"Your lordship has fairly won the day," said King Frederick, holding out his hand to the English Admiral; "but I trust you will give us Danes the credit of having done our best to beat you."

"Your Majesty's sailors have done all that the bravest men could do," answered Nelson, heartily. "The French fight well, but they could not have borne for one hour the fire which your brave fellows bore without flinching for nearly five. I have been in a hundred and five battles, but this last was the hardest of all."

Here the Admiral stopped suddenly, cast a keen glance into the crowd, and then sprang forward and seized by the hand a young Danish midshipman—no other, in fact, than our friend Villimves.

"Glad to see you again, my brave boy; you're an honor to your flag. Your Majesty, if I were in your place, I'd make this young fellow an admiral on the spot."

"My lord," replied Frederick, bowing, with a glow of pleasure on his handsome face, "if I were to make all my brave officers admirals, I should not have a single captain or lieutenant in my service."

But although the King did not make Villimves an admiral, he made him a lieutenant that very day; and in after-years the young middy became one of the foremost men in the whole Danish navy.

DOROTHY, THE FISHER GIRL.

FAR away on the northern coast of Scotland there is a little fishing village where the simple people spend very quiet lives. The girls are hardy and brave, and work as steadily as the boys. When the boats come in with their store of fish the women are on the beach to meet them, and they help in hauling the boats to land, and then carry the baskets with their glittering freight to the carts which are waiting to receive them.

Dorothy was a brown-cheeked lass, with nothing to distinguish her from her companions.

One evening last summer every boat in Dorothy's hamlet had gone to sea. Not a man was left in the settlement except three very infirm and aged fishermen, long past work.

In the night there came a southerly gale with a southerly sea, and the boats could not return. They found a harbor in a village about eighteen miles to the north.

The sea grew blacker and blacker. Great clouds of foam flew before the wind, dashed against the houses, and skimmed away into the distant fields. The sound of the wind was like the low rolling of fire-arms, and the waves as they broke among the rocks seemed to shake the ground.

When the tempest was at its worst a little schooner was seen coming around the point, and unfortunately hugging the rocks. To the horror of the breathless watchers in the village she presently struck. Her crew were seen clinging to the rigging.

There was no chance of getting a boat to her, and the helpless villagers stood on the shore, expecting to see her go to pieces, and the men drown before their eyes.

"Will she last for an hour?" cried Dorothy. "If I thoct she would hing there, I'd be away for the life-boat."

"You can never cross the burn," said the old men.

Four miles south there was a village where a life-boat was kept. Half way there was a stream, usually shallow, which ran into the sea, and over which was a rude plank bridge.

"I'll a'way!" said Dorothy. Over the moor she ran for a mile in the teeth of the storm. The second mile was still harder, for she had to splash through the foam, and the great waves might have dragged her off her feet.

At the mouth of the burn, or stream, her brave heart failed for a moment. There was no guessing at its depth as it rushed along, swollen and angry. In she plunged, the water up to her waist, and once she stumbled in a hole and fell, but struggled to her feet again.

Then the water grew deeper. Stretching out her arms, Dorothy battled with the current, and, half wading, half swimming, she reached the hard ground.

Wet to the neck, and her hair dripping, she fought her way on till she reached the house where the coekswain of the life-boat lived.

"The schooner! On the Letch! Norrad!" she gasped.

"Here, wife, look after the lass," cried the man, as he ran for his boat. Poor brave Dorothy! Her part of the work done, she had fainted. But the life-boat went northward round the point, reached the schooner in time, and saved all on board, except the Captain, who had been washed away.

OUR CONCERT.

BY JIMMY BROWN.

THERE is one good thing about Sue, if she is a girl: she is real charitable, and is all the time getting people to give money to missionaries and things. She collected monahundred dollars from ever so many people last year, and sent it to a society, and her name was in all the papers as "Miss Susan Brown," the young lady that gave a hundred dollars to a noble cause and may others go and do likewise.

About a month ago she began to get up a concert for a noble object. I forget what the object was, for Sue didn't make up her mind about it until a day or two before the concert; but whatever it was, it didn't get much money.

Sue was to sing in the concert, and Mr. Travers was to sing, and father was to read something, and the Sunday-school was to sing, and the brass band was to play lots of things. Mr. Travers was real good about it, and attended to engaging the brass band, and getting the tickets printed.

We've got a first-rate band. You just ought to hear and when I heard them coming I sat up as quiet as possible, and never said anything about what I had done, because we never should praise ourselves or seem to be proud of our own work.

Now I solemnly say that I never meant to do any harm. All I meant to do was to improve the music that the man who wrote it had been too lazy to finish. Why, in some of those pieces of music there were places three or four inches long without a single note, and you can't tell me that was right. But I sometimes think there is no use in trying to help people as I tried to help our brass band. People are never grateful, and they always manage to blame a boy, no matter how good he is. I shall try, however, not to give way to these feelings, but to keep on doing right no matter what happens.

The next night we had the concert, or at any rate we tried to have it. The Town-hall was full of people, and Sue said it did seem hard that so much money as the people had paid to come to the concert should all have to go to charity when she really needed a new seal-skin coat. The performance was to begin with a song by Sue, and the band was to play just like a piano while she was singing. The song was all about being so weary and longing so hard to die, and Sue was singing it like anything, when all of a sudden the man with the big drum hit it a most awful bang, and nearly frightened everybody to death.

People laughed out loud, and Sue could hardly go on with her song. But she took a fresh start, and got along pretty well till the big drum broke out again, and the man hammered away at it till the leader went and took his drumstick away from him. The people just howled and yelled, and Sue burst out crying and went right off the stage and longed to die in real earnest.

When things got a little bit quiet, and the man who played the drum had made it up with the leader, the band began to play something on its own account.

It began all right, but it didn't finish the way it was meant to finish. First one player and then another would blow a loud note in the wrong place, and the leader would hammer on his music-stand, and the people would laugh themselves 'most sick. After a while the band came to a place where the trombones seemed to get crazy, and the leader just jumped up and knocked the trombone-player down with a big horn that he snatched from another man. Then somebody hit the leader with a cornet and knocked him into the big drum, and there was the awfulest fight you ever saw till somebody turned out the gas.

There wasn't any more concert that night, and the people all got their money back, and now Mr. Travers and the leader of the band have offered a reward for "the person who maliciously altered the music" that's what the notice says. But I wasn't malicious, and I do hope nobody will find out I did it, though I mean to tell father about it as soon as he gets over having his nose pretty near broke by trying to interfere between the trombone-player and the man with the French horn.

"THERE WAS THE AWFULEST FIGHT YOU' EVER SAW"

it once. I'm going to join it some day, and play on the drum; that is, if they don't find out about the mistake I made with the music.

When Mr. Travers went to see the leader of the band to settle what music was to be played at the concert he let me go with him. The man was awfully polite, and he showed Mr. Travers great stacks of music for him to select from. After a while he proposed to go and see a man somewheres who played in the band, and they left me to wait until they came back.

I had nothing to do, so I looked at the music. The notes were all made with a pen and ink, and pretty bad they were. I should have been ashamed if I had made them. Just to prove that I could have done it better than the man who did do it, I took a pen and ink and tried it. I made beautiful notes, and as a great many of the pieces of music weren't half full of notes, I just filled in the places where there weren't any notes. I don't know how long Mr. Travers and the leader of the band were gone, but I was so busy that I did not miss them.

THE Postmistress thanks the writer of the letter which follows, not only for his kind reference to herself, but for his appreciation of the little correspondents whose busy pens make this department of YOUR PEOPLE so interesting and popular. Every week their letters, merry or thoughtful, as may be, help to give us glimpses of child-life all over our happy country. Sometimes we have letters from young Americans abroad, and occasionally the boys and girls of other lands send us pleasant messages. Fathers, mothers, and teachers frequently slip their kind notices to YOUR PEOPLE, and their approval of ours by writing to the Post-office Box. Paper is the representative of numbers whose praise is well worth having, and gives us real encouragement:

NEW YORK CITY.

Will the Postmistress of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE permit the father of one of her young addressees to heartily thank her for the manner and method of her work? The good, healthy tone of the letters and your comments, and the bringing together children of all classes and all sections of the country so intimately, are doing more than could be done in any other way to make all who now look on you as their friend good, wholesome American young women and men.

It is to work their minds, to give them rest and amusement it affords, is educating a generation and acting as an antidote to the less healthy tone of society in our larger cities. With my best wishes, I remain, very gratefully yours,

PATER.

AVONDALE, OHIO.

You say you want somebody who makes pets of chickens to write to. I have a hen named Tip. One day she saw him standing on the lawn, hungry and wet, about as big as a partridge, a lost chicken, and we took him in. He is now a great Shanghai rooster about two feet tall. She told us he had been a hen crooked, and he can only eat corn wrapped in dough. He lived in the kitchen, and Mary the cook called him Tiny, because he was so small. He is a great talker, and talks now in a very loud way. When he wants to get into the house he knocks at the door with his great big foot.

I have other chickens that are pets, and I have a dog and two pet pigs. They are the jolliest pets I ever had.

I have read YOUR PEOPLE every week for three years. I am eleven years old, and go to a fine school, and love to study.

GUY S.

SALISBURY, MASSACHUSETTS.

I like to read the letters in the Post-office Box. I am ten years old, and I have a sister who is twelve. We both like to read. For pets we have a cat and two birds—one named Bonbon, and the other Peep. We also have a horse named Bessie, and a dog named Bob. When they were chickens we petted them so much that they became quite tame. One of them, named Nigger, hops on my shoulder, and lets me take him up in my arms. Another one has laid an egg in the horse's ear. Our hen's name is Tabby. She likes to play with hens, and often goes to sleep in the hens' nests.

My home here at Salisbury is only a mile and a half from the residence of John G. Whittier, in Amesbury, and only half a mile from that of Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford.

LIZZIE M. W.

I was once the possessor of a dozen chickens which were as great pets as yours are, Lizzie. One of them, a brave creature, in a sober brown suit, we called My Lady Water-proof, because she stalked about like a lady in a water-proof cloak. Another was Miss Betsey, and another still was named by one of my children after a deity, but I did not detect the name of the family, and always named it after the name Mrs. —. I did not approve of this at all, and when the true Mrs. — happened to visit us, great was my terror lest she should happen to have her funny namesake presented to her, which would have been a great pity, so I changed Mrs. — to Little Dumpling.

PENFIELD, PENNSYLVANIA.

We have all the numbers of YOUR PEOPLE, and like the paper very much. I have had a dog pet hen that was almost eight years old. I began to make a pet of her when I was about twenty months old, and then I called her by the name she made when singing, and that name gradually changed to Wawa. She was a speckled black and white Houdan, and so muffled around the face that mamma had to clip the feathers so she could see to eat. She was so nice and pretty and lippy. She would sing while I held her in my arms. She used to coax the other hens' little chickens away from them, and scratch for them, and would hover them if they would let her. When we moved from Weedville, Elk County, Pa., I took her to my father's place, and she laid a corn about a month ago, and I feel as if I can never find another hen so nice. We made a party for me—

Eddie says don't tell you he cried. There was more than one sorrowful heart when we lost poor old Wawa.

EDDIE'S MAMMA.

Dear Eddie, it was no wonder you cried. I would have cried with you if I had loved the gentle hen as you did.

MARIBETH, PENNSYLVANIA.

I won't tell you how old I am, but will say that I was born on the 28th of September, 1873. I have been reading HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for some time, and look anxiously for every number. When I am asked to look at the paper, I am finding it all the cuts on the last page always make me laugh heartily.

I have four brothers and two dogs—a Newfoundland and a terrier. The big dog I call Ponto, and the little one Tip. Ponto is trained to draw a small wagon, and will pull me any place that I desire. He never gets balky. Some time ago I had lots of fun racing with my friend Harry. Our horses were named Sam and Jimmie, and I and H. would like to drive Ponto, but they are afraid that the girls would not think that manner. They ride horseback on old George and Prince. Our horses are named Sam and Jimmie, and they are broken. I go to school every day when I am well, and would like to tell you what I study, but my letter is getting too long.

GOOD-BYE.

GEORGE H.

You are studying penmanship to advantage. You write a hand which is a credit to yourself and your teachers, and a great pleasure to read.

BRYAN ROGER, LOUISIANA.

The weather here is warm and pleasant, and we have violets and roses in bloom. I have a little garden with lettuce, onions, radishes, and flowers. I work in the garden to-day, and Aunt Mary bought us a little express wagon to haul leaves. Our dog's name is Josephus.

I like "Nan" so much, and Jimmy Brown. Jimmy's papa must get tired of taking him up stairs.

GOOD-BYE.

ARTHUR B.

ORRELL, ILLINOIS.

I read "Raising the Pearl" in the last paper. When my father was in Tampa, Florida, he went to Cuba, and saw a young Bassett, or fish, as it is called, exactly as described in the story, very cross, and with only one leg. He owns a great many boats. When papa asked for some oysters his papa said, "You are going to put them?"

"Then he said, 'Do you want some crackers with them?'"

"Yes," was the answer. So my father went in and got some oysters, and Captain Sammy must not take any pay for them.

ROBERT A.

Captain Sammy must be polite and kind, notwithstanding his gruff manner.

PORTSMOUTH, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

I could write to you about many pets of mine, but I don't feel rather tired, so for a while I will let my friend who has visited me every week for a long time, and whose visits have been such a pleasant anticipation—"this dear little girl, whom I love, will come no more. I shall miss her very much. I think you know her; her name is Nan. Regrettably yours,

GRACE G.

I too felt a pang when Nan made her courtesy. We shall have to coax the author to tell us more about her one of these days, unless, indeed, she can point us another graceful girlie who shall steal into our hearts as Nan did.

Let me describe a Friday in my school-room; and when you have read my letter, then, children, let me tell you what makes it such a happy one on that day. I think I shall hear you say, "Our paper—HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE." I fear you will not see the first cause, for children too often grasp only the outward appearance, overlooking the inward principle which lead to outward happiness; so I will tell you my rule to encourage obedience and diligence. It is this: when lessons have been fairly done, I shall miss my moment during the week. HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE visits the school-room in a manner which I will now describe.

"Ding-dong! ding-dong! sounds our great college bell. We go to the chapel. Perfect order prevails, except that here and there a very close observer might see a sly nod from Bill to Tom, and from Tom to Dick. We then go to our seats.

I enter mine. Faces are beaming as I pass down to my place of importance. The verbs are nicely conjugated in all their parts, and pronouns declined neatly on the board. (And let me tell you a secret: afterward and there are the compound personal favorite pronouns with me for such exercise; I do not wish my young people to be saving attracted, drowned, and hiccoughed. Now for the first time, "The Great Line," by Josephine Pollard, and when I come to

"Jim delighted in games and ball.

"And his mind was not in his books at all."

I can not refrain from a glance at a fat boy we will call Dickson. I think the author would be gratified to see the reddening face go down, and the eyes

Bright Thomas then goes to the board, and writes,

"On your eyes he presses poppies,

"On your will he puts a brick," etc.

My class is ready for a parsing match. Fat Dickson insists that you are pressing on poppies instead of eyes. So girls head. Fat boy Peter, out of humor, pretends he can not say the rule for adverbs. Ding-dong! ding-dong! An hour has passed so nicely! Girls have won; consequently excused from class-room first. Boys look severely at Dickson and Peter.

Here enters Geography No. 3 in fine order; lesson well recited. Then a short lesson distinctly read, for this is my turn to recite. Now do you think I read to them?—Mr. Thompson and the Bats? I wish you could see Bessie, Lizzie, Rebecca, Wash, and all the bright faces; and when Mr. Thompson trends on Mrs. Rodemich's call, Charlie, my new friend, from the country, laughs so loud that if our president were not so good and wise he would have me before the faculty for disorder. But we will excuse Charlie; he will soon learn how to laugh. Ding-dong! Recess. They crowd around to see the picture of Mr. Thompson and the other rats.

I will not trouble you with the dignified young ladies who are here to-day to recite more difficult lessons, but carefully by aside "The Sad Story of a Boy King" for my Little history class.

Do not, dear young people, let your parents think you have no time on your hands for this my method, and have to lose English history authority for it, as I may prove to you some day by writing to you my Roger Ascham, Queen Elizabeth's tutor, and what he says about it.

With love for the young all over the world, and especially HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE,

SISTER FLORENCE.

The Postmistress knows, although you do not, in what city of the sunny south Sister Florence assembles her class for these delightful Friday exercises. She is sure that there are many teachers who find YOUR PEOPLE helpful, and she is glad that the school-days of some of you are made so bright and pleasant. Sister Florence has contributed a charming letter to this number of the Post-office Box, and we all join in thanking her.

FORT WASHINGTON, STATES ISLAND.

I am a little girl eleven years old. I like the story of "Nan" very much, and Jimmy Brown's stories in YOUR PEOPLE very much, and this is the first winter I have ever been North.

NELLY W. C.

I suppose you enjoyed the winter sports, as they were quite new to you.

SPASSY RIVER, ONTARIO.

I have always lived in Bay City, Michigan, until this winter, when we came up here, and now I am building a mill. I was on snow-shoes yesterday for the first time. I went too fast, so I fell down. I think it is fun to walk on them. There are a great many people here now, before the snow came, there was some lovely snow.

The mail comes once a week on sleighs drawn by dogs. I am always glad when it comes, as it brings me news from my friends. I would like to be a member of the Little Housekeeper's Society. I am twelve years old.

ADA E. M.

WELLSVILLE, NEW YORK.

My grandfather has taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for me since the first publication. I think it is the best paper for the young folks that is published. I think "Old Times in the Colonies," "The Cruise of the 'Gambol' Club," and "The Talking Leaves" are very nice stories, and Jimmy Brown's stories are very funny. As I have no pets, I will tell you about the oil tanks near this place, which are built by the Standard Oil Company. The tanks are made of plate iron about one-third of an inch thick, each plate being about four feet wide and eight or ten feet long. The tanks are thirty-three feet high and ninety feet in diameter, and are each capable of holding about thirty-six thousand barrels of oil. There have been a great many of these tanks built, and others are building. Three hundred men are employed in building them, and thirty thousand feet of lumber are used for scaffolding, and for the construction. The tanks are situated at what is called the Pump Station, there being two large buildings, one of them five large arches, and the other two immense pumps for forcing the oil

A FIRST-OF-APRIL JOKE.
MUCH FUNNIER THAN SHE KNEW.

AN APRIL-FOOLS'-DAY GAME.

A new game and a new friend,
To pleasure and happiness tend.

AND so the following game may prove pleasant and entertaining, not only to the little folk, but to their elders, who are said to enjoy "a bit of nonsense now and then."

There is one peculiarity about this game, however, and that is, it can only be played once among the same people. The leader announces himself as a gardener who is about to arrange his garden. He must of necessity be some person who can control his features. The gardener stands at the door, before he goes out, long enough to invite those who are in the room to come out one by one as quickly as possible to receive the name of some one of his garden products. He is very careful to impress upon all the necessity of keeping secret the names which they have received. Of course they all think that some new mystery is to be unfolded; but, without any one's knowledge, all are given the name of the same vegetable.

For instance, as each one goes out to receive his name from the gardener, the latter says, "You'll be carrots, will you?" "Yes." "Thank you." "Carrots"—all of them are carrots. The gardener stands at the open room door, and says, "Now, as I mention a vegetable, the person whose name it is must instantly rise and follow me out of the room." Then the gardener calls, "Carrots!" Of course there is a general stampede, which is most laughable. Every one thinks all the others are making a mistake, and the fun increases when each discovers the trick. It is a good game for an April party, especially if the "carrots" or "beets" are all led to a supper of cotton pies and wooden ducks and turkey.

SOME KNOWING PIGEONS.

THE Central Prison at Agra is the roosting-place of great numbers of the common blue pigeon; they fly out to the neighboring country for food every morning, and return in the evening, when they drink at a tank just outside the prison walls. In this tank are a large number of fresh-water turtles.

Any bird alighting to drink near one of these turtles has a good chance of having its head bitten off and eaten; and the headless bodies of pigeons have been picked up near the water, showing the fate which has sometimes befallen the birds. The pigeons, however, are aware of the danger, and have hit on the following plan to escape it:

A pigeon comes in from its long flight, and as it nears the tank will cross it at about twenty feet above its surface, and then fly back to the side from which it came, as if to select a safe spot which it had remarked as it flew over the bank. But even then the bird will not alight at the edge of the water, but on the bank about a yard from it, and will then run down, take two or three hurried gulps, and fly off to repeat the same process at another part of the tank, until its thirst is satisfied. In this way they escape the danger that lies in wait for them.

A FLAG OF TRUCE.

