For though they haue not as yet brought forth the fruites of their owne iniquitie, yet they haue the seede thereof enclosed within them: yea their whole nature is a certaine seede of Sinne: therefore it can not be but hatefull and abhominable to God. Wherevpon followeth, that it is properly accompted sinne before God: for there coulde be no giltinesse without sinne. The other point is, that this peruersenesse neuer cesseth in vs, but continually bringeth forth newe frutes, euen the same workes of the fleshe that we haue before described: like as a burning fornace bloweth out flame and sparcles, or as a spring doeth without ceassing cast out water. Therefore they which haue defined Originall sinne, to be a lacking of Originall righteousnesse which ought to haue bin in vs, although in deede they comprehend all that is in the thing it selfe: yet they haue not fully enough expressed the force and efficacie thereof. For our nature is not onely bare and emptie of goodnesse, but also is so plenteous and frutefull of all euilles, that it can not be idle. They that haue saide, that it is a concupiscence, haue vsed a worde not very farre from the matter, if this were added, which is not graunted by the most parte, that what so euer is in man, euen from the vnderstanding to the will, from the soule to the flesh, is corrupted and stuffed ful with this concupiscence: or, to ende it shortlier, that whole man is of him selfe nothinge els but concupiscence.

9 Wherefore, I haue saide that all the partes of the soule are possessed of sinne, sith Adam fell away from the fountaine of righteousnesse. For not onely the inferiour appetite allured him, but wicked impietie possessed the very castle of his minde, and pride pearced to the innermost parte of his hearte. So that it is a fonde and foolish thing, to restraine the corruption that proceded from thence, ouely to the sensuall motions as they call them, or to call it a certaine nouriture, that allureth, stirreth and draweth to sinne onely that parte, which among them is called Sensualitie. Wherein Peter Lombarde hath disclosed his grosse ignoraunce, which seeking and searching for the place of it, saith that it is in the flesh, as Paule witnesseth, not properly in dede, but bycause it more appeareth in the flesh, as though Paule did meane onely a parte of the soule, and not the whole nature which is in comparison set against supernaturall grace. And Paule there taketh away all doubt: teaching that corruption resteth not in one parte alone, but that nothing is pure and cleane from the deadly infection thereof. For entreating of corrupted nature, he doth not onely condemne the inordinate motions of appetites that appeare,

but specially trauaileth to proue that the vnderstanding minde is subiecte to blindenesse, and the hearte to puerfnesse. And the same third chapter to the Romaines is nothing els but a description of originall sinne. That appeareth more plainly by the renewing. For the spirite which is compared with the olde man and the flesh, doth not onely signifie the grace whereby the inferiour or sensuall parte of the soule is amended, but also conteineth a full reformation of all the partes. And therefore Paule doth commaund, not onely that our grosse appetites be brought to naught, but also that we our selues be renewed in the spirite of our minde, as likewise in an other place he biddeth vs to be transformed in newnesse of minde. Wherupon followeth, that the same parte, wherein most of all shineth the excellence and noblenesse of the soule, is not onely wounded, but also so corrupted, that it needeth not onely to be healed, but in manner to put on a newe nature. How farre sinne possesseth both the vnderstanding minde and the hearte, we will see hereafter. Here I onely purposed shortely to touch that the whole man from the heade to the foote is so overwhelmed as with an ouerflowing of water, that no parte of him is free from sinne, and that therefore what soeuer proceedeth from him is accompted for sinne, as Paule saith, that all the affections of the flesh or thoughtes, are enmities against God, and therefore death.

10 Now let them go, that presume to make God author of their sinnes, bycause we say that menne are naturally sinnefull. They do wrongfully seeke the worke of God in their owne filthyneffe, which they ought rather to haue sought in the nature of Adam, while it was yet sounde and vncorrupted. Therefore our destruction cometh of the faulte of our owne flesh and not of God, for asmuch as we perished by no other meane but by this, that we degendred from our first estate. But yet let not any man here murmure and say, that God might haue better foreseen for our saluation, if he had prouided that Adam shoulde not haue fallen. For this obiection both is to be abhorred of all godly mindes, for the to much presumptuous curiositie of it, and also pertaineth to the secret of predestination which shall after be entreated of in place conuenient. Wherefore let vs remembre that our fall is to be imputed to the corruption of nature, that we accuse not God himselfe the author of nature. True in dede it is, that the same deadely wounde sticketh fast in nature: but it is muche materiall to knowe, whether it came into nature from ells where, or from the beginning hath rested in it. But it is euident that the wounde was geuen by sinne. Therefore there is no cause why

we shoulde complaine but of our selues: which thing the Scripture ecl. 7. hath diligently noted. For Ecclesiastes saith: This haue I founde, that God hath made manne righteous, but they haue sought many inventions. It appeareth that the destruction of man is to be imputed onely to him selfe, for asmuche as hauing gotten vprightnesse by the goodnesse of God, he by his owne madnesse is fallen into vanitie.

11 We saie therefore, that man is corrupted with faultinesse naturall, but such as proceeded not from nature. We denie that it proceeded from nature, to make appeare that it is rather a qualitie come from some other thing, whiche is happened to man, than a substantiall propertie that hath bin putte into him from the beginning.
Yet we call it Naturall, that no man shoulde thinke that euery man getteth it by euill custome, wheras it holdeth all men bounde by inheritable descending right. And this we do not of our owne heads ph. 2. 3 without authoritie. For, for the same cause the Apostle teacheth, that we are all by nature the children of wrath. How coulde God, whome all his meanest workes do please, be wraathfull against the noblest of all his creatures? But he is rather wraathfull against the corruption of his worke, than against his worke it selfe. Therefore if, for that mans nature is corrupted, manne is not vnfitly saide to be by nature abhominable to God, it shalbe also not vnaptely called naturally peruerse and corrupted. As Augustine feareth not in respect of nature corrupted, to call the sinnes natural, which do necessarily reigne in our flesh where the grace of God is absente. So van-nysheth away the folish tryfeling deuise of the Maniches, which whē they imagined an euillnesse hauing substaunce in man, presumed to forge for him a new creator, least they should seeme to assigne to the righteous God the cause and beginning of euill.

The ij. Chapter.

That man is now spoiled of the Freedome of will, and made subiect to miserable bondage.

S I N we haue seen, that the dominion of sinne, sins the time that it helde the first man bounde vnto it, doth not onely reigne in all mankinde, but also wholly possesseth euery soule: now must we more nereely examine, sins we are brought into that bondage, whether we be spoyled of all Freedome or no: And if yet there remaine any parcell, how farre the force therof procedeth.
But

But to the ende that the trueth of this question may more easily appeare vnto vs, I will by the way set vp a marke, where vnto the whole summe may be directed. And this shalbe the best way to auoid errour, if the daungers be considered that are like to fall on both sides. For when man is put from all vprightnesse, by and by he therby taketh occasion of slouthfulnesse: and because it is sayd, that by himselfe he can do nothing to the study of righteousnesse, forthwith he neglecteth it wholly, as if it pertayned nothing vnto him. Againe, he can presume to take nothing vpon himselfe, be it neuer so litle, but that both Gods honor shalbe therby taken frō him, & man himselfe be ouerthrowen with rash confidence. Therefore to the end we strike not vpon these rocks, this course is to be kept, that man being enformed that there remaineth in him no goodnes, and being on euery side compassed about with most miserable necessity, may yet be taught to aspire to the goodnes whereof he is voyd, and to the liberty wherof he is deprived, and may be more sharply stirred vp from slouthfulnes, than if it were fayned that he is furnished with greatest power. How necessary this second point is, euery man seeth. The first, I see is doubted of by mo than it ought to be. For this beinge sette out of controuersie, it ought then plainly to stand for trueth, that nothing is to be taken away from man of his owne, as farre as it behoueth that he be throwne downe from false boasting of himselfe. For if it were not graunted to man to glory in himselfe euen at that time, when by the bountifulnes of God he was garnished with most singular ornamentes, how much ought he now to be humbled, sith for his vnthankfulnesse he is thrust downe from hie glory into extreame shame? At that time, I say, when he was aduanced to the hiest degree of honor, the Scripture attributeth nothing else vnto him, but that he was created after the image of God, whereby it secretly teacheth, that man was blessed, not by his own good things, but by the partaking of God. What therefore remaineth now, but that he being naked and destitute of all glory, do acknowledge God, to whose liberality he could not be thankfull when he flowed ful of the richesse of his grace: and that now at length with confession of his owne pouerty he glorifie him, whom in the acknowledging of his good gifts, he did not glorifie? Also it is as much for our profite, that all praise of wisdom and strength be taken from vs, as it pertayneth to the glory of God, that they ioyne our ruyne with the robbery of God, that giue vnto vs any thing more, than that which is true. For what is else done when we are taught to fight of our owne force, but y we be lifted vpō hie on a staffe of a reede, that it may by and by breake, and we fall to the ground? Albeit, our forces are yet to much commended when they are compared to the staffe of a reede. For it is but smoke all that vayne men haue imagined and do babble of them. Wherefore not without cause is this excellent sentence oft repeted by Augustine, that free will is rather throwen down headlonge, than stablished by them that defende it. This I thought needefull to speake before, as by way of preface for many mens saks, which when they heare mans power ouerthrowen from the ground, that the power of God may be buylded in manne, do much hate this manner of disputinge as daungerous, much more superfluous, which yet appeareth to be both in religion necessarie, and for vs most profitable.

2 Whereas we haue a litle before sayd, that in the vnderstanding minde, and in the heart are placed the powers of the soule, now let vs consider what they both are able to do. The Philosophers in deede with great cōsent do imagine that in the vnderstanding minde sitteth reason, which like a lampe giueth light to all cōsels, & like a Queene gouerneth the will, for they say y^e it is so endued with diuine light, that it can giue good counsell, and so excelleth in liuely force that it is able well to gouerne. On the other side, that sense is dull and bleare eyed, that it alway creepeth on the ground, and walloweth in grosse obiects, and neuer lifteth vp it selfe to true insight. That the appetite, if it can abide to obey reason, and do not yeld it selfe to sense to be subdued, is caried on to the study of vertues, holdeth on the right way, and is transformed into will: but if it giue it selfe subiect into the bondage of sense, it is by it corrupted and peruerted, so that it degendreth into lust. And whereas by their opinion there do sit in the soule those powers that I haue spoken of before, vnderstanding, sense, appetite or will, which word will is now more commonly vsed, they say that vnderstanding is endued with reason, the best gouernesse toward good and blessed life, so that it do hold it selfe within his owne excellence, and shew forth the force that is naturally giuen it. But that inferiour motion of it, which is called sense, wherewith man is drawn to error & deceite, they say to be such, that it may be tamed with the rod of reason, and by litle and litle be vanquished. They place will in the middest betwene reason and sense, as a thing at her owne ordering, & hauinge liberty whether it list to obey to reason, or giue forth it selfe to be rauished by sense.

3 Sometime in deede they do not deny, being ouercome by very experience, how hardly man stablisheth reason to raigne as queene within himselfe, while somtime he is tickled with intisements of pleasures, sometime deceiued with false semblance of good things, sometime time importunately stricken with immoderate affections, and violently haled out of the way as it were with ropes or strings of sinowes, as Plato sayth. For which reason Cicero sayth, that these sparkes giuen by nature, are with peruerse opinions & euill maners by and by quenched: But when such diseases haue once gotten places in the mindes of men: they graunt that they do more outragiously ouerflow, than that they easely may be restrayned: and they sticke not to compare them to wilde horses which throwing away reason as it were casting the Chariot driuen, do range vnrulely and without measure. But this they make no question of, that vertues and vices are in our owne power. For if (say they) it be in our choise to do this or that, then is it also in our choise not to do. Now if it be in our choise not to do, then is it also to do, but of free choise we seeme to do those things that we do, and to forbear those things that we forbear. Therefore if we do any good thinge when we list, we may likewise leaue it vndone: if we do any euell, we may also eschue the same. Yet some of them haue burst forth into so great licentiousnesse, that they haue boasted that it is in dede Gods gift that we liue, but our owne that we liue well & holily. And thence commeth that saying of Cicero in the person of Corta: because euery man himselfe getteth vertue to himselfe, therefore neuer any of the wise men did thanke God for it. For (sayth he) for vertue we be praised, & in vertue we glory, which should not be if it were the gift of God, and not of our selues. And a litle after. This is the iudgement of al men that fortune is to be asked of God, but wisdom to be taken of himselfe. This therefore is the summe of the opinion of all the Philosophers, that the reason of mans vnderstanding is sufficient for right gouernance: that Will being subiect to it, is in dede moued by Sense to euill thinges. But euen as it hath free election, so can it not be stopped, but that it follow reason for her guide in all things.

4 Among the Ecclesiasticall wryters, albeit there haue bin none that did not acknowledge both that the soundnesse of reason in man hath bin sore wounded by sinne, and his will exceedingly entangled with peruerse desires, yet many of them haue too much assented to the Philosophers: of which the auncient, as I thinke, did so much aduance the strength of man, vpon this consideration, lest if they should haue expressely confessed his weakenesse, first they should haue made the Philosophers, with whom they the contended, to laugh at them: and then least they should giue to the flesh; which of it selfe was dull to goodnesse, a new occasion of slouthfulness. Therefore because they woulde not teache any thinge that were an absurdity in the common judgement of men, their study was to make the doctrine of the Scripture halfe to agree with the teachings of the Philosophers. But that they principally regarded that second point, not to make place for slouthfulnesse, appeareth by their owne words. Chrysofome hath in one place: Because God hath put both good and euill thinges in our owne power, he hath giuen vs Freedome of election, and he withholdeth not y vnwilling, but embraceth the willing. Agayne, Oftentimes he that is euill, if he will, is turned into good, and he that is good by slouthfullnes falleth and becometh euill, because God made our nature to haue free will, and he layeth not necessity vpon vs, but giuing conuenient remedies, suffreth all to lye in the minde of the patient. Againe, As vnlesse we be holpen by the grace of God, we can neuer do any thing well: so vnlesse we bring that which is our owne, we can not obtaine the fauour of God. And he had said before, that it should not be all of Gods helpe, but we must also bring somewhat. And this is commonly a familiar word with him, let vs bring that which is ours, God wil supply the rest. Wherwith agreeth that which Hierom sayeth, that it is our part to beginne, but Gods to make an ende: our parte to offer what we can, his to fulfil what we can not. You see now that in these sayinges they gaue to man towarde the study of vertue more than was meete, because they thought that they could not otherwise awake the dullnesse that was naturally in vs, but if they did proue that in it onely we sinned. With what apt handeling they haue don the same, we shall after se. Surely that the sayings which we haue rehearsed are most false, shall by and by appeare. Now although the Grecians more than other, & among them principally Chrysofome haue passed measure in aduancing the power of mans will, yet all the old wryters, except Augustine, do in this point so either vary, or wauer, or speake doutefully, that in manner no certainty can be gathered of their wrytings. Therefore we will not tary vpon exact reckening of euery one of their sayinges, but heare and there we will touch our of euery one of them so much as the playne declaration of the matter shall seeme to require. As for them that followed after, while euery one for himselve sought praise of witte, in defending of mans nature, they fell continually by little and little one after an other into worse and worse, till it came so farre, that man was commonly thought to be corrupted only in his sensuall parte, and to haue reason altogether, and will for the more parte vncorrupted. In the meane time this flew about in all mens mouthes, that the naturall gifts were corrupted in man, and the supernaturall were taken away, But to what meaning that tended, scarcely the hundreth man did euen slightly vnderstande.

As for my parte, if I would plainly shew of what sorte is the corruption of nature, I could be easely contented with these words. But it is much materiall that it be heedefully weyed what a man, being in all partes of his nature corrupted and spoiled of his supernaturall giftes, is able to do. They therefore which boasted themselues to be the Disciples of Christ, spake of this matter to much like Philosophers. For the name of Freewill still remayned amonge the Latines, as if man had still abiden in vncorrupted state. And the Grecians were not ashamed to vse the worde much more arrogantly: For they called it Autexousion, that is to say of her owne power, as if man had the power of himselfe. Because therefore all, euen to the common people, had receiued this principle, that man was endued with Free will, and many of them that would seeme excellent, can not tell how farre it extendeth: first let vs search out the force of the word it selfe, and then let vs proceede on by the simplicity of the Scripture, to shewe what man is able to do of his owne nature, toward good or euill. What Freewill is, where as it is a word commonly found in all mens wrytinges, yet few haue defined. Yet it semeth that Origen rehearsed that thing whereof they were all agreed, when he sayd, that it is a power of reason to discerne good or euell, and a power of will to choose either of them. And Augustine varieth not from him, when he teacheth that it is a power of reason and will, whereby good is chosen while grace assisteth, and euill when grace ceaseth. Bernarde, while he meaneth to speake more suttelly, speaketh more darkely, which sayeth, that it is a consent by reason of the liberty of will that can not be lost, and the iudgement of reason that can not be auoyded. And the definition of Anselmus is not familiar enough, which sayth that it is a power to kepe vprightnesse for it selfe. Therefore Peter Lombarde and the other Schoolemen, haue rather embraced Augustines definition, because it both was playner & did not exclude the grace of God, without the which they sawe that Will was not sufficient for it selfe. But they bring also of their owne such thinges as they thought either to be better, or to serue for playner declaration. First, they agree that the name of Arbitrium, that is free choise, is rather to be referred to reason, whose parte is to discerne betwene good and Euill thinges: and the adiectiue Free, pertayneth properly to wil, which may be turned to either of both. Wherefore sith Freedome properly belongeth to will, Thomas sayth that it would very well agree, if Free will be called a power of chosing, which being mixt of vnderstanding and appetite, doth more encline to appetite. Nowe haue we in what thinges they teach that the power of Free will consisteth, that is to say, in reason and will. Nowe remayneth that we shortly see howe much they giue to either parte.

5 They are commonly wont to make subiect to the free determination of man, thinges meane, that is which belong not to the kingdom of God : but they do referre true righteousnesse to the speciall grace of God and spirituall regeneration. Which thing while the author of the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles meaneth to shew, he reckoneth vp three sortes of Willes, the first Sensitiue, the second Naturall, the third Spirituall, of which he sayth, that man hath the first two at his owne liberty, the last is the worke of the holy ghost in man. Which whether it be true or no, shall be entreated in place fit for it, for now my purpose is but shortly to rehearse the opinions of other, and not to confute them. Herby it cometh to passe, that when wryters speake of free will, they principally seeke not what it is able to do to ciuile or outward doings, but what it can do to the obedience of the law of God. Which later point I thinke so to be the principall, that yet I thinke the other is not to be neglected. Of which meaning I trust, I shall shew a good reason. There hath bin a distinction receiued in Schooles, that reckoneth vp three sortes of freedoms, the first from necessity, the second from sinne, the third from misery. Of which the first so naturally sticketh fast in man, that it can by no meane be taken away: the other two are lost by sinne. This distinction I willingly receiue, sauing that there necessity is wrongfully confounded with compulsion : betwene which two how much difference there is, and how necessary that difference is to be considered, shall appeare in another place.

6 If this be receiued, then shall it be out of controuersie that man hath not free will to do good workes, vnlesse he be holpen by grace, and that by speciall grace, which is giuen to the onely elect by regeneration. For I do not passe vpon these phrenetike men, which babble that grace is offered generally and without difference. But this is not yet made playne, whether he be altogether depriued of power to do well, or whether he haue yet some power, although it be but lile and weake, which by it selfe in dede can do nothing, but by helpe of grace doth also her parte. While the Maister of the Sentences goeth about to make that playne, he sayeth there are two sortes of grace necessary for vs, whereby we may be made meete to do a good worke : the one they call a Working grace, whereby we effectually will to do good : the other a Together working grace, which followeth good will in helping it. In which diuision this I mislike, that while he giueth to the grace of God an effectuall desire of good, he

secretly sheweth his meaninge that man already of his owne nature, after a certaine manner, desireth good though vneffectually. As Bernarde affirming that good will is in deede the worke of God, yet this he graunteth to man, that of his owne motion he desireth that good will. But this is farre from the meaning of Augustine, from whom yet Lombard would seeme to haue borrowed this diuision. In the second part of the diuision, the doutfulness of speach offendeth me, which hath bred a wrong exposition. For they thought that we do therefore work together with the Seconde grace of God, because it lieth in our power, either to make voyde the First grace by refusing it, or to confirm it by obediētly following it. Whereas the author of the booke Of the calling of the Gentiles, doth thus expresse it, that it is free for them that vse the iudgement of reason, to departe from grace, that it may be worthy rewarde not to haue departed, and that the thing which could not be done but by the working together of the holy Ghost, may be imputed to their merites, by whose wil it was possible to haue not bin done. These two things I had will to note by the way, that nowe, reader, thou maist see howe much I dissent from the soundest sorte of the Schoolemen. For I do much farther differ from the later Sophisters, euen so much as they be farther gone from the auncient time. But yet somewhat, after such a sorte as it is, we perceauē by this diuision, after what manner they haue giuen Free will to man. For at length Lombard sayth, that we haue not free will therefore, because we are alike able either to do or to thinke good and euill, but onely that we are free from compulsion: which freedome is not hindered, although we be peruerse and the bondmen of sinne, and can do nothing but sinne.

7 Therefore, man shalbe sayd to haue free will after this sorte, not because he hath a free choise as well of good as of euill, but because he doth euill by Will, and not by compulsion. That is very well sayd: but to what purpose was it to garnish so smale a matter with so proud a title? A goodly liberty forsooth, if man be not compelled to serue sinne: so is he yet a willing seruaunt that his will is holden fast bounde with the fetters of sinne. Truely I do abhorre struinge about wordes wherewith the Church is vaynely wearied: but I thinke that such wordes are with great religious carefullnesse to be taken heede of, which sound of any absurdity, specially where the errour is hurtefull. Howe fewe I pray you, are there, which when they heare that Free will is assigned to man, do not by and by conceaue, that he is lord both of his owne minde and will, and that he is able of himselfe to turne himselfe to whether parte he will? But some one will say:

this perill shalbe taken away, if the people be diligently warned of the meaning of it. But rather forasmuch as the wit of man is naturally bet to falsity, he will sooner conceiue an errour out of one litle word, than a trueth out of a long tale. Of which thing we haue a more certaine experience in this very word, than is to be wished. For omitting y^e expositiō of the old wryters, all they in maner that came after, while they sticke vpon the naturall signification of the word, haue bin caried into a trust of themselues that bringeth them to destruction.

8 : But if the authority of the fathers do moue vs, they haue in dede cōtinually the word in their mouth: but they do withall declare, how much they esteeme the vse of it. First of all Augustine, which sticketh not to call it Bonde will. In one place he is angry with them that denie free will but he declareth his chiefe reason why, when he sayth onely, Let not any man be so bold to deny the freedom of wil, that he go about to excuse sinne. But surely in an other place he confesseth, that the will of man is not free without the holy Ghost, forasmuch as it is subiect to lustes that do binde and conquere it. Againe, that when will was ouercome with sinne whereinto it fell, nature began to want freedom. Againe, that man hauing ill vsed his free will, lost both himselfe and it. Againe, free will is become captiue, that it can do nothing toward righteousnes. Againe, that it can not be free, which the grace of God hath not made free. Againe, that y^e iustice of God is not fulfilled when the lawe commaundeth, and man doth of his owne strength, but when the holy Ghost helpeth, and mans will not free, but made free by God, obeyeth. And of all these thinges he shortly rendereth a cause, when in an other place he wryteth, that man receiued great force of free will when he was created, but he lost it by sinning. Therefore in an other place, after that he had shewed that free will is stablished by grace, he sharply inueyeth against them that take it vpon them without grace. Why therefore (sayth he) dare wretched men either be proud of free will before that they be made free, or of their owne strength if they be already made free? And they marke not that in the very name of free will, is mention of freedom. But where the spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom. If then they be the bondmen of sinne, why do they boast them of free will? For of whom a man is ouercome, to him he is made bond. But if they be made free, why do they boast them as of their owne worke? Are they so free, that they will not be his bondseruantes, which sayth: Without me ye can do nothing? Beside that also in an other place he seemeth sportingly to mocke at the vse of that worde, when he sayd, that will was in dede free, but not made free, free to righteousnesse, but the bondseruaunt of sinne . Which saying in an other place he repeateth and expoundeth, that man is not free from righteousnesse, but by choise of will, and from sinne he is not free but by grace of the Sauour. He that doth testifie, that the freedome of man is nothing else but a free-making or manumission from righteousnes, seemeth trimly to mocke at the vaine name thereof. Therefore if any man will permit the vse of this word with no euil signification, he shall not be troubled by me for so doinge . But because I thinke it can not be kept without great peril, & that it should turne to a great benefit to the church, if it were abolished: neither will I my selfe vse it, and I would wish other, if they aske me counsell, to forbear it.

9 I may seeme to haue brought a great preiudice against my selfe, which haue confessed, that all the ecclesiasticall wryters, except Augustine, haue spoken so doutfully or diuersly in this matter, that no certaynety can be had out of their wrytinges. For some will so construe this, that I meant therefore to thrust them from giuinge any voice herein, because they are all against me. As for me, I meant it to no other end but this, that I simply & in good faith would haue godly wittes prouided for, which if they wayte vpon those mens opinion in this poynt, they shall alway wauer vncertayne . In such sorte do they sometime teach, man being spoyled of all strength of freewill, to flee to grace onely: sometime they furnish or seeme to furnish him with his owne armour. But it is not hard to make appeare, that in such doutfulnesse of speech, they nothing, or very litle esteeminge mans strength haue giuen the praise of all good thinges to the holy Ghost, if I here recite certaine sentences of theirs, whereby that is playnely taught. For what meaneth that saying of Cyprian, which Augustine so oft repeateth, that we ought to glory of nothing, because we haue nothing of our owne, but that man wholly despoyled in himselfe, may learne to hang all vpon God. What meaneth that saying of Augustine and Eucherius, when they expound, that Christ is the tree of life, to whom he that reacheth his hand, shall liue? and that the tree of knowledge of good and euill, is the free choise of will, wherof who so tasteth, forsaking the grace of God, he shall dye? What meaneth that of Chrysostome, that euery man is naturally not onely a sinner, but also altogether sinne? If we haue no good thing of our owne: If man frō top to toe be altogether sinne: if it be not lawfull to attempt howe much the power of free will is able to do, howe then may it be lawfull to parte the prayse of a good worke betwene God and man? I could rehearse of this sort very many sayings out of other, but least any man should cauill, that I choose out those things onely that make for my purpose, and do craftily leaue out such things as make against me, therefore I do forbear such rehearfall. Yet this I dare affirme, howsoeuer they be sometime to busie in aduancing free will, that this yet was their purposed marke, to teach man being altogether turned away from trust of his owne power, to haue his strength reposed in God alone. Now come I to the simple setting forth of the truth, in considering the nature of man.

10 But I am here constrained to reapeate that, which in the beginning of this chapter, I spake by way of preface. As any man is most discouraged and thrown downe with conscience of his owne misery, needinesse, nakednesse and shame, so hath he best profited in knowledge of himselfe. For there is no danger to be feared, least man will take to much from himselfe, so that he learne, that what he wanteth is to be recouered in God, but to himselfe he can take nothing more than his owne right, be it neuer so litle, but that he shall destroy himselfe with vaine confidence, and conueying the honor of God to himselfe, become guilty of haynous sacrilege. And truely so oft as this lust inuadeth our minde, that we desire to haue somewhat of our own, which may rest in our selues rather than in God, let vs know that this thought is ministred vs by no other counseller, but by him that perswaded our first parentes, to haue a will to be like vnto Gods, knowing both good and euill. If it be the word of the deuill that raiseth vp man in himselfe, let vs giue no place vnto it, vnlesse we list to take counsell of our enemy. It is pleasaunt in deede, for a man to haue so much strength of his owne, that he may rest in himselfe. But that we be not allured to this vaine affiance, let so many sore sentences make vs afraid, by which we be thrown downe: as are, Cursed is he which trusteth in mā, & setteth flesh to be his arme. Againe, that God hath not pleasure in the strength of a horse, neither deliteth in the legs of man, but deliteth in them that feare him, & attend vpon his mercy. Againe, that it is he which giueth strength vnto him that faynteth, and vnto him that hath no strength, he increaseth power, euen the yong men shall faint and be weary, and the yong men shall stumble and fall, but they that wayte vpon the Lord, shall renue their strength. All which sayinges tend to this end, that we leane not vpon any opinion of our owne strength, be it neuer so litle, if we meane to haue God fauourable vnto vs, which resisteth the proude, & giueth grace to the humble. And then againe, lette these promises come into our remembrance. I will poure out water vpon the thirsty, & Floudes vpon the dry ground. Againe, All ye that thirst, come vnto the waters. Which promises do testifie, that none are admitted to receiue the blessinges of God, but they they that pyn away with feeling of their owne pouerty. And such promises are not to be passed ouer, as is that of Esay: Thou shalt haue no more sunne to shine by day, neither shall the brightnesse of the Moone shine vnto thee: for the Lord shall be thine euerlasting light, and the God thy glory. The Lord in deede doth not take away the shining of the Sunne or Moone from his seruauntes, but because he will himselve alone appeare glorious in them, he calleth their confidence far away, euen from those thinges, that are compted in their opinion most excellent.

11 Truely, that saying of Chrysostome hath alway exceedingly well pleased me, that the foundation of our Wisdom is humilitie: but yet more that saying of Augustine, As (sayth he) that same Rhetoritian beinge asked, what was the first thinge in the rules of eloquence, answered Pronunciation: and what was the second, he answered Pronunciation: and what was the third, he answered Pronunciation: so if one aske me of the rules of Christian religion, the First, the Second, and Third time, and alwayes I would answer Humilitie. But he meaneth not humility, when a man knowinge some litle vertue to be in himselve, abstayneth from pride and hautinesse of minde, but when he truely feeleth himselve to be such a one, as hath no refuge but in humility: as in an other place he declareth. Lette no man (sayeth he) flatter himselve: of his owne he is a deuil. That thinge whereby he is blessed, he hath of God onely. For what hast thou of thine owne, but sinne? Take away from thee, sinne which is thine owne, for righteousnesse is Gods. Agayne, why is the possibility of nature so presumed on? it is wounded, maymed, troubled and lost, it needeth a true confession, and not a false defense. Agayne, when euery man knoweth that in himselve he is nothing, and of himselve he hath no helpe, his weapons in himselve are broken, the warres are ceassed. But it is needfull, that all the weapons of wickednesse be broken in sunder, shiuered in in peeces and burnt, that thou remayne vnarmed and haue no helpe in thy selfe. Howe much more weake thou art in thy selfe, so much the more the Lord receiueth thee. So vpon the three score and tenne Psalme he forbiddeth vs to remember our owne righteousnesse, that we may acknowledge the righteousnesse of God: and he sheweth that God doth so commende his grace vnto vs, that we may knowe our selues to be nothing, that we stand onely by the mercy of God, when of our selues we are nothing but euill. Lette vs not therefore strue here with God for our right, as if that were withdrawen from our saluation which is giuen to him. For as our humblenesse is his hienesse, so the confession of our humbleness hath his mercy ready for remedy. Neither yet do I require that manne not conuincd should willingly yelde himselfe: nor if he haue any power, that he shoulde turne his minde from it, to be subdued vnto true humilitie. But that laying away the disease of selfeloue and desire of victory wherewith beinge blinded, he thinketh to highly of himselfe, he should well consider himselfe in the true lookinge glasse of the Scripture.

12 And the common saying which they haue borrowed out of Augustine pleaseth me well, that the naturall giftes were corrupted in man by sinne, and of the supernaturall he was made empty. For in this later parte of supernaturall giftes, they vnderstande as well the light of faith as righteousnesse, which were sufficient to the attayning of heauenly life and eternall felicity. Therefore banishing himselfe from the Kingdome of God, he was also deprived of the spirituall giftes, wherewith he had bin furnished to the hope of eternall saluation. Whereupon followeth, that he is so banished from the Kingdome of God, that all thinges that belong to the blessed life of the soule, are extinguished in him, vntill by grace of regeneration he recouer them. Of that sorte are faith, the Loue of God, charity toward our neighbours, the study of holinessse and righteousnesse. All these thinges, because Christ restoreth them vnto vs, are compted thinges comming from an other to vs, and beside nature, and therefore we gather that they were once taken away. Againe, soundnesse of the vnderstandinge minde and vprightnesse of hart were then taken away together, and this is the corruption of naturall giftes. For though there remayne somewhat left of vnderstanding and iudgement together with will, yet can we not say, that our vnderstanding is sound and perfect, which is both feeble and drowned in many darkenesses. And as for our will, the peruersenesse thereof is more than sufficiently known. Sith therefore reason, whereby a man discerneth betwene good and euill, whereby he vnderstandeth and iudgeth, is a naturall gift, it could not be altogether destroied, but it was partely weakened, partely corrupted, so that soule ruynes thereof appeare. In this sense doth Iohn say, that the light shineth yet in darkenesse, but the darkenesse comprehended it not: In which wordes both thinges are plainly expressed, that in the peruerted and degendred nature of man, there shine yet some sparkes that shewe that he is a creature hauing reason, and that he differeth from brute beastes, because he is endued with vnderstanding: and yet that this light is choked with great thickenesse of ignoraunce, that it can not effectually gette abroad.

So Will, because it is vnseparable from the nature of man, perished not, but was bound to peruerse desires, that it can couet no good thinge. This in deede is a full definition, but yet such as needeth to be made playne with more wordes. Therefore, that the order of our talke may proceede according to that first distinction, wherein we diuided the soule of man into vnderstandinge and will: lette vs first examine the force of vnderstandinge. So to condemne it of perpetuall blindenesse, that a man leaue vnto it no manner of skill in any kinde of thinges, is not onely against the worde of God, but also against the experience of common reason. For we see that there is planted in man a certayne desire to search out trueth, to which he would not aspire at all, but hauing felt some sauour therof before. This therefore is some sight of mans vnderstanding, that he is naturally drawn with loue of trueth, the neglectinge whereof, in brute beastes proueth a grosse Sense without reason, albeit, this litle desire such as it is, faynteth before it entre the beginning of her race, because it byandby falleth into vanity. For the witte of man can not for dullnesse keepe the right way to search out trueth, but strayeth in diuerse errores, and as it were gropinge in darkenesse, oftentimes stumbleth, till at length it wander and vanisheth away, so in seekinge trueth, it doth bewray howe vnfitte it is to seeke and finde trueth. And then it is sore troubled with an other vanity, that oftentimes it discerneth not those thinges, to the true knowledge whereof it were expedient to bend it selfe, and therefore it tormenteth it selfe with sonde curiolyty, in searchinge out thinges superfluous and nothing worth: and to thinges most necessary to be known, it either taketh no heede, or negligently or seldome turneth, but surely scarce at any time applieth her study earnestly vnto them. Of which peruersenesse, whereas the prophane wryters do commonly complayne, it is founde, that all menne haue entangled themselves with it. Wherefore Salomon in all his Ecclesiastes, when he hadde gone through all these studies, in which men thinke themselves to be very wise, yet he pronounceth, that they are all vayne and trifling.

13 Yet do not all trauailes of Witte so alway become voyde, but that it attayneth somewhat, specially when it bendeth it selfe to these inferiour thinges. Yea and it is not so blockish, but that it tasteth also some litle of the hier thinges, howesoever it more negligently apply the searching of them, but yet not that with like power of conceaunge. For when it is caried vppe aboute the compasse of this present life, then is it principally conuincd of her owne weakenesse.

Cap. 2. Of the knowledge of

Wherefore, that we may the better see howe farre accordinge to the degrees of her ability it proceedeth in euery thinge, it is good that I putte foorth a distinction. Lette this therefore be the distinction, that there is one vnderstandinge of earthly thinges, an other of heauenly thinges. Earthly thinges I call those that do not concerne God and his Kingdome, true righteousnesse, and the blessednesse of eternall life, but haue all their respect and relation to this presente life, and are as it were contayned within the boundes thereof. Heauenly thinges, I call the pure knowledge of God, the order of true righteousnesse, and the mysteries of the heauenly kingdome. Of the first sorte are policy, gouernance of household, all handy craftes, and liberall Sciences. Of the second sorte are the knowledge of God and Gods will, and the iule to frame our life accordinge to it. Concerninge the first, this we must confesse, because man is a creature by nature giuen to liue in companies together: he is also by naturall instinctiō bent to cherish and to preserue the felloweshippe of these companies, therefore we see that there are in the mindes of all men vniuersal impressions of a certaine ciuill honestie and order. Hereby it commeth to passe, that there is found no man that vnderstandeth not, that all companies of menne ought to be kept in order with lawes, and that conceiue not in his minde the principles of these lawes. Hereof commeth that same perpetuall consent, as well of all nations as of all men vnto lawes, because the seedes thereof are naturally planted in all men without any teacher or lawmaker. And I weye not the dissensions and fightinges that afterward arise while some desire to peruert lawe and right, the loose absolute gouernementes of kinges, that lust strayeth abroad in steede of right, as theeues and robbers, some (which is a fault more than common) thinke that to be vniust, which other haue stablished for iust: and on the other side stiffely say, that to be laudable, which other haue forbidden. For these men do not therefore hate lawes, because they do not knowe that lawes are good and holy, but for that they raginge with headdy lust, do fight against manifest reason, and for theyr fansie do abhorre that, which in vnderstandinge of minde they allowe. The later sorte of striuinge is such, that it taketh not away the first conceiuinge of equity. For when men do striue amonge themselues, concerninge the poyntes of lawes, they agree together in a certayne summe of equity. Wherein is proued the weakenesse of mannes witte, which euen then when it seemeth to followe the right way, yet halteth and staggereth, but still this remayneth true, that there is sowne in all

menne a certaine seede of politike order . And that is a large proufe, that in the orderinge of this life, no manne is voyde of the light of reason.

14 Nowe do followe the artes , both the liberall , and the handy craftes : in learninge whereof, because there is in vs all a certayne aptnesse, in them also doth appeare the force of mannes witte : but albeit, all menne be not apt to learne them all, yet is this a token certayne enough of the common naturall power, that there is almost no manne founde, whose conceite of witte doth not in some art or other shew foorth it selfe . Neither haue they onely a power or facility to learne, but also to deuise in euery art some newe thinge, either to amplifie or make perfecter that which hath bin learned of an other that went before, which thinge, as it moued Plato erroneously to teach, that such conceauinge is nothinge else, but a callinge to remembraunce, so by good reason it ought to compell vs to confesse, that the beginninge thereof is naturally planted in the witte of man. These poyntes therefore do playnely testifie, that there is giuen to men naturally an vniuersall conceiuinge of reason and of vnderstandinge. Yet is it so an vniuersall benefite, that therein euery man ought for himselfe to acknowledge the peculiar grace of God. To which thankfullnesse the creator himselfe doth sufficiently awake vs, when he createth natural fooles, in whom he maketh vs to see with what giftes mans soule excelleth, if it be not endued with his light, which is so naturall in all men, that it is yet altogether a free gift of his liberality towarde euery man. But the inuention and orderly teachinge of the same artes, or a more inwarde and excellent knowledge of them which is proper but to a fewe, is no perfect argument of the common conceiuinge of witte, yet because without difference it happeneth to the godlye and vngodlye, it is rightfully reckened amonge naturall giftes.

15 So oft therefore as we light vpon prophane wryters, let vs be put in minde by that maruelous light of trueth that shineth in them, that the wit of man, how much soeuer it be, peruerted and fallen from the first integrity, is yet still clothed and garnished with excellent giftes of God. If we consider that the spirite of God is the onely fountayne of trueth, we will neyther refuse nor despise the trueth it selfe, wheresoeuer it shall appeare, except we will dishonorably vse the spirite of God : for the giftes of the holy Ghost can not be set light by, without contempt and reproch of himselfe. And what ? Shall we deny that the trueth shined to the olde Lawyers, which haue set forth Ciuile order and Discipline with so great equity? Shall we say that the Philosophers were blinde both in that exquisite contemplation, and cunning description of nature? Shall we say that they had no wit, which by setting in order the art of speach, haue taught vs to speake with reason? Shall we say that they were madde, which in setting forth Phisicke, haue employed their diligence for vs? What of all the Mathematicall sciences? shall we thinke them doting erroures of madde men? no, rather we can not reade the wrytings of the olde men; concerning these things, without great admiration of their wit. But shall we thinke any thinge praiseworthy or excellent, which we do not reknowledge to come of God? Lette vs be ashamed of so great vthankfullnesse, into which the Heathen Poetes fell not, which confessed that both Philosophie and Lawes, and all good artes, were the inuentions of Gods. Sith then it appeareth that these men, whom the Scripture calleth naturall men, were of so sharpe and deepe sight in searchinge out of inferiour thinges, lette vs learne by such examples, howe many good thinges the Lorde hath left to the nature of manne, after that it hath bin spoyled of the true God.

16 But in the meane time yet let vs not forget, that these are the most excellent good giftes of the spirite of God, which for the common benefite of mankinde he dealeth abroade to whom it pleaseth him. For if it behoued, that the vnderstandinge and skill that was required for the framinge of the tabernacle, should be poured into
 35 ledge of those thinges which are most excellent in mans life, be sayde to be communicated vnto vs by the spirite of God. Neither is there cause why any man should aske, what haue the wicked to do with Gods spirite, which are altogether estranged from God. For where it is sayd that the spirite of God dwelleth in the faithfull onely, that is to be vnderstanded of the spirite of sanctification, by the which we are consecrate to God himselfe, to be his temples: yet doth he neuerthelesse fill, moue and quicken all thinges with the vertue of the same spirite, and that according to the property of euery kinde which he hath giuen to it by law of creation. If it haue bin the Lords will that we should be holpen by the trauaile and seruice of the wicked in naturall Philosophie, Dialecticke, the Mathematicall knowledges, and other: lette vs vse it, least if we neglect the giftes of God, willingly offered in them, we suffer iust punishment for our slouthfullnes. But least any shoulde thinke a man to be blessed, when vnder the elementes of this world there is graunted vnto him so great an ability abilitie to conceiue truth, it is also to be added that all this power to vnderstand, and the vnderstanding that followeth therof, is a vanishing and transitorie thing before God, where there is not a stedefast foundation of truth. For Augustine teacheth most truely, whome (as we haue said) the Master of the Sentences, and the other Scholemen are compelled to assent vnto, as the free giftes were taken from man after his fall, so these naturall giftes which remained, were corrupted. Not that they can be defiled of themselues in asmuch as they come from God, but bycause they cease to be pure to a defiled man, that he should haue no praise of them.

17 Let this be the summe: that it is seen that in all mankinde is reason which is propre to our nature, which maketh vs to differ from brute beastes, as brute beastes do differ in sense from thinges without life. For where as there be borne certaine naturall fooles and idiots, that defaute obscureth not the generall grace of God. But rather by such sight we are put in minde, that what is left vnto our selues, ought iustely to be ascribed to the kindenesse of God, bycause if he had not spared vs, our rebellion had drawen with it the destruction of our whole nature. But wheras some do excell in sharpnesse of conceiuing, some other do passe in iudgement, some haue a quicker witte to learne this or that arte: in this variete God setteth forth his grace vnto vs, that no man shoulde claime to him selfe as his owne, that which floweth from Gods mere liberalitie. For howe becometh one more excellent than an other, but that in common nature might appere aboute other the speciall grace of God, which in omitting many, saith openly that it is bounde to none. Beside that, God poureth in singular motions, according to the calling of euery man. Of which thing we mete with many examples in the bookes of the Iudges, wher it is said, that the spirite of the Lord clad them, whome he called to rule the people. Finally, in euery noble acte there is a speciall instruction. By which reason the strong men followed Saul, whose heartes the Lord had touched. And when his ministring in the kingdome was prophecied of, Samuel said thus: The spirite of the Lord shall come vpon thee, and thou shalt be an other man. And this was continued to the whole course of gouernement: as after it is spoken of Dauid, that the spirite of the Lord came vpon him from that day forward. But the same is spoken in an other place as touching particular motions: yea in Homere men are said to excell in witte, not onely as Iupiter hath dealte to euery man, but also as the time required. And truely experience teacheth, while many times such men stand amased as were most sharpe and depewitted, that the wittes of men are in the hand and will of God to rule them at euery moment: for which reason it is said, that he taketh witte from the wise, that they may wander out of the way. But yet in this diuersitie we see remaining some markes of the Image of God, which do make difference betwene all mankinde and other creatures.

18 Now is to be declared what mans reason seeth, when it cometh to the kingedome of God and to that spirituall insight, which consisteth chiefly in three things: to know God, and his fatherly fauour toward vs, wherein our saluation standeth: and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his lawe. Both in the first two, and in the second, properly they that are most witty, are blinder than molles. I denie not that there be here and there read in Philosophers, concerning God, many thinges well and aptely spoken, but yet such as do alway saour of a certaine giddy imagination. The Lord gaue them in dede, as is aboue said, a little tast of his Godhead, that they shoulde not pretende ignoraunce to colour their vngodlinesse: and many times he moued them to speake many thinges, by confession wherof them selues might be conuincid: But they so sawe the thinges that they saw, that by such seyng they were not directed to the trueth, much lesse did attaine vnto it, like as a wayfaring man in the middest of the feylde, for a sodaine momēt, seeth faire and wide the glistering of lightning in the night time, but with such a quickly vanishing sight, that he is soner couered againe with the darkenesse of the night, than he can stirre his fote, so farre is it of that he can be brought into his way by such a helpe. Beside that, those small droppes of trueth, wherwith, as it were by chaunce, they sprinkle their bookes, with how many and how monstrous lies are they defiled? Finally, they neuer so much as smelled that assurednesse of Gods good will toward vs, without which mans witte must nedes be filled with infinite confusion. Therefore mans reason neither approcheth, nor goeth toward, nor ones directeth sight vnto this trueth, to vnderstand who is the true God, or what a one he will be toward vs.

19 But bycause we being dronke with a false persuasion of our owne deepe insight, do very hardely suffer our selues to be persuaded, that in matters of God it is vtterly blinde and dull: I thinke it shall be better to cōfirme it by testimonies of Scripture than by reasons. This doth Iohn very well teache in that place whiche I euen now alleged, whē he writeth, that life was in God from the beginning, and the same life which shoulde be the light of men, and that the light did shine in darkenesse, and the darkenesse comprehended it not. He sheweth in dede, that mans soule is lightened with the brightnesse of Gods light, so

so that it is neuer altogether without some small flame, or at least some sparckle of it, but yet, that with such a light he comprehendeth not God. And why so? bycause mans quickenesse of wit, as towarde the knowledge of God, is but mere darkenesse. For when the holy Ghost calleth men darkenesse, he at ones spoileth them of all abilitie of spirituall vnderstanding. Therefore he affirmeth, that the faithfull which embrace Christ, are borne not of bloude, or of the will of the flesh, or of man, but of God. As if he shoulde saie: flesh is not capable of so hie wisdom to conceiue God and that which is Gods, vnlesse it be lightened with the spirite of God. As Christ testified, that this was a speciall reuelation of the father, that Peter did know him.

20 If we were perswaded of this, which ought to be out of all controuersie, that our nature wanteth all that, which our heauenly father geueth to his elect by the spirite of regeneration, then here were no matter to doubt vpon. For thus speaketh the faithfull people in the Prophet: For with thee is the fountaine of life, and in thy light we shall see light. The Apostle testifieth the same thing, when he saith that no man can call Iesus the Lord, but in the holy Ghost. And Iohn Baptist seying the dulnesse of his disciples, crieth out, that no man can receiue any thing, vnlesse it be geuen him from aboue. And that he meaneth by Gifte a speciall illumination, and not a common gifte of nature, appereth hereby, that he complaineth that in so many wordes as he had spoken to commend Christ to his Disciples, he preuayled nothing. I see (sayeth he) that wordes are nothing to informe mens mindes concerning diuine thinges, vnlesse the Lord geue vnderstanding by his spirite. Yea and Moses, when he reprocheth the people with their forgetfulnesse, yet noteth this withall, that they can by no meanes grow wise in the mysteries of God, but by the benefite of God. Thyne eyes (saith he) haue seene those greate tokens and wonders, and The Lord hath not geuen thee a heart to vnderstande, nor eares to heare, nor eyes to see. What should he expresse more, if he called vs blockes in considering the workes of God? Wherupon the Lord by the Prophet promisseth for a great grace, that he will geue the Israelites a heart, that they may know him: signifying thereby, that mans witte is onely so much spiritually wise, as it is lightened by him. And this Christ plainely confirmed with his owne mouth, when he sayeth that no man can come to him, but he to whome it shall be geuen from the Father. What? is not he him selfe the liuely Image of the Father, in whom the whole brightnesse of his glorie is expressed vnto vs? Therefore he coule not better shewe what our power is to knowe God, than when he sayeth, that we haue no eyes to see his Image, where it is so openly set presente before vs. What? Came he not into the earth for this purpose, to declare his Fathers will vnto men? And did he not faithfully do his office? Yes surely. But yet nothing is wrought by his preaching, vnlesse the inwarde Scholemaster, the holy Ghost, set open the way to our mindes. Therefore none come to him, but they that haue hearde and bin taught of the Father. What maner way of learning and hearing is this? Euen, when the holy Ghost by maruellous and singular vertue formeth the eares to heare, and the mindes to vnderstande. And least that shoulde seme straung, he allegeth the prophecie of Esaie, where when he promisetht the repairing of the Church that they which shall be gathered together to saluation, shall be taught of the Lord. If God there foresheuweth some peculiar thing concerning his electes, it is euident that he speaketh not of that kinde of learning that was also common to the wicked and vngodly. It remaineth therefore that we must vnderstande it thus, that the way into the kingdome of God is open to no man, but to him to whom the holy Ghost by his enlightening shall make a new minde. But Paule speaketh most plainely of all, which of purpose entering into discourse of this matter, after he had condemned all mens wisdome of follie and vanitie, and vtterly brought it to naught, at the last concludeth thus: that naturall man can not perceiue those things that are of the spirite of God: they are foolishnesse vnto him, and he can not vnderstand them, bycause they are spiritually iudged. Whome doeth he call naturall? euen him that stayeth vpon the light of nature. He I say comprehendeth nothing in the spirituall misteries of God. Why so? is it bycause by slouthfulnesse he neglecteth it? Nay, rather although he would trauaile neuer so much, he can do nothing, bycause forsoth they are spiritually iudged. What meaneth that? bycause being vtterly hidden from the sight of man, they are opened by the onely reuelation of the spirite: so that they are reckened for follie where the spirite of God geueth not light. Before he had auanced those thinges that God hath prepared for them that loue him, aboue the capacitie of eyes, eares and mindes. Yea he testified that mans wisdome was as a certaine veile, wherby mans minde was kept from seyng God. What meane we? The Apostle pronounceth, that the wisdome of this worlde is made follie by God: and shall we forsoth geue vnto it sharpenesse of vnderstanding, whereby it may pearce to the secrete places of the heauenly kingdome? Farre be such beastlinessse from vs.

21 And so that which here he taketh away from men, in an other place, in a prayer, he geueth it to God alone. God (sayeth he) and the father father of glory, geue to you the spirite of wisdome and reuelation. Eph. 1.

 Now thou hearest that all wisdome and reuelation is the gift of God. 15.
 What followeth? and lighten the eyes of your minde. Surely if they neede a new reuelation, the are they blinde of themselues. It followeth after: That ye may knowe what is the hope of your calling. &c.
 Therefore he confesseth, that the wittes of men are not capable of so great vnderstanding, to know their owne calling. And let not some Pelagian babble here, that God doth remedie that dulnesse or vnskilfulnesse, when by the doctrine of his worde he directeth mans vnderstanding, whether without a guide he coulde not haue attained.
 For Dauid had a lawe, wherein was comprehended all the wisdome that may be desired, and yet not contented with that, he requireth to haue his eyes opened, that he may consider the misteries of the same lawe. By which speach truely he secretly sayeth, that the sunne riseth Ps. 119 vpon the earth where the worde of God shineth to men: but they get 18.
 not much thereby, vntill he himselve, that is therefore called the fa- Iac. 1.
 ther of lightes, do geue them or open their eyes, by cause where so 17.
 euer he shineth not with his spirite, all things are possessed with darke-nesse. So the Apostles were well and largely taught by the best schole-master: yet if they had not needed the spirite of truth to instruct their Ioh. 14 mindes in that same doctrine which they had hearde before, he would 26.
 not haue bidden them loke for him. If the thing that we aske of God, we do thereby confesse that we wante: and God in that that he promiseth it vs, doth argue our neede, let no man now doubt to confesse that he is so much able to vnderstande the misteries of God, as he is enlightened with his grace. He that geueth to him selfe more vnder-standing, is so much the more blinde, for that he doth not acknowe-ledge his owne blindenesse.

22 Nowe remaineth the thirde pointe, of knowing the rule of well framing of life, which we do rightly call the knowledge of the workes of righteousnesse, wherein mans wit semeth to be of somewhat more sharpe sight, than in the other two before. For the Apostle testifieth, that the Gentiles which haue no lawe, while they do the Rom. 2 workes of the lawe, are to themselues in stede of a lawe, and do shewe 14.
 the lawe written in their heartes, their consciences bearing them wit-nesse, and their thoughtes accusing them within themselues, or excusing them before the iugement of God. If the Gentiles haue righte-ousnesse naturally grauen in their mindes, surely we can not say that we are altogether blinde in the order of life. And nothing is more cō-mon, than that man by the lawe naturall, of which the Apostle speaketh in that place, is sufficiently instructed to a right rule of life. But let vs weye to what purpose this knowledge of the lawe is planted in men: then it shall by and by appeare, how farre it bringeth them toward the marke of reason and truth. The same is also euident by the wordes of Paule, if a man do marke the placing of them. He had saide a litle before, that they whiche sinned in the lawe, are iudged by the lawe: they that haue sinned without lawe, do perish without lawe. Because this might seme vnreasonable, that the Gentils should perish without any iudgement going before, he by and by addeth, that their conscience is to them in steade of a lawe, and therefore is sufficient for their iust damnation. Therefore the ende of the lawe naturall is, that man may be made inexcusable. And it shall be defined not ill after this sorte, that it is a knowledge of conscience, that sufficiently discerneth betwene iust and vniust, to take away from men the pretence of ignorance, while they are proued guilty by their owne testimonie. Such is the tenderesse of man toward him selfe, that in doing of euils, he alway turneth away his minde so much as he maie from the feeling of sinne. By which reason it semeth that Plato was moued to thinke that there is no sinne done but by ignorance. That in dede were firstly sayd of him, if mens hypocrisie went so farre in hiding of vices, that the minde might not know it selfe guilty before God. But when the sinner seeking to escheue the iudgement emprinted in him, is now and then drawene backe vnto it, and not suffered so to winke, but that he be compelled whether he will or no, some time to open his eyes: it is falsly said that he sinneth onely by ignorance. Themistius saith more truly, which reacheth that vnderstanding is seldome deceiued: that it is blindness when it goeth any further, that is, when he cometh downe to the speciall case. Euery man, if it be generally asked, will affirme, that manslaughter is euill: but he that conspireth to kill his enemies, deliberateth vpon it, as on a good thing. The adulterer generally will condemne adulterie, but in his owne, priuately he will flatter him selfe. This is ignorance, when a man comming to the speciall case forgetteth the rule, that he had lately agreed vpon in the general question. Of which thing Augustine discourseth very finely in his exposition of the first verse of the lvij. Psalme: albeit the same thing is not continuall. For sometime the shamefulnessse of the euill deede so presseth the conscience, that not deceiuing him selfe vnder false resemblance of a good thing, but wittingly and willingly he runneth into euill. Out of which affection came these sayinges: I see the better and allow it, but I follow the worse. Wherefore, me thinke, Aristotle hath very aptely made distinction betwene Incontinence and Temperance. Where incontinence reigneth, he sayeth, that there by reason of troubled affection or passion, knowledge is taken away from the minde, that it marketh not the euill in his owne acte, which it generally seeth in the like: and when the troubled affection is cooled, repentaunce immediatly followeth. But intemperaunce is not extinguished or broken by feeling of sinne, but on the other side obstinately standeth still in her conceiued choise of euill.

24 Now when thou hearest iudgement vniuersally named in the difference of good and euill, thinke it not euery sounde and perfect iudgement. For if mans heartes are furnished with choise of iust and vniust, only to this ende, that they should not pretende ignorance, it is not then nedefull to see the trueth in euery thing. But it is enough & more, that they vnderstand so farre that they can not escape away, but being conuict by witnesse of their conscience, they euen now already beginne to tremble at the iudgemēt seate of God. And if we will trie our reason by the lawe of God, which is the exemplar of true righteousness, we shall finde how many wayes it is blinde. Truely it atteineth not at all to those that are the chiefe things in the First table, as of confidence in God, of geuing to him the prayse of strength and righteousness, of calling vpon his name, of the true keping of Sabbath. What soule euer, by naturall sense did smell out, that the lawfull worshipping of God consisteth in these and like thinges? For when prophane men will worshippe God, although they be called away a hundred times from their vaine trifles, yet they alway slide backe thither againe. They denie in deede that sacrifices do please God, vnlesse there be adioyned a purenesse of minde: whereby they declare, that they conceiue somewhat of the spirituall worshipping of God, which yet they byandby corrupt with false inuentions. For it can neuer be perswaded them, that all is true that the lawe prescribeth of it. Shall I saie, that that wit excelleth in any sharpe vnderstanding, which can neither of it selfe be wise, nor harken to teaching? In the commaundementes of the Second table it hath some more vnderstanding, by so much as they came nēer to the preservation of ciuile fellowship among menne. Albeit euen herein also it is founde many times to faile. To euery excellent nature it semeth most vnreasonable, to suffer an vniust, and to imperious a maner of gouerning ouer them, if by any meane he may put it away: and the iudgement of mans reason is none other, but that it is the part of a seruile and base courage, to suffer it patiently: and againe, the parte of an honest and free borne heart, to shake it of. And reuenge of iniuries is reckened for no faulte among the Philosophers. But the Lorde condemning that to much noblenesse of courage, commaundeth his to kepe the same patience, that is so ill reported among men. And in all the keeping of the lawe, our vnderstanding marketh not desire of minde at all. For a naturall man suffereth not him selfe to be brought to this, to acknowledge the diseases of his desires. The light of nature is choked vp, before that it come to the first entrie of this bottomlesse depth. For when the Philosophers note immoderat motions of minde for faultes, they meane those motiōs that appere and shew forth themselues by grosse tokens, but they make no accompt of those euill desires that do gently tickle the minde.

25 Wherefore, as Plato was worthyly founde fault withall before, for that he imputed all sinnes to ignoraunce, so is their opinion to be reiected, which teach that purposed malice and frowardnesse is vsed in all sinnes. For we finde it to much by experience, how oft we fall with our good intent. Our reason is ouerwhelmed with so many sortes of being deceyued, is subiect to so many errors, stumblcth at so many staves, is entangled with so many streightes, that it is farre from sure directing. But how little it is esteemed before the Lord in all partes of our life, Paule sheweth when he sayeth, that we are not sufficient to thinke any thing of our selues, as of our selues. He speaketh not of will or affection, but he taketh also this away from vs, that we shoulde not thinke that it can come in our mindes how any thing is to be done well. Is our diligence, insight, vnderstanding, and heade so corrupted, that it can deuise or thinke vpon nothing that is right before the Lord? that semeth to harde to vs, that do vnwillingly suffer our selues to be spoyled of the sharpenesse of reason, which we accompt a most precious gift. But to the holy Ghost it semeth most full of equitie, which knoweth that all the thoughtes of wisemen are vaine: and which pronounceth plainly, that all the inuention of mans heart is onely euill. If all that our witte conceiued, deuiseth vpon, purposeth and goeth about, is alway euill, how can it come in our minde to purpose that which pleaseth God, to whom onely holynesse and righteousnesse is acceptable? So is it to be seen, that the reason of our minde, which way so euer it turne it selfe, is miserably subiect to vanitie. Dauid knew this weakenesse in him selfe, when he prayed to haue vnderstanding geuen him, to learne the Lordes commaundementes aright. For he secretly sayeth therein, that his owne wit sufficeth him not, which desireth to haue a new geuen him. And that he doth not onely once, but almost ten times, in one Psalme, he repeteth the same prayer. By which repeting he priuely declareth, with how great neede he is driuen to pray it. And that which he prayeth for himselfe alone, Paule commonly vseth to pray for the Churches. We cease not (sayeth he) to pray for you, and to desire that ye may be filled with the knowledge of God in all wisdom and spirituall vnderstanding, that ye may walke worthily of God. &c. But so oft as he maketh that thing the good gift of God, let vs remember that he doth withall testifie, that it lieth not in mans power. And Augustine so farre acknowledged this defaulte of reason to vnderstand those things that are of God, that he thinketh the grace of illumination to be no lesse necessarie for our mindes, than the light of the sunne is for our eyes. And not content with that, he addeth a correctiō of that, saying, that we lift vp our eyes to see the light: but the eyes of our minde lie shut, vnlesse the Lorde open them. And the Scripture teacheth that our mindes are not enlightned one day alone, that they may afterward see by themselues: for that which I euen now alleged out of Paule, belongeth to continuall proceedinges and encreasinges. And this doth Dauid expressely set out in these wordes: With my whole harte I haue sought thee, make me not to stray from thy commaundementes. For when he had bene regenerated, and had not slenderly profited in true Godlinesse, yet he confesseth, that for euery moment he needeth continuall direction, least he shoulde swarue from the knowledge wherewith he is endued. Therefore, in an other place he prayeth to haue the right spirite renewed, which he had lost by his owne faulte, because it belongeth to the same God to restore vnto vs the same thing being lost for a time, which himselfe gaue at the beginning.

26 Now is will to be examined, wherin standeth the cheefe libertie of free choise, for it hath bene already sene, that choise doth rather belong to will, than to vnderstanding. First, that this thing which the Philosophers haue taught, and is receiued with common cōsent, that is, that all thinges by naturall instinctiō desire that which is good, may not seeme to belong to the vprightnesse of mans will: Let vs marke that the force of free will, is not to be considered in such appetite, as rather procedeth of the inclination of the essence, than of the aduisement of the vnderstanding minde. For euen the scholemen do confess, that free will hath no action, but when reason turneth it selfe to obiectes, wherby they mean that the obiect of appetite must be such, as may be subiect to choise, and go before deliberation, which prepareth the way for choise. And truely, if a man cōsider what is the naturall desire of good in man, he shall finde that it is common to him with beastes. For they also desire to be well, and when any shew of good appeareth that moueth their sense, they follow it. But man doth neither chose by reason, that he may follow with diligence that thing which is in deede good for him, according to the excellence of his immortall nature, nor taketh reason to counsell, nor bendeth his minde, but without reason, without counsell, like a beast, followeth the inclination of nature. This therefore maketh nothing for the freedome of will, if a mā by sense of nature be caryed to desire that which is good: but this is requisite, that he discernē good by right reason, and when he hath knowene it, that he chose it, and whē he hath chosen it, that he follow it. But least any man shoulde doubt, there is to be noted a double sophisticall argumēt. For appetite is not here called the proper maner of will, but a naturall inclination: and good is called not as of vertue or iustice, but of estate, as we say. This man is well, or in good case: Finally, although a man do neuer so much desire to attaine that is good, yet he followeth it not. As there is no man to whom eternall blessednesse is not pleasant, yet is there none that aspieth vnto it, but by the mouing of the holy Ghost. Wherefore, sith the naturall desire in men to be well, maketh nothing to proue the fredome of will, no more than in metals and stones, doth the affection inclining to the perfection of their substance: let vs consider in other thinges, whether Will be so infected and corrupted in all partes, that it engendreth nothing but euill: or whether it kepeth still any parcell vnhurte, from whence do grow good desires.

27 They that do attribute to the first grace of God, that we will effectually, seme on the other side to say secretely, that there is in the soule a power of it selfe to aspire to good, but it is so weake, that it cannot growe to a perfecte affection, or raise vp any endeouour. And there is no doute that the scholemen haue commonly embraced this opinion, or which was borrowed by Origen and certaine of the olde writers: forsomuch as they are wonte to consider man in pure naturall thinges, (as they terme it) such a one as the Apostle describeth him in these wordes. I do not the good that I would, but the euill that I woulde not, that I do. To will is present vnto me, but to performe it, I finde not. But after this maner is the discours that Paule there followeth, altogether wrongfully peruerted. For he entreateth of the Christian wraffling (which he shortly toucheth to the Galathians) which the faithfull continually fele within themselues, in the battel of the flesh and the spirite. But the spirite is not of nature, but of regeneration. And that the Apostle doth there speake of the regenerate, appeareth by this, that whē he had said, that there dwelleth no goodnesse in him, he addeth an exposition, that he meaneth it of his flesh. And therefore he saith, that it is not he that doth the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in him. What meaneth this correction in me, that is, in my flesh? Euen as much as if he had said thus: God dwelleth not in me of my selfe, for there is no good to be founde in my flesh. Herevpon followeth that manner of excuse: I my selfe do not the euill, but sinne that dwelleth in me. Which excuse belongeth onely to the regenerate, which do with the cheefe parte of their soule tende vnto good. Nowe, the conclusion that is adioyned after, declareth all this matter evidently. I am delited (saith he) with the lawe, according to the inward man. But I see an other lawe in my members, fighting against the law of my mind. Who hath such a striving in himselfe, but he that being regenerate by the spirite of God, carieth the leauinges of his fleshe about with him? Therefore Augustine, whereas once he had thought, that that had bene spoken of the nature of man, reuoked his exposition as false, and ill agreing together. And truly, if we allowe this, that men without grace haue some motions to good, though they be but small, what shall we aunswere to the Apostle which saith, that we are not sufficient so much as to thinke any good? What shall we aunswere to the Lorde that pronounceth by Moses, that euery inuention of mans hearte is onely euill. Wherefore, sith they haue stumbled by false taking of one place, there is no cause why we shoulde staye vpon their iudgement. Let rather this saying of Christ preuaile. He that doth sinne, is the seruant of sinne. We are all sinners by nature, therefore we be all holden vnder the yoke of sinne. Nowe if whole manne be subiect to the dominion of sinne, then must it needes be, that the will it selfe which is the chiefe seate thereof, be bounde faste with most streight bondes. For otherwise the saying of Paule woulde not stande together, that it is God which worketh will in vs, if any will did go before the grace of the holy Ghost. Away therefore with all that many haue triflingly spoken concerning preparation. For although sometime the faithfull do praye to haue their hearte formed to the obedience of the lawe, as Dauid doth in many places: yet it is to be noted, that euen that desire of praying is from God. Which we may gather of his wordes, for whē he wisheth to haue a cleane hearte created within him, surely he taketh not on him selfe the beginning of creation. Therefore let rather this saying of Augustine haue place with vs: God will preuent thee in all thinges: And sometime preuent thou his wrath. Howe? Confesse that thou hast all these thinges of God that what so euer good thou haste, is of him: what soeuer euill, it is of thy selfe. And a little after. Nothing is ours but sinne.

That out of the corrupt nature of man procedeth nothing but damnable.

BVt man can not be any way better knowene in either part of his soule, than if he come forth with his titles wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. If he be painted whole in these wordes of Christ, That which is borne of flesh, is flesh: as it is easy to proue, then is he proued to be a very miserable creature. For the affection of the flesh, as the Apostle witnesseth, is death, for asmuch as it is enimitie against God, and so is not subiect, nor can be subiect to the lawe of God. Is flesh so peruerse, that with all her affection she continually vseth enimitie against God? that she can not agree with the righteousnesse of the lawe of God? Finally, that she can bring forth nothing but matter of death? Nowe, graunt that in the nature of man is nothing but flesh, and gather any good out of it if thou canst. But (they say) the name of flesh belongeth onely to the sensuall, and not the hier parte of the soule. But that is sufficiently confuted by the wordes of Christ, and of the Apostle. It is the Lordes argument, that man must be borne againe, bycause he is flesh. He commaundeth not to be borne againe according to the body. But in minde he is not borne againe; if a parte of it be amended, but when it is all renewed. And that doth the comparison, set in both places, confirme. For the spirite is so compared against the flesh, that there is left no meane thing betwene them. Therefore whatsoever is not spirituall in man, is after the same reason called fleshly. But we haue nothing of the Spirite but by regeneration. It is therefore flesh whatsoever we haue of nature. But of that matter, if otherwise we coulde haue any doubt, that is taken away from vs by Paule, where after he had described the olde man, whome he had saide to be corrupt with concupiscences of error, he biddeth vs to be renewed in the spirite of our minde: you see he doth not place vnlawfull and euill lustes onely in the sensitiue part, but also in the very minde, and therefore requireth a renuing of it. And truely a little before he had painted out such an image of mans nature, as did shewe that there was no parte wherein we were not corrupted and peruered: for whereas he writeth that all nations do walke in the vanitie of their minde, are darkened in vnderstanding, estranged from the life of God, by reason of the ignoraunce that is in them, and the blindenesse of their hearte: it is no doubt that this is spoken of all them whome the Lorde hath not reformed to the vprightnesse both of his wisdome and iustice: which which is also made more plaine by the comparison by and by adioyned, where he putteth the faithfull in minde, that they haue not so learned Christ. For of these wordes we gather, that the grace of Christ is the onely remedie whereby we be deliuered from that blindenesse, and the euils that ensue thereof. For so had Esaie also prophesied of the kingdome of Christ, when he promised, that the Lorde should be an euerlasting light to his Church, when yet darkenesse couered the earth, and a mist the peoples. Whereas he testifieth, that the light of God shall arise onely in the Church, truely without the Church he leaueth nothing but darkenesse and blindenesse. I will not reherse particularly such thinges as are written euery where, specially in the Psalmes and in the Prophetes against the vanity of man. It is a great thing that Dauid writeth, if he be weyed with vanitie, that he shall be vainer than vanitie it selfe. His wit is wounded with a greuous weapon, when all the thoughtes that come out of it, are scorned as foolish, trifeling, madde and peruerse.

No easier is the condemnation of the hearte, when it is called guilefull and peruerse about all thing: but by cause I studie to be short, I will be contente with one place alone, but such a one as shall be like a most bright loking glasse, wherein we may beholde the whole image of our nature. For the Apostle, when he goeth about to throwe downe the arrogance of mankinde, doth it by these testimonies, That there is not one righteous manne, There is not one manne that vnderstandeth or that seeketh God, All are gone out of the way, they are made vnprofitable together, there is none that doth good, no not one: their throte is an open sepulcher, with their tongues they worke deceitfully, the poison of Serpentes is vnder their lippes, whose mouth is full of cursing and bitternesse: whose feete are swifte to shedde bloude, in whose wayes is sorrowe and unhappinesse, which haue not the feare of God before their eyes: With these thunderboltes he inueyeth, not against certaine menne, but against the whole nation of the sonnes of Adam. Neither declineth he against the corrupt manners of one or two ages, but accuseth the continuall corruption of nature. For his purpose is in that place, not simply to chide men, to make them amende, but to teach rather that all menne are oppressed with calamitie, impossible to be ouercome, from which they can not get vp againe, vnlesse they be plucked out by the mercie of God. And by cause, that coulde not be proued vnlesse it had bin by the ouerthrowe and destruction of nature, he brought forth these testimonies whereby is proued that our nature is more than destroyed. Let this therefore remaine agreed, that menne are such as they be here described, not onely by faulte of euill custome, but also by corruptnesse of nature. For otherwise the Apostles argument can not stande, that there is no saluation for manne but by the mercie of God, bycause he is in him selfe vtterly losse and past hope. I will not here busie my selfe in prouing the applying of these testimonies that no man shoulde thinke them vnfitly vsed. I will so take them as if they had bin first spoken by Paule, and not taken out of the Prophetes. First he taketh awaie from manne righteousnesse, that is integritie and purenesse, and then vnderstanding. The wante of vnderstanding, he proueth by Apostasie or departing from God, whome to seeke is the first degree of wisdom. But that wante must nedes happen to them that are fallen awaie from God. He sayeth further, that all are gone out of the waie and become as it were rotten, that there is none that doeth good, and then he adioyneth the haynous faultes, wherewith they defile their members that are ones let lose into wickednesse. Last of all he testifieth that they are voide of the feare of God, after whose rule our steppes shoulde haue bin directed. If these be the inheritable gistes of mankind, it is in vaine to seke for any good thing in our nature. In deede I graunt that not all these faultes do appeare in euery manne: yet can not be denied that this Hydra lurketh in the heartes of all menne. For as the bodie while it already fostreth enclosed within it, the cause and matter of disease, although the paine be not yet vehement, can not be called healthy: no more can the soule be reckened sounde, while it swarmeth full of such diseases of vices, albeit the similitude doth not agree in all pointes. For in the body be it neuer so muche diseased, there remayneth a quicknesse of life: but the soule beyng drowned in this gulfe of destruction, is not onely troubled with vices, but also altogether voide of all goodnesse.

3 The same question in a manner which hath bin before assoyled, now riseth vp againe of newe. For in all ages there haue bin some, which by guiding of nature haue bin bente to vertue in all their life. And I regarde it not, though many slippinges may be noted in their manners: yet by the very studie of honestie they haue shewed a profe, that there was some purenesse in their nature. What rewarde such vertues haue before God, although we will more fully declare when we shall speake of the merites of workes, yet we must somewhat speake in this place: so farre as is necessaric for making plaine of this present argument. These examples therefore seeme to put vs in minde, that we shoulde not thinke mans nature all together corrupt, for that by her instruction some men haue not onely excelled in some noble noble actes, but also in the whole course of their life haue behaued themselues most honestly. But here we must thinke, how in this corruption of nature there is some place for the grace of God, not to cleanse it, but inwardely to restraine it. For if the Lord woulde suffer the mindes of all men as it were with lose reines to runne wildly into all sortes of lustes, without doubtte there woulde be no man, but he would in plaine experience make vs beleue, that all those euils wherewith Paule condemneth all nature, are most truely saide of him. For what? Canst thou exempt thy selfe out of the number of them, whose feete are swift to shed bloude, their handes defiled with robberies and manslaughters, their throtes like vnto open Sepulchres, their tongues deceitfull, their lippes venymous, their workes vnprofitable, wicked, rotten, deadly, whose minde is without God, whose inwardes are peruersenesse, whose eyes are bent to entrappingses, their heartes lift vp dispiteously to triumph ouer other, and all the partes of them applied to infinite mischeues. If euery soule be subiect to all such monsters, as the Apostle boldly pronounceth, truely we see what woulde come to passe, if the Lorde woulde suffer the lust of manne to wander after his owne inclination. There is no madde beast that is so hedlong caried away, there is no streame be it neuer so swifte and strong, whereof the ouerflowing is so violent. The Lorde healeth these diseases in his electe by this meane that we will by and by sette forth. In some he only restraineth them with putting a bridle in their mouth, onely that they breake not out, so farre as he foreseeth to be expedient for preseruing of the vniuersitie of thinges. Hereby some are holden in by shame, some by feare of lawes, that they burst not forth into many sortes of filthinesse, howbeit they do for a great part not hide their vncleannesse. Some bycause they thinke that an honest trade of life is good, do after a certaine sorte aspire towarde it. Some rise vp aboute the common sorte, that by their maiestie they may kepe other in their duetic. So God by his prouidence bridleth the peruersenesse of nature, that it breake not forth into doying: but he cleanseth it not within.

4 But yet the doubtte is not dissolued. For either we must make Camillus like vnto Catiline, or els in Camillus we shall haue an example that nature, if it be framed by diligence, is not altogether without goodnesse. I graunte in deede that those goodly giftes whiche were in Camillus bothe were the giftes of God and seeme worthy to be commended, if they be weyed by themselues, but how shall they be proues of naturall goodnesse in him? muste we not returne to the minde, and frame our argumente in this sorte? If a

Aug. li. 4. cōtra Iulia- num. naturall manne excelled in such vprightnesse of manners, then nature is vndoubtedly not without power towards the studie of vertue. But what if the minde were peruerse and crooked, and folowing any thing rather than vpright straightnesse? And that it was such, there is no doubt, if you graunt that he was a naturall manne. Nowe what power of mans nature to goodnesse will you reherse vnto me in this behalfe, if in the greatest shewe of purenesse it be founde that he is alway carried to corruption: Therefore, least ye commende a man for vertue, whose vices deceyue you vnder vertues Image, do not so geue vnto the will of manne power to desire goodnesse, so long as it remayneth fast in her owne peruersenesse. Albeit this is a most sure and easy solution of this question, that these are not common giftes of nature, but speciall graces of God, which he diuersely and to a certaine measure dealeth among men that are otherwise vngodly. For which reason we feare not in common speache to call one man well natured, and an other of euill nature, and yet we cease not to include them bothe vnder the vniuersall state of mans corruption, but we shewe what speciall grace God hath bestowed vpon the one, which he hath not vouchsafed to geue to the other, when his pleasure was to make Saule king, he formed him as a new man: and that is the reason why Plato alluding to the fable of Homere, sayeth that Kinges sonnes are created notable by some singular marke, bycause God providing for mankind, furnisheth these with a princely nature whome he appointeth to beare gouernemēt: and out of this store house came all the great Capitaines that are renomed in histories. The same is also to be thought of priuate men. But bycause as euery man hath most excelled, so his ambition hath most moued him forward (with which spotte all vertues are defiled, so that they lose all fauour before God,) it is to be accompted nothingworth, what soeuer semeth praiseworthy in vngodly men, beside that the chiefe parte of vprightnesse faileth, where there is no study to aduaunce the glory of God, which all they wante whome he hath not regenerate with his spirite. Neither is it vainely spoken in Esaie, that vpon Christ resteth the spirite of the feare of God, wherby we are taught, that so many as are strange from Christ, are without the feare of God, which is the beginning of wisdom. As for the vertues that deceiue vs with vaine shewe, I graunt they shall haue praise in the court of policie, and in the commō fame of men, but before the heauenly iudgement seate, they shall be of no valewe to deserue righteousnesse.

5 With such bondage of sinne therefore as Will is deteyned, it can not ones moue it selfe to goodnesse, much lesse apply it selfe. For such mouing mouinge is the beginnige of turning to God, which in Scriptures is wholly imputed to the grace of God. As Jeremy praieth to the Lord Ier. 31. to turne him, if he will haue him turned. Whereupon the Prophet 18. in the same chapter, describing the spiritual redemption of the faithful people, sayth that they were redeemed out of the hand of a stöger, meaning with how straight fetters a sinner is bound so long as being forsaken of the Lord, he liueth vnder the yoke of the Deuill. Yet Will stil remayneth, which with most bent affection is both enclined & hasteth to sinne. For man was not deprived of Will when he did cast himselfe into this necessity, but of the soundenesse of Will. And Bernarde sayth not vnaptly, which teacheth that to Will is in vs all: but to Will good is a profiting, to will ill is a default: and therefore simply to will, is the worke of man: to will euill, of corrupte nature: to wil wel, of grace. Now whereas I say, that will put from liberty is by necessity drawē or led into euill, it is maruell if that should seeme a hard speach vnto any man, which neither hath any absurdity in it, nor varieth frō the vse of holy men: But it offendeth them that can make no difference betwene necessity and compulsion. But if a man aske them, is not God of necessity good? is not the deuill of necessity euill? what can they aunswere? For so is goodnesse knit with Gods diuinity, that it is no more necessary that he be God then that he be good. And the deuill is by his fall so estranged from partaking of goodnesse, that he can do nothing but euill. But now if any robber of God do barke against this and say, that God deserueth smale praise for his goodnes, which he is compelled to keepe: shall not this be a ready aunswere to him, that it commeth to passe by his infinite goodnesse and not by violent impulsion, that he can not do euell. Therefore if this, that it is of necessitie that God doe well, do not hinder the free will of God in doing wel, if the deuill which can not do but euill yet willingly sinneth who shall then say that a man doothe therefore lesse willingly sinne for this that he is subiect to necessity of sinning. This necessity, whereas Augustine ech where speaketh of it, euen then also when he was enuiously pressed with the cauillation of Celestius, he sticket not to affirme in these wordes, by liberty it came to passe that man was with sinne, but now the corruption which flowed for punishment, hath of liberty made necessity. And so oft as he falleth into mention thereof, he douteth not to speake in this manner of the necessary bondage of sinne. Therefore let this summe of that distinction be kept, that man sins he is corrupted, sinneth in deede willingly and not against his will nor compelled, by a most bent affection of minde, and not by violent compulsion, by motion of his owne lust, and not by fur-ren constraynt: but yet of such peruersenesse of nature as he is, he can not but be moued and driuen to euil. If this be true, then surely it is playnely expressed that he is subiect to necessity of sinning. Bernard agreeing to Augustine wryteth thus, only man among all liuing creatures is free: and yet by meane of sinne, he also suffereth a certayne violence, but of wil and not of nature, that euen therby also he should not be depriued of freedome, for that which is willing is free. And a litle after, wil being chaunged in it selfe into worse, by I wot not what corrupt and maruelous manner, so maketh necessity, that very necessity for as much as it is willing, can not excuse will, and will forasmuch as it is drawn by allurement, can not exclude necessity, for this necessity is after a certayne manner willing. Afterward he sayth, y^e we are pressed downe with a yoke, but yet none other but of a certayne willing bondage, therefore by reason of our bondage we are miserable, by reason of our will we are inexcusable, because will when it was free, made it selfe the bondseruaunt of sinne. At length he concludeth, that the soule is so after a certayne maruelous and euill manner holden both a bonde seruaunt and free, vnder this certayne willinge and ill free necessity: a bondseruaunt by reason of necessity, free by reason of wil, and that which is more maruelous and more miserable, therein guilty wherein it is free, therein bond wherein it is guilty, and so therein bond wherein it is free. Hereby truely the readers do perceiue that I bringe no newe thinge, which longe ago Augustine brought forth out of the consent of all godly men, and almost a thousand yeares after was kept still in monkes Cloysters. But Lombarde when he could not distinguish necessity frō compulsion, gaue matter to a pernicious error.

6 On the other side it is good to consider what manner remedy is that of the grace of God, whereby the corruption of nature is amended and healed. For whereas the Lord in helping vs, giueth vs that which we want, when we shall knowe what his worke is in vs, it will streightway appeare on the other side what is our needinesse. When Phi. 1.6 the Apostle sayeth to the Philippians, that he trusteth that he which beganne a good worke in them, will performe it vnto the day of Iesus Christ: it is no dout, that by the beginninge of a good worke, he meaneth the very beginninge of conuersion, which is in will. Therefore God beginneth a good worke in vs by stirring vp in our heartes the loue, desire and endeouour of righteousnesse, or (to speake more properly) in bowing, framing and directing our heartes to righteousnesse: he endeth it in confirminge vs to perseuerance. And that no man should cauill that good is begonne by the Lord, when will being

being of it selfe weake is holpen : the holy Ghost in an other place declareth what will is able to do beinge lett vnto it selfe . I will giue you (sayth he) a newe heart . I will put a newe spirite in the middes of you . And I will take away the stony heart from your flesh , and I will giue you a heart of flesh . And I will put my spirite in the middes of you , and I will make you to walke in my commaundementes . Who shall say that the weakenesse of mans will is strengthened with helpe , whereby it may effectually aspire to the choise of that that is good , when it must be whole transformed and renewed ? If there be any softenesse in a stone , which by some helpe being made tenderer will abide to be bowed euery way , then will I graunt that the heart of man is pliable to obey that which is right , so that that which in it is perfect , be supplied by the grace of God . But if he meant to shewe by this similitude , that no goodnesse could euer be wrong out of our heart vnlesse it be made throughly newe : lette vs not parte betwene him and vs , that which he chalengerh to himselfe alone . If therefore a stone be transformed into fleshe , when God turneth vs to the desire of that which is right : then is all that which was of our owne will taken away , and that which commeth in place thereof is all of God . I say that will is taken away , not in that it is will , because in the conuersion of man , that which was of the first nature abideth whole : also I say that it is created newe , not that will then beginneth to be , but that it be turned from an euill will into a good . And this I affirme to be wholly done by God , because we are not able so much as to thinke , as the same Apostle witnesseth : therefore in an other place he sayth , that God doth not onely helpe our weake will , or amende our peruerse will , but that he worketh in vs to will . Whereupon is easily gathered , that which I sayd before , that whatsoeuer good is in will , it is the worke of onely grace . In which sense in an other place he sayeth , that it is God that worketh all in all . Neither doth he there intreate of the vniuersall gouernement , but giueth vnto God alone the praise of all good things that the faithfull haue . And in saying , all , truely he maketh God the author of spirituall life , euen from the beginning to the ende . Which selfe same thing he had taught before in other wordes , sayinge that the faythfull are of God in Christ . where he plainly maketh mention of the new creation , wherein that which was of common nature before , is destroyed . For there is to be vnderstanded a comparison betwene Adam and Christ , which in an other place he more playnly expresseth , where he teacheth that we are the worke of God created in Christ to good workes , which he hath prepared that we shoulde walke in them . For he goeth about by this reason to proue, that our saluation is of free gift, because the beginning of all goodnesse, is at the seconde creation, which we obtayne in Christ. But if there were any power of our selues, were it neuer so smale, we should haue also some portion of merite. But he to proue vs altogether nothing worth, reasoneth that we haue deserued nothing, because we are create in Christ to good workes, which God hath prepared. In which wordes he signifieth againe, that all partes of good workes, euen from the first motiō, are propre to God onely. For this reason, the Prophete after he had sayd in the Psalme that we are the workemanship of God, that there should be no partition, addeth byandby, We made not our selues. That he speaketh there of regeneration, which is the beginning of spirituall life, appeareth by the tenor of the text, where it byandby after followeth, that we are his people & the flocke of his pastures. We see now, how he not contented simply to haue giuen to God the praise of our saluation, doth expresly exclude vs from all fellowship with him, as if he would say, that there resteth no peece, be it neuer so litle, for man to glory in, because it is all of God.

7 But there will be some peradventure that will graunt, that Will being of her owne nature, turned away from good, is conuerted by the only power of the Lord: but so that being prepared before, it hath also her owne parte in doing, as Augustine teacheth, that grace goeth before euery good worke, but so, that will doth accompany it and not leade it, as a wayting maide after it, and not a foregoer. Which thing being not euill spoken by the holy man, Peter Lombarde doth disorderly wryth to this purpose. But I affirme, that as well in the wordes of the Prophet which I haue alleaged, as in the other places, these two thinges be playnely signified, that the Lord doth both correct our corrupted will or rather destroy it, & also of himselfe putteth in place therof a good will. In as much as it is preuented by grace, in that respect I giue you leaue to call it a wayting maide: but for that beinge reformed, it is the worke of the Lord, this is wrongfully giuen to man that he doth with will cōming after, obey grace going before. Therefore it is not wel wrytten of Chrysofostome, that neither grace without will, nor will without grace can worke any thing: as if grace did not worke very well it selfe, as euen now we haue seene by Paule. Neither was it Augustines purpose, when he called mannes will the wayting maide of grace, to assigne vnto her a certaine second office in doing a good worke, but because this only was his intent, to confute the wicked doctrine of Pelagius, which did set the principall cause of saluation in mans deseruing: therefore he stode only vpon this point, that grace was before all deseruing: which was sufficiēt for the matter that he then had in hande, not medling in the meane time with the other question, concerning the perpetuall effect of grace, which yet in an other place he excellently well handleth. For sometimes when he saith, y^e the lord doth preuent the vnwilling that he may wil, & followeth the willing that he wil not in vayne, he maketh him altogether the whole author of the good worke. Albeit his sentences touching this matter, are to plaine to neede any long arguing vpon them. Men (sayth he) do labour to finde in our will something that is our owne and not of God, but how it may be found I know not. And in his first booke against Pelagius and Celestius, where he doth expounde that saying of Christ, Euery one that hath heard of my father cometh to me, he sayth: Freewill is so holpen not only that it may know what is to be done, but also may do it when it hath knowen it. And so when God teacheth, not by the letter of the law, but by the grace of the spirite, he so teacheth, that he that hath learned, doth not only see it in knowing, but also desire it in willing, and performe it in doing.

8 And because we are now in hand with the chiefe point wherupō the matter hangeth, let vs go forward and proue the summe thereof to the readers, onely with a fewe & y^e most plaine testimonies of the Scripture. And then, least any man should accuse vs of wrongful wresting the Scripture, let vs shew that the trueth which we affirme being taken out of the Scripture, wanteth not the testimony of this holy man, I meane Augustine. For I thinke it not expedient, that all the thinges be rehearsed that may be brought out of the Scriptures, for confirmation of our meaning, so that by the most chosen that shalbe brought forth, y^e way may be prepared to vnderstand all the rest that are here and there commonly red. And againe, I thinke it shall not be vnfitly done, if I openly shew that I agree well with that man whom worthily the consent of godly men doth much esteeme. Surely it is euident by plaine and certaine proufe, that the beginning of goodnesse is from no where else but only from God, for there can not be found a will bent to good, but in the elect. But the cause of election is to be sought out of man. Whereupon followeth, that man hath not right Wil of himselfe, but it proceedeth frō the same good pleasure, wherby we are elect before the creatiō of the world. There is also an other reason not vnlike vnto that. For whereas the beginning of willing and doing well is of faith, it is to be seene whense faith it selfe cometh. For asmuch as the whole Scripture crieth out that it is a free gift of God, it followeth, y^e it is of the mere grace of God, whē we, which are with all our minde naturally bent to euill, begin to will that which is good.

Therefore the lord, whē he nameth these two things in the conuerſiō of his people, to take away from them a ſtony heart, and to giue them a heart of fleſh, plainly teſtifieth that that which is of our ſelues muſt be done away, that we may be conuerted to righteousneſſe: and that whatſoever commeth in place therof, is from himſelfe. And he vttereth not this in one place only. For he ſayth in Ieremy: I wil giue them one heart and one way, that they may feare me all their dayes. And a litle after. I will giue the feare of my name into their heart, that they departe not from me. Againe in Ezechiel: I will giue them one heart, and I will giue a new ſpirite in their bowels. I will take away the ſtony heart out of their fleſh, and I will giue them a heart of fleſh. He could not more evidently claime to himſelfe, & take from vs whatſoever is good and right in our will, than when he declareth that our conuerſion is a creation of a new ſpirite, and of a new heart. For it followeth alway, that both out of our will proceedeth no goodneſſe till it be reformed: and that after reformation, ſo much as it is good, is of God and not of vs.

9 And ſo reade we the prayers of holy men made to that effect, as, The Lord encline our heart to him (ſayth Salomon) that we may kepe his commaundementes. He ſheweth the frowardneſſe of our heart which naturally reioyſeth to rebell agaynſt the lawe of God if it be not bowed. And the ſame thinge is in the Pſalme: Lord incline my heart to thy teſtimonies. For the compariſon of contrariety is alway to be noted, which is betwene the peruerſe motion of the heart whereby it is caried to obſtinacy, and this correction whereby it is led to obedience. When Dauid feeling himſelfe for a time without the directing grace, prayeth God to create a new heart within him, to renew a right ſpirite within his bowelles: doth he not acknowledge that all the partes of his heart are full of vncleaneſſe, and his ſpirite wrythen with crooked peruerſeneſſe? and in calling the cleanneſſe which he prayeth for, the creature of God, doth he not attribute it wholly to God? But if any manne take exception and ſay, that the very prayer is a token of a godly and holy affection: our aunſwere is ready, that though Dauid were by that time ſomewhat come to amende-ment, yet doth he ſtill compare his firſt ſtate with that ſorrowfull fall that he had felt. Therefore taking vpon him the perſon of a man eſtraunged from God, he for good cauſe prayeth to haue giuen him all theſe thinges that God giueth to his elect in regeneration. And ſo beinge like a deade man, he wiſheth himſelfe to be created of new, that of the bondſlaue of Satan, he may be made the inſtrument of the holy Ghoſt. Maruelous & monſtrous ſurely is the luſt of our pride.

God requireth nothing more earnestly, than y^e we should most religiously keepe his Sabbath, that is in resting from our owne workes, but of vs nothing is more hardly obtained, than bidding our owne workes farewell, to giue due place to the workes of God. If sluggishnesse hindered not, Christ hath giuen testimony euident enough of his graces to make them not to be enuiouly suppressed. I am (sayth he) the Vine, you be the branches: My Father is a husbandman. As the branche can not beare fruite of it selfe, vnlesse it abide in the Vine, no more can you, vnlesse you abide in me. For without me you can do nothing. If we beare fruite none otherwise than a braunche buddeth being plucked out of the ground and without moysture: we neede no more to seeke what is the aptnesse of our nature to goodnesse. And this is a playne conclusion: Without me ye can do nothing. He doth not say that we are to weake to be sufficient for our selues: but in bringing vs to nothing, he excludeth all opinion of power be it neuer so little. If we being grafted in Christ, beare fruite like a Vine, which taketh her efficacy of liuelinesse both from the moisture of the earth, and from the deaw of heauen, and from the cherishing of the sunne: I see nothinge remayne for vs in doinge a good worke, if we keepe whole for God that which is his. That fonde futtle deuise is alleaged in vaine, that there is a iuyce already enclosed within the branch, and a certayne power to bringe foorth fruite, and that therefore it taketh not all from the earth or from the first roote, because it bringeth somewhat of her owne. For Christ doth meane nothinge else, but that we are a drie stick and nothing worth, when we be seuered from him, because by our selues beinge separate, we haue no power to do well: as also in an other place he sayth. Every tree that my father hath not planted, shall be rooted vp. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth all the whole vnto him in the place already alleaged. It is God (saith he) that worketh in vs both to will and to performe. The first parte of a good worke is will: the second is a strong endeuour in doing it: y^e author of both is God. Therefore we steale it from God, if we take to our selues any thing, either in will or in effectuall working. If it were sayd that God doth helpe our weake will, then somewhat were left for vs. But when it is sayd that he maketh will, now all the good that is in it, is set out of vs. And because the good will is yet still oppressed with weight of our flesh y^e it cā not rise vp. He said further, that to ouercom the hardnesse of that battell, there is ministred vnto vs stedfastnesse of endeuour, euen to the effect. For otherwise it could not stand together which he teacheth in an other place, that it is God alone that bringeth to effect all thinges in all, wherein we haue before taught eth, that euen they that are well minded, are subiect to so many with-drawings of minde, that they easily vanish or fal away if they be not established to constancy. For which reason in an other place, after he had prayed to haue his steppes directed to kepe the word of God he requireth also to haue strength giuen him to fight, Lette not any ini-

 19. 100. the Lord both beginne and ende good worke in vs: that it may all be 33. his worke, that will conceiue a loue of that which is right, that it is enclined to the desire thereof, that it is stirred vp and moued to en-deuour of following it. And then that our choise, desire, and endeuour faint not, but do procede euen to the effect: last of all, that man goeth forward constantly in them, and continueth to the end.

10 And he moueth the will, not in such sorte as hath in many ages bin taught and beleued: that it is afterward in our choise, either to obey or withstand the motiō, but with mightily strengthening it. Therfore that must be reiected which Chrysostome so oft repeteth: whom he draweth, he draweth being willing. Whereby he secretly teacheth that God doth onely reach out his hand, to see if we will be holpen by his aide. We graunt that such was the state of man while he yet stode, that he might bow to either parte. But sith he hath taught by his example how miserable is freewill, vnlesse God both will and can in vs: what shall become of vs, if he giue vs his grace according to that smale proportion? But rather we do obscure and extenuate it with our vnthankfullnes. For the Apostle doth not teach, that the grace of a good wil is offered vs if we do accept it, but that he wil performe it in vs: which is nothing else, but that the Lord by his spirite doth direct, bowe and gouerne our heart, and reigneth in it as in his owne possession. Neither doth he promise by Ezechiel, that he will giue to the elect a new spirite onely for this ende, that they may be able to walke in his commaundementes, but to make them walke in deede.
 Neither can Christs saying, (euery one that hath heard of my Father commeth to me) be otherwile taken, than to teach that the grace of God is effectuell of it selfe: as Augustine also affirmeth. Which grace, God vouchesaueth not to giue to all men generally without regarde, as that saying (as I thinke) of Occam, is commonly spoken among the people, that it denieth nothing to him that doth what lieth in him.
 Men are in deede to be taught that Gods goodnesse is layd open for all

all men, without exception that seeke for it. But forasmuch as they onely beginne to seeke for it, whom the heauenly grace hath breathed vpon, not so much as this litle peece ought to be plucked away from his praise. Truly this is the prerogatiue of the elect, that being regenerate by the spirite of God, they are moued and gouerned by his guiding. Therefore Augustine doth worthily as well mocke them, that claime any parte of willing them to themselves, as he doth reprehend other which thinke that, that is generally giuen to all men, which is the speciall testimony of free election. Nature, (sayth he) but not grace, is common to all men. Calling it a bricke suttelty of witte like glasse, that glistereth with mere vanity, where it is generally extended to all which God giueth onely to whom it pleaseth him. And in an other place. How camest thou? by beleuing. Feare thou, least while thou takest vpon thee that thou hast founde the iust way, thou perish out of the iust way. I came (sayest thou) by Free will, I came by mine owne will, why swellest thou? wilt thou heare that this also is giuen thee? Heare euen him that calleth: No man commeth to me vnlesse my Father draw him. And it is without controuersie gathered out of Iohns wordes, that the heartes of the godly are so effectually gouerned by Gods working, that they follow with an vnchangeable affection. He that is begotten of God (sayth he) can not sinne, because the seede of God abideth in him. For we see that the meane motion which the Sophisters imagine, which we at our liberty may either obey or refuse, is openly excluded, where an effectuall constancy to continue is affirmed:

11 Of continuance there shoulde no more dout haue bin made, but that it should haue bin taken for the free gift of God vnlesse the most wicked errour had growen in force, that it is distributed according to the desert of men, as euery man hath shewed himselfe not vnthankfull to the first grace. But forasmuch as this errour hath growen vpon that point, that they thought it to be in our hand to refuse or receiue the grace of God offered, that opinion being driuen away, this other doth also fall of it selfe. Albeit herein they erre two manner of wayes. For beside this that they teach that our thankfulness toward the first grace and our lawfull vse thereof, are rewarded with the later giftes: they adde also, that nowe grace alone doth not worke in vs, but that it is onely a worker together with vs. Of the first this we ought to beleue, that the Lord while he dayly enricheth and heapeth his seruantes with newe giftes of his grace, because he liketh and fauoureth the worke which he hath begonne in them, findeth in them somewhat whereupon to bestowe greater graces. And hereto serue those sayinges : To him that hath,shalbe giuen. Againe:

 Mat. 25 Oh, good seruaunt, because thou hast bin faithfull in few thinges, I 21. will set thee ouer many. But here two things are to be taken heede of, Luc. 19. that neither the lawefull vse of the first grace be sayd to be rewarded 17. with the later graces, nor it be so compted a rewarding, that it cesse to be reckened the free grace of God. I graunt therefore, that this blessing of God is to be looked for of the faithfull, that howe much the better they haue vsed the first graces, they shalbe encreased with so much the greater. But I say, that this vse also is of the Lord, and that this rewarding is of his free good will. And they vse no lesse wrongfully than unhappily that olde destruction of workinge and together workinge grace. Augustine vsed the same in deede, but delaying it with a fit definition, y^e God in together workinge with vs doth ende, that w^h in workinge he beginneth, and that it is still the same grace but chaun-geth name, according to the diuerse manner of effect. Wherupon fol-loweth, that he doth not parte it betwene God and vs, as if there were a mutuall meeting together by y^e motiō of both, but only noteth the multiplicatiō of grace. To which purpose belōgeth that which in an other place he teacheth; that many giftes of God do go before the good will of man, among the which the selfe same is one. Wherupon followeth, that he leaueth nothing that it may claime to it self. Which Phi. 2. thing Paul also hath namely expressed : For when he had sayd that it 13. is God, which worketh in vs both to will and to performe, he by and by addeth, that he doth them both of his good will declaringe by this word, that it is his free goodnesse. Whereas they are wont to say, that after we haue oncē giue place to the first grace, our owne endeuours do now worke together with the grace that followeth. To this I an-swere : If they meane that we, after we haue bin once by the power of the Lorde broken to the obedience of righteousnesse, do of our owne accorde go forward, and are inclined to follow the workinge of grace, I speake nothings against it. For it is most certayne, that there is such a readines of obeying, where the grace of God reigneth.
 But whense cometh that, but from this, that the spirite of God al-way agreeinge with it selfe; doth cherishe and confirme to stedfastnesse of continuuing, the same affection of obeying, which it selfe engendred at the beginning. But if they meane that man taketh of himselfe somewhat wherby to labour with the grace of God, they are most pestilently deceued.

12. And to this purpose is that sayinge of the Apostle wrongfully wraisted by ignoraunce: I haue laboured more than they all: not I, but 1 Cor. the grace of God with me. For they take it so: that because it might 15. 10. seeme

seeme somewhat arrogantly spoken that he preferred himselfe before them all, therefore he corrected it with referring the praise to the grace of God, but yet so, that he calleth himselfe a worker together with grace. It is maruell that so many which otherwise were not euill men, haue stombled at this straw. For the Apostle doth not wryte that the grace of the Lord laboured with him, to the intent to make himselfe partener of the labour, but rather by this correction he giueth away all y^e praise of the labour to grace only. It is not ! (sayth he) that haue laboured, but the grace of God that was with me. But the doubtfulnes of the speach deceiued them: but specially the ill translation wherein the force of the Greke article was left out. For if it be translated word for word, he doth not say, that grace was a worker together with him, but that the grace that was with him was the worker of all. And the same thing doth Augustine teach, not darkely, though shortly, where he thus saith: The good will of man goeth before many gifts of God, Psa. 59. but not before all. But of them which it goeth before, it selfe is one, 11. then followeth his reason: because it is wrytten: His mercy hath pre- Psa. 23. uented me: And his mercy shall follow me. It preuenteth man not wil- 6. linge, to make him will: & it followeth him willinge, that he wil not in vaine. With whom Bernard agreeth bringing in the church speaking Ser. 2. in thus: Drawe me in a maner vnwillinge, that thou maist make me wil- Cant. ling: draw me lying slouthfull, that thou maist make me tunne.

- 13 Now let vs heare Augustine speaking in his owne wordes, least the Pelagians of our age, that is to say, the Sophisters of Sorbone, shoulde as they are wont, lay to our charge that all antiquitie is against vs, wherein they followe their father Pelagius, by whom long ago Augustine was drawn forth into the same contention. In his booke of Correption and Grace wrytten to Valentine he entreateth largely that which I will rehearse shortly, but yet do it in his owne wordes: that to Adam was giuen the grace of continuinge in good if he would: and to vs is giuen to will, and by will to ouercome concupiscence: that he therefore had to be able if he would, but not to will that he might be able: to vs is giuen both to will and to be able. That the first liberty was to be able not to sinne, ours is much greater, not to be able to sinne. And least he shoulde be thought to speake of the perfection to come after immortality (as Lombard wrongfully draweth it to that meaning) within a litle after he plucketh out this dout. For (sayth he) the will of holy men is so much kindeled by the holy Ghost, that they therefore are able, because they so wil: they therefore will; because God worketh y^e they so will. For if in so great 2. Cor. weakenesse, in which yet behoueth the power to be made perfect, 12.9.

for repressing of pride, their owne will were left vnto the, that by the help of God they may if they will, and God doth not worke in them to will : then amonge so many temptations will shoulde needes fall downe for weakenesse, and therefore could not continue. Therefore is succour giuen to the weakenesse of mans will, that it should be moued without swaruing or seuering by the grace of God, and therefore shoulde not faint how weake so euer it be. Then he entreateth more largely howe our heartes do of necessity follow the mouing of God that worketh affectiō in them. And he sayth, that the Lord doth draw men in deede with their owne wills, but with such as he himselfe hath wrought. Nowe haue we that thing testified by Augustines mouth, which we principally desire to obtaine, that grace is not only offered by God to be receiued or refused at euery mans Free election, but also that grace is the same, that formeth the election and will in the heart: so that euery good worke that followeth after, is the frute and effect thereof, and that it haue no other will obeying it, but the same which it hath made. For these are also his wordes out of an other place, that nothing but grace maketh euery good worke in vs.

14 But whereas he sayth in an other place, that will is not taken away by grace, but from an euill will turned into a good, and holpen when it is good : he meaneth onely that man is not so drawn, that without any motion of heart he is caried as by an outwarde impulsion, but that he is inwardly so affected, that from his very heart he obeyeth. That grace is specially and freely giuen to the elect, he wryteth thus vnto Boniface: We know that grace is not giuen to all men, and to them to whom it is giuen, it is not giuen according to the merites of workes, nor according to the merites of will, but of free fauour : and to them to whom it is not giuen, we know that it is by the iust iudgement of God that it is not giuen. And in the same Epistle he strongly fighteth against that opinion, that the grace followinge is giuen to the deseruinges of men, because in not refusinge the first grace, they shewed themselues worthy. For he will haue Pelagius graunt, that grace is necessary to vs for euery of our doinges, and is not giuen in recompense to workes, that it may be grace in deede. But the matter can not be comprehended in a shorter summe, than out of the eight chapter of his booke to Valentine of Correption and Grace, where first he teacheth that mans will obtayneth not grace by liberty, but liberty by grace : and that by the same grace, by affection of delite printed in him, it is framed to continuance, that it is strengthened with inuincible force : that while grace gouerneth, it neuer falleth away : when grace forsaketh, it by and by tombleth downe. That by

by the free mercy of God it both is conuerted to good, and beinge conuerted abideth in it, that the direction of mans will to good, and stedfastnesse after direction, hangeth vpon the onely will of God, and not vpon any merite of his owne. And so to man is left such a free will, if we list so to call it, as he wryteth of in an other place, that can neither be turned to God, nor abide in God but by grace, & by grace is able all that it is able.

The iiij. Chapter.

How God vvorketh in the heartes of men.

YT is sufficiently proued, as I thinke, that man is so holden captiue with the yoke of Sinne, that of his owne nature he can neither aspire by desire, nor trauaile by endeouour to goodnesse, beside that, we haue rehearsed a distinction betwene compulsion & necessity, whereby it might appeare, that when he sinneth of necessity, yet neuerthelesse he sinneth willingly. But forasmuch as while he is subiect in bondage to the Deuill, he seemeth rather to be ledde by the deuils will than his owne, it resteth nowe to be declared of what sorte are both kindes of workinge. And then is this question to be assoiled, whether in euill workes there be any thinge to be attributed to God: in which the Scripture sheweth that there is vsed some workinge of his. In one place Augustine compareth mans will to a horse, which is ready to be ruled by the will of his rider: and God and the Deuill he compareth to riders. If God (sayth he) sit vpon it, he like a sober and cunning rider, gouerneth it temperatly, spurreth it forward if it be to slow, plucketh it backe if it be to quicke, restrayneth the wantonnesse and wildnesse of it, tameth the stubbornnesse of it, and guydeth it into the right way. But if the Deuill haue possessed it, he like a foolish and wanton rider, violently carieth it through places where no way is, driueth it into ditches, rolleth it downe steepe places, spurreth it forward to stubbornnesse & fearcenesse: which similitude we will for this time be cōtented with, sith there commeth not a better in place. Where it is sayd that the will of a naturall man is subiect to the rule of the Deuill, to be stirred by him, it is not ment therby that man as it were struing against it, & resisting is compelled to obey, as we compell bondslaues against their wil, by reason of being their lordes, to do our cōmaundementes: but that beinge bewitched with the deceites of Satan, it of necessity yeldeth it selfe obedient to euery leading of him. For whom the Lord vouchesaueth not to rule with his spirite, them

 2. Cor. 4 fore the Apostle sayth, that the God of this world hath blinded the 4. mindes of the vnbeleuers ordained to destructiō, that they should not Eph. 2. 2 see the light of the Gospell. And in an other place: That he worketh in the disobedient children. The blindinge of the wicked, and all the wicked deedes that follow therupon, are called the workes of Sathan, of which yet the cause is not to be sought elsewhere, than in the will of man, out of which ariseth the roote of euell, wherein resteth the fun-dation of the kingdome of Sathan, which is Sinne.

2 But farre other is the order of Gods doing in such thinges. And that the same may appeare more certainly vnto vs: let the hurt done to Job. 1. the holy mā Iob by the Chaldees, be an example. The Chaldees killed his herdmen, and like enemies in warre, droue away his cattell for booties. Now is their wicked deede plainly seene, and in that worke Sathan is not idle, from whome the History sayeth, that all this did proceede. But Iob himselfe did acknowledge the worke of the Lorde in it, whom he sayth to haue taken away from him those thinges, that were taken away by the Chaldees. How can we referre the selfe same worke to God, as author, to Sathan as author, and to man as author of it, but that we must either excuse Sathan by the company of God, or report God to be the author of euill? Very easily: if first we looke vpo the ende, why it was done, and then the manner how. The purpose of the Lord is by calamity to exercise the patience of his seruauant: The deuil goeth about to driue him to despeir. The Chaldees against right and law, seeke gayne of that which is an other mans. Such diuersity in purposes, maketh great difference in the worke. And in the manner of doing there is no lesse diuersity. The Lord leaueth his ser-uauant to Sathan to be afflicted: and the Chaldees, whom he did chose for ministers to execute it, he did leaue & deliuer to him to be driuen to it. Sathan with his venemous stings, pricked forward the mindes of the Chaldees which otherwise were peruerse of theselues to do that mischief: they furiously runne to do wrong, and do binde and defile al their members with wicked doing. Therefore it is properly said, that Sathan doth worke in the reprobate, in whom he exerciseth his kingdome: that is to say, the kingdome of wickednesse. It is also sayd that God worketh in them after his maner, because Sathan himselfe, foras-much as he is the instrument of his wrath, according to his biddinge & commaundement, turneth himselfe hither & thither to execute his iust iudgements. I speake not here of Gods vniuersall mouing, whereby as all creatures are susteined, so from thence they take their effectuall power of doing any thing. I speake only of that speciall doinge, which

which appeareth in euery speciall act. We see therefore that it is no absurdity, that one selfe act be ascribed to God, to Sathan, and to man: but the diuersity in the end and maner of doing, causeth that therein appeareth the iustice of God to be without fault, and also the wickednes of Sathan and man, bewrayeth it selfe to their reproch.

3 The old wryters in this point also, are somtime precisely afraid, simply to confesse the trueth, because they feare least they should so open a window to wickednes, to speke irreuerently of the workes of God. Which sobriety as I embrace, so I thinke it nothing daungerous, if we simply holde what the Scripture teacheth. Augustine himselfe somtime was not free frō y^e superstition, as where he sayth, that hardninge and blindinge, pertaine not to the worke of God, but to his foreknowledge. But the phrases of Scripture allow not these suttelties, which phrases do plainly shewe that there is therin somewhat else of God, besides his foreknowledge. And Augustine himselfe in his fift booke against Iulianus, goeth earnestly about with a long processe, to proue that sinnes are not only of the permission or sufferance of God, but also of his power, that so former sinnes might be punished. Likewise, that which they bring foorth, concerning permission, is to weake to stande. It is oftentimes sayd, that God blindeth and hardeneth the reprobate, that he turneth, boweth, & moueth their hearts as I haue else where taught more at large. But of what manner that is, it is neuer expressed, if we flee to free foreknowledge or sufferance. Therefore we answere that it is done after two manners, For first, where as when his light is taken away, there remayneth nothing but darkenesse and blindnes: wheras when his spirite is take away, our hartes waxe hard & become stones: where as when his direction cesseth, they are wrafted into crookednes, it is wel sayd that he doth blinde, harden & bow them frō whom he taketh away the power to see, obey & do rightly. The second maner, which cometh nere to the property of the words, is that for the executing of his iudgementes by Sathan the minister of his wrath, he both appointeth their purposes to what end it pleaseth him, and stirreth vp their willes, & strengtheneth their endeouours. So when Moyses rehearseth that king Schon did not giue passage to the people, because God had hardned his spirit, & made his hart obstinate, he by and by adioyneth the end of his purpose: that he might (sayth he) giue him into our handes. Therefore because it was Gods will to haue him destroied, the making of his hart obstinate, was Gods preparation to his destruction.

4 After the first manner this seemeth to be spoken. He taketh away the lip from the speakers of trueth, and taketh away reason from the Elders. He taketh the heart away from them that are set ouer the people, he maketh them to wander where no way is. Again, Lord why hast thou made vs mad, and hardened our heart, that we should not feare thee? Because they iudge rather of what sorte God maketh men by forsakinge them, than how he performeth his worke in them. But there are other testimonies that go further: as are these of the hardening of Pharaō. I will harden the heart of Pharaō, that he do not heare you, & let the people go. Afterward he saith, that he hath made heauy and hardened his heart. Did he harden it, in not susteininge it?

That is true in deede: but he did somewhat more, that he committed his heart to Sathan, to be confirmed with obstinacy. Whereupon he had before sayd: I will hold his heart. The people went out of Ægypt, the inhabitantes of that countrey came forth and met them like enemies. By whom were they stirred vp? Truely Moses affirmeth to the people, that it was the Lord that had hardened their heartes. And the Prophet reciting the same history, saith, that he turned their hearts, that they should hate his people. Now can you not say, that they stūbled being left without the counsell of God. For if they be hardened and turned, then they are of purpose bowed to that selfe thing. More-ouer so oft as it pleased him to punish the transgressours of the people, how did he performe his worke in the reprobate? so as a mā may see, that the effectuallnes of working was in him, & they only did seruice as ministers. Wherefore sometime he threatened that he would cal thē out with his whistle, sometime y they should be like a net for him to entangle them, & sometime like a mallet, to strike the Israelites. But specially he then declared how he is not idle in them, when he called Sennacherib an Axe, which was both directed and driuen by his hand to cut. Augustine in one place doth not amisse, appointe it after this sorte: that inasmuch as they sinne, it is their owne: inasmuch as in sin-ninge they do this or that, it is of the power of God, that diuided the darkeness as pleaseth him.

5 Now that the ministry of Sathan is vsed to pricke forward the reprobate, so oft as the Lord by his providence appointeth them to this or to that, may sufficiently be proued, though it were but by one place only. For it is oftentimes sayd in Samuell, that the euill spirit of the Lord, and an euill spirite from the Lord, did either violently cary or leaue Saul. To say that this spirit was the holy Ghost, is blasphemous. Therefore the vncleane spirit is called the spirit of God, because it answereth at his cōmaundement and power, being rather his instrumēt in doing, than an author of it selfe. This is also to be added with-all, which Paul teacheth, that the efficacy of errour and deceiuinge is sent by God, that they which haue not obeyed the trueth, may beleue lies. But there is alway great difference in one selfe same worke, betwene that which the Lorde doeth, and that which Sathan and the wicked go about. He maketh the euill instrumentes that he hath vnder his hand, and may turne whether he list, to serue his iustice. They, in as much as they are euill, do bring fourth in effect the wickednesse that they haue conceiued by corruptnesse of nature. The reste, of such thinges as serue for to deliuer the maiestie of God from slaunder, and to cut of all shifting from the wicked, are already set fourth in the chapter concerning Prouidence. For in this place my purpose was onely to shewe how Sathan reigneth in the reprobate man, and how God worketh in them both.

6 Although we haue before touched, yet it is not plainely declared what libertie man hath in those doinges, which are neither iust nor faulty of them selues, and belong rather to the bodely than the spirituall life. Some in such thinges haue graunted him free election, rather, as I thinke, because they woulde not striue about a matter of no great importance, than that they minded certainly to proue the same thing that they graunt. As for me, although I confesse that they which do holde that they haue no power to righteousnesse, do holde the thing that is principally necessarie to saluation: yet I do thinke that this point also is not to be neglected, that we may know that it is of the speciall grace of the Lorde, so oft as it cometh in our minde to chose that which is for our profit, so oft as our will enclineth therunto: againe so oft as our wit and minde eschueth that whiche els woulde haue hurte vs. And the force of Gods prouidence extendeth thus farre, not only to make the succeses of thinges to come to passe, as he shal forsee to be expedient, but also to make the willes of men to tende therunto. Truely if we consider in our wit the administration of outwarde thinges, we shall thinke that they are so farre vnder the will of man: but if we shall geue credit to so many testimonies, which crie out that the Lord doth in these thinges also rule the heartes of men, they shall compelle vs to yelde our will subiect to the speciall mouing of God. Who did procure the good willes of the Egyptians to the Israelites, to lende them all their most precious iewels? They woulde neuer haue founde in their heartes to haue so done of their owne accorde. Therefore their heartes were more subiect to the Lord, than ruled by them selues. And truely if Iacob had not bene perswaded that God put into men diuerse affections as pleaseth him, he woulde not haue said of his sonne Ioseph, whom he thought to be some Heathē Egyptian: God graunt you to finde mercie before this man. As also the whole Church confesseth in the Psalme, that whē it pleased God to haue mercie vpon it, he meekened the heartes of the cruell nations. Againe, when Saul so waxed on fire with anger, that he prepared him to warre, the cause is expressed, for that the spirite of God did enforce him. Who turned away Absolons minde from embracing the counsell of Achitophel, which was wont to be holden as an oracle? Who inclined Rehabeam to be perswaded with the yong mens aduise? Who made the nations that before were great, to be afrayde at the cōmyng of Israell? Truely the harlot Rahab confessed, that it was done by God. Againe, who threw downe the hartes of Israell with dread and fearfulnesse, but he that in the lawe threatened that he woulde geue them a fearefull hearte?

7 Some man will take exception and say, that these are singular examples, to the rule wherof all thinges vniuersally ought not to be reduced. But I say, that by these is sufficiently proued that which I affirme, that God so oft as he meanceth to prepare the way for his prouidence, euen in outwarde thinges doth bow and tourne the willes of men, and that their choise is not so free, but that Gods will beareth rule ouer the freedome therof. That thy minde hangeth rather vpon the mouing of God, than vpon the freedome of thine owne choise; this dāyly experience shall compell thee to thinke whether thou wilt or no: that is, for that in thinges of no perplexitie thy iudgement and wit oft faileth thee, in thinges not heard to be done thy courage fainteth: againe in thinges most obscure, byandby present aduise is offred thee: in thinges great & perillous, thou hast a courage ouercōming all difficultie. And so do I expounde that which Salomon saieth: That the eare may heare, that the eye may see, the Lord worketh both. For I take it that he speaketh not of the creation, but of the speciall grace of vsing them. And when he writeth that the Lord holdeth in his hande and boweth whether he will the hearte of the king as the streames of waters: truely vnder the exāple of one speciall sorte, he comprehendeth the whole generaltie. For if the will of any man be free from subiection, that preeminence principally belongeth to the will of a King, which vseth as it were a kingdome vpon the willes of other: but if the will of the King be ruled with the hande of God, no more shall our will be exempted from the same estate. Vpon this point there is a notable saying of Augustine. The Scripture if it be diligently looked vpon doth shew, that not onely the good willes of men which he of euill maketh good, and so beyng made by him selfe doth direct to good doinges and to eternall life, but also these willes that preserue the creature of the worlde, are so in the power of God,

God, that he maketh them to be inclined whether he will and when he will, either to do benefites, or to execute punishemētes, by a iudgement most secret in deede, but the same most righteous.

8 Here let the Readers remember, that the power of mans will is not to be weyed by the successe of thinges, which some vnskilful men are vnorderly wont to do. For they seme to them selues to proue trimly and wittely that mans will is in bondage, because euen the hyest Monarches haue not all thinges flowyng after their owne desire. But this power wherof we speake, is to be considered within man and not be measured by outwarde successe. For in the disputacion of freewil, this is not to the questiō, whether man may for outwarde impedimentes, perfourme and put in execution all those thinges that he hath purposed in minde: but whether he haue in euery thing both a free election of iudgement, and a free affection of will, which both if man haue, then Attilius Regulus, enclosed in the narrownesse of a tonne, set full of sharp prickes, shal no lesse haue free will than Augustus Cesar, gouerning a great part of the worlde with the becke of his countenance.

The v. Chapter.

A confutation of the obiections that are vront to be brought for defence of Free will.

IT might seme that we haue saide enough already, concerning the bondage of mans will, if they that with false opinion of libertie, labour to throw it downe hedlong, did not on the contrary part pretende certaine reasons to assaile our meaning. First they heape vp together diuerse absurdities, whereby they may bring it in hatred as a thing abhorring from common reason: afterwarde they set vpon it with testimonies of Scripture. Both these engines we shall beate backe in order. If (say they) Sinne be of necessitie, then cesseth it to be sinne: if it be voluntarie, then may it be auoyded. These were also the weapons of Pelagius to assaile Augustine, with whose name we will not yet haue them oppressed, till we haue satisfied them, concerning the matter it selfe. I deny therefore that sinne ought the lesse to be imputed, because it is necessarie. I denie againe that this doth follow which they conclude, that it may be auoyded, because it is voluntarie. For if any man will dispute with God, and seeke to escape from his iudgement by this pretense, because he coulde none otherwise do: God hath that answere ready which we in an other place haue spoken of, that it is not of creation, but of the corruption of nature that men being made bondslaues to sinne, can will nothing but euil. For whēce cometh this want of power which the wicked would gladly pretende, but vpon this, that Adam of his owne accorde made him selfe subiect to the tyrannie of the Deuill? Hereupon therefore grewe the corruptiō, with the bondes wherof we are holden fast tyed, for that the first man fell from his creator. If all men be iustly holdē guilty of his falling away, let them not thinke them selues excused by necessitie, in which it selfe they haue a most eident cause of their dampnation. And this I haue aboue plainly set fourth, and I haue geuen an example in the Deuill him selfe, wherby it might appeare, that he which necessarily sinneth, doth neuerthelesse willingly sinne: as againe in the elect Angels, where as their will can not decline from good, yet it cesseth not to be a will. Which same thing Bernard also aptly teacheth: that we are therefore the more miserable, because our necessitie is voluntarie: which yet holdeth vs so subiect vnto it, that we be the bondeslaues of sinne, as we haue before rehearsed. The second parte of their argument is faulty, because from voluntarie it streightway leapeth to free: but we haue before proued, that it is voluntarily done which yet is not subiect to free election.

2 They further say: that if both vertues and vices procede not of free choise of will, it is not reasonable that either punishment should be laide vpon man or rewarde geuen to him. This argument, although it be Aristotles, yet I graunt is in some places vsed by Chrysofome and Hierome. But that it was a common argument with the Pelagians, Hierome him selfe hideth not, & also rehearseth it in their own wordes. If the grace of God worke in vs: then it, not we that labour, shalbe crowned. Of punishments I aunswere, that they are iustly laid vpon vs from whom the guiltinesse of sinne procedeth. For what matter maketh it, whether sinne be done by free or bonde iudgement, so it be done by voluntarie lust: specially sith man is hereby proued a sinner, for that he is vnder the bondage of sinne? As to the rewardes of righteousnesse: a great absurditie forsooth it is, if we confesse that they hang rather vpon Gods bountifullnesse, than vpon our owne deseruings. How oft finde we this thing repeted in Augustine: that God crouneth not our deseruings, but his owne gistes: and that they are called rewardes, not as due to our deseruings, but such as are rendred to the graces already bestowed vpon vs? Wisely in dedde they note this, that now there remaineth no place for deseruings, if they come not out of the fountaine of free will: but where they reckon that which we say so farre differing from trueth they are much deceiued. For Augustine doubteth not, commonly to teach for necessarie, that which they thinke so vnlawefull to confesse, as where he saith: What

be the merites of any men what soeuer they be? when he commeth, nor with due rewarde, but with free grace, then he alone being free, and that maketh free from sinne? He findeth all men sinners. Againe, If that shall be rendred to thee that is due to thee, thou arte to be punyshed: what is done then? God hath not geuen thee punyishment which is due, but geueth thee grace which is not due. If thou wilt be estraunged from grace, boaste of thy deseruings. Againe: Thou art nothing by thy selfe. Sinnes are thine, but deseruings are Gods, punyishment is due to thee: and when rewarde commeth, he shall crowne his owne giftes, and not thy deseruings. And in the same meaning in an other place, he teacheth that grace is not of deseruing, but deseruing of grace. And a little after he concludeth, that God with his giftes goeth before all deseruings, that out of the same he may gather his owne deseruings, and doth geue altogether freely, bycause he findeth nothing wherevpon to saue. But what neede is it to make a longer register, when such sentences are often founde in his writings? But the Apostle shall yet better deliuer them from this error, if they heare from what beginning he conueyeth the glorie of the Saintes: Whome he hath chosen, them he hath called: whome he hath called, them he hath iustified: whome he hath iustified, them he hath glorified. Why then, as witnesseth the Apostle, are the faithfull crowned? bycause by the Lordes mercy and not by their owne endeuour they are both chosen and called and iustified. Away therefore with this vaine feare, that there shall no more be any deseruings, if free will shall not stande. For it is most foolish to be frayed away and to flee from that to which the Scripture calleth vs. If (saith he) thou hast receyued all thinges, why gloryest thou, as if thou haddest not receyued them? Thou seest that for the same cause he taketh all thinges from free will, to leaue no place for deseruings: but as the bountiefullnesse and liberalitie of God is manyfolde, and impossible to be spent out, those graces which he bestoweth on vs, bycause he maketh them ours, he rewardeth as if they were our owne vertues.

3 Moreouer they bring fourth that which may seeme to be taken out of Chrysostome: If this be not the power of our will, to choose good or euil, then they that are partakers of the same nature, must either all be euill or all be good. And not farre from that is he, what soeuer he was, that wrote the booke Of the calling of the Gentyles, which is carried about vnder the name of Ambrose, when he maketh this argument, that no man shoulde euer departe from the faith, vnlesse the grace of God did leaue vnto vs the state of mutabilitie: wherein it is marueile, that so excellēt men fell beside them selues.

For how chaũceth it came not in Chrysoftomes minde, that it is Gods election that so maketh difference betwene men? As for vs, we feare not to graunt that which Paule with great earnestnesse affirmeth, that all together are peruerse and geuen to wickednesse: but with him we adioyne this that by Gods mercy it cōmmeth to passe that all abide not in peruersenesse. Therefore wheras naturally we are all sicke of one dileafe, they onely recouer health vpon whome it hath pleased God to lay his healing hande. The rest whome by iust iudgement he passeth ouer, pine away in their own rottenesse till they be cōsumed. Neither is it of any other cause, that some contynew to the ende, and some fall in their course begon. For continuance it selfe is the gift of God, which he geueth not to all indifferently, but dealeth it to whom it pleaseth him selfe. If a man aske for a cause of the difference, why some continew constantly, and some faile by vnstedfastnesse, we know none other cause but that God lusteyneth the one sorte strenghtened with his power that they perish not, and doth not geue the same strengthe to the other sorte, that they maie be examples of inconstancie.

4 Further they presse vs, saying, that exhortations are vainely taken in hande, that the vse of admonitions is superfluous; that it is a fonde thing to rebuke, if it be not in the power of the sinner to obey. When the like thinges in time past were obiected against Augustine, he was compelled to write the booke of Correption and grace. Where although he largely wipe them away, yet he bringeth his aduersaries to this summe: O man; in the commaundement learne what thou oughtest to do: in correction learne that by thine owne faulte thou hast it not: in prayer learne whence thou maiest receiue that which thou wouldest haue. Of the same argument in a maner is the booke of the Spirite and Letter, where he teacheth that God measureth not the commaundementes of his lawe by the strength of man, but when he hath commaunded that which is right, he freely geueth to his elect power to fullfill it. And this is no matter of long disputation. First we are not onely in this cause, but also Christ and all the Apostles. Now let the other looke how they will get the maysterie in stryuing, that matche them selues with such aduersaries. Doth Christ, which testyfieth that we can do nothing without him, any thing the lesse rebuke and chastice them, that without him did euill? Doth he lesse exhorte euery man to applie him selfe to good workes? How seuerely doth Paule inuey against the Corinthians for neglecting of charitie? and yet he prayeth for charitie to be geuen to the same men from God. He testifieth in the Epistle to the Romaines, that it is neither ther of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy, and yet he cesseth not afterwarde to admonish, to exhort and to rebuke. Why do they not therefore speake to the Lorde, that he do not so lose his labour in requiring of menne those thinges which he him selfe alone can geue, and in punishing those thinges which are done for wante of his grace? Why do they not admonish Paule to spare them, in whose power it is not to will or to runne, but in the mercie of God, going before them which nowe hath forsaken them? As if the Lorde had not a very good reason of his doctrine, which offreth it selfe redily to be founde of them that reuerently seeke it, but howe much doctrine, exhortation and rebuking do worke of themselues, to the chaunging of the minde, Paule declareth, when he writeth, that neither he that planteth is any thing, nor he that watereth, but the Lord that geueth the encrease onely effectually worketh. So we see that Moses feuerally stablisheth the commaundementes of the lawe, and the Prophetes do sharply call vpon them, and threaten the transgressors, whereas they yet confesse, that men do then onely waxe wise, when a hearte is giuen them to vnderstand, that it is the propre worke of God to circumcise the heartes, and in steede of stony heartes to geue hearts of flesh, to write his law in the bowells of menne: finally in renewyng of soules to make that his doctrine may be effectuell.

5. Wherefore then serue exhortations? For this purpose: if they be despised of the wicked with an obstinate heart, they shal be for a witness vnto them when they shall come to the iudgement seate of the Lorde, yea and euen nowe already they beate and strike their conscience: for howsoever the most frowarde man laugheth them to scorne, yet can he not disproue them: but thou wilt say, what may silly miserable man do, if the softnesse of hearte, which was necessarily required to obedience, be denied him? Nay rather, why doth he excuse him selfe, when he can impute the hardnesse of heart to none but to him selfe? Therefore the wicked that are willingly ready to mocke them out if they might, are thrown downe with the force of them whether they wil or no. But the chiefe profite towarde the faithfull is to be considered: in whome as the Lord worketh all thinges by his spirite, so he leaueth not the iustrumentes of his worde, and vseth the same not without effect. Let this therefore stande which is true, that all the stréngth of the godly resteth in the grace of God, according to that saying of the Prophet: I will geue them a newe hearte that they may walke in them. But thou wilt saie: Why are they nowe admonished of their duerie, and not rather left to the direction of the holy Ghost? why are they moued with exhortation, sith they can make no more hast than the stirring forward of the holy Ghost worketh? why are they chastised if at any time they be gone out of the way, sith they fell by the necessary weakenesse of the flesh? O man, what art thou to appoint a law for God? If it be his pleasure, that we be prepared by exhortation to receiue the selfe same grace, wherby is wrought that the exhortation is obeyed, what hast thou in this ordre, to bite or carpe at? If exhortations and rebukinges did nothing els profit with the godly, but to reprove them of sinne, they were euen for that thing only to be compted not altogether vnprofitable. Now, for asmuch as by the holy Ghost working inwardly, they much auaille to enflame the desire of goodnesse, to shake of sluggishnesse, to take away the pleasure and venimous swetenesse of wickednesse, and on the other side to engendre a hatred and irkesomnesse therof: who dare cauill that they are superfluous? If any man require a plainer aunswere, let him take this: God worketh after two sortes in his electe, inwardely by his spirite, outwardely by his worde: By his spirite, by enlightning their mindes, by framing their heartes to the loue and keeping of iustice, he maketh them a newe creature: By his worde, he stirreth them to desire, to seke and atteine the same reuuing: by them both he sheweth fourth the effectual working of his hande, according to the proportion of his distribution. When he sendeth the same word to the reprobate, though not for their amendement, yet he maketh it to serue for an other vse: that both for the present time they may be pressed with witness of conscience, and may against the day of iudgement be made more inexcusable. So though Christ pronounce that no man cometh to him, but whom the Father draweth, and that the elect do come when they haue hearde and learned of the father? yet doth not he neglect the office of a teacher, but with his voice diligently calleth them, whome it necessarily behoueth to be inwardly taught by the holy Ghost, that they maie any thing profite. And Paule teacheth, that teaching is not in vaine with the reprobate, bycause it is to them the sauour of death to death, but a swete sauour to God.

6 They be verie laborious in heaping together of testimonies of Scripture: and that they do of purpose, that when they can not oppresse vs with weight, they maie yet with numbre. But as in battelles, when it commeth to hand strokes, the weaker multitude how much pompe and shew soeuer it hath, is with a fewe stripes discomfited and put to flight: so shall it be very easy for vs to ouerthrowe them with all their route. For, bycause the places that they abuse against vs, when they are ones diuided into their ordres, do meete vpon a fewe speciall pointes, pointes, we shall with one aunswere satysfie many of them: therefore it shall not be needefull to tarry vpon dissoluing euery one of them particularly. Their chiefe force they set in the commaundementes, which they thinke to be so tempered to our strengthes, that what soeuer is proued to be required by the one, it necessarily followeth that it may be perfourmed by the other. And therefore they runne through euery of the commaundementes, & by them do measure the proportion of our strength. For (say they) either God mocketh vs when he chargeth vs with holynesse, godlynesse, obedience, chastitie, loue, and mekenesse: and when he forbiddeth vs vnclennesse, idolatrie, vnchastenesse, wrath, robberie, pride, and such like: or he requireth onely those thinges that are in our power. Nowe, we may diuide into three sortes in manner all the commaundementes that they heape together. Some require our first conuersion to God, some speake simply of the keping of the lawe: some commaunde vs to cōtinue in the grace of God that we haue receyued. First let vs speake of them all in generalitie, and then descende to the speciall sortes. To extend the power of man to the commaundementes of the lawe, hath in deede long agoe begonne to be commune, and hath some shewe: but it proceded from most rude ignoraunce of the lawe. For they that thinke it a heynous offence, if it be saide that the keping of the lawe is impossible, do rest forsooth vpon this most strong argument, that els the lawe was geuen in vaine. For they speake in such sorte as if Paule had no where spoken of the lawe. For, I beseeche them, what meane these sayinges, that the lawe was set bycause of transgressions: That by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne: That the lawe maketh sinne: that the lawe entred, that sinne might abounde: was it meant that the lawe was to be limited to our strengthes, least it shoulde be geuen in vaine? or rather that it was set farre aboue vs to conuince our weaknesse? Truely by the same mans definition, the ende and fullfilling of the lawe is Charitie. But when he wisheth the mindes of the Theffalonians to be filled with charitie, he doth sufficiently confesse, that the lawe soundeth in our eares without profite, vnlesse God inspire the whole summe thereof in our heartes.

7 Truely, if the Scripture did teach nothing els, but that the law is a rule of life where vnto we ought to frame our endeuour, I woulde also without delay agree to their opinion: but whereas it doth diligently and plainely declare vnto vs the manyfolde vse of the lawe: it is conuenient rather to consider by that interpretation, what the lawe may do in man. For so much as concerneth this presente cause: it teacheth that so sone as it hath appointed what we ought to do, the power to obey commeth of the goodnesse of God, and therefore moueth vs to prayer, whereby we may require to haue it giuen vs. If there were onely the commaundement and no promise, then were our strength to be tried whether they were sufficient to aunswere the commaundement, but sith there are promises ioyned withall, whiche crie out, that not onely our aide, but also all our whole power consisteth in the helpe of Gods grace, they do testifie enough and more, that we are altogether vnfitte, much more insufficient to kepe the law. Wherefore let this proportion of our strengthes with the commaundementes of Gods lawe be no more enforced, as if the Lord had measured the rule of iustice, which he purposed to geue in his lawe, according to the rate of our weakenesse. Rather by his promises we ought to consider, how vnready we are of our selues which in euery behalfe do so much neede his grace. But who (say they) shall be perswaded that it is like to be true, that the Lorde appointed his lawe to stockes and stones? Neither doth any man go about to perswade it. For the wicked are neither stockes nor stones, when being taught by the lawe that their lustes do striue against God, they are proued guilty by their owne witnesse. Nor yet the godly, when being put in minde of their weakenesse, they flee vnto grace. For which purpose serue these sayings of Augustine. The Lorde commaundeth those things that we can not do, that we may know what we ought to aske of him. Great is the profite of the commaundementes, if so much be geuen to free will, that the grace of God be the more honoured. Faith obtaineth that which the lawe commaundeth, yea the lawe therfore commaundeth, that faith may obtaine that which was commaunded by the law: yea God requireth faith it selfe of vs, and findeth not what to require, vlesse he geue what to finde. Againe, Let God geue what he commaundeth, and commaunde what he will.

8 That shall more plainly be seen in rehering the three sortes of commaundementes which we touched before. The Lorde oftentimes commaundeth both in the lawe and in the Prophetes, that we be conuerted vnto him. But on the other side, the Prophet answereth, Conuerte me, Lorde, and I shall be conuerted: for after that thou didst conuerte me, I repented, &c. He commaundeth vs to circumsise the vncircumsised skinne of our hearte: and by Moses he declareth that this circumsision is done by his owne hande. He ech where requireth newnesse of hearte, but in an other place he testifieth that it is geuen by himselfe. That which God promiseth (saith Augustine) we do not by free will or nature, but he himselfe doth it by grace. And this is the same note that he himselfe reherfeth in the fifth place among the rules of Ticonius, that we well make difference betwene the lawe and the promises, or betwene the commaundementes and grace. Now let them go, that gather by the commaundementes whether man be able to do any thing towarde obediences in such sorte that they destroy the grace of God, by which the commaundemétes them selues are fulfilled. The commaundementes of the seconde sorte are simple, by which we are bidden to honour God, to serue and cleave vnto his will, to kepe his commaundementes, to follow his doctrine. But there are innumerable places that do testifie that it is his gifte what soeuer righteousnesse, holynesse, godlinesse or puritie may be had. Of the thirde sorte was that exhortacion of Paule and Barnabas to the faithfull, which is rehearsed by Luke, that they shoulde abide in the grace of God. But from whence that strength of constancie is to be had, the same Paule teacheth in an other place. That remaineth, saith he, Ephē. 6. brethren, be ye strong through the Lorde. In an other place he forbiddeth vs, that we do not greue the spirite of God, wherewith we are 16. sealed vp vnto the day of our redemption. But because the thing that Ephē. 4. he there requireth, coulde not be perfourmed by men, therefore he 30. witheth it, to the Thessalonians, from God, namely, that he woulde Thes. 1. 2 reckon them worthy of his holy calling, and fulfill all the purpose of his goodnesse, and the worke of faith in them. Likewise in the seconde 2. Cor. Epistle to the Corinthians, entreating of almes, he oftentimes com- 8. 11. mendeth their good and godly will: yet a litle after, he thanketh God that put it in the hearte of Titus, to take vpon him to geue exhortacion. If Titus coulde not so much as vse the office of his mouth to exhorte other, but onely so farre as God did put it vnto him, how shoulde other haue bene willing to do, vnlesse God him selue had directed their heartes?

9 The craftier sorte of them do cauill at all these testimonies: because there is no impediment, but that we may ioyne our owne strengthes, and God to helpe our weake endeouours. They bring also places out of the Prophetes, where the effect of our conuersion seemeth to be parted in halfe betwene God and vs. Tourne ye to me, Zach. 1. and I will tourne to you. What maner of helpe the Lord bringeth vs, 3. we haue aboue shewed, and it is not needefull here to repete it. This one thing I woulde haue graunted me, that it is vainely gathered that there is required in vs a power to fulfill the lawe, because God doth commaunde the obedience of it: For as much as it is euident, that for the fulfilling of all the commaundementes of God, the grace of the lawegeuer is both necessarie for vs & promised vnto vs. Thereby then it appeareth, that at least there is more required of vs than we

er. 13. are able to paye. And that saying of Hieremie can not be wiped away with any caullations: that the couenaunt of God made with the auncient people, was voide, because it was onely literall, and that it could no otherwise be stablished, than when the spirite cometh vnto it, which frameth the heartes to obedience. Neither doth that saying, Tourne ye to me, and I will tourne vnto you, fauour their errour. For there is meant, not that turning of God, wherewith he renueth our heartes to repentaunce, but wherewith he by prosperitie of thinges doth declare him selfe fauorable and mercifull: as by aduersitie he sometime sheweth his displeasure. Where as therefore the people being vexed with many sortes of miseries and calamities, did complaine that God was turned away from them: he aunswereth, that they shall not be destitute of his fauour, if they retourne to vprightnesse of life, and to him selfe that is the paterne of righteousnesse: Therefore the place is wrongfully wrested, when it is drawn to this purpose, that the worke of our conuersion shoulde sceme to be parted betwixte God and men. These thinges we haue comprehended so much the shortelier, bycause the propre place for this matter shall be where we entreate of the Lawe.

10 The seconde sorte of their argumentes is much like vnto the first. They allege the promises whereby God doth couenaunt with our wil, of which sorte are, Seeke good and not euill, and ye shall liue. If ye will and do heare, ye shal eat the good thinges of the earth: but if ye will not, the swerde shall deuoure you, bycause the Lordes mouth hath spoken it. Againe, If thou put away thine abominations out of my sight, then shalt thou not be driuen out: If thou shalt obey diligently the voice of the Lorde thy God, and obserue and do all his commaundementes which I commaunde thee this day, then the Lord thy God will set the on hye aboue all the nations of the earth. And other like. They do inconueniently and as it were in mockerie thinke, that these benefites which the Lorde doth offer in his promises, are assigned to our owne wil: vnlesse it were in vs to stablish them or make them voide. And right easy it is to amplifie this matter with eloquent complaintes, that the Lorde doth cruelly mocke vs, when he pronounceth that his fauour hangeth vpon our will, if the same will be not in our power: And that this liberality of God should be a goodly thing forsoth, if he so set his benefites before vs that we haue no power to vse them: and a merueilous assurednes of his promises, which hãg vpon a thing impossible, so as they might neuer be fulfilled. But of such promises as haue a condition adioined, we wil speake in an other place: so that it shall be plaine, that there is no absurditie in the impossible possible fullfilling of them. And for so much as concerneth this place: I deny that God doth vngently mocke vs, when he moueth vs to deserue his benefites, whome he knoweth to be vtterly vnable to do it. For whereas the promises are offered both to the faithfull and to the wicked, they haue their vse with both sortes. As God with his commaudemētes pricketh the consciēces of the wicked, that they should not to swetely take pleasure in their sinnes, without any remembrance of his iudgements: so in his promises he doth in a manner take them to witnesse, howe vnworthy they are of his goodnesse. For who can denie that it is most rightfull and conueniente, that the Lord do good to them of whome he is honored, and punish the despisers of his Maiesty, according to his seueritie? Therefore God doth well and ordrely, when in his promises he adioyneth this condition to the wicked that are bounde with the fetters of sinne, that they shall then only enioy his benefites, if they departe from their wickednesse: or for this purpose only, that they may vnderstand that they are worthily excluded from these thinges, that are due to the true worshippers of God. Againe, bycause he seeketh by all meanes to stirre vp the faithfull to call vpon his grace, it shall not be inconuenient, if he attempt the same thing also by promises, which we haue shewed that he hath done to great profit with commaudemētes towarde them. Being enfourmed of the will of God, by his commaudemētes, we are put in minde of our miserie, which do withall our hearte to farre dissent from the same, and we be therewithall pricked forward so call vpon his spirite, whereby we may be directed into the right waie. But because our sluggishnesse is not sufficiētly sharpened with commaūdemētes, there are added promises which with a certaine swetenesse may allure vs to the loue of them. And that the more desire that we haue of righteousnesse, we may be the more feruent to seeke the fauour of God. Loe howe in these requestes, (If you will: If you shall heare,) the Lorde neither geueth vs power to will nor to heare, and yet mocketh vs not for our want of power.

