PR 6025 M1965c 1912

A

000 549 717

7

THE LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LOS ANGELES

aprilia.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2007 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

CHARMIDES

AND

OTHER POEMS

CHIEFLY RELATING TO OXFORD

BY

GASCOIGNE MACKIE

AUTHOR OF

THE MAN OF KERIOTH, ANDREA AND OTHER POEMS, ETC.

Orford

B. H. BLACKWELL, BROAD STREET

London

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO. LIMITED

1912.

250 COPIES PRINTED.

Restricted PR 6025 M1965C 1912

PREFATORY NOTE.

CHARMIDES, published by Mr. Blackwell in 1898, has been revised, and in part re-written. The section entitled "Oxford" was first printed in The Spectator in 1897. I have also to acknowledge permission to reprint "Oxford at Night" from the same paper. Four sections from Charmides, two Sonnets and "Wadham Garden" have appeared in Mr. J. B. Firth's "Minstrelsy of Isis," (1908), and five sections from Charmides and one Sonnet in Professor William Knight's "Glamour of Oxford."

918012

CHARMIDES.

то

ARTHUR R. BAYLEY.

My DEAR FRIEND,

I have never yet treated myself to the luxury of a preface: but, as we grow older, we get more talkative, and have a tendency to spread ourselves in a more genial and personal way.

Poets may be said to dwell in the shadow which coming events cast before them; and I anticipate that the indifference which has been for so long time a marked feature of the age in respect to contemporary poetry will be mitigated, and we may now look forward perhaps to a more generous —or at least, a less perfunctory treatment at the hands of those whose office it is to mediate between the writer and his readers. Should it prove otherwise, I can say, with a certain other "harmless drudge," that "having carried on my work thus far with so little obligation to any favourer of learning, I shall not be disappointed though I should conclude it, if less be possible, with less"— Charmides owes its existence to the late John Addington Symonds, who on the strength of my earliest book of verse, twenty years ago, assured me that I was 'dear to the Muses,' and especially picked out for approbation, amid much that was "crude and young and yeasty," a piece called "An Invocation." It was his generous appreciation which encouraged me "to look again upon the things we love," and to sing with greater confidence of boyhood's friendship and of those school days spent at Oxford which had left so ineffaceable an impression on my memory. With this plain explanation before him, the wayfaring man, though critic, will, I trust, no longer err by alluding to Charmides as 'a college friend.'

There is not a word in this book about my college friends or my college days. I have almost forgotten my college days, and my college friends have forgotten me. Lest this should savour of bitterness, I will here most gratefully acknowledge that the Head of the College where I was an undergraduate has been the kindest of critics and the most steadfast of personal friends to me for more than twenty-five years.

The Professor of Poetry at Oxford-himself a poet-(Bristol has had many poets, but has kept none)-in his inaugural address in the Sheldonian Theatre, among other interesting and varied matters, said, "If you want before all to be a poet, if that is your first object, don't stay at Oxford." This remark, true in itself, is especially applicable to one who ventures to make Oxford the subject of his verse. For indeed, treading the streets of Oxford, I usually feel so overwhelmed by my own insignificance and unworthiness, that only the more plangent utterances of Job, or the words of the Patriarch in the presence of Pharoah could at all adequately express my emotions. Charmides was written in Germany, France, South Africa, on the high seas-almost anywhere, in fact, except in Oxford. It has been revised in this edition, and in part rewritten; and perhaps you will miss something in its present form of that which pleased you when you first read it fourteen years ago.

There is a famous saying that when a true friend is found one should grapple him with hooks of steel; and as it was this poem which made us friends, so to-day it seems to me inevitable that your name should be inscribed at its beginning; for indeed, I have no wish to be remembered if my friends are forgotten. We have made a pilgrimage together. You know who Charmides was; you have stood by his grave; you are intimate with the associations the customs and the localities of which these verses are a record — and through you I cherish the not unnatural hope that there will continue to be a few in every generation who will hold these buds of song above the stream of oblivion.

Your sincere friend,

GASCOIGNE MACKIE.

Hordle, Hants, Xmas, 1911.

CONTENTS. _____

_

CHARMIDES.

.....

PROEM :							1 14 0 15
To the Evening 7	CHRUS	5H	-	-	-	-	17
PART I.:-
OLD MAGDALEN BE	RIDGE		-	-	-	-	21
IFFLEY	-	-	-	-	-	-	22
April	-	-	-	-	-	-	23
THE POWER OF MU	JSIC	-	-	-	-	-	24
UT PASTOR -	-	-	-	-	-	-	25
PROVIDENCE -	-	-	-	-	-	-	26
LIFE'S OXYMORON	-	-	-	-	-	-	27
NEL MEZZO DEL C	AMMI	N DI	Nos	F RA	VITA	-	28
THE DOOR -	-	-	-	-	-	-	29
TRIVIUM	-	-	-	-	-	-	30
HOME SICKNESS	-	-	-	-	-	-	31
THE BIG SCHOOL	-	-	-	-	-	-	32
THE LIBRARY -	-	-	-	-	-	-	33
MAGDALEN MILL	-	-	-	-	-	-	34
MARSTON COPSE	-	-	-	-	-	-	35
AN ISLE OF SONG	-	-	-	-	-	-	36
INTERMEZZO :
ARCADES AMBO	-	-	-	-	-	-	37
PART II.:-
INVOCATION -	-	-	- 1	-	-	-	41
MAGDALEN CHAPEI	-	-	-	-	-	-	42

					PAGE
SELF-DEDICATION	-	-	-	-	43
A GARDEN AT DONNINGTON	-	-	-	-	44
A NARCISSUS	-	-	-		45
WYTHAM WOODS	-	-	-	-	46
PARSONS' PLEASURE -	-	-	-	-	47
GODSTOW	-	-	-	-	48
WORCESTER GARDENS -	-	-	-	-	49
MAY MORNING	-	-	-	-	50
MOZART'S REQUIEM -	-	-	-	-	51
EASTER MORNING	-	-	-	-	52
MADRIGALS	-	-	-	-	53
CHRISTMAS EVE	-	-	-	-	54
GLORIA IN EXCELSIS -	-	-	-	-	55
ALMA MATER	-	-	-	-	56
PART III. :					50
New Magdalen Bridge
A RETROSPECT	-	-	-	-	59
	-	-	-	-	60
THE ESSENTIAL SELF -	-	-	-	-	61
SELF-CONTROL	-	-	-	-	62
THE WELLS OF SLEEP -	-	-	-	-	63
THE FELLOWS' BRIDGE -	•	-	-	-	64
DANTE AND BROWNING -	-	~	-	-	65
SEDBERGH	-	-	-	-	66
INSPIRATION	-	-	-	-	67
GARDE-JOYEUSE OF YOUTH	-	-	-	-	68
THE KEYSTONE	-	-	-	-	69
HESPER-PHOSPHOR	-	-	-	-	70
MAN THE COLOSSUS -		-	-	-	71
ALPHA AND OMEGA -	-	-	-	-	72
SUNSET AT SARE	-	-	-	-	73
Oxford	-	-	-	-	74
EPILOGUE :
TO THE MORNING THRUSH
TO THE MORNING THRUSH	-	-	-	-	75

SIX SONNETS :		PAGE
THE SHELLEY MEMORIAL	-	79
AN OAK NEAR OXFORD	-	80
THE WEIR	-	81
FROM THE PARKS	-	82
IN THE BOTANIC GARDEN	-	83
AFTER CHARMIDES	-	84
DOMINUS ILLUMINATIO MEA:
(i) THE FRIAR	-	85
(ii) THE SAINT	-	88
ODE AND PALINODE	-	90
AUTUMN IN WADHAM GARDEN	-	97
OXFORD AT NIGHT	-	98
THE LEAVES OF SPRING	-	100
ST. MARY'S PORCH	-	101
DOUBLE SONNET	-	103
VALEDICTORY	-	105

PROEM.