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

UNDER the ground the spring flowers were waiting—
Hyacinths rosy and yellow and blue;
Tulips in gayest robes fit for a king or queen;
Golden narcissus, and silver ones too;
Pretty bright crocuses; dear little lily bells
Strung upon slender stems, longing to ring;
Iris with banners of lilac and purple
Ready to wave at the coming of Spring.

But still a winter wind blew cold above them,
Still from a winter sky fast fell the snow.
"Oh, will he never," they murmured, while shivering,
"Weary of scolding and fighting, and go?
He's had his own way for three months long and dreary;
Now it is time he should let us have ours.
Nought have we done to be punished thus; children
Sometimes are naughty, but never are flowers."

"I'll plead our cause," said a snow-drop. "Pray hasten,
Green leaves, before me to show me the way;
And I will carry a flag of truce with me,
And then he in honor must bear what I'll say."
But Winter, spying the tiny flag coming,
Borne by a herald not half a foot high,
Shattered his spear of ice, crying, "Ye pigmies, Fear me no longer; I'm going. Good-by."

"THIS IS VERY FINE WEATHER." "SO SAY WE ALL OF US."

THE "TEARERS" TRIAL TRIP.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JR.

FOSTER BRETT, Chandler Henry, and Andy Steadworth were three friends who were often called "railroad boys," because their fathers were all connected in some way with the Prairie Railroad. They had passes for all trains, and each knew the name of every locomotive that ran in and out of Prairie Junction.

Foster, or Fos for short, had a good share of the mechanical genius of Civil Engineer Brett, and was always puzzling over how he could invent some improvement in something that would make him rich and famous. So he was greatly delighted when one summer his father gave him a small hand-car, which had been half smashed in an accident, to use his wits upon.

"But what can you make out of it except another hand-car?" asked Chandler, as he looked at the ruin with some contempt.

"If I'm going to invent something new, what do I want with any of the old things?" and Fos began to measure the length and breadth of the car in a very business-like fashion.

The two boys watched his movements with a growing interest, and when the young inventor put up his rule and inquired if they could keep a secret, they both placed their hands upon their hearts as a sign that they could lock up a hundred if need be.

"Well, then," continued Fos, after making sure that there was no one in the round-house, by the side of which his car had been placed, "I'm going to rig up a sail-boat!"

"With the nearest river twenty miles away?"

"For no river at all," returned Fos. "That wouldn't be an invention, would it? No, it's something that's never been tried before. I'm pretty certain, and it's just this: if you'll both help me I mean to put a sail on this car."

"But you can only go the way the wind blows," objected Chandler. "so how do you propose to get back to your starting-point? Do you expect the wind to change to suit you every time?"

"Now, there," cried Fos, "I'm glad to hear you talk like that, because, you know, all the great inventors were laughed at at first, so I guess my idea must be worth something."

This had its effect, and both Andy and Chandler listened more seriously as their companion went on to tell how once when some professor proposed to cross the Atlantic Ocean to Europe in a balloon by means of an easterly current of air, there was the same objection about his getting back.

"But didn't he get people to make him a balloon," went on Fos, "and wasn't the thing talked about in the papers, and he had his picture published?"

"And came down in the woods before he even got to the coast," finished Chandler.

"But that was because it was a balloon," returned Fos, quickly. "If I can sail with the wind, I'm not afraid but I can manage so as to come back again; but even if I can't it'll be a great thing to prove that cars can be moved by means of sails, so they can put them on the regular trains, when the wind favors, and make them go twice as fast."

Chandler was privately of the opinion that such an arrangement would prove fatal to all time-tables, and was just going to inquire how people would know when to expect a train, when Andy suddenly exclaimed: "We've got a sail at home that you can have if you want it, Fos. We had it on our boat when we lived East, and brought it out here thinking it might be useful for something or other, but I heard father say when they came across it in cleaning the house that he didn't want it. It's all mildewed and full of holes, but I guess it will do for a trial."

"Jolly!" cried Fos. "That'll save a lot of trouble in begging for old sheets. And now, Chandler, bring your tool chest over to the grove behind our house after dinner, and we'll set to work mending the platform and making a place for the mast. We can let it down a foot or two underneath, you know, and brace it with strips. Has your sail got a boom, Andy?"

"No, and if you take my advice, you won't have any, for it'll be sure to come flying around suddenly and knock one of us over."

"Well, I suppose it'll do if I just fasten the sheet to a cleat. I think I've seen some big boats fixed that way around the docks in New York."

"What'll we do for a mast?" asked Chandler.

"Oh, we can take the flag-pole we put up for the Fourth for that," replied Fos. "You know it's in the grove there, nice and handy. And now be careful, both of you, not to say a word about it to anybody until after we have the trial trip."

"All right," returned Chandler; and then the three went their several ways for dinner, to meet again in the grove in which that year's Fourth of July celebration had been held. A seldom used siding of the railroad ran through it, and on this Andy and Fos had pushed the hand-car, after having placed on it the old sail, which Mrs. Steadworth declared she was glad to have out of the house.

The first thing to be done was to take down the flag-pole, which was not quite so easy a task as Fos had thought. However, it was finally done without accident, and then "the captain" declared that three feet must be sawed off from the lower end. Andy manfully straightened out the sail, while Fos patched up the platform of the car, not forgetting to leave a hole for the mast. Next came the fastening of the sail (which luckily was of the "leg-o-mutton" style) to the pole. This was done in a very unseamanlike fashion by means of bits of rope.

The mast, with the sail added to it, was pretty heavy, but the three at last succeeded in lifting it into position; and then, while Fos and Andy held it, Chandler made it fast by means of the flooring and two or three braces.

All this took time, and as the last nail was being driven the Bretts' supper bell rang.

"I don't believe anybody'll notice that mast in here to-night," said Fos, as he wound the sail around the pole; "and if there's a breeze, remember we're to start on our trial trip at five o'clock to-morrow morning. There's no train till seven, so we'll have a clear track. My, won't she tear along!"

"Let's name her the 'Tearer,'" suggested Andy, catching the delight of his friend.

"Good!" cried Fos; "I'll paint it in red letters on a piece of board to-night."

The last thing before going to bed that night the three boys put their heads out of the window to see about the state of the weather, and long before five the next morning they were up, dressed, and wending their way against half a gale of wind toward the grove.

Foster, of course, was the first one there, and when the other two arrived he pointed proudly to a piece of shingle nailed to the front of the hand-car, on which was painted in rustic lettering the word

GET ABOARD

"Get aboard," he cried, excitedly. "The sooner we're off the better."

"But how are we going to get back?" inquired Chandler, as he somewhat doubtfully took his place on the car.

"Oh, it's just a trial trip, you know; so we needn't go so far that it'll hurt us to push her back. But isn't it fine to have such a glorious breeze, and exactly in the right direction, too? It'll take us right on to the main track."

The wind was certainly all that could be desired, and as they loosened the sail, Andy and Chandler began to grow as excited as Fos.

"Now each of you put out a foot and give her a start," ordered the latter, when all was ready. "One, two, three—go!"

And go they did, for the three had shoved with all their might, determined to have a splendid "send-off," if nothing more. Out of the grove, on past the round house and the now quiet station, glided the queer-looking boat-car; but it made no noise, so nobody saw it except its three builders and passengers.

"But just wait till we get out into the open country," exclaimed the delighted Fos, "then you'll see her earn her name."

"Are you sure the track's all clear?" asked Andy, nervously, as the "Tearer" jolted from the siding on to the main line.

"Why, what could be on it at this hour?" returned Fos, as he caught hold of the sheet to feel how taut it was.

"Seems to me we're running pretty fast, Fos," remarked Chandler from his post as lookout before the mast.

"Certainly we are, and that's the fun, and business too, of the thing," replied the young captain, smiling contentedly.

"We've gone over a mile already, I guess," added Chandler, as if he had been counting up the number of them he would have to walk back.

Then nobody spoke for a few minutes, while the hand-car sped along faster and faster, for the same question had suddenly come into the minds of all three: how could they stop the "Tearer"? There was no brake, and they had nothing with them that could be used in place of one.

Chandler was the first to break the silence.

"The morning express is due at the Junction at seven, isn't it, Fos?" Then without waiting for an answer, he pulled out his watch, and went on: "It's half past five now, and we're running to meet it."

Andy was looking anxiously from one to the other of the older lads, and they in turn kept their eyes fixed on the sail, in which there was still no sign of a crease.

Suddenly Fos sprang toward the sheet, crying, "What goes we are! Why don't we let our sail loose?" and he began fumbling at the knot; but the great strain had drawn it so tight that it was impossible to nudge it.

"Quick! Andy! Chandler!" he exclaimed—"one of you give me a knife. I must have left mine in the wood-shop when I was cutting that name-board."

Andy had lost his the week before. Chandler, however, had one, which he hastily handed to Fos, but the car was now jolting so violently, and Foster's hand shook so, that just as he was about to cut the rope the knife slipped from his fingers, fell beside the track, and was soon left far behind.

The boys looked at one another blankly after this, until at last Chandler took out his watch again.

"Do you think it would be safe for us to jump off?" was all he said when he had noted the time.

Fos shook his head. "We must stop it and get it off the track some way," he added.

"But don't you suppose the engineer of the express will see us in time?" faltered Andy.

"And what if he should? he couldn't stop us, could he?" And Fos buried his face in his hands, as he tried to think of some means of putting an end to the "Tearer's" wild flight.

"Can't we break the rope?" suggested Chandler.

Then all three, at the risk of falling off, used all their strength to this end, but the sheet held fast, and the wind still showed no signs of falling.

They had already whizzed by two or three stations, but it was so early in the morning that no one had noticed them. There was no large town nearer than thirty miles, and before that distance could be covered they would meet the express.

On and on they went, and they looked at each other in silence, for no one of them had the heart to speak a word. Faster and faster they flew, not only toward what might be death to them, but what might also result in the destruction of the coming train.

Every moment they expected to hear a whistle, and see the black form of the locomotive as it rushed to meet them. How vainly now did Foster regret that he had made such a secret of his experiment. It seemed as if he must have felt that his father would have forbidden it.

But stop, what does this mean? The wind was blowing as steadily as before, the track was as level, but the speed of the car was surely slackening.

"Oh, the curve!" exclaimed Chandler.

They had all forgotten about that, and the "Tearer" had gone around it, and was now slowing up, for the wind struck it from the side.

Very soon the boys were enabled to bring their runaway boat-car to a stand-still, and then as quickly as possible, and with an utter disregard for the mast, they tipped it up, the wind helping them, and had it just clear of the rails when the express came rushing by. Then they walked three miles to the nearest station, and waited two hours for a way-train, on which they meekly rode home.

The "Tearer" was brought back that afternoon on a freight train, but her trial trip was the only one she ever made.

AN EXTINCT SEA-COW.

BY HELEN S. CONANT.

ON a bleak day in November, 1741, more than one hundred and forty years ago, a Russian ship which had been driven through icy seas at the mercy of winds and waves, came to a small harbor on an unknown and rock-bound coast.

On board the ship was the arctic explorer Behring, who on a previous voyage had discovered the strait which separates Asia from America, and which bears his name. Many of the men who were with Captain Behring were sick and dying, and any harbor was welcome. Although not a tree or shrub of any kind could be seen on the desolate shore, the barren rocks and sand heaps were better than the stormy sea.

After anchoring the vessel those of the crew who were strongest went on shore. They found a stream of fresh-water which was not yet frozen over, although the sides of the mountains were covered with snow. Along the banks of this stream the men made hollows in the sand which they roofed over with sails brought from the ship, and to these rude shelters they removed their sick companions.

The cold grew more bitter every day, and many of the sick men died from want of proper food and care. On the 8th of December the party had the misfortune to lose its commander, Captain Behring. He died after great suffering, and was buried on the desolate shore.

Not long after his death a great storm arose, and the vessel, the only means of escape of these poor sailors, was wrecked upon the rocky coast. There was but a small portion of the ship's provisions remaining, and forty-five men were left with no hope of escape for months to come.

The situation was dreadful, but the men faced it like true heroes. Instead of sitting on the cliffs and watching for a sail, which in those far-off regions might never appear, they at once set to work to see what they could do to help themselves. The first thing to do was to secure all the beams and timbers of the wrecked vessel before another storm could sweep them away.

Happily the carpenter's tools had all been brought on shore, and although three of the Russian carpenters had died, there was a Cossack among the crew who had once worked in a ship-yard, and who was able to direct the building of a new vessel. It was decided to begin the new ship as soon as the snow melted so the men could work, and meanwhile they must discover where they had been cast ashore, and if the land contained anything to support life.

About ten miles from the coast was a high hill, and on climbing to the top the men found that they were on a large island. This island, now known as Behring Island, in honor of its discoverer, who lies buried in its sands, is the most westerly of the Aleutian group, and at the time these poor Russian navigators were cast away on it was uninhabited, except by foxes and other wild animals.

The creature that was to play the most important part in saving the lives and health of these shipwrecked men was a sea-cow. To their great delight they found large herds of these creatures living in the bays and inlets of the rocky shore. They belonged to the same family as the sea-cows which are to be seen all along the Amazons and in swampy coast lands of the West Indies and the Gulf of Mexico, but were much larger than those found in tropical seas. Steller, the naturalist of Captain Behring's expedition, studied their habits carefully during his forced stay on the desolate island, and the creature is now known in natural history as Steller's sea-cow.

It was a very large beast, measuring in length from twenty-eight to thirty-five feet, and weighing over five hundred pounds. In form it was similar to a huge seal or sea-lion, and its fore-flippers were armed with stout nails, with which it tore up the sea-weed and water-grasses which served for its food. These sea-cows were very sociable animals, and lived in large herds like cattle. They lived mostly in the water, but would sometimes crawl on the shore, and sleep for hours and even days among the wet sea-grasses. They were very ugly-looking creatures, and their movements on shore were clumsy and awkward. The head was small, the mouth large; the hide, covered with scattering short stiff hair, lay in great wrinkles all over the huge body.

When the Russian sailors first saw these beasts they were puzzled how to capture one; but starvation was almost upon them, and food must be obtained at any price. The animals were not afraid of men, for they had evidently never seen human beings before, and were not suspicious of evil. At length one was secured by means of a harpoon, and to the great relief of the men the flesh was found to be similar in flavor to beef, while the thick coating of fat with which the creature was covered under its skin was useful as lard.

Good and wholesome food was now abundant, as more sea-cows were captured and killed, and the men went to work to build their ship, their hearts filled with courage and hope. It was slow work, as their materials were poor; but at length a small vessel was completed and successfully launched, and about the middle of August the men set sail from the island where so many of their former comrades were buried. The ship was well supplied with salted and dried sea-cow beef, and after a voyage of eleven days a small port on the coast of Kamutchatka was reached in safety.

But there were sad days in store for the poor and defenseless sea-cows. The escaped sailors told wonderful stories of these creatures, and soon other sailors, especially those in charge of whaling ships, sought out the island, and waged relentless war upon the sea-cows, which proved valuable for their strong stout hides, the nourishing meat, which, salted or dried, would keep for a whole year, and for the immense quantity of fat—an article much valued in the cold countries of the far North. So extensive was the slaughter of the sea-cows that in less than thirty years not a single animal remained.

Many explorers of more recent times have tried in vain to find one of the animals described by Steller; but it seems to be entirely extinct, and the only traces which have been discovered are a few skeletons bleaching on the barren sand.

CHAPTER VI.

THE WRECK.

THE boys were obliged to look several moments in the direction Captain Sammy pointed before they could see anything that looked like a boat, and then they saw dimly in the fast-gathering darkness a small white cloud on the surface of the water, that grew to look more and more like a sail.

Captain Sammy seemed almost beside himself with joy, for in this approaching boat he saw the means of escaping a sharp attack of rheumatism, which he felt he should surely have to endure if he slept in the open air all night.

But the boys looked at this boat which was coming along so merrily under the influence of the strong sea-breeze with far different thoughts. They had counted on this enforced camping out as an adventure which could be told their friends at home as having some tinge of danger in it; but to be rescued before nine o'clock in the evening made it a very tame affair.

On came the little boat, regarded with such opposite feelings by age and youth, until she could be quite clearly seen, although the white sail hid those on board from the view of those on the island.

They could almost hear the water ripple around her bow, and Captain Sammy could keep still no longer.

"Boat ahoy!" he shouted, using both hands for a speaking-trumpet, and making such a noise that he might have been heard half a mile away.

There was no answering hail from those on board the little craft, and while Captain Sammy was wondering why no reply came, the boat luffed up into the wind, presenting to the watchers only the full sail and the bow.

"Why! why!" stammered Captain Sammy, in surprise—"why, that's my boat!"

The boys thought that rather a rash assertion for the little man to make, since it was impossible to see her with sufficient clearness to be sure as to such a fact; but the Captain continued, "That's my boat, sure, for there's the very patch I put on her sail last Wednesday."

In trying to make out this mark, the boys now saw what they had not noticed before. At the mast-head floated something black, which Bobby felt sure was the pirate flag Tommy Tucker had displayed on the oar shortly after he had captured the boat.

It was all very strange, for it did not seem possible that Master Tucker would come to the island, so great had been his fear of Captain Sammy. Besides, now that it was evening, his crew must be on shore, behaving like a peaceful boy again.

But as the boat went slowly ahead, and then came up into the wind, there could be no mistake made. Master Tucker was there, and alone, in all the glory of his gorgeous uniform, while his flag floated proudly over him. He surely had come back, although for what purpose it was impossible even to guess.

At the sight of this boy, whom he had put out of his mind, in order that he might be more contented with his fate, all of Captain Sammy's anger came back with renewed force.

"You villain!" he cried, "come in here this minute, and let me get my hands on you once."

It is hardly possible that Captain Sammy thought Tommy would obey the command, and yet he waited patiently, as if he expected that such would be the case.

"I'm comin' over here in the mornin' to serve you out," cried Tommy, defiantly, to the angry man; "but I've come now to tell them boys that Ikey went up to the hotel an' told that they wouldn't be home to-night."

"Does my mother know where we are?" asked Dare.

"No; he jest told her that you was off with that old heathen, an' wouldn't be home to-night."

"Did he tell her why we couldn't come back?" and Dare grew anxious now.

"Of course he didn't. What kind of a feller do you think I am? If he'd told her that, she'd sent over here to-night, an' I ain't goin' to let Cap'n Sammy get away till I've fixed him out so's he'll be sorry he ever took his leg to me."

"I'll beat the whole of your miserable body with it," roared Captain Sammy; and he started to take off his leg again, but remembering his former mishap, he shook his fist instead.

"Will you come in here and take us off?" he shouted.

"No, I won't," was the pirate's defiant reply. "If them fellers want to go home, I'll carry 'em over, provided they'll tie you hand an' foot, an' let me pound you as much as I want to first."

Under other circumstances it would have been impossible for the boys to have restrained their laughter at the very comical appearance of Captain Sammy; but now it seemed all too serious for mirth.

He ran along on the beach first this way and then that, shaking his fists at the small boy in the boat, and acting in every way as if his anger had made him lose his senses.

"Will you do what I want you to?" asked Tommy, clearly speaking of the capture of the Captain.

"We can't do that," replied Dare; "but we'll do almost anything else you want us to, if you will take us home."

"I'll never take you away if you don't tie the old heathen;" and from the very decided tone it was easy to understand that Master Tucker expected them to help him to his revenge.

While they had been talking, the wind had been increasing in force, and already had the waves begun to put on their white caps as if preparing for a regular lark. The little boat, lying head to the wind, tossed about like an egg-shell, and Captain Sammy saw that she was being forced slowly but surely toward the beach.

If Tommy could only be induced to remain there long enough, he might be aground before he was aware of the fact.

"Keep talking to him," whispered the Captain to Dare, "an' we may get our hands on him after all."

But it was almost as if Tommy had heard what his enemy had said, for hardly had the words been spoken when he found out his peril, and began to see how he could avoid it.

He got an oar out, and began pulling the boat around so that the sail would fill again. Had he been a better sailor he would not have pulled so long before he attended to the sheet and helm, and this same want of knowledge brought the pirate voyage to a more speedy ending than he had looked for.

He worked at the oar until the wind completely filled the sail, forcing the little craft around suddenly, and bearing her directly on to the sharp reef of coral that showed itself just above the water not more than fifty feet from the main line of the shore, and a little to the right of where the party on the island were standing.

The force of the wind, which was now increasing each moment, sent the boat on toward the sharp coral points, which could pierce her timbers so easily, with a speed that seemed to make Tommy helpless. He made no attempt to remove his boat from the dangerous position in which he had placed her, but clung to the rail, crying for help in the most unpiratical manner.