11 The third sorte of their argumentes, hath also great affinitie with the two former. For they bring fourth the places wherein God reprocheth the vnthankfull people, and sayeth that they them selues onely were the cause that they receyued not of his tender loue all kindes of good thinges. Of which sorte are these places. Amaleck Num. 1 and the Chananee are before you, with whose swerde you shal fall, because ye woulde not obey the Lorde, because I called and ye aunswere- 43.

ued discipline, therefore it is cast away from the Lorde. Againe, because ye haue hardened your hearte and woulde not obey the Lorde, all these euilles are happened vnto you. Howe (say they) could such reproches be laide against them which might redely aunswere? As for vs, we loued prosperitie, and feared aduersitie. But where as for to obtaine the one and auoyde the other we obeyed not the Lorde, nor hearkened to his voice: this was the cause thereof, for that it was not at our libertie so to do, because we were subiect to the dominion of sinne. Vainely therefore are these euilles layde to our charge, which it was not in our power to auoyde. But leuing the pretense of necessitie, wherein they haue but a weake and sickly defence, I aske of them whether they can purge them selues of all fault. For if they be found guilty of any faulte, then the Lorde doth not without cause reproche them, that it came to passe by their peruersnesse, that they felt not the fruite of his clemencie. Let them aunswere therefore, whether they can denie, that their frowarde will was the cause of their stubbournnesse. If they finde the spring head of the euill within them selues, why gape they to finde out foreine causes, that they might seme not to haue bene authours of their owne destruction? But if it be true that by their owne faulte and none others, sinners are both deprived of the benefites of God, and chastised with punishmentes, then is there great reason why they should heare these reproches at the mouth of God: that if they go obstinately forwarde in their faultes, they may learne in their miteries rather to accuse and abhorre their owne wickednesse, than to blame God of vniust crueltie: that if they haue not cast of all willingnesse to learne, they may be wery of their sinnes, by the deseruinges whereof they see them selues miserable and vndone, and may retourne into the way, and acknowledge the same with earnest confession which the Lorde rehearseth in chiding them. For which purpose it appeareth by the solempne prayer of Daniel, which is in the ninth Chapter, that those chidinges of the Prophetes which are alleged, did auayle with the Godly. Of the first vse we see an example in the Iewes, to whome Hieremie is commaunded to declare the cause of their miseries, wheras yet it shoulde not haue fallen otherwise than the Lorde had foresaide. Thou shalt speake vnto them all these wordes, and they shall not heare thee: thou shalt call them, and they shall not aunswere thee. To what ende then did they singe to deafe men? that being euen loth and vnwilling, yet they shoulde vnderstande that it was true that they hearde, that it were wicked sacrilege if they shoulde lay vpon God the blame of their euils which rested in them selues. By these fewe solutions thou mayst easily deliuer thy thy selfe from the infinite heape of testimonies, which, for to erect an image of free will, the enemies of the grace of God are wont to gather together, as well out of the commaundementes as out of the protestations against the professors of the law. It is reprochefully spoken in the Psalme concerning the Iewes: A frowarde generation that haue not made their hearte streight. Also in an other Psalme, the Prophet exhorteth the men of his age, not to harden their heartes, and that bycause all the faulte of obstinacie remaineth in the peruersnesse of men. But it is fondely gathered therof, that the hearte is pliable to either side, the preparing wherof is onely of God. The Prophet saith: I haue enclined my hearte to keepe thy commaundementes: bycause he had willingly and with a cheerefull earnest affection of minde addicted himselfe to God, and yet he doth not boast him selfe to be the author of his owne inclinatio, which he confesseth in the same Psalme to be the gift of God. Therefore we must holde in minde the admonition of Paule, where he biddeth the faithfull to worke their owne saluation with feare and trembling, bycause it is the Lorde that worketh both the willing and the perfourming. In deede he assigneth them offices, to be doing, that they shoulde not geue them selues to sluggishnesse of the flesh: but in that he commaundeth the to haue feare and carefulnesse, he so humbleth them, that they may remembre that the same thing which they are commaunded to do, is the propre worke of God, wherin plainly he expresseth, that the faithful worke, passiuely, as I may so call it, in so much as power is ministred them from Heauen, that they should claime nothing at all to them selues. Wherefore when Peter exhorteth vs that we should adde power in faith, he graunteth not vnto vs a seconde office, as if we shoulde do any thing seuerally by our selues, but only he awaketh the slothefullnesse of the flesh, wherewith commonly faith it selfe is choked. To the same purpose seemeth that saying of Paule: Extinguish not y^e spirite, for slouthfullnesse doth oftentimes crepe vpon the faithfull, if it be not corrected. But if any man conclude thereupon, that it is in their owne choise to cherish the light being offred them, his ignoraunce shall be easily confuted: bycause the selfe same diligence that Paule requireth, cometh onely from God. For we are also oftentimes commaunded to purge our selues from all filthynesse: whereas the holy Ghost dothe claime to him selfe alone the office of making holy. Finally that by way of graunting the same thing, is conueyed to vs that properly belongeth to God, is plaine by the wordes of Iohn: Whosoeuer is of God, saueh him selfe. The aduancers of freewill take holde of this saying, as if we were saued partely by the power of God, that the godly, while they warre against Satan, do get the victorie by no other armure and weapōs, but by the armure and weapōs of God.

1. Pet. 1. Wherfore when Peter commaunded vs, to purifie our soules in the 12. obedience of truth, he byandby addeth as by way of correction, (by the holy Ghost.) Finally, how all mens strength are of no force in the

9. which are begotten of God, can not sinne, because the sede of God
1. Ioh. 5. abideth in them. And in an other place, he rendreth a reason why: for
4. that our faith is the victorie that ouercometh the worlde.

12 Yet there is alleged a testimonie out of the law of Moses, which semeth to be much against our saluation. For after the publishing of Deu. 30 the law, he protesteth vnto the people in this maner. The commaun-11. dement that I commaunde thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither farre of: It is not in heauen, but harde by thee, it is in thy mouth and in thy heart, thou shouldest do it. Truly if this be taken to be spoken of the bare cōmaundementes, I graunt they be of no smal weight to this present matter. For though it were easy to mocke it out with saying, that here is spoken not of the easinesse and redinesse of obseruation, but of knowledge: yet euen so, peradventure it woulde also leauē some doubt. But the Apostle which is no doubtfull expositour, Rom. 10 taketh away all doubt from vs, which affirmeth that Moses here spake 8. of the doctrine of the Gospell. But if any obstinate man will say, that Paule violently wrested those wordes, that they might be drawene to the Gospell: although his boldnesse so to say shal not be without impietie, yet is there sufficiēt matter beside the authoritie of the Apostle to conuince him withall. For if Moses spake of the cōmaundementes only, then he puffed vp the people with a most vaine confidence. For what should they els haue done, but throwen them selues down headlong, if they had taken vpō them the keping of the lawe by their own strength, as a thing not hard for them? Where is then that so ready easinesse to keepe the lawe, where there is no accesse vnto it, but by a hedlong fall to destruction? Wherfore there is nothing more certaine, than that Moses in these wordes did meane the couenant of mercie, which he had published together with the streight requiring of y^e law.
Deu. 30 For in a few verses before he had taught, that our heartes must be cir-8. cumcised by y^e hād of God, that we may loue him. Therefore he placed y^e easinesse, wherof he streightway after speaketh, not in the strēgth of mā, but in y^e helpe & succour of y^e holy Ghost, w^h performeth his worke mightely

mightely in our weakenesse. Albeit the place is not simply to be vnderstanded of the commaundementes, but rather of the promises of the Gospell, which are so farre from stablishing a power in vs to obtayne righteousnesse, that they vtterly ouerthrow it. Paul considering that same, proueth by this testimony, that saluation is offred vs in the Gospell, not vnder that hard and impossible condition, wherwith the law dealeth with vs, that is, that they onely shall attayne it which haue fulfilled all the commaundementes, but vnder a condition that is easie, ready, and playne to come vnto. Therefore this testimony maketh nothing to challenge freedom to the will of man.

13 There are also certaine other places w^ot to be obiected, wherby is shewed that God sometime, withdrawing y^e succour of his grace, trieth men, and wayteth to see to what end they will applie their endeouours, as is that place in Osee: I will go to my place till they put it in their heart and seeke my face. It were a fond thing (say they) if the Lord should consider whether Israel would seke his face, vnlesse their mindes were pliable that they might after their owne wil incline themselves to the one side or the other. As though this were not a thinge commonly vsed with God in the Prophetes, to make a shewe as if he did despise and cast away his people, till they haue amended their life. But what will the aduersaries gather out of such threatninges? If they meane to gather, that the people beinge forsaken of God, may purpose their owne saluation: all the Scripture shall cry out against them in so doing. If they confesse that the grace of God is necessary to conuersion, why striue they with vs? But they so graunt it necessary, that still they will haue mans power preserued vnto him. Howe proue they that? truly not by this place, nor any like to it. For it is one thing, to depart aside from man, and to looke what he will do being giuen ouer and left to himselfe, and an other thinge to helpe his litle strength after the measure of his weakenesse. What then (will some man say) do these manners of speaking meane? I aunswere that they are asmuch in effect, as if God had sayd: Forasmuch as I preuaile nothing with this stubborne people by admonishinge, exhorting and rebukinge, I will withdraw my selfe a while: and sitte still and suffer them to be afflicted: I will see if at length, after longe miseries, they will beginne to remember me, to seeke my face. The Lordes goinge farre away, signifieth the taking away of Prophecy: his lookinge what men will do, signifieth that he keepinge silence, and as it were hidinge himselfe, doth for a time exercise them with diuerse afflictions. Both these thinges he doth to humble vs the more. For we shoulde sooner be dulled than amended with the scourges of aduersity, vnlesse he did frame vs to that tractablenesse by his Spirite. Now whereas the Lorde beinge offended, and in a manner weryed with our obstinate stubbornesse, doth not for a time leaue vs (that is by takinge away his word in which he is wont to geue vs a certayne presence of himselfe) and doth make a proufe what we would do in his absence, it is falsely gathered hereof that there is any strength of free will that he should behold and trie, forasmuch as he doth it to no other ende, but to driue vs to acknowledge our owne being nothing.

14 They bringe also for their defence the continuall manner of speakinge, that is vsed both in the Scriptures and in the talke of men. For good workes are called ours, and it is no lesse sayd that we do the thing that is holy and pleasinge to God, than that we committe sinnes. But if sinnes be iustly imputed to vs, as proceedinge from vs, truely in righteous doinges also somewhat by the same reason ought to be assigned vnto vs. For it were against reason that it shoulde be sayd that we do those thinges, to the doing whereof being vnable of our owne motiō, we are moued by God like stones. Therefore though we giue the chiefe parte to the grace of God, yet these manners of speaking do shew that our endeuour hath also yet a second parte. If that thing onely were stil enforced, that good workes are called ours,

15. 6. I would obiect againe, that the bread is called ours, which we pray to haue giuen vs of God. What will they get by the title of possession, but that by the bountifulnes & free gift of God, the same thing becommeth ours, which otherwise is not due vnto vs? Therefore either lette them laugh at the same absurdity in the Lordes prayer, or let them not reckon this to be laughed at, that good workes are called ours, in which we haue no property, but by the liberality of God. But this is somewhat stronger, that the Scripture ostentimes affirmeth that we our selues do worship God, obey the law & apply good workes. Sith these are the duties properly belonging to the minde and will: howe could it agree that these thinges are both referred to the holy Ghost, & also attributed to vs, vnlesse there were a certaine communicatinge of our endeuour with the power of God? Out of these snares we shall easily vnwinde our selues, if we well consider the manner how the spirite of the Lorde worketh in the holy ones. The similitude wherwith they enuiously presse vs is from the purpose, for who is so sonde to thinke that the mouing of man differeth nothing from the casting of a stone? Neither doth any such thinge follow of our doctrine. We reckon among the naturall powers of man, to allow and refuse, to will and not will, to endeuour and to resist, that is, to allow allowe vanity and to refuse perfect goodnesse, to will euill and to be vnwilling to good, to endeubur our selues to wickednesse and to resist righteousnesse. What doth the Lord herein? If it be his will to vse that peruersenesse as an instrument of his wrath, he directeth and appointeth it to what end he will, that he by an euill hand may execute his good worke. Shall we then compare a wicked man that so serueth the power of God, when he laboureth onely to obey his owne lust, to a stone that beinge throwen by the violence of an other, is caried neither with mouing nor sense nor will of his owne? We se how much difference there is. But what doth he in good thinges, of which is our principall question? when he erecteth his kingdom in them, he by his spirit restrayneth mans will, that it be not caried vp and downe with wandering lustes, according to the inclination of nature: & that it may be bent to holinesse and righteousnesse, he boweth, frameth, fashio- neth & directeth it to the rule of his righteousnes: and that it should not stumble or fall, he doth stablish and confirme it with the strength of his spirite. For which reason Augustine sayth: Thou wilt say vn- to me: then we are wrought, and worke not. Yea thou both workest and art wrought, and thou workest well when thou art wrought of that which is good. The spirite of God that worketh thee, helpeth them that worke, and giueth himselfe the name of a helper, for that thou also workest somewhat. In the first parte he teacheth, that mans working is not taken away by the mouing of the holy Ghost, because will is of nature, which is ruled to aspire to goodnesse. But where he by and by addeth, that by the name of help, may be gathered that we also do worke somewhat, we ought not so to take it, as if he did giue any thing seuerally to vs: but because he woulde not cherish slouth- fullnesse in vs, he so matcheth the working of God with ours, that to will may be of nature, and to will well of grace. Therefore he sayd a litle before, Vnlesse God helpe vs, we shall not be able to ouercome, no nor yet to fight at all.

15 Hereby appeareth, that the grace of God (as the word is taken when we speake of regeneration) is the rule of the spirite, to direct & gouerne the will of man. And it can not gouerne it, vnlesse it correct it, reforme it, and renew it (from whence we say that the beginnige of regeneration is, that that which is ours might be destroyed) & vn- lesse it moue it, stirre it, driue it forward, cary it and hold it. Where- upon we do truly say, that all the doinges that proceede from it, are wholly the only worke of the same grace. In the meane time we denie not that it is very true that Augustine teacheth, that will is not destroyed by grace, but rather repayred. For both these thinges do stand very well together : that mens will be sayd to be restored , when the faultinesse and peruersenesse thereof being reformed, it is directed to the true rule of iustice:and also that a new will be sayd to be created in man,forasmuch as it is so defiled and corrupted,that it needeth vtterly to put on a new nature . Nowe is there no cause to the contrary, but that we may well be sayd to do the same thing that the spirit of God doth in vs , although our owne will do of it selfe giue vs toward it nothing at all,that may be seuered from his grace. And therefore we must kepe that in mind,which we haue elsewhere alledged out of Augustine , that some do in vayne trauaile to finde in the will of man some good thinge that is properly her owne . For whatsoever mixture men study to bring from the strength of free wil to the grace of God,it is nothings but a corruptinge of it, as if a man would delay wine with dirty and bitter water.But although whatsoever good is in the wil of man,it proceedeth from y^e mere instinct of the holy Ghost, yet because it is naturally planted in vs to will , it is not without cause sayd,that we do those thinges whereof God chalengeth the praise to himselfe.First,because it is ours whatsoever by his goodnesse he worketh in vs , so that we vnderstand it to be not of our selues : and then because the minde is ours,the will is ours,the endeouour is ours,which are by him directed to good.

16 Those other testimonies beside these , that they scrape together here and there , shall not much trouble euen meane wittes that haue well conceiued onely the solutions aboue sayd.They allege that saying out of Genesis , Thine appetite shalbe vnder thee , and thou shalt beare rule ouer it.Which they expound of sinne,as if y^e Lord did promise to Cain,that the force of sinne should not get the vpper had in his minde,if he would labour in subduinge of it. But we say that it better agreeth with the order of the text,that this be taken to be spoken of Abell. For there Gods purpose was to reprove the wickednes of the enuy that Cain had conceiued against his brother.And that he doth two wayes . One, that in vayne he imagined mischief to excell his brother in Gods sight , before whom no honor is giuen but vnto righteousness : the other , that he was to much vnthankefull for the benefit of God which he had already receiued,which could not abide his brother , although he had him subiect vnder his authority . But least we should seme therefore to embrace this exposition,because the other is against vs : let vs admitte that God spake of sinne. If it be so, then God either promiseth or commaundeth that which he there declareth. If he commaundeth,then haue we already shewed that thereby followeth no proufe of the power of man. If he promiseth,where is the fulfilling of the promise? for Cain became subiect to sinne, ouer which he should haue had dominion. They will say, that in the promise was included a secrete condition, as if it had bin sayd, that he should haue the victory if he would striue for it. But who will receiue these crooked compasses? For if this dominion be meant of sinne, then no man can doubt that it is spoken by way of commaundement, wherein is not determined what we are able to do, but what we ought to do, yea though it be aboue our power. Albeit both the matter it selfe and the order of Grammer do require, that there be a comparison made of Cain and Abel, because the elder brother should not haue bin set behinde the yonger, vnlesse he had become worse by his owne wicked doing.

17 They vse also the testimony of the Apostle, which saith, that it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. Wherby they gather that there is somewhat in mans will and endeouour, which of it selfe, though it be weake, beinge holpen by the mercy of God, is not without prosperous successe. But if they did soberly wey what matter Paule there intreateth of, they woulde not so vnaduisedly abuse this sentence. I know that they may bringe forth Origen and Hierome for maintainers of their exposition: and I coulde on the other side set Augustine against them. But what they haue thought, it maketh no matter to vs, if we know what Paul meant. There he teacheth that saluation is prepared only for them, to whom the lord vouchsaueth to graunt his mercy: and that ruine and destruction is prepared for all those that he hath not chosen. He had vnder the example of Pharao declared the state of the reprobate, & had also confirmed the assurednes of free election by the testimony of Moses, I will haue mercy vpon whom I will haue mercy. Nowe he concludeth, that it is not of him that willeth, or him that runneth, but of God that hath mercy. If it be thus vnderstanded, that wil or endeouour are not sufficiēt, because they are to weake for so great a weight, that which Paule sayth, had not bin aptly spoken: Therefore away with these surltelies, to say: It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, therefore there is some will, there is some running. For Pauls meaning is mere simply, thus: It is not will, it is not running that get vs the way to saluation, herin is only the mercy of God. For he speaketh no otherwise in this place than he doth to Titus, where he writeth, that the goodnesse and kindenesse of God appeareth not by the workes of righteousness, which we haue done, but for his infinite mercy. They themselues that make this argument, that Paule meant that there is some will & some running, because he said, y it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, would not giue me leaue to reason after the same fashion, that we haue done some good workes, because Paul sayth, that we haue not attayned the goodnesse of God by the good works that we haue done. If they see a fault in this argumēt, let them open their eyes, & they shall perceiue that their owne is not without the like deceite. For that is a sure reason that Augustine resteth vpon, If it were therfore sayd that it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, because neither the will nor the running is sufficient. Then it may be turned on the contrary parte that it is not of the mercy of God, because it alone worketh not. Sith this second is an absurdity, Augustine doth rightfully conclude, that this is spoken to this meaning, that there is no good will of man, vnlesse it be prepared of the Lord, not but that we ought both to will and to runne, but because God worketh both in vs. No lesse vnaptly do some wrest that sayinge of Paule: We are the workers with God, which out of doubt ought to be restrayned only to the ministers: and that they are called workers with him, not that they bring any thing of theselues, but because God vseth their seruice, after that he hath made the mete and furnished with necessary giftes.

18 They bring foorth Ecclesiasticus, who, as it is not vnknown, is a wryter of whose authority is doubted. But although we refuse it not (which yet we may lawfully do) what doth he testifie for free will? He sayth, that man so soone as he was created, was left in the hand of his owne counsell: that commaundementes were giuen him, which if he obserued, he shoulde agayne be preferued by them: that before man was set life and death, good and euill: that whatsoeuer he would, should be giuen him. Be it, that man receiued from his creation power to obtaine either life or death. What if on the other side we answer that he lost it? Truly my minde is not, to speake against Salomon, which affirmeth that man at the beginning was create vpright, and he forged vnto himselfe many inuentions. But because man in swaruing, lost as it were by shipwreke both himselfe and all his good things, it followeth not by and by, that all that is giuen to his first creation belongeth to his nature being corrupted and degenerate. Therefore I answer, not to them onely, but also to Ecclesiasticus himselfe whatsoeuer he be. If thou meane to instruct man, to seeke within himselfe power to attayne saluation, thy authority is not of so great force with vs, that it may be any preiudice, be it neuer so small, against the vndoubted word of God. But if thou only study to restrayne the malice of the flesh, which in laying the blame of her owne euills vpon God, vseth to seeke a vayne defense for it selfe, & therefore thou answerest that that vprightnesse was giuen vnto men, whereby it may appeare that himselfe was cause of his owne destruction, I willingly agree vnto it: so that againe thou agree in this with me, that now by his owne fault he is spoyled of those ornamentes, wherwith God had clothed him at the beginning: & that so we confesse together, that now he more needeth a Phisician than a defender.

19 Yet they haue nothing oftener in their mouth thã ȳ parable of Christ of the wayfaring man, whom the eues layd abroad halfe dead in the way. I know that it is common almost with all wryters, that the calamity of mākinde is represented vnder the figure of that wayfaring man. Therupon do our aduersaries gather an argument, ȳ man is not so maymed with the robbery of sinne and the Deuill, but ȳ he keepeth still remayning the leauinges of his former good things, forasmuch as it is sayd, that he was left halfe aliue. For where is that halfe life, vnles some portion both of right reason & will remayned? First if I would not giue place to their allegory, I beseech you, what would they do? For there is no dout that it was deuised by the fathers beside the naturall sense of the Lordes wordes. Allegories ought to go no further than they haue the rule of Scripture going before them: so farre is it of, that they be by themselues sufficient to ground any doctrines. And there want not reasons, whereby I can, if I list, ouerthrow this deuise, for the word of God leaueth not to man halfe a life, but teacheth that he is vtterly dead, for somuch as cōcerneth blessed life. And Paul whē he speaketh of our redemption, doth not say that we were healed, whē we were halfe dead and halfe aliue, but that we were raised vp againe when he were dead. He calleth not vpon them that are halfe aliue to receiue the light of Christ, but them that slepe and are buried. And in like maner speaketh the Lord himselfe, when he sayth, that the houre is come when the dead shall rise againe at his voice. With what face would they set this light allusiō against so many plaine sentences? But let this allegory haue the force of a certaine testimony, yet what shall they wring out of vs therby? Mā is halfe aliue, therefore he hath somewhat left safe. I graunt: he hath a wit capable of vnderstāding, although it pearce not to ȳ heauenly and spirituall wisdom: he hath true iudgement of honesty: he hath some feeling of the godhead howbeit ȳ he attaine not the true knowledge of God. But to what purpose come all these thinges? Truly they bring not to passe that the same saying of Augustine be taken frō vs, which is also approued by cōmon consent of the Schooles: that after mans fall the freely giuen good thinges, whereupon saluation hangeth, are taken away from him, and that his naturall giftes are corrupted and defiled. Lette therefore this truth remayne with vs vndouted, which can be shaken by no engines, that the minde of man is so estranged frō the righteousnes of God, that it cōceiueth, coueteth, & enterpriseth al wickednes, filthines, vncleannes, and mischiefe: that his heart is so thoroughly soked in poyson of sinne, that it can breath out nothings but corrupt stinke: But if at any time they do vtter any goodnes in shew, yet still the minde remayneth alway wrapped in hypocrisie and deceitfull crookednesse, and the heart entangled with inward peruersnes.

The vj. Chapter.

That man being lost, must seeke for redemption in Christ.

Sith all mankinde hath perished in the person of Adam, that excellence and nobility of beginninge which we haue spoken of would so litle profit vs, that it would rather turne to our greater shame, till God appeare the redeemer in the person of his onely begotten Sonne, which acknowledgeth not men defiled and corrupted with sinne. to be his worke. Therefore sith we are fallen from life into death, all that knowledge of God the creator whereof we haue entreated, were vnprofitable, vnlesse there followed also faith setting foorth God a father vnto vs in Christ. Truely this was the naturall order that the frame of the world should be a Schoole vnto vs to learne godlinesse, from whence might be made a passage for vs to eternall life and perfect felicity: but since our fallinge away, whether soeuer we turne our eyes, vpward and downeward, the curse of God still presenteth it selfe vnto our sight, which while it possesseth and enwrappeth innocent creatures by our fault, must needs ouerwhelme our owne soules with desperation. For although Gods will is that his fatherly fauour toward vs do still many wayes appeare: yet by beholding of the worlde we cannot gather that he is our Father when our conscience inwardly pricketh vs, and sheweth that there is in sinne iust cause of forsaking, why God should not accompt or reckon vs for his children. Beside that there is in vs both slouthfullnesse and vnthankfulnesse: because both our mindes, as they be blinded, do not see the trueth, and also as all our senses be peruerse, we maliciously defraude God of his glory. Therefore we must come to that sayinge of Paule:

because in the wisdom of God, the world knew not God by wisdom, it pleased God by the foolishnesse of preachinge to saue them that beleue. The wisdom of God he calleth this honorable stage of heauen and earth, furnished with innumerable miracles, by beholdinge whereof we ought wisely to haue knowen God. But because we so ill profited therein, he calleth vs backe to the fayth of Christ, which for that

that it seemeth foolish, y^e vnbeleuers do disdain. Wherefore although the preaching of the crosse do not agree with mā's wit, yet ought we humbly to embrace it, if we desire to returne to God our creator and maker, that he may beginne againe to be our father. Truely since the fall of the first man, no knowledge of God auailed to saluation, without the Mediatour. For Christ speaketh not of his owne age onely, Ioh. 17.
3. but comprehendeth all ages, whē he sayth that this is the eternall life, to know the father the one true God, & him whom he hath sent Iesus Christ. And so much the fowler is their sluggishnesse, which take vpon them to set open heauen to all prophane and vnbeleuing men, without his grace whom, the Scripture ech where teacheth to be the only gate wherby we entre into saluation. But if any wil restrayne that saying of Christ only to the publishing of the Gospel, we haue in readinesse wherwith to confute him. For this hath bin a cōmon sentence in all ages & among all nations, that without reconciliation they that are estranged from God & pronounced, accursed and the children of wrath, can not please God. And here may be also alleaged that which Christ answered to the womā of Samaria: Ye worship what ye know not, but we worship that which we know: because the saluation is frō the Iewes. In which wordes he both condemneth of falsehood all the religions of the Gentiles, and also assigneth a reason why, for that the Redemer was promised vnder the lawe to the onely chosen people. Whereupon it followeth, that no worship euer pleased God, but that which had respect vnto Christ. For which cause also Paule affirmeth Iohn. 4.
21. that all the nations of the Gentiles were without God, and voide of the hope of life. Now wheras Iohn teacheth that life was from the beginning in Christ, and that all the world fell from it, we must nedes returne to the same fountayne Christ. And therefore Christ, insomuch as he is the reconciler, affirmeth himselfe to be the life. And truly the inheritance of heauen belongeth to none, but to the childrē of God. But it is not meete that they be accompted in the place and degree of childrē, that are not grafted into the body of the only begotten sonne. And Iohn plainly testifieth, that they which beleue in his name, are made the children of God. But because it is not directly my purpose yet to discourse of sayth in Christ, therefore it shall for this time be sufficient to haue touched it by the way.

2 And therefore God neuer shewed himselfe mercifull to the olde people, nor euer did put them in any hope of grace without the Mediatour. I omitte to speake of the sacrifices of the lawe, wherein the faithfull were openly and plainly taught, that saluation is no where else to be sought, but in the cleansing which was performed by Christ

alone. Only this I say, that the blessed and happy state of the church hath bin alway grounded vpon y person of Christ. For though God comprehended all the issue of Abraham in his couenant, yet doth Paule wisely reason, that Christ is properly that seede in whom all nations were to be blessed, forasmuch as we know that not all they were reckened his seede that were begotten of him according to the flesh. For (to speake nothing of Ismael and other) how came it to passe that of the two sonnes of Isaac, that is Esau and Iacob, brethren borne at one birth, while they were yet together in their mothers wombe, the one was chosen, the other refused? Yea how came it to passe that the elder was reiected and the yonger only tooke place? And how also came it to passe, that the greater parte should be forsaken? It appeareth therefore, that the seede of Abraham was principally reckened in one person, and that the promised saluation did neuer stande sure till it came to Christ, whose office is to gather together the things that were scattered abroad. Therefore the first adoption of the chosen people did hang vpon the grace of y Mediatour. Which though it be not in so plaine wordes expressed by Moses, yet it sufficiently appeareth that it was commonly knowen to all the godly. For before that there was any king create among the people, Hanna the mother of Samuell entreatinge of the felicity of the godly, euen then sayd thus in her song: God shall giue strength to his king, and shal exalt the horne of his anointed. In which wordes she meaneth that God shall blesse his church. Wherewith also agreeth the oracle that is within a litle after adioyned: The Priest whom I shall appoint shall walke before mine anointed. Neither is it to be doubted, but that the will of the heavenly father was to haue the liuely image of Christ to be seene in Dauid and his posterity. Therefore meaning to exhorre the godly to the feare of God, he biddeth them to kisse the Sonne. Wherwith this saying of the Gospell also agreeth: He that honoreth not the sonne, honoreth not the father. Therefore although by fallinge away of ten tribes the kingdome decayed: yet it behoued the couenant to stande which God had made in Dauid and his successours: as also he sayd by the Prophets: I will not altogether cut of the kingdome, for Dauid my seruantes sake, and for Hierusalems sake, whom I haue chosen: but there shall remaine one tribe to thy sonne. Where the same thing is repeated the second and third time. It is also expressely added. I will afflict the seede of Dauid; but not for euer with in a litle space of time after, it is sayd. For Dauid his seruantes sake God hath geuen a light in Hierusalem, to rayse vp a sonne and to kepe Hierusalem in sauctie. Now when the state grew toward destruction, it was said agayne: God would would not scatter Iuda for Dauid his seruantes sake, because he had spokē ȳ he would giue a light to hī & his sonnes for euer. Finally this is the summe, that all other being passed ouer, only Dauid was chosen, vpon whom the good pleasure of God should rest. As in another place it is sayd: He hath refused the tabernacle of Silo, and the tabernacle of Ioseph, and he hath not chosen the tribe of Ephraim, but he hath chosen the tribe of Iuda, the mount Sion which he hath loued. He hath chosen his seruant Dauid to feede Iacob his people, and Israell his inheritāce. To cōclude, it pleased God so to saue his church, that the safety and preseruation thereof should hange vpon that one head, & therefore Dauid crieth out, The Lord ȳ strength of his people, the strength of the saluations of his Christ. And by and by he addeth a prayer: Saue thy people & blesse thine inheritāce: meaning that the state of the church is with vnseparable knot ioyned to the governmēt of Christ. And in ȳ same meaning in another place: Lord saue vs: Let the king heare vs in the day ȳ we shall call vpon him. In which words he plainly teacheth, that the faithfull did vpon none other confidence flee to the helpe of God, but because they were hidden vnder the succour of the king. Which is gathered by another Psalm: Lord saue vs: Blessed is he that cōmeth in the name of the Lord. Where it is plaine enough, that the faithfull are called backe vnto Christ, that they may hope that they shalbe saued by ȳ hand of God. The same respect hath the other prayer, where all the Church calleth vpon ȳ mercy of God. Let thy hand be vpon the man of thy right hand, vpon the sonne of mā, whom thou hast preserued (or appointed) to thy selfe. For though the author of the Psalme bewayleth ȳ scattrig abrode of the whole people, yet he praieth for their restitution in the head alone. Where, when the people was led away into exile, the land wasted, & all things to mans seruing destroyed, Hieremy lamenteth the ouerthrow of the Church, he doth principally complaine that by destruction of the kingdom all hope was cut of from the faithfull. Christ (sayth he) the spirit of our mouth is taken in our sinnes, to whom we sayd; In thy shadowe we shall liue among the nations. Hereby now it sufficiently appeareth, that because God can not be merciful to mankind without the Mediatour, therefore Christ was alway set before the holy fathers in time of the law, to whom they might direct their faith.

Now, where cōfort is promised in affliction, specially where the deliuerāce of the Church is described, there the banner of affiance and hope is auanced in Christ alone. God went out to the sauing of his people with his Messiah, sayth Habacuc. And so oft as the Prophetes make mention of the restoring of the Church, they call backe the people to the promise made to Dauid, concerning the euerlasting continuance of the kingdome. And no maruell. For otherwise there had bin no assurace of the couenant. For which purpose serueth that notable answere of Esay. For when he saw that the vnbeleuing kinge Achaz refused that which he had declared to him of the rayfinge of the siege of Hierusalem and of present safety, as it were sodainely, he passed ouer to Messias. Behold a virgine shall conceiue and bring forth a Sonne, meaninge indirectly that though the king and his people by their frowardnesse refused the promise offered vnto them, as though they did of purpose bend themselues to discredite the truth of God, yet the couenant should not be voide, but that the Redemer shoulde come at his appointed time. Finally it was the care of all the Prophets, to the ende they might shew that God would be mercifull, alway to set out that kingdom of Dauid, wherupon hanged the redemption and euerlasting saluation. So Esay sayth: I will make a couenant with you the faithfull mercies of Dauid. Beholde I haue giuen him for a witnessse vnto nations, that is, because the faythfull when their state is at the worst, coulde not otherwise haue any hope, but by the meanes of him beinge witnessse, that God would be appeaseable toward them. Likewise Hieremy, to raise them vp beinge in despeire, sayth: Beholde the dayes come, wherein I will raise vp vnto Dauid a righteous branche, and then shall Iuda be saued, and Israell shall dwell in safety. And Ezechiell sayeth; I raise vp one sheepeherd ouer my sheepe, euen Dauid my seruant. I the Lord will be a God to them, and my seruaunt Dauid for a sheepeherd. And I will make a couenant of peace with them. Also in an other place, after he had entreated of the incredible renuinge, he sayeth: my seruaunt Dauid shalbe their King, and there shalbe one sheepeherd ouer all, and I will make an euerlastinge couenant of peace with them. I gather here and there a fewe places out of many, because I onely meane to haue the readers putte in minde, that the hope of all the godly hath alway bin reposed no where else but in Christ. And all the other Prophetes also speake agreeably hereunto, as it is sayd in Osee. The children of Iuda and the children of Israell shalbe gathered together, and shall appoynt to themselues one head. Which he afterward more plainly expoundeth, The children of Israell shall returne; & shall seeke for the Lord their God and Dauid their king. And Michee speaking of the returne of the people expressely sayth, The king shall go before them, & the Lord in their head. So Amos meaning to prayse the renuing of the people, sayth: I will in that day raise vp the tabernacle of Dauid that is fallen downe, and I wil hedge vp the gappes, and raise vp the places ouerthro-ouerthrowen, euen because that was the only standard of saluation, to haue the royall glory to rise vp againe on hie in the stocke of Dauid, which is fulfilled in Christ. Therefore Zacharie, as his age was nerer to the appearing of Christ, so doth he more plainly crie out: be glad thou daughter of Sion, reioise thou daughter of Hierusalem. Beholde thy king commeth, righteous and saued. Which agreeth with the place of the Psalme before alleaged. The lorde the strength of the saluations of his anointed, Lord saue vs. Where saluation is deriued from the head to the whole body.

4 It was Gods will to haue the Iewes so instructed with these prophecies, that to seke for their deliuerance, they should bend their eyes directly to Christ. And though they had shamfully swarued, yet could not the remembrance of the generall principle be abolished, that God by the hand of Christ, as he had promised to Dauid, would be the deliuerer of his church, and so the couenant should be of his owne free graunt, wherby God had adopted his chosen. Hereby it came to passe, that this songe sounded in the mouth of the children when Christ a litle before his death entred into Hierusalé, Hosianna to the sonne of Dauid. For it appeareth that it was commonly knowen and spoken of, & according to common vse that they song, that the only pledge of Gods mercy remayned vnto them, in the coming of the Redemer. For this cause Christ himselfe, to make his disciples plainly and perfectly beleue in God, biddeth thē to beleue on himselfe, Beleue ye in God, (saith he) then beleue also in me. For though (to speake properly) faith climeth vp from Christ to the father, yet he meaneth that the same faith, albeit it rest vpon God, doth by litle and litle vanish away, vnlesse he become a meane to hold it in assured stedfastnesse. Otherwise the maiesty of God is to hie for mortall men, which creepe vpon the grounde like wormes, to attaine vnto it. Wherefore I allowe that common saying, that God is the obiekt of faith, but in such sorte that it needeth correction. Because Christ is not in vaine called the invisible Image of God, but by this title we are put in minde, that if we finde not God in Christ, saluation can not be knowen vnto vs. For although amonge the Iewes, the Scribes and Pharisees had darkened with false inuentions, that which the Prophetes had spoken concerning the Redeemer: yet Christ tooke it for a thing confessed as received by common cōsent, that there was none other remedy, despered case, and no other meane of deliueringe the church, but by giuing the Mediatour. In deede that was not commonly knowen amonge the people as it ought to haue bin, which Paule teacheth, that Christ is the ende of the lawe. But howe true and assured it is, doth playnely appear by the law and the Prophetes. I speake not yet of fayth, because there shalbe elsewhere a more conuenient place for it. Only let the readers hold this as fast stablished, that the first degree of godliness be, to acknowledge God to be a Father vnto vs, to defend, gouerne and cherish vs, till he gather vs together into the euerlasting inheritance of his kingdom: and that hereby it plainly appeareth which we sayd euen now, that the knowledge of God which bringeth saluation, standeth not without Christ, and that therefore from the beginning he hath bin set forth vnto all the elect, that they should looke vpon him, and that in him should rest all their affiance. Accordinge to this meaning writeth Ireneus, that the Father which is vnmeasurable, is in his Sonne measured, because he hath applied himselfe to y^e measure of our capacity, lest he should drowne our mindes with the vnmeasurablnes of his glory. Which thing the phrentike men not considering, do wrest a profitable sentence to a wicked fantasy, as though there were in Christ but a portion of the godhead deriued from the whole perfection: whereas it meaneth nothing else, but that God is comprehended in Christ alone. That sayinge of Iohn hath alway bin true: He y^e hath not the Sonne, neither hath he the father. For though in old time many did boast that they worshipped the soueraigne God, the maker of heauen and earth: yet because they had no Mediatour, it was impossible that they should truely tast of the mercy of God, & so be perswaded y^e he was their father. Therefore because they knew not y^e head that is Christ, the knowledge of God was but vaine among them: whereby also it came to passe, that at length falling into grosse & filthy superstitions, they bewrayed their owne ignorance. As at this day the Turkes, although they report with full mouth, that the creator of heauen and earth is their God, yet do they thrust an idol in place of the true God while they swarue from Christ.

That the law was giuen, not to hold still the people in it, but to nourish the hope of saluation in Christ untill his comming.

BY this continuall processe that we haue rehearsed, may be gathered, that the law was added about foure hundred yeres after the death of Abraham, not for this entet to lead away the chosen people from Christ: but rather to keepe theyr mindes in expectation vntill his comming, to kindle a desire of him, & to confirme them in looking for him, that they should not waxe faint with long tariance. I meane by this word Law, not only the ten commaundementes dementes, which prescribe a rule how to liue godhly and righteously, but also the forme of religion deliuered by the hand of Moses. For Moses was not made a lawgiuer to abolish the blessing promised to the kinred of Abraham: but rather we see how euery where he putteth the Iewes in remembrance of that free couenaunt made with their fathers whose heires they were, as if he had bin sent to renewe the same. That was most plainely set foorth by the ceremonies. For what were more vaine and fonde, than for men to offer vp lothsome stinke of the fat of cattell, to reconcile themselues to God therby? to flee to the sprinkling of water or bloud to wash away their filthines? Finally, all the seruice of God apointed in the law (if it be considered by it selfe, and do not containe shadows and figures, which the truth should answer vnto) shalbe but a very mockery. Wherefore not without a cause both in Stephens sermō, & in the Epistle to the Hebrues is that place so diligently weyed, where God commaūdeth Moses to make all things pertaining to the tabernacle, according to the paterne that had bin shewed him in the mount. For if there had bin some spirituall thing appointed that they should tend vnto, y^e Iewes should no lesse haue fondly spent their labour in them, than the Gentiles did in their trifles. Prophane men that neuer earnestly applied the study of godlinesse, cannot without lothsome tediousnesse abide to here so many sundry fashions of vsages: and they not onely maruell why God wearied his people with such a heape of ceremonies, but also they despise and scorne them as childrens playes. And the cause is, for that they consider not the end, frō which if the figures of the law be seuered, they must needes be condemned of vanity. But that same figure sheweth, that God did not therefore commaund sacrifices, because he would occupie them that worshipped him with earthly exercises, but rather to raise vp their minds hier. Which may also plainly appeare by his nature: for as he is spirituall, so he is delited with no other worshippinge but spirituall. This do the sayinges of the Prophetes testific, wherein they rebuke the Iewes of sluggishnes, for that they thought that any sacrifices were of any value with God. Is that because their purpose is to derogate any thing from the law? No, but according as they were true expositours of the law, so they would by this meane haue mens eyes directed to the marke frō which the cōmon people strayed. Now by the grace offered to the Iewes, it is certainly gathered, that the law was not void of Christ. For Moses did set forth vnto them this end of the adoption, that they shoulde become a priestly kingdom to God. Which they coulde not obtaine vnles there were had for the meane therof, a greater and more excellent.

reconciliation, than by the blood of beastes. For what is lesse likely than Adams children, which by inheritably descending infection are all borne the bondslaves of sinne, to be aduanced to royal dignity, & so to become partakers of the glory of God, vnlesse that so excellent a benefit shoulde come vnto them from else where than from themselves? Also how could y^e right of priesthoode remaine in force among them, who by filthinesse of sinnes were abhominable to God, vnles they had bin consecrate in a holy head? Wherefore Peter doth very aptly turne that saying of Moises, where he teacheth, that the fulnes of grace, the tast wherof the Iewes had taken vnder the law, was giuen in Christ. Yea are (sayth he) a choisen kinred, a kingly priesthoode. For to this end tendeth that turning of the wordes, to shewe that they, to whom Christ appeared by the Gospel, haue obtained more than their fathers, because they are all endued both wth priestly and kingly honor, that trusting vpon their mediatour, they may freely be bold to come forth into the sight of God.

2 And here by the way it is to be noted, that the kingdom which at length was erected in the house of Dauid, is part of the law, & contained vnder the ministry of Moses. Whereupon followeth, that as wel in all the kinred of the Leuites as in the posterity of Dauid Christ was set before the eyes of y^e olde people as in a double looking glasse. For, as I sayd euen now, they could not otherwise be before God either kings or priestes, which were both the bondslaves of sinne and of death, & defiled by their owne corruption. Herby appeareth that that saying of Paul is most true, that the Iewes were holden as vnder the keeping of a Schoolemaister, till the seide came for whose sake the promise was giuen. For, because Christ was not yet familiarly knowen, they were like vnto children, whose weaknesse could not yet beare a full knowledge of heauenly thinges, but howe they were by ceremonies as it were led by the hand to Christ, is before spoken, & may be better vnderstanded by many testimonies of the Prophetes. For although it was commaunded them to come daily with newe sacrifices to appease God: yet Esay promiseth that all their sinnes shalbe cleansed with one onely sacrifice. Wherewith Daniell agreably sayeth: The priestes appointed of the tribe of Leui, did enter into the Sanctuary: but of the only priest it was once sayd, that by an oth he was chosen of God to be a priest for euer, according to the order of Melchisedec. At that time the anointing with oile was visible: but Daniel by his vision pronounceth y^e there shalbe an other manner of anointing. And because I will not rary vpon many examples, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues euen from the 4. chapter to the 11. doth largely and plainly plainely enough shewe, that the ceremonies are nothing worth and vaine till we come to Christ. As concerning the tenne commaundements: that lesson of Paule is likewise to be kept in minde, that Christ is the ende of the law vnto saluation, to euery one that beleueth: And an other lesson, that Christ is the Spirite that quickeneth the letter which of it selfe slayeth. For in the first of these two, he meaneth that righteousnesse is vainely taught by commaundementes, vntill Christ do geue it both by free imputation and by the spirite of regeneration. Wherefore he worthily calleth Christ the fulfilling or ende of the law. Bycause it shoulde nothing profit vs to knowe what God requireth of vs, vnlesse he did succour vs fainting and oppressed vnder the yoke & vntolerable burden. In an other place he teacheth that the lawe was made for transgressions, that is to bring men to humilitie being proved guilty of their owne damnation. And, bycause this is the true and onely preparation to seke Christ, what so euer he teacheth in diuerse wordes, do all very well agree together. But bycause he then was in contention with peruerse teachers, which fained that we do deserue righteousnesse by the workes of the lawe, to confute their errour, he was compelled sometime to speake precisely of the bare lawe, which yet otherwise is clothed with the couenant of free adoption.

3 But now it is good to know, how being taught by the morall lawe, we are made more inexcusable, that our owne guiltynesse may moue vs to craue pardon. If it be true that we be taught perfection of righteousnesse in the lawe: then this also followeth, that the absolute keeping thereof is perfect righteousnesse before God, that is, whereby a man may be demed and accompted righteous before the heauenly throne of iudgement. Wherefore Moses, when he had published the lawe, doubted not to protest before heauen and earth, that he had set before Israell life and death, good and euill. And we may not denie, but that the rewarde of eternall saluation belongeth to the vpright obedience of the lawe, as the Lord hath promised it. Againe, yet it is good to examine, whether we performe that obedience, vpon desert whereof we may conceiue a trust of that rewarde. For to what small purpose is it, to see the rewarde of eternall life set in keeping of the lawe, vnlesse we further knowe whether we may by that way attaine to eternall life? But herein the weakenesse of the lawe doth shewe it selfe. For bycause that keeping of the lawe is founde in none of vs all, we are excluded from the promises of life, and do fall into curse only. I do not nowe tell what doth come to passe, but what needes must so come to passe. For where as the doctrine of the lawe is farre aboue the power of man, he may in deede a farre of, looke at the promises, but yet not gather any fruite of them . Therefore this one thing remaineth, that by the goodnesse of them he may the better weye his owne miserie, while he considereth, that all hope of saluation being cut of, death doth certainly hang ouer him . On the other side do presse vs terrible penall lawes, which do holde entangled and fast bounde not onely a fewe of vs, but euery one without exception: they presse vs, I say, and do pursue vs, with vnappeasable rigour, so that we may se most present death in the lawe.

4 Therefore if we loke only vpon the lawe, we can do nothing but be discouraged, be confounded, and despeire, forasmuch as by it we are all damned and cursed, & kept farre of from the blessednesse that he offreth to them that worship him. Wilt thou say then, Doth the Lord so mocke vs? For how smally doth it differ from mocking, to shewe forth a hope of felicitie, to allure and exhorte men vnto it, to protest that it is layed open for vs, when in the meane season the entrie vnto it is forclosed and impossible to be come to? I aunswere: although the promises of the lawe, in so much as they are conditional, do hang vpon the perfect obedience of the lawe, which can no where be founde, yet are they not geuen in vaine. For when we haue learned that they shalbe voide and of no effect vnto vs, vnlesse God embrace vs with his free goodnesse without regarde of our workes, and vnlesse we do embrace by faith the same goodnesse geuen vs by the Gospell, then want they not their effectualnesse, yea with their condition annexed. For then he doth so freely geue all thinges vnto vs, that he addeh this also to the heape of his bountifullnesse, that not refusing our halfe full obedience, and remitting so much as it wanteth of full performance, he so maketh vs to enioy the fruite of the promises of the lawe, as if we our selues had fulfilled the condition. But we will at this present procede no further in this matter, by cause it shalbe more largely to be entreated of, when we shall speake of the Iustification of faith.

5 Wheras we said that it is impossible to kepe the lawe, that is in fewe wordes to be both expounded and proued. For it is wont among the people commonly to be accompted an opinion of great absurditie, so farre that Hierome doubted not to pronounce it accursed: what Hierome thought, I do nothing stay vpon: as for vs, let vs search what is truth. I will not here make long circumstances of diuerse sortes of possibilities. I call that impossible, which both neuer hath ben, and also is hindered by the ordinance and decree of God, that it neuer hereafter may be. If we recorde from the farthest time of memorie, I say that there hath none of the holy men, that being clothed with the

bodie of death, hath euer attained to that full perfection of loue, to loue God with all his heart, with all his minde, with all his soule, with all his power: Againe; that there hath bene none that hath not bene troubled with concupiscence. Who can say Nay? I see in deede what maner holy men foolish superstition doth imagine vnto vs, euen such whose purenesse the heauenly Angels do scarcely counteruaile: but against both the Scripture and profe of experience. I say also, that there shall none hereafter be, that shall come to the marke of true perfection, vnlesse he be loosed from the burden of his bodie. For this point there are open testimonies of Scripture. Salomon said, there is not a righteous man vpon the earth that sinneth not. And Dauid said: euery liuing man shal not be iustified in thy sight. Iob in many places affirmeth the same. But Paule most plainly of all: that the flesh lusteth against the spirite, and the spirite against the flesh. And by no other reason he proueth that all that are vnder the lawe, are subiect to the curse. But bycause it is written, that cursed are all they that do not abide in all the commaundementes therof: meaning, or rather taking it as a thing confessed, that no man can abide in them. And what soeuer is forespoke by the Scriptures, that must be holden for perpetuall, yea and necessarie. With such subtiltie did the Pelagians trouble Augustine, saying that there is wrong done to God, to say that he doth commaund more than the faithful are able by his grace to performe. Augustine, to auoide their caullation confessed, that the Lord might in deede, if he woulde, aduaunce a mortall man to the purenesse of Angels: but that he neither hath done so at any time, nor will do, because he hath otherwise affirmed in the Scriptures. And that do I also not denie. But I adde further, that it is inconuenient to dispute of his power against his truth, and that therefore this sentence is not subiect to caullations if a man shoulde say, that that thing is impossible to be, wherof the Scriptures do pronounce that it shall not be. But if they dispute of the worde: when the Disciples asked the Lorde, who may be saued, he answered: with men in deede it is impossible, but with God all thinges are possible. Also Augustine with a most strong reason stiffely defendeth, that in this flesh we neuer yelde to God the due loue that we owe him. Loue (saith he) so followeth knowledge, that no man can perfectly loue God, but he that hath first fully knowe his goodnesse. We, while we wander in this worlde, see by a glasse and in a darke speech it followeth therefore, that our loue is vnperfect. Let this therefore remaine out of controuersie, that in this flesh it is impossible to fulfill the lawe, if we behold the weakenesse of our owne nature, as it shall yet also in an other place be proued by Paule.

6 But that the whole matter may be more plainly set forth : let vs in a compendious order gather vp together the office and vse of the lawe which they call Moral. Now, as farre as I vnderstand, it is conteined in these three partes. The first is, that while it sheweth to euery man the righteousnesse of God, that is, the righteousnesse which only is acceptable to God, it admonish, certifie, proue guilty, yea and condemne euery man of his owne vnrighteousnesse. For so is it nedefull that man blinded and dronke with loue of himselfe, be driuen both to the knowledge and the confession of his owne weakenesse and vncleannesse : for asmuch as if his vanitie be not euidently conuincd, he swelleth with madde affiance of his owne strength, and can neuer be brought to thinke of the sclēdernesse therof, so long as he measureth it by the proportion of his owne will. But so sone as he beginneth to compare his strength to the hardnesse of the lawe, there he findeth matter to abate his courage. For how so euer he before conceiued a great opinion of it, yet byandby he feeleth it to pante vnder so great a burden, and then to shake and folter, at laste euen to fall downe and faint. So being taught by the scholing of the lawe, he putteth of that arrogancie wherwith before he was blinded. Likewise he is to be healed of an other disease of pride, wherof we haue said that he is sicke. So long as he is suffred to stand to his owne iudgement, he deuisseth Hypocrisie in steede of righteousnesse, wherwith being contented, he riseth vp in courage, by I wote not, what forged righteousnesse, against the grace of God. But so sone as he is compelled to trie his life by the balaunce of the lawe, the leauing the presumption of the counterfeit righteousnesse, he seeth himselfe to be an infinite space distant from holynesse : Againe, that he floweth full of infinite vices, wherof before he seemed cleane. For the euils of luste are hidden in so deepe and crooked priuie corners, that they easily deceiue the sight of mā. And not without cause the Apostle saith, that he knewe not luste, except the lawe had said : Thou shall not luste : bycause except it be by the law disclosed out of her lurking holes, it destroieth miserable man so secretly, that he feeleth not the deadely darte thereof.

Rom. 7.

7 So the lawe is like a certaine looking glasse wherein we beholde, first our weakenesse, and by that our wickednesse, and laste of all by them both our accursednesse, euen as a glasse representeth vnto vs the spottes of our face. For when power faileth man to follow righteousness, then muste he needes sticke faste in the mire of sinnes. And after sinne byandby followeth curse. And of howe much the greater transgression the lawe holdeth vs guiltie and conuict, with so much the more greuous iudgement it condemneth vs. For this purpose maketh the

the saying of the Apostle, that by the lawe is the knowledge of sinne. Rom. 3. For there he speaketh onely of the first office of the lawe, the prooffe 22. wherof is in sinners not yet regenerate. And like to this are these two sayinges, that the lawe entred that sinne might abound, and therefore Rom. 5. that it is the ministration of death that worketh wrath and slayeth. 20. For without doubt so much more groweth iniquitie, with how much 2. Cor. 3. more vnderstanding of sinne the conscience is stricken, bycause vnto Rom. 4. breach of lawe is added obstinacie against the maker of the lawe. It 15. followeth therefore that the lawe armeth the wrath of God to the destruction of the sinner, bycause of it selfe it can do nothing but accuse, condemne and destroie. And as Augustine writeth, if the spirite of grace be absent, the lawe is present with vs, onely to this ende, to accuse vs and kill vs. And yet when this is said, neither is the lawe dishonored thereby, nor any thing taken from the excellencie thereof. Truly if our will were wholly framed and disposed to the obedience of the lawe, then plainly the onely knowledge of it were sufficient to saluation. But for asmuch as our fleshly and corrupt nature fighteth, as an enemy with the spirituall lawe of God, and is nothing amended with the discipline thereof, this followeth that the lawe which was geuen for saluatiō, (if it hadde founde fitte hearers) tourneth to the occasion of sinne and death. For sith we are all proued transgressors of it, the more plainly that it openeth the righteousnesse of God, so much the more on the other side it discloseth our iniquitie: the more surely that it confirmeth the rewarde of life and saluation laide vp for righteousnesse, so much the more assured it maketh the destruction of the wicked. So farre is it of therefore that these sayinges shoulde be to the dishonour of the lawe, that they much auaille to the more glorious commendations of Gods bountie. For truly it hereby appeareth that we are hindered by our owne wickednesse, and peruersnesse, that we enioy not the blessednesse of life set openly abroad for vs by the lawe. Whereby the grace of God that helpeth vs without the succour of the lawe, is made so much the sweter, and the mercie more louely that geueth it vnto vs, wherby we learne that he is neuer wearied with often doing vs good and heaping new giftes vpon vs.

8 And wheras the iniquitie and condemnation of vs all is sealed by the testimonie of the lawe, it is not done for this purpose (if at leaste we well profit in it) to make vs fall downe with despeire, or with discouraged mindes to tumble downe hedlong. In deede the reprobate are amased after that manner, but that is by reason of their obstinacie, but with the children of God there behoueth to be an other Rom. 3. ende of instructiō. not so well vnderstand it, or bycause he wanted wordes where with distinctly & plainly to expresse his meaning of it, which yet he rightly conceyued: but this first office of the lawe is not idle euen in the reprobate also. For though they go not thus farre forward with the children of God, that after the throwing downe of their flesh they be renewed and flourish againe in the inward man, but amased with the first terrour do lie still in desperation: yet it serueth to shewe forth the equitie of Gods iudgement, that their consciences be tossed with such wayes. For they euer willingly desire to make shifte against the iudgement of God. Nowe while the same is not yet opened, they yet so astonished with the testimonie of the lawe and their conscience do bewraic in them selues what they haue deserued.

10 The second office of the lawe, is that they which are touched with no care of that which is iust and right, vnlesse they be compelled, when they heare the terrible penall ordinaunces therein, may be restrayned at least with feare of punishment. But they are restrained, not because their inwarde minde is moued or affected withall, but bycause being as it were brideled, they withhold their hande from outward worke, and do keepe in their peruersenesse within them, which otherwise they woulde haue outragiously poured out. Thereby they become truely nether the better, nor the more righteous before God. For although being letted either by feare or by shame, they dare not put that in practise which they haue conceiued in their minde, nor openly blow abroad the rages of their lust: yet haue they not a hearte framed to the feare & obediēce of God, yea the more that they holde backe them selues, so much the stronglier within they are kindeled, they burne, they boile, ready to do any thing, and to breake forth any whether, if this terrour of the lawe did not stay them. And not that onely, but also they most spitefully hate the lawe, and do detest God the lawemaker, so that if they coulde, they would very faine take him away, whome they can not abide, neither when he commaundeth rightfull thinges, nor when he reuengeth him vpon the despisers of his maiestic. In some in deede more darkly, and in some more plainely, but in all generally that are not regenerat, is this feeling, that they are drawn to the following of the lawe not by willing submission, but resisting and against their willes, only by violence of feare. But this constrained and enforced righteousness is necessarie for the publike common state of men, the quiet wherof is herin provided for, while ordre is taken that all thinges be not cōfounded with vprore, which woulde come to passe, if all thinges were lawefull for all men. Yea it is not vnprofitable for the childre of God to be exercised with this Scholing, so long as they before their calling being yet destitute of the spirite of sanctification, are still wanton with the folly of the flesh. For when they are drawn backe, though it be but from outwarde licentiousnesse, by the terrour of Gods vengeance, although for that they are not yet ramed in minde, they go for the present time but a little forward, yet they partly grow in vre to beare the yoke of Christ, so that when they are called, they be not altogether rude and raw to discipline, as to a thing vnknown. This office the Apostle seemeth properly to haue touched; when he saith that the lawe was not set for the righteous man, but for the vnrighteous and disobedient, wicked and sinners, euill doers and prophane men, slaiers of their parétes, and murtherers, fornicators, Sodomites, robbers of children, lyers and periured men, and what soeuer ells is against sounde doctrine. For he saith, that it is a stay to the wilde outraging lustes of the flesh, that ells woulde stray abroad without measure.

II But to both may that be applyed which he saith in an other place, that the lawe was to the Iewes a Schoolemaister to Christ, for there are two sortes of men, whom with her schooling she leadeth by the hande to Christ. The one sorte, of whome we first spake, bycause they are to full of affiance of their owne strength or righteousnesse, are not meete to receiue the grace of Christ, vnlesse they be first emptied, therefore the lawe bringeth them downe to humilitie by knowledge of thē selues, that so they may be prepared to desire that which before they thought they wanted not. The other sorte neede a bridle to be holden backe, least they so geue loose the reins to the wantonnesse of their flesh, that they fall of altogether from all studie of righteousnesse. For where the spirite of God doth not yet gouerne, there sometime lustes do so boile, that it is in great perill least they throw downe the soule that is subiect to them into the forgetfulnesse and despisinge of God: and so woulde it come to passe if God did not with this remedy prouide for it. Therefore those whom he hath apointed to the inheritaunce of his kingdome, if he do not byandby regenerate them, he keepeth them by the workes of the lawe vnder feare, vntill the time of his visitation, not that chaste and pure feare such as ought to be in children, but yet a profitable feare for this that they may according to their capacitie be taught by introduction to true godlinesse. Of this we haue so many proues, that it needeth no example. For who soeuer haue any time continued in not knowing of God, will cōfesse that this happened vnto them, that they were holden by the bridle of the law in some feare & obediēce of God, vntill the time that being regenerate by his spirit, they beganne hartely to loue him.

12 The third vse, which is also the principall vse, and more nearely loketh vnto the propre ende of the lawe, concerneth the faithfull, in whose heartes already liueth and reigneth the spirite of God. For although they haue the lawe written and grauen in their heartes by the finger of God, that is to say, be so affectioned and minded by the direction of the spirite that they desire to obey God, yet do they still two waies profite in the lawe. For it is to them a very good meane, whereby they may dayly better and more assuredly learne what is the will of the Lord which they aspire vnto, and may be confirmed in the vnderstanding thereof. As if a seruaunt be already bente with all the affection of his hearte, to please his Lorde: yet hath he neede diligently to searche out and marke the fashions of his Lorde, that he may frame and apply him selfe vnto them. And let none of vs exempt him selfe from this neede. For no manne hath hether to attained to so great wisdom, but that he may by dayly instruction of the lawe get newe profit in proceeding to the purer knowledge of Gods will. Then by cause we neede not onely doctrine but also exhortation: this other profite shall the seruaunt of God take by the lawe, to be by the often meditation thereof stirred vp to obedience, to be strengthened in it, to be holden backe from the slippery way of offending. For after this maner, must these holy ones driue forwarde them selues, which with how great cheerefulnesse so euer they trauaile to Godwarde according to the spirite, yet they are alway loden with the sluggishnesse of y flesh, that they procede not with such ful redinesse as they ought. To this flesh is the lawe geuen as a whippe, that like a slowe and dull Ass it may be pricked forwarde to worke. Yea to the spirituall man, by cause he is not yet dispatched of the burden of the flesh, it shall be a continuall pricke that suffereth him not to stand still. Euen to this vse Dauid hadde respect, when he did set forth the lawe with those notable praises: The lawe of the Lorde is vndefiled, conuerting soules: the iustices of the Lorde are vpright, and chearing heartes: the commaundemente of the Lorde is bright, that geueth light to the eyes. &c. Againe: A launterne to my feete is thy worde, and a light vnto my pathes, and innumerable other that he rehearseth in all that Psalme. Neither are these thinges against the sayinges of Paule; wherein is shewed, not what vse the lawe ministreth to the regenerate, but what it is able to geue to manne of it selfe. But here the Prophet reporteth with howe great profite the Lorde doth instruct them by reading of his lawe, to whome he inwardely inspireth a readynesse to obey. And he taketh holde not of the commaundementes onely, but also the promise of grace annexed to the thinges, whiche onely maketh the bitternesse to waxe sweete. For what were lesse ameable than the lawe, if it shoulde onely with requiring and threatening trouble soules carefully with feare, and vexe them with terrour? But specially Dauid sheweth, that he in the lawe conceyued the Mediatour, without whome there is no delite or sweetnesse.

13 Which while some vnskillfull men canne not discern, they boldly shake a way all Moses, and bidde the two tables of the lawe farewell, bycause they thinke it is not agreable for Christians to cleaue to that doctrine that conteineth the ministracion of death. Let this prophane opinion departe farre out of our mindes. For Moses taught excellently well, that the same Lawe which with sinners can engendre nothing but death, ought in the holy to haue a better and more excellent vse. For thus, when he was ready to die, he openly saide to the people: Lay your heartes vpon all the wordes that I do testifie to you this daie, that ye maie committe them to your children, that ye maie teache them to keepe, to do, and to fullfill all the thinges that are written in the volume of this lawe, bycause they are not vainely commaunded you, but that euery one shoulde liue in them: but if no manne canne denie that there appeareth in it an absolute paterne of righteousnesse, then either we muste haue no rule at all to liue iustely and vprightely, or els it is not lawefull for vs to departe from it. For there are not many but one rule of life which is perpetuall and canne not be bowed. Therefore, whereas Dauid maketh the life of a righteous manne continually busied in the meditation of the lawe, let vs not referre that to one age onely; bycause it is mooste meete for all ages to the ende of the worlde: and let vs not therefore be frayed awaie, or flee from being instructed by it, bycause it appointeth a muche more exact holynesse than we shall performe, while we shall carry about the person of our bodie. For nowe it executeth not against vs the office of a rigorous exacter that will not be satisfied, but with his full taske performed: but in this perfection where vnto it exhorteth vs, it sheweth vs a marke, towarde which in all our life to endeuour, is no lesse profitable for vs, than agreable with our dutie. In which endeuour if we faile not, it is well. For all this life is a race, the space whereof being runne out, the Lord wil graunt vs to attein to that marke, towarde which our endeoures do trauaile a farre of.

14 Nowe therefore, whereas the lawe hath towarde the faithfull a power to exhorte, not such a power as may binde their consciences with curse, but suche as with often calling on, may shake of sluggishnesse nesse and pinche imperfection to awake it: many when they meane to expresse this deliuerance from the curse thereof, do say, that the lawe is abrogate to the faithfull. (I speake yet of the lawe morall) not that it doth no more commaunde them that which is right, but only that it be no more vnto them that which it was before, that is, that it do no more, by making afraide and confounding their consciences, damne and destroie them. And truely such an abrogation of the lawe, Paule dothe plainely teache, and also that the Lord himselfe spake of it, appeareth by this that he woulde not haue confuted that opinion Mat. 5. that he shoulde dissolue the lawe, vnlesse it hadde bene commonly re- 17. ceuyed among the Iewes. But forasmuch as it coulde not rise causelessly and without any colour, it is likely that it grewe vpon false vnderstanding of his doctrine, as in a maner all erroures are wonte to take occasion of truthe, but least we shoulde also stumble at the same stone, let vs diligently make distinction, what is abrogate in the lawe, and what remaineth yet in force. Where the Lord protesteth that he came not to destroie the lawe, but to fullfill it: and that till heauen and earth passe away, no one iote of the lawe shoulde passe away, but that all shoulde be fullfilled: he sufficiently confirmeth that by his comming nothing should be taken away from the due keeping of the lawe. And for good cause: sith he came rather for this ende, to heale offences. Wherefore the doctrine of the lawe remaineth for all Christians, inuiolable, which by teaching, admonishing, rebuking and correcting may frame and prepare vs to euery good worke.

15 As for those things that Paule speaketh of the curse, it is euident that they belong not to the very instruction, but onely to the force of binding the conscience. For the lawe not onely teacheth, but also with authoritie requireth that which it commaundeth. If it be not perfourmed, yea if duety be slacked in any parte, it bendeth her thunderboulte of curse. For this cause the Apostle saith, that all they Gal. 3. that are of the workes of the lawe, are subiect to the curse, bycause it 10. is written: Cursed is euery one, that fulfilleth not all. And he saith, Deu. 27. that they be vnder the workes of the lawe, that do not set righteous- 26. nesse in the forgeuenesse of sinnes, by which we are loosed from the rigor of the lawe. He teacheth therefore that we must be loosed from the bondes of the lawe, vnlesse we will miserably perish vnder them. But from what bondes? the bondes of that rigorous and sharp exacting, that releaseth nothing of the extremitie of the lawe, and suffreth not any offence vnpunished. From this curse (I say) that Christ might redeme vs, he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Cursed is Gal. 3. euery one that hangeth vpon the tree. In the chapter following in 12. and 5.4.

ceded he saith, that Christ was made subiect to the lawe, to redeme them that were vnder the lawe: but all in one meaning, for he by and by addeth, that by adoption we might receiue the right of children. What is that? that we shoulde not be oppressed with perpetuall bondage, that shoulde holde our conscience fast strained with anguish of death. In the meane time this alway remaineth vnshakē, that there is nothing withdrawn of the authority of the lawe, but that it ought still to be receiued of vs with the same reuerence and obedience.

16 Of ceremonies it is otherwise, which were abrogate not in effect, but in vse onely. And this, that Christ by his comming hath made an ende of them, doth so nothing diminish their holinesse, that it rather setteth them forth, and maketh them glorious. For as they shoulde haue geuen but a vaine shew to the olde people, vnlesse the power of the death & resurrection of Christ had bene shewed therein, so if they had not ceased, we coulde not at this day discern to what purpose they were ordained. Therefore Paule, to proue that the keeping of them now is not onely superfluous, but also hurtfull, teacheth that they were shadowes wherof we haue the body in Christ. We see therefore how in the abolishing of them, the trueth shineth better than if they did still a farre of, and as it were with a veile spred before, shewe a figure of Christ that hath already plainly appeared. And therefore the veile of the temple at the death of Christ was torne in two peeces and fell downe: because now the true and expres image of the heauenly good thinges was come to light, which before had bene but vnperfectly begonne with darke rude daughters, as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues saith. Herevnto serueth that saying of Christ, that the lawe & the Prophetes were vnto the time of Iohn, and that from that time forwarde, the kingdome of God beganne to be ioyfully preached: not meaning that the holy fathers were without the preaching that cōtaineth the hope of saluation, & of eternall life, but because a farre of, and vnder shadowes only they did beholde that which we at this day see in the full light. But why it behoued that the church of God shoulde climbe vp hyer from those first instructions, Iohn the Baptist declareth: for that the lawe is geuen by Moses, but grace and trueth beganne by Iesus Christ. For although the purging of sinnes were truely promised in the olde sacrifices, and the Arke of the couenant was a sure pledge of the fatherly fauor of God: yet all this had bene but a shadowe, if it had not bene grounded vpon the grace of Christ, wherein is sounde, perfect, and eternall stedfastnesse. Let this then remaine sure, that although the cremonial vsages of the lawe haue ceased to be obserued, yet by the ende of them it is the better better knowne howe great was the profit of them before Christes cō-ming, which in taking away the vse of them hath sealed the force and effect of them with his death.

17 Somewhat more hard is the point that Paule noteth. And he hath renewed you together with him, when ye were dead by sinnes, and the vncircumcision of your flesh, forgiuing you all your offences, blotting out the handwriting that remained in the decrees against vs, which was contrary vnto vs, and he hath taken it away, fastening it to the crosse. &c. For he seemeth to stretch the abolishing of the lawe somewhat further that now we haue nothing to do with the decrees thereof. For they erre that expqunde it of the lawe morall, whose vnapeasable rigor rather then doctrine thereof they thinke to be taken away. Some more depely waying the wordes of Paule, do espie that it is properly spoken of the lawe ceremoniall, and do shew that this worde Decree, doth more than once so signifie in Paule. For to the Ephesians he saith thus: He is our peace, that maketh both to be one, that maketh voide the lawe of commaundementes consisting in the decrees, that he might make two in himselfe into one newe man. It is no dout that he speaketh there of the ceremonies, for he calleth it the partition wherewith the Iewes were seuered from the Gentiles: wherefore I graunt that those first expositors are rightfully reprov'd by these: but yet me thinkes that these do not sufficiently well set forth the minde of the Apostle. For I like not at all, to haue these two places compared together in all pointes, when his purpose was to aduertise the Ephesians of their adoption into the fellowship of Israel, he teacheth that the stop is taken away, wherby they were before time kept asunder, that was in ceremonies. For the vsages of washinges and sacrifices, wherewith the Iewes were made holy vnto the Lorde, do seuer them from the Gentiles. But in the Epistle to the Colossians, who seeth not that he toucheth a hyer misterie? In deede the point of the disputation there, is of Mosaicall obseruations wherewith the false Apostles did labor to driue the Christian people. But, as in the Epistle to the Galathians he fetcheth that controuersie further of, and as it were bringeth it backe to the first head thereof, so doth he also in this place. For if in the ceremonies you consider nothing els but a necessitie of the vse of them, to what purpose was it, to call it a handwriting against vs? moreouer to set the whole summe in a maner of our redemption in this, that it shoulde be cancelled? Wherefore the matter it selfe trieth out, that here is some more secret thing to be considered. And I trust that I haue attained the naturall vnderstanding of it, if at least this be graunted me to be true, which in one place is most truly written by Augustine, yea that he hath taken out of the plaine wordes of the Apostle, that in the Iewish ceremonies was rather a confessiō than a clensing of sinnes. For what did they els by sacrifices, but confesse them selues in their conscience guilty of death, that did put clensings in their place? What did they with their clensings, but testifie them selues to be vncleane? And so was the handwriting of their sinne, and vncleannessē oft renewed by them, but there was no discharge in that testifying thereof. For which cause the Apostle writeth that at length by meane of the death of Christ, was performed the redemption of the offences that remained vnder the olde Testament. Therefore the Apostle doth worthily cal the ceremonies handwritings against those that obserue them: forasmuch as by them they did openly seale to their owne damnation and vncleannessē. And it hindereth not, that they were also partakers of the same grace with vs. For this they obtained in Christ, not in the ceremonies, which there the Apostle doth seuer from Christ, because being at that time vsed, they did obscure the glorie of Christ. Thus learne we, that the ceremonies, if they be considered by themselues, are well and fitly called handwritings against the saluation of men, because they were as solemne instrumentes that testified their being bounde. When the false Apostles went about to binde the Christian Church to them againe. Paule did not without cause admonish the Colossians, by fetching the signification of them further of, to what pointe they shoulde fall backe againe, if they suffered them selues in such sorte to be yoked by them. For therewithal was the benefite of Christ wrested away from them, in as much as he hauing once performed the eternall clensing, hath vterly abolished those dayly obseruations, which were only of force to seale sinnes, but coulde do nothing to the putting away of them.

The viij. Chapter.

An exposition of the Morall lawe.

Here I thinke it shall not be from the purpose, to enterlace the tenne commaundementes of the lawe with a shorte exposition of them, because thereby both that shall better appeare which I haue touched, that the same keeping of them which God hath once appointed, remaineth yet in force: and then also we shall haue besides that a prooffe of the seconde point, that the Iewes did not only learne by it what was the true force of godlynesse, but also by the terror of the iudgement, sith they saw themselues vnable to keepe it, they were compelled whether they woulde or no, to be drawn to the Mediator. Nowe in setting forth the summe of those

those things that are required in the true knowledge of God, we haue already taught, that we cannot conceiue him according to his greatnesse, but that by and by his maiesty presenteth it selfe vnto vs, to binde vs to the worship of him. In the knowledge of our selues we haue set this for the chiefe point, that being voide of the opinion of our owne strength, and cleane stripped of the trust of our owne righteousnesse, and on the other side discouraged and beaten downe with conscience of our owne nedinesse, we shoulde learne perfect humilitie and abasement of our selues. The Lord setteth forth both these pointes in his lawe, where first chalenging to himselfe due power to gouerne, he calleth vs to the reuerence of his diuine maiestie, and apointeth out vnto vs wherein it standeth and consisteth: and then publishing a rule of his righteousnesse, (against the righteousnesse whereof our nature as it is peruerse and crooked, doth alway striue, and beneth the perfection whereof our power as of it selfe it is weake and feble to do good, lieth a greate way belowe) he reproveth vs both of weaknesse and vnrighteousnesse. Moreouer that inwarde lawe which we haue before said to be grauen and as it were imprinted in the hartes of al men, doth after a certaine maner enforme vs of the same things that are to be learned of the two tables. For our conscience doth not suffer vs to sleepe a perpetuall sleepe without feeling, but that it inwardly is a witnessse and admonisher of those thinges that we owe to God, and layeth before vs the difference of good and euill, and so accuseth vs when we swarue from our duetic. But man being wrapped in such darkenesse of errours as he is, skarse euē slenderly tasteth by that lawe of nature, what worship pleaseth God: but truely he is very farre distant from the right knowledge thereof. Beside that, he is so swollen with arrogancie and ambition, and so blinded with selfe loue, that he can not yet looke vpon, and as it were, descend into him selfe to learne to submit and humble him selfe, and confesse his owne miserie. Therefore (as it was necessary both for our dulnesse and stubbornesse) the Lorde hath set vs a lawe written, which shoulde both more certainly testifie that which in the law naturall was too obscure, and also should shake away our drowsinesse, and more liuely touche our minde and remembraunce.

2 Nowe it is easy to vnderstand what is to be learned of the lawe, that is, that as God is our creator, so of right he hath the place of our father and Lorde, and that by this reason we owe to him glorie, reuerence, loue and feare. Yea and also that we are not at our owne libertie, to followe whether so euer that lust of our minde doth moue vs, but that we ought to hang vpon his becke, and to rest onely vpon that which pleaseth him. Then we learne, that he delireth in righteousness and vprightnesse, that he abhorreth wickednesse, and therefore, that vnlesse we will with wicked vnthankfulnesse fall away from our creator, we must necessarily obserue righteousness all our life lōg. For if then only we yelde vnto him the reuerence that we owe, when we prefer his will before our owne, it followeth, that there is no other due worship of him, but the obseruation of righteousness, holynesse & cleannesse. Neither may we pretend this excuse that we want power, and like wasted debtors be not able to pay. For it is not convenient that we shoulde measure the glory of God by our owne power: for whatsoever we be, he alway abideth like to himselfe, a louer of righteousness, a hater of wickednesse. What soeuer he requireth of vs (because he cā require nothing but that which is right) by bonde of nature we muste of necessitie obey: but that we are not able, is our owne fault. For if we be holden bounde of our owne lust wherein sin reigneth, so y we are not lose at libertie to obey our father, there is no cause why we should allege necessitie for our defence, the euill wherof is both within vs, and to be imputed vnto our selues.

3 When we haue thus farre profited by the teaching of the lawe, then must we by the teaching of the same lawe also descend vnto our selues: whereby at length we may cary awaie two thinges. The first is, by comparing the righteousness of the lawe with our life, to learne, that we are farre of from being able to satisfie the will of God, and that therefore we are not worthy to haue place among his creatures, much lesse to be reckened among his children. The second is, in considering our strength, to learne that it is not onely insufficient to fulfill the lawe, but also vtterly none at all. Hereupon followeth both a distrust of our owne strength, and a care and fearefullnesse of minde. For conscience can not beare the burden of iniquitie, but that by and by the iudgement of God is present before it: and the iudgement of God can not be felte, but that it striketh into vs a dreadfull horrour of death. And likewise being constrained with proues of her owne weakenesse, it can not choose but by and by fall into despeire of her own strength. Both these affectiōs do engendre humility & abatement of courage. So at length it commeth to passe, that man made afraide with feling of eternal death, which he seeth to hang ouer him by the deseruing of his owne vnrighteousnesse, turneth him selfe to the only mercy of God, as to the onely hauen of saluation: that feling that it is not in his power to pay that he oweth vnto the lawe, despeiring in him selfe, he may take breath againe and beginne to craue and looke for helpe from els where.

4 But the Lord not contented to haue procured a reuerēce of his righteousnesse, hath also added promises and threatnings, to fill our heartes with loue of him, and with hatred of wickednesse. For, because our minde is to blinde, to be moued with the onely beauiy of goodnesse, it pleased the most mercifull Father of his tender kindenesse, to allure vs with sweetenesse of rewardes, to loue and long for him. He pronounceth therefore, that with him are rewardes layd vp for vertue, and that he shall not spende his labour in vaine, whosoeuer he be, that shall obey his commaundementes. He proclaimeth on the other side, that he not only abhorreth vnrighteousnesse, but also that it shall not escape vnpunished, for that he will be a reuenger of the contempt of his maiesty. And to exhort vs by all meanes, he promiseth as well the blessinges of this present life, as also eternall blessednesse, to their obedience that keepe his commaundementes: and to the transgressours therof, he threatneth both present miseries and the punishment of eternall death. For the same promise, (he that doth these things, shall liue in them:) and also the threateninge that answereth it, (the soule that sinneth, that same shall die) do without dout belong to the immortality or death that is to come, and shall neuer be ended. Albeit, wheresoeuer is mentioned the good will or wrath of God, vnder the one is contained the eternity of life, vnder the other eternall destruction. Of present blessinges and curses there is a long register rehearsed in the law. And in the penall ordinaunces appeareth the so-ueraigne cleannesse of God, that can suffer no iniquity: but in his promises, beside his great loue of righteousnesse, (which he cannot finde in his heart to defraude of her reward) there is also proued his maruelous bountifullnesse. For whereas we and all ours are indetted vnto his maiesty, by good right whatsoeuer he requireth of vs, he demaundeth it as due det, but the payment of det is not worthy of rewarde. Therefore he departeth with his owne right, whē he offereth rewarde to our obediences, which we do not yeld of our selues as things that were not due: but what those promises do bring vnto vs, is partly sayd already, and partly shall appeare more plainly in place fit for it. It sufficeth for this present, if we remember and consider, that there is in the promises of the law, no small commendation of righteousnesse, that it may the more certainly appeare howe much the keepinge thereof pleaseth God: that the penall ordinaunces are set for the more detestation of vnrighteousnesse, least the sinner, delited with the swete flattering of vices, should forget that the iudgement of the lawmaker is prepared for him.

5 Now whereas the Lord giuing a rule of perfect righteousnesse, hath applied all the partes thereof to his owne will, therein is declared that nothing is to him more acceptable than obedience, which is so much more diligētly to be marked, as the wantonnesse of mans minde is more ready to deuise nowe and then diuerse sortes of worshipping to winne his fauour withall. For in all ages that irreligious affectation of religion, because it is naturally planted in the witte of man, hath shewed and yet doth shew foorth it selfe, that men do alway delite to inuent a way to obtaine righteousnesse beside the word of God, wherby it commeth to passe, that the commaundementes of the law haue but smale place among the workes that are commonly called good works, while that innumerable route of mens workes occupieth almost all the roome. But what other thing meant Moses than to restraine such licentiousnesse, when after the publishing of the law he spake thus to the people: Giue heede, and heare all y^e things that I commaund thee, that it may be well to thee and to thy children after thee for euer, when thou shalt do that which is good and pleasaunt before thy God. What I commaunde thee, that onely do: adde not vnto it, nor diminish it. And before, when he had protested, that this was his wisdom and vnderstanding before other nations that he had receiued iudgementes, righteousnesse and ceremonies of the Lord, he sayd further, keepe therefore thy selfe & thy soule carefully, that thou forget not the wordes which thine eyes haue seene, and that at no time they fall out of thy heart. For, because God did foresee, that the Israelites woulde not rest, but that after they had receiued the lawe, they would beside it trauaile in bringinge foorth new righteousnesse, if they were not seuerely holden backe: therefore he pronunceth that herein is contained the perfection of righteousnesse, which shoulde haue bin the strongest stay to hold them backe, and yet they did cesse from that boldnesse so much forbidden them. But what of vs? we are surely comprehended within the same charge: for it is no dout that that continueth still whereby the Lord hath chalenged to his law the absolute doctrine of righteousnesse, yet we not contented therewith, do monstruously trauaile with forginge and coyninge of newe good workes one vpon an other. For the healing of this fault, the best remedy shalbe, if this thought shalbe stedfastly settled in vs, that the law is giuen vs from God to teach vs a perfect righteousnesse: that therein is taught no righteousnesse, but the same that is examined, by the appointed rule of Gods will: that therefore new formes of workes are vainely attempted to winne the fauour of God, whose true worship standeth in onely obedience: but rather that such study of good workes as wandereth out of the lawe of God, is an intolerable defilinge of Gods

Gods righteousness and of the true righteousness Augustine also sayth most truly, which calleth the obedience that is done to God, sometime the mother and keeper, sometime the originall of all vertues.

6 But when we haue expounded the lawe of the Lord, then more fitly and with more profite shall that be confirmed which I haue before spoken of the office & vse of the law. But before that I beginne to discusse euery seuerall commaundement by it selfe, it shall be good now to giue such lessons as serue to the vniuersall knowledge therof. First let vs hold for determined, that the life of mā is instructed in the law not onely to outward honesty, but also to inward and spirituall righteousness. Which thinge whereas no man can deny, yet there be fewe that rightly marke it. That commeth to passe, because they looke not vpon the lawmaker, by whose nature the nature of the law also ought to be weyed. If any king do by proclamation forbid to commit fornication, to kill, or to steale: in this case I graunt that if a man do only conceiue in his minde a lust to commit fornication, to sinne, or to steale, and do not commit any of these things in dede, he is out of the compasse of this prohibitō. And the reason is, for that because the foresight of a mortal lawmaker, could not extend but to outward ciuility: his commaundementes are not broken, but when the outward offences are committed. But God (whose eye nothing escapeth, and which regardeth not so much the outward shew as the cleannes of the heart) vnder the forbidding of fornication, manslaughter and theft, forbiddeth lust, wrath, hatred, coueting of an other mans, guile, and whatsoeuer is like to these. For insomuch as he is a spiritual lawmaker, he speaketh no lesse to the soule than to the body. But the manslaughter of the soule, are wrath and hatred: the theft of the soule, is euell desire and couetousnesse: the fornication of the soule, is lust. But mans lawes also (will some man say) haue regard to ententes & willes, and not to successes of fortune. I graunt, but yet they are such ententes and willes, as haue outwardly broken out. They weye with what entent euery outwarde act hath bin done, but they searche not the secrete thoughtes. Therefore they are satisfied when a man onely withholdeth his handes from offending. On the other side, because the heauenly lawe is made for our mindes, therefore the restraite of myndes is principally needefull to the keepinge thereof. But the common sorte of menne, euen when they mightily dissemble there contempt of the lawe, do frame their eyes, their feete, their handes, and all the partes of their body to some obseruation of the law, in the meane time they hold their heart most farre of from all obedience, and thinke themselues well discharged, if they keepe close frō men y^e which they do in the sight of God. They heare it sayd: Thou shalt not kill: Thou shalt not commit adultery: Thou shalt not steale: they draw not out their swerd to kill: they ioyne not their bodies with harlots: they lay not their handes vpon other mens goods. All this is well hitherto. But in their whole heartes they breath out murders, they boile in lust, they cast their eyes aside at all mens goods, and deuour them with couetinge. Now wanteth that which was the chiefe point of the lawe. Whence, I pray you, commeth so grosse dulnesse, but that leauing the lawemaker, they rather measure righteousnesse by their owne wit? Against these doth Paul mightily crie out, affirming that the law is spirituall: whereby he meaneth, that it not onely demaundeth an obedience of the soule, minde and will, but also requireth an Angelike purenesse, which hauing all the filthinesse of the flesh cleane wiped away, may saour nothinge but of the spirite.

21.

7 When we say that this is the meaninge of the lawe, we thrust not in a new exposition of our owne, but we follow Christ the best expositor of the law. For when the Pharisees had infected the people with a false opinion, that he performeth the law that hath with outward worke committed nothing against the law, he reprobued this most perilous errour, and pronounced that vnchast looking at a woman is fornication: he protested that they are manslayers that hate their brother, for he maketh them guilty of iudgement that haue but conceiued wrath in their minde, and them guilty of the counsell that in murmuring or grudging haue vttered any token of a displeas'd mind: and them guilty of Hell fier, that with tauntes and railing breake forth into open anger. They that haue not espied these thinges, haue fayned Christ to be an other Moses, the giuer of the law of the Gospell, which supplid the imperfection of the law of Moses. Whereupon commeth that common principle of the perfection of the law of the Gospell, which far passeth the old law, which is a most pernicious opinion. For hereafter, where we shall gather a summe of the cōmandementes, it shall appeare by Moses himselfe, how reprochfully they dishonor the law of God. Truely it sheweth that all the holinesse of the fathers did not much differ from hypocrisie, & it leaderh vs away from that only and perfect rule of rightheousnesse. But it is very easie to confute that errour: for that they thought that Christ did adde vnto the law, whereas he did but restore the law to her integrity, while he made it free, & clenfed it being obscured with lies, and defiled with leuen of the Pharises.

8 Let this be our second note, that there is alway more containd in in the commaundementes and prohibitions, than is by words expressed, which yet is so to be tempered, that it be not like a Lesbian rule, whereby licentiously wresting the Scriptures, we may make of euery thing what we list. For many bring to passe by this vnmeasured liberty of running at large, that with some the authority of Scripture groweth in contempt, and other some despeire of vnderstanding it. Therefore, if it be possible, we must take some such way, that may by right and perfect path lead vs to the will of God, we must I say search how farre our exposition may exceede the boundes of the wordes, that it may appeare that it is not an additiō of mens gloses knit to the word of God, but rather that the pure and naturall meaning of the lawgiuer is faithfully rendred. Truely in a manner in all the commaundementes it is so manifest, that there are figuratiue speaches, meaninge more in expressing parte that he may worthily be laughed at that will restraine the meaning of the law to the narrownesse of the wordes. It is euident therefore, that sober expositiō doth passe beyond the words: but how farre, that remayneth hard to iudge, vnlesse there be some measure appointed: wherefore I thinke this to be the best measure, that if it be directed to the entēt of the commaundement, that is, that in euery commaundement be weyed; why it was giuen vs. As for example: Euery commaundement is either by way of bidding, or of forbidding: the truely of both sortes shall foorth with be founde, if we consider the intent or the end thereof. As the end of the fift commaundement is, that honor is to be giuen to them to whom God appointeth it. This therefore is the summe of the commaundement, that it is right and pleaseth God, that we honor them to whom he hath giuen any excellency, and that he abhorreth contempt and stubbornnesse against them. The intent of the first commaundement is, that God alone be honored. The summe therefore of the commaundement shall be, that true godlinesse, that is to say, true worshippe of his maiesty pleaseth God, and that he abhorreth vngodlinesse. So in euery commaundement we must looke, vpon what matter it treateth: then must we search out the ende, till we finde what the lawemaker doth testifie therein properly to please or displease him: and last of all must we draw an argument from the same to the contrary, after this maner: If this pleaseth God, then the contrary displeaseth him: if this displeaseth him, then the contrary pleaseth him: if he commaunde this, then he forbidderth the contrary, if he forbid this then he commaundeth the contrary.

9 That which is now somewhat darkely touched, shall in expounding of the commaundements become very plaine by practise, where fore it suffiseth to haue touched it, sauinge that this last point, is to be shortly confirmed with some proufe thereof, because otherwise either it should not be vnderstanded, or being vnderstand, it might perhaps at the beginning seeme to sound like an absurdity. This needeth no proufe, that when a good thing is commaunded, the euill is forbidden that is contrary to it: for there is no man but he wil graunt it me. And common iudgement will not much sticke to admitte, that when euill thinges are forbidden, the contrary dueties are commaunded. It is an vniuersall opinion that vertues are commended, when the contrary vices are condēned. But we require somewhat more than those formes of speach do signifie commonly among the people. For they for the most parte take the vertue contrary to any vice, to be the abstainingē from the same vice: we say that it proceedeth farther, that is to contrary dueties & doings. Therefore in this commaudemēt, Thou shalt not kill the common sense of men will consider nothing else, but that we must abstaine frō all hurt doing, or lust to do hurt. I say that there is further contained, that we should by all the helps that we may, succour the life of our neighbour. And, least I speake without a reason, I proue it thus: God forbiddeth that our brother be hurt or misused, because he willeth that our neighbours life be deare & precious vnto vs: he doth therefore require withal those duties of loue that may be done by vs for y^e preferuation of it. And so may we see how the end of the commaudemēt doth alway disclose vnto vs all that we are therein commaunded or forbidden to do.

10 But why God, in such as it were halfe cōmaudemētes, hath by figures rather secretly signified, than expressed what his will was, whereas there are wont to be many reasons rendered therof, this one reason pleaseth me about the rest. Because y^e flesh alway endeuoreth to extenuate the filthinesse of sinne, & to colour it with faire pretenses, sauing where it is euē palpable for grossenes, he hath set forth for an example in euery kinde of offense that which was most wicked & abhominable; at the hearing whereof our very senses might be moued with horreur, thereby to imprint in our mindes a more haynous detestinge of euery sorte of sinne. This many times deceiueth vs in weying of vices, that if they be any thing secret, we make them seeme small. These deceites the Lord doth disclose, when he accustometh vs to referre all the whole multitude of vices to these principall heades, which do best of all shew, how much euery kinde is abhominable. As for example, wrath and hatred are not thought so haynous euills, when they are called by their owne names, but whē they are forbidde vs vnder the name of manslaughter, we better vnderstand how abhomiminable they are before God, by whose word they are set in the degree of so horrible an offense: and we moued by his iudgement, do accustome our selues better to wey the haynousnesse of those faultes that before seemed but light vnto vs.

11 Thirdly is to be considered, what meaneth the diuiding of the lawe of God into two tables, whereof all wise men will iudge that there is sometime mention made not vnfirly from the purpose, nor without cause. And we haue a cause ready, that doth not suffer vs to remayne in dout of this matter. For God so diuided his law into two partes, in which is contayned the whole righteousnesse, that he hath assigned the first to the dueties of religiō that do peculiarly pertaine to the worshipping of his Godhead, the other to the dueties of Charity which belong vnto men. The first foundation of righteousnesse is the worship of God: which being once ouerthrowen, all the other members of righteousnesse are torne in sunder and dissolued, like to the partes of a house vniointed and fallen downe. For what manner of righteousnesse wilt thou call it, that thou vexest not menne with robbery & extorcions, if in the meane time by wicked sacrilege thou spoylest Gods maiesty of his glory? that thou defilest not thy body with fornication, if with thy blasphemies thou prophanely abuse the sacred name of God? that thou murderest no man, if thou trauaill to destroy and extinguish the memorie of God. Wherefore righteousnesse is vainly boasted of without religion, & maketh no better shew, than if a mangled body with the head cutte of, shoulde be brought forth for a beautifull sight. And religion is not onely the principall parte of righteousnes, but also the very soule wherwith it breatheth: and is quickned. For men keepe not equity and loue among themselues without the feare of God. Therefore we say, that the worship of God is the beginning and foundation of righteousnes, because when it is taken away all the equity, continence and temperance that men vse amonge themselues, is vaine and triflinge before God. We say also that it is the springe heade and liuely breath of righteousnesse, because hereby men do learne to liue amonge themselues temperately & without hurt doing one to an other, if they reuerence God as the iudge of right and wronge. Wherefore in the first table he instructeth vs to godlinesse and the proper dueties of religion, wherewith his maiesty is to be worshipped: in the other he prescribeth howe for the feares sake of his name, we ought to behaue our selues in the fellowship of men. And for this reason our Lord (as the Euangelistes reherse Mat. 22 it) did in a summe gather the whole lawe into two principall pointes, 37. the one that we should loue God with all our heart, with all our soule, Luc. 10 27.

Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of

with all our strength : the other, that we loue our neighbour as our selues. Thus thou seest how of the two partes wherein he concludeth the whole law, he directeth the one toward God, & appointeth the other toward men.

12 But although the whole lawe be contained in two principall pointes, yet, to the ende to take away all pretense of excuse, it pleased our God, to declare in the ten cōmaundements more largely & plainly all things that belong both to the honor, feare & loue of himselfe, and also to that charity which he commaundeth vs to beare to men for his sake. And thy study is not ill spent to know the diuision of the commaundementes, so that thou remember that it is such a matter wherein euery man ought to haue his iudgement free, for which we ought not contentiously to strue with him that thinketh otherwise. But we must needs touch this point, least the readers shoulde either scorne or maruell at the diuision that we shall vse, as newe and lately deuised. That the law is diuided in ten words, because it is oft approved by the authority of God himselfe, it is out of controuersie, wherefore there is no dout of the number, but of the manner of diuidinge. They that so diuide them, that they giue three commaundements to the first table, and put other 7. into the second, do wipe out of the number the commaundement concerninge images, or at least they hide it vnder the first: whereas without dout it is seuerally set by the Lord for a commaundement, and the tenth commaundement of not coueting the things of his neighbour, they do fondly teare into two. Beside that it shall by and by be done to vnderstand, that such manner of diuiding was vnknownen in the purer age. Other do reckon, as we do, fower seuerall cōmaundementes in the first table, but in place of the first they set the promise without the commaundement. As for me, because vnlesse I be conuincid by euident reason, I take the ten wordes in Moses for ten commaundementes, me thinkes I see so many diuided in very fit order. Therefore, leauing to them their opinion, I will follow that which I best allowe, that is, that the same which these later sorte make the first commaundement, shalbe in steede of a preface to the whole law, and then shal follow the commaundements, foure of the first table, and sixe of the seconde, in such order as they shalbe rehearsed. Augustine also to Boniface agreeth with vs which in rehearsinge them kepeth this order: that God onely be serued with obedience of religion, that no idole be worshipped, that the name of the Lord be not taken in vaine, when he had before seuerally spoken of the shadowishe commaundement of the Sabbat. In an other place in deede that first diuision pleaseth him, but for to slender a cause, that is, because cause in the number of three, if the first table consist of three commaundementes, the mystery of the trinity more plainly appeareth. Albeit in the same place he sticketh not to confesse that otherwise he rather liketh our diuision. Beside these, the author of the Vnperfect worke vpon Matthew is of our side. Iosephus, vndoubtedly according to the common consent of his time, assigneth to either table five commaundements. Which is both against reason, because it confoundeth the distinction of religion & charity, and also is confuted by the authority of the Lord himselfe, which in Matthew reckoneth the commaundement of honoring our parentes, in the number of the second table. Mat.

19. Now let vs heare God himselfe speaking in his owne wordes.

The first commaundement.

I am the Lord thy God, which haue brought thee out of the lande of AEgypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt haue no straunge Gods before my face.

13 Whether you make the first sentence a parte of the first commaundement, or read it seuerally, it is indifferent to me, so that you do not deny me that it standeth in stede of a preface to the whole lawe. First in making of lawes is heede to be taken, that they be not shortly after abrogate by contempt. Therefore God first of all prouideth, that the maiesty of the law that he shal make, may neuer at any time come in contempt. For stablishinge whereof he vseth three maners of argumentes. First he chalengeth to himselfe power and right of dominion, whereby he may constraine his chosen people, that they must of necessity obey him: the he setteth forth a promise of grace with swetnesse therof to allure them to study of holines. Thirdly he reciteth the benefit that he did for them, to reprove the Iewes of vnthankfulness, if they do not with obedience answer his kindnes. Vnder the name of Iehouah, the Lord, is meant his authority & lawful dominion. And if all things be of him and do abide in him, it is right that all things be referred to him, as Paule sayth. Therefore we are with this word alone Rom. sufficiently brought vnder the yoke of Gods maiesty, because it were 36. monstrous for vs to seeke to withdrawe our selues from vnder his gouernment, out of whom we can not be.

14 After that he hath shewed that it is he that hath power to commaund, to whom obedience is due, least he should seeme to draw by onely necessity, he also allureth with swetenesse in pronouncing, that he is the God of the Church. For there is hidden in this speach a mutuall relation, which is contained in the promise: I will be to the Ier. 33. a God, & they shalbe to me a people. Wherupon Christ proueth that Mat. 32.

Abraham, Isaac and Iacob haue immortall life, by this that God testified that he is their God. Wherefore it is as much in effect, as if he should say thus: I haue chosen you to be my people, not only to do you good in this present life, but also to giue you y^e blessednes of the life to come. But to what end this tendeth, it is noted in diuerse places in the law. For when the Lord doth vouchsaue to deale thus mercifully with vs, to call vs into the company of his people, he choseth vs (sayth Moses) that we shoulde be a peculiar people vnto himselfe, a holy people, & should kepe his commaundements. From whence also cometh this exhortation: Be ye holy, for I am holy. Now out of these two is deriued that protestatiō that is in the Prophet: The sonne honoreth the father, and the seruauant honoreth his Lord. If I be a Lord, where is my feare? If I be a father, where is my loue?

15 Now followeth the rehearfall of his benefit, which ought to be of so much more force to moue vs, as y^e fault of vnthankfullnes is more detestable euen among men. He then did put Israell in remembrance of a benefit lately done, but such a one as for the miraculous greatnesse therof being worthy to be had in remembrance for euer, should remaine in force with their posterity. Morouer it is most agreeable for this present matter. For y^e Lord seemeth to say that they were deliuered out of miserable bondage for this purpose, that they should with obedience and redines of seruice honor him, the author of their deliuerance. He vseth also, (to the end to hold vs fast in the true worshipping of him alone) to set out himselfe with certaine titles, wherby he maketh his sacred maiesty to be differently knowen from all idols & forged gods. For, as I sayd before, such is our redy inclinatioⁿ to vanity, ioyned with rash boldnes, y^e so soone as God is named, our minde can not take hede to it selfe, but that it by and by falleth away to some vaine inuention. Therefore, when the Lord meaneth to bring a remedy for this mischiefe, he setteth out his owne godhead with certaine titles and so doth compass^e vs in, as it were within certaine grates, least we should wander hither and thither & rashly forge our selues some new God, if forsaking y^e liuing God, we should erect an idole. For this cause, so oft as the Prophetes meane properly to point out him, they cloth him, and as it were enclose him, within those markes, whereby he had opened himselfe to the people of Israell, And yet when he is called the God of Abrahā, or the God of Israell, when he is set in the temple of Hierusalem among the Cherebins, these & like formes of speache do not binde him to one place or to one people, but are set onely for this purpose, to stay the thoughts of the godly in that God, which by his couenant, that he hath made with Israell, hath so represented

 But let this remaine stedfastly emprinted, that there is mention made of the deliuerance to this end, that the Iewes might the more cherefully giue themselues to the God that doth by right claime them vnto him. And we (least we should thinke that the same nothing belongeth to vs,) ought to consider, that the bondage of Ægipt is a figure of the spiritual captiuity, wherein we are all holden bound, vntill our heauenly deliuerer do make vs free by the power of his arme, & conuey vs into the kingdom of liberty. As therefore, when in the old time he minded to gather together the Israelites that were scattered abroad, to the worshipping of his name, he deliuered them out of the intolerable dominion of Pharao, wherewith they were oppressed: so al those to whō at this day he professeth himselfe a God, he doth now deliuer frō the deadly power of the deuil, which was in a shadow signified by y corporall bondage. Wherfore there is no man, but his minde ought to be inflamed to harken to the law which he heareth to haue proceeded frō the soueraigne king. From whom as all things take their beginning, so is it meete that they haue also their ende appointed & directed to him. There is no man (I say) but he ought to be rauished to embrace the lawmaker, to the keeping of whose commaundementes, he is taught that he is peculiarly chosen: frō whose bounty he looketh both for flowing store of all good things, & also the glory of immortall life: by whose maruelous power and mercy, he knoweth himselfe to be deliuered out of the iawes of death.

16 After that he hath grounded and stablished the authority of his law, he setteth forth the first cōmaundement, That we haue no straunge Gods before him. The ende of this commaundement is, that God will only haue preeminēcie, and wholly enioy his owne authority among his people. And that it may so be, he commaundeth that there be far from vs all vngodlines and superstition, whereby the glory of his godheade is either diminished or obscured: and by the same reason he commaundeth, that we worshippe and honor him with true endeuour of godlinesse. And the very simplicity of the wordes themselues do in a manner expresse the same, For we cannot haue God, but we must also comprehend therein all thinges that properly belonge to him. Whereas therefore he forbiddeth vs to haue other Gods, he meaneth therby, that we should not giue away elsewhere y which is propre to him. For although y things y we owe vnto God be innumerable, yet not vnfitly they may be brought vnto foure principal points: Adoration, whereunto as a thing hanging vpon it, is adioyned spiritual obedience of cōscience: Affiance, Inuocation, & Thanksgiuing.

Cap. 8. Of the knowledge of

Adoration I call the reuerēce & worship which euery one of vs yeeldeth vnto him, when he submitteth himselfe vnto his greatnes: wherefore I do not without cause make this a part therof, y^e we yeelde our consciences in subiection to his lawe. Affiance is an assurednes of resting in him by reknowledging of his powers, whē reposing al wisdom, righteousnes, power, trueth and goodnes in him, we thinke our selues blessed with onely partaking of him. Inuocation, is a resorting of our minde to his faith and help as to our only succour, so oft as any necessity presseth vs. Thankesgiuing, is a certaine thankfulness wherby the praise of all good things is giuen vnto him. Of these, as God suffreth nothing to be conueyed away else where, so he commaunded all to be wholly giuen to himselfe. Neither shal it be enough to abstaine from hauing any straunge God, vnlesse thou restrain thy selfe in this, that many wicked cōtemners are wont, which thinke the rediest way, to scorne all religions: but true religion must go before, whereby our mindes may be directed to the liuinge God, with knowledge whereof they being endued, may aspire to reuerence, feare & worship his maiesty, to embrace the communicatinge of all his good thinges, euery where to seeke for his help, to reknowledge and aduaunce with confession of praise the magnificence of his works, as to the only marke in all the doings of our life. Then, that we beware of peruerse superstition, whereby our mindes swaruing from the true God, are drawn hither and thither as it were vnto diuerse gods. Wherefore, if we be cōtented with one God, let vs call to remembrance that which is before said, that all forged gods are to be driuen farre away, and that the worship is not to be torne in sunder, which he alone claimeth to himselfe. For it is not lawfull to take away any thing from his glory, be it neuer so litle, but that all thinges that belong to him may wholly remaine with him. The percell of sentence that followeth (Before my face) encreaseth the hainousnes: for that God is prouoked to ialousy, so oft as we thrust our owne inuentions in his place, as if an vnchast woman by bringing in an adulterer openly before her husbands eyes should the more vexe his minde. Therefore when God testified that with his present power & grace he looked vpon y^e people that he had chosen, the more to fray them from the wicked act of falling from him, he giueth them warning that there can be no new gods brought in, but that he is wimes and beholder of their sacrilege. For this boldnesse is encreased with much wickednesse, that man thinketh that in his fleinges away he can begile the eyes of God. On the other side, God crieth out that whatsoeuer we purpose, whatsoeuer we go about whatsoeuer we practise, it commeth in his sight. Let therefore our cō-science be cleane euen from the most secret thoughtes of swaruinge from him, if we will haue our religion to please the Lord. For he requireth to haue the glory of his godhead whole & vncorrupted not only in outward confession, but also in his eyes, which do behold the most secret corners of heartes.

The second Commaundement.

Thou shalt not make to thee any grauen image, nor any similitude of those things that are in heauen aboue, or in earth beneth, or in the waters under the earth. Thou shalt not worship them, nor serue them.

As in the first commaundement he pronounced that he is the one God beside whom there are no other gods to be deuised or had, so now he more openly declareth what manner of God he is, and with what kinde of worship he is to be honored: that we may not presume to forge any carnall thing for him. The end therefore of this commaundement is, that he will not haue the lawful worship of him, to be prophaned with superstitious vsages. Wherefore in summe, he calleth and draweth vs away from the carnall obseruations, which our foolish minde is wont to inuent, when it conceiueth God according to her owne grosnesse. And therefore he frameth vs to the lawfull worship of him, that is the spirituall worship, and which is appointed by him. He speaketh of y^e grossest fault that is in this offense, namely outward idolatry. And there be two partes of this commaundement, The first restraineth our liberty, that we do not presume to make subiect to our senses or by any forme to represent God, which is incomprehensible. The second parte forbiddeth vs to honor any images for religions sake. Moreouer he shortly reciteth all the formes wherewith he was wont to be expressed in shape, by the prophane and superstitious nations. By those things that are in heauen, he meaneth the Sunne, the Moone, and other Starres, and paradventure also birdes, as expressing his meaning in the fourth of Deuteronomy he meaneth as wel birdes as starres. Which note I would not haue spokē of but that I saw some vnskilfully to apply it to Angels. Therefore I omit the other partes, because they are sufficiently knowen of themselues. And we haue already in the first booke taught plainly enough, that whatsoever visible formes of God man doth inuent, they are directly contrary to his nature, and that therefore so soone as images come foorth, true religion is corrupted and defiled.

18 The penall ordinance that followeth ought not a litle to auaise to shake of our slouthfulnesse. For he threatneth: That he is the Lord our God, a ielous God, that visiteth the iniquity of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third and fourth generation, in them that hate his name, and sheweth mercy vnto thousandes to them that loue him and keepe his commaundementes. This is asmuch in effect, as if he shoulde haue sayd, that it is he onely vpon whom we ought to sticke. And to bring vs thereunto, he speaketh of his power, that doth not without punishment suffer it selfe to be contemned or diminished. Here is in deede set the name El, which signifieth God. But because it is deriued of strength, to expresse the sense the better, I did not sticke so to translate it, or to put it into the text. The he calleth himselfe ielous that can abide no fellow. Thirdly he affirmeth that he will be a reuenger of his maielty and glory if any do transferre it to creatures or to grauen images, and that not with a shorte or slender reuenge, but such as shall extende to the children and childrens children, and childrens childrens children, that is such as shall be followers of their fathers vngodlinesse: as also he sheweth a perpetuall mercy & bountifullnes vnto longe continuance of posterity, to those that loue him and keepe his lawe. It is a common manner with God to take vpon him the persone of a husband toward vs. For the coniunction wherewith he bindeth himselfe vnto vs, when he receiueth vs into the bosome of his church, is like vnto a certaine holy wedlocke, that must stand by mutuall faithfulness. As he doth all the dueties of a faithfull and true husband, so againe he requireth of vs such loue and chastity as ought to be in wedlocke, that we yeelde not our soules to Satan, to lust, and to filthy desires of the flesh, to be defiled by them. Whereupon he that rebuketh the Apostasie of the Iewes, complaineth that they did throw away chastity, & were defiled with adulteries. Therefore, as the husband, the more holy and chaste that he himselfe is, the more is he kindeled to anger if he see his wiues minde encline to a strange louer: so the Lord that hath wedded vs vnto himselfe in truth, testifieth that he hath a most feruently burning ialousie, so oft as neglecting the purenes of his holy marriage, we are defiled with wicked lustes, but specially then when we transferre to any other, or do infect with any superstition the worshippe of his name, which ought to be most vncorrupted: Forasmuch as by this meane we do not only break the faith giuen in wedlocke, but also do defile the very weddinge bed with bringing into it adulterers.

19 In the threthening is to be seene what he meaneth by this, when he sayth, that he will visite the iniquity of the fathers vpon the children vnto the third and fourth generation. For, beside that it standeth not with the equity of Gods iustice, to punish the innocent for an others offence. God himselfe also saith, that he will not make the sonne to beare the wickednes of the father. But this sentence is more than once repeated, of prolonging the punishmēt of the sinnes of the auncesters vpon the generations to come. For so doth Moses oftentimes speake vnto him: Lord, Lord, that rendrest the iniquity of the fathers to the children, vnto the third & fourth generation. Likewise Jeremy: Thou that shewest mercy in thousandes, that renderest the iniquity of the fathers into the bosome of the children after them. Many, while they trauaile much in losinge this knot, thinke that it is to be vnderstanded onely of temporall punishmentes, which if the children suffer for the parentes faultes, it is no absurdity, forasmuch as they are oftentimes layed vpon them for their saluation, which is in dede true For Esay declared to Ezechias, that his sonnes should be spoiled of the kingdom, & caried into exile for y sinne that he had committed. The houses of Pharao & Abimelech were plaged for offending Abraham. But when that is alleaged for assoilinge of this question, it is rather a shift than a true exposition. For here & in like places he threatneth a more greuous reuenge thā that it may be limited within the bounds of this present life. It is therefore thus to be taken: that the iust curse of the Lord, lieth not only vpon the head of the wicked mā himselfe, but also vpon his whole family: whē the curse once lieth vpon them, what is else to be looked for, but that the father being destitute of the spirit of God, liue most wickedly, and the sonne likewise forsaken of the Lord for the fathers fault, do follow the same way of destruction: & finally, the chilles child, & the childe of the chilles childe, the cursed seede of detestable men do fall headlong after them?

20 First let vs see, whether such reuēge be vnseemely for the iustice of God. If all the nature of man be dānable, we know that destruction is prepared for them, to whom the lord vouchsaueth not to communicate his grace, Neuertheles they do perish by their own vnrighteousnesse, & not by vnrighteous hatred of God. Neither is there left any cause to quarell, why they be not holpen by y grace of God to saluation as other are. Wheras therefore this punishmēt is laid vpon wicked mē & euil doers for their offenses, that their houses be depriued of the grace of God during many generations: who can accuse God for this most iust reuenge? But y Lord on y other side pronounceth, that y punishmēt of y fathers sinne shal not passe ouer vnto y sonne. Note what is there entreated of. When the Israelites had bin long & continually vexed w many calamities, they began to vse for a Prouerbe, that their fathers had eatē a sower grape, wherwith the childrens teeth were set on edge: whereby they meant that their fathers had cōmited sinnes, whereof they, being otherwise righteous, and not deserving it, did suffer the punishment, rather by the vnappealeable wrathfulnesse of God, than by a moderate seuerity. The Prophet pronounceth vnto theſe it is not so: because they are punished for their owne offenses, & that it standeth not with the iustice of God, y^e the righteous sonne shoulde suffer punishment for the naughtinesse of the wicked father. Which thing also is not contained in this present ordinance. For if y^e Visiting, wherof mention is now made, be fulfilled when the lord taketh away from the house of the wicked his grace, the light of his trueth and other helps of saluation: in this that the children beinge blinded & forsaken of him, do go on in the steps of their fathers, they susteine curses for their fathers offenses. But inasmuch as they are put to temporall miseries, & at last to eternal destruction, herein they are punished by the iust iudgement of God, not for y^e sinnes of other, but for their owne iniquity.

21 On the other side is offered a promise of enlarging the mercy of God into a thousand generatiōs, which promise is also often found in the Scriptures, & is set in y^e solemne couenant of the church: I wil be thy God, and of thy seede after thee. Which thing Salomon hagen. 17
ro. 20. uing respect vnto, wryteth that y^e childre of the righteous shalbe blessed after their death not only by reasoⁿ of holy bringing vp, which also not a litle auaieth therunto, but also for y^e blessing promised in the couenāt, that the grace of God shall rest eternally in the houses of the godly. Hereupō groweth great cōfort to the faithfull, great terrour to the wicked. For if euen after death, the remembrance both of righteousness & wickednesse be of so great force with God, that the cursing of the one, and the blessing of the other redoundeth vnto posterity, much more shal it light & rest vpon the heads of the doers theselues. But it maketh nothings against vs, that the issue of the wicked many times cometh to good proufe, & y^e issue of the faithfull swarueth out of kinde: because the lawmaker meant not here to stablish such a perpetuall rule as should derogate his free electiō. For it sufficeth for the comfote of the righteous and for the terrour of the sinner, that the penalty is not vaine or of no effect, although it do not alway take place. For as the temporall punishmentes that are layed vpon a few wicked men, are testimonies of the wrath of God against sinnes, and of the iudgement that shal one day be giuē vpon all sinners, although many escape vnpunished euen to the ende of their life: so when God giueth one example of this blessing to shew mercy & bountifulnesse to the sonne for the fathers sake, he giueth a proufe of his cōstant & perpetuall fauour to them that worship him: and when he once pursueth

sueth the wickednesse of the father in the sonne, he sheweth what iudgement is prepared for all the reprobate for their owne offences. Which assurednesse he had in this place principally respect vnto. And by the way he commendeth vnto vs the largenesse of his mercie, which he extendeth vnto a thousand generations, whereas he assigned but onely fower generations to vengeance.

The third Commaundement.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vaine.

The ende of this commaundement is, that his will is to haue the maiesty of his name to be holy amōg vs. Therefore the summe shalbe, that we do not defile it with cōtemptuously and irreuerently vsing it. With which prohibition the commaundement hangeth orderly together, that we take studie and care godlily to reuerence it. Therefore we ought so to order our selues both in our mindes and our tonges, that we neither thinke nor speake any thing of God himselfe or his misteries, but reuerently and with much sobrietie: that in weying his workes, we conceiue nothing but honorable towarde him. These three things I say, it behoueth vs not negligently to marke, that what soeuer our minde conceiueth of him, what soeuer our tong vttereth, it may sauour of his excellencie, and may agree with the holy highnesse of his name: and finally may serue to aduaunce his magnificēce, That we do not rashly or disorderly abuse his holy word and reuered misteries either to ambition, or to coueteousnesse, or to our owne triflinges: but that as they beare the dignitie of his name emprinted in them, so they may keepe their honour and estimation among vs. Last of all, that we do not carp against or speake euill of his workes, as these wretched men are wont to babble reprochefully against the: but that what soeuer we rehearse done by him, we reporte it with wordes of praise of his wisdome, righteousnesse & goodnesse. That is to sanctifie the name of God. Where otherwise is done, it is defiled with vaine and peruerse abuse, bycause it is violently carried from the right vse wherunto onely it was apointed: and though there be no other hurt done, yet it is spoiled of his dignitie, and by little and little brought to contempt. Now, if there be so much euill in this rash readinesse to vse the name of God out of season, much more mischief is in this, if it be employed to euill vses, as they do that make it to serue the superstitions of Necromancie, cruell execrations, vnlawfull coniuurations, and other wicked enchauntementes. But swearing is chiefly mentioned in the commaundement, as the thing wherein the peruerse abuse of Gods name is most detestable; that thereby we may be the better altogether frayed away from all defiling thereof. But that here is commaundement geuen of the worship of God, and of the reuerence of his name, and not of the truthe and equitie that is to be kept among men, appeareth by that that he afterwarde in the second table condemneth periurie and false witnessse, whereby hurte is done to the fellowship of men: but it were in vaine to repete it againe, if this commaundement entreated of the dutie of charitie. And also the diuision of the lawe it selfe requireth it, bycause as it is said, God did not in vaine apointe two tables for his lawe, whereby is gathered that in this commaundement he chalengeth his owne right to himselfe, and defendeth the holynesse of his name, and teacheth not what men owe to men.

23 First is to be learned what is an othe. It is a taking of God to witnessse, to confirme the truthe of that which we speake. For those cursed speeches that containe manifest reproches against God, are vnworthy to be reckened among othes. That such taking to witnessse, whan it is rightly done, is a kinde of worshipping of God, is shewed in diuerse places of the Scripture. As when Esaie prophecieth of the calling of the Assyrians and Egyptians into fellowship of the couenaunt with Israel, They shall speake (saith he) in the tongue of Chanaan, and shall swere in the name of the Lorde. That is to say, in swearing by the name of the Lorde, they shall yelde a confession of his religion. Againe when he speaketh of the enlargemēt of his kingdome, he saith: Whosoever shall blesse himselfe, shall blesse in the God of the faithfull: and he that shall swere in the lande, shall swere in the true God. Hieremie saith, If they shall teache the people to swere in my name as they haue taught them to swere by Baal, they shalbe builded vp in the middes of my house. And for good cause it is saide, that when we call vpon the name of the Lorde to witnessse, we do witnessse our religion towards him. For so we confesse that he is the eternall and vnchangeable truthe, whome we call vpon, not onely as a most substantiall witnessse of truth aboue all other, but also as the onely defense thereof, which is able to bring forth hidden thinges into light, and then as the knower of heartes. For where testimonies of men do faile, there we flee to God for witnessse, specially where any thing is to be proued that lieth secrete in conscience. For which cause the Lorde is bitterly angry with them that swear by strange gods, and he iudgeth that maner of swearing to be an argumēt of manifest falling from his allegiance: Thy sonnes haue forsaken me, and do swear by them that are no gods. And he declareth the haynousnesse of this offense by threatening of punishment: I will destroy them that swear by

24 Nowe when we vnderstand that it is the Lordes will that there be in our othes a worship of his name: so much the more diligent hede is to be taken, that in stede of worshipping they do not conteine dishonour, contempt or abacement of it. For it is no small dishonour, when periurie is committed in swearing by him, wherefore it is called in the lawe, Profanation. For what is left to the Lorde when he is spoiled of his truth? he shall then cease to be God. But truely he is spoiled therof, when he is made an affirmer and approuer of falshood. Wherefore, when Iosua minded to driue Achan to confesse the truth, he said: My Sonne, geue glorie to the Lorde of Israell, meaning thereby, that the Lorde is greuouly dishonored if a man sweare falsely by him. And no maruell. For we do as much as in vs lieth, in a maner, to staine his holy name with a lie. And that this manner of speech was vsed among the Iewes so oft as any was called to take an othe, appeareth by the like protestation, that the Pharisees vse in the Gospell of Iohn. To this heedfulnessse the formes of othes that are vsed in the Scriptures do instruct vs: The Lord lyueth, The Lord do these thinges vnto me, and adde these thinges, The Lorde be witnessse vpon my soule. Which do proue, that we can not call God for witnessse of our sayinges, but that we also wishe him to take vengeance of our periurie, if we speake deceitfully.

25 The name of the Lorde is made vile and common, when it is vsed in superfluous othes, although they be true. For in such case it is also taken in vaine. Wherefore it shal not be sufficient to absteine from swearing falsely, vnlesse we do also remember, that swearing was suffered and ordeined not for luste or pleasure, but for necessities sake: and therefore they go beyond the lawfull vse thereof, that applie it to thinges not necessarie. And there can no other necessitie be pretended, but where it is to serue either religion or charitie, wherein at this day men do to much licentiously offende, and so much the more intolerable, for that by very custome it hath cessed to be reckned for any offense at all, which yet before the iudgement seate of God is not slenderly weyed. For euey where without regard, the name of God is defiled in trifling talkes, and it is not thought that they do euill, because by long suffered and vnpunished boldenesse, they are come to rest as it were in possession of so great wickednesse. But the commaundement of the Lord remaineth in force, the penaltie abideth in strength, and shall one day haue his effect, whereby there is a certaine speciall reuenge proclaimed against them that vse his name in vaine. This commaundement is also transgressed in an other point, that in our othes we put the holy seruantes of God in the place of God, with manifest vngodlynesse, for so we transfer the glorie of his godhead to them. Neither is it without cause, that the Lorde hath geuen speciall commaundement to swere by his name, and by speciall prohibition forbidden, that we shoulde not be heard swere by any strange gods. And the Apostle evidently testifieth the same, when he writeth, that men in swearing do call vpon a hier than themselues, and that God which had none greater than his owne glorie to swere by, did swere by himselfe.

26 The Anabaptistes not contented with this moderatiō of swearing, do detest all othes without exception, bycause the prohibition of Christ is generall: I say vnto ye, swere not at all, but let your talke be yea yea, and nay nay, what so euer is more than this, is of euill. But by this meane, they do without consideration stumble against Christ: while they make him aduersarie to his father, and as if he had come downe from heauen to repeale his fathers decrees. For the eternall God doth in the lawe not onely permit swearing as a thing lawfull, which were enough: but also in necessitie doth commaunde it. But Christ affirmeth that he is all one with his father? that he bringeth no other thing, but that which his father commaunded him, that his doctrine is not of himselfe, &c. What then? will they make God contrarie to himselfe, which shall afterwarde forbidde and condemne the same thing in mens behauiours, whiche he hath before allowed by cōmaunding it? But bycause there is some difficultie in the wordes of Christ, let vs a little weye them. But herein we shall neuer atteine the truth, vnlesse we bende our eyes vnto the entent of Christ, and take heede vnto the purpose that he there goeth about. His purpose is not either to release or restreigne the lawe, but to reduce it to the true and naturall vnderstanding, whiche had bene very muche depraued by the false gloses of the Scribes and Pharisees. This if we holde in minde, we shall not thinke than Christ did vtterly condemne othes, but only those othes which do transgresse the rule of the lawe. Thereby it appeareth, that the people at that time did forbear no maner of swearing but periuries, wheras the lawe doth not onely forbidde periuries, but also all idle and superfluous othes. The Lord therefore the most sure expositour of the lawe, doth admonish them, that it is not onely euill to forswear, but also to swear. But how to swear? in vaine. But as for these othes that are commended in the lawe, he leaueth them safe and at libertie. They seme to fight somewhat more strongly when they take earnest holde of this worde At all, which yet is not referred to the worde Swear, but to the formes of swearing that that are after rehearsed. For this was also parte of their errour, that when they did sweare by heauen and earth, they thought that they did not touch the name of God. Therefore after the principall kinde of offence against this commaundement, the Lorde doth also cut of from them all byeshiftes, that they shoulde not thinke that they haue escaped, if not speaking of the name of God they call heauen and earth to witnesse. For here by the way it is also to be noted, that although the name of God be not expressed, yet me by indirect formes do sweare by him, as if they sweare by the liuely light, by the bread that they eate, by their Baptisme, or other tokens of Gods liberalitie toward them. Neither doth Christ in that place where he forbiddeth them to sweare by heauen and earth and Hierusalem, speake it to correct superstition, as some men falsely thinke, but he rather confuteth their sophisticall sutteltie, which thought it no faulte babblingly to throwe out indirect othes, as though they spared the holy name of God, which is engrauen in all his benefites. But otherwise it is, where either a mortall man, or a dead man, or an Angell is put in the place of God: as among the prophane nations flatterie deuised that stinking forme of swearing by the life or soule of the King: for then the false making of Gods doth obscure and minish the glorie of the one onely God. But when we meane only, to procure credit to our sayings by the holy name of God, although the same be indirectly done, yet in all such trifling othes his maiestie is offended. Christ taketh from this licentiousnesse, all pretense of excuse, in this that he forbiddeth to sweare at all. And Iames tendeth to the same purpose, reciting the same wordes of Christ which I haue before alleged, by cause that same rash boldenesse hath alway bene in the worlde, which is a prophane misuse of the name of God. For if ye referre this worde, At all, to the substance, as if without any exception it were altogether vnlawfull to sweare: wherefore serueth that exposition which is added afterward: Neither by heauen nor by earth, &c? Wherby it sufficiently appereth that those cauillations are met withall, by which the Iewes thought their faulte to be excused.

27 Therefore it can not nowe be doubtfull to sounde iudgements, that the Lorde in that place did onely reprove those othes that were forbidden by the lawe. For he himselfe which shewed in his life an examplar of the perfection that he taught, did not sticke to sweare when occasion required. And his disciples, who (we doubt not) did obey their maister in all thinges, followed the same example: who dare say that Paule woulde haue sworne, if swearing had ben vtterly forbidden? but when matter so required, he sware without any sticking at it, yea sometime adding an execration. But this question is not yet ended, bycause some do thinke that onely publike othes are excepted out of this prohibitiō, as those othes that we take when the Magistrate doth offer them to vs and require them of vs. And such as Princes vse to take in stablishing of leagues, or the people when they swear allegeance to their Prince, or the Soldiar when he is put to an othe for his true seruice in the warre, and such like. And to this sorte they adioyne, and that rightfully, such othes, as are in

Heb. 6. 16. Paule to confirme the dignitie of the Gospell, for asmuch as the Apostles in their office are not priuate men but publicke ministers of God. And truely I denie not that those are the safest othes, bycause they are defended with soundest testimonies of Scripture. The magistrate is commaunded in a doubtfull case to driue the witnessse to an othe, and he on the other side to aunswere by othe: and the Apostle saith, that mens controuersies are by this meane ended. In this cōmaundement bothe these haue a perfect allowance of their offices. Yea and we may note, that among the olde heathen men, the publike and solemne othe was had in great reuerence, but common othes that were vsually spoken without consideration, were either nothing or very little regarded, bycause they thought that in these they had not to do with the maiestie of God at all. But yet it were to much daungerous to condemne priuate othes, that are in necessarie cases soberly, holily, and reuerently taken, which are mainteined both by reason and examples. For if it be lawfull for priuate men in a weighty and earnest matter to appele to God as iudge betwene them, much more is it lawfull to call him to witnessse. Put the case: thy brother will accuse thee of false breache of faith, thou endeourest to purge thy selfe according to the durie of charitie, and he by no meanes will suffer himselfe to be satisfied. If thy good name come in perill by his obstinate maliciousnesse, thou shalt without offense appele to the iudgement of God, that it will please him in time to make thine innocency knowen. Now if the weight of the wordes be considered, it is a lesse matter to call him to witnessse. Therefore I see not why in this case we shoulde affirme, that the calling him to witnessse is vnlawfull. And we are not without many examples thereof. For though the othe of Abraham and Isaac with Abimelech be said not to serue for our purpose, bycause it was made in the name of a publike companie, yet Iacob and Laban were priuate men, which stablished a couenaunt with mutuall othe betwene themselues. Booz was a priuate man, which by the same meane cōfirmed his promise of mariage to Ruth. Abdias was a priuate man, a iust man and fearing God, which affirmed vnto

Elias by othe, the thing that he meant to perswade him. Therefore I haue no better rule, but that othes be so tempered, that they be not vnaduised, that they be not common without regard, that they be not vsed of raging luste, nor trifling, but that they serue iuste necessitie, as where the Lordes glorie is to be maintained, or the edification of our brother furthered, to whiche ende the commaundement of the lawe tendeth.

The fourth Commaundement.

Remember that thou kepe holy the Sabbath day. Six dayes shalt thou worke and do all thy workes. But on the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. In it thou shalt do no worke. &c.

28 The ende of this commaundement is, that we being dead to our owne affections and workes, shoulde be busied in meditation of the kingdome of God, and to the same meditation shoulde be exercised, by such meanes as he hath ordeined. But bycause this commaundement hath a peculiar and seuerall consideratiō from the rest, therefore it must haue also a seuerall manner of exposition. The olde writers vse to call it a shadowish commaundement, for that it conteineth the outward obseruatiō of the day, which by the comming of Christ was taken away with the other figures. Wherin I graūt they say truly, but they touch but halfe the matter. Wherefore we must fetch the exposition of it farther of. And (as I thinke) I haue marked that there are three causes to be considered, wherupon this commaundement consisteth. For first the heauenly lawemaker meant vnder the rest of the seventh day, to set out in figure to the people of Israell the spirituall rest, whereby the faithfull ought to cesse from their owne workes, that they might suffer God to worke in them. Secondarily, his will was to haue one appointed day, wherin they shoulde meete together to heare the law, & execute the ceremonies, or at least bestow it peculiarly to the meditation of his workes: that by such calling to remembrance, they might be exercised to godlinesse. Thirdly, he thought good to haue a day of rest graunted to seruauntes, and such as liued vnder the gouernement of other, wherein they might haue some cessing from their labour.

29 But we are many waies taught, that the same shadowing of the spirituall rest, was the principall point in the Sabbath. For the Lorde required the keeping of no commaundement in a maner more seuerely, than this: when his meaning is in the Prophetes to declare that all religiō is overthrowen, thē he complaineth that his Sabbares are polluted, defiled, not kept, not sanctified: as though that peece of seruice being omitted, there remained no more wherein he might be honored. He did set forth the obseruing thereof with hie praises. For whiche cause the faithfull did among other oracles maruelously esteeme the reueling of the Sabbat. For in Nehemiah thus spake the Leuites in a solemne conuocation, Thou hast shewed to our fathers thy holy Sabbat, and hast geuen them the commaundementes and the ceremonies, and the lawe by the hande of Moses. You see how it is had in singular estimation among all the commaudemētes of the lawe. All which thinges do serue to set forth the dignitie of the misterie, whiche is very well expressed by Moses and Ezechiel. Thus you haue in Exodus. See that ye kepe my Sabbat day, bycause it is a token betwene me and you in your generations: that you may knowe that I am the Lord that sanctifie you: kepe my Sabbat, for it is holy vnto you. Let the children of Israell kepe the Sabbat and celebrate it in their generations, it is an euerlasting couenant betwene me and the children of Israell, and a perpetuall token. Yet Ezechiel speaketh more at large. But the summe therof cometh to this effect, that it is for a token whereby Israell shoulde knowe that God is their sanctifier. If our sanctification be the mortifying of our owne will, then appeareth a most apte relation of the outwarde signe with the inward thing it selfe: we must altogether rest, that God may worke in vs: we must depart from our owne will, we must resigne vp our heart, we must banish all lustes of the flesh. Finally, we must cesse from all the doinges of our owne wit, that we may haue God working in vs, that we may reſte in him, as the Apostle also teacheth.

 30 This perpetuall censing was represented to the Iewes, by the keping of one day among seuen: which day, to make it be obserued with greater deuotion, the Lord commaunded with his owne example. For it auaieth not a litle to stirre vp mans endeuour, that he may knowe that he tendeth to the following of his Creator. If any man search for a secret signification in the number of seuen: For asmuch as that number is in the Scripture the number of perfection, it was not without cause chosen to signifie euerlasting continuance. Wherewith this also agreeth that Moses in the day that he declared that the Lord did rest from his workes, maketh an ende of describing the succeding of dayes and nightes. There may be also brought an other probable note of the number, that the Lord thereby meant to shew that the Sabbat shoulde neuer be perfectly ended, till it came to the last day. For in it we beginne our blessed rest, in it we do dayly procede in profiting more and more. But bycause we haue still a continuall warre with the flesh, it shall not be ended vntill that saying of Esaie be fulfilled, concerning the continuing of newe Moone with newe Moone, of Sabbat with Sabbat, euen then when God shalbe all in all. It may seeme therfore that the Lord hath by the seuenth day set forth to his people the perfection to come of his Sabbat at the laste day, that our whole life might by continuall meditation of the Sabbat, aspire to this perfection. 1. Cor. 15. 28.

31 If any man mislike this obseruation of the number as a matter to curious, I am not against him, but that he may more simply take it: that the Lorde ordeined one certaine day, wherein his people might vnder the scholing of the lawe be exercised to the continuall meditation of the spirituall reste: And that he assigned the seuenth day, either bycause he thought it sufficiēt, or that by setting forth the likeness of his owne example, he might the better moue the people to keepe it: or at least to put them in minde, that the Sabbat tended to no other ende, but that they should become like vnto their Creator. For it maketh small matter, so that the misterie remaine which is therein principally set forth, concerning the perpetual rest of our workes. To consideration whereof the Prophetes did now and then call backe the Iewes, that they should not thinke them selues discharged by carnall taking of their rest. Beside the places already alleaged, you haue thus in Esay: If thou turne away thy foote from the Sabbat, that thou doe not thine owne will in my holy day, and shalt call the Sabbat delicate and holy of the glorious Lorde, and shalt glorifie him while thou doest not thine owne wayes, and seekest not thine owne will to speake the word, the shalt thou be delited in y^e Lord, &c. But it is no doubt, that by the comming of our Lorde Christ, so much as was ceremoniall herein, was abrogate. For he is the truth, by whose presence all figures doe vanish away: he is the body at sight whereof the shadowes are left. He, I say, is the true fulfilling of the Sabbat, we being buried with him by Baptisme, are grafted into the fellowship of his death, that we being made partakers of the resurrection, we may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in an other place the Apostle writeth, that the Sabbat was a shadow of a thing to come: and that the true body, that is to say, the perfect substance of truth is in Christ, which in the same place he hath well declared. That is not contained in one day, but in the whole course of our life, vntill that we being vtterly dead to our selues, be filled with the life of God. Therefore superstitious obseruing of dayes ought to be farre from Christians. Esa. 58. 13. Rom. 4. Col. 2. 16. & 17.

32 But for asmuch as the two later causes ought not to be reckoned among the olde shadowes, but doe belong a like to all ages: since the Sabbat is abrogate, yet this hath still place with vs, that we should

meete at appoynted dayes to the hearing of the word, to the breaking of the mysticall bread, and to publike prayer: and then, that to seruantes and laborers be graunted their rest from their labour. It is out of doubt that in commaunding the Sabbath the Lorde had care of both these thinges. The first of them hath sufficient testimonie by the only vse of the Iewes to proue it. The second, Moses spake of in Deuteronomie in these wordes: that thy man seruant and thy mayde seruant may rest as well as thou: remember that thou thy selfe didst serue in Egypt. Againe in Exodus: that thy Oxe and thy Assse may rest, and the sonne of thy bondwoman may take breath. Who can deny that both these thinges doe serue for vs as well as for the Iewes? Meetings at the Church, are commaunded vs by the word of God, and the necessitie of them is sufficiently knowen in the very experience of life. Vnlesse they be certainly appoynted and haue their ordinarie dayes, how can they be kept? All thinges by the sentence of the Apostle are to be done comly and in order among vs. But so farre is it of, that comlinessse and order can be kept without this policie and moderation, that there is at hand present trouble and ruine of the Church, if it be dissolued. Now if the same necessitie be among vs, for releefe whereof the Lord appointed the Sabbath to the Iewes: let no man say that it belongeth nothing vnto vs. For our most prouident and tender Father, willed no lesse to prouide for our necessitie than for the Iewes. But thou wilt say, why doe we not rather daily meete together, that the difference of dayes may be taken away? I would to God, that were graunted, and truely spirituall wisdome was a thing worthy to haue daily a peece of the time cut out for it. But if it can not be obtained of the weakenesse of many to haue daily meetings, and the rule of charitie doth not suffer vs to exact more of them, why should we not obey the order which we see layed vpon vs by the will of God.

33 I am compelled here to be somewhat long, because at this day many vnquiet spirites doe raise trouble, concerning the Sunday. They crie out that the Christian people are nourished in Iewishnesse, because they keepe some obseruation of dayes. But I answere, that we keepe those dayes without any Iewishnesse, because we doe in this behalfe farre differ from the Iewes. For we keepe it not with streight religion as a ceremonie, wherein we thinke a spirituall misterie to be figured, but we retaine it as a necessary remedie to the keeping of order in the Church. But Paule teacheth that in keeping thereof they are not to be iudged Christians, because it is a shadow of a thing to come. Therefore he feared that he had laboured in vaine among the Galathians, thians, because they did still obserue dayes. And to the Romanes he affirmeth that it is superstition if any man doe make difference betwene day and day. But who, sauing these madde men onely doth not see, of what obseruing the Apostle meaneth? For they had no regarde to this politicall ende and the order of the Church, but whereas they kept them still as shadowes of spiritual thinges, they did euen so much darken the glory of Christ and the light of the Gospell. They did not therefore cease from handy vvorkes, because they were thinges that did call them away from holy studies and meditations, but for a certaine religion, that in ceasing from worke they did dreame that they still kept their misteries of olde time deliuered them. The Apostle, I say, inueyeth against this disordered difference of dayes, and not against the lawefull choise of dayes that serueth for the quietnesse of Christian fellowship, for in the Churches that he him selfe did ordaine, the Sabbath was kept to this vse. For he appointeth the Corinthians the same day, wherein they should gather the collection to relieue the brethren at Ierusalé. If they feare superstition, there was more daunger thereof in the feast dayes of the Iewes, than in the Sundayes that the Christians now haue. For, so as was expedient for the ouerthrowing of superstition, the day that the Iewes religiously obserued is taken away: and, so as was necessary for keeping of comlineffe, order, and quiet in the Church, an other day was appoynted for the same vse.

34 Albeit the old fathers haue not without reason of their choise, put in place of the Sabbath day the day that we cal Sunday. For whereas in the Resurrection of the Lorde is the ende and fulfilling of that rest, whereof the olde Sabbath was a shadow: the Christians are by the very same day that made an ende of shadowes, put in minde that they should no longer sticke vnto the shadowish ceremonie. But yet I doe not so rest vpon the number of seuen, that I would binde the church to the bondage thereof. Neither will I condemne those Churches, that haue other solemne dayes for their meetings, so that they be without superstition, which shall be, if they be onely applyed to the obseruation of Discipline and well appoynted order. Let the summe hereof be this: as the truth was geuen to the Iewes vnder a figure, so is it deliuered vs without any shadowes at all. First that in all our life long we should be in meditation of a continuall Sabbath or rest from our owne workes, that the Lord may worke in vs by his spirite: then that euery man priuately so oft as he hath leasure, should diligently exercise him selfe in godly calling to minde the workes of God, and also that we all should keepe the lawfull order of the Church appoynted.

ted, for the hearing of the worde, for the ministration of the Sacraments and for publike prayer: thirdly that we should not vngently oppresse them that be vnder vs. And so doe the trifelings of the false prophets vanish away that in the ages past haue infected the people with a Iewish opinion, that so much as was ceremoniall in this commaundement is taken away, which they in their tongue call the appointing of the seuenth day, but that so much as is morall remaineth, which is the keeping of one day in the weeke. But that is nothing else in effect, than for reproch of the Iewes to change the day, & to kepe still the same holinesse in their minde: For there still remaineth with vs the like signification of mysterie in the dayes as was among the Iewes. And truly we see what good they haue done by such doctrine. For they that cleaue to their constitutions, doe by these as much as exceede the Iewes in grosse and carnall superstition of Sabbath: so that the rebukings that are read in Esay, doe no lesse fitly serue for them at these dayes, than for those that the Prophet reprobud in his time. But this generall doctrine is principally to be kept, that lest religion should fall away or waxe faint among vs, holy meetings are to be diligently kept, and those outward helpes are to be vsed that are profitable for to nourish the worshipping of God.

The fift Commaundement.

Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that thou maist liue long vpon the Land which the Lord thy God shall geue thee.

35 The ende of this commaundement is, that because the Lorde deliteth in the preservation of his order, therefore he willet that those degrees of preeminence which he hath ordained be not broken, the summe therefore shall be that we reuerence those whom the Lord hath set ouer vs, that we yeld to them honour, obedience and thankfulness. Whereupon followeth that it is forbidden vs, to withdraw any thing from their dignitie, either by contempt or obstinacie or vnthankfulness. For so doth the word Honour, in the Scripture signifie very largely: as when the Apostle sayeth, that the elders which rule well are worthy of double honour, he meaneth not onely that reuerence is due vnto them, but also such recompense as their ministerie deserueth. And because this commaundement of subiection, doth most of all disagree with the peruerseness of mans nature, which as it swelleth with greedinesse of climbing hie, so it hardly abideth to be brought lowe: therefore he hath set that kinde of superiority for example, which by nature is most amiable and least enuious: because he might the easelyer meeken and reclaime our mindes to the use of submission. Therefore the Lorde doth by litle and litle traine vs to all lawfull subiection by that which is most easy to beare, forasmuch as the rule of all is alike. For to whome he geueth any preeminence, he doth communicate his owne name with them, so farre as is necessarie to preferue the same preeminence: The name of Father, God, and Lord, do so belong vnto him alone, that so ofte as we heare one of them named, our minde must needes be touched with a feeling of his maiesty. Therefore whom he maketh partakers of these thinges, he maketh to glister with a certaine sparke of his brightnesse, that they may be honorable euery one according to his degree. Therefore in him that is our father we haue to cōsider somewhat of the nature of God, bycause he beareth not the name of God without cause. He that is our Prince or our Lord, hath some partaking of honour with God.