TO THE EVENING THRUSH.

Rapt Orpheus of the green and glimmering ways Hidden amid the flowering chestnut-trees, Thou singest to my heart of other days! Deep in the crimson-hued Hesperides Vesper now lifts her lamp to evening prayer; And o'er the fields of memory, like a dream, Through the still twilight and the scented air Rings the sweet prelude of thy song supreme.

Ah, look not back; Eurydice was lost To Orpheus thus, and vain was any skill: Yet, through thy passionate voice I hear the ghost Of Hellas singing on the haunted hill: And, gazing backward down that dark ascent Memory embraces but a melting shade: For never twice the awful Powers relent, E'en though an Orpheus should invoke their aid.

17

B

For ever throned amid the falling bloom ! Still in my heart and high above all pain, Like some brave banner in the minster gloom I'll hang the votive offering of thy strain :— Still, amid chestnut-boughs, when soft winds blow Their efflorescent wreaths like censers swinging; Vesper shall glimmer through the crimson glow, And thou shalt sing, as now I hear thee singing. PART I.

I. OLD MAGDALEN BRIDGE.

HERE from the bridge where cloister'd gardens old Are spread beneath us, and the frequent bells Chime the division of our parcell'd day, Behold the city of the still grey towers ! It is a sacred spot.

The fragrant air Is stirring with the lisp of summer leaves, Lilac and linden and laburnum leaves, And the low murmur of the meeting streams Rippling under the arch : and, all around, Within the shadow of her antique walls Youth passes like an unabiding stream.

Perchance her syren-sister of the fens Hath sent forth greater singers to the world, While we in silent reverence bow the head :— For how can lips of dust thy praise proclaim, Mother immortal of too mortal men?

II. IFFLEY.

THERE is a plot of land that lies a league Beyond this bridge, whither my thoughtful steps Have often turned : up the strait straggling hamlet And past the shatter'd elm, I reach the gate : Here reigns the giant yew-tree as of yore, And eastward underneath an iron cross The dust of dearest Charmides is layed. Silent I stand and gaze. The sombre dome Hangs like a ponderous catafalque, and all That lies beneath seems to my troubled brain One huge sarcophagus : and human song As witless as the twittering of the swallows That gather in the dumb September sky.

The swallow mourns not o'er her empty nest, But trusts her wings: and since the change must come,

O, why should mortals mourn their home of clay ?

22

III. APRIL.

SOFTER than April shower on opening leaves, From the big cloud of doubt that dulled my brain The quickening drops of gentle transport fall, Reviving hopes that drooped: Dear Charmides, Spring brings the cuckoo, thee it brings not back, Only the pang of ineffectual grief.

A strain of music at the close of day I cannot hear but I remember thee: When the full sequence of harmonious waves Gluts the enchanted hollow of mine ear, Then too thou comest, on the throbbing tide Of music, borne from strange and distant shores, To comfort and to charm me as of old. Like Israfel, on wings of melody Thou speedest from the regions of thy rest, To comfort and to charm me as of old.

IV. THE POWER OF MUSIC.

AH, did not music build the walls of Heaven And bid the whirling atoms of white mist Fall into shape, and fuse to forms of Beauty? Did not the spell of Love's enchanting lyre Thrilling the uttermost uncouth abyss Compel obedience, till the firmament Was framed, and distant dim stupendous stars Sang of Creation, while the Sons of God Standing amazed beheld the Mazzaroth Coast into splendour with a shout of joy?

E'en so thy being, immortal Charmides, Seem'd ever swayed by that majestic rhythm; And thy proud spirit, beneath a spell of fire, E'en through the poise and counterpoise of passions Rebelliously constrained, I watched with awe Unfolding, still unconscious of its power.

V. UT PASTOR.

OR shall I, like poor Colin on a hill, Pipe a sad ditty to the heedless flock? Or, seated on some solitary spur Flute sweetly to the blue unlistening sky, Telling dead things a tale of deathless love, Lost in my song, still dreaming he were near?— Ah, what abides but heavenly charity?—

Swift as the rivulet singing to the sea, Yet guided by celestial influence And gathering impulse as it onward rolls, The spring-tide of my song's impetuous flood Shall beat and burst the barriers of the heart : Until, in other ears and other days, And to the breast of beauty yet unborn The murmurs of my melody shall ring Like echoes from the Islands of the Blest.

VI. PROVIDENCE.

LOOK back, and scrutinize the web of life; Study the knitted texture and confess How every stitch was counted, every turn Deliberately contrived; and though unseen, The cunning needles made the ends converge To fit some object:—something was in view, Some secret half-concealed and half-expressed, Some purpose undivulged, but yet enough To inspire the heart.

When I was yet a child, A mighty Spirit stood beside my bed And in her hand she held a silver shield; 'Behold,' she cried. I look'd and wondering saw As in a mirror, darkly, my own face Aged and calm, and round my brows a wreath Of laurel leaves: "Only have faith," she frowned, "Labour in faith, and all shall be fulfilled."

26

VII. LIFE'S OXYMORON.

But what to me is an immortal crown, Or boyish dream fulfilled ?---A wider joy Invigorates my soul: I have seen enough To know that he who strives with Death is blest :---The baffled patience of a poet's heart Builds for eternity, and he who fights With self is born a king beyond the grave: But heaven's best boon is humour that can gaze Fearlessly round, feeling how infinite Love Enfolds us all so softly in His arms That man can smile e'en in the face of death :---So would I whisper to the yet unborn Some fragment of the secret I have learnt, And from the discipline of long defeat Affirm :--- the pith if not the prize of life Is ours who, striving, never quite achieve.

27

VIII. NEL MEZZO DEL CAMMIN DI NOSTRA VITA.

WHO can remould the perished dews of time Or trace the trembling ardours of the dawn? Who can call back the morning-star of love? Or, from youth's lattice leaning, breathe again Th' authentic exultation of the prime?

Pausing midway upon the path of life I feel as one who inly is resolved To rest no more on any human heart: And lesson'd in the school of lonely song, Another stay is mine: yet memory, Like summer lightning, playing on the past, Pictures again that morning when I first Beheld these towers, and stood upon this bridge, Holding my father's hand: for, even then, The lot was cast, and I, a child of nine, Was called henceforth to serve the muse of song.

IX. THE DOOR.

O MOMENT of unutterable distress Then, when my father kissed me, and I clung To him, saying farewell upon the step Where the dark hatchment frowned with lilies adorned Above our heads; awaiting on the threshold While the bright bell re-echo'd, ere the door Swung open silently:—and he went home. O unrecorded nights of childhood's tears

When the faint image of a mother dead Seemed to be near, and comfort me unseen !

Though naked to the rack of life we move, We move not unattended. There are those Who watch and weigh, and will in turn exact Righteous requital. For myself, I vow, Had I as many sons as Hecuba, Not one should serve th' apprenticeship I served !