"Let go your sheets, and put your helm hard down!" shouted Captain Sammy, forgetting, in his eagerness to save the boat, that he was giving advice which, if followed, would enable the thief to escape.

But Master Tucker was past that point where he had any idea of what he should do, or even where he could understand what was said to him.

He remained by the rail, looking at the reef toward which he was being borne, with his boat at the mercy of both wind and waves, that were dashing her on to destruction.

With only one thought, that of trying to save Master Tucker when the final crash came and he was hurled into the water, the three boys, regardless of the wounds caused by the sea-urchins, ran down the beach. Captain Sammy, still shouting his orders to the frightened pirate, followed their example, and all stopped opposite the point toward which the boat was heading.

It was but a few moments before Tommy Tucker's career as a pirate was ended.

Lifted high on a wave larger than the preceding ones, the boat hung for a single instant over the reef below, and then was dashed upon it with a force that shattered every timber, and, fortunately for him, hurled the pirate captain entirely over it, almost upon the beach.

Master Tucker was not at all injured by the fall; but he was terribly frightened at being thus thrown exactly at the feet of the man whom he expected would punish him most severely.

Before the boys could reach him—and they started to his aid at once, fearing lest he was injured by the fall—the disheartened pirate, who had lost both weapons and his gorgeous hat, sprang to his feet, and made all speed toward the centre of the island.

His short voyage, during which he had destroyed nothing more than Captain Sammy's boat and temper, was ended, his craft was a complete wreck upon the little reef, and the pirate himself a prisoner upon the same island to which he had doomed the others.

It was a quick ending to Master Tucker's dream of wickedness, and one that seemed all the more cruel to him since he had never believed that pirates were in the habit of being wrecked.

When his boat first struck the reef, Captain Sammy dashed into the water as if he were going to her rescue, regardless of the rheumatism; but before he had gotten in above his knees he turned around and came back.

He knew from the sound when she struck the reef that she had been injured beyond all hope of mending, and it would be a more than foolish task to attempt to wade out to where she was being torn in pieces by the waves.

"Look out for the oars and sail!" he shouted to the boys, while he watched for the small water cask which he always carried, no matter how short a voyage he was making, in the hope that it would be washed ashore, and thus give them a chance to secure a stock of water.

It was hardly ten minutes, so furious had the waves become and so strong did the wind blow directly toward the land, before the boys had secured three of the oars, and soon after the sail came ashore directly in front of the Captain.

He ordered the boys to drag the canvas up to the camp. As they did so they wondered why he remained there so anxiously when there was no longer a hope that any portion of the boat, save small fragments, could be washed ashore.

But Captain Sammy's watching was at length rewarded, and when he saw the water cask floating heavily on the waves he rushed into them for the second time, and brought it ashore triumphantly.

"It come just in time," he said, gleefully, "for there ain't over an' above half a pint of water in my canteen, and you boys would have wanted a drink pretty soon."

In fact, they began to grow thirsty just as soon as they realized how near they had come to being without any water, and it was not until they had each drunk twice from the cask that they felt satisfied, even though they had not thought of it before.

Captain Sammy spread the wet sail out in front of the fire to dry, and as he sat gazing at it and smoking he felt very much relieved in mind, for now they would at least have a covering over their heads.

It was quite natural that the boys should wonder as to what had become of Tommy Tucker, and Dare proposed that they should go in search of him. But Captain Sammy put an end to any such charitable plan by saying,

"Let him alone, an' in the morning I'll go after him myself, an' then—"

The Captain did not finish the sentence, but his face was very expressive as to what Master Tommy's fate would be when he should have him in his power.

Dare trembled for the misguided pirate until he realized that it would be one thing for Captain Sammy to go after him, and quite another matter to catch him, owing to the matter of legs. But he thought it was cruel to leave Tommy alone on the island all night, even though he had done them so much harm.

"Don't you think we had better try and find him, so that he can sleep with us to-night?" Dare asked. "It won't do any harm, and you can punish him in the morning."

"He wouldn't have a chance to sleep very much if he should dare to show his nose around here to-night," said Captain Sammy, in such a tone that Dare concluded it might perhaps be less painful for Tommy to sleep alone, and anywhere he could find a place, rather than with them.

The boat sail was far from being dry when the little man took it from the fire and spread it over the boughs of the trees as a shelter. But the hour was late, and the Captain anxious that the party under his charge should get to sleep as soon as possible.

But even after the boys were stretched out on the hard sand, and Captain Sammy had laid himself down between them and the fire—as if to keep them from rolling out of bed—sleep did not appear inclined to pay them a visit.

They listened anxiously to each sound, and at every rustling of the leaves they fancied they heard Tommy coming to ask that he might be allowed to share their camp with them.

Then when the time wore on, and every one in the tent save Dare had yielded to slumber, the boy began to grow very nervous and unhappy because of the possible fate of the pirate. He feared lest all kinds of accidents might befall him, until his imagination had pictured so much suffering for Tommy that he attempted to crawl quietly out over Captain Sammy in order to go in search of him.

But it seemed as if the little man slept with one eye open, for no sooner did Dare make the first movement toward getting out than the Captain said, much as if he had not been asleep at all, but had been lying awake reading the boy's thoughts,

"You may put some more wood on the fire; but don't you try to find that Tucker boy, because I shall make it very uncomfortable for him if he comes around here to-night."

So all Dare's kindly impulse resulted in was the rebuilding of the fire, and then he crawled in behind Captain Sammy again, wishing he could know that Tommy was at least safe from bodily harm.

RAISING CANARIES.

BY A. W. ROBERTS.

THIS is the portrait of the little songster that took the prize at the "Exhibition of Canaries, and British and Foreign Birds" recently held in London, England. The little fellow with his golden plumage and musical voice must indeed be a prince among canaries, for he had 793 other birds of his own kind to dispute the prize with him. All honor to him, with his dainty ways, his cunning top-knot, and his rich outbursts of song such as can only come from the free and untroubled heart of a bird!

So far, we have not taken enough interest in birds in this country to have exhibitions especially devoted to them; but that canaries are very popular among us is shown by the fact that during this season sixty thousand of these birds will be brought to this country from Europe, and will join the thousands upon thousands that are already at home in our land. Soon, also, these beautiful songsters will be passing through the most critical period of their lives—the breeding season. Thousands of them will perish from neglect, want of knowledge and experience, and even from too much care on the part of their owners.

Raising canaries is an interesting, instructive, and paying employment for young people. It is very suitable to the girls, as they are usually more painstaking and thoughtful, more delicate and tender in the handling of pets, than boys. Many hints, suggestions, and make-shifts may be offered to a beginner which will prove very useful; still, the successful raising of canaries must depend to a great extent on the knowledge gained by experience.

The modern breeding cage, which is to be the home of the father and mother bird and their little ones, is called a "double cage." It is in reality one long cage divided through the middle by a movable wire partition. In one of these divisions two nest boxes are placed, and the hen bird is allowed to select the nest that pleases her best. The partition is left open, unless the male bird becomes ill-tempered, when it is used to separate him from his family so that he can not injure or annoy them. The cage should be hung in the most quiet and private part of the room. Warm or hot walls should be avoided, or positions where the hot rays of the sun will reach it, though one hour of the cool morning's sunlight will be of advantage. The heat of the room should be very even.

The best nesting boxes are of tin or wire; pasteboard and wooden boxes are very apt to harbor vermin. In order to destroy these little pests when they appear, the so-called "Persian powder" is blown into all parts of the nest, even into the feathers of both the old and young birds, without the least injury to the birds, but with death-dealing effect to their tormentors.

Some breeders remove the old nest and destroy it as soon as the young are out of their shells, and put in its place a hand-made nest. This should be done when the mother bird is away feeding or bathing.

For nest-building many things can be used, such as deers' hair, ravelled-out old sheeting, untarred Manila rope cut into lengths of one inch and picked apart, also fine shavings of tissue-paper, and feathers that have been scalded in hot water. These materials are placed in small quantities against the wires on the outside of the cage, so that the hen and male birds, for they both work on the building of the nest, can reach them. If they were placed on the floor of the cage, they would become soiled and otherwise unfit for nest-building.

In case there are a number of breeding cages in the room, they can be placed one above another, or if placed side by side, they must be divided by partitions of stiff paper, so that the occupants of one cage can not see those of the other cages. The floor of the cage should be thoroughly covered with gravel. A little old lime, broken well up, may now and then be scattered about the bottom of the cage as well as the gravel.

In the way of plain wholesome food for birds that are breeding nothing is better than German rape-seed mixed with a little canary-seed. Bird-seed should be as pure and fresh as possible. See that it is free from dust; sift it well, and keep it in clean, dry jars or pickle-bottles. The hen bird must be well supplied with lime in the form of finely crushed egg-shells and cuttle-fish bone.

As soon as the young birds are out of the shell, the food is changed to hard-boiled egg grated and mixed with an equal part of soaked cracker. During hot weather the cage should be well supplied with greens, such as tender and fresh lettuce, chick-weed, groundsel, or a piece of raw sweet apple. To wean the young birds from their soft food, and that they may learn to feed themselves, nothing is better than carefully washed and soaked rape-seed.

The twelfth or thirteenth day after the laying of the first egg the young birds may be expected. The nest should be looked at every day, for it often happens that a young bird is smothered or otherwise killed, and the necessity of its prompt removal is very great. Should the parents desert their offspring, they are sometimes raised by hand by means of a goose-quill filled with a paste composed of equal parts of hard-boiled egg and grated cracker, to which is added soaked rape-seed that has been rolled on a board to separate the hulls from the meat of the seed. Two or three quillfuls of this paste are fed to the orphans every hour.

The young males begin warbling as soon as they are fledged and can leave the nest. They are then placed in separate and small cages near accomplished singers for their musical education. Their voices improve constantly for eight or nine months.

A bad-tempered, greedy, and vicious young male bird is known as a "growler," and is always to be taken out of the nest and disposed of before he does an injury to his sisters and brothers. The male bird, so long as he behaves himself in the breeding cage, refrains from annoying his mate, feeds her, takes her place on the eggs when she is off, is doing all that can be expected; but as soon as he begins to behave badly it is better to make use at once of the partition to the cage and place him where he can do no mischief.

In case the young birds are not out of their shells, it may be necessary to find the hen bird a mate who will behave better; but as soon as the young are hatched the mother bird will bring them up herself without any help. The mother birds are not always perfection; some are poor nest-builders, or lay their eggs anywhere and everywhere about the cage, or will not lay regularly, as they should, every day; others again will not feed their young, or will peck and pluck out their feathers after killing them; but, as a rule, the female canary is a model of good behavior.

"TAKE CARE, SIR!"

JOHNNIE AND THE CRAB.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

JOHNNIE was lying with his head over the stern of the boat, looking down into the water. He was in no very good humor either, and the reflection of his face on the surface of the creek was a very wrinkled one.

"I don't care," he muttered. "I think mamma might let me take just a little row. It's just as safe as— There's a crab! I wonder if it is a soft one?" he added, interrupting himself. "I'd poke my finger down and see, only if he was hard he'd bite me." And Johnnie leaped further over the stern of the boat, trying to see what the crab was about, till, splash! he went over into the water.

For a moment he was frightened, but soon recovered his self-possession, as the crab remarked, rather crossly, "Do you always make your entrance into company that way?" Johnnie declared he was very sorry, and the crab, somewhat softer, growled, "I s'pose it's all right, but you nearly tumbled on me, and spattered my mouth full of mud."

"I was trying to see if you were soft."

"Oho!" laughed the crab. "And you thought you'd fall on me to find out." And the crab laughed as if he thought it a great joke. Finally he calmed himself, and continued, "No, I ain't soft, but I'm a shedder. Now under here," he continued, lifting a piece of sea-weed, "is a real softie."

"What does he stay under the sea-weed for?"

"On account of the men. Partly because of the toad-fish, and partly because of eels, but mostly on account of the men," replied the crab.

"Do the toad fish bother you much?"

"Awful!" replied the crab, solemnly—"awful! Why, you see, a good-sized toad-fish could swallow me whole. Then the eels bite one's legs off and nibble pieces off of us, so that ain't pleasant."

"I should think not," said Johnnie.

"Now there comes a toad-fish," continued the crab. "He knows I'm hard, and he don't see you." And with a lazy flirt of his speckled tail, the toad-fish vanished round the corner of the dock.

Johnnie breathed freer as the ugly-looking creature disappeared, and proceeded once more to question the crab.

"How do you shed?" he inquired.

"Well, you've just come in good time to see," answered the crab, good-naturedly, "for I'm just going to shed."

So saying he chose a clear space in the mud, and commenced to wave his claws to and fro; suddenly he stopped. "Come here," he said; then added, as Johnnie approached, "You see, the back seam is split all the way along?"

"Yes," replied Johnnie.

"And the two side seams?"

"Yes."

"Well," continued the crab, "with the exception of those two small cracks in my claws, these are the only splits in my shell, and I shall crawl out of the back seam." And he commenced waving his claws, and moving first one way and then the other. The crack along his back grew wider, and the soft shell underneath could be plainly seen. Soon he was half-way out of the old shell, and finally, after great efforts, he slid out completely, and the old shell and the perfect crab lay side by side. For the moment Johnnie could hardly tell which was which, but a wink from his old friend soon showed him.

"Now," said the crab, "you see I'm as soft as can be. Put your finger on me gently, and feel." Johnnie did so, and found that the crab's skin was as soft as his own. "I think I'll go to sleep for a while now. You had better run up to your mother; but before you go just pull up that piece of sea-weed over me."

Johnnie did as he was told, and suddenly found himself in the boat with his neck very stiff from having hung over the stern so long. When he told his mother about it, she laughed, and said, "You must have dreamed it." But Johnnie says that he was sure that he saw the crab wink at him as he left the boat, and certain it is that Johnnie won't eat crabs any more for fear of making a meal off his friend.

GRANDMAMMA'S SCHOOL-DAYS.

MARK'S STORY.

A TALE OF THE SOUTH PACIFIC.

MARK is my brother. The story is his, not mine. He is just home after a terrible adventure. No doubt you all read of the wreck of the Euroclydon; that was Mark's ship.

The Euroclydon was wrecked somewhere in the latitude of Cape Horn; a few survivors in a small boat were picked up in a state of great misery by a passing vessel and brought home to England. The opinion of the men saved—some thirteen or fourteen in number—was that every other soul on board had gone down with the ship.

Mark's name appeared in the papers among the list of the missing, and for weeks we mourned him as dead. I believe his mother—my mother too, God bless her loving heart!—never quite despaired through those long fearful days, when we sat out on the lawn, pretending to work or read, but with thoughts far away, never daring to mention the name of him whose memory was always uppermost in our minds.

Brave, handsome Mark! How could she think of him as lying cold and dead at the bottom of the tossing sea? No, he was living in her heart. A prayer for his safety was on her lips from morn till night, and, strong in loving faith, she believed he would some day be restored to her.

And he was.

Why tell of the joy he shed on the household, of the surprise, of the discarded black dresses, of the shadow lifted from my mother's life? After the news of the wreck she looked ten years older, but the stolen summers were restored to her on the day when Mark walked alive and well up the garden path. Why tell all this? Let Mark tell his own story.

When the catastrophe happened I was below, and I at once rushed on deck. Two boats were lowered in the greatest confusion, and filled beyond safety.

Seeing this, and knowing that if I sprang into either of them the cook and one of the seamen, who were beside me, were sure to follow, and we should all be capsized, I made up my mind to keep to the ship and take my chance. Hardly had the Captain's gig got away when a great sea caught her, and over she went. I could see only two men afloat, and presently they disappeared.

What to do with ourselves now became the important question. The vessel was settling lower and lower in the water every minute. To stay with her till she foundered was almost certain death, and the only chance we had was to hastily build a raft and trust to floating about until we caught the attention of some passing vessel.

No sooner said than done. All worked with a will, and soon a few planks were tied securely together. Scarcely was this done when we heard a strange rumbling noise below-decks. The boilers had burst, and with one terrible roll the vessel sank. In a moment we were all in the water, and it seemed to me an age before I came to the surface again.

On rising at last, and pushing the hair out of my eyes, I looked round for the raft. There it was, floating bravely, not many yards away, and the ship's cook had already gained possession. Striking out in despair, I soon reached it, and with his help scrambled out of the water. Then we saw Smith struggling hard to reach us. A wave bore us right toward him, and we managed to haul him aboard. So three of us were saved, if saved you could call it, to be left in the midst of the wildest sea in the world on a few planks tied hastily together.

How the days and nights passed I hardly know. I think we were almost too benumbed to be able to think. One thing, however, became clear—the sea was gradually getting quieter every hour, and this gave us hope.

On the third day we sighted a speck in the distance. It was land. Evidently we were nearing some of the islands of Terra del Fuego. On we drifted, inspired by fresh hopes, dismissing from our minds all fears as to the reception we might meet with should the island prove to be inhabited. It was land; that was enough for us. We took one of the planks of our raft and used it as an oar, working it by turns.

Almost as soon as we commenced waving our jaekets we beheld a movement on shore. The place was inhabited, and in a few minutes half a dozen boats were skimming toward us over the water. How shall I describe the occupants of these boats? And how can I find words to tell our despair when we recognized them as the lowest type of savages—most likely cannibals?

Soon they were beside us, shouting and screaming in a horrible jargon; men and women almost naked, of a tawny brown color, short and thickset. Hideously ugly is a mild term to apply to them. In vain I scanned the numerous faces for a trace of mere human feeling. In only one countenance did I seem to find a gleam of pity. It was the face of one of the women, younger than the rest, and less fiendish in her expression. Her eyes all through this strange scene were fixed steadily on me.

All at once the women, as with one impulse, thrust into the men's hands their weapons of war, and with wild gestures pointed to the raft. In a moment the man nearest had raised his blade, and poor Smith fell dead. Another savage hauled cost the cook his life. I closed my eyes, and lay there expecting that my death-blow would instantly follow.

Whether my weak state or my youth had filled them with pity I know not, but they did not strike. In a short time I was lifted off the raft into one of the boats, and we paddled back to shore. After that I remembered nothing for a time. I suppose I fainted from exhaustion and hunger. When I came to my senses I found myself in a dark, damp cavern on the side of the steep rocky island. At first I wondered where I was, and looked round utterly astonished, until my eyes fell upon a figure at the doorway, and I remembered what had happened. All my clothes were gone with the exception of my trousers; but although evidently a prisoner, with my jailer at the door, I was not bound in any way.

But I need not go into the details of my daily existence. Nothing occurred, and I could only wait and wonder what would be my fate.

My usual food consisted of a coarse salt species of mussel, varied with a kind of dried sea-weed, and occasionally—about once a week—a piece of raw seal was added to my bill of fare. Was I being fattened up for the royal table? And when would his Majesty take a fancy to a filet de midshipman, or some English bones grilled?

One night my jailer was absent, and I was stretched in a corner of the cave trying to get asleep. Suddenly a shadow fell across the entrance, and a figure approached. In my visitor I recognized the young woman whose eyes had been so earnestly fixed on me during the terrible tragedy on the raft. She began to make signs; the thought that she wished to save me helped me to understand her.

By gestures she told that on the morrow I was to die, and that she desired to save me. She gave me a small weapon, with which I understood I was to slay my jailer if he saw me. She led me to the mouth of the cave, and pointed round toward the eastern side of the island, where, as I understood her to mean, there were no inhabitants. By degrees I understood that she meant me to go to one particular creek in the island, and there I would find oars and paddles, or probably, I thought, a boat or a raft.

How I ever scrambled over those unknown and rocky paths I can not tell. My feet were soon cut and bleeding, but I heeded not. On, on I pushed, with desperate speed.

It seemed to me as if the distance lengthened as I went, and I despaired of ever reaching the creek in time to save myself.

At length I reached a gully wider than any I had passed, which I fancied might lead me out to the sea-side. In about half an hour I was rewarded by hearing the distant splash of the waves. In a little time I came across a pair of clumsily made paddles hidden in a crevice of the rocks, and jumped for joy. But no boat was near. "Extremes meet," is an old proverb. From the extreme of delight I was plunged into the extreme of misery and despair. What was the use of paddles without a boat?

Standing on a high rock asking myself if I could sail to Europe on two small oars, I saw, about thirty yards from the edge of the sea, a dark object of square form that seemed to move with the swelling of the waves. In a moment I was swimming toward the object. Was it a raft? I rapidly approached. It proved to be a long box, for on striking its side it sounded hollow. I swam round to one of its ends, that faced the bright moon. Picture my joy when I read in white letters the word Euroclydon.

It was the ice-box of our ship! Had Providence guided it there? I then saw what the brave girl had done. Knowing it to be impossible to steal one of the boats belonging to her tribe without being found out, she had waited until chance should supply something that would do in its place. The ice-box had drifted there from the Euroclydon, and the savage had deemed it time to set me free. I clambered on to the box and fell upon my knees with a prayer of gratitude.