36 Wherefore it ought not to be doubted that God doth here set a generall rule, that as we know any man to be by his ordinaunce set ouer vs, so we yeelde vnto him reuerence, obedience, thankfulnessse, and such other dueties as it lieth in vs to do. And it maketh no difference, whether they be worthy or vnworthy. For of what sorte soeuer they be, they haue not without the prouidence of God attained that place, by reason wherof the lawemaker would haue them to be honored. Yet namely he hath geuen commaundement of reuerēce to parentes, that haue brought vs into this life, to which reuerence very nature ought in a maner to instruct vs. For they are monsters and not men, that breake the authoritie of parentes with dishonor or stubbornnesse. Therefore the Lord commaunded all the disobedient to their parentes, to be slaine, as men vnworthy to enioy the benefite of light, that do not reknowlege by whose meanes they came into it.

And by many additions of the lawe it appeareth to be true that we haue noted, that there are three partes of honour that he here speaketh of, Reuerence, Obedience, and Thankfullnesse. The first of these the Lord establissheth when he commaūdeth him to be killed that curseth his Father or his Mother, for there he punisheth the contempt and dishonour of them. The seconde he confirmeth when he appointeth the punishment of death for the disobedient and rebellious children. To the thirde belongeth that saying of Christ in the fiftene of Matthew, that it is the commaundement of God that we do good to our parentes. And so oft as Paule maketh mention of a cōmaundement, he expounereth that therein obedience is required.

37 There is annexed a promise for a commendation, which doth the rather put vs in minde, how acceptable vnto God is the submission that is here commaunded. For Paule vseth the same picke to stirre vp our dulnesse when he saith : that this is the first commaundement with promise . For the promise that went before in the first Table, was not speciall and properly belonging to one commaundement, but extēded to the whole law. Now this is thus to be taken: The Lord spake to the Israelites peculiarly of the lande which he had promised them for their inheritance. If then the possession of lande was a pledge of Gods bountyfullnesse: let vs not meruell if it pleased God to declare his fauour by geuing length of life, by which a man might long enioye his benefit. The meaning therefore is thus. Honour thy Father and thy Mother, that by a long space of life thou mayst enioy the possession of that lande that shalbe vnto thee for a testimonie of my Father. But sith all the earth is blessed to the faithfull , we do not worthily reckon this present life among the blessings of God. Therefore this promise doth likewise belong vnto vs, forsomuch as the continuance of this life is a prooffe of Gods good will . For it neither is promised to vs, nor was promised to the Iewes, as though it contained blessednesse in it selfe , but bycause it is wont to be to the Godly a token of Gods tender loue. Therefore if it chaunce that an obedient child to his parētes be taken out of this life before his ripe age, which is oftentimes seene , yet doth God no lesse constantly continue in the performance of his promise, than if he shoulde rewarde, him with a hundreth Acres of lande , to whome he promised but one Acre. All consisteth in this, that we should cōsider that long life is so farre promised vs, as it is the blessing of God, and that it is his blessing so farre as it is a prooffe of his fauour , which he by death doth much more plentifully and perfectly witnessse and shew in effect to his seruantes.

38 Moreouer, when the Lorde promiseth the blessing of this presente life to the children that honour their parentes with such reuerence as they ought , he doth withall secretly say , that most assured curse hangeth ouer the stubborne and disobedient children. And that the same shoulde not want execution : he pronounceth them by his law subiect to the iudgement of death, and commaundeth them to be put to execution: & if they escape that iudgement, he him selfe taketh vengeance on them by one meane or other. For we see how great a numbere of that sorte of men are slaine in battailes and in fraies , and some other tormented in strange vnaccustomed fashions, and they all in a manner are a prooffe that this threatning is not vaine . But if any escape to olde age , sith in this life being deprived of the blessing of God , they do nothing but miserably languish and are reserued for greater paines hereafter , they are farre from being partakers of the blessing promised to the godly children . But this is also by the way to be noted, that we are not commaunded to obey them but in the Lorde. And that is euident by the foundation before layed: for they sit on hie in that place whereunto the Lorde hath aduanced them, by communicating with them a portion of his honour. Therefore the submission that is vsed towarde them, ought to be a steppe towarde the honouring of that soueraigne Father. Wherefore, if they moue vs to transgresse the lawe, then are they worthily not to be accompted parentes, but straungers that labour to withdraw vs from obedience to the true Father. And so is to be thought of Princes, Lordes and all sortes of superiours. For it is shamefull and against conuenience of reason, that their preeminence shoulde preuaile to presse downe his highnesse, sith theyres as it hangeth wholly vpon it, so ought onely to guide vs vnto it.

The sixt Commaundement.

Thou shalt not kill.

39 The ende of this commaundement is, that forasmuch as God hath bounde together all mankinde with a certaine vnitie, that euery man ought to regarde the safetie of all men, as a thing geuen him in charge. In summe therefore, all violence and wrong, yea and all harme doing, wherby our neighbours bodie maie be hurte, is forbidden vs. And therefore we are commaunded, if there be any power of succour in our trauaile to defende the life of our neighbours, that we faithfully imploy the same, that we procure those things that may make for their quiet, that we watch to keepe them from hurte, and if they be in any daunger, that we geue them our helping hand. If thou consider that it is God the lawemaker that so saith, then thinke withall that his meaning is by this rule also to gouerne thy soule. For it were a fonde thing to thinke, that he which espieth the thoughtes of the hearte, and principally resteth vpon them, should instruct nothing but the body to true righteousnesse. Therefore the manslaughter of the hearte is also forbidden in this lawe, and an inwarde affection to preserue our brothers life is here geuen in commaundement. The hande in deede bringeth fourth the manslaughter, but the minde conceiueth it, when it is infected with wrath and hatred. Looke whether thou canst be angry with thy brother without burning in desire to do him hurte. If thou canst not be angry with him, then canst thou not hate him, for asmuch as hatred is nothing but an olde rooted anger. Although thou dissemble and go about to winde out thy selfe by vaine circumstances: yet where anger or hatred is, there is an affection to hurte. If thou wilt still dally out with shiftes to defende it, it is already 40 The Scripture noteth two pointes of equitie, vpon which this commaundement is grounded : bycause manne is both the image of God and our owne flesh, wherefore vnlesse we will defile the image of God, we must haue care to touche man none otherwise, than as a sacred thing : and vnlesse we will put of all naturallnesse of man, we must cherish him as our owne flesh. That maner of exhortation that is fetched from the redemption and grace of Christ, shall be entreated of in an other place. God willed these two thinges naturally to be considered in man, that might perswade vs to the preseruatiō of him, that we should both reuerence the image of God emprinted in him, and embrace our owne fleshe. He hath not therefore escaped the crime of manslaughter, that he hath kept him selfe from shedding of bloude. If thou committe any thinge in dede, if thou go about any thing with endeuour, if thou conceiue any thing in desire and purpose that is against the safetie of an other, thou art holden gilty of manslaughter. And againe : If thou do not trauaile to thy power and as accasion may serue to defende his life, thou doest with like haineousnesse offende the lawe. But if there be so much care taken for the safetie of his body, let vs hereby gather, how much studie and trauaile is due to the safetie of his soule, which in the Lordes sight doth infinitely excell the bodie.

The seuenth Commaundement.

Thou shalt not committe adulterie.

41 The ende of the cōmaundement is, that bycause God loueth charitie and cleannesse, therefore all vncleannesse ought to departe farre away from vs. The summe therefore shall be, that we be defiled with no vncleannesse or lustfull intemperance of the flesh: Whervnto aunswereth the affirmatiue commaundement, that we chastely and continently ordre all the partes of our life. But fornication he forbiddeth by name, to which all vnchaste luste tendeth, that the filthinesse of that which is more grosse and sensible, for somuch as it also defileth the body, he might bring vs to abhorre all filthy luste. Sith manne was created in this estate, not to liue a solitarie life, but to vse a helper ioined vnto him: and sins that by the curse of sinne he is driuen the more to this necessitie, the Lord hath in this behalfe prouided ded help for him so much as was sufficient, when he ordained marriage, when he sanctified with his blessing the fellowship begonne by his authority. Whereby followeth, that all other fellowship of man & woman out of mariage, is accursed before him, & that the fellowship of mariage it selfe, was ordained for remedy of necessity, y^e we should not runne out into vnbridled lust. Therefore let vs not flatter our selues, sith we heare that man can not be coupled with woman out of mariage, without the curse of God.

42 Nowe forasmuch as by the condition of nature, and by lust more enkindeled sins the fall of man, we are become doutely subiect to desire of company of women, except it be those whom God of his singular grace hath exempted from it: let euery man looke well what is giuen vnto him. Virginitie, I graunt, is a vertue not to be despised: but sith it is to some denied, and to some graunted but for a time, lette them that are troubled with incontinence and striuinge with it, can not get the vpper hande, resorte to the helpe of mariage, that so they may keepe chastity in the degree of their vocation. For they that can not conceiue this word, if they do not succour their owne intemperance with the remedy that is offered and graunted them, they striue against God and resist his ordinaunce. And let no man carpe against me (as many do at this day) that beinge aided with the helpe of God, he can do all thinges. For the helpe of God is present only with those, that walke in his wayes, that in their vocation from which they do all withdrawe themselues, which forsakinge the helps of God, do trauell to ouercome and maister their necessity with vaine rash boldnesse. The Lord affirmeth that continence is a singular gift of God, & of that sorte that are not giuen generally, nor vniuersally to the whole body of the Church, but to a few members thereof. For first he sayth, that there is a certaine kinde of men, that haue gelded themselues for the kingdome of Heauen, that is, that they might the more loosely and freely applie themselues to the affayres of the heauenly kingdome. But, that no man should thinke that such geldinge is in the power of man, he shewed a litle before, that all men are not able to receiue it, but they to whom it is peculiarly giuen from heauen, whereupon he concludeth: He that can take it, let him take it. But Paul yet affirmeth it more plainly, where he wryteth, that every man hath his proper gift of God, one thus, and an other thus. Psa. 118. & 119. Mat. 12. 1. Cor. 7.

haue the more ready to his worke : do we not striue against God and nature which he hath institute , if we do not apply the kinde of our life to the proportion of our power ? Here the Lord forbiddeth fornication, therefore he requireth cleannesse and chastity of vs. To keepe the same there is but one way , that euery man measure himselfe by his owne measure . Neither lette a man despise mariage as a thinge vnprofitable or superfluous for him, nor otherwise desire single life, vnlesse he be able to liue without a wife. And therein also let him not prouide onely for the quiet and commodity of the flesh, but only that being loosed from this bond, he may be the more in readinesse & prepared to all dueties of Godlinesse. And forasmuch as this benefit is giuen to many but for a time, let euery mā so long abstaine frō mariage as he shalbe meete to liue to kepe single estate, If strēgh faile him to tame his lust, let him learne that the Lord hath now laied or.7 vpon him a necessity to marry . This the Apostle sheweth when he
9. commaundeth that to auoide fornication euery man haue his owne wife, and euery woman haue her owne husband, that he that can not liue continently should mary in the Lord. First he declareth, that the most part of men are subiect to y vice of incōtinence: & then of those that be subiect vnto it, he excepteth none, but cōmaundeth all to that only remedy, wherewith vnchastity is resisted. Therefore if they that be incontinent do neglect to helpe their infirmity by this meane, they sinne euen in this that they obey not the commaudemēt of the Apostle. Neither let him flatter himselfe that toucheth not a woman as though he coulde not be rebuked of vnchastity , while in the meane or.6 season his minde burneth inwardly with lust. For Paule defineth chastity to be a cleannes of the minde , ioyned with chastity of the body. A woman vnmarried (sayth he) thinketh vpon those things that are of the Lord, forasmuch as shee is holy both in body and in spirit. Therefore when he bringeth a reason to confirme that former commaundement, he doth not only say, that it is better for a mā to take a wife, than to defile himselfe, with company of a harlot, but he sayth, that it is better to mary than to burne.

44 Now if married folkes do confesse that their fellowship together is blessed of the Lord, they are thereby admonished not to defile it with intemperate and dissolute lust: For though the honesty of marriage do couer y filthines of incontinence, yet it ought not forthwith to be a prouocation therof. Wherfore let not married folkes thinke, that all thinges are lawfull vnto them , but let euery husbande haue his owne wife soberly , and likewise the wife her husband , and so doinge, lette them committe nothing vnbeseming the honesty and tempe-

temperance of mariage. For so ought mariage made in the Lord to be restrained to measure and modesty, and not to ouerflow into euery kinde of extreme lasciuiousnesse. This wantonnesse Ambrose reproued with a saying very sore in deede, but not vnfitte for it, when he calleth the husbände, the adulterer of his owne wife, which in vse of wedlocke hath no care of shamefastnesse or honesty. Last of all, let vs consider what lawemaker doth here condemne fornication, euen he which sith of his owne righthe ought to possesse vs wholly, requireth purenesse of the soule, spirite and body. Therefore when he forbiddeth to commit fornication, he also forbiddeth with wanton attire of body, with vncleanly gestures, & with filthy talke to lay waite to trap an others chastity. For that saying is not without good reason, which Archelaus spake to a yong man aboue measure wantonly and deintely clothed, that it made no matter in what parte he were filthily vnchast: if we haue regard vnto God that abhorreth all filthines in what soeuer part either of our soule or body it appeareth. And to put thee out of dout, remember that the Lord here commendeth chastity. If the Lorde require chastity of vs, then he condemneth all that euer is against it. Therefore if thou couet to shew obedience, neither let thy minde burne inwardly with euill lust, nor lette thine eyes runne wantonly into corrupt affections, nor let thy body be trimmed vp for allurement, nor let thy tongue with filthy talke entise thy minde to like thoughtes; nor let thy gluttonous belly enflame thee with intemperance. For all these vices are, as it were, certaine blottes, wherwith the purenesse of chastity is bespotted.

The eight Commaundement.

Thou shalt not steale.

45 The ende of this commaundement is, because God abhorreth vnrighteousnesse, y^e euery man may haue his owne rendred vnto him. The summe therefore shall be, that we are forbidden to gape for other mens goodes, & that therefore we are commaunded euery man to employ his faythfull trauaile to preserue to eche man his owne goodes. For thus we ought to thinke, that what euery man possesseth is not happened vnto him by chaunce of fortune, but by the distribution of the soueraigne Lord of all things, & therefore no mans goods can be gotten from him by euill meanes, but that wronge be done to the disposition of God. But of thestes there be many kindes: one standeth in Violence, whē y^e goods of an other are by any maner of force and robbinge licentiousnesse bereued. The other kinde consisteth in malicious deceite, where they are guilefully conueied away. An other sorte there is that standeth in a more hidden suttelty, when they are wrong from the owner by colour of lawe. An other sorte in flatterie, where they are sucked away by pretense of gift. But least we shoulde tary too longe vpon renting of all the seuerall kindes of theft, lette vs know, that all crafty meanes whereby the possessions and money of our neighbours are conueyed vnto vs, when they once go by crooked wayes from sincerenesse of heart, to a desire to beguile, or by any meane to do hurt, are to be accompted for theftes. Although by pleadinge the lawe, they may preuaile, yet God doth not otherwise wey them. For he seeth the longe captious suttelties, wherewith the guilefull man beginneth to entangle the simpler minde, till at length he drawe him into his nettes. He seeth the hard and vngentle lawes, wherewith the mightier oppresseth and throweth downe the weaker. He seeth the allurementes, wherewith as with baited hookes, the craftier taketh thee vnware. All which things are hidden from the iudgement of man, and come not in his knowledge. And this manner of wrong is not only in money, in wares, or in landes, but in euery mans right. For we defraude our neighbour of his goodes, if we deny him those duties which we are bound to do for him. If any idle factor or bailie do deuour his maisters substance, & is not heedeful to the care of his thrift, if he either do wrongfully spoile, or do riorously wast the substance committed vnto him, if a seruauant do mocke his maister, if he disclose his secretes by any meanes, if he betray his life and his goodes: againe if the Lord do cruelly oppresse his householde, they are before God gilty of theft. For he both withholdeth & conueieth an other mans goodes, which performeth not that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other.

46 We shall therefore rightly obey this commaundement, if being contented with our owne estate, we seeke to get no gaine but honest and lawful, if we couet not to waxe rich with wrong, nor go about to spoile our neighbour of his goodes that our owne substance may encrease, if we labour not to heape vp cruell riches and wronge out of others mens blood, if we do not immeasurably scrape together euery way, by right and by wrong, that either our couetousnesse may be filled, or our prodigality satisfied. But on the other side, lette this be our perpetuall marke, to aide all men faithfully by counsell and helpe to keepe their owne so farre as we may: but if we haue to do with false and deceitfull men, lette vs rather be ready to yeelde vp some of our owne, then to striue with them. And not that only, but let vs communicate to their necessities, & with our store relieue their neede, whom we see to be oppressed with hard and poore estate. Finally, lette euery man looke how much he is by duty bounde vnto other, and let him faithfully pay it. For this reason lette the people haue in honor all those that are set ouer them, let them patiently beare their gouernement, obey their lawes and commaundementes, refuse nothing that they may beare, still keepinge God fauourable vnto them. Againe, let them take care of their people, preserue common peace, defende the good, restraine the euil, & so order all things, as ready to giue accompt of their office to the soueraigne iudge. Let the Ministers of churches faithfully applie their ministry, and not corrupt the doctrine of saluation, but deliuer it pure & sincere to the people of God, and let the instruct them not onely with learning, but also with example of life: finally, let the so be ouer the, as good sheperdes be ouer the shepe. Let the people likewise receiue them for the messingers & Apostles of God, giue them that honor whereof the hiest maister hath voutsaued them, and minister vnto them such thinges as are necessary for their life. Lette parentes take on them to feede, rule and teach theyr children, as committed to them of God, & greue not, nor turne away their mindes from them with cruelty, but rather cherish & embrace them with such lenity and tenderesse, as becommeth there person. After which manner, we haue already sayd, that children owe to their parentes their obedience. Let yong men reuerence olde age, euen as the Lord willed that age to be honorable. Let old men also gouerne the weakenes of youth with their wisdom and experience, wherein they excell yonge men, not ratinge them with rough and loude brawlings, but tempering seuerity with mildenesse and gentlenesse. Lette seruautes shew themselues diligent and seruisable to obey: and that not to the eye, but from the heart, as seruing God himselfe. Also lette maisters shewe themselues not testy and hard to please, nor oppresse them with too much sharpenes, not reprochfully vse them, but rather acknowledge that they are their brethren and their fellow seruautes vnder the heauely Lord, whom they ought mutually to loue & getly to entreat. After this manner, I say, let euery man consider what in his degree and place he oweth to his neighbours, and let him pay that he oweth. Morouer our minde ought alwayes to haue respect to the law maker, that we may know that this law is made as wel for our mindes, as for our handes, that men should study to defend & further the commodities and profite of other.

The ninth commaundement.

Thou shalt not be a lying wnesse against thy neighbour.

47 The end of this commaundement is that because God which is trueth abhorreth lyinge, we ought to obserue trueth without deceitfull colour. The summe therefore shall be, that we neither hurt any mans name either with slaunders or false reportes, nor hinder him in his goodes by lyinge: finally that we offende no man, by lust to speake euill, or to be busie: with which prohibition is ioyned a commaundement, that so farre as we may, we enploy our faithfull endeouour for euery man in affirminge the trueth, to defende the safety both of his name and goodes. It seemeth that the Lord purposed to

Exo. 23.

25.

Chapter of Exodus in these wordes. Thou shalt not vse the voyce of lying, nor shalt ioyne thy hande to speake false witnessse for the wicked. Againe, Thou shalt flee lying. Also in an other place he doth not onely call vs away from lyinge in this point that we be no accusers, or whisperers in the people, but also that no man deceiue his brother for he forbiddeth them both in seuerall commaundementes. Truly it is no dout, but that as in the commaundementes before, he hath forbidden cruelty, vnchastity & couetousnes, so in this he restraineth falshood. Whereof there are two partes as we haue noted before. For either we offende the good name of our neighbours by maliciousnesse and froward minde to backebite, or in lyinge and sometime in euill speakinge we hinder their commodities. There is no difference whether in this place be vnderstanded solemne & iudiciall testimony, or common testimony that is vsed in priuate talkes. For we must alway haue recourse to this principle, that of all the generall kindes of vices one speciall sorte is set for an example, whereunto the rest may be referred, and that that is chiefly chosen, wherein the filthinesse of the fault is most apparaunt. Albeit, it were conuenient to extende it more generally to slaunders and sinister backebitinges wherewith our neighbours are wrongfully greued, for that falshood of witnessinge which is vsed in iudiciall courtes, is neuer without periury. But perjuries insomuch as they do prophane and defile the name of God, are already sufficiently met withall in the third commaundement. Wherefore the right vse of this commaundement is, that our tongue in affirminge the trueth do serue both the good name and profite of our neighbours. The equity thereof is more than manifest. For if a good name be more precious than any treasures, whatsoeuer they be: then is it no lesse hurt to a man to be spoyled of the goodnesse of his name than of his goodes. And in bereuing his substaunce, sometime false witnessse doth as much as violence of handes.

48 And yet it is maruelous w^h how negligent carelesnesse men do commonly offende in this point, so y^t there are found very few that are not notably sicke of this disease: we are so much delited with a certaine poisoned sweetenes both in searching out & in disclosing the euills of other. And let vs not thinke y^t it is a sufficient excuse, if oftentimes we lye nor. For he y^t forbiddeth thy brothers name to be defiled wth lying, willeth also that it be preserued vntouched so farre as the trueth will suffer. For howsoeuer he taketh heede to himselfe only, so that he tell no lye, yet in the same he secretly confesseth that he hath some charge of him. But this ought to suffice vs to keepe safe our neighbours good name, that God hath care of it. Wherefore without dout all euill speaking is vterly condemned. But we meane not by euill speakinge, that rebukinge which is vsed for chastisement: nor accusation, or iudiciall processe, wherby remedy is sought for an euill, nor publike reprehension which tendeth to put other sinners in feare, nor bewrayinge of faultes to them for whose safety it behoued that they should be forwarned least they should be in daunger by ignoraunce: but we meane only hatefull accusing, which ariseth of maliciousnesse and of a wanton will to backebite. Also this commaundement is extended to this point, that we couet not to vse a scoffing kinde of a pleasauntnes, but mingeled with bitter tauntes, thereby bitingly to touch other mens faultes vnder pretense of pastime, as many do that seeke praise of mery conceites with other mens shame yea & greefe, also when by such wanton railing many times our neighbours are not a litle reproched. Now if we bende our eyes to the lawmaker, which must accordinge to his rightfull authority beare rule no lesse ouer the eares and minde than ouer the tongue: truely we shall finde that greedinesse to heare backebittings, and a hasty readines to euill iudgementes are no lesse forbidden. For it were very fond if a man should thinke that God hateth the fault of euill speakinge in the tongue, and doth not disallowe the fault of euill maliciousnesse in the hearte. Wherefore if there be in vs a true feare and loue of God, let vs endeouour so farre as we may and as is expedient, and as charity beareth, that we giue neither our tongue, nor our eares to euill speakinges, and bitter iestinges, least we rashly without cause yeelde our mindes to indirect suspicions. But being indifferent expositours of all mens sayinges and doinges, let vs both in iudgement, eares, and tongue gently preserue their honor safe.

The tenth Commaundement.

Thou shalt not couet thy neighbours house, &c.

49 The end of this comaundement is, y^t because y^e lords wil is that:

our soule be wholly possessed with the affectiō of loue: all lust is to be shakē out of our minde that is contrary to charity. The summe therefore shall be, that no thought creepe into vs, which may moue our mindes with a concupiscens hurtfull and turninge toward an others losse: wherewith on the other side agreeth the commaundement, that whatsoeuer we conceiue, purpose, will or study vpon, be ioyned with the benefit and commodity of our neighbours. But here, as it semeth, ariseth a hard and combersome difficulty. For if it be truly sayd of vs before that vnder the names of fornication and theft are containd the lust of fornication, and the purpose to hurt and deceiue, it may seeme superfluously spoken, that the couetinge of other mens goodes shoulde afterward be seuerally forbidden vs. But the distinction betwene purpose and couetinge, will easily lose vs this knot. For purpose (as we haue meant in speakinge of it in the other commaundementes before) is deliberate consent of will, when lust hath subdued the minde: but couetinge may be without any such either aduise-ment or assent, when the minde is only pricked & tickled with vaine and peruerse obiectes. As therefore the Lord hath heretofore commaunded, that the rule of charity shoulde gouerne our willes, studies and workes: so he now commaundeth the conceptions of our minde to be directed to the same rule, that there be none of them crooked and writhen, that may prouoke our minde an other way. As he hath forbidden our minde to be bowed and ledde into wrath, hatred, fornication, robbery, and lying: so he doth now forbid vs to be moued thereunto.

50 And not without cause doth he require so great vprightnesse. For who can deny that it is righteous, that al the powers of the soule be possessed with charity? But if any of the do swarue from the marke of charity, who can deny that it is diseased? Now when se commeth it that so many desires hurtfull to thy neighbour do enter into thy heart, but of this, that neglecting him thou carest onely for thy selfe? For if thy minde were altogether throughly soked with charity, no percell thereof shoulde be open to such imaginations. Therefore it must needes be void of charity, so farre as it receiueth concupiscens. But some man will obiect, that yet it is not meete that phantasies that are wout order tossed in mans wit, & at length do vanish away, should be condemned for concupiscence, whose place is in the heart. I aunswere: that here our question is of that kinde of phantasies, which while they are present before our mindes, do together bite and strike our heart with desire, forasmuch as it neuer commeth in our minde, to wish for any thing, but that our heart is stirred vp and leapeth with-all.

all. Therefore God commaundeth a maruelous seruētnes of loue which he willet not to be entangled with neuer so small snares of concupiscence. He requireth a maruelously framed minde, which he suffereth not so much as with slight prouocatiōs to be any thing stirred against the law of loue. To this exposition Augustine did first open me the way: because thou shouldst not thinke that it is without consent of some graue authority. And though the Lords purpose was to forbid vs all wrongfull coueting: yet in rehearsing that same, he hath brought forth for example those things that most cōmonly do deceiue vs with a false image of delight: because he would leaue nothing to concupiscence when he draweth it from these things, vpon the which it most of all rageth and triumpheth. Loe, here is the seconde Table of the law, wherein we are taught sufficiently what we owe to men for Gods sake, vpon consideration wherof hangeth the whole rule of charity. Wherefore you shall but vainely call vpon those ducties that are contained in this Table, vnlesse your doctrine do stay vpon the feare and reuerence of God, as vpon her foundation. As for them which seeke for two commaundementes in the prohibition of couetinge, the wise reader, though I say nothing, will iudge that by wrong diuision, they teare in sunder that which was but one. And it maketh nothinge against vs, that this worde, Thou shalt not couet, is the second time repeated, for after that he had first set the house, then he renteth the partes thereof, beginning at the wife: whereby it plainely appeareth, that (as the Hebrues do very well) it ought to be read in one whole sentence, and that God in effect commaundeth, that al that euery man possesseth, should remaine safe and vntouched, not onely from wrong and lust to defraude them, but also from the very least desire that may moue our mindes.

51 But now to what ende the whole lawe tendeth, it shall not be hard to iudge: that is, to the fulfilling of righteousnesse, that it might frame the life of man after the example of the purenesse of God. For God hath therein so painted out his owne nature, as if a man do performe in deedes that which is there commaunded, he shall in a manner expresse an image of God in his life. Therefore when Moses meant to bring the summe thereof into the mindes of the Israelites, he sayd: And nowe Israell, what doth the Lorde thy God aske of thee, but that thou feare the Lorde, and walke in his wayes? loue him and serue him in all thy hearr, and in all thiy soule, and keepe his commaundementes? And he ceassed not still to sing the same song againe vnto them, so oft as he purposed to shewe the ende of the law. The doctrine of the lawe hath such respect hereunto, that it ioyneth

Deut. 6. man, or as Moses in an other place teimeth it, maketh man to sticke 5. & 11. fast to his God in holinesse of life. Now the perfection of that holy-
 13. nesse consisteth in the two principall pointes already rehearsed, That we loue the Lorde God with all our hearte, all our soule, and all our Mat. 22 strength, and our neighbour as our selues. And the first in deede is, that our soule be in all partes filled with the loue of God. From that byandby of it selfe foorth floweth the loue of our neighbour.
 1. Tim. 1 Which thing the Apostle sheweth when he wryteth, that the ende of 15. the law is Loue out of a pure conscience, and a faith not fayned. You see how, as it were, in the heade is set conscience and faith vnfayned, that is to say in one worde true Godlinesse, and that from thense is charity deriued. Therefore he is deceiued, whosoever thinketh that in the lawe are taught onely certaine rudimentes and first Introductions of righteousnesse, wherewith men became to be taught their first schoolinge, but not yet directed to the true marke of good woorkes: whereas beyonde that sentence of Moses and this of Paule, you canne desire nothinge as wantinge of the highest perfection.
 For howe farre, I pray you, will he proceede that will not be contented with this institution, whereby manne is instructed to the feare of God, to spirituall worshippinge, to obeyinge of the commaund-ementes, to foliow the vprightnes of the way of the Lord: finally to purenesse of conscience, sincere faith and loue? Whereby is confirmed that exposition of the law, which searcheth for and findeth out in the commaundementes thereof all the duties of Godlinesse and loue. For they that follow onely the drie and bare principles, as if it taught but the one halfe of Gods will, know not the end thereof, as the Apostle witnesseth.

52 But whereas in rehearsing the summe of the law, Christ & the Apostle do sometime leaue out y^e first Table: many are deceiued therein while they woulde faine draw their words to both the Tables. Christ in Matthew calleth the chiefe pointes of the law, Mercy, Iudgemēt & Faith: vnder the word Faith, it is not doubtful to me, but that he mea-neth trueth or faithfulnessse toward men. But some, that the sentence might be extended to the whole law, take it for religiousnesse toward

Mat. 5. God. But they labour in vaine. For Christ speaketh of those woorkes 13. wherewith man ought to proue himselfe righteous. This reason if we note, we will also cesse to maruell why, when a yong man asked him what be the commaundementes by keeping wherof we enter into life: he answered these things only: Thou shalt not kil. Thou shalt not cō-mit adultery. Thou shalt not steale. Thou shalt beare no false witness. Honor thy Father and thy Mother. Loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. For the obeying of the first Table consisted in manner all either in the affection of y heart, or in ceremonies: the affection of the heart appeared not, & as for the ceremonies the hypocrites did continually vse. But the workes of charity are such, as by them we may declare a perfect righteousnesse. But this commeth eche where so oft in the prophetes, that it must needes be familiar to a reader but meanelly exercised in them. For in a manner alway when they exhorte to repentance, they leaue out the first Table, and only call vpon Fayth, Iudgemēt, Mercy & Equity. And thus they do not ouerskip the feare of God, but they require the earnest prose thereof by the tokens of it. This is well knowē, that when they speake of the keeping of the law, they do for y most part rest vpon the second Table, because therein the study of righteousnes and vprightnesse is most openly seene. It is needlesse to rehearse the places, because euery man will of himself easily marke that which I say.

53 But thou wilt say, is it then more auailable to the perfectiō of righteousnes, to liue innocently among men, than with true godlines to honor God? No, but because a man doth not easily kepe charity in all pointes, vnles he earnestly feare God, therefore it is therby proued, that he hath godlinesse also. Beside that, forasmuch as the Lord well knoweth, that no benefit can come from vs vnto him, which thing he doth also testifie by y Prophet: therefore he requireth not our duties to himselfe, but doth exercise vs in good workes towarde our neighbour. Therefore not without cause the Apostle setteth the whole perfectiō of the holy ones in charity. And not incōueniently in another place he calleth y same the fulfillinge of the law: adding that he hath performed y law that loueth his neighbour. Againe, That all y law is comprehended in one word, Loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. For he reacheth no other thinge but the same which Christ doth when he saith: Whatsoeuer ye will that men do to you, do ye the same to thē. For this is the law & the Prophets, It is certaine, that in the law & the Prophetes, Faith and all that belongeth to the true worship of God, holdeth the principall place, & that Loue is beneth it in a lower degree: but the Lords meaning is, that in the law is only prescribed vnto vs an obseruation of right and equity, wherein we be exercised to testifie our godly feare of him, if there be any in vs.

54 Here therefore let vs sticke fast, that then our life shalbe best framed to Gods will and the rule of his law, when it shall be every way most profitable to our brethren. But in the whole lawe there is not redde one sillable that appointeth to man any rule of such thinges as he shall do or leaue vndone to the commodity of his owne flesh. And surely sith men are so borne of such disposition naturally that they be too much caried all headlong to the loue of themselves, and how much soeuer they fall from the trueth yet still they keepe that selfe loue, there needed no law any more to enflame that loue, that was naturally of it selfe, too much beyonde measure. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that not the loue of our selues, but y^e loue of God & of our neighbour is the keeping of the commaundements, & that he liueth best & most holily, y^e (so nere as may be) liueth & trauaileth least for himselfe, & that no man liueth worse & more wickedly than he that liueth and trauaileth for himselfe & only thinketh vpon and seeketh for things of his owne. And the Lord, the more to expresse with how great earnestnesse we ought to be led to the loue of our neighbours, appointed it to be measured by the loue of our selues as by a rule, because he had no other vehement or stronger affection to measure it by. And the force of the maner of speakinge is diligently to be weyed. For he doth not, as certaine Sophisters haue foolishly dreamed, giue the first degree to the loue of our selues, and the second to charity, but rather that affection of loue which we do all naturally draw to our selues he giueth away vnto other, wherupon y^e Apostle sayth, that Charity seketh not her owne. And their reasoⁿ is not to be esteemed worth a heare that y^e thing ruled is euer inferiour to his Rule. For God doth not make the loue of our selues a rule whereunto charity towarde other should be subiect, but whereas by peruersnes of nature, y^e affecti^on of loue was wont to rest in our selues, he sheweth that now it ought to be elsewhere spred abroad, that we should with no lesse cherefullnesse, feruentnesse, & carefulnesse be ready to do good to our neighbour than to our selues.

55 Now sith Christ hath shewed in the parable of the Samaritane that vnder the name of Neighbour euery man is cōtained be he neuer so straunge vnto vs: there is no cause why we shoulde restraîne the commaundement of loue within the bouⁿdes of our owne frendships and acquaintances. I deny not that the nerer that any man is vnto vs, the more familiarly he is to be holden with our endeouours to do him good. For so the order of humanity requireth, that so many mo duties of friendshippe men shoulde communicate together, as they are bound together with streighter bonds of kinred, familiarity or neighbourhoode, & that without any offense of God, by whose prouidence we are in a manner driuen therunto. But I say that all mākinde without exception is to be embraced with one affection of charity: & that in this behalfe is no difference of Barbarous or Grecian, of worthy or vnworthy, of friend or foe, because they are to be considered in God

& not in themselves: from which consideration when we turne away, it is no maruell if we be entangled with many errors. Wherefore if we will keepe the true trade of louing, we must not turne our eyes vnto man, the sight of whom would offer enforce vs to hate thã to loue, but vnto God which cõmaundeth that the loue which we offer him, be poured abroade amonge all men: that this be a perpetuall foundation, that whatsoeuer the man be, yet he ought to be loued because God is loued.

56 Wherefore it was a most pestilent either ignorãce or malice, that the Schoolemen of these commaundementes, touchinge not desiring of reuengement, and louing our enemies, which in the olde time both were giuen to the Iewes and at the same time were commonly giuen to all Christians, haue made Councils which it is in our liberty to obey, or not obey. And the necessary obeying of them, they haue posted ouer to Mõkes which were though but in this one point forsooth more righteous thã simple Christians, that they willingly bound themselves to keepe the Councils. And they render a reason why they receiue them not for lawes, for that they seme too burdenous & heauy, specially for Christians that are vnder the law of grace. So dare they presume to repell the eternall law of God touching the louing of our neighbours? Is there any such difference in any lease of the law? & are not therein rather eche where founde commaundementes that do most seuerely require of vs to loue our enemies? For what manner of saying is that, where we are commaunded to feede our enemy whẽ he is hungry? to set into the right way his Oxen or Asses straying out of the way, or to ease them when they faint vnder their burden? Shall we do good to his beastes for his sake without any good wil to himselfe? What? is not the word of the Lord euerlasting: Leauē vengeance to me, and I will requite it? Which also is spoken more plainly at large in an other place. Seke not vengeance, neither be mindeful of the iniury of thy Citizens. Either let them blot these things out of the law, or let them acknowledge that the Lord was a lawmaker, and not lyingly faine that he was a councill giuer.

57 And what I pray you meane these things that they haue presumed to mocke withall in their vnfauory glose? Loue your enemies, do good to them that hate you, pray for thẽ that persecute you, blesse them that curse you, that ye may be the childrẽ of your father which is in heauen. Who can not heare reason with Chryso stome, that by so necessary a cause it plainly appeareth that they are no exhortations but commaundementes? What remaineth more when we be blotted out of the nombre of the children of God? But by their opinion, only

Monkes shall be the children of the heauenly father, they onely shall be holde to call vpon God their Father: what shall the Church do in the meane season? it shall by like right be sent away to the Gentils & Publicans. For Christ sayth: If ye be friendely to your friendes, what fauour looke you for therby? do not y^e Gentiles & publicans the same?
 But we shall be in good case forsooth, if the title of Christians be left vnto vs, and the inheritaunce of the kingdome of heauen taken away from vs. And no lesse strong is Augustines argument. When (saith he) the Lord forbiddeth to commit fornication, he no lesse forbiddeth to touch the wife of thine enemy thā of thy friend. When he forbiddeth theft, he giueth leaue to steale nothing at all, either frō thy friende or from thine enemy. But these two, not to steale, & not to commit fornication, Paule bringeth within the compasse of the rule of loue, yea & teacheth that they are contained vnder this cōmaundement, Thou shalt loue thy neighbour as thy selfe. Therefore, either Paul must haue bin a false expositor of the lawe, or it necessarily followeth hereby, that our enemies ought also to be loued, euen by commaundement, like as our friendes. Therefore they do truely bewray themselues to be the children of Satan, that do so licentiously shake of the cōmon yoke of the children of God. It is to be doubted, whether they haue published this doctrine with more grosse dulnes or shamelesnes. For there are none of the olde wryters that do not prouounce as of a thing certaine, that these are mere cōmaundementes. And that euen in Grego-ries age it was not doubted of, appeareth by his owne affirmatiō, for he without controuersie taketh them for commaundementes. And how foolishly do they reason? They say y^e they are to weighty a burden for Christiās. As though there could be deuised any thing more weighty, than to loue God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strēgth. In cōparison of this law any thing may be cōpted easy, whether it be to loue our enemy, or to lay away all desire of reuenge out of our minde. In dede all things are hie & hard to our weakenes euen the least title of the lawe. It is the Lord in whom we vse strength. Let him giue what he commaundeth, & commaund what he wil. Christian men to be vnder the law of grace, is not vnbridledly to wander without law, but to be graffed in Christ, by whose grace they are free from the curse of the law, and by whose spirite they haue a law wrytten in their heartes. This grace Paule vnproperly called a law, alludinge to the law of God against which he did set it in comparison. But these men do in the name of the law, dispute vpon a matter of nothing.

58 Of like sorte it is, that they called Veniall sinne, both secrete vngodlinesse that is against the first table, and also the direct transgres-

gressing of the last commaundement. For they define it thus, that it is a desire without aduised assent, which resteth not long in the heart. But I say, that it can not come at all into the heart, but by want of those things that are required in the law. We forbid to haue strange gods. When the minde shaken with the engines of distrust, looketh about elsewhere: whē it is touched with a soden desire to remouche blessednesse some other way: whense come these morions, although they quickly vanish away, but of this, that there is some thing in the soule empty, to receiue such tentations? And to the ende not to draw out this argumēt to greater length, there is a commaundement giuē to loue God with all our heart, with all our minde, with all our soule: if then all the powers of our soule be not bent to the loue of God, we haue already departed from the obedience of the law, Because the enemies that do therein arise against his kingdome, and interrupt his decrees, do proue that God hath not his throne wel stablished in our conscience. As for the last commaundement, we haue already shewed that it properly belongeth hereunto. Hath any desire of minde pricked vs? we are already guilty of couetinge, and therewithall are made transgressors of the law. Because the Lord doth forbid vs, not only to purpose & practise any thing that may be to an others losse, but also to be pricked & swell with coueting it. But the curse of God doth alway hang ouer the transgressiō of the law. We can not therefore proue euen the very least desires free from iudgement of death. In weyinge of sinnes (saith Augustine) let vs not bring false balances to wey what we list and how we list at our owne pleasure, saying: this is heauy, and this is light. But let vs bring Gods balāce out of the holy Scriptures, as out of the Lordes treasorie, and let vs therein wey what is heauy: rather let vs not wey, but reknowledge things already weyed by the Lorde. But what sayth the Scripture? Truely when Paule sayth that the rewarde of sinne is death, he sheweth that he knew not this stinking distinction. Sith we are to much enclined to hypocrisie, this cherishmēt therof ought not to haue bin added to flatter our slouthfull consciences.

59 I would to God, they would consider what y^e saying of Christ meaneth: He that transgresseth one of the least of these commaundements, & teacheth men so, shalbe compted none in the kingdom of heauē. Are not they of that sort, when they dare so extenuate the transgression of the law, as if it were not worthy of death? but they ought to haue considered, not only what is cōmaunded, but what he is that cōmaundeth, because his authority is diminished in euery transgression, howe litle soeuer it be, of the lawe that he hath giuen in commaundement. Is it a small matter with them, that Gods maiesty be offended in any thinge? Moreouer if God hath declared his will in the lawe, whatsoeuer is contrary to the lawe, displeaseth him. Will they imagine the wrath of God to be so disarmed, that punishment of death shall not forthwith follow vpon them? And he himselve hath pronounced it plainly, if they would rather finde in their heartes to heare his voyce, than to trouble the cleare trueth with their vnfauory suttelties of argumēt. The soule (sayth he) that sinneth, the same shall dye. Againe, which I euen now alleaged: The reward of sinne is death. But albeit they graunt it to be a sinne, because they can not denie it: yet they stand stiffe in this, that it is no deadly sinne. But sith they haue hitherto too much borne with their owne madnesse, lette them yet at length learne to waxe wiser. But if they continue in dotage, we will bid them farewell: and let the children of God learn this, that all sinne is deadly, because it is a rebellion against the will of God, which of necessity prouoketh his wrath, because it is a breach of the law, vpon which the iudgemēt of God is pronounced without exception: and that the sinnes of the holy ones are veniall or pardonable, not of their owne nature, but because they obtayne pardon by the mercy of God.

The ix. Chapter.

That Christ, although he was knowen to the Iewes vnder the lawe, yet was deliuered only by the Gospell.

BEcause it pleased God in the olde time not vainely by expiations and sacrifices to declare himselve a Father, and not in vaine he did consecrate a chosen people to himselve: euen then without dout he was knowen in the same image, wherein he nowe appeareth to vs with full brightnesse. Therefore Malachie, after that he had bidden the Iewes to take heede to the law of Moses, and to continue in study therof, (because after his death there should come a certaine interruptiō of the office of the Prophetes) did forthwith declare, that there shoulde arise a sonne of righteousness. In which wordes he teacheth, that the law auaieth to this purpose to hold y godly in expectation of Christ to come: but yet that there was much more light to be hoped for, when he should be come in deede. For this reason doth Peter say, that the Prophetes did make search, and diligently enquire, of the saluation that is now opened by the Gospell: & that it was reueled vnto them, that they should minister, not to themselues, nor to their owne age but vnto vs, those things that are declared by the Gospell. Not that their doctrine was vnprofitable to the people in olde time, or nothing auailed themselues: but by-cause they enioyed not the treasure which God sent vnto vs by their hand. For at this day the grace whereof they testified, is familiarly set before our eyes. And wheras they did but a litle sippe of it, there is offered vnto vs a more plentifull enioying thereof: Therefore Christ himselve, which affirmeth that he had witness borne him by Moses, yet extolleth the measure of grace whereby we excell the Iewes. For speaking to the Disciples; he said: Blessed are the eyes that see that which ye see, & blessed are the eares that heare that which ye heare. Iohn 46.

 For many kinges and Prophetes haue wished it, and haue not obtai- Mat. 16. ned it. This is no small commendation of the reueling of the Gospell, Luc. 23. that God preferred vs before the holy fathers that excelled in rare godlinesse. With which sentence that other place disagreeth not, where it is said, that Abraham sawe the day of Christ, and reioysed: Iohn 36.
 For though the sight of a thing farre distant was somewhat darke, yet he wanted nothing to the assurance of good hope. And thence came that ioye which accompanied the holy Prophet, euen to his death.
 And that saying of Iohn Baptist, No man hath seen God at any time, Iohn 18.
 the only begotten that is in the bosome of the father, hath declared him vnto vs, doth not exclude the godly which had ben dead before him, from the felowship of the vnderstanding and light that shineth in the persone of Christ. But comparing their estate with oures, he teacheth that those misteries, which they saw but darkely vnder shad- Heb. 1 dows, are manifest to vs: as the author of the epistle to the Hebrewes doth well set out, saying, that God diuersly and many wayes spake in olde time by the Prophetes, but now by his beloued Sonne, Although therfore that only begotten one, which is at this day. to vs the bright-nesse of the glory, and the point of the substance of God the father, was in olde time knowen to the Iewes, as we haue in an other place alleaged out of Paule, that he was the guide of the olde deliuerance: yet is it true, which the same Paule els where teacheth, that God which 2. Cor. 6. commaunded the light to shine out of darkenesse, hath nowe shined vpon our heartes to set forth the knowledge of the glorie of God in the face of Iesus Christ: bycause when he appered in this his image, he did in a maner make himselve visible, in comparison of the darke and shadowish forme that had ben of him before. And so much the more fowle and detestable is their vnthankfulnessse and peruersnesse, that are here so blinde at midde day. And therefore Paule saith, that their mindes are darkened by Satan, that they shoulde not see the glorie of Christ shining in the Gospell, though there be no veile set betwene them and it.

Cap. 9. Of the knowledge of

2 Now I take the Gospell for the cleere disclosing of the myste-rie of Christ. I graunt truely, that in that respect that Paule calleth the Gospell the doctrine of faith, all the promises that we here and there finde in the lawe, concerning the free forgeueneffe of sinnes, whereby God reconcileth men to himselfe, are accompted partes therof. For he compareth faith against these terrors, wherewith the conscience should be troubled and vexed, if saluation were to be sought by wor-kes. Wherevpon followeth, that in taking the name of the Gospell largely, there are contened vnder it all the testimonies that God in olde time gaue to his fathers, of the mercie and fatherly fauour. But in the more excellent signification of it, I say it is applied to the publishing of the grace geuen in Christ. And that meaning is not onely receyued by common vse, but also hangeth vpon the authoritie of Christ and the Apostles. Wherevpon this is properly ascribed vnto him, that he preached the Gospell of the kingdome. And Marke ma-keth his preface in this maner, The beginning of the Gospell of Jesus Christ. And there is no neede to gather places to proue a thing sufficiently knowen. Christ therefore by his comming hath made cleere the life and immortalitie by the Gospell. By which wordes Paule meaneth, not that the fathers were drowned in darkenesse of death, vntill the sonne of God did put on flesh: but clayming this prerogatiue of honour to the Gospell, he teacheth that it is a newe and vnwonted kinde of message, wherby God performed those thinges that he had promised, that the truth of his promises shoulde be fulfilled in the persone of the Sonne. For although the faithful haue alway found by experience, that same saying of Paule to be true, that in Christ are all the promises, yea and Amen, bycause they were sealed in their heartes: yet bycause he hath accomplished all partes of our saluation in his flesh, therefore that selfe liuely deliuering of the thinges rightfully obtained a newe and singular title of praise. Whervpon cometh that saying of Christ: Hereafter ye shall see the heauens open, and the Angels of God ascending and descending vpon the sonne of man. For though he seeme to haue relation vnto the ladder shewed in a vision to the Patriarch Iacob: yet he setteth out the excellencie of his com-ming by this marke, that he opened the gate of heauen to all men, that the entrie thereof maie stand familiarly open to all men.

3 But yet we must take hede of the deuclish imagination of Seruettus, which when he goeth about, or at least faineth that he goeth about, to extoll the greatnesse of the grace of Christ, vtterly abolisheth the promises, as if they were ended together with the lawe.
He layeth for him, that by the faith of the Gospell there is brought

vnto vs the accomplisment of all the promises: as though there were no difference betwene vs and Christ. I did in deede euen nowe declare that Christ leste nothing vnperformed of the whole summe of our saluation: but it is wrongfully gathered thereupon, that we do already enioy the benefites purchaced by him, as though that saying of Paule were false, that our saluation is hidde in hope, I graunt in deede, that we by beleuing in Christ, do also passe from death to life: But in the meane season we must holde this saying of Iohn, that although we knowe we be the children of God, yet it hath not as yet appeared, till we shalbe like vnto him: that is, till we shall see him suche as he is. Therefore although Christ offer vnto vs in his Gospell present fulnesse of spiritual good thinges, yet the enioying therof lieth stil hidde vnder the keping of hope, till being vnclouted of the corruptible flesh, we be transfigured into the glorie of him that goeth before vs. In the meane time the holy Ghost biddeth vs to reste vpon the promises, whose authoritie ought with vs to put to silence all the barkinges of that filthy dogge. For as Paule witnesseth, godlinesse hath a promise as well of the life to come, as of the life present. For which reason he boasteth that he is an Apostle of Christ, according to the promise of life that is in him. And in an other place he putteth vs in minde, that we haue the same promises, which in the olde time were geuen to the holy men. Finally, he setteth this for the summe of felicitie, that we are sealed vp with the holy spirite of promise, but yet we do no otherwise enioy Christ, but so farre as we embrace him clothed with his promises. Wherby it cometh to passe, that he in dede dwelleth in our heartes, and yet we wander in iourney abroad from him: bycause we walke by faith & not by sight. And these two thinges do not ill agree together: that we possesse in Christ all that pertaineth to the perfection of the heauenly life: and yet that faith is a beholding of good thinges that are not seene. Onely there is a difference to be noted in the nature or qualitie of the promises: bycause the Gospell sheweth with her finger that thing, whiche the lawe did shadow vnder figures.

4 And hereby also is their errour conuincd, whiche do neuer otherwise compare the lawe with the Gospell, but as they compare the merites of workes with the free imputation of righteousness. Although in deede this comparison of contraries be not to be reiectred: bycause Paule doth ostentimes vnderstand by the name of the law, a rule to liue righteously, wherin God requireth of vs, that which is his, not geuing vs any hope of life, vnlesse we in all pointes obey it: and on the other side adding a curse if we do neuer so litle swarue from it: that is in such places as he disputeth, the we do freely please God, and are by pardon reckened righteous, bycause the obseruation of the lawe, wherunto the rewarde is promised, is no where founde. Therefore Paule doth fitly make the righteousnesse of the lawe and of the Gospell, contrarie the one to the other. But the Gospell did not so succede in place of the whole lawe, that it shoulde bring any diuers meane of saluation, but rather to confirme and proue to be of force, what so euer the lawe had promised, and to ioine the body to the shadowes. For when Christ saith, that the lawe and the Prophets were vntill Iohn: he maketh not the fathers subiect to the curse, which the bond seruantes of the lawe can not escape: but rather only that they were instructed with certaine rudimentes, so as they stayed a great way beeneath the heighth of the doctrine of the Gospell. Therefore Paule calling the Gospell the power of God, to saluation to euery beleuer, by and by addeth, that it hath witness: of the lawe and the Prophetes. But in the ende of the same Epistle, although he shewe that the title of praise of Iesus Christ is the reuelation of the misterie kept secret in euerlasting times: yet he doth qualifie that saying, with adding an exposition, teaching that he is openly shewed by the writings of the Prophets. Wherupon we gather, that when we are to entreate of the whole lawe, the Gospell differeth from the lawe onely in respect of the plaine diclosing thereof. But yet for the inestimable flowing store of grace, which hath ben layed open for vs in Christ, it is not without cause said, that at his coming the heauenly kingdome of God was erected in earth.

1. Tim. 4. 8.
2. Tim. 1. 7.
2. Cor. 7.

5. Now betwene the lawe and the Gospell came Iohn, which had an office that was meane and of affinitie to them both. For though when he called Christ the lambe of God, and the sacrifice for the cleansing of sinnes, he shewed forth the summe of the Gospell: yet bycause he did not expresse that same incōparable strēgh and glorie, which at length appered in his resurrection, therefore Christ sayeth, that he was not egal to the Apostles. For so do those wordes of his meane: that though Iohn excell among the sonnes of women, yet he that is least in the kingdome of heauen, is greater than he. Bycause he doeth not there commend the persones of men, but after he had preferred Iohn before all the Prophetes, he auaunceth the preaching of the Gospell to the hiest degree: which preaching we see in another place signified by the kingdome of heauen. But whereas Iohn himselte doth aunswere that he is but a voice, as though he were inferiour to the Prophetes, he doth not that for fained humilities sake, but meaneth to teach that the prope office of the Embassadour was not committed to him, but that he onely executeth the office of an apparitor: as it was forespoken by Malachie: Beholde, I sende Elias Mal. 4. 5 the prophet, before that the great and terrible day of the Lorde do come. And truely he did nothing els in the whole course of his ministerie, but endeouour to get disciples to Christ: as also Esaie proueth, that this was enioyned him from God. And in this sense Christ is called a candell burning and shining, bycause the broade day had not yet appeared. And yet this is no let, but that he may be reckened among Iohn. 5. 35. the publishers of the Gospel, like as he vsed the same Baptisme, which was afterwarde deliuered to the Apostles. But that which he beganne, was not fulfilled but by the Apostles, with free proceeding, after that Christ was taken vp from them into the heauenly glorie.

The x. Chapter.

Of the likenesse of the olde and newe Testament.

BY the thinges aforesaid it may nowe appeare euidently, that all the men whome from the beginning of the worlde God adopted into the estate of his people, were with the same lawe, and with the bonde of the same doctrine, which nowe remaineth in force among vs, bound in conuenant to him. But bycause it is of no small importance that this point be well established, I will adioyne vnto it for an addition, sith the fathers were partakers of all one inheritance with vs, and hoped for all one saluation by the grace of al one Mediatour, how farre their estate differed from oures in this fellowship. But although the testimonies that we haue gathered out of the lawe and the Prophets for prooffe therof, do make it plaine that there was neuer any other rule of religion and godlinesse in the people of God: yet bycause in writers there are oftentimes many thinges spoken of the difference of the olde and new Testament, that may make the reader that is not of very sharp iudgement to be in doubt: therefore we shall rightfully apoint one peculiar place for the better and more exact discussing of this matter: Yea and that thing also, which otherwise shoulde haue bene very profitable for vs, is nowe made necessarie by that monstrous losel Seruettus, and by diuerse other mad men of the sect of Anabaptistes, which haue no other opinion of the people of Israell, than as of a hearde of swine: which they fondely faine to haue bene fatted vp by the Lorde here in this earth, without any hope of heauenly immortalitie. Therefore that we may keepe away this pestilent error from godly mindes, and also to plucke out of them all doubtles which are wont by and by to arise vpon hearing mention of the diuersitie betwene the olde and newe Testament: let vs by the way looke, what they haue in them like, and what vnlike one to the other: what couenant the Lorde made with the Israelites in the olde time before the cōming of Christ, and what couenant he hath nowe made with vs sins Christ hath bene openly shewed.

2 And both these pointes may be made plaine with one worde. The couenāt of all the fathers so differeth nothing from ours in substance and in the matter it selfe, that it is altogether one and the selfe same: but the ministracion is diuers. But bycause of so great shortnesse no man were able to attaine a certaine vnderstanding, we must needes proceede on with a longer declaration if we meane to profit any thing at all. But in shewing how they are like or rather all one, it shalbe superfluous to discourse againe of new vpo all the speciall particulars that haue already bene declared: and it shalbe out of season to mingle those thinges together that remaine yet to be spoken in other places. Here we must chiefly rest vpon three principall pointes: First, that we holde, that carnall wealth and felicitie was not the marke apointed to the Iewes to aspire vnto, but that they were by adoption chosen vnto the hope of immortalitie: and that the truth of this adoption was certainly assured vnto them both by oracles, and by the lawe, & by the prophecies. Secundarily, that the couenant whereby they were ioyned to the Lord, was vpholden not by any merites of theirs, but by the onely mercie of God that called them. Thirdly, that they both had and knew Christ the mediatur, by whome they shoulde both be ioyned to God and enioie his promises. Of which pointes, bycause the second paraduēture is not yet sufficiently knowen, it shall in place apointed for it be declared at large. For we shall confirme by many and cleere testimonies of the Prophetes, that it was of his owne meere goodnesse and tender fauour, what so euer good the Lord at any time did, and promised to the people of Israell. The third also hath already had here and there some plaine declarations of it, and we haue not left the first altogether vntouched.

3 Therefore in setting out of this point, bycause it most specially belongeth to this present matter, and for that they make vs most controuerfic about it, we will emploie the more earnest trauaile: but yet so that if there wante yet any thing of the explication of the other, it may be by the way supplied, or in conuenient place be added. Truly the Apostle taketh away all doubt of them all, when he saith, that

God the Father long before by the Prophetes in the holy Scriptures promised the Gospell, which he afterwarde published according to the time apointed. Againe, that the righteousnesse of faith which is taught by the Gospell it selfe, hath witnesse of the lawe and the Prophetes.

phetes. For the Gospell doth not holde the heartes of men in the ioy of this present life, but listerh them vp to the hope of immortalitie: doth not fasten them to earthly delites, but preaching to them a hope layed vp in heauen, doth in a manner transport them thether. For thus he defineth in an other place. Sins that ye beleueed the Gospell, ye are sealed vp with the holy Spirite of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritaunce, for the redemption of the possession purchaced. Ephes. 1. 13.

Againe, we haue heard of your faith in Christ Iesu, and of your charitie towarde the holy ones, for the hopes sake that is layed vp for you in heauē, wherof ye haue heard by the true speech of the Gospel. Col. 1.

Againe: He hath called vs by the Gospel to the partaking of the glorie of our lorde Iesus Christ. Wherefore it is called, both the worde of saluation, and the power of God to saue the faithfull, and the kingdome of heauen. Now if the doctrine of the Gospell be spirituall, and openeth the entrie to the possessiō of an incorruptible life: let vs not thinke that they to whome it was promised and declared, did passe ouer and neglect the care of their soule, & lie dully like beastes in seeking pleasures of the body. Neither let any man here cauill that the promises which are sealed in the law and the Prophetes, cōcerning the Gospel, were ordeined for the new people. For within a little after that which he spake of the Gospell promised in the lawe, he addeth, that all the thinges that the law containeth, are without doubt properly directed to them that are vnder the lawe. I graunt in deede it is in an other argument. But he was not so forgetfull, that when he had ones said that all the thinges which the lawe containeth belong to the Iewes, he did not remember what in a fewe verses before he had affirmed of the Gospell promised in the lawe. Wherefore the Apostle sheweth most plainly, that the old Testamēt chiefly tended to the life to come, when he saith, that vnder it are contened the promises of the Gospell. 1. Theff. 2. 14.

4 By the same reason followeth, both that it stode vpon the free mercie of God, and also was confirmed by the meane of Christ. For the very preaching of the Gospell pronounceth no other thing, but that sinners are iustified by the fatherly kindenesse of God, without their owne deseruing: and the whole summe therof is fulfilled in Christ. Who then dare make the Iewes without Christ, with whome we heare that the couenant of the Gospell was made, wherof Christ is the only foundarion? Who dare make them strangers from the benefite of free saluation, to whome we heare that the doctrine of the righteousnesse of faith was ministred? But, that we dispute not longe of an euidēt matter, we haue a notable sentence of the Lord. Abraham reioysed that he might see my day, he sawe it and was glad. And the Rom. 3. 19. Iohn. 1. 56.

same thing whiche Christ there testifieth of Abraham, the Apostle sheweth that it was vniuersall in the faithfull people, when he saith, Heb. 13. that Christ abideth, yesterday, this day, and for euer. For he speaketh not there onely of the eternal godhed of Christ, but also of his power, which was continually opened to the faithfull. Wherefore both the Luke. 1. blessed Virgin and Zacharie in their songes, do say, that the saluation 4. and reueled in Christ, is the performance of the promises, which God in 2. olde time had made to Abraham and the Patriarches. If the Lorde in geuing his Christ, discharged his olde othe, it can not be said but that the ende therof was alway in Christ, and euerlasting life.

5 Yea and the Apostle doth make the Israelites egall with vs, not onely in the grace of the covenant, but also in signification of Sacramentes. For meaning by examples of punishmentes, wherewith the Scripture reciteth that they were corrected in the olde time, to make the Cor. Corinthians afraide, that they shoulde not runne into the like of- 1. & fenses, he beginneth with this preface, that there is no cause why we 1. shoulde challenge any prerogatiue vnto our selues, to deliuer vs from the vengeance of God which they susteined, for asmuch as the Lord did not onely graunt vnto them the same benefites, but he hath gloriously set forth his grace among them with the same tokens: As if he shoulde haue sayd: If ye trust that ye be out of peril, bycause both Baptisme wherewith ye be marked, and the Supper which ye daily receyue, haue excellent promises, and in the meane time despising the goodnesse of God, ye are licētiously wanton: Know ye, that the Iewes also were not without such sacramentes, against whome yet the Lord did most seuerly put his iudgementes in execution. They were Baptized in passing ouer the Sea, and in the cloude wherewith they were defended from the burning heate of the sonne. They say, that that same passage was a carnall Baptisme, which after a certaine proportion aunswereth to our spirituall Baptisme. But if that were allowed true, the Apostles argument coulde not procede, which meaneth here to haue this taken away from the Christiāns, that they thinke that they excell y Iewes by the prerogatiue of Baptisme. Neither is that which by and by after followeth, subiect to this cauillation: that they did eate the same spirituall meate that we eate, and dronke the same spirituall drinke; which he expoundeth to be Christ.

6 To ouerthrow this sentence of Paule, they obiecte that which ohn. 6. Christ saith: Your fathers did eate Manna in the wildernesse, and are dead: he that eateth my flesh, shall not die for euer. Which two places are very easily made to agree together. The Lord, bycause he then talked to hearers that sought onely to be filled with foode of their belly, belly, but cared not for the meate of the soule, tempered his talke somewhat to their capacitie, but specially he frameth the comparison of Manna and of his body according to their sense. They required that he, to gette himselfe some credite, woulde approue his power with doing some such miracle, as Moses did in the wildernesse, when he obtained Manna from Heauen. But in Manna they conceyued nothing but the remedie of carnall hunger, wherewith the people was then vexed: but they pearced not to that hier misterie which Paule hath respect vnto: Christ therefore, to shew how much greater a benefite they ought to looke for at his hande, than that which they reported that Moses did bestow vpon their fathers, frameth this comparison: If it were a great miracle in your opinion, and worthy to be remembred, that the Lord by Moses ministred foode from Heauen to his people, to susteine them for a small time, that they shoulde not perish for hunger in the wildernesse: gather hereby how much more excellent is the meate that geueth immortalitie. We see why the Lord passed ouer that thing which was principall in Manna, and spake only of the basest profit of it: euen bycause the Iewes as it were of purpose to reproche him, did caste Moses in his teeth, which succored the necessitie of the people with remedie of Manna: he answered that he is the minister of a much hier grace, in cōparison wherof, the carnall feding of the people, which alone they so much esteemed, ought of righte to be nothing regarded. But Paule, bycause he knew that the Lorde when he rained Manna from heauen, did not onely poure it downe for the feding of their belly, but also did distribute it for a spirituall mysterie, to be a figure of the spirituall quickning that is had in Christ, did not neglect that parte that was most worthy of cōsideration. Wherfore it certainly and clerely followeth, that the same promises of eternall and heuenly life, which now the Lorde vouche-faueth to graunt vnto vs, were not only cōmunicated vnto the Iewes, but also sealed with very spirituall Sacramentes. Of which matter Augustine disputeth largely against Faustus the Manichee.

7 But if the readers had rather to haue testimonies alledged vnto them out of the lawe and the Prophetes, whereby they may perceiue that the spirituall couenant was common also to the fathers, as we heare by Christ and the Apostles: I will also follow that desire, and so much the more willingly, bycause by that meane the aduersaries shalbe more surely conuincd, so that they shall haue afterward no way to dally. And I will beginne at that prooffe, which although I knowe that the Anabaptistes pride will thinke very fonde and in a manner to be laughed at, yet shall much auaille with such readers as are willing to learne and haue their sounde wit. And I take it as a principle confessed, that there is such effectuall force of life in the worde of God, that whome so euer God vouchesaueth to be partakers therof, it quickeneth their soules. For this saying of Peter hath alway ben of force, that it is the incorruptible seede which abideth for euer, as he also gathereth out of the wordes of Esaie. Nowe sith God in the olde time bounde the Iewes vnto him with this holy bonde, it is no doubt that he did also seuer them into the hope of eternall life. For when I say they embraced the worde, which shoulde ioine them nier to God, I take it for the maner of communicating it: not that general maner, which is poured abroad throughout the heauen and earth and all the creatures of the worlde, which although it do quicken all thinges, euery one after the proportion of their nature, yet it doth not deliuer them from necessitie of corruption: but I speake of this speciall maner, whereby the soules of the godly are both lightened vnto the knowledge of God, and in a maner coupled to him. By this enlightening of the worde, sith Adam, Abel, Noe, Abraham, and the other fathers cleaued vnto God, I say that it is not doubtfull that they had an entrie into the immortall kingdome of God. For it was a sounde partaking of God, which can not be without the benefit of eternall life.

8 But if this seeme somewhat entangled: go to, let vs come to the very forme of the covenant, which shal not only satisfie sobre wittes, but also shall sufficiently conuince their ignorance that bende themselues to speake against it. For God did alway thus covenant with his seruantes: I will be to you a God, and ye shalbe to me a people. In which wordes the Prophetes themselues are wont to expounde, that both life and saluation, and the whole summe of blessednesse is comprehended. For Dauid doth not without cause often pronounce, that blessed is the people, whose God is the lorde: blessed is the nation, which he hath chosen to be his inheritance: and that not for earthly felicities sake, but bycause he deliuereth them from death, he preseruet them for euer, and continually sheweth them eternall mercie, whome he hath taken to his people: as it is in the other Prophetes, Thou art our God, we shall not die: The Lorde is our king, our lawemaker, he shall saue vs. Blessed art thou, O Israell, bycause thou art saued in the lorde God. But, not to labour ouermuch in a thing needlesse, this admonition is founde eche where in the Prophetes, that we shall wante nothing towarde all abundance of good thinges, and assurance of saluation, so that the Lorde be our God. And rightfully: For if his face so sone as it beginneth to shine, is a most present pledge of saluation; to what man shall he openly shew himselfe for his God, but that he will also open to him his treasure of saluation? For he is our God with this condition, to dwell in the midst of vs: as he testified by Moses. But such presence can not be obtained, but that life must be also together had in possession with it. And although there were no more expressed, yet had they a promise of spirituall life plaine enough in these wordes: I am your God. For he did not declare that he would be a God vnto their bodies alone, but principally to their soules. But soules vnlesse they be ioyned to God by righteousnesse remaine estranged from him in death. But on the other side, let that ioyning be present, it shall bring euerlasting saluation with it.

9 Beside that, he did not onely testifie that he was to them their God, but he also promised that he would be so all way: to the ende that their hope not contented with present benefites, should be extended to eternitie. And many sayings do shewe, that the speaking in the future time meant so much, as where the faithfull not onely in present euels, but also for the time to come, doe comfort them selues with this, that God will neuer faile them. Now as concerning the seconde part of the promise, he yet more plainly assured them of the blessing of God to be prolonged vnto them beyond the boundes of this life, in sayeng: I will be the God of your seede after you. For if he minded to declare his good will towarde them being dead, in doing good to their posteritie, much more would his fauour not faile towarde themselues. For God is not like vnto menne, which do therefore carry their loue to their frendes children, bycause their power is interrupted by death, so that they can not emploie their frendly doinges vpon them to whome they did beare good will. But God, whose bountifullnesse is not hindered by death, taketh not away from the very dead the frute of his mercie, which for their sakes he poureth out into a thousand generations. Therefore the Lordes will was by a notable prooffe to sette forth vnto them the greatnesse and flowing plentie of his goodnesse which they should feele after death, when he described it to be such as should flow ouer into all their posteritie. And the truth of this promise the Lorde did then seale, and as it were brought forth the fulfilling of it, when he named himselfe the God of Abraham, Isaac and Iacob, long after their death. For what? had it not been a fonde naming, if they had vtterly perished? For then had it ben all one, as if he had said, I am the God of them that are not. Wherefore the Euangelistes reherse, that with this one argument the Sadduces were so driuen to a streight, that they could not denie that Moses did testifie the resurrection of the dead, for that

u. 33 they had learned by Moses, that all the Saintes were in his hande. Wherupon it was easy to gather, that they are not destroyed by death, whome he that is the iudge of life and death had receyued in to his sauegard, custodie, and protection.

10 Now (which is the principal point whereupon this contro- uersie hangeth) let vs looke, whether the faithful themselues haue not ben so instructed of the Lord, that they perceyued that they shoulde haue a better life els where, & so neglecting this life, had an eie to the other. First the state of life that was enioyned them by God, was a cō- tinuall exercise, whereby they might be put in minde, that they were the most miserable of all men, if their happinesse were only in this life.

en. 3. Adam, most vnhappy, euen with onely remembrance of the happi- nesse that he had lost, did with painefull labours hardely susteine his nedinesse, and that he shoulde not be pressed with the curse of God, in the onely labours of his handes, euen there receyued he extreme sorrowe of that which remained for him to be his comfort. Of his two sonnes, the one was taken away by the wicked slaughter of his brother: the other he had lefte aliue, whose sight he worthily detested and abhorred. Abel cruelly murdered in the very floure of his age, became an example of the wretchednesse of men. Noe, while the en. 6. whole worlde carelesly liued in pleasure, spent a good part of his age with great werinesse in bilding the Arke. This that he escaped death, came to passe by his greater troubles, than if he shoulde haue died a en. 9. hundred deathes. For byside that the Arke was to him as a graue for tenne monethes, there is nothing more vnpleasant than to be holden so longe in manner drowned in dong of beastes. When he had passed ouer so great difficulties, he fell into newe matter of griefe, he sawe him selfe scorned of his owne sonne, and was compelled with his owne mouth to curse him, whome by the great benefit of God he had receyued safe from the generall floode.

en. 12 11 Abraham in deede may be one alone to be compared with a hundred thousand, if we consider his faith, which is set forth vnto vs for the best rule of beleuing, of whose kinred we must be accompted, that we may be the children of God. But what more absurditie is there, than Abraham to be the father of all the faithfull, and not to possesse so much as the smalest corner amōg them? but he can not be thrown downe out of the number, no not from the most honorable degree, but that the whole church must be destroyed. Now as tou- ching the experiēces of his life: When he was first called by the com- maundement of God, he was plucked away from his countrey, his pa- rentes and his frendes, in whome men thinke to be the chiefe sweete- nesse ness of life: euen as if God of determined purpose meant to spoyle him of all the pleasures of life. So soone as he came into the lande where he was commaunded to dwell, he was driuen out from thence with famine. Thither he fled for succour, where to saue himselfe, he was compelled to deliuer out his wife to be abused, which we knowe not whether it were not more bitter to him thā many deathes. Whē he was returned into the lande of his owne dwelling, he was driuen out againe from thence with famine. What a felicitie is this, to dwell in that lande, wherein a man must so oft be hungry, yea die for famine if he runne not away? And therewithall he was brought to that necessitie with Abimelech, that he must needs redēme his life with the losse of his wife, while many yeares long he wandred vncertainely hither and thither, he was compelled by the continuall brawlinges of his seruantes to put away his nephew, whome he loued as his owne sonne. Which departing without doubt he dyd no otherwise take, than if he had suffred the cutting of one of his limmes. A litle after, he heard that he was carried away captiue by his enemies. Whether so euer he went, he founde neighbours outrageously barbarous, which woulde not suffer him so much as to drinke water out of the welles that himselfe had digged with great labour. For he would not haue redēmed the vse of them at the hand of king Gerar, if he had not first ben forbidden. Nowe when he came to olde age, he saw the thing which is the most vnpleasant & bitter that that age hath, himselfe punished with hauing no children, till beside all hope he begate Ismaell, whose birth yet he payed dere for, when he was weryed with the brawling of Sara, as if he in mainteining the stubbornesse of his bondewoman, were himselfe the cause of the trouble of his household. At length Isaac was borne, but with this condition that his first begotten Ismaell must, as forsaken, be cruelly caste out of doores. When only Isaac was left, in whome the weryed age of the silly good man might rest, within a litle after he was commaunded to kill him. What can mans wit deuise more miserable, than the father to be made the butcher of his owne sonne? If Isaac had dyed of any sickenesse, who woulde not haue thought the olde man most miserable, that had a sonne geuen him in mockeage, for whome his griefe of want of children should be doubled? If he had ben slaine by some straunger, the unhappinesse of the thing would haue much encreased his miserie. But this passeth all examples of miserie, to haue him slaine with his fathers owne hand. Finally, he was in all the whole course of his life so tossed and vexed, as if a man would in a table paint out an example of a miserable life, he coulde finde none more fit, than this of Abraham.

Cap. 10. Of the knowledge of

And let noe man obiekt that he was not altogether vnhappy, for that he at length prosperously escaped from so many and so great tempestes. For we can not say that he liueth a blessed life, which for a long space together painefully weareth out of infinite troubles, but him that without feeling of euils, quietly enioyeth present good thinges.

12 Isaac that was lesse troubled with euilles, yet scarce euer toke any tast of sweetenesse. He also felt the same vexations, that do not suffer a manne to be blessed in the earth. Famine chased him out of the lande of Chanaan: he had his wife violently plucked away from his bosome: his neighbours oft troubled him, and by all meanes oppressed him, so that he was faine to striue for his water: at home in his owne house, he suffred much troublesomnesse by his childrens wiues, he was greued with disagreements of his sonnes, and coulde not remedie that so great a mischiefe, but by the banishment of him whome he had blessed. But as for Iacob, he is nothing els but a notable example of extreme infelicitie. He passed his childehod most vnquietly at home among the threatenings and terrors of his elder brother, to which at length he was compelled to geue place. When he was fled from his parentes and his natiue cōuntry, beside that it was a greuous thing to lue in banishment, he was nothing more kyndly or gently receiued of his vnclē Laban. Thē it sufficed not that he had serued seuen yeare a hard and cruell seruice, but that also he must be by guile defrauded of his wife. For an other wiues sake he was driuen into new seruice, where he was all the day fried with heate of the sunne, and all the night lay waking and pained with frost and cold, as himselfe complained. While he by the space of twentie yeares suffred so hard a life, he was dayly vexed with newe iniuries of his father in lawe. Neither was he quiet in his owne house, seyng it diuided and in a maner scattered abroad with the hatred, brawling and enuie of his wiues. When he was commaunded to returne into his cōuntry, he was compelled to watche an auantage to take his iourney, much like a shamefull running away: and yet coulde he not so escape the vniust dealing of his father in lawe, but was faine to suffer his reproches and rebukes in the middes of his iourney. Then fell he into a much more cruell destresse. For when he came nere to his brother, he had so many deaths before his eyes, as might be prepared by a cruell man and a bentemie. So was he about measure tormented and as it were drawen in sōder with terrible feares, so long as he looked for his brothers cōmyng: when he came ones in his sight, he fell down as halfe dead at his feete, vntil he found him more favorable than he durst haue hoped. Beside that, at his first entrie into the lande, he he lost Rachel his derely beloued wife. Afterwarde he heard worde that the sonne which he had by her, and whome therefore he loued aboute the reste, was torne with wilde beastes: by whose death hewe great grieve he conceyued, he himselfe declared in this, that after long weping he obstinately stopped vp all wayes whereby comfort might come to him, leauing himselfe nothing, but to goe downe to his sonne wayling into the graue. In the meane time howe great causes of grieve, wayting and werinesse were the rauishment and deflouring of his daughter, and the boldenesse of his sonnes in reuenging it, which not onely made him to be abhorred in sight of all the inhabitants of that countrey, but also procured him mooste present perill of vtter destruction? Then followed that horrible outragious offense of Ruben his first begotten sonne, which was such as their coulde not chaunce a more greuous. For whereas the defiling of a mans wife is reckned among the hiest ill fortunes: what is to be saide of it, when that wickednesse is committed by a mans owne sonne? Within a litle while after, his house is spotted with an other vnaturall adulterie: so that so many shames might well breake a hearte, that otherwise were most constant and vnable to be vanquished with calamities. Nere before the ende of his life, while he sought to provide succour for the famine of himselfe and other, he has striken with tidynges of a newe misfortune, vnderstanding that an other of his sonnes was kept in prison, for recouering of whome he was compelled to leaue to the rest Benjamin his onely dearling. Who can thinke, that in such a heape of mischeues he had any one moment geuen him safely to take breath in? And therefore he himselfe the beste witnessse of himselfe, affirmed to Pharao, that his dayes were shorte and euill vpon the earth. Nowe truely he that declareth that he hath passed his life by continuall miseries, denieth that he felt that prosperitie which the Lorde had promised him. Therefore either Iacob did vnkindely and vnthankfully weye the grace of God, or he truely professed that he had ben miserable vpon the earth. If his affirmation were true, then it followeth, that he had not his hope fastened vpon earthly thinges.

13. If these holy fathers looked for (as vndoubtedly they did) a blessed life at the hande of God, truely they both thought and saw it to be an other maner of blessednesse, than the blessednesse of earthly life. Which thing the Apostle also doth shewe excellently well: Abraham (saith he) direct by faith in the lande of promise as in a strange lande, dwelling in tentes with Isaac and Iacob parteners with him of the same inheritaunce. For they looked for a citie set vpon a good foundation, the maker and bilder wherof is God. All these are dead in faith, not receyuing the thinges promised, but loking at them a farre of, and beleuing and confessing that they were gistes and strangers vpon the land. Whereby they declare that they sought for a countrie, and if they had ben moued with desire of that lande from whence they came, they had power to returne. But they sought for a better, that is the heauenly countrie. Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God, for asmuche as he hath prepared them a citie. For they had bene duller than blockes, to followe promises so earnestly, wherof there appered no hope in earth, vnlesse they had loked for the fulfilling of them els where. But this he chiefly enforceth, and that not without good reason, that they called this life a iourney frō home, euen as Moses reporteth. From if they were strangers and foreiners in the lande of Chanaan, where is the Lordes promise whereby they were made heires of it? He sheweth plainely therefore, that the Lordes promise, cōcerning the possessiō therof, had a further respect. Wherefore they purchaced not one foote in the lande of Chanaan, but for burial, wherby they testified, that they did not hope that they should receiue the frute of the promise till after death. And that is the cause why Iacob so much esteemed to be buried there, that he compelled his sonne Ioseph to promise it him, and to sweare to performe it: and why Ioseph willed his bones, certaine ages after, whē they were long before fallen into powder, to be remoued thither.

14. Finally, it appeareth plainely, that in all the trauailes of this life they had alway set before them the blessednesse of the life to come. For to what purpose shoulde Iacob haue so much desired, and with so great daunger sought the preeminence of the first begotten, which should procure him nothing but banishment, and in a maner to be cast of from beyng his childe: but no good at all, vnlesse he had respect to a hyer blessing? And he declared, that he had this meaning by the wordes which he spake among his last breathinges: Lorde, I will loke for thy saluation. What saluation coulde he haue loked for, when he sawe that he laie ready to geue vp the ghost, vnlesse he had seene in death the beginning of a newe life? But what dispute we of the holy ones and children of God, when euen he was not without a tast of such vnderstanding, which otherwise was enemy to the truthe? For what meant Balaam when he said: Let my soule die the death of the righteous, and let my laste times be like vnto theirs? but that he meante the same thing that Dauid afterwarde vttered, that the death of the Saintes is precious in the sight of the Lorde, but the death of the wicked, is very euill? If the furthest bounde and ende were in death, there could in it be noted no difference betwene the righteous and vnrighteous, they differ one from the other by the diuersity of the estates, that after death shall befall to them both.

15. We are not yet come beyonde Moses: Which (as these men say) had no other office, but to perswade the carnal people to worship God by the frutefullnesse of the ground & plenty of all thinges. And yet (vnlesse a man will flee the light that willingly offereth it selfe) there is already a plaine declaration of the spirituall couenant. But if we come downe to the Prophetes, there with most full brightnesse both the life euerlasting and the kingdome of Christ do vtter themselves. And first of all Dauid, which as he was before y^e other in time, so accordinge to the order of Gods distribution, he shewed the heauenly misteries in shadowes more darkely than the rest, yet with what plainnesse and certaintie directeth he all his sayings to that end? How he esteemed the earthly dwelling, this sentence testifieth: I am here a forener & stranger, as all my fathers were. Euery liuing man is vanity, euery one walketh about as a shadow. But now what is my expectation, Lord? euen to thee is my hope. Truely he that confessing that in the earth there is nothinge sounde or stedfast, keepeth still a stedfastnes of hope in God, cōsidereth his felicity laied vpon in an other place. To such consideration is he wont to call all the faithfull, so oft as he meaneth to comfort them truely. For in an other place, after he had spoken of the shortnesse, and the transitorie and vanishing image of mans life, he addeth: but the mercy of the Lord is for euer vpon them that feare him. Like whercunto is that which is in the hundred and second Psalm. At the beginning Lord thou didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heauens are the workes of thy handes. They shall perish, but thou abidest: they shall waxe olde like a garment, and thou shalt change them as apparell, but thou remaine the selfe same, and thy yeares shall not faile: the sonnes of thy seruantes shall dwell, and thy posterity shall be stablished before thee. If the Godly ceasse not for the decay of heauen & earth to be stablished before the Lord, it followeth, that their saluation is ioyned with the eternity of God. But that hope can not stand at all, vnlesse it rest vpon the promise that is set forth in Esay: The heauens (sayth the Lord) shall vanish away like smoke, the earth shall be worne out like a garment, & the inhabitantes of it shall perish like those thinges. But my saluation shall be for euer, & my righteousness shall not faile: where euerlastingnes is giuē to righteousness & saluation, not in respect y^e they remaine with God, but in respect that they are felt of men.

16 Neither may we otherwise take those thinges, that he commonly speaketh of the prosperous successe of the faithfull, but to apply the to the open shewing of the heauenly glory. As these sayings: Psal. 97. The Lord kepeth the soules of the righteous, he shall deliuer them from the hand of the sinner. Light is arisen to the righteous, and ioy to the vpright in heart. The righteousness of the Godly man abideth for euer: his horne shall be exalted in glory, the desire of the sinner shall perish. Againe: but the righteous shall confesse vnto thy name, the vpright shall dwell with thy countenance. Againe: the righteous shall be in eternall remembrance. Againe: The Lord shall redeme the soules of his seruantes. For the Lord ostentimes leaueth his seruantes to the lust of the wicked, not only to be vexed, but also to be torne in peeces & destroyed: he suffereth the good to lye languishing in darkenesse & filth, while the wicked do in a manner shine among the starres. And he doth not so chere them with y brightnes of his couenance, that they enioy long cōtinuing gladnes. Wherefore euen he also hideth not, that if the faithfull fasten their eyes vpon the present state of thinges, they shall be stricken with a sore tēptation, as though there were no fauour or reward of innocency with God. So much doth wickednes for the most part prosper & flourish, while the company of the Godly is oppressed with shame, pouerty, contempt & all kindes of crosses. It wanted but litle (sayth he) that my foote slipped not, & my steppes fell not abroad, while the fortune of fooles grieueth me, and while I see the prosperity of y wicked. At length after rehearsall of it he concludeth. I bent my thought, if I could vnderstand these thinges. But it is a torment to my spirit, till I enter into the sanctuary of the Lord, & vnderstand the last end of them.

17 Let vs therefore learne, yet by this confession of Dauid, that the holy fathers vnder the old testament were not ignorant, how seldom or neuer God doth in this worlde performe to his seruantes those things that he promiseth them, & that therefore they did lift vp their mindes to Gods sanctuary, wherein they had y laied vp in store, which appeareth not in y shadow of this present life. That was y last iudgement of God, which when they could not see with eyes, they were content to vnderstand by faith. Trusting vpon which affiance, whatsoever happened in the world, yet they doubted not a time would once come, when the promises of God should be fulfilled. As these sayings do witness, I will behold the face of God in righteousness: I will be satisfied with thy countenance. Againe. I as a greene Oliue tree in the house of the Lord. Againe. The righteous shall flourish as a Date tree, and shall spred in branches like the Ceder of Libanus, beinge planted in the house of y Lord, they shall flourish in the Palaces of our God: They

They shall still beare frute, they shall be fat and greene in their olde age. When he had sayd a litle before: How deepe are thy thoughtes. O Lord, while the wicked do flourish, they bud out like an herbe, that they may perish for euer. Where is that faire shew and beauty of the faithfull, but when the face of this worlde shall be turned inward by disclosing of the kingdom of God? When they turned their eyes to that eternity, they despised the hardnesse enduring but a moment of present miseries, & boldly burst foorth into these words: Thou shalt not suffer for euer the righteous to die, but thou shalt throw downe the wicked headlong into y^e pit of destruction. Where as in this world the pit of eternall destruction that may swallow vp the wicked? Amōg whose felicities, this is also reckened in an other place, that they close vp the end of their life in a momēt, without long languishing. Where is that so great stedfastnesse of the holy ones, whom Dauid himselfe ech where complaineth, not only to be shaken with trouble, but also to be oppressed, and vtterly broken in peeces? Forsooth, he did set before his eyes, not what the altering course of the world beareth, which is vnstable & more vnstedfast than the ebbinge and flowing of tides; but what the Lord will do, when he shall one day sitte for the eternall settling of heauen and earth. As in an other place he excellently wel describeth it: The foolish do stay vpon their welthines, & are proude because of their great riches. And yet no mā, though he flourish in neuer so great dignity, can redeeme his brother from death, no man can pay to God the price of his ransome, but whereas they see that both the wise do die, and that the wicked also and fooles do perish & leaue their riches to strangers, yet they thinke that their houses shall abide for euer, and their dwellings to the ende of ages, and they aduaunce their names vpon the earth; but man shall not continue in honor: he shalbe like to the beastes that die. This imagination of theirs is extremest folly, which yet their posterity do greedily follow. They shall be placed like a focke in Hell; and death shall haue rule ouer them. When the light ariseth, the vpright shall haue dominion ouer them, the beauty of them shall perish, Hell is their dwelling house. First this laughinge to scorne of the foolish; for that they rest on the slippery and rolling good things of the worlde, doth shew that the wise must seeke a farre other felicity. But there he more evidently discloseth the mystery of the resurrection, where after the destruction & extinguishment of them, he erecteth the kingdom of the Godly. For what rising of light (I pray you) shal we call that, but the reueeling of the new life which followeth the end of this present life.

18 From thense did spring vp that consideration, which the faith-

full oftentimes vsed for a comfort of their miteries and remedy of patience: It is but a moment in the Lordes displeasure, and life in his mercy. How did they determine afflictions to end in a moment, that were in affliction in a manner their life long? where did they espie so long an enduring of Gods kindenesse, whereof they scarsely felt any litle tast? If they had sticked fast vpon the earth, they coulde haue founde no such thing, but because they looked vpon heauen, they acknowledged that it is but a moment of time, while the Lord exercise his holy ones by the crosse, but that his mercies, wherein they are gathered together, do last the worldes age. Againe, they did foresee the eternall and neuer endinge destruction of the vngodly, which were as in a dreame happy for one day. Whereupon came these sayings: The remembrance of the righteous shall be in blessinge, but the name of the wicked shall rot. Precious is the death of the Saintes in the sight of the Lord, but the death of the wicked, most euill. Againe in Samuel. The Lorde shall keepe the feete of the holy, and the wicked shall be put to silence in darkenesse. Which do declare that they wel knew, that howsoeuer the holy were diuersly caried about, yet their last end is life and saluation; and that the prosperity of the wicked is a pleasure way, whereby they by litle and litle slide forward into the gulfe of death. Therefore they called the death of such, the destruction of the vncircumcised, as of them from whom the hope of the resurrection was cut away. Wherefore Dauid could not deuise a more grieuous curse than this: Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, & not be written with the righteous.

19 But about all other, notable is that saying of Iob: I know that my redeemer liueth, & in the last day I shal rise againe out of the earth, and in my flesh I shall see God my sauour: This hope is layed vp in my bosome. Some that haue a minde to make a shew of their sharpe wit, do cauill that this is not to be vnderstanded of the last resurrection, but of the first day that Iob looked to haue God more gentle to him, which although we graunt them in parte, yet shall we enforce them to confesse whether they will or no, that Iob coulde not haue come to that largenes of hope, if he had rested his thought vpon the earth. Therefore we must needes confesse, that he lifted vp his eyes to the immortality to come, which saw, that his redeemer would be present with him euen lying in his graue. For to them that thinke only of this present life, death is their vttermost desperation: which very death could not cut of Iobs hope. Yea though he kill me (said he) neuerthelesse I will still hope in him. And let no trisler here carpe against me and say, that these were the sayinges but of a few, whereby is not

proued that such doctrine was among the Iewes. For I will by and by answer him, that these few did not in these sayings utter any secret wisdom, whereunto only certaine excellent wittes were seuerally & priuately suffered to attaine, but that as they were by the holy Ghost appointed teachers of the people, so they openly published those mysteries of God that were to be vniuersally learned, and ought to be the principles of the common religion among the people. Therefore when we heare the publike oracles of the holy Ghost, wherein he spake of the spirituall life so clearly and plainly in the Church of the Iewes, it were a point of vntolerable stubbornnesse to send them away onely to the fleshly couenant, wherein is mention made of nothings, but earth and earthly wealthinesse.

20 If I come downe to the later Prophetes, there we may freely walke as in our owne felde. For if it were not hard for vs to get the vpper hande in Dauid, Job, and Samuel, here it shall be much more easie. For God kept this distribution and order in disposing the couenant of his mercy, that how much the nearer it drew on in processe of time to y^e ful performance thereof, with so much greater encrease-mentes of reuelation he did day by day more brightly shew it. Therefore at the beginninge when the first promise of saluation was made vnto Adam, there glistered out but as it were smale sparkles of it. After, hauinge more added vnto it, a greater largenesse of light began to be put forth: which from thense forth brake out more and more, and displaied her brightnesse farther abroad, till at length all the cloudes were driuen away, and Christ the sonne of righteousnesse fully lightned the whole world. We neede not therefore to feare that we faile of testimonies of the Prophetes, if we seeke them to proue our cause, but because I see that there will arise a huge deale of matter, whereupon I shoulde be constrained of necessity to tary longer then the proportion of my purpose may beare, for it woulde so grow to a worke of a great volume, and also because I haue already, by those things that I haue sayd before, made plaine the way, euen for a reader of meane capacity, so as he may go forward without stū- blinge: therefore I will at this present abstaine from longe tediousnesse: which to do is no lesse necessary: but giuinge the readers warning before hande, that they remember to open their owne way with that key that we haue first giuen them in their hande. That is, that so oft as the Prophetes speake of the blessednesse of the faithful people, whereof scarcely the least steppes are seene in this present life, they may resort to this distinction: that the Prophetes, the better to expresse the goodnesse of God, did as in a shadow expresse it to the people by temporall benefites, as by certaine rough drawinge of the portraiture therof: but that the perfect image, that they haue painted therof, was such as might rauish mens mindes out of the earth, & out of the elements of this worlde, and of the age that shall perish, and of necessity raise it vp to the cōsidering of the felicity of the life that is to come and spirituall.

21 We will be content with one example. When the Israelites being caried away to Babylon, saw their scattering abroad to be like vnto death, they coulde hardy be remoued from this opinion that they thought that all was but fables that Ezechiel prophecied of their restitution: because they reckened it euen all one as if he had told them that rotten carcases shoulde be restored againe to life. The Lord to shew, that euen that same difficulty could not stop him from bringinge his benefite to effect, shewed to the Prophet in a vision a felde full of drie bones, to the which in a moment with the onely power of his word he restored breath and liuelinesse. The vision in dede serued to correct the incredulity at that present time: but in the meane season he did put the Iewes in minde how farre the power of the Lord extended beyond the accompt of the people, which so easly quickened with his only becke, bones already rotten and scattered abroad: wherefore you shal cōpare that with an other saying of Esaie. The dead shall rise, my carcase, they shall rise againe. Awake ye and reioyse that dwell in the dust, because the deaw of the greene felde is thy deaw, & thou shalt plucke downe the lande of the Giances into ruine. Go my people, enter into thy tentes: shut thy dores vpon thee: hide thee a little while, till my displeasure passe ouer. For behold, the Lord shall go out of his place, to visite the iniquity of the dweller vpon the earth against him, and the earth shall shewe forth her bloode, and shall no longer hide her staine.

22 Albeit a man should do fondly, that would go about to drawe all to such a rule. For there be some places that without any couering do shew the immortality to come, that is prepared for the faithfull in the kingdome of God, of which sorte we haue recited some, and of like sorte are the most part of the rest, specially these two, the one in Esay. As a new heauen, & a new earth which I make to stande before me, so shall your seede stande, and there shalbe moneth of moneth, and Sabbar of Sabbar: all flesh shall come to worshippe before my face, saith the Lord. And they shall go out and see the deade carcases of the men that haue offended against me, that their worme shall not die, and their fier shall not be quenched. The other of Daniel. In that time shall rise vp Michael the great prince, that stādeth for the sonnes of his people, and there shall come a time of distresse, such as was not since nations first began to be, and then shall all thy people be saued that shall be founde wrytten in thy booke. And of those that slepe in the dust of the earth, there shall awake some to eternall life, and some to euerlasting shame.

23 Now as for prouing y other two pointes that the fathers had Christ for pledge of their couenant, and that they reposed in him all their affiance of blessing, I will not trauaile therein at all, because they haue both lesse controuersie & more plainnesse. Let vs therefore boldly determiner this, which by no engines of the deuil may be remoued, that the olde Testament or couenant which the Lord made with his people Israel, was not limited within the compasse of earthly things, but also contened the promise of the spirituall and eternall life: the expectation wherof must nedes haue binimprinted in all their mindes that truly consented to the couenant. But let vs put farre away this mad and pernicious opinion, that either God did set forth in his promise to the Iewes nothing else, or that the Iewes sought nothing else but filling of their belly, delites of the flesh, flourishing wealth, outward power, frutefullnesse of children, and whatsoeuer a naturall man esteemeth. For at this day Christ promiseth no other kingdom of heauen to his, but where they shall rest with Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob. And Peter affirmed, that the Iewes of his time were heires of the grace of the Gospel, for that they were the children of the Prophets, comprehended in the couenant, which the Lord had in the olde time made with his people. And, that the same shoulde not be witnessed with wordes only, the Lord also approued it by deede. For in the very moment that he rose againe, he vouchsafed to haue many of y holy men to rise againe in company with him, & made them to be seene in the City: so giuing an assured token, that whatsoeuer he did and suffered for y purchasing of eternall saluation, pertaineth no lesse to the faithfull of the old testamēt, than vnto vs. For as Peter testifieth, they were also endued with y same spirit of faith, wherby we are regenerate into life. Now, when we heare that the same spirit which is in vs a certaine sparckle of immortality, wherupon it is also in an other place called the earnest of our inheritance, did likewise dwell in thē, how dare we take from thē y inheritance of life? Wherby it is so much y more maruell, that in the olde time the Sadduces fell to such grossenesse of errour, that they denied both the resurrection & also the substance of soules, both which pointes they saw sealed with so cleare testimonies of Scripture. And no lesse to be marueled at, euen at this day, were the folly of all that nation in looking for the earthly kingdom of Christ, if the Scriptures had not long before declared, that they should haue that punishment for refusing the Gospell. For so it behoued, by the iust iudgement of God, to strike those mindes with blindenes, which in refusing the light of heauen being offered them, did wilfully bring themselues into darkenesse. Therefore they read and continually turne ouer Moses, but they are stopped with a veile set betwene them and him, that they can not see the light that shineth in his countenance. And so shal it remaine couered & hidden from them, till he be turned to Christ, from whom now they trauaile to leade & drawe him away so much as in them lieth.

The xi. Chapter.

Of the difference of the one Testament from the other.

WHat then? wilt thou say: shall there be no difference left betwene the olde Testament and the New? and to what purpose serue all those places of Scripture, where they are compared one against the other, as things most contrary? I do willingly allowe those differences that are rehearsed in the Scripture: but so that they nothing hinder the ynity already stablished, as it shalbe plaine to see when we shall haue entreated of them in order. Those differences are (as farre as euer I could marke or can remember) chiefly foure in number, to the which if you list to adioyne the 5 I am not against it. I say and trust to proue that they are all such as rather belonge to the manner of ministracion, than to the substance of them. And by this meane they shall nothing hinder, but that the promises of both the old and new testament may remayne all one and all one foundation of the same promises, Christ. Now the first difference is, that although, euen, in the old time also, the Lordes will was to direct the mindes of his people, and to haue them raised vp to the heauenly inheritance: yet, that they might be the better nourished in hope thereof, he gaue it to be seene or rather to be tasted of, vnder earthly benefites? But now hauing reueled the grace of the life to come, by the Gospell, he more clearly and plainely directeth our mindes the streight way to the meditation thereof, leauing the inferior maner of exercising which he vsed with the Israelites. They that marke not this purpose of God, do not thinke that the olde people climbed any hier than to y good things promised to y body. They so often heare the lande of Chanaan named, as the excellent, or rather only reward for the keepers of Gods law. They heare that God threatneth nothing more seuerely to the transgressors of the same law, than that

that they shalbe driuen out of the possession of the same land, & scattered abroade into strange regions. They see that in a manner to this effect come all the blessings & curses that are pronounced by Moses. Hereby they do vndoubtedly determine, that the Iewes not for their owne sakes, but for others, were seuered frō other nations: that is, that the Church of Christ might haue an image, in whose outward forme she might see examples of spirituall things. But sith the Scripture doth sometimes shew, that God himselfe directed all the earthly benefites that he did for them to this end, that so he might leade them by the hand to the hope of heauēly benefites. It was too much vnskilfulnes, I will not say blockishnesse, not to consider this order of disposition. The issue or point of our controuersie with this sorte of men is this, that they teach that the possessiō of the land of Chanaan was to the Israelites their chiefe and last blessednes, & that to vs after the reueling of Christ, it doth but figuratiuely signifie y^e heauenly inheritance. On the other side we affirme, that they did in the earthly possession which they enioyed, as in a lookinge glasse behold the inheritance to come, which they beleued to be prepared for them in heaven.

2 That shall better appeare by the similitude that Paul vsed to the Galatians. He compareth the nation of the Iewes to an heire, within Gal. 4. 1 age, which beinge not yet able to to gouerne himselfe, followeth the guiding of the tutor or schoolemaister, to whose custody he is committed. And whereas he applieth that similitude to the ceremonies, that nothings hindereth but that it may also very fitly serue to this purpose. The same inheritance was appointed for them, that was appointed for vs: but such as yet for want of age, they were not of capacity to enter vpon and vse. The same Church was among them, but whereof the age was yet but childish. Therefore the Lord kept them vnder this schooling, that he gaue them not the spirituall promises so naked and openly, but as it were shadowed wth earthly promises. Therefore, where he called Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, and their posterity vnto hope of immortality, he promised them the land of Chanaan to be their inheritance: not to determine their hopes vpon it, but that in beholding of it, they shoulde exercise and confirme themselues in the hope of that true inheritance that did not yet appeare. And that they might not be deceiued, there was giuen them a hier promise to testify, that that lande was not the hiest benefite of God. So Abraham was not suffred to lie slouthfull in the promise receiued of the lande, but his minde was with a greater promise raised vp vnto the Lord. For Abraham heard this sayd vnto him: I am thy protector, & thy reward Ge. 15. 1 exceeding great. Here we see, that Abraham hath the ende of his reward set forth in the Lord, that he should not accompt vpon a transitory and slippery reward in the elementes of this worlde, but rather thinke it to be such as can not wither away. Afterward he adioyneth the promise of the land to no other intent, but that it should be a token of the good will of God, & a figure of the heauēly inheritance.

And that the holy men had this meaning, their owne sayinges do declare. So Dauid riseith vward from temporall blessings, to that same highest & last blessing, My heart (saith he) & my flesh faint for desire of thee. God is my portion for euer. Againe, The Lord is y^e part of my inheritance, and of my cup: thou art he that sauest mine heritage for me. Againe. I haue cried vnto thee, O Lorde, I haue sayd, Thou art my hope, my portion in the land of the liuing. Truely they that dare so speake, do without dout professe that with their hope they climbe aboute the world, and all the good thinges here present. But the Prophetes do oft describe this blessednesse of y^e world to come, vnder the figure that they had receiued of the Lord. And so are these sayings to be vnderstanded. That y^e Godly shal possesse the lande by inheritāce, and the wicked shalbe destroied out of it. That Hierusalē shal abound with all kinde of richesse, and Sion ouerflow with plenty of all things. All which we see, can not properly be spokē of the land of our wayfaringe, or the earthly Ierusalem, but of the true contry of the faithfull, and that heauenly citie wherein the Lord hath cōmaunded blessing and life for euer.

3 This is the reason why it is read that the holy mē in time of the olde testament, did esteeme the mortal life & the blessings therof more than is now meete to do. For although they knew wel y^e they shoulde not rest in it, as in the end of their race, yet whē they called to mind, what markes of his grace y^e lord had pointed therein, to exercise them according to y^e small rate of their tendernes, they felt a greater sweetness of it, than if they had considered it by it selfe. But as the Lorde in testifying his good will toward the faithfull, by present good things, did as in shadowe expresse the spirituall felicity, by such figures and signes: so on the other side he did in corporall paines shew examples of his iudgement against the reprobate. Therefore, as the benefites of God were to be seene in earthly things, so were also his punishments. While the vnskillfull do not weye this comparison or agreement, as I may call it betwene the punishmentes and the rewardes, they maruell at so much alteration in God, that in olde time was so sodainly ready to take vengeāce on euery offence of man with sterne & horrible punishmentes, & now as if he had layed away the affection of his old angines, he punisheth both much more gentlie & seldomer, yea and for the same cause they do almost imagine severall gods of y^e old & new testament: which the Manichees did in dede. But we shal easily be deliuered from such doutes, if we lay our mindes to consider this orderly disposition of God that I haue spoken of, whose will was for the time to signifie & set forth in figure both the grace of the eternall felicity to come, by temporall benefites, and the greuoufnes of the spirituall death, by corporall paines. Whereby he deliuered his Testamēt to the Israelites, as yet after a certaine maner folded vp.

4. An other difference of the olde and newe Testament is sayd to be in the figures: for that the olde testament did shew onely an image in absence of the trueth, and a shadow in steede of the body. But the new testament giueth the trueth present, and the sounde body it selfe. And this difference is mentioned commonly wheresoeuer the newe testament is in comparison set against the olde: but it is more largely entreated of in the epistle to the Hebrues than any where else. There the Apostle disputeth against them, which thought that the obseruation of Moses law might not be taken away, but that they should also draw with them the ruine of all religion. To confute this errour, he vseth that which had bin forespoken by the Prophete concerning the priesthoode of Christ. For whereas there is giuen him an eternall priesthoode, it is certaine, that that priesthoode is taken away, wherin new successours were daily put in, one after an other. But he proueth that the institution of this new priesthoode is to be preferred, because it is stablished with an oth. He after addeth further, that in the same change of the priesthoode, is also contained the change of the Testament. And that it was necessary so to be, he proueth by this reason: for that the weakenesse of the law was such that it coulde helpe nothing, to perfection. Then he proceedeth in declaring what was that weakenes, euen this, that it had certaine outward righteousnes of the flesh, which could not make the obseruers of them perfect, according to conscience: that by sacrifices of beastes, it could neither wipe away sinnes, nor purchase true holines. He concludeth therefore that there was in it a shadow of good things to come, but not the liuely image of the thinges themselues: & that therefore it had no other office, but to be as an introduction into a better hope, which is deliuered in the Gospell. Here is to be seene, in what point the couenant of the law is compared with the couenant of the Gospell: and the ministry of Christ with the ministry of Moses. For if the comparison concerned the substance of the promises, then were there great difference betweene the two testaments: but sith the point of our case lea-deth vs an other way, we must tende to this ende, to finde out the

Cap. II. Of the knowledge of

trueth. Let vs then set forth here the couenant which he hath stablished to be eternall, and neuer to perish. The accomplishment thereof, wherby it attaineth to be stablished & continuing in force, is Christ. While such establishment was in expectation, the Lord did by Moses appoint ceremonies, to be as it were solemne signes of the confirmation. Now this came there in question, whether the ceremonies that were ordained in y^e law ought to giue place to Christ or no. Although these ceremonies were in dede only accidents, or verily additions and things adioyned, or (as the people call them) necessary things to the couenant, yet because they were instrumentes or meanes of the administration thereof, they beare the name of the couenant it selfe; as the like is wont to be attributed to other Sacramentes. Therefore in summe, the olde Testament is in this place called the solemne forme of confirming the couenant, contained in Ceremonies and Sacrifices. The Apostle sayth, that because in it is nothinge perfect, vnlesse we passe further, therefore it behoued that they should be discontinued and abrogate, that place might be giuen to Christ the assurer and mediator of a better testament, by whom eternall sanctification is once purchaced to the elect, and the transgressions blotted out that remained vnder the law. Or, if you like it better, thus: That the olde testament of the Lord was that, which was deliuered, wrapped vp in the shadowish and effectuall obseruation of ceremonies: and that therefore it was but for a time, because it did but (as it were) hang in suspēse vntill it might stay vpon a more stedfast and substantiall confirmatiō: and that then onely it was made newe and eternall; after that it was consecrate and stablished by the blood of Christ. Whereupon Christ calleth the cup that he gaue at his supper to his Disciples, The cup of the new testament in his blood: to signifie, that then the testament of God attaineth his trueth: by which it becommeth new & eternal, when it is sealed with his blood.

5 Hereby appeareth in what sense the Apostle sayd: that in the schoolinge of the law, the Iewes were brought vnto Christ, before that he was shewed in the flesh. And he confesseth, that they were the children and heires of God, but yet such, as for their yong age were to be kept vnder the custody of a schoolemaister. For it behoued, that ere the sonne of righteousness was yet risen, their should neither be so great brightnesse of reuelation, nor so great deepe sight of vnderstandinge. Therefore God so gaue them in measure the light of his word, that they saw it as yet farre of and darkely. Therefore Paule expresseth this slendernesse of vnderstandinge by the tearme of yong age, which the Lordes will was to haue to be exercised with the elementes mentes of this world & with outward obseruations, as rules of instruction for children vntill Christ should shine abroad, by whom it behoued that the knowledge of the faithfull people should grow to full age. This distinction Christ himselfe meant of, when he said, that the law and the Prophetes were vntill Iohn, and that from thensefoorth the kingdom of God is preached. What did the law & the Prophetes open to men of their time? euen this, they gaue a tast of that wisdom which in time to come should be plainly disclosed: and they shewed it before as it were twinklingly shining a farre of. But whē it came to passe y. Christ might be pointed to with the finger, thē was the kingdom of God set open. For in him are laied abroade the treasures of all wisdom and vnderstanding, whereby we attaine, euen in a manner, into the secret closets of heauen. Mat. 11.

Col. 1.9

6 And it maketh not against vs, that there can scarcely any one be found in the Christian Church, that in excellency of faith may be compared with Abraham, or that the Prophetes excelled in such force of spirite, that euen at this day they lighten the whole world withall. For our question is not here, what grace the Lord hath bestowed vpon a fewe, but what ordinarie disposition he vsed in teaching his people: such as is declared in the Prophetes themselues, which were endued with peculiar knowledge aboute the rest. For euen their preachinge is darke and enclosed in figures, as of thinges a farre of. Moreouer how maruellous knowledge soeuer appeared in them aboute other, yet forasmuch as they were driuen of necessity to submit them to the common childish instructiō of the people, they themselues also were reckned in the number of children. Finally, there neuer chaunged any such cleare sight to any at that time, but that it did in some parte fauour of the darkeness of the time. Whereupon Christ sayd, Many kings and Prophetes haue desired to see the thinges that ye see, and haue not seene them: and to heare the things that ye heare, and haue not heard them. Therefore blessed are your eyes, because they see, & your eares because they heare. And truely it was meete that the presence of Christ should haue this excellency of prerogatiue, that from it should arise the cleare reuealing of the heauenly misteries. And for this purpose also maketh that, which euē we now alleaged out of the first epistle of Peter: that it was opened to them, that their trauaile was profitable, principally for our age. Mat. 13.

7 Now I come to the third difference, which is taken out of Ieremie, whose wordes are these. Behold the dayes shall come, sayth the Lord, and I will make a new couenant with the house of Israell, & the house of Iuda, not according to the couenant that I made with your Ier. 31.

Cap. II. Of the knowlledge of Fathers, in the day when I tooke them by the hande, to leade the out of the lande of Ægypt, the couenant that they made voide although I ruled ouer them. But this shal be the couenant that I will make with the house of Israell. I will put my lawe in their bowelles, and I will wryte it in their heartes, and I will be mercifull to their iniquity. And no man shall teach his neighbour, and no man his brother. For they shall all know me, from the least vnto the most. Of which wordes the Apostle tooke occasion to make this comparison betwene the law & the Gospell, that he called the law a literall, and the Gospell a spirituall doctrine: the law, he said, was fashioned out in Tables of stone, the Gospell written in heartes: that the law was the preaching of death, the Gospell the preaching of life: the law the preaching of damnatiō, the Gospell the preaching of righteousnesse: that the lawe is made voide, that the Gospell abideth. Sith the Apostles purpose was but to declare the meaninge of the Prophet, it shall be sufficient that we weye the wordes of one of the, to attaine the meaning of them both. Albeit, there is some vnlikenes betwene them. For the Apostle speaketh more odiously of the law than the Prophet doth: and that not in simple respect of the law, but because there were certaine naughty men, hauing a wrong zeale to the law, which did with peruerse loue of the ceremonies, obscure the brightnesse of the Gospell. He disputeth of the nature of the law, accordinge to their errour and foolish affection. Therefore it shall be good to note that peculiarly in Paul. But both of them, because they do by comparison set the olde and the new testament, the one against the other: do consider nothing in the law, but that which properly belongeth vnto it. As for example. The law doth commonly in euery place containe promises of mercy, but because they are borrowed from elsewhere, therefore they are not reckened as part of the law, whē the mere nature of the law is spoken of. The onely thing they ascribe vnto it, to commaunde thinges that are right, and to forbid wicked doings: to promise reward to the followers of righteousnesse, and to threaten punishment to the transgressours: but in the meane time neither to change nor amende the peruersenes of heart, that is naturally in all men.

8 Now let vs expounde the Apostles comparison, one peece after an other. The old testament is literal, because it was published without the effectuall workinge of the spirite: The new is spirituall, which the Lord hath spiritually grauen in the heartes of men. Therefore the second diuersity is as it were a declaration of the first. The old is deadly, because it can do nothinge but wrappe all mankinde within the curse. The new is the instrument of life, because it deliuereth from curse, & restoreth restoreth into fauour with God. The olde is the ministry of damnation, because it condemneth all Adams children of vnrighteousnesse. The new is the ministry of righteousnesse, because it reuealeth the mercy of God, by which we are made righteous. The last diuerſity is to be referred to the ceremonies. Because the old testament had an image of thinges absent, it behoued that it should in time decay & vanish away: but the Gospell, because it giueth the true body in deede, keepeth still a firme & perpetuall stedfastnes. Ieremie in deede calleth euen the morall lawes; a weake and fraile couenant: but that is for another reason, because by the sodaine falling away of the vnthankfull people, it was by and by broken, but forasmuch as such breakinge of it was the fault of the people, it can not properly be layd vpon the testament. But the ceremonies, forasmuch as by their owne weakenesse were dissolued by the coming of Christ, had the cause of their weakenesse within themselues. Now, that difference of the letter and spirite is not so to be takē, as though the Lord had giuen his lawes to the Iewes without any frute at all, hauing none of thē conuerted vnto him: But it is spoken by way of comparison, to aduaunce the aboundance of grace, wherewith the same lawmaker as it were putting on a new personage, did honorably set forth the preaching of the Gospell. For if we reckon vp the multitude of these whom the Lord out of all peoples hath by the preaching of the Gospel regenerate with his spirite, and gathered into the communion of his Church, we shall say, that there were very fewe, or in a manner none in the olde time in Israell, that with affection of minde and entirely from their heart embraced the couenant of the Lord: who yet were very many, if they be reckoned in their owne number without comparison.

9 Out of the third differēce riseth y fourth. For the Scripture calleth the old testament, the testamēt of bondage, for that it ingendreth feare in mens mindes: but the new testament, the testament of liberty, because it raiseth them vp to confidence & assurednes. So saith Paule Ro. 8.15 in the eight to the Romaines. Ye haue not receiued the spirit of bondage againe to feare, but y spirit of adoption, by which we crie Abba, father. Hereunto serueth that in the epistle to the Hebrues, that the Heb. 12. 18. faithfull are not now come to the bodily mount, and to kindled fire, & whirlewinde, darkenes and tempest, where nothing can be heard or seene but that striketh mens mindes with terrour, in somuch that Moses himselſe quaked for feare, when the terrible voice sounded, which they all besought, that they might not heare: But that we are come to the Mount Sion, and the Citie of the liuinge God, the heauenly Hierusalem. But that which Paule shortely toucheth in the sentēce that we haue alleaged out of the epistle to the Romaines, he setteth out more largely in the Epistle to the Galatians, when he maketh an allegory of y^e two sonnes of Abraham, after this manner, that

Gala. 4. 21. Agar the bondwoman is a figure of the mount Sinai, where the people of Israel receiued the law: Sara the freewoman is a figure of the heauenly Hierusalem, from whence proceedeth the Gospell. That, as the seede of Agar is borne bonde, which may neuer come to y^e inheritance, and the seede of Sara is borne free, to whom the inheritance is due: so by the law we are made subiect to bondage, by the Gospell only we are regenerate into freedom. But the summe commeth to this effect, that the old testament did stricke into consciences feare & trembling: but by the benefite of the new testament it commeth to passe, that they are made ioyfull. The olde did hold consciences bound vnto the yoke of bondage, by the liberality of the new they are discharged of bondage, and brought into freedom. But if out of the people of Israel they obiect against vs the holy fathers, who sith it is euident, that they were endued with the same spirit that we are, it followeth that they were also partakers both of the selfe same freedom & ioy: We answer, that neither of both came of the law. But that when they felt themselves by the law to be both oppressed with estate of bondage, and wearied with vnquietnes of conscience, they fled to the succour of the Gospell, & that therefore it was a peculiar frute of the new testament, that beside the common law of the old testament they were exempted frō these euils. Moreouer, we wil deny that they were so endued with the spirit of freedom and assurednes, that they did not in some parte feele both feare and bondage by the law. For howsoeuer they enioied that prerogatiue which they had obtained by grace of the Gospell, yet were they subiect to the same bondes and burdēs of obseruation, that the commō people were. Sith therefore they were compelled to the carefulll keepinge of those ceremonies, which were the signes of a schooling much like vnto bondage, and the handwrytinges whereby they confessed themselves guilty of sinne, did not discharge them from being bonde: it may rightfully be said, that in comparison of vs they were vnder the testament of bondage and feare, while we haue respect to that common order of distribution that the Lord then vsed with the people of Israel.

10 The three last comparisons that we haue recited, are of the law and the Gospel. Wherefore in them by the name of the Old testament is meant the lawe, and by the name of the New testament is meant the Gospel. The first stretched further, for it comprehendeth vnder it the promises also that were published before the lawe, but whereas

Augustine denieth that they ought to be reckened vnder the name of the olde testament, therein he thought very well, and meant euen the same thing that we do nowe teach, for he hadde regarde to those sayinges of Hieremie and Paule, where the olde testament is seuered from the worde of mercie and grace. And this also he very aptely adioyneth in the same place, that the children of promise regenerat of God, which by faith working through loue, haue obeyed the commandements, do from the beginning of the worlde belong to the new Testamēt, and that in hope not of fleshly, earthly and temporall, but spirituall, heauenly, and eternall good thinges, principally beleeuing in the Mediatour, by whome they doubted not that the spirit was no: ministred vnto them, both to do good, and to haue pardon so oft as they sinned. For the same thing it is that I minded to affirme, that all the Sainctes whome the Scripture reherfeth to haue been from the beginning of the worlde chosen by God, were partakers of the selfe same blessing with vs vnto eternall saluation. This difference therefore is betweene our diuision and Augustines: that oures (according to that saying of Christ: The lawe and the Prophets were vnto Iohn: Mat. 11. from thenseforth the kingdome of God is preached) doth make distinction 13. betweene the cleereneffe of the Gospell, and the darker distribution of the worde that went before: and Augustine doth onely seuer the weaknesse of the lawe from the strength of the Gospell. And here also is to be noted cōcerning the holy fathers, that they so liued vnder the olde testament, that they stayed not there, but alway aspired to the newe, yea and imbraced the assured partaking thereof. For the Apostle condemneth them of blindenesse and accursednesse, which being cōtented with present shadowes, did not stretch vp their minde vnto Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest) what greater blindenesse can be imagined, than to hope for the purging of sinne by the killing of a beast, than to seeke for the cleansing of the soule in outwarde sprinkeling of water? than to seeke to appease God with colde ceremonies, as though he were much delited therewith? For to all these absurdities do they fall, that sticke fast in the obseruations of the lawe without respect of Christ.

11 The fifth difference that we may adde, lieth in this: that vntill the comming of Christ the Lord had chosen out one nation, within which he woulde keepe seuerall the couenant of his grace. When the hiest did distribute the nations, when he diuided the sonnes of Adam (saith Moses) his people fell to his possession: Iacob the corde Deu. 32. of his inheritance. In an other place he thus speaketh to the people: 8. Beholde the heauen and earth and all that is in it, are the Lord thy Deu. 10. 14.

Gods. He cleaved onely ro thy fathers, he loued them, to chose their seede after them euen your selues out of all nations. Therefore he vouchesaued to graunt the knowledge of his name to that people onely, as if they onely of all men belonged vnto him: he layed his couenant as it were in their bosome: to them he openly shewed the presence of his Godhead: them he honored with all prerogatiues. But (to omit the rest of his benefites, and speake that which onely here is to our purpose) he bound them to him by the communicating of his worde, that he might be called and compted their God. In the meane season he suffered other nations to walke in vanitie, as though they had not any entercourse or any thing to do with him: neither did he to helpe their destruction, geue them that which was onely the remedie, namely the preaching of his worde. Therefore Israell was then the Lordes sonne that was his derling, other were straungers: Israell was knowen to him and receyued into his charge and protection, other were left to their owne darkenesse: Israell was sanctified by God, other were prophane: Israel was honored with the presence of God, other were excluded from comming nie vnto him. But when the fullnesse of time was come, appointed for the restoring of all men, and that same reconciler of God and men was deliuered in deede, the partition was plucked downe, which had so long holden the mercy of God enclosed within the boundes of Israell, & peace was preached to them that were farre of, euen as to them that were neere adioyned, that being together reconciled to God, they might growe into one people. Wherefore, nowe there is no respect of Greke or Iewe, circumcision or vncircumcision, but Christ is all in all, to whome the nations are geuen for his inheritaunce, and the endes of the earth for his peculiar possession, that vniuersally without difference he might haue dominion from sea to sea, and from the riuers to the vttermost endes of the worlde.

12 Therefore the calling of the Gentiles is a notable token, whereby is clearly shewed the excellencie of the newe Testament aboue the olde. It had in deede bin before testified by many, & most plaine oracles of the Prophetes, but so as the perfourmance thereof was still differred vnto the kingdome of Messias. And Christ him selfe did not procede vnto it at the first beginning of his preaching, but differred it so long vntil that all the partes of our redemption being perfourmed, and the time of his abacement ended, he receyued of his father a name that is aboue all names, before whome all knees shoulde bowe. For which cause when this conuenience of time was not yet fulfilled, he said to the woman of Chanaan, that he was not sent but to the lost sheepe sheepe of the house of Israell. And he suffered not his Apostles at the first sending, to passe these boundes. Go not ye, (saith he) into the way of the Gentiles, nor entre into the Cities of the Samaritanes, but rather go ye to the lost sheepe of the house of Israell. But howsoever it was before vttered by so many testimonies, yet when the Apostles were first to beginne it, it seemed so newe and strange a thing vnto them, that they were afraide of it, as of some monster. Truly very fearefully and not without sticking at it, they first did set vpon it. And no maruell, for it seemed against reason, that the Lorde which by so many ages had chosen out Israel from all other nations, should nowe vndo that choise, as it were, sodenly changing his purpose. It was in deede spoken of afore by prophecies: but they coulde not geue so great heede to the prophecies, as to be nothing moued with the newnesse of the thing that they sawe. And these examples which the Lorde had shewed of the calling of the Gentiles that shoulde one day come to passe, were not sufficient to moue them. For beside this that he had called vey fewe, he did after a certaine maner engraffe them into the householde of Abraham, to adde them vnto his people as percell of them: but by this generall calling the Gentiles, were not onely made egall with the Iewes, but also it appeared that they came into the place of the Iewes, that were become deade. And yet all those strangers whome God hath before that time brought into the bodie of the Church, were neuer made egall with the Iewes. And therefore not without a cause doth Paule so extoll this mysterie hidden from ages and generations, and which he also saith to be maru- Col. 1.

13 In these fower or fve pointes, I thinke, I haue well & faithfully set forth the whole difference of the olde and newe Testament, so much as sufficeth to y simple ordre of teaching. But because many report this varietie in gouerning the Church, this diuers manner in teaching, so great alteration of vsages and ceremonies, to be a great absurditie: they are also to be answered before that we passe forth to other things. And that may be done shortly, bycause the obiections are not so strong that they nede a curious confutation. It hangeth not together (say they) that God which doth alway stedfastly agree with him selfe, shoulde suffer so great an alteration, as afterwarde to disallow the same thing, which he had before both commaunded and commended. I answere, that God ought not therefore to be compted mutable, for that he applied diuerse formes to diuerse ages, as he knew to be expediēt for euery one. If the husbandman apoint to his householde one sorte of businesse in winter, & an other in sommer, shall we therfore accuse him of inconstancie, or thinke that he swarueth from the right rule of husbandrie which agreeth with the continuall ordre of nature? Likewise if a father of a householde do instruct, rule and ordre his children of one sorte in childhoode, of an other in youth, and of an other in mans state, we can not therefore say that he is fickle & forsaketh his owne purpose. Why therefore do we charge God with reproch of inconstancie, for that he hath seuered the diuersitie of times with fit and agreable markes? The last similitude ought fully to satisfie vs. Paule maketh the Iewes like vnto children, & Christians to yongmen. What disordre is there in this gouernement of God that he helde them in their childish lessons, which accordinge to the capacity of their age were fit for them, and instructed vs with stronger and as it were more manly discipline? Therefore herein appeareth the constancie of God, that he taught one selfe same doctrine in all ages, and continueth in requiring the same worshippe of his name, which he commaunded from the beginning. But wheras he chaunged the outwarde forme and manner thereof, in that he shewed not him selfe subiect to change: but so farre he tempered him selfe to the capacitie of man, which is diuerse and chaungeable.

14 But whense (say they) commeth this diuersitie, but bycause God willed it to be such? Coulede he not as well from the beginning as sins the comning of Christ, reuele the eternall life in plaine wordes without any figures, instruct those that are his with a few sacramentes and easy to perceauce, geue his holy spirite, and poure abroad his grace throughout the whole worlde? This is euen like as if they shoulde quarell with God for that he hath created the worlde so late, sith he might haue created it from the beginning: or for that his will was to haue enterchaunged courses betwene winter and sommer, betwene day and night. But as for vs, euen as al Godly men ought to thinke, let vs not doubtte that whatsoeuer God hath done, is wisely and righteously done, although oftentimes we know not the cause why it ought so to haue been done. For that were to take presumptuously to much vpon vs, not to geue God leaue to haue the causes of his owne purpose secret to himselfe from vs. But it is meruellous (say they) that he now refuseth and abhorreth the sacrificing of beastes, and all that furniture of the Leuiticall priesthode, wherewith in the olde time he was delited. As though these outward and transitorie thinges did delite God, or any way moue affection in him. We haue already said that he did none of these for his owne cause, but disposed them all for the saluation of men. If a Phisicion do heale a yong man after one very good meane from his disease, and afterward do vse an other maner of healing healing with the same man being olde: shall we therefore say, that he hath refused the manner of healing which before pleased him, but rather continuing still in the same, he hath consideration of age? So behoued it, that Christ being absent, shoulde be expressed in figure by one sort of signes, and by an other sort be before shewed that he was to come: and it is mete that now being already deliuered, he be represented by other signes. But as concerning Gods calling, nowe at the coming of Christ more largely spread abrode among all peoples than it was before, and the graces of the holy ghost more plenteously poured out, who, I pray you, can denie it to be right, that that God haue in his owne hande and will the disposing of his owne graces, to geue light to what nations it pleaseth him? to raise vp the preaching of his worde in what places it pleaseth him? to geue what doctrine and howe great profiting and successe of doctrine it pleaseth him? and in what ages he will, to take away the knowledge of his name out of the worlde for their vnthankfulnesse? and againe when he will to restore it for his owne mercie? We see therefore, that the cauillations are to much vnmeete, wherwith wicked men do in this point disquiet the mindes of the simple, to make them call either the righteousnesse of God, or the faith of the Scripture into doubt.

The xij. Chapter.

That it behoued, that Christ, to performe the office of the Mediatour, shoulde be made man.

NOwe, it much behoued vs that he shoulde be both God and man, which shoulde be our Mediatour. If a man aske of the necessitie, it was not in deede a simple or absolute necessitie, as they commonly call it, but it proceeded from the heauenly decree, wherevpon hanged all the saluation of men. But the most merciful father apointed that which should be best for vs. For wheras our owne iniquities had, as it were, cast a cloude betwene him and vs, and vtterly excluded vs from the kingdome of heauen, no man coulde be the interpreter for restoring of our peace, but he that could attein vnto God. But who coulde haue attained vnto him? coulde any of the sonnes of Adam? But all they did with their father shunne the sight of God for feare. Coulde any of the Angels? but they also had neede of a head, by whose knitting together they might perfectly and vnseuerably cleaue vnto God. What then? It was past all hope, vnlesse the very maiestie of God would descend vnto vs, for we coulde not ascende vnto it. So it behoued that the sonne of God shoulde become for vs Immanuell, that is, God with vs: and that in this sort, that by mutuall ioyning, his godhed and the nature of man might growe into one together. Otherwise neither coulde the neerenesse be neere enough, nor the alliance strong enough for vs to hope by, that God dwelleth with vs. So great was the disagreement betwene our filthinesse, and the most pure cleannesse of God. Although man had stand vndefiled without any spot, yet was his estate to base to attein to God without a Mediator. What coulde he then do being plunged downe into death and hell with deadly fall, defiled with so many spottes, stinking with his owne corruption, and ouerwhelmed with all accursednesse?

1. Tim. 2.3. Therefore not without cause, Paule meaning to set forth Christ for the Mediator, doth expressly recite that he is Man. One Mediator (saith he) of God and man, the man Iesus Christ. He might haue said, God: or at the least he might haue left the name of Man as well as of God. But bycause the holy Ghost speaking by his mouth, knewe our weakenesse: therefore to prouide for it in time, he vsed a most fit remedy, setting among vs the sonne of God familiarly as one of vs. Therefore least any man shoulde trouble himself to know where the Mediatour is to be sought, or which way to comme vnto him, in naming Man, he putteth vs in minde that he is nere vnto vs, yea so nere that he toucheth vs, for asmuch as he is our owne flesh. Truly he meaneth there euen the same thing that in an other place is set out with moe wordes: that we haue not a bishop that can not haue compassion of our infirmities, for asmuch as he was in all thinges tempted as we are, onely sinne excepted.

Hebr. 4. 15.

2 That shall also appere more plainely, if we consider how it was no meane thing that the Mediatour had to do: that is, so to restore vs into the fauour of God, as to make vs of the children of men, the children of God: of the heires of hell, the heires of the kingdome of heauen. Who could do that, vnlesse the sonne of God were made also the sonne of manne, and so take oures vpon him to conuey his vnto vs, and to make that oures by grace, which was his by nature? Therefore by ths earnest we trust, that we are the children of God, bycause the naturall sonne of God hath shapen for himselfe a body of our body, flesh of our flesh, bones of our bones, that he might be all one with vs. He disdained not to take that vpon him which was propre vnto vs, to make againe that to belong to vs which he had propre to himselfe, and that so in common together with vs, he might be both the sonne of God and the sonne of man. Herevpon commeth that holy brotherhode which he commendeth with his owne mouth when he saith: I go vp to my father and your father, my God and your God.

Ihō. 10. 17.

By this meane is the inheritance of the kingdome of heauen assured

vnto

vnto vs: for that the onely sonne of God, to whome it wholly did properly belong, hath adopted vs into his brethren: bycause if we be brethren, then are we partakers of the inheritaunce. Moreouer it was for the same cause very profitable, that he which shoulde be our redeemer, shoulde be both very God and very manne. It was his office to swallowe vp death: who coulde do that but life it selfe? It was his office to ouercome sinne: who coulde do that but righteousnesse it selfe? It was his office to vanquish the powers of the worlde and of the aire: who coulde do that but a power aboue both worlde and aire: Nowe in whose possession is life, or righteousnesse, or the empire and power of heauen, but in Gods alone? Therefore the most merciful God, in the persone of his onely begotten sonne, made himselfe our redeemer, when his will was to haue vs redemed.

Rom. 8.

3 An other principall point of our reconciliation with God was this that man which had lost by his disobedience, shoulde for remedy set obedience against it, shoulde satisfie the iudgement of God, and paye the penaltie of sinne. Therefore there came forth the true man, our Lorde, he put on the persone of Adam, and toke vpon him his name to entre into his stede in obeyeng his father, to yeld our flesh the price of the satisfaction to the iust iudgement of God, and in the same flesh suffer the paine that we had deserued. For asmuch as therefore neither being onely God he coulde fele death, nor being onely man he coulde ouercome death, he coupled the nature of man with the nature of God, that he might yelde the one subiect to death to satisfie for sinnes, and by y power of the other he might wastle with death, and get victorie for vs. They therefore that spoile Christ either of his godhed or of his manhode, do in deed either diminish his maiesty and glory, or obscure his goodnes: but on the other side they do no lesse wrong vnto men whose faith they do therby weaken and ouerthrow, which can not stand but resting vpon this foundatiō. Beside that, it was to be hoped, that the Redemer shoulde be the sonne of Abraham and Dauid, which God had promised in the lawe and the Prophetes. Wherby the godly mindes do gather this other frute, that being by the very course of his pedigree brought to Dauid and Abraham, they do the more certainly know that this is the same Christ that was spoken of by so many oracles. But this which I euen now declared, is principally to be holden in minde, that the common nature betwene him and vs is a pledge of our felowship with the sonne of God: that he clothed with our flesh vanquished death and sinne together, that the victorie so might be oures and the triumph oures: that he offered vp for sacrifice the flesh that he receyued of vs, that hauing made satisfaction he might wipe away our guiltinesse, and appease the iust wrath of his father.

4 He that shalbe diligently hede-full in considering these things as he ought, wil easily neglect these wandring speculations that rauish vnto them light spirites and desirous of noueltie: of which sort is, that Christ should haue been man, although there had been no neede of remedie to redeeme mankinde. I graunt that in the first degree of creation, and in the state of nature vncorrupted, he was set as head ouer Angels and men. For which cause Paule calleth him the first begottē of all creatures. But sith all the Scripture crieth out, that he was clothed with flesh, that he might be the Redeemer: it is to much rash presumptiō to imagine any other cause or ende. To what ende Christ was promised from the beginning, it is well enough knowen: euen to restore the world fallen in ruine, and to succour men being lost. Therefore vnder the lawe, the image of him was set forth in sacrifices, to make the faithfull to hope that God woulde be mercifull to them, when after satisfaction made for sinne, he shoulde be reconciled. But whereas in all ages, euen when the lawe was not yet published, the Mediatour was neuer promised without blood: we gather that he was apointed by the eternall counsell of God to purge the filthinesse of men, for that the shedding of blood is a token of expiation. The Prophetes so preached of him, that they promised that he shoulde be the reconciler of God and men. That one specially notable testimonie of Esaie shal suffice vs for all, where he foretelleth, that he shalbe stricken with the hande of God for the sinnes of the people, that the chastisement of peace shoulde be vpon him: and that he shoulde be a priest that shoulde offer vp himselfe for sacrifice: that of his woundes should come health to other: and that, bycause all haue strayed and been scattered abroad like sheepe, therefore it pleased God to punish him, that he might beare the iniquities of all. Sith we heare that Christ is properly apointed by God to helpe wretched sinners, who so euer passeth beyond these bouēdes, he doth to much follow foolish curiositie. Nowe when himselfe was ones come, he affirmed this to be the cause of his comming, to appease God, and gather vs vp from death into life. The same thing did the Apostles testifie of him. So Iohn before that he teacheth that the Worde wrs made flesh, declareth of the falling away of man. But he himselfe is to be hearde before all, when he speaketh thus of his owne office: So God loued the worlde, that he gaue his only begottē sonne, that who so euer beleueth in him should not perish, but haue euerlasting life. Againe: The houre is come that the dead shall heare the voice of the sonne of God, & they that heare it, shall liue. I am the resurrection and life: he that beleueth in me, although he be dead, shall liue. Againe. The sonne of man cometh to saue that which was lost. Againe. The whole neede not a Physician.

 I shoulde neuer make an ende, if I shoulde reherse all. The Apostles do all with one consent call vs to this fountaine: And truely if he had not come to reconcile God, the honor of the priesthode should haue come to nought. For asmuch as the priest appointed meane betwene God and man to make intercession: and he should not be our righte-ousnesse, bycause he was made a sacrifice for vs, that God should not impute sinnes vnto vs. Finally, he shoulde be spoiled of all the honorable titles, wherewith the Scripture doth set him out. And also that saying of Paule shoulde proue vaine, that that which was impossible to the law, God hath sent his owne sonne, that in likenes of the flesh of sinne he shoulde satisfie for vs. Neither will this stand that he teacheth in an other place, that in this glasse appeared the goodnesse of God and his infinite goodnesse towarde men, when Christ was geuen to be the Redemer. Finally, the Scripture euery where assigneth no other ende, why the sonne of God woulde take vpon him our flesh, and also receiued this commaundement of his father, but to be made a sacrifice to appease his father towarde vs. So it is written, and so it behoued that Christ should suffer, and repentance be preached in his name. Therefore my father loueth me, bycause I geue my life for the sheepe, this commaundement he gaue me. As Moses lifted vp the Serpēt in the desert, so must the sonne of man be lifted vp. In an other place. Father, saue me from this houre. But I am therefore come euen to this houre. Father glorifie thy sonne. Where he plainely speaketh of the ende why he toke flesh, that he might be a sacrifice and satisfaction to do away sinne. After the same sorte doth Zacharie pronounce, that he came according to the promise geuen to the fathers, to geue light to them that sate in the shadow of death. Let vs remember that all these thinges are spoken of the sonne of God: in whome Paule in an other place testifieth, that all the treasures of knowledge and wisdom are hidden, and byside whome he glorifieth that he knoweth nothing.

5 If any man take exception & say, that none of all these thinges proue the cōtrarie, but that the same Christ that redeemed men being damned, might also in putting on their flesh testifie his loue towarde them, being preserued & safe. The aunswere is short, that for asmuch as the holy Ghost pronounceth, that by the eternall decree of God these two thinges were ioyned together, that Christ should be our redeemer, and also partaker of all one nature with vs, therefore it is not lawfull for vs to search any further. For who so euer is tickled with desire to knowe any more, he being not contented with the vnchangeable ordinance of God, doth shewe also that he is not contented with the same. Christ that was geuen vs to be the price of our redemption. But Paule not onely reherfeth to what ende he was sente, but also climbing to the hye misterie of the predestination, he very fitly represseth all wantonnesse and itching desire of mans wit. The father chose vs in Christ before the creation of the worlde, to make vs his sonnes by adoption, according to the purpose of his will: and he accepted vs in his beloued sonne, in whom we haue redemption by his bloude. Truly here is not the fall of Adam set before as though it were formost in time, but is shewed what God determined before all ages, when his wil was to helpe the miserie of mandkinde. If the aduersarie obiecte againe, that this purpose of God did hang vpon the fall of man which he did foresee: it is enough and more for me, to say, that they with wicked boldnesse breake forth to faine them a new Christ, who so euer suffer themselves to searche for more, or hope to know more of Christ thā God hath foreappointed them by his secret decree. And for good cause did Paule, after he had so discoursed of the proper office of Christ, wish to the Ephesians the spirite of vnderstanding, to comprehend what is the length, heygth, bredth, and depth, euen the loue of Christ that surmounteth all knowledge: euen as if of purpose he would set barres about our mindes, that when mention is made of Christ, they should not, be it neuer so liitle, swarue from the grace of reconciliation. Wherefore, sithe this is a faithfull saying (as Paule testifieth) that Christ is come to saue sinners, I do gladly rest in the same. And wheras in an other place the same Apostle teacheth, that the grace which is nowe disclosed by the Gospell, was geuen vs in Christ before the times of the worlde: I determine that I ought constantly to abide therein to the ende. Against this modestie Oslander carpeth vniustly which hath againe in this time unhappily stirred this question before lightly moued by a fewe. He accuseth them of presumption that say, that the sonne of God should not haue appered in the flesh, if Adam had not fallen, bycause this inuention is confuted by no testimonie of Scripture. As though Paule did not bridle forward curiositie, when after he had spoken of redemption purchaced by Christ, he by and by commaundeth to auoide foolish questions. The madnesse of some did burst out so farre, that while they disorderly coueted to seeme witty, they moued this question, whether the Sonne of God might haue taken vpon him the nature of an Asse. This monstruousnes which all the godly do worthily abhorre as detestatestable, let Osiander confute with this pretense that it is neuer expressly confuted in the Scripture. As though when Paule accompteth nothing precious or worthy to be knowen, but Christ crucified, he doth therefore admit an Assle to be the author of saluation. Therefore he that in an other place reporteth, that Christ by the eternall counsell of his father was ordeined to be a head to gather all things together: will neuer the more acknowledge an other that hath no office of redeming appointed him.

6 But as for the principle that he braggeth of, it is very trifling. He would haue it, that man was created after the image of God, bycause he was fashioned after the paterne of Christ to come, that he might resemble him, whome the father had already decreed to clothe with our flesh. Wherevpon he gathereth, that if Adam had neuer fallen from his first and vncorrupted originall state, yet Christ should haue bene man. How trifling this is & wrested, all men that haue sounde iudgement, do easily perceiue of themselues. In the meane time first he thinketh that he hath seene what was the image of God, that forsooth the glorie of God did not onely shine in those excellent giftes wherewith he was garnished, but also that God himselfe essentially dwelt in him. But as for me, although I graunt that Adam did beare the image of God, in so much as he was ioyned to God, (which is the true & hyest perfection of dignitie) yet I say, that the likenesse of God is no where els to be sought, but in those marques of excellencie wherewith he had garnished Adam aboue other liuing creatures. And that Christ was then the image of God, all men doe graunt with one consent, and therefore that what so euer excellencie was grauen in Adam, it proceeded from this, that by the onely begotten sonne he approached to the glorie of his creator. Therefore man was created after the image of God, in whome the creators will was to haue his glorie scene as in a looking glasse. To this degree of honour was he aduanced by the benefite of the onely begotten sonne: But I say further, that the same sonne was a common head as well to Angels as to men, so that the same dignitie that was bestowed vpon man, did also belong vnto Angels. For when we heare them called the children of God, it were inconuenient to denie, that there is somthing in them wherein they resemble their father. Nowe if his will was to haue his glorie to be represented as well in Angels as in menne, and to be seene in both natures, Osiander doth fondely trifle in sayinge, that the Angels were then set behinde menne, bycause they did not beare the image of Christ. For they coulde not continually enioy the present beholding of God, vnlesse they were like him. And Paul teacheth, that men are no otherwise renewed after the image of God, but if they be coupled with Angels, that they may cleave together vnder one head. Finally, if we beleue Christ, this shalbe our last felicitie, to be made of like forme to the Angels, when we shalbe receyued vp into heauen. But if Osiander will conclude, that the originall paterne of the image of God was in Christ as he is man, by the same reason a manne may say, that Christ must needs haue been partaker of the nature of Angels, bycause the image of God pertaineth also to them.