X. TRIVIUM.

SCANT patience have I to expatiate Upon the harsh scholastic pedantry Preposterous, to which I was enthralled : Dry sentences that praised Philosophy And Wisdom formed my bitter tale of bricks : To learn me Greek I conned a grammar-book Written in Latin-even the title-page ! As though man's path had not enough of thorns, Mine was the serpent's curse-to feed on dust: And so, like Virgil, but without a guide, Ibam obscurus in the shades of hell. Where rigour was not lacking, nor the wail Of wretchedness, and fear in many a form : ' God is my light'-O city tenebrous, God is thy light !---Why then with works of darkness

Wert thou about my path, about my bed ?

XI. HOME SICKNESS.

THE first slow hours of our return to school Two of us sauntered slowly, sick at heart, Down the Broad Walk : and as we went, we heard The whistle and the clank of shunting trucks Far off: and "Oh," he wailed, "I wish that train Had come for me, to take me home again !" And I, forlorn, echo'd the hopeless wish. We were so miserable, we did not try Even to hide our tears :—and once, it happ'd, Pinched with the wretched fare they served at school, We hung about the platform, watching trains ; And gaping through at the refreshment room

With eager looks, a traveller noticed us,

Who, having less convention or a heart

Of kindlier feeling, pointed to some pies ;

"Do boys still eat such things ? Lay on, Macduff."

XII. THE BIG SCHOOL.

It is the silent irony of Heaven

That weak things should outlast the strong. Henceforth

With my eyes not my betters' those to come Will visit here, where, round the panelled walls On shields of zinc, lettered in red, are names Of those who won distinction year by year : Sawyer and Titherington, both scholars born, The younger Smeaton, and good-natured Kent, My seniors, these :—and the boy-abbot Bowers In gorgeous vestments, with closed finger-tips, Muttering Gregorians, bringing up the rear In some procession of the unemployed On Sunday evenings, down the chapel yard, I well remember—Stewart too I knew, And gentle Hallam and brave Howard Green, And Wilson who could draw an angel down.

XIII. THE LIBRARY.

FIVE years I lived of fear that in me bred Hatred of cruelty, hatred of vice, And almost hatred of the human race; Then all was changed, for thou wert by my side. Do you remember the old oriel-room, Our library, perched half-way up the tower ?— In such a turret Faustus might have toiled— I seem to see you still, with slanting page, Your dark head close against the casement pressed, Reading away the winter afternoon, Rapt with enchantment, flush'd with the fiery zest That only youth can feel. Ah, let me sing,

And cast this haunting sorrow from my heart; For Charmides a thousand miles away Sleeps by the stately river, where the white Syringa-blossom droops above his breast.

33

С

XIV. MAGDALEN MILL.

THE touch of time bequeathes a lovelier shade To this famed walk of over-arching elms That gird the meadow :—But the mill is gone— Here have I idled many an hour away Angling, or groping underneath the stones For cray-fish: often the shy deer would come To the park gate, and lift their lips against it To take the bread we fished with :—One may see The mill-dam yet: but the low westering sun Shines on a stagnant pool, where once the stream Poured from the pounding wheel in roaring foam.

So boyhood frets beneath constraint, nor dreams How wistfully the light may some day fall Upon the vacant stillnsss:—Yet, God knows, I would not choose to live those hours again Nor change what then I was with what I am.

XV. MARSTON COPSE.

I HEARD a nightingale in Marston Copse, Beneath a saffron-leaf'd oak sapling, hidden In the green thicket: as I nearer drew I watched, and sheltered by the hedge I listened: And listening, I seem'd to leave the earth And soar into a finer element; Dilating to some more celestial plane Or dower'd with larger consciousness, I breathed The spirit which fills the leaping heart of Spring: And then, methought, I saw young Charmides; Far on a flashing headland ringed with foam I saw him standing, and behind him stood His angel: oh, my throat was thick with joy! To me they stretched their hands, and cried "Sing on:

O, hidden as the noon-day nightingale, Darkness shall crown the fulness of thy song."

C 2

XVI. AN ISLE OF SONG.

But thou art gone: gone with the Autumn leaves: As from the Autumn sky a falling star May cast a thread of gold, so thou art gone : And all is gone but thy dear memory And faith unfathomed, and exalted song. Death shall not brag he threw thee and rejoiced, Oblivion's poppy shall not cover thee !---Maugre the moth of chance, the rust of time, The restless wave of mutability, I'll build, like patient coral, stem by stem, An Isle of Song :--- and there the thrush shall sing Sweeter than mortal on a bough of gold : And in the shadow of the willow trees We two, for ever young, will wander slow Beside the river, where the sorrel gleams At sunset, amid fields no scythe can reap.

INTERMEZZO.

ARCADES AMBO.

Sleeps Charmides beside the stream Cephissus Under Athena's olive invulnerable? Or by that grotto where great echoes linger Of Theseus, and a Voice oracular Summoned the blind old Seer?— And Charmides, who gave me the narcissus, Where Isis flows, beneath a white syringa Sleeps by the Norman Tower on Iffley hill: And o'er them both burns the same morning-star Of beauty, like a tear.

PART II.

a. 7. M.

."

- 1

I. INVOCATION.

I TREAD the old enchanted fields: I pass The space of years once more: once more I wave My willow-wand, and call thee from the lake Where thou art haply loitering, or liest In pleasant meadow-land asleep, secure :----Awake, and look upon thine earthly friend Who loves thee yet, and would again behold The phantom of the first he ever loved.

IL MADRICKY

Loren al l. 5 1

O, fairer than Narcissus at the fountain, Eager as April with her tears and smiles, Stand ever thus with Spring upon thy lips! Nor from thy hand let fall the daffodil That never fades, —dear vision of delight! Dear Charmides, e'en as I gaze, the past Returns, and passionate memory that plucks ' The flower of beauty from the feet of death.

II. MAGDALEN CHAPEL.

THE Carfax bell is tolling: the old town Lies in a dull June haze: the cloisters, Worn down by many a foot, are quiet now: The pillars stand a-dreaming, though the hands That fashioned them lie listless in the dust, Hushed in forgetfulness: from point to point The shadows creep: and that great judgment-scene Burnt on the western window, is ablaze With wrestling figures wrapt in bronzèd flame Against the falling sun;

Come, Charmides, Children are we of nature, not of wrath: Under the trees between the winding streams, Over the ferry, where the feathered grass And flowers wave, and winged things exult, There will we wander: till the long long day Fades, and the sun sinks down to other lands.

III. SELF-DEDICATION.

AND when the sun sinks down to other lands, And where the may-fly fluttered, the white moth Floats like a ghostly flower above the grass; When in the scented twilight the bells ring And the breath of night blows free—Oh, Charmides ! That lived once, and I loved once and for ever ! Death cannot conquer love. Still let us love,— Not with the old half-torture, half-delight, But with the new-fledged spirit of freedom :—

Hail!

If in celestial colonnade the moon Silvers your lattice sleeping, or yonder star Claim thee as denizen, where slumber never Steals, nor sweet memory visits your dear eyes: Yet, listen, while beneath the solemn gloom And splendour of the summer night, I lift My spirit in consecration, and in prayer.