It was now nearly dawn, and no time was to be lost. I tried to paddle my strange craft out to sea, but my progress was slow. That it was progress was all I could say.

A day passed, and no sail appeared. As night came on I opened the doors of the ice-box and lay down on them, and was as comfortable as any one could expect to be under the circumstances.

The second day passed without incident, as did also the third, except that on each I saw a ship in the distance, which I was unable to signal.

The fourth day was pleasant but very cold. I saw another sailing vessel, but could not attract her attention. Remember, I had but one garment, and when I wanted to signal a vessel I was obliged to take it and wave it frantically above my head. I did not suffer in the least from hunger; in fact, I had no craving for food.

At last—words would fail to describe what my feelings were—I saw a brigantine, and in answer to my two-legged flag she signaled me. I strained my eyes to try and watch her every movement. I seemed to think that if I ceased to look at her for a second she would disappear. I held out my arms toward her, my teeth were set, and my eyes were almost starting from their sockets. I saw the boat lowered, and as it came near and nearer, I fell down in a heap on my queer craft, and sobbed as if my heart were breaking. The men took me quite tenderly on board the boat, and my faithful ice-box drifted away.

No sooner had I set foot on the brigantine than I made a rush for the "scuttle-butt" and began to drink. After I had drank all that I could, the steward stopped me, and furnished me with a bowl of coffee; I never knew until that moment what a delicious drink coffee is. Then the Captain got me food, and the sailors brought me clothes. I was the hero of the hour. Every luxury of the ship was given me, and in return I had to tell my story a dozen times a day.

You may be sure that when we reached England I did not stop to write, but took the first train home. And here I am.

This is how Mark always used to wind up. There is no need for me to add anything. The story is true, and that is enough.

LITTLE FREDRIKA BREMER.

BY MRS. M. E. SANGSTER.

VERY likely many of you have still before you the pleasure of reading the works of Miss Fredrika Bremer. In The H. Family, The Neighbors, Nina, and other stories written by this bright and merry-hearted woman, you will find a world of enjoyment, for Miss Bremer was one of the most famous women authors of our century.

But it is not of her books nor of her grown-up life that I thought of telling you when I wrote "Little Fredrika Bremer" at the top of my paper.

When she was a child most parents were very grand and stately in their manners with their children, and hers were especially severe and formal. Fredrika and her sisters used to hide in the rooms of their governess or nurse when they heard the step of father or mother. The first duty of each morning was to go to their mother, not for a kiss and a loving look, but to be criticised and scolded if they did not enter the room gracefully. They had to courtesy at the door, walk slowly up to Madame Bremer, and kiss the tips of her extended fingers. Fredrika could never stand, sit, walk, or courtesy well enough to please her mother, and she was often obliged to go through the whole performance several times, and be blamed for her awkwardness besides.

Madame Bremer had three principles in the government of her children—two which were very good, and one which was very bad. They were to be kept in ignorance of the evil that is in the world, they were to be thoroughly taught by the best professors, and—think of it, dears!—they were to eat as little as possible. She fancied that eating as much as they wished would make them dull about learning, and vulgar-looking as well; she desired her daughters to become sylph-like and slender, like the heroines in the romances which then were the fashion.

So, until they were fifteen, the little Bremers never were permitted to eat as much as they wanted at any meal. Breakfast consisted of a tiny basin of cold milk and a very little piece of thin hard rye biscuit. Dinner was always eagerly welcomed, for then the children were allowed to eat of three of the four or five dishes which composed the meal; they tasted very good to the poor half-starved things. At night the rye bread and cold milk appeared again. Miss Bremer's sister declared in after-life that she never had seen bowls so small as those which held their breakfasts and suppers.

Fredrika was a very plain child with a very large nose, which she made much worse by constant efforts to improve its shape. High foreheads were admired in those days, and hers, alas! was very low. Young ladies who wear bangs and frizzes to hide their foreheads will be amused to learn that Miss Bremer began to improve hers by regularly plucking out the hairs which grew around it, until one day her mother remarked, quite innocently, "Your forehead is not so very low, after all!"

In spite of constant scolding and punishment Fredrika managed to be quite happy. The servants and her brothers and sisters loved her very dearly. One year the children saved all the candies that were given them, eating only one or two, and locking up the rest, so that Fredrika, who was fond of candy, should have a great box of it on her birthday. The birthday came, and there was an immense heap of sugar-plums, but unfortunately most of them were hard and dry, and the children were much disappointed at the result of their self-denial.

The girls were clever, witty, and well taught in books, but none of them were ever very strong. They suffered in health throughout life, from their mother's mistaken notions that thin clothing and insufficient food were for their good. But nothing checked their flow of cheerful spirits, and of the household of young people Fredrika was the gayest and most charming.

WHY THE CATS OF JAPAN HAVE NO TAILS

BY EVAL OGDEN

It was in the LAND of the MORNING,
The REALM of the RISING SUN,
In days when the CATS of JAPAN had tails
Though the MONKEYS, poor things! had none.

It was down in the PROVINCE of FIREFLIES,
In the month when the rice-fields grow green;
The day had been misty and drizzly
And at night not a star could be seen;
But each fire-fly had taken his lantern
And put on his rain-proof straw hat,
For an airy dance in the dark and the damp
When the great bronze bell
Should sound through the swamp
The frolicsome HOUR of the RAT.

The MONKEY suffered great pain that night
From tooth-ache; the CAT he saw
Had troubles too, for she wept outright
At loss of her mother-in-law.
So they went to the house of MO-MO-TA-RŌ
In pain and tears, just to see
If they could drown such terrible woe
In cups of fragrant tea.

There in the scent of the LOTUS FLOWERS
That float on the KA-MA-GA-RŌ
They heard the wind-bells that fringe the roof
Of the temple at SA-MAN-SIN-Ō.

What's that?
Said the CAT
As she saw the gleam,
As down the stream,
Of a sudden brilliant light:
"It's nothing at all."
"But the FIREFLIES BALL!"
Said the MONKEY, "They dance tonight:
There is not," he added, "beneath the skies
A pleasanter sport than to catch fireflies,
But then I suppose you wouldn't care
For sport; and besides you wouldn't dare."
"Do you 'dare' me? A failless thing like you!
Show me the thing that I wouldn't do!"

BRENN

AN—MDCCCLXXXII—

lightly floated, the fireflies
 Hither and thither and yon,
 And gracefully waved the tail of the CAT,
 As she leaped from log to stone,
 Chasing a bright
 Little glimmer of light,
 As the winged millions
 Flashed in collisions,
 A-dancing the DANCE of MIDNIGHT.

With superior grace,
 The CAT in her chase,
 Stepped on a moss-covered log;
 But that step I am sure
 Proved too insecure,
 For she next pitched headfirst in the bog.
 And while floundering there,
 In the wildest despair,
 She felt herself turning quite pale
 As that MONKEY ran out overhead on a bough,
 A-muttering something like "jolly chance now!
 —Get even with her about 'tail'."

For nought but that waving tail cared he,
 And he sprang for it, with a grin of glee.
 He pulled and tugged, in vain at first,
 For the mud was of mud, the very worst
 But at last, with a jerk that sent him down
 Head over heels, like the TEA-KETTLE-CLOWN,
 The CAT was once more safe on land.
 But—the TAIL broke off in the MONKEY'S hand.

The MONKEY was heard next day in COURT:
 "Was it my fault," said he, "that it broke off short?
 I can only hint, had the tail been strong—
 But I must not make my plea too long—
 Yet oh! Let me swear no hope of gain
 To myself, for a moment entered my brain;
 And the proof— I flung your tail away
 Far, far out in the rolling SEA."

The COURT decided, as any court must,
 That the MONKEY was right and the cat unjust;
 And it issued a solemn and wise command,
 To be put in force throughout the land,
 That no cat in JAPAN, till TIME should fail,
 Should ever be suffered to wear a tail.

"Oh! I could, if I would, a tale unfold
 Chuckles the BROOK as it runs to the SEA—
 And so could the cat's laugh, the SPARROW,
 From the top of an old cherry tree.
 But no cat in JAPAN, that LAND of BLISS,
 Has unfolded a tail from that day to this."

CLINTON, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—My brother hastaken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it was published. Papa takes the MONTHLY and WEEKLY. I like the editor-in-chief of the Monthly. My grandpa took them when papa was a little boy. They are all bound, and we think a good deal of them. I am eleven years old, and have written to you several times, but mamma never would let me do so. She says she will send this, and copy it for me so that you can read it without any trouble. I want to tell you a true story. It happened to a relation of mine about twenty-seven years ago. This is the fourth story I've written:

NELLIE AND ABE.

When Nellie was twelve years old her mother sent her to the country to spend the summer. Nellie was thin and pale; could not study or eat. The doctor said she must go in the country, run all she wanted to do, and do as she liked. If she did not want to do that, she thought that would hurt her. Aunt Betsy let her have her own way. She rode on horseback, waded and swam in Stony Creek, stood on the long logs that stuck out from the hay-down with after it was loaded, and which hung on to the back of the cart while the men were loading. The men called it the boom-pole. But the most thing that Nellie liked to do was to see what I am going to tell you. Her cousin in Abe, who was ten years old, did everything that Nellie told him to.

One day they put their white little heads together and made up a plan for blocking their faces and going round the neighborhood begging. Nellie burned several holes, and blackened Abe's face and hands. With his help she put black dots all over the cow's face, and blackened his hind clothes. Abe, putting on an old dress they found in the garret. Abe, like all the little boys in that part of the country, went barefooted every day, and he forgot to blacken his feet or put on shoes.

Off they started. After calling on some of the neighbors, and having a merry time, the children walked slowly down the road. Suddenly they espied a man in a dress, and a boy in a coat and hat. "Ah!" cried Abe, "here comes old Dominic Van Horn. Let us ask him to help us."

So Nellie, putting out her hand as the dominie ran up to them, said, "Won't you please give us some pennies, Sir, to get something to eat?"

The old gentleman asked them a few questions, then putting his hand in his pocket, took out two pennies when the dominie turned out Abe's bare feet. "Suff he, turning to Nellie, "Little girl, is that your sister?"

"No, Sir," she answered, "it is my cousin."

"How is it how is it that she has a black face and white feet?"

"She is pibald!" screamed Nellie, and the naughty children ran down the road as fast as they could, while the old dominie rode off laughing.

Now, dear Postmistress, don't you think that is a funny story? BESSIE B.

Yes, it is a funny story, and Bessie has told it very well. What a library you have, dear! If you possess all the volumes of HARPER'S MONTHLY Magazine! I am sure you would be proud to show them, and looking at the pictures. It was very kind of mamma to copy your letter and story for me to read. Please give my thanks.

CENTREVILLE, MISSISSIPPI.

I have wanted to send you a letter for a year, but I was afraid you would not get it, unless I had enough for the Post-office box. Don't you all wish we could see the Postmistress? Mamma and I talk about her a good deal sometimes. We think she is young, and again we decide she is not, for she seems to know what will please us, and gives us such good advice that we can't help thinking she has a good many boys and girls at home.

I am a girl eleven years old. I live in a pretty grove of holly, magnolias, and beech. My mother is an invalid. She teaches us when she is not suffering too much. She has not walked for six years. I do all our work—cooking, milking, and house-work. We have no servant. My little brother can help me; he is only six years old, but he can chop wood, milk the cows, and do the best of all, he is so kind and thoughtful of dear sick mamma.

I tell you one little thing about him. Last fall mamma sent him with some money to the store to get some cloth to make him an overcoat. After he had done a little way he came back to her, and she asked him if it hurt him. He said winter haunched. Mamma told him she would attend to it, but he begged her not to put it on, and asked her to write for it instead of the coat for him.

I have a chance to go to school, and mamma is going to try to get along with Ed Elliot (that is my brother's name). I have a younger brother, but mamma was too weak to take care of him, and a kind aunt took him home, he was four months old. He is four years old now, and his friends love him dearly. It was very hard for us to give him up. You may know he is happy when he comes to see us, but you do not know how very lively he is if you would like to know how I manage I will write again.

Will the Postmistress care if I ask some of the young people to send me some silk-crepe ribbons of velvet or ribbon for my sick mother? I would like to make my little brother a quilt for a keepsake. If they send their names, I will send in return some magnolia leaves and tea flowers this summer.

I shall think a great deal about your sick mother, Lillian, and I hope you may be able to exchange some of your pressed flowers with the girls who have bits of silk to spare. Can your mamma amuse herself by reading, or does that tire her too much? Your little brother must be a dear, thoughtful boy, and will make a very good man if he grows up as kind and unselfish as he now is.

SUMMIT, BRIDGE PLAND.

I am nine years old. I have two brothers; their names are Arthur and Willis. We all go to school; we all like the teacher. My papa attends to the depot, and my mamma teaches in most of the time. We had some skates and tools last Christmas. The tools we have are a hammer, saw, screw-driver, awl, pliers, bits, and a file. We had some books, and my papa bought some books. I like the stories of Robinson Crusoe and The Swiss Family Robinson. I keep home when my mother is not at home. I like to play very much, and the toys I wish Jimmy Brown would give me.

GEORGE H. N.

SPRING VALLEY, NEW JERSEY.

I have never written to YOURS PEOPLE before, and I thought I ought to do so now, because it is a long time. I have two sisters and three brothers. We live on a farm of forty acres. Papa has business in New York, so is away through the day, but comes home at night. I have been lame thirteen years—ever since I was a baby—but am under the care of a skillful surgeon in New York. When I go to the hospital I take the car to the depot, and walk to Franklin Square. My brothers and I do the farming.

I read in your paper that you would like to know what your boys do before school and after their school hours. Before we go to school I milk the cows and feed them, and my brother feeds the horse and goes to the station with papa. My brother George has an excuse house he came late. He lets me go on, so I may take my time, as a mile is quite a walk for a lame boy. In the afternoon, when we come home, I get wood and coal for morning, do my chores around the barn, and go to the station for papa. I have an older brother, who has graduated from school, and a wiggler.

HERBERT H.

If a lame boy can accomplish so much, and be so merry and cheerful as I am certain Herhert is, what shall we expect from the rest of the boys who can run and jump on two active feet?

CHOCOMA, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl nearly six years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE four or five weeks, and I like the letters the best of all. Somebody reads them to me, because I can't read good yet. I wish I was able to tell you all about my pets, my little Dickey, and my little Watch, first. If you put your two hands on the floor, he'll run and bite them, and he will tear up everything that he can get hold of. He is very noisy, and he has the scarlet fever. He is light yellow, and bathes and sings me every day. I am going away for a little visit with Nellie, but mamma is like her, and she will be here for me. One day papa broke his leg, but it is all well now, and this morning I rode out with him.

GRACIE R. (written by Lucy).

POTTSDALE, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am very nearly twelve years old. I have two pets—a cat and a dog. The former we just call Kitty, but she is two years old, and not much like her mother. The dog is a spaniel, and is the dearest little dog you ever saw. Besides these two pets I have five dolls—six I mean if I forget my new one. They are Mimie, Daisy, Fanny, Ching-Wing, and Red. I have also a few French little china dolls, Fanny and Daisy are French, Mimie is wax, and Ching-Wing a jap. I have one sister and two brothers. I made forty-six cents for my mother. I received six valentines, and all were very pretty.

We had two canaries. One, my little brother hurt so it died at the age of ten, and the other was a pair that I bought for ten days before it was out of its cage, and my little brother took care of it; so was frightened that it died, at twelve months old. They would each, if they had lived till now, have been thirteen years old.

I live one mile out of town, and as it is snowing pretty hard, I do not believe I can get to Sabbath-school this afternoon. I say my lessons at home to my sister. My studies are French, Latin, history, writing, spelling, grammar, and arithmetic, mental and written arithmetic. I hope you can read my writing. Love to the Postmistress from FLORENCE H.

PUSSY AND THE POLICEMAN.

Once there was a little pussy cat, and it went down town, and met a policeman, and the policeman said, "Where are you going, Miss Pussy?" And the pussy said, "I am going down town, and I am hungry." So the policeman said, "Come with me, and I will get you something to eat." So he took her away down to the station-house. But the pussy cat was afraid of all the policemen sitting with their chairs leaning against the wall. The one who was with him said, "Don't be afraid, they are all friends." So the policeman went and got an apple and gave it to the pussy. But the pussy said, "My mamma won't let me eat apples with the skin on." So the policeman said, "I'll excuse me." And he got a knife and took the skin off, and then the pussy ate it all up. And then the policeman got a piece of bread and butter, and the pussy ate that all up too; and that's all.

Nan says that her little sister Belle told this story when she was three years old. It is a very pretty story.

ALLEGHENY, PENNSYLVANIA.

My papa has been taking YOUR PEOPLE for us since the first number was issued, and we like it very much. After I get home I like to play with my kites, skate, coast, or play some out-door game. I spend about half an hour in study. In the evening I must bring up night coal, and when my work is done, I read some of the stories in the book. I like Jacob Abbott. I have read the "Hollo Books" written by him, and several of his histories. I like the "Hollo Books" best. One of my favorite books is Robinson Crusoe, by Daniel Defoe. My game is skating. My pleasant winter amusement is skating. EDWIN S. E.

NEWBURNPORT, ONTARIO.

I am a little girl eight years old, and have been living the last year in Newburnport, Ontario. I have one little brother, Lyn, six years old, who has been in the house for a week with theumps. I have a sister, who is nearly three years old; her name is Edith McCord. We all love her and pet her very much.

My ammie Belle, who lives in Jamaica, West Indies, sent me YOUR PEOPLE for a Christmas present. I have a grandpa who lives in Toronto, where we used to live. Mamma and I went to see her last summer, and I hope we will go and see her again this summer. I have been at school all winter, and am in the Third Book. I am writing this letter all myself. I hope you will print this, for I want to send it to my papa, who is in St. John, New Brunswick. LOTTIE B. C.

ASHENA, NEW YORK.

I am nine years old, and have been wanting to write to you for a long time, but I was afraid you would not print my letter. I think my year's stories are very funny. I have a dog; his name is Jack; he is a Gordon setter. Papa bought a badness for him, and I have trained him to it. I have some milk to sled, and he drags me around on the ice and snow. I am studying at home this winter with mamma, but am going to school in the summer. AMY B. P.

CRANFORD, NEW JERSEY.

As I have not seen any letters from our town, I thought that I would write one. I have a goat named Billie that I drove around in summer, and I have a cow named Bessie, and I have a pig named Emory-bird, but he died a few weeks ago. There is a squirrel out in the yard in the trees that I would like to get and keep for a pet, if I could catch him. We have a little chick named Tom, and a great big mastiff; the little one is white, and the big one is very jealous of the big one, whose name is Frank, and one day he shook Snip up so that he was very much frightened. I like to read very much; my dimmy Brown's story are the best of all. I am eleven years old, and a boy. E. A. B.

Please don't catch the squirrel, dear. He prefers to race about in the trees, to being a boy's pet. You may admire him as much as his freedom as you could in a cage.

MADISON COUNTY, ONTARIO.

I am a little girl ten years old. Salem, the capital of our State, is only eighteen miles from here. The Willamette River, on which it is situated, only runs a few miles and is a very pretty river. Portland, the largest city in our State, is forty miles north. We live in the country, and the railroad runs through our farm. Papa has a car, and we go to school on the cars, and I have been there several times.

There are some very pretty hills near here, and part of the time this winter they were covered with snow. On a clear day we can see Mount Hood one of the highest mountains in the United States) very plainly. Its summit is always covered with snow. Papa has a large farm, and raises four fine head of beefy yearling, and two young sheep. It will soon be spring-time, and then I like to go out in the field and watch the little lambs play. I once had a pet lamb, and it grew so large that I turned it out with the rest of the sheep.

It rains a great deal during the winter here, so we have been called Wetfoot, but I think Oregon is one of the best places to live in. This winter ago I went down to Oakland, California, to go to school. While there I often went to San Francisco, and lived in Woodward Garden. I saw many beautiful things, and I had a horse and twelve year old, and we each have a horse and saddle, and in pleasant weather we often go out riding. This winter we have a governess. We have a Steinway piano, and we both play music, and we have lots of fun swinging and playing together. I read Young People every week. I like the story of "Nan" and the letters in our Post-office box very much. GERTRUDE H.

CLANTON, ALABAMA.