7. Therefore, Osiander hath no cause to feare, that God shoulde be found a lier, vnlesse it had ben first stedfastly and vnchangeably decreed in his minde, to haue his sonne incarnate: bycause if the integritie of Adam had not fallen, he shoulde with the Angels haue ben like vnto God, and yet it shoulde not therefore haue ben necessarie, that the sonne of God shoulde be made either man or Angel. And in vaine he feareth that absurditie, least vnlesse the vnchangeable counsell of God had been before the creation of man that Christ shoulde be borne, not as the redemer but as the first man, he shoulde haue lost his prerogatiue: for asmuch as nowe he shoulde be borne man onely by an accident cause, that is to restore man kinde being lost, and so it might be gathered therevpon, that Christ was created after the image of Adam. For why shoulde he so muche abhorre that which

Hebr. 4. the Scripture so openly teacheth; that he was made like vnto vs in all 15. things, except sinne? Wherevpon Luke doubteth not to reckon him Luke 3. the sonne of Adam in his Genealogie. And I woulde faine know why 38. Paule calleth Christ the second Adam, but bycause the estate of man
1. Cor. was appointed for him, that he might raise vp the posteritie of Adam 5. 47. out of their ruine. For if he were in order before that creation, he shoulde haue been called the first Adam. Osiander boldly affirmeth, that bycause Christ was alreedy before knowen man in the minde of God, men were formed after the same paterne. But Paule in naming him the second Adam, setteth meane betwene the first beginning of man and the restitution which we obtaine by Christ, the fall of man wherby grew the necessity to haue nature restored to her first degree.
Wherupō it foloweth, that this same was the cause why the sonne of God was borne to become man. In the meane time, Osiander rea-soneth ill and vnfavorily, that Adam, so long as he had stande without falling, shoulde haue bin the image of himselfe and not of Christ. I aunsweare by the contrarie, bycause though the sonne of God had neuer put on flesh, neuertheless both in the body and in the soule of man shoulde haue shined the image of God, in the bright beames whereof it alway appered, that Christ is verily the head, and hath the Soueraigne supremicie in all. And so is that foolish subtletie assoyled, which Oslander bloweth abroade, that the Angels shoulde haue lacked this head, vnlesse it had bene purposed by God to clothe his sonne with flesh, yea though there had bine no fault of Adam. For he doth to rashly snatche holde of that which no manne in his right wit will graunt, that Christ hath no supremicie ouer Angels, that they shoulde haue him for their Prince, but in so much as he is man. But it is easily gathered by the wordes of Paule, that in as much as he is the eternall worde of God, he is the first begotten of all creatures: not that he is create, or ought to be reckened among creatures: but by-cause the state of the worlde in integritie, such as it was at the beginning garnished with excellent beautie, had no other originall: and then, that in as much as he was made man, he was the first begotten of the dead. For the Apostle in one shorte clause setteth forth both these pointes to be considered: that all thinges were create by the sonne, that he might beare rule ouer Angels: and that he was made man, that he might beginne to be the redemer. Of like ignoraunce is it that he saith, that men shoulde not haue had Christ to their king, if he had not bene man. As though the kingdome of God coulde not stand, if the eternall sonne of God, although not clothed with the flesh of man, gathering together both Angels and men into the felowship of his heavenly glorie and life, shoulde himselfe beare the soueraintie. But in this false principle he is alway deceyued, or rather deceyueth himselfe, that the Church shoulde haue bene without a head, vnlesse Christ had appeared in the flesh. As though, euen as the Angels enioyed him their heade, he coulde not likewise by his diuine power rule ouer men, and by the secret force of his spirite quicken and nourish them like his owne body, till being gathered vp into heauen, they might enioy all one life with the Angels. These trifles that I haue hetherto confuted, Oslander accompteth for most strong oracles: euen so as being dronke with the sweetenesse of his owne speculations, he vseth to blowe out fonde Bacchus cries of matters of nothing. But this one that he bringeth after, he saith is much more strong; that is the prophecie of Adam, which, seyng his wife said, this nowe is a bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh. But howe pro- ueth he that to be a prophecie? Bycause in Matthew Christ geueth the same saying to God: As though that what so euer God hath spoken by men, conteyneth some prophecie. Let Oslander seeke prophcies in euery commaundement of the lawe, which, it is certaine to haue come from God the author of them. Beside that, Christ should haue bene grosse and earthly, if he had rested vpon the literall

1. sense. Bycause he speaketh not of the mysticall vnion wherevnto he hath vouchesaued to receiue his church, but only of faithfulnessse betwene man and wife: for this cause he teacheth, that God prouounced that man and wife shalbe one flesh, that no man shoulde attempt to breake that insoluble knot by diuorce. If Oliander loth this simplicitie, let him blame Christ, for that he led not his disciples further to a misterie, in more suttely expounding the saying of his father. Neither yet doth Paule mainteine his error, which after he had said that we are flesh of the flesh of Christ, by and by addeth, that this is a great misterie; for his purpose was not to tell in what meaning Adam spake it, but vnder the figure and similitude of mariage, to set forth the holy coupling together; that maketh vs one with Christ. And so doe the wordes sound. Bycause when he geueth warning that he speaketh this of Christ and his church, he doth as it were by way of correction, seuer the spirituall ioyning of Christ and his church from the lawe of mariage. Wherefore this fickle reason easily vanisheth away. And I thinke I neede no more to shake vp any more of that sort of chaffe, bycause the vanitie of them all his sone found out by this short confutation. But this sobrietic shall abundantly suffice to feede soundly the children of God: that when the fulnesse of times was come, the sonne of God was sent, made of woman; made vnder the lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the lawe.

The xiiij. Chapter.

That Christ toke vpon him the true substance of the flesh of man.

NOwe, vnlesse I be deceiued, it were superfluous to entreate againe of the godhead of Christ, which hath already in another place ben proued with plaine and strong testimonies. It remaineth therefore to be seene, howe he being clothed with our flesh, hath fulfilled the office of Mediatour. The trueth of his humaine nature hath in the olde time ben impugned both by the Manichees and the Marcionites: of whome, the Marcionites fained a ghost in stede of the body of Christ, and the Manichees dreamed that he had a heauenly flesh. But both many and strong testimonies of the Scripture do stand against them both. For the blessing is promised neither in a heauenly seede, nor in the couëterfaite shape of man, but in the seede of Abraham and Iacob. Neither is the eternal throne promised to a man made of aire, but to the sonne of Dauid & to the frute of his wombe. Therefore being deliuered in the flesh, he is called the sonne of Dauid and Abraham: not bycause he is onely borne of the wombe of the Virgine, and create in the aire, but because (as Paule expoundeth it) he is according to the flesh made of the seede of Dauid: as in an other place the Apostle teacheth, that he descended of the Iewes. For which cause the Lord himselfe not contented with the bare name of man, doth oftentimes call himselfe the sonne of man, meaning to expresse more plainly that he was man truly issued of the seede of mankind. Sith the holy Ghost hath so oft by so many meanes with so great diligence and simplicities declared a thing not obscure of it selfe, who woulde haue thought any men to be so shamelesse as to presume yet to spread mistes to darken it? And yet we haue other testimonies at hand, if we list to heape vp more of them. As is that saying of Paule: that God sent his sonne made of woman. And innumerable other places, whereby appeareth that he was subiect to hungre, thirst, colde, & other infirmities of our nature. But out of many these are chiefly to be chosen, that may most auaille to edifie our mindes in true confidence. As, where it is said, that he gaue not so great honour to the Angels, as to take their nature vpon him: but toke our nature, that in flesh & bloud he might, by death, destroy him that had the power of death. Againe, that by benefite of that communicating we are reckened his brethren. Againe, that he ought to haue bine made like vnto his brethren, that he might be made a mercifull and faithfull intercessour: that we haue not a Bishop that can not be compatiuent of our infirmities. And such like. And for the same purpose serueth that which we touched a litle before, that it beloued that the sinnes of the worlde shoulde be cleansed in our flesh: Which Paule plainly affirmeth. And truly, what so euer the father hath geuen to Christ, it doth therefore belong to vs, because he is the head, from which the whole body being knit together, groweth into one. Yea, and otherwise that will not agree together, which is said: that the Spirite was geuen him without measure, that all we shoulde drawe of the fulnesse thereof. For asmuch as there is no greater absurditie than to say, that God is enriched in his essence by any accidentall giste. And for this cause Christ saith in an other place: I do sanctifie my selfe for them.

2 As for the places that they bring forth to confirme their errour, they do to vnaptly wrest them, and they nothing preuaile by their trifling suttelties, when they goe about to wipe away those thinges that I haue alleged for our part. Marcion imagineth that Christ did put on a fantastical body in stede of a true body: because in some places it is said, that he was made after the likenesse of man, and that he was founde in shape as a manne. But so he nothing weyeth what is

Paules purpose in that place . For his meaning is not to teach what manner of body Christ toke vpon him , but that whereas he might haue shewed forth his godhead , he made none other shewe of himselfe, but as of an abiect and vnregarded man. For, to exhorte vs by his example to submission, he sheweth, that for asmuch as he was God, he might haue by and by set forth his glory to be seene to the worlde: but yet that he gaue ouer some of his owne right; and of his owne accord abaced himselfe , bycause he did put on the image of a seruant and contended with that humilitie , suffred his godhed to be hidden with the veile of the flesh. He doth not here teach what Christ was, but how he behaued himselfe. And also by the whole processe of the texte it is easily gathered, that Christ was abaced in the true nature of manne. For what meaneth this, that in shape he was founde as man, but that for a tisme the glorie of his godhead did not shine forth, but only the shape of man appeared in base and abiect estate? For otherwise that place of Peter could not stande together, that he was dead in the flesh, but quickened in the spirite , if the sonne of God had not bene weake in the nature of man: which Paule expresth more plainely in sayeng , that he suffred by reason of the weakenesse of the flesh. And herevnto serueth the exaltation: bycause it is exprestly said, that Christ attained a new glorie after that he abaged himselfe, which could not well agree to be spoken of any , but of a man hauing flesh and soule . Manichees framed Christ a body of aire , bycause Christ is called the second Adam , heauenly of heauen . But neither in that place doth the Apostle bring in a heauenly essence of the body , but a spirituall force which being poured abroad by Christ, doth quicken vs . Nowe , as we haue already seene , Peter and Paule doe seuer the same from his fleshe . But rather that doctrine which is receiued among the true teachers , concerning the flesh of Christ , is very well proued by that place . For if Christ had not all one nature of body with vs , it were a very vaine argument , that Paule with such vehemencie followeth : that if Christ be risen againe , we shall also rise againe : and if we do not rise , then that Christ also is not risen . By what cauillations so euer either the olde Manichees or their new Disciples goe about to escape , they shall not winde them selues away. It is a fowle shifte, that they fondely say, that Christ is called the sonne of manne , in so much as he is promised of menne . For it is plaine, that after the Hebrewe phrase, very man in deede is called the Sonne of manne. And Christ without doubtte kepte the phrase of his owne tongue. Also it ought to make no question, what ought to be vnderstanded by the children of Adam. And (not to go farre of) the place of the eight Psalmes, which the Apostles apply to Christ, shall be sufficient enough: What is man that thou art mindefull of him, or the sonne of man, that thou visitest him? In this figure is expressed the true manhoode of Christ. For though he were not immediatly begotten of a mortall father, yet his race came frō Adam. For else that place could not stande which we haue already alleaged that Christ is made partaker of flesh and blood, that he might gather to him yonge children to the seruice of God. In which words it is plainly determined, that Christ is made fellow & partaker of all one nature with vs. In which meaninge also he sayth; that both the author of holinesse & they that are made holy, are all of one. For it is proued by the processe of the text, that the same is referred to the fellowship of nature: because he by and by addeth, Therefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren. For if he had said before, that the faithfull are of God in so great dignity, what cause should there be to be ashamed? But because Christ of his infinite grace doth ioyne himselfe to the base & vnnoble therefore it is sayd, that he is not ashamed. But in vaine they object, that by this meane the wicked shall become the brethren of Christ: because we know that the children of God are not borne of flesh and blood, but of the holy Ghost by faith. Therefore onely flesh maketh not a brotherly ioyninge. But although the Apostle giue this honor to y^e faithfull only, to be of one with Christ, yet it followeth not, but that the wicked may be borne of the same originall. As when we say that Christ was made man, to make vs the sonnes of God: this saying extendeth not to all men, because faith is the meane which spiritually graffeth vs into the body of Christ. Also they foolishly moue a brawle about the name of First begottē. They say that Christ should haue bin borne of Adam streight at the beginning, that he might be the first begotten amonge brethren. For the title of First begotten, is not referred to age, but to the degree of honor, and excellence of power. And more colour hath that which they bable, that Christ tooke to him man and not Angels, because he receiued mankinde into fauour. For, to set out more largely the honor which God vouchsafed to giue vs, he cōpared the Angels with vs, which were in this behalfe set behinde vs. And if y^e testimony of Moses be well weyed, where he sayth that the seede of the woman shall breake the serpentes heade, it shall vtterly ende the controuersie. For only Christ is not there spoken of, but all mankinde. Because the victory was to be gotten by Christ for vs, he generally pronounceth that the posterity of the woman should get the vpper hand of y^e Deuil. Whereupon followeth, that Christ issued of mankinde, because it was Gods purpose there to raise vp Eue, whom he spake vnto with good hope, that she shoulde not faint with sorow.

3 They do no lesse wickedly than foolishly entangle with allegories these testimonies where Christ is called the seede of Abraham, and the frute of the wombe of Dauid. For if the name of Seede had bin spoken in an allegory, truely Paul would not haue left it vntolde, where he plainly & without figure affirmeth, that there are not many sonnes of Abraham redemers, but one Christ. Of like sorte is it that they alleage: that he is no otherwise called the sonne of Dauid, but because he was promised and at length in his due time deliuered. For after that Paule had once named him the sonne of God: in that he byandby addeth, According to the flesh, he truely meaneth of nature. And so in the 9 chapter callinge him the blessed God, he sayth feuerally beside, that accordinge to the flesh he descended of the Iewes. Nowe if he were not truely begotten of the seede of Dauid, to what purpose shalbe this sayinge, that he is the frute of his wombe? What meaneth this promise? Out of thy loynes shal he descende, that shall abide in thy seate. Now in the Genealogie of Christ, as it is rehearsed of Matthew, they do Sophistically mocke. For though he do not rehearse the parêtes of Marie but of Ioseph, yet because he speaketh of a thing sufficiently knowē abroad among the people, he reckoneth it enough to shew that Ioseph came of the seede of Dauid, when it was well knowen that Mary was of the same stocke. But Luke more presseth them in teaching that saluation brought by Christ, is cōmon to all mankind: because Christ the author of saluation proceeded frō Adam the common parent of all. I graunt in dede, that by the Genealogie it can none otherwise be gathered that Christ was the sonne of Dauid, but in so much as he was begotten of the Virgine. But the newe Marcionites to colour their errour do to proudly, in this that to proue that Christ tooke his body of nothing, they affirme that women are seedeles, and so they ouerthrow the principles of nature. But because that is no question of diuinity, & the reasons that they bringe are so fickle, that they may very easily be confuted: therefore I will not touch those thinges that belong to Philosophie and Phisike, and will hold me contented to wipe away those thinges that they alleage out of Scripture: that is, that Aaron and Ioiadah tooke wiues of the tribe of Ichudah, & so the difference of tribes had then bin confounded, if woman hadde engendringe seede in her. But it is well enough knowen y as touching ciuile order, the kindreds are reckened by the sede of the man, & yet the excellency of the kinde of man aboute woman proueth not the contrary, but that in generatiō the seede of woman must meete. And this solution extendeth to all the Genealogies. Oftentimes when the Scripture reckoneth vp a Genealogie, it nameth the mē only:shal we therefore say, that the women are nothing? But very children do know, that women are comprehended vnder the name of men. And after this sorte it is said, that women bring forth to their husbands, because the name of the household alway remaineth with the males. Now as this is graunted to the excellency of the male kinde, that the children are compted noble or vnnoble, according to the estate of their fathers:so also in the state of bondage the issue followeth the wombe, according to the iudgement of the Ciuile lawyers. Whereby we may gather, that the issue is engendred of the seede of the woman. And it hath of long time bin receaued in common vse of al nations, that the mothers are called Genetrixes, that is engēdrers. Wherwith Gods law also agreeth, which else should wrōgfully forbid y^e mariage of the vnclē with his sisters daughter, because there were no consanguinity betwene them: and also it were lawfull for a man to marry his suster by the mothers side, so that she were begotten of an other father. But as I graunt that there is a passue power ascribed to women, so do I answere that the same thing is indifferently spoken of them that is of men. And Christ himselfe is not sayd to be made by the woman, but of the woman. But some of their company shaking of all shame do too leudly aske, whether we wil say that Christ was engendred of the menstruall seede of the Virgine, for I will likewise aske of them, whether he did not congele in the blood of his mother, which they shalbe constrained to confesse. Therefore it is fitly gathered of Mathewes words, that because Christ was begotten of Marie, he was engendred of her seede: as a like engendringe is meant when it is sayd, y^e Booz was begotten of Rahab. Neither doth Matthew here describe the Virgine as a conduit pipe through which Christ passed: but he seuereth this maruellous maner of generation from the common maner, for that by her Christ was begotten of the seede of Dauid. For euen in the same sorte, that Isaac was begotten of Abraham, Salomon of Dauid, and Ioseph of Iacob, likewise it is sayd that Christ was begotten of his mother. For the Euangelist so frameth the order of his speach, and willinge to proue that Christ came of Dauid, is contented with this one reason, that he was begotten of Marie. Wherby it followeth, that he tooke it for a matter confessed, that Marie was of kinne to Ioseph.

Ga. 4. 4.

4 The absurdities wherewith they woulde charge vs, are stuffed full of childish cauillations. They thinke it a shame and dishonor to Christ, if he should haue takē his original of men: because so he could not be exempt from the vniuersall law that encloseth all the offspring of Adam without exception, vnder sinne. But the comparison that we read in Paule doth easily assoyle this dout: that as by one man came sinne, and by sinne death, so by the righteousnesse of one man grace hath abounded. Wherewith also agreeth an other comparison of his: the first Adam of earth, earthly and naturall, the seconde of heauen, heavenly. Therefore in an other place, the same Apostle, where he teacheth that Christ was sent in the likenes of sinfull flesh to satisfie the law, doth so expressely seuer him from the common estate of men, that he be very man without fault and corruption. But very childishly they trifle in reasoning thus: If Christ be free from all spot, and was by the secreete workinge of the holy Ghost begotten of the seede of Marie, then is not the womans seede, but onely the mans seede vncleane. For we do not make Christ free frō all spot, for this cause y he is only engendred of his mother without copulation of man, but because he is sanctified by the holy Ghost, that the generation might be pure and vncorrupted, such as should haue bin before the fal of Adam. And this alway remained stedfastly determined with vs, that so oft as the scripture putteth vs in minde of the cleannesse of Christ, it is meant of his true nature of manhoode: because it were superfluous to say, that God is cleane. Also the sanctification that he speaketh of in the seuentene of Iohn, could haue no place in the nature of God. Neither are there fained two seedes of Adam, although there came no infection to Christ: because the generation of mā is not vncleane or vicious of it selfe, but accidentall by his falling. Therefore it is no maruell, if Christ, by whom the estate of innocency was to be restored, were exempt from common corruption. And wheras also they thrust this vpon vs for an absurdity, y if the Word of God did put on flesh, then was it enclosed in a narrow prison of an earthly body: this is but mere waywardnes: because although the infinite effeēce of the Word did growe together into one person with the nature of man: yet do we faine no enclosing of it. For the Sonne of God descended maruelously from heauen, so as yet he left not heauen, it was his will to be maruelously borne in the Virgins wombe, to be conuersant in earth, & hang vpon the crosse, yet that he alway filled the world euen as at the beginning.

The xiiii. Chapter.

How the two natures of the Mediatour do make one person.

Now

Now where it is sayd, that the Word was made flesh: that is not so to be vnderstanded, as though it were either turned into flesh, or confusely mingled with flesh, but because he chose him a temple of the Virgins wombe to dwell in: he that was the Sonne of God, became also the sonne of man, not by confusion of substance, but by vnity of person. For we so affirme the godheade ioyned and vnited to the manhoode, that either of them haue their whole property remaining, and yet of them both is made one Christ. If any thing in all worldly thinges may be founde like to so great a mysterie, the similitude of man is most fitte, whom we see to consist of two substances, whereof yet neither is so mingled with other, but that either keepeth the property of his owne nature. For neither is the soule the body, nor the body the soule. Wherefore both that thing may be seuerally spoken of the soule, which can no way agree with the body: and likewise of the body that thing may be sayd, which can by no meane agree with the soule: and that may be said of the whole man, which can be but vnfitly taken neither of the soule nor of the body seuerally. Finally, the properties of the soule are sometime attributed to the body, and the properties of the body sometime to the soule: and yet he that consisteth of them is but one man and not many. But such formes of speach do signifie both that there is one person in man compounded of two natures knit together, and that there are two diuerse natures which do make the same person. And so do the Scriptures speake of Christ: Sometime they giue vnto him those thinges that ought singularly to be referred to his manhoode, & sometime those thinges that do peculiarly belong to his godhead, & sometime those thinges that do comprehend both natures, & do agree with neither of them seuerally. And this conioyning of the two natures y^e are in Christ, they do with such religiousnes expresse, that sometime they do put them in common together: which figure is among the old authors called, Communicating of properties.

2 These things were but weake, vnles many phrases of Scripture, and such as be echwhere ready to finde, did proue that nothing hereof hath bin deuised by man. That same thing which Christ spake of himselfe, saying: Before that Abraham was, I am: was farre disagreeing from his manhoode. Neither am I ignorant with what cauillation the erroneous spirites do deprauē this place: for they say that he was before all ages, because he was already foreknowen the Redemer, as well in the counsell of the father, as in the mindes of the godly. But where as he openly distinguisheth the day of his manifestation from his eternall essence, & of purpose pronounceth vnto himselfe an authority by antiquity wherein he excelleth aboue Abraham, he doth vndoubtedly challenge to himselfe that which is proper to the God-head. Whereas Paul affirmeth that he is the first begotten of all creatures, which was before all things, & by whom all things keepe their being: & wheras he himselfe reporteth that he was in glory with the father before the creatiō of the world, & y he worketh together with the father: these things do nothing more agree with y nature of men. It is therfore certaine, that these and such like are peculiarly ascribed to the godhead. But whereas he is called the seruant of the father: and wheras it is said, that he grew in age, wisdom & fauour with God and men: that he seketh not his owne glory: that he knoweth not the last day: that he speaketh not of himselfe: that he doth not his owne will: where it is sayd, that he was seene and felt: this wholly belongeth to his only manhode. For in the respect that he is God, neither can he encrease in any thinge, and he worketh all thinges for his owne sake, neither is any thing hidden from him, he doth all thinges according to the free choise of his owne will, and can neither be seene nor felt. And yet he doth not seuerally ascribe these things to his nature of mā on-ly, but taketh thē vpon himselfe, as if they did agree with the person of the mediatur. But the communicinge of properties is in this that Paul saith, that God did by his owne blood purchase vnto him a Church: and the Lord of glory crucified. Againe, where Iohn sayth, that the Word of life was felt. Truly God neither hath blood, nor suffereth, nor can be touched with handes. But because he which was both very God & man, Christ being crucified, did shed his blood for vs: those thinges that were done in his nature of man, are vnproperly, and yet not without reason giuen to his godhead. A like example is, where Iohn teacheth that God gaue his soule for vs: therefore there also the property of the manhode is cōmunicate with the other nature. Againe, when Christ sayd being yet conuersant in earth, that no man hath ascended into heauē, but the sonne of man that was in hea-uen: truly according to his manhoode, and in the flesh that he had put on, he was not thē in heauen: but because himselfe was both God and man, by reason of the vnity of both natures, he gaue to the one that, which belonged to the other.

3 But most plainly of all do these places set forth the true substāce of Christ, which do comprehend both natures together: of which sort there are very many in the gospell of him. For that which is there red is singularly belonging neither to his godhead nor to his manhoode, but both together: y he hath receiued of his father power to forgiue sinnes, to raise vp whom he will, to giue righteousnesse, holinesse and saluation saluation, to be made iudge ouer the quicke & the dead, to be hono- red euen as the father is : Finally, that he is called the light of the world, the good shepherd, the only dore, the true Vine. For such pre- rogatiues had y^e sonne of God, whē he was shewed in the flesh: which although he enioyed with his father before the worlde was made, yet he had thē not in the same maner or the same respect, & which could not be giuē to such a man as was nothing but man. In the same mea- ning ought we to take that which is in Paule : that Christ after the iudgement ended, shall yeelde vp the kingdom to God & the father: Euen the kingdom of the sonne of God, which had no begining, nor shall haue any ending: but euen as he lay hid vnder the basenesse of the flesh, and abaced himselfe, takinge vpon him the forme of a ser- uant, and layinge aside the porte of maiesty, he shewed himselfe o- bediēt to his father: & hauing performed all such subiection; at légh is crowned with honor & glory, & auanced to the highest domini- on, that all knees shall bow before him: so shall he then yeelde vp to his father both that name & crowne of glory, & whatsoever he hath receiued of his father, that God may be all in all. For to what purpose is power & dominion giuen him, but that the father should gouerne vs by his hande? In which sense it is also sayd, that he sitteth at y^e right hand of the father. But this is but for a time, til we may enioy the pre- sent beholding of the godhead. And here the errour of y^e old fathers can not be excused, which while they tooke no heede to the person of the Mediatour, haue obscured y^e natural meaning of almost all the doctrine that is read in the gospell of Iohn, & haue entangled them- selues iin many snares. Let this therefore be vnto vs the key of right vnderstanding, that such things as belong to the office of the Media- tour, are not spokē simply of the nature of God, nor of the nature of man. Therefore, Christ shal reigne til he come forth to iudge y^e world, insomuch as he ioyneth vs to his father, according to the smale mea- sure of our weakenesse. But when we beinge made partakers of the heavenly glory, shall see God such as he is, thē he hauing performed the office of Mediatour, shall ceasse to be the embassadour of his fa- ther, & shalbe cōtented with that glory which he enioyed before the makinge of the worlde. And the name of Lord doth in no other re- spect peculiarly agree with the person of Christ, but in this, that it si- gnifieth y^e meane degree betwene God & vs. For which purpose maketh y^e saying of Paul: One God, of whom are all things, & one Lord, by whom are all things, euen he to whom the dominiō for a time is cōmitted by the father, vntil his diuine maiesty be to be seene face to face. Frō whom so far is it of that any thing shall decay, by yelding vp the dominion to his father, that he shall become so much the more glorious. For then shall God also cesse to be y^e head of Christ because Christes godheade shall then shine of it selfe, whereas yet it is couered with a certaine veile.

4 And this obseruation shall do no small seruice to assoile many doutes, if the readers do fitly apply it. For it is maruelous how much the vnskilfull, yea some not viterly vnlearned, are combred with such formes of speach, which they see spoken by Christ, which do well agree neither with his godheade nor with his manhoode: because they consider not that they do agree with his person wherein he is shewed both God and man, and with the office of Mediatour. And it is alway easie to see, how well all things hang together, if they haue a sober expositour, to examine so great misteries with such deuout reuerence as they ought to be. But there is nothing that these furious and phrentike spirites trouble not. They catch hold of those things that are spoken of his manhoode, to take away his Godhead: and likewise of those things that are spoken of his godhead to take away his manhoode: and of those thinges that are so ioyntly spoken of both natures, that they seuerally agree with neither, to take away both. But what is that else but to say, that Christ is not man, because he is God: and that he is not God, because he is man: and that he is neither man nor God, because he is both man and God? We therefore do determine that Christ, as he is both God and man, consisting of both natures, vnited, though not confounded, is our Lord and the true sonne of God, euen according to this manhoode, though not by reason of his manhoode. For the error of Nestorius is to be driuen far away from vs, which when he went about rather to draw in sunder, than to distinguish the nature, did by y^e meane imagine a double Christ. Whereas we see that the Scripture crieth out with loude voice against it, where both the name of the sonne of God is giuen to him that was borne of the Virgine, & the Virgine her selfe is called the mother of our Lorde. We must also beware of the madnesse of Eutiches, least while we go about to shew the vnity of the person, we destroy either nature. For we haue already alleaged so many testimonies, & there are euery where so many other to be alleaged, where his Godhead is distinguished from his manhoode, as may stop the mouthes euen of the most contentious, And a litle herafter I will adioine some testimonies, to confute better that fained deuise, but at this present, one place shal content vs. Christ would not haue called his body a Temple, vnlesse the Godhead did distinctly dwel therin. Wherefore as Nestorius was worthily condemned in the synode at Ephesus, so also was Eutiches afterward condemned in the synodes of Constantinople and Chalcedon: forasmuch as it is no more lawfull to confounde the two natures in Christ, than it is to draw them in sunder.

5 But in our age also there hath risen vp no les pestilent a mōster, Machaell Seruettus which did thrust in place of the sonne of God, a fained thing made of the essence of God, of spirit, flesh & threë elementes vncreate. And first he denieth that Christ is by any other way the sonne of God, but in this that he was begotten of y^e holy ghost in the wombe of the Virgine. But to this ende tendeth his suttlety, that the distinctiō of y^e two natures being once ouerthrowē, Christ might be thought to be a certaine thing mingled of God & man, & yet neither God nor man. For in his whole processe he trauaileth toward this point, that before Christ was opēly shewed in the flesh, there were onely certaine shadowish figures in God, wherof the trueth or effect then at length was in beinge, when that word which was ordained to that honor, began truely to be the sonne of God. And we in dede do confesse that the Mediatour which is borne of the Virgin, is properly the sonne of God. For Christ in that he is man, could not be the mirror of the inestimable fauour of God, vnlesse this dignity were giuen him to be, and be called the onely begotten sonne of God. But in the meane season the definitiō of the Church standeth stedfastly grounded, that he is compted the sonne of God, because he being the Word begotten of the father before all worlds, did by hypostaticall vniō take vpō him the nature of man. Now the hypostaticall vniō is called with the olde fathers, that which maketh one person of two natures, which phrase of speach was deuised to ouerthrow the doting errour of Nestorius, because he fained that the sonne of God did so dwell in flesh, that yet he the same was not man. Seruettus sclaudereth vs, that we make two sonnes of God when we say that the eternall Word was already the sonne of God before that it was clothed with flesh, as if we did say any thing else but that he was manifested in the flesh. Neither doth it follow, that if he were God before that he was man, he began to be a new God. And no more absurdity it is to say, that the sonne of God appeared in the flesh, which yet had this alway from eternall begetting to be the Sonne, which the Angels words to Mary do secretly shew, That holy thing y^e shall be borne of thee, shall be called y^e sonne of God: as if he should haue sayd, that the name of the Sonne which was obscure in time of the law, should now become famous and eue-ry where knowne abroade. Wherewith agreeth that saying of Paul, Ro. 8. 15 that now by Christ we are the children of God, freely & with boldnesse to crie Abba, Father. But were not the holy fathers in the olde time also accompted amonge the children of God? Yea: and bearing them bold vpon that interest, they called vpon God by name of their Father. But because since \bar{y} only begotten sonne of God was brought forth into the world, the heavenly fatherhode is become more plainly knowen: therefore Paul assigneth this, as it were, a priuilege to the kingdom of Christ. But yet this is stadfastly to be holdē, that God neuer was father either to Angels or men, but in respect of the only begotten sonne: and that men specially, whom their owne wickednesse maketh hateful to God, are his children by free adoption because he is the sonne of God by nature. And there is no cause why Seruettus should cauill, that this hangeth vpon filiatiō or becomming a sonne, which God had determined with himself: because our purpose is not heare to speake of the figures howe the expiation was shewed in the bloud of beastes: but because they could not in dede be the childrē of God, vnlesse their adoption were grounded vpon \bar{y} head, it is without reason to take that from the head which is common to all the members. I go yet further: Whereas the Scripture calleth the Angels the sonnes of God, whose so great dignity did not hang vpon the redēption to come: yet must it needes be, that the sonne is in order before them, which maketh the father to be their father. I will repeate it againe shortly, & adde the same of mankinde. Sith from at their first beginning both Angels and men were created, with this condition, that God should be common father to them both, if that saying of Paule be true, that Christ was alway the head & the first begottē of all creatures, to haue the first degree in all: I thinke I do rightly gather that he was also the sonne of God before the creation of the world.

6 But if his Filiation (if I may so terme it) began since he was manifested in the flesh, it shall follow, that he was also sonne in respect of his nature of man. Seruettus and other such frenlike men would haue it, that Christ which appeared in \bar{y} flesh, is the sonne of God, because out of the flesh he coulde not be called by that name. Now let them answer me whether he be the sonne according to both natures, and in respect of both. So in dede they prate, but Paule teacheth farre otherwise. We graunt in dede, that Christ is in the flesh of man called the Sonne, but not as the faithfull are, that is by adoption only and grace, but the true and naturall, and therefore only sonne, that by this marke he may be discerned from all other. For God voutsaueth to giue the name of his sonnes to vs, that are regenerate into a new life: but the name of the true and only begotten sonne, he giueth to Christ only. How can he be the only sonne in so great a number of brethrē, but because he possesseth that by nature, which we haue receiued by gift?

gift? And y^e honor we extend to the whole person of the Mediatour, that he be truly & properly the Sonne of God, which was also borne of the Virgine, & offered himselfe for sacrifice to his father vpon the crosse: but yet in respect of his Godhead, as Paule teacheth, when he sayth, he was seuered out to preach the Gospell of God, which he had before promised of his sonne, which was begotten of the seede of Dauid according to his flesh, and declared the sonne of God in power. But why, whē he nameth him distinctly the sonne of Dauid according to the flesh, should he seuerally say, that he was declared the Sonne of God, vnlesse he meant to shew that this did hang vpon some other thinge, than vpon the very flesh? For in the same sense in another place he sayth, that he suffered by the weakenesse of the flesh, and rose againe by the power of the spirite, euen so in this place he maketh a difference of both natures. Truly they must needs graunt, that as he hath that of his mother for which he is called the Sonne of Dauid, so he hath that of his Father for which he is called the Sonne of God: and the same is an other thing and seuerall from the nature of man. The Scripture giueth him two names, callinge him here & there sometimes the Sonne of God, and sometimes the Sonne of Man. Of the second there can be no cōtention moued: but according to the common vse of the Hebrue tongue he is called the Sonne of mā, because he is of the offspring of Adā. By the contrary I affirme, that he is called the Sonne of God in respect of the Godhead & eternall essence: because it is no lesse meete that it be referred to the nature of God, that he is called the Sonne of God, than to the nature of man, that he is called the Sonne of Man. Againe, in y^e same place that I alleaged, Paul doth meane that he which was according to the flesh begotten of the seede of Dauid, was no otherwise declared the Sonne of God in power, thā he teacheth in another place, that Christ which accordinge to the flesh descended of the Iewes, is God blessed for euer. Now if in both places the distinctiō of the double nature be touched, by what right wil they say, that he which according to y^e flesh is the Sonne of Man, is not also the Sonne of God, in respect of the nature of God.

7 They do in dede disorderly enforce for the maintenāce of their error, the place where it is sayd, y^e God spared not his owne Sonne: & where the Angell commaunded, that the very same he that should be borne of y^e Virgine, should be called the Sonne of the highest. But, least they should glory in so fickle an obiection, let them wey with vs a litle, how strongly they reason. For if it be rightly concluded, that from his conception he beganne to be the Sonne of God, because he that is conceiued is called the Sonne of God, then shall it follow, that he began to be the word at his manifesting in the flesh, because Iohn sayth, that he bringeth them tidings of the Word of life, which his handes haue handeled. Likewise that, which is reade in the Prophet: Thou Bethleem in the lande of Iuda, art a litle one in thousandes of Iuda: Out of thee shall be borne to me a guide to rule my people Israel, and his comming forth from the beginning, from the daies of eternity. How will they be compelled to expounde this, if they will be content to follow such manner of reasoning? For I haue protested, that we do not agre with Nestorius, which imagined a double Christ: whereas by our doctrine, Christ hath made vs the sonnes of God with him, by right of brotherly conioyninge, because he is the only begotten sonne of God in the flesh which he tooke of vs. And Augustine doth wisely admonish vs, that this is a bright glasse, wherein to behold the maruellous and singular fauour of God, that he attained honor in respect that he is man which he coulede not deserue.

 Therefore Christ was adorned with this excellency euen according to the flesh frō the wombe of his mother, to be the Sonne of God. Yet is there not in the vnity of person to be fained such a mixture, as may take away that which is proper to the Godheade. For it is no more absurdity, that the eternall word of God and Christ, by reason of the two natures vnited into one person, be diuerse wayes called the Sonne of God, than that he be accordinge to diuerse respectes, called sometime the Sonne of God, and sometime the sonne of Man.
 And no more doth that other cauillation of Seruettus accomber vs: that before that Christ appeared in the flesh, he is no where called the Sonne of God, but vnder a figure, because although the describing of him, thē was somewhat darke: yet where as it is already clerely proued that he was no otherwise eternall God, but because he was the word begotten of the eternall father, and that this name doth no otherwise belonge to the person of the Mediatour which he hath taken vpon him, but because he is God openly shewed in the flesh: and that God the Father hath not bin called Father from the beginning, if there had not then bin a mutuall relation to the Sonne, by whome all kinred or fatherhood is reckened in heauen and in earth: hereby it is easie to gather, that euen in the time of the law and the Prophets, he was the Sonne of God, before that this name was commōly knowen in the Church. But if they striue onely about the onely word, Salomon discoursing of the infinite highnesse of God, affirmeth as well his Sonne as himselfe to be incomprehensible. Tell his name if thou canst (sayth he) or the name of his sonne. Yet I am not ignorant

rant, that with the contentious this testimony will not be of sufficient force: neither do I much grounde vpon it, sauing that it sheweth that they do maliciously caull, that deny Christ to be the Sonne of God, but in this respect that he was made man. Beside that, all the oldest wryters with one mouth and consent haue openly testified the same: so that their shamelesnesse is no lesse worthy to be scorned than to be abhorred, which dare obiekt Ireneus & Tertullia against vs, both which do confesse that the Sonne of God was inuisible, which afterward appeared visible.

8 But although Seruettus hath heaped vp horrible monstrous deuises, which paradventure the other woulde not allow: yet if ye presse them hard, ye shall perceiue that all they that do not acknowledge Christ to be the sonne of God but in the flesh, do graunt it onely in this respect, that he was conceiued in the wombe of the Virgin by the holy Ghost, like as the Maniches in olde time did foolishly affirme, that man hath his soule (as it were) by deriuation from God, because they reade that God breathed into Adam the breath of life. For they take so fast hold of y name of Sonne, that they leaue no difference betwene the natures, but babble disorderly, that Christ being man, is the Sonne of God, because according to his nature of man, he is begotten of God. So the eternall begetting of Wisdom, that Salomon speaketh of, is destroied, and there is no accompt made of the Godheade in the Mediatour, or a fantasied Ghost is thrust in place of the Manhood. It were in deede profitable to confute the grosser deceites of Seruettus, wherewith he hath bewitched himselfe and some other, to the ende that the Godly readers admonished by this example, may hold themselues within the compasse of sobernes and modelty: sauing that I thinke it should be superfluous, because I haue already done it in a booke by it selfe. The summe of them commeth to this effect, that the Sonne of God, was a forme in minde from the beginning, and euen then he was before appointed to be man that should be the essentiall image of God. And he doth acknowledge no other Word of God, but in outward shew. This he expoundeth to be the begetting of him, that there was begotten in God from the beginning a will to begette a Sonne, which also in act extended to the nature it selfe. In the meane time he confoundeth the Spirite with the Word, for that God distributed the inuisible Word and the Spirite into flesh and soule. Finally the figuration of Christ, hath with them the place of begetting, but he saith, that he which then was but a shadowish sonne in forme, was at length begotten by the word, to which he assigneth the office of seede. Whereby it shall follow that hogs and dogs are as well the children of God, because they were create of the originall seede of the word of God. For although he compound Christ of three vncreate elements to make him begotten of the essence of God, yet he faineth that he is so the first begotten among creatures, that the same essentiall godhead is in stones, according to their degree. And least he should seeme to strippe Christ out of his godhead, he affirmeth that his flesh is consubstantial with God, and that the Word was made man by turninge the flesh into God. So while he can not conceiue Christ to be the Sonne of God, vnlesse his flesh came from the essence of God, and were turned into godhead, he bringeth the eternall person of the Word to nothinge, and taketh from vs the sonne of Dauid, that was promised to be the Redeemer. He oft repeateth this, that the Sonne was begotten of God by knowledge and predestination, and that at length he was made man of that matter which at the beginning shined with God in the three elementes, which afterward appeared in the first light of the worlde, in the cloude and in the piller of fire. Now how shamefully he sometime disagreeeth with himselfe, it were too tedious to rehearse. By this shorte recitali the readers that haue their sounde witte may gather, that with the circumstances of this vncleane dogge the hope of saluation is vtterly extinguished. For if the flesh were the godheade it selfe, it shoulde ceasse to be the temple thereof. And none can be our redemer, but he that begotten of the seede of Abraham and Dauid, is accordinge to the flesh, truely made man. And he wrongefully standeth vpon the wordes of Iohn, that the Word was made flesh. for as they resist the errour of Nestorius, so they nothing further this wicked inuention, wherof Eutiches was author, forasmuch as the onely purpose of the Euangelist was to defend the vnity of persons in the two natures.

The xv. Chapter.

That vve may knowv, to vvhath end Christ vvas sent of his Father, and vvhath he brought vs: three things are principally to be considered in him, his Propheticall office, his Kingdom, and his Priesthoode.

AVgustine saith rightly, that although the Heretikes do bragge of the name of Christ, yet they haue not all one foundation with the godly, but that it remaineth onely proper to the Church. For if these thinges be diligently considered, that belong to Christ. Christ shall be founde among them onely in name, and not in very deede. So at this day the Papistes, although the name of the Sonne of God redemer of the worlde, sounde in their mouth:

mouth: yet because being contented with vaine pretense of the name, they spoile him of his power and dignity: this sayinge of Paule may be well spoken of them, that they haue not the head. Therefore, that faith may finde sounde matter of saluation in Christ, and so rest in him, this principle is to be stablished, that the office which is committed to him by his Father, consisteth of three partes. For he is giuen both a Prophet, a King, and a Priest. Albeit, it were but small profite to know those names, without knowledge of the ende and vse of them. For they are also named amonge the Papistes, but coldly and to no great profite, where it is not knowen what eche of these titles cōtaineth in it. We haue said before, how, though God sending Prophets by continual course one after an other did neuer leaue his people destitute of profitable doctrine, and such as was sufficient to saluation: that yet the mindes of the godly hadde alway this persuasiō, that full light of vnderstandinge was to be hoped for onely at the comming of Messias: yea and the opinion thereof was come, euen to the Samaritans, who yet neuer knew the true religion, as appeareth by the sayinge of the woman: When Messias commeth, he shall teach vs all thinges. And the Iewes had not rashly gathered this vpon presumptions in their mindes: But as they were taught by assured oracles, so they beleued. Notable amonge the other is that saying of Esay: Behold, I haue made him a witnessse to peoples, I haue giuen him to be a guide and Schoolemaister to peoples: euen as in an other place he had called him y^e Angell or interpreter of the great counsel. After this maner the Apostle commending the perfection of the doctrine of the gospell, after that he had sayd, that God in the old time spake to the Fathers by the Prophetes diuersly, and vnder manifolde figures, addeth that last of all he spake vnto vs by his beloved Sonne. But because it was the common office of the Prophetes to keepe the Church in suspense, and to vphold it vntill the comming of the Mediatour, therefore we reade that in their scattering abroad, the faithfull cōplained that they were deprived of that ordinary benefite, saying: We see not our tokens: there is not a Prophet amonge vs: there is no more any that hath knowledge. But when Christ was now not farre of, there was a time appoynted to Daniell to seale vp the vision and the Prophet, not onely that the Prophecie, which is there spoken of, shoulde be stablished in assured credit, but also that the faithfull shoulde learne with contented minde to want the Prophetes for a time, because the fulnesse and closing vp of all reuelations was at hand.

2 Now it is to be noted, that the title of commendation of Christ

belongeth to these three offices. For we know that in the time of the law, as well the Prophetes as Priestes and Kings were anointed with holy oyle. For which cause the renoumed name of Messias was geuen to the promised Mediatour. But though in deede I confesse (as I haue also declared in an other place,) that he was called Messias by peculiar consideration and respect of his kingdome: yet the annoyn-tinges in respect of the office of Prophet & of priest, haue their place, and are not to be neglected of vs. Of the first of these two is expresse mention made in Esay, in these words: The spirit of the Lord Iehoua vpon me. Therefore the Lord hath anointed me, that I should preach to the meeke, should bring health to the contrite in heart, should declare deliuerance to captiues, shoulde publish the yeare of good will: &c. We see that he was anoynted with the Spirit, to be the publisher and witness of the grace of the Father. And that not after the common manner: for he is seuered from other teachers, that had the like office. And here againe is to be noted, that he tooke not the anoin-ting for himselfe alone, that he might execute the office of teaching; but for his whole body, that in his continuall preachinge of the Gospell, the vertue of the Spirite shoulde ioine withall. But in the meane time this remaineth certaine, that by this perfectiō of doctrine which he hath brought, an ende is made of all prophecies: so that they do diminish his authority, that beinge not content with the Gospell, do patch any foraine thinge vnto it. For that voice which thundered from heauen, saying: This is my beloued Sonne, heare him: hath auanced him by singular priuilege aboue the degrees of all other. Then, this oyntment is poured abroade from the head vnto all the members: as it was forespoken by Ioel: Your children shall prophesie, and your daughters shall see visions. &c. But where Paule sayth, that he was giuen vs vnto wisdom: and in an other place, that in him are hidden all the treasures of knowledge and vnderstandinge: this hath somewhat an other meaninge: that is, that out of him there is nothinge profitable to knowe, and that they which by faith perceauce what he is, haue comprehended the whole infinitenesse of heauenly good things. For which cause he wryteth in an other place: I haue compted it precious to know nothing, but Iesus Christ, and him crucified: which is most true, because it is not lawfull to passe beyonde the simplicity of the Gospell. And hereunto tendeth the dignity of a Prophetes office in Christ, that we might know that in the summe of the doctrine, which he hath taught, are contained all pointes of perfect wisdom.

3 Now come I to his kingdome, of which were vayne to speake, if

if the readers were not first warned, that the nature thereof is spirituall. For thereby is gathered, both to what purpose it serueth, and what it auaieth vs, and the whole force and eternitie therof, and also the eternitie which in Daniel the Angell doth attribute to the person of Christ: and againe the Angell in Luke doth worthily applie to the saluation of the people. But that is also double or of two sortes, for the one belongeth to the whole bodie of the Church, the other is propre to euery membre. To the first is to be referred that which is said in the Psalme: I haue ones sworne by my holinesse to Dauid, Psa. 89 I will not lie, his seede shall abide for euer, his seate shall be as the 36.
 Sunne in my sight, it shall be stablished as the Moone for euer, and a faithfull witnessse in heauen. Neither is it doubtfull, but that God doth there promise, that he wil be by the hande of his sonne an eternall gouerner and defender of his Church. For the true perfourmance of this prophecie can be founde no where els but in Christ: for asmuch as immediatly after the death of Salomon, the greater parte of the dignitie of the kingdome fell away, and was to the dishonour of the house of Dauid conueyed ouer to a priuate man, and afterwarde by litle and litle was diminished, till at length it came to vtter decaie with heauy and shamefull destruction. And the same meaning hath that exclamation of Esaie: Who shall shewe forth his Esa. 53 generation? For he so pronounceth that Christ shall remaine aliue 8. after death, that he ioyneth him with his membres. Therefore, so oft as we heare that Christ is armed with eternall power, let vs remembre that the euerlasting continuance of the Church is vpholden by this support, to remaine still safe amög the troublesome tossinges, wherewith it is continually vexed, and among the greuous and terrible motions that threaten innumerable destructions. So when Dauid scorneth the boldnesse of his enemies, that go about to breake Psal. 2 the yoke of God and of Christ, and saith, that the kinges and peoples 3-4. raged in vaine, bycause he that dwelleth in heauen is strong enough to breake their violent assaultes: he assureth the Godly of the continuall preseruatiõ of the Church, and encourageth them to hope well so oft as it happeneth to be oppressed. So in an other place, when he Psal. 110 saith in the person of God: sit on my right hande, till I make thine enemies thy foote stoole: he warneth vs, that how many and strong enemies so euer do conspire to besiege the Church, yet they haue not stréghth enough to preuaile against that vnchangeable decree of God, whereby he hath apointed his sonne an eternall kinge: wherevpon it followeth, that it is impossible that the Deuell with all the preparation of the worlde, may be able at any time to destroy the Church,

Cap. 15. Of the knowledge of which is grounded vpon the eternall seate of Christ. Now for so much as concerneth the speciall vse of euery one, the very same eternall continuance ought to raise vs vp to hope of immortality. For we see, that whatsoeuer is earthly and of the worlde, endureth but for a time, yea oh. 18. and is very fraile. Therefore Christ, to lift vp our hope vnto heaven, 6. pronounceth that his kingdome is not of this worlde. Finally, when any of vs heareth, that the kingdome of Christ is spirituall, let him be raised vp with this saying, and let him pearce to the hope of a better life: and whereas he is nowe defended by the hande of Christ, let him looke for the full frute of this grace in the worlde to come.

4 That, as we haue saide, the force and profite of the kingdome of Christ can not otherwise be perceiued by vs, but when we knowe it to be spirituall, appeareth sufficiently though it were but by this, that while we must liue in warfare vnder the crosse, during the whole course of our life, our estate is harde and miserable: what then should it profit vs to be gathered together vnder the dominion of a heauenly king, vnlesse we were certaine to enioy the frute thereof out of the state of this earthly life? And therefore it is to be knowen, that whatsoeuer felicitie is promised vs in Christ, it consisteth not in outward commodities, that we shoulde leade a merry and quiet life, flourish in wealth, be assured from all harmes, and flowe full of those delitefull things that the flesh is wont to desire, but that it wholly belongeth to the heauenly life. But as in the worlde the prosperous and desired state of the people is partely mainteined by plentie of good things and peace at home, and partly by strong forceable defenses, whereby it may be safe against outward violence: so Christ also doth enriche his with all things necessarie to eternall saluation of soules, and fortifieth them with strength, by which they may stande inuincible against all assaultes of spirituall enemies. Whereby we gather, that he reigneth more for vs than for himselfe, and that both within & without: that being furnished, so farre as God knoweth to be expediēt for vs, with the gistes of the spirite, whereof we are naturally empty, we may by these first frutes perceiue that we are truely ioyned to God vnto perfect blessednesse. And then, that bearing vs bolde vpon the power of the same spirit, we may not doubt that we shall alway haue the victorie against the Deuill, the worlde, and euery kinde of hurtefull thing. To this purpose tēdeth the aunswere of Christ to the Pharises, that because the kingdome of God is within vs, it shal not come with obseruation. For it is likely that because he professed that he was the same king, vnder whome the soueraigne blessing of God was to be hoped for, they in scorne required him to shew forth his signes.

But he, bycause they (who otherwise are to much bent to the earth) should not foolishly rest vpon worldly pompes, biddeth the to enter into their owne consciéces, bycause the kingdome of God is righteousnesse, peace and ioy in the holy Ghost. Hereby we are briefly taught, what the kingdome of Christ auaieth vs. For, bycause it is not earthly or fleshly, subiect to corruption, but spirituall: he liueth vs vpon euen to eternall life, that we may patiently passe ouer this life in miseries, hunger, colde, contempt, reproches, and other greues, contented with this one thing, that our king will neuer leaue vs destitute, but succour vs in our necessities, till hauing ended our warre, we be called to triumph. For such is his maner of reigning, to communicate with vs all that he hath receiued of his father. Nowe whereas he armeth and furnisheth vs with power, and garnisheth vs with beautie and magnificence, enricheth vs with wealth: hereby is ministred vnto vs most plentiful matter to glorie vpon, and also bolde courage to fight without feare against the Deuill, sinne and death. Finally, that clothed with his righteousnesse, we may valiantly ouercome all the reproches of the worlde, and as he liberally filleth vs with his giftes, so we againe for our parte, may bring forth frute to his glorie.

5 Therefore his kingly anointing is set forth vnto vs, not done with oyle or ointmētes made with spices, but he is called the anointed of God, because vpon him hath rested the spirit of wisdom, vnderstanding, counsell, strength and feare of God. This is the oyle of gladnesse, wherewith the Psalme reporteth that he was annointed aboue his fellowes, because if there were not such excellencie in him, we should be all needy and hungry. For, as it is already said, he is not priuately enriched for him selfe, but to poure his plenty vpon vs being hungry and drie. For as it is said, that the father gaue the spirit to his sonne, not by measure, so there is expressed a reason why, that all we should receiue of his fulnesse, and grace for grace. Out of which fountaine floweth that liberall geuing, whereof Paule maketh mention, whereby grace is diuersly distributed to the faithfull, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Hereby is that which I said, sufficiently confirmed, that the kingdome of Christ consisteth in the spirit, not in earthly delites or pompes, and therefore we must forsake the worlde that we may be partakers of it. A visible signe of this holy anointing was shewed in the baptism of Christ, when the holy Ghost rested vpon him in the likenesse of a doue. That the holy Ghost and his giftes are meante by the worde Anointing, ought to seeme neither noueltie nor absurditie. For we are none other way quickened, specially for so much as concerneth the heauenly life: there is no droppe of liuely force in vs, but that which the holy Ghost poureth into vs, which hath chosen his seate in Christ, that from thence the heavenly richesse might largely flowe out vnto vs, whereof we are so needy. And whereas both the faithfull stande inuincible by the strength of their king, and also his spirituall richesse plenteously flowe out vnto them, they are not vnworthily called Christians. But this eternitie whereof we haue spoken, is nothing derogate by that saying of Paule: Then he shall yelde vp the kingdome to God and the Father. Againe: The sonne him selfe shall be made subiecte, that God may be all in all thinges: for his meaning is nothing els, but that in that same perfect glorie, the administration of the kingedome shall not be such as it is now. For the father hath geuen all power to the sonne, that by the sonnes hande he may gouerne, cherish and susteine vs, defende vs vnder his sauegarde, and helpe vs. So while for a litle time we are wauering abroad from God, Christ is the meane betweene God and vs, by litle and litle to bring vs to perfect conioyning with God. And truely, whereas he sitteth on the right hande of the father, that is as much in effect, as if he were called the fathers depute, vnder whome is the whole power of his dominion, bycause it is Gods will to rule and defende his Church by a meane (as I may so call it) in the person of his Sonne. As also Paule doth expounde it in the first chapter to the Ephesians, that he was set at the right hande of the father, to be the heade of the Church, which is his body. And to no other meaning tendeth that which he teacheth in an other place, that

Phi. 2 9 there is geuen him a name aboue all names, that in the name of Iesus all knees should bow, and all tongues confesse that it is to the glorie of God the Father. For euen in the same wordes also he setteth out in the kingdome of Christ an ordre necessarie for our presente weakenesse. So Paule gathereth rightly, that God shall then be by him selfe the onely head of the Church, bycause Christes office in defending of the Church, shall be fulfilled. For the same reason the Scripture commonly calleth him Lorde, bycause his Father did set him ouer vs to this ende, to exercise his owne Lordely power by him. For though there be many lordeshippes in the worlde, yet is there to vs but one God the father, of whome are all thinges and we in him, and one Lord Christ, by whome are all thinges and we by him, saith Paule. Wherevpon is rightly gathered that he is the selfe same God, which by the mouth of Esaie affirmed him selfe to be the kinge and the lawemaker of the Church. For though he do every where call all the power that he hath, the benefit and gifte of the Father, yet he meaneth nothing els, but that he reigneth by power of

God:

God: bycause he hath therefore put on y^e personage of the Mediator, that descendinge from the bosome & incomprehensible glory of the father, he might approach nie vnto vs. And so much more rightfull it is, that we be with all consent prepared to obey, and that with great cherefulnesse we direct our obediences to his commaundement. For as he ioyneth the offices of king and pastor toward them that willingly yeelde themselues obedient: so on the other side we heare that he beareth an yron scepter, to breake and broose all the obstinate like potters vessels: we heare also that he shalbe the iudge of nations, to couer the earth with deade corpses, and to ouerthrowe the heighth that standeth against him. Of which thing there are some examples seene at this day: but the full proufe thereof shalbe at the last iudgement, which may also properly be accompted the last act of his kingdome.

6 Concerning his Priesthood, thus it is briefly to be holden, that the ende and vse of it is, that he shoulde be a Mediator pure from all spotte, that shoulde by his holinesse reconcile vs to God. But bycause the iuste curse possesseth the entrie, and God according to his office of iudge is bente against ys, it is necessarie that some expiation be vsed, that he being a priest may procure fauour for vs, to appease the wrath of God. Wherefore, that Christ might fulfill this office, it behoued that he shoulde come forth with a sacrifice. For in the lawe it was not lawfull for the priest to entre into the sanctuarie without bloud, that the faithfull might know, that though there were a priest become meane for vs to make intercession, yet God coulde not be made fauourable to vs before that our sinnes were purged. Vpō which point the Apostle discourseth largely in the epistle to the Hebrues, from the seuenth chapter almost to the ende of the tenth: But the summe of all commeth to this effect, that the honour of priesthoode can be applied to none but to Christ, which by the sacrifice of his death hath wiped away our giltinesse, & satisfied for our sinnes. But how weighty a matter it is, we are enfourmed by that solemne orthe of God, which was spoken without repentance: Thou art a priest for euer, according to the ordre of Melchisedech. For without doubt his will was to establish that principall pointe, which he knewe to be the chiefe iointe wherevpon our saluation hanged. For, as it is said, there is no way open for vs or for our prayers to God, vnlesse our filthinesse being purged, the priestes do sanctifie vs and obtaine grace for vs, from which the vncleannesse of our wicked doinges and sinnes doth debarre vs. So do we see, that we must beginne at the death of Christ, that the efficacie and profite of his Priesthoode may come vnto vs.

Cap. 16. Of the knowledg of

Of this it followeth that he is an eternall intercessor, by whose mediation we obtaine fauour, wherupon againe ariseth not only affiance to pray, but also quietnesse to godly consciences, while they safely leane vpon the fatherly tenderesse of God; and are certainly perswaded that it pleaseth him whatsoever is dedicated to him by the Mediator. But whereas in the time of the lawe; God commaunded sacrifices of beastes to be offered to him: there was an other and a new ordre in Christ, that one should be both the sacrificed host, & y Priest: because there neither could be found any other meete satisfactiō for sinnes, nor any was worthy so great honour to offer vp to God his onely begotten sonne. Now Christ beareth the person of a priest, not onely by eternall meane of reconciliation to make the Father fauourable & mercifull vnto vs, but also to bring vs into the felowship of so great an honour. For we that are defiled in our selues, yet being made Priestes in him do offer vp our selues, & all ours to God, & do freely enter into y heauely sanctuarie, that al the sacrifice of prayer & praise that come from vs, may be acceptable & sweete smelling in the sight of God. And thus farre doth that saying of Christ extende: For their Reue. 1. 6. sakes I sanctifie my selfe: because, having his holinesse poured vpon vs, in as much as he hath offered vs with himselfe to his father, we that otherwise do stinke before him, do please him as pure & cleane, yea and holy. Herevnto serueth the anointing of the sanctuarie; whereof mention is made in Daniell. For the comparison of contrarietie is to be noted betweene this anointing, and that shadowish anointing that then was in vse: as if the Angell should haue said, that the shadowes being driuen away, there should be a cleere priesthood in the person of Christ. And so much more detestable is their inuention, which not contented with the sacrifice of Christ, haue presumed to thrust in them selues to kill him: which is daily enterprised among the Papistes, where the Masse is reckened a sacrificing of Christ.

The xvj. Chapter.

How Christ hath fulfilled the office of Redeemer, to purchase saluation for vs, VVherein is intreated of his Death, and Resurrection, and his Ascending into Heauen.

AL that we haue hetherto saide of Christ, is to be directed to this marke, that being damned, dead, and lost in our selues, we may seeke for righteousnesse, deliuerance, life and saluation in him: as we be taught by that notable saying of Peter, that there is none other name vnder heauen geuen to men wherein they must be saued. Neither was the name of Iesus geuen him vn-

aduisedly, or at chaũsable aduẽture, or by the will of men, but brought from heauen by the Angell the publishe of Gods decree, and with a reason also assigned: because he was sent to saue the people from their sinnes. In which wordes that is to be noted, which we haue touched in an other place, that the office of redeemer was appointed him, that he shoulde be our Saviour: but in the meane time our redemption should be but vnperfect, vnlesse he shoulde by continuall proceedinges conuey vs forward to the vttermoſt marke of saluation. Therefore, so sone as we swarue neuer so litle from him, our saluation by litle and litle vanisheth away, which wholly resteth in him: so that all they wilfully spoile them selues of all grace, that reste not in him. And that admonition of Bernarde is worthy to be rehearsed, that the name of Iesus is not only light, but also meate, yea and oile also, without which all the meate of the soule is drie, and that it is also salte without the seasoning whereof all that is set before vs is vsfauorie. Finally, that it is hony in the mouth, melodie in the eare, and ioyfulnesse in the hearte, and also medicine, and that whatsoever is spoken in disputation is vsfauory, but where this name soundeth. But here it behoueth to weye diligently, how saluation is purchased by him for vs: that we may not onely be perswaded that he is the author of it, but also embracing such things as are sufficient to the stedfast vpholdinge of our faith, we may refuse all such thinges as might drawe vs away hether or thether. For sith no man can descende into him selfe, and earnestly consider what he is, but feeling God angry and bent against him, he hath neede carefully to seeke a meane and way to appease him, which demaundeth satisfaction: there is no common assurednesse required, because the wrath and curse of God lieth alwaie vpon sinners, til they be loose from their guiltinesse: who, as he is a righteous iudge. suffereth not his lawe to be broken without punishment, but is ready armed to reuenge it.

2 But before we goe any further, it is to be seene by the way, how it agreeth together, that God which preuented vs with his mercie, was our enemye vntil he was reconciled to vs by Christ. For how, could he haue geuen vs in his only begotten Sonne a singular pledge of his loue, vnlesse he had already before that embraced vs with his free fauour? Bycause therefore here ariseth some seeming of contrarietie, I will first vndo this knot. The holy Ghost commonly speaketh after this maner in the Scriptures, that God was enemye to men, till they were restored into fauour by the death of Christ: that they were accursed till their iniquitie was purged by his sacrifice: that they were seuered from God, till they were receyued into a conioyning by his body. Such maner of phrases are applied to our capacitie, that we may the better vnderstand how miserable and wretched our estate is being out of Christ. For if it were not spoken in expresse wordes, that the wrath and vengeance of God, and euerlasting death did rest vpon vs, we woulde lesse acknowledge how miserable we shoulde be without Gods mercie, and woulde lesse regarde the benefit of deliuerance. As for example. If a man heare this spoken to him: If God, at such time as thou wast yet a sinner, had hated thee, and cast thee away as thou hadst deserued, thou shouldest haue suffered horrible destruction: but because he hath willingly and of his owne free kindenesse kept thee in fauour, & not suffred thee to be estrāged frō him, he hath so deliuered thee from that perill: truely he will be moued with, and in some parte feele how much he oweth to the mercie of God. But if he heare on the other side that which the Scripture teacheth, that he was by sinne estraunged from God, the heit of wrath, subiect to the curse of eternall death; excluded from all hope of saluation, a stranger from all blessing of God, the bondslaue of Satan, captiue vnder the yoke of sinne. Finally, ordeined vnto and already entangled with horrible destruction, that in this case Christ became an intercessor to entreat for him, that Christ toke vpon him and suffered the punishment which by the iust iudgement of God did hang ouer all sinners, that he hath purged with his bloude those euils that made them hatefull to God, that by this expiation is sufficient satisfaction and sacrifice made to God the father: that by this intercessor his wrath was appeased: that within this foundation resteth the peace betwene God and men: that vpon this bonde is contened his good will towarde them: shall not he be so much the more moued with these, as it is more liuely represented, out of how great miserie he hath bene deliuered? In a summe: because our minde can neither desirously enough take holde of life in the mercy of God, nor receiue it with such thākefulness as we ought, but when it is before striken and throwne downe with the feare of the wrath of God and dreade of eternall death, we are so taught by holy Scripture, that without Christ we may see God in maner wrathfully bent against vs, and his hande armed to our destruction: and that we may embrace his goodwill and fatherly kindnesse no otherwhere, but in Christ.

3 And although this be spoken according to the weakenesse of our capacitie, yet is it not falsely saide. For God which is the highest righteousnesse, can not loue wickednesse which he seeth in vs all. Therefore we all haue in vs that, which is worthy of the hatred of God. Therefore in respect of our corrupted nature, and then of euill life life added vnto it, truly we are all in displeasure of God, guilty in his sight, and borne to damnation of hell. But because the Lord will not lose that which is his in vs, he findeth yet somewhat that he of his goodnesse may loue. For howsoever we be sinners by our owne fault, yet we remaine his creatures. Howsoever we haue purchaced death to our selues, yet he made vs vnto life. So is he moued by meere and free louing of vs, to receiue vs into fauour. But sith there is a perpetuall and vnappeasable disagreement betweene righteousnesse and iniquitie, so long as we remaine sinners, he cannot receiue vs wholly. Therefore, that taking away all matter of disagreement, he might wholly reconcile vs vnto him, he doth by expiation set forth in the death of Christ, take away whatsoeuer euill is in vs, that we, which before weare vnclane and vnpure, may now appeare righteous and holy in his sight. Therefore God the Father doth with his loue preuent and go before our reconciliation in Christ: yea, bycause he first loued vs, therefore he afterwarde doth reconcile vs vnto himselfe. But bycause, vntill Christ with his death come to succour vs, there remaineth wickednesse in vs, which deserueth Gods indignation, and is accursed and damned in his sight, therefore we are not fully and firmly ioyned to God, vntill Christ do ioyne vs. Therefore if we will assure our selues to haue God made well pleased and fauourable vnto vs, we must fasten our eyes and mindes vpon Christ onely: as in deede we obtaine by him onely, that our sinnes be not imputed to vs, the imputing whereof, draweth with it the wrath of God.

4 And for this reason Paule saith, that the same loue, wherewith God embraced vs before the creation of the worlde, was stayed and grounded vpon Christ. These thinges are plaine and agreable with the Scripture, and do make those places of Scripture to accorde very well together, where it is saide: that God declared his loue toward vs in this, that he gaue his onely begotten sonne to death: and yet that he was our enemy till he was made fauourable againe to vs by the death of Christ. But that they may be more strongly proued to them that require the testament of the olde Church, I will allege one place of Augustine, where he teacheth the very same that we do. The loue of God (saith he) is incomprehensible and vnchangeable. For he beganne not to loue vs, since the time that we weare reconciled to him by the bloude of his sonne. But before the making of the worlde he loued vs, even before that we weare any thing at all, that we might also be his children with his only begotten Sonne. Therefore wheras we are reconciled by the death of Christ, it is not so to be taken as though the Sonne did therefore reconcile vs vnto him, that he might nowe beginne to loue vs whome he hated before : but we are reconciled to him that already loued vs, to whome we were enemies by reason of sinne. And whether this be true or no that I say, let the Apostle beare witness. He doth commend (saith he) his loue towarde vs, because when we were yet sinners, Christ died for vs. He therefore had a loue to vs, euen thē when we were enemies to him & wrought wickednesse. Therefore after a maruellous and diuine maner he loued vs, euen then when he hated vs. For he hated vs in that we were such as he had not made vs, and because our wickednesse had on euery side wasted away his worke, he knew how in euery one of vs, both to hate that which we our selues had made, and to loue that which he had made. These be the wordes of Augustine.

5 Nowe where it is demaunded, howe Christ hath done away our sinnes, and taken away the strife betwene vs and God, and purchased such righteousnes as might make him fauourable and wel willing towarde vs: it may be generally answered, that he hath brought it to passe by the whole course of his obedience. Which is proued by y^e testimony of Paul. As by one mans offense many were made sinners, so by one mā's obediēce we are made righteous. And in an other place he extendeth the cause of the pardō that deliuereth vs from the curse of the lawe, to the whole life of Christ, saying: When the fulnesse of time was come, God sente his sonne made of a woman, subiect to the lawe, to redeeme them that were vnder the lawe: And so affirmed that in his very baptisme was fulfilled one parte of righteousnes, that he obediently did the commaundement of his father. Finally, from the time that he toke vpon him the person of a seruaunt, he beganne to paye the raunsome to redeeme vs. But the Scripture to set out the maner of our saluation more certainly, doth ascribe this as peculiar and proprely belonging to the death of Christ. He him selfe pronounced that he gaue his life to be a redemption for many. Paule teacheth that he died for our sinnes. Iohn the Baptist cried out that Christ came to take away the sinnes of the worlde, bycause he was the Lambe of God. In an other place Paule saith, that we are iustified freely by the redemption that is in Christ, bycause he is set forth the reconciler in his owne bloude. Againe, that we are iustified in his bloude, and reconciled by his death. Againe. He that knewe not sinne, was made sinne for vs, that we might be thē righteousnesse of God in him. I will not recite all the testimonies, because the numbere woulde be infinite, and many of them must be hereafter alleged in their order. Therefore in the summe of beleefe, which they call the Apostles creede, it is very ordrely passed immediatly from the birth of Christ to his death and resurrection, wherein consisteth the summe of perfect saluation. And yet is not the reste of his obedience excluded, which he perfourmed in his life: as Paule comprehendeth it Phil. 1. wholly from the beginning to the ende in saying, that he abaced himselfe, taking vpon him the forme of a seruant, and was obedient to his father to death, euen the death of the crosse. And truely euen in the same death his willing submissiō hath the first degree, because the sacrifice, vnlesse it had bene willingly offred, had nothing profited towards righteousnesse. Therefore, where the Lorde testified, that he gaue his soule for his sheepe, he expressly addeth this, no man taketh it away from my selfe. According to the which meaning, Esaie saith, that he helde his peace like a lambe before the sherer. And the historie of the Gospell rehearseth, that he went forth and met the souldiers, and before Pilate he left defending of him selfe, and stode still to yelde him selfe to iudgement to be pronounced vpon him. But that not without some strife: for both he had taken our infirmities vpon him, and it behoued that his obedience to his father, shoulde be this way tried. And this was no sclender shew of his incomparable loue towards vs, to wraastle with horrible feare, and in the middest of these cruell tormentes, to cast away all care of himselfe, that he might prouide for vs. And this is to be beleued, that there could no sacrifice be wel offered to God any otherwise, but by this that Christ for saking all his owne affection, did submitte and wholly yelde him selfe to his fathers will. For prooffe whereof, the Apostle doth fitly allege that testimonie of the Psalme: In the booke of the lawe it is written of me, that I may do thy will, O God. I will, and thy lawe is in the middest of my heart. Then I saide: Loe, I come. But because trembling consciences finde no reste but in sacrifice and washing whereby sinnes are cleansed: therefore for good cause we are directed thither, and in the death of Christ is appointed for vs the matter of life. Nowe forasmuch as by our owne guiltinesse, curse was due vnto vs; before the heauenly iudgement seate of God, therefore first of all is recited how he was condemned before Ponce Pilate president of Iurie: that we shoulde know that the punishment whereunto we were subiect, was iustly laide vpon vs. We coule not escape the dreadfull iudgement of God: Christ, to deliuer vs from it, suffred himselfe to be condemned before a mortall man, yea a wicked & heathen man. For the name of the president is expressed not onely to procure credit to the historie, but that we shoulde learne that which Esaie teacheth, that that chastisement of our peace was vpon him, and that by his stripes we were healed. For to take away our damnation, euery kinde of death sufficed not for him to suffer, but to satisfie our redemption, one speciall kinde of death was to be chosen, wherein both drawing away our damnation to him selfe, and taking our guiltinesse vpon himselfe, he might deliuer vs from them both. If he had bene murdered by theues, or had bene ragingly slaine in a commotion of the common people: in such a death there shoulde haue bene no apparance of satisfaction. But when he was brought to be arraigned before the iudgement seate, when he was accused and pressed with witnessses against him, and was by the mouth of the iudge condemned to die: by these tokens we vnderstand, that he did beare the person of a guilty man and of an euill doer. And here are two thinges to be noted, which both were afore spoken by the prophecies of the Prophetes, and do bring a singular comfort and confirmation of faith. For when we heare that Christ was sent from the iudges seate to death, and was hanged among theues, we haue the fulfilling of that prophecie which is alledged by the Euangelist. He was accompted among the wicked.

1. 53. And why so? euen to take vpon him the stede of a sinner, not of a man righteous or innocent, bycause he suffred death not for cause of innocencie, but for sinne. On the other side when we heare that he was acquitted by the same mouth whereby he was condemned, for Pilate was compelled openly more than ones to beare vitnesse of his innocencie: let that come in our minde which is in the other Prophet: that he repayed that which he had not taken away. And so we shall beholde the person of a sinner and euill doer represented in Christ: and by the open apparance of his innocencie it shall become plaine to see, that he was charged rather with others offence than his owne. He suffred therefore vnder Ponce Pilate, and so by the solemne sentence of the President, was reckened in the number of wicked doers: but yet not so, but that he was by the same iudge at the same time pronounced righteous, when he affirmed that he founde no cause of condemnation in him. This is our acquital, that the guiltinesse which made vs subiect to punishment, is remoued vpon the head of the sonne of God. For this setting of the one against the other, we ought principally to holde fast, least we tremble and be carefull all our life long, as though the iuste vengeance of God did hang ouer vs, which the sonne of God hath taken vpon himselfe.

6 By side that, the very maner of his death is not without a singular mysterie. The Crosse was accursed, not onely by opinion of men, but also by decree of the lawe of God. Therefore when Christ was lifted vp to the Crosse, he made himselfe subiect to the curse. And so it behoued to be done, that when the curse was remoued from vs to him, we might be deliuered from all curse that for our finnes was prepared for vs, or rather did already rest vpon vs. Which thing was also by shadowe expressed in the lawe. For the sacrifices and satisfactorie oblations that were offred for finnes, were called Ashemoth: Which worde proprely signifieth sinne it selfe. By which figuratine chaunge of name, the holy Ghost ment to shewe, that they were like vnto cleansing playsters to drawe out to them selues, and beare the curse due to finnes. But that same which was figuratiuely represented in the sacrifices of Moses, is in deede deliuered in Christ the originall paterne of all the figures. Wherefore he, to performe a perfect expiation, gaue his owne soule to be an asham, that is a satisfactorie oblation as the Prophet calleth it, vpon the which our filth and punishment might be cast, and so cesse to be imputed to vs. The Apostle testifieth the same thing more plainly where he teacheth, that he which knewe no sinne, was by his father made sinne for vs, that we might be made the righteousnesse of God in him. For the sonne of God being most cleane from all fault, did yet put vpon him the reproch and shame of our iniquities, and on the other side couered vs with his cleanness. It seemeth that he meante the same, when he speaketh of sinne, that sinne was condemned in his flesh. For the father destroyed the force of sinne, when the curse thereof was remoued and layed vpon the flesh of Christ. It is therefore declared by this saying, that Christ was in his death offred vp to his father for a satisfactorie sacrifice, that the whole satisfaction for sinne being ended by his sacrifice, we might cesse to dread the wrath of God. Nowe is it plaine, what that saying of the Prophet meaneth, that the iniquities of vs all were layed vpon him, that is, that he intending to wipe away the fulthinesse of our iniquities, was himselfe as it were by way of enterchanged imputation, couered with them. Of this, the crosse whereunto he was fastened was a token, as the Apostle testifieth. Christ (saith he) redeemed vs from the curse of the lawe, when he was made a curse for vs. For it is written: Accursed is euery one that hangeth on the tree: that the blessing of Abraham might in Christ come to the Gentiles. And the same had Peter respect vnto, where he teacheth that Christ did beare our finnes vpon the tree. Bycause by the very token of the curse we do more plainely learne that the burden wherewith we were oppressed was layed vpon him. And yet it is not so to be vnderstanded, that he toke vpon him such a curse, wherewith himselfe was ouerloden, but rather that in taking it vpon him, he did treade downe, breake and destroy the whole force of it. And so faith conceiueth acquitall in the condemnation of Christ, and blessing in his being accursed. Wherefore Paule doth not without a cause honorably reporte the triumph that Christ obtained to him selfe on the crosse, as if the crosse which was full of shame; had bene turned into a Chariot of triumph. For he saith, that the hande writing which was against vs, was fastened to the crosse, and the Princely powers were spoyled and led openly. And no maruell: bycause (as the other Apostle testifieth) Christ offered vp himselfe by the eternall spirite. And therevpon proceded that turning of the nature of thinges. But that these thinges may take steadfast roote, and be thoroughly settled in our heartes, lette vs alway thinke vpon his sacrifice and washing. For we coulde not certainly beleue that Christ was the raunsome, redemption, and satisfaction, vnlesse he had bene a sacrificed hoste. And therefore there is so often mention made of bloud, where the Scripture sheweth the maner of our redeming. Albeit the bloude of Christ that was shed, serued not onely for sacrifice, but also in steede of washing, to cleanse away our filthinesse.

7 It followeth in the Crede, that he was dead and buried. Where againe it is to be seene, howe he did euery where put him selfe in our steede, to paie the price of our redemption. Death held vs bounde vnder his yoke, Christ in our steede did yelde him selfe into the power of death, to deliuer vs from it. This the Apostle meaneth where he writeth, that he tasted of death for all men. For he by dying brought to passe that we shoulde not die, or (which is all one) by his death he did redeme life for vs. But in this he differed from vs, that he gaue him selfe to death as it were to be deuoured, not that he shoulde be swallowed vp with the gulfes of it, but rather that he shoulde swallowe vp it, of which we shoulde haue bene presently swallowed: that he gaue himselfe to death to be subdued, not that he shoulde be oppressed with the power thereof, but rather that he shoulde overthrow death which approched nere vs, yea and had already beaten vs downe and triumphed vpon vs. Finally, that by death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the Deuill: and might deliuer them that by feare of death were all their life long subiect to bondage. This is the first fruite that his death did bring vs. An other is, that by enterpartening of him selfe with vs, he mortifieth our earthly membres, that they shoulde no more hereafter vse their owne workes: and killeth our olde manne, that it shoulde no more liue and beare frute. And to the same purpose pertaineth his buriall, that we being partakers thereof, shoulde also be buried to sinne. For when the Apostle teacheth that we are grafted into the likenesse of the death of Christ, and buried with him to the death of sinne, that by his crosse the worlde was crucified to vs, and we to the worlde, that we are dead together with him, he doth not onely exhorte vs to expresse the example of Christes death, but he declareth that there is such effectualnesse in it, as ought to appere in all Christians, vnlesse they will make his death vnprofitable and frutelesse. Therefore in the death and buriall of Christ, there is offred vs a double benefit to be enioyed, that is deliuerance from death, wherevnto we were become bonde, and the mortifying of our flesh.

8 But it is not meete to ouerpasse his going downe to the helles, wherein is no small importaunce to the effect of redemption. For although it appeareth by the writings of the olde fathers, that that parte which is read in the Crede was not in olde time so much vsed in the Churches: yet in entreating of the summe of our doctrine, it is necessarie that it haue a place allowed it, as a thing that containeth a very profitable and not to be despised mystery of a right weighty matter. And there are also some of the olde writers that do not leaue it out. Whereby we may gesse, that it was after a certaine time added, and did not presently but by litle and litle growe in vse in the Churches. But this certainly is out of question, that it proceded of the common iudgement of all the godly: For as much as there is none of the Fathers that doth not in his writings make mention of Christes going downe to the helles, although after diuerse maner of exposition. But by whome, or at what time it was first added, maketh litle to the purpose. But rather in the Creede this is to be taken heede vnto, that we therein certainly haue a full and in all pointes perfect summe of our faith, whereinto nothing may be thrust, but that which is taken out of the most pure worde of God. Nowe if any will not for precise curiositie admit it into the Crede, yet shall it streight way be made to appere plainely, that it is of so great importance to the summe of our redemption, that if it be lefte out, there is lost a great parte of the frute of the death of Christ. There are againe some that thinke, that there is no newe thing spoken in this article, but that in other wordes the same thing is repeted which was spoken before of his buriall; for asmuch as the worde Infernum, hell, is in the Scripture oftentimes vsed for the graue. I graunt that to be true which they allege of the signification of the worde, that Hell is oftentimes taken for the graue; but there are against their opinion two reasons, by which I am easily persuaded to dissent from them, For what an idlenesse were it, when carelessly and as it were, in sporte to come foorth to suffer death? But this was a true proufe of his infinite mercy, not to shun y death which he so sore trembled at. And it is no dout that the same is the 1e. 5. 7. Apostles meaning to teach, in the Epistle to the Hebrues, where he wryteth: that Christ was heard of his owne Feare; some translate it: Reuerence or piety, but how vnfitly, both the matter it selfe, and the very manner of speakinge proueth. Christ therefore prayinge with reares and mighty crie, is hearde of his owne feare: not to be free from death, but not to be swallowed vp of death as a sinner: because in that place he had but our person vpon him. And truly there can be imagined no more dreadfull bottomlesse depth, than for a man to fele himselfe forsaken and estraunged from God, and not to be heard when he calleth vpon him, euen as if God himselfe had conspired to his destruction. Euen thither we see that Christ was throwen downe, so farre that by enforcemēt of distresse he was compelled to crie out: psal. 22. My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? For whereas some would haue it taken, that he so spake rather according to the opiniō of other, thā as he felt in himselfe: y is in no case probable, forasmuch as it is eident, that this sayinge proceeded out of the very anguish of the bottome of his heart. Yet do we not meane thereby, that God was at any time his enemy or angry with him. For how could he be angry with his beloued sonne, vpon whom his minde rested? Or how could

 6. Christ by his intercessiō appease his fathers wrath toward other, hauinge him hatefully bent agaynst himselfe? But this is our meaning: that he suffered the greuousnesse of Gods rigour, for that he beinge stricken and tormented with the hande of God, did fele all the tokens of God when he is angry and punisheth. Wherupon Hylary argueth thus, that by this goinge downe we haue obtained this, that death is slayne. And in other places he agreeth with our iudgement, as where he sayth. The crosse, death, and hels are our life. Againe in an other place. The sonne of God is in the hels, but man is caried vp to heauen. But why do I alleage the testimony of a priuate man, when the Apostle affirmeth the same, rehearsing this for a frute of his victory, that they were deliuered which were by feare of death all their life long subiect to bondage? It behoued therefore, that he shall overcome that feare, that naturally doth continually torment and oppresse all mortall men: which coulde not be done but by fightinge with it. Moreouer, that his feare was no common feare or conceiued vpon a slender cause, shall by and by more plainly appeare. So by fightinge hande to hande with the power of the Deuill, with the horreur of death, with the paynes of the hels it came to passe, that he both had the victory of them, and triumphed ouer them, that we now in death shoulde no more feare those thinges, which our Prince hath swallowed vp.

12 Here some leud men, although vnlearned, yet rather moued by malice than by ignoraunce, crie out that I do a hainous wronge to Christ, because it was against conueniency of reason, that he shoulde be fearefull for the saluation of his soule. And then they more hardly enforce this cauillation with sayinge, that I ascribe to the sonne of God desperation, which is cōtrary to faith. First they do but maliciously moue controuersie of Christs feare and tremblinge, which the Euangelistes do so plainely reporte. For a litle before that the time of his death approached, he was troubled in spirite and passioneth with heauinesse, and at his very meeting with it, he began more vehemētly to tremble for feare. If they say that he did but counterfeit, that is too foule a shift. We must therefore as Ambrose truly teacheth, boldly confesse the sorowfulnesse of Christ, vnlesse we be ashamed of his crosse. And truely if his soule had not bin partaker of payne, he had bin only a redeemer for bodies. But it behoued that he should wrastle, to raise vp them that lay throwen downe. And his heauenly glory is so nothinge appaired thereby, that euen herein gloriously shineth his goodnesse which is neuer sufficiently praysed, that he refused not to take our weakenesses vpon him. From whence is also that comforte of our anguishes and sorrowes, which the Apostle setteth before vs: that this Mediatour did feele our infirmities, that he might be the more earnestly bent to succour vs in misery. They say: He. 4. 15 that that thinge which is euill of it selfe, is vnworthily ascribed to Christ. As though they were wiser than the spirite of God, which ioyneth these two thinges together, that Christ was in all thinges tempted as we are, and yet that he was without sinne. Therefore there is no cause that the weakenes of Christ should make vs afrayd, whereunto he was not by violence or necessitye compelled, but by meere loue of vs and by mercy was led to submit himselfe. And what soeuer he of his owne will suffered for vs, diminisheth nothinge of his power. But in this one poynte are these backbiters deceiued, that they do not perceiue in Christ an infirmity cleane and free from all fault and spot, because he kept himselfe within the boundes of obedience. For wheras there can be found no moderation in our corrupt nature, where all our affectiōs do with troublesome violence exceede all measure, they do wrong to measure y^e forme of God by that standard. But when man was in his vncorrupted state, then there was a moderation hauinge force in all his affectiōs, to restrayne excesse.

Whereby, it might well be that he was like vnto vs in sorrow, dread, and fearefulnes, and yet that by this marke he differed from vs. Being so confuted, they leape to an other cauillation, that though Christ feared death, yet he feared not the curse and wrath of God frō which he knew himselfe to be safe. But let the godly readers weye how honorable this is for Christ, that he was more tender and more fearefull than the most part of the very rascall sort of men. Theues and other euill doers do obstinately hast to death, many do with haute courage despise it: some other do mildly suffer it. But what constancy or stout courage were it, for the sonne of God to be astonished and in a maner striken dead with feare of it? For euen that w̄ among the cōmon sorte might be accompted miraculous, is reported of him, that for vehemency of griefe, very droppes of bloud did fall from his face. Neither did he this to make a shew to the eyes of other, but whē in a secret corner whither he was gone out of company, he groned vnto his father. And this putteth it out of all dout, that it was nedefull that he should haue Angels to come downe from heauen to relieue him with an vnwonted maner of comforting. How shamefull a tendernes, as I sayd, should this haue bin, to be so farre tormented for feare of common death, as to melt in bloody sweate, and not to be able to be comforted but by sight of Angels? What? doth not that praier thrise repeated, (Father, if it be possible, let this cuppe depart from me) proceeding from an incredible bitternesse of heart, shew that Christ had a more cruell and harder battell than with common death? Whereby appeareth that those triflers against whom I now dispute, do boldly babble vpon things that they know not, because they neuer earnestly considered what it is, or of how great importance it is that we be redeemed from the iudgement of God. But this is our wisdom, well to vnderstande howe deere our saluation did cost the sonne of God. Now if a man should aske me, if Christ went then downe to hel, whē he prayed to escape that death: I answere, that thē was the beginning of it: whereby may be gathered, how grieuous and terrible tormentes he suffered, when he knew himselfe to stande to be arained for our cause before the iudgement seate of God. But although for a moment of time, the diuine power of the spirite did hide it selfe, to giue place to the weakenesse of the flesh: yet must we know, that the tentation by feeling of sorrow and feare was such as was not against faith. And so was that fulfilled which is in the Sermon of Peter, that he could not be holden of the sorrowes of death, because whē he felt himselfe as it were forsaken of God, yet he did nothing at all swarue from the trust of his goodnesse. Which is proued by that his notable callinge upon God, when for extremity of peine he cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? For though he was aboue measure greued, yet he cesseth not to cal him his God, of whom he crieth out that he was forsaken. Moreover hereby is confuted as well the error of Apollinaris, as theirs that were called Monothelites. Apollinaris fained that Christ had an eternall spirite in steade of a soule, so that he was onely but halfe a man. As though he could cleanse our sinnes any other way, but by obeying his father. But where is the affection or will of obedience but in the soule? which soule of his we knowe was troubled for this purpose to driue away feare, and bringe peace and quietnesse to our soule. Againe, for confusion of the Monothelites, we see how now he willed not that thing according to his nature of manhoode, which he willed according to his nature of godhead. I omit to speake how he did subdue the aforesaid feare with a contrary affection. For herein is a plaine shew of contrariety. Father deliuer me from this hour. But euen herefore I came euen into this hour. Father glorifie thy name. In which perplexity yet was there no such outrage in him as is seene in vs, euen then when we most of all endeouour to subdue our selues.

13 Now followeth his resurrection from the dead, without which all that we haue hitherto, were but vnperfect. For sith there appeareth in the crosse, death, & buriall of Christ nothing but weakenesse: faith must passe beyond all those things, that it may be furnished with full strength. Therefore although we haue in his death a full accomplishment of saluation, because by it both we are reconciled to God, and his iust iudgement is satisfied, & the curse taken away, and the penalty fully payed: yet we are sayd to be regenerate into a liuinge hope, not by his death, but by his risinge againe. For as he in risinge againe rose vp the vanquisher of death, so the victory of our faith consisteth in the very resurrection: but how this is, is better expressed in y^e words of Paule. For he sayth, that Christ died for our sinnes, and was raised vp againe for our iustification: as if he should haue sayd: that by his death sinne was taken away, and by his rising againe righteousnes was renewed and restored. For how coulde he by dyinge deliuer vs from death if he himselfe hadde lyen still ouercome by death? How coulde he haue gotten victory for vs, if himselfe hadde bin vanquished in fight? wherefore we do so parte the matter of our saluation betwene the death and resurrection of Christ, that by his death we say sinne was taken away and death destroyed, and by his resurrection righteousnesse was repaired, and life raised vp againe: but so that by meane of his resurrection, his death doth shew foorth her force and effect unto vs. Therefore Paule affirmeth, that in his very resurrection he was declared the sonne of God; because then at last he vttered his heauenly power, which is both a cleare glasse of his godheade, and a stedfast stay of our faith. As also in an other place he teacheth, that Christ suffered after the weakenesse of the flesh, & rose againe by the power of the spirit. And in y^e same meaning, in an other place, where he entreateth of perfection, he sayth: that I may know him and the power of his resurrection. Yet by and by after he adioyneth the fellowship with death. Wherewith most aptly agreeth that saying of Peter: that God raised him vp from the deade and gaue him glory, that our faith and hope might be in God: not that our faith being vpholden by his death should wauer, but that the power of God which kepeth vs vnder faith, doth principally shew it selfe in the resurrection. Therefore let vs remember, that so oft as mention is made of his death onely, there is also comprehended that which properly belongeth to his resurrection: and like figure of comprehension is there in the word Resurrection, as oft as it is vsed seuerally without speaking of his death, so that it draweth with it that which peculiarly pertayneth to his death. But forasmuch as by rising againe he obtained the crowne of conquest; so that there should be both resurrection and life: therefore Paule doth for good cause affirme that faith is destroyed, and the Gospell is become vaine & deceitful, if the resurrection of Christ be not fastened in our heartes. Therefore in an other place, after he had gloried in the death of Christ agaynst all the terrours of damnation, to amplifie the same, he sayth further: Yea the same He which dyed, is risen vp againe and nowe standeth a Mediatour for vs in the presence of God. Furthermore as we haue before declared, that vpon the partakinge of his crosse hangeth the mortification of our flesh. so is it to be vnderstanded, that by his resurrection we obtaine an other commodity which aunswereth that mortification. For (sayth the Apostle) we are therefore grafted into the likenesse of his death, that being partakers of his resurrection, we may walke in newnesse of life. Therefore in an other place: as he gathereth an argument of this that we are dead together with Christ, to proue that we ought to mortifie our members vpon earth: likewise also, because we are risen vp with Christ, he gathereth therupon that we ought to seeke for those things that are aboue, and not those that are vpon the earth. By which wordes we are not onely exhorted to be raised vp after the example of Christ, to folow a newnesse of life. But we are taught that it is wrought by his power that we are regenerate into righteousness. We obtaine also a third frute of his resurrection, that we are, as by an earnest earnest deliuered vs, assured of our owne resurrection, of which we knowe that his resurrection is a most certaine argument. Whereof he disputeth more at large in the fiftene chapter of his first Epistle to the Corinthians. But by the way this is to be noted, that it is sayd, that he rose againe from the dead: in which sayinge is expressed the trueth both of his death and of his resurrection: as if it had bin sayd, that he did both dye the same death that other menne naturally do die, and receiued immortality in the same flesh which he had put on mortall.

14 To his resurrection is not vnfitly adioyned his ascending into heauen. For although Christ beganne more fully to set forth his glorie and power by risinge againe, for that he had now layd away that base and vnnoble estate of mortal life, and the shame of the crosse: yet by his ascendinge vp into heauen onely, he truely beganne his kingdome. Which the Apostle sheweth where he teacheth, that Christ ascended to fulfill all thinges. Where in seeming of repugnācy he sheweth that there is a goodly agreement: because he so departed frō vs, that yet his presence might be more profitable to vs, which had bin penned in a base lodginge of y flesh, while he was conuersant in earth. And therefore Iohn, after that he had rehearsed that notable calling, Eph. 4. 10. If any thirst, let him come to me, &c. By and by sayth, that the holy Ioh. 7. 37. Ghost was not yet giuen to the faithfull, because Iesus was not yet glorified. Which the Lord himself also did testifie to the Disciples, say- Ioh. 16. 7. inge: It is expedient for you that I go away. For if I do not go away, the holy Ghost shall not come. But he giueth them a comfort for his corporall absence, that he will not leaue them as parentlesse, but will come againe to them after a certaine manner, in deede inuisible, but yet more to be desired, because they were thē taught by more assured experience, that the authoritie which he enioyeth, and the power which he vseth, is sufficient for the faithfull, not onely to make them liue blessedly, but also to die happily. And truely we see howe much greater abundance of his spirite he then poured out, howe much more royally he then aduanced his kingdome, howe much greater power he then shewed, both in helpinge his, and in ouerthrowinge his enemies. Being therefore taken vp into heauen, he toke away the presence of his body out of our sight: not to cesse to be present with the faithfull that yet wandred in the earth, but with more present power to gouerne both heauen and earth. But rather the same that he had promised, that he would be with vs to the end of the worlde, he performed by this his ascendinge, by which as his bodie was lifted vppe aboue all heauens, so his power and effectuall workinge was poured an d spread abroad beyond all the boundes of heauen and earth. But this I had rather to declare in Augustines wordes than mine owne. Christ (sayth he) was to go by death to the right hande of the father, from whence he is to come to iudge the quicke & the dead: & that likewise in bodily presence according to the sounde doctrine and rule of faith. For in spirituall presence with them, he was to come after his ascension. And in an other place more largely and plainely: Accordinge to an vnspeakeable & vnvisible grace is that fulfilled which he had spoken: behold I am with you all the days, euen to the end of the world. But accordinge to the flesh which the Word tooke vpon him, according to that that he was borne of the Virgin, according to that that he was taken of the Iewes, that he was fastened on the tree, that he was taken downe from the crosse, that he was wrapped in linen clothes, that he was layd in the graue, that he was openly shewed in his rising againe: this was fulfilled, Ye shall not alway haue me with you. Why so? because he was conuersant according to the presence of his body forty dayes with his disciples, and they being in his company, seeing him, not followinge him, he ascended into heauen and is not here, for he sitteth there, at the right hande of his Father: and is here, for he is not gone away in presence of maiestie. Therefore according to the presence of his maiestie, we alway haue Christ: according to the presence of his flesh, it was truly said to his Disciples: but me ye shall not alway haue. For the Church had him a fewe dayes according to the presence of his flesh, but now she holdeth him by faith, but seeth him not with eyes.

15 Wherefore, it by and by followeth, that he is sitten downe at the right hande of his father: which is spoken by way of similitude, taken of princes that haue their sitters by, to whom they commit their office to rule & gouerne in their stede. So it is said, that Christ, in whom the father will be exalted and reigne by his hand: was receaued to sit at his right hande: as if it had bene said, that he was inuested in the dominion of heauen and earth, solemnly entred vpon the possession of the gouernment committed vnto him, and that he not onely entred vpon it, but also continueth in it till he come downe to iudgement. For so doth the Apostle expounde it, when he saith thus: The father hath set him at his right hand, aboue all principalitie & power, and strength and dominion, and euery name that is named not onely in this worlde, but in the worlde to come. &c. He hath put all thinges vnder his feete, and hath geuen him to be head of the Church aboue all thinges. Nowe you see to what purpose belongeth that sitting, that is, that all creatures both heauenly and earthly may with admiration looke vpon his maiestic, be gouerned with his hande, beholde his countenance, and be subiect to his power. And the Apostles meane nothing els, when they so oft rehearse it, but to teach, that all things are left to his will. Therefore they thinke not rightly, which thinke that blessednesse is onely meant by it. And it forceth not, that in the Actes, Stephen testifieth that he saw him standing, because we speake not heere of the gesture of his body, but of the maiesty of his dominion: so that to Sit is nothing else, but to be chiefe iudge in the heauenly iudgement seat.

16 Hereupon doth fayth gather manifolde frute: For it learneth, that the Lord by his ascending into heauen, hath opened the entrie of the heauenly kingdom, which before had bin stopped vp by Adā. For when he entred into it in our flesh as in our name, therupon followeth that which the Apostle sayth, that we do already in him after a certaine manner sit in heauen. For that we do not with bare hope looke for heauen, but already in our heade we possesse it. Moreouer faith perceiueth that he sitteth with his father to our great benefite. For he is entred into a sanctuary not made with hands, and there appeareth before the face of the Father a continuall aduocate & intercessor for vs: he so turneth the fathers eyes to his righteousnes, that he turneth them away from our sinnes: He so reconcileth his minde vnto vs, that by his intercession he prepareth vs a way and passage to his throne, filling it with grace & mercifulnes, which otherwise would haue bin full of horreur to wretched sinners. Thirdly, faith conceiueth his power, wherein consisteth our strength, might, welch, & glorying against the hels. For ascending into heaue he led captiue captiue, & spoiling his enemies he enriched his people, and daily filleth them with heapes of spirituall richesse. He sitteth therefore on his throne, that from thence pouringe out his power vnto vs, he may quicken vs to a spirituall life, sanctifie with his spirit, and garnish his church with the diuerse giftes of his grace, preserue it safe against all hurtes by his protectiō, restraine with the strength of his hand the raging enemies of his crosse and of our saluation: finally, hold all power both in heauen and in earth, till he haue ouerthrowen all his enemies which are also our enemies, & made perfect the building vp of his Church. And this is the true state of his kingdom: this is the power that his father hath giuen him, till he make an end of the last act, when he commeth to iudge the quicke and the dead.

17 Christ doth in dede here shew to thē that be his, plaine proues of his power present among them: but because vnder the basenes of flesh his kingdom doth in a manner lie hidden in earth, therefore for good cause is faith called to thinke vpon that visible presence, which he will openly shew at the last day. For he shall in visible forme come downe from heauen, euen such as he was seene to go vp: and he shall appeare to all men with vnspeakeable maiesty of his kingdome, with bright glistering of immortality, with infinite power of godhead, with a gard of Angels. From thence therefore we are bidden to looke for him to come our redemer at that day, whē he shal seuer the Lambes from the Goates, the chosen from the forsaken: & there shalbe none of all either the quicke or the dead, that shall escape his iudgement.

 For frō the furthest corners of the world shall be heard the sound of the trōper, wherewith all shall be called to his iudgement seate, both they that shalbe founde aliue at that day, and they whom death hath before takē out of the company of the quicke. Some there be that in this place expound the wordes of the quicke and the dead otherwise: and we see that some of the olde wryters did sticke in dout vpon the construction of this article. But as the aforesayd meaning is plaine & easie to perceiue: so doth it better agree with the Crede w̄ is eident that it was wrytten according to the capacity of the common people.
 And herewith nothing disagreeeth that which the Apostle affirmeth, that it is appointed to all men once to die. For although they which shall remaine in mortall life at the last iudgement. shall not die after a naturall manner and order: yet that change which they shal suffer, because it shalbe like a death, is not vnproperly called death. It is in deede certaine, that not all shall slepe, but all shalbe chaunged. What meaneth that? In one moment their mortall life shall perish and be swallowed vp and be vtterly transformed into a newe nature. This perishinge of the flesh no man can deny to be a death: and yet in the meane time it remaineth true, that the quicke & the dead shalbe summoned to the iudgement: because the dead that are in Christ shal first rise, and then they that shall remaine and be liuinge, shall with them be sodenly taken vp into the ayre to meete the Lord. And truely it is likely that this article was taken out of the sermon of Peter, which Luke reciteth, and out of the solemne protestation of Paule to Timothe.

18 Hereupon ariseth a singular comfort, when we heare that he is iudge, which hath alredy appointed vs parteners with him in iudging: so far is it of, that he will go vp into the iudgement seate to condemne vs. For how shoulde the most mercifull prince destroy his owne people? how shoulde the head scatter abroad his owne members? howe shoulde the patrone condemne his owne clientes? For if the Apostle dare crie out, that while Christ is intercessour for vs, there can none come come forth that can condemne vs : it is much more true, that Christ himselfe beinge our intercessour, will not condemne them whom he hath receiued into his charge and tuition. It is truely no small assurednes, that we shalbe brought before no other iudgement seate, but of our owne redeemer, from whom our saluation is to be looked for: moreouer that he which now by the Gospel promiseth eternall blessednesse, shall then by sittinge in iudgement performe his promise. Therefore to this end the father hath honored the sonne, in giuinge Ioh. 5.

22. him all iudgement, that so he hath provided for the consciences of them that be his, trembling for feare of the iudgemēt. Hitherto I haue followed the order of the Apottles Crede, because whereas it shortly in fewe wordes contayneth the chiefe articles of our redemption, it may serue vs for a table, wherein we do distinctly and seuerally see those things that are in Christ worthy to be taken heede vnto. I call it the Apottles Creede, not carefully regarding who were the author of it. It is truely by great consent of the olde wryters ascribed to the Apottles, either because they thought that it was by common trauaile wrytten and set out by the Apottles, or for that they iudged that this abridgement beinge faithfully gathered out of the doctrine, deliuered by the handes of the Apottles, was worthy to be confirmed with such a title. And I take it for no dout, that whense so euer it proceeded at the first, it hath euen from the first beginninge of the church, and from the very time of the Apottles, be vsed as a publike confession, and receiued by consent of all men. And it is likely that it was not priuately wrytten by any one man, forasmuch as it is euident that euen from the farthest age it hath alway continued of sacred authority and credit amonge all the godly. But that thinge which is onely to be cared for, we haue wholly out of controuersie, that the whole History of our faith is shortly and wel in distinct order rehearsed in it, and that there is nothings contayned in it that is not sealed with sounde testimonies of the Scripture. Which beinge vnderstanded, it is to no purpose either curiously to dout, or to striue with any manne, who were the autor of it: vnlesse perhappe it be not enough for some man to be assured of the trueth of the holy Ghost, but if he do also vnderstand either by whose mouth it was spoken, or by whose hand it was wrytten.

19 But forasmuch as we do see, that the whole summe of our saluation, and all the partes thereof, are comprehended in Christ, we Act 4.
12. must beware, that we do not draw away from him any parte thereof be it neuer so litle. If we seeke for saluation, we are taught by the very name of Iesus, that it is in him. If we seeke for any other giftes of 1. Cor. 1.

the Spirit, they are to be found in his anoynting. If we seeke for strength, it is in his dominion: if we seeke for cleannes, it is in his conception. If we seeke for tender kindnes, it sheweth it selfe in his birth, whereby he was made in all things like vnto vs, that he might learne to sorrow with vs: if we seeke for redemption, it is in his passion: if we seeke for absolution, it is in his condemnation: if we seeke for release of the curse, it is in his crosse: if we seeke for satisfaction, it is in his sacrifice: if we seeke for cleansing, it is in his bloude: if we seeke for reconciliation, it is in his going downe to the hels: if we seeke for mortification of the flesh, it is in his buriall: if we seeke for newnesse of life, it is in his resurrection: if we seeke for immortality, it is in the same: if we seeke for the inheritance of the kingdom of heauen, it is in his entrance into heauen: if we seeke for defense, for assurednesse, for plenty and store of all good thinges, it is in his kingdome: if we seeke for a dreadlesse looking for the iudgement, it is in the power giuen to him to iudge. Finally, sith the treasures of all sortes of good things are in him, let vs draw thense and from no where else, euen till we be full withall. For they which, being not content with him alone, are caried hither and thither into diuerse hopes, although they haue principall regard to him, yet eue in this they are out of the right way, that they turne any parte of their knowledge to any other where. Albeit such distrust can not creepe in, where the aboundance of his good giftes hath once bin well knowen.

The xvij. Chapter.

That it is truly and properly sayd, that Christ hath deserued Gods fauour and saluation for vs.

THis question is also to be affoyled for an addition. For there are some suttle men after a wronge manner, which although they confesse that we obtaine saluation by Christ, yet can not abide to heare the name of deseruing, by which they thinke the grace of God to be obscured: and so they will haue Christ to be only the instrumēt or minister, not the author, guide, or Prince of life, as Peter calleth him. In deede I confesse, that if a man will set Christ simply and by himselfe against the iudgement of God, then there shalbe no roome for deseruing: because there can not be founde in man any worthines that may deserue the fauour of God: But, as Augustine most truly wryteth, the most cleare light of predestination and grace is our Sauour himselfe, the man Christ Iesus, which hath obtayned so to be, by the nature of man, which is in him, without any deseruinges of workes or of fayth goinge before. I beseeche you

let me be answered, whereby that same Man deserued to be taken vp by the Word that is coeternall with the father into one person, and so to be the only begotten sonne of God. Let therefore appeare in our head the very fountaine of grace, from whom accordinge to the measure of euery one, it floweth abroad into all his mēbers. By that grace euery one from the beginning of his faith is made a Christian, by which that same man from his beginninge was made Christ. De bo no per. feuerāt. cap.vit. Againe in an other place: there is no plainer example of predestination than the Mediatour himselfe. For he that made of the seede of Dauid a man righteous that neuer shoulde be vnrighteous, without any deseruinge of his will goinge before, euen the same he doth of vnrighteous make them righteous that are the members of that heade: and so forth as there followeth. Therefore when we speake of Christs deseruinge, we do not say that in him is the beginning of deseruinge, but we climbe vp to the ordinance of God, which is the first cause thereof: because God of his owne meere good will appoynted him Mediatour, to purchase saluation for vs. And so is the deseruinge of Christ vnfitly set against the mercy of God. For it is a common rule, that things orderly one vnder an other do not disagree. And therefore it may well stand together, that mans iustification is free by the meere mercy of God, and that there also the deseruinge of Christ come betwene which is contained vnder the mercy of God. But against our workes are aptly set, as directly contrary, both the free fauour of God, & the obedience of Christ, either of them in their degree. For Christ could not deserue any thinge but by the good pleasure of God, and but because he was appointed to this purpose, with his sacrifice to appease the wrath of God, and with his obedience to put away our offences. Finally in a summe: because the deseruinge of Christ hangeth vpon the only grace of God, which apointed vs this meane of saluation, therefore as well the same deseruinge, as that grace, is fitly set against all the workes of men.

2 This distinction is gathered out of many places of the Scripture. God so loued the world, that he gaue his onely begotten sonne, that whosoever beleueth him, shall not perish. We see how the loue of God holdeth the first place, as the soueraigne cause or original, & the followeth faith in Christ, as the second or nerer cause. If any man take exception and say, that Christ is but the formall cause, he doth more diminish his power than the wordes may beare. For if we obtayne righteousness by sayth that resteth vpon him, then is the matter of our saluation to be sought in him, which is in many places plainly proued. Not that we first loued him, but he first loued vs, and sent his sonne to be the appeasing for our sinnes. In these wordes is clerely shewed, that God to the ende that nothing should withstand his loue toward vs, appointed vs a meane to be reconciled in Christ. And this word Appeasinge, is of great weight; because God after a certaine vnspeakeable manner, euen the same time that he loued vs, was also angry with vs, vntill he was reconciled in Christ. And to this purpose serue all those sayings: He is the satisfaction for our sinnes. Againe: It pleased God by him to reconcile all things to himselfe, appeasing himselfe through the blood of the crosse by him, &c. Againe, God was in Christ, reconcilinge the worlde to himselfe, not imputinge to men their sinnes. Againe: He accepted vs in his beloued sonne. Agayne, That he might reconcile them both to God into one man by the crosse. The reason of this mysterie is to be fetched out of the first chapter to the Ephesians, where Paule, after that he had taught that we were chosen in Christ, addeth therewithall, y we haue obtayned fauour in him. Howe did God beginne to embrace with his fauour them whom he loued before the makinge of the world, but because he vttered his loue when he was reconciled by the blood of Christ? For sith God is the fountayne of all righteousnesse, it must needes be, that man so longe as he is a sinner, haue God his enemy and his iudge. Wherefore the beginning of his loue is righteousnes, such as is described by Paule: He made him that had done no sinne, to be sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnesse of God in him. For he meaneth, that we haue obtayned free righteousnesse by y sacrifice of Christ, that we should please God, which by nature are the chuldrē of wrath, & by sinne estranged from him. But this distinction is also meant so oft as the grace of Christ is ioyned to y loue of God. Wherupon followeth, that he giueth vs of his owne that which he hath purchaced: For otherwise it would not agree with him, that this praise is given him seuerally from his father, that it is his grace and procedeth from him.

3 But it is truely and perfectly gathered by many places of the Scripture, that Christ by his obedience hath purchaced vs fauour with his father. For this I take for a thinge confessed, that if Christ hath satisfied for our sinnes, if he hath suffered the punishment due vnto vs, if by his obedience he hath appeased God, finally, if he being righteous, hath suffred for the vnrighteous, then is saluation purchaced for vs by his righteousnesse: which is as much in effect as to deserue it. But, as Paule witnesseth, we are reconciled and haue receiued reconciliation by his death. But reconciliation hath no place, but where there went offence before. Therefore the meaninge is: that that God, to whom we were hatefull by reason of sinne, is by y death of his sonne appeased, so that he might be fauorable vnto vs. And the comparision of contraries that followeth a litle after, is diligently to be noted as by the transgressiō of one man, many were made sinners: Ro. 5. 19 so also by the obedience of one, many are made righteous. For the meaning is thus: As by the sinne of Adam we were estranged from God & ordained to destruction, so by the obedience of Christ we are receiued into fauour as righteous. And the future time of the verbe doth not exclude present righteousness, as appeareth by the proesse of the text: For he had said before, that the free gift was of many sinnes vnto iustification.

4 But when we say, that grace is purchased vs by the deseruing of Christ, we meane this, that we are cleansed by his blood, and that his death was a satisfaction for our sinnes. His blood cleanseth vs from sinne. This blood is it that is shed for remission of sinne. If this be the effect of his blood shed, y sinnes be not imputed vnto vs: it foloweth, that with that price the iudgement of God is satisfied. To which purpose serueth that saying of Iohn the Baptist: Behold y lambe of God, that taketh away the sinne of the world. For he setteth in comparision Christ against all the sacrifices of the law, to teach that in him only was fulfilled y which those figures shewed. And we know, what Moses eche where sayth: Iniquity shalbe cleansed, sinne shalbe put away and forgiuen. Finally we are very well taught in the old figures, what is the force and effect of the death of Christ. And this point the Apostle setteth out in the Epistle to the Hebrues, very fitly takinge this principle, that remissiō is not wrought without shedding of blood. Wherupon he gathereth, that Christ for the abolishing of sinne, appeared once for all by his sacrifice. Againe: that he was offered vp to take away y sinnes of many. And he had sayd before, that not by the blood of goates or of calues, but by his owne bloude he once entered into the holy place, finding eternall redemption. Now when he thus reasoneth: If the blood of a calfe do sanctifie, accordinge to the cleannes of the flesh, that much more cōsciences are cleansed by the blood of Christ from deade workes: it easily appeareth that the grace of Christ is too much diminished, vnles we graunt vnto his sacrifice the power of cleansing, appeasinge and satisfyinge. As a litle after he addeth: This is the mediatur of the new testament, that they which are called, may receiue y promise of eternall inheritance by meane of death for y redēption of sinnes going before, which remained vnder the law. Bur specially it is conuenient to wey the relation which Paul describeth, that he became curse for vs. &c. For it were supetfluous, Ga. 3. 13 yea and an absurdity, that Christ shoulde be charged with curse, but for this entēt, that he paying y^e which other didowe, should purchase righteousnesse for them. Also the testimony of Esaie is plaine that the chastisement of our peace was laid vpon Christ, & that we obtained health by his stripes. For if Christ had not satisfied for our sinnes, it could not haue bin said, that he appeased God by taking vpon him the payne whereunto we were subiect. Wherewith agreeth that which foloweth in the same place: For the sinne of my people I haue striken him. Let vs also recite the expositiō of Peter, which shal leaue nothings doutfull: that he did beare our sinne, vpon the tree. For he saith, that the burthen of damnation from which we were deliuered, was laid vpon Christ.

5 And the Apostles do plainly pronouce, that he payed the price of raunsome to redeme vs from the giltinesse of death. Being iustified by his grace, through the redemption which is in Christ, whom God hath set to be the propitiatory by faith which is in his blood. Paule cōmendeth the grace of God in this point, because he hath giuen the price of redēption in the death of Christ: & then he biddeth vs to flee vnto his blood, that hauinge obtayned righteousnesse, we may stande boldly before the iudgement of God. And to the same effect is that saying of Peter: that we are redeemed, not by gold and siluer, but by the precious blood of the vnspotted Lambe. For the comparison also would not agree, vnles with that price satisfaction had bin made for sinnes: for which reason Paule sayth, that we are preciously bought. Also that other saying of his would not stand together: There is one mediatur that gaue himselfe to be a redemptiō, vnles the paine had bin cast vpon him which we had deserued: Therefore the same Apostle defineth, that the redemption in the blood of Christ is the forgiuenes of sinnes: as if he shoulde haue sayd, y^e we are iustified or acquitted before God, because that blood answereth for satisfaction for vs. Wherewith also agreeth the other place, that the hand wryting which was against vs, was cancelled vpon the crosse. For therein is meant the payment or recompense that acquiteth vs from giltinesse, There is also great weight in these wordes of Paule: If we be iustified by the works of the law, thē Christ died for nothing. For hereby we gather, that we must fetch from Christ that which the lawe woulde giue, if any man can fulfill it: or (which is all one) that we obtayne by the grace of Christ that, which God promised to our workes in the lawe when he sayd: He that doth these thinges, shall liue in them. Which he no lesse plainely confirmeth in his sermon made at Antioche, affirming that by beleuing in Christ we are iustified from all those things, from which we could not be justified in the lawe of Moses. For if the keeping of the lawe be righteousnesse, who can denie that Christ deserued fauour for vs, when taking that burden vpon him, he so reconciled vs to God, as if we our selues had kept the law? To the same purpose serueth that which he afterwarde writeth to the Galatians: Gal. 4. 4 God sent his Sonne subiect to the lawe, that he might redeeme those that were vnder the lawe. For to what ende serued that submission of his, but that he purchaced to vs righteousnesse, taking vpon him to make good that which we were not able to pay? Hereof commeth that imputation of righteousnesse without workes, whereof Paule Rom. 4 speaketh, bycause the righteousnesse is reckened to vs which was founde in Christ onely. And truely for no other cause is the flesh of Christ called our meate, but because we finde in him the substance of Iohn 6. life. And that power proceedeth from nothing els, but because the Sonne of God was crucified, to be the price of our righteousnesse. 55.

 As Paule saith that he gaue vp himselfe a sacrifice of sweete fauour. Eph. 5. 2 And in an other place: He died for our sinnes, he rose againe for our Rom. 4 iustification. Herevpon is gathered, that not onely saluation is geuen vs by Christ, but also that for his sake his father is nowe fauourable 25. vnto vs. For there is no doubt that that is perfectly fulfilled in him, which God vnder a figure pronounceth by Esaie, saying: I will do it Esa. 37. for mine owne sake, and for Dauid my seruantes sake. Whereof the 35.
 Apostle is a right good witness, where he saith: Your sinnes are forgiven you for his names sake. For though the name of Christ be not 1. Ioh. 3. expressed, yet Iohn after his accustomed maner signifieth him by 12. this pronoune He. In which sense also the Lorde pronounceth: As Iohn. 6.
 I liue because of my father, so shal ye also liue bycause of me. Where- 57. with agreeth that which Paule saith, It is geue you because of Christ, Phil. 1. not onely to beleue in him, but also to suffer for him. 19.

6 But to demaunde, whether Christ deserued for himselfe, (as Lombarde, and the other schoolemen do) is no lesse foolish curiositie, than it is a rash determination when they affirme it. For what needed the sonne of God to come downe to purchase any newe thing for him selfe? And the Lord declaring his owne counsell, doth put it wholly out of doubt. For it is not said, that the father prouided for the commoditie of his sonne in his deseruings, but that he deliuered Rom. 8 him to death, and spared him not, because he loued the worlde. And the Prophetes manners of speaking are to be noted, as, A childe is Esa 9. commeth to thee. Also that confirmation of loue shoulde be very Rom. 5 colde which Paule setteth out, that Christ suffered death for his ene- 10.

Cap. I. Of the maner how to receiue

17. mics. For therevpon we gather, that he had no respect of himselfe: and that same he plainly affirmeth in saying: I sanctifie my selfe for them. For he that geueth away the frute of his holinesse vnto other, doth thereby testifie that he purchaceth nothing for himselfe. And truely this is most worthily to be noted, that Christ, to geue him selfe wholy to saue vs, did after a certaine maner forget him selfe. But to this purpose they doe wrongfully drawe this testimonie of Paule:
2. Therefore the father hath exalted him, and geuen him a name, &c.
For by what deseruings coulde man obtaine to be iudge of the worlde, and the heade of the Angels, and to enioy the soueraigne dominion of God, and that in him shoulde rest that same maiestie, the thousandth parte wherof all the powers of men and Angels can not reach vnto? But the solution thereof is easy and plaine, that Paule 24. doth not there entreate of the cause of exalting of Christ, but onely 6. to shewe the effect ensuyng thereof, that it might be for an example to vs. And no other thing is meante by that which is spoken in an other place, that it behoued that Christ shoulde suffer, and so enter into the glorie of his Father.

THE THIRD BOOKE OF THE INSTITVTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, WHICH intreateth of the maner how to receiue the grace of Christ, and what profites do grow vnto vs, and what effectes ensue thereof.

The first Chapter.

That those thinges vvhich are spoken of Christ, do profite vs by secret vworking of the holy Ghost.

Owe it is to be seene how those good thinges do come vnto vs, which the Father hath geuen to his only begotten Sonne, not for his owne priuate vse, but to enriche them that were without them and needed them. And first this is to be learned, that so long as Christ is out of vs, and we be seuer-red from him, whatsoever he suffered or did for the saluation of mankind, is vnprofitable and nothing auaieth for vs.

vs. Therefore that he may enterparten with vs those things that he hath receiued of his Father, it behoueth that he become ours, and dwell in vs. And for that cause he is called our head, and the first begotten among many brethren: and on the other side it is saide, that we are grafted into him, and did put on him. For (as I haue before saide) all that euer he possesseth belongeth nothing to vs, vntill we grow together into one with him. But although it be true that we obtaine this by faith: yet forasmuch as we see that not all without difference do embrace this enterpartening of Christ, which is offered by the Gospell, therefore very reason teacheth vs to climbe vp hier, and to enquire of the secret effectual working of the Spirit, by which it is brought to passe, that we enioy Christ and all his good things, I haue before entreated of the eternall godheade and essence of the Spirite, at this present let vs be content with this one speciall article, that Christ so came in water and bloude that the Spirite should testifie of him, least the saluation that he hath purchaced, should slippe away from vs. For as there are alleged three witnessess in heauen, the Father, the Worde and the Spirite, so are there also three in earth, Water, Bloude and the Spirite. And not without cause is the testimonie of the Spirite twise repeted, which we feele to be engrauen in our heartes in steede of a seale: whereby commeth to passe, that it sealeth the washing and sacrifice of Christ. After which meaning Peter also saith, that the faithfull are chosen in sanctification of the Spirite vnto obedience and sprinkeling of the bloude of Christ. By which words he telleth vs, that to the entent the shedding of that holy bloud shoulde not become voide, our soules are cleansed with it by the secrete watering of the holy Spirite. According wherevnto Paule also speaking of cleansing and iustification, sayeth that we are made partakers of them both in the name of Iesus Christ and in the Spirite of our God. Finally this is the summe, that the holy Spirite is the bonde wherewith Christ effectually bindeth vs vnto him. For prooffe whereof also do serue all that we haue taught in the last booke before this, concerning his anointing.

2 But that this, being a matter specially worthy to be knowne, may be made more certainly euident, we must holde this in minde, that Christ came furnished with the holy Spirite after a certaine peculiar maner, to the ende that he might seuer vs from the worlde, and gather vs together into the hope of an eternall inheritance. For this cause he is called the Spirite of sanctification, because he doth not onely quicken and nourish vs with that generall power which appeareth as well in mankinde as in all other liuinge creatures, but also is in vs the roote and seede of heauenly life . Therefore the Prophets do principally commende the kingdome of Christ by this title of prerogatiue, that then should flourish more plentiful abundance of the Spirite. And notable about all the rest is that place of Ioel: In that day I will poure of my Spirite vpon all flesh. For though the Prophet there seeme to restraine the giftes of the Spirite to the office of prophecying, yet vnder a figure he meaneth, that God by the enlightning of his Spirite will make those his scholers which before were vnskillfull and voide of all heauenly doctrine. Now forasmuch as God the Father doth for his Sonnes sake geue vs his holy Spirite, and yet hath left with him the whole fulnesse therof, to the ende that he shoulde be a minister and distributor of his liberalitie: he is sometime called the Spirite of the Father, and sometime the Spirite of the Sonne. Ye are not (saith Paule) in the flesh, but in the Spirite, for the Spirite of God dwelleth in you . But if any haue not the spirite of Christ, he is not his, And herevpon he putteth vs in hope of full reuening, for that he which raised vp Christ from the deade, shall quicken our mortall bodies because of his Spirite dwelling in vs. For it is no absurditie, that to the Father be ascribed the praise of his owne giftes, whereof he is the author: and yet that the same be ascribed to Christ, with whome the giftes of the Spirite are leste, that he may geue them to those that be his . Therefore he calleth all them that thirst, to come to him to drinke. And Paule teacheth that the Spirite is distributed to euery one, according to the measure of the gifte of Christ. And it is to be knowen, that he is called the Spirite of Christ, not only in respect that the eternall Worde of God is with the same Spirite ioyned with the Father, but also according to his person of Mediator, because if he had not had that power, he had come to vs in vaine. After which meaning he is called the second Adam geuen from heauen, to be a quickning Spirite: whereby Paule compareth the singular life that the sonne of God breatheth into them that be his that they may be all one with him, with the naturall life that is also common to the reprobate. Likewise where he wisheth to the faithfull the fauour of Christ and the loue of God, he ioyneth with all the common partaking of the Spirite, without which no man can tast neither of the fatherly fauour of God, nor of the bountifullnesse of Christ. As also, he saith in an other place: The loue of God is poured out into our heartes by the holy Spirite that is geuen vs.

3 And here it shalbe profitable to note, with what titles the Scripture setteth out the holy Spirite, where it entreateth of beginning and whole restoring of our saluation. First he is called the Spirite of adop-adop-

adoption, becaute he is a witnesse vnto vs of the free goodwill of God, wherewith God the Father hath embraced vs in his beloued onely begotten Sonne, that he might be a father vnto vs, and doth encourage vs to praie bouldely, yea and doth minister vs wordes to crie with out feare Abba, Father: by the same reason he is called the earnest pledge, and seale of our inherance, because he so geueth life from heauen to vs wandering in the worlde, and being like to dead men, that we may be assured that our soule is in safegarde vnder the faithful keping of God: for which cause he is also called life, by reason for righteousnesse. And forasmuch as by his secret watering he maketh vs frutefull to bring forth the buddes of righteousnesse, he is oftentimes called water, as in Esaie: All ye that thirst come to the waters. Againe: I will poure out my spirite vpon the thirstie, and floodes vpon the drie lande: wherewith agreeth that saying of Christ, which I did euen now allege: If any thirst, let him come to me. Albeit sometime he is so called, by reason of his power to purge and cleanse, as in Ezechiell where the Lord promiseth cleane waters wherewith he will wash his people from filthinesse. And forasmuch as he restoreth and norisheth into liuely quicknes, them vpon whome he hath poured the liquore of his grace, he is therefore called by the name of oile and anointment. Againe bycause in continually seething out and burning vp the vices of our lust, he setteth our heartes on fire with the loue of God and zeale of godlines, he is also for this effect worthily called fire. Finally he is described vnto vs as a fountaine, from whence do flowe vnto vs all heauenly riches, or the hande of God, wherewith he vseth his power: bycause by the breath of his power he so breatheth diuine life into vs, that we are not now stirred by our selues, but ruled by his stirring and mouing: so that if there be any good thinges in vs, they be the frutes of his grace: but our owne giftes without him, be darkenesse of minde and peruersnesse of harte. This point is set out plainely enough, that till our mindes be bente vpon the holy Ghost, Christ lyeth in a maner idle, bycause we coldely espie him without vs, yea & farre away from vs. But we know that he profiteth none other but them whose heade he is, and the first begotten among brethren, and them which haue put on Him. This conioining onely maketh that, as concerning vs, he is come not vnprofitably with the name of Sauour. And for prooffe hereof serueth that holy mariage whereby we are made flesh of his flesh, and bones of his bones, yea and all one with him. But by the Spirite onely be maketh him selfe one with vs: by the grace and power of the same Spirite we are made his membres, so that he conteineth vs vnder him, and we againe possesse him.

4 But forasmuch as faith is his principall worke, to it are for the most parte referred all those thinges, that we commonly finde spoken to expresse his force and working: because he bringeth vs into the light of the Gospell by nothing but by faith: as John Baptiste teacheth, that this prerogatiue is geuen to them the beleue in Christ, that they be the children of God which are borne not of flesh and bloude, but of God: where setting God against flesh and bloude, he affirmeth it to be a supernaturall gifte that they receiue Christ by faith, who otherwise shoulde remaine subiect to their owne infidelitie. Like where vnto is that aunswere of Christ: Flesh and bloude hath not reueled it to thee, but my Father which is in heauen. These thinges I do nowe but shortly touche, bycause I haue already intreated of them at large. And like also is that saying of Paule, that the Ephesians were sealed vp with the holy Spirit of promise. For Paule sheweth that he is an inwarde teacher, by whose working the promise of saluation pearceth into our mindes, which otherwise shoulde but beate the aire or our eares. Likewise when he saith, that the Thessalonians were chosen of God in the sanctification of the spirit and beleuing of the truth: by which ioyning of them together, he briefly admonisheth that faith it selfe proceedeth from nothing els but from the holy spirit: which thing Iohn setteth out more plainly, saying: We knowe that there abideth in vs of the spirit which he hath geuen vs. Again, By this we knowe that we dwell in him, and he in vs, because he hath geuen vs of his spirit. Therefore Christ promised to his Disciples the Spirit of truth which the worlde can not receiue, that they might be able to receiue the heavenly wisdom. And he assigneth to the same spirit this prope office, to put them in minde of those thinges that he had taught them by mouth. Because in vaine shoulde the light shewe it selfe to the blinde, vnlesse the same spirit of vnderstanding shoulde open the eyes of their minde: so as a man may rightly call the holy spirit, the key by which the treasures of the heavenly kingdome are opened vnto vs: & may call his enlightning, the eyesight of our minde to see. Therefore doth Saint Paule so much commend the ministerie of the spirit: bycause teachers shoude crie without profiting, vnlesse Christ himselfe the inwarde maister shoulde drawe them with his spirit that are geuen him by his Father. Therefore as we haue saide, that perfect saluation is founde in the person of Christ: so that we may be made partakers thereof, he doth baptize vs in the holy spirit and fire, lightning vs into the faith of his Gospell, and so newe begetting vs, that we may be newe creatures: and purging vs from vnholly filthinesse, doth dedicate vs to be holy temples to God.

The ij. Chapter.

Of faith, wherein both is set the definition of it, and the properties that it hath, are declared.

BVt all these things shalbe easie to vnderstand, when there is shewed a plaine definitiō of faith, that the readers may know the force and nature thereof. But first it is conuenient to call to minde againe these things that haue bene already spoken, that sith God doth appoint vs by his lawe what we ought to do, if we fall in any point therof, the same terrible iudgement of eternall death that he pronounceth doth rest vpon vs. Againe, that forasmuch as it is not onely hearde but altogether aboue our strength and beyonde all our power to fulfill the lawe, if we onely beholde our selues, and weye what estate is worthy for our deseruings, there is no good hope left, but we lie cast away from God vnder eternall destruction. Thirdly this hath been declared, that there is but one meane of deliuerance to draw vs out of so wretched calamitie: wherein appeareth Christ the Redeemer, by whose hande it pleased the heauenly father, hauing mercie vpon vs of his infinite goodnesse and clemencie, to succour vs, so that we with sounde faith embrace this mercie, and with constant hope rest vpon it. But nowe it is conuenient for vs to weye this, what maner of faith this ought to be, by which all they that are adopted by God to be his children, do enter vpon the possessiō of the heauenly kingdome, forasmuch as it is certaine that not euery opiniō nor yet euery perswasion is sufficient to bring to passe so great a thing. And with so much the more care and study must we looke about for, and search out the natural propertie of faith, by how much the more hurtfull at this day is the errour of many in this behalfe. For a great part of the world, hearing the name of faith, conceiueth no hier thing, but a certaine common assent to the historie of the Gospel, Yea when they dispute of faith in the scholes, in barely callinge God the obiect of faith, they do nothing but (as we haue saide in an other place) by vaine speculation rather draw wretched soules out of the right way, than direct them to the true marke. For whereas God dwelleth in a light that none can atteine to, it behoueth of necessitie that Christ become meane betwene vs & it. For which cause he calleth him selfe the light of the world: & in an other place, The way: the Truth, & the Life, because no man commeth to the father (which is the fountaine of life) but by him: because he only knoweth the Father, & by him the

Luk. 10. faithfull to whome it pleaseth him to disclose him. According to this 12. reason, Paule affirmeth, that he accompteth nothing excellent to be .Cor. 2 knowene, but Christ: and in the xx. chapter of the Actes he saith, Act. 20. that he preached faith in Christ, &c. And in an other place he bring-

2. Cor. Gentiles, that they may receiue forgeueneſſe of finnes, and portion 4. 6. among holy ones, by the faith which is in me. And Paule testifieth, that the glorie of God is in his person visible vnto vs: or (which is all one in effect) that the enlightning of the knowledge of Gods glorie shinerh in his face. It is true in deede that faith hath respect onely to the one God, but this also is to be added, that it acknowledge him whome he hath sent, euen Iesus Christ. Because God himselfe should haue lyen secret and hidden farre from vs, vnlesse the brightnesse of Christ did cast his beames vpon vs. For this entent the father left all that he had with his onely begotten sonne, euen by the communicating of good thinges with him to expresse the true image of his glorie. For as it is saide, that we must be drawene by the spirite, that we may be stirred to seeke Christ, so againe we ought to be admonished, that the inuisible father is no where els to be sought but in this image. Of which matter Augustine speaketh excellently well, which I Ibr. 11. intreating of the marke that faith should shoote at, saith that we must de ciui. know whether we must goe and which way: and then by and by after Dei. ca. he gathereth that the safest way against al erroures is he that is both 2. God and man. For it is God to whome we go, and man by whome we go: and both these are founde no where but in Christ. Neither doth Paule when he speaketh of faith in God, meane to ouerthrow that which he so ofte repeteth of faith that hath her whole stay vpon 1. Pet. 1. Christ. And Peter doth most fitly ioyne them both together, saying 21. that by him we beleue in God.

2 Therefore this euill, euen as innumerable other, is to be imputed to the Schoolemen, which haue hidden Christ as it were with a veile drawene before him, to the beholding of whome vnlesse we be directly bent, we shall alway wander in many vncertaine mazes. But beside this that with their darke definition they do deface and in a maner bring to naught the whole force of faith, they haue forged a deuise of vnexpressed faith, with which name they garnishing their most grosse ignorance do with great hurte deceyue the silly people, yea (to say truely and plainly as the thing is in deede) this deuise doth not onely burie but vtterly destroy the true faith. Is this to beleue, to vnderstand nothing, so that thou obediently submit thy sense to the Church? Faith standeth not in ignorance but in knowledge, and that not onely of God, but of the will of God. For neither do we obtaine saluation by this that we either are ready to embrace for true whatsoeuer the Church appointeth, or that we do commit to it all the office of searching and knowing: but when we acknowledge God to be a merciful father to vs by the recōciliatiō made by Christ, and that Christ is geuen vs vnto righteousnesse, sanctification, and life. By this knowledge, I say, not by submitting of our sense, we atreine an entrie into the kingdome of heauen. For when the Apostle Rom. 10. saith, that with the hearte we beleue to righteousnesse, and with the mouth confessiō is made to saluatiō, he sheweth that it is not enough, if a man vnexpressedly beleue that which he vnderstādeth not, nor seeketh to learne: but he requireth an expressed acknowledging of Gods goodnesse, in which consisteth our righteousnesse.
and

3 In deede I denie not (such is the ignorance wherewith we are compassed) that there nowe be and hereafter shalbe many things wrapped and hidden from vs, till hauing put of the burden of our flesh we come neerer to the presence of God: in which very things that be hidden from vs, nothing is more profitable than to suspend our iudgement, but to stay our minde in determined purpose to kepe vnitie with the Church. But vnder this colour to intitle ignoraunce tempered with humilitie by the name of faith, is a great absurditie. For faith lieth in knowledge of God and of Christ not in reuerence Iohn 17. of the Church. And we see what a maze they haue framed with this 3. their hidden implication, that any thing whatsoeuer it be without any choise, so that it be thrust in vnder title of the Church, is greedily receiued of the ignorant as it were an oracle, yea somtime also most monstrous erroures. Which vnadvised lighnesse of beliefe, whereas it is a most certaine downefal to ruine, is yet excused by them, for that it beleueth nothing determinatly, but with this condition adioyned. If the faith of the Church be such. So do they faine, that truth is holden in errour, light in blindnesse, true knowledge in ignoraunce. But because we will not tarry long in confuting them, we do onely warne the readers to compare their doctrine with ours. For the very pleanesse of the truth it selfe will of it selfe minister a confutation ready enough. For this is not the question among them, whether faith be yet wrapped with many remnauntes of ignorance, but they definitiueley say that they beleue aright, which stande amased in their ignorance, yea & do flatter them selues therein, so that they do agree to the authoritie and iudgement of the Church, concerning things vnknowene. As though the Scripture did not euery where teach, that with faith is ioyned knowledge.

4 But we do graunt, that so long as we wander from home in this worlde, our faith is not fully exprest, not only because many things are yet hiddē from vs, but because being compassed with many mistes of erroures, we atteine not all thinges. For the highest wisdome of the most perfect is this, to profite more and proceede on further forward with gentill willingnesse to learne. Therefore Paule exhorteth the faithfull, if vpon any thing they differ one from an other, to abide for reuelation. And truely experience teacheth, that till we be vn-clothed of our flesh, we atteine to know lesse than were to be wished, and daily in reading we light vpon many darke places which do conuince vs of ignorance. And with this bridle God holdeth vs in modesty, assigning to euery one a measure of faith, that euen the very best teacher may be ready to learne. And notable examples of this vnexpressed faith, we may marke in the Disciples of Christ, before that they had obtained to be fully enlightned. We se, how they hardely tasted the very first introductions, how they did sticke euen in the smallest pointes, how they hanging at the mouth of their maister did not yet much proceede, yea when at the womens information they ranne to the graue, the Resurrection of their maister was like a dreame vnto them. Sith Christ did before beare witnessse of their faith, we may not say that they were vtterly without faith: but rather, if they had not ben perswaded that Christ should rise againe, all care of him woulde haue perished in them. For it was not superstition that did drawe the women to embalme with spices the corpes of a dead man of whome there was no hope of life: but although they beleued his wordes whome they knew to be a speaker of trueth, yet the grosnesse that still possessed their mindes so wrapped their faith in darkenesse, that they were in a maner amased at it. Wherevpon it is saide, that they then at the last beleued when they had by triall of the thing it selfe proued the trueth of the wordes of Christ: not that they then beganne to beleue, but bycause the seede of hidden faith which was as it were dead in their hartes, then receiuing liuelinesse, did sprunge vp. There was therefore a true faith in them, but an vnexpressed faith, because they reuerently embraced Christ for their onely teacher, and then being taught of him, they determined that he was the author of their saluation: Finally, they beleued that he came from heauen, by the grace of his father to gather his Disciples to heauen. And we neede not to seke any more familiar prooffe hereof than this, that in all thinges alway vnbelefe is mingled with faith.

5 We may also call it an vnexpressed faith, which yet in deede is nothing but a preparation of faith. The Euangelistes do rehearse that

that many beleued, which ouely being rauished to admiration with miracles, proceeded no further but that Christ was the Messias which had bene promised, albeit they tasted not so much as any slender learning of the Gospell. Such obedience which brought them in subiectiō willingly to submit them selues to Christ, beareth the name of faith where it was in dede but the beginning of faith. So the courtier that beleued Christes promise, cōcerning y^e healing of his sonne, when he came home, as the Euangelist testifieth, beleued againe: by-cause he receiued as an oracle that which he hearde of the mouth of Christ, and then submitted him selfe to his authoritie to receiue his doctrine. Albeit it is to be knowen, that he was so tractable and ready to learne, that yet in the first place the worde of beleuing signifieth a particular belese: and in the second place maketh him of the num-bre of the Disciples, that professed to be the scholars of Christ. Anke example doth Iohn set forth in the Samaritanes, which so beleued the womans reporte, that they ranne earnestly to Christ, which yet when they had hearde him, saide thus: Now we beleue not by cause of thy reporte, but we haue hearde him, and we know that he is the Sauour of the worlde. Hereby appeareth that they which are not yet instructed in the first introductions, so that they be disposed to obedience, are called faithfull, in dede not proprely, but in this respect, that God of his tender kindenesse vouchsafeth to graunt so great honour to that godly affection, but this willingnesse to learne, with a desire to proceede further, differeth farre from that grosse ignorance, wherin they lie dull that are content with the vnexpressed faith, such as the Papistes haue imagined. For if Paule seuerely condemneth them which alway learning, yet neuer come to the knowledge of trueth, how much more greuous reproche do they deserue, that of purpose studie to know nothing?

6 This therefore is the true knowledge of Christ, if we receiue him such as he is offered of his Father, that is to say, clothed with his Gospell. For as he is appointed to be the marke of our faith, so we can not go the right way to him, but by the Gospell going before to guide vs. And truely there are opened to vs the treasures of grace, which being shut vp; Christ shoulde litle profire vs. So Paule ioyneth faith an vnseparable companion to doctrine, where he saith: Ye haue not so learned Christ, for ye haue bene taught what is the trueth in Christ. Yet do I not so restraine faith to the Gospell, but that I con-fesse that there hath bene so much taught by Moses & the Prophets, as suffised to the edification of faith, but because there hath bene de-liuered in the Gospell a fuller opening of faith, therefore it is wor-

om. 10 thily called of Paule, the doctrine of faith. For which cause also he faith in an other place, that by the comming of faith the law is taken away, meaning by this word faith, the new and vnaccustomed maner of teaching, wherby Christ since he appeared our scholemaster, hath more plainely set forth the mercy of his father, and more certainly testified of our saluation. Albeit it shalbe the more easie and more conuenient ordre, if we descend by degrees from the generaltie to the specialtie. First we must be put in minde that there is a generall relation of faith to the worde, and that faith can no more be seuered from the worde, than the sunnebeames from the sunne from whom they procede. Therefore in Esaie God crieth out: Heare me and your soule shall liue. And that the same is the fountaine of faith, Iohn sheweth in these wordes: These things are written that ye may beleue. And the Prophet meaning to exhorte the people to beleefe, saith: This day if ye shall heare his voice. And to heare is commonly taken for to Beleue. Moreouer, God doth not without cause in Esaie set this marke of differēce betwene the children of the Church and straungers, that he will instruct them all, that they may be taught of him. For if it were a benefit vniuersall to all, why shoulde he direct his wordes to a fewe? Wherewith agreeth this that the Euangelistes do commonly vse the wordes Faithfull, and Disciples, as seuerall wordes expressing one thing, and specially Luke very oft in the Actes of the Apostles. Yea and he stretcheth that name euen to a woman in the ninth chapter of the Actes. Wherefore if faith do swerue neuer so litle from this marke, to which it ought to be directly leuelled, it kepeth not her own nature, but becometh an vncertaine light-nesse of beleefe and wandring error of minde. The same Worde is the foundation wherewith faith is vpholden and susteined, from which if it swarue, it falleth downe. Therefore take away the Worde, and then there shall remaine no faith. We do not here dispute whether the ministerie of man be necessarie to sowe the word of God that faith may be conceiued therby, which question we wil els where intreate of: but we say that the worde it selfe, howesoever it be conueied to vs, is like a mirrour when faith may beholde God. Whether God doth therein vse the seruice of man, or worke it by his owne only power, yet he doth alway shew him selfe by his worde to those, whome his will is to drawe vnto him: wherevpon Paule defineth faith to be an obedience that is geuen to the Gospell. Rom. 1. And in an other place he praiseth the obedience of faith in the Philippians, For this is not the onely purpose in the vnderstanding of faith, that we knowe that there is a God, but this also, yea this chiefly, that we vndervnderstand what will he beareth towarde vs. For it not so much behoueth vs to knowe what he is in himselfe, but what a one he will be to vs. Nowe therefore we are come to this point, that faith is a knowledge of the will of God, perceyued by his worde. And the foundation hereof is a foreconceiued persuasion of the truthe of God.

Of the assurednesse whereof so long as thy minde shall dispute with it selfe, the worde shall be but of doubtfull and weake credit, yea rather no credit at all. But also it sufficeth not to beleue that God is a true speaker, which can neither deceiue nor lie, vnlesse thou further holde this for vndoubtedly determined, that whatsoever procedeth from him, is the sacred and inuiolable truthe.