IV. A GARDEN AT DONNINGTON.

Do you remember that wild tangled garden Where once we lingered both of us together An early summer afternoon alone? The place that long had stood untenanted Echo'd and echo'd to your mirthful laugh As we explored the house from room to room Or leaned upon the little balcony That hung above th' unweeded flower-beds, filled With budding columbine :—

And here we talked Of your new home and all our boyish hopes, Of what the hidden years might have in store For both of us, and of the dreams we shared :---At last descending, yielding to a whim, Or moved by sudden prescience of thy doom Thou didst stoop down and pick a white narcissus; Half-sad, half-playful---adding words like these---

V. A NARCISSUS.

'RECEIVE this flower, and keep it for my sake: So, in the years to come, if luck is mine And you should meet misfortune :--- if you wish Send me this token, and I vow : '-(he kissed it)-'I will be true, if you are true to me.' And then, amid the swaying orchard-grass, His cheek irradiate with the rosy glow Of sunset, to the hum of quivering gnat : Continued : "and if aught should come between To mar our friendship; or if untimely change Should steal you from me, while I yet survive: Wait patiently for me beyond the river, And when I pass, pick me the star of flowers, So shall we know each other, and rejoice." And, when at last we rose, the trees were dark, And the bat circled in the garden gloom.

VI. WYTHAM WOODS.

Do you remember once, past Osney town, Leaving the dusty seven-bridge road, we turned Our steps to Wytham woods?—

That happy day We picnic'd underneath a tree, and watched The butterflies: some flutter'd in the grass Blue as the sky, or white as summer cloud: Others in mazy rings from briar to briar Went eddying down the edges of the wood, Like flying flowers, among the saffron-leafed Oak-saplings flitting: and one, all peacock-eyed, Upon the apex of a lilac thistle Settled, and sunn'd her damask-dreaming wings.— Not lovelier were thy flowers, O Proserpine Of Sicily: and these melodious woods And grassy slopes, no less than Enna's vale Sacred to thee, are haunted evermore.

VII. PARSONS' PLEASURE.

Do you remember that straight gravel-walk Planted with may-trees, leading to the bridge, With sunny palisade? On summer morns, When we passed down to bathe, what scented showers

Of may-bloom like confetti strewed our path ; The crimson drift of summer's carnival !— Do you remember the old willow-stump ? And how you swam (although I warned you back) Far out to gather the first water-lilies ? I seem to see you still, waving the buds Above the stream, and toiling with one hand ! Ah, dear drenched head, dear laughter-flashing eyes, How glad were you to grasp the steps at last !— And I too swim far out to gather flowers, And with one hand I toil, that I may hold These buds of song above the stream of Death.

VIII. GODSTOW.

AND once, in strawberry time, we rowed together To many-gated Godstow, where the stream Splits, and upon a tongue of land there stands An inn with willow-bowers :---it is a spot Where still the genius of Old Merry England Lingers : and gently flowed the silver Thames Beside the garden, while we fed the fish. There, in the twilight to the trellised roses We sang the ballad of fair Rosamund : And drifting homeward down the stream, we saw Above the ruined Nunnery where she sleeps A star; and from the reeds a mournful gust Whispered and rippled round the shallow prow Leaving a tragic silence :--at that moment The mighty mother touched me, and I felt The first strong throb of that which rules me still.

IX. WORCESTER GARDENS.

Do you remember once, in Worcester Garden, We heard The Tempest played beneath the trees?— 'Be not afeard: the isle is full of noises, Sounds and sweet airs, that give delight and hurt not. Sometimes a thousand twangling instruments Will hum about mine ears, and sometime voices That, if I then had waked after long sleep, Will make me sleep again:'

These were the lines that fell like shooting stars Out of the summer heaven, while the leaves Murmured about us both.

To-day I passed, And saw the tree-tops touched with autumn gold, Thirty years after: it was but a glimpse Caught from a moving window; yet I felt (While through the smoke and uproar onward hurled)

Heart-shaken, like old Prosper in his cell.

49

D

X. MAY MORNING.

Do you remember how, upon May-morning We climbed the Tower ?—first, the broad wooden flights

And then the spiral steps; and last the ladder That led us out into the welcome air? Then might you see the choir in full array Bare-headed turn towards that point of heaven Whence light appears: and when the clock had told The same hour as the fingers of one hand, A silence fell upon the listening throng And on the upturned faces of the crowd Below: a moment's hush:—and then the strains 'Te Deum Patrem Colinus' began, Our Royal Founder's hymn.

O Towers of Death.

Have ye no voices that salute the May? Are there no angels in the opening East To comfort us who listen and look up?

XI. MOZART'S REQUIEM.

THE prelude of a thousand organ-pipes In diapason pealed the approach of Doom; And thrice, while loud th' archangel trumpet rang, Majestic voices thunder'd 'Rex !' and lo! The King of Kings and Lord of Lords passed by Riding in triumph upon the clouds of heaven :---Then 'Salva me fons pietatis' fell Soft as a trembling feather of the Dove Beneath whose wings, brooding outstretched, are heard Celestial voices by the cedar-trees Of Paradise, lovelier than Lebanon, Singing of Peace, where Love and Peace abide : And when those strains had ceased,---those solemn strains---

I looked at Charmides; and through the veil Of his bright eyes, suffused with tears, I saw The 'Salva me' of love's apocalypse.

XII. EASTER MORNING.

Do you remember how on Easter Day We used to sing the resurrection hymn Outside the old Dean's rooms? Four boys together We stood upon the darkling staircase, singing As dawn was breaking o'er the tranquil towers. And when we ceased, and heard his grave salute

' Surrexit Pastor, benedicite,

Laudate pueri, surrexit Pastor.'

How sweet the low and measured Latin fell From his kind lips, while from a silver tray He doled us, each in turn, an Easter gift ! And not ungrateful, when the Spring returned, We gathered handfuls of fritillaries (Snake's-head we called them) from the island meadow,

And shyly laying them outside his doors, Slipped down the oaken stair, nor stayed for thanks.

XIII. MADRIGALS.

IN Autumn, when the first dead chestnut-leaf Drops through the stillness like an outspread hand, We used to gather in the spacious hall To sing true English music ;--madrigals In praise of Oriana, or quaint glees Of 'Shepherds running up apace the mountain'! Do you remember him who held the wand In his strong fingers, and the shaking tuft Of hair that boded storm? And after supper, We used to gather round the old Dean's chair Beside the wood-fire, while he read aloud. How the long portraits on the lofty wall Stared down upon us listening to the tale Of Flodden or Drumossie !- The spectral past Weighed on my spirit : but when I looked at you Joy in my bosom blossomed like the rose.

XIV. CHRISTMAS EVE.

Do you remember how, upon the eve Of the Nativity, it was our wont To keep the vigil of the King of Peace? Bright glowed the lighted hall, and every guest Wore the glad season's garland of good-will, And on the dais towered the tinselled tree: But could I choose, and tell what touched me most Of all the music of that night of song, 'Twould be the Suabian melody divine In Dulci Jubilo :--- a strain so pure That e'en the memory of that sweet carol Ringing amid the rafters, when the snow Is falling, and the hour draws on to twelve, Brings tears into my eyes: This Christmas Eve, Love, though I cannot hear thee, thou art singing Cælorum Cantica-Oh that we were there.

XV. GLORIA IN EXCELSIS.

'GLORY to God' the Italian canon rose In intricate iteration, as of old, Amid the scarlet conclave, and the pomp ' At Rome, the Angel message · 'Peace on earth, Goodwill to men':—Then, when the midnight hour In solemn hush awaited, chimed and struck : Bells in the belfry rang 'Noel, Noel,' And all the ten bells clashed, until the tower Rocked as in exultation : and afar Over the starlit city dome and spire Answer'd the challenge, echoing back their praise.