I am sorry that my teacher is too sick to come to school to-day. My two older brothers have gone a-fishing, so I will spend some of my time playing with my little brother. We are very much with Harper's Young People, which comes each Thursday. One week when papa gave me the paper, he said, "Do see if Nan is out of her trouble yet." Of course he knew she had not, but mamma would come out nicely. I would like to join the Hoosekeeper's Club, though I can not send any useful receipts for cooking; but mamma says I can't run my own kitchen, and I have a new carpet. I am ten years old. I live in the pine woods near my papa's saw-mill. I will write some time and tell my city cousins how I spend my time in the big woods. ANNA LOR D.

You may join the Little Hoosekeepers, Anna. I like to hear that you keep your room in nice order. That is one sign that you are a little lady.

CLOUD COUNTY, KANSAS.

As I haven't not many letters from this place, I thought I would write one. My mamma and I like the Post-office box very much. I want to tell the children about the prairie-dogs and their towns. They are small animals about as large as a rat in the shape and color, but similar to a dog. They build their houses near each other. First they dig a hole in the ground, then pile earth around in the shape of a mound; they have a door at one end. Some dig out two acres of ground. When they hear a noise they all run up on top of their houses and stand on their hind-legs and bark for a long time. My brother and I tried to catch one, but it was so hard to have a brother. We have a sister Nellie. Nellie and I have three dolls. I am a little girl eight years old. Good-by. CLARA E. T.

NAPA VALLEY, CALIFORNIA.

All the little girls and boys who visit their pets, so I am going to say something different. I live in Napa Valley. We live opposite the Husana Asylum; there are twelve hundred patients there and five little infants, and it would be very hard for me to see them. Every Friday night there is a dance, and the crazy people dance. It is a very strange sight to see them dancing. One big girl named Nora, cried out loud because she was so full of water. I go over very often to see the doctor's little girl. I used to be afraid of the crazy people, but I am not now. My brother walks to Napa to see a mamma teacher. My brother and I have three dogs and one cat; the dogs' names are Loufer, Bonner, and Tramp, and the cat's name is Tilly Winks. We had a rooster named George. We are very much with our Sunday paper, and some days we get one hundred eggs. This is my first letter, and I hope you will publish it. BETTIE M.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

I am one of the boy readers of Harper's Young People. My papa has been taking your paper for me since 1879, when "The Brave Swiss Boy" was published. I have now on hand, nicely done up, 172 numbers of Harper's Young People, and it seems to me I never get tired looking over them. I have read so many nice little letters from so many nice little people about the pets they have that I might tell you about some. I have had since our Postmistress said she would like to hear from her boys who take the paper. That a lovely pair of bunnies; they were very beautiful and when for some time I gave them some guinea-pigs, and gave them plenty to eat. I had a fine goat, with a buggy and express wagon to ride out in. My goat was nicely trained, and I kept him at home. Whenever we went to the country my papa would have him taken along too. I had some fine sport with him. I sold him not long ago to a nice little boy who takes good care of him.

I now have a pet rooster, which I raised myself. When I first got it I had to feed it. Now it has grown very large, and will follow me wherever I go, and every day when we eat dinner it comes to the dining-room porch and pecks on the window until we give it some of our dinner. It will eat cake, and almost anything sweet, and drinks tea and coffee instead of water.

I also had a pet alligator, brought to me from Florida last August. I thought, perhaps, when I first got him that he might die during the fall or winter, as our climate is colder than Florida, but he is living as well as ever. He was very much brought to our home. He will eat only when in winter, and does not eat a great deal.

My little cousin Ohio, who rears your paper, and who has a dog which every girl and boy in our city would subscribe for Harper's Young People.

And now, dear Postmistress, I must say good-by, and I only wish that every girl and boy in our city would subscribe for Harper's Young People. WILLIE F. L.

ANDREWS, DAKOTA.

I thought you would like to hear from a little girl in Dakota. I have taken your paper two years, and have never written to you before. I am eleven years old. The only pet I have is a Maltese kitten. I had a beautiful singer—a bird—but the kitten killed him. I was sorry, but I had him stuffed. I think "Nan" is a lovely story. ROSA B. H.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have a brother almost nine years old. I think "Nan" ended splendidly, and we have had many a good laugh over Jimmy Brown's stories. I think the "Raising the Pearl" is going to be very interesting. The only pet we have is a cat named Hussy. She will not eat her breakfast until we sit down. Mamma gave her a saucer of milk, and she would not take a bit until we sat down at the table. ANNIE H.

A very polite cut.

WEST CLIFTON, WEST VIRGINIA.

I have taken your paper since last August, and have seen but two letters from your paper. I think I thought I would write one. I also take the Youth's Companion, and have saved every number of each paper. You said you wanted the boys to write. In the evening I study my lessons and read. My favorite books are books of travel and history. My chief amusement is reading, and my favorite game is marbles. I was very much interested in "Nan," but was sorry that it did not tell more about her. I hope the author will do so in the future. WILLIAM O. H.

SPEAR, INDIANA.

I am a little Hooseer girl. I suppose you don't care if I have a little corner in your Post-office box? I have a darling motto, which you sent me dear paper for her Christmas gift. I am twelve years old. I go to school, and study arithmetic, grammar, geography, reading, writing, spelling, and history. I study music at home. My mamma teaches the primary grade here; she has seventy little ones. Almost all your little folks tell about their pets. I have two, which I think will compare with any one—a great big black and white snowball, and a pretty little black hen named Jetty. Snowball is by me now. I have a nice grandmother. She likes to work your puzzles, especially those which have anything about geography. "Reg" was a fine story; I was delighted with it. I think the same as Flora C. M. about our Postmistress. MAUDE L.

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND.

I like Young People very much. "Nan," I think was a very nice story. I am seven years old, and have just learned to write. I have a little brother three years old who is very funny. I have four cats; one has six little kittens; they are very soft and pretty. The little girl next door is my constant playmate; her name is Susie C. H. Good-by. JENNIE R. O.

AFTER THE PARTY.

"Surely you've not washed this Morning, Tommy?"
 "No, Mamma! I was in Bed so late last Night that I didn't think I required it!"

SAVED FROM FIRE BY A DOG.

BY MARTIN ROBSON.

ABOUT a month ago a dog, whose master is Mr. Henry Gower, an insurance agent, living at Maldon, Essex County, England, made his way into the house through a hole leading to the shed where he slept, and awoke his master by jumping on the bed, licking his face, and whining. He also pulled at the bed-clothes, and altogether behaved in such a way that his master was annoyed, and sent him off with a scolding.

A minute afterward he returned, and went through the same actions, tearing away at the bed-clothes so wildly that his master arose for the purpose of shutting him out. The dog capered about with evident pleasure at having got his master to rise, and Mr. Gower, crossing the room to shut the door, saw in the opposite windows the reflection of fire.

He immediately hurried on his clothes, called his children (his wife was from home at the time), and took such steps to call the fire brigade together that the fire, which had begun in a shed close to where the dog slept, was soon put out, and all danger at an end. Thus was saved from destruction not only Mr. Gower's house, but several buildings close by in which were stored the gunpowder stocks of two iron-mongers and a gunsmith. Under the guidance of Providence the little dog's action was the means of saving many thousands of dollars' worth of property. He is of mixed breed, but looks like a Scotch terrier, and rejoices in the unusual name of Brail.

CUT TWO PIECES THE SIZE OF EACH OF THESE, AND OUT OF THE FOUR MAKE A SQUARE.

THE NAME PUZZLE.

BY G. B. BARTLETT.

AMONG the many ways of conveying information by a secret process none is better than the following very simple method, which has been very rarely found out.

One person is sent out of the room, and the rest of the company fix upon some word or sentence for him to guess. This may be the name of some article in the room, some event of history, or some little story. On his return a number of questions is asked him by some person who is acquainted with the trick, and the article is guessed by the player as soon as it is mentioned.

The secret of this is that he knows that the selected article will always be named to him just after some article which begins with the first letter of his own name. This of course might soon be found out by the rest of the company if the first letter of the name was used several times in succession. Instead of doing this, the questioner uses the first letter only once, and when the guesser returns for the second time he knows that the second letter of his name will be used.

When the Christian name has all been spelled they must go on to the middle name, which is used also one letter after another, and then the last name is treated in the same way.

An example may help the little ones to understand the easy though puzzling method of playing the game. Frank Walker Jones we will suppose to be the name of the guesser who is sent out of the room, and the word chosen for him to guess first may be "orange." The questions are to be asked by George, and when Frank enters he begins to question him as follows: Is it that picture? Is it a hat? Is it a lamp? Is it an apple? Is it a fig? Frank, being on the watch for the first letter of his name, knows that the next word will be the right one, so says "Yes" the moment orange is mentioned.

They may next choose "Sindbad," and George may ask, Is it a book? No. A piece of music? No. Is it a fig? No. Is it a monkey? No. Is it Blue-beard? No. Robinson Crusoe? No. Sindbad? Yes. The next time George may inform him by using an apple, then by Napoleon, then kangaroo, and so on. After this he can use the middle and last name in the same manner.

A DECIDED MISTAKE.

BY E. I. STEVENSON.

THERE is one part of Sands Moffat's life to which, like many another boy, he can never look back without saying to himself, "Don't I wish I could just go over it again!" By "it" Sands means his six years at Dr. Portress's school in Mount Sparta.

Sands and his friends there were, in fact, a very jolly little crowd. The tall brick school building, standing on a height a quarter of a mile out of the village, was sunny and roomy and rambling. Its big garden was a complete happy hunting ground to the boys, to say nothing of the school play-ground, the gymnasium, and the bowling-alley, all fitted up in the newest style.

There was always enough whooping and general racket from them to convince people passing that hard play as well as hard study must be the fashion of the school. Regularly once a week stout old Dr. Portress was obliged to say to some anxious father, "Why, my dear sir, if the youngsters 'll only get their Latin verbs as they do now, and the answers to their problems, they can't make too much noise for me." It seemed as if they tried to.

Sands himself, Fred Traft, Hugh Black, and Chess Burnett made up what they called The League, "Offensive and Defensive." Their hands were never known to be against any one, nor any one's hands against them.

A SMALL BUT SELECT AUDIENCE.

But what of that? it was a league all the same. Yet stop; when I say never, I mean—hardly ever. And the single exception chanced thus:

One late autumn afternoon Traft, Black, and Burnett had gone chesnutting, leaving Sands to entertain himself. Truth to tell, Sands had been invited to stay in after school hours to become better acquainted with his United States History lesson. When he came out he found the other three had sorrowfully deserted him. Sands got his Life of Paul Jones, and sat down under one of the big willows. Five or six small boys belonging to the school were lounging around the other end of the bench. Presently Sands became aware that one of these was telling to the rest a story much more wonderful than anything in his book. There seemed to be enough information in it about what the story-teller called "ghosts and hobgoblins and witches" to stock all the foolish old nurses in the land. The little boys stood listening, with excited faces. Sands dropped Paul Jones, and marched up to the story-teller.

"I say, Brown Junior," he exclaimed, "where did you read all that precious stuff, eh? You ought to be ashamed of yourself for remembering it."

Brown Junior blushed. "I didn't read it at all," he answered, after some hesitation. "Belfort told it to some of us last night."

"Told it to some of you last night, did he?" repeated Sands, angrily. "So Belfort is at his old tricks, putting ridiculous nonsense into the heads of you fellows on the sly? I thought the Doctor gave him a sound warning on that subject last term."

"Yes, sir," spoke another little fellow in the group. "But he keeps on telling us the stories, after tea, in the prayer hall, every evening. On Tuesday Tommy Gautier was afraid to go upstairs alone."

"I wasn't anything of the sort," said Tommy, indignantly. "I only—"

"Well, never mind," continued Sands. "Afraid or not afraid, Belfort has got to stop frightening you little fellows. Just remember that whatever he says isn't true—not one word of it. There never was such a thing as a ghost. No boy ever saw one, and never will, either. Now run off, the whole pack of you; and not another story of Tad Belfort's do you let me catch you retailing, Brown Junior, or it 'll be unlucky for your ears."

The little boys ran off, and began punting about the foot-ball. Sands sat still, in a brown-study. All at once he laughed heartily. Then he joined the foot-ball players.

The chesnutters returned an hour before tea-time, well pleased with their full bags. Sands beckoned Traft, Black, and Burnett around the corner of the bowling-alley directly he saw them. "Look here, you fellows," he exclaimed; "Tad Belfort's been at his old tricks again, frightening the second-form boys out of their wits with what he calls ghost stories."

"Has he? The seamp!" exclaimed Burnett.

"And that, too, after the lecture the Doctor gave him last year!" exclaimed Black.

"And, you see, the Doctor isn't likely to hear anything about it for a good while," pursued Sands, "for of course nobody's going to tell him. So I thought—"

"That we ought to do something, and put a stop to it ourselves?" inquired Traft, quickly. "Good boy, Sandsey. Long may you wave!"

"But how shall we manage it?" "What's the plan?" exclaimed Sands's three friends, in lower voices.

"Haven't I been planning it half the afternoon? Belfort not only talks about his rubbishy old ghosts, but he believes in them too—don't he?"

"Of course he does, the precious idiot!" answered Traft, with a very wry face, having just bitten into a very worny chesnut.

"Very well, then. He sleeps alone in the corner room of the third floor—Shafer's old room—and there isn't any master, and only two other fellows, on that floor. We'll just fix ourselves up to-night—you, Traft, Burnett, Black, and myself—as near to what ghosts ought to look like, if there happened to be any, as we can. Somebody must get leave to run down to the village for four white masks before tea. After the last bell for lights out, you fellows must slip around to Traft's and my room. Late enough—say by about twelve o'clock—when the Doctor and everybody else is asleep, we'll come out, creep upstairs, and go into Belfort's room."

"Suppose he wakes?" interrupted Black.

"Let him. He'll have to wake a minute later, when we all stand round his bed! Then I'll give him a shake. He's an awful coward, and he'll be so frightened at seeing our four white figures about him that he won't know what he's about. If he tries to make any noise, we must catch hold of him and stop him in a hurry. After we've frightened him long enough we'll pull off our masks, show him who we are, and make him promise never to tell one single ghost story more in this school, or we'll let out to the other fellows how scared he was. They won't ever let him hear the last of it if we do. What do you think of it?"

"Capital!" "Fine idea!" "Best lark out!" came the expected chorus. "Black, careful soul, stopped it."

"Look here, Moffat," he objected, "your notions are all very well. But suppose that when Belfort starts up he is either too clever to be tricked, or too frightened to do anything except give three or four of the worst screeches you ever heard. He'll bring the whole house up, Doctor and all, before we can get off."

"Well," admitted Sands, "of course in that ease we'll have to cut away like good fellows—down the back stairs and into our rooms. You two can get out of my window into yours over the piazza roof. But we will get square with him, all the same, for spoiling the thing. Let each fellow take his wash-stand mug along with him full of water. If he yells, down with the water on top of him before you run. That 'll be one comfort to think about afterward."

This last idea clinched the business. The League separated. Hugh was given leave by the unsuspecting Mr. Camp to "run down street before tea; just time to do it, sir."

He strode up the flagged walk in twenty minutes with a package, and with winks full of mystery to Burnett and Traft, "sought the seclusion" which Traft and Moffat's room granted, the others accompanying him.

Tea followed. After it Traft noticed a dozen of the younger boys in the prayer hall hanging around Belfort—a tall, hulking fellow of fifteen—who was plainly reeling off one of his longest and silliest ghost stories. They sat listening with a fearful joy.

"He won't be trying that after to-night," Black said to Traft as they walked out.

Traft laughed. The evening study hour in the school was finished somehow. Sands and the other members of the League scarcely dared to lift their eyes to Dr. Portress's grave, good-humored face as he read prayers, distributed the evening mail, and answered forty-three "Good-night, sirs," as the boys filed out—the custom of the school. An hour later each boy was supposed to be ready for bed. The bell rang; a master walked past each door to be sure that the lights were out. Quiet settled down throughout the big school building.

Hardly had the master's step died away when Sands Moffat's door opened softly. Two white figures entered. White masked, and draped in the sheets from the beds, four noiseless figures, each crowned with a white turban, slipped out of the same door a couple of hours later. Each carried something carefully in his hand. All was still. The air was chilly, and the four figures might have been seen to shiver and shake with cold and excitement, as they glided one by one up the stairs without a word or sound.

"Steady, Black! Less noise, Burnett!" whispered Sands, as he drew near to the end of the hall.

"Hope you haven't spilled any water; it might track us if we have to run for it," came Black's low voice.

"Never mind the water. Hurrah for the ghosts!" said the irrepressible Traft.

"Be still, Traft!" ordered Sands. He reached Belfort's door, and noiselessly turned the knob. The other three followed him within the room. A broad strip of moonlight fell across its floor. There stood the bed in the shadow. The League took their appointed places around it, their hearts "thumping like pile-drivers," as Burnett afterward put it.

"One—two—" counted Sands with his hand. Alack! Ere he counted the "three" the sleeper in the bed stirred. He woke up. Two swift, sharp cries escaped him. He struck out to seize the nearest ghost.

"Down with your water!" exclaimed Sands. "Quick! Run for it!"

The dash of the water over the bed, and the rush of the four boys to the door, head over heels, succeeded. The door had latched. Sands caught the handle. It came off. Traft fell atop of him, Burnett dashed on Traft, and Black plunged against Burnett, upsetting all the quartette and a towel rack. Before they could scramble to their feet, a voice, stern in spite of suggestions of choking caused by so many mugfuls of water, rang out to completely shipwreck their little presence of mind:

"Young—young gentlemen, what does this outrageous—outrageous!—mean?"

Sands heard Black exclaim, in anguish, "Gracious! boys, it's the Doctor!"

And the Doctor it certainly was.

Forbidding them to stir—they could not very conveniently—Dr. Portress threw his red dressing-gown about his wet and shivering self, and lit the gas. The sight of the disguised four, huddled together across the room, in the corner, their extraordinary costumes, bare feet, mugs, and masks, beside their utter bewilderment, nearly took away the little breath the Doctor had left.

"Take off those masks, young gentlemen," he said, quickly.

The League obeyed as speedily as cold and fright permitted. By this time several of the older students of the school, and both the under-masters, had hurriedly left their rooms, mounted the stairs, and knocked at the door. No response coming at once, some one of them pushed it open. They stood there staring at the extraordinary scene within.

"Come in—come in, gentlemen," said Dr. Portress, grimly. "The more the merrier, under the circumstances."

But, bewildered or grim, Dr. Portress had a keen sense of fun. He had understood in a moment that by mistake he had been made the object of some very improper school-boy prank, originally planned without the least reference to himself, much less to permitting him to be an actor in it. As he looked at the shivering League, who hung their heads, speechless, before him—as he glanced at the alarmed faces of the in-comers, his mouth began to twitch before he had asked or given a word more of explanation. He bit his lips, he sneezed tremendously, and finally, after a single desperate attempt to preserve his dignity, he burst into a peal of laughter, loud, long, and hearty. It was irresistible. One by one all the surrounding group chimed in, even the sadly frightened League.

"Go to your rooms, young gentlemen," the Doctor said, in another moment, recovering himself. "I shall not inquire into this remarkable affair to-night. Moffat, Traft, Black, and Burnett, come to the study to-morrow morning before breakfast."

The two masters escorted the members of the League to their own rooms like so many convicts. Not a word could they say to each other as they descended the stairs, nor did the masters ask them questions. Nevertheless, just before Sands left Black's side he contrived to mutter to him, "We'll make a clean breast of it all to-morrow."

And Black answered: "Yes; and who knows he'll let us off pretty easy—after that laugh?"

Dr. Portress did. He had been a boarding-school boy himself twenty-five years before.

The next morning the four culprits met in the study, and, as Sands had said, made a clean breast of it. The Doctor read them a lecture, sound and earnest, as to taking law in their own hands for the benefit of Belfort or the smaller boys, or upon any other occasion whatever. He was entirely equal to attending to such matters. He likewise gave them a merited number of pages in their Latin grammars and dictionaries to "write out"; and very lucky were they to escape so lightly. As they quitted the study rather shamefacedly, Sands looked up, and gathered courage enough to say, "Dr. Portress, if you please, sir, would you mind telling us how you came to be in Belfort's room last night instead of Belfort?"

The Doctor laughed softly to himself, and replied: "Why, you see, the plastering in my bedroom downstairs became dangerously loose yesterday right over my bed. I forgot about it until just before the 'lights out' bell had rung. Then, to save Mrs. Portress trouble, I stepped upstairs, and remembering that Belfort slept alone, I made up my mind to ask him to room with Eggert, and took his place myself—the most convenient way I could think of, so late. If I had had the least idea that a surprise party was in store for Belfort, I would have kept him and myself out of it at any price. One thing more: if you prefer, and can keep your secret yourselves, no other person shall know anything more about last night's adventure, Belfort not excepted, let them ask as many questions as they will."

Of course the humbled League promised. Not one of the four has ever let out a word of the matter until now.