7. But because not at euery worde of God mans hearte is raised vp to faith, we must yet further search what this faith in the worde hath proprely respect vnto. It was the saying of God to Adam: Thou Gene. 3. shalt die the death. It was the saying of God to Cain: The bloude 17. an of thy brother crieth to me out of the earth. Yet these are such say- 4. 10. inges as of them selues can do nothing but shake faith, so much lesse are they able to stablisch faith. We deny not in the meane season that it is the office of faith to agree to the truthe of God, howe ofte soever, what soeuer, and in what sorte soeuer it speaketh: but nowe our question is onely, what faith findeth in the worde of the Lorde to leane and rest vpon. When our conscience beholdeth onely indignation and vengeance, howe can it but tremble and quake for feare? And howe shoulde it but flee God, of whome it is afraide?
But faith ought to seeke God, and not to flee from him. It is plaine therefore, that we haue not yet a full definition of faith, bycause it is not to be accompted for faith to knowe the will of God, of what sorte so euer it be. But what if in the place of will, whereof many times the message is sorrowefull and the declaration dreadfull, we put kindenesse or mercie? Truely so we shall come nerer to the nature of faith. For we are then allured to seeke God, after that we haue learned that saluation is laied vp in store with him for vs. Which thing is confirmed vnto vs, when he declareth that he hath care and loue of vs. Therefore there needeth a promise of grace, whereby he may testifie that he is our mercifull father, for that otherwise we can not approach vnto him, and vpon that alone the hearte of man may safely rest. For this reason commonly in the Psalmes these two things Mercie and Truth do cleaue together, because neither shoulde it any Psal. 4

truth and thy saluation, I haue not hidden thy goodnesse and thy truth. Thy goodnesse and thy trueth keepe me. In an other place. Thy mercie to the heauens, thy trueth euen to the cloudes. Againe. psal. 36. All the wayes of the Lord are mercie and trueth, to them that keepe his couenant. Againe. His mercie is multiplied vpon vs, and the truth of the Lorde abideth for euer. Againe. I will singe to thy name vpon thy mercie and trueth. I omit that which is in the Prophetes to the same meaning, that God is mercifull and faithfull in his promises. For we shall rashely derermine that God is mercifull vnto vs, vnlesse him selfe do testifie of him selfe and prevent vs with his calling, leaste his will shoulde be doubtfull and vnknown. But we haue already seene, that Christ is the onely pledge of his loue, without whome on euery side appeare the tokens of hatred and wrath. Nowe forasmuch as the knowledge of Gods goodnesse shall not much preuaile, vnlesse he make vs to rest in it, therefore such an vnderstanding is to be banished as is mingled with doubting, and doth not soundly agree in it selfe, but as it were, disputeth with it selfe. But mans wit, as it is blinde and darkened, is farre from atteinig and climbing vp to perceine the very will of God: and also the hearte of man, as it waereth with perpetuall doubting, is farre from resting assured in that persuation. Therefore it behoueth both that our wit be lightned, and our hearte strengthened by some other meane, that the worde of God may be of full credit with vs. Nowe we shall haue a perfect definition of faith, if we say, that it is a stedfast and assured knowledge of Gods kindnesse toward vs, which being grounded vpon the trueth of the free promise in Christ, is both reueled to our mindes, and sealed in our heartes by the holy Ghost.

8 But before I procede any further, it shalbe necessarie, that I make some preambles to dissolue certaine doubttes that otherwise might make some stoppe to the readers. And first I must confute that distinction that flieth about in the scholes, betwene faith formed and vnformed. For they imagine that such as are touched with no feare of God, with no feeling of godlinesse, do beleue all that is necessarie to saluation. As though the holy Ghost in lightening our heartes vnto faith, were not a witnessse to vs of our adoption. And yet presumptuously, when all the Scripture crieth out against it, they geue the name of faith to such perswasion voide of the feare of God. We neede to striue no further with their definition, but simply to rehearse the nature of faith, such as it is declared by the worde of God. Whereby shall plainely appeare howe vnskilfully and foolishly they rather make a noise than speake of it. I haue alreadie touched

parte, the rest I will adde hereafter as place shall serue. At this present I say, that there can not be imagined a greater absurditie, than this inuention of theirs. They wil haue faith to be an assent, whereby euery despiser of God may receiue that which is vttered out of the Scripture. But first they shoulde haue seene whether euery man of his owne power do bring faith to him selfe, or whether the holy Ghost be by it a witnessse of adoption. Therefore they do childishly plaie the fooles, in demaunding, whether faith, which qualitie adde doth fourme, be the same faith or an other and a newe faith. Whereby appeareth certainly, that in so babling they neuer thought of the singular gifte of the holy Ghost. For the beginning of beleuing doth already containe in it the reconciliation, whereby man approacheth to God. But if they did weye that saying of Paule: Rom. 10. With the hearte is beleued to righteousness, they woulde cesse to faine that same colde qualitie. If we hadde but this one reason, it shoulde be sufficient to ende this contention: that the very same assent (as I haue already touched, and will againe more largely repete) is rather of the hearte than of the braine, rather of affection than of vnderstanding. For which cause it is called the obedience of faith, Rom. 1. which is such as the Lorde preferreth no kinde of obedience aboue it: and that worthily, forasmuch as nothing is more precious to him than his truthe, which as Iohn the Baptist witnesseth, the beleuers doe as it were subscribe and seale vnto. Iohn. 3. Since the matter is not doubtfull we doe in one worde determinately saie, that they speake fondely when they saie that faith is fourmed by adding of godly affection vnto assent: whereas assent it selfe, at least such assent as is declared in the Scriptures, consisteth of godly affection. But yet there is an other plainer argument that offereth it selfe to be alleged. For whereas faith embraceth Christ as he is offered vs of the Father: and Christ is offered not onely for righteousness, forgeuenesse of sinnes and peace, but also for sanctification, and a fountaine of liuing water: without doubt no man can euer truely knowe him, vnlesse he doe therewithall receiue the sanctification of the Spirite. Or, if any man desire to haue it more plainely spoken, Faith consisteth in the knowledge of Christ. And Christ can not be knowene, but with sanctification of his Spirite: therefore it followeth, that faith can by no meane be seuered from godly affection.

9 Whereas they are wonte to laie this against vs, that Paule saith: If a man haue all faith, so that he remoue mountaines: if he haue not charitie, he is nothing: whereby they woulde deforme 1. Cor. 12. 10.

faith, in spoyling it of charitie : they consider not what the Apostle in that place meaneth by faith . For when in the chapter next before it, he had spoken of the diuerse giftes of the holy Ghost, among the which he had reckened the diuerse kindes of languages , power and prophecie , and had exhorted the Corinthians to follow the best of these giftes , that is to say , such giftes whereby more profit and comoditie might come to the whole dody of the Church: he streightway saide further , that he woulde shewe them yet a more excellent way. That all such giftes, how excellent soeuer they be of them selues, yet are nothing to be esteemed, vnlesse they serue charitie. For they were geuen to the edifying of the Church , and vnlesse they be applied therevnto, they lose their grace. For prooffe of this he particularly reherfeth them , repeting the selfe same giftes that he had spoken of before, but in other names. And he vseth the wordes Powers and Faith, for all one thing, that is for the power to do miracles. Sith therefore this, whether ye call it power or faith , is a particular gifte of God , which euery vngodly man may both haue and abuse , as the gifte of tongues, as prophecie and other giftes of grace : it is no maruell if it be seuered from charitie . But all the error of these men standeth in this , that where this worde Faith , hath diuerse significations , they not considering the diuersitie of the thing signified, dispute as though it were taken for one thinge in all places alike. The place of Iames which they allege for maintainance of the same error , shall be els where discussed . But although for teachings sake , when we meane to shewe what manner of knowel dge of God there is in the wicked , we graunt that there are diuerse sortes of faith: yet we acknowledge and speake of but one faith of the godly , as the Scripture teacheth . Many in deede doe beleue that there is a God , they thinke that the Historie of the Gospell and other partes of the Scripture are true (as commonly we are wonte to iudge of such thinges , as either are reported being done long ago, or such as we our selues haue bene presente at and seene.) There be also some that goe further , for bothe they beleue the worde of God to be a mooste assured oracle , and they do not altogether despise his commaundementes , and they somewhat after a sorte are moued with his threateninges and promises . It is in deede testified that such haue faith : but that is spoken out by abuse , because they do not with open vngodlinesse fight against the worde of God, or refuse or despise it : but rather pretende a certaine shew of obedience.

10 But this image or shadowe of faith , as it is of no value , so is it is it not worthy of the name of faith. From the sound trueth wherof how farre it differeth, although it shall be hereafter more largely entreated, yet there is no cause to the contrary, why it shoulde not now be touched by the way. It is sayd that Simon Magus beleued, which yet within a litle after bewraied his owne vnbeliefe. And whereas it is said that he beleued, we do not vnderstand it as some do, that he fayned a beliefe when he had none in his heart: but we rather thinke that being ouercome with the maiesty of the Gospell, he had a certaine faith such as it was, and so acknowledged Christ to be the author of life and saluation, that he willingly professed himselfe to be one of his. After the same manner it is said in the Gospel of Luke, that they beleue for a time, in whom the seede of the word is choked vp before it bring foorth frute, or before it take any roote at all, it byandby withereth away and perisheth: we dout not that such delited with a certaine tast of the word do greedily receiue it, and beginne to feele the diuine force of it: so farre that with deceitful counterfaying of fayth, they beguile not onely other mens eyes, but also their owne mindes. For they perswade themselues, that that reuerence which they shew to the word of God, is most true godlinesse, because they thinke that there is no vngodlynesse but manifest and confessed reproch or contempt of his word. But what manner of assent soeuer that be, it pearceth not to the very hart to remaine there stablished: & though somtime it semeth to haue take rootes, yet those are not liuely rootes. The heart of man hath so many secret corners of vanity, is full of so many hiding holes of lying, is couered with so guilefull hypocrisie, that it oft deceiueth himselfe. But let them that gorie in such shadowes of faith vnderstande, that therein they are no better than the Deuill. But that first sorte of men are farre worse than the Deuill, which do senselessly heare and vnderstande those things for knowledge whereof the Deuills do tremble. And the other are in this point egall with the Deuill, that the feelinge such as it is wherewith they are touched, turneth onely to terrour and discouragement.

11 I knowe that some thinke it hard, that we assigne fayth to the reprobate, whereas Paule affirmeth fayth to be the frute of election. Which dout yet is easily dissolued: for though none receiue the light of faith, nor do truely feele the effectual working of the Gospell, but they that are foreordained to saluation: yet experience sheweth that the reprobate are sometime moued with the same feelinge that the elect are, so that in their owne iudgement they nothing differ frō the elect. Wherefore it is no absurdity, that the Apostle ascribeth to them the tast of the heauenly giftes, that Christ ascribeth to them a faith for a time: not that they soundly perceauē the spirituall force of grace and assured light of faith: but because the Lord, the more to cōdemne them and make them inexcusable, conueyeth himselfe into their mindes so farre foorth, as his goodnesse may be tasted without the spirite of adoption. If any obiect, that then there remayneth nothing more to the faithfull whereby to proue certainly their adoption: I answerē that though there be a great likenesse and affinity betwene the elect of God, and them that are endued with a falling faith for a time, yet there liueth in the elect only that affiance which Paul speaketh of, that they crie with full mouth, Abba, Father. Therefore as God doth regenerate onely the elect with incorruptible seede for euer, so that the seede of life planted in their hearts neuer perisheth: so soundly doth he seale in them the grace of his adoptiō, that it may be stable & sure. But this withstandeth not but that that other inferior working of the Spirite may haue his course, euen in the reprobate. In the meane season the faithful are taught, carefully & humbly to examine themselues, least in steade of assurednes of faith, do creepe in carelesse confidēce of the flesh. Beside that, the reprobate do neuer conceiue but a confused feelinge of grace, so that they rather take holde of the shadow than of the sounde body, because the holy Spirite doth properly seale the remission of sinnes in the elect onely, so that they apply it by speciall faith to their vse. But yet it is truely said, that the reprobate beleue God to be mercifull vnto them, because they receiue the gift of reconciliation, although confusedly and not plainly enough: not that they are partakers of the selfe same fayth or regeneration with the children of God, but because they seeme to haue as well as they, the same beginning of faith, vnder a cloke of Hypocrisie. And I denie not, that God doth so farre giue light vnto theyr mindes, that they acknowledge his grace, but he maketh that same feelinge so different from the peculiar testimonie which he giueth to his elect, that they neuer come to the sounde effect and fruition thereof. For he doth not therefore shewe himselfe mercifull vnto them, for that he hauinge truely deliuered them from death, doth receiue them to his sauegarde, but onely he discloseth to them a present mercye. But he vouchsafeth to graunt to the onely elect the liuely roote of fayth, so that they continue to the ende. So is that obiection aunswered, if God do truely shewe his grace, that the same remayneth perpetually stablished, for that there is no cause to the contrarie, but that God may enlighten some with a present feelinge of his grace, which afterwarde vanisheth sheth away.

12 Also though faith be a knowledge of Gods kindenes toward vs, and an assured persuasion of the trueth thereof: yet it is no maruell that the feelinge of Gods loue in temporall thinges doth vanish away: which although it haue an affinity with faith, yet doth it much differ from faith. I graunt, the will of God is vnchangeable, and the trueth thereof doth alway stedfastly agree with it selfe, but I deny that the reprobate do proceede so farre as to attaine vnto that secreete reuelation, which the Scripture sayth to belonge to the elect onely. Therefore I deny that they do either conceiue the will of God as it is vnchangeable, or do stedfastly embrace the trueth thereof, because they abide in a feeling that vanisheth away: Like as a tree that is not planted deepe enough to take liuely rootes, in processe of time waxeth drie, although for a fewe yeares it bringeth foorth not onely blossomes and leaues, but also frute. Finally, as by the fall of the first man, the Image of God might haue beene blotted out of his minde, and soule; so it is no maruell, if God do shine vpon the reprobate with certaine beames of his grace, which afterward he suffereth to be quenched. And there is no cause to the contrary, but that he may lightly ouer wash some, and throughly soke other some with the knowledge of his Gospell. This is in the meane time to be holden for trueth, that how small and weake soeuer faith be in the elect, yet because it is to them a sure pledge of the Spirite of God, and a seale of their adoption, the printe thereof can neuer be blotted out of their heartes: as for the reprobate, that they are ouerspred with such a light as afterwarde commeth to nought. And yet the Spirite is not deceitefull, because he geueth not life to the seede that he casteth in their heartes, to make it abide alwayes incorruptible, as he doth in the elect. I go yet further, for whereas it is euident by the teachinge of the Scripture and by dayely experience, that the reprobate are sometime touched with the feelinge of Gods grace, it must needes be that there is raised in their heartes a certaine desire of mutuall loue. So for a time there liued in Saul a godly affection to loue God, by whom he knew himselfe to be fatherly handeled, and therefore was delited with a certaine sweetenesse of his goodnesse. But as the persuasion of the fatherly loue of God is not fast rooted in the reprobate, so do they not soundely loue him agayne as his children, but are led with a certayne affection like hired seruauntes. For to Christ onely was that Spirite of loue giuen, to this ende, that he shoulde poure it into his members. And truely that saying of Paule extendeth no further, but to the elect only: The Ro. 5.5.

Cap. 2. Of the maner how to receiue

loue of God is poured abroad into our heartes by the holy Spirit that is giuen vs, euen the same loue that engendreth the same confidence of calling vpon him, which I haue before touched. As on the contrary side we see God to be maruelously angry with his children, whom yet he cesseth not to loue: not that in himselfe he hateth the, but because his will is to make them afrayd with the feelinge of his wrath, but to the content to abate their pride of flesh, to shake of their drouinesse, and to moue them to repentance. And therefore all at one time they conceiue him to be both angry with them or with their sinnes, and also mercifull vnto them: because they not faynedly do pray to appease his wrath, to whom yet they flee with quiete assured trust. Hereby it appeareth that it is not true that some do counterfaite a shewe of faith, which yet do lacke the true faith, but while they are caried with a sodayne violent motion of Zeale, they deceiue themselues with false opinion, And it is no dout that sluggishnesse so possesseth them, that they do not well examine their heart as they ought to haue done. It is likely that they were such to whom (as Iohn witnesseth) Christ did not commit himselfe when yet they beleued in him: because he knew them all, and knew what was in man. If many did not fal from the common faith (I cal it common, because the faith that lasteth but a time hath a great likenesse and affinity with the liuely and continuinge faith) Christ would not haue sayd to his Disciples: If ye abide in my worde, then are ye truly my Disciples, and ye shall know the trueth, and the trueth shall make you free. For he speaketh to them that had embraced his doctrine, & exhorteth them to the encrease of faith, that they should not by their owne sluggishnesse quenche the light that is giuen them. Therefore doth Paul affirme, that faith peculiarly belongeth to the elect, declaring that many vanish away, because they haue not taken liuely roote. Like as Christ also saith in Matthew: euery tree y^e my father hath not planted, shalbe rooted vp. In other there is a grosser kinde of lyinge, that are not ashamed to mocke both God and men. Iames inueieth against y^e kind of men, that with deceitful pretense do wickedly abuse faith. Neither would Paule require of the children of God a faith vnfayned, but in respect that many do presumptuously chalenge vnto themselues that which they haue not, and with vaine coloured deceite do beguile other or sometime themselues. Therefore he compareth a good conscience to a chest wherein fayth is kept, because many in fallinge from good conscience, haue suffered shipwrecke of their faith.

13 We must also remember the doutfull signification of the word fayth.

faith. For oftentimes faith signifieth the sounde doctrine of religion, as in the place that we now alleaged, and in the same Epistle where Paule will haue Deacons to holde fast the mystery of faith in a pure conscience. Againe, where he publisheth the falling away of certaine from the faith. But on the other side he sayth that Timothee was nourished vp with the wordes of faith. Againe, where he sayth that prophane vanities and oppositions, falsely named sciences, are the cause that many departe from the faith: whom in an other place he calleth reprobate touchinge faith. As againe he chargeth Titus, saying, Warne them that they be sounde in the faith. By soundenesse he meaneth nothing else but purenesse of doctrine, which is easily corrupted and brought out of kinde by the lightnesse of men. Euen because in Christ, whom faith possesseth, are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge: therefore faith is worthily extended to signifie the whole summe of heauenly doctrine, from which it can not be seuered. Contrarywise sometime it is restrayned to signifie some particular obiekt, as when Matthew sayth, that Christ saw the faith of them that did let downe the man sicke of the palsey through the tiles and Christ himselfe crieth out that he founde not in Israell so great faith as the Centurion brought. But it is likely that the Centurion was earnestly bent to the healing of his daughter, the care whereof occupied all his minde: yet because being contented with the onely assent and answer of Christ, he required not Christs bodily presence, therfore in respect of this circumstance his faith was so much commended. And a litle here before we haue shewed, that Paul taketh faith for the gift of working miracles, which gift they haue that neither are regenerate by the Spirit of God, nor do hartily worship him. Also in an other place he setteth faith for y^e doctrine wherby we are instructed in faith. For where he wryteth that faith shall be abolished, it is out of question that that is meant by the ministry of the Church, which at this time is profitable for our weakenesse. In these formes of speach standeth a proportionall relation. But when the name of faith is vnproperly remoued, to signifie a false profession, or a lyinge title of faith, that should seeme to be as harde a figuratiue abuse as when the feare of God is settē for a corrupt and wrongfull manner of worshipping, as when it is oftentimes sayd in the holy History, that the foraine nations which hadde bin transplanted into Samaria and the places borderinge there about, feared the fayned Gods and the God of Israell: which is as much, as to mingle heauen and earth together.
 But now our question is, What is that faith which maketh the children of God different from the vnbeleuers, by which we call vpon

God by the name of our Father, by which we passe from death to life, and by which Christ the eternall saluation and life dwelleth in vs. The force and nature thereof I thinke I haue shortly and plaine-ly declared.

14 Now let vs againe go through all the partes of it, euen frō the beginning which being diligently examined, (as I thinke) there shall remaine nothing doutfull. When in defining faith we call it a know-ledge, we meane not therby a cōprehending, such as men vse to haue of those things that are subiect to mans vnderstandinge. For it is so far aboue it, that mās wit must go beyond & surmount it selfe to come vnto it, yea and when it is come vnto it, yet doth it not attayne that which it feeleth, but while it is perswaded of that which it conceiueth not, it vnderstandeth more by the very assurednesse of perswasion, than if it did with mans owne capacity throughly perceiue any thing familiar to man. Therefore Paule sayth very well, where he calleth it to comprehend what is the length, bredth, depth, & heighth, and to know the loue of Christ that farre surmounteth knowledge. For his meaninge was to signifie, that the thinge which our minde conceiueth by faith, is euery way infinite, and that this kinde of knowledge is farre hyer than all vnderstandinge. But yet because the Lord hath disclosed to his Saintes the secrete of his will which was hidden from ages and generations, therefore by good reason faith is in Scripture sometime called an acknowledginge: and Iohn calleth it a certaine knowledge, where he testifieth, that the faithfull do certaynely know that they are the children of God. And vndoubtedly they know it assuredly: but rather by being confirmed by perswasion of Gods trueth, than by beinge informed by naturall demon-stration. And this, also the wordes of Paule do declare sayinge, that while we dwell in the body, we are wandering abrode from the lord, because we walke by faith and not by sight: whereby he sheweth that those thinges which we vnderstande by faith, are yet absent from vs and are hidden from our sight. And hereupon we determine, that the knowledge of faith standeth rather in certainty than in com-prehending.

15 We further call it, a sure and stedfast knowledge, to expresse thereby a more sound constancy of perswasion. For as faith is not cō-tented with a doutful and rowling opinion, so is it also not contented with a darke and entangled vnderstanding: but requireth a full & fixed assurednesse, such as men are wont to haue of things founde by experience and proued. For vnbeliefe sticketh so fast and is so deepe rooted in our heartes, and we are so bent vnto it, that this which all men cōfesse with their mouth to be true, y^e God is faithful, no mā is without great contention perswaded in his heart. Specially when he cōmeth to the proufe, then the wauering of all men discloseth the fault that before was hidden. And not without cause the Scripture with so notable titles of cōmendation maintaineth the authority of the word of God, but endeouureth to giue remedy for the aforesayd disease, that God may obtaine to be fully beleued of vs in his promises. The wordes of the Lord (sayth Dauid) are pure wordes, as the Siluer tried ^{Psal. 119.} in a fornace of earth, fined seuen times. Againe, The word of the Lord ^{31.} fined is a shielde to all that trust in him. And Salomon confirminge ^{Pro. 30.} the same, and in a manner in the same wordes, sayth: Euery word of ^{5.} God is pure. But sith y^e whole 119. Psalme entreateth only in a manner vpon the same, it were superfluous to alleage any moe places. Truly so oft as God doth so cōmend his word vnto vs, he doth therein by the way reproche vs with our vnbeleuingnesse: because that commendation tendeth to no other end, but to roote vp all peruerse doutings out of our hearts. There be also many which so cōcciue the mercy of God, that they take litle comfort therof. For they be euen therewithall pinched with a miserable carefulnesse, while they doubt whether he will be mercifull to them or no, because they enclose within to narrow boundes the very same mercifulnesse, of which they thinke themselues, most assuredly perswaded. For thus they thinke with themselues, that his mercy is in deede great and plentifull poured out vpon many, offering it selfe and ready for all men: but that it is not certaine whether it will extende vnto them or no, or rather whether they shall attaine vnto it or no. This thought when it stayeth in the midde race, is but a halfe. Therefore it doth not so confirme the spirit with assured quietnes, as it doth trouble it with vnquiete doubtfulnesse. But there is a far other feeling of full assurednesse, which in the Scriptures is alway assigned to faith, euen such a one as plainly setting before vs the goodnes of God, doth clearly put it out of doubt. And that can not be, but that we must needes truly feele and proue ^{Eph. 3.} in our selues the swetenesse thereof. And therefore the Apostle out ^{12.} of faith deriueth assured confidence, and out of it againe boldnesse. For thus he sayth, that by Christ we haue boldnesse, and an entrance with confidence, which is through faith in him. By which words truly he sheweth, that it is no right sayth, but when we are bolde with quiet mindes to shew our selues in the presence of God. Which boldnesse procedeth not but of assured confidence of Gods good will and our saluation. Which is so true, that many times this word Faith, is vsed for Confidence.

16 But hereupon hangeth the chiefe stay of our faith, that we do not thinke the promises of mercy which the Lord offreth to be true only in other beside vs, & not at all in our selues: but rather that in inwardly embracing them, we make them our owne. From hense
Ro. 5. 1. proceedeth that confidence which the same Paule in an other place calleth peace, vnles some had rather say, that peace is deriued of it. It is an assurednes that maketh the cōscience quiete & chereful before God, without which the consciēce must of necessity be vexed, & in a maner torne in peeces with troublesome trembling, vnlesse perhaps it do forget God and it selfe, and so slomber a litle while. And I may truely say, For a litle while, for it doth not longe enjoy that miserable forgetfulnes, but is with oftē recourse of the remembrance of Gods iudgement sharply tormented. Briefely, there is none truely faithfull, but he that being perswaded with a sounde assurednesse that God is his mercifull and louing father, doth promise himselfe all thinges vpon trust of Gods goodnesse: and none but he that trusting vpon the promises of Gods good will toward him, conceiueth an vndouted
He. 3. 13 lookinge for of saluation: as the Apostle sheweth in these wordes: if we keepe sure to the ende our confidence and gloryinge of hope. For hereby he meaneth that none hopeth well in the Lorde, but he that with confidence glorieth that he is heire of the kingedome of heauen. There is none (I say) faithfull, but he that leaning vpon the assurednesse of his owne saluation, doth confidently triumphe vpon the Deuill and death, as we are taught by that notable concludinge
Rom. 8. sentence of Paule: I am perswaded (saith he) that neither death, nor
38. life, nor Angels, nor principalties, nor powers, nor thinges present, nor things to come, shalbe able to separate vs from the loue of God, wherewith he embraceth vs in Christ Iesu. And in like manner, the same Apostle thinketh, that the eyes of our minde are by no other meane well lightened, vnlesse we see what is the hope of the eternal Ephē 1. inheritance to which we are called. And ech where his common ma-
18. nner of teaching is such, that he declareth that no otherwise we do not well comprehend the goodnesse of God, vnlesse we gather of it the frute of great assurednesse.

17 But (some man will say) the faithfull do finde by experience a farre other thing within themselues, which in recording the grace of God toward them, are not onely tempted with vnquietenesse, which oftentimes chaunceth vnto them, but also are sometime shaken with most grieuous terrours: so great is the vehemency of temptations to throw downe their mindes: which thing seemeth not sufficiently wel to agree with that assurednesse of faith. Therefore this dout must be answe-

answered, if we will haue our afore sayd doctrine to stand. But truely, when we teache that fayth ought to be certaine and assured, we do not imagine such a certaintie as is touched with no doutinge, nor such an assurednesse as is assayed with no carefulnesse: but rather we say, that the faithfull haue a perpetuall strife with their owne distrustfullnesse. So farre be we from settlinge their consciences in such a peaseable quietenesse, as may be interrupted with no troubles at all. Yet on the other side we say, that in what sorte soeuer they be afflicted, they do neuer fall and departe from that assured confidence which they haue conceiued of the mercy of God: The Scripture setteth forth no example of faith more plaine, or more notable than in Dauid, specially if a man beholde the whole continuall course of his life. But yet howe he was not alway of quiete minde, himselfe declareth by innumerable complaintes, of which at this time it shall be sufficient to choose out a fewe. When he reprocherh his owne soule with troublesome motions, what is it else but that he is angry with his owne vnbeleuingnesse? Why tremblest thou my soule (sayth he) and why art thou disquieted within me? trust in God. And truely that same discouragement was a playne token of destruction, euen as if he thought himselfe to be forsaken of God. And in an other place we reade a larger cōfession therof, where he saith: I sayd in my ouerthrow, I am cast out from the sight of thy eies. Also in an other place he disputeth with himselfe in carefull and miserable perplexity, yea & quareleth of the very nature of God, sayinge: Hath God forgotten to haue mercy? will he cast of for euer? And yet harder is that which followeth: But I haue sayd, To die is mine: charges are of the right hande of the hiest. For, as in despeare he condemneth himselfe to destruction, and not only confesseth himselfe to be tossed with douting, but as if he were vanquished in battell, he leaueth nothing to himself, because God hath forsaken him, and hath turned to destroy him, the same hande that was wont to be his helper. Wherefore not without cause he exhorteth his soule to returne to her quietenesse, because he had found by experience, that he was tossed amōg troublesome waues. And yet (which is maruellous) in all these assaults, faith vpholdeth the heartes of the godly, and is truely like vnto a Date tree to endeavour and rise vpward against all burdens, howe great soeuer they be: as Dauid when he might seeme to be viterly ouerwhelmed, yet in rebuking himselfe, cesseth not to rise vp to God. And truely he that striuinge with his owne weakenesse, resorteth to faith in his troubles, is already in a manner conquerour. Which may be gathered by this sentence and other like: Waite for the Lord, be strong, he shall strengthen thy heart:waite for the Lord.He reprocheth himfelfe of fearefulnes; & in repeating the same twife,cōfelleth himfelfe to be sometimes fubieft to many troublefome motions.And in the meane time he doth not onely become displeafed with himfelfe in thefe faultes, but earnestly endeouoreth to amendement. Truely if we will more nerely by good examination compare him with Achaz,there fhall be founde great difference.Efay was sent to bring remedy to the carefull griefe of the wicked king and hipocrite,and fpake vnto him in thefe wordes:Be in fauegard and be quiete:feare not, &c. But what did Achaz? As it was before fayd,that his heart was moued as the trees of the woode are shaken with winde,though he hearde the promife,yet he celled not to quake for feare. This therefore is the propre reward & punishment of vnbeliefe,fo to tremble for feare,that in temptatio he turneth himfelfe away from God,that doth not open to himfelfe the gate by faith. Contrariwife the faithfull whom the weighty burden of temptations maketh to ftoupe,and in a maner oppreffeth,do constantly rife vp,although not without trouble and hardineffe.And because they know their owne weakeneffe,they pray with the Prophet:Take not the word of trueth away from my mouth continually.By which words we are taught,that sometime they become dumme as though their faith were ytterly ouerthrowen, yet they faint not,nor turne their backes,but proceede in their battel,& with praier do encourage their flouthfulneffe, leaft by fauoringe themfelues they fhould grow to vnfenfible dulneffe.

18 For the vnderftanding therof,it is needefull to returne to that diuifion of the flefh and the fpirite, whereof we made mention in an other place, which doth in this behalfe moft clearly appeare. The godly heart therefore feeleth a diuifion in it felfe, which is partely delited with fweteneffe by acknowledging of the goodneffe of God, and partly grieued with bitterneffe by feelinge of his owne miferie, partly refteth vpon the promife of the Gofpell,and partly trembleth by reason of the testimony of his owne wickedneffe:partly reioyseth with conceiuing of life,and partly quaketh for feare of death.Which variation commeth by imperfection of faith,forasmuch as we neuer be in fo good cafe in the courfe of this present life, as beinge healed from all difeafe of diftruftefulneffe to be altogether filled & poffeffed with faith. Hereupon proceede thofe battels, when the diftruftefulnes that abideth in the remnants of the flefh,rifeth vp to affaile the faith that is inwardly conceiued.But if in a faithfull minde affurednes be mixed with doubtfulneffe, come we not then alway to this point, that faith ftandeth not in a certaine and cleare knoweledge,but in a darke darke & doutfully entangled knowledge of Gods will toward vs? No, not so. For though we be diuersely drawn with sundry thoughtes, yet are we not therefore byandby seuered from faith: though we be vexed with tossing vp and downe of distrustfulnesse, yet are we not therefore drowned in the bottomlesse depth therof: and though we be shaken, yet be we not thrust downe out of our place. For this is alway the ende of this battell, that faith doth at length with wrastling ouercome those hard troubles wherewith when she is so besieged, she seemeth to be in danger.

19 Let this be the summe of all. So soone as any drop of faith, be it neuer so small, is poured into our heartes, we byandby beginne to beholde the face of God milde and pleasaunt, and louing toward vs: yet the same we see from a farre of, & farre distant from vs, but with so sure sight, that we know we are not deceiued. Fiō these forward, howe much we profit (as we ought continually to profit) as it were by proceeding further, we come vnto so much the nerer, & therefore certainer beholding of him, & by very continuance he is made more familiar vnto vs. So we see, that the minde enlightened with the knowledge of God, is first holden wrapped in much ignorance, which by litle and litle is wiped away. Yet the same minde is not so hindered by being ignorant of some things, or by darkely seing that which she seeth, but that she enioyeth a clere knowledge of Gods wil toward her, which is the first and principall point in faith. For as if a man being shut vp in prison, haue beames of the sunne shininge in, sidelonge at a narrowe window, or as it were but halfe glimmeringe, he wanteth in deede the free beholdinge of the sunne, yet he seeth with his eyes an vndouted brightnesse thereof, and receiueth the vse of it: so we being bounde with the fetters of an earthly body, howsoeuer we be on eche side shadowed with much darkenes, yet we are sufficiently enlightened vnto perfect assurednesse, by the light of God, extending his beames of light vpō vs, though it be but a litle, to shew forth his mercy.

20 Both these pointes the Apostle very well teacheth in diuerse places. For when he sayth, that we know vnperfectly, and propheticie vnperfectly, and see by a darke speakinge as by a glasse, he sheweth how slender a litle portion of the true godly wisdom is giuen vs in this present life. For though those words do not expressely shew that our faith is vnperfect so longe as we grone vnder this burden of the flesh, but that it happeneth vnto vs by our owne imperfection that we haue neede to be continually exercised in learning: yet he secretly declareth that that thinge which is infinite, can not be comprehended by our small capacity, and narrow compasse. And this Paule reporteth of the whole church, but vnto euery one of vs, his owne dullnesse is a hinderance and stay that he can not come so nere as were to be wished. But how sure and vndeceiueable a tast of it selfe, euen a small droppe of faith doth make vs feele, the same Apostle sheweth in another place, where he affirmeth, that by the Gospell we behold the glory of God with vncouered face, hauing no veile betwene vs and it, so effectually that we be transformed into the same image. In such entanglementes of ignorance there must needs be wrapped together both much doutinge and fearefull trembling, specially forasmuch as our heart, by a certaine naturall instinct of it selfe, is inclined to vnbeleuingnesse. Beside that, there be tentations which both infinite in number, and diuerse in kinde, do oftentimes with great sodaine violence assaile vs. But specially our owne conscience oppressed with heauy burden of sinnes lying vpon it, doth sometime lament and grone with it selfe, and sometime accuseth it selfe: sometime secretly murmureth, and sometime is openly troubled. Whether therefore aduersities do shewe an apparance of the wrath of God, or the conscience doth finde in it selfe any proufe or matter of his wrath, from thense vnbeliefe doth take weapons and engines to vanquishe the faith withall: which are alway directed to this ende, that we thinking God to be our aduersarie and hatefully bent against vs, shoulde both not hope for any helpe at his hande, & also be afraid of him as of our deadly enemy.

21 To beare these assaultes, faith doth arme & fortifie her selfe with the word of God. And when such a tentation assaileth, that God is our enemy, because he is sharpe against vs: faith on the other side answereth, that euen when he punisheth he is also mercifull because his chastisement cometh rather of loue than of wrath. When faith is striken with this thought that God is a reuenger of iniquities, against that stroke he setteth his pardon ready for all offenses, so oft as the sinner resorteth to the mercifulnesse of the Lorde. So a godly minde howsoeuer it be in maruelous wise tossed and vexed, yet at length riseth vp aboute all daungers, & neuer suffereth the confidence of Gods mercy to be plucked away from it: But rather whatsoeuer contentions do trouble and wery it, in the ende they turne to the assurednesse of this confidence. And hereof this is a proufe: that the holy ones, when they thinke theselues most of all pressed with the vengeance of God, yet euen then do make their complaints to the same God: and when it seemeth that they shall not be heard at all, euen then neuerthelesse they call vpon him. For to what purpose were it, to make their moane to him from whom they hoped for no comfort? truly they would neuer finde in their heartes to call vpon him, vnlesse they beleued that there were some helpe at his hande prepared for them. So the Disciples, in whom Christ blameth their smalnesse of faith, complained in deede that they perished, but yet they called to him for help. And when he rebuketh them for their small faith, yet he doth not reiect them from the number of his, nor maketh them of the number of the vnbeleuers, but stirreth them to shake of that fault. Therefore we affirme againe that which we haue aboue spoken, that the roote of faith is neuer plucked out of a godly heart, but sticketh so fast in the bottome, that howsoeuer it be shaken and seeme to bende this way or that way, the light therof is so neuer quenched or choked vp, but that it lieth at least hidden vnder some embers: and by this token is plainly shewed, that the worde which is an vncorruptible seede, bringeth forth frute like to it selfe, the spring whereof doth neuer wither & vtterly perish. For whereas this is the extremest matter of despeire to the holy ones, to feele according to the cōsideraion of present thinges, the hande of God bent to their destruction: yet Iob affirmeth that his hope shal proceede so farre, that though God do kill him, yet he will not therefore cesse to trust in him. This is the trueth therefore: Vnbeliefe reigneth not within the heartes of the godly, but outwardly assaileth them: neither doth she deadly wounde them with her wepons, but only troubleth them, or so hurteth thē, that yet the woūd is curable. For faith, as Paul teacheth, serueth vs for a shield that beinge holden vp against weapons, doth so receiue the force of them, that it either vtterly driueth thē backe, or at least so breaketh their violēce, that they can not pearce them to danger of life. Therefore when faith is shaken, it is like as if a stronge souldiour with the violent stroke of a dart be compellied to remoue his foote, and geue grounde a litle: and when faith it selfe is wounded, that is like as if his buckler by some stroke be in some parte broken, but yet so that it is not striken through. For alway the godly minde will attaine to rise thus hie as to say with Dauid, If I walke in the midst of the shadow of death, I will feare none euill, because thou art with me. It is in deede terrible to walke in the darkenes of death, and it can not be but that the faithful, how much strength soeuer they haue, must be afraid of it. Yet because this thought surmounteth it, that they haue God present with them, and prouiding for their safety, that feare is overcome with assurednesse. For (as Augustine sayth) how great engines soeuer the deuil raiseth vp against vs, so long as he possesseth not the place of the heart, where faith dwelleth, he is cast out of the dores.

And so if we may iudge by the successe, the faithfull not only escape safe from euery battell, so that by and by receiuing fresh courage they are ready to come againe into the field: but also that is fulfilled which Iohn saith in his canonical Epistle: This is the victory that ouercometh the world, euen your faith. For he affirmeth that it shal not onely winne the victory in one or few battels, or against some one assault, but also that it shall get the ouerhande of the whole world, although it be a thousand times assailed.

22 There is an other kinde of feare and trembling, but such a one as by it the assurednesse of faith is so nothing at all diminished, that thereby it is the more soundly stablished. That is, when the faithfull either in thinking that the examples of Gods vengeance against the wicked are shewed for lessons for them to learne by, do carefully beware that they happen not to prouoke Gods wrath against themselues with the same offenses: or recordinge with themselues their owne misery, do learne to hang altogether vpon the Lord without whom they see themselues to be more fickle and sooner vanishinge than any blast of winde. For when the Apostle, in settinge foorth the scourges wherewith the Lord in olde time had punished the people of Israell, putteth the Corinthians in feare that they entangle not themselues with like euils: he doth not thereby abate their affiance, but only shaketh away the dulnes of the flesh by which faith is wont more to be oppressed than strengthened. And when he taketh occasion of y^e Iewes fall to exhort him that standeth, to take heede that he fall not, he doth not thereby bid vs to wauer, as though we were not fully assured of our stedfastnesse, but only he taketh away arrogant presumption and rash trusting to much in our owne strength, that after the thrusting out of the Iewes, the Gentiles being receiued into their place, should not to much outrageously triumphe against the. Albeit he speaketh there not only to the faithfull, but also in the same saying comprehendeth the Hypocrites that gloried onely in outward shew. For neither doth he admonish euery man particularly, but makinge a comparison betwene the Iewes & the Gentiles, after y^e he had shewed that the Iewes in this that they were reiecte, did suffer iust punishment for their vnbeliefe and vnthankesfulnesse, he also exhorted the Gentiles that they should not, by being proud and extolling themselues, loose the grace of adoption lately conueyed into them. But as in that generall reiecting of the Iewes, there remained yet some that were not fallen from the couenant of adoption, so out of the Gentiles there might arise some, which without true faith, should be puffed vp onely with foolish confidence of the flesh, and so abuse Gods louing knidenesse to their

owne destruction. But although you take this as spoken to the elect & faithfull, yet thereupon shall folow no inconuenience. For it is one thinge to holde downe the rash presumption which out of the remnantes of the flesh creepeth sometime euen into the holy ones, that with vaine confidence it waxe not outragiously wanton: and an other thinge to strike the cōscience with feare, that it rest not with full a flurednesse in the mercy of God.

23 The, when he teacheth, that with feare & trembling we should worke our owne saluation, he requireth nothinge else, but that we should accustome vs with much abacing of our selues, reuerently to looke vp vnto the mightinesse of God. For truely nothing doth so much awake vs to cast all our confidence & assurance of minde vpon the Lord as doth the distrust of our selues and carefulnes conceived by knowledge in cōscience of our own wretchednes. And according to this meaning is that saying in the Prophet to be taken: In the multitude of thy goodnesse I will entre into thy temple: I will worship in feare. Where he comely cōioyneth the boldnes of faith that leaneth vpon Gods mercy with a reuerent feare, wch we must needs feele so oft as comming into the sight of Gods maiesty, we perceiue by the glorious brightnesse thereof, how great is our owne filthinesse. And Salomon sayth truely, where he pronounceth the man blessed, that continually maketh his owne heart afraid, for by hardning thereof men fall hedlong into euill. But such feare he meaneth as may make vs more heedfull, not such wherby we should be troubled & vterly fall: euen such a feare as when the minde confounded in it selfe, doth recouer it selfe againe in God: when despeiring it selfe, it reuieth by trust in him. Therefore there is no cause to the contrary, but that the faithfull may, at one time both be in feare, and also enjoy most assured cōfort, in respect that sometime they turne their eyes to behold their owne vanity, & sometime they cast the thought of their minde vpon the trueth of God. But how (will some man say) shall feare and faith dwell both in one minde? euen thus, as contrarily vn sensible, dulnesse, and carefulnesse. For wheras the wicked trauaile to procure to themselues a want of griefe, that no feare of God might trouble them, yet, the iudgement of God so presseih them, that they can not attaine that which they desire. So there is nothing to withstande, but that God may exercise them that be his to humility, that in fighting valiantly, they may restraints themselues vnder the bridle of modesty. And by the processe of the text it appeareth, that this was the enter of the Apostle, where he assigneth the cause of feare, and trembling to be the good pleasure of God, whereby, he giueth to them that be, his both to will well, and valiantly to go through with it. According se. 3 5 to this meaning ought we to take that sayinge of the Prophet: The children of Israel shall feare God and his goodnesse: because not only, godlines engēdreth the reuerence of God, but the very swetenesse and pleasant tast of grace, filleth man beinge discouraged in himselve with feare & admiration, to make him hang vpon God, and humbly yeelde himselve subiect to his power.

24 Yet we do not hereby make roome to that most pestilent Philosophie, which many haltepapistes at this day beginne to coyne in corners. For, because they can not defende that grosse doubtfulnesse which hath bin taught in Schooles, they flie to an other deuise, to make a confidence mingled with distrustfulnes. They confesse, that so oft as we looke vnto Christ, we finde in him full matter to hope wel: but because we are alwayes vnworthy of those good things that are offered vs in Christ, they would haue vs to wauer & stagger in beholding of our owne vnworthinesse. Briefely, they place conscience so betwene hope & feare, that it altereth from the one to the other, by ent. rchangeable times & courses: and they so compare faith & hope together, that when the one springeth vp, the other is pressed downe, when the one ariseth, the other againe falleth. So when Satan seeth that those open engines wherewith before time he was wont to destroy the assurednesse of faith, do now nothinge preuaile, he endeuoreth by crooked vndermininges to ouerthrow it. But what maner of confidence shall that be, which shall now and then yeelde to desperation? If (say they) thou consider Christ, there is assured saluation: but if thou returne to thy selfe, there is assured damnation. Therefore of necessity distrust and good hope must by enterchangeable courses reigne in thy minde: As though we ought to imagine Christ standing a farre of, and not rather dwelling within vs. For therefore we looke for saluation at his hande, not because he appeareth a farre of vnto vs, but because he hath graffed vs into his body, & so maketh vs partakers not onely of all his good thinges, but also of himselve. Therefore I thus turne this their argument against themselues: If thou consider thy selfe, there is certaine damnation. But because Christ with al his good thinges is by way of communicinge so giuen vnto thee that all his thinges are made thine, and thou art made a member of him, yea & all one with him: his righteousnesse drowneth thy sinnes, his saluation taketh away thy damnation: he by his worthinesse commeth betwene thee and God, that thy vnworthinesse come not in the sight of God. Briefely, this is the trueth: we ought neither to separate Christ from vs, nor vs from him, but with both handes to holde fast that

that fellowship whereby he hath coupled himselfe vnto vs. So the Apostle teacheth vs: The body in dede (saith he) is dead by reason of sinne: but the Spirit of Christ that dwelleth in you, is life for righteousnesse. According to these mens trifeling deuise he shoulde haue saide, Christ in dede hath life with himselfe: but you, as you be sinners, remaine subiect to death & damnation. But he saith farre otherwise. For he teacheth that that damnation which we deserue of our selues, is swallowed vp by the saluation of Christ, and to proue it, he vseth the same reason that I haue alleged, because Christ is not without vs, but dwelleth within vs, and cleaueth vnto vs not onely with vndiuidable knot of fellowship, but with a certaine maruellous communion daily more and more groweth with vs into one body, till he be made altogether one with vs. And yet I denie not, as I haue said a litle before, that sometime there happen certaine inrruptions of faith, as the weakenesse thereof is amonge violent sodeine motions bowed hether or thether. So in the thicke miste of tētations the light thereof is choked, but what so euer happeneth, it cesseth not from endeuour to seeke God.

25 And no otherwise doth Bernarde argue, when he purposely intreateth of this question in his fift Homelie in the Dēdication of the temple. Oftentimes (I say) by the benefite of God studying vpō the soule, me thinkes I finde in it two thinges as it were contrarie. If I beholde the soule it selfe, as it is in it selfe and of it selfe, I can say nothing more truely of it, than that it is viterly brought to nought. What neede I now to reckon vp particularly all the miseries of the soule, how it is loaden with sinnes, couered with darknesse, entangled with deceitfull enticementes, itching with lustes, subiect to passions, filled with illusions, alway enclined to euill, bent to all kindes of vice, finally ful of shame and confusion? Now if all the very righteousnesse of it being looked vpō by the light of trueth be found like a clothe stained with floures, then what shall the vnrighteousnesse thereof be accompted? If the light that is in vs be darkenesse, how great shall the very darkenesse be? What then? without doubtē man is made like vnto vanitie: man is brought to naught: man is nothing. But how then is he vtterly nothing, whome God doth magnifie? How then is he nothing, towarde whome Gods hearte is set? Brethren, let vs take hearte againe. Though we be nothing in our owne heartes, peradventure there may somewhat of vs lie hidden in the hearte of God. O father of mercies? O father of the miserable, how doest thou set thy hearte towarde vs? For thy hearte is where thy treasure is. But how be we thy treasure, if we be nothing? All nations are so before thee as if they were not, they shalbe reputed as nothing. Euen before thee, not within thee: so in the iudgement of thy truth, but not in the affection of thy pitie. Thou callest those things that are not, as though they were. Therefore both they are not, because thou callest those things that are not, & also they are bycause thou callest them. For though they are not, in respect of them selues, yet with thee they are, according to that saying of Paule, not of the workes of righteousness, but of him that calleth. And then he saith, that this coupling together of both considerations is marvellous. Truely those things that are knit together, doe not the one destroy the other. Which also in the conclusion he more plainly declareth in these wordes. Now if with both these considerations we diligently looke vpon our selues what we be, yea in the one consideration how we be nothing, and in the other how much we be magnified, I thinke our glorying semeth to be tempered, but peradventure it is more encreased. Truely it is perfectly stablished, that we glorie not in our selues but in the Lorde. If we thinke thus: if he hath determined to saue vs, we shall by and by be deliuered: now in this we may take courage. But let vs climbe vp into a hier watché toure, and seeke for the citie of God, seeke for the temple, seeke for the house, seeke for the spouse. I haue not forgotten, but I say it with feare and reuerence, we I say be, but in the harte of God. We be, but by his allowing as worthy, not by our owne worthinesse.

26 Now, the feare of the Lorde, whereof commonly in euery place witnesse is borne to all the holy ones, and which is in some places called the beginning of wisdom, and in some places wisdom it selfe, although it be but one, yet it procedeth from a double vnderstanding. For God hath in himselfe the reuerence both of a Father and of a Lorde. Therefore he that will truely worship him, will endeuor to shewe himselfe both an obedient sonne and a seruisable seruant vnto him. The obedience that is geuen to him as to a father, the Lorde by his Prophet calleth honor: the seruice that is done to him as to a lorde, he calleth feare. The sonne (saith he) honoreth the father, and the seruant the lorde. If I be a father, where is my honor? If I be a lorde, where is my feare? But how soeuer he putteth difference betwene them, thou seest how he confoundeth them both together. Therefore let the feare of the lorde be vnto vs a reuerence, mingled with that same honor and feare. Neither is it any marvell, if one minde receiue both those affections. For he that considereth with himselfe what a father God is vnto vs, hath cause enough, although there were no helles at all, why he shoulde drede his displeasure.

sure more greuouely than any death. But also (such is the wantonnesse of our flesh to runne to licentiousnesse of sinning) to restraine the same by all meanes, we ought therewithall to take holde of this thought, that the Lorde vnder whose power we live, abhorreth all iniquitie, whose vengeance they shall not escape, that in liuing wickedly doe prouoke his wrath against themselues.

27 But that which Iohn saith, that feare is not in charitie, but perfect charitie casteth out feare, because feare containeth punishment, disagreeeth not with this that we say. For the wicked feare not God in this respect that they drede to incurre his displeasure, if they might do it without punishment: but because they know him to be armed with power to reuenge: therefore they shake for feare at the hearing of his wrath. And also they so feare his wrath, because they thinke that it hangeth ouer them, for that they looke euery moment when it shall fall vpon their heades. As for the faithfull: they (as is aboue said) both feare his displeasure more than punishment, and are not troubled with feare of punishment as if it did hang ouer their neckes, but they are made the more ware not to procure it. So saith the Apostle, when he speaketh to the faithfull: Be ye not deceiued: for this commeth the wrath of God vpon the children of vnbeleefe. He threateneth not that Gods wrath will come vpon them, but putteth them in minde to thinke vpon this, that the wrath of God is prepared for such wicked doings as he had recited, that they themselves shoulde not be willing also to proue it. Albeit it seldome happeneth that the reprobate be awakened with only and bare threatenings, but rather being already grosse and vnseensibly dull with their owne hardnesse, so oft as God thundreth from heauen they harden themselves to obstinacie, but when they are ones striken with his hande, then whether they will or no, they be enforced to feare. This feare they commonly call a seruile feare: and in comparison set it for contrarie to free natured and willing feare which becommeth children. Some other do suttelly thrust in a middle kinde, because that same seruile and constrained affection sometime so subdueth mens mindes, that they come willingly to the feare of God.

28 Now we vnderstand, that in the good will of God, wherunto faith is saide to haue respect, the possession of saluation and eternall life is obtained. For if we can wante no good thing while God is favorable vnto vs, it abundantly sufficeth vs to the assurednesse of saluation, when he himselfe doth assure vs of his loue. Let him shewe his face (saith the Prophet) and we shalbe safe. Wherupon the Scriptures determine this to be the summe of our saluation, that God putting away all enmities, hath receiued vs into fauour. Whereby they shew, that when God is reconciled vnto vs, there remaineth no perill, but that all thinges shall prosper well with vs. Therefore faith, hauing taken holde of the loue of God, hath promises of the present life and of the life to come, and perfect assurednesse of all good thinges: but that same such as may be gathered out of the word of God. For faith doth not certainly promise to it selfe either the length or honor or wealth of this life, for asmuch as God willed none of these thinges to be apointed vnto vs, but is contented with this assurednesse, that God will neuer faile how so euer many thinges faile vs that pertaine to the maintenance of this present life. But the chiefe assurednesse of faith resteth in expectation of the life to come, which is set out of doubt by the worde of God. But what so euer miseries and calamities beride vnto them whome God loueth, they can not worke the contrarie, but that his good will is perfect felicitie. Therefore when we did meane to expresse the summe of blessednesse, we named the fauor of God, out of which spring do flow vnto vs al kindes of good thinges. And this we may comonly note throughout the Scriptures, that when so euer mention is made not onely of eternall saluation, but also of any good thing in vs, we be alway called backe to the loue of God. For which cause Dauid saieth, that the goodnesse of God when it is felt in a godly hearte, is sweter and more to be desired than life it selfe. Finally, if all thinges els do flow vnto vs according to our owne wishing, and we be vncertaine of Gods loue or hatred, our felicitie shalbe accursed, and therefore miserable. But if the fauorable face of God do shine vnto vs, euen our very miseries shalbe blessed, because they are turned to helpes of our saluation. As Paule, when he heaped vp a rehearfall of all aduersities, yet he glorieth that he was not by them seuered from the loue of God: and in his prayers he alway beginneth at the fauour of God, from whence floweth all prosperitic. Likewise Dauid setteth the onely fauour of God against all the terrors that trouble vs. If (saith he) I shall walke in the midst of the shadowe of death, I will feare no euils, because thou art with me. And we alway feele that our mindes do wauer, vnlesse being contented with the fauour of God, they seeke their peace in it, and haue this inwardely fixed in them that is said in the Psalme, Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord, and the nation whome he hath chosen to him for his inheritance.

29 We make the fundation of faith to be the free promise of God, bycause faith proprely stayeth vpon it. For though faith doe beleue God to be true in all thinges, whether he commaunde or for-forbidde, whether he promise or threaten, and also obediently recei-ueth his commaundementes, and bewareth of thinges that he prohibiteth, and hath regard to his threatenings, yet properly it beginneeth at the promise, and therein continueth, and therevpon endeth. For faith seeketh for life in God, which is not founde in commaundemētes or declarations of penalties, but in promise of mercie, and in no other promise, but such as is freely geuen. For the conditionall promise, by which we are sente to our owne workes, doth no otherwise promise life, but if we perceiue it to stande in our selues.

Therefore if we will not haue our faith to tremble and wauer, we must stay it with that promise of saluation, which is willingly and liberally offred vs of the Lorde, rather in respect of our miserie, than of our worthinesse. Wherefore the Apostle beareth this witnessse of the Rom. 10 Gospell, that it is the word of faith: which name he taketh both from 8. the commaundementes and also from the promises of the lawe, because there is nothing that can stablisch faith, but that liberall embassage, by which God reconcileth the worlde to himselfe. Therefore the same Apostle oftentimes maketh a relatiō of faith and the Gos- Rom. 1. pell together, when he teacheth that the ministerie of the Gospell 6. and the power of God, to saluation to euery one that beleueth: that in it is reueled the righteousnes of God from faith to faith. And no maruell. For sith the Gospell is the ministerie of reconciliation, there is 2. Cor. 5 no other testimonie sure enough of Gods good will towarde vs; the 18. knowledge wherof faith requireth. Therefore when we say that faith must rest vpon free promise, we do not denie but that the faithful do euery way embrace and receiue the word of God, but we apoint the promise of mercie to be the prope marke of faith. Euen as the faith-full ought in deede to acknowledge God to be the iudge and pu-nisher of wicked doinges, and yet they properly haue regard vnto his mercifull kindenesse: for asmuch as he is described to them to Psa. 86.

all his workes.

30 Neither yet do I regarde the barkinges of Pighius, or such other dogges, when they finde faulte with this restraint, as though in diuiding faith, it did take holde but of one peece thereof. I graunt (as I haue already saide) that the generall obiect of faith (as they terme it) is the truth of God, whether he threaten or put vs in hope of fauour. Wherefore the Apostle ascribeth this to faith, that Noe Heb. 11. feared the destruction of the worlde, when it was not yet seene. If the 7.

Cap. 2. Of the maner how to receiue fear of a punishment shortly to come, was the worke of faith, then ought not the threatenings to be excluded out of the definition of faith. This is in deede true. But the cauillers do vniustly accuse vs, as though we denied that faith hath respect to all the partes of the worde of God: For our meaning is onely to shew those two things, first, that faith neuer stedfastly standeth vntill it come to the free promise: and than that we are no otherwise by it to be reconciled to God, but because it coupleth vs to Christ. Both those pointes are worthily to be noted. We seeke such a faith, which may make difference betwene the children of God and the reprobate, betwene the faithfull and the vnbeleuing. If a man do beleue that God both iustly commaundeth all that he commaundeth; and truly threatneth, shall he be therefore called faithfull? Nothing lesse. Therefore there can be no stedfast stay of faith, vnlesse it be grounded vpon the mercie of God. But now to what ende do we dispute of faith? Is it not that we may learne the way of saluation? But how doth faith bringe saluation but in respect that it graffeth vs into the body of Christ? Therefore there is no inconueniencē, if in the definition we do enforce the principall effect therof, & do ioynē vnto the general name, in stede of a difference that marke that seuereth the faithfull frō the vnbeleuing. Finally, the malicious haue nothing to finde fault withall

Rom. 10 in this doctrine; but they must wrappe vp Paule with vs in the same

31 But hereupon againe we gather that which we haue before declared, that faith doth no lesse neede the worde than the frute doth oftentimes creepe into mans minde; he shall well perceiue that they which do highly esteeme it as it is worthy, haue not a litle profited in faith. We all will confesse that God is able to do whatsoeuer he will, but when euen the least tentatiō throweth vs downe with feare, and amaseth vs with horroure, thereby appeareth plainly, that we diminish the estimation of Gods power, when we preferre aboue it those thinges, that Satan threatneth against Gods promises. This is the reason why Esaie, meaning to print into the hartes of the people the assurednesse of saluation, doth so honorably entreate of the infinite power of God. It seemeth oft that so sone as he hath begonne to speake of the hope of pardon and reconciliation, he by and by tourneth to an other thing, and wandereth about in long and superfluous circumstances, rehersing how maruelously the Lorde governeth the frame of heauen and earth and the whole ordre of nature; yet is there nothing that serueth not fittly for the circumstance of the matter that he speaketh of. For vnlesse the power of God whereby he is able to do all thinges be presently set before our eyes, our cares will hardely heare the worde, or will not esteeme it so much as it is worth. Beside that, here is declared his effectuall power, because godlinesse (as we haue already shewed in an other place) doth alway applie the power of God to vse and worke, specially it setteth before it selfe those workes of God; whereby he hath testified himselfe to be a father. Herevpon commeth that in the Scriptures is so often mention made of the redemption, whereby the Israelites might haue learned that God which was ones the author of saluation; will be an euerlasting preseruer thereof. And Dauid putteth vs in minde by his owne example, that those benefites which God hath particularly bestowed vpon euery man; do afterwarde auaille to the confirmation of his faith. Yea when God seemeth to haue forsaken vs; it behoueth vs to stretch out wittes further; that his auncient benefites may recomforte vs, as it is saide in an other Psalme: I haue bene mindefull of olde dayes, I haue studied vpon all thy workes. &c. Againe. I will remembre the workes of the Lorde, and his meruelles from the beginning. But because without the worde all quickly vanisheth away that we conceiue of the power of God and of his workes; therefore we do not without cause affirme that there is no faith; vnlesse God geue light vnto it with testimonie of his grace. But here a question might be moued; what is to be thought of Sara and Rebecca, both which being moued as it seemeth with zeale of faith, passed beyonde the bondes of the worde: Sara; when she feruently desired the promised issue, gaue her bondemaide to her housbande. It can not be denied but that she many wayes sinned: but nowe I touch onely this faulte, that being carried away with her zeale, she did not restraine herselfe within the boundes of Gods word, yet it is certaine that that desire proceeded of faith. Rebecca being certified by the oracle of God of the electiō of her sonne Iacob, procurēd his blessing by euill crafty meanes: she deceiued her housbande the witnesse and minister of the grace of God: she compelled her sonne to lie: she by diuerse guiles and deceites corrupted the truerth of God. Finally in making a scorne of his promise, she did as much as in her laie, destroe it. And yet this act, how much soeuer it was euill, and worthy of blame, was not without faith, for it was necessarie that she shoulde ouercome many offenses, that she might so earnestly endeouour to attaine that which without hope of earthly profite was full of great troubles and daungers. As we may not say that the holy Patriarche Isaac was altogether without faith, because he being by the same oracle of God admonished of the honour transferred to the yonger sonne, yet celsed not to be more fauourably bente to his first begotten sonne Esau. Truly these examples do teach, that oftentimes erroures are mingled with faith: but yet so that faith if it be a true faith, hath alwaye the vpper hande. For as the particular error of Rebecca did not make voide the effect of the blessing, so neither did it make voide her faith which generally reigned in her minde, and was the beginning and cause of that doinge. Neuerthelesse therein Rebecca vttered how ready mans minde is to fall so sone as he geueth him selfe neuer so litle libertie. But though mans default and weakenesse doth darken faith, yet it doth not quenche it: in the meane time it putteth vs in minde, how carefully we ought to hange vpon the mouth of God, and also confirmeth that which we haue taught, that faith vanisheth away, vnlesse it be vpholden by the worde: as the mindes both of Sara, and Isaac, and Rebecca had become vaine in their crooked wanderings out of the way, vnlesse they had bene by Gods secret bridle holden in obedience of the worde.

32 Againe, not without cause we include all the promises in Christ, forasmuch as in the knowledge of him the Apostle includeth all the Gospell: and in an other place he teacheth, that all the promises of God are in him, yea and Amen. The reason whereof is ready to be shewed. For if God promise any thing, he therein sheweth his good will: so that there is no promise of his, that is not a testimonie of his loue. Neither maketh it any matter that the wicked when they haue great and continual benefites of Gods liberalitie heaped vpon them, do therby wrap themselves in so much the more greuous iudgemēt.

For

For sith they do neither thinke nor acknowledge that those things come vnto them from the hand of God, for if they acknowledge it, they do not with them selues consider his goodnesse, therefore they can not thereby be better taught of his mercie than brute beastes, which according to the measure of their estate, do receiue the same frute of Gods liberalitie, and yet they perceiue it not. Neither doth it any more make against vs, that many times in refusing the promises apointed for them, they do by that occasion procure to them selues the greater vengeance. For although the effectuall working of the promises do then onely appeare, when they haue founde faith with vs, yet the force and naturall propertie of them is neuer extinguished by our vnbeleefe or vnthankfulnesse. Therefore when the Lorde by his promises doth prouoke man not onely to receiue, but also to thinke vpon the frutes of his bountifulnesse, he doth therewithall declare vnto him his loue. Wherevpon we must returne to this pointe, that euery promise is a testifying of Gods loue towarde vs. But it is out of questiō, that no man is loued of God but in Christ, he is the beloued Sonne, in whome the loue of the Father abiderh and resteth, and then from him poureth it selfe abroade vnto vs: as Paule teacheth, that we haue obtained fauour in the beloued one. Therefore it must needes be deriued and come vnto vs by meane of him. For this cause the Apostle in an other place calleth him oure peace: in an other place he setteth him oute as a bonde, whereby God is with fatherly naturall kindenes bounde vnto vs. It followeth then that we must caste our eyes vpon him, so oft as any promise is offered vs. And that Paule teacheth no absurditie, that all Gods promises whatsoever they be, are confirmed and fulfilled in him. There be certaine examples that make for the contrarie, For it is not likely that Naaman the Syrian, when he required of the Prophet the manner how to worship God aright, was instructed concerning the Mediator: yet his godlinesse is praised. Cornelius a Gentile and a Romaine, coulde scarcely vnderstande that which was knowen not to all the Iewes, yea and that very darkely: yet his almes and prayers were acceptable to God. And the sacrifice of Naaman, by the Prophetes aunswere allowed. Which thing neither of them coulde obtaine but by faith. Likewise it may be said of the Eunuche to whome Philippe was carried, which if he had not had some faith, woulde not haue taken vpon him the trauaile and expenses of so long a iourney, to worshippe. Yet we see, when Philippe examined him, how he bewrayed his ignorāce of the Mediator. And truely I graunt that their faith was partly vnexpressed, not onely concerning Christes person, but also concerning his power and the office committed vnto him of the Father. Yet in the meane time it is certaine, that they were instructed in such principles, as gaue then some tast of Christ, although but very small. Neither ought this to seeme strange. For neither would the Eunuche haue come in hast to Ierusalem from a farre country to worship an vnknowene God, neither did Cornelius whē he had once embraced the Iewish religion spende so much time, without being acquainted with the first groundes of true doctrine. As for Naaman, it had bene to fonde an absurditie for Elizeus when he taught him of small things, to haue saide nothing of the principall point. Therefore although there were among them a darke knowledge of Christ, yet it is not likely y^e there was no knoweledge because they did vse them selues in the sacrifices of the lawe, which must haue bene discerned by the very ende of them, that is Christ, from the false sacrifices of the Gentiles.

33 But this bare and outward declaration of the worde of God, ought to haue largely sufficed to make it be beleued, if our owne blindenesse and stubbournesse did not withstande it. But oure minde hath such an inclination to vanitie, that it can neuer cleaue fast vnto the trueth of God, and hath such a dulnesse, that it is alwaie blinde and can not see the light thereof. Therefore there is nothing auailably done by the worde without the enlightning of the holy Ghost. Whereby also appeareth, that faith is farre aboue mans vnderstanding. Neither shall it be sufficient that the minde be lightned with the spirit of God, vnlesse the hearte be also strengthened & stablished with his power. Wherein the Schoolemen do altogether erre, which in considering of faith, do onely take holde of a bare and simple assent by knowledge, leauing out the confidence and assurednesse of the hearte. Therefore faith is both waies a singular gift of God, both that the minde of man is clesed to tast the trueth of God, and that his hearte is stablished therein. For the holy Ghost not onely is the beginner of faith, but also by degrees encreaseth it, vntill by it he bring vs to the heauenly kingdome. That good thing (saith Paule) which was committed to thy keeping, kepe in the holy Ghost which dwelleth in vs. But how Paule saith that the holy Ghost is geuen by the hearing of faith, we may easily dissolue it. If there had bene but one onely gifte of the holy Ghost, then it had bene an absurditie for him to call the holy Ghost the effect of faith, which is the author and cause of faith. But when he maketh report of the giftes wherewith God garnisheth his Church, and by encreasinges of faith bringeth it to perfection, it is no meruell if he ascribe those thinges to faith which which maketh vs fitt to receiue them. This is reckened a most stráže conclusion, when it is said, that no man but he to whome it is geuen, can beleue in Christ. But that is partely bycause they do not consider either hōw secret and hie the heavenly wisdome is, or how great mans dulnesse is in conceiuing the misteries of God: and partely bycause they looke not vnto that assured and stedfast constantiess of hearte, that is to say; the chiefe parte of faith.

34 But if (as Paule preacheth) no man is witnessse of the will of man, but the spirit of man that is within him, then how shoulde man be sure of the will of God? And if the trueth of God be vncertaine among vs, in those things that we presently beholde with our eye, howe shoulde it be assured and steadfast among vs there where the Lord promiseth such thing as neither eye seeth, nor wit comprehendeth? But herein mans sharpnesse of vnderstanding is so ouerthrowene and faileth, that the first degree of profirng in Gods schoole, is to forsake his owne wit. For by it as by a veile cast before vs, we are hindered that we can not attaine the misteries of God, which are not disclosed but to litle ones. For neither doth flesh and bloude disclose, nor naturall man perceiue those things that are of the Spirite, but rather to him the learning of God is foolishnesse, because it is spiritually to be iudged. Therefore herein the helpe of the holy Ghost is necessarie, or rather herein his force only reigneth. There is no man that knoweth the minde of God, or hath bene his counsellor: but the holy Spirit searcheth out all things, euen the depe secretes of God, by whome it is brought to passe, that we knowe the minde of Christ. No man (saith he) can come to me, vnlesse my father that sent me, drawe him. Euery one therefore that hath hearde and learned of my father, commeth. Not that any man hath seene the father, but he that is sent of God. Euen as therefore we can not come vnto Christ, but being drawene by the Spirite of God: so when we be drawene, we are lifted vp in wit and minde aboue our owne vnderstanding. For the soule enlightned by him, taketh as it were a new sharpnesse of vnderstanding, wherewith it may beholde heauenly misteries, with brightnesse whereof it was before daseled in it selfe. And so mans vnderstanding receiuing brightnes by the light of the holy Ghost, doth neuer till then truely beginne to tast of those things that belong to the kingdome of God, being before altogether vsfauourie and without iudgement of tast to take assay of them. Therefore when Christ did notably set our vnto two of his Disciples y misteries of his kingdome, yet he nothing preuailed, vntill he opened their senses that they might vnderstand the Scriptures. When the Apostles were so taught by his Godly mouth, yet the Spirit of trueth must be sent vnto them, to poure into their mindes the same doctrine which they had hearde with their eares. The worde of God is like vnto the sunne that shineth vnto all them to whome it is preached, but to no profit among blinde men. But we are all in this behalfe blinde by nature, therefore it can not pearce into our minde but by the inward master the holy Ghost, making by his enlightning an entrie for it.

35 In an other place, when we had to entreat of the corruption of nature, we haue more largely shewed how vnfit men are to beleue. Therefore I will not wery the readers with repeting the same againe. Let this be sufficient that the spirit of faith, is called of Paule faith it selfe, which the spirit geueth vs, but not which we haue naturally. Therefore he prayeth that God fulfill in the Thessalonians all his good pleasure, and the worke of faith in power. Wherin calling faith the worke, of God, and geuing it that title for a name of addition, and calling it by figure of apposition Gods good pleasure, he denieth that it is of mans owne motion: and not contented therewith he addeth further, that it is a declaration of Gods power: writing to the Corinthians, where he saith, that faith hangeth not vpon the wisdom of men, but is grounded vpon the power of the holy Ghost. He speaketh in deede of ourwarde miracles: but because the reprobate are blinde at the beholding of them, he comprehendeth also that inwarde seale, whereof he maketh mention in an other place. And God, the more gloriously to set forth his liberalitie in so noble a giste, vouchesaueeth not to graunt it to all vniuersally without difference, but by singular priuilege geueth it to whome he will. For prooffe whereof we haue alleged testimonies before. Of which Augustine being a faithfull expositor, crieth out that it woulde please the Sauour to teache him, and that the very beleuing it selfe, is of gift and not of deseruing. No man (saith he) commeth to me, vnlesse my father drawe him, and to whome it is geuen of my father. It is maruellous that two do heare, the one despiseth, the other ascendeth vp. Let him that despiseth, impute it to himselfe: let him that ascende not, it arrogantly assigne to himselfe. In an other place. Why is it geuen to one and not to an other? It greueth me not to say it, this is the depth of the crosse. Out of I wote not what depth of the iudgements of God which we may not searche, procedeth all that we can. What I can, I see: whereby I can, I see not, sauing that I see thus farre, that it is of God. But why him, and not him? That is muche to me. It is a bottomelesse depth, it is the depth of the crosse. I may crie out with wonderinge, but not shewe it in disputing. Finally the summe commeth to this, that that Christ when he enlightneth vs vnto faith by the power of his spirit, doth there withall graffe vs into his body, that we may be made partakers of all good thinges.

36 Nowe remaineth that that which the minde hath receiued, may be further conueyed into the heart. For the word of God is not thoroughly receiued by faith, if it swimme in the toppe of the braine, but when it hath taken roote in the bottome of the heart that it may be an inuincible defense to beare and repulse all the engines of tēations. Nowe if it be true, that the true vnderstanding of the minde is the enlightning thereof, then in such confirmation of the hearte, his power much more euidently appereth, euen by so much as the distrustfulnesse of the hearte is greater than the blindnesse of the wit: and as it is harder to haue the minde furnished with assurednesse, than the wit to be instructed with thinking. Therefore the Spirite performeth the office of a seale, to seale vp in our heartes those same promises, the assurance whereof it first emprinted in oure wits, and serueth for an earnest to confirme and stablish them. Sith ye beleued (saith the Apostle) ye are sealed vp with the holy Spirite of promise, which is the earnest of oure inheritance. See you not how he teacheth that by the spirit the heartes of the faithfull are grauen as with a seale? and how for the same reason he calleth him the Spirit of promise, because he ratifieth the Gospell vnto vs? Likewise to the Corinthians he saith: God which annointed vs, which hath also sealed vs, and geuen the earnest of his Spirit in oure heartes. And in an other place when he speaketh of confidence and boldnesse of hopinge well, he maketh the pledge of the Spirit the foundation thereof.

37 Neither yet haue I forgotten that which I saide before, the remembrance whereof experience continually reneweth, that is, that faith is tossed with diuerse doubtings, so that the mindes of the godly are seldome quiet, or at least do not alway enjoy a peasable state: but with what soeuer engine they be shaken, either they rise vp out of the very gulfe of temptations, or do abide fast in their standing. Truly this assurednesse onely nourisheth and defendeth faith, when we holde fast that which is saide in the Psalme: The Lorde is oure protection, oure helpe in trouble, therefore we will not feare, when the earth shall tremble, and the mountaines shall leape into the heart of the sea. Also this most swete quietnesse is spoken of in an other place: I lay downe and slepte, and rose againe, because the Lorde hath susteined me. It is not meante thereby that Dauid was alway with one vndisturbed course framed to a merry cheerefulnesse: but in respect that he tasted the grace of God, according to his proportion of faith.

therefore he glorieth that he without feare despiseth all that euer might disquiet the peace of his minde. Therefore the Scripture meaning to exhort vs to faith, biddeth vs to be quiet. In Esaie it is saide: In hope and silence shall be your strength. In the Psalme: Holde thee still in the Lorde, and waite for him. Wherewith agreeth that saying of the Apostie to the Hebrues: Patience is needefull. &c.

38 Hereby we may iudge how pestilent is that doctrine of the Scholemen, that we can no otherwise determine of the grace of God towarde vs, than by morall coniecture as euery man thinketh himselfe worthy of it. Truly if we shall wey by oure workes how God is minded towarde vs, I graunt that we can atteine it with any coniecture, be it neuer so slender: but sith faith ought to haue relation to a simple and free promise, there is lefte no cause of doubting. For with what confidence (I beseeche you) shall we be armed: if we say that God is fauourable vnto vs vpon this condition, so that the purenesse of oure life do deserue it? But bycause I haue appointed one place proprely for the discussing hereof, therefore I will speake no more of them at this present, specially for asmuch as it is plaine enoughe, that there is nothing more contrary to faith, than either coniecture or any thing neere vnto doubting. And they do very ill wryth to this purpose that testimonie of the Preacher which they haue oft in their mouths: No man knoweth whether he be worthy of hatred or loue. For (to speake nothing how this place is in the common translation corruptly turned) yet very children can not be ignorant what Salomon meaneth by such wordes: that is, that if any man will iudge by the present state of thinges, whome God hateth, or whome God loueth, he laboreth in vaine, & troubleth himselfe to no profitte for his paines: sith all thinges happen alike, both to the righteous and the wicked, to him that offreth sacrifices and him that offreth none. Wherevpon followeth, that God doth not alway witnesse his loue to them to whome he maketh all things happen prosperously, nor doth alwaies vtter the hatred to them whome he punisheth. And that he doth to condemne the vanitie of mans witte, sith it is so dull in thinges most needefull to be knowen. As he hadde written a little before, that it can not be discerned what the soule of a man differeth from y^e soule of a beast, because it seemeth to dy in like manner. If any manne will gather thereof, that the opinion that we holde of the immortalitie of soules, standeth vpon coniecture: may he not worthily be compted a madde manne? Are they then in their right wittes which gather that there is no certaintie of Gods grace, bycause we can conceiue none by the carnall beholding of present thinges?

39 But they alleage that it is a point of rash presumption, to take vpon vs an vndoubted knoweledge of Gods will. I would in deede graunt it vnto them, if we did take so much vpon vs, that we would make the incomprehensible secrete purpose of God subiect to the sclendernesse of oure witte. But when we simply say with Paule, ^{1. Cor. 2} that we haue receiued not the spirit of this world, but the Spirit that ^{12.} is of God, by whose teaching we may know those things that are geuen vs of God, what can they barke against it, but they must flaundersously speake against the Spirit of God? But if it be a horrible roberie of God to accuse the reuelatiō that commeth from him, either to be lying, or vnassured or doubtfull, what do we offend in affirming that it is assured? But they say, that this also is not without greate presumptuousnesse, that we dare so glorie of the Spirite of Christ. Who would thinke that their dulnesse were so greate that would be compted maisters of the world, that they so fowly stumble in the first principles of religion? Surely I would not thinke it credible, vnlesse their owne writinges that are abroad did testifie it: Paule pronounceth that they onely are the children of God, that are moued with his spirit: and these men would haue them that be the children of God, to be moued with their own spirit, and to be without the Spirit of God. Paule teacheth that we call God oure Father, as the holy ^{Rom 8.} Ghost ministreth that word vnto vs, which onely can beare witnessse ^{14.} to our spirite that we are the children of God: These men, although they forbidde vs not to call vpon God, yet do take away his Spirit, by whose guiding he should haue bene rightly called vpon. Paule denieth that they are the seruantes of Christ, that are not moued with the Spirit of Christ: these men faine a Christianitie that needeth not the Spirit of Christ. Paule maketh no hope of the blessed resurrectiō, ^{Rom. 8.} vnlesse we feele the holy Ghost abiding in vs: they forge a hope ^{11.} without any such feling. But peraduenture they will answere, that they do not deny that we ought to be endued with it, but that it is a point of modesty & humility not to acknowledge it. What meaneth he thē, when he biddeth the Corinthians to trie whether they be in the ^{2. Cor.} faith, to proue themselues whether they haue Christ, whom vnlesse a ^{13. 5.} man do acknowledge to be dwelling in him, he is a reprobate? But by the Spirit that God hath geuen vs (saith Iohn) we know that he abideth in vs. ^{1. Ioh. 3.} And what do we els but call y^e promises of Christ in dout, ^{24.} when we will be compted the seruantes of God without his Spirit, ^{Esa. 34.} which he hath openly declared, that he would poure out vpon all ^{3.} his? Biside that, we do wrong to the holy Ghost, which do separate from him faith that is his peculiar worke. Sith these are the first lessons of godlie religion, it is a token of miserable blindenesse; to haue Christians noted of arrogancie, that dare glorie of the presence of the holy Ghost, without which glorieng Christianitie it selfe doth not stand. But they declare by their example how truely Christ saide, Ioh. 14. 7. that his Spirit is vnknown to the worlde, and is onely knowen of them with whome he abideth.

40 And bycause they will not go about to ouerthrowe the steadfastnesse of faith with digging onely of one mine, they assayle it also otherwise. For they say, that although according to our present state of righteousnes, we may gather a iudgment of the grace of God, yet the knowledge of perseuerance to the ende abideth in suspense. A goodly confidence of saluation forsooth is left vnto vs, if we iudge by morall coniecture, that for a present moment we be in fauoure, and Rom. 8. 8. what shall become of vs to morrow we can not tell. The Apostle teacheth farre otherwise: I am surely perswaded (saith he) that neither Angels, nor powers, nor principalities, neither death, nor life, neither present things nor things to come, shall seuer vs from the loue wherewith the Lorde embraceth vs in Christ. They seeke to escape with a trifling solution, pratinge that the Apostle had that by speciall reuelation. But they are holdē to hard to slippe away so. For there he entreateth of those good things that commonly come by faith to the faithfull, not those that he himselfe specially feleth. But the same Cor. 12. Paul in an other place putteth vs in feare with mentiō of our weaknesse and vnstedfastnes: Let him that standeth (saith he) beware that he fall not. It is true, but not such a feare wherby we shoulde be ouerthrowen, but wherby we may learne to humble our selues vnder Pet. 5. the mighty hand of God, as Peter expoundeth it. Then how against ordre and truth is it to limite the assurednes of faith to a moment of time, whose propretie is to passe beyond the spaces of this life, and extend further to immortalitie to come? Sith therefore the faithfull do impute it to the grace of God, that being lightned with his spirit they do by faith enioy the beholding of y^e heauenly life: so far is such glorying from presumptuousnesse, that if any man be ashamed to confesse it, he doth therein more bewray his extreme vnthankfulnessse, in vnkindely hiding Gods goodnes, than he doth declare his modestie or submission.

41 Because it semed y^e the nature of faith could not otherwise better or more plainly be declared than by the substance of the promise vpon which it resteth as vpon her propre foundation, so that if the promise be taken away, faith by and by falleth downe or rather vanisheth away: therefore we toke our definition from thense, which yet varieth varieth not from that definition, or rather description of the Apostle, that he applieth to his discourse, where he sayth that fayth is a substance of things to be hoped for, & a certainty of things that are not seene. For by this worde Hypostasis substance (for that terme he vseth) he meaneth as it were, an vpholding stay, whereupon the godly minde leaneth & resteth. As if he should say y^e fayth is a certaine & assured possession of those things that are promised vs of God, vnlesse a man had rather to take Hypostasis for affiance, which I mislike not, albeit I follow that which is more commonly receiued. Againe, to signifye that euen to the last day when the bookes shalbe opened, they are hier than those things that may be perceiued with our senses, or seene with our eyes, or handeled with our handes, and that the same are no otherwise possessed by vs, but if we go beyonde the capacity of our owne wit, and bende our vnderstanding about all things that are in the world, yea and climbe about our selues, he hath therefore added that this assurednes of possessiō, is of things that lie in hope, & therefore are not seene. For plaine appearance (as Paule wryteth) is not hope, neither hope we for those things that we see. And when he calleth it a certainty or proufe (or as Augustine hath oft translated it) a coniunction of things not present: for in Greeke it is Elenchos, he sayth as much as if he did say, that it is an euident shewing of things not appearing, a seeinge of things not seene, a plainnesse of darke things, a presence of things absent, an open shewing of hidden things. For the mysteries of God, such as they be that pertaine to our saluation, can not be seene in themselves and in their owne nature as they call it; but we behold them only in his word, of whose trueth we ought to be so fully perswaded, that we ought to hold all that he speaketh as it were already done and fulfilled. But how can the minde lift vp it selfe to receiue such a tast of Gods goodnesse, but that it must needes be therewith wholly kindled to loue God againe? For that flowing plenty of sweetenes which God hath layed vp in store for them that feare him, can not be truely knowen; but that it must therewith all vehemently moue affection: and whose affection it once moueth, it vterly rauisheth and carrieth him beyonde himselfe. Therefore it is no maruell, if into a peruerse & crooked heart neuer entreth this affection, by which being conueyed vp into the very heauen, we are suffred to come to the most secretely hidden treasures of God, and the most sacred priuie places of his kingdom; which may not be defiled with the entrance of an vncleane heart. For that which the Schoolemen teach, that charity is before faith and hope, is a meere madnes. For it is faith onely that first engendreth charity in vs. Howe much more rightly doth Bernard teach: I beleue (saith he) that y^e testimony of conscience, which Paul calleth the glory of y^e godly, consisteth in three thinges. For first of all it is necessary to beleue y^e thou canst not haue forgiuenes of sinnes, but by y^e pardon of God: then y^e thou canst haue no good worke at all, vnles he also giue it: last of all y^e thou canst by no works deserue eternal life, vnles it also be giuen freely. A litle after he addeth y^e these things suffice not, but that there is a certaine beginning of faith, because in beleuing y^e sinnes can not be forgiuen but of God, we ought also to beleue y^e they are not forgiue vs, til also we be perswaded by y^e testimony of the holy Ghost, y^e saluation is layd vp in store for vs: because God forgiueth sinnes, he himselfe giueth merites, & he himselfe also giueth rewards, that we may not stay stil in this beginning. But these & other things shalbe to be entreated of in places fit for them. Now let it only suffice to know what faith is.

42 Now whersoever this liuely faith shalbe, it can not be possible but that it hath with it y^e hope of eternall saluation, as an vndiuidable copanion: or rather that it engendreth or bringeth it foorth out of it selfe, which hope being taken away, how eloquently, gloriously soeuer we talke of faith, yet we are conuicted to haue no faith at all, for if faith (as is aboue said) be an assured perswasion of Gods trueth, that it can not lye vnto vs nor deceiue vs, nor become voide, then they that haue conceiued this assurednesse, truely do therewithal looke for a time to come that God shall performe his promises, which in their perswasion can not be but true: so that briefly, hope is nothing else, but a looking for those thinges which faith hath beleued to be truely promised of God. So faith beleueth that God is true, hope loketh for the performace of his trueth in conuenient time. Faith beleueth that he is our Father, hope looketh for him to shew himselfe such a one towarde vs. Faith beleueth that eternall life is giuen vs, hope looketh that it be one day reuealed. Faith is the foundation whereupon hope resteth, hope nourisheth & sustaineth faith. For as no man can looke for any thing at Gods hand, but he that hath first beleued his promises: so againe the weakenesse of our faith must with patient hope and expectation be susteined and cherished, that it fall not as fainting for wearinesse. For which reason Paul doth well place our saluation in hope. For hope, while it in silence looketh for the Lord, restrayneth faith that it fall not headlonge with too much hast: hope strengthneth faith, that it wauer not in Gods promises, nor beginne to dout of the trueth of them: hope refresheth faith that it waxe not weary: Hope stretcheth faith to the vtermoost bounde, that it faint not in the middé course nor in the very beginning. Finally, hope by continually tinually renewing and restoring, it maketh it now and then to rise up fresher than it selfe to continuance. But howe many wayes the helpes of hope are necessary to the strengthening of faith, shall better appeare, if we consider with how many sortes of temptations they are assailed and shaken, that haue embraced the word of God. First the Lord in differing his promises doth oftentimes hold our mindes longer in suspense than we woulde wish: here it is the office of hope to performe, that which the Prophet commaundeth, that though his promises do tary, yet we should waite still for them. Sometime he suffereth vs not only to faint, but also seemeth to be highly displeas-sed: here it is much more necessary to haue hope to helpe vs, that according to the saying of an other Prophet, we may still looke for the Lord that hath hidden his face from Iacob. There rise vp all scorers agree with hope, and not without cause, forasmuch as we haue already taught, that hope is nothing else but the nourishment and strength of faith. Sometimes they are ioyned together: as in the same epistle. That your faith and hope should be in God. But Paule to the Philip-other place, although he speake vnproperly, yet meaneth the same thing in these wordes: We looke in the spirit through faith for hope of righteousnesse, euen because we embracing the testimonie of the Gospell concerninge his free loue, do looke for the time when God shal openly shew that which is now hidden vnder hope. And now it is plaine how foolishly Peter Lombard laieth two foundations of hope that is the grace of God, & the deseruinge of workes. Hope can haue no other marke to be directed vnto, but faith: and we haue already declared that faith hath one only marke the mercy of God, to which it ought to looke (as I may so speake) with both eyes. But it is good to heare what a liuely reason he bringeth. If (sayth he) thou darst hope for any thing without deseruings, y^e shall not be worthy to be called hope, but presumptiō. Who (gentle reader) wil not worthily abhorre such beastes, that say, it is a rash and presumptuous deede, if a man haue confidence that God is true of his worde? For where the Lorde willeth vs to looke for all things at his goodnesse, they say it is presumption to leane and rest vpon it. A maister meete for such scholers as he founde in the mad schoole of filthy bablers. But as for vs, when we see that we are commaunded by the oracles of God to conceiue a hope of saluation, let vs gladly presume so much vpon his trueth, as trusting vpon his only mercy, casting away the confidence of works, to be bold to hope well. He will not deceiue that said: Be it vnto you according to your faith.

The iij. Chapter.

That we are regenerate by faith. VVherein is entreated of Repentance.

Albeit we haue already partely taught howe faith possesseth Christ, and howe by it we enioy his benefites: neuer thelesse this were yet darke, vnlesse we did also make declaration of the effectes that we feele therby. Not without cause it is said, that the sum of the Gospell standeth in repentance and in forgiuenesse of sinnes. Therefore leauinge out these two pointes, whatsoever we shall say of faith, shalbe but a hungry & vnperfect, yea and in manner vnprofitable disputation of faith. Now forasmuch as Christ doth giue both vnto vs, and we obtaine both by faith, that is to say, both newnesse of life and free reconciliation, reason and order of teaching requireth, that in this place I begin to speake of both. Our next passage from faith shalbe to Repentance, because whē this article is well perceiued, it shall the better appeare how man is iustified by only faith and mere pardon, & yet how reall holinesse of life (as I may so call it) is not seuered from free imputation of righteousnesse. Now it ought to be out of question, that Repentance doth not onely immediatly follow faith, but also spring out of it. For whereas pardon and forgiuenes is therefore offered by the preachinge of the Gospell, that the sinner beinge deliuered from the tyranny of Satan, from the yoke of sinne, and from miserable bondage of vices, may passe into the kingdom of God, truely no man can embrace the grace of the Gospell, but he must returne from the errours of his former life into the right way, and apply all his study to the meditation of repentance. As for them that thinke that repentance doth rather go before fore faith than flow or spring forth of it, as a frute out of a tree, they neuer knewe the force therof, and are moued with too weake an argument to thinke so.

2 Christ (say they) and Iohn in their preachings do first exhorte the people to repentance, & then they afterward say that the kingdom of heauen is at hande. Such commaundement to preach, the Apostles receiued, such order Paule followed, as Luke reporteth. But while they superstitiously sticke vpon the ioyning together of syllables, they marke not in what meaning the wordes hang together. For when the Lorde Christ and Iohn do preach in this manner: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heauen is come nere at hande: do they not ferche the cause of repentance from very grace and promise of saluation? Therefore their wordes are asmuch in effect as if they had said: because the kingdome of heauen is come nere at hand, therefore repent ye. For Matthew, when he hath shewed that Iohn so preached, faith that in him was fulfilled the prophetic of Esay, concerning the voice crying in the wildernesse, Prepare the way of the Lorde, make streight the pathes of our God. But in the Prophet that voice is commaunded to beginne at comfort and glad tidings. Yet when we referre the beginninge of repentance to faith, we do not dreame a certaine meane space of time, wherein it bringeth it out: but we meane to shewe that a man can not earnestly apply himselfe to repentance, vnlesse he know himselfe to be of God. But no man is truely perswaded that he is of God, but he that hath first receiued his grace. But these thinges shalbe more plainly discussed in the proceffe following. Paraduventure this deceiued them, that many are first by terroures of conscience tamed; or framed to obedience, before that they haue thoroughly digested, yea before they haue tasted the knowledge of grace. And this is the feare at the beginning, which some accompt among vertues, because they see that it is nere to true and iust obedience. But our question is not here how diuersely Christ draweth vs vnto him, or prepareth vs to the endeouour of godlinesse: only this I say, that there can be no vprightnesse founde where reigneth not that Spirite which Christ receiued to communicate the same to his members. Then according to that saying of the Psalme. With thee is mercifulnesse, that thou mayest be feared. No man shall euer reuerently feare God, but he that trusteth that God is mercifull vnto him: no man will willingly prepare himselfe to the keeping of the law, but he that is perswaded that his seruices please him: which tenderesse in pardoninge and bearinge with faultes, is a signe of fatherly fauour. Which is also shewed by that exhortation of Osee, Come, let vs re-not without hope, and yet faith and hope are diuerse things: so repentance and faith, although they hang together with one perpetuall bond, yet they rather would be conioyned than confounded. And truly I am not ignorant, that vnder the name of repentance is comprehended the whole turning vnto God, whereof faith is not the least parte: but in what meaninge it is so comprehended, shall most easily appeare when the force and nature therof shalbe declared. The name of repentance in Hebrue is deriued of conuertinge or returninge, in Greke of chaunging of the minde or purpose, & the thing it selfe doth not ill agree with either deriuations, whereof the summe is, that we departing from our selues should turne vnto God, & puttinge of our old minde, should put on a new. Wherefore in my iudgement, repentance may thus not amisse be defined: that it is a true turninge of our life vnto God, proceeding from a pure & earnest feare of God, which consisteth in the mortifying of the flesh and of the olde man, and in the quickening of the spirite. In this sense are to be taken all the preachings wherein either the Prophets in olde time, or the Apostles afterward exhorted the men of their time to repentance. For this onely thinge they trauailed to perswade, that confounded with their owne sinnes, and pricked with feare of the Lordes iudgement, they shoulde fall downe and be humbled before him, against whom they had offended, and with true amendement returne into his right way. Therefore these wordes, To be turned or returne vnto the lord, To repent, or do penance, are among them vsed without difference in all one signification. And therefore also the holy history saith, that men repent after the Lorde, when they that liued wantonly in their owne lustes, not regardinge him, do beginne to follow his worde, and are ready at their captaines commaundement to go whether he calleth them. And John and Paule vsed these wordes, to bring forth frutes worthy of repentance, for, to leade such a life as may represent and testifie such an amendement in all their doings.

6 But before we go any further, it shalbe profitable that we do more plainly set out at large the definitiõ that we haue made. Wherein there be chiefly three pointes to be considered. First when we call it a turning of life vnto God, we require a transforming, not onely in outward workes, but also in the soule it selfe, which when it hath put of her oldnesse, then beginneth to bring forth the frutes of workes agreeable to her renuinge. Which when the Prophet goeth about to expresse, he commaundeth them whome he calleth to repentance, to make them a newe heart. Therefore Moses oftentimes meaninge to shew how the Israelites might repent, and so be rightly turned vnto the the Lorde, teacheth that it be done with all their heart, and with all their soule (which maner of speakinge we see often repeated of the Prophets) and naming it the circumcising of the heart, he shaketh away all inward affections. But there is no place whereby a man may better perceiue what is the naturall propriety of repentance thā the fourth Chapter of Ieremie. If thou returne to me, O Israel, (saith the Lord) returne to me, plowe vp your arable lande and sow not vpon thornes. Be circumcised to the Lord, and take away the vncircumcised skinnnes of your heartes. See how he pronounceth that they shall nothing preuaile in taking vpō thē the following of righteousnes, vnlesse wickednes be first plucked out of the bottome of their heartes. And to moue them throughly, he warneth them that they haue to do with God, with whom there is nothing gotten by dalying, because he hateth a double heart. Therefore Esay laugheth to scorne y foolish endeouours of hipocrites, which did in deede bulily go about an outward repentance in ceremonies, but in the meane time they had no care to loose the bundles of wickednes wherwith they helde poore men fast tied. Where also he very well sheweth in what dueties vnfeined repentance properly standeth.

7 The second point was, that we taught that repentance proceedeth of an earnest feare of God. For, before that the mind of a sinner be enclined to repentance, it must be stirred vp with thinkinge vpon the iudgement of God. But when this thought is once throughly settled, that God will one day go vp into his iudgement seate, to require an accompt of all sayings & doings: it will not suffer the sily mā to rest, nor to take breath one minute of time, but cōtinually stirreth him vp to thinke vpon a new trade of life, whereby he may safely appeare at that iudgement. Therefore oftentimes the Scripture, when it exhorteth to repentance, maketh mention of the iudgement: as in Ieremie: least peraduenture my wrath go out as fire, & there be none to quench it, because of the naughtines of your works. In Paules sermon to the Athenians: And whereas hitherto God hath borne with the times of this ignorance, now he giueth warninge to men, that all mē euery where may repent them, because he hath apointed the day wherein he will iudge the world in equity. And in many other places. Sometime it declareth by the punishmentes already extended, that God is a iudge, that sinners should thinke with thēselues, that worse thinges hang ouer them if they do not répent in time. You haue an example therof in the 29. of Exodus. But because the turning beginneth at the abhorring and hatred of sinne, therefore the Apostle maketh sorowfulnesse, such as is according to God, the cause of repenrance. And he calleth sorrowfulnes according to God, when we are not only afraid of punishment, but do hate and abhorre sinne it selfe, forasmuch as we vnderstand that it displeaseth God. And no maruel. For vnlesse we be sharply pricked, the slouthfulnes of our flesh could not be corrected, yea prickings would not suffice for the dulnes & slouthfulnes therof, vnlesse God in stretching out his rodde should pearce more depely. This is also an obstinacy which must be beaten downe as it were with beetles. Therefore the peruersenesse of our nature enforceth God to the seuerity that he vseth in threateninge, because he shoulde in vaine call vs alluringly with faire speach while we lie a sleepe. I recite not the testimonies that cōmonly offer thēselues to be founde. The feare of God is in an other manner also the beginninge of repentance. For though mans life were absolutely furnished with all pointes of vertues, if it be not applied to the worshiping of God, it may in deede be praised of the world, but in heauen it shalbe meere abomination, forasmuch as the chiefe parte of our righteousnesse is to giue God his due right and honor, wherof he is wickedly robbed, when we bend not our selues to yeelde vs subiect to his gouernment.

8 Thirdly, it remaineth that we declare what is meant by this that we say, that Répentance consisteth in two partes, that is to say, mortifying of the flesh, and quickening of the spirit. The Prophetes do plainely expresse it, although somewhat simply and grossly, according to the capacity of the carnall people, when they say: Cesse from euill and do goodnes. Againe. Be washed, be cleane, take away the euill of your workes from mine eyes: Cesse to do peruerly, learne to do well, seeke iudgement, help the oppressed, &c. For when they call men away frō wickednes, they require the death of the whole flesh, which is stuffed full of wickednes and peruersenes. It is in deede an vneasie & hard thing to put of our selues, & to depart from our natural dispositiō. Neither can it be thought that the flesh is throughly deade, vnlesse all that we haue of our selues be abolished. But forasmuch as all the affection of the flesh is enemy against God, the first entree to the obeying of his law, is the forsaking of our owne nature. Afterward they expresse the reuiuing by the frutes that folow therof, as righteousnes, iudgement & mercy. For it were not enough to do those dueties rightly, vnlesse the minde it selfe & the heart haue first put on the affection of righteousnes, iudgement and mercy. That is done when the spirit of God hath so soked in new thoughtes & affections, our soules first washed with his holines, that they may rightly be compted new. And truely as we are naturally turned away from God,

God, so vnlesse the forsaking of our selues do go before, we can neuer go toward that which is right. Therefore we are so oft commaunded to put of the old man, to forsake the world & flesh, to bid our lustes farewell, and to be reued in the spirite of our minde. Moreouer the very name of mortification doth put vs in minde how hard it is to forget our former nature: because we thereby gather that we are not otherwise framed to the feare of God, nor do learne the principles of godlinesse, but when we are violently slaine with the worde of the Spirit, and so brought to nought: euen as though God should pronouce, that to haue vs to be accompted among his childrē, there needeth a death of all our commune nature.

9 Both these things do happē vnto vs by the partaking of Christ. For if we do truely communicate of his death, by the power thereof Ro. 6. 6 our olde man is crucified, & the body of sinne dieth, that the corruption of our former nature may liue no more. If we be partakers of his resurrection, by it we are raised vp into a newnesse of life, that may agree with the righteousnes of God. In one word I expounde repentance to be regeneration, which hath no other marke whereunto it is directed, but that the image of God which was by Adams offence fowly defaced and in a maner vtterly blotted out, may be reued in vs. So the Apostle teacheth, when he sayth: but we representing the glory of God with vncouered face are transformed into the same image, out of glory into glory, as by y^e spirit of the Lord. Againe. 2. Cor. 18. Be ye reued in the spirite of your minde and put on the newe man, Ephe. 4. 23. which is created according to God in righteousnes and holinesse of trueth. Againe in an other place: putting on the new man, which is re- Col. 3. 10. uued after the knowledge and image of him that created him. Therefore by this regeneratiō we be by the benefit of Christ restored into the righteousnes of God, from which we were fallē by Adam. After 1. Cor. 12. which manner it pleaseth the Lord wholly to restore all those whom he adopteth into the inheritance of life. And this restoring is fulfilled not in one moment, or one day, or one yere, but by continuall, yea & sometimes slow proceedinges God taketh away the corruptions of the flesh in his elect, cleanseth them from filthines, and consecrateth them for temples to himselfe, reuinge all their senses to true purenes, that they may exercise themselues all their life in repentance, and knowe that this warre hath no ende but in death. And so much the greater is the lewdnes of that filthy railer & apostata Staphilus, which foolishly saith that I confounde the state of this present life with the heavenly glory, when I expounde by Paule the image of God to be 2. Cor. 4 holines and true righteousnes. As though when any thing is defined,

we shoulde not seeke the whole fulnes & perfection of it. And yet we deny not place for encreasces: but I say that how neere any man approacheth to the likenes of God, so much the image of God shineth in him. That the faithfull may attaine herunto, God assigneth them the race of repentance wherein to runne all their life long.

10 The children of God therefore are so deliuered by regeneration from the bondage of sinne, not that hauinge now obtained the full possession of liberty, they should feele no more trouble by their flesh, but that they should haue remaining a cōtinual matter of strife, wherwith they may be exercised, and not only be exercised, but also may better learne their owne weakenesse. And in this point all wryters of sounde iudgement agree together, that there remayneth in man regenerate a feedinge of euill, from whence continually springe desires that allure & stirre him to sinne. They confesse also that the holy ones are still so holden entangled with that disease of lustinge, that they can not withstand but that sometime they are tickled & stirred either to lust or to couetousnes, or to ambition or to other vices. Neither is it nedefull to labour much in searching what the old wryters haue thought herein, forasmuch as only Augustine may be sufficient for it, which hath faithfully and with great diligence gathered al their iudgementes. Therefore let the readers gather out of him, such certainty as they shall desire to learne of the opinion of antiquity. But there may seeme to be this differēce betwene him and vs, that he when he graunteth that the faithfull so long as they dwell in a mortall body are so holden bound with lustes, that they can not but lust, yet dareth not call that disease sinne: but being content to expresse it by the name of weakenesse, he teacheth that then onely it becommeth sinne, when either worke or consent is added to cōceite or receiuing, that is, when will yeeldeth to the first desire: but we accompt the very same for sinne, that man is tickled with any desire at all against the law of God: Yea we affirme that the very corruption that engendreth such desires in vs, is sinne. We teach therefore that there is alway sinne in the holy ones, vntill they be vnclodhed of the mortall body, because there remaineth in their flesh that peruersenes of lusting that fighteth against vprightnes. And yet he doth not alway forbear to vse the name of Sinne, as when he sayth: This Paule calleth by the name of sinne, from whence spring all sinnes vnto a fleshly cōcupiscence. This asmuch as pertaineth to the holy ones, looseth the kingdom in earth, and perisheth in heauen. By which wordes he confesseth, that the faithfull are guilty of sinne, in so much as they are subject to the lustes of the flesh.

II But this that it is sayd, y^e God purgeth his church frō all sinne, that he promisseth that grace of deliuerāce by Baptisme, & fulfilleth it Ephē. 5. in his elect, we referre rather to the guiltines of sinne, than to the very 26. matter of sinne. God truely performeth this by regenerating thē that be his, that in them that kingdome of sinne is abolished (for the holy Ghost ministreth them strength, whereby they get the vpper hand & are cōquerours in the battel) but it cisseth only to reigne & not so to dwell in them. Therefore we so say, that the old man is crucified, & the Ro. 6. 6. law of sinne abolished in the children of God, that yet there remaine some leauings, not to haue dominiō in them, but to humble them by knowledge in conscience of their owne weakenesse. And we confesse that the same are not imputed, as if they were not: but we affirme that this cōmeth to passe by the mercy of God, that the holy ones are deliuered from this guiltinesse, which otherwise should iustly be reckened sinners & guilty before God. And this sentence it shal not be hard for vs to confirme, forasmuch as there are euident testimonies of the Scripture vpon their matter. For what woulde we haue more plaine, than that which Paule crieth out to the Romaines cap. 7. First both Ro. 7. 6. we haue in an other place shewed, and Angustine proueth by stronge reasons, that Paul there speaketh in the person of a man regenerate. I speake not of this, that he vseth these wordes, Euill and Sinne, that they which will speake against vs may not cauill against those words? but who can deny, that a striuing against the law of God is euill? who can deny a withstanding of Iustice to be sinne? Finally, who will not graunt that there is a fault, where is a spirituall misery? But all these things are reported of this disease by Paule. Againe, we haue an assured demonstration by the law, by which this whole questiō may easily be discussed. For we are commaunded to loue God with al our heart, with all our soule, with all our powers. Sith all the partes of our soule ought so to be occupied with the loue of God, it is certaine, that they satisfie not the commaundement that cōceiue in their heart any desire, be it neuer so litle, or suffer any such thought at all to entre into their minde, as may withdraw them from the loue of God into vanity. For what? are not these the powers of the soule, to be affected with sodaine motions, to comprehend with wit, to conceiue with minde? Therefore, when these do open a way for vaine or corrupt thoughtes to entre into thē, do they not shew that they are euen so much voide of the loue of God? Wherfore, who so confesseth not that all the lusts of the flesh are sinnes, and that the same disease of lusting, which they call a feeding, is the well springe of sinne, he must needes deny that the transgression of the law is sinne.

12 If any man thinke it an absurdity, that all the desires wherwith man is naturally moued in affection, are vniuersally cōdemned, wheras they be put into man by God the author of nature. We answere, that we do not condemne those desires that God hath so engrauen into y^e minde of man at the first creation, that they can not be rooted out without destroying the very nature of man, but onely outrageous and vnbridled motions that fight against the ordinance of God. But nowe sith by reason of the peruersenesse of nature all her powers are infected and corrupted, that in all her doinges appeareth a continuall disorder & intemperance, because the desires can not be seuered frō such intemperance: therefore we say that they are corrupt. Or (if you like to haue the whole summe in fewer wordes) we teach that all the desires of men are euill: and we accuse them to be guilty of sinne, not in that that they are naturall, but for that they are inordinate: and we call them inordinate, because no pure or cleane thinge can come out of a corrupt and vncleane nature. And Augustine doth not so much vary from this doctrine as he appeareth in shew, while he somewhat too much feareth the enuie that the Pelagians labored to bring him into, he sometime forbeareth to vse the name of sinne: Yet where he wryteth that the law of sinne still remaining in the holy ones, the only guiltines is taken away, he plainly sheweth that he doth not so much disagree from our meaning.

13 We will alleage some other sentences, wherby shall better appeare what he thought. In the second booke against Iulian: This law of sinne is both releasēd by the spiritual regeneration, and abiderth in the mortall flesh: releasēd herein, because the guiltines is taken away in the sacrament wherby the faithfull are regenerate: & it abideth, because it worketh the desires against which the faithfull do fight. Agayne. Therefore the law of sinne (which was also in the members of so great an Apostle) is releasēd in baptisme, but not ended. Againe. The law of sinne (of which yet remaininge the guiltinesse, is in baptisme discharged) Ambrose called wickednes: because it is wickednes for the flesh to lust against the Spirit. Againe. Sinne is dead in respect of that guiltines wherein it helde vs, and euen being dead, it still rebelleth till it be healed with perfection of buriall. And yet playner in the 5. booke. As the blindnesse of heart is both a sinne, wherby man beleueth not in God: and also a punishmēt of sinne, wherby a proud heart is chastised with worthy correction: and the cause of sinne when any thing is committed by the error of a blinde heart: so the lust of flesh against which a good spirit lusteth, is both sinne, because there is in it disobedience against the gouernment of the minde: and also the punishment of sinne, because it is giuen for recompense to the deseruings of the disobedient: and the cause of sinne in man, when he consenteth by defectiō or in man, when he is borne: by infection. Here without any doutfull speach he calleth it sinne, because when error was once ouerthrowen, and the trueth confirmed, he lesse feared sclaunders reports. As in the 41. Homely vpon Iohn, where doubtlesse he speaketh accordinge to the true meaninge of his minde, he sayth: If in the flesh thou serue the lawe of sinne, do that which the Apostle himselte saith: let not sinne reigne in your mortal body to obey the desires therof. He saith not, let it not be, but let it not reigne. So long as thou liuest, sinne must needes be in thy members at least let reigne be takē from it. Let not that be done which it commaundeth. They that defende that lust is no sinne, are wont to obiekt that saying of Iames: Lust, after that it hath cōceiued, bringeth forth sinne. But this is easily cōfuted. For vnlesse we thinke that he speaketh of only ill workes or actuall sinnes, euill wil it selfe, shall not be accounted sinne. But where he calleth mischieuous deedes and wicked offenses the offsprings of sinne, and giueth vnto them the name of sinne, it doth not by and by folow thereof, but that to lust, is an euill thing & damnable before God.

14 Certaine Anabaptistes in this age, deuise I wote not what phretike intemperance in steede of spiritual regeneration: saying that the children of God restored into the state of innocency, now ought no more to be carefull for bridling of the lust of the flesh: that the Spirit is to be followed for their guide, vnder whose guiding they neuer go out of the way. It were incredible that mans minde coulde fall to so great madnesse, vnlesse they did openly and proudly babble abroad this doctrine. Truely it is monstrous. But it is meete that such should suffer the punishment of such blasphemous boldnesse, that so haue perswaded their minde to turne the trueth of God into a lie. Shall all the choise of honesty and dishonesty, right and wrong, good & euill, vertue and vice, be taken away? Such difference (say they) commeth of the cursednesse of olde Adam, from which we are exempted by Christ. So now there shalbe no difference betwene fornication and chastity, plaine dealinge and suttelty, trueth and lying, iustice and extortion. Take away vaine feare, say they, the Spirite wil commaunde thee no euill thinge, so that thou boldly and without feare yeelde thee to the guiding thereof. Who can choise but be astonished at these monstrous thinges? Yet it is a common learning among them, which blinded with madnesse of lustes, haue putte of all common reason, but what Christ (I beseech you) do they frame vnto vs, and what spirit do they belch out? For we reknowledge one Christ, & his only Spirit whom the Prophets haue cōmended, whom the Gospell giuen vs doth preach, of whom we there heare no such thinge. That Spirit is no patrone of manslaughter, whoredom, dronkennes, pride, contention, couetousnes, & guile: but the author of loue, chastity, sobriety, modesty, peace, temperance & truth. It is not a giddy spirit, & runneth headlong without consideration through right and wronge, but is full of wisdom and vnderstandinge, that discerneth rightly betwene iust and vniust. It stirreth not vnto dissolute and vnbridled licentiousnesse, but maketh difference betwene lawfull and vnlawfull, and teacheth to kepe measure and temperance: but why do we labour any longer in confuting this beastly rage? To Christians the Spirit of the Lord is not a troublesome phantaie, which either theselues haue brought forth in a dreame, or haue receiued being forged of other: but they reuerently seeke the knowledge of him at the Scriptures, where these two things be taught of him: First that he is giuen vs vnto sanctification, that he might bringe vs into the obedience of Gods will, being purged from vncleannesse and defilinges, which obedience can not stande, vnlesse lustes be tamed and subdued, whereunto these men would giue the bridle at liberty. Secondly we are taught that we are so cleansed by his sanctification, that we are stil besieged with many vices and much weakenes, so long as we are enclosed in the burden of our body: wherby it commeth to passe, that being farre distant frō perfection, we haue neede alway to encrease somewhat, and being entangled in vices, we haue neede daily to wastle with them. Whereupon also followeth, that shaking of slouth and carelesnesse, we must watch with heedfull mindes, that we be not compassed vnware with the snares of our flesh. Vnlesse peraduenture we thinke that we haue proceeded further thā the Apostle, which yet was wried of the Angel of Satan, that his strength might be made perfect with weakenes: and which did vnfaignedly represent in his flesh that diuision of the flesh and of the spirit.

15 But whereas the Apostle in describing of repentance reckoneth feauen either causes or effectes or partes thereof, he doth that of a very good cause: and these they be: endeouour or carefulnesse, excusinge, indignation, feare, desire, zeale, punishment. Neither ought it to seeme any absurdity, that I dare not certainly determine whether they ought to be compted causes or effectes. For both may be defended in disputation. They may be also called affections ioyned with repentance: but because, leauinge out those questions, we may vnderstande what Paule meaneth, we shalbe content with a simple declaration of

of them. He saith therefore, that of the heauincesse which is according to God, ariseth carefulnesse. For he that is touched with an earnest feeling of displeasure by cause he hath sinned against his God, is therewithall stirred vp to diligence and heedefulnesse, to winde himselfe clerely out of the snares of the Deuell, to take better heede of his snares, to fall no more from the gouernance of the holy Ghost, not to be oppressed with security. Next is Excusing, which in this place signifieth not the defense, whereby a sinner to escape the iudgement of God, either doth denie that he hath offended, or diminisheth the haynousnesse of his faulte, bur a purgation which standeth rather in crauing of pardon, than in defense of his cause. Like as the children that are not reprobate when they acknowledge and confesse their faultes, do yet vse entreating, and that it may take place, they protest by all meanes that they can, that they haue not cast away the reuerence that they owe to their parentes. Finally they so excuse them, as they go not about to proue themselues righteous and innocent, but onely that they may obteine pardon. Then followeth Indignation, whereby the sinner fretteth inwardly with himselfe, quareleth with himselfe, is angry with himselfe, when he recordeth his owne perversnesse and his owne vnthankfulnesse to God. By the name of feare, he meaneth that trembling that is striken into our mindes so ofte as we thinke both what we haue deserued, and howe horrible is the seueritie of Gods wrath against sinners. For we must needes then be vexed with a maruellous vnquietnesse, which both instructeth vs to humilitie, & maketh vs more ware against the time to come. Now if out of feare do springe that carefulnesse, whereof he had spoken before, then we see with what linking they hang together. It semeth to me that he hath vsed this worde Desire for diligence in our dutie and redy cherefulnesse to obey, whereunto the acknowledging of our owne faultes ought chiefly to prouoke vs. And thereunto also belongeth zeale, which he ioyneth immediatly next vnto it. For it signifieth a feruentnesse, wherewith we be kindled when we be spurred forward with these pricking thoughtes: what haue I done? whether had I throwen my selfe hedlonge, if the mercie of God did not help me? The last of all is punishment, for the more rigorous that we be to our selues, and the streightlier that we examine our owne sinnes, so much the more we ought to trust that God is fauorable and mercifull vnto vs. And truely it is not possible, but that the soule being striken with horrour of the iudgement of God must needes do some execution in the punishing of it selfe. Truely the godly do fele what punishmentes are shame, confusion, mourning, lothing of themselues,

& other affectiōs that spring out of earnest acknowledging of sinnes: But let vs remember that there is a measure to be kepte, that sorrow do not swallowe vs vp, because nothing more redily happeneth to fearefull consciences than falling to despeire. And also by that crafty meane whom so euer Satā findeth ouerthrowen with dreade of God, he more and more drowneth them in the gulfe of sorrow, that they may neuer rise vp againe. Truly the feare can not be to great which endeth with humilitie, and departeth not from hope of pardon. But
eb. 12. alway (as the Apostle teacheth) the sinner must beware, that while he moue himselfe to the lothing of himselfe, he despeire not, oppressed with to great feare, for so do we flee away from God which calleth vs to him by repentance. Vpon which point this lesson of Bernarde is very profitable: Sorrow for sinnes is necessarie, if it be not ermo. e. 11. in ant. continuall. I counsell you sometime to returne your faute from greuous and painefull remembrance of your owne wayes, and to climbe vp to the plaine grounde of cherefull remembrance of benefites of God. Let vs mingle hony with wormewood, that the holosome bitterness may bring vs health; when it shalbe dronke tempered with swetenesse. And if ye thinke of your selues in humilitie, thinke also of the Lorde in goodnesse.

16 Now it may be also perceiued what be the frutes of repentāce, euen the duties of godlinesse toward God, and of charitie toward men, and therewithall a holines and purenesse in all our life. Finally, the more earnestly that any man examineth his life by the rule of Gods lawe, so much the surer tokens he sheweth of his repentance. Therefore the holy Ghost oftentimes, when he exhorteth vs to repentance, calleth vs sometime to all the commaundementes of the law, sometime to the duties of the second table. Albeit in other places after that he hath condemned vncleannesse in the very fountaine of the heart, he descendeth afterwarde to outwarde testimonies that do set out true repentāce: of which thing I will hereafter set before the readers eyes a table in the description of a Christian life. I will not gather testimonies out of the Prophets, wherein they partely scorne at their follies that go about to appease God with ceremonies, & do shewe that they be mere mockeries, and partely do teache that outwarde vprightnesse of life is not the principall part of repentance; bycause God loketh vpon the heart: who so euer is euen meanelly exercised in y^e scripture, shall perceiue of himselfe without any other mans putting in minde, that when we haue to do with God, we labour in vaine, vnlesse we beginne at the inward affection of the heart.
del. 12. 3. And the place of Ioel shall not a litle helpe to the vnderstanding of the the reste, where he saith: Teare your heartes and not your garmets. Also both those pointes are expressed in these wordes of Iames: Ye wicked doers, cleanse your handes: ye double men, purge your heartes. Where in deede there is an addition ioyned to the first part, but after is shewed the very fountaine and beginning that they must wipe away their secret filthinesse, that there may be an altar set vp to God in the very heart. Beside this there are also certaine outward exercises which we vse priuately as remedies to humble our selues or to tame our flesh, and publikely for the declaration of repentance. And they procede from that punishment of which Paule speaketh, for these are the properties of an afflicted minde, to be in lothesomenesse, mourning and weping, to flee gorgeousnesse and all trimming, and to forsake al delites. Then he that feleth how great an euell is the rebellion of the flesh, seketh all remedies to bridle it. Moreouer he that well bethinketh him how greuous a thing it is to haue offended the iustice of God; can not rest vntill he haue in his owne humility geuen glorie to God. Such exercises the olde writers do oftentimes rehearse, when they speake of the frutes of repentance. But albeit they do not place the whole force of repentance in them, yet the readers shall pardon me, if I speake what I thinke: it seemeth vnto me that they stand to much vpon them. And if any man will wisely wey it, I trust he will agree with me, that they haue two wayes gone beyond measure. For whē they so much enforced, and with immeasurable commendations aduanced that bodily discipline, this in deede they obtained, that the people did the more earnestly embrace it, but they in a manner darkened that, which ought to haue bene of much greater importance. Secondely, in geuing punishmentes they were somewhat more rigorous than ecclesiasticall mildenesse may beare, as we shall haue occasion to shew in an other place.

17 But because many when they heare weping, fasting and ashes spoken of, both often in other places and specially in Ioel, they measure the chiefe part of repentance by fasting and weping: therefore their errour is to be taken away. That which is there spoken of the turning of the whole heart to the Lorde, of cutting their heartes and not their garmentes, is proprely belonging to repentance: but weping and fasting are not ioyned as continuall or necessary effectes thereof, but are spoken of in respect of a speciall circumstance. Because he had prophecied, that there hāged ouer the Iewes a most greuous destruction, therefore he counselleth them to preuent the wrath of God, not only in repenting, but also in vttering tokens of their sorrow. For as a man standing to be arraigned, vseth humbly to abace himfelfe with an ouergrown bearde, vncombed heare and blacke apparell, to moue the iudge to pitie; so it behoued them when they stode accused before the iudgement feate of God, in piteous array to besech him not to extend his rigour. But although ashes and sackcloth did paraduenture more fitly agree with those times. Yet it is certaine, that weping and fasting shoulde be to a very conuenient good vse among vs, so oft as the Lord semeth to threaten vs any plague or calamitie. For when he maketh any danger to appere, he doth after a certaine maner geue warning, that he is prepared or armed to reuenge. Therefore the prophet did wel, when he exhorted his contritmen to weping and fasting, that is to the sorrowfull manner of accused men, whose offences he said a litle before, were had in examination. Euen as the Pastors of the Church should not do ill at this day, if when they see any ruine hanging ouer the neckes of their people, they would crie out vpon them to make hast to fasting and weping: so that they would with greater and more inward care and diligence, alway enforce that which is the principall point, that they must cut their heartes and not their garmentes. It is out of doubt, that fasting is not alway ioyned with repentance, but is appointed peculiarly for times of miserable plagues: and therefore Christ ioyneth it with way-ling, when he acquiteth the Apostles from neede thereof, vntill the time that being spoiled of his presence, they should be tormented with griefe. I speake of solene fasting. For the priuate life of the godly ought to be tempered with honest sparing and sobrietie, that in the whole course thereof there may appere a certaine kinde of fasting. But because all this matter shalbe to be declared againe in the place where we shall entreate of the discipline of the Church, therefore I do now the more sclenderly touche it. But this one thing I will adde here by the way: when the name of repentance is applied to this outward profession, then it is vnpropely turned from the naturall meaning which I haue aboue set forth of it. For it is not so much a turning vnto God as a confession of fault, with a beseching of God not to charge them with the paine and giltinesse. So to do penance in ashes and sackcloth is nothing els, than to vtter a displeasednesse when God is angry with vs for greuous offenses. And this is a publike kinde of confession; whereby we condemning our selues before the Angels and the world, do preuent the iudgement of God. For Paule rebuking their slouthfulnesse that tenderly beare with their own faultes, saith: if we did iudge our selues, we should not be iudged of God. But it is not alway necessarie to make men openly of counsell and witnesses of our repentance: but to confesse priuately to God is a part of true

repentance which can not be omitted. For there is nothing more vnreasonable than to loke to haue God to pardon vs the finnes in which we flatter our selues and do hide them by Hipocrisie, least he should bring them to light. And it behoueth vs not onely to confesse those finnes which we dayely commit, but more greuous offenses ought to drawe vs further, and to call againe into our remembrance thinges that seeme longe ago buried. Which lesson Dauid geueth vs by his example. For being touched with shame of his newly committed fault, he examineth himselfe euen to the time when he was in his mothers wombe, and cōfesseth that euen then he was corrupted and infected with the filthinesse of the flesh. And this he doth not to diminish the haynousnesse of his fault, as many hide themselues in the multitude, and seke to escape punishment by wrapping other with them. But Dauid doth far otherwise which with simple plainnes enforceeth his fault in saying, that being corrupt from his first infancie, he hath not cessed to heape euels vpon euels. Also in an other place he likewise so examineth his passed life, that he craueth the mercie of God for the finnes of his youth. And truely then onely shall we proue our drowfines to be shakē away from vs, if groning vnder our burden and bewailing our euels, we aske reliefe of God. It is moreouer to be noted, that the repentance which we are commaunded continually to applie, differeth from that repentance, that listeth vp as it were, from death them that either haue filthily fallen, or with vnbridled licentiousnesse haue throwen forth themselues to sinne, or after a certaine manner of rebellious reuolting, haue shaken of the yoke of God. For the Scripture oftentimes, when it exhorteth to repentance, meaneth thereby as it were a passage or rising againe from death into life: and when it reherfeth that the people did penance, it meaneth that they were turned from their idolatrie & other grosse offences. And in like manner Paule threateneth mourning vnto sinners that haue not done penance for their wantonnesse, fornication and vnchastitie. This difference is to be diligently marked, least while we heare that few are called to penāce, a more than carelesse assurednesse should crepe vpon vs, as though the mortifieng of the flesh did no more belong vnto vs, the care whereof, the corrupt desires that alway tickle vs, and the vices that commonly budde vp in vs, do not suffer vs to release, Therefore the speciall repentance which is required but of some, wimho the Deuell hath violently carried away from the feare of God, and fast bound with damnable snares, taketh not away the ordinary repentance which the corruptnesse of nature compelleth vs to applie throughout all the whole course of our life.

19 Now if that be true, which is most evidently certaine, that all the summe of the Gospell is contained in these two principall pointes, Repentance and forgeuenesse of sinnes: do we not see, that the Lord doth therefore freely iustifie thē that be his, that he may also by the sanctification of his Spirite restore them into true righteousness? John the Angel sent before the face of Christ to prepare his wayes, preached: Repent ye, for the kingdome of heauen is come nere at hande. In calling thē to repentance, he did put them in minde to acknowledge themselues sinners, and all that was theirs, to be damnable before the Lorde, that they might with all their heartes desire the mortifieng of their flesh and a newe regeneration in the Spirit. In telling them of the kingdome of God, he called them to faith. For by the kingdome of God which he taught to be at hand, he meant forgeuenesse of sinnes, saluation, and life, and all that euer we get in Christ. Wherefore in the other Euangelistes it is written, John cam preaching the Baptisme of repentance vnto forgeuenesse of sinnes. And what is that els, but that they being oppressed and weried with the burden of sinnes, shold turne to the Lorde, and conceiue good hope of forgeuenesse and saluation? So Christ also beganne his preachings: The kingdome of God is come nere at hand: repent ye and beleue the Gospell. First he declareth that the treasures of Gods mercie are opened in him, and then he requireth repentance, and last of all confidence in the promises of God. Therefore when he meant briefly to comprehend the whole summe of the Gospell, he said, that he must suffer & rise againe from the dead, and that repentance and forgeuenesse of sinnes must be preached in his name. The Apostles also preached the same after his resurrectiō, that he was raised vp by God, to geue to Israell repentance and forgeuenesse of sinnes. Repentance is preached in the name of Christ, when men do heare by the doctrine of the Gospell that all their thoughtes, their affections, and their endeuors are corrupt and faulty, and that therefore it is necessarie that they be borne againe if they will entre into the kingdome of God. Forgeuenesse of sinnes is preached when men are taught that Christ is made to them redemption, righteousness, saluation and life: in whose name they are freely accompted righteous and innocent in the sight of God, whereas both these graces are receiued by faith, as I haue in an other place declared: yet because the goodnesse of God whereby sinnes are forgiven, is the prooffe obiect of faith, therefore it shalbe good that it be diligently distinguished from repentance.

20 Now as the hatred of sinne, which is the beginning of repentance, tance, openeth vs the first entrie vnto Christ, which sheweth himselfe to none but to miserable and afflicted sinners, which grone, labour, are loden, are hungry and thirsty, and pine away with sorrow and miserie: so must we endeuer toward repentance, throughout all our life applie it, and follow it to the ende, if we will abide in Christ. For he came to call sinners, but to repentance: he was sent to blesse the vnworthy, but so that euery one should turne himself from his wickednesse. The Scripture is full of such sayings. Wherefore when God offreth forgeuenesse of sinnes, he likewise vseth to require on our parte repentance, secretly declaring thereby, that his mercie ought to be to men a cause to repent them. Do (saith he) iudgement and righteousnesse, bycause saluation is come nere at hand. Againe. There shall come to Sion a Redemer, and to them that in Iacob repēt from their sinnes. Againe. Seke the Lord while he may be found: call vpon him while he is nere. Let the wicked leue his way and the wickednes of his thoughts, and be turned to the Lorde, and he shall haue mercy on him. Againe. Turne ye and repent, that your sinnes may be done away. Where yet is to be noted, that this condition is not so annexed as though our repentance were a foundation to deserue pardon, but rather (because the Lorde hath determined to haue mercy vpon men to this ende that they should repent) he teacheth men whither they shall trauaile if they will obtaine grace. Therefore so long as we shall dwell in the prison of our body, we must continually wrestle with the vices of our corrupt flesh, yea with our owne naturall soule. Plato saith in certainē places, that the life of a Philosopher is a meditation of death, but we may more truely say, that the life of a Christian man is a perpetuall studie and exercise of mortifieng the flesh, till it being vtterly slaine, the Spirit of God get the dominion in vs. Therefore I thinke that he hath much profited, that hath learned much to mislike himselfe: not that he shoulde sticke fast in that mire and go no further, but rather that he should hast and long toward God, that being grafted into the death and life of Christ, he should studie vpon a continuall repentance: as truely they can not otherwise do, that haue a naturall hatred of sinne: for no man euer hated sinne, vnlesse he were first in loue with righteousnesse. This doctrine, as it was most simple of all other, so I thought it best to agree with the truth of the Scripture.

21 Now that Repentance is a singular gift of God, I thinke it be so wel knowen by the doctrine aboue taught, that I neede not to repete a long discourse to proue it againe. Therefore the Church praiseth and hath in admiration the benefit of God, that he hath geuen

2. Tim. 2. 25. the Gentiles repentance vnto saluation. And Paule commaunding Timothee to be patient and milde toward the vnbeleuers; saith: If at any time God geue them repentance that they may repent from the snares of the Deuell. God in deede affirmeth that he willeth the conuersion of all men, and directeth his exhortations generally to all men: but the effectuall working therof hangeth vpon the Spirit of regeneration. Because it were more easy to create vs men, than of our owne power to put on a better nature. Therefore in the whole course of regeneration we are not without cause called, the worke of God created to good workes, which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. Whom soeuer the lordes will is to deliuer from death, those he quickeneth with the Spirite of regeneration: not that repentance is properly the cause of saluation, but bycause it is already seen that it is vnseparable from faith and from the mercie of God: sith (as Esaye testifieth) there is a redemer come to him, and to those that in Iacob are returned from their wickednesse. This truely standeth stedfastly determined, that where so euer liueth the feare of God, there the Spirit hath wrought vnto the saluation of man. Therefore, in Esaye, when the faithfull complaine and lament that they are forsaken of God, they reckon this as a token of being reprobates, that their hartes were hardened by God. The Apostle also meaning to exclude apostataes from hope of saluation, apointeth this reason, that it is impossible for them to be renewed vnto repentance: because God in renewing them whom he will not haue perish, sheweth a token of his fatherly fauour, and in a manner draweth them vnto him with the beames of his cherefull and mery countenance: on the other side with hardening them, he thundereth against the reprobate, whose wickednesse is vnardonable. Which kinde of vengeance the Apostle threatneth to wilfull apostataes, which when they depart from the faith of the Gospell, do make a scorne of God, reprochefully despise his grace, and defile and tread vnder feete the bloud of Christ, yea as much as in them is they crucifie him againe. For he doth not (as some fondly rigorous men would haue it) cut of hope of pardon from all wilfull sinnes: but teacheth that apostasie is vnworthy of all excuse: so that it is no maruell that God doth punish a contempt of himself so full of sacrilege, with vnappeasable rigour. For he saith that it is impossible, that they which haue once ben enlightened, haue tasted of the heauenly gift, haue ben made partakers of the holy Ghost, haue tasted of the good worde of God and the powers of the worlde to come, if they fall, should be renewed to repentance, crucifying againe of new, and making a scorne of the sonne of God. Againe in an other place:

place : If (saith he) we willingly sinne after knowledge of the truth Heb. 10. 25. receiued, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sinnes, but a certaine dreadfull expectation of iudgement, &c. These also be the places, out of the wrong vnderstanding whereof, the Nouatians in old time haue gathered matter to play the mad men: with whose rigorousnesse certaine good men being offended, beleued this to be a counterfeit Epistle in the Apostles name, which yet in all partes doth truly fauour of an Apostolike spirit. But bycause we contend with none but with them that allow it, it is easy to shew, how these sentences do nothing mainteine their error. First it is necessarie that the Apostle agree with his maister, whiche affirmeth that all sinne and blasphemie shall be forgeuē, except the sinne against the holy Ghost, which is not forgeuen neither in this world, nor in the world to come. It is certaine (I say) that the Apostle was contented with this exception, vnlesse we will make him an aduersary to the grace of Christ. Whereupon followeth, that pardon is denied to no speciall offenses, but onely to one, which proceeding of a desperate rage, can not be ascribed to weakenesse, and openly sheweth that a man is possessed of the Deuell.

22 But to discusse this, it behoueth to enquire what is that same so horrible offense, that shall haue no forgeuenesse. Whereas Augustine in one place defineth it an obstinate stiffness euen vnto death, with despeire of pardō, that doth not well agree with the very wordes of Christ, that it shall not be forgeuen in this world. For either that is spoken in vaine, or it may be committed in this life. But if Augustines definitiō be true, then it is not committed, vnlesse it continue euē vnto death. Wheras some other say, that he sinneth against the holy Ghost, that enuieth the grace bestowed vpon his brother: I see not from whence that is fetched. But let vs bring a true definitiō, which being ones proued with sure testimonies, shall easily by it selfe ouerthrowe all the reste. I say therefore, that they sinne against the holy Ghost, which of set purpose resist the truth of God, with brightness whereof they are so daseled, that they can not pretend ignorance: which they do onely to this ende to resist. For Christ meaning to expounde that which he had said, immediatly addeth: He that speaketh a worde against the sonne of man, it shalbe forgeuen him: but he that blasphemeth against the holy Ghost, shall not be forgeuen. And Matthew, for the blasphemie against the holy Spirit, putteth the spirit of blasphemie. But how can a man speake a reproche against the Sonne, but it is also spoken against the holy Ghost? They that stumble vnware against the truth of God, not knowing it, which do ignorantly speake euell of Christ, hauing yet this minde, that they would not extinguish the truth of God disclosed vnto them, or ones with one worde offend him, whome they had knowen to be the lordes anointed: these men sinne against the father and the sonne. So there are many at this day, that do most hatefully detest the doctrine of the Gospell, which if they did know it to be the doctrine of the Gospell, they would be redy to worship with all their heart. But they whose conscience is conuincd, that it is the worde of God which they forsake and fight against, and yet cesse not to fight against it, they are said to blaspheme the holy Ghost: for asmuch as they wrastle against the enlightening that is the worke of the holy Ghost. Such were many of the Iewes, which when they could not resist the Spirit that spake by Stephen, yet endeuored to resist. It is no doubt but that many of them were carried vnto it with zele of the lawe, but it appereth that there were some other that of malicious wickednesse did rage against God himselve, that is to say against the doctrine, which they were not ignoraunt to be of God. And such were those Pharisees, against whome the Lord inueyeth, which to ouerthrow the power of the holy Ghost, defamed him with the name of Beelzebub. This therefore is the Spirit of blasphemy, when mans boldnesse of set purpose, leapeth forth to reproche of the name of God. Which Paule signifieth when he saith, that he obtained mercie, because he had ignorantly comitted those thinges through vnbelefe, for which otherwise he had bene vnworthy of Gods fauour. If ignorance ioined with vnbelefe was the cause that he obtained pardon, thereupon followeth, that there is no place for pardon, where knoweledge is ioined to vnbelefe.

23 But if thou marke it well, thou shall perceiue that the Apostle speaketh not of one or other particular fall, but of the vniuersall departinge whereby the reprobate do forsake saluation. And it is no maruell, that they whom Iohn in his canonically Epistle affirmeth not to haue bene of the elect, from whome they went out, do fele God vnappeasable. For he directeth his speech against thē, that imagined; that they might returne to the Christian religion, although they had ones departed from it: and calling them from this false and pestilent opinion, he saith that which is most true, that there is no way of returne open for them to the communion of Christ, that wittingly and willingly haue cast it away: But they cast it not away, that onely in dissolute licentiousnesse of life transgresse the word of the Lord, but they that of set purpose cast away his whole doctrine. Therefore the deceit is in these wordes of falling and sinning. Because the Nouatiāns expound expound Falling to be, if a man being taught by the law of the Lorde, that he ought not to steale or to commit fornication, abstaineth not from stealing or fornication. But contrariwise I affirme, that there is a secrete comparison of contraries, wherein ought to be repeted all thinges contrarie to that which was first spoken, so that here is expressed not any particular fault, but the whole turning away from God, and (as I may so call it) the Apostasie of the whole man. Therefore when he saith, they which haue fallen after that they haue ones bene enlightened, and haue tasted the heauenly gift, and bene made parrakers of the holy Ghost, and also tasted the good worde of God and the powers of the worlde to come: it is to be vnderstanded of them, that with aduised vngodlinesse haue choked the light of the holy spirit, haue spit out againe the tast of the heauenly gift, haue estranged themselues from the sanctification of the holy Ghost, haue troden vnder foote the worde of God and the powers of the worlde to come. And the more to expresse that aduised purpose of wickednesse, in an other place afterwarde he addeth this worde by name. Wilfully. For when he saith, that there is left no sacrifice for them that sinne willingly after knowledge of the truthe receiued, he doth not denie, that Christ is a continuall sacrifice to purge the iniquities of the holy ones (which he expressly crieth out almost in the whole Epistle, where he declareth the priesthoode of Christ) but he saith, that there remaineth no other when that is ones forsaken: and it is forsaken, when the truth of the Gospell is of set purpose renounced.

24 But whereas some do thinke it to harde and to far from the tender merciefulnesse of God, that any are put away that flee to beseching the Lords mercie: that is easily answered. For he doth not say, that pardon is denied them if they turne to the Lorde: but he vtterly denieth, that they can rise vnto repentance, bycause they are by the iuste iudgement of God striken with eternall blindnesse for their vnthankfulnesse. And it maketh nothing to the contrarie that afterwarde he applieth too this purpose the example of Esau, which in vaine attempted with howling & weping to recouer his right of the first begotten. And no more doth that threatening of the Prophet, when they crie, I will not heare. For in such phrases of speache is meante neither the true conuersion, nor calling vpon God, but that carefulnesse of y^e wicked wherewith being bounde, they are cōpelled in extremity to loke vnto y^e which before they carelesly neglected, that there is no good thing for thē but in y^e Lords helpe. But this they do not so much call vpon, as they mourne that it is taken from them.

Therefore the Prophet meaneth nothing els by Crying, and the Apostle nothing els by Weping, but that horrible torment which by desperatiō fretteth & vexeth the wicked. This it is good to marke diligently: for els God should disagree with himselfe, which crieth ze. 18. by the Prophet that he will be mercifull so sone as the sinner turneth. And as I haue alredy said, it is certaine that the minde of man is not turned to better, but by Gods grace preuenting it. Also his promise concerning calling vpon him, will neuer deceiue. But that blinde torment wherewith the reprobate are diuersly drawn, when they see that they must needes seeke God, that they may finde remedie for their euels, and yet do flee from his presence, is vnproperly called Conuerfion and prayer.

25 But a question is moued, whereas the Apostle denieth that
Reg. 8.29. God is appeased with fained repentance, how Achab obtained pardon and turned away the punishment pronounced vpon him, whom yet it appereth by the reste of the course of his life to haue bene onely striken amased with sodeine feare. He did in deede put on sacke cloth, scattered ashes vpon him, lay vpon the ground, and (as it is testified of him) he was humbled before God: but it was not enough to cut his garmentes when his heart remained thicke & swollen with malice. Yet we see howe God is turned to mercy. I answere that so somtimes hypocrites are spared for a time, but yet so that euer the wrath of God lieth vpon them, and that is done not so much for their sakes, as for common example. For whereas Achab had his punishment mitigate vnto him, what profit got he thereby, but that he should not fele it a liue in earth? Therefore the course of God, although it were hidden, yet had a fast abiding place in his house, and he himself went en. 27 into eternall destruction. This same is to be seene in Esau. For though he had a repulse, yet a temporell blessing was graunted him at his weping. But bycause the spirituall inheritance, by the oracle of God could not rest but with one of the brethren, when Iacob was chosen and Esau refused, that putting away did exclude the mercie of God: this comfort was left him as to a beastly man, that he shoulde be fat with the fat of the earth and the dew of heauen. And this is it that I said euen now, that it ought to be referred to the example of other, that we should learne the more cherefully to applie our mindes and endeouours to repentance, bycause it is not to be doubted that when we are truely and hartily turned, God will be ready to forgeue vs, whose mercifulnesse extendeth it selfe euen to the vniworthy, so longe as they shew any grieffe at all. And therewithal we be also taught, how terrible iudgement is prepared for all the obstinate, which now make it a sport with no lesse shamelesse face than iron heart to despise and set nought by the threatenings of God. After his manner he oftentimes reached out his hand to the children of Israell, to releue their miseries, although their cries were counterfait, and their heart double and false, as himselfe in the Psalme complaineth, that they by and by returned to their nature, and so minded with so frendly gentle dealing to bring then to earnest conuersion, or to make them vnexcusable. Yet in releasing punishmentes for a time, he doth not binde himselfe to a perpetuall lawe thereby, but rather riseth somtimes more rigorously against Hypocrites, and doubleth their peines, that thereby may appere howe much faining displeaseth him. But (as I haue said) he sheweth some examples of his redinesse to geue pardon, by which the godly may be encouraged to amendement of life, and their pride may be the more greuouly condemned, that stubbornely kick against the pricke.

36.

That all that the Sophisters babble in their scholes of Penance, is far from the purenesse of the Gospell. Where is entreated of Confession and Satisfaction.

NOW I come to discusse thole things, which the Schole Sophisters haue taught of repentance. Which I will run ouer in as few words as may be, bycause I minde not to go through all, least this boke, whiche I labour to drawe into a short abridgment, should growe to a huge greatnesse. And the Sophisters haue entangled it in so many volumes, being a matter otherwise not very hard, that a man shall hardly finde how to get out, if he ones fall into their dregges. First, in defining it, they shew that they neuer vnderstode what repentance was. For they take hold of certaine sayings of the olde writers, which do nothing at all expresse that nature of repentance, as that to repent is to wepe for sinnes passed, and not to commit sinnes to be wept for: Againe, that it is to lament euels passed, and not to commit againe other euels to be lamented. Againe: that it is a certaine sorowfull reuēge, punishing in himselfe that which he is sory to haue committed. Againe: that it is a sorrow of heart, and bitternesse of soule, for the euels that a man hath committed or to which he hath consented. But, to graunt these thinges well saide of the fathers, (which a contentious man might easily enough denie) yet they were not spoken to this entent to describe repentance, but onely to exhort them to whom they wrote, that they should not fall againe into the same offenses, out of which they had ben drawen. Cap. 4. Of the maner how to receiue if we list to turne all such titles of commendation into definitions; then other may also be adioined as rightfully as they. As this of Chrysofome, Repentance is a medicine that destroyeth sinne, a gift geuen from heauen, a maruellous vertue, a grace surmounting the force of the law. Yea and the doctrine which they after ward teach, is somewhat worse than these definitions. For they sticke so earnestly in outward exercises, that a manne can gather nothings els out of infinite volumes, but that repentance is a discipline and rigorousnesse that serueth partly to tame the flesh, and partly to chastise and punish vices: but they keepe maruellous silence of the inward renewing of the minde that draweth with it correction of life. There is in dede much talke among them of Contrition and Attrition, they torment soules with many doubttes, & do thrust into them much trouble and carefulnesse: but when they seeme to haue thoroughly wounded the heartes, they heale the bitternesse with a light sprinkeling of ceremonies. And when they haue thus curiously defined repētance, they diuide it into contrition of hearte, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke, no more logically than they defined it, although they wolde seeme to haue wasted all their age in framinge of syllogismes. But if a man will go about to proue by the definition (which kinde of argument is of force among logicians) that a man may wepe for his sinnes passed, and commit no more to be wept for, that he may bewaile his euels passed, and commit no more to be bewailed, and that he may punish himself for that which he was sory to haue committed. &c. although he do not confesse with his mouth: howe will they maintaine their diuision? For if that true penitent man do not confesse, then repentance may be without confession. But if they answer, that this diuision is referred to repentance, in respect that it is a sacrament, or is meant of the whole perfection of repentance, which they comprehend not in their definitions, thē is there no cause to blame me, but let them lay the fault in themselues that make not a purer and plainer definition, I truely (according to my grossnesse) when any thing is disputed of, do referre all things to the very definition, which is the stay and grounde of the whole disputation. But admitte that to be their masterlike licence. Now let vs particularly consider all the partes in ordre. Wheras I do negligently leape ouer as trifles those things that they with great grauitie of countenance do publish for misteries, I do it not vnwittingely, neither were it very painful for me to cōfute al that they thinke thēselues to haue deeply and suttley disputed) but I woulde thinke it against conscience to wery the readers with such trifles without any profit. Truely it is easy

easy to know by the questions which they moue and tosse, and wherewith they miserably encomber themselves, that they prate of things that they know not. As for example: whether the repentance of our sinne pleaseth God, when obstinacie endureth in other. Againe: whether the punishmentes layed vpon man by God, do auaille to satisfaction. Againe: whether repentance may be oftentimes reiterate for deadly sinnes: where they fowly and wickedly define, that penaunce is daily done but for veniall sinnes. Likewise they very much torment themselves with a grosse error, vpon the sayinge of Hierome, that repentance is a second bourde after shipwracke. Wherin they shewe that they neuer waked from their brutish dulnesse, to feele so much as a farre of the thousandth part of their faultes.