Time cannot steal the wonder from the sky Nor fret the white robe of Emmanuel : Still o'er His cradle hangs the guiding star ; And round His head, while bending Magi kneel, The Dove of Peace celestial glory sheds.

XVI. ALMA MATER.

ILLUSTRIOUS Mother, patroness of the poor! Me, as a child, mid echoing cloisters old, Thou in thy love didst nurture and instruct; And Charmides, is he not with thee still? Through all the generations for to come Still with thee, shall the music of thy bells And murmuring rivers haunt his hill of rest.

Ah, famous city, city of my soul, Let me but touch thy stones, and say farewell !---O Mother, there is virtue in thy touch :---I see thee still, inspired with patient thought, Musing upon the mystery of the world; And those gray towers in autumn's evening hush Still draw us back as pilgrims to thy shrine With something of a mother's wistfulness Remembering hopes which Time has not fulfilled.

PART III.

I. NEW MAGDALEN BRIDGE.

AND after many days I came again And wandered by the long familiar walls, A stranger, and unknown. Many the year Since first I stood upon this bridge, and heard The light bell ring for evening prayer; and now Another generation with other ways Passes me unconcerned : and all around The elm-trees shed in showers their sallow leaves. Can I, whose heart throbs as a homeless child's, I, to whom life looms yet so wonder-strange, Be growing old ?- Then come, dear Charmides, Swan of my soul, begin the dying strain ! "Why dost thou heed the falling leaf, or reck The ruined years behind thee? Love is youth:" Thy voice canorous through the darkness calls, And flying homeward through the mist, I sing.

II. A RETROSPECT.

ALAS! the rearward of my life lies dim As a great tract of sand washed clean by tide Of every childish castle, and there gleams Only the distance traversed; every print And trace of all I traversed once is gone : Only some stubborn rock or ribbed wreck Breaks the gaunt landscape, while the wistful moon Whose light is memory, crescent no more, Sheds a wan splendour on the lessening waste : For, in the midnight, knells upon mine ear The bitter thunder of the flowing tide Buffeting and booming round the outward reef: Remorseless billows of oblivion Roll in : and shallowing as they shoreward roll, Bursting in layers of foam, shoot out their tongues, And hiss in tremulous silver to my feet.

III. THE ESSENTIAL SELF.

ONCE, in the morning-tide of life and love When every leaf and blade distilled a pearl Of hope, and every passing shower displayed A bow of promise, and the world was bright :--I took no heed of Nature's ministries, But like a child accepted all she gave In happy heedlessness : but now I know That every oak-tree is an oracle. There comes an hour when each of us must say; 'Something is taken time will not recall, Something is added which was not of old.' And yet love's hope brooks no denial : beneath The denudation of the stormy years, Deep down th' essential self remains unchanged : So in the seraph lives the friend I loved As in the silent man the boy survives.

IV. SELF-CONTROL.

Could that which burns within her breast leap forth The earth would long ago have been consumed; E'en so my love lives on and is not spent, E'en so the fire burns deep, and I am dumb : Only, perchance, on some still afternoon When the soft grays of autumn wake regret, The depths of memory shudder, and cast forth A short volcanic shower of sudden song Flashing with lava and dust of whirling dreams, Uprushing streams of joy, and blasts of hell ;--And then, as suddenly, the fierce impulse fails. More often, in the long warm winter nights, When the fire sinks, and through the gaping grate The glimmering ashes quiver into gloom, In stoical submission, like a stone I sit unmoved ; I sit and muse alone.

V. THE WELLS OF SLEEP.

THEN, in the shadow of the cave of sleep, Motionless by the brink where fern-seed grows, Gazing into those cold clear depths, I see Wonderful shapes: and wandering sounds, the soul Of music yet unborn, I hear: and forms Visit me in my dream, with faces hidden, And hands that beckon as they fade from sight.

Ancient as sorrow, young as new-born love, 'Tis beauty that enthralls, undying beauty, The beauty of the dead, that fills my heart With tears, I know not wherefore, till with tears Mine eyes o'erflow.

The trivial things of life Bring back self-consciousness: and then we gaze Vainly in beauty's fountain: soon, too soon Care, like quicksilver, dulls the crystal depths Till they reflect no image but our own.

VI. THE FELLOWS' BRIDGE.

CITY of bridges—none hast thou like this; For this, although I loved it as a boy, Yet have I never crossed: For in the midst There stands a wooden wicket, and above it A grim cheval de frise.

So, in my dreams, When, Mirza-like, I tread the bridge of life, I reach a guarded door I cannot climb :---But I am well content to linger here And watch the river, leaning on the rail, And feel at least withdrawn if not secure :---Nay, if some favoured hand that holds the key Should open, and give me liberty to pass, Do I not know that all which lies concealed Is kin to that which I can plainly see ?---To look once more upon the things we love Is better than to crane at things beyond.

VII. DANTE AND BROWNING.

O DANTE, is it true these streets have felt The feet that trod Inferno?

In these streets

I saw the last great heir of English song Whom Venice, scene of thy vain pilgrimage, Took,—but his heart still sleeps where thou wast born—

And this gray city knew the first, the last, And still she dreams in silence: ob, if her walls Could echo with the accents of the dead, Or if her stones could 'blossom in the dust' And tell of all the mighty who have trod them, What city could a chronicle unfold More ancient, more august? They are in peace. Still from the past their bidding voices hail us: 'The great inheritance which once was ours Is yours to-day. To-morrow and to-morrow Let the traditions deepen and endure.'

65

E

VIII. SEDBERGH.

AGAIN the cuckoo calls, the dog-rose blooms, And through the ghyll the clear-voiced rivulet falls Where fern and foxglove lean above the Force, And o'er the mimulus-bells and globe-flowers drooping

The bees still murmur, and the ousel sings.— Still, in this dingle spread the same dark boughs And every larch is fledged with lighter green, Only the cankered fir-cone at my feet Whispers of happier summers that have fled.

Blow, vernal airs, breathe o'er my brow love's secret, Mock me not thus with thy divine renewal, Dear earth, but tell me, he too will return : Not as of old in frail and fleeting vesture, Garment of heaviness and grace that fades ! Bnt, in a world unfading, in His Image Shall we not waken, and be satisfied ?

IX. INSPIRATION.

COME, welcome Spring ! a wave of ecstasy Sweeps through my frame, and every fibre thrills: My heart, my brain, my senses,-all are bathed In beauty, and to music every impulse And step, and gesture, undivided moves; Fain would I sing, but only broken notes Fall from my lips : a flood of happiness O'erwhelms me, wandering through the woods alone: Yon white acacia leaning over the pool Sways not her drooping blossom in the breeze With purer joy than I my thoughts unfold: The budding lilies floating in mid-stream Are not more lovely than the hopes which lie Half-opened in my bosom : and all my heart Unutterably throbs-a sunlit heaven Of hidden stars-waiting for night to come.