LIVERWORTS.

BY SOPHIE B. HERRICK.

ONE beautiful October day I started out, basket in hand, to hunt for some curious plants that I had been reading about, and which had interested me very much. I had often noticed, as you have probably done, curious flat leaves, with curled-up edges, growing on damp paving-stones or around a spring, clinging close to the stones or wet ground, and carpeting them with a mat of rich dark green.

As soon as I began reading about the liverworts I recognized my old friends at once, and was anxious to see them again now that I knew something about their ways. A friend who was interested in my studies promised to show me the way to a spot where they grew, and this October day was set apart for the excursion.

After leaving the street ears we turned down a side path and entered a deep cut, and in another minute a great wall of uneven rock and earth stood in front of us, covered from top to bottom with the most exquisite green. Mosses elude close like a rich velvet mantle, ferns reared their delicate fronds, tiny weeds fresh from the continual sprinkling of a stream of water which trickled over the rock grew in all the little crannies, and close around a spring which had hollowed out a small basin for itself in a ledge of the solid rock grew the liverwort.

Besides what I had seen before in the liverworts I now found that the leaves were spotted all over with diamond-shaped markings of a darker green, each of which had a dot in the centre, and that they were covered underneath

Fig. 1.—LEAF. a, Pocket Disks; b, Seed Disks; c, Nest.

There were three other kinds of outgrowths upon the leaves which I want to show you when we have done examining the leaves themselves. Fig. 1, a, is a leaf which I brought home to draw for you; b is another from a place close by. Fig. 2 is a piece of the same leaf magnified. You see the diamond-shaped spots plainly in this, with the little dot in the centre. Now I want to make you understand clearly the meaning of these spots and their central dot.

Just imagine that this irregular piece of leaf is a large low house, only one story high, made up of quantities of little rooms placed side by side, and with no entries or passages between them. The under side of the leaf is the floor of the house, the top is the roof, and the diamond-shaped spots all over the top are the roofs of the separate rooms; each spot is a single roof, and covers in one room. The dot in the centre is a wonderful little chimney that leads out of the room into the open air, and keeps it fresh.

These rooms have no doors or windows; they have only these chimneys, for their inhabitants never want to come and go; they only want light and air, and these they get through the chimneys. We have been looking at the liverwort rooms from above; a good magnifying glass will let you look right down the chimney's throat into the rooms, and see the little inhabitants. Now I want to take off the front of one of them, as you take off the front of a baby-house to look in. Fig. 3 is a room cut in this way, though this is cut right down through the middle, so that the chimney is sheered in two, and you may see how it is built.

The floor, f, is very thick, made up of three or four rows of cells; the walls (w) are only one cell deep; the roof (r) slopes up from every side toward the chimney (c), which is in the middle. The chimney, as you see, is built of rows of cells, one laid on top of another, just as the bricks are laid in our chimneys. The inhabitants are like the inhabitants of a greenhouse; they are queer little plants, something like a cactus plant so common in greenhouses or as a window plant.

The liverwort is a plant that seems to be all leaves. There is no regular stem, but the leaves grow on and on, one out of another; the roots (h) are the little glassy hairs that grow from the under part of the leaf.

Fig. 3.—LEAF CUT THROUGH ONE ROOM OF FLOOR. r, Roof; c, Chimney; w, Wall; f, Plants growing inside; h, Root.

What takes the place of a flower, that is, the part that produces the seed, also grows out of the leaf. I hope you noticed in Fig. 1, b, the odd little umbrella-la-shaped things that came out of one, and the blunt, clumsy scalloped clubs out of the other, a. If not, you may look back now and see them, for they are very curious little things.

The first we will examine under the magnifier. Fig. 1, b, is like a little umbrella deeply scalloped about the edge. In Fig. 4 you may see it in two positions very much enlarged. No drawing can give you the least idea how beautiful this is under the microscope (a, Fig. 4); the delicate green spotted with a deeper tint of the same color and from beneath lovely irregular fringes, which look as if they were made of glistening spun glass. When you turn it over (b) you see nestling between the bright fringes a little round body like a pea in its pod; this body comes after the seed. If I had looked for my liverwort earlier, I would not have seen this pea, but would have found something even more singular, which comes before it, as the flower comes before the fruit. We can not talk about things without having some name to call them by, and as the names the botanists give these things are very long and hard and puzzling, we will name them for ourselves, and call these long scalloped umbrellas seed disks, for they grow the seed.

After the seed disks have grown, down between the fringes a tiny bud sprouts, which, when it is complete, is an odd, pretty little vegetable bottle with a ball in the middle (Fig. 4, c), reminding one of the water-bottles with ice frozen in them that we sometimes see at restaurants. When the bottles are full grown the neck peeps out from between the fringes, waiting for something.

Now we will have to go back, as they do in the story-books, and see what the bottles are stretching out their little necks for. On the other growths (Fig. 1, a) you see some queer little toadstools which grow underneath the leaf, and curve around upward till they stand straight up; these usually grow on another plant near by the seed disk, and while one is growing the other is doing the same thing. Now look at one of these little toadstools (they are not really toadstools, but they look like them). I have cut it with a sharp razor right down through the middle, as we did the tiny room of the leaf, and you are looking at it sidewise. You see (Fig. 5, a) that it is all full of little pockets, and that standing on end in each pocket is something like an egg. Fig. 5, b, is this egg enlarged still more.

Each of these eggs is like an immense prison, with hundreds of cells built story on story. In each cell is an impatient little prisoner waiting to get out. You remember I told you the liverworts always lived where there was plenty of water. The water is the fairy that finally lets the prisoners free. It trickles into the pockets and fills them, and the prison walls swell and crack and free the captives. Funny-looking little things they are, too, when they get out! Put them in a little water on a piece of glass and look at them through your microscope, and you will see hundreds of little blunt-handled whips, each with a couple of lashes (Fig. 5, c), which have the singular power of whipping around without any help.

By some unknown means beyond our guessing these diligent little whips, sooner or later in their active trips through the water, find the open mouths of the bottles in the seed disk, and whip themselves in. This was what the bottle was waiting for, and the ball in the bottle, and the whip which has found its way in to it, enter on a very close partnership, just such a partnership as we saw long ago (HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, February 11, 1882) was formed by the pollen and ovule of the geranium, just such a partnership as must be made for the formation of every seed. The little whips are a queer kind of pollen, and the ball in the bottle an ovule.

In ordinary plants the seed formed in this way falls into the ground and makes a new plant, but the liverworts do not. Without leaving its home between the glassy fringes the seed grows till it makes the round pea which we saw in Fig. 4, b; this is made up of a quantity of a kind of seed called spores, and whole bundles of long elastic threads, which, when they are ripe, snap and flit the seed everywhere about, so that one single seed produces thousands of spores, which sow themselves broadcast.

Besides these curious arrangements for sowing themselves, there is yet another. The liverworts, when they find themselves in very comfortable quarters, get lazy; they grow and spread and take their ease, and don't seem to care whether any other liverworts come after them when they die or not; no little disks grow on them to make seed and sow themselves; but whether these disks grow or not, they almost always have on their leaves the little nests marked c on Fig. 1.

Now let us put one of these under the microscope and look at it. If it was hard to give any idea of the seed disk by means of a mere picture, it is impossible here. The nests are the most exquisite things imaginable; the shape you see in Fig. 6, but they look as if they were carved out of a pale emerald, the fringed points shining and glistening, and down in the bottom of the nest lies a treasure-trove of carved gems of a deeper green. Over it all one would imagine diamond dust had been sprinkled, as it glitters and sparkles in the light. These little gems are spores which are washed out of the nest, and taking root, make new plants to bear new nests as beautiful as themselves.

Upon pots in most greenhouses you will find quantities of another kind of liverwort, not nearly so beautiful as the one I have been describing. Instead of the nests there are little crescent-shaped pockets which hold the spores. Another kind has a little upright flask which holds them. But whatever shape they may be, and whether the seed-making disks are on the leaves or not, some kind of cup or pocket for the spores is always formed.

CHAPTER VII.

RESCUED.

WHEN the boys awoke on the following morning the sun had risen, and Captain Sammy had followed his example. He—meaning Captain Sammy, not the sun—had kindled the fire anew; but instead of allowing it to blaze, he was doing all he could to deaden it by flinging green boughs wet in sea-water upon the flames.

The boys watched him for some time in silence, wondering what he was trying to do, until Charley asked him the reason of his strange actions.

"Well, you see"—and Captain Sammy spoke in the tone he always used when telling anything new or strange—"I kinder reckon that when the Jones boy finds that his partner don't turn up this morning he'll tell the folks jest where we are. The chances are that no one will believe him, so I want to keep this smoke goin', for they can see that when they couldn't see the blaze."

* Begun in No. 153, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

After he had thus explained the reason for his work he made them pay for their curiosity by ordering Charley and Bobby to keep enough fire going to raise a smoke, while he seated himself on the point of the ledge to watch for the coming of the rescuing party.

The only toilet which the boys could make that morning was to wash their hands and faces in the salt-water, and dry them on their handkerchiefs, which caused them to understand, as they never had before, how fresh-water, soap, and towels can refresh one.

By the division of labor according to Captain Sammy's orders Dare had nothing to do. At first he secured more firmly the logs which they had cut and rolled into the water the day previous, that there might be no chance of their getting adrift, and in order that they might be all ready for towing to the mainland. Then he helped the other boys in their task; but finding that there was no more work than two could do easily, the idea occurred to him of making an effort to find Tommy Tucker, in order that he might go to Tampa on the same boat that carried the others.

Without Captain Sammy's knowledge, he told Charley and Bobby what he was about to do, and asked them to call him in case any boat came to their rescue.

Then he started, keeping so near the water on his left that he could make no mistake when he wanted to get back.

It was not until he was some distance from the others that he dared to call Tommy's name, for he was afraid that if Captain Sammy should hear him he would try to prevent him from doing good to the pirate in return for evil.

When he did call out it was in a low tone, and he looked carefully around each root or trunk of tree that was large enough to conceal the boy he was in search of.

In this manner he had walked so far that he was beginning to think he ought to return to camp, when he heard a rustling of the leaves, and then came a hoarse, frightened whisper:

"Where's Cap'n Sammy?"

Dare knew, of course, that this question had been asked by the boy he was in search of, and in order that Tommy might not think he was trying to catch him, he stood perfectly quiet, as he replied,

"He's back there on the beach watching for a boat."

There was a moment of silence as if the boy was making up his mind as to whether or no there would be any danger in showing himself, and then Master Tucker stepped out into view.

He was certainly the most discouraged-looking pirate that ever was seen in that part of the country. The sash was still around his waist, and the epaulets on his shoulders, but owing to his plunge in the water, and the night he had spent among the trees, all the glory of coloring was covered with mud and dirt. His face was at least twice as dirty as usual, while each hair on his head seemed to stand out in a different direction, giving him a very comical appearance, especially about the head.

He was far from being the same bold pirate chieftain he had been the day before, and that he had had quite as much of piracy as he wanted was shown by the tone of his voice, as he asked,

"What did Cap'n Sammy say about his boat?"

"He was very angry, and I don't think he would have let me come here to find you if he had known what I was going to do."

"What is he goin' to do to me?" asked Tommy, and his knees actually trembled beneath him, as he thought of the punishment he might receive.

"I don't exactly know," replied Dare, not wanting to tell the boy all the threats made against him by the angry Captain; "but I suppose he will whip you."

"He'll half kill me," replied Master Tucker, sadly.

"I suppose he will be rather hard on you," said Dare, inclined to be sympathetic, but feeling at the same time that Tommy deserved some severe punishment for what he had done. "But I tell you what you had better do: come right out with me, and have it over before any one comes from Tampa to take us off."

"I wouldn't go out there where he is—not for—not for a dollar," exclaimed Tommy, frightened at the simple idea of such a thing.

"But how are you going to get away from here, and what will you get to eat while you do stay?"

"I don't know, an' I don't care. I ain't goin' out there where he is."

Dare noticed that the pirate was so broken in spirit that he no longer called Captain Sammy an "old heathen," which was good proof that he was not as proud and triumphant as he had been ten hours before.

"I s'pose I shall get home some time," said Tommy, sullenly; "but he won't have a chance to get hold of me, I can tell him that, for I can run twice as fast as he can any day."

Dare used all the arguments he could think of to persuade Tommy to go with him and try to gain Captain Sammy's pardon; but his words had no effect.

Master Tucker declared that he had rather stay there and starve than to go out and meet the man whom he had every reason to believe would punish him severely, and he flatly refused every proposal Dare made, replying to each,

"I s'pose I'll get home somehow; but he won't never catch me."

While Dare was urging him to do as he wished, he heard Charley calling loudly, and he knew that some one was coming after them.

"All right, I'll be there!" he replied, and then, turning to Tommy again, he said: "I suppose a boat is in sight, and I must go. Now, Tommy, if you won't come with us, what do you want me to do for you when I get back?"

"Nothin'," replied Tommy, sullenly; and then he disappeared quickly in the bushes, as if he was afraid that Captain Sammy, guided by Dare's voice, would come to catch him.

Dare's attempt to do good to the boy had resulted in nothing; but he was glad that he had made the trial. He walked back to the beach feeling that he ought to have done more, yet not knowing what else he could have done, so great was Tommy's fear of the little Captain.

When Dare reached the beach his father and two men were just landing from a boat, and Captain Sammy was explaining to them his misfortunes, with so many and terrible threats against the boy who had done the mischief, that Dare thought perhaps it was best for Tommy to remain out of sight for a time.

Captain Sammy looked at him sharply as he came up, much as if he understood the errand he had been on, but, greatly to Dare's relief, he did not ask any questions.

Mr. Evans explained that neither he nor his wife had felt any anxiety concerning the boys. Ikey Jones had delivered his message as Tommy had told him to do, but he had run home before any questions could be asked, fearing that he would get into trouble about his share in the theft of the boat.

Mr. Evans, troubled by the scanty information almost as much as he would have been at no word at all, started at once for Ikey's home, and there, owing to the ex-pirate's wholesome dread of his mother's slipper, the whole story had been told.

It was then too late to think of sending for the prisoners that night, and knowing that they would be perfectly safe with the little Captain as leader of the expedition, no fears were entertained regarding them.

Dare told his father how he had seen Tommy, and begged that he would ask Captain Sammy to allow the pirate to go with them. But Mr. Evans refused to do anything in regard to the matter. Tommy deserved punishment, and he thought the man who had been injured by the boy should be allowed to do as he chose regarding him.

The logs that had been cut on the previous day were all ready for towing, and the Captain insisted that the men who had been employed by Mr. Evans should pull them to the mainland, in order that their trip to Dollar Island might not be wholly a failure.

Therefore, greatly to the delight of the boys, they were fastened to the stern of the boat. The oars, sail, and water-cask, which were all that remained of the little Captain's jannity craft, were put on board, and all the prisoners of Dollar Island, except the one who was still hiding in the thicket, were sailing toward Tampa.

Tommy had said that he should make Dollar Island his piratical head-quarters, and he now held full possession of it.

Owing to the heavy logs which were towed by the sail-boat in which Mr. Evans had come to the rescue, the trip from Dollar Island to Tampa was a long one, and during it the boys learned much by listening to a discussion regarding the work which they had undertaken.

Mr. Evans had asked Captain Sammy some questions as to the Pearl, and the little man was in exactly the right mood for conversation.

The question of how much work was needed to raise the sunken boat by the means of the rafts came up, and the Captain inclined to the belief that the three boys could do it unaided in four or five days. He also seemed to think that they could hire planks enough to make a double covering for the frame-work of logs, and by this means their work would be very much lessened.

Mr. Evans told Dare that he could order the necessary lumber hauled to the place where they would need it, and have the bill sent to him. He also bargained with Captain Sammy for the purchase of a small boat he owned, which the boys would need in building the rafts, and which would afterward be useful as a tender to the Pearl, in case she was successfully floated.

The boys were therefore ready for work as soon as they should reach the shore, and it seemed to them as if Tommy's attempt to injure Captain Sammy had resulted very much in their favor.

THE ELEPHANT SOLDIER.

BY MARY D. BRINE.

LONG, long ago, on India's plains,
There raged a battle fierce and strong;
The din of musketry was heard,
And cannon's roar was loud and long.
Old Hero marched with stately tread
His part to act in the affray;
And on his back, above all heads,
The royal ensign waved that day.

Fondly the soldiers viewed their flag,
Which shook its colors to the air.
Proudly the mahout rode, and sent
His watchful gaze now here, now there,
Till "Halt!" he cried; and Hero heard,
And instantly the word obeyed.
When, lo! a flash, a shriek, and then
His driver with the slain was laid.

Oh, fierce and hot the conflict grew!
Yet patiently old Hero stood

Amidst it all, the while his feet

Were stained, alas! with human blood,
His ears were strained to catch the voice
Which only could his steps command,
Nor would he turn when men grew weak,
And panic spread on either hand.

But yet the standard waved aloft;
The fleeing soldiers saw it. "Lo!
We are not conquered yet," they cried,
And rallying, closed upon the foe.
Then turned the tide of conquest, and
The royal ensign waved at last Victorious o'er the blood-stained field
Just as the weary day was past.

Yet waited Hero for the word
Of him whose sole command he knew—
Waited, nor moved one ponderous foot,
To his own captain's orders true.
Three lonely nights, three lonely days,
Poor Hero "halted." Bribe nor threat
Could stir him from the spot. And on His back he bore the standard yet.

Then thought the soldiers of a child
Who lived one hundred miles away,
"The mahout's son! fetch him!" they cried;
"His voice the creature will obey."
He came, the little orphaned lad,
Scarce nine years old. But Hero knew
That many a time the master's son
Had been the "little driver" too.

Obediently the brave old head
Was bowed before the child, and then,
With one long, wistful glance around,
Old Hero's march began again.
Onward he went. The trappings hung
All stained and tattered at his side,
And no one saw the cruel wound
On which the blood was scarcely dried.

But when at last the tents were reached,
The suffering hero raised his head,
And trumpeting his mortal pain,
Looked for the master who was dead;
And then about his master's son
His trunk old Hero feebly wound,
And ere another day had passed
A soldier's honored grave had found.

TWO LITTLE INDIANS.

BY HELEN S. CONANT.

"FINE ripe pomegranates, quinces, pears, tunitas," sang a sweet little voice in the streets of the great city of Mexico. On the pavement, under the shadow of a large church, sat two little Indians, a brother and sister. All around them lay heaps of rich ripe fruit.

Remembering the dear little readers of YOUNG PEOPLE, and that they are interested in boy and girl life in all parts of the world, I stopped to buy some pomegranates of these little fruit merchants, and to win from the shy Indian maiden the story of her simple life.

At first she refused to answer a word, and hid her large black eyes in the striped blue and white cotton mantle which forms a part of the costume of every Indian girl in Mexico. The boy, however, was more talkative, and told me his name was Carlito, which is also the name of many of my readers, only perhaps they do not know that little boys who talk Spanish say Carlito instead of Charley. His sister's name was Luzita, which means very pretty and bright; and very pretty and bright she was, with her plump nut-brown cheeks, her streaming black hair, and her beautiful eyes.

I had a copy of YOUNG PEOPLE in my hand, and as something had to be done to overcome the shyness of these two little Indians, I opened it, and showed them a pretty picture of some soldier boys marching in grand review. A smile rippled all over Carlito's brown face.

"Look, Luzita," he cried—"look at the little soldiers."

The blue cotton mantle fell from the pretty eyes, and Luzita was soon chattering merrily with her brother over the wonderful pictures.

In the city of Mexico are a great number of little Indians. They are a very busy little people, and run about the streets or sit at the corners all day long, selling fruit, sweetmeats, little baskets and brooms which they make themselves, funny little brown jars and plates just large enough for toy kitchen furniture, and many other interesting things. But among them all there are few so intelligent and pretty as Carlito and Luzita.

These two little children had kind parents, who, although they could neither read nor write, knew the importance of knowledge, and sent Carlito and Luzita to school. They were very studious, and had learned to read their little primer and to make big letters on their slates, when one sad morning their papa lay sick and quiet with closed eyes, and before night he was dead.

They lived in a tiny cottage on the banks of one of the old canals which lead from the city of Mexico to the large lake lying miles away at the foot of the mountains. It was not a pretty white cottage like the small farm-houses in the United States, but a low building containing only two rooms. Its walls were of rough stones fastened together with coarse mortar, and the roof was only a thatching of dried plantain leaves; but it was home to this simple Indian family, and now the kind strong father was gone. Carlito, although only ten years old, was the man of the house, and must do a man's work. There was the mother, Luzita (two years older than Carlito), and a baby brother, who lay all day in a basket, fighting the air with his little brown fists. There was the garden full of fresh vegetables planted by the father, which must be harvested by other hands than his; and in the canal in front of the cottage was the rude empty canoe, tied fast to an old tree stump.