But I wold the readers should note, that here is not a quarel about the shadow of an asse, but the most earnest matter of all other is entreated of, that is to say, forgeuennesse of sinnes. For whereas they require three things to repentance, contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke: they do therewithall teach that those three things are necessarie to the obtaining of forgeuennes of sinnes. But if it behoues vs to knowe any thinge at all in all oure religion, this truely behoueth vs most of all, I meane to vnderstand and knowe well by what meane, with what lawe, vpon what condition, with what easinesse or hardnesse the forgeuennesse of sinnes is obtained. If this knowledge stande not plaine and certaine, the conscience can haue no rest at all, no peace with God, no confidence or assured-nesse, but continually trembleth, wauereth, is troubled, is tormented, is vexed, horribly dreadeth, hateth and fleeth the sight of God. But if the forgeuennesse of sinnes hang vpon those conditions to which they do binde it, then nothing is more miserable; nothing in more lamentable case than we. They make Contrition the first parte of obtaining pardon, and they require that to be a due contrition, that is to say perfect and full: but in the meane time they do not determine when a man may be assured, that he hath to the full measure perfectly perfourmed this contrition. Truely I graunt that euery man ought diligently and earnestly to enforce himselfe, with bitterly weeping for his sinnes, to whet himselfe more and more to a lothing and hatred of them. For this is a sorrowe not to be repented, that breedeth repentance vnto saluation. But when there is such a bitter-nesse of sorrowe required as may proportionally aunswer the great-nesse of the fault, and such as may in balaunce counterpaise with the grust of pardon, here the pure consciences are maruellously tormented and troubled, when they see them selues changed with a due

contrition of sinnes, and do not so attaine the measure of that due, that they can determine with them selues, that they haue duely performed so much as they duely oughte. If they say that we must do as much as lieth in vs, then come we still to the same pointe that we were at before: for how dare any manne assure himselfe that he hath employed all his force to bewaile his sinnes? So when the consciences hauinge longe wraisted with them selues, and longe bene exercised with battailes, do at length finde no heauen to rest in, yet somewhat to ease them selues, they enforce them selues to a sorrowe, and wringe out teares to make perfect their contrition.

3. But if they say that I flaudre them: Let them come forth and shewe any one man, that by such doctrine of contrition hath not either bene driuen to despeire, or hath not set for his defense a counterfayting of sorrowe in steede of true sorrowe, against the iudgement of God. We haue also our selues said in one place, that forgeueneffe of sinnes neuer cometh without repentance, by cause none but the afflicted and wounded with conscience of sinnes, can sincerely call vpon the mercie of God: but we haue therewithall further said, that repentance is not the cause of the forgeueneffe of sinnes. As for those tormentes of soules, which they say must be perfourmed of duetie, we haue taken them away: we haue taught the sinner not to loke vpon his owne contrition nor his owne teares, but to fasten both his eyes vpon the onely mercie of God. We haue onely put him in minde that Christ called the laboring and loden, when he was sent to publish glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in heart, to preach remission to captiues, to deliuer prisonners, and to comforte them that mourne. From which shoulde be excluded both the Pharises, that filled with their owne righteousnesse, do not acknowledge their owne pouertie, and also the despisers that carelesse of Gods wrath do seke no remedy for their euels. For such do not labour, nor are loden; nor contrite in heart, nor bounde nor captiue. But there is great difference betweene teaching a man to deserue forgeueneffe of sinnes with due and full contrition, which the sinner can neuer perfourme: and instructing him to hunger and thirst for the mercie of God, that by the acknowledging of his owne miserie, by his owne vnquietnesse, wearinesse and captiuitie, it may be shewed him, where he ought to seeke for releefe, rest and libertie: and finally, he may be taught in the humbling of himselfe, to geue glorie to God.

4. Concerning Cōfession, there hath bene alway great strife betweene the Canonistes & Scholediuiues: while the one sorte affirme, that confession is cōmaunded by the speciall cōmaundement of God, and the other sorte deny it and say, that it is commaunded onely by the Ecclesiasticall constitutions. But in this contention hath appeared the notable shamelesnes of the diuines, that haue corrupted and violently wrafted as many places of Scripture, as they alleaged for their purpose. And when they saw that they coulde not so obtaine that which they required, they which would be thought more suttle than the rest escaped away with this shift, that confession came from the law of God, in respect of the substance of it, but afterward receiued forme of the law Positiue. Euen as the foolishlest sorte amonge the lawyers do say, that Citations came from the law of God, because it is said: Adam where art thou? And likewise Exceptions, because Adam answered as it were by way of exception sayinge: The wife that thou gaucst me. &c. but that both citations and exceptions receiued forme giuen them by the Ciuile lawe. But let vs see by what argumentes they proue this confession, either Formed or Vnformed to be the commaundement of God. The Lord (say they) sent the leprous men to the priestes. But what? Sent he the to confession? Who euer heard it spoken, that the Leuiticall priestes were appointed to heare confessions? Therefore they flie to Allegories, and say: It was commaunded by the law of Moses, that the priestes should discern betwene leprosie and leprosie: sinne is a spirituall leprosie: therefore it is the priestes office to pronounce vpon it. Before that I aunswere them, I aske this by the way, If this place make the iudges of the spirituall leprosie, why do they draw to the knowledge of naturall and fleshly leprosie? This forsooth is not to mocke with the Scriptures. The law giueth to the Leuiticall priestes the knowledge of Leprosie, therefore let vs take it vpō vs. Sinne is a spiritual leprosie, therefore let vs also be examiners of sinne. Now I answere: sith the priest-hood is remoued, it is necessary that the law be remoued also. All priesthoodes are remoued to Christ, and fulfilled and ended in him, therefore to him onely all the right and honor of priesthood is also remoued. If they loue so well to follow allegories, let them set Christ before them for the only priest, and heape vpon his iudgement seate the free iurisdiction of all things: this we can easily be cōtent to suffer. Moreouer their allegorie is very vnfit, that setteth among the ceremonies that lawe which is merely politike. Why then did Christ sende the leprous men to the priestes? That the priestes shoulde not caull that he did breake the law that commaunded the man healed of the leprosie, to be shewed before the priest and purged with offering of sacrifice: therefore he commaunded the leprous men beinge cleansed, to do that which belonged to the law. Go (sayth he) and shew your selues to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses hath commaunded in the law that it shoulde be for a witnessse vnto them.

And truely this miracle shoulde haue bin a witnessse vnto them, for they had pronounced them leprous, and now they pronounce them healed. Are they not whether they will or no compelled to become all nations. Againe: Ye shalbe led before kings and gouernours, for a witnessse to them, that is: that in the iudgement of God they may be

Chana- I am ashamed to alleage the witnessse of any man: wheras Christ pro-

næa. nounceth that he leaueth the right of the lawe whole to the priestes as to the professed enemies of the Gospell, which were alway bent to carpe against it, if their mouth had not bin stopped. Wherefore that the popish sacrificing priestes may still keepe this possession, let them openly take partes with them which must of necessity be restrained by force, that they speake not ill against Christ. For this no-thinge belongeth to his true ministers:

They bring their second argument out of the same fountaine, that is from an allegorie, as though allegories were of great force to confirme any doctrine. But let them be of force, if I do not proue that I can make a fairer shew of the for my side, than they can for theirs.

Ioh. 11. They say, The Lord commaunded his Disciples, that when Lazarus

44. was raised vp, they should vnbinde and loose him from his bondes.

Here first they lie: for it is no where read that the Lord said this to the Disciples: and it is much more likely that he sayd it to the Iewes that stode by him, that the miracle might be made the more euidet without suspition of fraude, and his power appeare the greater, that without any touching, with his only word he raised vp dead men. For thus I expounde it: that the Lord, to take away all wrongfull opinion frō the Iewes, willed them to rolle away the stone, to feele the stinke, to behold assured tokens of death, to see him rising by the only power of his worde, and them first to feele him liuinge. And this is the Ser. cō- iudgement of Chrysostome. But let vs graunt that this was spoken to tra lu- the Disciples: what will they get therby? That the Lord gaue his Adas, Gē postles power to loose. But how much more fitly and more handsomtilis & ly might these thinges be applied by way of allegorie, to say that by hære- this

tic. this

this signe the lord meant to instruct his faithfull, to loose them that he had raised vp: that is, that they should not call into remembrance those sinnes that he had forgotten: that they should not condemne the for sinners whom he had acquitted: that they should not reproch men with those things that he had forgiuen: that they should not be rigorous to punish, and lightly offended, where he is mercifull and easily entreated to spare? Truely nothing ought to moue vs more to readinesse to forgiue, than the example of the Iudge that threatneth that he will be vnappeasable to them that be too rigorous & vngentle. Now let them go and boast of their allegories.

6 But now they ioyne more neere hande with vs, when they fight (as they thinke) with open sentences. They that came to Johns baptisme, did confesse their sinnes, & Iames willeth that we confesse our sinnes one to an other. No maruell if they that wold be baptised did confesse their sinnes, for it was sayd before that John preached the baptisme of repētance, & baptised in water vnto repentance. Whom should he then haue baptized, but them that had confessed themselves sinners? Baptisme is a token of the forgiuenesse of sinnes: and who should be admitted to this tokē but sinners, & they that acknowledge themselves to be such? Therefore they cōfessed their sinnes, that they might be baptized. And not without a cause doth Iames bid vs confesse one to an other. But if they did marke what followeth next after, they would vnderstand, that this also maketh litle for the. Confesse (saith he) one to an other your sinnes, & pray one for an other: He ioyneth together mutuall confession & mutual praier. If we must confesse to priestes only, the must we also pray for priestes only. Yea, What and if it might folow of the words of Iames that only priestes might confesse: for when he willeth that we should confesse one to an other, he speaketh only to them that may heare the confessions of other: his word is in Greke Allelous, mutually, interchaungeably, by turnes, or (if they so like best to rearme it) by way of reciprocatiō one to an other. But so interchāgeably none can cōfesse, but they that are mete to heare cōfessions. Which prerogatiue sith they vouchsaue to graunt only to priestes, we do also put ouer the office of confessing to them only. Therefore away with such trifelings, & let vs take the very meaning of the Apostle which is simple & plaine: that is, y we should lay our weakenes one in an others bosome to receiue mutual counsell, mutual cōpassion & mutual comfort one of an other: then that we being naturally priuie to y weakenesses of our brethren, should pray for the to y Lord. Why do they then alleage Iames against vs, which do so earnestly require y cōfession of the mercy of God? but no man

Ro. 3.9. God, before his Angels, before the Church, yea and before all men confesse himselfe a sinner. For the Lorde hath concluded all vnder finnes that all mouthes might be stopped, and all flesh humbled before God, and he only iustified and exalted.

17 But I maruell with what face they dare affirme, that the confession whereof they speake, is of the lawe of God: the vse whereof we graunt in dede to be very auncient, but such as we are able to proue in old time to haue bin at liberty. Truely euen their owne cronacles declare, that there was no certaine lawe or constitution of it before the times of Innocent the third. Surely if they had had a more auncient law, they woulde rather haue taken hold thereof, than haue bin contented with the decree of the counsell of Laterane, and so made themselues to be laughed at, euen of children. In other things they sticke not to make forged decrees, which they father vpon the most auncient Counsells, that they may with very reuerence of antiquity dasell the eyes of the simple. In this point, it came not in their minde to thrust in such a false packe. Therefore by their owne witnessse, there are not yet passed three hundred yeres since Innocent the third laid that snare vpon men, and charged them with necessity of Confessiō. But, to speake nothinge of the time: the very barbarousnesse of the wordes minisheth the credit of that lawe. For where these good fathers commaunde euery one of both kindes, male and female, once euery yeaere to confesse all his finnes to his owne priest, pleasant men do merily take exception, that in this commaundement are contained only Hermaphrodites, & say that it belongeth not to such a one as is either male or female only. Since that time, a more gosse beastlines hath bewrayed it selfe in their scholers, that can not expound what is meant By his owne priest. Whatsoeuer all the Popes hyred bablers do prate, we hold both that Christ was neuer the author of this law that compelleth men to reckon vp their finnes, and also that there passed a thousande and two hundred yeares from the resurrection of Christ before that any such law was made. And so, that this tyranny was then first brought in, when all godlinesse & learning being destroyed, the visiors of Pastors had without choise taken all licentiousnesse vpon them. Moreouer there are euident testimonies both in histories and other auncient writers, which teach that this confession was a politicke discipline redeemed by the Bishops, not a lawe made by Christ or his Apostles. I will alleage but one out of many, which shall be a plaine proufe thereof. Sozomenus reporteth that this constitution of bishops was diligently kept in all the west Churches, but specially at Rome. Wherby he sheweth that it was no vniuersall ordinance of all Churches. But he saith that there was one of the priestes peculiarly apointed to serue for this office. Whereby he doth sufficiently confute that which these men do falsely say of the keyes giuen for this vse vniuersally to the whole order of priesthoode. For it was not the common office of all priestes, but the speciall duety of some one that was chosen therunto by the bishop. The same is he, whom at this day in all cathedrall Churches they call Penitentiarie, the examiner of haynous offenses, and such whereof the punishment pertaineth to good example. Then he saith immediatly after, that this was also the manner at Constantinople, till a certaine woman faininge that she came to confession, was founde so to haue coloured vnder that pretence the vnhonest company that she vsed with a certaine Deacon. For this act, Nectarius a man notable in holinesse and learninge, bishop of that Church, tooke away that custome of confessinge. Here, here let these asses lift vp their eares. If auricular confession were the law of God, how durst Nectarius repelle and destroy it? Will they accuse for an heretike and schismatike Nectarius a holy man of God, allowed by the consenting voices of all the olde fathers? But by the same sentence they must condemne the Church of Constantinople, in which Sozomenus affirmeth that the maner of confessing was not onely let slip for a time, but also discontinued euen till within time of his remembrance. Yea let them condemne of apostasie not onely the Church of Constantinople, but also all the east Churches which haue neglected that law, which (if they say true) is inuiolable & commaunded to all Christians.

8 This abrogation Chrysofome, which was also bishop of Constantinople, doth in so many places evidently testifie, that it is maruel that these dare mutter to the contrary. Tell (sayth he) thy sinnes that thou maiest do the away, if thou be ashamed to tel any man the sinnes that thou hast done, tell them daily in thy soule. I do not say, Confesse them to thy fellow seruant, that may reproch thee: tell them to God that taketh care of them. Confesse thy sinnes vpon thy bed, that there thy conscience may daily recognise her euills. Againe. But now it is not necessary to confesse when witnesses be present: let the examination of thy sinnes be done with thy thought: let this iudgement be without witness: let only God see thee confessing. Againe. I do not lead thee into a stage of thy fellow seruants, I do not cōpel thee to disclose thy sinnes to men, rehearse and vtter thy conscience before God. Shew thy woundes to the Lord the best surgeon, & aske salue of him.

ro. Shew to him that will reproch thee with nothing, but will most gently heale thee. Againe. Tel not man, least he reproch thee, for neither is it to be confessed to thy fellow seruant, that may vtter it abroade, but to the Lord. To the Lord shew thy woundes which hath care of thee, that is both gentle & a Phisition. Afterward he bringeth in God speaking thus: I compel thee not to come into the mids of a stage, & call many witnesses, tell thy sinne to me alone priuately, y^e I may heale thy sore. Shall we say that Chrysofome did so rashly, when he wrote this and other like thinges, that he would deliuer mens consciences from these bonds wherewith they be bound by y^e law of God? not so. But he dare not require that as of necessity, which he doth not vnderstand to be commaunded by the word of God.

9 But that the matter may be made the plainer and easier, first we will faithfully rehearse, what kinde of cōfession is taught by the word of God: and then we wil also declare their inuentions, but not all (for who could draw drie such an infinite sea?) but only those wherin they comprehend the some of their secret cōfession. Here I am loth to rehearse how oft the old translatour hath giuen in translation this word Confesse in stede of Praise: which the grossest vnlearned men commonly know: sauing that it is good to haue their presumptuousnesse bewraied, that do giue away that which was wrytten of the praises of God, to their owne tyrannicall commaundement. To proue that cōfession auaieth to cheare the mindes they thrust in that place of the Psal. 13.

5. Psalme: In the voice of reioising & cōfession. But if such change may serue, then we shall haue what we list, proued by what we list. But seeing they are so become past shame, let the godly readers remember that by the iust vengeāce of God they haue bin cast into a reprobate minde, that their presumption should be y^e more detestable. But if we will rest in the simple doctrine of the Scripture, we shall not be in danger of any such deceites to beguile vs. For therein is apointed one order of confessinge, that forasmuch as it is the Lord that forgiueth, forgetteth, and putteth away sinnes, therefore we should confesse our sinnes to him for to obtaine pardon, he is the Phisician, therefore let vs shew our diseases vnto him. It is he that is grieued & offēded, therefore let vs seke peace at his hand. He is the knower of heartes, & priuie to all thoughtes, therefore let vs make hast to poure out our hearts before him. Finally it is he that calleth sinners, therefore let vs not delay to come to him. I haue (saith Dauid) made my sinne knowen vnto thee, & haue not hiddē my vnrighteousnes. I haue said, I wil confesse against me my vnrighteousnes to the Lord, & thou hast forgiuē the wickednes of my heart. Such is the other confession of Dauid. Haue uing from thy cōmaundements. And such are other confessions that are commonly found in the Scriptures, the rehearſall whereof would almost fill a great volume. If we confesse our sinnes (saith Iohn) the: 1. Ioh. 1.

euen to him: that is, if we fal downe with a troubled & humbled heart: before him, if heartily accusing & condemning our selues before him we pray to be acquitted by his goodnes and mercy.

10 He that hartily and before God shall embrace this confession, shal vndoutedly haue both a tongue ready to cōfesse, so oft as it shal-be nedefull for him to publish ȳ mercy of God before mé, & not only to whisper the secret of his heart to one man, & once & in his eare: but oft and openly, and in the hearing of all the world simply to rehearse both his owne shame and the magnificēce & glory of God.
After this maner when Dauid was rebuked of Nathā, he was pricked 2. Sa. 12 with the sting of conscience, & confessed his sinne before both God 13. and man. I haue (saith he) sinned to the Lorde, that is to say, now I allege nothing for my excuse, I vse no shiftes, but that all men may iudge me a sinner, and that the same thing which I would haue had secret frō the Lord, may be also open to men. Therefore a willing confession before men alway foloweth the secret cōfession that is made to God, so oft as it is profitable for ȳ glory of God or for ȳ humbling of our selues. For this reason the Lord in old time ordained in ȳ peo- Leu. 26 ple of Israell, ȳ the priest should first speake the words, & the people 19. saying after him should openly cōfesse their iniquity in ȳ church. For he foresaw ȳ this help was necessary for thē that euery man might be the better brought to a iust reknowledging of himselfe. And mete it is ȳ with ȳ confessiō of our owne misery we should among our selues, & before all the world glorifie the goodnesse & mercy of our God.

11 And it is conuenient ȳ this kinde of confessiō be both ordinary in the church, and also extraordinarily vsed in speciall maner, if it happen at any time the people to be guilty of any generall fault. Of this second kinde we haue an example in ȳ solemne confession which mon reuolting of them all: they could not acknowledge the benefit of deliuerance in such sort as was mete, vnlesse they did first condemne themselues. Neither maketh it matter, if in a whole Congregation

some few sometime be innocent. For sith they be the members of a feeble and diseased body, they ought not to boast of healthfulnesse. Yea it is not possible but they must also themselues gather some infection and beare part of the blame. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, either with pestilence or warre, or barrenesse or any other plague: if it be our duty to flie to mourning, to fasting and to other signes of guiltinesse: then confession it selfe, wherupon all these things do hang, is not to be neglected. As for the ordinary confession, beside that it is commended by the Lordes owne mouth, there is no wiseman that considering the profit thereof, dare disallow it. For where as in all holy assemblies we make our apparaunce in the sight of God and the Angels: what other beginning may there be of our pleading, but our reknewledging of vnworthinesse? But y^e (some man will say) is done by euery prayer. For so oft as we pray for pardon, we therby confesse our sinnes. I graunt. But if you consider how great is our carelesnesse, or drowsinesse, or sluggishnesse, you will graunt me that it shoulde be a profitable ordinance, if by some solemne vse of confession, the Christian common people shoulde be exercised to humbling themselues. For though the ceremonie that the Lord commaunded the Israelites, was parcel of the nurture of the law, yet in some maner it also belongeth to vs. And truely we see that this vse is in well ordered churches profitably obserued, that euery Sunday the minister should rehearse a forme of confession in the name of himselfe and of all the people, wherein he accuseth all of wickednes, and craueth pardon of the Lord. Finally with this keye the gate to prayer is opened as well priuatly to euery man, as vniuersally to all men.

12 Moreouer the Scripture alloweth two formes of priuate confession, one that is made for our owne sake, whereof that sayinge of Iames is spoken, that we should confesse our sinnes one to an other, for his meaning is, that disclosing our wickednesse one to an other, we should one help an other with mutuall counsell and comfort. The other forme, that is to be vsed for our neighbours sake, to appease him & reconcile him vnto vs, if he haue in any thing bin offended by vs. Now in the first kinde of confession, although Iames in this hath assigned no man by name, into whose bosome we shoulde vnload our selues, leaueth vs a free choise, to confesse to him that shall seeme meetest vnto vs of all the flocke of the church: yet we ought principally to chose the Pastors, because they are for the most part in comparison of the other to be iudged meetest. I say that they are meetest in comparison of the rest, because the Lorde appointeth them by the very calling of their ministry, at whose mouth we shoulde be instru-

 ministers. So when as we all ought to comfort and confirme one an other in confidence of Gods mercy: yet we see that the ministers, to assure our consciences of the forgiuenesse of sinnes, are ordayned as it were witnesses and pledges thereof, in so much that they be sayd to forgiue sinnes and loose soules. When thou hearest this to be ascribed vnto them, thinke that it is for thy profit. Therefore let e-uery one of the faithfull remember this to be his duety, if he be priuately so vexed and troubled with the feelinge of sinnes that he can not winde out himselfe without help of another, not to neglect the remedy that the Lord hath offered him: that is, for his reliefe to vse the priuate confession to his owne Pastor: and for his comfort to craue the priuate help of him, whose duety it is both publiquely and priuately to comfort the people of God with the doctrine of the Go-spell. But alway this moderation is to be vsed, where God appointeth no certaintie, not to binde consciences with a certayne yoke.
 Hereupon followeth that such Confession ought to be free: not to be required of all men, but to be commended to those onely that shall vnderstand themselves to haue nede of it. Then that euen they that vse it for their nede, should not be compelled by any commaun-dement, or trayned by any deceite, to reckon vp all their sinnes, but so farre as they shall thinke it behoueful for them, that they may receiue sound frute of comfort. Faithfull Pastors ought not only to leaue this liberty to the churches, but also to maintaine it, & stoutly stand in defence of it, if they will haue tyranny absent from their ministry and superstition from the people.

13. Of the other sorte of confession Christ speaketh in Matthew. Matt. 5.
 If thou offer thy gift at the altar, & there remembreth that thy bro- 23. ther hath any thing against thee, leaue thy gift there, & go, & first be reconciled to thy brother, & then come and offer thy gift. For so charity that hath bin appaired by our fault, is to be repaired by acknowledging & crauing pardon of the offence that we haue committed.
 Vnder this kinde is contained their confession that haue sinned euen to the offending of the whole church. For if Christ maketh so great a matter of the priuate offence of one mā, to forbid from holy misteries all them that haue sinned against their brother, till they be with iust a-mendes reconciled: how much greater reason is it, that he that hath offended the church with any euill example, should recouer the fa-uour of the church with acknowledging his fault? So was the Corin- 2. Cor. 2.6.

Cap. 4. Of the maner how to receiue

thian receiued againe to the communion, when he had yelded himselfe obedient to correction. Also this forme of confession was vsed in y^e old church, as Ciprian maketh mention. They do penance (saith he) in due time, & then they come to confession, and by laying on of the handes of the bishop & the Clergy, they receiue leaue to come to the cōmunion. Any other order or forme of cōfessing, the Scripture vterly knoweth not, & it is not our duety to binde consciences with new bonds, whom Christ most sharply forbiddeth vs to bring in bondage. In the meane time I do so much not speake against it that the shepe should present themselues to their shepeherd whē they meane to be partakers of the holy supper, that I would most gladly haue it euery where obserued. For both they that haue an encombred conscience, may from thence receiue singular profit, & they that are to be admonished do by that meane prepare place for admonishment, but so alway that tyranny and superstition be away.

14 In these three kindes of confession, the power of y^e keies hath place: that is, either when the whole church with solemne reknewledging of their faultes craueth pardon: or when a priuate man, that by any notable fault hath bred cōmon offence, doth declare his repentance: or when he that for the vnquietnes of his conscience, doth nede help of y^e minister discloseth his weakenes vnto him. But there are diuerse ways of taking away offence, because although thereby also the peace of conscience is prouided for, yet the principal end is, that hatred should be takē away, & mens mindes knit together with a bond of peace. But this vse that I haue spoken of, is not to be despised, that we may the more willingly cōfesse our sinnes. For when the whole church standeth as it were before the iudgemēt seate of God, confesseth it selfe guilty, and hath one only refuge vnto the mercy of God: it is no slender or light comfort to haue there present Christs embassadour, hauing cōmaundemēt of reconciliatiō, of whom it may heare absolution pronounced vnto it. Here the profitableness of the keies is worthily cōmended, whē this embassage is performed rightly, & with such order & religiousnes as beseemeth it. Likewise when he that had in a maner estranged himselfe from the Church, receiueth pardon & is restored into brotherly vnity: how great a benefite is it that he vnderstandeth himselfe to be forgiuē by thē, to whom Christ hath sayd: To whom soeuer ye forgiue sinnes in earth, they shal be forgiuen in heauen. And of no lesse effectualnes & profit is priuate absolutiō, when it is asked by them that haue neede of speciall remedy to relieue their weakenes. For it happeneth oftētimes, that he which heareth the generall promises that are directed to y^e whole congregation of the faithful, remaineth neuertheles in some dout, & hath stil an vnquiet minde, as though he had not yet obtained pardon: & the same mā, if he haue disclosed to his person y^e secret fore of his mind, & heareth peculiarly directed to himselfe that saying of the Gospel, Thy sinnes are forgien thee, be of good hope, stablisheth his minde vnto assurednes & is deliuered frō that trembling, wherewith he was before tormented. But when we speake of the keyes, we must take hede that we dreame not of a certaine power seuered from the preaching of y^e Gospel. In an other place we shal haue occasion more fully to declare this matter again, where we shal entreat of the gouernment of the church: & there shall we see that all the power to binde & to loose, which Christ hath giuen to his church, is bound to the worde. But this is most true in the ministry of the keyes, the whole force wherof standeth in this, y^e the grace of the Gospel be publikely & priuatly sealed vp in the heartes of the faithful, by them whom the Lord hath ordained: which can not be done but by only preaching.

15 But what say the Romish diuines? They decree that euery one of either kinde, so soone as they come to the yeres of discretiō, must yearely once at the least confesse all their sinnes to their owne priest: & that their sinne is not forgien, vnlesse they haue firmly conceiued an entent to confesse it: which intent if they performe not when occasion is offred that they may do it, there is now no more entry open for thē into Paradise. And that the priest hath the power of the keyes, wherewith he may loose & binde a sinner: because the word of Christ is not in vaine, Whatsoeuer ye binde. &c. About this power they stoutly fight amonge themselues. Some say that there is but one keye in substance, that is the power to binde & loose, and as for knowledge, that it is in dede requisite for a good vse, but that it is only as an accessary & is not essentially ioyned with the other. Some other, because they saw this to be too much an vnbridled licence, haue reckened vp two keyes, discretion, & power. Other againe, when they saw the lewd boldnes of priestes to be restrained by this moderation, haue forged other keyes, that is to say, authority of discerning which they should vse in giuing determinate sentence: & power, which they should practise in executing of their sentence: & that knowledge standeth by as a counsellor. But they dare not simply expound this binding & loosing to be to forgie and put away sinnes, because they heare the Lorde crying out in the Prophet: It is I, and none other but I: it is I, it is I that put away thy sinnes; O Israell, But they say it is the priestes office to pronounce who be bounde or loosed, and to declare whose sinnes are forgien or retained: and that he doth declare it, either by confession when he absolueth & retained sinnes, or by sentence when he excommunicated and receiueth againe to partaking of the Sacramentes. Finally, when they vnderstand that they be not yet out of this dout, but that it stil may be obiected against them, that oftentimes their priests do binde and loose men vnworthy, which are not therefore bounde or loosed in heauē: then (which is their last refuge) they answere that the giuing of the keyes, must be construed with a limitation, that is to say, that Christ hath promised, that before his iudgement seate such sentence of the Priest shalbe allowed as hath bin iustly pronounced, accordinge as the deseruings of him that is bounde or loosed, did require. Moreouer they say, that these keyes are giuen by Christ to all Priests, and are deliuered to them by their Bishoppes, at the time of their promotinge to priesthoode: but the free vse of them, remaineth only with such as do exercise Ecclesiasticall offices: and that the excommunicate & suspended Priestes haue in deede the keyes, but rusty & bounde vp. And they that say these things may well seeme modest & sober in cōparison of y rest, which vpon a new anuielde haue forged new keyes with which they say the treasure of the church is locked vp. These keyes we shall hereafter trie in place fit for it.

16 Now I will in few wordes answere to euery one of these particularly. But at this present I speake not by what right or what wronge they binde the soules of the faithfull with their lawes, forasmuch as we will consider that when place serueth. But where they charge men with a law of reckeninge vp all their sinnes: where they say that sinne is not forgiuen but vpon condition, if there be an intent conceiued to confesse it: where they babble that there remaineth no entrie into Paradise, if occasion of confessinge be neglected: this is in no wise to be suffered. Must all sinnes be reckened vp? But Dauid, (Who as I thinke) had well studied vpon the confession of his sinnes, yet cried out: who shall vnderstand his errours? Lord cleanse me from my secret sinnes. And in an other place. My iniquities haue passed aboue my heade, and like a weighty burden haue waxed heauy aboue my strength. Truely he vnderstoode how great was the bottomlesse depth of our sinnes: how many were the sortes of our mischieuous doings, how many heades this monster Hydra did beare, & how long a taile she drew after her. Therefore he went not about to reckon vp a register of them, but out of the depth of euills, he cried vnto the Lord: I am ouerwhelmed, I am buried and choked, the gates of hels haue compassed me, let thy hand draw me out, which am drowned in the great pit, and am fainting and ready to die. Who now may thinke vpon vpon the numbring of his finnes, whē he seeth that Dauid can make no nombre of his?

17. With this butchery, the soules that haue bin touched with any feelinge of God, haue bin more cruelly vexed. First they called themselues to accompt: then they deuided finnes into armes, into boowes, into braunches, and into twigges, according to these mens rules: then they weyed the qualities, quantities, and circumstances. And so the matter went a litle forward. But when they had procéded a litle further, than was on ech side skie, and on ech side seae, no hauen, no safe roade: the mo that they had passed ouer, the greater heape alway did thrust it selfe into their sight, yea they rose vp as hie mountaines, & there appeared no hope, not so much as after long cōpassings, any way to escape. And so they did sticke fast betwene the sacrifice & the stone, & at last was found no other issue but desperation. Then these cruel butchers, to ease the woundes that themselues had made, laid certaine gentle plaisters, that euery man should do as much as he could. But new cares againe rose vp, yea new tormentes did flea the silly soules, as to thinke: I haue not employed time enough, I haue not endeouored my selfe with such diligence as I ought, I haue passed ouer many things by negligēce & the forgetfulnes that commeth by negligēce is not excusable. Thē were there ministred other plaisters to asswage such paines, as Repent thee of thy negligēce: if it be not altogether carelesse, it shall be pardoned. But all these things can not close vp the wounde, and are not so much easment of the euill, as poisons couered with honey, that they should not with their bitternesse offend the first tast, but enter into the bowels before that they be perceiued. Therefore this terrible saying alway calleth vpon thē & soundeth in their eares: Confesse all thy finnes. And this horrour can not be appeased but by assured cōfort. Here let the readers consider, how possible it is to bring into accompt all the doings of a whole yere, & to gather together what finnes they haue done euery day: forasmuch as experience proueth to euery man, that when at eueninge he shall reckon vp the faultes but of one day, his memory is confounded therewith, so great a multitude & diuersity presenteth it selfe. For I speake not of grosse & blockish hypocrites that thinke they haue done sufficiently, if they haue noted three or foure of the greatest finnes: but I speake of the true worshippers of God, which when they see themselues oppressed with the examination that they haue made, do adde also this saying of Iohn: If our owne heart do accuse vs, God is greater than our heart; and so they quake for feare at the sight of that iudge, whose knowledge farre surmounteth our vnderstanding.

18. But whereas a great parte of the world rested them vpon such flatteries, wherewith so deadly a poyson was tempered, this came not so to passe, because they beleued y^e God was satisfied, or because they themselues were fully satisfied: but that the anchor cast as it were in the midde sea, shoulde rest a litle from saylinge, or as a wayfaringe man weary and faintinge, shoulde lye downe in the way. I labour not much in prouinge this. For euery man may be witnesse to himselfe. I will in a shorte summe shew, what maner of law this was. First simply it is impossible, and therefore it can do nothing but destroy, damne, confounde, and cast in ruine and desperation. And then when it hath ledde sinners from the true feelinge of their sinnes, it maketh them hypocrites and ignoraunt of God & themselues. For while they are wholly busied in reckening vp of their sinnes, in the meane time they forget the secreete sinke of vices, their hidden Iniquities, and inward filthinesse, by knowledge whereof they shoulde chiefly haue weyed their misery. But this was a most certaine rule of confession, to acknowledge and confesse the bottomlesse depth of our euill to be so great as passeth our vnderstandinge. After this rule we see that the

Luc. 18. Publicanes confession was made. Lorde be mercifull to me a sinner: as if he should say: All that euer I am, I am altogether a sinner, and I can not attaine with witte or expresse with tongue the greatnesse of my sinnes: let the bottomlesse depth of thy mercy swallow vp the bottomlesse depth of my sinne. But then thou wilt say, what are not all our sinnes to be confessed? is no confession acceptable to God, but that which is knitte vp in these two wordes, I am a sinner? No, but rather we must endeouour our selues as much as in vs lyeth, to poure out our heart before the Lorde, and not onely in one worde confesse our selues sinners, but also truely and heartily acknowledge our selues to be such: and with all our thought recorde, howe great and diuerse is our filth of sinnes, not onely that we be vncleane, but what, how great, and in howe many partes is our vncleannesse: not onely that we be detters, but with howe great dettes we be loden, and howe many wayes charged: not onely that we be wounded, but also with howe many and deadly strokes we be wounded. With this reknowledging when the sinner hath wholly poured out himselfe before God, lette him earnestly and sincerely thinke, that yet there remayne moc sinnes, and that the secret corners of their euils are so depe, that they can not be throughly disclosed. And he crieth out with Dauid: Who vnderstandeth his errours? Lord cleanse me from my hidden sinnes. Now where they affirme, that sinnes are not forgien but with an intent of confessing firmly conceiued, and that the gate of para-paradise is shut against him that neglecteth occasion offered when he may be confessed, God forbid that we shoulde graunt them that. For there is no other forgiuenes of sinnes, than alway hath bin. It is not read that all they haue cōfessed their sinnes in the eare of some priest, that we reade to haue obtained forgiuenesse of sinnes at Christes hand. And truely they could not confesse, where there were neither any priests cōfessors, nor any cōfessing at all. And in many ages after, this confession was vnheard of, at which time sinnes were forgiuen without this condition. But that we may not neede to dispute longer about this, as about a doutfull matter, the word of God is plain, which abideth for euer: Whensoever the sinner repenteth, I will no more remember all his iniquities. He that dare adde any thing to this word, Eze. 18. bindeth not sinnes, but the mercy of God. For whereas they say, that 21. Iudgement can not be giuen but when the cause is hearde, we haue a solution in readinesse, that they do presumptuously take that vpon themselues, which haue made themselues iudges. And it is a maruell, that they do so boldly frame to themselues such principles, as no man in his right wit will graunt. They boast that the office of Binding and Loosing is committed to them, as though it were a certaine iurisdiction ioyned with Inquisition. Morouer their whole doctrine crieth out, that this authority was vnknown to the Apostles. Neither doth it belong to the priest, but to him which desireth absolution, to know certainly whether the sinner be loosed or no: forasmuch as he that heareth can neuer know whether the reckning be iust and perfect. So should there be no absolution but such as is restrained to his wordes that is to be iudged. Moreouer the whole order of loosing standeth of faith & repentance, which two things are hidden frō the knowledge of mā, when sentence must be giuen vpon an other man. It foloweth therefore, that y assurance of binding & loosing is not subiect to the iudgement of an earthly iudge: because the minister of the word, when he doth his office, can not giue absolution but cōditionally: but that this is spoken for the sinnes sake, Whose sinnes ye forgiue. &c. that they should not dout that the pardō which is promised by the commaundement and word of God, shall be ratified in heauen.

19. Therefore it is no maruell, if we condemne and desire to haue vtterly taken away this Auricular confession, a thing so pestilent & so many waies hurtful to the Church: but if it were a thing by it selfe indifferent, yet forasmuch as it is to no vse nor profite, and hath giuen cause to so many wickednesses, sacrileges and errours, who will not thinke that it ought to be presently abolished? They do in dede reckon vppe some good vses, which they boast vpon as very profitable, but these either false or of no value at all. One only they commend with a singular prerogative, that shame is a great punishment of him that confesseth, wherby the sinner both is for time to come made warer, & preuenteth the punishment of God in punishing himselfe. As though we did not humble a mā with shamefastnes enough when we cal him to y^e hie iudgement seate of heauen, I meāne to the hearing of God! It is forsooth very well profited, if for shame of one mans knowledge we cesse to sinne, and be not ashamed to haue God witnes of our euil conscience. Although the very same is also most false, for it is to be seene that by nothing groweth greater confidence or licentiousnesse to sinne, than when men hauinge made confession to a priest, thinke that they may wipe their mouth and say, I did it not. And not onely they are made all y^e yeare long the bolder to sinne: but all the rest of the yeare bearing themselues bolde vpon confession, they neuer sigh vnto God, they neuer returne to themselues, but heape sinnes vpon sinnes till they vomit vp all at once as they thinke. And when they haue once vomited them vp, they thinke themselues discharged of their burden, and that they haue taken away from God the iudgemēt that they haue giuen to the priest, & that they haue brought God in forgetfulness when they haue made the priest priuie. Moreouer who doth merily see the day of confession at hande? Who goeth to confession with a cherefull heart, and commeth not to it rather against his will, & as it were drawinge backward, like as if he were taken by the necke & drawen to prison? vnlesse peraduenture it be the very priestes, that vse ioyfully to delite themselues with mutuall rehearsals of their doings, as were with mery tales? I will not defile much paper with monstrous abominations whereof auricular confession swarmeth full. Onely this I say, If that holy mā did not vnwisely, that for one rumor of fornication tooke away confession out of his Church, yea, out of the remembrance of his flocke: then we be thereby put in minde what is needefull to be done at this day vpon infinite whoredomes, adulteries, incestes and bawderies.

20 Where the Confessionars alleage for this purpose the power of the keyes, and do therupō set the peupe and prore of their kingdome, as the prouerbe is: it is to be seene how much they ought to auayle. Then (say they) are the keyes giuen without cause? Is it sayd without cause: Whatsoeuer you loose vpon earth, shall be also loosed in heauen? Do we then make the worde of Christ voyde? I answered there was a weighty cause why the keyes should be giuen, as both I haue euen nowe already declared; and shall more plainely shew againe when I come to entreat of Excommunication. But what if I do with one swerde cutt of the holde of all that they require, that is with saying, that sacrificing priestes are not y vicars nor successors of the Apostles? But this shall also be to be entreated of in an other place: but nowe they raise vp an engine whereby they wolde most of all defende themselves, and thereby may all their buildinges be ouerthrowen. For Christ did not geue his Apostles y power to binde and loose, before that he gaue them the holy Ghost. Therefore i say, that none haue the power of the keyes that haue not first receiued the holy Ghost. I denie that any man can vse the keyes, but hauing the holy Ghost going before, and teaching him and informing him what is to be done. They trifling say, that they haue the holy Ghost. but in dede they denie it, vnlesse paradventure they faine (as they do faine in dede) the holy Ghost to be a vaine thing and a thing of nothing, but therin they shall not be beleued. And by this engine they are viterly ouerthrowen, that of what soeuer dore they boast that they haue the keye, a man may alway aske them whether they haue the holy Ghost which is the iudge and governer of the keyes. If they aunswer that they haue, then they may be asked againe, whether the holy Ghost may erre. This they will not be glad to speake expressly, although they cokedly vtter the same by their doctrine. It is therefore to be gathered, that no priestes haue power of the keyes which do commonly without consideration loose those thinges that the Lorde wolde haue to be bounde, and binde those thinges that the Lorde commaunded to be loosed.

21 Wheras they see themselves conuincd by most clere experimentes, that they do without choise loose and binde the worthy and vnworthy, they vsurpe a power without knowledge. And although they dare not denie that knowledge is requisite for a good vse, yet they write that the very power is geuen to euell disposers of it. But this is the power, whatsoeuer thou bindest or loosest in earthe, shall be bounde or loosed in heauen. Either the promise of Christ must lie, or they that haue this power do well binde and loose. Neither may they dallie and say, that the saying of Christ is limited according to the deseruings of him that is bound or loosed. And we also confesse, that none can be bound or loosed, but they that are worthy to be bound or loosed. But the messengers of the Gospell and the Church haue the worde, by which they measure this worthinesse, in this worde the messengers of the Gospell, may promise to all men forgeuence of finnes in Christ by faith, they may proclaime damnation into all and vpon all that embrace not Christ, In this word the Church pronounceth that fornicatours, adulterers, theues, manslayers, couetous men, vniust men, haue no parte in the kingdom of God, and bindeth such with most sure bondes. With the same worde the Church looseth them whome it comforteth being repentant. But what power shall this be, not to know what is to be bounde or loosed, & not to be able to binde or loose without knowledge? Why then do they say that they loose by authoritie geuen vnto them, when the loosing is vncertain? What haue we to do with this imaginatiue power, if there be no vse of it? But I haue it already proued that either there is no vse of it, or so vncertaine an vse as may be accompted for none at all. For wheras they confesse that there is a great parte of priestes that do not rightly vse the keyes, and that the power without lawefull vse is of no effect. Who shall assure me that he of whome I am loosed is a good vsur of the keyes? if he be an euell vsur of it, what hath he els but such a voide disposing of them, as to say, what is to be found or loosed in thee I knowe not, for asmuch as I lack the right vse of the keyes, but if thou deserue I loose thee. But so much might do, I will not say a lay man (for they could not beare that with patient eares) but a Turke, or a Deuell. For it is asmuch as to say, I haue not the worde of God the sure rule of loosing, but there is power geuen me to loose thee, if thy deseruings be so. We see therefore what they meant, when they defined the keyes to be the authoritie of discerning, and power of executing: and that knowledge is adioined for a counseller, and like a counseller serueth for a good vse: vndoubtedly euen they desired to reigne at their owne will, licentiously, without God and his worde.

22 If any man take exception and say, that the lawfull ministers of Christ shall be no lesse doubtfull in their office, bycause the absolution that hangeth vpon faith shall alway remaine doubtfull: and then that sinners shall haue either none or a could comforte, bycause the minister himselfe which is no comperent iudge of their faith, can not be assured of their absolution: we haue aunswer thereunto in redinesse. For they say that no sinnes are forgeuen by the priest, but such whereof himselfe hath bene the hearer: so by their opinion, the forgeuenes hangeth vpon the iudgement of the priest, and if he do not wisely discern who be worthy of pardon, the whole doing is voide and of no effect. Finally the power whereof they speake, is a iurisdiction adioined to examination, wherunto pardon and absolution is restrained. In this point is found no sure ground, but rather it is a bottomlesse depth. For where the confession is not found, the hope of pardon is also lame, and then the priest himself must needes sticke in suspense while he can not tell, whether the sinner do faithfully

recker vpon all his euell deedes. Finally (such is the ignoraunce and rudenesse of priestes) the most parte are no fitter to do this office, than a shomaker is to plowe the ground, and the rest in a manner all ought worthily to suspect themselues. Herevpon therefore riseth the perplexitie and doubtfulnessse of the Popes absolution, bycause they will haue it grounded vpon the person of the priest, and not onely that, but also vpon knowledge, that he may iudge onely of thinges informed, examined and proued. Now if a man should aske of these good docters, whether a sinner be reconciled to God, when some sinnes are forgeuen: I see not what they haue to aunswer, but that they shalbe compelled to confesse that all is vnprofitable, that the priest pronounceth of the forgeuenesse of those sinnes that he hath heard rehearsed, so long as the other sinnes are not deliuered from condemnatiō. On the behalfe of him y^e confesseth how hurtfull carefulnesse holdeth his conscience bound, appereth hereby, that when he resteth vpon the priests discretion, as they call it, he can determine nothing certainly by y^e word of God. The doctrine that we teach is free and cleare from all these absurdities. For the absolution is conditionall, that the sinner should trust that God is mercifull vnto him, so that he sincerely seeke the cleansing of his sinnes in the sacrifice of Christ, and obeye the grace offered him. So he can not erre, which according to the office of a preacher, proclaimeth that which is geuen him in instructions by the word of God. And the sinner may embrace a sure and cleare absolution, when that simple condition is annexed of the embracing the grace of Christ, according to that generall doctrine of the maister himselfe, Be it done to thee according to thy faith. Which hath bene wickedly despised in the Papacie. Matt. 9.

23 How foolishly they confound those things that the Scripture teacheth of the power of keyes, I haue promised that I will speake in an other place, and there shalbe a more conuenient place for it, when I come to entreate of the gouernement of the Church. But let the readers remēber that those things are wrongfully wrested to Auricular and secret confession, which are spoken by Christ partly of the preaching of the Gospell, and partly of excōmunication. Wherefore when they obiekt that the power of loosing is geuen to the Apostles, which priests may vse in forgeuing sinnes acknowledged vnto them, it is plaine that they take a false and fonde principle: because the absolution that serueth faith, is nothing els but a witnessse of pardō take out of the free promise of the Gospell. As for the other confession, that hangeth vpon the discipline of the Church, it pertaineth nothing to secret sinnes, but rather to example, that common offence of the Church may be taken away. But wheras they scrape together here and there testimonies, to proue that it sufficeth not to confesse sinnes either to God onely or to lay men, vnlesse a priest be the hearer of them, their trauaile therin is but lewd, and such as they may be ashamed of. For when the auncient fathers counsell sinners to vnburden themselues to their owne pastour, it can not be expounded of particular rehearfall which then was not in vse. Then, Lumbard and such like (such was their sinister dealing) seme of set purpose to haue geuen themselues to fained bokes, by pretense whereof they might deceiue the simple. They do in deede truely confesse, that because absolution alway accompanieth repentance, therefore there properly remaineth no bond when a man is touched with repentance, although he haue not yet confessed, and therefore that then the priest doth not so much forgeue sinnes as pronounce and declare them forgeuen. Albeit in the word of declaring they slyly bring in a grosse error, thrusting a ceremonie in stede of doctrine. But wheras they patche vnto it, that he is absolued in the face of the Church that had already obtained pardon before God: they do inconueniently drawe to y^e peculiar vse of euery particular man, that which we haue already said to be appointed for common discipline, where the offense of a hainous and notorious fault is to be taken away. But by and by after, they deprave and corrupt moderation, adding an other manner of forgeuing, with an enioyning of penaltie and satisfaction, wherein they presumptuously claime to their owne sacrifices a power to part that in halfes, which God hath in all places promised vs whole together. For when he simply requireth repentance and faith, this partition or exceptiō is a very robbie of God. For it is in effect asmuch as if the priest taking vpon the persone of a Tribune, should become intercessour to God, and would not suffer God of his mere liberalitie to receiue him into fauour, that hath lien prostrate before the Tribunes seates, and there hath bene punished.

24 The whole summe commeth to this point, that if they will make God the authour of this counterfeit cōfession, therein is their fallshod condemned, as I haue proued them false forgers in the fewe places that they allege. But sith it is euident that it is a law made by men, I say that it is both tirānicall and made iniuriously against God, who binding mens consciences to his word, will haue them free from the bondage of men. Now when for the obtaining of pardon, there is a necessitie prescribed of that thing which the Lorde wolde to be free, I say that this is a sacrilege not to be suffred, bycause there is nothing more properly belonging to God, than to forgeue sinnes, wherein consisteth saluation for vs . Moreouer I haue shewed that this tirannie was first brought in, when the world was oppressed with filthy barbarousnesse. I haue also taught that it is a pestilent law, that either throweth downe hedlong into desperation the poore soules in whom so euer abideth a feare of God : or where there reigneth carelesnes, deliteth thē with vayne flatteries, & so maketh thē duller. Last of all I haue declared, that what so euer mitigations they bring, tend to no other ende, but to entangle, darken and depraue pure doctrine, and hide vngodlinesse with deceitfull colors.

25 The third place in Repentance they assigne to satisfaction, whereof all that euer they babble may be ouerthrowen with one worde. They say that it is not enough for him that repenteth, to absteine from his former euels, and change his behavior into better, vnlesse he make satisfaction to God for those things that he hath done : And that there be many helpes by which we may redeme sinnes, as wepinges, fastinges, oblations and the workes of charitie. With these we must winne the Lord to be fauorable, with these we must pay our dettes to the righteousnesse of God, with these we must make amendes for our defaultes, with these we must deserue pardon. For although by the largenes of his mercy he hath forgeuen our faulte, yet by the discipline of his iustice he reteineth the peine, and that this is the peine that must be redemed with satisfactions. But in effect all that they say commeth to this point, that we do in deede obtaine pardon of our sinnes at the mercifulnesse of God, but by meanes of the deseruing of our workes, by which the offense of our sinnes may be recompensed, that due satisfaction may be fully made to Gods righteousnesse. Against such lies. I set the free forgeuenesse of sinnes, than which there is nothing more euidētly spoken of in the Scripture. First, what is forgeuenesse, but a gift of mere liberalitie? For the creditour is not said to forgeue, that acknowledgeth by acquittance that the mony is payed, but he that without any payment willingly of his owne liberalitie cancelleth the detters bonde. Secondly, why is this word, Freely, added, but to take away all opinion of satisfaction? With what confidence therefore do they yet set vp their satisfactions, that are stricken downe with so mighty a thunderbolt? But what? when y^e Lord crieth out by Esay, It is I, it is I, that do put away iniquities for mine owne sake, and will not be mindefull of thy sinnes: doth he not openly declare, that he fetcheth the cause and foundation of forgeuenesse only from his owne goodnes? Moreouer whereas the whole Scripture beareth this witness of Christ, that forgeuenesse of sinnes is to be receiued by his name, doth it not thereby exclude all other names? How then do they teach that it is receiued by the name of satisfactions? Neither can they denie that they giue this to satisfactions, although they say that the same be vsed as helpes by way of meanes. For whereas the Scripture saith By the name of Christ, it meaneth that we bring nothing, we allege nothing of our owne, but reſte vpon the onely commendation of Christ. As 26 But (ſuch is their peruerſneſſe) they ſay that both forgeueneſſe of ſinnes and reconciliation are performed both at one time, when we are in Baptiſme receiued into the fauour of God by Christ: that after baptiſme we muſt riſe againe by ſatisfactions: and that the bloud of Christ profiteth nothing, but ſo far as it is diſtributed by the keyes of the Church. Neither do I ſpeake of a doubtfull matter, for aſmuch as they haue in moſt euident writings bewrayed their owne filthineſſe, and not one or two of them, but all the Scholemen vniuerſally. For their Maſter, after that he had confeſſed that Christ had payed the penaltie of ſinnes vpon the tree, according to the doctrine of Peter, immediately correcteth his ſaying with adding this exception, that in baptiſme all temporall penalties of ſinnes are releaſed, but after baptiſme they are miniſhed by the helpe of penance, that ſo the croſſe of Christ and our penance may worke together.

For whereas the right and power to forgive belógeth properly to the father, in the reſpect

that he is distinguished from the sonne, as we haue already sene: Christ is here set in an other degree, that taking vpon himselfe the paine due vnto vs, he hath taken away our giltinesse before the iudgement of God. Wherevpon foloweth, that we shall no otherwise be partakers of the satisfaction made by Christ, vnlesse the same honour remaine whole with him, which they do wrongfully take to themselues that go about to appease God with their owne recompensings.

27 And here it is good to consider two things: that Christ may haue his due honour kept vnto him whole and vnminished: and that the consciences being assured of the forgeuenesse of sinne, may haue peace with God. Esaye saith, that the father hath layed the iniquities of vs all vpon his sonne, that we shoulde be healed by his stripes. Which thing Peter rehearsing in other wordes saith: that Christ did in his body beare our sinnes vpon the tree. Paule writeth that sinne was condemned in his flesh, when he was made sinne for vs. That is to say, that the force and curse of sinne was slaine in his flesh, when he was geuen to be a sacrifice, vpon which the whole heape of our sinnes, with all their malediction and curse, with the dreadfull iudgement of God, and condemnation of death should be cast. Here those triflinges are in no case to be heard, that after the first purging, every one of vs doth none otherwise fele the effectualnesse of the passion of Christ, than after the measure of satisfactorie repentance: but so oft as we fall, we be called backe to the onely satisfaction of Christ. Now set before thee their pestilent follies, as for example: That the grace of God worketh alone in the first forgeuenesse of sinnes: that if we afterwarde fall, to the obtaining of a seconde forgeuenesse our workes do worke with it. If these thinges may haue place, do these thinges that are here before assigned to Christ remaine safe vnto him? It his a meruellous greate difference, betwene this that our iniquities are layed vpon Christ, that they shoulde be cleansed in him, & this that they are cleansed by our owne workes: betwene this that Christ is the procuringe of mercie, and this that God must be made mercifull by workes. But if we speake of pacifieng the consciences: what pacification shall this be for a mans conscience, to heare that his sinnes are redemed by satisfactions? When shall he certainly knowe the measure of his satisfactiō? Therefore he shall alway doubt whether he haue God mercifull or no, he shall alway be vexed, and alway quake for feare. For they that rest vpon light pety satisfactions, do too contemptuously esteeme the iudgement of God, and do litle consider how great is the greuoussnesse of sinne, as we shall declare in an other place. But although we graūt them to redeme some sinnes with iust satisfaction: yet what will they do when they are oppressed with so many finnes, for satisfactiō wherof a hundred liues although they were wholly applied therunto can not suffice? Beside that, all the places wherin the forgeueneſſe of finnes is affirmed, do not belong to yonglinges, but to the already regenerate childrē of God, and them that haue bene long nourished in the bosome of the Church. That embassage which Paule so honorably extolleth, I besech you in the name of God, be ye reconciled vnto God, is not directed to straungers, but to them that had bene already regenerate. But he, biddinge satisfactions farewell, sendeth them to the crosse of Christ. So when he writeth to the Colossians, that Christ by the bloud of the crosse hath pacified all thinges in heauen or in earth, he restraineth not this to the onely moment wherein we are receiued into the Church, but extendeth it to our whole course. Which easily appereth by the proceſſe of the text, where he saith, that the faithfull haue a redemption by the bloud of Christ, that is forgeueneſſe of finnes. Albeit it is superfluous to heape together mo places, that redily offer themselues to be founde.

28. Here they flee to the sanctuarie of the foolish distinction, that some finnes are veniall, and some deadly: that for deadly finnes is great satisfaction due, that veniall finnes are purged with more easy remedies, as with saying of the Lords prayer, with sprinkling of holy water, with absolution at the masse. So they mocke and trifle with God. But whereas they alway haue in their mouth veniall and deadly sinne, yet they coulde neuer discern the one from the other, sauing that they make vngodlines and vncleanneſſe of heart, a veniall sinne. But we (as the Scripture the rule of right and wrong teacheth vs) do pronounce, that the rewarde of sinne is death, and that the soule that sinneth is worthy of death. But that the finnes of the faithful are veniall, not for that they do not deserue death, but bycause by the mercie of God there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Iesus, because they are not imputed: bycause they are taken away by pardō. I know how vniustly they sclander this our doctrine. For they say, that it is the Stoikes straunge conclusion, concerning the equalitie of finnes. But they shall easily be conuincd by their owne mouth. For I demaunde of them, whether among the very same finnes that they cōfesse to be deadly, they do not acknowledge one to be greater than an other. It doth not therefore immediatly followe, that finnes are egall, because they are all together deadly. When the Scripture definitiuely saith, that the reward of sinne is death, that the obediēce of the lawe is the way of life, and that the transgression of the lawe is death, is death, they can not escape this sentence. What end of satisfieng then will they finde in so great a heape of sinnes? If the satisfaction of one day be the satisfaction of one sinne, while they are about that one satisfaction, they wrappe themselues' in many sinnes, sith the iustest man passeth no one day wherin he falleth not many times. Now when they shall prepare themselues to make satisfaction for these sinnes, they shall heape vp great numbers, yea rather innumerable. Then the hope of satisfieng being cut of, what do they stay vpon? how dare they still thinke of satisfieng?

29 They go about to winde out themselues: but (as the proverbe is) the water still cleaueth vpon them. They forge a distinction of fault and penaltie. Thei confesse that the fault is forgeuen by the mercie of God, but that when the fault is forgeuen, the penaltie remaineth which the righteousnesse of God requireth to be payed: and that satisfactions do properly belong to the release of the penaltie. Good God, what a skipping lighnesse is this? now they confesse that the forgeuenesse of the fault lieth freely open for men, which sometime they teache men to deserue with prayers and wepinges, and all other kindes of preparations. But yet still all that is taught vs in the scripture concerning the forgeuenesse of sinnes, doth directly fight against this distinction. Which although I thinke that I haue alreedy more than sufficiently confirmed, yet I will adde some other testimonies wherwith these winding snakes may be holden so fast, that they shall not be able ones to folde in the toppe of their taile. This is the newe Testament which the Lorde hath couenanted with vs in his Christ, that he will not remember our iniquities. What he meant by these wordes, we learne by an other Prophet where the Lorde saith: If the righteous turne away from his righteousnesse, I will not remember all his righteousnesse. If the wicked depart frō his wickednesse, I will not remember all his iniquities. Wheras he saith that he will not remember their righteousnesse, this is asmuch to say, that he will haue no regard of them in respect to reward them. Therefore not to remember sinnes, is asmuch as not to call them to punishment. The same thing is called in an other place, to cast it behinde his backe, to wipe it away like a cloude, to drowne it in the bottome of the sea, not to impute it and to hide it. By such manners of speche the holy Ghost doth plainly expresse his meaning vnto vs, if we would apply vnto him willing eares to learne. Truely if God do punish sinnes, he imputeth them: if he taketh vengeance, he remembreth them: if he call them to iudgement, he doth not hide them: if he examine them, he doth not cast them behinde his backe: if he loke vpon them, he hath not wiped them away like a cloude: if he sift them, he hath not cast them into the bottome of the sea. And in this manner doth Augustine expound it in plaine wordes. If God haue couered sinnes, then he would not loke vpon them: if he would not loke vpon them, then he would not marke them: if he would not marke the, then he would not punish them: he would not knowe them, he had rather pardon them. Why therefore did he say that sinnes were couered, that they should not be seen: What was meant by this that God did see sinnes, but that he did punish them? But let vs heare also out of an other place of the Prophet, vpon what conditions the Lorde forgeueth sinnes. If (saith he) your sinnes be as scarlet, they shall be made white as snow: if they be red like crimosin, they shall be as woll. And in Ieremie we read thus: In that day the iniquitie of Iacob shalbe sought for, and shall not be founde: the sinne of Iudah, and it shall not be.

 Because I will be fauorable to the remnantes that I shall preserue.
 Wilt thou briefly vnderstand what is the meaning of those wordes?
 Weye on the other side what is meant by these speches: that the Lorde doth binde vp iniquities in a sacke, doth gather them into a boundell and laye them vp, & doth graue them with an iron pointell in an Adamant stone. If they signifie (as it is out of doubt) that vengeance shalbe geuen for recōpense, then is it also not to be doubted, but that by contrarie sentences the Lorde affirmeth, that he remit-teth all recompensing of vengeance. Here I must besech the readers not to harken to my gloses, but onely that they will suffer the worde of God to take some place.

30 What, I pray you, had Christ done for vs, if we should still be compelled to suffer paine for sinnes? For when we say that he did beare all our sinnes in his body vpon the tree, we meane nothing els thereby, but that he suffred all the peine and punishment that was due to our sinnes. And the same hath Esaye more liuely declared where he saith: the chastisemēt (or correction) of our peace, was vpon him.
 What is the correction of our peace but the peine due to sinnes? and which we should haue suffred before that we could be reconciled to God, vnlesse that he had entred into our stede? Lo, thou seest plainely, that Christ suffred the peines of sinnes, to deliuer them that be his from them. And so oft as Paule maketh mention of the redemptiō performed by Christ, he vseth to call it in Greke Apolutrosin, whereby he meaneth not onely redemption, as it is commonly taken, but the very price and satisfaction of redemption. After which manner he writeth, that Christ gaue himselfe Antilutron, a price of raunsome for vs. What propitiation is there with the Lorde (saith Augustine) but sacrifice?

sacrifice? And what sacrifice is there, but that which is offered for vs in the death of Christ? But that which is appointed in the lawe of Moses for cleansing the offenses of sinnes, ministreth vs a strong battell ramme. For the Lord doth not there apoint this or that manner of satisfieng, but requireth the whole recompense in sacrifices. Whereas yet in other things, he doth most diligently and in most exact order set out all the ceremonies of expiation. Howe commeth it to passe, that he commaundeth to recompense faultes committed, with no workes at all, but requireth onely sacrifices for satisfaction: but because his will is so to declare, that there is onely one kinde of satisfaction, whereby his iudgement is appeased? For the sacrifices that the Israelites did then offer, were not weyed by the worke of men, but were esteemed by their truth, that is to say, by the onely sacrifice of Christ. But what manner of recompense the Lord receiueth of vs, Osee hath very well expressed in fewe wordes. Thou shalt (saith he) take away iniquitie, O God. Loe, here is forgeueneffe of sinnes. And we shall pay thee calues of our lippes: Loe, here is satisfaction. I knowe that they yet do suttelly slippe away, when they make distinction betwene euerlasting peine, and temporall peines. But when they teach that temporall peine is any kinde of punishment that God taketh as well of the body as of the soule, except onely euerlasting death, this restraining of it doth litle helpe them. For the places that we haue aboue recited, do expressly meane this, that God receiueth vs into fauour with this condition, that in pardoning the fault, he pardoneth all the peine what so euer we had thereby deserued. And so oft as Dauid or the other Prophets do craue pardõ of sinnes, they do also there withall pray to be released of the peine. Yea, the very feling of Gods iudgement doth driue them therunto. Againe, when they promise mercie at the Lordes hand, they do in manner alway of purpose preach of the peines and the forgeueneffe therof. Truly when the Lorde in Ezechiell pronounceth that he will make an ende of the exile in Babylon, and that for his owne sake, not for the Iewes sake, he doth sufficiently shewe that both are of free gift. Finally, if we be deliuered by Christ from giltinesse of fault, the peines that come thereof, must needes cesse.

Osee. 14. 3.

31 But for asmuch as they do also arme themselues with testimonies of Scripture, let vs see what manner of argumentes those bee that they allege. Dauid (say they) being rebuked by Nathan the Prophet of adulterie and mãslaughter, receiued pardon of his sinne, and yet he was afterward punished by the death of his sonne that he had gotten by that adulterie. We are taught to redeme with satisffactions such paines as were to be extended after forgeuenes of the fault. For Daniel aduised Nebuchadnezer to redeme his sinnes with almes. And Salomon writeth that for equitie and godlineffe, iniquities are forgeuen. And in an other place, that with charitie the multitude of sinnes is couered. Which sentence Peter also confirmeth.

 Againe, in Luke the Lord saith of the woman that was a sinner, that many sinnes are forgeuen her, because she hath loued much. Howe peruerfly and wrongfully they euer weye the doinges of God. But if they had marked (as they should not haue ouerpasse it) that there are two kindes of Gods iudgement, they would haue seen in this rebuking of Dauid, a far other manner of punishment, than such as might be thought to tend to reuengement. But bycause it not a litle behoueth vs all to vnderstand wherunto the chastisements haue respect, wherwith God correcteth vs for our sinnes, and how much they differ from those examples wherewith he pursueth the wicked and reprobate with indignation: therefore I thinke it shall be not beside the purpose to comprehend it shortly in a summe. For the order of plaine teaching, let vs call the one kinde of iudgement, the iudge-ment of Reuenge, the other of Chastisemēt. It is to be vnderstanded, that God so punisheth his enemies with the iudgement of reuenge, that he vseth his wrath against them, confoundeth them, destroyeth them, and bringeth them to nought. Therefore let vs take that to be properly the vengeance of God, when his punishing is ioined with his indignation: with the iudgement of Chastisemēt he dealeth not so cruelly: as to be angry: nor punisheth to destroy, nor sendeth downe his lightening to kill. Therefore it is not properly punishment or vengeance, but correction and admonishment. The one is the doing of a iudge, the other of a father. For the iudge when he punisheth an euell doer, he hath regard to the offense, & punisheth the very fault: when the father somewhat rigorously correcteth his childe, he doth it not to be reuenged on him, or to punish him, but rather to teach him & make him waver in time to come. Chrysostome in a certaine place vseth a similitude somewhat differing from this, but yet it commeth to the same point. The sonne (saith he) is beaten, and the seruant also is beaten: but the one is punished as a bonde seruant, bycause he hath offended, and the other is chastised as a freeman and as a sonne, ne-ding correction. To the one his correction serueth for profe and amendement, to the other for a scourge and punishment.

32 But that we may haue the whole matter shortly and in a redy summe, let this be the first of two distinctions. Wheresoeuer punishment is to reuenge, there sheweth it self the curse and wrath of God,

which

which he alway withholdeth from the faithfull. Contrarywise Chastisement both is a blessing of God, and beareth a testimonie of his loue, as the Scripture teacheth. This difference is commonly euery where sufficiently expressed in the worde of God. For what so euer afflictions the wicked suffer in this present life, therein is painted out vnto vs as it were a certaine entrie of hell, frō whence they do already see a far of their eternall damnation: and they are so far from being amended or taking any profit thereby, that rather by such beginings they are prepared to the most cruell hell that at length abideth for them. But the Lorde chastising chastiseth his seruantes, but he doth not put them to death. Therefore they confesse that to be beaten with his rodde, was good for them vnto true instruction. But as we read euery where that the holy ones suffer such punishmentes with quiet minde, so they haue alway prayed to escape the first kinde of scourges. Chasse me Lorde (saith Ieremie) but in thy iudgement, not in thy wrath, least thou destroy me. Poure out thy wrath vpon the nations that haue not knowen thee, and vpon the kingdomes that haue not called vpon thy name. And Dauid saith: Lorde rebuke me not in thy wrath, nor correct me in thine anger. And it maketh nothing to the contrarie, that oftentimes it is said, that the Lord is angry with them that be his, when he punisheth their sinnes. As in Esaye: I will confesse to thee O Lorde, because thou hast bene angry with me: thy wrath is turned, & thou hast comforted me. Againe Abacuc: Thou that hast bene angry shall remember mercie. And Michee: I will beare the wrath of the Lord, because I haue sinned against him. Where he putteth vs in minde that not onely they that are iustly punished, nothing preuaile with murmuring against him, but also that the faithfull haue aswagement of their sorrow, in considering the purpose of God. For after the same manner it is said that he doth defile his owne inheritance, which yet (as we knowe) he will neuer defile. But that is spoken not in respect of the purpose or meaning of God that punisheth, but of the vehement feling of sorrow, which they fele that suffer any of his seueritie what so euer it be. But he not only pricketh his faithfull with no smal rigour, but sometimes so woundeth them, that they thinke themselues not far from the damnatiō of hell. So he testifieth that they haue deserued his wrath, and so it behoueth that they should loth themselues in their euels, and be touched with the greater care to appease God, and carefully make hast to craue pardon. But euen in the very same doing he sheweth a more eident testimonie of his fauorable kindenesse than of his wrath. For y couenant cōtinueth that was made with vs in our true Salomon: the truth

Cap. 4. Of the maner how to receiue whereof he that can not decerne, hath affirmed, that it shall neuer bee made voide. If (saith he) his children forsake my lawe, and walke not in my iudgements: if they defile my statutes, and kepe not my commaundementes. I will visite their sinnes with a rodde and with stripes: but I will not take away my mercie: from him. Of which mercie to make vs assured, he saith, that the rodde wherewith he will correct the posteritie of Salomon, shalbe of menne, and stripes of the children of menne: by which clauses when he meaneth moderation and lenitie, he therewithall secretly declareth, that they can not but bee confounded with extreme and deadly horrour, that fele the hand of God to be against them. Howe great regard he hath of this lenitie in chastising his Israell, he sheweth in the Prophet: I have purged thee (saith he) in fire: But not as Siluer, for then thou shouldest haue bene all consumed. Albeir he teacheth that chastisementes serue him for to cleanse him, but he further saith that he vseth the same so temperately, that he bee not too much consumed by them.

And that is needefull. For the more that euery man reuerently feareth God, and geueth himselfe to follow godlinesse, so much the ten-dler he is to beare his wrath. For the reprobate, although they grone vnder his scourges, yet for that they wey not the cause, but rather turne their backe both to their owne sinnes and to the iudgement of God, by that slouthfulnesse they gather a hardnesse: or bycause they murmure and kicke against him, and do make an vprore against their iudge, that furious sudden rage astonieth them with madnesse and furor. But the faithfull being admonished by his correction, by and by descend to consider their sinnes, & being striken with dread and horrour, they flee in humble wise to pray to him for pardon, vnlesse the Lorde did aswage these sorrowes wherewith the poore sou-les torment themselues, they would fainte a hundred times euen in smal tokens of his wrath.

33 Then let this be the second distinction, that when the reprobate are stryken with the scourges of God, they do alredy after a certaine manner beginne to suffer peines by his iudgemēt, and though they shall not escape vnpunished, for that they haue not taken hede to such tokēs of the wrath of God, yet they are not punished to this ende, to make them come to a better minde: but onely that, to their great hurt, they should proue God to be a iudge and reuenger. But children are beaten with rodde, not that they shoulde thereby be punished of God for their sinnes, but that they should therby profit to amendement. Therefore we take it that they rather haue respect to the time to come, than to the time past. This I had rather expresse in

in Chrysoftomes wordes than mine owne. For this (saith he) God doth lay peine vpon vs, not punishing our sinnes past, but correcting vs against time to come. And so saith Augustine: That which thou suffrest, that for which thou lamentest, is a medicine to thee and no peine, a chastisement and no damnation. Put not away the scourge, if thou wilt not be put away from the inheritance, &c. Know ye brethren that all this miserie of mankinde when the world groneth is a medicinall sorrow, and not a pennall sentence, &c. These sentences I haue therefore thought good to alleage, that the manner of speche that I haue aboue written, shoulde not seme to any man newe and vnused. And hereunto serue all the complaintes full of indignation wherein the Lorde oftentimes doth expostulate of the vnkindenesse of the people, for that they stiffly despised all punishments. In Esaye he saith: To what purpose should I strike you any more: from the sole of the foote to the crowne of the hed, there is no whole place. But because the Prophets are full of such sayings, it shalbe sufficient to haue briefly shewed that God doth punish his Church for none other intent, but that it shoulde be tamed and amend. Therefore when he did cast Saul out of the kingdome, he punished him to reuengement: When he toke from Dauid his yonge sonne, he corrected him to amendement. According to this meaning is that to be taken which Paule saith, when we are iudged of the Lorde, we are corrected, that we should not be damned with this worlde. That is, when we that be the children of God are afflicted with the hande of our heavenly father, this is no peine wherewith we should be confounded, but only a chastisement wherewith we should be instructed. In which pointe Augustine is plainely on our side. For he teacheth that the peines wherewith men are a like chastised by God, ar diuersly to be considered: bycause to the holy ones they are battels and exercises after the forgeuenesse of their sinnes, to the reprobate they are without forgeuenesse peines of wickednesse. In which place he rehearseth how peines were layed vpon Dauid and other godly men, and saith that the same tended to this ende, that their godlinesse shoulde by such humbling of them, be exercised and proued. And where Esaye saith, that the Iewish people had their iniquitie forgeuen them, bycause they had receiued full chastisement at the Lordes hande: this proueth not that the pardon of sinnes hangeth vpon the full payment of the peine: but it is in effect asmuch as if he had said: Bycause ye haue alredy suffred peines enough, and by the greuoufnesse and multitude thereof haue bene now pined away with longe mourning and sorrowe, therefore it is nowe time that receiuing the tidinges of full mercie, your heartes shoulde reioyce and fele me to be your father. For there God did take vpon him the person of a father, which repenteth him euen of his iuste seueritie, when he was compelled sharply to correct his sonne.

34 With these thoughtes it is necessarie that the faithfull be furnished in bitterneffe of afflictions. It is time that the iudgement beganne at the house of the Lorde, in which his name is called vpon. 1. Pet. 4. 17. Iere. 25. 29. What should the children of God do, if they did beleue the seueritie of God that they fele to be his vengeance? For he that being striken with the hand of God, imagineth God a punishing iudge, can not conceiue him but angry andemie vnto him, and detest the very scourge of God as a curse and damnation. Finally he can neuer be perswaded that God loueth him, that shall thinke him so minded toward him, that he is still minded to punish him. But he only profiteth vnder the rod of God, that thinketh him to be angry with his sinnes, but merciefull & louinge to himselfe. For otherwise that must needs happen, which the Prophet complaineth that he felt, where he saith. Ps. 88. 17. Ps. 90. 7. Thy wraths, O God haue passed ouer me: thy terrors haue oppressed me. Also that which Moses writeth, bycause we haue fainted in thy wrath; and we haue bene troubled in thy indignation, thou hast set our iniquities in thy sight, and our secretes in the light of thy countenance: because all our dayes are gone away in thy wrath: our yeres are consumed as the word that is passed out of a mouth. On the other side Dauid saith thus of his fatherly chastisements, to teach that the faithfull are rather holpen than oppressed thereby: Ps. 94. 12. Ps. 88. 17. Blessed is the man whom thou hast corrected O Lorde, and hast instructed in thy lawe, to geue him quiet from euell dayes, while a pit is digged for the sinner. Truely it is a harde tentation, when God sparing the vibleuers and winking at their faultes, semeth more rigorous against them that be his. Therefore he gaue them a cause of comfort, the admonishment of the lawe, whereby they shoulde learne, that it is done to prouide for their saluation when they are called againe into the way, and the wicked are caried hedlong into their errours, whose ende is the pit. And it is no difference whether the peine be euerlasting or during for a time. For as well warre, famine, pestilence, and sicknesse as the iudgement of eternall death are the curses of God, when they are layed vpon menne to this ende, to be instrumentes of the Lordes wrath and vengeance against the reprobate.

35 Nowe (as I thinke) all men do perceiue whereunto tended that chastisement of the Lorde vpon Dauid: euen to be an instruction that God is greuouly displeased with manslaughter and adulterie, against against which he had shewed so great an indignation in his beloued and faithfull seruant : that Dauid should be taught to be no more so bold to do ſuch like deede: & not to be a paine whereby he should make a certaine recompense to God . And so is to be iudged of the other kinde of correction, wherby the Lord punished his people with a sore pestilence, for Dauids disobedience wherinto he was fallen in numbring ſuch people. For he did in deede freely forgiue to Dauid the guiltinesse of his sinne: but because it pertained both to the publike example of all ages, and also to the humbling of Dauid, that such a hainous offense should not remayne vnpunished : therefore he most sharply chastised him with his rod . Which marke also we ought to haue before our eyes in the vniuersall curse of mankind . For wheras after pardon obtained, we do all yet suffer the miseries that were laid vpon our first parent for paine of sinne: we perceiue our selues by such exercises to be admonished, how grieuouſly God is displeas'd with the transgression of his law: that being throwen downe & humbled with knoweledge in conscience of our owne miserable estate , we may the more feruently aspire to true blessednes . But he shall be most foolish that shall thinke, that the calamities of this present life are layed vpon vs for the guiltines of sinne. And that I thinke was the meaning of Chrysostome when he wrote thus. If God do therefore lay paines vpon vs, that he should call vs, perseuering in euils to repentance, then when repentance is once shewed, the paine shall be superfluous. Therefore , as he knoweth it to be expedient for euery mans nature, so he handeleth one man more roughly, and an other with more louinge tendernes. Therefore where he mindeth to teach that he is not vntemeasurable in taking punishment, he reprocheth to the hard hearted and obstinate people that being striken yet they make not an end of sinning. In this meaning he complaineth, that Ephraim was as a cake scorched on the one side, and raw on the other, because the corrections did not pearce into their mindes, that the people hauing their vices boyled out, might be made meete to receiue pardon. Truly he that so speaketh, sheweth, that so soone as a man hath repented , he will by and by become appeasable: and that by our stifnes he is enforced to that rigour in chastising of faultes, which should haue bin prevented with willing amendement. Yet forasmuch as we all are of such hardnes and rudenesse, as vniuersally needeth chastisement: it seemed good to him being a most wise father, to exercise all without exception with a comon scourge all their life long. But it is maruelous why they so cast their eyes vpon the only example of Dauid, & are not moued with so many examples, in which they might haue beholde free for-

Luk. 18. giuenesse of finnes. It is read that the Publicane went out of the temple iustified. There followed no paine. Peter obtayned pardon of his offence, his teares we reade (sayth Ambrose) his satisfaction we read not. And the man sicke of the Palsey heard it spoken to him: Rise: thy finnes are forgien thee. There was no paine layed vpon him. All the absolutions that are rehearsed in the Scripture, are set out as giue freely. Out of this great nōber of examples, a rule should rather haue bin gathered than of that only example that containeth in it a certayne speciall matter.

Dan. 4. 36 Daniel in his exhortation wherin he counselleth Nabuchadnezer to redeeme his finnes with righteousnesse, and his iniquities with pityinge of the poore: his meaning was not to say, that righteousnesse and mercy are satisfactory appeasementes of God, and redēption of paines (for God forbid that there were euer any redēptiō sauing only the bloud of Christ) but to referre this word Redeeming rather to men than to God, as if he had sayd: O king, thou hast vsed an vnrighteous and violent goruernment, thou hast oppressed the humble, thou hast spoyled the poore, thou hast hardly and vniustly handled thy people: for thy vniust exactions, for thy violence and oppression, now render to them mercy and righteousnesse. Likewise Salomon sayth, that with charity the multitude of finnes is couered: not before God, but amonge men themselues. For thus is the whole verse: Hatred raiseth vp contentions: but charity couereth all iniquities. In which verse, as his maner is, he doth by way of comparison of contraries, compare the euils that grow of hatreds, with the frutes of charity: in this meaninge, they that hate together, do one bite, barke at, reproch and rayle at an other, and turne all things to the worst: but they that loue together, do dissemble many thinges amonge themselues, do winke at many thinges, and pardon many thinges one to the other: not that the one alloweth the others faultes, but beareth with them, and helpeth them with admonishinge, rather than galleth them with reproching them. And it is not to be doubted that Peter alleageth this place in the same sense, vnlesse we will accuse him of deprauiing and wrongfully wresting the Scripture. But whereas he teacheth that sinne is purged with mercifulnesse and liberality, he doth not meane that recompense is therewith made for sinne before the face of the Lorde, so that God beinge appeased by such satisfaction doth release the paine that otherwise he would haue layd vpon thē, but after the accustomed maner of the Scripture he declareth that they shall finde him mercifull vnto them that leauinge their former vices and iniquities, do turne to him by godlines & truth: as if he should should say, that the wrath of God doth cesse and his iudgement rest, when we cesse frō our euill doinges. Neither doth he there describe the cause of pardō, but rather the maner of true conuersion. As many times the Prophets do declare that Hypocrites do in vaine pester God with forged ceremonious vsages in stede of repentance, whereas it is vprightnes of life with the duties of charity that deliteth him. As also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues commendinge liberality and gentlenesse, teacheth that such sacrifices please God. And when Christ, taunting the Pharises that giuinge heede only to cleansinge of dishes, they neglected the cleanness of the heart, commaunded them to giue almes that all might be cleane: he did not thereby exhorte them to make satisfaction: but only teacheth what maner of cleanness pleaseth God. Of which kinde of speach we haue entreated in an other place.

37 As touching the place of Luke, no man that hath with sounde iudgement read the parable that the Lord did there recite, will make vs any controuersie thereupon. The Pharisee thought with himselfe, that the Lord did not know the woman, which he had so easily receiued into his presence. For he thought that Christ would not haue receiued her, if he had knowen her such a sinner as she was. And thereby he gathered, that Christ was not a Prophet that might in such sort be deceiued. The Lord, to shewe that she was no sinner to whom her sinnes were already forgiuen, did put out this parable. There were two detters to one creditour vpō vsurie: the one ought fifty, the other ought five hundred, both had their dettes forgiuen them. Whether oweth more thanke: the Pharisee answered: he to whom most is forgiuen. The Lord replied: learne hereby that this womans sinnes are forgiuē her, because she hath loued much. In which words (as you se) he maketh not her loue the cause, but the prooue of the forgiuenesse of her sinnes. For they are deriued vpon a similitude of that dettour, to whome five hundred was forgiuen, to whome he did not say that therefore it was forgiuen, because he had loued much: but therefore loued much, because it was forgiuen. And hereunto must that similitude be applied in this sorte: Thou thinkest this woman to be a sinner; but thou oughtest to know that she is none such, forasmuch as her sinnes be forgiuen her. And that her sinnes be forgiuē her, her loue ought to proue vnto thee, whereby she rendereth thanke for this benefit. It is an argument gathered of the following effect, whereby any thing is proued by signes ensuinge. By what meane she obtayned forgiuenes of sinnes, the Lord openly testifieth: Thy faith, saith he, hath saued thee. Therefore we obtayne forgiuenesse by fayth:

By charity we giue thankes, and testifie the bountifulnesse of the Lord.

38 As for those things that are commonly founde in the bookes of olde wryters concerninge satisfaction, they litle moue me. I see in deede that many of them, (I will speake plainly) in a maner all whose books remaine, haue either erred in this poinr, or spokē to crabbedly and hardly: but I will not graunt that they were so rude and vnskilfull as to haue wrytten those thinges in that sense that the new Satisfactionars do reade thē. Chrysofostome in one place writeth thus: where mercy is required, examination cesseth: where mercy is asked, iudgement is not rigorous: where mercy is craued, there is no place for paine: where is mercy, there is no inquisition. Where is mercy, the answere is pardoned. Which wordes howsoeuer they be wrested, yet they can neuer be made to agree with the Schoolemens doctrines. In the booke of Ecclesiasticall doctrines, which is fathered vpon Augustine, is red thus: Satisfaction of repentance is, to cut of the causes of sinnes, and not to graunt an entrie to their suggestions. Whereby appeareth that the doctrine of satisfaction that was sayd to be giuen in recompense for sinnes committed, was euen in those times laughed to scorne: forasmuch as they referre all satisfaction to a heedfulnesse in abstaining frō sinnes in time to come. I will not alleage that which the same Chrysofostome sayth, that he requireth of vs no more, but that we shoulde confesse our sinnes vnto him with teares: sith such sentences are many times found in his wrytings & others. Augustine in deede in some places calleth the workes of mercy, remedies to obtaine forgiuenesse of sinnes: but because nō man shoulde stumble at that litle word, he himselfe preuenteth it in an other place. The flesh of Christ (sayth he) the true and onely sacrifice for sinnes, not onely these sinnes that are wholly put away in baptisme, but also these that afterward creepe in by weakenes: for which the whole church crieth out at this day, Forgiue vs our trespasses. And they are forgiuen by that singular sacrifice.

39 They haue for the most parte called satisfaction, not a recompense to be rendred to God, but an open declaration whereby they that had bin excommunicate when they woulde be receiued againe to the communion, did assertaine the church of their repentāce. For there were enioyned vnto them when they did repent certaine fastinges and other thinges, whereby they might perswade men that they were truely and hartily weary of their former life, or rather blotte out the remembrance of their former doinges: and so they were sayd to make satisfaction not to God, but to the Church. Which is also expressed of Augustine in these wordes in his Enchiridion to Laurence : Out of that auncient custome the confessions and satisfactions that are at this day vsed, tooke their beginning. Truely very viperous birthes, by which is brought to passe, that there remaineth not so much as a shadowe of that better forme. I know that the olde wryters do sometime speake somewhat hardly, and as I sayd euen now, I do not deny that peradventure they erred herein. But those thinges that were besprinkled with a few spots, when they are once handeled with these mens vnwashed handes, are altogether defiled. And if we must contende with the authority of olde wryters : good God, what olde wryters do they thrust vnto vs? A good parte of those wherewith Peter Lombard their champion hath botched vp his patched Sentences, is gathered out of the vnsauory dotages of certaine monkes that are caried about vnder the name of Ambrose, Hierome, Augustine, and Chrysostome. As about this presente question he taketh in a maner all out of Augustines boke of repentance, which is foolishly botched of good and bad by some scraper together. It beareth in deede the name of Augustine, but such a booke as no man beinge but meanely learned, would vouchsaue to acknowledge for his. But whereas I do not so narrowly examine their follies, lette the readers pardon me whom I would ease of that tediousnesse. For to me it should not be very laboursome, and yet very pausible to bewray to their great shame those thinges that they haue heretofore boasted vpon as misteries, but because my purpose is to teach frutefully, therefore I passe them ouer.

The v. Chapter.

Of the supplyings which they adde to satisfactions, as pardons and purgatory.

OVt of this doctrine of satisfactions do flowe indulgences or pardons. For they say that that which our power wanteth to make satisfaction, is supplied by these pardons. And they runne so farre foorth into madnesse, that they define them to be the distribution of the merites of Christ & of the martyrs, which the Pope dealeth abroad by his bulles. But although they haue more neede of Helleborus to putge their frenlike braine, than argumentes to answere them, so that it is not much worthy the trauaile to stand vpon confutinge such triflinge errors, which are already shaken with many batelrammes, and of themselues grow into decayed age, and bende toward fallinge: yet because a shorte confutation of them shalbe profitable for some that be ignoraunt, I will not altogether omit it. As for this that pardons haue so longe stande safe, and haue so longe bin vnpunished, hauinge bin vsed with so outragious and furious licentiousnesse: this may serue to teach vs in how darke a night of errours, men in certaine ages past haue bin drowned. They sawe themselues to be openly and vnicolouredly scorned of the Pope & his Bulbearers, gainefull markets to be made of the saluation of their soules, the price of saluation to be valued at a few pence, and nothing set out to be frely giuen: that by this colour they be wiped of offrings to be filthily spent vpon brothels, bawdes and bankettings: that the greatest blowers abroad of pardons are the greatest despisers of the: that this monster doth daily more & more with greater licentiousnesse ouerrunne the worlde, and grow into outrage, and that there is no ende, newe lead dayly brought, and newe mony gotten. Yet with hye reuerence they receiued, they worshipped and bought pardons, and such as among the rest saw somewhat farther, yet thought them to be godly deceites, wherby men might be beguiled with some profit. At the length, since the world suffered it selfe to be somewhat wiser, pardons waxe colde, and by litle and litle become frosen, till they vtterly vanish away.

2 But forasmuch as many that see the filthy gaminges, the deceites, thestes, and robberies, wherewith the pardoners haue heretofore mocked and begiled vs, yet see not the very fountayne of vngodlinesse from whence they springe: it is good to shew not onely of what sort pardons be, but also what they be, when they are wiped fro all spottes. They call the treasure of the church, the merites of Christ and of the holy Apostles and Martyrs. The principall custody of this barne (as I haue already touched) they faine to be deliuered to the bishop of Rome, that he should haue the distributiō of so great gifts, that he might both giue them by himselfe, and also graunt iurisdiction to other to giue them. Hereupon procede from the Pope sometime plenary pardons, sometime pardons for certaine yeres: from the Cardinals, pardons for a hundred dayes: from Bishoppes, pardons for forty dayes. But they be (as I may naturally describe the) the profaninge of the bloud of Christ, Sathans mockery, to leade away the christian people from the grace of God, from the life that is in Christ, and to turne them from the true way of saluation. For how could the bloude of Christ be more filthily prophaned, than when it is denied to suffice the remission of sinnes, to reconciliation and satisfaction, vnlesse the want thereof as being withered and wasted, shoulde be otherwise supplied and profited? The law and all the Prophetes (saith Peter) beare witnessse of Christ, that by him forgiuenesse of sinne is to be receiued: Pardons giue remission of finnes by Peter, Paul and the Martyrs. The blood of Christ (saith Iohn) cleanseth vs frō sinne: 1. Ioh. 1 uings obtaine grace not due vnto vs. Truly where as all their doctrine is parched together of horrible sacrileges and blasphemies, yet this is a more monstrous blasphemy than all the other. Let them remember thēselues, whether these be not their decrees: that the Martyrs haue by their death done more to God, and deserued more, than

was nedefull for themfelues:and that they had remaining so great a plenty of deseruings, as did also ouerflow vnto other:and that therefore, least so great goodnesse shoulde be superfluous, their blood is mingled with the blood of Christ, and of both these bloudes is made the treasure of the church, for the remissio and satisfaction of finnes. And that so is the sayinge of Paule to be taken: I supply in my body those things that want of the sufferings of Christ for his body, which is the church. What is this else but to leaue Christ only his name, otherwise to make him but a common pety saint, that may scarcely among the multirude be knowen from the rest? He only, only shoulde haue bin preached, he onely set foorth, he only named, he only bin looked vnto, when the obtaining of forgiuenesse of sinne, satisfactio, and sanctification are entreated of. But let vs heare their curtalled argumentes. Least the bloude of the Martyrs shoulde be shed in vaine, therefore let it be employed to the common benefit of the Church. Is it so? was it no profit to glorifie God by their death? to subscribe to his trueth with their blood? by despisinge this present life, to testifie that they sought for a better life? by their stedfastnesse to strengthen the faith of the church, and overcome the stubbornesse of the enemies? But this is the matter in deede: they acknowledge no profit of the Martyrs death, if Christ only be the propitiator, if he onely died for our finnes, if he onely was offered vp for our redemption. So (say they) Peter and Paul might neuerthelesse haue obtayned the crown of victorie, if they had died in their beddes. And whereas they haue fought euen to the shedding of their bloude, it woulde not agree with y^e iustice of God to leaue the same barren & fruteles. As though God could not tel how to encrease in his seruants their glory, according to the measure of his gifts. But the church receiueth in commune together profite enough, when it is by their triumphes encouraged to a zealous desire to fight.

4 But how maliciously do they wrest that place of Paule where he Colo. 1. saith, that he supplieth in his body those thinges that wanted of the 4 sufferings of Christ? For he referreth not the default or supplying, to the worke of redemption, satisfaction, & expiation: but to those afflictions wherwith all the members of Christ, that is to say, all the faithful must be exercised, so longe as they shall be in this flesh. He sayth therefore, that this remaineth of the sufferings of Christ, that he dayly suffereth in his members the same that he once suffered in himselfe. Christ vouchsaueth to do vs so great honor, to reckon and account our afflictions his owne. Where as Paule added these wordes, For the church, he meaneth not for the redemption, for the reconciliation, for the satisfaction of the church, but for the edifyinge and profit of the church. As in an other place he sayth, that he suffereth all things for the electes sakes, that they may obtaine the saluation which is in Christ Iesu. And he wrote to the Corinthians, that he suffered all the troubles that he suffred, for their comfort and saluation. And immediately in the same place he expoundeth himselfe, when he sayth further, that he was made a minister of the church, not for redemption, but accordinge to the dispensation that was committed vnto him, to preach the Gospel of Christ. If they yet require an other expositour, let them heare Augustine. The sufferings of Christ (sayth he) are in Christ only as in the head: and both in Christ & the church, as in the whole body. Whereby Paule being one member saith, I supply in my body that which wanteth in the suffrings of Christ. Therefore if thou what soeuer thou be y^e hearest this, art one of the members of Christ, whatsoeuer thou sufferest of the that are not the members of Christ, that same wanted in the suffrings of Christ. But wherunto the suffrings of the Apostles taken for the church of Christ do tend, he expoundeth in an other place where he sayth: Christ is to me the gate vnto you: because ye are the shepe of Christ bought with his blood: acknowledging your price, which is not giue of me, but preached by me. Then he addeth. As he hath giuen his soule, so ought we to giue our soules for our brethren, to edifie peace, & to cōfirme faith. These are Augustines words. But God forbid, that Paul should haue thought that any thing wanted in the suffrings of Christ, as concerning all fulnes of righteousnes, saluation and life: or that he meant to adde any thing thereunto, which so plainly and honorably preacherh, that the abundance of grace was so largely poured out by Christ, that it farre surmounted all the force of sinne. By it only all the saintes haue bin saued, & not by y^e merit of their owne life or death, as Peter expressly testified: so that he should be sclanderous against God & Christ, that should repose the worthines of any saint any where else than in the only mercy of God. But why do I tary hereupon any longer, as vpon a matter yet doutfull, sith the very bewrayinge of such monstrous errors is a sufficient confutation of them?
for

5 Now (to passe ouer such abominations) who taught the Pope to enclose in lead and parchement the grace of Iesus Christ, which the Lord willed to be distributed by the word of the Gospel? Truly either the Gospell of God must be false, or their pardons false. For, that Christ is offered vs in the Gospel, with all abundance of heauenly benefites, with all his merites, with all his righteousnes, wisdom and grace, without any exception, Paul witnesseth where he saith, that the word of reconciliation was deliuered to the ministers, whereby they might vse this forme of message, as it were Christ giuing exhortation by them: we besech you, be ye so reconciled to God? He hath made him y^e knew no sinne, to be made sinne for vs, that we might be made the righteousnes of God in him. And the faithful know of what value is that common partakinge of Christ, which (as the same Apostle witnesseth) is offred vs to be enioyed in the Gospel. Contrariwise the pardōs do bring out of the storehouse of the Pope, a certaine pittance of grace, & fasten it to lead, parchment, yea and to a certaine place, & seuer it from the word of God. If a man should aske whence this abuse tooke beginning: it seemeth to haue proceded herof, that when in time past penitentes were charged with more rigorous satisfaciōs than all could beare, they which felt themselues aboue measure oppressed with penāce enioyed them, required of the church a release. The mitigation that was graunted to such, was called an indulgence or pardon. But when they turned Satisfactions from the Church to God, & sayd that they were recompenses wherby men may redeme themselues frō the iudgement of God, then they therwithall did also draw these indulgences or pardons to be propitiatory remedies, to deliuer vs from deserued punishments. As for these blasphemers that we haue recited, they forged thē so shamelessly, that they can haue no colour at all.

6 Now let thē no more trouble vs with their purgation, because it is with this axe already broken, hewed downe, & ouerthrowen from the very fundaxions. For I do not agree to some mē, that thinke best to dissemble in this point, and make no mention at all of Purgatory, whereupon (as they say) great contentions do arise, but small edification is gotten. Truly I my selfe woulde also thinke such trifles worthy to be negligently passed ouer, if they did not accompt thē earnest matters. But forasmuch as purgatory is builded of many blasphemes, and is dayly vpholden with newe blasphemes, and raiseth vp many and grieuous offences, truly it is not to be winked at. This parauenture might after a sort haue bin dissembled for a time, that it was inuented by curious and bolde rashnesse without the worde of God: that men beleued of it by, I wot not what reuelations, fained by the craft of Sathan: that for the confirmation of it, certaine places of Scripture were fondly wrested. Albeit the Lord giueth not leaue to mans presumptuousnes so to breake into y^e secret places of his iudgements, & hath seuerely forbidden men to enquire for trueth at dead mē, neglecting his word, & permitteth not his word to be so vnreuerently defiled. But let vs graunt, that all those things might for a while haue haue bin borne with, as thinges of no great importaunce. But when the cleansing of finnes is sought else where then in the bloude of Christ, when satisfaction is giuen away to any other thinge, then it is most perillous not to speake of it. Therefore we must crie out not onely with vehement stretching of our voice, but also of our throte and sides: that Purgatory is the damnable deuise of Sathan, that it maketh void the Crosse of Christ, that it layeth an intolerable sclander vpon the mercy of God, that it feebleth and ouerthroweth our faith. For what else is Purgatory amonge them, but the satisfaction that the soules of men departed do pay after their death? So that ouerthrowing the opinion of satisfaction, Purgatory is immediately ouerthrowen by the very rootes. But if in our former discourse it is more than euident that the bloude of Christ is the onely satisfaction, propitiatory sacrifice and cleansing for the finnes of the faithfull: what remaineth but that purgatory is a mere and horrible blasphemie against Christ? Lasse ouer the robberies of God wherewith it is daily defended, the offenses that it bredeth in religion, and other thinges innumerable, which we see to haue come out of the same spring of vngodlinesse.

7 But it is good to wringe out of their handes such places as they haue falsly & wrongfully takē out of the Scripture. When (say they) the Lord affirmeth that y sinne against the holy Ghost should not be forgiuen in this world, nor in the world to come, thereby he sheweth that there is a forgiuenesse of some finnes in the worlde to come. But who seeth not that the Lord there speaketh of the fault of sinne? Now if it be so, what is that to their Purgatory, forasmuch as by their opinion the paine is there suffred of those finnes, wherof they deny not the fault to be forgiuē in this present life? But that they may no more carp against vs, they shal haue yet a plainer solution. When the Lord meant to cut of all hope of Pardon from so haynous wickednesse, he thought it not enough to say that it should neuer be forgiuē: but the more to amplify it, he vsed a diuision, wherin he comprehended both the iudgement that every mans conscience feeleth in this life, & the last iudgement that shalbe openly pronounced at the resurrection: as thogh he should haue said: Beware ye of malicious rebellio, as of most present damnatio. For he that of set purpose shal endeouour to quench the light of the holy Ghost, shall not obtaine pardon, neither in this life which is giuen to sinners for their conuersion, nor in the last day when the lambes shalbe seuered by the angels of God frō the goats, and the kingdome of heauen shalbe cleansed from all offenses. Then they bringe foorth that parable out of Matthew: Agree with thine aduersary, least he deliuer thee to the Iudge, & the iudge to the Sargeant, and the Sargeant to the prison, from whence thou shalt not get out, vntil thou hast payed the vttermost farthing. If in this place the Iudge do signifie God, and the aduersary plentife the Deuil, the Sargeant the Angell, and the prison purgatory, I wil gladly yeelde vnto them. But if it be euident to all men, that Christ meant there to show into how many daungers and mischieues they cast themselues, that had rather obstinately pursue the extremity of the law, thã deale according to equity & good right, to the ende to exhort his disciples the more earnestly to agreement with equity: where thẽ I pray you shall Purgatory be found?

8 They fetch an argument out of ȳ saying of Paul, where he affirmeth that the knees of thinges in heauen, earth & hels, shall bow to Christ. For they take it as cõfessed, that hels can not there be meant of those that are adiudged to eternall damnation. Therefore it remaineth that it must be the soules lying in paine in Purgatory. They did not reason very euil, if the Apostle did by kneelinge meane the true godly worshipping. But sith he teacheth only, that there is a dominiõ giuen to Christ whereby all creatures are to be subdued, what prooffe is there to the contrary, but that we may by hels vnderstand the Deuils, that shalbe brought before ȳ iudgement of God, to acknowledge him their iudge with feare and trembling? Like as Paul himselfe expoundeth the same prophecy in an other place. All (sayth he) shalbe brought before the iudgemēt seate of Christ. For it is written: So truly as I liue, euery knee shall bow to me. &c. But we may not so expound that which is in the Reuelation: I haue heard all creatures, both these things that are in heauen, & those that are vpon the earth, and these that are vnder the earth, & those that are in the seae, & all those that are in thẽ, I haue heard thẽ all say to him that sitteth on the Throne & to the Lambe, Blessing & honor, and glory, and power, for euer & euer. That I do in deede easily graunt, but what creatures do they thinke to be here rehearsed? For it is most certaine, that there are contained creatures both without reason and without sense. Wherby is affirmed nothing else, but that all the partes of the world, from the hiest toppe of the heauens, to the very midle point of the earth, do in their maner declare the glory of their creator. As for that which they alleage out of the history of the Machabees, I will not vouchsaue to answer it, least I should seeme to reckon that worke in the number of the holy books. But Augustine receiued it for Canonically. But first, of what sure credit did he receiue it? The Iewes (sayth he) esteeme not the wryting of the Machabees as they do the law, the Prophetes

and the Psalmes, of which the Lord himselfe hath witnessed as of his witnessers, saying: It was necessary, that all thinges should be fulfilled that are wrytten in the law, and the Psalmes, and Prophetes, concerning me. But it hath bin receiued of the Church not vnprofitably, if it be soberly read or heard. And Hierom teacheth without any doubting that the authority thereof is of no force to prouing of doctrines. And it evidently appeareth by that old booke, which is entituled vnder the name of Cyprian, concerninge the exposition of the Crede, that it had no place at all in the olde Church. But why do I here strue without cause? As though the author himselfe doth not sufficiently shew, how much he is to be credited, whē in the end he craueth pardon, if he haue spoken any thing not well. Truely he that confesseth his wrytings to neede pardon, sayth plainly that they are not the oracles of the holy Ghost. Beside that, y^e godlines of Iudas is praised for none other cause, but for that he had an assured hope of the last resurrection, when he sent an offering for the dead to Hierusalem. Neither doth the wryter of that history referre that which Iudas did to be a price of redemption, but that they might be partakers of the eternall life with the other faithful, that had died for their contry & religion. This doing was in deede not without superstition and preposterous zeale, but they are more thā fooles, that draw a sacrifice of the law so farre as vnto vs: forasmuch as we know that things do cesse by the comming of Christ, that then were in vse.

9 But they haue an inuincible bulwarke in Paul, which can not so easily be battered. If any man (sayth he) build vpon this foundation, gold, siluer, precious stones, timber, heye, stubble, the Lord shall shew euery mans worke what it is: because it shal be reuealed in fier, & the fier shall trie euery mans worke what it is. If any mās worke do burne, it shall suffer losse, but he shalbe safe, but as through the fier. What fier (say they) can that be, but the fier of Purgatory? by which the filthines of sinne are censed away, that we may enter pure in to the kingdom of God? But the most part of the old wryters thought it to be an other fier, that is to say, Trouble or the crosse, by which the Lord trieth them that be his, that they should not rest in the filthines of the flesh: & that is much more probable, than in faining purgatory. Albeit I do neither agree with these men, because I thinke I haue attained a certaine and much plainer vnderstanding of that place. But before that I vtter it, I woulde haue thē answere me, whether the Apostles & all y^e sainctes must haue gone through this fier of Purgatory? I know they wil say, nay. For it were to much inconueniēt that they must haue needed to be purged; whose merites they dreame to oucrflow aboue measure to all the members of the church. But the Apostle affirmeth it. For he doth not say that the worke of some shalbe proued, but the worke of all. Neither is this my argumēt, but Auguchir. stines, which so confuteth that expositiō. And (which is more absur-Lau. dity) he doth not say, y they shal passe through the fire for all works; it. 68 but if they haue faithfully builded the church, they shall receiue rewarde when their worke is examined with fier. First we see that the Apostle vsed a Metaphore, when he called the doctrines inuēted by mans braines, wood, hey, & stubble. And the Metaphore hath an apparant rescue; that as wood so soone as it is put in the fier, consumeth & wasteth, so can not those doctrines continue when they come to be examined. Now no man is ignorant that such triall commeth of the holy Ghost. Therefore to folow the true cause of his metaphore, & match the partes together with iust relation, he called the triall of the holy Ghost, fier. For euen as the nerer that gold & siluer are put to the fier, so much the surer proufe they haue of their goodnes and finenes: so the Lords trueth, y more exactly it is weyed with spiritual examination, so much the greater cōfirmation of credit it receiueth. As hey, wood, & stubble put to the fier, are brought to sudden consuming, so the inuentions of men not stablished by the word of God, can not beare the triall of the holy Ghost, but they by and by fal away and perish. Finally, if forged doctrines be compared to wood, hey, and stubble, because like wood, hey, & stubble, they are burned with fire & destroyed: but they are not destroyed or driuen away but by the spirit of the Lord: it followeth that the holy Ghost is the fier wherwith they shalbe proued, whose prouf Paul, according to the common vse of the Scripture, calleth The day of the Lord. For it is called y day of the Lord, whensoever he doth any way shew his presence to mé. But thē his face principally shineth, when his trueth shineth vpō vs. Now haue we proued, that Paul meaneth no other fier, but the triall of the holy Ghost. But how are they saued by y fier, that suffer losse of their worke? That shall not be hard to vnderstande, if we consider of what kinde of men he speaketh. For he toucheth those builders of the church, that keping the true foundation, do build disagreeing matter vpon it, that is to say, they that not swaruing frō the chiefe & necessary articles of faith, do erre in pointes that be smaler & lesse perillous mingling their owne deuises with the word of God. Such I say, must suffer losse of their worke, hauinge their deuises destroyed. But themselves are saued, but as by the fier: that is to say, not that their ignorance and error is allowable before the Lord, but because they are cleansed from it by the grace and power of the holy Ghost. Therefore who-whosoever haue defiled the golden fineness of Gods word with this dong of purgatory, they must nedes suffer losse of their worke.

10 But they wil say, it hath bin an auncient vsage of the church. Paule answered this obiection when he comprehendeth his owne time in that sentence, where he sayth, that all they must suffer losse of their worke, that in the building of the church, do lay any thing vpon the foundation that agreeth not with it, Therefore when the aduerfaries object against me, that it hath bin vsed aboue a thousande and three hundred yeares, to haue prayers made for the dead: I aske the againe, by what word of God, by what Reuelation, by what example it was done. For here they do not only want testimonies of Scripture but also all the examples of holy men that there are red, do shew no such thing. Of the mourning and order of funeralles there are somtimes found many & long tales: but of prayers you can not see one tittle. But of the greater weight that the matter is, the more it ought to haue bin expreffely spoken. But the very old fathers themselues that prayed for the dead, did see that herein they wanted both commaundement of God, and lawfull example. Why then durst they so do? In this I say, they did suffer somewhat as men: & therefore I affirme that, that which they did, ought not to be drawen into example. For where as the faithfull ought to enterprife the doinge of nothing, but vpon assured conscience, as Paule teacheth: this assurednesse is principally required in prayer. But it is likely that they were led by some reason vnto it: they sought some comfort to relieue their sorrow: and it seemed vnnatural nor to shew before God some testimony of their loue toward the dead. Howe mans wit is enclined to this affection, all men know by experience. Also the receiued custome was like a burninge brand to set many mens mindes on fier. We knowe that with all nations & in all ages there were funerals done for y^e dead, & their soules yearely purged: For though Sathan beguiled foolish men with these deceites: yet he tooke occasion so to begile by a true principle: that death is not a destructiō, but a passage out of this life into an other. And it is no dout, but that euē very superstitiō condēneth the Gentils before the iudgement seat of God, for neglecting the care of the life to come, which they professed themselues to beleue. Nowe Christians, because they would not be worse than Heathē men, were ashamed to do nothing for the dead, as though they were vterly destroyed. Herupon came that il aduised diligence: because if they were slow in looking to y^e funerals, in bankettinges & offrings, they thought that they had put themselues in daunger of a great reproche. And that which first proceeded from a wrongful following of the Heathens example, was so multiplied by often new encrease, that now it is the principal holynesse of Papistry, to help the dead in distresse. But the Scripture ministreth an other much better and perfecter comfort, when it testifieth, that the dead are blessed that die in the Lorde. And it addeth a reason: because from thence forth they rest frō their labours. And we ought not so much tenderly to follow our owne affection of loue, to set vp a wrōgful maner of praying in the church. Truely he that hath but meane wisdom, doth soone perceiue that all that is red hereof in the olde wryters, was done to beare with the common vsage, and the ignorance of the people. They themselues also, I graunt, were caried away into error euen as vnaduised lightnes of beliefe is wont to rob mens wits of iudgement. But in the meane time the very readinge of them doth shew, how doutingly they commend prayers for the dead. Augustine in his booke of confessions, reporteth that Monica his mother did earnestly desire, that she might be remembered in celebrating the ministeries at the Altar. An old wiues request, which y^e sonne neuer examined by the rule of the Scripture, but according to his affectiō of nature, would haue it allowed of other. As for the booke that he made of care for the deade, containeth so many doutinges, that of right it ought with the coldnes thereof to quench the heare of a foolish zeale: if any man desire to be a proctor for dead men, truely with cold likelihodes it wil bring them out of care that were before careful. For this is one piller of it, that this doing is not to be despised, because it is a custome growē in vse, that the dead should be prayed for. But though I graūt to the old writers of the church, that it is a charitable vse to help the dead: yet we must stil hold one rule which cā not deceiue: that it is not lawfull for vs in our prayers to vse any thing of our own, but our requestes must be made subiect to the word of God: because it is in his wil to appoint what he wil haue to be asked. Now where as the whole lawe and the Gospell do not so much as in one sillable giue liberty to pray for the dead, it is a prophane abuse of the inuocation of God to attempt more than he commaundeth vs. But that our aduersaries may not boast that they haue the aunciēt church cōpanion of their error: I say there is great difference betwene thē & it. They vsed a memorial of y^e dead, least they should seeme to haue cast away all care of them: but they did therewithall confesse that they doubted of their state. As for purgatory, they so affirmed nothing that they helde it for a thinge vncertaine. These men require to haue that which they haue dreamed of purgatory, to be holdē wout questiō for an article of faith. They sclenderly & only to passe it lightly ouer, did in the cōmunion of the holy supper cōmend their dead to God:

These

These do continually call vpon the care of the dead, and with importunate prailing it, do make it to be preferred aboue all dutieful works of charitie. Yea and it were not harde for vs to bringe forth some testimonies of the olde writers, that do manifestly ouerthrowe all those prayers for the dead, which then weare vsed. As this of Augustine, when he teacheth that all men loke for the resurrection of the flesh and the eternall glorie, and that euery man then receiueth the rest that followeth after death, it he be worthy when he dieth. And therefore he testifieth, that all the Godly do immediatly after death enioy the blessed rest as well as the Prophets, Apostles and martyrs. If their estate be such, what I beseeche you, shall our prayers auaille them? I passe ouer the grosser superstitions, wherewith they haue bewitched the mindes of the simple: which yet are so innumerable and the most part so monstruous, that they can haue no honest collour to excuse them. Also I let passe those most filthy byings and sellings that they haue vsed, while the worlde was in such grosse senselesse ignorance. For both I shoulde neuer make an ende, and also the readers shall without any rehearfall of them, haue here sufficient, wher-vpon they may stablish their consciences.

The vj. Chapter.

Of the life of a Christian man: And first by what argumentes the Scripture exhorteth vs thereunto.

WE haue already said, that the marke whereunto regeneration tendeth, is that in the life of the faithfull there should appeare an agreement and consent betwene the righteousnesse of God and their obedience: and that so they should confirme the adoption, whereby they are receiued to be children. But although his lawe containe in it selfe that newnesse, whereby the image of God is restored in vs, yet because our dulnesse hath neede both of many prickings forward and helps, therefore it shalbe profitable to gather out of diuerse places of the Scripture an order of framing of life, that they that haue a desirous minde of amendement, may not wander out of the way in their endeuour. Now when I take vpon me the framing of a Christian mans life, I am not ignorant that I entre into a manifold and plentuous argument, and such as may with the greatnesse thereof fill a long volume, if I wold absolutely entreate of it in all pointes. For we se into what great length are stretched the exhortatorie orations of olde writers, made onely euery one of one seuerall vertue. And that is not done with too much idle babbling. For what so euer vertue a mā purpose to set out in oration, the stile runneth of it selfe into such largenes with plentie of matter, that a man can not seme to haue discoursed well of it, vnlesse he haue spoken much. But my mind is not to stretche so far the institution of life, which I promise to teache, as peculiarly to go through euery speciall vertue, and wander abrode into exhortations. Let such thinges be fetched out of other mens writings, and specially out of the Homelies of the olde fathers. It shalbe enough for me to shewe an orderly trade, wherby a godly man may be guided to a right marke of framing his life, and shortly to apoint out a certain vniuersall rule, by which he may well trie what be his duties. There shall paraduenteure at some other season be a fit time to make declamations, or I will leaue that to other, which I my selfe am not mete to do. I do naturally loue shortnesse, and paraduenteure if I would speake more at large, it woulde not frame well with me. And if a longer manner of teaching were neuer so much pleasing, yet I would scarce haue minde to put it in prose. But the course of this present worke requireth to knit vp a simple doctrine with as great shortnesse as I may. As the Phylosophers haue their certaine endes of right and honestie, from which they deriue particular duties and all the companie of vertues: so the Scripture is not without her order in this matter: but holdeth a most goodly well ordred disposition, and much more certaine than all the Phylosophers orders. This only is the difference, that they (as they were vaigneglorious men) haue diligently endeouored to attaine an exquisite plainnesse of order, to shewe fourth the ready aptnesse of their witte. But the Spirit of God, because he taught without curious affectation, hath not so exactly nor continually kept an orderly trade: which yet when he sometime vseth, he doth sufficiently declare, that it is not to be neglected of vs.

2 This instruction that the Scripture teacheth, whereof we now speake, standeth chiefly vpon two partes. The first, that there be poured and brought into our mindes a loue of righteousnesse, to which otherwise we are of nature nothing inclined. The seconde, that there be a rule set out vnto vs, that may not suffer vs to go out of the way in following righteousnes. In commendation of righteousnes it hath both very many and very good reasons: of which we haue herebefore in diuerse places spoken of some, and other some we shall in this place briefly touch. At what foundation may it better beginne, than when it putteth vs in minde that we must be holy, because our God is holy? For when we were scattered abrode like straying shepe, and dispersed abrode in the maze of the world, he gathered vs together againe, to ioine vs in one flocke with him selfe. When we heare mention made of our joining with God, let vs remember that holinesse must be the bonde thereof. Not that by the merite of holinesse we come into common with him: (where as rather we must first cleave vnto him, that beyng endued with his holinesse, we may followe whether he calleth) but because it greatly pertaineth to his glorie, that he haue no fellowship with wickednesse and vncleannesse. Therefore also it teacheth, that this is the ende of our calling, which we ought alway to haue respect vnto, if we will answere God that calleth vs. For to what purpose was it, that we should be drawn out of the wickednesse and filthenesse of the world, if we geue our selues leaue all our life long to wallowe in them still? Moreouer it also admonisheth vs, that to the ende we may be reckened among the people of God, we must dwell in the holy citie Hierusalem. Which as he hath halowed to him selfe, so is it vnlawefull that it be vnholily profaned by the vncleannesse of the inhabitantes. From hence came these sayinges, that they shall haue a place in the tabernacle of God that walke without spot, and studie to followe righteousnesse. &c. Because it is not meete that the Sanctuarie whereon he dwelleth, shoulde be like a stable full of filthinesse. —

Psal. 35.
Psal. 15.
2. & 23.

3 And the better to awake vs, it sheweth that God the father, as he hath ioined vs to him selfe in his Christ, so hath printed an image for vs in him, after which he would haue vs to be fashioned. Now let them finde me a better order among the Phylosophers, that thinke that the phylosophie concerning manners, is in them onely orderly framed. They when they will excellently well exhorte vs to vertue, bring nothing els but that we should liue agreeably to nature. But the Scripture bringeth here exhortation from the true welspringe, when it not onely teacheth vs to referre our life to God, the authour of it, to whom it is bonde: but also when she hath taught that we are swarued out of kinde from the true originall & state of our creation, she immediatly addeth, that Christ by whom we come againe into fauour with God, is set before vs for an example, that we should expresse the forme thereof in our life. What may a man require more effectually then this one thing? Ye what may a manne require more than this onely thing? For if the Lorde hath by adoption made vs children with this condition, that our life shoulde resemble Christ the bond of our adoption: if we do not geue and auowe our selues to righteousnesse, we do not onely with most wicked breach of allegiance depart from our creatour, but also we forswear him to be our sauour. Then the Scripture taketh matter of exhortation out of all the benefites of God, which she reherfeth vnto vs, & all the partes

 But with what face do they boast of his holy name: sith none haue any fellowship with Christ, but they that haue receiued a true know-that all they haue not rightly learned Christ, that are not taught that they must cast away the old man which is corrupted according to the desire of errour, and haue not put on Christ. Therefore it is proued that they falsly, yea and wrongfully pretēde the knowledge of Christ, although they can eloquently and roundely talke of the Gospell.

 For it is not a doctrine of tong, but of life: and is not conceiued as other learnings be, with onely vnderstanding and memorie, but is then onely receiued when it possesseth the whole soule, and findeth a seate and place to hold it in the most inward affection of the heart.
 Therefore either let then cesse, to the sleaude of God, to boast of that which they are not, or let them shew themselues not vnworthy scholars for Christ their maister. We haue geuen the first place to the doctrine wherin our religion is contained, because our saluation beginneth at it: but the same must be poured into our hearte, and passe into our maners, yea and transforme vs into it, that it be not vnfrute-full vnto vs. If the Philosphers do iustly chafe against them, and do with

with shamefull reproche driue them from their companie, that professing an art that ought to be the scholemaistres of life, do turne it into a Sophisticall babbling: with how much better reason shall we detest these trifling Sophisters, that are contented to role the Gospell vpon the top of their tongues, the effectuall working whereof ought to pearce into the innermost affections of the heart, to rest in the soule, & to alter the whole man a hundred times more, than the colde exhortations of Philosophers?

5 Yet do I not require, that the maners of a Christian man sauour of nothing but the absolute Gospel: which neuerthelesse both were to be wished, and we must endeouour vs toward it. But I do not so seuerely require a Gospellike perfection, that I would not acknowledge him for a Christian that hath not yet attained vnto it. For so should all men be excluded from the Church, sith there is no man found that is not by a great space distant from it, and many haue hitherto but a litle way proceded toward it, who yet should be vniustly cast away. What thē? let that be set for the marke before our eyes, to which alone all our endeouour may be directed. Let that be appointed the gole for vs to runne and trauaile vnto. For it is not lawfull for thee so to make partition with God, to take vpon thee part of these thinges that are commaunded thee in his word, and to leaue part at thine owne choise. For first of all he euery where commendeth integritie as the chiefe part of worshipping him: by which word he meaneth a pure simplicitie of mind that is without all deceitful colour & faining: against which a double heart is set as cōtrarie: as if it should be said, that the beginning of liuing vprightly is spirituall, when the inward affection of the mind is without faining dedicate to God to obserue holinesse & righteousnes. But because no man in this earthly prison of the body hath so great strength to hast with such freshnesse of running, as he perfectly ought to do, and the greater number are so feble, that with staggering and haltinge, yea and creping vpon the ground, they auance but slowly forward: let vs euery one go according to the measure of his litle pōwer, and procede on our iourney begon. No man shall go so vntowardly, but he shall euery day get some ground, though it be but litle. Therefore let vs not cesse to trauail so, that we may continually procede somewhat in the way of the Lord. And let vs not despeire vpon the sclendernesse of our going forward, for howsoeuer the successe aunswere not our desire, yet we haue not lost our labour when this day passeth yesterday: so that with pure simplicitie we loke vnto our marke, and long toward the ende of our course, not soothingly flattering our selues, nor tendely bearing with our owne euils, but with continuall endeouour traouailing to this, that we may still become better than our selues, till we atteine to goodnesse it selfe: which in deede we seke for and followe all our life long: but we shall then only atteine it, when being vnclodhed of the weakenes of the flesh, we shalbe receiued into the full fellowship thereof.

The vij. Chapter.

The summe of a Christian life: where is entreated of the forsaking of our selues.

Albeit that the lawe of the Lorde haue a most aptly well disposed order to frame a mans life, yet it semed good to the heauēly scholemaister to instruct men yet with a more exact trade to the same rule that he had set fourth in his law. And the beginning of that trade, is this: that it is the dutie of the faithfull to yelde their bodies to God a living, holy and acceptable sacrifice vnto him: and that therein standeth the true worshipping of him. Herevpon is gathered occasion to exhorthe men, that they do not applie them selues to the fashion of this world, but be transformed in renewinge of their minde, that they may proue what the will of God is. Nowe this is a great thing, that we be consecrate and dedicate to God: that we should from thence fourth thinke, speake, imagine, or do nothing but to his glorie. For the thing that is consecrate, can not be applied to vnholly vses, without great wronge done vnto him. If we be not our own, but the Lordes, it appeareth what error is to be auoided, and wherunto all the doinges of our life are to be directed. We are not our owne: therefore let neither our owne reason nor our owne will beare rule in our counselles and doinges. We are not our owne: therefore let vs not make this the ende for vs to tend vnto, to seke that which may be expediēt for vs according to the flesh. We are not our owne: therefore so much as we may, let vs forget our selues and all things that are our owne. On the other side, we are Gods: therefore let vs liue and dye to him. We are Gods: therefore let his wisdom and will governe all our doinges. We are Gods: therefore let all the partes of our life tend towarde him as their onely lawful end. Oh how much hath he profited, that hauing learned that himselfe is not his owne, hath taken frō him selfe the rule & government of himselfe to geue it to God. For as this is y most strong working pestilence to destroy men, that they obey thēselues: so it is the onely hauen of safetie, neither to knowe nor will any thing by him selfe, but onely to follow God going before him. Let this therefore be the first steppe, that man departe from himselfe, that he may apply

all

all the force of his wit to the obeying of the Lorde. Obeying I call not onely that which standeth in obedience of the worde, but that whereby the minde of man, voide from his owne sensualitie of flesh, bendeth it selfe wholly to the will of Gods spirit. Of this transformation (which Paule calleth renewing of the minde) where as it is the first entrie into life, all the Phylosophers were ignoraunt. For they make onely Reason the gouernesse of man: they thinke she onely ought to be heard: finally to her onely they geue and assigne the rule of manners. But the Christian Phylosophie biddeth her to geue place, and to yeld and be subiect to the holy Ghost: so that man now may not liue himselfe, but beare Christ liuing and reigning in him. Ephc. 4.
23.

2 Herevpon followeth also this other point, that we seeke not the thinges that be our owne, but those thinges that be according to the will of the Lord, and that make to the aduancemēt of his glory. This is also a profe of great profiting, that in a manner forgetting our selues, and altogether leauing the regarde of our selues, we trauail to employ our study to God and his commaundements. For when the Scripture biddeth vs to leaue priuate regard of our selues, it doth not onely race out of our mindes the couetousnesse of hauing, the greedy seeking for power and fauour of men: but also rooteth out ambition and all desire of worldly glorie, and other more secrete pestilences. Truly a Christian man must be so fashioned and disposed, to thinke throughout all his life, that he hath to do with God. In this sort, as he shall examine all his doings by Gods will and iudgement: so he shall reuerently direct vnto him all y earnestly bent diligence of his minde. For he that hath learned to loke vpon God in all things that he hath to do, is therewithall turned a way from all vaine thoughtes. This is that forsaking of our selues, which Christ euen from their first beginning of instruction so earnestly gaue in charge to his Disciples: which when it ones hath gotten possession in the heart leaueth no place at all, first neither for pride, nor disdainfulnes, nor vain glorious boasting; then neither for couetise, nor filthy lust, nor riotousnesse, nor deintinesse, nor for other euils that are engēdred of the loue of our selues. Contrariwise whersoeuer it reigneth not, there either most filthy vices do range without shame, or if there be any spice of vertue, it is corrupted with peruerse desire of glory. For shew me a man, if thou canst, that vnles he haue forsaken him selfe according to y cōmaundement of the Lord, will of his owne free will vse goodnesse among men. For all they that haue not ben possessed with this feling, if they haue followed vertue, they haue done it at y least for praises sake. And all y Phylosophers that euer most of all affirmed that vertue wast be desired for it selves sake, were puffed vp with so great pride, that it appeared that they desired vertue for no other thinge, but that they might haue matter to be proude vpon. But God is so nothing at all delited, neither with those gapers for the peoples breath, nor with these swelling beastes, that he pronounceth that they haue already receiued their rewarde in the world, and maketh harlottes and Publicanes nerer to the kingdome of heauen, than them. And yet we haue not throughly declared with how many and how great stoppes man is hindred from that which is right, so long as he hath nor forsaken him selfe. For it was truely said in time past, that there is a world of vices hidden in the soule of man. And thou canst finde no other remedies, but denying thy selfe, and leauing regarde of thy selfe, to bende thy minde to seeke those thinges that the Lorde requireth of thee, and to seke them therefore onely because they please him.

3 In an other place the same Paule doth more plainly, although shortly, go through all the partes of a well ordred life, saying: The grace of God that bringeth saluation vnto all men, hath appeared and teacheth vs, that we should denie all vngodlinesse, and worldly lustes, and that we should liue sobre minded, righteously and Godly in this present worlde, loking for the blessed hope and glorious appearing of the mighty God, and of our sauour Iesus Christ, which gaue him selfe for vs to redeme vs from all vnrighteousnesse, and to purge vs a peculiar people vnto him selfe feruently geuen vnto good works. For after that he hath set forth the grace of God to encorage them, to make redy the way for vs to worshippe God, he taketh away two stoppes that do most hinder vs, that is to say, Vngodlinesse, wherunto we are naturally to much enclined, and Worldly desires, which extende further. And vnder the name of vngodlinesse, he not onely meaneth superstitions, but also comprehendeth all that disagreeeth with the earnest feare of God. And worldly lustes are in effect as much as the affections of the flesh. Therefore he commaundeth vs in respect of both the tables of the lawe, to put of our owne wit, and to forsake all that our owne reason and will informeth vs. And all the doinges of our life he bringeth into three partes, sobrietie, righteousnesse, and godlinesse: of the which sobrietie without doubt signifieth as well chastitie and temperaunce, as a pure and measurably sparing vse of temporall things, and a pacient sufferance of pouertie. Righteousnesse conteineth all the duties of equitie, to geue every man his owne. The thirde is Godlinesse, that seuereth vs from the defilinges of the world, & with true holinesse joineth vs to God. These things, when they be knit together with an vnseparable knot, make a full perfect-

perfection. But for as much as nothing is more hard, than forsaking the reason of the flesh, yea subduinge and renouncing her desires, to geue our selues to God and our brethren, and to studie for an angelike life in the filthy state of this earth: therefore Paule, to loose our mindes from all snares, calleth vs back to the hope of blessed immortalitie, admonishing vs not to striue in vaine: because as Christ hath ones appeared the redemer, so at his last comming, he shall shew the frute of the saluation that he hath purchaced. And thus he driueth away the enticementes that blinde vs, and make vs not to aspire as we ought to the heauenly glorie: yea and he teacheth that we must trauail as men being from home in this worlde, that the heauenly inheritance be not lost or fall away from vs.

4 Nowe in these wordes we perceiue; that the forsaking of our selues hath partly respect to men, and partly, yea chiefly to God. For where as the scripture biddeth vs so to behaue our selues with men, that we preferre them before vs in honour, that we faithfully employ our selues wholly to procure their commodities: therefore it greueth such commaundements as our minde is not able to receiue, but first being made voide of naturall sense. For (with such blindenesse we runne all into loue of our selues) euery man thinketh him selfe to haue a iust cause to aduance him selfe, and to despise all other in comparison of him selfe. If God haue geuen vs any good gift, by and by bearing our selues bold therof we list vp our courage, & not only swel, but in a maner burst with pride. The vices wherewith we abound, we do both diligently hide from other, and to our selues we flatteringly faine them light and slender, and sometime embrace them for vertues. And if the same good giftes, which we praise in our selues, or better do appeare in other, least we shoulde be compelled to geue place to them, we do with our enuiousnesse deface them and finde fault with them. If there be any faultes in them, we are not contented seuerely and sharpely to marke it, but we also odiously amplifie it. Herevpon groweth that insolence, that euery one of vs, as though he were priuiledged from the common estate, would be hier than the rest, and carelessly and proudly set light by euery man, or despise them as inferiours. The poore yeld to the rich, base people to gentlemen, seruantes to their maisters, vnlearned to the learned: but there is no man that doth not nourishe within himselfe some opinion of excellencie. So euery man in flattering himselfe, beareth a certaine kingdome in his brest. For presumptuously taking vpon them somewhat whereby to please themselues, they iudge vpon the wittes and manners of other menne. But if they come to contention, there bur-steth out their poison. For many do make a shewe of great mekenes, so longe as they finde all things gentle and louely: but howe many a one is there that kepeth that continuall course of modestie, when he is pricked and stirred to anger? And there is no remedie hereof, but that the most hurtfull pestilence of loue, of soueraingtie and selfe loue be rooted out of the bottome of their heartes, as it is rooted out by the doctrine of the Scripture. For there we are so taught, that we must remember that the good giftes that God hath geuen vs, are not our owne good things, but the free giftes of God, whereof if any be proude, they bewraye their owne vnthankfulnessse. Who maketh thee to excell? Paule saith, if thou hast receiued all things, why dost thou boast as if they were not geuen thee? Then, that we must with continuall reknowledging of our faultes, call our selues back to humilitie. So shall there remaine in vs nothing to be proude vpon, but there shalbe much matter to abace our selues. Againe, we are commaunded, whatsoeuer giftes of God we see in other men, so to reuerence and esteeme those gifts, that we also honour those menne in whom they be. For it were a great lewdnes for vs, to take from them that honour, the God hath vouchsafed to geue them. As for their faults, we are taught to winke at them, not to cherish them with flattering, but that we should not by reason of those faultes triumphe against them, to whome we ought to beare good will and honour. So shall it come to passe, that with what man so euer we haue to do, we shall behaue our selues not onely temperatly and modestly, but also gently and frendly. As a man shall neuer come any other way to true mekenesse, but if he haue a heart endued with abacing of himselfe, and reuerencing of other.

5 Nowe howe hard is it, for thee to do thy dutie in seeking the profit of thy neighbour? Thou shalt herin labour in vaine, vnlesse thou depart from regard of thy selfe, and in a manner put of thy selfe. For howe canst thou performe these things that Paule teacheth to be the workes of charitie, vnlesse thou forsake thy selfe, to geue thy selfe wholly to other? Charitie (saith he) is patient and gentle, not proude, not disdainfull, enuieth not, swelleth not, seeketh not her owne, is not angry, &c. If this one thing be required, that we seke not the things that are our owne, we shall do no small violence to nature, which so bendeth vs to the onely loue of our selues, that it doth not easily suffer vs negligently to passe ouer our selues & our owne things, to watch for other mens commodities, yea to depart with our owne right to resigne it to an other. But the Scripture, to leade vs thether as it were by the hand, warneth vs that what so euer gracious giftes

we obtaine of the Lorde, they are committed vnto vs vpon this condition, that they should be bestowed to the common benefit of the Church: and that therefore the true vse of all Gods graces is a liberall and bountifull communicating of them to other. There can be no certaine rule, nor more forceable exhortatiō could be deuised for the kepinge of the same, than when we be taught that all the good giftes that we haue, are things of God deliuered, committed to our trust vpon this condition, that they shoulde be disposed to the benefit of our neighbours. But the Scripture goeth yet further, when it compareth them to the powers wherewith the members of mans body are endued. No mēber hath his power for himself, nor applieth it to his priuate vse: but poureth it abrode into the other membres of the same body, and taketh no profit therof, but such as procedeth from the common commoditie of the whole body. So whatsoeuer a godly man is able to do, he ought to be able to do it for his brethren, in prouidinge none otherwise priuately for himselfe, but so that his minde be bent to the common edification of the Church. Let this therefore be our order for kindnesse and doing good: that whatsoeuer God hath bestowed vpon vs, whereby we may helpe our neighbour, we are the Bailies thereof, and bound to render accompt of the disposing of it. And that the onely right disposing is that which is tried by the rule of loue. So shall it come to passe, that we shall alway not only ioine the trauail for other mens commoditie with the care of our owne profit, but also set it before the care of our owne. And that we should not happen to be ignorant that this is the true lawe of disposing all the giftes that we receiue of God, he hath in the olde time set the same lawe euen in the smalest giftes of his liberalitie. For he cō-maunded the first frutes of corne to be offred vnto him, by which the people might testifie that it was vnlawfull for them to take any frute of the goods that were not first consecrate to him. If the giftes of God be so onely then sanctified vnto vs, when we haue with our owne hande dedicate them to the authour thereof, it is euident that it is an vntrue abuse thereof that doth not fauour of such dedicatiō. But it shalbe vaine for thee to go about to enriche the Lorde with communicating to him of thy things. Therefore sith thy liberalitie can not extende vnto him, as the Prophet saith, thou must vse it toward his saintes that are in earth. Therefore almes are compared to holy oblations, that they may now be correspondent to these of the lawe.

6 But, y we should not be wery w̄ doing good (which otherwise must needs come quickly to passe) that other thing must be adioined

Cap. 7. Of the maner how to receiue

Cor. 3. 4. which the Apostle speaketh of, that charitie is patient and not moued to anger. The Lorde commaundeth to do good to all vniuersally, of whom a great part are most vnworthy, if they be considered by their owne deseruing. But here y^e Scripture helpeth with a very good meane, when it teacheth that we must not haue respect what men deserue of themselves, but that the image of God is to be considered in all men, to which we owe all honour and loue. But the same is most diligently to be marked in them of the householde of faith, in so much as it is in them renewed and restored by the Spirite of Christ. Therefore whatsoeuer man thou light vpon, that needeth thy helpe, thou hast no cause to withdraw thy selfe from doing him good. If thou say that he is a stranger: but the Lorde hath geuen him a marke, that ought to be familiar vnto thee, by the reasoⁿ that he forbiddeth thee to despise thine owne flesh. If thou say that he is base and nought worth: but the Lord sheweth him to be such a one, to whom he hath vouchsafed to geue the beautie of his image. If thou say that thou owest him nothing for any thing that he hath done for thee: but God hath set him as it were in his place, in respect of whom, thou knowest so many and so great benefites wherewith he hath bound thee vnto him. If thou say that he is vnworthy that thou shouldest labour any thing at all for his sake: but the image of God whereby he is commended to thee, is worthy that thou shouldest geue thy selfe & al that thou hast vnto it. But if he haue not only deserued no good at thy hande, but also prouoked thee with wrongs and euell doings: euen this is no iuste cause why thou shouldest cesse both to loue him and to do for him the dutifull workes of loue. Thou wilt say, he hath far otherwise deserued of me. But what hath the Lorde deserued? Which when he commaundeth thee to forgeue all wherein he hath offended thee, truely he willethe the same to be imputed to himselfe. Truely, this is that only way to come to that which is viterly against the nature of man, much more is it hard for man. I meane, to loue them that hate vs, to recompense euell with doinge good, to render blessinges for reproches: if we remember that we must not consider the malice of men, but loke vpon the image of God in them, which defacing and blotting out their faultes, doeth with the beautie and dignitie of it selfe allure vs to embrace it.

Luc. 17. 3
Matt. 5. 44. 7 Therefore this Mortification shall then onely take place in vs, when we performe the duties of charitie. But it is not he that performeth them, that onely doeth all the dutifull workes of charitie, although he leaue none of them vndone, but he that doth them of a sincere affection of loue. For it may happen, that a man may fully performe forme to all menne all that he oweth, so much as concerneth outward duties: and yet he may be far from the true performing of it. For you may see some that would seeme very liberall, which yet do geue nothing but either with pride of loke, or with churlishnesse of wordes they vpbraide it. And we be come to such wretchednesse in this vnhappy worlde, that almost no almes are geuen of any menne, or at least of the most parte of men, without reproching. Which peruersnesse should not haue bene tolerable among the very heathen. For of Christians is somewhat more required than to shew a cherefulness in countenance, and make their doinges louely with gentleness of wordes. First they must take vpon them the personage of him whom they see to neede their helpe, and then so pitie their case, as if themselues did fele and suffer it: so that they may bee caried with felinge of mercie and gentlenesse euen as they would be to helpe themselues. He that shall come so minded to helpe his brethren, will not onely not defile his doinges with any arrogante or vpbraydinge, but also neither will despise his brother to whom he doth good as one needing his helpe, nor treade him vnder foote as one bounde vnto him: no more than we vse to reproch a sicke member, for easing whereof the whole body laboreth, or to thinke it specially bounde to the other members, bycause it hath drawen more helpe vnto it than it hath recompensed. For it is thought that the common enterpartning of duties betwene members of one body, hath no free kinde of gifte, but rather that it is a payement of that which being due by the lawe of nature it were monstrous to denie. And by this reason it shall followe, that he may not thinke himselfe discharged that hath performed one kinde of duetie, as it is commonly vsed, that when a riche manne hath geuen any thinge of his owne, he leaueth other charges to other men, as not belonging to him. But rather euery manne shall thinke thus with himselfe, that he is altogether detter to his neighbours, & that he must determine none other ende of vsing his liberalitie, but when abilitie faileth, which how large so euer it be, must be measured by the rule of charitie.

8 Now let vs more fully declare the principall parte of forsaking our selues, which we said to haue respect to God. We haue said much of it already, which it were superfluous to rehearse againe: it shalbe sufficiēt to entreate of it so far as it frameth vs to quietnesse of minde and sufferance. First therefore in seking the commoditie or quietnesse of this present life, the Scripture calleth vs hereunto, that resigning vs and our thinges to the Lords will, we should yeld vnto him the affectiōs of our heart to be tamed and subdued. To couet wealth and honors, to compasse authoritie, to heape vp riches, to gather together all such follies as serue for royaltie and pompe, our lust is outragious, and our gredinesse infinite. On the other side of pouerty, ignobilitie, and base estate, we haue a maruellous feare and maruellous hatred, that moue vs to trauaile by all meanes to eschue them. Hereby a man may see, how vnquiet a minde they haue, how many shifts they attempt, with what studies they wery their life, that frame their life after their owne deuise: to attaine those things that their affection of ambition or couetousnesse requireth, and on the other side to escape pouertie and basenesse. Therefore the godly must kepe this way, that they be not entangled with such snares. First let them not either desire, or hope for, or thinke vpon any other meane of prospering, than by the blessing of the Lorde: and therefore let them safely and boldly rest themselues vpon it. For how so euer the flesh thinke it selfe sufficient of her selfe, when she either trauaileth by her owne diligence, or endeuoreth with her owne studie, or is holpen by the fauour of men, to the attaining of honour and wealth: yet it is certaine, that all these things are nothing, and that we shall nothing preuaile with wit or trauaile, but in so much as the Lorde shall prosper both. But on the other side his onely blessing findeth a way through all stoppes, to make all things procede with vs to a ioyfull and lucky ende. Then how soeuer we may most of all obtaine any glorie or wealth without it (as we daily see the wicked to get heapes of great honours and riches) yet for as much as they vpon whom resteth the curse, do fele no parcell of felicitie, we can obtaine nothing without his blessing that shall not turne vs to euell. And it is not at all to be coueted, that maketh men more miserable.

9 Therefore if we beleue that all the meane of prosperous successe and such as is to be wished, consisteth in the onely blessing of God, which being absent, all kindes of miserie and calamitie must happen vnto vs: this remaineth also, that we do not gredyly endeuour to wealth and honours standing vpon our owne finesse of wit or diligence, nor leaning to the fauour of men, nor trusting vpon a vaine imagination of fortune, but that we alway looke vnto the Lorde, to be led by his guiding to what so euer lot he hath prouided. So first it shall come to passe, that we shall not violently rush to the catching of riches and inuading of honours, by wronge, by guile and euell crafty meanes, or extortion with doing iniury to our neighbours, but shall onely followe those fortunes that may not leade vs from innocence. For who may hope for the helpe of Gods blessing among fraudes, extortions, and other suttile meanes of wickednesse?

For as Gods blessing followeth noman but him that thinketh purely, and doth rightly, so it calleth back all them of whom it is desired, from crooked thoughtes, and corrupt doinges. Then we shalbe bridled that we burne not with inmeasurable desire of growing rich, nor ambitiously gape for honours. For with what face may a man trust to be holpen of God, to obreine those thinges that he desireth against his worde? For God forbidde that God shoulde geue the helpe of his blessing to that which he curseth with his owne mouth. Last of all, if it succede not according to our wish and hope, yet we shalbe restrained from impatience, and from cursing our estate what soeuer it be: bycause we know that that is to murmur against God, at whose will richesse and pouertie, basenesse and honours are disposed. Brefely, he that refterh himselfe in such sorte as is a foresaid vpon the blessing of God, neither will by euell suttelties hunt for those thinges that menne are wont outragiously to couet, by which crafty meanes he thinketh that he shall nothing preuaile: nor if any thing happen prosperously will impute it to himselfe, and to his owne diligence endeuour or to fortune, but will assigne it to God the author. But if while other mens estates do flourish, he go but sclenderly forward, yea or slide backward, yet he will beare his ill fortune with greater quietnesse and moderatiō of minde, than a prophane manne will beare a meanely good successe, which is not altogether so good as he desired: bycause he hath a comfort wherein he may more quietly rest, than vpon the hiest toppe of wealth and authoritie: bycause he accompteth that his thinges are ordered by God as is auailable for his saluation. So we see that Dauid was minded, and yeldeth himselfe to be ruled by God, he declareth himselfe to be like to a weined childe, and that he walketh not in high things or maruellous aboue himselfe. Psa. 131.