X. GARDE-JOYEUSE OF YOUTH.

As some poor exile pushes from the shore Alone at twilight, leaving all he loves, I float along the quickening stream of years; Great trees bend o'er me, and the night wind blows: From the dense forest comes the distant roar Of hunger, or anon some desperate cry Of pain and combat; or, some monstrous snake Gapes, swaying from the poisonous bough, and darts

A flickering tongue at me : or mid the reeds Glitters the mail of some grim crocodile Floating beside the ford :---

And at my back Black thunder broods :—O fading towers of youth Whose gates are locked in everlasting night, Farewell !—Death holds the key : I am driven forth, A brother to the disinherited And all whose Aiden is the evening star.

XI. THE KEYSTONE.

DEATH is the keystone of the vital arch That spans the flood of mutability; It is an arch based on the two unknowns, The whence, the whither : and death renders firm Or proves unstable all life's superstructure :---But Faith's a rainbow sprung of light divine Falling on human tears, and standing bright Against the onset of renewing storms. O that my Art could gather in one crown The pearls that glitter'd on love's April lyre Of early promise: O that I might sweep The chords that, stretched across the hollow shell Of heaven, awake celestial harmonies, So that the laverock mid the falling rain Carols more blithely, and the sower's hand With happier confidence scatters good seed.

XII. HESPER-PHOSPHOR.

HUSH'D in the glimmering depth of day's adieu Hesperus glows above the fallen sun : And, when the constellated hosts have wheel'd And set, and the great year has run its course, The same star is the herald of the dawn :—

Thou wert the planet of my waking soul, Hesper of life's long night:—albeit now A thousand others shine, and thou art gone; Yet, when the silence deepens, and the breeze Of morning stirs,—O Day-spring from on high !— Will not that star which rose upon earth's night Herald the splendour of the rising sun ? Wilt thou not then return ?—I live in faith That I shall see thee then, first, as of old; Though thou art hidden in the depths of heaven, And I, a pilgrim in a world of pain.

XIII. MAN THE COLOSSUS.

IMAGINATION brooding o'er mankind Conceives the figure of the human race As a Colossus, bearing in himself Both that which was, and is; his feet are formed Of servile elements; and, cell by cell, The higher and the higher :- but one whole, From head to heel one huge imperfect whole,-Whereof we all are conscious atomies : And as he strides the battle-plain, or groans Breasting the mount of vision; from his pores The souls of men distil like drops of sweat; And those sad eyes where saints and poets watch Are raised in deep humility to heaven; And from those lips where prophets sit enthroned There bursts a cry: 'We know not thy design O Father, but we feel that all are One.'

XIV. ALPHA AND OMEGA.

ERE first enormous Andes raised his head Cleaving the swollen cloud-rack with his snows; When cataracts, like the strings of one great lyre, Thunder'd the bridal hymn of earth and sun; Ere first the morning-star—a stripling herald— Peeped through the chambers of the curtain'd East On tiptoe, for his coming :—ere first the god Sprang glorious on the golden mountain-peak And watched the earth her virgin mists unveil; Love was, dear Charmides :—

And when the moon In some neglected corner of the sky Ekes out her scanty pittance from the sun; When, mid her peers, this perish'd earth shall roll Cold as a snowball, frozen and deform : Still shall Love triumph, still shall Love redeem us, Dear Charmides,—for Love is Lord of all.

XV. SUNSET AT SARE

Long gaps of lingering splendour—but no sun— Now from the heights the hieratic tints Fade slowly, like the fervour from life's dream : And every valley veiled in violet bloom Lies hushed; till lo, from out her vestal shrine— Heaven's inmost penetralia of peace— Upon the bosom of maternal night Passionless Hesper, like a kneeling child, Glimmers: and soft as dew, the far off hills Drop down divine nostalgia on my soul That homeward turns at last.

Dear Charmides, Still be thou near me, wheresoe'er I walk, The motive and the charm of solitude : Close as a shadow let thy memory cling And deepen round me; till the shadows break And on the golden bough the thrush begins.

XVI. OXFORD.

UPON a hill I stood, and far below Lay the loved city in a silver haze: Mine eyes were quick with tears: she lay so fair, So passionless, so sad.

'Twas here our fathers Drained the waste fen, and with prophetic eye Divined a refuge for the soul, and planned A green oasis severed from the waste, Where each, in cloistered calm and leisure shade, Might learn of wisdom in the lap of peace. Slowly she grew in unobtrusive grace Generous in bounty as in beauty first : As showers, as showers of scarlet leaves in autumn, The generations scatter : she remains Like Niobe, surviving all her sons :— Me too, O Mother, did the Sungod's arrow Winged with Uranian splendour pierce;—Farewell.

TO THE MORNING THRUSH.

Epilogue.

LOVER of lawns and garden solitudes ! Ere sunlight chase the lingering stars away Again thou pourest forth melodious floods Of rapture from the flowering chestnut-spray : And, as I listen, and the dawn-wind blows, I seem to wander, hand in hand, among The lilies where the living water flows, With beauty and with love for ever young.

Rich as Arabian clouds that damascene The deep at sunrise :—in my reverie The dreaming heaven of all that might have been Bursts into splendour like a sunlit sea ; And, at thy voice,—O Love in Paradise ! I see afar the secret dwelling-place, Where, like the mirror'd cloud, earth's memories Shall melt into the morning of thy face.

O heart of boyhood,—happy, happy song Waking celestial echoes in my heart ! Minstrel of youth that suffers and is strong, Of love that cannot be destroyed, thou art :— Priest at thine altar standing rapt beneath The efflorescent boughs like censers swinging, Sing me thine orison :—the mist of death Is changed to incense, while I hear thee singing.

SIX SONNETS.

THE SHELLEY MEMORIAL. (At University College, Oxford.)

ABOVE him hangs a sapphire-coloured dome Superb with stars : but through the rifted floor Breaks, like eternity—his metaphor— The light beyond. We envy not dead Rome His little dust : for here—by fire and foam Twice purged from every stain of mortal wrong,— Th' imperishable heart of passionate song Even thy heart, O Shelley, may find a home !

Here, through the ages, shall thy shrine be shown; Here, vindicated, on thy pyre sublime Lifted above the flood and flame of time, The world shall pay thee homage, and shall own More strong than privilege and power and pride, Genius—of all her martyrs justified.

AN OAK NEAR OXFORD.

Lo !—like a king in Thule with his thegns,— Quaffing the goblet of the golden sun This glorious oak, when summer has begun, Drinks in fresh vigour through his leafy veins Until, arrayed in royal robes, he reigns : A thousand years he sees, from his green throne, The goblet sink into the deep unknown ; While he, earth's mightiest, unremoved remains.

Ab, as he watches the great sun go down Has he no dim prevision of that part In Time's rude drama even oaks must play ? When storm and tempest sweep his frenzied crown He too shall learn though late and stubborn of heart,

'Earth's mightiest, fallen, have no second day.'

THE WEIR.

It seems indeed a vision desolate When, on some autumn eve, the breezes shrill Stripping the willow-trees above the mill, Dead leaves drift downward to the water-gate, Where, like the ghosts in Dante's dream, they wait Chafing to pass:—so, by a Higher Will Toward a barrier as inexorable We too like leaves are drifting, small and great.

Yet, though our morn be often hidd'n in haze, Our evening blotted with a blinding mist, The power of man is in his upward gaze: Since God has mingled, as He only can, Both frailty and fortitude in man, 'Tis man's to be resigned—and yet, persist.

FROM THE PARKS.

WHILE from this bench I watch the winding Cher Slow as a tortoise creep from shade to shade, How trivial seem the changes Time has made! Still looms the Dome of Wisdom from afar, Still gleams the lily like an evening star! And sooner shall e'en Wisdom's King, arrayed In all his glory, from remembrance fade Than youth's white bud of glimmering nenuphar.