Somehow the garden and the canoe must be made to continue their work of bringing bread for the desolate family.

In those first days of sorrow little Carlito sat and thought very earnestly. His head was weary with the care thrown upon him, but his courage grew larger and larger as plans for the future opened before him. His mother could take care of the garden, he was sure of that, for he had seen her digging and hoeing many long sunny days, while the father was away in the city selling vegetables. And he and Luzita could sell things—of course they could. He knew lots of boys and girls who did it who could not reckon and count so well as he could.

Besides the vegetable garden, there were pear-trees, pomegranates, and quince-bushes, all loaded with ripe fruit. And great numbers of tunas grew all about the cottage.

The tuna is a very large cactus, with great round prickly leaves. Its fruit, which is green, and shaped something like a small plump cucumber, has a thick skin, which incloses a pale green pulp as delicious and refreshing as a glass of cool water. The fruit grows in a very curious manner. It has no stem, but springs directly from the top and sides of the great leaf, first appearing as a little green knob, which, after the yellow blossom falls, swells and swells until it attains its full size.

The pomegranate you will perhaps remember as one of the fruits brought back by the men sent by Moses to spy out the land of Canaan. It is a very beautiful fruit, containing hundreds of juicy seed-vessels of the richest crimson. It flourishes all over the American tropics as plentifully as in the Promised Land in olden time.

It was a very proud moment for Carlito when for the first time he loaded his canoe with great bunches of juicy carrots, baskets of fresh pease and beans and tomatoes and peppers, and rich ripe fruit from his own trees, and taking his seat among his treasures, with Luzita at his side, paddled down the canal toward the great city in the early morning. And he was prouder and happier still when, late in the afternoon, he and Luzita paddled home again with an empty canoe, but with their pockets filled with little shining silver pieces.

Hard work and keeping at it brought success to these two little Indians. The mother, with Carlito's help, tilled the little garden, and on days when the load of vegetables was very abundant she would strap the baby on her back, wrapped in her blue and white cotton mantle, and come herself to the city to sell them in the great market place, while the two children sat at the street corner with their fruits. Carlito was soon able to buy a large square piece of straw matting, of which he made an awning, that Luzita might not suffer from the hot rays of the sun.

If you come to the city of Mexico, and go to a certain corner of the street near the great square in front of the Cathedral, you will be sure to find Carlito and Luzita sitting under their awning selling fruit; and if you can talk with them, you will learn that every word of this story of two hard-working little Indians is true.

THE STORY OF CINDERELLA.

"LITTLE FLOY."

BY MRS. WELLS FERRIN.

"WHAT is it?" asked Papa Bisbee.

"What is it?" echoed Mamma Bisbee.

"What is it?" elimed in little Floy.

Dora Bisbee had just unfolded the morning paper, and her low cry of joy and surprise, as her eyes glanced over its columns, caused the little group on the back porch to ask the above question.

Mr. Bisbee laid down his newspaper, his wife paused with her hands in the dough, and little ten-year-old Floy rested her brown hands on the top of the churn-dasher, which she was moving swiftly up and down, to listen as her sister read:

"The celebrated German musician Carl Fraulander will give one of his matchless entertainments in this city this evening in Markwell Hall. As the Professor's fame has long preceded him, it is unnecessary to say that he will meet with a warm reception and crowded house. Let everybody come. Such opportunities are rare."

The Bisbee family lived upon a farm ten miles from the city of C—, and consisted of father and mother and four children. The oldest girls were twins—Cora and Dora—aged seventeen, and possessed of more than ordinary beauty. They had been petted and well-nigh "spoiled" by short-sighted parents and friends, and were looked upon as very superior beings by their younger sister Floy. For had they not been away to boarding-school, and taken music lessons, and learned to do up their hair in the latest style?

"We must all go," said Dora, laying down the paper.

"Of course we must," added Cora, who had appeared in time to hear the announcement.

"I don't see how we can all go," remarked Mr. Bisbee. "The two-seated buggy that I lent yesterday to Neighbor Thomas has lost a bolt, and can't be used until it is repaired. The carriage can seat but three, and that not very comfortably; so somebody will have to stay at home."

It was a plain case—some one must stay. Dora looked hopefully at her mother. Mrs. Bisbee noticed the appealing glance and came promptly to the rescue.

"I could not think of going with baby," she said, "so I will stay, for one."

"And I will stay with mamma," said Floy, who knew she would be expected to make this sacrifice; but she looked straight down at the frothy ring of cream on the churn cover as she said it, that they might not see how hard she was trying to keep back the tears. Musical little girl that she was, she did not know that there was a greater charm in the simple ballads she sang to baby than in the operatic airs her sisters spent so much time in practicing to sing when there was company. But she did know how she had longed to hear the German gentleman sing, and how she had read everything she could find in the papers about him and the other fine singers with him. And now he was coming, and she must stay at home—or somebody must—and she had offered to do so herself, and with so little show of reluctance that the others never guessed what a struggle it had cost her.

"That's a darling!" cried Cora, kissing her. "We'll bring you some candy."

As if candy could make up for it!

And so it was arranged that Mr. Bisbee and the twins should take an early tea, and drive Topsy, the fiery black pony, and reach C— in time to secure good seats in the hall; for it would be crowded, Cora said; and Dora said if she could not get a seat near the platform she would not go at all.

Floy watched the preparations with almost feverish interest, noting how careful Cora was to arrange her hair beamingly, and Dora to place the rich lace at throat and wrists, and wondered if, when she grew to be a "big girl," she would have "such a nice time" as they were going to have. And when they had been tucked into the carriage, and Topsy spun away out of sight, we will not wonder that she did shed a few childish tears of disappointment, and wiped them away with the corner of her calico apron.

By-and-by the twilight began to gather, and with it tokens of a coming storm. The supper dishes had been washed and put away, and Floy was teaching baby to "patty-eake," when the curly head of a neighbor's little son was thrust in at the door, and a piping voice exclaimed:

"Please, Miss Bisbee, could you come over an' doctor mother a bit? She is got awful 'tack nooralgy, an' says fer you to bring over some of your nerve powder. She is berry bad," added the boy, as he detected the doubt in Mrs. Bisbee's manner. That good lady looked at her children, and then at the gathering clouds.

"Will you be afraid to stay alone a little while, Floy? I will come back as soon as possible."

"Oh no, I shall not be one bit afraid. Baby and I will have a nice time while you are gone—won't we, darling?" she said, shaking his string of spools gleefully at him, whereupon Freddie laughed and crowed, and Mrs. Bisbee, kissing them both, went out into the gathering darkness.

Floy amused her baby brother until he began to grow sleepy, and then like a little mother she put on his night-gown and rocked him to sleep, and tucked him in the crib. Meanwhile the rain that had been threatening began to fall in large warm drops, which increased in number, until at length it came pouring down in torrents, with gusts of wind that bent the old elm in the yard, and strewed the ground with branches from neighboring trees.

Little Floy, white and frightened, but with her usual presence of mind, closed the chamber windows first, then those below, and watched the violence of the storm which the blinding flashes of lightning now and then revealed. She thought of her father and sisters, and wondered if they, or any one else, were out in this dreadful storm.

Just then, as if in answer to her questioning thought, there came a knock at the door so loud and determined that it startled her. She thought of tramps, of robbers, of a neighbor—but no neighbor would knock like that. Quaking with fear, she gathered Trip, Cora's poodle, in her arms for a sort of body-guard, and started to answer the summons. She turned the handle slowly, and held the lamp high over her head as she peered out into the gloom.

There, drenched with water and bare-headed, stood a short, stout gentleman—and he was a gentleman. Floy could see at a glance—who bowed politely, and begged to be allowed shelter until the storm was over.

"The wind carried my hat away," he explained, passing his fingers through his wet curly locks. He stepped into the hall at Floy's invitation, and removed his water-soaked overcoat.

"I have been quite unfortunate," he continued, noticing the shy look with which the little girl regarded him. "I expected to reach C—to-night, but owing to a railroad accident I was obliged to stop at the first station above here, and hire a conveyance to the city. It is almost impossible to keep the road, with the rain and lightning blinding one so."

His gentlemanly manner, and that nameless something which comes from long contact with good society, put our little heroine at ease in a moment, and placing an easy-chair for him, she spread his drenched coat before the fire to dry, and proffered him her father's slippers and dressing-gown. They were accepted with a charming bow and "thank you" that quite won her heart.

"You are not keeping house alone this stormy night, are you, my little lady?" asked the gentleman, with a strong flavor of foreign accent.

Floy informed him that papa and the twins had gone to the Fraulander concert, that mamma was visiting a sick friend, and baby was asleep.

"Why did not you go to the concert too?" he asked, pulling at the corner of his black mustache.

"We couldn't all go," replied Floy. "Dora and Cora are the oldest, and of course they couldn't stay at home just for a little girl like me. It's going to be perfectly splendid, too, Dora said; and Cora said I wouldn't appreciate it anyhow," she added, with a slight quiver in her voice, as she thought how at that very moment they were sitting in the blaze of the gas-light, listening to those rapturous melodies she so longed to hear.

The gentleman's eyes twinkled merrily as he asked, "Do you like music?"

"Oh, so much!" was the reply, with a glance at the elegant piano she was seldom allowed to touch lest she leave finger-marks.

"And do you ever play?" continued her questioner.

"Sometimes," said Floy. "When the girls are away mamma lets me practice all I want to. I can play a waltz I learned all by myself," she added, with an air of amusing confidence.

"I love music too. Won't you play your waltz for me?" he asked, coaxingly.

Though naturally timid, Floy's reserve had vanished in the genial presence of the stranger, and so she played and he listened, and even persuaded her to sing for him one of her quaint little songs. The sweet voice warbled like a bird, and then sank into a mournful strain, from which it rose carolling again, until the gentleman clapped his hands in delight.

"You will make a great singer yet, little one," he remarked to the astonished child, stroking her curls. "Just keep on singing, and some day the world will hear of you. And since you have played for me, I will play for you."

He seated himself at the instrument and ran his fingers over the keys. It seemed to Floy that he touched them without knowing what he did, and yet there burst forth such a flood of melodies that the child could scarcely believe her senses, and crept close beside him to watch his hands as they flew with such wonderful rapidity over the white ivory. And then he sang song after song, until the tears sprang into the great brown eyes: such tender harmonies, such angelic music, she had never listened to before in her short life.

When he had finished he turned and looked into the upturned face. "What! tears?" he exclaimed.

"Oh, it is all so grand, so beautiful!" was the reply.

He caught her hands in his and laughed a merry, ringing laugh, and told her those little hands would some day play much better than his clumsy ones had done. Then going to the door, and finding the storm had ceased, he put on his coat, which was nearly dry at this time, and tying a handkerchief over his head, told his little hostess he must be going. He thanked her for her kindness, and bade her adieu, leaving in her hand a card. She took it to the light, and read thereon, "Carl Fraulander."

Mrs. Bisbee returned soon after, and heard with delight Floy's story. Then they sat quietly by the fire, and waited until a sorry-looking group put in an appearance a few hours later, cold and tired and cross.

The girls told of their disappointment; how the Professor had been prevented by a railroad accident from reaching the city, what a "perfectly horrid" time they had had, and "what a bore it is to live in the country anyhow."

But what was their chagrin when they learned that patient, self-sacrificing little Floy had been the great musician's sole audience, and that he had sung for her some of his choicest productions! There was no help for it, however, and they bore it with as good a grace as could be expected.

Ten years have passed away. Again it is September, mild and mellow and golden, with fruitage ripening everywhere, and hazy glory hanging over lake and mountain.

The farm-house upon the hill is a trifle grayer than of yore, and the vines clamber more wildly over its porches, while the trees cast denser shadows than they did when first we made the acquaintance of the Bisbee family. Let us peep within these walls again, for it is evening now and the lamps are lighted. Beside the window in his great easy-chair the father reclines. His usually active limbs are quiet now; but the doctor says his disease is not as yet dangerous; only he must have the best of nursing and perfect rest. The mother moves quietly about, but her step is slower, and her black hair is threaded with silver.

"Hark! didn't I hear a footstep? Has she come?" the invalid asks, eagerly.

"It is only the breeze, father."

But listen! What sound is that we hear? Is it not some one singing? The sick man hears it too, for the drooping head is quickly raised, and he bends forward to listen. In at the open window it floats, a snatch of "Home, Sweet Home," low and soft and sweet, yet clear as the notes of a silver lute. It seems to electrify the eager listener, who starts from his seat, forgetful of his weak limbs, but is gently drawn back by his wife.

"Wait a moment, Robert," she says. "Listen again." But there is no mistaking that bird-like voice as it trills and quavers on the willing air, only it is richer and fuller and more complete, and holds the old couple as if spell-bound for a moment.

But it is only for a moment, and then the singer is in their midst. It is Floy, who has returned from the school of art and music, where she has won high honors, to gladden the dear home with her sweet presence, and waken the echoes with her joyous songs.

The offer of a salaried position in the gay city has been declined, because home duties rank first in her warm little heart. And mother's eyes grow moist, and father's hand rests long and lovingly on the young head, as they welcome her home again.

Perhaps the Professor's words that the world will hear of her may be realized some day, but just now Floy is the support of old age and the comforter in its lonely hours. In the years to come the sweet songs and ballads that she sings for the little audience at home may be heard in concert halls, and delight hundreds of listeners; for the Professor says that Floy has only to study a little while longer, when she will more than realize all that he ever prophesied of her.

PEAWEEES, OR PONIES.

MARBLES, AND WHERE THEY COME FROM.

BY A. W. ROBERTS.

IS there a wide-awake boy, a boy who goes to school, and knows how to enjoy himself during play-time as well as how to study hard during study hours, that does not know all about "fen dubs," "fen h'isting," "fen punching," "fen inching," "fen grinds," and "fen bunching"? If there is such a boy, he has missed a great deal of fun in never having learned and used these mystical sayings; and when perhaps he becomes a father or a grandfather he will lose much pleasure in not being able to take a hand in with the youngsters, and tell how he played marbles when he was a boy.

Although it is many and many a year since I wore the skin off my knuckles and my trousers out at the knees, and flattered myself that I knew all about marbles, it was not until recently, when talking with the wholesale dealers in marbles, that I had to acknowledge that there was still very much to be learned on the subject that is interesting and new.

I was told that in ancient times, away back before the Christian era, games were played with marbles, not the beautiful round, smooth, and polished ones of the present day, but with round sea-worn stones and pebbles; also that marbles are frequently met with in the ruins of old cities, and among the other wonderful relics found in the buried city of Pompeii.

As to which particular nation or people first manufactured stone and glass marbles nothing is known. About the first mention we have of them is that they were introduced into England from Holland as early as 1620. This being the case, the boys have our early Dutch settlers to thank for the first introduction of marbles to this country, as it is not at all probable that the stern Pilgrims would encourage the playing of games with round stones.

All the dealers in marbles—and I have talked with very many of them—tell me that the entire stock of marbles for the American market comes from Germany, and that the prices paid for manufacturing them are so low that no American laborer would or could live on such wages. A great deal of the work, such as moulding and painting, is performed by poor little children.

I shall never again watch a lot of happy, intelligent, bright, well-fed, and well-clothed American boys playing at marbles but I shall think of the poorly clad German children munching away on a piece of black bread (for that is all they get to eat) as they work on their weary tasks for a few cents a week. Poor little things! it is no wonder they love America, and wish they were human marbles and could roll over here.

The common gray marble is made of a hard stone found near Coburg, in Saxony. This stone is first broken with a hammer into small square fragments. From 100 to 200 of these are ground at one time in a mill which resembles a flour mill. The lower stone remains at rest, and is provided with several concentric circular grooves or furrows. The upper stone is of the same size as the lower, but revolves by means of water-power. Little streams of water are allowed to flow into the furrows of the lower stone. The pressure of the "runner" (the upper stone) on the pieces rolls them over in all directions, until in about a quarter of an hour they are reduced to nearly perfect spheres.

An establishment with three such mills can turn out over sixty thousand marbles a week. This operation is for the coarser kinds of stone marbles. In making the finer grades they are afterward placed in revolving wooden casks in which are cylinders of hard stone, and the marbles, by constantly rubbing against one another and against the stone cylinders, become very smooth. To give them a high polish the dust formed in the last operation is taken out of the cask, which is then charged with fine emery powder. The very highest and last grade of polish is effected with "putty powder." Marbles thus produced are known to the trade as "polished gray marbles." They also are stained different colors, and are then known as "colored marbles," and are sold by the New York wholesale dealers at from seventy to eighty cents per thousand.

What the maker receives for them I leave you to imagine, for the German wholesale dealer must obtain his profit, then comes the cost of sending them to this country, and the Custom-house duty, and a profit for the American dealer who disposes of them at eighty cents per thousand. As there are twenty to twenty-five lines or varieties of German marbles, it is not to be wondered at that they hold their own against even the labor and time saving machinery of America.

After the small gray marbles come the largest-sized marbles, or bowlers, now called "bosses" by the New York boys. These are one and a quarter inches in diameter, and cost from $6 to $7 per thousand. The next grade of marbles includes the "china alleys," "burnt agates," "glass agates," and "jaspers," though with the trade these are all called marbles. China alleys are painted in fine circles of various colors, or in small broad rings, in which case they are known as "bull's-eyes." Some of these are pressed in wooden moulds, after which they are painted and baked. These cost from 50 cents to $7 50 per thousand, according to the size. The better and more highly finished alleys are made of china, carefully moulded, painted, and fire-glazed. These cost from $2 75 to $15 per thousand, the largest being an inch and a half in diameter. Our illustrations in every case show the marbles full size.

Next come the jaspers, or, as the boys call them, "Croton alleys," consisting of glazed and unglazed white china handsomely marbled with blue. The "burnt agates" are also china, and highly glazed; in color they are a mixture of dark and light brown with splashes of white; when green is introduced with the above colors they are known as "moss agates"; by the dealers they are known as "im-

GLASS FIGURE AGATE.

CARNELIAN AGATE.

CROTON, OR JASPER.

BIRD'S EGG.

itation agates." The prices of these range from $2 75 to $7 50 per thousand. Then comes a very large and beautiful class or variety of alleys known as "glass marbles." These range in size from two inches in diameter down to the small "peawees," and are of every conceivable combination of colored glass. Some contain figures of animals and birds, and are known as "glass figure marbles." These are pressed in polished metal moulds the parts of which fit so closely together that not the slightest trace of them is to be seen on the alleys, which is not the case with most of the pressed china alleys, for if one looks over a number of them sharply he will detect a small ridge encircling some of them. The "opals," "glimmers," "blood," "ruby," "spangled," "figured," and imitation carnelian all come in this class, and are all very beautiful.

Now come the most beautiful and expensive of all marbles—the true agates and true carnelians. These are gems, and are quoted as high as $45 per gross wholesale for the largest sizes. They are of the most exquisite combinations of colors in grays and reds, and are all highly polished by hand on lapidaries' wheels. Last and least in size are the "peawees" or "pony" alleys and marbles. They are comical little chaps no larger than a good-sized marrowfat pea. Of late years gilded and silvered marbles have been introduced, also a style speckled with various colored paints, which are called "birds' eggs."

When playing marbles it is well to provide one's self with a pad on which to kneel, thereby avoiding all soiling and wearing out of the knees of one's pants. A rest for the hand when "knuckling down," consisting of a piece of the fur of any animal, will be found very convenient when playing on coarse sandy soils.

"CHILDREN."

Chil-dren, nev-er mind how small, Nor how fat, or thin, or tall,

Wish, as lit-tle chil-dren should, To be ver-y, ver-y good.

Yet I find, however small,
Whether fat, or thin, or tall,
Little children, as a rule,
Do not like to go to school.

I've remarked, however small,
Whether fat, or thin, or tall,
Children much too kindly take
To plum-pudding, sweets, and cake.

Further, I have noticed that,
Whether tall, or thin, or fat,

Children, do just what you please,

Wear their stockings at the knees.

You've remarked—at least you ought—
Children fat, or tall, or short,
Though you have them tipped with steel,
Tread their hoots down at the heel.

Men have tried, and tried in vain,
This great problem to explain,
Why poor children, though they would,
Are so very seldom good.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

SO many of you have written to me about your interest in the fair for Young People's Cot, which was held in New York on March 28, that I think you will be glad to know something about it. The tables were loaded with pretty and useful articles, many of which had been made by little girls. I saw Aunt Edna there, and Miss Fanshawe, who has been so kind in receiving and taking care of the contributions for the Cot. Aunt Edna showed me some of the tasteful articles which had come to her all the way from Texas, California, the Carolinas, and Virginia on purpose to adorn her table. I was very glad that the Postmistress was not the only person who went to the fair because it was held for Young People's Cot. There were visitors there who had come by boat and by rail from several places outside of New York, and the ladies were very busy in waiting on them.