10 And the godly mindes ought to haue that quietnesse and sufferance not onely consisting in this behalf: but also it must extend to all chaunces wherunto our present life is subiect. Therefore no man hath rightly forsaken himselfe, but he hath so resigned himselfe vpon wholly to the Lorde, that he suffreth all the partes of his life to be gouerned by his will. He that is so framed in minde, what so euer happen, will neither thinke himselfe miserable, nor will with enuiousnes against God complaine of his fortune. Howe necessary this affection is, shall herby appeare, if you consider to howe many chaunces we be subiect. Diuerse kindes of diseases do trouble vs, sometime the pestilence cruelly reigneth, sometime we are sharply vexed with calamities of warre, sometime frost or haile deuouring the hope of the yere bringeth barennesse, that driueth vs to dearth: somtime our wife, parentes, children or kinsfolkes are taken away by death, our house is consumed with fier: these be the thinges at chauncing whereof men curse their life, detest the day of their birth, haue heauen and light in execration, murmure against God, and (as they be eloquent in blasphemies) accuse him of vniustice and crueltie. But a faithfull manne must euen in these chaunces beholde the mercifull kindenesse and fatherly tendernesse of God. Therefore whether he see his house destroyed, his kinsfolke slaine, yet he will not therefore cesse to praise God, but rather will turne himselfe to this thought: Yet the Grace of the Lorde that dwelleth in my house, will not leaue it desolate. Or if when his corne is blasted or bitten, or consumed with frostes, or beaten downe with haile, he see famine at hand, yet he will not despeir, nor speake hatefully of God, but will remaine in this confidence, We are yet in the Lordes protection, and shepe brought vp in his pastures: he therefore will finde vs foode euen in extremest barrenesse. Or if he bee troubled with sicknesse, euen then he will not be discouraged with bitternesse of sorrow, to burst out into impatience and quarell thus with God: but considering the righteoussnesse and lenitie in Gods correction, he will call himselfe back to patience. Finally, what so euer shall happen, because he knoweth it ordeined by the hand of God, he will take it with a well pleased and thankefull minde, leaſt he should stubbornly resist his authoritie, into whose power he hath yelded himselfe and all his. Therefore let that foolish and most miserable comfort of the Heathen be far from a Christian mans heart, which to strengthen their mindes against aduersities, did impute the same to fortune, with whom they compted it foolish to be angry, because she was blinde and vnaduised, that blindly wounded both the deseruing and vnderferuing. For contrariwise this is the rule of godlinesse, that the onely hand of God is the iudge and gouernes of both fortunes, and that it runneth not forward with vnaduised sodeine rage, but with most orderly iustice dealeth among vs both good thinges and euell.

The viij. Chapter.

Of the bearinge of the crosse, which is a part of the forsaking of our selues.

Mat. 16.
BVt a Godly minde must yet climbe vp hier, euen to that wherunto Christ calleth his disciples, that euery one take vp his crosse. For all whom the Lorde hath chosen and vouchesauced to receiue into his companie, must prepare themselues to a hard, hard, trauailesome and vnquiete life, and full of many and diuerse kindes of incommodities. So it is the will of the heauenly father, to exercise them in such sorte, that he may haue a true prooffe of them that be his. Beginning at Christ, his first begotten sonne, he proceedeth with this order toward all his children. For whereas Christ was the best beloued sonne about the rest, & in whom the fathers minde was fully pleased, yet we see howe he was not tenderly and deintily handeled: so that it may be truely sayd, that he was not only exercised with a perpetuall crosse so long as he dwelled in earth, but that all his life was nothing else but a kinde of continuall crosse. The Apostle sheweth the cause thereof to be, that it behoued that he should learne obedience by those things that he suffred. Why then should we priuilege our selues from that estate, wherunto it behoued Christ our head to be subiect, specially sith he became subiect thereunto for our cause, to shew vs an example of paciēce in himselfe? Therefore the Apostle saith that this is the appointed end of al y childre of God, to be fashioned like vnto him. Whereupon also in hard & sharp chaunces, which are reckened aduersities and euils, ariseth a great comfort vnto vs, that we communicate with the suffrings of Christ: that as he entred out of a maze of all troubles into the heauenly glory, so we may be diuerse tribulations be brought into the same glory. For so saith Paul himselfe, that when we learne the communicatinge of his afflictions, we do also conceiue the power of his resurrection: & whē we are fashioned like vnto his death, we are so prepared to the fellowship of his glorious risinge againe. Howe much may this auaille to aswage all the painefulnesse of the crosse, that the more we are afflicted with aduersities, so much the more sure is our fellowshipe with Christ confirmed? by communicating whereof, our suffrings are not only made blessed vnto vs, but also do much help vs to the furtherāce of our saluation.

2 Beside that, our Lorde had no neede to take vpon him to beare the crosse, but to testifie & proue his obedience to his father: but we for diuerse causes, haue neede to lead our life vnder a cōtinual crosse. First (as we be naturally bent to attribute all thinges to our flesh) vnlesse our weakenes be shewed vs as it were before our eyes, we do easily esteeme our owne strength aboue due measure, & dout not that whatsoeuer happen, it will continue vnbroken and vnouercome against all harde assaultes. Whereby we are caried into a foolishhe and vaine confidence of flesh, and then trusting thereupon, we stubbornly waxe proud against God himselfe, as though our own powers without his grace did suffice vs. This arrogancy he can no way better beate downe, than when he proueth vnto vs by experience, not only how feeble, but also how fraile we be. Therefore he afflicteth vs either with shame, or pouerty, or losse of children, or sicknesse, or other calamities, which we beinge vnable to beare in respect of our selues, do by and by sinke downe vnder them. Beinge so humbled we learne to call vpon his strength, which only maketh vs to stande vp-right vnder the heauy burden of afflictions. Yea the most holy, howe wel soeuer they know that they stand by the grace of God & not by their owne force, yet are too much assured of their owne strength & constancy, vnles by the triall of the crosse, he bring them into a more inward knowledge of themselues. The slouthfulnesse crept into Dauid: I sayd in my rest, I shall neuer be moted, Lorde, thou hadst stablished in thy good pleasure a strength to my hil, thou hiddest away thy face, I was stricken. For he confesseth that with sluggishnesse in prosperity his senses were dulled, that not regardinge the grace of God, vpon which he should haue hanged, he leaned vnto himselfe, to promise himselfe perpetuall continuance. If this chaunced to so great a Prophet: which of vs ought not to be fearefull, that we may be heedfull? Therefore whereas in prosperity they flatter themselues with opinion of a greater constancy and patience, when they are once humbled with aduersity, they learne that their former opinion was but hypocrisie. The faithfull (I say) beinge admonished by such examples of their diseases, do thereby profit to humility, that beinge vnclouted of the wrongfull confidence of the flesh, they may resorte to y^e grace of God. And where they are once come to his grace, they feele the presence of Gods strength, wherein is abundantly sufficient succour for them.

3 And this is it that Paul teacheth, that by troubles is engendred patience, by patience prooue. For whereas God hath promised y^e faithful that he will be present with thē in troubles, they feele the same to be true, when they stand patiently, being vpholdē by his hand, which by their owne strength they were not able to do. Patience therefore bringeth a prooue by experience to y^e holy ones, that God when nede requireth, wil in dede performe the help that he hath promised. And thereby also their hope is confirmed: forasmuch as it were too much vnthankfulnesse not to looke for in time to come, the same trueth of God that they had already by experience proued to be constant and sure. We see nowe howe many good thinges do come vnto vs in one knot by the crosse. For, ouerthrowing the opinion that we falsely presume of our owne strength, & disclosing our hypocrisie that deliteth vs, it shaketh away the hurtfull confidence of the flesh, and teacheth vs being so humbled, to rest vpon God only, by which it commeth to passe, that we neither be oppressed nor falldowne. And after victory followeth hope, insomuch as the Lord in performing that which he hath promised, stablisheth the credit of his trueth for time to come, Truely, although there were no moe reasons but these, it appeareth how much the exercise of y^e crosse is necessary for vs. For it is a matter of no small importace, to haue the blinde loue of thy selfe wiped away, that thou maist well know thine owne weakenes. To fele thine owne weakenesse, that thou maiest learne to distrust thy selfe: to distrust thy selfe, that thou maist remoue thy confidence from thy selfe vnto God: to rest with confidence of heart vpon God, that being vpholden by his help, thou maist cōtinue vnouercome to the last end: to stande fast by his grace, that thou maist vnderstand that he is true in his promises: to know by prooffe the truth of his promises, that thy hope may be strengthened therby.

4 The Lord hath also an other ende of afflictinge his, to trie their patience, and instruct vs to obedience. Not that they can vse any obediēce toward him, other than the same that he giueth them: but so it pleaseth him by open examples to make approued by witnesses, & to set forth the graces that he hath bestowed vpon his holy ones, that they should not lie idly hidde within them. And therefore in bringing forth into open shew the strength of suffrance and constancy, wherewith he hath furnished his seruauntes, it is sayd that he trieth their pacience. And from hense came these sayinges: that God tempted Abraham, & had prooffe of his godlinesse, by this that he refused not to offer vp in sacrifice his owne & only sonne. Therefore Peter teacheth, that our faith is so proued in troubles, as golde is tried in a fornace: And who can say that it is not expedient, that the most noble gift of pacience, which a faithfull man hath receiued of his God, should be brought forth into vse, that it may be made certainly knowen and manifest? For otherwise men will not esteeme it as it is worthy. Now if God himselfe doth rightfully whē he ministreth matter to stirre vp the vertues that he hath giuen to his faithfull, that they shoulde not lie hidden, yea lie vnprofitable and perish: then is there good reason of the afflictions of the holy ones, without which their paciēce should be nothing. I say also that by the crosse they are instructed to obedience, because they are so taught to liue not after their owne wish, but after the will of God. Truely if all thinges shoulde flowe vnto them after their owne minde, they would not know what it were to follow God. And Seneca rehearseth that this was an olde Prouerbe, when they exhorted any man to suffer aduersities, Followe God. By which they declared, that then only men truly entred vnder the yoke of God, when he yelded his hand and backe to Gods correction. Now if it be most righteous, that we should shew our selues in all things obedient to the heauēly father, then we ought not to refuse, that he should by all meanes accustom vs to yeld obedience vnto him.

5 But yet we perceiue not how necessary this obedience is for vs, vnlesse we do also consider, howe wanton our flesh is to shake of the yoke of God, so soone as it hath bin but a litle while deintily and tenderly handeled. The same happeneth vnto it, that chaunceth to stubborne horses, which if they be a fewe dayes pampred idley, they can not afterward for fearenesse be tamed, neither do know their rider, to whose gouernment they somewhat before obeyed. And this is continual in vs that God cōplaineth to haue bin in the people of Israell, that beinge well fed and couered with fatnesse, we kicke against him that fed and nourished vs. The liberality of God should in dede haue allured vs to consider and loue his goodnesse, but forasmuch as our euill nature is such, that we are alway corrupted with his tender v-sage, it is more than necessary for vs, to be restrayned by some discipline, that we runne not outragiously into such a stubborne wantonnesse. So that we should not grow fierce with vnmeasurable abundance of riches, that we should not waxe proud being lifted vp with honors, that we should not become insolent, being puffed vp with other good gifts, either of the soule, body or fortune, the lord himself, as he foreseeeth it to be expedient, preuenteth it, and with the remedy of the crosse subdueth & bridleth the fearenesse of our flesh, & that diuerse wayes, so much as is healthfull for euery man. For all are not a like sicke of all one diseases, or do a like neede of hard healing. And thereupon is to be scene howe some are exercised with one kinde of crosse, and some with an other. But whereas the heauenly Phisician handeleth some more gently, & purgeth some with sharper remedies, when he meaneth to prouide for the health of all: Yet he leaueth none free or vntouched, because he knoweth all without exception to be diseased.

6 Moreouer, the most mercifull father needeth not only to preuent our weakenesse, but many times to correct our passed offences. Therefore so oft as we be afflicted, the remembrance of our forepassed life ought by and by to entre into our minde: so without dout we shall finde that we haue done somewhat worthy of chastisement. Yet we ought not chiefly to grounde our exhortation to patience vpon the acknowledging of sinne. For the Scripture ministreth vs a farre better consideration, when it sayth, that the Lord correcteth vs with aduersities, uerities, that we should not be damned with this world. Therefore we ought euen in the very sharpenes of tribulatiōs to acknowledge the kindenes & goodnes of our father toward vs, forasmuch as euen then he ceaseth not to further our saluation. For he doth afflict, not to destroy or kill vs, but rather to deliuer vs from the damnation of the world. That thought shall leade vs to that, which the Scripture teacheth in an other place: My sonne, refuse not y^e Lords correctiō, nor Prou. 11. be weary when thou shalt be rebuked of him. For whom the Lord lo-ueth, he correcteth, and embraceth him as a father doth his childe.

 When we know his rod to be the rod of a father, is it not our duety rather to shewe our selues obedient children and willinge to learne, than with obstinacy to do like desperate men, that are hardned with euill doinges? The Lord leseth vs, vnlesse he call vs backe by correction when we are fallen away from him: so that the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues rightly sayth that we are bastards, and not chil- Heb. 12. dren if we be out of correction. Therefore we are most froward, if we 8. can not suffer him when he declareth his good will and the care that he hath for our saluation. This the Scripture teacheth to be the difference betwene the vnbeleuers and the faithfull, that the vnbeleuers as the bondslaves of a rooted and hardned wickednes, are made the worse & more obstinate with whipping: the faithful, like children hauing an honest freedome of nature, do thereby profit to repentance.
 Now must thou choose of whether number thou wilt be. But because I haue spoken of this matter in an other place, I am content to touch it briefly, and so will make an end.

7 Morouer it is a singular comfort, whē we suffer persecution for righteousnes. For then we ought to thinke, how great an honor God vouchsafeth to graunt vs, that he so garnisheth vs with the peculiar marke of his souldiours. I meane that they suffer persecution for righteousnes, not only that suffer for defense of the Gospell, but also that are troubled for any defense of righteousnes. Whether therefore in maintaineinge the trueth of God against the lies of Sathan, or in taking in hande the defense of good men and innocentes against the wrongs of the wicked; we be driuen to runne into the displeasure & hatred of the worlde, whereby our life or goods, or estimation may come in daunger: let it not be grieuous or lothsome vnto vs to employ our selues for God, or let vs not thinke our selues miserable in those things in which he hath with his owne mouth pronounced vs blessed. Pouerty in dede, if it be considered in it selfe, is miserable: Matt. 5 likewise banishment, contemptuous estate, prisonment, shame: 10. death is the vttermost of all calamities. But when the fauour of our God breatheth vpon vs, there is none of all these things, but it turneth to our felicity. Therefore let vs rather be content with the testimony of Christ, than with the false estimation of the flesh. So shall it come to passe, that we shall reioise as the Apostles did, whē God shall accompt vs worthy to suffer reproch for his name. For why? If we being innocent, & knowinge our selues cleare in our conscience, are by the naughty dealinge of wicked men spoiled of our goods: we are indeede brought to pouerty therby among mē, but so richesse do truely grow vnto vs in heauen before God. If we be thrust out of our houses, we are the more inwardly receiued into the household of God. If we be vexed & despised, we take so much the deeper rootes in Christ. If we be noted with reproches & shame, we are insomuch the more honorable place in the kingdom of God. If we be slaine, so is the entry made open for vs vnto blessed life. Let vs be ashamed to esteeme lesse these things, vpon which the Lord hath set so greate a price, thā shadowish and fickle enticing pleasures of present life.

8 Sith therefore the Scripture doth with these & like admonitiōs giue sufficient comfort for the shames or calamities, that we suffer for defense of righteousnes, we are too much vnthankfull if we do not gladly and cherefully receiue them at the Loods hande: specially sith this is the kinde of crosse, most properly belonginge to the faithfull, whereby Christ will be glorified in vs. As also Peter teacheth. But it is more grieuous to gentle natures to suffer shame than a hundred deaths: therefore Paul expressly admonisheth that we shall not only suffer persecutions, but also reproches, because we trust in the liuinge God. As in an other place he teacheth vs after his example to walke through sclaunder and good reporte. Yet there is not required of vs such a cherefulness as may take away all feeling of bitternes and sorrow, or else the patience of the holy ones in the crosse were no paciēce, vnles they should be both tormēted with sorrow & vexed with griefe. If there were no hardines in pouerty, no paine in sickenes, no griefe in shame, no horrour in death, what valiantnes or temperance were it to beare thē indifferently? But when euery one of these doth with the naturall bitternes therof bite the hearts of vs all, herin doth the valiantnes of a faithful man shew it selfe, if being assayed with the feeling of such bitternes, how grieuously soeuer he be troubled with it, yet with valiantly resisting he ouercommeth it, his patience vttereth it selfe herein, if being sharply prouoked, he is yet so bridled with the feare of God, that he bursteth not out into any distemper. His cherefulness appeareth herin, if being wounded with sadnes and sorrow, he resteth vpon the spiritual comfort of God.

9 This conflict, which the faithfull do sustaine against the natural feeling of sorrow, while they study for patience & temperance, Paul hath very well described in these words. We are put to distresse in all things, but we are not made sorrowfull: we labour, but we are not left destitute: we suffer persecution, but we are not forsaken in it: we are thrown downe, but we perish not. You see how to beare the crosse patiently, is not to be altogether astonished and without all feeling of sorrowe. As the Stoikes in olde time did foolishly describe a valiant harted man, to be such a one as putting of al nature of man, was a like moued in prosperity and in aduersity, in sorrowfull and ioyfull state, yea such a one as like a stone was moued with nothings. And what haue they profited with this hie wisdom? Forsooth they haue painted out such an image of wisdom as neuer was found, & neuer can hereafter be amonge men: But rather while they coueted to haue to exact and precise a patience, they haue taken away all the vse of patience out of mans life. And at this day also among Christians there are new Stoikes, that reckon it a fault not only to grone and wepe, but also to be sad and carefull. But these strange conclusions do commonly proceede from idle men, which busying themselues rather in speculation than doing, can do nothing but brede vs such new founde doctrines. But we haue nothings to do with that stony Philosophie, which our maister and Lord hath condemned not only by his word but also by his example. For he mourned and wept both at his owne and other mens aduersities. The worlde (sayth he) shall reioyse, but you shall mourne and wepe. And because no man should finde fault therewith, by his open proclamation, he hath pronounced them blessed that mourne. And no maruell. For if all weping be blamed, what shall we iudge of y^e Lord himselfe, out of whose body dropped bloody teares? If euery feare be noted of infidelity, what shall we iudge of that quaking feare, wherwith we read that he was not scenderly stricken. If all sadnes be misliked, how shall we like this, that he confesseth his soule to be sad euen to the death?

10 This I thought good to speake to this end, to call godly mindes from despeire: that they should not therefore altogether forsake the study of patience, because they can not put of the natural affection of sorrow: which must needs happen to them, that make of patience a senselesse dulnes, and of a valiant and constant man, a stocke. For the Scripture giueth to the holy ones the praise of patience, when they are so troubled with hardnes of aduersities, that yet they be not overcome nor thrown downe with it: when they be so pricked with bitterness, that they be also delited with spirituall ioy: when they be so distressed with griefe, that yet they receiue courage againe beinge cheared with the comfort of God. Yet in the meane time that repugnancy abideth still in their heartes, that naturall sense eschueth and dredeth those thinges that it knoweth to be against it: but the affection of godlines trauaileth euen through all those difficulties to the obeying of Gods wil. This repugnancy, the Lord expressed when he sayd thus to Peter: When thou wast yong thou didst gird thy selfe & didst walke whether thou wouldest: But when thou art old, another shall girde thee and leade thee whether thou shalt not be willinge. Neither is it likely that Peter, when the time came that he must glorifie God by his death, was drawn vnwillingly and resistinge vnto it. Else his martyrdome should haue but small praise. But howsoeuer he did with great cherefulness of heart obey the ordinance of God, yet because he had not put of the nature of mā, he was doubly strained with two sortes of wils. For when he did by himselfe consider the bloudy death that he shoulde suffer, beinge stricken with horroure thereof, he would gladly haue escaped it. On the other side, when it came in his minde, that he was called vnto it by the commaundement of God, then conqueringe and treadinge downe feare, he gladly, yea and cherefully tooke it vpon him. This therefore we must endeavour if we will be the Disciples of Christ, that our mindes be inwardly filled with so great a reuerence & obedience to God, as may tame and subdue to his ordinaunce all contrary affections. So shall it come to passe, that with whatsoever kinde of crosse we be vexed, eue in the greatest anguishes of minde, we shall constantly kepe patience. For aduersities shall haue their sharpnes, wherwith we shalbe bitten: so when we are afflicted with sickenes, we shal both grone and be disquieted and desire health: so beinge pressed with pouerty, we shalbe pricked with the stings of carefulness and sorrow: so shall we be stricken with griefe of shame, contempt and iniury: so shall we yelde due tears to nature at the buriall of our friendes: but this alway shalbe the conclusion, But the Lorde willed so. Therefore let vs follow his will. Yea euen in the midst of the prickings of sorow, in the midst of mourning and teares, this thought must needes come betwene, to encline our heart to take cherefully the very same thinges, by reason whereof it is so moued.

11 But forasmuch as we haue taken the chiefe cause of bearinge the crosse, out of the consideration of the will of God, we must in few wordes define what difference is betwene Philosophicall & Christian patience. Truely very few of the Philosophers climbed to so hie a reason, to vnderstand that the hande of God doth exercise vs by affli-

ctions, & to thinke that God is in this behalfe to be obeyed. But they bring no other reason, but because we must so do of necessity. What is this else, but to say that thou must yeelde vnto God, because thou shalt traueil in vaine to wraastle against him? For if we obey God, only because we so must of necessity: thē if we might escape, we would cesse to obey. But the Scripture biddeth vs to consider a farre other thing in the will of God, that is to say, first iustice and equity, then the care of our saluation. These therefore be the Christian exhortations to patience, whether pouerty, or banishment, or prisonment, or shame, or sicknesse, or losse of parentes, or children, or any other like thing do grieue vs, we must thinke that none of these things doth happen, but by the will and prouidence of God, and that he doth nothing but by most iust order: For why? do not our innumerable and daily offenses deserue to be chastised more sharply, & with more grieuous correction, than such as the mercifull kindnesse of God layeth vpon vs? Is it not most great equity, that our flesh be tamed, & as it were made acquainted with the yoke, that she do not wantonly growe wilde accordinge to her nature? Is not the righteousnesse and trueth of God worthy, that we should take paine for it? But if there appeare an vndoubted righteousnes in our afflictions, we can not without vnrighteousnes either murmure or wraastle against it. We heare not now that colde songe: We must giue place, because we so must of necessity, but we heare a liuely lesſō & full of effectualnes: We must obey, because it is vnlawfull to resist: we must suffer patiently, because impatience is a stubbornesse against the righteousnesse of God. But now, because that thinge only is worthy to be loued of vs, which we know to be to our safety and benefit, the good father doth this way also comfort vs, when he affirmeth that euen in this that he afflicteth vs with the crosse, he prouideth for our safety. But if it be certaine that troubles are healthfull for vs, why should we not receiue them with a thankfull and well pleased minde? Therefore in patiently suffering them, we do not forceably yeelde to necessitie, but quietly agre to our owne benefite. These thoughtes (I say) do make that how much our mindes are griued in the crosse with naturall feelinge of bitterness, so much they be cheared with spirituall gladnesse. Whereupon also followeth thankesgiuinge, which can not be without ioy. But if the praise of the Lord and thankesgiuing proceedeth of nothing but of a cherefull and ioyfull heart, and there is nothing that ought to interrupt the same praising of God and thankesgiuing in vs: hereby appeareth howe necessary it is that the bitterness of the crosse be tempered with spirituall ioy.

BVt with whatsoeuer kinde of trouble we be distressed, we must alway looke to this ende, to vse our selues to the contempt of this present life, and thereby be stirred to the meditation of the life to come. For, because God knoweth well howe much we be by nature enclined to the beastly loue of this worlde, he vseth a most fitte meane to draw vs backe, and to shake of our sluggishnesse, that we shoulde not sticke too fast in that loue. There is none of vs that desireth not to seeme to aspire & endeuour all their life-long to heavenly immortality. For we are ashamed to excel brute beastes in nothinge: whose state shoulde be nothinge inferiour to ours, vnlesse there remayne to vs a hope of eternity after death. But if you examine the deuises, studies and doinges of euery manne, you shall finde nothing therein but earth. Hereupon groweth that senselesnesse, that our minde beinge daseled with vaine glisteringe of richesse, power and honors, is so dulled that it can not see farre. Our heart also beinge possessed with couetousnesse, ambition and lust, is so weyed downe, that it can not rise vp higher. Finally all our soule entangled with enticementes of the flesh, seeketh her felicity in earth. The Lord, to remedy this euill, doth with continuall examples of miseryes teach this of the vanity of this present life. Therefore that they shoulde not promise themselues in this life a sounde and quiet peace, he suffereth them to be many times disquieted and troubled either with warres, or vprores, or robberies, or other iniuries. That they shoulde not with too much greedinesse, gape for fraile and transitory richesse, or rest in the richesse that they already possesse, sometime with banishment, sometime with barrennesse of the earth, sometime with fire, sometime by other meanes he bringeth them to poerty, or at least holdeth them in measure. That they should not with too much ease take pleasure in the benefites of mariage, he either maketh them to be vexed with the frowardnes of their wiues, or plucketh them downe with ill children, or punisheth them with want of issue. But if in all these thinges he tenderly beareth with them, yet least they should either swell with foolish glory, or immeasurably reioyse with vaine confidence, he doth by diseases & dangers set before their eyes, howe vnstable, and vanishinge be all the goods that are subiect to mortality. Then onely therefore we rightly profit in the discipline of the crosse when we learne that this life, when it is considered in it selfe, is vnquiet, troublesome and innumerable wayes miserable, and in no point fully blessed: & that all those that are reckoned the good things therof are vncertaine, fickle, vaine, and corrupted with many euils mixed with them. And hereupon we do determine, that here is nothing to be sought or hoped for but strife: & that when we thinke of our crowne, then we must lift vp our eyes to heauen. For thus we must beleue. That our minde is neuer truely raised to the desire and meditation of the life to come, vnlesse it haue first conceiued a contempt of this present life.

2 For betwene these two there is no meane, the earth must either become vile in our sight, or holde vs bounde with intemperate loue of it. Therefore if we haue any care of eternity, we must diligently endeouour to louse our selues from these fetters. Now because this present life hath many flattering pleasures wherewith to allure vs, a great shewe of pleasauntnesse, grace, and sweetenesse, wherewith to delite vs: it is much behoueful for vs to be now and then called away, that we be not bewitched with such allurements. For what, I pray you, woulde be done if we did here enioy a continuall concourse of good things and felicity, sith we can not with continual spurres of euils be sufficiently awaked to consider the misery thereof? Not onely the learned do know, but also the common people haue no Prouerbe more common than this, that mans life is like a smoke or shadow: and because they sawe it to be a thinge very profitable to be knowen, they haue set it out with many notable sentences. But there is nothing that we do either more negligently consider, or lesse remember. For we go about all thinges, as though we would frame to our selues an immortality in earth. If there be a corps caried to buriall, or if we walke amonge graues, then, because there is an image of death before our eyes, I graunt we do maruelously well discourse like Philosophers vpon the vanity of this life. Albeit we do not that continually, for many times all these things do nothing moue vs. But when it happeneth, our Philosophie lasteth but a while, which so soone as we turne our backes, vanisheth away, and leaueth no steppe at all of remembrance behind it: finally it passeth away as a clapping of hands vpon a stage at any pleasaunt sight. And we forgettinge not onely death, but also that we be subiect to death, as though we had neuer heard any reporte thereof, fall to a carelesse assurednesse of earthly immortality. If any man in the meane time tel vs of the Prouerb, that man is a creature of a dayes continuance, we graunt it in deede: but so heedlesly, that still the thought of euerlasting continuance resteth in our minde. Who therefore can deny, that it is a great profit to vs all, not only to be admonished in wordes, but by all the examples of experience that may be to be conuincd of the miserable estate of earthly life: forasmuch as euen whē we are conuincd, we scarcely cesse to stand amased with peruerse and foolish admiration of it, as though it contained the vttermost end of good things. But if it be necessary that God instruct vs, it is our duety likewise on our behalues to harken to him when he calleth & awaketh our dulnesse, that despising the worlde we may with all our heartes endeuour to the meditation of the life to come.

3 But let the faithful accustome themselves to such a despising of present life, as may neither engendre a hatred thereof, nor any vnthankfulness toward God. For this life, howsoeuer it is ful of infinite miseries, is yet worthily reckened among the not slender blessings of God. Therefore if we acknowledge no benefite of God in it, we are guilty of no small vnthankfulness toward God himselfe. But specially it ought to be to the faithfull a testimonie of Gods good will, forasmuch as it is wholly directed to the furtherance of their saluation. For before that he openly deliuer vnto vs the inheritance of eternall glory, his will is to shew himselfe a Father vnto vs by smaller examples: and these be the benefites that are daily bestowed vpon vs. Sith therefore this life serueth vs to vnderstande the goodnesse of God, shall we disdain it as though it had not a crumme of goodnesse in it? We must therefore put on this feelinge and affection, to reckon it amonge the giftes of goodnesse that are not to be refused. For though there wanted testimonies of Scripture, of which there are both many and most eident, very nature it selfe doth exhorte vs to giue thanks to the Lorde, for that he hath brought vs into the light of it, that he graunteth vs the vse of it, that he giueth vs all necessary succours for the preservation of it. And this is a much greater reason, if we consider that we are in it after a certaine maner prepared to the glory of the heavenly kingdome. For so the Lorde hath ordained that they which in time to come shall be crowned in heauen, must fight certaine battels in earth, that they shoulde not triumphe, till they had ouercome the hard aduentures of the battell, and obtained the victory. Then an other reason is, that we do by diuerse benefites beginne therein to taste the sweetnesse of Gods liberality, that our hope and desire should be whetted to long for the reueling thereof. Whē this is determined, that it is a gift of Gods clemency that we liue this earthly life, for which as we be bound vnto him, so we ought to be mindefull and thankful: then we shall in fit order come to consider the most miserable estate therof, to this end that we may be deliuered from too much greedinesse of it, whereunto as I haue before sayd, sayd, we are of our selues naturally enclined.

4 Nowe whatsoeuer is taken from the wrongfull desire of this life, ought to be added to the desire of a better life. I graunt in dede that they thought truely, that thought it best not to be borne, & the next, to die quickly. For what could they being destitute of the light of God and true religion, see therein but vnhappy & miserable? And they did not without reason, that mourned and wept at the birthes of their friendes, & solemnely reioysed at their burials, but they did it without profit, because beinge without the right doctrine of faith, they did not see howe that may turne to good to the godly, which is of it selfe neither blessed nor to be desired: and so they ended their iudgement with desperation. Let this therefore be the marke of the faithful in iudging of mortall life; that when they vnderstand it to be of it selfe nothing but misery, they may resort wholly the more freshly and readily to the eternal life to come. When we come to this comparison, then this present life may not onely be safely neglected, but also vtterly despised and lothed in comparison of the other. For if heauen be our contrey, what is the earth else but a place of banishment? If the departing out of the world be an entring into life, what is the world but a graue? to abide in it, what is it else but to be drowned in death? If to be deliuered from the body is to be set in perfect liberty, what is the body else but a prison? If to enioy the presence of God is the hiest summe of felicity, is it not miserable to lacke it? But til we be escaped out of the world, we wander abroade fró the Lord. Therefore if the earthly life be compared with the heauenly life, doutlesse it ought to be despised & troden vnder foote. But it is neuer to be hated, but in respect that it holdeth vs in subiection to sinne, & yet that hatred is not properly ro be layd vpon our life. But howsoeuer it be, yet we must be so moued either with wearinesse or hatred of it, that desiring the end of it, we may be also ready at the will of the Lord to abide in it: so that our wearines may be farre from al grudging & impatience. For it is like a place in battel array, wherein the Lorde hath placed vs, which we ought to kepe till he call vs away. Paule in deede lamenteth his state that he is holden bond in the bondes of the body longer thã he wished, & sigheth with feruent desire of his redéption: neuertheles to obey the commaundement of the Lord, he professed himself ready to both, because he acknowledgeth himself to owe this vnto God, to glorifie his name, either by death or life: and that it is in God to determine what is most expediét for his glory. Therefore if we must liue & die to the Lord, let vs leaue to his will the time of our life & death: but so that we be still feruent in desire of death, and be continually occupied in meditation thereof, & despise this life in comparison of the immortality to come, and wish to forsake it when it shall please the Lord because of the bondage of sinne.

5 But this is most ruous, that in stede of that desire of death, many that boast themselves to be Christians, are so afraid of it, that they tremble at every mention of it, as of a thing betokening vnluckely & vnhappy. Truly it is no maruell, if naturall sense in vs do quake for feare when we heare of the dissoluing of vs. But this is in no wise tolerable, that there be not in a Christian mans brest the light of godlines, that shoulde with greater comfort ouercome and suppress that feare, how great soeuer it be. For if we consider that this vnstedfast, faulty, corruptible, fraile withering, & rottē tabernacle of our body, is therefore dissolued, y^e it may afterward be restored again into a stedfast, perfect, vncorruptible & heavenly glory: shall not faith compell vs feruently to desire that which nature feareth? If we consider that by death we are called home out of banishment, to inhabite our contrey, yea a heavenly contrey, shal we obtaine no comfort therby? But there is nothing that desireth not to abide continually. I graunt, and therefore I affirme, that we ought to looke vnto the immortality to come, where we may attaine a stedfast state that no where appeareth in earth. For Paul doth very well teach, that the faithfull ought to go cherefully to death: not because they would be vncloded, but because they desire to be newly clothed. Shal brute beastes, yea & lifeles creatures, euen stocks & stones, knowing their present vanity, be earnestly bent to looking for the last day of the resurrectiō, that they may with the children of God be deliuered from vanity, & shal we that are endued with the light of wit, & aboue wit enlightened with the spirit of God, when it standeth vpon our being, not lift vp our mindes beyond this rottennes of earth? But it pertaineth not to my present purpose, nor to this place, to speake against this peruersnes. And in the beginning I haue already professed, that I woulde not here take vpon me the large handling of common places. I would counsel such fearefull mindes to read Cyprians booke of Mortality, vnlesse they were mete to be sent to the Philosophers, that they may beginne to be ashamed when they see the contempt of death that those do shew. But this let vs hold for certainly determined, that no man hath well profited in Christes schoole, but he that doth ioyfully looke for the day both of death & of the last resurrection. For both Paul describeth all y^e faithfull by this marke, & also it is common in the Scripture, to call vs thither as oft as it wil set forth a grouūd of perfect gladnes. Reioise (saith the Lord) & lift vp your heads, for your redemption commeth nere at hand. Is it reasonable, I pray you, that the thing which he willed to be of so great force to raise vp ioy & cherefullnes in vs, should brede nothing but sorrow & discouragemēt? If it be so, why do we stil boast of him as our Schoolemaister? Let vs therefore get a sounder mind, & howsoeuer the blinde & senselesse desire of the flesh do striue against it, let vs not dout to wish for the comming of the Lord, not only with wishing, but also with grōning & sighing, as a thing most happy of all othēr. For he shall come a redemer to vs, to draw vs out of this infinite gulfe of euils & miseries, and to leade vs into that blessed inheritance of his life and glory.

6 This is certainly true: all the nation of the faithfull, so long as they dwel in earth, must be as shepe appointed to slaughter, that they may be fashioned like Christ their head. Therefore they were in most lamentable case, vnlesse they had their minde raised vp into heauē, & surmounted all that is in the world, and passed ouer the present face of things. Contrariwise whē they haue once lifted their heades aboue all earthly thinges, although they see the wealth and honors of the wicked flourishing, if they see thē enjoyinge quiet peace, if they see thē proude in gorgiounes and sumptuousnesse of all thinges, if they see thē to flow in plentiful store of all delites, beside that if they be spoiled by their wickednesse, if they sustaine reprochful dealings at their pride, if they be robbed by their couetousnes, if they be vexed by any other outrage of theirs: they will easily vphold themselues in such aduersities. For that day shalbe before their eies, when the Lorde shall receiue his faithfull into the quiet of his kingdom, when he shal wipe all teares from their eies, when he shall clothe them with the robe of glory & gladnes, when he shall feede thē with ȳ vnspēakeable sweetness of his deinties, when he shall aduance them to the fellowship of his hie estate: finally when he shall vouchsaue to enterparten his felicity with them. But these wicked once that haue flourished in the earth, he shall throw into extreme shame, he shall change their delites into tormentes, their laughing and mirth into weping and gnashing of teeth, he shall disquiet their peace with terrible torment of conscience, he shall punish their deintinesse with vnquenchable fier, & shall put their heades in subiectiō to those godly mē, whose patience they haue abused. For this is righteousnesse (as Paule testifieth) to giue release to the miserable & to them that are vniustly afflicted, & to render affliction to the wicked that do afflict the godly, when the Lorde Iesus shal be reuealed from heauen. This truely is our onely comfort, which if it be taken away, we must of necessity either despeir, or flatteringly delite our selues with the vayne comfortes of the worlde to our owne destruction. For euen the prophet confesseth that his feete staggged, when he taried too long vpon consideringe the present prosperity of the wicked: and that he could not otherwise stande stedfast, but when he entred into the sanctuary of God, and bended his eies to the last end of the godly & the wicked. To conclude in one word, then only the crosse of Christ triumpheth in the hearts of the faithfull vpon the Deuill, flesh, sinne & the wicked, when our eyes are turned to the power of the resurrection.

The x. Chapter.

How we ought to vse this present life, and the helps thereof.

BY such introductions the Scripture doth also well informe vs what is the right vse of earthly benefites: which is a thinge not to be neglected in framing an order of life. For if we must liue, we must also vse the necessary helps of life: neither can we eschue euen those things that seeme rather to serue for delite than for necessity. Therefore we must keepe a measure, that we may vse them with a pure conscience, either for necessity or for delight. That measure the Lorde appointeth by his worde, when he teacheth that this life is to them that be his, a certaine iorney through a straunge countrey, by which they trauaile towarde the kingdome of heauen. If we must but passe through the earth, doutlesse we ought so farre to vse the good thinges of the earth, as they may rather further than hinder our iourney. Therefore Paul doth not vnprofitably counsell vs so to vse this worlde, as though we vsed it not: and to bye possessions with such a minde as they vse to be solde. But because this place is slippery, and so slope on both sides, that it quickly maketh vs to fall, let vs labour to fasten our foote there, where we may stande safely. For there haue bin some, that otherwise were good and holy menne, which when they sawe intemperance and ryot continually to range with vnbridled lust, vnlesse it be sharply restrained, & were desirous to correct so great a mischief, they could find none other way, but suffred mā to vse the benefites of the earth, so far as necessity required. This was in dede a Godly counsell, but they were to seuer. For (which is a very perillous thinge) they did put streighter bondes vpon consciences, than those wherewith they were bound by the word of God. And they expounde necessity, to abstaine from all thinges which a man may be without. And so by their opiniō, a mā might scarcely take any more foode than bread & water. And some be yet more seuer: as it is red of Crates the Thebane, that did throwe his goods into the sea, because because if they were not destroyed, he thought that he should be destroyed by them. Many at this day, while they seeke a pretence, whereby the intemperance of the flesh in vse of outward things may be excused, and while they go about to prepare a way for the flesh raging in wantonnes, do take that as a thing confessed, which I do not graunte them, that this libertie is not to be restrained with any limitation of measure, but that it is to be left to every mans conscience to vse as much as he seeth to be lawfull for him. Truly I confesse, that consciences neither ought nor can in this point be bounde by certaine and precise formes of lawes. But for as much as the Scripture teacheth generall rules of lawfull vse, we must surely measure the vse according to these rules.

2 Let this be a principle: that the vse of Gods giftes swarueth not out of the way, when it is referred to that ende, whereunto the authour him selfe hath created and apointed them for vs, for as much as he hath created them for our good and not for our hurt. Therefore no man can kepe a rightier way, than he that shall diligently loke vnto this ende. Nowe if we consider to what ende he hath created meates, we shall finde that he meant to make prouision not onely for necessitie but also for delite and pleasure. So in apparell, beside necessitie he apointed an other ende, which is comlineffe and honestie. In herbes, trees, and frutes, beside diuerse profitable vses, there is also a pleasantnesse of sight, and swetenesse of smell. For if this were not true, the Prophet would not reckon among the benefites of God that wine maketh glad the heart of man, and that oyle maketh his face to shine: the Scripture would not echewhere, to set fourth his liberalitie, rehearse that he hath geuen all such things to men. And the very naturall qualities of things do sufficiently shew, to what ende and how far we may vse them. Shall the Lord haue set in floures so great a beutie, as presenteth it selfe to our eyes: shall he haue geuen so great a swetenes of sauour as naturally floweth into our smelling: and shall it be vnlawfull either for our eyes to take the vse of that beutie, or for our smelling to feele that swetenesse of sauour? what? Hath he not so made difference of colours, that he hath made some more acceptable than other? what? Hath he not geuen to gold and siluer, to iuorie and marble, a speciall grace whereby they might be made more precious than other metalles or stones? Finally hath he not made many things commendable vnto vs without necessary vse?

3 Therefore away with that vnnaturall Philosophie, which in graunting vs of the creatures no vse but for necessitie, not onely doth niggardly berreue vs of the lawfull vse of Gods liberalitie, but also can not take place, vnlesse it first haue spoiled man of all his senses and made him a blocke. But on the other side we must with no lesse diligence prouide a stay for y^e lust of the flesh, which if it be not brought into order, ouerfloweth without measure: and it hath (as I haue said) defenders of it, which vnder pretense of allowed libertie do graunt vnto it all things. First there is one bridle put in the mouth of it, if this be determined, that all things are created for vs to this ende, that we should know the authour of them, and geue him thanks for his tender kindnesse toward vs. Where is thy thanks geuing, if thou so gluttonously fill thy selfe with deinty meates or with wine, that thou either be made senselesse, or vnfit to do the duties of godlinesse and of thy calling? Where is the reknowledging of God, if thy flesh by to great abundance boiling in filthy lust, doth with her vncleannesse infecte thy minde, that thou canst not see any thinge that is right or honest? In apparell, where is thankfulnessse to God, if with costly gorgiousnesse thereof we both fall in admiration of our selues and disdaine other? If with the trimnesse and cleannesse of it, we prepare our selues to vnchastitie? Where is the reknowledging of God, if our minde be fixed vpon the gainesse of our apparell? For many so geue all their senses to bodely delites, that the minde lieth ouerwhelmed. Many are so delited with marble, gold, and paintings, that they become as it were menne made of marble, that they bee as it were turned into metalles, and bee like vnto painted Images. The smelle of the kitchen, or swetenesse of saour so dulleth some, that they can smell nothing that is spirituall. And the same is also to be seen in the rest. Therefore it is certaine that hereby the licenciousnesse of abusing is somewhat restrained, and that rule of Paule confirmed, that we be not to carefull of the flesh, for the lustes therof, to which if we graunt to much, they boile out aboue measure and temper.

4 But there is no surer nor redier way than that which is made vs by the contempt of this present life, and the meditation of heauenly immortalitie. For therupon follow two rules: the one, that they which vse this world, should be so minded as though they vsed it not, they that mary wiues as though they did not mary: they y^e bye as though they did not bye, as Paule teacheth. The other, that they should learne as well to beare pouertie, quietly and patiently, as abundance moderatly. He that biddeth thee to vse this world as though thou didst not vse it, doth cut away not onely the intemperance of gluttonie in meat and drinke, and to much deintinesse, sumptuosnesse, pride, hautinesse, and nicenesse, in fare, bilding, and apparell, but also all care and affection that may either withdrawe thee or hinder thee

from thinking of the heauenly life, or from study to garnish thy soule. But this was long ago truely said of Cato: that there is great carefullnesse of trimming our body, and great carelesnesse of vertue. And it is an olde prouerbe that they which are much busied in care of their body are commonly carelesse of their soule. Therefore, although the libertie of the faithfull in outward things is not to be restrained to a certain forme, yet truly it must be subiect to this law, to beare very little with their owne affections, but contrariwise still call vpon them selues with continually bent minde, to cut of all shew of superfluous plentie, much more to restraine ryotous excesse, and to take diligent hede, that they do not of helpes make to them selues hinderaunces.

5 The other rule shalbe, that they that haue but small and slender richesse, may learne to lacke patiently, that they be not carefully moued with immeasurable desire of them: which paciēce they that kepe, haue not a litle profited in the Lords schole: as he that hath not at least somewhat profited in this behalf, can scarcely haue any thing whereby to proue him selfe the scholar of Christ. For beside this that the most part of other vices do accompanie the desire of earthly thinges, he that beareth pouertie impatiently, doth for the most part bewray the contrarie disease in abundance. I meane hereby that he which wilbe ashamed of a poore cote, wilbe proude of a costly cote: he that will not be content with a hungry supper, will be disquieted with desire of a deintier, and would also intemperately abuse those deinties if he had them: he that hardly and vnquietly beareth a priuate and base estate, will not abstaine from pride if he climbe to honors. Therefore let all them that haue an vnfained zeale of Godlinessse, endeouour to learne by the Apostles example, to be full and hungry, to haue store & suffer want. The Scripture hath also a third rule, whereby it tempereth the vse of earthly things, of which we haue spoken somewhat when we entreated of the preceptes of charitie. For the Scripture decreeth that all earthly things are so geuen vs by the bounifulnesse of God, and appointed for our commoditie, that they may be as things deliuered vs to kepe, wherof we must one day yeelde an accompt. We must therefore so dispose thē, that this saying may continually sound in our eares, yeld an accompt of thy bailiweke. Therewithall let this also come in our minde. Who it is that asketh such an accompt, euen he that hath so much commended abstinēce, sobrietie, honest sparing, and modestie, and abhorreth riotous sumptuousnesse, pride, ostētation and vanitie, which alloweth no other disposing of goodes, but such as is ioined with charitie: which hath already with his owne mouth condemned all those delitefull things that do withdrawe a mans minde from chastitie and cleanness, or do dull his wit with darkenesse.

6 Last of all, this is to be noted, that the Lord biddeth euery one of vs in all the doinges of his life, to haue an eye to his calling. For he knoweth with how great vnquietnesse mans wit boileth, with how skipping lightnesse it is caried hether and thether, howe greedy his ambition is to holde diuerse things at ones. Therefore that all things should not be confounded with our follie and rashnesse, he hath apointed to euerie man his duties in seuerall kindes of life. And that no man rashly runne beyond his bondes, he hath named all such kindes of lyfe, vocations. Therefore euery mans seuerall kinde of life is vnto him as it were his standing apointed him by God, that they should not all their life vncertainly wander about. And this diuision is so necessary, that all our doings are measured thereby in his sight, and oftentimes contrary to the iudgement of mans reason and Philosophie. There is no deede accompted more noble, euen among the Philosophers, than for a man to deliuer his contrie from tyrannie: but by the voice of Gods iudgement the priuate man is openly condemned that layeth hand vpon a tyrant. But I will not tarry vpon rehearsing of examples, It is sufficient if we knowe that the calling of the Lorde is in euery thing the beginning and fundation of well doing: to which he that doth not direct himselfe, shall neuer kepe a right way in his doinges. He may paraduerture sometime do somewhat seeming worthy of praise: but whatsoeuer that be in the sight of men, before the throne of God it shalbe reiected; moreouer there shalbe no conuenient agrement in the partes of his life. Therefore our life shall then be best framed, when it shalbe directed to this marke: For then, no man caried with his owne rashnesse will attempt more than his calling may beare, because he knoweth that it is not lawefull to passe beyond his bondes. He that shalbe a man of base estate, shall contentedly live a priuate life, least he shoulde forsake the degree wherein God hath placed him. Againe this shalbe no small relese to cares, labors, greues, and other burdens, when a man shall know that in all these things, God is his guide. The more willingly the magistrate will execute his office: the housholder will bind him selfe to his dutie: euery man in his kinde of life will beare and passe through the discommodities, cares, tediousnesse, and anguishes thereof: when they are perswaded that euery mans burde is laid vpon him by God. Herevpon also shall growe singular comfort, for as much as there shalbe no worke so filthy and vile, (if it be such a one as thou obey thy calling in it) but it shineth & is most precious in the sight of God.

The

Of the iustification of Faith, and first of the definition of the name and of the thing.

I Thinke I haue already sufficiently declared before, howe there remaineth for men being accursed by the lawe one onely helpe to recouer saluation: againe, what Faith is, and what benefites of God it bestoweth vpon man, and what fruites it bringeth fourth in him. The summe of all was this, that Christ is geue vs by the goodnesse of God, and conceiued and possessed of vs by faith, by partaking of whome we receiue principally twoo graces: the first, that being reconciled to God by his innocencie, we may nowe in stede of a iudge haue a mercifull father in heauen: the second, that being sanctified by his Spirit, we may geue our selues to innocencie and purenesse of life. As for regeneration, which is the second grace, we haue already spoken of it as much as semed to be sufficient. The manner of iustification was therefore lesse touched, because it serued well for our purpose, first to vnderstande both how the Faith by which alone we receiue frely geuen righteousnesse by the mercie of God, is not idle from good workes: & also what be the good workes of the holy ones, wherevpon part of this question entreateth. Therefore they are first to be thoroughly discussed, and so discussed that we must remembre that this is the chiefe stay of vpholding religiō, that we may be the more carefull and hedefull about it. For vnlesse thou first knowe, in what state thou art with God, and what his iudgement is of thee: as thou hast no ground to stablishe thy saluation, so hast thou also none to raise thy reuerēt feare toward God. But the necessitie of this knowledge shall better appere by knowledge it selfe.

2 But that we stumble not at the first entrie, (which we should do if we should entre disputation of a thing vnknown) let vs first declare what is meant by these speches, Man to be iustified before God, To be iustified by faith or by workes. He is said to be iustified afore God, that is pronounced by the iudgement of God both iust and accepted for his owne righteousnesse sake. For as wickednesse is abhominable before God, so a sinner can not finde fauour in his eyes, in respect that he is a sinner, or so long as he is accompted such a one. Therefore wheresocuer sinne is, there also appereth the wrath and vengeance of God. He is iustified that is not accompted in place of a sinner but of a iust man, and by reason thereof he standeth fast before the iudgement seate of God when all sinners fall. As if an innocēt be brought to be arained before the seate of a righteous iudge, when iudgement is geuen accordinge to his innocencie, he is saide to be iustified before the iudge: so he is iustified before God that being exempt out of the number of sinners hath God a witnesse and affirmer of his righteousnesse. Therefore after the same manner a man shalbe said to be iustified by workes, in whose life there is founde such cleannesse and holynesse, as may deserue the testimonie of righteousnesse before y^e throne of God: or he that with the vprightnes of his workes is able to aunswere and satisfie Gods iudgement. Cōtrariwise he shalbe said to be iustified by faith that being excluded from the righteousnesse of workes, doth by faith take holde of the righteousnes of Christ: wherewith when he is clothed, he appeareth in the sight God, not as a sinner, but as righteous. So we simply expound iustification to be an acceptation, whereby God receiuing vs into fauour taketh vs for righteous. And we say that the same consisteth in forgeuennesse of sinnes, and imputation of the righteousnesse of Christ.

3 For confirmation hereof there are many and euident testimonies of Scripture. First it can not be denied, that this is the proper and most vsed significatiō of the word. But because it is too long to gather all the places and compare them together, it shalbe enough to put the readers in minde of them, for they may of them selues easely marke them. But I will bring fourth some, where this iustification that we speake of is expressely entreated of by name. First where Luke sayeth that the people when they had heard Christ did iustifie God. And where Christ pronounceth that wisdome is iustified by her children: he doth not meane there, that they do geue righteousnesse, which alway remaineth perfect with God, although all the world go about to take it away from him: nor in this place also to make the doctrine of saluation righteous, which hath euer that of it selfe. But both these speches are as much in effect, as to geue to God and his doctrine the praise that they deserue. Againe whē Christ reprocheth the Pharisees, that they iustifie them selues, he doth not meane that they obtaine righteousnesse by well doing, but do vaine gloriously seke for the same of righteousnesse, whereof in deede they be voides. They that are skilfull of the Hebrue tongue do better vnderstande the sense of this phrase: in which tongue they are not onely called wicked doers, that are guilty in their conscience of any wicked doing, but also they that come in daunger of iudgement of condemnation. For when Bersabe sayeth that she and Solomon shalbe wicked doers, she doth not therein acknowledge any offense, but complaineth that she and her son shalbe put to shame, to be numbred among the reprobate probate and condemned. But by the processe of the text it easely appeareth, that the same worde in Latine also, can not otherwise be taken but by way of relation, and not to signifie any qualitie. But as concerning the matter that we are nowe in hande with: where Paule saith that the Scripture did forsee, that God iustificieth the Gentiles by faith, what may a man vnderstande thereby, but that God doth impute righteousness by faith? Againe, when he saith that God iustificieth the wicked man that is of the faith of Christ, what meaning can be thereof, but by the benefit of faith to deliuer them from the damnation which their wickednesse deserued? And yet he speaketh more plainly in the conclusion, when he cried out thus, Who shall accuse Gods elect? It is God that iustificieth, who shall condemne? It is Christ that died, yea that rose againe, and nowe maketh intercession for vs. It is as much in effect as if he should say, Who shall accuse them whome God acquiteth? who shall condemne them whose patrone Christ is and defendeth them? To iustifie therefore is nothing els, than to acquite him that was accused, from guiltinesse as allowinge his innocencie Sith therefore God doth iustifie vs by the intercession of Christ, he doth acquite vs, not by allowance of our owne innocency, but by imputation of righteousness, that we may be compted for righteous in Christ, which are not righteous in our selues. So in the 13. Chapter of the Actes, in Paules sermon: by him is forgeuenes of sinnes preached vnto you, and euery one that beleueth in him is iustified from all those things, from which you could not be iustified in the lawe of Moses. You see that after forgeuenesse of sinnes, iustification is added in place of an exposition. You see plainly that it is taken for absolution, you se that it is taken away from the workes of the lawe. you see that it is the mere beneficiall gift of Christ, you see that it is receiued by faith. Finally you see that there is a satisfaction spoken of where he sayeth that we are iustified from sinnes by Christ. So when it is said that the Publicane came iustified out of the Temple, we can not say that he obtained righteousness by any deseruing of workes. This therefore is saide that after pardon of his sinnes obtained, he was compted for righteous before God. He was therefore righteous, not by approuinge of workes, but by Gods free absolution. Wherefore Ambrose sayeth very well, that calleth the confession of sinnes a lawefull iustification.

4 But to leaue struiuing about the word: If we loke vpon the thing it selfe as it is described vnto vs, there shall remaine no more doubt. For truely Paule doth expresse iustification by the name of acceptation, when he saith (Ephes. 1. 1. 5.) we are appointed vnto adoption by Christ, according to y^e good pleasure of God, vnto the praise of his glorious fauour, whereby he hath accompted vs acceptable or in fauour. For the same is meant by it that is saide in an other place, that God doth frely iustifie. In the. 4. Chapter to the Romaines, he first calleth it an imputation of righteousnesse, and sticketh not to say that it consisteth in forgeuenesse of sinnes. That man (said he) is called of Dauid a blessed man, to whom God accōpteth or imputeth righteousnesse without workes, as it is written: Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgeuen. &c. Truly he there doth entreate not of one part of iustification, but of all iustification wholly. And he testifieth that Dauid in that place maketh a definition of iustification, when he pronounceth that they are blessed to whom is geuen free forgeuenesse of sinnes. Whereby appereth that this righteousnesse whereof he speaketh, is in comparison simply set as contrary to guiltinesse. But for this purpose, that is y^e best place where he teacheth, that this is the summe of the message of the Gospell, that we should be reconciled to God: because it is his will to receiue vs into fauour through Christ, in not imputing sinnes vnto vs. Let the reders diligently wey all the whole processe of the text. For by & by after, where he addeth by way of exposition, that Christ which was without sinne was made sinne for vs, to expresse the manner of reconciliation, doubtlesse he meaneth nothing els by the word recōciling but iustifying. And that which he saith in an other place, that we are made righteous by the obedience of Christ, could not stand together, vnlesse we be accompted righteous before God, in him, and without our selues.

5 But where as Oslander hath brought in, I wote not what monster of essentiall righteousnes, whereby, although his will was not to destroy free righteousnes, yet he hath wrapped it within such a mist, as darkeneth godly mindes, & bereueth them of the earnest feling of the grace of Christ: therefore ere I passe further to other thinges, it is worthy labour to cōfute this doting errour. First this speculatiō is but of mere & hungry curiositie. He doth in deede heape together many testimonies of Scripture, to proue that Christ is one with vs, and we one with him, which nedeth no profe: but because he kepeth not this bonde of vnitie, he snareth him selfe. But we which holde that we are made all one with Christ by the power of his Spirit, may easily vndo all his knottes. He had conceiued a certaine thing very neare to the opinion of Manichees, to desire to conuey the substance of God into men. Herevpon riseth an other inuention of his that Adam was fashioned after the Image of God, because euen before the fall Christ was ordained the paterne of the nature of man. But by cause I would

would be shorte, I will tarry vpon the matter that I haue presently in hande. He saith that we are one with Christ. We graunt. But we denie that the substance of Christ is mingled with oures. Moreouer we say that this principle that Christ is righteousnesse to vs, because he is an eternall God, the fountaine of righteousnesse & the very selfe righteousnesse of God, is wrongfully drawen to defende his deccites. The readers shall pardon me, if I do nowe but touche these thinges that the ordre of teaching requireth to be differred into an other place. But although he excuse himselfe from meaning nothing els by the name of essentiall righteousnesse, but to resist this opinion that we are accompted righteous for Christes sake: yet he plainly expresseth that he is not contented with that righteousnes that is purchased for vs by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ, but faineth that we are substantially righteous in God, as well by substāce as by quality poured into vs. For this is the reason why he so earnestly affirmeth, that not only Christ, but also y^e father & the holy Ghost do dwell in vs. Which although I graunt to be true, yet I say that he wrongfully wresteth it. For he should haue considered the manner of dwelling, that is, that the father and the holy Ghost are in Christ, and as the fulnesse of the Godhead dwelleth in him, so do we possesse whole God in him. Therefore all that he saith seuerally of the father & the holy Ghost, redeth to no other ende but to draw y^e simple from Christ. And then he thrusteth in a mixture of substances, whereby God pouring himselfe into vs, doth make vs as it were a part of himselfe. For he reckeneth it almost a matter of nothing, that it is wrought by the power of the holy Ghost, that we grow into one with Christ, & that he is our heade & we his membres, vnlesse his very substāce be mingled with vs. But in the father & the holy Ghost (as I haue said) he doth more openly bewray what he thinketh, euen this, that we be iustified not by the only grace of the Mediator, and that righteousnesse is not simply or perfectly offered vs in his persone, but that we are made partakers of the righteousnes of God, whē God is essentially made one with vs.

6. If he did say no more, but that Christ in iustifying vs, is by essentiall coniointing made oures: and that not onely he is our heade, in that he is manne, but also that the substance of the diuine nature is powred into vs. He should with lesse hurte feede him selfe deintily, and peradventure so great a contention should not haue bene raised for this doubtinge errour. But sith this beginning is like a cuttle that with casting out of blacke and thicke bloode hideth her many tailes, we must needes earnestly resist vnlesse we will wittingly & willingly suffer that righteousnesse to be taken from vs, which only bringeth

vs confidence to glory of saluation. For in all this discourse, the name of righteousness, and this worde iustifying, extende to two partes: that to be iustified is not onely to be reconciled to God with free pardon, but also to be made righteous, that righteousness is not a free imputation but a holinesse and vprightnesse, which the substance of God remaining in vs doth breath into vs. Then he stoutly denieth, that Christ is our righteousness in respect that being a priest he did with satisfactorily purging sinnes appease his father towards vs, but in respect that he is eternall God and life. To proue that first point, that God doth iustifie not onely by forgeuing but also by regenerating, he asketh whether God doth leaue them whom he doth iustifie such as they were by nature, chaunging nothing of their vices. The aunswere hereof is very easy: that as Christ can not be torne in partes so these two things which we together and iointly receiue in him, that is to say righteousness and sanctification, are inseparable. Therefore, whomsoeuer God receiueth into fauour, he doth also therewithall geue them the spirit of adoption, by the power whereof he newly fashioneth them after his image. But if the brightnesse of the sunne can not be seuered from the heate thereof, shall we therefore say that the earth is warmed with the light, and enlightened with the heate? There is nothing more fit for this purpose, than this similitude. The sunne with his heate geueth life and frutefulnesse to the earth, with his beames he geueth light and brightnesse. Here is a mutuall and vnseparable conioining: yet reason forbiddeth to conuey to the one that which is peculiar to the other. Like absurditie is in this confusion of two sortes of graces, that Osiander thrusteth in. For because God doth in deede renew them to the obseruing of righteousness whom he freely accompteth for righteous, therefore Osiander confoundeth that gift of regeneration with this free acceptation, and affirmeth that they be al one and the selfesame thing. But the Scripture ioining them both together, yet doth distinctly reckon them, that the manifold grace of God may y better appere vnto vs. For that saying of Paule is not superfluous, that Christ was giuen vs vnto righteousness and sanctification. And whensoeuer he reasoneth to proue by the saluation purchaced for vs by the fatherly loue of God, and by the grace of Christ; that we are called to holinesse and cleannesse, he plainly declareth that it is one thing to be iustified and an other to be made newe creatures. But when Osiander cometh to the Scripture, he corrupteth as many places as he allegeth. Where Paule saith that faith is accompted for righteousness to him that worketh not, but beleueth in him that iustificieth the wicked man, he expoundeth it to make righteous. With like rashnesse, he depraueth all the fourth Chapter to the Romaines, and sticketh not with like false colour to corrupt that place which I euen now alleged, Who shall accuse the electes of God? it is God that iustificieth: where it is plaine that he speaketh simply of guiltinesse and acquiting, & the meaning of the Apostle hangeth vpon a comparing of cōtraries. Therefore Osiander is found too fond a babler, as well in that reason as in alleging the testimonies of Scripture. And no more rightly doth he speake of the name of righteousnesse, in saying that faith was accompred to Abraham for righteousnesse, after that embracing Christ (which is the righteousnesse of God and God him selfe) he excelled in singular vertues, whereby appereth that of two whole places he hath wrongfully made one corrupt place. For the righteousnes that is there mentioned, pertaineth not to the whole course of his calling: but rather the holy Ghost testifieth, that although the vertues of Abraham were singularly excellent, and that with long continuance he at length had encreased them: yet he did no other way please God, but by this, that he receiued by faith the grace offered in the promise. Wherevpon followeth, that in iustification there is no place for workes, as Paule very well affirmeth.

7 As for this that Osiander obiecteth, that the power of iustifying is not in faith of it selfe, but in respect that it receueth Christ, I willingly graūt it. For if faith did iustifie of it selfe, or by inward force, as they call it and as it is alway feble and vnperfect, could not worke iustification but in part, so should the iustification be-maimed, that should geue vs but a pece of saluation. As for vs, we imagine no such thing, but in proper speaking do say, that God onely iustificieth: and then we geue the same to Christ, because he was geuē vs vnto righteousnesse: and faith we compare as it were to a vessell. For except we came emptie with open mouth of our soule to craue the grace of Christ, we can not be able to receiue Christ. Wherevpon we gather that we do not take from Christ the power of iustifying, when we teache that he is first receiued by faith, before that his righteousnesse be receiued. But yet I do not admit the crooked figures of this Sophister; when he saith that faith is Christ: as if an earthen pot were a treasure, because gold is hiddē in it. For the reason is not vnlike, but that faith although it be by it selfe of no worthines or price, may iustifie vs in bringing Christ, as a pot full of money maketh a man riche. Therefore I say that faith, which is onely the instrument to receiue righteousnesse, is vnfitly mingled with Christ, which is the materiall cause and both author and minister of so great a benefitt. Nowe is this doubt also dissolued. Howe this worde Faith ought to be vnderstanded when we entreate of iustification.

8 In the receiuing of Christ he goth further: for he sayeth, that the inward worde is receiued by the ministracion of the outwarde worde, thereby to drawe vs from the priesthode of Christ and the persone of the Mediatour to his outwarde Godhed. As for vs, we deuide not Christ, but we say that he is the same eternall worde of God, which reconciling vs to God in his flesh, gaue vs righteousnesse: and we confesse that otherwise he could not haue fulfilled the office of Mediatour, and purchaced vs righteousnesse, vnlesse he had bene eternall God. But this is Osianders doctrine, where as Christ is both God and man, that he was made righteousnesse to vs, in respect of his nature of Godhed, and not of manhode. But if this properly belong to the Godhed, then it shall not be peculiar to Christ, but common with the father and the holy Ghost, for as much as there is not one righteousnesse of the one, & an other of the other. Morouer that which was naturally from eternitie, could not be conueniently said to be made to vs. But although we graunt this, that God was made righteousnesse for vs: howe shall it agree that that which is set betwene, is made of God? Truely that properly belongeth to the persone of the Mediatour: which though he containe in him selfe the nature of Godhede, yet here he is specially signified by his proper title, by which he is seuerally discerned from the father and the holy Ghost. But he foolishly triumpheth in that one worde of Hieremie, where he promiseth that the Lord Iehoua shalbe our righteousnesse, but out of that he shall gather nothing, but that Christ which is righteousnesse, is God openly shewed in the flesh. In an other place re. 15. we haue rehearsed out of Paules sermō, that God purchaced to himselfe the Church with his blood, if any man gather therevpon, that the blood wherewith sinnes were purged was diuine, and of the nature of Godhed, who can abide so fowle an errour? But Osiander thinketh that with this so childishe a cauillation he hath gotten all things, he swelleth, he leapeth for ioy, and stuffeth many leaues full with his bigge wordes: when yet there is a plaine and redy solution for it in saying that the worde Iehoua in deede when he is made the
a. 20. issue of Dauid shalbe the righteousnesse of the godly: But Esaye teacheth in what sense, saying: My iust seruant shall with knowledge of himselfe iustifie many. Let vs note that the father speaketh: that he geueth to the sonne the office of iustifying: he addeth a cause, for that he is iust, and setteth the manner or meane as they call it in the doctrine wherby Christ is knowen. For it is a more comodious exposition fiction to take this worde Daab knowledge passiuely. Herevpon I gather first that Christ was made righteousnesse when he did put on the fourme of a seruaut: secondely that he did iustifie vs in respect that he shewed him selfe obedient to his father: and that therefore he doth not this for vs according to his nature of Godhed, but according to the office of dispensation committed vnto him. For although God alone is the fountaine of righteousnesse, & we be made righteous by no other meane but by the partaking of him: yet because we are by vnhappy disagreement estranged from his righteousnesse, we must needes come downe to this lower remedy, that Christ may iustifie vs with the force of his death and resurrection.

9 If he object that this is a worke of such excellency, that it is aboue the nature of man, and therefore can not be ascribed but to the nature of God, the first I graunt: but in the second I say that he is vnwisely deceiued. For although Christ could neither cleanse our soules with his blood, nor appease his father with his sacrifice, nor acquite vs frō guiltinesse, nor do the office of priest; vnlesse he had bene true God, because the strength of the flesh had bene to weake for so great a burden: yet it is certain that he performed all these things according to his nature of manhod. For if it be demaunded how we be iustified, Paule answereth, by the obedience of Christ. But did he any other wise obey than by taking vpon him the shape of a seruāt? whervpon we gather that righteousnesse was geuē vs in his flesh. Likewise in the other wordes (which I maruell that Oslander is not ashamed to allege so often) he apointeth the fountaine of righteousnesse no where els but in the flesh of Christ. Him that knew no sinne he made sinne for vs, that we might be y^e righteousnesse of God in him. Oslander with full mouth aduanceth the righteousnes of God, and triumpheth as though he had proued that it is his imaginatiue Ghost of essentiall righteousnesse: when the wordes sound far otherwise, that we be righteous by the cleansing made by Christ. Very yong beginners should not haue bene ignorant that the righteousnesse of God is taken for the righteousnesse that God alloweth, as in Iohn, where the glorie of God is compared with the glorie of men. I knowe that sometime it is called the righteousnesse of God, whereof God is the authour and which God geueth vs: but though I say nothing, the readers that haue their sound wit do perceiue that nothing els is meant in this place but that we stande vpright before the iudgement seate of God, being vpholden by the cleansing sacrifice of Christes death. And there is not so great importance in the word, so that Oslander do agree with vs in this point that we are iustified in Christ, in this respect that he was made a propiciatorie sacrifice for vs, which can not agree with his nature of Godhed. After which sort, when Christ meaneth to seale the righteousnesse & saluation that he hath brought vs, he setteth before vs an assured pledge thereof in his flesh. He doth in deede call him selfe the lyuely bred, but expressing the manner here, he addeth that his flesh is verily meate, and his blood is verily drinke. Which manner of teaching is sene in the Sacramentes, which although they direct our faith to whole Christ, and not to halfe Christ, yet they do there withall teache that the matter of righteousnesse and saluation remaineth in his flesh: Not that in that that he is onely man, he either iustificieth or quickeneth of him selfe, but because it pleased God to shewe openly in the mediatur that which was hidden and incomprehensible in him selfe, whereupon I am wont to say, that Christ is as it were a fountaine set opē for vs, out of which we may drawe that which otherwise should without fruite ly hidden in that close and depe spring that riseth vp vnto vs in the persone of the Mediatour. In this manner & meaning, I do not deny that Christ as he is God and man doth iustifie vs, and that this is also the worke of the father & the holy Ghost as well as his. Finally, that the righteousnesse whereof Christ maketh vs partakers, is the eternall righteousnesse of the eternall God, so that he yelde to the sure and plaine reasons that I haue alleged.

10 Nowe that he shoulde not with his cauillations deceiue the vnskillfull, I graunt that we want this incomparable benefit, till Christ be made ours. Therefore we set that conioyning of the head and the membres, the dwelling of Christ in our heartes, and that mysticall vnion, in the hiest degree: that Christ being made ours, may make vs partakers of the giftes wherewith he is endued. Therefore we do not beholde him a far of out of our selues, that righteousnesse may be imputed vnto vs, but because we haue put on him, and are graffed into his body: finally because he hath vouchsafed to make vs one with him, therefore we glorie that we haue a fellowship of righteousnesse with him. So is Oslanders sclaunderous cauillation confuted, where he saith that we compt faith righteousnesse, as though we spoiled Christ of his right, when we say that we come by faith empty to him, to geue rounge to his grace, that he onely may fil vs. But Oslander refusing this spirituall conioining, enforceth a grosse mingling with the faithfull, and therefore he odiously calleth all them Zuinglians that subscribe not to his fantastickall errour, concerning essentiall righteousnesse: because they do nor thinke that Christ is substācially eaten in the Lordes supper. As for me, I compt it a great glorie to be so reproched proched of a proude man & geuen to his owne erros. Albeit he toucheth not me onely, but also other writers well knowen to the world, whom he ought to haue modestly reuerēced. It moueth me nothing, which meddle not with mine owne priuate cause: and so much the more sincerely I handle this cause, being free from all corrupt affection. Where as therefore he so importunately requireth essentiall righteousnesse, and the essentiall dwelling of Christ in vs, it tendeth to this ende: First that God should with a grosse mixture poure himself into vs, as he faineth a fleshly eating of Christ in y^e supper: secondly that God shoulde breath his righteousnesse into vs, whereby we may be really righteous with him: for by his opinion, this righteousnesse is as well God himselfe, as the goodnesse or holinesse, or purenesse of God. I will not spende much labour in wiping away the testimonies that he bringeth, which he wrongfully wresteth from the heauently life to this present state. Through Christ (sayth Peter) are geue vs the precious & most great promises, that we should be made partakers of the nature of God: As though we weare nowe such as the Gospell promised that we shalbe at the last comming of Christ: yea John telleth vs, that we shall then see God as he is, because we shalbe like vnto him. Onely I thought good to geue a small tast to the readers, that I do of purpose passe ouer these trifles: not for that it is harde to confute them, but because I will not be tedious in a superfluous worke.

II But in the secōde point lurketh more poison, where he teacheth that we are righteous together with God. I thinke I haue already sufficiently proued, that although this doctrine were not so pestilent, yet because it is colde and frutelesse, & of it selfe so vaine that it melteth away, it ought worthely to be vnsauorie to sound and godly Readers. But this is an intolerable wickednesse, vnder preiēse of double righteousnesse, to enfeble the earnest assuraunce of saluation, and to cary vs aboute the cloudes, that we should not embrace by faith the grace of propiciation, & call vpon God with quiet mindes. Oslander scorneth thē, that teach that this word Iustifying is a law terme: because, we must be righteous in deede. And he abhorreth nothinge more than so say, that we be iustified by free imputation. But, if God do not iustifie vs by acquiting and pardoning, what meaneth that saying of Paule, God was in Christ reconciling the world to him selfe, not imputing to men their sinnes. For, him that had done no sinne, he made sinne for vs, that we might be the righteousnes of God in him. First I winne thus much, that they be iudged righteous that be reconciled to God. The manner howe is declared, for that God iustifieth

by forgeuing: as in an other place iustification is set as contrary to accusation, which comparing of them as contraries, doth clerely shewe that it is a phrase borrowed from the vse of the lawe. And there is no man being but meanly practised in the Hebrew tongue, if he haue a sober braine, that is ignoraunt that this phrase came from thence, and whereunto it tendeth, and what it meaneth. Nowe where Paule sayeth that Dauid described y^e righteousnesse without workes, in these wordes, Blessed are they whose sinnes are forgeuen: Let Osiander aunswere me whether this be a full definition or but halfe a one. Truely Paule bringeth not in the Prophet for a witnessse, as though he taught that forgeuenesse of sinnes is but a part of righteousness, or a thing that ioineth with other to the iustifying of man: But he includeth whole righteousness in free forgeuenesse, pronouncing the man blessed, whose sinnes are couered, to whom God hath forgeuen iniquities, and to whom he imputeth no transgressions: He doth measure and iudge such a mans felicitie thereby, because he is not this way righteous in deede, but by imputation. Osiander taketh exception and sayeth, that this should be sclanderous to God, and contrary to his nature, if he should iustifie them that in deede remaine still wicked. But we must remember, as I haue already saide, that the grace of iustifying is not seuered from regeneration, although they be seuerall things. But because it is more than sufficiently knowen by experience, that there abide alwaies in the righteous some remnantes of sinne, it must needs be that they be farre otherwise iustified than they be reformed into newnesse of life. For this later point of reformation, God so beginneth in his elect, & throughout the whole course of their life, by litle & litle, & sometime slowly procedeth in it, that they be alway before his seat in danger of y^e iudgement of death, But he iustifieth them, not by partmeale, but so that they may freely, as clothed with the purenes of Christ, appere in heauen For no portion of righteousnesse could appease our consciences, till they be satisfied that God is fully pleased with vs, because we be righteous in his sight without exception. Wherupon followeth, that the doctrine of iustification is misturned, yea ouerturned from the very foundatiō, when doutinge is cast into mens mindes, when the affiance of saluation is shaken, when the free and dredlesse inuocation is hindered, yea when quiet and tranquillitie with spirituall ioy is not stablished.

Gal. 3. 8. Wherevpon Paule gathereth an argument by contraries, to proue, that the inheritance is not by the lawe. For by this meane faith should be made voide, which if it haue respect to workes, is ouerthrowen, because none of the most holy shall therein finde wherevpon to trust.

This

This difference of iustifyinge and regeneratunge (which two thinges. Osiander confounding together, calleth two sortes of righteousnes) is very well expressed by Paule: For speaking of his reall righteousnes in deede, or of the vprightnes wherewith he was endued (which Osiander nameth essentiall righteousnesse) he lamentably crieth out: Wretch that I am: who shall deliuer me from the body of this death? Rom. 24. But fleeinge to the righteousnes which is grounded vpon the onely mercy of God, he gloriously triumpheth ouer both life, death, reproches, hunger, sword, and all aduersities. Who shall accuse the electes of God whome he iustificieth? For I am surely perswaded, that nothing Rom. 33. shall seuer vs frō his loue in Christ. He plainly publisheth, y he hath the righteousnes which alone fully sufficeth to salutiō before God, so that the wretched bondage which he knowing to be in himselfe, did alitle before bewaile his estate, may not monish nor any way hinder his boldnes to glory. This diuersity is sufficiently knowen, and so familiar to all the holy ones, that grone vnder the burden of iniquities, & yet with victorious confidence, do mount vp aboue all feares. As for this that Osiander obiecteth, that it disagreeeth with the nature of God, it falleth vpon himselfe. For although he clotheth the holy ones with a double righteousnes as it were with a furred garment, yet he is compelled to confesse that without forgiuenesse of sinnes they neuer pleased God. If that be true, then at least let him graunt, that they which are not righteous in deede, are accompted righteous accordinge to the appointed proportion of imputation, as they call it. But how farre shall a sinner extend this free acceptation that is put in place of righteousnes? shall he measure it by the pound or by the ounce? Truely he shall hang doutfull and wauering to this side & that side, because he may not take vnto him so much righteousnesse as shalbe necessary to stablishe confidence. It is happy that he that would binde God to a law, is not iudge of this cause. But this shall stande stedfast, that thou mayst be iustified in thy sayinges and overcome when thou art iudged. But howe great presumption is it Ps. 51. to condemne the chiefe iudge when he freely acquiteth, that this aunswere may not be in force, I will haue mercy vpon whome I will haue mercy. And yet the intercession of Moses which God did put to silence with this saying, tended not to this ende that he should spare Exo. 19. none, but that he should acquite altogether, taking away their condemnation although they were guilty of offense. And we do say that they which were lost haue their sinnes buried and so are iustified before God: because, as God hateth sinne, so he cā loue none but thē whom he iustificieth. But this is a maruelloys manner of iustifyinge, that they being couered with the righteousnesse of Christ stand not in feare of the iudgement which they haue deserued, and when they worthily condemne themselues are accompted righteous without themselues.

12 But the readers are to be warned, that they take good heede to the mystery which he braggeth that he will not hide from them. For after that he hath longe and largely trauailed to proue that we do not obtaine fauour with God by the only imputatiō of the righteousnesse of Christ, because this should be impossible for him to compt them for righteous that are not righteous, (I vse his owne wordes) at length he concludeth that Christ was giuen vs vnto righteousness, not in respect of his nature of manhoode but of his nature of Godhead: and that although this righteousnesse can not be found but in the person of the Mediatour, yet it is the righteousnesse not of mā but of God. he doth now binde vp his rope made of two righteousneses, but he plainly taketh away the office of iustifyinge from Christes nature of manhode. But it is good to see how he disagreeeth. It is sayd in the same place, that Christ was made vnto wisdom, which belongeth to none but to the eternal word. Therefore Christ in that he is man is not wisdom. I answere that the onely begotten sonne of

ol. 2. 3 God was in deede his eternall wisdome, but in Paules wrytinges that name is giuen him in diuerse wise, because all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge are layd vp in him. That therefore which he had with his father, he disclosed vnto vs: and so that which Paul saith is not referred vnto the essence of the sonne of God, but to our vse, and is rightly applied to Christes nature of manhoode: because although he shined a light in darkenes, before that he did put on flesh,

ohn. 8. 2. yet it was a hidden light till the same Christ came foorth in the nature of man, the shininge sunne of righteousnesse, which therefore calleth himselfe the light of the world. Also it is foolishly obiected of him, that the power of iustifying is farre aboue both Angels and men: forasmuch as this hangeth not vpon the worthinesse of any creature, but vpon the ordinance of God. If Angels will take vpon them to satisfie God, they can nothinge preuaile, because they are not appointed therunto. But this singularly belonged to Christ being man, which sa. 3. 13 was made subiect to the law, to redeme vs from the curse of the law. Also he doth sclanderously caull, that they which deny that Christ is our righteousnesse accordinge to his nature of Godhead, do leaue but one part of Christ, & (which is worse) do make two gods, because although they confesse, that God dwelleth in vs, yet they say againe that we are not righteous by the righteousness of God. For although we call Christ the author of life, in respect that he suffered death to destroy him that had the power of death, we do not by and by take away that honor from whole Christ as he was openly shewed God in the flesh, but we only make a distinction how the righteousness of God is conueied vnto vs, y^e we may enjoy it. In which point Oslander hath too fowly erred. Neither do we deny that that which is openly giuen vs in Christ, proceedeth fr^o the secret grace & power of God: & we striue not against this, that the righteousnesse which Christ giueth vs is the righteousnesse of God that proceedeth from God: but we hold this stedfastly, that we haue righteousness & life in the death & resurrection of Christ. I ouerpasse that heaping together of places wherof he may wel be ashamed, wherwith he hath tediously cōbred the readers without choise & without common reason, to proue that whersoever is made mention of righteousness, there ought to be vnderstanded this essentiall righteousness. As where David calleth vpon the righteousnesse of God to help him: whereas he doth the same aboue a hundred times, Oslander sticketh not to corrupt so many sentences. And nothing stronger is the other obiection, that that is properly and rightly called righteousness, whereby we be moued to do rightly, but that God only worketh in vs both to will & to performe. For we do also not deny, but that God reformeth vs with his Spirit vnto holinesse of life and righteousness: but we must first see whether he do this by himselfe and immediatly, or by the hand of his Sonne, with whom he hath left all the fullnesse of his holy Spirit, that with his abundant store he should supply the nede of his members. Moreover although righteousness come vnto vs out of the secret fountaine of the godhead, yet it followeth not that Christ which sanctified himselfe in the flesh for our sakes, was righteousness vnto vs according to his nature of godhead. No lesse fonde is that which he sayth, that Christ himselfe was righteous by the righteousness of God. Because vnlesse y^e wil of his father had moued him, he could not himselfe haue satisfied y^e office cōmitted vnto him. For though we haue in an other place sayd, that all the deseruings of Christ himselfe do procede from the mere good will of God, yet y^e maketh nothing to that fantasticall thing, wherwith Oslander bewitcheth both his owne & simple mens eyes. For who woulde suffer a man to gather this conclusion, that because God is the fountaine & beginning of our righteousness, therefore we be essentially righteous, & the essence of Gods righteousness dwelleth in vs? In redeeminge the church (sayth Esay) God did put on his righteousness as a harnessse: but did he se to spoile Christ of his armure which he hadde giuen him, to make him to be no perfect redcemer? But the Prophet meant nothing else but that God borrowed nothing out of himselfe, nor was holpen by any aide to redeme vs. Which thing Paul briefly expressed in other wordes, saying that he gaue vs saluation to the shewing of his righteousnesse. But this doth not ouerthrowe that which he teacheth in an other place, that we are righteous by the obedience of one man. Finally whosoever wrappeth vp a double righteousnesse, that poore soules may not rest in the mere only mercy of God, he doth in a mockery crowne Christ with thornes.

13 But forasmuch as a great parte of men, imagineth righteousnes to be made of faith and workes, let vs first shew this also, that the righteousnesse of faith and workes do so differ, that when the one is stablished, the other must needs be ouerthrowen. The Apostle sayeth that he esteemed all things as dong, that he might winne Christ and finde in him the righteousnesse that is of God by fayth, comptinge not his righteousnesse that which is by the law, but that which is by the faith of Iesu Christ. You see that here is also a cōparison of cōtraries & that here is declared that he which wil obtaine the righteousnesse of Christ, must forsake his owne righteousnesse. Therefore in an other place he sayeth, that this was the cause of fall to the Iewes that going about to stablish their owne righteousnes, they were not subiect to the righteousnesse of God. If in stablishing our owne righteousnesse we shake away the righteousnesse of God, therefore to obtaine Gods righteousnes our owne must be vterly abolished. And he sheweth the same thinge, when he sayth, that our gloryinge is not excluded by the law, but by faith. Wherupon followeth that so long as there remaineth any righteousnesse of workes, howe litle soeuer it be, there still remaineth to vs some matter to glory vpō. Now if faith exclude all glorying, then the righteousnesse of workes can no wise be coupled with the righteousnes of faith. To this effect he speaketh so plainly in the 4. chapter to Romaines, that he leaueth no rounge for cauillations or shiftes: If (sayth he) Abraham was iustified by workes, he hath glory. And immediatly he addeth: but he hath no glory in the sight of God. It followeth therefore that he was not iustified by workes. Then he bringeth an other argument by contraries, when reward is rendered to workes, that is done of det and not of grace. But righteousnesse is giuen to faith according to grace: Therefore it is not of the deseruinges of workes. Wherefore farewell their dreame, that imagine a righteousnes made of faith & workes mingled together.

14 The Sophisters thinke that they haue a suttile shift, that make

to themselves sport and pastime with wresting of Scripture and with vaine caillations. For they expound works in that place to be those which mē not yet regenerate do only literally & by the endeouour of free will without the grace of Christ: & do say that it belongeth not to spirituall workes. So by their opinion a man is iustified both by faith & by workes, so that the workes be not his owne, but the gifts of Christ and frutes of regeneration. For they say that Paule spake so for none other cause, but to conuince y Iewes, trusting vpon their owne workes, that they did foolishly presume to claime righteousnesse to themselves, sith the only Spirit of Christ doth giue it vs, and not any endeouour by our owne motion of nature. But they do not marke that in the comparison of the righteousnesse of the lawe and the righteousnes of the Gospell, which Paul bringeth in in an other place, all workes are excluded with what title soeuer they be adorned. For he teacheth that this is the righteousnesse of the lawe, that he should obtaine saluation that hath performed that which the law commaundeth: & that this is y righteousnes of faith, if we beleue that Christ died and is risen againe. Moreouer we shall hereafter shew in place fit for it, that sanctification & righteousnes are seuerall benefites of Christ. Wherupon followeth that the very spirituall workes come not into the accompt, when the power of iustifyinge is ascribed to faith. And where Paul denieth (as I euen now alleaged) that Abraham had any thinge whereupon to glory before God, because he was not made righteous by workes: this ought not to be restrained to the literall and outward kinde of vertues, or to the endeouour of free will. But although the life of the patriarch Abraham were spirituall & in maner Angelike, yet he had not sufficient deseruinges of workes to purchase him righteousnesse before God.

15 The Scholemē teach a litle more grossly that mingle their preparations: but these do lesse infect the simple and vnskilful with corrupt doctrine, vnder pretense of Spirit and grace hiding the mercy of God which onely is able to appease tremblinge consciences. But we confesse with Paul that the doers of the law are iustified before God: but because we are all farre from the keeping of the law, hereupon we gather, that the workes which should most of all haue auailed to righteousnes, do nothing help vs because we lacke thē. As for the cōmon Papistes or Schoolemen, they are in this point doubly deceiued: both because they call faith an assurednesse of conscience in lookinge for reward at the hande of God for deseruinges, and also because they expounde the grace of God not to be a free imputation of righteousnesse, but the holy Ghost helping to the endeouour of holinesse. They

Feb. 11. read in the Apofle that he which commeth to God, must first beleue 5. that there is a God, and then that he is a render of reward to them that seeke him. But they marke not, what is the maner of feking. And that they are deceiued in the name of grace, is plainly proued by Gen. 11. their owne wrytings. For Lombard expoundeth, that iustification by .dist. Christ is giuen vs two wayes. First (sayth he) the death of Christ doth 6. ca. 2. iustifie vs, when by it charity is stirred vp in our heartes, by which we are made righteous. Secondly that by the same death sinne is destroyed, whereby Sathan held vs captiue, so that nowe he hath not whereby to condemne vs. You see how he considereth the grace of God principally in iustificatiō, to be so far as we are directed to good works by the grace of the holy Ghost. He woulde forsooth haue folo-wed the opinion of Augustine: but he foloweth him a far of, & goeth far out of the way from rightly followinge him: because if Augustine haue spoken any thing plainly he darkeneth it, if there be any thinge in Augustine not very vnpure, he corrupteth it. The Scholemē haue stil straied from worse to worse, till with headlong fall at length they he rolled downe into a Pelagian error. And the very sentence of Augustine, or at least his manner of speakinge is not altogether to be receiued. For though he singularly well taketh from man all praise of righteousnesse and assigneth it wholly to the grace of God, yet he referreth grace to sanctification, wherby we are renewed into newnesse of life by the holy Ghost.

16 But the Scripture, when it speaketh of y^e righteousnes of faith, leadeth vs to a far other ende, that is to say, that turning away frō the loking vpō our owne workes, we should only loke vnto the mercy of God & perfectiō of Christ. For it teacheth this order of iustification, that first God vouchsaueth to embrace man beinge a sinner with his mere & free goodnes, considering nothing in him but misery wherby he may be moued to mercy, forasmuch as he seeth him altogether naked & voide of good workes, fetching frō himselfe the cause to do him good: then, that he moueth the sinner himselfe with feeling of his goodnes, which despeiring vpon his owne workes casteth al y^e summe of his saluation vpon Gods mercy. This is the feelinge of faith, by which feling the sinner cōmeth into possession of his saluation, when he acknowledgeth by the doctrine of the Gospel that he is recōiled to God, that obtaininge forgiuenes of sinnes by meanes of the righ-teousnes of Christ, he is iustified: & although he be regenerate by the Spirite of God, he thinketh vpon continuall righteousnesse layed vp for him not in the good workes to which he applieth himself, but in y^e only righteousnes of Christ. Whē these things shalbe euery one particular

icularly weied, they shall giue a perfect declaration of our sentence. Albeit they might be better disposed in an other order thā they are set forth, But it maketh litle matter, so y they hang together in such sort that we may haue the whole matter truely declared & surely proued.

17 Here it is good to remember the relation that we haue before said to be betwene faith and the Gospell : because it is sayd for this cause that faith iustificeth, for that it receiueth & embraceth the righteousness offered in the gospel. And whereas it is sayd to be offered by the gospel, thereby all consideration of works is excluded Which thing Paul declareth many times else where, but most plainly in two places For, to the Romaines, cōparing the law & the gospel together Rom. 10 he sayth: the righteousness that is by the law is thus, the mā that doth 5. these things shall liue in them. But the righteousness that is of faith offereth saluation, if thou beleue in thy heart and confesse with thy mouth the Lord Iesus, & that the father hath raised him vp from the dead. See you not how he maketh this the difference of the law and the gospel, that the law giueth righteousness to workes, and the gospel giueth free righteousness without helpe of workes? it is a notable place, and that may deliuer vs out of many hard doutes, if we vnderstande that the same righteousness that is giuen vs by the gospel is free from all conditions of the law. This is the reason, why he doth more than once with great seeming of contrariety set the promise by way of opposition against the lawe, as if the inheritance be of the law, then is it not of the promise : and all the rest in the same chapter Ga. 3. 18 to the same effect. Truely the law it self hath also her promises. Therefore there must needes be in the promises of the gospell, somethinge different & diuerse from the promises of the law, vnlesse we will confesse that the comparison is very fonde. But what diuersity shall this be, vnlesse it be that they are freely giuen, and vpholden by the only mercy of God, whereas the promises of the law hang vpon the condition of workes. Neither lette any manne here carp against me, and say, that in this place the righteousness is reiected which menne of their owne force and freewill would compell God to receiue : forasmuch as Paul without exception teacheth that the law in commaun- Ro. 8. 2. dinge profiteth nothinge: because there is none not only of the common multitude, but also of the perfectest, that fulfilleth it. Loue vndoubtedly is the chiefe point of the law : when the Spirite of God frameth vs vnto it, why is it not to vs a cause of righteousness, but for that euen in the holy ones it is vnperfect, and therefore of it selfe deserueth no reward.

18 The second place is this. It is manifest that no man is iustified.

Cap. 11. Of the maner how to receiue

by the law before God: Because the righteous man shall liue by faith,

2. 3. 12 But the law is not of faith: but the man that doth these thinges shall liue in them. How coulde this argument otherwise stande together, vnlesse we agree vpon this point, that workes come not into the account of faith, but are vtterly to be seuered from it? The lawe (sayth he) differeth from faith. Why so? because workes are required to the righteousness thereof. Therefore it followeth that workes are not required to the righteousness of faith. By this relation it appeareth, that they which are iustified by faith are iustified beside the deseruing of workes, yea without the deseruing of workes, because faith receiueth that righteousness which the Gospel giueth. And the Gospel differeth from the law in this point, that it bindeth not righteousness to workes, but setteth it in the only mercy of God. Like hereunto is that 0m. 4. which he affirmeth to the Romaines, that Abraham had nothinge to glory vpon, because faith was imputed to him vnto righteousness, & he addeth a confirmation, because then there is place for the righteousness of faith, whē there are no workes to which a reward is due. Where be workes (sayth he) due reward is rendered vnto them: that which is giuen to faith is freely giuen. For the very meaninge of the words that he vseth in that place serue to proue the same. Whereas he adioyneth within a litle after, that therefore we obtaine the inheritāce by faith as according to grace, hereupon he gathereth that the inheritance is of free gift, because it is receiued by fayth: and howe cometh y, but because faith without any help of workes leaneth wholly vpon the mercy of God? And in the same meaning, without dout he 0m. 3. teacheth in an other place, that the righteousness of God was openly shewed without the law, although it haue witness borne of it by the law & the Prophets: because excluding the law, he sayth that it is not holpen by workes, and that we obtaine it not by working, but come empty that we may receiue it.

19 By this time the reader perceiueth with what equity the Sophisters do at this day cauill at our doctrine, when we say that man is iustified by faith only. They dare not deny that man is iustified by faith because it is so often found in Scripture: but because this word, Only, is neuer expressed, they can not abide to haue such an addition made. Is it so? But what will they answer to these wordes of Paule, where 0. 4. 2. he affirmeth that righteousness is not of faith except it be freely giuen? Howe can free gift agree with workes? And with what cauillations will they mocke out, that which he sayth in an other place, that 0m. 1. the righteousness of God is manifestly shewed in the Gospell? If 7. righteousness be manifestly shewed in the Gospell, surely therein is contained not a torne or halfe righteousnesse but full and perfect. Therefore the law hath no place therein. And they stand vpon not onely a false but also a foolish shift about this exclusiue word, Only. Doth not he perfectly enough giue all things to onely fayth; that taketh all things from workes? What, I pray you meane these say- Rom. 3. 21. & 24. ings: that righteousnesse was manifestly shewed without the lawe: that man is iustified freely and without the workes of the lawe? Here they haue a witty shift to escape withall, which although they deuised it not theselues but borrowed it of Origen & certaine of the old wryters, yet is very foolish. They prate that the ceremoniall workes of the law, not the morall, are excluded. They profit so with continuall brawlinge, that they knowe not the very first rules of Logike. Do they thinke that the Apostle doted when he alleaged these places to proue his sayinge? The man that shall do these things shall liue in Ga. 3. 12. them: and, Cursed is euery one that fulfilleth not all things that are wrytten in the volume of the lawe. Vnlesse they be madde, they will not say that life was promised to the keepers of Ceremonies, or curse threatened onely to the breakers of them. If these places be to be vnderstanded of the morall law, it is no dout that the morall workes also are excluded from the power of iustifying. To the same purpose serue Rom. 3. 20. & 4. 15. these argumentes that he vseth: because the knowledge of sinne was by the lawe, therefore righteousnesse is not by the lawe. Because the lawe worketh wrath, therefore it worketh not righteousnesse. Because the lawe can not make conscience assured, therefore also it can not giue righteousnesse. Because faith is imputed vnto righteousnesse, therefore righteousnesse is not a reward of worke, but is giuen beinge not due. Because we are iustified by faith, therefore gloryng is cutte of. If there had bin a law giuen that might giue life, Ga. 3. 21. then righteousnesse were truely by the law: but God hath shutte vp all vnder sinne that the promise might be giuen to the beleuers. Let them nowe fondly say if they dare, that these things are spoken of ceremonies and not of manners: but very children would hisse out so great shamelesnesse. Therefore let vs holde this for certaine, that the whole lawe is spoken of, when the power of iustifyinge is taken away from the law.

120 But if any man maruell why the Apostle vsed such an addition, not beinge content with onely naming of workes: the reason is ready to be shewed for it. For, although workes be so hiely esteemed, yet they haue that value by the allowance of God, rather than by their owne worthinesse. For who can boast vnto God of any righteousnesse of workes, but that which he hath allowed? Who dare claime any reward as due vnto thē, but such as he hath promised? They haue therefore this of the bountifulnes of God, y they are cōpted worthy both of the name & reward of righteousnesse. & they be of value only for this cause, whē the purpose of him that doth them is by thē to shew his obediēce to God. Wherefore y Apostle in an other place, to proue that Abraham could not be iustified by workes, alleageth that y law was giuen, almost foure hundred & thirty yeares after the couenant made. Vnlearned mē would laugh at such an argumēt, because there might be righteous workes before the publishing of the law. But because he knew y there was no such value in workes but by the testimony & vouchsauiing of God, therefore he taketh it as a thing cōfessed y before the law they had no power to iustifie. We vnderstand why he namely expresseth y worke of the law, whē he meaneth to take away iustification from any workes because controuersy may be moued of those & none other. Albeit somtime he excepteth all workes without any addition, as when he sayth, that by the testimony of Dauid blessednes is assigned to that man, to whom the Lord imputeth righteousness without workes. Therefore they can with no cauillations bring to passe, but that we shal get this general exclusiue, only. And they do in vaine seeke that trifling suttely, that we are iustified by that only faith which worketh by loue, so that righteousness must stande vpon loue. We graunt in deede with Paul, that no other faith iustifieth, but that which is effectually workinge with charity: but that faith taketh not her power of iustifying from that effectualnes of charity. Yea it doth by no other meane iustifie, but because it bringeth vs into the communicating of the righteousness of Christ. Or else all that which the Apostle so earnestly preffeth, shoulde fall to nought. To him that worketh (sayth he) the reward is not reckened accordinge to grace, but accordinge to det. But to him that worketh not, but beleueth in him that iustifieth the vnrighteous, his faith is imputed vnto righteousness, Could he speake more evidently than in so saying, that there is no righteousness of faith but where there are no works to which any reward is due: & that onely then faith is imputed vnto righteousness, when righteousness is giuen by grace that is not due.

21 Now let vs examine how true that is, which is sayd in the definition, that the righteousness of faith is the recōciliation with God, which consisteth vpon the only forgiuenes of sinnes. We must alway returne to this principle, that the wrath of God resteth vpon all mē, so long as they continue to be sinners. That hath Esay excellētly wel set out in these wordes: The hand of the Lord is not shortned, that he is not able to saue: nor his care dulled that he cā not heare: but your iniqui-iniquities haue made disagreemēt betwene you & your God, & your sinnes haue hidden his face from you that he heareth you no: . We heare that sinne is the diuision betwene man & God, & the turning away of Gods face from the sinner. Neither can it otherwise be. For it is disagreeing frō his righteousnes to haue any fellowship with sinne. Wherefore the Apostle teacheth that man is enemy to God till he be restored into fauour by Christ. Whom therefore the Lord receiueth into ioyninge with him, him he is sayd to iustifie: because he can neither receiue him into fauour nor ioyne him with himselfe, but he must of a sinner make him righteous. And we further say, that this is done by the forgiuenesse of sinnes. For if they whom the Lord hath reconciled to himselfe be iudged by their workes, they shalbe found stil sinners in deede, who yet must be free & cleane from sinne. It is certaine therefore that they whom God embraceth, are no otherwise made righteous; but because they are cleansed by hauing the spottes of their sinnes wiped away by forgiuenes, that such a righteousnesse may in one word be called the forgiuenes of sinnes.

221 Both these are most clerely to be seene by these words of Paul, which I haue already alleaged : God was in Christ reconcilinge the world to himselfe, not imputing their sinnes to man, & he hath left with vs the word of reconciliatiō. And then he addeth the summe of his message, that him which knew no sinne he made sinne for vs, that we might be made the righteousnes of God in him. Here he nameth righteousnesse and reconciliation without difference, that we may perceiue that the one is mutually contained vnder the other. And he teacheth the manner to attaine this righteousnesse to be when our sinnes are not imputed vnto vs. Wherefore dout thou not hereafter how God doth iustifie vs, when thou hearest that he doth reconcile vs to himselfe by not imputing sinnes. So to y Romaines he pro- ueth by the testimony of Dauid, that righteousnes is impued to man without workes; because Dauid pronounceth the man blessed whose iniquities are forgiuen, whose sinnes are couered, to whom the Lord hath not imputed his offenses. Without dout by blessednes he there meaneth righteousnesse. As sith he affirmeth the same to stande in the forgiuenesse of sinnes; there is no cause why we should otherwise define it. Therefore Zacharie the father of Iohn the Baptist singeth that the knowledge of saluatiō consisteth in the forgiuenes of sinnes. Which rule Paule followinge in his Sermon which he made to the Antiochians concerninge the summe of saluation, as Luke reporteth it, concluded in this maner: by him forgiuenes of sinnes is preached vnto you, & eucry one that beleueth in him is iustified from all these things, fō w^e could not be iustified in the law of Moses. The Apostle so knitteth the forgiuenes of sinnes with righteousnes, y^e he sheweth y^e they be both; all one. Wherupō he rightfully reasoneth y^e the righteousnes is freely giuen vnto vs, which we obtaine by the louing kindnes of God. Neither ought it to seme a strāge vnused speach, that the faithful are righteous before God, not by workes, but by free acceptatiō: sith both it is so oft found in y^e Scripture, & the old authors also do somitime so speake. For Augustin saith thus in one place: The righteousnes of the saintes in this world stādeth rather in forgiuenes of sinnes, thā in perfection of vertues. Wherwith agreeth the notable sentēces of Bernard: Not to sinne is the righteousnes of God: but y^e righteousnes of man, is the merciful kindenes of God. He had before affirmed that Christ is to vs righteousnes in absolution, and therefore that thēy only are righteous that haue obtained pardon by mercy.

23. Herupō also followeth this, that by the only meane of Christes righteousnes, we obtain to be iustified before God. Which is asmuch in effect as if it were said, y^e mā is not righteous in himself, but because the righteousnes of Christ is by imputatiō enterpartened with him, which thing is worthy to be heedefully marked. For y^e triflinge error vanisheth away, to say y^e mā is therefore iustified by faith, because faith taketh part of the Spirit of God by which he is made righteous, which is so cōtrary to the doctrine aboue taught, y^e they can neuer be made to agree together. For it is nō dout y^e he is void of his own righteousnes, y^e is taught to seke righteousnes without himselfe. This the Apostle affirmeth most plainly when he writeth y^e he which knew no sinne was made for vs a propitiatory sacrifice to cleanse away sinne, that we might be made the righteousnes of God in him. You see y^e our righteousnes is not in vs but in Christ, & y^e it belongeth to vs only by this title, because we be partakers of Christ, because we possesse all his riches with him. And it maketh nothing to the contrary y^e in an other place he teacheth, y^e sinne was condēned of sinne in the flesh of Christ, that the righteousnesse of the law might be fulfilled in vs: where he meaneth no other fulfillinge, but y^e which we obtaine by imputation. For the Lorde Christ doth in such sort cōmunicate his righteousnes with vs, that after a certaine maruellous maner, he poureth the force therof into vs, so much as pertaineth to the iudgement of God. It appeareth that he did no other wise meane, by y^e other sentēce which he had spoken a litle before: As by the disobediēce of one man we were made sinners, so by the obedience of one mā we are iustified. What is it else to set our righteousnes in y^e obedience of Christ, but to affirme that hereby only we are accōpted righteous, because the obediēce of Christ Christ is imputed vnto vs as if it were our owne? Therefore me thinks that Ambrose hath excellētly well shewed how there is an example of this righteousnes in the blessing of Iacob. For as Iacob hauing not of himselfe deserued the preeminency of the first begotten sonne, hid himselfe in the apparel of his brother, & being clothed with his brothers cote y^e sauored of a most swete smell, he crept into y^e fauour of his father, & receiued the blessing to his owne commodity vnder the person of an other: so we do lie hiddē vnder the precious purenes of Christ our elder brother, that we may get a testimony of righteousnes in y^e sight of God. The words of Ambrose are these: Whereas Isaac smelt the sauour of the garmentes, paradventure this is meant therby, that we are not iustified by workes but by faith: because fleshly weakenes hindreth workes, but the brightnes of faith which meriteth forgiuenes of sinnes, ouershadoweth the error of deedes. And truely so it is. For, that we may appeare before the face of God vnto saluation, it is necessary for vs, to smell sweetely with his odour, and to haue our faultes couered and barred with his perfection.

The xij. Chapter.

That, to the end vve may be fully persvaded of the free iustification, vve must lift vp our mindes to the iudgement seate of God.

ALthough it appeareth by most eident testimonies, that all these things are true, yet we shall not clearly perceiue how necessary they be, vntill we haue set before our eyes those things y^e ought to be the grounds of all this disputation. First therefore let vs remember this, that we purpose not to speake of the righteousnesse of a worldly iudicial court, but of the heauenly iudgement seate: that we should not measure by our owne small portiō, by what vprightnes of workes Gods iudgement may be satisfied. But it is maruelous to see with what rashnes & boldnes it is commonly debated. Yea & it is to be seene how none do more boldly or with fuller mouthes (as the saying is) prate of the righteousnes of workes, than they y^e are either monstuously sicke of open outward diseases, or be ready to burst with inward vices. That cometh to passe because they thinke not vpon the righteousnes of God, whereof if they had neuer so litle feelinge, they would neuer make so great a mockery of it. And truely it is out of measure lightly regarded, when it is not acknowledged to be such & so perfect that nothing be imputed vnto it but euery way whole & absolute, & defiled with no vncleanness: such as neuer was & neuer shall be able to be founde in man. It is in deede easie and ready for euery man in Schooles to talke vainely vpon the worthines of workes to iustifie men. But when they come into the sight of God, such dalliances must auoide, because there is earnest doing vsed, and no trifling strife about words. To this, to this I say, we must apply our minde, if we wil profitably enquire of true righteousnes, how we may answere the heavenly iudge when he calleth vs to accompt. Lette vs thinke him to be a iudge, not such a one as our owne vnderstandings do of themselues imagine: but such a one as he is painted out in the Scripture, with whose brightnes the starres shalbe darkened, by whose strength the hills do melt away, by whose wrath the earth is shaken, by whose wisdom the wise are taken in their suttelty, by whose pure-nesse all things are proued vnpure, whose righteousnesse the Angels are not able to beare, which maketh the innocent not innocēt, whose vengeance when it is once kindled pearceth to the bottome of hel. If he (I say) sit to examine mens doinges, who shall appeare assured before his throne? who shall dwell with a deuouringe fier? sayth the Prophet. Who shall abide with continuall burninges? he that walketh in righteousnesse & speaketh trueth, &c. But let such a one come forth, whatsoeuer he be. But that aunswere maketh, that none commeth forth. For this terrible saying soundeth to the contrary: Lord if thou marke iniquities, Lorde, who shal abide it? truely all must needes immediately perish, as it is wrytten in an other place: Shall man be iusti-fied if he be compared with God, or shall he be purer thā his maker?

 Beholde they that serue him are not faithful, and he hath found per-uersnes in his Angels. How much more shal they that dwel in houses of clay, & that haue an earthly fundation, be consumed with mothes? they shalbe cut downe from the morninge to the euening. Beholde amonge his Saintes there is none faithfull, and the heauens are not cleane in his sight: how much more is man abhominable and vnprofitable, which drinketh iniquity as water? I graunt in dede that in the booke of Iob, is mention made of a righteousnesse that is hier than the keeping of the law. And it is good to vnderstand this distinction: because although a man did satisfie the law, yet he could not so stand to the triall of that righteousnesse that passeth all senses. Therefore although Iob be cleare in his owne conscience, yet he is amased, and not able to speake because he seeth that very angelike holinesse can not appease God, if he exactly weye their workes. But I therefore will at this time ouerpasse that righteousnesse which I haue spoken of, because it is incomprehensible: but only this I say, that if our life be examined by the rule of the wrytten law, we are more than senseles if so many curses wherwith the Lord hath willed vs to be awaked do not torment vs with horrible feare, & amonge other this generall curse, Cursed is euery one that doth not abide in all the thinges that are

are wrytten in the booke. Finally all this discourse shalbe but vnfauory and cold, vnlesse euery man yelde himselfe guilty before the heauenly iudge, and willingly throw downe and abace himselfe, beinge carefull how he may be acquitted.

2 To this, to this I say, we should haue lifted vp our eies, to learne rather to tremble for feare, than vainly to reioise. It is in deede easie, so long as y^e cōparison extendeth no further than men, for euery man to thinke himselfe to haue somewhat which other ought not to despise. But when we rise vp to haue respect vnto God than suddenly y^e confidence falleth to the ground & commeth to nought. And in the same case altogether is our soule in respect of God, as mans body is in respect of the heauen. For the sight of the eie, so long as it cōtinueth in vewing things that lie nere vnto it, doth shew of what pearcing force it is, but if it be once directed vp to the sunne, then beinge daseled and dulled with the too great brightnes therof, it feleth no lesse feblenes of it selfe in beholding of the sunne, thā it perceiued strength in beholding inferiour things. Therefore let vs not deceiue our selues with vaine confidence, although we compt our selues either egall or superiour to other men: but that is nothing to God, by whose will this knowledge is to be tried. But if our wildenes can not be tamed with these admonitions, he will answere to vs as he sayd to the Pharisees: you be they that iustifie your selues before mē: but that which is hie to men is abhominable to God. Now go thy way and proudly boast of thy righteousnes among men, while God from heauen abhorreth it. But what say the seruantes of God that are truely instructed with his Spirit? Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, because euery living man shal not be iustified in thy sight. An other sayth, although in somewhat diuerse meaning. Man can not be righteous with God: if he will contende with him, he shall not be able to answere one for a thousand. Here we now plainely heare what is the righteousnesse of God, euen such as can be satisfied with no workes of men, to whom when it examineth vs of a thousande offences, we can not purge our selues of one. Such a righteousnes had that same chosen iustrument of God Paule conceiued, when he profess'd that he knew himselfe guilty in nothing, but that he was not thereby iustified.

3 And not only such exāples are in the holy Scriptures, but also all godly wryters do shewe that they were alway of this minde. So Augustine sayth. All the godly that grone vnder this burden of corruptible flesh, and in this weakenesse of life haue this only hope that we haue one mediator Iesus Christ the righteous, and he is the appeasement for our sinnes. What sayth he? If this be their only hope, where is the confidence of workes? For when he calleth it only, he leaueth none other. And Bernard sayth. And in deede where is safe & stedfast rest & assurednes for the weake, but in the woundes of the Sauour? & so much the surer I dwell therein as he is mightier to saue. The world rageth, the body burdeneth, the deuill lieth in waite. I fall not, because I am builded vpon the sure rocke. I haue sinned a grieuous sinne, my conscience is troubled, but it shal not be ouertrobled, because I shall remember the woundes of the Lord. And hereupon afterward he concludeth: Therefore my merite is the Lords takinge of mercy, I am not vtterly without merite, so long as he is not without mercies. But if the mercies of the Lord be many, then I also haue as many merites. Shal I sing mine owne righteousnesse? Lord I will remeber only thy righteousnes. For that is also my righteousnes, for he is made vnto me righteousnes of God. Againe in an other place. This is y whole merite of man, if he put his whole hope in him that saueh whole mā. Likewise where retaining peace to himselfe he leaueth the glory to God. To thee (sayth he) let glory remaine vnminished: it shal be well with me, if I haue peace. I forswere glory altogether, least if I wrongfully take vpon me that which is not mine owne, I loose also y which is offred me. And more plainly in an other place he sayth: Why should the church be careful of merites, which hath a surer & safer way to glory vpon the purpose of God? So there is no cause why thou shouldest aske, by what merites we hope for good things, specially when thou hearest in the Prophet, I wil do it, not for your sakes, but for mine own sake, sayth the Lord. It sufficeth for merite, to know that merites suffice not. But as it sufficeth for merit not to presume of merites, so to be without merites sufficeth to iudgement. Whereas he freely vseth this word Merites for good workes, we must therein beare with the custome. But in the end his purpose was to make hipocrites afrayd, that wildly range with licentiousnesse of sinning against the grace of God. As afterward he expoundeth himselfe, saying: Happy is the Church that neither wāteh merites without presumption, nor presumption without merites. It hath whereupon to presume, but not merites. It hath merites, but to deserue not to presume. Is not the very not presuming a deseruing? Therefore it presumeth so much the more boldly, because it presumeth not, hauing large matter to glory vpon, euen the many mercies of the Lord.

4 This is the trueth. The exercised consciences perceiue this to be the onely sanctuary of safety, wherein they may safely rest themselves when they haue to do with the iudgement of God. for if the Statres that seemed most bright in the night season, do loose their

brightnesse with light of y^e sunne, what thinke we shall become euen of the rarest innocencie of man, when it shalbe compared with the purenesse of God? For that shalbe a most seuerer examination, that shall pearce into the most hidden thoughtes of the heart, and (as Paule saith) shall reuele the secretes of darknesse, and disclose the hidden thinges of the heart, which shall compell the lurking and vnwilling conscience to vtter all thinges that now are fallen out of remembrance. The Deuell our accuser will presse vs, which is priuie to all the wicked deedes that he hath moued vs to do. There the outward pompous shewes of good workes which now onely are esteemed, shall nothing profit vs. Onely the purenesse of will shalbe required. Wherefore the Hypocrisie, not onely whereby euery man knowing himselfe gilty before God desireth to boast himselfe before men, but also wherewith euery man deceiueth himselfe before God (as we be all inclined to stroke and flatter our selues) shall fall downe confounded, howsoeuer it now be proude with more than drunken boldnesse. They that bend not their wit to such a sight, may in deede for a short time swetely & pleasantly frame a righteousnes to themselves, but it is such a righteousnesse as shalbe by and by shaken away from them at the iudgement of God: like as great riches heaped vp in a dreame do vanish away from men when they awake. But they that shall earnestly as it were in the sight of God, enquire of the true rule of righteousnesse, shall certainly finde that all the workes of mē, if they be iudged by their owne worthines, are nothing but defilings and filthinesse: that that which among the common people is accounted righteousnesse, is before God mere wickednesse: that that which is iudged puritie, is vnclennesse: that that which is reckened glorie, is but shame.

5 From this beholding of the perfection of God, let it not greue vs to descend to loke vpon our selues without flatterie or blinde affectiō of loue. For it is no maruell if we be all so blinde in this behalf, for asmuch as none of vs doth beware, of the pestilent tendernesse toward himselfe, which (as the Scripture crieth out) naturally sticketh fast in vs all. To euery man (saith Salomon) his owne way is right in his owne eyes. Againe. All the wayes of man seme cleane in his owne eyes. But what? Is he acquitted by this blindness? No. But (as he further saith in the same place) the Lord weyeth the heartes, that is to say, while man flattereth himselfe by reason of the outward visor of righteousnesse that he beareth in resemblance, in the meane time the Lorde with his balance examineth the hidden vnclennes of the heart. Therefore sith we so nothing profit with such flatteries, let vs not wilfully mocke our selues to our owne destruction. But that we may trie our selues rightly, we must necessarily call back our cōscience to the iudgement seate of God. For we do altogether neede his light to disclose the secret foldinges of our peruersnesse, which otherwise lie too depely hidden. For then, and neuer till then, we shall clerely perceiue what is meant hereby: that man being rottenesse and a worme, abhominable and vaine, which drinketh wickednes as water is far from being iustified before God. For who shoulde make that cleane that is conceiued of vnclane seede? not one man. Then shall we also finde that by experience, which Iob said of himselfe: If I will go about to shew my selfe innocent, mine owne mouth shall condemne me: if I will shewe my selfe righteous, it will proue me wicked. For that is not meant of one age onely, but of all ages, which the Prophet in old time complained of Israel, that all went astray like shepe, that euery one turned aside to his owne way. For he there cōprehēdeth all them, to whom the grace of redemption should come. And the rigorousnesse of this examination ought to procede so far, till it subdue vs, so that we be fully throwen downe withall, and by that meane prepare vs to receiue the grace of Christ. For he is deceiued that thinketh himselfe able to receiue the enjoying of this grace, vntill he haue first throwen downe all hawtines of minde. This is a knowen saying: that God confoundeth the proude, and geueth grace to the humble.

6 But what way is there to humble our selues, but that we being altogether needy and empty, should geue place to the mercy of God? For I do not call it humbleness, if we thinke that we haue any thing remaining with vs. And hetherto they haue taught a very hurtfull hypocrisie, hat haue ioined these two things together, that we must thinke humbly of our selues before God, & that we must make some accompt of our owne righteousness. For if we confesse to God contrarie to our owne thinking, we do wickedly lie vnto him: but we can not thinke as we ought, but that by and by all that seemeth glorious in vs must be troden vnder foote. Therefore when thou hearest in the Prophet, that there is prepared saluation for the humble people, and abacement for the eyes of the wicked: First thinke, that there is no entrie open to saluation, vntill thou haue layed away all pride and taken to thee perfect humbleness: then, that the same humbleness is not a certaine modesty whereby thou geuest ouer to the Lord a heare bredth of thine owne right, as they are called humble before men that do neither presumptuously aduaunce themselves, nor reprochfully triumph ouer other, although they stand vpon some estimation mation of their owne excellence: but an vnfaigned submission of a minde throwen downe with feling of his owne miserie and needinesse. For it is so echewhere described in the worde of God. When the Lorde saith thus in Zephānias: I will take away out of thee him that outragiously reioiseth, and I will leaue in the middes of thee the afflicted man, and the proore man, and they shall trust in the Lorde: doth he not there plainly shewe who be humble? euen they that lie afflicted with knowledge of their owne pouertie. On the other side he calleth the proude, outragious reioisers, because men ioying in prosperitie are wont to reioise without measure. Būt to the humble whom he purposeth to saue, he leaueth nothing but to trust in the Lorde. And likewise it is said in Esaye: Whom shall I looke vnto, but to the poore and contrite in spirit, and him that feareth my wordes? Againe: The hie and excellent, that inhabiteth eternitie, his name is holy, that dwelleth on hie, and in the holy place, and with the contrite and humble spirit, to quicken the spirit of the humble and the heart of the contrite. When thou so oft hearest the name of contrition, vnderstand thereby the wound of the heart, that suffreth not a man throwen downe on the ground to rise againe. With such contrition ought thy heart to be wounded, if thou wilt according to the saying of God be aduanced with the humble. If that be not done, thou shalt be brought lowe with the mighty hande of God to thy shame and disgracement.

7 And our best Schoolemaister thinking it not enough to shewe it out in wordes; hath also set out vnto vs in a parable the image of true humilitie as in a painted table. For he bringeth forth a Publicane Luc. 18. 13.
 that standing a far of, not daring to lifte vp his eyes to heauen, with much knocking his brest prayeth in this wise: Lorde be mercifull to me a sinner. Let vs not thinke these to be tokens of fained modestie, that he dare not loke vp to heauen, nor to come nerer, that with knocking his brest he confesseth himselfe a sinner: but let vs know that they bee testimonies of inward affection. On the other side he setteth the Pharisee, which thanketh God that he is not of the common sorte of men, either an oppresser, or an vnrighteous man, or an adulterer, bycause he fasted twise on the Sabbat, and gaue tithes of all that he possessed. He doth with open cōfession acknowledge that the righteousnesse which he hath is the gift of God: but bycause he standeth in confidence that he is righteous, he departeth from God vnfaured & in hatred. The Publicane by acknowledging of his own wickednesse is iustified. Hereby we may se, howe great is the estimation of our humbling vs before God: so that the heart can not be open to receiue his mercie, vnlesse it be first voided of all opinion of his owne worthinesse. When this opinion hath possessed the place, it shutteth vp the way for Gods mercie to entre. And that no man should doubt hereof, Christ was sent of his father into the earth with this commission, to bring glad tidings to the poore, to heale the contrite in heart, to preach libertie to the captiue, and deliuerance to them that were shut vp in prison, & to comfort them that mourne: to geue them glorie for ashes, oyle for mourninge, the robe of praise for the spirit of sorrowe. According to this commission, he calleth none but them that labour and are loden to take part of his liberalitie. And in an other place he saith: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners.

8 Therefore if we will geue place to the calling of Christ, let all arrogancy & carelesnesse depart far away from vs. Arrogancy groweth of a foolish persuasion of our owne righteousnesse, when a man thinketh himselfe to haue somewhat, by the deseruing whereof he may be commended before God, carelesnesse may be euen without any persuasion of workes. For many sinners, because being dronke with sweetness of vices they thinke not vpon the iudgement of God, lie as it were senselessly amased with a disease of drouinesse, that they aspire not to the mercie offered them. But we must no lesse shake of such dull sluggishnesse, than we must cast away all vaine confidence of our selues, that we may without encombrance hasten to Christ, that we being empty and hungry may be filled with his good things. For we shall neuer sufficiently haue trust in him, vnlesse we vterly distrust of our selues, we shall neuer sufficiently raise vp our courages in him, vnlesse they be first throwen downe in our selues. We shall neuer sufficiently haue consolation in him, vnlesse we be first desolate in our selues. Therefore we be then mete to take hold of and obtaine the fauour of God, casting away all trust of our selues, but trusting vpon the onely assurednesse of his goodnesse, when (as Augustine saith) forgetting our owne deseruings, we embrace the giftes of Christ. Because if he sought deseruings in vs, we should not come to his giftes. Wherewith Bernard very well accordeth, comparing proude men to vnfaithfull seruantes, that arrogantly claime any thing be it neuer so litle to their owne deseruings: because they do wrongfully keepe to themselues the praise of grace passing by them, as if a wall would say that it bringeth forth the sunbeame which it receiueth through a window. But, not to tary longer herevpon, let vs take a short but a generall and sure rule, that he is prepared to take parte of the frutes of Gods mercie, that hath vterly emptied himselfe, I will not say of righteousnesse, which is none at all, but of the vaine and windie image of righteousnes. Because euery man so much hindereth his receiuing of the liberaltie of God as he resteth in himselfe.

The xiiij. Chapter.

That there are two things to be marked in free iustification.

ANd here are alway two things to be principally looked vnto: that is to say, that there may remaine to the Lorde his glorie vnminished, and as it were wholly and perfectly mainteined, and to our consciences an vntroubled quietnesse and calme tranquillitie before his iudgement. We see how oft and how earnestly the Scripture exhorteth vs, to geue onely to God a confession of praise, when we entreate of righteousnes. And the Apostle testifieth, Rom. 3. 15. that this was the Lordes principall purpose of geuing vs righteousnesse in Christ, that he might shewe his owne righteousnesse. And what a shewing that should be, he declareth immediatly after: that is, if he alone be knowen to be righteous, and that iustified him that is of the faith of Iesus Christ. Thou seest that the righteousnesse of God is not sufficiētly set out, vnlesse he alone be accompted righteous, and do communicate the grace of righteousnesse to them that deserue it not. By this meane he will haue euery mouth to be stopped, and the whole World to be made subiect to him. For while man hath any thing to speake in his owne defence, so long there is somewhat taken away from the glory of God. So in Ezechiel he teacheth Ezc. 20. 42. howe much we glorifie his name by rekneweledging of our owne wickednesse. You shall remember (sayeth he) the wayes and all the wicked doinges wherewith ye haue bene defiled. And ye shall be displeas'd with your selues in your owne sight, in all the euels that ye haue committed. And ye shall knowe that I am the Lorde, when I shall do good to you for mine owne names sake, and not according to your most wicked offences. If these things be contened in the true knowledge of God, that we being broosed with knowledge of our owne iniquitie, should consider that he doth good to vs wherē as we be vnworthy therof: why then do we to our great hurt attempt to steale away from the Lorde any parcell be it neuer so small of the praise of his free goodnesse? Like wise Ieremie when he crieth out, Iere. 9. 13. Let not the wise man glorie in his wisdome, or the riche man in his richesse, or the strong man in his strength, but let him that glorieth, glorie in the Lorde: doth he not there declare that somewhat is diminished from Gods glorie, if man glorie in him selfe? To this pur-

Cap. 13. Of the maner how to receiue

1. Cor. 1.30. pose truely doth Paule apply those wordes, when he teacheth that all the partes of our saluation are reposed in Christ, that we shoulde not glory but in the Lord. For his meaning is that he riseth vp against God and darkeneth his glorie, whosoever thinketh that he hath any thing be it neuer so litle of his owne:

2 This is the truth, we neuer truely glorie in him, vnlesse we be vtterly put from our own glory. On the other side, this is to be holdē for a catholike principle, that all they glorie against God that glorie in them selues, For Paule iudgeth that onely by this meane the world is made subiect to God, when all matter to glorie vpon is vtterly taken from men. Therefore Esaye, when he declareth that Israel shall haue their iustificatiō in God, saith also that they shal there also haue their prayse: as though he should say, that the Lorde to this endē iustificieth the elect that they should glorie in him and in nothing els. But howe we ought to be praised in the Lorde, he had taught in the verse next before: that is, that we should sweare that our righteousnes and strength are in the Lorde. Not that there is not required a bare confession, but confirmed with an othe, that a man should not thinke that he shall be discharged with I wote not what fained humilitie. And let no man here allege for excuse, that he doth not glorie when without arrogance he reknowledgeth his owne righteousness: for there can be no such estimation but it engendreth confidence, nor confidence but it bredeth glorie. Therefore let vs remember that in all the disputation of righteousness we must haue regard to this endē, that the praise thereof remaine with the Lord whole and perfect. For as much as for declaration of his righteousness (as the Apostle testifieth) he hath poured out his grace vpon vs, that he might be iust and iustifying him that is of the faith of Christ. Wherefore in an other place, when he had taught that the Lorde gaue vs saluation, to set out the glorie of his name, afterward as it were repeting the same thing he addeth: ye are saued by grace and by the gift of God, not by workes, that none should glorie. And when Peter telleth that we are called vnto hope of saluation that we shoulde declare the powers of him that hath called vs out of darkenesse into his maruelous light, without doubt his meaning is so to make the onely praises of God to sound in the eares of the faithfull, that they should with depe silence oppresse all arrogancie of the flesh. In a summe, man can not without robbery of God challenge to him selfe any one crum of righteousness: because euen so much is plucked and taken away from the glorie of Gods righteousness.

3 Now if we aske by what meane the conscience may be quited before before God, we shall finde no other meane but if free tightheousnesse be geuen vs by the gift of God: Let vs alway think vpon this saying of Salomon, Who shall say: I haue cleansed my heart, I am made cleane from my sinne? Truly there is no man that shall not be ouerwhelmed with infinite filthinesse. Therefore let euen the perfectest man descende into his owne conscience, and call his doinges to accompt: what ende shall he haue? Shall he swetely rest as though all thinges were in good order betwene him and God? and shall he not rather be vexed with terrible torments, when he shall fele matter of damnation abiding in him selfe if he be iudged according to his workes? The conscience, if it loke vpon God, must of necessitie either haue assured peace with his iudgement, or be beseged with the terrours of helle. Therefore we profit nothing in disputing of righteousnesse vnlesse we stablish such a righteousnesse, with the stedfastnesse wherof our soule may be stayed in the iudgement of God. When our soule shall haue whereby it may both without feare appeare before the face of God, and receiue his iudgement, vnshaken, then and not till then let vs knowe that we haue found an vnfained righteousnesse. Therefore not without cause the Apostle standeth so much vpon this point, with whose wordes I had rather expresse it than with mine own. If (saith he) the promise of inheritance be of the law, faith is made voide, the promise is made abolished. He first inferreth that faith is disanulled & made voide if the promisse of righteousnesse haue respect to the deseruings of our workes, or do hang vpon the keeping of the law, For so could neuer any man assuredly rest in it: because it could neuer come to passe that any man might assuredly determine with him selfe that he had satisfied the law, as in deede neuer any man doth by workes fully satisfie it. Whereof, that we should not neede to seke far for testimonies to proue it, euery man may be a witnessse to him selfe that will with a right eye behold him selfe. And herby appeareth, in how depe and darke corners hypocrisie buried the mindes of men, while they so carelesly beare with themselues, that they stick not to set their own flatteries against the iudgement of God, as though they would binde to a stay of his iudiciall proceding, but the faithfull that do sincerely examine them selues, are greued and tormented with a far other manner of carefulnesse. Therefore there should so entre into all mindes a doubting, and at length a very despeire where eche man for him selfe should make accompt, with how great a burden of det he is still overpressed, and how far he is from the condition wherwith he is charged. Lo, how faith is by this meane already expresse and extinguished. For to wauer, to varie, to be carried vp and downe, to sticke fast in doubting, to be holden in suspéce, to stagger, and at length to despire, is not to trust: but to strengthen thy minde with cōstant certaintie and perfect assurednes, & to haue wherevpon to rest and fasten thy foote.

Pro. 20.

Cap. 13. Of the maner how to receiue

4 He adioineth also an other thing; that is, that the promise shall thereby be made of no effect and void. For if the fulfilling thereof do hang vpon our deseruing, when shall we come thus farre as to deserue the bountifulnes of God? Also this second point hangeth vpon the former: For the promise shall not be fulfilled but to them that beleue it. Therefore if faith be fallen, there shal remaine no force of the promise, Therefore the inheritance is of faith, that it may be according to grace, to stablish the promise. For it is abundantly well stablished when it resteth vpon the onely mercy of God: because his mercy & truth are with a perpetuall knot ioined together, that is to say, whatsoeuer God mercifully promiseth, he also faithfully performeth. So David, before that he required saluation by the worde of God, first determineth the cause thereof to be in his mercy. Let thy mercies (saith he) come vnto me, thy saluatiō according to thy word. And rightfully: bycause God is by no other meane perswaded to make the promise, but of his owne mere mercie. Therefore we must herein stay, and deeply fasten all our hope and not to looke to our own works, to seke any helpe of them. And that you should not think that I herein speake any new thing: Augustine doth also teache that we ought so to do. Christ (saith he) shall reigne for euer in his seruantes, God hath promised it, God hath said it, and if that be not enough, God hath sworne it. Therefore forasmuch as the promise is stablished, not according to our deseruinges, but according to his mercie, no mā ought to speake fearefully of that of which he can not doubt. Bernarde also saith: The disciples of Christ say, Who canne be saued? But he answered: this is impossible with menne, but it is not impossible with God. This is all our confidence, this is our onely comforte, this is the whole grounde of our hope, but being assured of the possibilitie, what say we of his will? Who knoweth whether he be worthy of loue or hatred? Who hath knowen the Lords meaning? Or who hath bene his counseller? Here now faith must of necessitie helpe vs, here must his truth succour vs, that that which is hidden from vs in the heart of the father, may be reueled by the Spirit, and his Spirit testifying it may perswade our heartes that we are the sonnes of God. And it may perswade vs by calling and iustifying vs freely by faith, in which things there is as it were a certaine meane passage from the eternal predestination to the glorie that is to come. Briefely let vs thus conclude. The Scripture declareth that the promises promises of God are not stablished, vnlesse they be taken hold of with assured affiance of conscience: and wheresoeuer there is any doubting or vncertaintie it pronounceth that they be voide. Againe it pronounceth that they do nothing but stagger and wauer if they rest vpon our owne workes. Therefore we must needes either lose righteousnesse, or we must not consider our owne workes, but onely faith must take place, whose nature is this, to lift vp her cares and shut her eyes, that is to say, to be hede fully bent to the promise only, and to turne away her thought from all mans worthinesse or deseruing. So is that notable prophetic of Zacharie fulfilled, that when the wickednes of the land shalbe done away, a man shall call his friend vnder his vine and vnder his figge tree, where the Prophet declareth that y^e faithfull do no otherwise enjoy true peace but after obtaining of the forgeuenesse of sinnes. For this cauelation is to be remembered in the Prophetes, that when they speake of the kingdome of Christ, they set out the outward blessings of God as figures of the spirituall things. Whereupon Christ is called both the king of peace and our peace, because he appeaseth all the troublesom motions of conscience. If we seke by what meane he doth it, we must needes come to the sacrifice by which God is appeased. For he shall never cesse to tremble for feare that shall not determine that God is appeated by the onely satisfactorie cleansing wherein Christ hath sustained his wrath. Finally peace is no where els to be sought for but in the terrors of Christ our redemer.

But why do I vse so darke a testimonie? Paule euery where denieth, that there is peace or quiet joy left to consciences, vnlesse it be determined that we be iustified by faith. And he therewithall declareth whence that assurednes cometh, namely when the loue of God is poured into our heartes by the holy Ghost: as if he had said, that our consciences can not otherwise be quicted, vnlesse we be certainly perswaded that we please God. Whereupon also in an other place he crieth out in the person of all the godly, Who shall seuer vs from the loue of God, which is in Christ? because we shall tremble euen at euery litle breath, till we be arriued into the hauen: but we shalbe without care euen in the daikenes of death, so long as the Lord shall shew him selfe a pastor to vs. Therefore whosoever prate that we are iustified by faith, because being regenerate we are iust by living spiritually: they neuer tasted the sweetness of grace, to consider that God wil be merciful vnto them. Wherupon also followeth, that they do no more know the manner of praying rightly, than Turkes and whatsoeuer other profane Nations. For (as Paule witnesseth) it is no

Gala 4. 5. true faith vnlesse it teache and put vs in minde of that most swete name of Father, yea vnlesse it open our mouth freely to crie out Abba father. Which in an other place he more plainly expreffeth, where he saith that in Christ we haue boldnesse and entrie in confidence by the faith of him. Truly this cometh not to passe by the gift of regeneration: which as it is alway vnperfect in the flesh, so it containeth in it self manifold matter of douting. Wherefore we must of necessity come to this remedy, that the faithfull should determine that they may by no other right, hope for the inheritaunce of the heavenly kingdome, but because being graffed into the body of Christ they are frely accompted righteous. For as touching iustification, faith is a thing merely passiue, bringing nothing of our own to the recouering of the fauour of God, but receiuing of Christ that which we want.

The xiiij. Chapter.

What is the beginning of iustification, and the continuall proceedinges thereof.

THat the matter may be made more plaine, let vs search, what may be the righteousnesse of man in the whole course of his life: and let vs make fower degrees thereof. For men either being endued with no knowledge of God, are drowned in idolatrie: or being entred into profession by sacramentes, denying God with vncleannesse of life, whom they confesse with mouth, they are Christs no further thā in name or they be hypocrits, which couer the wickednes of their harts, with vayne deceitful colors: or being regenerate by y^e spirit of God, they endeouour themselues to true holinesse. Specially when they are to be iudged by their naturall gistes, from the crowne of their head to the sole of their foote, there shall not be found one sparckle of goodnes, vnles peradventure we will accuse the scripture of falshed, when it setteth out all the sons of Adam with these titles, that they be of froward and stubborne heart: that all the imaginatiō of their heart is euill from their infancy, that their thoughts be vaine, that they haue not the feare of God before their eyes, that none of them vnderstandeth or seketh God, briefely that they be flesh, by which word are vnderstanded all those works which Paule rehearseth, fornication, vncleannesse, vnchastitie, riotousnesse, worshipping of idoles, witchecraftes, enmities, contentions, emulations, angers, dissensions, sectes, enuies, manslaughteres, & whatsoeuer filthynesse and abomination may be deuised. This forsooth is the worthines, with confidence whereof they must be proued. But if any among then excell with such honesty of manners as may haue some shewe shewe of holines among men: yet because we know that God regardeth not the outward glistering, we must search the very fountaine of workes if we will haue them to auaille any thing to righteousnesse. We must (I say) thoroughly loke into them, from what affection of heart these works procede. But although here lieth open a most large felde to discourse in, yet because the matter may be declared in very fewe wordes, I will follow asmuch as I may a bresenes in teaching.

2 First I deny not that whatsoeuer excellent gifts appeare in the vnbeleuers, they are the gifts of God. Neither do I so differ from common iudgement, that I would affirme that there is no difference betwene the iustice, temperance and equitie of Titus and Traianus, and the rage, intemperance, and crueltie of Caligula, or Nero, or Domitian: betwene the filthy lustes of Tiberius, and in this behalfe the continence of Vespasian: and (that we may not tarry vpon some speciall vertues or vices) betwene the obseruing and the despising of right and lawes. For there is so great difference of right and wronge, that it appeareth euen in the dead image therof. For what thing shall there remain well ordered in the world, if we cōfound these together? Therefore such a difference betwene honest and vn honest doinges, the Lorde hath not onely engrauen in the mindes of all men, but also doth oft confirme it with the dispensation of his prouidence. For we see how he extendeth many blessings of this present life to them that among men do follow vertue. Not by cause that outward image of vertue deserueth so much as the least benefite of his: but so it pleaseth him to declare by prooffe how much true righteousnes pleaseth him, when he suffereth euen outward and fained righteousnesse not to be without rewarde, Whereupon followeth that which we euen nowe confessed, that these vertues, such as they be, or rather images of vertues, are the giftes of God; forasmuch as there is nothing in any wise-praise worthy, which procedeth not from him.

3 But neuertheles it is true which Augustine writeth, that all they that are straungers from the true religiō of the one God, howsoeuer they be accompted worthy of admiration for opinion of vertue, are not onely worthy of no rewarde, but rather are worthy of punishmēt, because they do with defiling of their heart, bespot the pure good things of God. For though they be the instruments of God, to preserue ȳ felowship of men with iustice, cōtinence, téperance of minde, valiantnes, and wisdom: yet they do very euilly execute these good workes of God: because they are restrained from euill doing, not by sincere loue of goodnes, but either by onely ambition, or by loue of themselues, or by some other croked affection. Wheras therefore they are corrupt by the very vncleannes of hart as by their beginning, they are no more to be reckened among vertues, than those vices, which are wont to deceiue by reason of nerenes and likenesse of vertue. Finally when we remembre, that the ende of that which is right, euer is that God be serued: whatsoeuer tendeth to any other ende, forthwith worthily loseth the name of right. Bycause therefore they haue not respect to the marke which the wisdome of God appointeth: although y^e thing that they do, seeme good in doing, yet by a wrongful ende it is sin. He cōcludeth therefore that all the Fabricij, Scipioes, and Catoes, in all those excellent actes of theirs: yet sinned in this behalfe, that whereas they lacked the light of faith, they did not apply them to the ende to which they ought to haue applied them: & that for that cause, true righteousnes was not in them: forasmuch as duties are not weyed by the doings, but by the endes.

4 Moreouer if it be true which Iohn saith, that there is no life without y^e sonne of God: who so haue no part in Christ, what maner of men so euer they be, what soeuer they do or go about, yet they runne forward with their whole course into destruction & the iudgement of eternall death. After this reason, is that said of Augustine. Our religion discerneth the righteous from the vnrighteous, not by lawe of workes: but by the very lawe of faith, without which, those that seeme good workes are turned into sins. Wherefore the same Augustine saith very well in an other place, when he compareth the endeuor of such men to running out of the way. For howe much faster a man runneth out of the way, so much further he is from the marke, and therefore is made so much more miserable. Wherefore he affirmeth that it is better to halt in the way, than to runne out of the way. Finally it is certaine that they are euell trees, forasmuch as without the cōmunicating of Christ there is no sanctification. They may therefore beare faire fruites and beautifull to the eye, yea & swete in tast, but in no wise good fruites. Hereby we easily perceiue that whatsoeuer man thinketh, purposeth, or doth, before that he be reconciled to God by faith, is accursed, and not onely of no value to righteousnesse, but of certaine deseruing to damnation. And why dispute we hereof as of a doutfull thing, sith it is already proued by the wirtuesse of the Apostle, that it is impossible that any man may please God without faith?

1. Joh. 5
5. But there shall yet appeare a plainer profe, if the grace of God be in comparison, directly set against the naturall state of man. For the Scripture crieth out euery where, that God findeth nothing in man whereby he may be prouoked to do good to him, but with his owne free

free goodnesse preuenteth him. For what can a deade man do to atteine life? But when he lightneth vs with the knowledge of himselfe, he is said to raise vs from death, and to make vs a newe creature. For we see that oftentimes, specially of the Apostle, the goodnes of God is set forth vnto vs by this title, God (saith he) which is rich in mercy, for the great loue wherewith he loued vs, euen when we were dead by sinnes, hath made vs aliue together in Christ. &c. In an other place, where vnder the figure of Abraham he entreateth of the generall calling of the faithful, he saith: it is God that geueth life to the dead, and calleth those thinges that are not, as though they were. If we be nothing, what (I beseech you) can we do? Wherefore y^e Lorde strongly beateth downe this arrogancy, in the history of Iob, in these wordes: who preuenteth me, and I shall rendre it him? for all things are mine. Which sentence Paule expounding applieth it to this, that we should not thinke that we bring any thing to the Lorde but mere shame of needines and emptines. Wherefore in y^e place aboue cited, to proue that we are come into the hope of saluation by his grace alone, not by works, he allegeth that we are his creatures because we are new begotten in Christ Iesus, to the good workes which he hath prepared that we should walke in the: As if he had said: which of vs may boaste that he hath with his righteousnesse prouoked God, sith our first power to do good procedeth out of regeneration? For as we are made by nature, oyle shall soner be wronge out of a stone, than a good worke out of vs. Truly it is wonderfull if man being cōdemned of so great a shame, dare yet say that there remaineth any thing with him. Therefore let vs confesse with this noble instrument of God, that we are called of God with a holy calling, not according to our workes, but according to his purpose and grace: and that the kindnes & loue of God our sauour toward vs hath appeared, because he hath saued vs, not by the works of righteousnesse which we haue don, but according to his owne mercy: y^e being iustified by his grace, we might be made the heires of eternall life. By this cōfession we spoill man of all righteousnesse euen to the least litle peece thereof, till he be by only mercy regenerate into hope of eternall life: forasmuch as if the righteousnesse of workes do bring any thing toward the iustifying of vs, it is falsly said that we are iustified by grace. Truly the Apostle had not forgotten himselfe, when he affirmed iustificatiō to be of free gift, which in an other place resoneth y^e grace is nowe not grace, if works do any thing auail. And what other thing doth the Lord mean, whe he saith that he came not to call righteous men but sinners? If onely sinners are receiued, why seeke we an entry by fained righteousnes?