Down in yon deepening bend I learnt to swim: Beneath these drooping boughs I walked with him Whom death has parted from me, like a dream; And here it was I found my willow-wand: How beautiful—across the narrow stream— Shines the red sorrel in the fields beyond !

IN THE BOTANIC GARDEN. (After the Oxford Pageant, July 2nd, 1907.)

O WHAT an Iliad of hopes and fears More fierce than any fought with spear and lance,— O what an Odyssey of sheer romance My own past life, in retrospect, appears! Now, as the tumult ebbs and the air clears, I see myself—no thrall of Fate or Chance— But girt around in every circumstance As any god-led hero of ancient years.

Full thirty times into this placid stream These drooping boughs have shed their prickly store, Since first I dreamed here of the days to come:— What though I cannot tell what measure more May be assigned me—these still moments seem To whisper that I am not far from home.

AFTER CHARMIDES.

WHO in his nobler moments would deny The splendour of life ?—and if I too have gained Power through affliction, and by faith maintained My birthright, not yet sold for pottage; why May I not say it? Death is victory— Though on this pastoral slope I might have reigned, My heart is fixed with hope and love unfeigned To tread the mount of vision ere I die.

Humility is life's heroic prize,-

Unfaltering faith in God is man's great need,— O that my words might be as winged seed— For slender is the harvest of the wise, And many whom the world has honoured least Shall sit exalted at the heavenly feast.

DOMINUS ILLUMINATIO MEA.

I.

(THE FRIAR).

PACING in silence the gray moonlit street A phantom moved beside me with bare feet : "Brother," he whispered, "from Alverna's woods, And Casentino's mountain solitudes. A nameless few, St. Francis sent us forth : Here, for the love of God, in this bleak North We served among the outcast and the sick-Sons of St. Francis and St. Dominic :-O the lost legions of the Lord of Hosts ! Doth not the night lead forth their cowléd ghosts? Do not their shadows beckon and waylay The careless footsteps of a later day, And daunt the sons of Tumult ere they tread Amid the dreaming cloisters of the dead ? Forget us not, O brother, for by God's grace We were the nursing-fathers of this place: What though to-day her seats of power and pride Stretch as lign-aloes by the water-side,-

Not for themselves did your forefathers found These homes of learning upon hallowed ground; Not for the rich alone did Princes raise Her walls of wisdom, and her gates of praise.

"What does this city dream of, as she stands, Save of the city that is not made with hands? Or is it moonlight only that so steeps In peace her groves and gardens, as she sleeps? What are her towers, her temples, and her dome. But shadows of the better things to come ? Is there no presage in her Virgin spire Sheathed in white armour of celestial fire ? No menace in those statues smouldering there Lifted on lonely pinnacles of prayer ? Mute witnesses of human woe and wrong From age to age their vigil they prolong : Hear they no whisper from the starry height ? O patient watchmen of the passing night Are ye not waiting for the promised end ?-Then come, Lord Jesus-O that Thou would'st rend The heavens, and in majesty descend With a loud shout; with lifted trumpet blown, With thousands and ten thousands round thy throne

Then, at the cry 'Behold, the Bridegroom comes!' The dead shall hear His voice, and leave their tombs:

Then shall His angels, speeding through the skies, Thrust in the sickle for that dread assize, And gather first for fire the worthless tares : And the Sons of God, upon the golden stairs Of heaven, shall hymn the Spirit and the Bride.

Then shall they cry to the mountains 'Hide, O hide!'

And kings shall skip like conies to the rocks : And as a shepherd separates his flocks Upon His right hand shall He set His sheep, And many shall rejoice, and many weep :--Ah, Jesu pie, Judge of quick and dead, Ne, ne me perdas illa die,"—said The phantom at my side, and turned and fled.

11. (THE SAINT).

THEN, o'er my soul another spell was cast: I heard a second voice speak from the past.

"O thou who gazest on St. Mary's fane, I was the humblest scholar in her train: Yet, me she lifted from my low estate To sit with kings, and to rebuke the great : Alas,-the higher I was raised, the less Did I the riches of her poor possess, Until, once more, from worldly grandeur shrunk, Cast forth contemned, I knelt, a simple monk. Then, as the fire of memory in me burned, A sweetness, like the breath of May, returned-O'er me again the joy of knighthood burst And all the boyish vision, when the first Bright ray of Beauty shone upon my path :---Such grief had I as every exile hath; Yet, oft I seemed, at Compline or at None, To hear the merry bells of Abingdon And live again that morn I came to thee, O Virgin-Mother, in my poverty:

For, here it was I vowed myself thy knight And with exchange of rings my troth did plight To her who is the Lady of all Grace: Surely her Peace doth rest upon this place.

What though the sword of grief, O Love Divine, The sword that pierced thy heart, hath piercéd mine, Yet even grief grows beautiful, being old, And all our sorrow, as a tale, is told :--O'er Roncesvalles, green with April corn, Still rings the blast of dying Roland's horn : Time hides the rest :--to later ages float Of things disastrous done in days remote Only the echoes of some high chivalric note :--

Over a ruined realm, the prostrate cross, Time strews her flowers, and steals with trembling moss:—

What though her Image in the dusty niche Shall wear no more the ring of Edmund Rich : Take me, O dreaming city, and whisper thus : 'Thou art made one imperishably with us; Though in the sight of men they seem to fail The saints shall triumph, and the cross prevail.'"

ODE AND PALINODE.

I.

HUSHED is the leafless glade, Silent the tower, Silent the colonnade Where, as a boy, I played : Standing alone Here at the midnight hour I see again The weather'd stone, The woonlit pane, The withered creeper swaying in the breeze : The glimmering lattices That once glowed bright with festal cheer, How blind and blanch'd they peer !

> Where hast thou fled, O spirit of boyhood, now ? Around my lonely brow Time only wreathes

A garland of gray hairs, And to my earnest prayers Deigns no reply :---Desolate Nature breathes A wintry sigh, Saying : "Thou, too, shalt die Worn down with cares Even as those who are dead."

Il.

MANY a summer day I have loitered here Feeding the fallow deer : Many a morn in May I have glanced up from my books Envying the noisy rooks Their liberty and strife : Or, drifting in my boat Under the sunlit elms, Dreaming of life, The same rich note Has mingled with my dream :— Ah, how it overwhelms ! So soon the stream Bears us away.

Who can unravel how The caul of care doth grow O'er him who gropes in the gloom, Penn'd in life's narrow room

Panting for light and breath And birth, To burst from this blind earth Whose door is death?

Where hast thou fled, O spirit of boyhood ? Lo ! The fields are mute with frost, And ghosts of long ago, The faces that I know, The friends that I have lost, Flit past, like phantom all, Saying : "Thou, too, shalt go Beyond recall. Even as we who are dead."

III.

AND yet, and yet, What have I to regret? Rather, deep gratitude Is mine for gifts so good : The Faith time cannot tame Burns with as bright a flame, And Hope that looks ahead is still the same :

> I mourn not for the days That can return no more, But with undaunted gaze And steadfast heart I move to that dark door That stands apart But does not turn both ways.