6 Still this same thought hath now, & then recourse to my minde, that it is perill least I should do wrong to the mercies of God, which do so carefully trauaill in prouinge of this thing as though it were doutfull or darke. But bycause our enuiousnes is such, as vnlesse it be most straightly thrust out of place, it neuer yeldeth to God y which is his, I am cōpelled to tary somwhat the longer vpon it. Yet forasmuch as the scripture is clere enough in this matter, I wil in fighting rather vse y wordes thereof then mine owne. Esaye, when he hath described the vniuersall destruction of mākind, doth immediatly after very fitly adioin the ordre of restoring. The Lorde hath seen, and it semed euell in his eyes. And he sawe, that there is no man: and he maruailed that there is none that offereth himselfe: and he hath set saluation in his owne arme, & hath strengthened himselfe with his owne righteousnesse. Where are our righteousneses if it be true which the Prophet saith: that there is no man that helpeth the. Lorde in recouering his saluation? So an other prophet, where he bringeth in the Lorde, discoursing of the reconciling of sinners to himselfe, saith: I will espouse thee to me for euer, in righteousnes, iudgement, grace and mercie. I wil say to her y hath not obtained mercy, thou hast obtained mercy. If such conuenant, which it is certaine to be the first conioining that we haue with God, standeth vpon the mercie of God, there is left no foundation of our owne righteousnesse. And I would fain learne of those men which faine y man meteth God with some righteousnesse of workes, whether they thinke that there is any righteousnesse at all, but that which is acceptable to God, If it be madnes to thinke so, what acceptable thing to God can procede from his enemies, whom he wholly abhorreth with all their doings? That all we, I say, are the dedly and professed enemies of our God, the truth it selfe testifieth, till being iustified, we are receiued into frendship. If iustification be the beginning of loue, what righteousnesse of workes shall go before it? So Iohn, to turne away that pestilent arrogance, doth diligently put vs in minde how we did not first loue him. And the selfe same thing the Lorde had long before taught by his Prophet: I will loue the, saith he, with a free loue, because mine anger is turned. Certainly his loue is not prouoked by workes if it hath of his owne accord inclined it selfe vnto vs. But the rude common sorte of men thinke it to be nothing els, but that no man hath deserued that Christ should performe our redemption: yet that to the entring into the possession of redemption, we be holpen by our owne workes. Yea but howsoeuer we be redēmed of Christ, yet till we be by the calling of the Father grafted into the communiō of him, we are both heires of darkedarkenesse and death, and the enemies of God. For Paule teacheth ^{1. Cor. 6. 11.} that we are not cleansed and washed from our vncleanneses by the blood of Christ, vntill the holy Ghost worketh that cleansing in vs. Which same thing Peter minding to teach, declareth that the sanctifying of the Spirit auaieth vnto obedience & the sprinkling of the ^{1. Pet. 2.} bloode of Christ. If we be by the Spirit sprinkled with the bloode of Christ vnto cleansing, let vs not thinke that before such watering we be any other than a sinner is without Christ. Let this therefore remaine certaine, y^e the beginning of our salutiō is as it were a certaine resurrection frō death to life: because when for Christs sake it is geuen to vs to beleue in him, thē we first begin to passe from death into life.

7 Vnder this sort are comprehended they which haue in the diuision aboue set bene noted for the second and third sort of men. For the vncleannesse of conscience proueth that both of them are not yet regenera: e by the Spirit of God. And againe, whereas there is no regeneration in them, this proueth the want of faith. Whereby appeareth that they are not yet reconciled to God, nor yet iustified in his sight: forasmuch as these good things are not attained to, but by faith. What can sinners being estrāged from God bring forth, but that which is accursed in his iudgement? With this foolish boldnes in deede, both all wicked men are puffed vp, & specially hypocrites, because howsoever they knowe that their whole heart swarmeth full of filthinesse, yet if they do any works y^e haue a shew of goodnes, they thinke them worthy that God should not despise thē. Herof groweth that pernicious errour, y^e being proued guilty of a wicked and mischeuous minde, yet they can not be driuen to cōfesse themselues void of righteousnes: but euen when they acknowledge thēselues vnrighteous, because they can not deny it, yet they arrogantly claime some righteousnes vnto thē. This vanitie the Lord excellēly well confuteth by the prophet: Aske (saith he) the priests, saying: if a man carrie sanctified flesh in the hemme of his garmēt, & putteth to it bread or other ^{Hag. 2. 12.} meate, shall it be sanctified? The priests answered: No. And Haggee said. If a defiled man in soule touch any of such these things, shall it be defiled? The priests answered: it shalbe defiled. Haggee said. So is this people before my face, saith the Lord: & so all the works of their hands, & all things y^e they offer to me shalbe defiled. I wold to god that this saying might either get full credit with vs, or well be settled in our remēbrāce. For there is no man, though he be otherwise in his whole life neuer so hainous a wicked doer, y^e can abide to be perswaded, that which y^e Lord here plainely pronouceth. The naughtiest man, so sone as he hath performed one or two doubtfull deedes of y^e law, doubteth not that it shalbe accōpted to him for righteousnes. But y^e Lord crieth to the contrarie, that there is no sanctification gotten thereby, vnlesse the heart be first well cleansed. And not contented therewith, he affirmeth that all the workes whatsoever they be that procede from sinners, are defiled with vncleannes of the heart. Therefore let the name of righteousnesse depart from these workes which are by the Lordes owne mouth condemned of filthines. And with howe fit a similitude doth he shew the same? For it might haue bene objected, that whatsoever the Lorde had commaunded, was inuiolably holy. But he on the cōtrarie side setteth against them, that it is no maruell, if those things that are hallowed by the lawe of the Lorde, are defiled with the filthinesse of naughty men: whereas an vncleane hand prophaneth a holy thing with touching it.

8 The same matter he excellently well handleth in Esaye, Offer not (saith he) sacrifice in vaine: incense is abomination to me: my soule hateth your Calendes & solemnities. They are become tedious to me, & I haue bene werie with bearing them: when you shall hold vp your handes I will tourne away mine eyes from you: when you shall multiply prayer I will not heare: for your hādes are full of bloud. Be washed, be cleane, take away y^e euell of your thoughts. What meaneth this that the Lord so lotheth the obeyinge of his owne lawe? Yea but he here refuseth nothing that is of the naturall obseruing of the lawe, y^e beginning whēreof he euery where teacheth to be the vnfaigned feare of his name. When that is taken away, what so euer things are offered him are not onely trifles, but stinking and abhominable filthinesse. Nowe let the hypocrites go, & keping peruersnes wrapped vp in their heart, endeouour to deserue the fauour of God with works. But by this meane, they shall more & more prouoke hī to wrath. For to him the sacrifices of wicked are abhominable, and the only prayer of vpright men pleaseth him. Therefore we hold y^e out of dout, which ought to be most cōmonly knowen to him, that is euen but meanely exercised in the Scriptures, that euen those workes that glister most gloriously in men not yet truly sanctified, are so farre from righteousnesse in the sight of the Lord, that they be iudged sins. And therefore they haue said most truely that haue taught that fauour with God is not procured to any person by workes: but contrarywise that workes do then please, & neuer till then, when y^e person hath first found grace in the sight of God. And this ordre is religiously to be kept, to which the scripture leadeth vs by y^e hand. Moses wryteth that the Lord had respect to Abell & to his workes. See you not how he declareth that God is fauorable to the menne, before that he hath respect to their workes?

workes? Wherefore the cleansing of the heart must go before, that the workes which come from vs, may be louingly receiued of God: because this saying of Ieremy is alway in force, that the workes of God haue respect vnto trueth. And that it is only faith by which the hearts of men are clesed, the holy Ghost hath affirmed by the mouth of Peter: whereby it is certaine, that the first foundation is in true and liuely faith.

9 Now let vs looke what righteousnes they haue, whom we haue set in the fourth degree. We graunt that when God by the meane of the righteousnes of Christ, reconcilēth vs to himselfe, & giuing vs free forgiuenesse of sinnes accompteth vs for righteous, with such mercy is also conioyned this his beneficial doinge, that by his holy spirit he dwelleth in vs, by the power whereof, the lustes of our flesh are daily more & more mortified, but we are sanctified: that is to say, hallowed to the Lord vnto true purenes of life, when our heartes are framed to the obedience of the law: that this may be our chiefe wil, to serue his will, and by all meanes to aduaunce only his glory. But euen while by the guiding of the holy Ghost we walke in the wayes of the Lord, least yet we forgettinge our selues should waxe proude, there are lest certaine remnants of imperfection, which may minister vs matter of humility. There is none righteous, (saith the Scripture) that doth good and sinneth not. What maner of righteousnes therefore will they yet get by their workes? First I say, that the best worke that can be brought foorth of them, is yet alway sprinkled and corrupted with some vncleanness of the flesh, and hath as it were some dregges mingled with it. I say, let a holy seruant of God choose out of all his life the most excellēt thing that he shall thinke that he hath done in the whole coursē therof, & let him wel consider all the partēs of it, without dout he shall finde somewhere somewhat sauoringe of the rottenesse of the flesh, forasmuch as to doing well our cherefull quickenesse is neuer such as it ought to be, but in slacking our course our weakenesse is much. Although we see that there are eident foule blots wherwith the workes of the holy are bespred, yet graunt that they be nothing but most litle spottes: shall they nothing offend the eies of God, before whom euen the starres are not cleane? Thus haue we shewed that there commeth not so much as one good worke out of holy men, which if it be iudged in it selfe, deserueth not iust reward of shame.

10 Secondly I say, that if it were possible that we should haue som throughly pure and perfect workes, yet one sinne is enough to blotte out and quench all the remembrance of the former righteousnesse, as the Prophet sayth. With whom also Iames agreeth: He that offendeth (saith he) in one, is made guilty of all. Nowe sith this mortall life is neuer pure or void from sinne, whatsoeuer righteousnes we should purchase, being from time to time with sinnes following corrupted, oppressed and lost, it shoulde not come into the sight of God, nor be accompted to vs for righteousnesse. Finally when the righteousnesse of workes is entreated of, we must not haue respect to the worke of the lawe, but to the commaundement. Therefore if we seeke righteousness by the law, we shall in vaine bring forth one or two workes: but a perpetuall obediēce of y^e law is there necessary. Wherefore the lord doth not but once (as many foolishly thinke) impute to vs righteousness that same forgiuenesse of sinnes wherof we haue spoken, that hauinge once obtained pardon of our life past, we should afterward seeke righteousness in the law: because he should so do nothing else but bring vs into a false hope, and mocke and laugh vs to scorne. For sith no perfection coulde come to vs so longe as we are clothed with this flesh, & sith the law threatneth death & iudgemēt to all thē y^e performe not ful righteousnes in worke: it shal alway haue wherof it may accuse and condemne vs, vnlesse the mercy of God on the other side did withstand it, to acquite vs from time to time with continuall forgiuenesse of sinnes. Wherefore this standeth alway certaine which we sayd at the beginnige, that if we be weied by our owne worthinesse, whatsoeuer we purpose or go about, yet we with all our trauailes and endeouours are worthy of death and destruction.

11 Vpon these two pointes we must strongly stand fast: that there was neuer any worke of a godly mā, which if it were examined by the seuerer iudgement of God, was not damnable. Againe, if there be any such shewed, (which is not possible for man) yet being corrupted and defiled with the sinnes, wherewith it is certaine that the doer of it is loden, it looseth the grace. And this is the chiefe point of our disputation. For about the beginnige of iustification there is no strife betwene vs and the sounder sorte of Scholmen, but that a sinner being freely deliuered from damnation obtaineth righteousness, and that by the forgiuenesse of sinnes: sauing that they vnder the word of Iustification comprehend the reuiuing wherewith we are newly formed by the Spirit of God vnto the obediēce of the law & they thus describe the righteousness of a man regenerate; that man being once reconciled to God by the faith of Christ, is by good workes iudged righteous before God, and by their deseruinge is accepted. But the Lorde contrariwise pronounceth that he imputed to Abraham faith for righteousness, not at the time when he yet serued Idols, but when

when he had already many yeares excelled in holinesse of life. Therefore Abraham had long worshipped God from a pure heart, and had performed the obedience of the lawe which may be performed of a mortall man, yet he hath righteousnesse reposed in fayth. Whereupon we gather, according to the argument of Paule, that it was not of workes. Likewise when it is sayd in the Prophet. The righteous man shall liue by faith, it is not spoken of wicked & prophane men, whom the Lord iustificieth by conuerting them to the faith, but the speach is directed to the faithfull, and to them is promised life by faith. Paule also taketh away all dout, when for confirminge of that sentence, he taketh this verse of Dauid. Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven. But it is certaine, that Dauid speaketh not of the wicked, but of the faithfull, such as himselfe was: because he spake out of the feeling of his owne conscience. Therefore this blessednesse we must not haue once in our life, but hold it throughout all our life. Last of all he testifieth that the embassage concerning the free reconciliation with God is not published for one or two dayes, but is perpetuall in the church. Therefore the faithfull haue euen to the end of their life no other righteousnesse than that which is there set forth. For Christ euerlastingly remaineth the Mediator to reconcile the father to vs, & the effectualnesse of his death is euerlasting: namely washing, satisfaction, expiation, finally perfect obedience, wherewith all our iniquities are couered. Neither doth Paul to the Ephesians say, that we haue the beginning of saluation out of grace, but that we are saued by grace, not of workes, that no man should glory.

. 12 The starting holes which the Scholemen do here seeke to escape by, do not deliuer them. They say that good workes are not by inward worthines in themselues of so great value, that they be sufficient to purchase righteousnes: but this, that they be of so great value, is of grace accepting them. Then, because they be driuen to confesse that the righteousnesse of workes is in this life alway vnperfect, they graunt that we, so long as we liue, do neede forgiuenesse of sinnes, whereby the want of workes may be supplied: but, that the defaultes which are committed, are recompenced with workes of supererogation. For I answer, that the acceptinge grace as they call it, is none other than his free goodnesse wherewith the father embraceth vs in Christ, when he clotheth vs with the innocency of Christ, & accompteth the same ours, that by the beneficial meane therof he may take vs for holy, pure, and innocent. For, the righteousnes of Christ (which as it only is perfect, so only can abide the sight of God) must be set in our steade, and be presented at the barre as a surety. Herewith we being furnished, do obtaine continuall forgiueneſſe of ſinnes in faith. With the pureneſſe hereof our filthineſſes and vncleaneſſes of imperfections being couered are not imputed: but are hidden, as if they were buried, y they may not come into the iudgement of God, vntil the houre come, when the old mā being ſlaine & vtterly deſtroied in vs, the goodneſſe of God ſhall receiue vs into bleſſed peace with the new Adā, where let vs looke for the day of the Lord, in which in receiuing vncorrupt bodies, we ſhall be remoued into the glory of the heauenly kingdom.

13 If theſe things be true, verily no workes of ours can of themſelues make vs acceptable & pleaſing to God: neither can the workes themſelues pleaſe, but in reſpect that man beinge couered with the righteousneſſe of Chriſt, pleaſeth God, & obtaineth forgiueneſſe of his ſinnes. For God hath not promiſed the reward of eternall life to ſome certaine workes, but onely pronounceth that he which doth theſe things, ſhal liue: ſettinge the notable curſe againſt all them that continue not in all things. Whereby the deuiſe of righteousneſſe in parte is largely confuted, ſith no other righteousnes is admitted into heauē, but a whole obſeruing of the law. And no whit ſounder is that which they are wont to babble of ſupplying of recompence by workes of Supererogation. For why? Do they not ſtill returne to the ſame place from whence they are already ſhut out: that he which kepeth the law in parte, is by workes ſo farre righteous? That which no man of ſound iudgemēt will graunt them, they do too ſhameleſſly take for cōfeſſed. So oft the Lord testiſieth that he acknowledgeth no righteousneſſe of workes, but in the perfect obſeruing of his law. What obſtinacy is it, that we when we are deſtitute of that obſeruing, leaſt we ſhoulde ſeeme ſpoiled of all glory, that is, to haue altogether giuen place to God, do boalt our ſelues of I wot not what ſmall peeces of a few workes, and go about by ſatisfactions to redeme that which wanteth. Satisfactions haue already before bin ſufficiently ouerthrowen, that we ought not now ſo much as to dreame of thē. Only this I ſay, that they which ſo play the fooles, do not wey how deteſtable a thing ſinne is before God: for truely they ſhould vnderſtand that the whole righteousneſſe of men beinge layd vpon a heape, is not ſufficient to make recompence for one ſinne. For we ſee that man was by one offence ſo caſt away and abandoned of God, that he therewithall loſt all meane to recouer ſaluation. Therefore the power of Satisfaction is taken away, wherewith they flatter themſelues, but ſurely ſhall neuer ſatisfie God, to whom nothing is pleaſant or acceptable that proceedeth frō his enemies. And his enemies are all they to whom he purpoſeth poseth to impute sinnes. Therefore our sinnes must be covered and forgiuen, before that the Lorde haue respect to any worke of ours. Whereupon followeth that the forgiuenes of sinnes is of free grace Phil. 3. 13. which they do wickedly blaspheme that trust in any satisfactions. Let vs therefore, after the example of the Apostle, forgetting those things that are behinde vs, and hasting forward to those thinges that are before vs, runne in our race, endeuoringe to the price of the hie callinge.

14 But how doth the boasting of the workes of supererogation agree with that rule which is taught vs, that when we haue done all thinges that are commaunded vs, we should say that we are vnprofitable seruantes; and that we haue done no more than we ought? To say before God, is not to faine or to lie, but to determine with thy selfe, that which thou art assured of. The Lord therefore commaundeth vs vnfaignedly to thinke and consider with our selues, that we do not any free beneficial doings to him, but to render due seruice. And worthily. For we are seruantes endetted in so many seruices, as we are not able to discharge, although all our thoughts & all our members, were turned into dutefull deedes of the law. And therefore that which he sayth. When ye haue done all thinges that are commaunded you, &c. is asmuch in effect, as if the righteousnes of one man were more thā all the righteousnes of men. How therefore may we (of whom there is none that is not most farre distant from this marke) be so bolde as to boast that we haue added a heape to the full measure? Neither is there any cause why any man may take exceptiō and say, that nothing withstandeth but that his endeour may proceede beyonde necessary duties, which in some behalfe ceaseth those that be from necessary. For this we must altogether holde, that we can imagine nothing that auasteth either to the worship or the loue of God, which is not cōprehended vnder the law of God. If it be a part of the law, let vs not boast of voluntary liberality, where we are bound to necessity, Luk. 17. 10.

15 And for this purpose that glorying of Paule is out of season alleaged. That amōg the Corinthians he did of his owne wil yeld of his right, which otherwise he might haue vsed if he had would, and that he hath employed vpon them not onely so much as he ought of duty, but also hath giuen them his free trauaill beyonde the boundes of duties. But they should haue marked the reason there expressed, that he did this least he should be an offense to the weake. For false and deceitful workemen did boast them selues with this alluring shew of liberality, wherby they might both procure fauour to their poisonous doctrines; and raise vp hatred to the Gospell, so that Paule was driuen 1. Cor. 6. 1.

of necessity either to bring the doctrine of Christ into danger, or to meete with such craftes. Go to: if it be to a christian man an indifferent thinge, to runne into offense, when he may refraine it, then I graunt that the Apostle did somthing of Supererogatiō for the lord. But if this were by right required of a wise distributor of the Gospel; then I say y^e he did that which was his duty to do. Finally although there appeare no such cause, yet this saying of Chrysostome is alway true, that all our thinges are in the same case wherein are the proper possessions of bondmen, which it is certaine by the law to be due to their Lord. And Christ hath vttered the same in the parable. For he asked what thanke we will giue to a bondseruant when hauing birt all the day trauailed with sundry labours he returneth home to vs in the euening. But it is possible, that he hath labored with greater diligence than we durst haue required. Be it so: yet he hath done no thing but that which by his estate of bondage he ought, for he with his whole ability is ours. I speake not of what sort their Supererogatiōs are which these men wil boast of to God: for they be trifles, such as he neither hath at any time commaunded, nor doth approue them, nor will allow them whē accompt shalbe to be made before him. In this signification onely we will graunt that they are workes of Supererogation, namely of which it is spoken in the Prophet: who hath required these things at your hands? But let them remember what is in another place also spoken of these things: Wherefore do ye weye your siluer & not in bread? Ye spend in labour & not in being satisfied. It is in deede not very hard for these idle Rabbines to dispute vnder the shadow in a soft chaire: but when the soueraigne iudge shall sit in his iudgement seate, such windy decrees shall of necessity vanishe away. This, this was to be sought what affiance of defense we may bring to his iudgemēt seate, not what we may talke of in schooles & corners.

16 In this behalfe there are chiefly two pestilences to be driuen out of our mindes: that we put no affiance in the righteousnesse of workes. And that we ascribe no part of glory to them. The Scriptures doe euery where thrust vs from all maner of affiance, whē they teach that our righteousnesse do stinke in the sight of God, vnlesse they receiue a good sauor from the innocence of Christ, & that they can do nothing but prouoke the vengeance of God, vnlesse they be sustained by the tendernes of his mercy. Moreouer they so leaue nothing to vs, but that we shoulde craue y^e mercy of our iudge with that confession of Dauid, that none shal be iustified before him, if he require accompt of his seruantes. But where Iob sayth: If I haue done wickedly, wo to me: but if I do righteously, yet I wil not so list vp my head:

head: though he meane of that most hie righteousnes of God, wher-vnto the very Angels answere not: yet he therewithall sheweth that when they come to the iudgement of God, there remaineth nothing for all mortal men, but to hold their peace as dumme. For it tendeth not only to this purpose that he had rather willingly yeelde than dāgerously striue with the rigorousnes of God: but he meaneth that he felt no other righteousnes in himselfe, than such as at y first moment should fall before the sight of God. When affiance is driuen away, al glorying must also necessarily depart: For who can giue the praise of righteousnes to these workes, the affiance whereof trembleth before the sight of God? We must therefore come whether Esay calleth vs, Esay. 46. that all the seede of Israell may be praised & glory in God: because it 10.
is most true which he saith in an other place, that we are the plan- Esay. 61.
ting of the glory of God. Our minde therefore shall then be rightly 3. purged, when it shal neither in any behalfe rest vpon the confidence of workes, nor reioyse in the glory of them. But this error encouraged foolish men to the puffinge vp of this false & lying affiance, that they alway set the cause of their saluation in workes.

17 But if we looke to the foure kindes of causes, which the Philosophers teach vs to consider in the effect of thinges, we shall finde that none of them doth accord with workes in the stablishing of our saluation. For the Scripture doth euery where reporte that the cause of procuringe the eternall life to vs, is the mercy of the heauenly father and his free loue towarde vs: that the Materiall cause is Christ with his obedience, by which he purchaced righteousnesse for vs.
What also shall we say to be the formall or instrumentall cause but faith? And these three causes Iohn comprehendeth together in one, Ioh. 3. sentence, when he saith, God so loued y world, that he gaue his only 16.
begotten sonne, that euery one which beleueth in him may not perishe, but may haue euerlastinge life. Now the finall cause the Apostle testifieth to be both the shewing of the righteousnesse of God, and the praise of his goodnesse: where he rehearseth also the other three in expresse wordes. For he saith thus to the Romaines: all haue Rom. 3. sinned and do neede the glory of God: but they are justified fre- 23.
ly by his grace. Here thou hast the head & first fountain, namely that God embraced vs with his free mercy. Then followeth: By the redemption which is in Christ Iesu. Here thou hast as it were the matter, whereof righteousnesse is made for vs through fayth in his bloude.
Here is shewed the instrumentall cause, whereby the righteousnesse of Christ is applied to vs. Last of all he ioyneth the ende, when he sayth, vnto the shewing of his righteousnes that he may be righteous

Cap. 14. Of the maner how to receiue

& the righteousmaker of him that is of the faith of Christ. And (to touch by the way that this righteousness standeth of reconciliation) he setteth expressly by name; that Christ was giuen to vs for reconciliatiō. So in the first chap. also to the Ephesians he teacheth that we are receiued of God into fauour by mere mercy : that the same is wrought, by the intercession of Christ: receiued, by fayth : all to this ende, that the glory of the goodnesse of God may fully shine. When we see y all the partes of our saluation are so without vs, what cause is there y we should now either haue affiāce or glory in works? Neither can euen the most sworne enemies of the grace of God moue any controuersie with vs about the efficient or finall cause, vnlesse they will deny the whole Scripture. In the Materiall & Formall cause they cast a false colour, as though our workes haue a halfe place with faith and the righteousnesse of Christ. But this also they teache, the Scripture crying out against them; which simply affirmieth both that Christ is to vs for righteousnesse and life, & that this benefit of righteousness is possessed by only faith.

18 But whereas the holy men do oftentimes strengthen & comfort themselves with remembrance of their owne innocency and vprightnes, & sometime also forbear not to report of it with praise, that is done two waies: either that in cōparing their good cause with the euill cause of the wicked; they conceiue thereby assured trust of victory, not so much for commending of their owne righteousnesse, as for the iust & deserued condemning of their aduersaries: or that euen without comparison of other, while they recorde themselves before God, the purenes of their owne consciēce bringeth to the both some comfort & affiance. Of the first of these two wayes, we shal see hereafter: now let vs briefly declare of the latter, howe it agreeth with that which we haue aboue sayd, that in the iudgement of God we must rest vpon no affiance of workes, and glory vpon no opinion of them. This is the agreement that the holy ones, when it concerneth the founding and stablishing of their saluation, do without respect of workes bend their eies to the only goodnesse of God. And they do not only bend themselves to it afore all things: as to the beginning of blessednesse, but do rest therein as in the fulfilling of it. A conscience so founded, raised and stablished, is also stablished with consideration of workes: namely so farre as they are the witnessings of God dwelling and reigning in vs. Sith therefore this affiance of workes hath no place, vnlesse thou haue first cast the whole affiance of thy minde vpon the mercy of God: it ought not to seeme contrary to that wherupon it hangeth. Wherfore when we exclude the affiance of workes, we meane onely this that a Christian minde may not bowe to the merit of workes as to the succour of saluation, but shoulde thoroughly rest in the free promise of righteousnesse. But we forbid it not to vnderprop and strengthen this faith with the signes of the good will of God toward it selfe. For if al the good giftes which God hath bestowed vpon vs, when they be recorded in remembrance, are to vs after a certaine maner as it were beames of the face of God, by which we are enlightened to beholde that soueraigne light of goodnesse: much more is the grace of good workes, which sheweth that the Spirit of adoption is given vs.

19 When therefore the holy ones do by innocency of conscience confirme their faith, & gather matter of reioysing, they do nothinge but call to minde by the frutes of their calling, that they are adopted of the Lord into the place of children. This therefore that is taught by Salomon, that in the feare of the Lord is stedfast assurednes: and this that sometime the holy ones vse this protestation, to the entent that they may be heard of the lord, that they haue walked before his face in vprightnes & simplicity: haue no place in laying the fundatiō of stablishing of cōscience: but are the only of value, if they be taken of the ensuing effect: because both that feare is no where which may stablish a full assurednes, & y^e holy ones are priuie in their cōscience of such an vprightnes, wherwith are yet mingled many remnantes of the flesh. But forasmuch as of the frutes of regeneration they gather an argument of the holy Ghost dwellinge in them, they do there by not sclenderly strengthen themselues to looke for y^e help of God in all their necessities, when they by experiēce finde him their father in so great a matter. And euen this also they can not do, vnlesse they haue first conceiued the goodnes of God, sealed with no other assurednesse, than of the promise. For if they beginne to weie it by good workes, nothing shalbe more vncertaine nor more weake: forasmuch as if workes be considered by themselues, they shall no lesse by their imperfection shew profe of the wrath of God, thā they do with howsoever vnperfect purenesse testify his good will. Finally they do so set out the benefites of God, that yet they turne not away from the free fauour of God, in which Paul testifieth that there is y^e length, breadth, depth & heighth of them: as if he should say, Whethersoever the senses of the godly do turne themselues, how hie soeuer they clime, how farre & wide soeuer they extende them, yet they ought not to go out of the loue of Christ, but holde themselues wholly in the meditation thereof, because it comprehendeth all kindes of measures in it. And therefore he sayth that it excelleth & surmounteth about all know-

m. 8. ledge: and that when we acknowledge how much Christ hath loued vs, we are fulfilled into all the fulnesse of God. As in an other place, when he glorieth that all the Godly are vanquishers in battell, he by andby addeth a reason, because of him that loued vs.

20 We see now that there is not in the holy ones that affiance, of works, which either giueth any thing to the merite of them (forasmuch as they regard the none otherwise than as the gifts of God, wherby they reknowledge his goodnes none otherwise thã as signes of their callinge, whereby may thinke vpon their election) or which withdraweth not any thing from the free righteousnesse which we obtaine in Christ, forasmuch as it hangeth vpon it, and standeth not without it. The same thinge doth Augustine in few wordes, but very wel set out where he writeth. I do not say to the Lord, despise not the workes of my handes, or I haue sought the Lord with my handes & haue not bin deceiued. But, I do not comend the works of my hands: for I feare, least when thou hast looked vpon them, thou shalt finde moe sinnes than merites. Only this I say, this I aske, this I desire, despise not the workes of thy hands, behold in me thy worke, not mine. For if thou beholdest mine, thou damnest me: if thou beholdest thine, thou crownest me. For also whatsoeuer good workes I haue, they are of thee. He setteth two causes, why he dare not boast of his workes to God, because if he haue any good workes, he seeth therein nothing his owne: secondly, because the same is also ouerwhelmed with multitude of sinnes. Whereupon commeth to passe that the conscience feeleth therby more feare & dismaying than assurednes. Therefore he would haue God no otherwise to looke on his well doings, than that reknowledging in them the grace of his calling, he may make an end of the worke which he hath begonne.

21 But furthermore wheras the Scripture sheweth that the good workes of the faithful, are causes why the Lord doth good to them; that is so to be vnderstãded, that that which we haue before set may stand vnshaken, that the Effect of our saluation consisteth in the loue of God the Father: the Matter, in the obediẽce of the Sonne: the Instrument, in the enlightning of the holy Ghost, that is to say, in faith: that the ende is the glory of the so great kindenesse of God. These things withstand not, but that the Lord may embrace workes as inferior causes. But whense commeth that? Namely whome the Lorde of his mercy hath appointed to the inheritance of eternall life, them with his ordinary dispensation he doth by good workes bringe into the possession thereof. That which goeth before in order of dispensation, he calleth the cause of that which followeth. After this maner ner he sometime deriueth eternal life from workes: not for that is to be ascribed to them: but because whom he hath chosen, thē he doth iustifie, that he may at length glorifie them, he maketh the grace that goeth before which is a step toward that which foloweth, after a certaine maner the cause of it. But so oft as he hath occasiō to assigne the true cause, he biddeth vs not to flee to workes, but holdeth vs in the onely thinkinge vpon the mercy of God. For what manner of thinge is this which he teacheth by the Apostle, The rewarde of sinne is death: the grace of the Lorde, is life euerlastinge? Why doth he not set righteousnesse in comparison against sinne, as he setteth life against death? Why doth he not make righteousnesse the cause of life, as he maketh sinne the cause of death? For so should the cōparison of contraries haue stande well together, which is much broken by this turninge. But the Apostle meant by this comparison to expresse that which was trueth, that death is due to the deseruings of men: that life is reposed in the onely mercy of God. Finally in these manners of speaking is rather expressed the order than the cause: because God in heapinge graces vpon graces, taketh cause of the first to adde the seconde, that he may leaue nothinge vndone to the enriching of his seruantes: and he so cōtinually extendeth his liberality, that yet he would haue vs alway to looke vnto the free electiō which is fountaine and beginninge of it. For although he loueth the giftes which he daily giueth, insomuch as they spring out of that fountaine: yet it is our part to holde fast that free acceptation, which alone is able to vpholde our soules: as for such giftes of his Spirite as he afterward giueth vs, so to adioyne them to the first cause, that they minish nothing of it.

The xv. Chapter.

That those things that are commonly boasted concerning the merites of vworks, do ouerthrow as well the praise of God in giuing of righteousnesse, as also the assurednesse of saluation.

NOW we haue declared that which is the chiefe point in this matter: that because if righteousnes be vpholdē with workes, it must needes by and by fall downe before the sight of God, it is contained in the onely mercy of God, the onely communicating of Christ, and therefore in only faith. But, let vs diligently marke that this is the chiefe stay of the matter, least we be entangled with that generall error, not only of the common people, but also of learned men. For so soone as question is moued of the iustification of faith & workes, they flee to those places which seeme to giue to workes

some merit in the sight of God: as though the iustification of workes were fully wonne, if it be once proued that they be of any value with God. But we haue aboue plainly shewed that the righteousnesse of workes consisteth only in the perfect & full keping of the law. Whereupon foloweth that no man is iustified by workes but he that hauing climbed vp to y^e hiest top of perfection can not be proued guilty of any offense be it neuer so litle. Therefore it is an other & a seueral questiō: Howsoeuer workes suffice not to iustifie a man, whether yet do they not deserue fauour with God?

2 First of the name of merite I must needes say this afore hande, that whosoever first applied it to works of men cōpared to the iudgement of God, he did very ill prouide for the purenesse of faith. Truly I do by my good wil abstaine frō striues about wordes, but I would wish that this sobriety had alway bin vsed among Christian wryters, that they woulde not haue founde in their heartes to vse wordes strange from the Scriptures, which engendred much offense and no frute. For whereto, I besech you, was it needefull to haue the name of Merite brought in, when the price of good workes might be fitly expressed by an other name without offense? But howe much offense that worde containeth in it, is euident with the great hurt of the worlde. Surely as it is most proude it can do nothinge but darken the grace of God, and fill men with froward pride. The olde wryters of the Church, I graunt, haue commonly vsed it, and I would to God they had not with the abusinge of one litle word giuen to posteritie matter of errour. Howebeit they themselues also do in many places testifie, howe in no case they meant to giue any preiudice agaynst the trueth. For thus sayeth Augustine in one place, Let Merites of men here holde their peace, which haue perished by Adam: and lette the grace of God reigne, by Iesus Christ. Againe, The saintes giue nothing to their owne Merites: they will giue all to none but to thy mercy, O God. In an other place, When man seeth that whatsoever good he hath, he hath it not from himselfe, but from his God, he seeth that all that which is praised in him, is not of his owne Merites, but of the mercy of God. You see howe takinge from men the power of doinge well, he also throweth downe the dignity of Merite. And Chrysofome sayth, Our workes, if there be any, which folow the free calling of God, are repayment and det: but the giftes of God are grace and bountifullnesse and the greatnesse of liberall giuinge. But, leauinge the name, let vs rather looke vpon the thinge. I haue verily before alleaged a sentence out of Bernarde, As it sufficeth to Merite, not to presume of Merites: so to want Merites, sufficeth sufficeth to iudgement. But by addinge forth with an exposition, he sufficiently mitigateth the hardnesse of the worde, where he saith: Therefore care thou to haue Merites: when thou hast them, knowe that they are giuen: hope for frute, the mercy of God: and so thou hast escaped all danger, of pouerty, vnthankfulnessse, and presumption. Happy is the church which neither wanteth Merites without presumption, nor presumption without Merites. And a litle before he hadde largely shewed, howe Godly a meaninge he vsed. For of Merites (sayth he) why shoulde the Church be carefull, which hath a stedfaster and surer cause to glorie of the purpose of God? God can not deny himselfe, he wil do that which he hath promised. If there be no cause why thou shouldest aske, by what merites may we hope for good thinges? specially sith thou hearest it sayd, Not Eze. for your sakes, but for my sake: it sufficeth to Merit, to know that Me- 22. rites suffice not.

3 What all our workes deserue, the Scripture sheweth when it sayth that they can not abide the sight of God, because they are ful of vncleannesse: then, what the perfect obseruing of the law (if any such could be found) shal deserue, when it teacheth that we should thinke our selues vnprofitable seruantes when we haue done all things that Luk are commaunded vs: because we shal haue giue nothing freely to the 10. Lord, but only haue performed our due seruices, to which there is no thanke to be giuen. But those good workes which he himselfe hath giuen vs, the Lord both calleth ours and testifieth that they are not onely acceptable to him, but also that they shal haue reward. It is our duty againe for our parte, to be encouraged with so great a promise, and to gather vp our heartes, that we be not wearied with well doinge, and to yeelde true thankfulnessse to so great bountifulnesse of God. It is vndouted y it is the grace of God whatsoeuer there is in workes that deserueth praise: that there is not one droppe, which we ought properly to ascribe to our selues. This if we do truely and earnestly acknowledge, there vanisheth away not onely all affiance but also opinion of Merite. We (I say) do not parte the praise of good workes (as the Sophisters do) betwene God and man: but we reserue it whole, perfect, and vnminished to the Lorde. Onely this we assigne to man, that euen the selfe same workes that were good he by his vncleannesse corrupteth and defileth. For nothinge commeth out of man, howe perfect soeuer he be, that is not defiled with some spot. Therefore let the Lord call into iudgement euen these thinges that are best in the workes of menne: he shall verily espie in them his owne righteousnessse, but mans dishonesty and shame. Good workes

therefore do please God & are not vnprofitable to the doers of them, but rather they receiue for rewarde the most large benefites of God: not because they so deserue, but because the goodnesse of God hath of it selfe appointed this price vnto them. But what spitefulnesse is this, that men not cōtented with that liberality of God, which giueth vndue rewardes to workes that deserue no such thing, do with ambition ful of sacrilege endeuour further, that that which is wholly of the liberality of God, may seeme to be rendered to the merites of men. Here I appelle to the common iudgement of euery man. If any man that hath a taking of profit in a peece of ground by an others más liberall graunt, do also claime to himselfe the title of propriety: doth he not by such vnthankfulnes deserue to loose the very selfe possession which he had? Likewise if a bondslaue beinge made free of his Lord, do hide the basenes of the estate of a Libertine, & boast himself to be a freeman borne: is he not worthy to be brought backe into his former bondage? For this is the right vse of enioying a benefite, if we neither claime to our selues more than is giuen, nor do defraude the author of the benefite of his praise: but rather do so behaue our selues, that that which he hath giuen from himselfe to vs, may seeme after a certaine maner to remaine with him. If this moderation be to be kept toward men, let all men looke & consider what maner of moderation is due to God.

Libertine, is he that is free by manumission, not by birth

4 I knowe that the Sophisters do abuse certaine places, to proue therby that the name of Merit toward God is found in the Scriptures. They alleage a sentence out of Ecclesiasticus, Mercy shall make place to euery man, according to the Merit of his workes. And out of the Epistle to the Hebrues, Forget not doing good and communicating, for with such sacrifices men merite of God. As for my right in resisting the authority of Ecclesiasticus, I do now release it. Yet I deny that they faithfully alleage that which Ecclesiasticus, whatsoever writer he were, hath wrytten. For the Greeke copie is thus: πάση ἐλεημοσύνη ποιήσει τόπον, ἕκαστος γὰρ κατὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ εὐρήσει. He shal make place to euery mercy, & euery man shal finde according to his workes. And that this is y true text, which is corrupted in the Latine translation, appeareth both by the framing of these words, & by a longer ioyning together of the sentence going before. In the Epistle to the Hebrues, there is no cause why they should snare vs in one litle worde, when in the Greeke wordes of the Apostle is nothing else but that such sacrifices do please and are acceptable to God. This alone ought largely to suffice to subdue & beate downe the outragiousnes of our pride, that we faine not any worthinesse to workes beyonde the rule of Scripture. Now the doctrine of the Scripture is, that all our good workes are continually besprinkled with many filthy spottes, wherewith God may be worthily offended and be angry with vs: so far is it of, that they be able to winne him to vs, or to prouoke his liberality toward vs: Yet because he of his tender kindenesse doth not examine them by extremity of law, he taketh thē as if they were most pure, & therefore though without merit, he rewardeth them with infinite benefites both of this present life and of the life to come. For I do not allowe the distinction set by men otherwise learned and godly: that good workes deserue the graces that are giuen vs in this life, and that eternall life is the reward of faith alone. For the Lord doth commonly alway set in heauen the reward of labors and the crowne of battel. Againe to giue it so to the merit of workes, that it be taken away frō grace, that the Lord heapeth vs with graces vpon graces, is against the doctrine of the Scripture. For though Christ sayth that to him that hath, shalbe giuen, and that the faithfull and good seruant which hath shewed himselfe faithfull in fewe thinges, shalbe set ouer many: yet he also sheweth in an other place, that the encreases of the faithfull are the giftes of his free goodnesse. All ye that thirst (sayth he) come to the waters: and ye that haue not money, come and bye milke and honie without money and without any exchange. Whatsoever therefore is nowe giuen to the faithfull for help of saluation, yea and blessednesse it selfe, is the meere liberality of God yet both in this and in those he testifieth that he hath consideration of workes: because, to testifie the greatnesse of his loue towarde vs, he vouchsafueth to graunt such honor not only to vs, but also to the giftes which he hath giuen vs.

5 If these thinges had in the ages past bin handeled & disposed in such order as they ought to haue bin, there had neuer arisen so many troubles and dissensions. Paul sayth that in the buildinge of Christian doctrine, we must kepe still that foundation which he had layed among the Corinthians, beside which no other can be layed: and that the same foundation is Iesus Christ. What maner of foundation haue we in Christ? is it, that he was to vs the beginninge of saluation: that the fulfilling thereof should follow of our selues? and hath he but only opened the way, by which we should go forward of our owne strength? Not so: but, as he sayd a litle before, when we acknowledge him, he is giuen to vs for righteousnesse. No manne therefore is well founded in Christ, but he that hath full righteousnesse in him: forasmuch as the Apostle sayeth not that he was sent to helpe vs to obtaine righteousnes, but that he himselfe might be our righteousnesse.

Cap. 15. Of the maner how to receiue

he. 1. Namely, that we are chosen in him from eternitie before the making olo. 1. of the world, by no deseruing of oures, but according to the purpose & of the good pleasure of God: that by his death we are redemed from the damnation of death, and deliuered from destruction: that in him we are adopted of the heauenly father into children and heires: that
h. 10 by his blood we are recōciled to the Father: that being geuen to him to be kept we are deliuered from perill of perishing and of being lost: that being so engrafted in him, we are already after a certaine manner partakers of eternall life, being entred into the kingdome of God by hope: and yet more: that hauinge obtained such partaking of him, howe so euer we be yet fooles in our selues, he is wisdom for vs before God: howsoeuer we be sinners, he is righteousnesse for vs: howsoeuer we be vnclane, he is cleannesse for vs: howsoeuer we be weake, howsoeuer vnarmed and lieng open in danger of Satan, yet oures is the power which is geuen him in heauen and earth, at. 28 whereby he may treade downe Satan for vs, and breake the gates of helles: howsoeuer we still cary about with vs the body of death, yet he is life for vs: brefely that all his things are oures, and we in him haue all things, in our selues nothing: vpon this foundation. I say, it behoueth that we be builded, if we will encrease into a holy temple to the Lorde.

6 But the world hath a longe time bene otherwise taught. For there haue bene found out I wote not what morall good workes, by which men may be made acceptable to God before that they be grafted in Christ. As though the Scripture lieth, when it saith, that Joh. 5 they are all in death which haue not possessed the Sonne. If they be om. 14 in death, howe should they bring forth matter of life? As though it were of no more force, y whatsoeuer is done without faith, is sinne: as though there may be good frōtes of an euell tree. But what haue these most pestilent Sophisters left to Christ wherin he may shewe forth his power? They say that he hath deserued for vs the first grace, namely the occasion of deseruing: that it is nowe our part not to faile the occasion offred. O desperate shamelesnesse of vngodlinesse.
Who would haue thought that men professing the name of Christ, durst so strippe him naked of his power, and in a manner treade him vnder foote? This testimonie is eche where spoken of him, that all they are iustified that beleue in him: these fellowes teache, that there Joh. 5. commeth from him no other benefite, but this, that the way is opened to euery man to iustifie himselfe. But I would to God they tasted Joh. 5. what these sayings meane: that all they haue life that haue the Sonne of God: that whosoever beleueth, is already passed from death into life : that we are iustified by his grace , that we might be made heires of eternall life : that the faithfull haue Christ abidinge in them , by whome they cleaue fast to God : that they which are partakers of his life , do sit with him in heavenly places : that they are transplanted into the kingdome of God , and haue obtained saluatiō. and innumerable other such. For they do not declare , that there cometh by the faith of Christ nothing but y^e power to obtaine righteousness or saluation , but that they are both geuen to vs. Therefore so sone as thou art by faith engrafted into Christ , thou art already made the sonne of God , the heire of heauen , partaker of righteousness , possessor of life , and (that their lies may be better confuted) thou hast not obtained the fit abilitie to deserue , but euen all the deseruings of Christ : for they are communicated to thee.

7 So the Sorbonical scholes , the mothers of all errours , haue taken from vs the iustificatiō of faith which is the summe of all godliness. They graunt verily in worde , that man is iustified by formed faith : but this they afterward expound , because good workes haue of faith this that they auaille to righteousness : that they seme in a manner to name faith in mockage , sith without great enuiousnesse it could not be passed ouer in silence , seing it is so oft repeted of the Scripture. And not yet contented , they do in the praise of good works priuilege steale from God somewhat to geue away to man. Because they see that good workes litle auaille to aduaunce man , and that they can not be properly called Merites , if they be accompted the frutes of the grace of God : they picke them out of the strength of free will , oyle forsooth out of a stone. And they denie not in deede that the principall cause of them is in grace : but they affirme that thereby is not excluded free will , by which is all merit. And this not onely the latter Sopisters do teach , but also their Pythagoras , Lombard : whome if you compare with these men , you may say to be sound witted and sobre. It was truely a point of maruelous blindness , that when they had Augustine so oft in their mouth , they sawe not with howe great carefulnesse that man provided that no peece of the glorie of good workes were it neuer so litle , should be conueyed to men. Here before where we entreated of free wil , we recited certain testimonies of his to this purpose , of which sort there are oftentimes found many like in his wrytinges : as when he forbiddeth vs that we should no where boast of our merites , because euen they also are the giftes of God : And when he writeth , that all our merite is onely of grace , that it is not gotten by our sufficiency , but is all made by grace , &c. It is no maruell that Lombard was blinde at the light of the Scripture , in whiche it appereth that he was not so well practised. Yer nothing could be desired more plaine against him and his disciples, than this word of the Apostle, For when he forbiddeth Christiāns all glorieng, he adioineth a reason why it is not lawefull to glorie: because we are that handiworke of God, created to all good workes, that we should walke in them. Sith therefore there cometh out of vs no good thing, but in so much as we be regenerate: and our regeneration is whole of God without exception: there is no right why we should claime to our selues one ounce in good workes. Finally whereas they cōtinually call vpon good workes, in the meane time they sō instruct consciences, that they neuer dare haue affiance, that they haue God wel pleased and fauorable to their workes. But contrariwise we, without making any mention of Merite, do yet by our doctrine raise vp the courages of the faithfull with singular comfort, when we teach them that in their workes they please God, and are vndoubtedly accepted vnto him. Yea and also here we require that no man attempt or go about any worke without faith, that is to say, vnlesse he do first with assured confidence of minde determine that he shall please God.

8 Wherefore let vs not suffer our selues to be led so much as one heare bredth away from this onely foundation: which being layed, wise builders do afterward well & orderly builde vpon it. For if there be neede of doctrine and exhortation, they put men in minde, that the Sonne of God hath appered to this ende, that he may destroy the workes of the deuell: that they should not sinne which are of God, that the time past is enough for the fulfilling of the desires of the Gētiles: that the elect of God are vessels of mercie chosen out vnto honour, which ought to be made cleane from all filthinesse. But all is spoken at ones, when it is shewed that Christ wil haue such disciples, which forsaking, themselues, and taking vp their crosse, do followe him. He that hath forsaken himselfe, hath cut of the roote of all euels, that he may no more seke those thinges that are his owne. He that hath taken vp his crosse, hath framed himselfe to all patience and mildenesse. But the example of Christ containeth both these and all other duties of godlinesse & holinesse. He shewed himselfe obedient to his father, euen to the death: he was wholly occupied in doing the workes of God: he with his whole heart breathed out the glorie of his father: he gaue his soule for his brethren: he both did good and wished good to his enemies. If there be neede of comfort, these will bring maruelous comfort, that we be in affliction, but we are not made carefull: that we labour, but we are not forsaken: we are brought lowe, but we are not confounded: ws are thrown downe, but we do not perish : alway bearing about with vs in our body the mortifying of Iesus Christ, that the life of Iesus may be manifestly shewed in vs, 2. Tim. 2. that if we be dead with him, we shall also liue together with him : if Phil. 3. 10. we suffer with him, we shall also reigne together with him : that we be so fashioned like to his suffringes, till we atteine to the likenesse of his resurrection : For asmuch as the Father hath predestinate these to Rom. 8. 29. be fashioned like the image of his sonne, whome, in him he hath chosen, that he may be the first begotten among all his brethren: and therefore that neither death, nor present things, nor things to come, shall seuer vs from the loue of God which is in Christ : but rather all things shall turne to vs to good and to saluation. Loe, we do not iustifie a man by workes before God : but we say that all they that are of God, are regenerate and made a newe creature, that they may 2. Pet. 1. 10. passe out of the kingdome of sinne into the kingdome of righteousness, and that by this testimonie they make their calling certaine, and are iudged as trees by the frutes.

The xvj. Chapter.

A confutation of the sclaunders, vvhich the Papistes go about to bring this doctrine in hatred.

WITH this one word may the shamelesnesse of certaine vngodly mē be confuted which sclaunder vs with saying that we destroy good workes, and do drawe men away from the following of them, when we say that they are not iustified by workes, nor do deserue saluation : and againe, that we make to easy a way to righteousness, when we teach that it lieth in the free forgiuenesse of sinnes, and that we do by this enticement allure men to sinne, which are of their owne will too much enclined therto already. These sclaunders (I say) are with that one word sufficiently confuted: yet I will brefely answer to them both. They allege that by the iustification of faith, good workes are destroyed. I leaue vnspoken, what māner of men be these zelous louers of good workes which do so backbite vs. Let them haue licence as freely to rayle as they do licentiously infect the whole world with the filthinesse of their life. They faine that they be greued, that when faith is so gloriously aduanced, workes are driuen downe out of their place. What if they be more raised vp, and stablished? For neither do we dreame of a faith voide of good workes, nor a iustification that is without them. This onely is the difference, that when we confesse that faith and good workes do necessarily hang together, yet we set iustification in faith, not in works. For what reason we do so, we haue in redinesse easily to declare, if we do but turne to Christ vnto whome our faith is directed, and from whome it receiueth her whole strength. Why therefore are we iustified by faith? bycause by faith we take holde of the righteousnesse of Christ, by which alone we are reconciled to God. But this thou canst not take holde of, but that thou must also therewithall take hold of sanctification. For he was geuen to vs, for righteousnesse, wisdom, sanctification, and redemption. Therefore Christ iustificieth none whom he doth not also sanctifie. For these benefites are coupled together with a perpetuall and vnseparable knot, that whome he enlighteneth with his wisdom, them he redemeth: whome he redemeth, he iustificieth: whome he iustificieth, he sanctifieth. But for asmuch as our question is onely of righteousnesse and sanctifying, let vs stay vpon these. We may put difference betwene them, yet Christ containeth them both vnseparably in himselfe. Wilt thou therefore obtaine righteousnesse in Christ? Thou must first possesse Christ: and thou canst not possesse him, but that thou must be made partaker of his sanctification: because he can not be torne in peeces. Sith therefore the Lorde doth graunt vs these benefites to be enjoyed none otherwise than in geuing himselfe, he geueth them both together, the one neuer without the other. So appereth how true it is, that we are iustified not without workes, and yet not by workes: because in the partaking of Christ, wherby we are iustified, is no lesse contained sanctification than righteousnesse.

2 That also is most false, that the mindes of men are withdrawn from the affection of weldoing, when we take from them the opinion of meriting. Here by the way the readers must be warned, that they foolishly reason from reward to merit, as I shall afterward more plainly declare: namely because they know not this principle, that God is no lesse liberall when he assigneth reward to workes, than when he geueth power to do well. But this I had rather differre to the place fit for it. Now it shalbe enough to touch howe weake their obiection is: which shalbe done two wayes. For first whereas they say that there shalbe no care of well framing of life, but when hope of reward is set before them: they erre quite from the truth. For if this onely be entended when men serue God, that they loke to reward, or let out to hire or sell their labors to him, they litle preuayle: for God will be freely worshipped, freely loued: he (I say) alloweth that worshipper, which when all hope of receiuing reward is cut of, yet cesseth not to worshippe him. Moroeuer if men be to be pricked forward, no man can put sharper spurres vnto them, than those that are taken of the ende of our redemption and calling: such as the word of God spurreth men withall, when it teacheth, that it is to wicked vnthankfulnesse, not mutually to loue him againe which first loued vs: that by the blood of Christ our consciences are cleansed from dead workes, to serue the liuing God: that it is a hainous sacrilege, if being ones cleansed, we defile our selues with newe filthinesse, and prophane that holy blood: that we are deliuered from the handes of our enemies, that we may without feare serue him in holinesse and righteousnesse before him all the dayes of our life: that we are made free from sinne, that we may with a free Spirit followe righteousnes: that our olde man is crucified, that we may rise againe into newnesse of life: againe that if we be dead with Christ (as becommeth his members) we must seeke those things that are aboue, and must in the world be waifaring men from home, that we may long toward heauen where is our treasure: that the grace of God hath appered to this ende, that forsaking all vngodlinesse and worldly desires, we may liue soberly, holily, and godlily in this world, looking for the blessed hope and the appering of the glorie of the great God and sauour: therefore that we are not apointed that we should stirre vp wrath to our selues, but that we may obtaine saluation by Christ: that we are the temples of the Holy Ghost, which it is not lawfull to be defiled: that we are not darkenesse, but light in the Lord, which must walke as children of light: that we are not called to vncleannesse, but to holinesse: because this is the will of God, our sanctification, that we absteine from vnlawfull desires: that our calling is holy, that the same is not fulfilled but with purenesse of life: that we are for this purpose deliuered from sinne, that we should obey to righteousnesse. Can we be pricked forward to charitie with any more liuely argument than that of Iohn, that we should mutually loue one an other as God hath loued vs? that herein his children do differ from the children of the Deuell, the children of light from the children of darkenesse, bycause they abide in loue? Againe with that argument of Paule, that we if we cleaue to Christ, are the members of one body, which it is mete to be holpen one of an other with mutuall duties? Can we be more strongly prouoked to holinesse, than when we heare againe of Iohn, that all they that haue this hope, do sanctifie themselues, bycause their God is holy? Againe of y^e mouth of Paule: that hauing the promise of adoption, we should cleanse our selues from all the defiling of the flesh and spirite? than when we heare Christ setting forth himselfe for an example vnto vs that we should follow his steppes?

3 And these fewe things I haue set forth for a tast. For if I should entende to go through all, I shoulde be driuen to make a longe volume. The Apostles are all full of encouragements, exhortations & rebukings, wherby they may instruct the man of God to euery good worke, and that without any mention of merite. But rather they fetch their chiefe exhortations from this that our saluation standeth vpon the onely mercie of God and vpon no merite of ours. As Paule, after that he hath in a whole Epistle discoursed that there is no hope of life for vs but in the righteousnesse of Christ, when he commeth downe to moral exhortations, he besecheth them by that mercy of God which he hath vouchsafed to extend to vs. And truly this one cause ought to haue bin sufficient, that God may be glorified in vs. But if any be not so vehemently moued with the glory of God, yet the remembrance of his benefites ought to haue bin, most sufficient, to stirre vp such men to do well. But these men, which do parauenture with thrusting in of merites beate out some seruile & constrained obediences of the law, do falsly say that we haue nothing whereby we may exhorte menne to good workes, because we go not the same way to worke. As though God were much delited with such obediences, which protesteth that he loueth a cherefull giuer, & forbiddeth any thing to be giuen as it were of heauines or of necessity. Neither do I speake this for that I do either refuse or despise that kinde of exhortation, which the Scripture oftentimes vseth, that it may leaue no meane vnattempted euery way to stirre vp our mindes. For it rehearseth the reward which God will render to euery man accordinge to his workes. But I deny that that is the only thing, yea or the chiefe among many. And then I graunt not that we ought to take beginnige thereat. Moreouer I affirme that it maketh nothinge to the settinge vp of such merites as these men boast of, as we shall hereafter see. Last of all I say that is to no profitable vse, vnlesse this doctrine haue first taken place, that we are iustified by the onely merite of Christ, which is conceiued by faith but by no merites of our workes, because none can be fitte to the endeouour of holinesse, vnlesse they haue first digested this doctrine. Which thinge also the Prophet very well signifieth, when he thus speaketh to God: With thee is mercy, that thou mayst be feared. For he sheweth that there is no worshippinge of God, but when his mercy is acknowledged, vpon which alone it is both founded and stablished. Which is very worthy to be noted, that we may knowe not onely that the beginnige of worshippinge God aright is the affiance of his mercy, but also that the feare of God (which the Papistes will haue to be meritorious) can not haue the name of merite, because it is grounded vpon the pardon and forgeuenesse of finnes.

4. But it is a most vayne sclaunder, that men are allured to sinne, when we affirme the free forgeuenesse of finnes, in which we say that righteousnesse consisteth. For, we say that it is of so great value, that it can with no good of oures be recompensed, and that therefore it should neuer be obtained, vnlesse it were freely geue. Moreouer that it is to vs in deede freely geuen, but not so to Christ which bought it so derely, namely with his owne most holy bloud, beside which there was no price of value enough that might be paied to the iudgement of God. When menne are taught these things, they are put in minde that it is no thanke to them that the same most holy bloud is not shed so oft as they sinne. Furthermore we learne, that our filthinesse is such, as is neuer washed away but with the fountaine of this most pure bloud, Ought not they that heare these things, to conceiue a greater horreur of sinne, than if it were said that it is wiped away with the sprinkling of good workes? And if they haue any thing of God, howe can they but dred being ones cleansed, to wallowe themselves againe in the mire, as much as in them lieth to troble & infect the purenesse of this fountaine? I haue washed my feete (saith the faithfull soule in Salomon) how shall I againe defile them? Now it is euidēt, whether sort do both more abace the forgeuenesse of finnes, and do more make vile the dignitie of righteousnesse. They babble that God is appeased with their owne trifling satisfactions, that is, their donge: We affirme that the giltinesse of sinne is more greuous than can be purged with so light tristes: that the displeasure of God is more heauie than can be released with these satisfactions of no value, and that therefore this is the prerogatiue of the onely bloude of Christ. They say that righteousnes (if it faile at any time) is restored and repaired by satisfactorie workes: we thinke it more precious than that it can be matched with any recompense of workes, and that therefore for the restoring thereof we must flee to the onely mercie of God. As for the rest of those thinges that pertaine to the forgeuenesse of finnes, let them be sought out of the next chapter.

The xvij. Chapter.

The agreement of the promises of the lawe and the Gospell.

NOW let vs also go through the other arguments wherewith Satan by the soldiars of his garde, goeth about either to ouerthrowe or batter the iustification of faith. This I thinke we haue already wrong from the sclaunderers, that they can no more charge vs as enemies of good workes. For, iustification is taken away from good workes, not that no good workes should be done, or that those which be done should be denied to be good, but that we should not put affiãce in them, not glorie in them, not ascribe saluation to them. For this is our affiãce, this is our glorie, and the onely authour of our saluation, that Christ the sonne of God is ours, and we likewise are in him y^e sonnes of God, and heyers of the heauēly kingdome, being called by the goodnesse of God, not by our owne worthinesse, into the hope of eternall blessednesse. But bycause they do biside these assaile vs, as we haue said, with other engines, go to let vs go forward in beating away these also. Firff they come backe to the promises of the lawe, which the Lorde did set forth to the keepers of his lawe: and they aske whether we will haue them to be vterly voide or effectuell. Bycause it were an absurditie and to be scorned to say that they are voide, they take it for cōfessed that they are of some effectualnesse. Hereupon they reason that we are not iustified by only

ut. 7. faith. For thus saith the Lorde: And it shalbe, if thou shalt heare these commaundementes and iudgementes, and shall kepe them and do them, the Lorde also shall kepe with thee his couenant and mercie which he hath sworne to thy fathers, he shal loue thee and multiplie

ec. 7. thee, and blesse thee, &c. Againe, If ye shall well direct your wayes

x. 23. and your endeuors, if ye walke not after strange Gods, if ye do iudgement between man and man, and go not backe into malice, I will walke in the middest of you. I will not recite a thousand peces of the same sorte, which sith they nothing differ in sense, shalbe declared

u. 11. by the solution of these. In a summe, Moses testifieth that in the lawe is set forth blessing and curse, death & life. Thus therfore they reason, that either this blessing is made idle and frutelesse, or that iustificatiō is not of faith alone. We haue already before shewed, howe if we sticke fast in the lawe, ouer vs being destitute of all blessing, hangeth onely curse which is threatned to all transgressors. For the Lord promiseth nothing but to the perfect keepers of his lawe, such as there is none found. This therfore remaineth, that all mankinde is by the lawe accused, and subiect to curse and the wrath of God: from which that they may be loosed, they must needes go out of the power of the lawe, & be as it were brought into libertie from the bondage thereof: not that carnall libertie which should withdrawe vs from the keeping of the lawe, should allure vs to thinke all things lawfull and to suffer our lust, as it were the staves being broken & with loose reines to run at riot: but the spirituall libertie, which may comfort and raise vp a dismayed and ouerthrowen conscience, shewing it to be free from place they are commaunded to worke the meate which perissheth not, when by beleuing in Christ they gette to themselues life: and yet it is by and by afterward added: Which the sonne of man shall giue you. Wherby appeareth y^e the word of Working is not set as contrary to grace, but is referred to endeouour: & therefore it foloweth not, y^e either the faithful are theselues authors of their owne saluation, or that the same procedeth from their workes. How then? So soone as they are taken into the felowship of Christ, by the knowledge of the Gospel, & the enlightning of the holy Ghost, eternall life is begonne in the. Nowe the same good worke which God hath begonne in the, must also be made perfect vntil the day of the lord Iesu. And it is made perfect, when resembling the heavenly father in righteousnes & holines, they proue themselues to be his children. not swarued out of kinde.

2 There is no cause why we should of the name of rewarde gather an argument that our workes are the cause of saluation. First let this be determined in our heartes, that the kingdom of heauē is not a reward of seruants, but an inheritance of children, which they only shal enioy, that are adopted of the lord to be his children: & for no other cause, but for this adoption. For, the sonne of the bond woman shall not be heir, but the sonne of the free womā. And in the very same places, in which the holy Ghost promiseth to workes eternall glory for reward, in expressing the inherance by name, he sheweth that it cometh frō else where. So Christ rehearseth workes, which he recōpenseth with the rewarding of heauen, when he calleth the elect to the possiō therof: but he therewithal adioineth that it must be possessed by right of inheritance. So Paule biddeth seruantes, which do their duety faithfully, to hope for reward of the lord: but he addeth, of inheritance. We see how they do as it werē by expresse wordes prouide that we impute not eternal blessednes to workes, but to the adoption of God. Why therefore do they therewithall together make mention of workes? This question shalbe made plaine with one example of Scripture. Before the birth of Isaac, there was promised to Abraham a seede in which all the nations of the earth should be blessed: & a multiplying of his seede, which should match the starres of the skie, & the sandes of the sea, & other like. In many yeares afterward, Abraham, as he was commaunded by the oracle, prepared himselfe to offer vp his sonne in sacrifice. When he had performed this obedience, he receiued a promise. I haue sworne by my self (saith the Lord) because thou hast done this thing, & hast not spared thine owne only begotten sonne, I wil blesse thee & multiply thy seede as the starres of the skie, & the sandes of the sea: thy seede shal possesse the gates of their enemies, and all the nations of the earth shalbe blessed in thy seede, because thou hast obeyed my voice. What heare we? Hath Abraham by his obedience deserued the blessinge, the promise whereof he had receiued before that the commaundement was giuen? Here verily we haue it without circumstances shewed, y^e the lord rewardeth the works of the faithful with those benefites which he had already giuen them before that the workes were thought of, hauing, yet no cause why he should do good to them but his owne mercy.

3 Yet doth the Lord not deceiue nor mocke vs when he saith that he rendreth for reward to works the same thing which he had before workes freely giuen. For, because he wil haue vs to be exercised with good workes, to thinke vpon the deliuey or enioyinge (as I may so call it) of these things which he hath promised, and to runne through them to the blessed hope set before vs in heauen, the frute of the promises is also rightly assigned to them, to the ripenesse wherof they do not bring vs. The Apostle very fitly expressed both these pointes, whē he sayd that the Colossians apply themselues to the duties of charity, for the hope which is laied vp for them in heauen, of which they had before heard by the word of the true speaking Gospel. For when he sayth that they knewe by the Gospel, that there was hope layd vp for them in heauen, he declareth that the same is by Christ only, not vnderpropped with any workes. Wherwith accordeth that saying of Pe. 1. Peter, that the godly are kept by the power of God, through faith, vnto the saluation which is ready to be manifestly shewed at the time appointed for it. Whē he sayth that they labor for it, he signifieth that the faithful must runne all the time of their life, that they may attaine to it. But least we shoulde thinke that the reward which the Lord promisetht vs, is not reduced to the measure of merite, he did put foorth a parable, in which he made himself a householder, which sent all them that he met, to the trimming of his vineyard, some at the first houre of the day, some at y^e second, some at y^e third, yea & some also at the 11. At eueninge he payed to euery one egall wages. The exposition of which parable, that same old wryter whatsoever he was, whose booke is caried abroade vnder the name of Ambrose of the callinge of the Gentiles, hath briefely and truely set out. I will vse rather his wordes than mine owne. The Lorde (sayth he) by the rule of this comparison hath stablished the diuersity of manifolde callinge, belonginge to one grace: where without dout they which being let into the vineyard at the 11. houre, are made egall with them that had wrought the whole day, do represent the estate of them, whom for the aduancing of the excellency of grace, the tender kindenes of the lord hath rewarded at the waning of the day, and at the endinge of their life: not payinge wages for their labour, but pouring out the richesse of his goodnesse vpon them whom he hath chosen without workes, that euen they also which haue sweet in great labour, and haue receiued no more than the last, may vnderstand that they haue receiued a gift of grace, not a reward of workes. Last of all, this also is worthy to be noted in these places, where eternall life is called the reward of workes, that it is not simply taken for the communicating which we haue with God to blessed immortality, when he embraceth vs with fatherly good will in Christ: but for the possessing or enioying (as they call it) of blessednes, as also the very words of Christ do sound, In time to come life euerlasting. And in an other place, Come & possess the kingdom, &c. After this maner Paul calleth adoptiō, the revealing of the adoption which shalbe made in the resurrection: and afterward expoundeth it the redemption of our body. Otherwise as estranging from God is eternall death, so when man is receiued of God into fauour, that he may enioy the communicating of him & be made one with him, he is receiued from death to life: which is done by the beneficial meane of adoptiō only. And if, as they are wont, they stiffely enforce the reward of works, we may turne against them that sayinge of Peter, that eternall life is the reward of faith.

4 Therefore let vs not thinke, that the holy Ghost doth with such promise set forth the worthinesse of our workes, as if they deserued such reward, For y^e Scripture leaueth nothing to vs, whereof we may be aduanced in the sight of God. But rather it wholly endeuoreth to beate downe our arrogance, to humble vs, to throw vs downe, and altogether to breake vs in peeces. But our weakenes is so succoured, which otherwise would by and by slip & fall downe, vnlesse it did sustaine it selfe with this expectation, and mitigate her tedious grieues with comfort. First how hard it is for a mā to forsake & deny not only all his thinges, but also himselfe, let euery man consider for himselfe. And yet with this introductiō Christ traineth his schollers, that is, all the godly. Then throughout all their life he so instructeth thē vnder the discipline of the crosse, that they may not set their heart either to the desire or cōfidence of present good things. Briefly he so handlet them for the most part, that which way soeuer they turne their eies throughout the whole widenesse of the worlde, they haue on euery side nothing but desperation present before them: so that Paule sayth, that we are more miserable then all men if our hope be onely in this world. That they shoulde not faint in these so great distresses, the lord is present with them, which putteth them in mind to lift vp their heade hier, to cast their eies further, y^e they finde with him the blessednes which they see not in y^e world. This blessednes he calleth, reward, wages, recompense, not weying the merit of workes, but signifying that it is a recōpensing to their troubles, sufferings, sclauanders, &c. Wherefore nothing withstandeth, but y^e we may after the example of the Scripture, call eternall life a rewarding, because in it the Lord receiueth his from labors into rest, frō affliction into prosperous & happy state, from sorrow into gladnes, from pouerty into flowing wealth, frō shame into glory, & changeth al the euils which they haue suffred for greater good things. So it shal also be no inconuenience, if we thinke holines of life to be a way, not which openeth an entry into the glory of the heavenly kingdom, but whereby the elect are led of their God into y^e disclosing of it: forasmuch as this is his good will, to glorifie them whom he hath sanctified. Only let vs not imagine a correllatiō of merit & reward, wherein the Sophisters do fondly stick fast, because they consider not this end which we set forth. But how vnorderly is it, whē the lord calleth vs to one end, for vs to loke to another? Nothing is more euident, than that rewarde is promised to good workes, to relieue the weakenesse of our flesh with some confor-te, not to puffed vp our mindes with glory. Whosoeuer therefore doth therby gather the merit of workes, or doth in one balance weye worke with reward, he erreth farre from the right marke of God.

Tim. 4 5 Wherefore when the Scripture saith that God the iust iudge wil one day render to his a crowne of righteousness, I do not only take exception with Augustine, and say: To whom should he being a iust iudge, render a crowne, if he had not beinge a mercifull father giuen grace? and how should there be righteousness, vnlesse grace went before which iustificth the vnrighteous? How should these due thinges be rendered, vnlesse these vndue thinges were first giuen? But also I adde an other thinge. Howe should he impute righteousness to our workes, vnlesse his tender mercifulnesse did hide the vnrighteousnes that is in them? How should he iudge them worthy of reward, vnlesse he did by immeasurable bountifullnesse take away that which is worthy of punishment? For he is wont to call eternall life, grace: because it is redred to the free gifts of God when it is repaid to workes. But the Scripture doth further humble vs, and therewithall raise vs vp. For beside this that it forbiddeth vs to glory in workes, because they are the free gifts of God, it therewithall teacheth that they are alway defiled with some dregges, that they can not satisfie God, if they be examined by the rule of his iudgement: but least our courage should faint, it teacheth y^e they please by only pardō. But although Augustine speaketh Speakeſh ſomwhat otherwiſe than we do: yet that he doth not ſo diſagree in the matter, ſhall appeare by his words in his third booke to Boniface. Where when he had cōpared two men together, the one of a life euen miraculoſly holy & perfect, the other honeſt in dede & of vncorrupt inaners, but not ſo perfect but that much wanteth in him: at ſ̄ laſt he concludeth thus. Euen this man which in maners ſeemeth much inferiour, by reaſon of the true faith in God whereof he liueth and according to which he accuſeth himſelfe in all his offences, in all his good workes praiſeth God, giuinge to himſelfe the ſhame, & to him the glory, & taking from himſelfe both the pardon of finnes, & the loue of weldoinges, when he is to be deliuered out of this life, he paſſeth into the fellowſhip of Chriſt. Wherefore, but becauſe of faith? Which although it ſaue no man without workes (for it is it, which worketh by loue, not a reprobate faith) yet by it alſo finnes are releaſed, becauſe the righteous man liueth of faith: but without it euen the ſame which ſeeme good workes are turned into finnes. Here verily he doth plainly confeſſe ſ̄ which we ſo much trauaile to proue, that the righteousnes of good workes hangeth hervpon, that they are by pardon allowed of God.

6. A very neare ſenſe to the places aboue recited, haue theſe: Make to your ſelues friends of the Mammon of wickednes, that when you ſhal faile, they may receiue you into euerlaſtinge tabernacles. Commaunde the rich men of this world not to be proudly minded, nor to truſt in vncertaine richeſſe but in the liuinge God, to do well, to become riche in good workes, to lay vp in ſtore for themſelues a good foundation againſt the time to come, that they may obtaine eternall life. For good workes are compared to the richeſſe, which we may enioy in the bleſſedneſſe of eternall life. I anſwere, that we ſhall neuer come to the true vnderſtāding of them, vnleſſe we turne our eies to the marke wherunto the holy Ghoſt directeth his words. If it be true which Chriſt ſaith, that our minde abideth there where our treaſure is, as the childrē of ſ̄ world are wont to be earnestly bent to the getting of thoſe things which ſerue for the delites of this preſent life: ſo the faithfull muſt looke, ſiſh they haue learned that this life ſhal by and by vaniſh away like a dreame, that they ſend thoſe thinges which they would enioy, thither where they ſhal haue perfect life. We muſt therefore do as they do which purpoſe to remoue into any place, wher they haue choſen to reſt their whole life. They ſende their goods before, & do not miſcōtentedly want thē for a time: becauſe they think themſelues ſo much more happy, how much more goods they haue where they ſhal tary long. If we beleue that heauen is our countrey, it behoueth vs rather to sende away our richesse thither than to keepe thē here where we must loose them with sudden remouing. But how shal we send them thither? If we cōmunicate to the necessities of the poore: to whom whatsoever is giuen, the lord accompteth it giuen to himselfe. Wherupon cōmeth that notable promise. He that giueth to the poore, lendeth for gaine to the Lorde. Againe he that liberally sowerth, shall liberally reape. For those things are deliuered into the hand of the lord to kepe, which are bestowed vpon our brethrē by the duty of charity. He, as he is a faithful keeper of y^e which is deliuered to him, wil one day restore it with plentiful gainē. Are thē our ductifull doings of so great value with God, that they be as richesse laid vp in store for vs in his hand? Who shal feare so to say, when the Scripture doth so of: & plainly witnesse it? But if any man will leape from the mere goodnes of God to the worthines of works, he shalbe nothing holpen by these testimonies to the stablishing of his error. For you can gather nothing rightly therof but the mere inclination of Gods tendernes toward vs: forasmuch as to encourage vs to well doing although the seruices which we do to him are not worthy of so much as his only looking vpon thē, yet he suffreth none of them to be lost.

7 But they more enforce the words of the Apostle, which when he comforteth the Thessalonians in troubles, teacheth that the same are sent to them, y^e they may be accōpted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which they suffer. For (saith he) it is righteous with God, to render trouble to thē y^e trouble you: but to you, rest with vs when the lord Iesus shalbe shewed from heauen. But the author of the epistle to the Hebrues saith, God is not vnrighteous, y^e he should forget your worke, & y^e loue which you haue shewed in his name for y^e you haue ministred to the saintes. To the first place I answer, that there is no worthines of merit spoken of: but because God y^e fa: her willeth that we whom he hath chosen to be his children, should be made like to Christ his first begottē sonne: as it behoued that he should first suffer, & thē entre into the glory appointed for him: so must we also by many tribulations entre into the kingdome of heauen. Therefore when we suffer tribulatiōs for the name of Christ, there are as it were certaine marks printed vpon vs, wherwith God vseth to marke the shepe of his flocke. After this maner therefore we are accompted worthy of the kingdom of God, because we beare in our body y^e markes of our lord & maister which are the signes of the children of God. To this purpose make these sayinges. That we beare about in our body the mortification of Iesus Christ y^e his life may be shewed in vs. That we be fashioned like to his suffrings, that we may come to the likenes of his

his resurrectiō from the dead. The reason which is adioyned serue:th not to proue any worthines, but to confirme y^e hope of the kingdom of God: as if he had said, As it agreeth with the iust iudgemēt of God, to take vengeance of your enemies for the vexations that they haue done to you: so agreeth it also to giue to you release & rest from vexations. The other place, which teacheth that it so becommeth the righteousnesse of God not to forget the obediences of them that be his, that it declareth it to be in a maner vnrighteous if he should forget thē, hath this meaning: God to quicken our slouthfulnes, hath giuen vs assurance that the labor shall not be vaine which we shal take for his glory. Let vs alway remēber y^e this promise, as all other should bring vs no profit, vnlesse the free couenaut of mercy went before, wherupon the whole assurednes of our saluation should rest. But standing vpon that couenant, we ought assuredly to trust, there shall also not want reward of the liberality of God to our workes howe soeuer they be vnworthy. The Apostle to confirme vs in that expectation, affirmeth y^e God is not vnrighteous, but will stande to his promise ones made. Therefore this righteousnes is rather referred to the truth of Gods promise, thā to his iustice of rendring due. According to which meaning there is a notable saying of Augustin, which as the holy mā sticketh not to rehearse oftē as notable, so I thinke it not vnworthy that we should continually remēber it. The lord (saith he) is faithfull, which hath made himselfe detter to vs, not by receiuing any thing of vs, but by promising all things to vs.

8 There are also allēaged these sayings of Paul. If I haue all faith, so that I remoue mountaines out of their place, but haue not charity, I am nothing. Againe, Now there remaine hope, faith & charity, but the greatest among these is charity. Againe, Aboue all thinges haue charity, which is the bonde of perfection. By the first two places our Pharises affirme that we are rather iustified by charity than by faith, namely by the chiefer vertue as they say. But this fonde argument is easily wiped away. For we haue in an other place already declared, that those things which are spokē in the first place pertaine nothing to true faith. The other place we also expounde of true faith, than which he sayth that Charity is greater: not that it is more meritorius, but because it is more frutefull, because it extendeth further, because it serueth mo, because it remaineth alway in force, whereas the vse of faith cōtinueth but for a time. If we haue regard to excellēce, the loue of God should worthily haue y^e chiefe place, of which Paule here speaketh not. For he enforceth this thing only, y^e we should with mutuall charity edifie one an other in y^e Lord, but let vs imagine that charity doth euery way excell faith: yet what man of sounde iudgement, yea or of sounde braine, will gather thereof that it doth more iustifie? The power of iustifying which faith hath, consisteth not in the worthinesse of the worke. Our iustification standeth vpon the onely mercy of God & the deseruing of Christ, which iustificatiō whē faith taketh holde of, it is said to iustifie. Now if you aske our aduersaries in what sense they assigne iustification to charity, they wil answere that because it is a diuertifull doing acceptable to God, therefore by the deseruing thereof righteousness is imputed to vs by the acceptation of the goodnes of God. Here you see how wel the argument procedeth. We say that faith iustificieth, not because by the worthines of it selfe it deserueth righteousness to vs, but because it is an instrument by which we freely obtaine righteousness of Christ. These mē, omitting the mercy of God, and passing ouer Christ, (where the summe of righteousness standeth) do affirme that we are iustified by the benefit of charity because it excelleth aboue faith: euen as if a man woulde reason that a king is fitter to make a shooe thā is a shooemaker, because he is an infinite way more excellent. This onely argument is a plaine example that all the Sobornicall schooles do not so much as tast with the vtermost part of their lippes what the iustification of faith is. But if any wrangler do yet carpe and aske, why in so small distance of place we take the name of faith in Paule so diuersly: I haue a weighty cause of this exposition. For sith those gifts which Paule rehearseth are after a certaine maner vnder faith & hope, because they pertaine to the knowledge of God, he cōtemneth thē all by way of recaptitulatiō vnder the name of faith & hope: as if he should say bothe prophecy, & tōgues, & the grace and knowledge of interpretation tende to this marke to lead vs to the knowledge of God, And we know God in this life none otherwise but by hope & faith. Therefore when I name faith & hope, I comprehend all these thinges together. And so there remaine these three, Hope, Faith, Charity: that is to say, how great diuersity of gifts soeuer there be, they are all referred to these. Among these the chief is charity, &c. Out of the thirde place they gather, If Charity be the bonde of perfection, then it is also the bonde of righteousness which is nothinge else but perfection. First, to speake nothinge howe Paule there calieth perfection, when the members of the Church well set in order do cleaue together, & to graunt that we are by charity made perfect before God: yet what newe thinge bringe they foorth? For I will alway on the contrary side take exception and say that we neuer come to this perfection vnlesse we fulfil all the partes of charity, and thereupon I wil gather, that sith all men are most far frō the fulfilling

of charitie, therefore all hope of perfection is cutt of from them.

9 I will not go through all the testimonies which at this day the foolish Sorbonistes rashly snatch out of the scriptures, as they first come to hande, and do throwe them against vs. For, some of them are so worthy to be laughed at, that I my selfe also can not rehearse them, vnlesse I would worthily be compted fond. Therefore I will make an ende, when I shal haue declared the saying of Christ, where-with they maruelously please themselues. For, to the lawyer which asked him what was necessarie to saluation, he answered: if thou wilt entre into life, kepe the commaundementes. What wold we more (say they) when we are commaunded by the author of grace himselfe to get the kingdom of God by the keping of his commaundementes? As though forsooth it were not certaine, that Christ tépered his aunsweres to them with whom he saw that he had to do. Here a doctor of the lawe asketh of the meane to obtaine blessednes, and not that onely, but with doing of what thing men may atteine vnto it. Both the person of him that spake and the question it selfe led the Lord so to answer. The lawyer being filled with the persuasion of the righteousnesse of the lawe, was blinde in cōfidence of workes. Againe, he sought nothing els but what were the workes of righteousnesse, by which saluation is gotten. Therefore he is worthily sent to the lawe, in which there is a perfect mirror of righteousnesse. We also do with a loude voice pronounce that the commaundementes must be kept, if life be sought in works. And this doctrine is necessary to be knowen of Christians. For how should they flee to Christ if they did not acknowledge that they are fallen from the way of life into the hedlonge downefall of death? But how should they vnderstand how far they haue strayed from the way of life, vnlesse they first vnderstande what is that way of life? For then they are taught that the sanctuarie to recouer saluation, is in Christ, when they see howe great difference there is betwene their life and the righteousnesse of God which is contained in the keping of the law. The summe is this, that if saluation be sought in workes, we must kepe the commaundementes by which we are instructed to perfect righteousnesse. But we must not sticke fast here, vnlesse we will faint in our midde course: for none of vs is able to kepe the commaundements. Sith therefore we are excluded from the righteousnes of the lawe, we must of necessity resort to an other helpe, namely to the faith of Christ. Wherefore as here the Lorde calleth backe the doctor of the lawe whom he knew to swell with vaine confidence of workes, to the lawe, whereby he may learne that he is a sinner subiect to the dreadfull iudgement of eternall death: so in other places, without making mention of the law, he comforteth other that are already humbled with such knowledge, with promise of grace, as, Come to mee all ye that laboure and are laden, and I will refresh you, and ye shall finde rest for your soules.

At the last when they are weary with wresting the Scripture, they fall to subtleties and sophisticall argumentes. They caull vpon this that faith is in some places called a worke, and thereupon they gather that we do wrōgfully set faith as cōtrary to workes. As though forsooth faith in that it is an obeying of the will of God, doth with her owne deseruinge procure vnto vs righteousnesse, and not rather bycause by embracing the mercie of God, it sealet in our heartes the righteousnesse of Christ offred to vs of it in the preaching of the Gospel. The readers shall pardon me if I do not tarry vpon confuting of such follies, for they themselues without any assault of other, are sufficiently ouerthrowen with their owne feeblenesse. But I will by the way cōfute one obiection which seemeth to haue some shew of reason, least it should trouble some that are not so well practised. Sith common reason teacheth that of contraries is all one rule, and all particular sinnes are imputed to vs for vnrighteousnesse, they say it is meete that to all particular good workes be geuen the praise of righteousnes. They do not satisfie me which answer, that the damnation of men proprely proceedeth from only vnbelefe, not from particular sinnes. I do in deede agree to them, that vnbelefe is the fountaine and roote of all euels. For it is the first departinge from God, after which do followe the particular trespassinges against the lawe. But wheras they seeme to set one selfe same reason of good and euell workes in weying of righteousnesse or vnrighteousnesse, therein I am compelled to disagree from them For the righteousnes of workes is the perfecte obedience of the lawe. Therefore thou canst not be righteous by workes, vnlesse thou do followe it as a streight line in the whole continuall course of thy life. From it so sone as thou hast swarued, thou arte fallen into vnrighteousnesse. Hereby appeareth that righteousnesse commeth not of one or a fewe workes, but of an vnswaruing and vnweried obseruing of the will of God. But the rule of iudging vnrighteousnesse is most contrary. For he that hath committed fornication, or hath stolen, is by one offence guilty of death, because he hath offended against the maiestie of God. Therefore these our suttle arguers do stumble, for that they maike not this saying of James, that he which sinneth in one, is made guilty of all, because he that hath forbidden to kill, hath also forbidden to steale, &c. Therefore it ought to seeme no absurditie when we say that death is the iuste iuste rewarde of euery sinne, because they are euery one worthy of the iuste displeasure and vengeance of God. But thou shalt reason foolishly, if on the contrarie side thou gather that by one good worke man may be reconciled to God, which with many sinnes deserueth his wrathe.

The xix. Chapter.

Of Christian libertie.

NOwe we must entreate of Christian libertie: the declaration whereof he must not omitt whose purpose is to comprehend in an abridgmet the summe of the doctrine of the Gospell. For it is a thing principally necessarie, and without the knowledge whereof conscience dare in a manner enterprise nothing without doubting, they stumble and start backe in many things, they alway stagger & tremble: but specially it is an appendant of iustification, and aualeth not a little to the vnderstanding of the strength thereof. Yea they that earnestly feare God, shall hereby receiue an incomparable frute of that doctrine which the wicked & Lucianicall men do pleasantly taunt with their scoffes, because in the spirituall daikenesse wherewith they be taken, euery wanton railing is lawefull for them. Wherefore it shall nowe come forth in fit season: and it was profitable to differre to this place the plainer discorsing of it, (for we haue already in diuers places lightly touched it) because so sone as any mention is brought in of Christian libertie, then either filthy lustes do boile, or mad motions do arise, vnlesse these wanton wittes be timely met withall, which do otherwise most naughtily corrupte the best things. For, some men by pretense of this libertie, shake of all obedience of God, and breake forth into an vnbridled licentiousnesse: and some men disdain it, thinking that by it all moderation, ordre and choise of things is taken away. What should we here do, being compassed in such narrowe streightes? Shall we bidde Christian libertie farewell, and so cutt of all fitt occasion for such periles? But, as we haue said, vnlesse that be fast holden, neither Christ, nor the truth of the Gospell, nor the inward peace of the soule is rightly knowen. Rather we must endeouour that so necessarie a part of doctrine be not suppressed, and yet that in the meane time those fonde obiections may be mette withall which are wont to rise thereupon.

Lucia,
godles
man.

2 Christian libertie (as I thinke) consisteth in three pottes. The first, that the consciences of the faithfull, when the affiance of their iustification before God is to be sought, may raise & aduance themselves about the lawe, and forget the whole righteousnesse of the

lawe. For sith the lawe (as we haue already in an other place declared) leaueth no man righteous: either we are excluded from all hope of iustification, or we must be loosed from the lawe, and so that there be no regarde at all hadde of workes. For whoso thinketh that he must bring somwhat be it neuer so little of good workes to obtaine righteousness, he can not apointe any ende or measure of them, but maketh him selfe detter to the whole lawe. Therefore taking away all mention of the lawe, and laying aside all thinking vpon workes, we must embrace the onely mercie of God, when we entreate of iustification: & turning away our sight from our selues, we must behold Christ alone. For there the question is not howe we be righteous: but howe although we be vnrighteous and vnworthy, we be taken for worthy. Of which thing if consciences will attein any certainty, they must geue no place to the lawe. Neither can any man hereby gather that the lawe is superfluous to the faithfull, whom it doth not therefore ceasse to teach, and exhorte, and pricke forwarde to goodnesse, although before the iudgement seate of God it hath no place in their consciences. For these two things, as they are most diuerse, so must be well and diligently distinguished of vs. The whole life of Christians ought to be a certaine meditation of godlinesse, bycause they are called into sanctification. Herein standeth the office of the lawe, that by putting them in minde of their duetie, it should stir them vp to the endeour of holinesse and innocencie. But when consciences are carefull howe they may haue God mercifull, what they shall answer, and vpon what affiance they shall stand if they be called to his iudgement, there is not to be reckened what the lawe requireth, but onely Christ must be set forth for righteousness, which passeth all perfection of the lawe.

3. Vpon this point hangeth almost all the argumēt of the Epistle to the Galathians. For, that they be fonde expositers which teach that Paule there contendeth onely for the libertie of ceremonies, may be proued by the places of the arguments. Of which sort are these. That Christ was made a curse for vs, that he might redeme vs from the curse of the lawe. Againe, Stand fast in the libertie wherewith Christ hath made you free, and be not againe entangled with the yoke of bondage. Beholde, I Paule say, if ye be circumcised, Christ shall nothing profit you. And he which is circumcised is dettor of the whole lawe. Christ is made idle to you whosoever ye be that are iustified by the lawe: ye are fallen away from grace. Wherin truely is cōtēned some hier thing than the libertie of ceremonies. I graunt in deede that Paule there entreateth of ceremonies, because he contendeth standeth with y^e false Apostles, which went about to bring againe into the Christian Church the old shadowes of law which were abolished by the coming of Christ. But for the discussing of this question, there were hier places to be disputed, in which the whole controuersie stood. First because by those Iewish shadowes the brightnesse of the Gospell was darkened, he sheweth that we haue in Christ a full geuing in deede of all those things which were shadowed by the ceremonies of Moses. Secondly, because those deceiuers filled the people with a most noughty opinion, namely that this obedience auailed to deserue the fauor of God: Here he standeth much vpon this point, that the faithfull should not thinke that they can by any works of the law, much lesse by those litle principles, obtaine righteousness before God. And therewithall he teacheth, that they are by the crosse of Christ free from the damnation of the lawe, which otherwise hangeth ouer all men, that they should with full assurednesse rest in Christ alone. Which place properly pertaineth to this purpose. Last of all he mainteineth to the consciences of the faithfull their libertie, that they shoulde not be bound with any religion in things not necessarie.

4 The second part, which hangeth vpon that former part, is that consciences obey the lawe, not as compelled by the necessitie of the lawe: but being free from the yoke of the lawe it selfe, of their owne accord they obey the will of God. For, because they abide in perpetuall terrors, so long as they be vnder the dominion of the lawe, they shall neuer be with cherefull redinesse framed to the obedience of God, vnlesse they first haue this libertie geuen them. By an example we shall both more briefly, and more plainely perceiue what these things meane. The commaundement of the lawe is, that we loue our God with all our heart, with all our soule, with all our strengths. That this may be done, our soule must firste be made voide of all other sense and thought, our heart must be cleansed of all desires, all our strengths must be gathered vp and drawn together to this onely purpose. They which haue gone most far before other in the way of the Lord, are yet very far from this marke. For though they loue God with their minde, and with sincere affection of heart, yet they haue still a great part of their heart and soule possessed with the desires of the fleshe, by which they are drawn backe and stayed from going forward with hasty course to God. They do in deede trauaile forward with great endeuer: but the flesh partly febleth their strengths, and partly draweth them to it selfe. What shall they here do, when they fele that they do nothing lesse than performe the lawe? They will, they couet, they endeuor, but nothing with such perfection as ought to be. If they loke vpon the lawe, they see that whatsoeuer worke they attempt or purpose, is accursed. Neither is there any cause why any man should deceiue himself with gathering that the worke is therefore not altogether euell, bycause it is vnperfect: and therefore that God doth neuertheless accept that good which is in it. For, the lawe requiring perfect loue, cōdemneth all imperfection, vnlesse the rigor of it be mitigated. Therefore his workes should fall to nought which he would haue to seme partly good: and he shall finde that it is a transgression of the lawe, euen in this because it is vnperfect.

5 Loe, howe all our workes are subiect to the curse of the lawe, if they be measured by the rule of the lawe. But howe should then vnhappy soules cherefully applic themselves to worke, for which they might not trust that they could get any thing but curse? On the other side, if being deliuered from this seuerer exacting of the lawe, or rather from the whole rigor of the lawe, they heare that they be called of God with fatherly gentlenesse: they will merily and with great cherefulness aunswer his calling and followe his guiding. In a summe, they which are bound to the yoke of the lawe, are like to bondseruants, to whom are appointed by their Lordes certain taskes of worke for euery day. These seruants thinke that they haue done nothing, nor dare come into the sight of their Lordes, vnlesse they haue performed that full taske of their workes. But children, which are more liberally and more freemanlike handled of their fathers, sticke not to present to them their begonne & half vnperfect workes, yea and those hauing some fault, trusting that they will accept their obedience and willingnesse of minde, although they haue not exactly done so much as their good will was to do. So must we be as may haue sure affiance, that our obediences shalbe allowed of our most kinde father, howe litle soeuer, and howe rude and vnperfect soeuer they be. As also he assureth to vs by the prophet: I will spare them (saith he) as the father is wont to spare his sonne that serueth him.

1. 3. Where this word Spare, is set for to beare withall, or gently to winke at faultes, forasmuch as he also maketh mention of seruice. And this affiance is not a litle necessarie for vs, without which we shal go about all things in vaine. For God accompteth himselfe to be worshipped with no worke of ours but w^h is truly done of vs for the worshipping of him. But howe can that be done among these terrors, where it is doubted whether God be offended or worshipped with our worke?

6 And that is the cause why the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues, referreth all the good workes that are red of in the holy fathers, fathers, to faith, & weyeth them onely by faith. Touching this liberty there is a place in the Epistle to the Romaines, where Paule resoneth that some ought not to haue dominion ouer vs, because we are not vnder y^e law, but vnder grace. For when he had exhorted the faithfull that sinne should not reigne in their mortall bodie, and that they should not geue their mēbers to be weapons of wickednesse to sinne, but should dedicate themselues to God, as they that are alieue from the deade, and their members, weapons of righteousnesse to God: and whereas they might on the other side obiekt that they do yet carry with them the flesh full of lustes, and that sinne dwelleth in them, he adioyneth that comfort by the libertie of the lawe, as if he should say. Though they do not yet throughly fele sinne destroyed and that righteousnesse yet liueth not in them, yet there is no cause why they should feare and be discouraged as though they had bene alway displeas'd with thē for the remnāts of sinne, forasmuch as they are by grace made free from the law, that their workes should not be examined by the rule of the law. As for thē that gather that we may sinne because we are not vnder the law, let thē know that this liberty pertaineth nothing to them, the ende wherof is to encourage to God.

6 The third part is, that we be bound with no conscience before God of outward things which are by them selues indifferent, but that we may indifferently sometime vse them, and sometime leaue them vnused. And the knowledge of this libertie also is very necessary for vs, for if it shalbe absent, there shalbe no quiet to our cōsciences, no ende of superstitions. Many at this day do thinke vs fonde to moue disputation about the free eating of flesh, about the free vse of dayes, and garmentes and such other smale trifles as they in deede thinke them: but there is more weight in them than is commonly thought. For when consciences haue ones cast themselues into the snare, they entre into a long and comber some way, from whence they can afterward finde no easy way to get out. If a man beginne to doubt whether he may occupy linnen in shetes, shertes, hankercheifes, and napkines, neither will he be out of doubt whether he may vse hēpe, and at the last he wil also fall in doubt of mattes, for he will way with himself whether he can not suppe without napkins, whether he may not be without handkercheifes. If any man thinke deinty meate to be vnlawfull, at length he shall not with quietnesse before the Lorde eate either brounebreade or common meates, when he remembreth that he may yet susteine his body with bacer foode. If he doubte of pleasaunte wine, afterwarde he will not drinke deade wine with good peace of conscience, last of all he will not be so bold to touch sweter and cleanner water than other. Finally at the length he will come to this point, to thinke it vnlawefull (as the common saying is) to treade vpon a strawe lying a crosse. For here is begonne no lighte strife, but this is in question, whether God will haue vs to vse these or those things, whose will ought to guide all our counsells and doings. Hereby some must needes be carried with desperation into a confuse deuouring pit: some must, despising God, and casting away his feare, make themselues away through destructiō when they haue no redy way. For whosoever are entangled with such doubting, which way soever they turne themselues, they see euery where present offense of conscience.

o. 14. 4. 8 I knowe (saith Paule) that nothing is common (meaning by common, vnholly) but who so thinketh any thing common, to him it is common. In which wordes he maketh all outward things subiect to our libertie, prouided alway that our mindes haue the assurance of the libertie before God. But if any superstitious opinion cast into vs any dout, those things which of their owne nature were cleane, are defiled to vs. Wherefore he addeth: Blessed is he that iudgeth not himselfe in that which he alloweth. But he that iudgeth, if he eate, is condemned, because he eateth not of faith. And that which is not of faith, is sinne. Among such narrowe streights, who so neuertheless with carelesly venturing on all things shewe themselues boulder, do they not asmuch turne themselues away from God? But they which are throughly pearced with some feare of God, when they themselues also are compelled to do many things against their conscience, are discouraged & do fall downe with feare. All that are such, do receiue none of the giftes of God with thankesgeuing, by which alone yet Paul testifieth that they all are sanctified to our vse. I meane the thankesgeuing that procedeth from a heart that acknowledgeth the liberalitie & goodnesse of God in his giftes. For, many of them in deede do vnderstande that those are the benefites of God which they vse, and they praise God in his workes: but sith they are not perswaded that they are geuen to themselues, howe should they thanke God as the geuer of them? Thus in a summe we see, whereto this libertie tendeth, namely that we should vse the gifts of God to such vse as he hath geuen them vnto vs, without any scruple of conscience, without any trouble of minde: by which confidence our soules may both haue peace with him and acknowledge his liberalitie toward vs. For here are comprehended all ceremonies that are at liberty to be obserued, that our consciences should not be bound with any necessitie to kepe them, but should remember that the vse of them is by Gods benefit subiect subject to themselves vnto edification.

9 But it is diligently to be noted, that Christian libertie is in all the partes of it a spirituall thing, the whole strength whereof consisteth in appeasing fearfull consciences before God, if either they be vnquieted or carefull for the forgeueneffe of sinnes, or if they be pensive whether our imperfect workes and defiled with the faultes of our flesh do please God, or if they be troubled about the vse of indifferent things. Wherefore they do wrongfully expound it, which either do make it a cloke for their owne desires, that they may abuse the giftes of God to their owne lust, or which do thinke that there is no libertie but that which is vsed before men, and therefore in vsing it haue no regard of the weake brethren. In the first kinde, men do at this day much offend. There is almost no man which may by his abilitie of wealth be sumptuous, which deliteth not in excessive gorgiuousnesse, in furniture of bankets, in apparell of body, in building of houses, which hath not a will to excell other in all kinde of statelinenesse: which doth not maruclously flatter himself in his finenesse. And all these things are defended vnder the pretēse of Christian libertie. They say that they are things indifferent: I graunt, so that a man indifferently vse them. But when they are to greedily coueted, when they are proudly boasted, when they are wastefully spent, it is certaine that those things which otherwise were of themselves lawfull, are by these faultes defiled. This saying of Paule doth very well put difference betwene things indifferent: All things are cleane to the cleane: but to the defiled: and vnbeleuing, nothing is cleane, because their minde and conscience is defiled. For why are accursed the rich men, they which haue their comfort, which are satisfied with meate, which do nowe laugh, which slepe in beds of iuory, which ioyne land to lande, whose banketes haue lute, harp, taber and wine? Verily both iuory, and golde, and richesse, are the good creatures of God, permitted yea & apointed by the providence of God for men to vse. Neither is it any where forbidden either to laugh, or to be satisfied with meate, or to ioyne new possessions to their owne olde possiōs or of their auncesters, or to be delited with muscally melodie, or to drink wine. This is true in deede. But w^hē they haue plenty of things, to wallowe in delites, to glut themselves, to make their wit and minde dronke with present pleasures & alway to gape for newe, these doings are most farre from the lawfull vse of the giftes of God. Therefore let them take away immeasurable desire, let them take away immeasurable wasting, let them take away vanitie and arrogance, that they may with a pure conscience purely vse the giftes of God. When the minde shalbe framed to this sobrietie, they shall haue a rule of the lawfull vse. On the other side let this moderation be wanting, euen base and common delicates are to much. For this is truely said, that oftentimes in frise and course cloth dwelleth a purple hearte, and somtime vnder silke and purple, lieth simple humilitie: Let every man in his degree so liue either poorely, or meanelly, or plentifully, that they all remember that they are fed of God to liue, not to be riotous: and let them thinke, that this is the lawe of Christian liberty, if they haue learned with Paule to be contented with those things which they presently haue: if they can skill both to be humble and to excell: if they be taught in all places and in all things to be both full and hungry, to haue plentie and to suffre want.

10 Herein also many men do erre, bycause as though their libertie should not be sounde and safe vnlesse it had men witnesses of it, they do vndiscretly and vnwisely vse it. By which vnseasonable vsing they many times offend the weake brothren. You may see at this day some, which thinke that their libertie can not stande, vnlesse they take possession of it by eating of flesh on friday. I blame not that they eate: but this fallie opinion must be driuen out of their mindes. For they ought to thinke that by their libertie they obtaine no newe thing in the sight of menne but before God, and that it standeth as well in absteyning as in vsing. If they vnderstande that it maketh no matter before God, whether they eate flesh or egges, whether they weare redde or blacke garments, that is enough. The conscience is nowe free, to which the benefite of such libertie was due. Therefore although they do afterward absteyne all their life long from flesh, and weare alway but one colour, yet they are no lesse free. Yea therefore because they are free, they do with a free conscience absteyne. But they do most hurtfully offend bycause they nothing regard the weakenesse of their brethren, which we ought so to beare with, that we rashly commit nothing with offense of them. But sometime also it behoueth that our libertie be set forth before men. And this I graunt. But there is a measure most heedfully to be kept, that we cast not away the care of the weake of whome the Lorde hath so earnestly geuen vs charge.

11 I will in this place therefore speake somewhat of offenses, in what differēce they are to be taken, which are to be auoided, & which to be neglected: whereupō we may afterward determine what place there is for our libertie among men. I like well that cōmon diuision, which teacheth that there is of offenses one sort geuen, an other taken: for asinuch as it both hath a plaine testimonie of the Scripture, and

and doth not vntruly expresse that which it meaneth. If thou do any thing by vnseasonable lightnesse, or wantonnesse, or rashnesse, not in order, nor in fit place, whereby the ignorant and weake are offended, that same may be called an offense geuen by thee: because it came to passe by thy fault that such offense was stirred vp. And it is alway called an offense geuen in any thing, the fault whereof came from the doer of the thing it selfe. It is called an offense taken, when a thing which is otherwise not euellly done nor out of time is by euell will or by some wrongfull maliciousnesse of minde drawn to occasiō of offense. For in this case was not offense geuen, but these wrongfull construers do without cause take one. With that first kinde of offense none are offended but the weake: but with this. ij. kinde sowre natures & Pharisaicall scornfull heads are offended. Wherefore we shall call the one, the offense of the weake: the other of the Pharisees: and we shall so temper the vse of our libertie, that it ought to geue place to the ignorance of the weake brethren, but in no wise to the rigorousnesse of the Pharisees. For, what is to be yelded to weaknesse, Paule sheweth in very many places. Beare (saith he) the weake in faith. Again, Let vs not hereafter iudge one an other: but this rather, let there not be layed before our brother any offense or occasion of falling: and many other sayings to the same entent, which are more fit to be red in the place it selfe, than to be here rehearsed. The summe is, that we which are strong should beare with the weakenesses of our brethren, and not please our selues, but euery one of vs please his neighbor vnto good for edifying. In an other place, But see that your libertie be not in any wise an offense to them that are weake. Again, Eate ye al things that are sold in the shambles, asking no question for conscience: of your conscience (I say) not an other mans. Finally be ye such, that ye geue no offense, neither to the Iewes, nor to the Grekes, nor to the Church of God. Also in an other place, Ye are called, brethren, into libertie: onely geue not your libertie to be an occasion to the flesh, but by charitie serue ye one an other. Thus it is. Our libertie is not geuen toward our weake neighbours, whose seruantes charitie maketh vs in all things: but rather, that hauing peace with God in our mindes, we may also liue peaceably among men. As for the offense of the Pharisees, howe much it is to be regarded, we learne by the wordes of the Lorde, whereby he biddeth them to be let alone, because they are blinde, and guides of the blinde. The disciples had warned him, that the Pharisees were offended with his sayings: he answered that they were to be neglected, and the offending of them not to be cared for.

12 But yet still the matter hangeth doutfull, vnles we knowe who are to be taken for weake, and who for Pharisees: which difference beinge taken away, I see not amonge offences what vse at all of liberty remaineth, which might neuer be vsed without great danger. But it seemeth to me that Paul hath most plainly declared both by doctrine and by examples, howe far our liberty is either to be tempered or to be defended though with offences. When he toke Timothee into his company, he circumcised him: but he coulde not be brought to circumcise Titus. Here were diuerse doings, & no chaunge of purpose or of minde: namely in circumcising Timothee, when he was free from all men, he made himselfe a seruaunt to all men: and he was made to the Iewes, as a Iewe, that he might win the Iewes: to them that were vnder the lawe, as if he himself were vnder the lawe, that he might winne them which were vnder the lawe: all things to all men, that he might saue many, as he writeth in an other place. Thus we haue a right moderation of libertie, if it may be indifferently restrained with some profit. What he had respect vnto, when he stoutly refused to circumcise Titus, he himself testifieth, writing thus. But neither was Titus, which was with me, although he was a Grecian, compelled to be circumcised, because of the false brethren which were come in by the way, which had priuily crept in to espie our libertie which we haue in Christ Iesus, that they might bring vs into bondage, to whome we gaue not place by subiection so much as for a time, that the truth of the Gospell might continue with you. There is also a time when we must of necessitie defend our libertie, if the same be in weake consciences endangered by the vniust exactings of false Apostles. We must in euery thing study to preserue charity, & haue regard to the edifying of our neighbor. All things (saith he) are lawfull for me, but not all things are expedient: all things are lawfull for me, but not all thinges do edify. Let no man seeke that which is his owne, but that which is an others. There is nothing now plainer by this rule, than that we must vse our libertie, if it may turne to the edifying of our neighbor: but if it be not so expediēt for our neighbor, then we must forbear it. There be some which conterfait the wisdom of Paule in forbearing of libertie, while they do nothing les than apply the same to the duties of charitie. For so that they may provide for their owne quietnes, they wish all mentiō of liberty to be buried, whereas it is no les behouefull for our neighbors, sometime to vse libertie for their benefit and edification, than in fit place to restraine it for their commoditie. But it is the part of a godly man to thinke, that free power in outward things is therefore graunted him, him, that he may be the freer to all duties of charitie.

13 But whatsoeuer I haue spoken of auoyding of offences, my meaning is that it be referred to meane and indifferent things. For, those things that are necessary to be done, are not to be left vndone for fear of any offence. For as our libertie is to be submitted to charity, so charity it selfe likewise ought to be vnder the purenes of faith. Verily here also ought to be had regard of charitie, but so far as to the altars, that is, that for our neighbors sake we offēd not God Their intemperance is not to be allowed, which do nothing but with troublesome turmoiling, and which had rather rashly to rend all things, than leisurely to rip them. Neither yet are they to be harkened to, which when they be leaders of men into a thousand forts of vngodlynnes, yet do faine that they must behaue themselues so that they be none offence to their neighbors. As though they do not in y^e meane edify the cōsciences of their neighbors to euill, specially wheras they sticke fast in the same mire without any hope of getting out. And the pleasant men forsoth, whether their neighbor be to be instructed with doctrine or example of life. say that he must be fed with milke, whome they fill with most euill & poisonous opinions. Paule reporteth that he fed the Corinthians with drinking of milke: but if Popish Masse had then bene among them, would he haue sacrificed to geue them the drinke of milke. But milke is not poison. Therefore they lie in saying y^e they feede them whom vnder a shewe of flattering allurementes they cruelly kill. But, graunting that such dissembling is for a time to be allowed, howe long yet will they feede their children with milke? For if they neuer grow bigger, that they may at the least be able to beare some light meate, it is certain that they were neuer brought vp with milke. There are two reasons that moue me why I do not nowe more sharply contend with them: first, because their follies are scarcely worthy to be cōfuted, sith they worthily seeme filthy in the sight of all men that haue their sound wit: secondly, because I haue sufficiently done it in peculiar bookes, I will not nowe do a thing already done. Onely let the readers remember this, that with whatsoeuer offences satan and the world go about to turne vs away from the ordinances of God, or to stay vs from following that which he apointeth, yet we must neuerthelesse go earnestly forward: and then, that whatsoeuer dangers hang vpon it, yet is it not at our liberty to swarue one heare bredth from the commaundement of the same God, neither is it lawfull by any pretence to attempt any thing but that which he geueth vs leaue.

14 Nowe therefore sith faithfull consciences hauing receiued such prerogative of libertie as we haue aboue set forth, haue by the benefite of Christ obtained this that they be not entangled with any snares of obseruations in those things in which the Lorde willed that they should be at libertie: we conclude that they are exempt from all power of men. For it is vnmeete, that either Christ should lose the thanke of his so great liberalitie, or consciences their profite. Neither ought we to thinke it a slight matter, which we see to haue cost Christ so deere: namely which he valued not with gold or siluer, but with his owne blood: so that Paule sticketh not to say, that his death is made voide, if we yeld our soules into subiection to men. For he trauelleth about nothing els in certaine chapters of the epistle to the Galathiás, but to shew that Christ is darkned or rather destroyed to vs, vnlesse our consciences stand fast in their libertie, which verily they haue lost if they may at the will of men be snared with the bondes of lawes and ordinances. But as it is a thing most worthy to be knowen, so it needeth a longer and plainer declaration. For so soone as any word is spoken of the abrogating of the ordinances of men, biandby great troubles are raised vp partly by seditious men, partly by slanderers, as though the whole obedience of men were at once taken away and ouerthrowen.

1. Pet. 1.
 Gal. 5. 1.
 and 4.

15 Therefore that none of vs may stumble at this stone, first let vs consider, that there are two sortes of gouernment in man: the one spirituall whereby the conscience is framed to godlinesse and to the worship of God: y other ciuill, wherby man is trayned to the duties of humanitie and ciuilitie which are to be kept among men. They are commonly by not vnfit names called the Spirituall and Temporall iurisdiction, whereby is signified, that the first of these two formes of gouernment pertaineth to the life of the soule, and the latter is occupied in the things of this present life: not onely in feeding and clothing, but in setting forth of lawes whereby a man may spend his life among men holily, honestly, and soberly. For, that first kinde hath place in the inward minde, this latter kinde ordereth onely the outward behauiours. The one we may call the Spirituall kingdome the other, the Ciuil kingdome. But these two, as we haue deuided them, must be either of them alway seuerally cōsidered by themselves: and when the one is in considering, we must withdrawe and turne away our mindes from the thinking vpon the other. For there are in man as it were two worlds, which both diuerse kings & diuerse lawes may gouerne. By this putting of difference shall come to passe, that that which the Gospell teacheth of the spirituall libertie, we shall not wrongfully drawe to the ciuil order, as though Christians were according

According to the outward government lesse subiect to the lawes of men, because their consciences are at libertie before God: as though they were therefore exempt from all bondage of the flesh, because they are free according to the spirit. Again, because euen in those ordinances which seeme to pertaine to the Spirituall kingdome, there may be some error; we must also put difference betwene these, which are to be taken for lawfull as agreeable to the word of God, & on the other side which ought not to haue place among the godly. Of the Ciuile government there shalbe els where place to speake. Also of the Ecclesiasticall lawes I omit to speake at this time, because a more full entreating of it shalbe fit for the fourth book, where we shall speake of the power of the Church. But of this discourse, let this be the conclusion, The question being (as I haue said) of it selfe not very darke or entangled, doth for this cause accomber many, because they do not sutrelly enough put differēce betwene the outward court as they call it, and the court of conscience. Moreouer this encreaseth the difficultie, that Paule teacheth that the Magistrate ought to be obeyed, not onely for fear of punishment, but for conscience. Whereupon followeth that consciences are also bounde by the ciuile lawes. If it were so, all should come to naught which we both haue spoken and shall speake of the spirituall government. For the losing of this knot, first it is good to know what is conscience. And the definition therof is to be fetched from the deriuation of the word. For, as when men do with minde and vnderstanding conceaue the knowledge of things, they are thereby said (Scire) to knowe, whereupon also is deriued the name of Science: Knowledge: so when they haue a feeling of the iudgement of God, as a witness ioined with thē, which doth not suffer them to hide their sinnes but that they be drawn accused to the iudgement seate of God, that same feeling is called Conscience. For it is a certaine meane betwene God and man, because it suffreth not man to suppress in himself that which he knoweth. but pursueth him so far till it bring him to guiltines. This is it which Paul meaneth, where he saith that conscience doth together witness with men, when their thoughtes do accuse or aquite them in the iudgement of God. A simple knowledge might remaine as enclosed within man. Therefore this feeling which presenteth man to the iudgement of God, is as it were a keeper ioined to man, to marke and espie all his secretes, that nothing may remaine buried in darknes. Whereupon also cometh that olde Prouerb, Consciēce is a thousand witnesses. And for the same reason Peter hath set the examination of a good conscience for quietnesse of minde, when being perswaded of the grace of Christ, we do without fear present our selues before God.

10. And the author of the Epistle to the Hebrues, setteth to haue no more cōscience of sinne, in stede of to be deliuered or acquitted that sinne may no more accuse vs.

16 Therefore as workes haue respect to men, so conscience is referred to God, so that a good conscience is nothing els but the inward purenes of the hart. In which sense Paul writeth that charity is the fulfilling of the lawe out of a pure conscience & faith not fained. Afterward also in y same chapter he sheweth how much it differeth from vnderstanding, saying that some had suffred shipwracke from the faith, because they had forsaken good Conscience. For in these wordes he signifieth it is a liuely affection to worship God, and a sincere endeour to liue holly and godlily. Sometime in deede it extendeth also to men, as in Luke where the same Paul protesteth that he endeoured himselfe to walke with a good conscience toward God and men. But this was therefore said, because the frutes of good conscience do flowe and come euen to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God onely, as I haue already said. Hereby it cometh to pas that the lawe is said to binde the conscience, which simply bindeth a man without respect of men, or without hauing any consideration of them. As for example: God commaundeth not onely to kepe the minde chaste and pure from all lust, but also forbiddeth all manner of filthines of wordes and outwarde wantonnes whatsoever it be. To the keepinge of this lawe my conscience is subiect although there liued not one man in the world. So he that behaueth himselfe intemperantly, not onely sinneth in this that he geueth an euill example to the brethren, but also hath his conscience bound with giltines before God. In things that are of themselues meane, there is another consideration. For we ought to absteine from them if they bred any offence, but the conscience still being free. So Paule speaketh of flesh consecrate to Idoles. If any (saith he) moue any doubt, touch it not for conscience sake: I say for conscience, not thine but the others. A faithfull man should sinne, which being first warned should neuertheless eate such flesh. But howesoever in respect of his brother, it is necessary for him to absteine as it is prescribed of God, yet he ceaseth not to kepe stil the libertie of cōscience. Thus we see howe this lawe binding the outward worke, leaueth the conscience vnbound.

The

The xx. Chapter.

Of Praier, vvhich is the chiefe exercise of faith, and vvhereby vve daily receiue the benefites of God.

OF these thinges that haue bin hitherto spoken, we plainly perceiue how needy and voide man is of all good thinges, & howe he wanteth all helpes of saluation. Wherefore if he seeke for reliefes whereby he may succour his needines, he must go out of himselfe and get them else where. This is afterward declared vnto vs, that the Lorde doth of his owne free will and liberally giue himselfe to vs in his Christ, in whom he offereth vs in stede of our misery all felicity, in stede of our neede welthinesse, in whom he openeth to vs the heauenly treasures: that our whole faith should behold his beloued sonne, y^e vpon him our whole expectation should hange, in him our whole hope should sticke fast and rest. This verily is the secret & hidden Philosophy, which can not be wronge out with Logickall arguments: but they learne it whose eies God hath opened that they may see light in his light. But since that we are taught by faith to acknowledge that whatsoeuer we haue neede of, whatloeuere wanteth in vs, the same is in God & in our Lord Iesus Christ, namely in whome the Lorde willed the whole fulnesse of his largesse to rest, that from thense we shoulde all drawe as out of a most plentiful fountaine: nowe it remaineth that we seeke in him, and with prayers craue of him that which we haue learned to be in him. Otherwise to know God to be the Lord & giuer of all good thinges, which allureth vs to pray to him: and not to go to him and pray to him: shoulde so nothing profit vs, that it should be al one as if a man should neglect a treasure shewed him buried and digged in the ground. Therefore the Apostle, to shewe that true faith can not be idle from callinge vpon God, hath set this order: that as of the Gospel springeth faith, so by it our heartes are framed to cal vpon the name of God. And this is the same thing which he had a litle before sayd, that the Spirit of adoption, which sealeth in our heartes the wiuesse of the Gospell, raiseth vp our spirits that they dare shew forth their desires to God, stirre vp vnspeakeable gronings, and crie with confidence Abba, Father. It is mete therefore that this last point, because it was before but only spoken of by the way & as it were lightly touched, should nowe be more largely entreated of.

2 This therefore we get by the benefit of prayer, that we attaine to those richesse which are laid vp for vs with the heauenly father. For there is a certaine communicatinge of men with God, whereby they entring into sanctuary of heauen, do in his owne presence call to him touching his promises: that the same thing which they beleued him affirming only in word not to be vaine, they may when neede so requireth finde in experience. Therefore we see that there is nothing set forth to vs to be looked for at the hand of the Lord, which we are not also cōmaunded to craue with praier: so true it is that by prayer are digged vp the treasures, which our faith hath looked vpon being shewed to it by the Gospel of the Lord. Now how necessary and how many wayes profitable this exercise of praier is, it can by no wordes be sufficiently declared. Vndoubtedly it is not without cause that the heauenly father testifieth, that the only fortresse of saluation is in the callinge vpon his name, namely whereby we call to vs the presence both of his prouidence, by which he watcheth to take care of our matters: and of his power, by which he sustaineth vs being weake and in a maner faintinge: and of his goodnesse, by which he receiueth vs into fauour being miserably loden with sinnes: finally wherby we call him all whole, to giue himself present to vs. Hereby groweth singular rest and quietnes to our consciences. For when we haue disclosed to the Lorde the necessity which distressed vs, we largely rest though it were but in this only that none of our euils is hidden frō him, whom we are perswaded both to be most well willinge toward vs, and most able to prouide well for vs.

3 But (will some man say) did not he know without any to put in minde of it, both in what parte we be distressed, and what is expedient for vs: so that it may seeme after a certayne maner superfluous, that he should be troubled with our praier, as though he winked or slept, vntill he were awaked with our voice? But they which so reason, marke not to what end the Lord hath instructed them that be his to pray: for he ordained it not so much for his owne cause as rather for ours. He willeth in deede, as right it is, that his due be rendred to him, when they acknowledge to come from him whatsoever men require or do perceiue to make for their profit, and do testifie the same with wishings. But the profit also of this sacrifice wherwith he is worshipped, commeth to vs. Therefore how much more boldly the holy fathers gloriously talked both to themselues & other of the benefites of God, so much the more sharply they were pricked forward to pray. The oneiy example of Elias shalbe enough for vs, which beinge sure of the couंसell of God, after that he not rashly had promised raine to Achab, yet busily prayeth betwene his knees, and sendeth his seruant ^{ngs} seauen times to espy it: not for that he did discredit the oracle of God, ^{t2.} but because he knew that it was his duty, least his faith should waxe drowfie drowſie and ſluggiſh, to lay vp his deſires with God. Wherefore although while we lie ſenſleſſe & ſo dul that we perceiue not our owne miſeries, he waketh and watcheth for vs, and ſomtime alſo helpeth vs vndeſired, yet it much behoueth vs, that he be cōtinually called vpon of vs, that our heart may be enflamed with earneſt and feruent deſire to ſeeke, loue, and worſhip him, while we accuſtome our ſelues in euery neceſſity to flee to him as to our ſhoote anchare. Againe, that no deſire and no wiſhe at all may entre into our minde, whereof we ſhould be aſhamed to make him witneſſe, while we learne to preſent our wiſhes, yea & to poure out our whole heart before his eyes. Theſe, that we may be framed to receiue all his benefites with true thankfullnes of minde, yea & with outward thankſgiuing, of which we are put in mind by our praier that they come to vs from his hand. Moreouer, that when we haue obtained that which we deſired, being perſwaded that he hath answered to our prayers, we may be thereby the more feruently caried to thinke vpon his kindenes, and therewithall embrace with greater pleaſure thoſe thinges which we acknowledge to haue bin obtained by praier. Laſt of all, that very uſe & experience may according to the meaſure of our weakenesſe aſſure our mindes of his prouidence, when we vnderſtand that he not only promiſeth that he will neuer faile vs, and that he doth of his owne accord open vs the entry to cal to him in the very point of neceſſity, but alſo hath his hand alway ſtretched out to help theſe that be his, & that he doth not feede them with wordes, but defendeth them with preſent help. For theſe cauſes, the moſt kinde Father, although he neuer ſlepeth or is ſluggiſh, yet oftentimes maketh a ſhewe as though he ſlept and were ſluggiſh, that ſo he may exerciſe vs, which are otherwiſe ſlouthfull and ſluggiſhe to come to him, to aſke of him, to requiſe him to our owne great benefit. Therefore they do to fooliſhly, which to call away the mindes of men from prayer, babble that the prouidence of God, which maketh for the ſafekeeping of all thinges, is in vaine wearied with our callings vpon him: Whereas the Lord contrariwiſe not in vaine teſtifieth that he is nie to all them that call vpon his name in truth. And of none other ſort is y^e which other do triflingly ſay, that it is ſuperfluous to aſke thoſe thinges which the Lorde is of his owne will ready to giue: whereas euen the very ſame thinges which flowe to vs from his owne free liberality, he will haue vs acknowledge to be graunted to our praers. Which thing that notable ſentence of the Pſalme doth teſtifie, wherewith many like ſayinges do accorde. The eyes of the Lorde are vpon the righteous, and his eares vnto their praers. Which ſayinge ſo ſetteth out the prouidence of God bent of his owne accord to provide for the safety of the godly, that yet he omitteth not the exercise of faith, whereby slouthfulnesse is wiped frō the mindes of men. The eies of God therefore do wake, that he may succour the necessity of the blinde: but he will againe on our behalfe heare our gronings, that he may the better proue his loue toward vs.

21 And so both are true, that the watchman of Israell slepeth not, nor slombreth, and yet that he sitteth still as hauinge forgotten vs when he seeth vs dull and dumme.

4 Now, to frame praier rightly & wel, let this be the first rule, that we be no otherwise framed in minde and hearte, than becommeth them that enter into talke with God. Which verily we shall attaine as touching the minde, of the same being free from fleshly cares and thoughtes wherewith it may be called away or withdrawen from the right and pure beholding of God, do not onely bende it selfe wholly to prayer, but also so much as is possible be lifted vp & caried aboue it selfe. Neither do I here require a minde so at liberty, y^e it be pricked and nipped with no care, whereas contrariwise the feruentnesse of prayer must by much carefulnesse be kindled in vs (as we see that the holy seruantes of God do sometime declare great tormentes, much more carefulnesse, when they say that they vtter to the Lord a bewailinge voice out of the deepe depth, and out of the middest of the iawes of death) But I say that all strange and foraine cares must be driuen away, wherewith the minde it selfe wandring hither and thither is caried about, & being drawen out of heaven is pressed down to the earth. I meane by this that it must be lifted vp aboue it selfe, that it may not bring into the sight of God any of those things which our blinde & foolish reason is wont to imagine, nor may hold it selfe bound within the compasse of her owne vanity, but rise vp to purenes worthy for God.

5 Both these thinges are specially worthy to be noted, that who-soeuer prepareth himselfe to pray, should thereto apply all his senses and endeouours, & not (as men are wont) be diuersly drawē with wandering thoughtes: because there is nothing more contrary to the reuerence of God, than such lightnesse which is a witnessse of too wanton licentiousnesse and loose from all feare. In which thing we must so much more earnestly labour, as we finde it more hard, for no man can be so bent to pray, but that he shall feele many bythoughtes to crepe vpon him, either to breake of, or by some bowing & swaruinge to hinder the course of his prayer. But here let vs call to minde, how great an worthinesse it is, when God receiueth vs vnto familiar talke with him, to abuse his so great gentelnesse, with minglinge holy and profane prophane thinges together, when the reuerence of him holdeth not our mindes fast bound vnto him: but as if we talked with some meane man, we do in the middest of our prayer, forsaking him, leape hither and thither. Let vs therefore know that none do rightly and well prepare themselues to praier, but they whom the maiesty of God perceeth, that they come to it vncumbred of earthly cares and affectiōs. And that is ment by the ceremony of lifting vp of handes, that men shoulde remember that they be farre distant from God, vnlesse they lift vp their senses on hie. As also it is said in the Psalm. To thee haue I lifted vp my soule. And the Scripture oftentimes vseth this manner of speech, to lift vp praier: that they which desire to be heard of God, should not sit stil in their dregges. Let this be the summe: that howe much more liberally God dealeth with vs, gently allurige vs to vnlode our cares into his bosome, so much lesse excusable are we vnlesse his so excellent and incomparable benefit do with vs ouerweye all other things and draw vs vnto it selfe, that we may earnestly apply our endeouours and senses to pray: which can not be done vnlesse our minde by strongly wrastringe with the hinderances do rise vp aboue them. An other point we haue set foorth, that we aske no more than God giueth leaue. For though he biddeth vs to poure out our hartes, yet he doth indifferently giue loose reines to foolish and froward affectiōs: and when he promiseth that he will do according to the will of the Godly, he procedeth not to so tender bearing with them that he submitteth himseife to their will. But in both these pointes men do cōmonly much offend. For not only the most part of men presume without shame, without reuerēce, to speake to God for their follies, & shamelesly to present to his throne whatsoever liked them in their dreame: but also so great foolishnes or senselesse dulnes possesseth the, that they dare thrust into the hearing of God, euen all their most filthy desires, wherof they would greatly be ashamed to make men priuy. Some prophane men haue laughed to scorne, yea & detested this boldnes, yet the vice it selfe hath alway reigned. And hereby it came to passe that ambitious men haue chosen Iupiter to be their Patron: couetous men, Mercurie: the desirous of learninge, Apollo and Minerva: warriors, Mars: and Lecherous folke, Venus. Like as at this day (as I haue euen now touched) men do in praier graunt more licence to their vnlawfull desires, than when they sportingly talke with their Egalles. But God suffreth uot his gentlenes to be so mocked: but claiming to himseife his right, maketh our praier subiect to his authority, and restraineth them with a bridle. Therefore we must keepe fast this sayinge of Iohn, This is our affiance, that if we aske any thinge according to his wil, he heareth vs. But forasmuch as our abilities are far frō being sufficient to performe so great perfectiō, we must seke a remedy to help vs. As we ought to bend the sight of our mind to God so the affection of the hearte ought also to followe to the same ende. But both do stay farre beneth it, yea rather do faint and faile or be caried a contrary way. Therefore God to succour this weakenesse, in our prayers giueth the Spirite to be our Schoolemaister; to instruct vs what is right, and to gouerne our affections. For, because

m. 8. we knowe not what we ought to praye as we ought, the Spirite cometh to our succour, and maketh intercession for vs with vnspeakeable gronings, not that it in deede either prayeth or groneth but stirreth vp in vs affiance, desires, and sighinges, which the strength of nature were not able to conceiue. And not without cause Paule calleth them vnspeakeable gronings which so the faythfull sende foorth by the guidinge of the Spirite, because they which are truly exercised in prayers, are not ignorant that they be so holden in perplexity with blinde cares, that they scarcely finde what is profitable for them to speake: yea while they go about to vtter stammeringe wordes they sticke fast encombred. Whereupon it followeth, that the gift of prayinge rightly is a singular gift. These things are not spoken to this purpose, that we faoringe our owne slouthfulnesse should giue ouer the charge of prayinge to the Spirit of God, and lie dull in that carelesnesse, to which we are too much enclined: (as there are hearde the wicked sayinges of some, that we must lie negligently gaping to waite vntill he preuent our mindes occupied else where) but rather that we lothing our owne slouthfulnesse and sluggishnesse, should craue such helpe of the Spirite. Neither doth Paule, when he

Cor. 26. biddeth vs to pray in Spirite, therefore cease to exhorte vs to wakefulness: meaning that the instinct of the Spirite so vseth his force to frame our prayers, that it nothinge hindereth or slacketh our owne endenour: because God wil in this behalfe proue how effectually faith moueth our heartes.

6 Lette also an othel law be, that in prayinge we alway feele our owne want, & that earnestly thinking how we stand in nede of those thinges that we aske, we ioyne with our prayer an earnest yea feruent affection to obtaine. For, many do slightly for maners sake recite prayers after a prescribed forme, as though they rendered a certaine taske to God: and although they confesse that this is a necessary remedy for their euils, because it is to their destruction to be without the help of God which they craue: yet it appeareth that they do this duety for custome, forasmuch as in the meane time their mindes

are cold, & do not wey what they aske. The generall & confuse feeling in deede of their necessity leadeth them hereunto: but it doth not stirre them as it were in a present case to aske reliefe of their neede. Now what thinke we to be more hatefull or more detestable to God than this faining, when a man asketh forgiuenesse of sinnes, in the meane time either thinkinge that he is not a sinner, or not thinkinge vppon this that he is a sinner: euen wherewith God himselfe is plainly mocked? But of such peruerseness (as I haue sayd) mankinde is full, that for manners sake they many times aske many thinges of God, which they certainly Iudge that without his liberalitie to come to them from some other where, or that they haue them already remaininge with them. The fault of some other seemeth to be lighter and yet not tolerable, that they which haue onely conceiued this principle that we must sacrifice to God with praier, do mumble vp praier without any musing of minde vpon them. But the Godly must principally take heede, that they neuer come into the sight of God to aske any thinge, but because they do both boyle with earnest affection of heart, and do therewithall desire to obtaine it of him. Yea and also though in those thinges which we aske onely to the glory of God, we seeme not at the first sight to prouide for our owne necessity, yet the same ought to be asked with no lesse feruentnesse and vehementnes of desire. As, when we pray that his name be hallowed, we must (as I may so speake) feruently hunger & thirst for that hallowing.

7 If any man obiekt, that we are not alway driuen with like necessity to pray, I graunt the same in dede: and this difference is profitably taught vs of Iames: Is any man heauy amonge you? Let him pray. Iac. 5. Who so is mery, let him sing. Therefore euen commō feeling teacheth vs, that because we are to slouthfull, therefore, as the matter requireth we are the more sharply pricked forward of God to pray earnestly. And this David calleth the fit time, because (as he teacheth in many other places) how much more hardly troubles, discōmodities, feares, Psa. 33. and other kindes of tentations do presse vs, so much freer accesse is open for vs, as though God did call vs vnto him. But yet no lesse true Ephe. 6. is that saying of Paule, that we must pray at all times: because howe- 18. soeuer thinges prosperously flowe accordinge to our heartes desire, and matter of mirth doth compasse vs on euery side, yet there is no minute of time wherein our neede doth not exhort vs to pray. If a man haue abundance of wine and wheate: yet sith he can not enioy one morsell of bread but by the continuall grace of God, whole cellars or barnes full shalbe no let why he should not craue daily bread.

Nowe if we call to minde howe many dangers do euery moment hang ouer vs, the very feare it selfe wil teach vs that we haue no time free from prayer. But this we may better perceiue in spiritual things. For, when shall so many sinnes, wherof we knowe our selues guilty, suffer vs to sit still without care and not in humble wise craue pardon both of the fault and the paine? When do tentations graunt vs truce; so that we neede not to hast vnto helpe? Moreouer the desire of the kingdome and glory of God ought so to plucke vs to it selfe, not by fits, but continually, that it shoulde alway be fit time for vs. Therefore not without cause we are so oft commaunded to pray continually. I do not yet speake of perseuerance in prayer, whereof mention shalbe made herafter: but when y^e Scripture warneth vs that we ought to pray continually, it accuseth our slouthfulnesse, because we do not perceiue how necessary this care & diligence is for vs. By this rule all hypocrisie & craftinesse of lying to God, is debarred, yea driuen farre away from prayer. God promisetht that he will be neere to all them that call vpon him in trueth, & he pronounceth that they shall finde him which seeke him with their whole heart. But they aspire not thither which please themselues in their owne filthinesse. Therefore a right praier requireth repentance. Whereupon this is commo-ly said in the Scriptures, that God heareth not wicked doers, and that their praiers are accursed, like as their sacrifices also be: because it is rightful that they finde the cares of God shut, which do locke vp their owne hearts: and that they should not finde God easie to bow, which do with their owne hardnesse prouoke his stiffenesse. In Esay he threatneth after this maner. When ye shall multiply your prayers, I will not heare you: for your handes are full of blond. Againe in Ieremy: I haue cried, and they haue refused to heare: they shall likewise crie, and I will not heare: because he taketh it for a most hie dishonor, that wicked men shoulde boast of his couenant, which do in all their life defile his holy name. Wherefore in Esay he complaineth, that when the Iewes come neare to him with their lippes, their hearte is farre from him. He speaketh not this of only praiers, but affirmeth that he abhorreth faininge in all the partes of worshippinge him. To which purpose maketh that saying of Iames. Ye aske, & receiue not: because ye aske ill, that ye may spende it vpon your pleasures. It is true in dede (as we shal againe shew a litle hereafter) that the prayers of the godly which they pour out, do not rest vpon their owne worthinesse: yet is not that admonition of Iohn superfluous: If we aske any thing, we shall receiue it of him, because we kepe his commaundementes: forasmuch as an euill conscience shutteth the gate against vs. Whereupon

upon followerh that none do rightly pray, nor are hearde, but the pure worshippers of God. Therefore whosoever prepareth himselfe to pray, let him be lothfull to himselfe in his owne euils; and (which can not be done without repentance) let him put on the person and minde of a begger.

8 Hereunto let the third rule be ioyned, that whosoever presenteth himselfe before God to pray, should forsake all thinkinge of his owne glory, put of all opiniõ of worthines, & finally giue ouer al trust of himselfe, giuing in the abacing of himselfe y^e glory wholly to God: least if we take any thing be it neuer so litle to our selues, we do with our owne swelling fall away from his face. Of this submission which throweth downe all heighth, we haue often examples in the seruantes of God: amõg whom the holier that euery one is, so much the more he is throwen downe when he commeth into the sight of the Lord. So Daniel, whom the Lord himselfe commended with so great a title of praise, sayd: We poure not out our praier before thee in our righteousnes, but in thy great mercies. Here vs Lord, Lord be mercifull to vs: Heare vs, & do these things that we aske, for thine owne sake: because thy name is called vpon ouer y^e people & ouer thy holy place. Neither doth he by a crooked figure (as me sometime speake) mingle himselfe with the multitude as one of the pe ople, but rather seuerally confesseth his owne giltinesse & humbly fleeth to the sanctuary of forgiuenes, as he expressly sayth: When I confessed my sinnes and the sinnes of my people. And this humblenes Dauid also setteth out with his owne example, when he sayth: Enter not into iudgement with thy seruāt, because in thy sight euery one that liueth shall not be iustified. In such manner Esay prayeth: Loe, thou art angry because we haue sinned, the world is founded in thy wayes, therefore we shalbe saued: And we haue bin all filled with vncleannes, & all our righteousnes as a defiled cloth: and we haue all withered away as a leafe, & our iniquities do scatter vs abroad as the winde: and there is none that calleth vpon thy name, that raiseth vp himselfe to take holde of thee: because thou hast hid thy face from vs, & hast made vs to pine away in the hande of our wickednes. Now therefore O Lord, thou art our father, we are clay, thou art our fashioner, & we are the worke of thy hande. Be not angry O Lord, neither remember wickednes for euer. Behold, looke vpon vs, we are al thy people. Loe, how they stand vpon no affiance at all, but vpon this only, that thinking vpon this that they be Gods, they despeire not that he will haue care of them. Likewise Jeremy: If our iniquities answere against vs, do thou for thy names sake. For it is both most truely & most holy written, of whomsoever it be, which being wrytten by an vnknownen author is fathered vpon the Prophet Baruch: A soule heauy & desolate for the greatnes of euil, crooked, and weake, a hungry soule, & fainting eies giue glory to thee O Lord. Not accordinge to the righteousnes of our fathers do we poure out praiers in thy sight, and aske mercy before thy face O Lord our God: but because thou art mercifull, haue mercy vpon vs, because we haue sinned before thee.

9 Finally the beginning and also the preparing of praying rightly, is crauing of pardon, with an humble & plaine confession of fault. For neither is it to be hoped, that euen the holiest man may obtaine any thing of God, vntill he be freely reconciled to him: neither is it possible that God may be fauourable to any but them whom he pardoneth. Wherefore it is no maruel if the faithfull do with this keie open to thēselues the dore to pray. Which we learne out of many places of the Psalmes. For Dauid when he asketh an other thing, sayth: sal. 25 & 18. Remember not the sinnes of my youth, remember me according to thy mercy for thy goodnes sake O Lord. Againe, Looke vpon my affliction, and my labour, & forgiue all my sinnes. Where we also see sa. 51. ȳ it is not enough, if we euery seueral day do cal our selues to accōpt for our newe sinnes, if we do not also remember those sinnes which might seeme to haue bin long ago forgotten. For, the same Prophet in an other place, hauinge cōfessed one hainous offense by this occasion returneth euen to his mother wombe wherein he had gathered the infection: not to make the fault seeme lesse by the corruption of nature, but that heaping together the sinnes of his whole life, howe much more rigorous he is in condemninge himselfe, so much more easie he may find God to entreate. But although ȳ holy ones do not alway in expresse words aske forgiuenes of sinnes, yet if we diligently weye their prayers which the Scripture rehearseth, we shall easily finde that which I say, that they gathered a mind to pray of the only mercy of God, and so alway tooke their beginning at appeasing him because if euery manne examine his owne conscience, so farre is he from being bold to open his cares familiarly with God, that he trembleth at euery comming toward him, except that he standeth vpon trust of mercy and pardon. There is also an other speciall confession, where they ask release of peines, ȳ they also pray to haue their sinnes forgiuen: because it were an absurdity to will that the effect be taken away while the cause abideth. For we must beware that God be fauourable vnto vs, before that he testifie his fauour with outward signs: because both he himselfe will kepe this order, & it should litle profit vs to haue him beneficiall, vnlesse our conscience feling him appea-

sed should throughly make him louely vnto vs. Which we are also taught by the answer of Christ. For when he had decreed to heale the man sicke of the Palsey, he sayd, Thy sinnes are forgien thee: lifting vp our mindes thereby to that which is chiefly to be wished, that God first receiue vs into fauour, and then shew forth the frute of reconciliation in helping vs. But beside that special confessiō of present guiltines, whereby the faithful make supplication to obtaine pardon of euery special fault & peine, that general preface, which procureth fauour to praiers, is neuer to be omitted, because vnlesse they be grouded vpon the free mercy of God, they shall neuer obtaine any thing of God. Wherunto may be referred that saying of Iohn: If we cōfesse our sinnes, he is faithful & righteous to forgie vs, & cleanse vs from all iniquity. For which cause it behoued praiers in the time of the law to be hallowed with expiation of blood, y they might be acceptable, & that so the people should be put in minde that they are vnworthy of so great a prerogatiue of honor, till being cleansed from their defilings they should of the only mercy of God cōceiue affiance to pray.

10 But whereas the holy ones seeme sometime for the entreatinge of God to alleage the help of their owne righteousnes (as when Dauid saith: kepe my soule, because I am good. Againe Ezechias: Remember Lord I besech thee, that I haue walked before thee in trueth, and haue done good in thine eies) by such formes of speaking they mean nothing else than by their very regeneratiō to testifie theselues to be the seruants & children of God, to whome he himselte pronounceth that he will be mercifull. He teacheth by the prophet (as we haue already seene) that his eies are vpo the righteous, & his eares vnto their praiers. Againe by the Apostle, that we shall obtaine whatsoeuer we aske, if we keepe his cōmaundements. In which sayings he doth not value praier by the worthinesse of workes: but his will is so to stablish their affiance, whose owne conscience well assureth them of an vnfained vprightnes & innocency, such as all the faithfull ought to be. For the same is taken out of the very trueth of God, which the blind man y had his sight restored, saith in Iohn, y God heareth not sinners: if we vnderstand sinners after the cōmon vse of the Scripture, for such as without all desire of righteousnes do altogether slepe & rest vpon their sinnes: forasmuch as no heart can euer breake forth into vnfained calling vpon God which doth not also aspire to godlines. Therefore with such promises accord the praiers of the holy ones, wherein they make mentiō of their owne purenes or innocency that they may feeley to be giuen them which is to be looked for of al y seruants of God. Againe it is thē cōmonly found y they vse this kinde of prayer, whē they do in the presence of the lord compare themselues, wth their enemies, frō whose vniust dealing they wished themselues to be deliuered by his hand. In this comparison it is no maruel if they brought forth their righteousnes & simplicity of heart to moue him y^e rather by y^e rightfulness of their cause to help thē. This therfore we take not away frō the godly heart of a good mā, but y^e he may vse the purenes of his conscience before the lord, to strengthē himself in y^e promises wherwith the Lord cōforteth & vpholdeth his true worshippers: but our meaning is, that the trust of obtaining stand vpon the only mercy of God, laying away all thinking of their owne deseruing.

11 The fourth rule is, that being so throwen downe and subdued with true humility, we should neuertheles with certaine hope of obtaining be encouraged to pray. These be things in deede contrary in shew, to ioyne with the feeling of the iust vengeance of God sure affiance of fauour: which things do yet very well agree together, if the onely goodnesse of God raise vs vp beinge oppressed with our owne euills. For, as we haue before taught that repentance & faith are knit as companions together with an vnseparable bond: of which yet the one afraieth vs, the other chereth vs: so in prayers they must mutually meete together. And this agreement Dauid expresseth in fewe
 5. 8 wordes: I (sayth he) will in the multitude of thy goodnesse enter into thy house: I will worship in the temple of thy holinesse with feare. Vnder the goodnesse of God he comprehendeth faith, in the meane time not excluding feare: because not only his maiesty driueth vs to reuerence, but also our owne vnworthinesse holdeth vs in feare forgetting all pride & assurednes. But I meane not such an affiance which should stroke the minde loosed from all feeling of carefulnes with a sweete & full quietenesse. For, to rest so peasably is the doing of them which haunge all thinges flowing as they would wish it, are touched with no care, are kindled with no desire, do swel with no feare. And it is a very good spurre to the holy ones to call vpon God, when being distressed with their owne necessity, they are vexed with most great vnquietenesse, & are almost dismaied in themselues, till faith come in fit time to their succours, because in such distresses the goodnesse of God so shineth to them, y^e they do in dede grone beinge weried with weight of present euils, they are also in paine & grieued with feare of greater, yet being so vpholden by it, they both relieue and cōfort the hardnes of bearing them, & do hope for escape & deliuerance. Therefore the prayer of a godly man must arise out of both affections, must also containe & shew both: namely to grone for present euils, & to be carefully afraid of new, & yet therewithall to flie to God, not douting