O STRANGE,-and swift as strange-Will be the welcome change From arctic to Arcadian weather ! There, in the tremulous haze All creatures sing together Their hymn of praise : And in the fields Celestial daisies lift their Spartan shields Saluting the great sun : The New Life has begun ! Round the eaves The swallows rush, And in the dewy laurel leaves Pipes as of old the perfect thrush : The naked briar Bursts into bud, And, like a bush of fire A thousand blossoms flood The shimmering air with scent: Dreamy bewilderment

And langour exquisite Enthrall me; larks aloft Drop notes like bubbling nectar, pure As dew : and in the distance, soft The cuckoo calls me to the fields of light :----To him who can endure Unto the end, To all the simple-hearted Death is a friend : When, from the body parted Th' enfranchised spirit waits At heaven's gates, Such music fills the air : And while he lingers there The loved ones come To lead him home.

AUTUMN IN WADHAM GARDEN.

HER passing seems to me more fair Than all the pride of summer's hour: Now, while the half-transfigured air Flings splendour on the seeding flower

That only struggles not to die :---So, mute with meaning unexpressed, So, hushed for some great agony This garden still awaits a guest.

Here, on some spirit drawn apart Shall fall her mantle and her flame To serve with undivided heart A bride more beautiful than fame:

97

G

OXFORD AT NIGHT.

HER towers in heavenly splendour soar And smoulder to the starlit air, As though her beauty, slumbering, wore The robe Immortals wear.

It is not might of armoured fleets Nor power of sword she deems most dear, Soldier and sailor in her streets Are guests and strangers here.

But, is there one like him who came Bare-footed to St. Mary's Porch? It is for him she guards her flame And holds the sacred torch.

Austere she stood in ancient times, A refuge for the pure in heart, And still the music of her chimes Peals from a world apart. And when we hear those cloister'd bells After long years, or absence long, With what high hopes and proud farewells Their haunting echoes throng !

Until it seems as if she brings (To mock the pride of lonely men), Only the tears of mortal things That cloud our mortal ken.

Yet, through her silence breathes a spell Of deeper import, wider range, That speaks of things invisible And charms through every change.

Still, o'er the waste of Time's decay, Dove-like she broods with dreaming wing, Still, fluttering at her windows grey, Brings back the pledge of Spring.

THE LEAVES OF SPRING.

HERE—where the moonbeam glistens cold and calm On the bare garden, the low cloister arch :—-Soon will the golden-tassel'd willow-palm Shimmer with bees beneath the blue of March.

The redbreast, eyeing where the gardener digs, Wears not a mantle from so rich a loom As yonder shrub, when her thick leafless twigs Are clothed in clustering cusps of crimson bloom.

Here will the flowering almond waste away Almost before the thrush has learnt to sing, Here will the mulberry grudge to fickle May The last and loveliest of the leaves of Spring.

ST. MARY'S PORCH.

STILL twine my thoughts round Love and Youth's twin torch
Close as the clinging creepers that festoon
The spiral pillars of St. Mary's Porch
In the deep shadow, 'neath a wintry moon.

Have I not served—though sorrow was my lot— And woo'd thee long ?—O Love, where'er I tread, I seem to hear in each remembered spot The voice of Rachel weeping for her dead.

O City of the Past—would, as of old, That, like the Son of Beor, in a trance Falling, with open eyes, I might behold The generations with a Seer's glance.

The Angel, who hath fed me all my days And hath redeemed me from a thousand ills, Bless them on whom mine eyes shall never gaze, And lift them to the everlasting hills.

Oft as the welcome of the Christmas bells Shall break the silence of the moonlit street, Let my song echo: 'Fear not earth's farewells, Lean on thy staff, and gather up thy feet.'

As dying Israel bade them bear his bones Back to the sacred land where Rachel died, So shall ye lay my dust beneath these stones And let me slumber by the loved hill side.

DOUBLE SONNET.

(Suggested by the Ter-centenary of Milton.)

I.

I HAVE not wandered forty years and more In this wide wilderness of life for nought; It is not for a shadow I have fought, It is not empty silence I implore : But, drawing closer to death's threshing-floor I feel that I have been divinely taught, I feel that I shall find what I have sought, And knocking—Love will open me a door.

I have not lain amid the reeds and lilies Nor played the satyr to the pipes of Pan, Nor was I dower'd like that seraphic man Who sang of Eden and of outcast Eve— The wrath of some celestial Achilles Whom all admire, but in whom none believe ! O STRONG as Samson, blind as Scio's bard ! Sun-smitten eagle of the sacred hill Soaring alone and unapproachable !---My dreaming eyes are fixed on Love's regard : Like her who broke the box of pistic nard Over her Master as He sat at meat ; While others murmur'd--she, at Love's own feet Won by devotion her unique reward.

The triumph is not always to the swift, Nor to the strong; there is an inner soul Of vision which is hidden from the wise: But it was ever the world's common drift To make My House a house of merchandise And shout Hozanna—to the ass's foal.

II.

VALEDICTORY.

THE blackbird with his crocus-coloured bill Pipes from a woolly spray of willow-palm; Upon the fading double daffodil A glory falls:—How exquisitely calm The air is in my April garden now, While from the shower-drenched border steals the balm

Of wall-flower; and the windless heavens glow More golden than the sun-kissed apricot: And yonder cowslip-cloudlet seems to know The way they went, and say, 'Forget them not:'---For a little while this pillory of the flesh Seems to be lifted, and my garden-plot Transfigured shines so dewy-sweet and fresh, The flowers seem shadows of celestial things; And I, escaped from earth's entangling mesh Sing, happy as the bird that trusts his wings!

Far off I hear the village vesper bell: To-night is Easter Eve that ever brings

Faith which transcends the anguish of farewell :---Two have I loved, and both have passed from sight, And both are with me now, invisible, Walking upon my left hand and and my right; Although my ears are dull, and I am blind, I feel that they are near me now to-night; And they have come, I doubt not, to remind My drooping heart of that not distant day When I too shall have cast my cloak behind : Dear children of the Sun, can ye not stay A little longer ?---Till my task is done (Ye whisper) that I have but to obey And to endure :---

Ah! whither have ye flown? Angels of twilight !--leave me not so soon.

WORKS BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

	S. 1	d.
"SHORT POEMS" (Blackwell) 1907 net	I	0
"ANDREA AND OTHER POEMS" (Blackwell) 1908 net	: I	0
Copies of the following (out of print) may be h	ad dire	ct
from the author :—
"THE MAN OF KERIOTH " (Grant Richards) 1901	I 5	6
"CHARMIDES" (1st edition, Blackwell) 1898	2	0
"THE RECONCILIATION " (J. W. Arrowsmith) 1894	F 3	0
"POEMS, DRAMATIC AND DEMOCRATIC" (Elliot	t
Stock) 1893	5	6

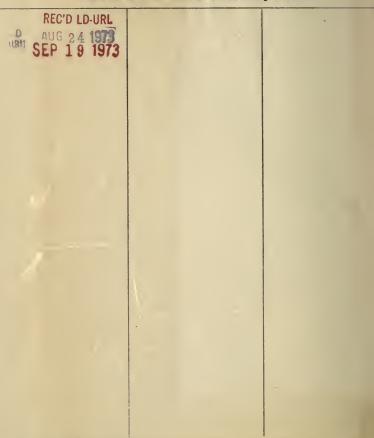

GASCOIGNE MACKIE, Hordle, Hampshire.

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY Los Angeles

This book is DUE on the last date stamped below.

Form L9-17m-8,'55 (B3339s4)444