As for the fish-pond, there was such a crowd in its neighborhood that I could not get a glimpse of its treasures. And the boys with tiny trumpets, and the girls flying here and there, you should all have seen them! I can not tell you yet just how much money was made at the fair, but it was so much that you will be perfectly delighted when Miss Fanshawe shall announce it in her next report.

When the Cot is endowed, and the little child who belongs to us is occupying it, then, dears, I shall go to St. Mary's and see the pleasant ward where the children are cared for by the gentle Sisters, and tell you all about it.

NEW YORK CITY.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have been sick in bed for over a year, but am getting better. I thought I would amuse myself by writing to YOUNG PEOPLE. Papa carried me down to our library and pilloved me up in the window on the evening of Barmen's procession, which passed our house. It was quite a rousing sight for me, as it was the first time I had seen anything of the kind since Decoration-day last year.

I am Jumbo in London some fine ago. On my brother Gerald's birthday mamma gave him permission to celebrate it, as he pleased, so he decided we should all spend the day in the Zoological Gardens, and we must all ride Jumbo—even mamma! We had great fun. We also rode camels, all except mamma. She said it was enough of fun to have ridden Jumbo.

One time, when we were in London, before Gerald's birthday celebration, a very funny thing happened. We were all at the Zoo, looking at the giraffes. One giraffe stood in front of mamma. Suddenly a little girl called out, "Oh, mamma, look at that giraffe eating that lady's head off!" We all turned to look, and mamma discovered that the giraffe was calmly nibbling off the crown of her hat! The giraffe was the only one of the party who was not frightened. He quietly walked off with his mouth full of artificial flowers. Mamma had to hurry home, having had enough of the Zoo for that day.

I am afraid I will not be well in time to see Jumbo this year. My little brother Arthur went there yesterday, and said, "Oh, it was bully; but every fellow ought to be allowed to go three days to really see it." Arthur is eight years old.

I hope my letter is not too long to be printed. I enjoy YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I like Mr. Alden's and Mr. Stoddard's stories very much. I wish Mr. Stoddard would write a sequel to the "Talking Leaves." Of course I like Mr. Lillie's stories, because she is my aunt. I enjoy reading them in MS. I have written this all myself. Perhaps you are as tired of it as I am.

JOHN J. M. (11 years).

We are not a bit tired of so merry and descriptive a letter, but I haven't a doubt that you were ready to lie back in your reclining chair or among the pillows, and rest awhile after writing it. What a droll giraffe, to be so easily cheated by the flowers on a lady's bonnet! Did you ever hear of the artist who painted flowers so beautifully that he deceived the bees, which went flying toward the picture to find the sweets they love? I imagine some little folks will exclaim, "O-o-h! what a fortunate boy, to see Mrs. Lillie's stories so long before we do!"

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I have eight dolls. One of them is very large. Her name is Mrs. Edith Lillian Montague de St. Evedard. About two years ago she was married, but her husband Robert lost his head, both arms, and one leg (I think mamma threw him in the ash barrel), so she is a widow. She has a daughter, Carrie May. Carrie is a jointed bisque doll, with lovely dark blue eyes and curly hair. The others are named Edith, Mabel, Daisy, Belle, Mammie, and Nellie.

Last Christmas a very kind lady friend of papa's and mamma's sent me a beautiful doll's dressing-case. It has everything so nice: three bottles of cologne, one of bandoline, a piece of lovely pink soap, sponges, two brushes, a comb, powder, face and puff, wash-bowl, pitcher, soap-dishes, sachet, and even an oil-skin cap. Don't you think she was a very nice lady to know just what little girls like?

This is the first letter I have ever written. My brother Percy used to write letters to you, but he is twelve years old now, and he lets me take YOUNG PEOPLE this year, and we both receive it. I love Young People too, but I like YOUNG PEOPLE best, because it comes every week, and I understand things in it better. ELLA M.C.D.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA.

I was surprised to see the name of Mignon C. of Dresden, Germany, in the columns of YOUNG PEOPLE. She and I were dear friends once, and if we go to Europe this summer I hope we may meet her, that is, if she has not forgotten me by this time. I too, like Minnie M., live "way down South in Dixie," but have travelled all over the North. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since the first number, and enjoy it exceedingly.

Living in the city, I don't have many pets, only a French Angora cat and a canary. As these were raised together they get along very well. But I should not like to trust Master Tom (the cat) too far, for instinct might prove stronger than training. If it is not too much trouble, will you kindly tell me on what day fell the 11th of August, 1869? ANNIE L. T.

The 11th of August, 1869, fell on Sunday.

KONA, HAWAII, SANDWICH ISLANDS.

My name is Harold James Manning B. I am four years old, and more than three feet high. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and mamma has read all about Santa Claus in it, and I thought you would know where he lived, so I asked papa to write and ask you if you could let me where he lives. I will sing every day "A green hill far away." I have a little calf; his name is Billy; his mother is Jenny; they come and eat out of my hand. I am a good boy, but sometimes am a naughty. My dog and I get grapes to eat. My father takes care of me. The mango-trees are all in flower. We have nice mangoes, peaches, and bananas. We have a big dog, a yellow Mopsy. He is the top, because he will run away sometimes. We have a little rice-bird that is building its nest in a bunch of bananas. Please put this letter in your paper, and let me know where Santa Claus lives. Papa is a farmer, and sees long ridges of mountains. That's all from HAROLD.

My darling boy, where Santa Claus lives is a great secret, and nobody ever finds it out until he or she has grown so wise, or else so foolish, that Santa Claus has no time to ring his bells at that person's door. Does papa read fairy tales to you? If so, when you have found the singing leaves, and the talking bird, and all the other queer and pretty things in the land of the fairies, you may perhaps discover and sanctify home. That rice-bird probably knows it, but she is too busy with her nest in the bananas to tell little Harold.

Will you listen while two little people—Frank and Virginia—tell you about a large Newfoundland dog who had a name, but not a name, and she was a little girl? On one occasion, mamma tells us, she went with her papa and mamma to spend the evening with a friend. When they were ready to return home, they saw a carriage, no horse and carriage at the post where grandpa had fastened her. As it was not more than a mile to their house, they all started to walk, and they went on for some time, but when they were coming after them with the horse and carriage. They thought that he must have gone out to the carriage when he heard it come, and finding no one in it, he was following him with the carriage, and carriage turned around, and induced the old horse to leave the little colt she had probably come home to see, and to return with him in rear. As he was following him with the carriage, grandpa, grandpa, and mamma were all in it was after ten o'clock at night. The faithful dog was walking backward right in front of the horse, and he was following him with the carriage.

I am writing this for little brother and myself, as I am the oldest—ten years, and he be but seven. He has a pet squirrel, which was given to him, but it is so anxious about its health and life, that he hardly likes to keep it. I can almost hear you say, "Rather too long a letter," so in haste we bid you good-by. FRANK and VIRGINIA S.

P.S.—Mamma's receipt for

DROP GINGEBREAD.

Half a cup of butter, three-quarters of a cup of sugar, three-quarters of a cup of molasses, half a cup of sweet milk, a full tea-spoonful of soda, two eggs, and three cups of flour; spice; bake in party pans. V. S.

I am so glad you would to hear from us boys. Seems to me most people don't like boys, only my mamma she says her boys are her rubies, and her girls are her pearls. We live in the country, and have five acres, and in summer I have to weed mamma's flowers; and if I feed the chickens I may sell the eggs and keep the money for my own use. Mamma reads the papers to me at school, and take lessons on the violin, and I have to practice every morning before school. Sister takes lessons on the piano, and we play some evening society together. Sister likes to see mamma play with us, or papa on his flute. My best amusement is my violin. The book I like best is Uncle Remus's Sayings and Doings. We just laugh when papa reads that. He sits there and says, "Mamma I have read, because mamma reads lots to me. I have two sisters and one little baby brother. He is two years old, and has long light curls. Sister is ten and a half. I am nine. Another thing I like is to use tools. My papa gave me a splendid great big chest on Christmas, and a real wood-bench, and mamma lets me have it when my nursery, and she sits there and makes, and I make things. Sister and I are saving our money for the Cot; we have ten cents apiece each week, but we have to buy our own pencils and candy and at Sunday-school, so it takes a long time. Mamma won't let us chew wax. It eat much candy, and she won't pay us money for doing our work, while she says it's our duty. Sister has a note, and she says to my mamma—"He who aims at the sun will surely hit something higher than his foot." We study every night, but I don't go to bed till 10. I have some holidays. When we play games—go-bag, cribbage, or logzomahy. I just loved "Tober Tyler." I have two dogs, and they always follow the carriage; one is a fine hunting dog, and the other isn't.

RUX N. W.

Where does Rux live? He forgot to tell us.

I have written to the Post-office Box before, but my letter was not printed, so I am going to try again, and hope this letter will not go into the bin, like the last. I have a sister and am studying German. I have a sister and a brother, Fannie and Clyde. I have a little dog about ten inches high, and his name is Jumbo. He runs away to bed every night, and he goes out in the street when the boys are playing marbles, and he runs away with the marbles. We had a cat, but when we moved the cat would not live in our new house. I have some folks near Chicago in 1873, '74, and '75. At night my brother and sister play dominoes, except Thursday. Then we read HAPPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I think "Taming the Pearl" is a splendid story.

ORRIN G.

WAYSBIE, MISSISSIPPI.

I am a little girl six years old. My sister and I like to read the paper. She sent you a picture at Wazgto No. 31. Hers was an alligator, and although there are two alligators in our last paper, hers doesn't appear. We hope to see it yet, though, because we think it real good. My papa has sold his place here, and is going to Texas. He is so far away I'm afraid YOUNG PEOPLE will never find us, and that's what grieves me. We will write you yet, then we will tell you what to send in. Uncle Cate tells us that all the boys in Texas are "cowboys." That isn't so, is it?

AMMIE W.

Uncle Cate ought to know. Does he keep a sober face when he tells you that story about the Texas boys? YOUNG PEOPLE will be sure to find you, if you remember to send your new address.

TERRILL, PENNSYLVANIA.

Very often children get tired of their toys and cry for something new, and most likely their crying makes their parents or older sisters angry with them. Take a ledger, or day-book, or any such book that you want to keep, and if you are writing or not, and cut out about half the pages (do not tear them, as it will make those you do not want come out, and then take any cards you do not want, and paste them in). Cut out pictures, and paste them in also, arranging them as prettily as possible. Get colored ones, if possible, as the others will not look very nice, or put a large card in the middle that arranges other pictures around it, or fix them in any way that is pretty.

I made one for my brothers and sisters, and find it very convenient. I think, if some of the subscribers of YOUNG PEOPLE will make one of their younger brothers or sisters, that they will like it very much. They will feel proud to say that they have a scrap-book as well as Susie or Anna.

M. B.

MOUNTAIN PARK, WERNERSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am sick in bed. My mamma has just been reading to me the letters in YOUNG PEOPLE. I like them very much, and asked her to write one for me, but she says she has no time. We live in the town of Medford. It was too cold there for mamma (the mercury below zero for one month), and she was taken ill, so a few weeks ago she came and lived with me wither. My mamma and sister who is fourteen years old, came with me to be cured of asthma. He is much better.

I had fine weather here for a few days on a pair of long legs, but on one day the bob broke, and we were all thrown off. I hit the back of my head and the lower end of my spine very hard against the stone wall, and have not been well since, but the doctor says I will be around again in a few days. I told mamma this is the place for well people to get sick, and sick people to get well. It is a very nice place, though, because they make mamma well and do not give me any medicine, but they will not let me go to school. I like the Sunday-school, and I like to get well better than I do the foundations and hot packs.

One day George and I were up on the mountain, looking at the great old chestnut, dogwood, and juniper trees, lying on a great moss-covered stone, when we saw about a dozen squirrels jumping, playing, and scolding above our heads. It was fun to watch them. George wished he had his gun, but I did not.

I am ten years old. I wish I could see Barnum's barkers perform. I wish I had a book to teach me how to draw. I like the story of my? I have a splendid great watch-dog at home. We call him Caesar. It was almost as hard to say good-by to him as to my brother Will. Was that wrong? I send love to you and all the letter-writers.

P.S.—I received a beautiful book just before I left home from my teacher for being the best scholar in the school. Is there any room for you to put in the Post-office Box? I hope not.

I am very sorry you met with so dreadful an accident. In HAPPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE No. 156, Vol. III., you will find a capital article on the training and teaching of dogs by Edward I. Stevenson, who knows all about them.

ATMENS, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little boy six years old, and have been taking HAPPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since the beginning of the year, and like it very much. I can hardly wait from one Tuesday to the next. Mamma or sister will read the stories to me every week. I have no pets except one cat named Jumbo. I think he is very wonderful. Sometimes he tries to steal a drink of milk from the cream pitcher; he can not get his head in, so he sticks his foot in and laps the milk from it. I have a little friend Willie who comes to play with me very often.

DOUGLAS K. B.

HERE IS A YOUNG GENTLEMAN WHO KNOWS HOW TO WRITE A BUSINESS LETTER:

I saw in the Post-office Box a letter from Norman T. asking how you would write an order for a tailor's goose if two were wanted. Here is the way I would write one:

EVANSTON, ILLINOIS, March 27, 1883.

Messrs. Hubbard, Spencer, & Co.,

CHICAGO.—Dear Sir, I enclose a check for a tailor's goose? If so, please send two of the above-named articles to.

FRANK GOULD.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

Our brother takes YOUNG PEOPLE, and he reads it to us in the evening. We like Humy Brown's stories best. We wish he would write some more. Won't you ask him to? Mamma gave us a darling little blue pig on Easter. Bob (that is our brother) likes to go to make a house for him. We often go out to Fairmount Park when the weather is pleasant, and sometimes we take our dolls. We have ten of them. Our sister is writing this letter for me, she is ever so kind to us. Will you please print this letter, as we have never had any of ours printed before?

LENA and LOTT A. (aged 5 years).

LEWISTON, MAINE.

I want to tell you what is done with the YOUNG PEOPLE that comes to my mother every week. My father is the pastor, and mother has a class of small boys in Sunday-school. After YOUNG PEOPLE comes she puts a thick wrapping-paper cover on it, and lends it to the oldest boy in her class. He keeps it one week, and then brings it back the next Sunday, and it goes to the next oldest, and so on. In this way they each have a new one every week. Then, after it has gone through the class, down to the youngest boy, she takes it again, and lends it to the boy who blows the organ in church. One day this week he came to the door and wanted to know if "this box" a policeman's son "couldn't have it to read." So that makes another one. Then mother takes off the extra cover and sends it by mail to one of my cousins—or rather to three of them in a bundle. When they are done with it they take it to two more of my little cousins, and then it goes to still another, and even a fourth. There it stops, and is stowed away in the bottom of a box. Mother's son says she is going to have them all again, to make a scrap-book of, though I tell her it will be a scrap-book indeed—a very, very, very scrap-book. My father has a dollar and a half in her life, and I think so too.

ALICE.—There is no book that teaches all that is to be learned before you can be a good lawn-tennis player. The principal rules and some account of the game were given in No. 84 of HAPPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and Nos. 44 and 45, Vol. XIV., of HAPPER'S BAZAR contain some very good hints about positions in play, etc. The Rules of Lawn Tennis are published by Wright & Ditson, Boston.

VIOLA.—Plenty of cold water freely used, and regular exercise both out doors and in, will make your skin clear, your eyes bright, and your cheeks rosy. A good complexion is the sign of perfect health, so if you take care of the one, the other will take care of itself. Have you a garden? If so, an hour's work daily among the plants from this time until autumn will help to make you strong, cheerful, and beautiful too.

GOSSAMERS.

BY JENNY MARSH PARKER.

As I went out with my brel-nun-ber-ee,

The rain pouring down, pray what did I see

Out there by the school-house just before nine?—
Some forty odd some things hard to define.

They were black—oh, so black!—except a white nose.
Perhaps they were crazy overgrown crows;
Perhaps they were turtles—big fellows that go
Tiptoeing around on their hind-legs, you know.

There, now! I have guessed it! It's plain as can be!
They were seals, hobbling seals, just up from the sea.
A shower won't hurt 'em. They're going to try
What it is to be quiet in school, and get dry.

A STORY OF A CHAFFINCH.

I AM going to tell you a true story about a chaffinch. One morning when I came down-stairs I heard a great chattering going on, and went to the door to see what was the matter. I saw a chaffinch lying on the ground under a tree, and another flying and dancin' round it and kissing it. By kissing it I mean putting its beak close to the other's, as I dare say you have often seen birds in a cage do.

I went to the bird and took it up, and found that it was warm, but quite dead. When I took it in my hand the mate hopped on to the twig just above my head, as if to see what I was doing with it. I then laid it down on the same spot, and went in to breakfast. All through breakfast the bird went on in the same way. Afterward I went to my household duties. Then, as it still kept on doing the same, I took away the dead bird and put it behind the outside window-blind of the drawing-room, the window being wide open. The chaffinch, however, kept hovering near the window, and did not seem to mind my being there.

Presently I went away into the garden for half an hour, and when I came back I found that the chaffinch had carried away the dead bird and laid it under the same tree, and was again doing all it could to rouse it; first chirping, then singing a long note, then flying down and hovering round it and kissing it; then settling on the branch once more, and trying another note. It went on in this way the whole day, seldom leaving its dead mate, or, so far as I saw, taking any food; and so I left it when I went to bed at night, and next morning when I came down it was still there, going on in the same way.

Then I felt that it was cruel to let the poor little bird go on any longer, so I took away the dead bird and buried it, and from that time I saw no more of the other chaffinch, though I often thought of it, and hoped it would find another mate.

PRISONER'S BASE.

BY AN OLD BOY.

DON'T be afraid of the game because of the diagram, boys, for you can readily mark it out on any kind of ground, and it is by no means necessary that the lines should be drawn straight or even.

The squares A and B are the bases, which must be large enough to contain all the players; the smaller squares, A-1 and B-1, are the prisons. The number of players must be evenly divided, each side having a captain, and they must occupy the bases. Having decided which side shall open the game, the captain sends out one of his men, who goes to C, cries out "Chivy," and then runs back to his base. If one of the opposite side can touch him before he gets home, he is obliged to go to prison; if belonging to A side, he goes to A-1, if to B side, to B-1, remaining there until one of his party can take him out.

The pursuing player is, of course, not allowed to chase the "chivy" unmolested, one of "chivy's" side being ordered to pursue and touch him, and this latter becomes in his turn an object of pursuit; and thus, if the two captains so decide, each player may be pursuing and pursued. It is not allowed that more than one shall chase one of the other side, therefore each boy has his own particular object of pursuit.

A player may only touch that opponent who has left home before himself, and can of course only be touched by one who has left after him. When a player has made a capture he has the right to return home without being pursued, and can not be touched until he starts out again.

A player once touched is obliged to go to his prison, and remain there until one of his side can reach him untouched, when both may return in safety to the home base. The prisoner need keep only his feet in prison, and may reach over the line as far as possible. If there are several prisoners, they may form a chain, one only remaining in prison, and the others extending as far outside as the length of their arms will permit.

The game is won by the side which succeeds in getting all the members of the opposite side in prison at one time.

WORKING ON THE RAFTS.

IN order not to spend the time necessary to go to the hotel for breakfast. Dare asked that he and Bobby might be allowed to go directly to Captain Sammy's dock, where they could get both the boat and the chain-cables, while Charley should go to the hotel for sufficient food to serve them as breakfast and dinner.

* Begun in No. 175, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE

This Mr. Evans consented to, while Captain Sammy forwarded matters very much by saying that he would attend to ordering the lumber and nails, and then the sail-boat was headed for the sunken Pearl.

Upon arriving there the logs were left, anchored near the beach, and since it was then ebb-tide, they would be aground ready for the boys to begin work on them by the time they should return.

Here also Mr. Evans and Charley were landed, as they were then nearer the hotel than they would be at the little Captain's dock, and then the sail-boat started again.

At the dock the tender was brought out of the boat-house in which she had been placed to protect her from the rays of the sun, and the boys were surprised to find that she was as neat and serviceable a little craft as they could have wished for. From the manner in which she had been spoken of they expected to find an ordinary boat, rather the worse for wear, instead of one that hardly bore marks of usage.

The building in which Captain Sammy stored what he called "odds and ends" looked more like a regular shop than an ordinary store-house, for in it could have been found almost everything necessary to fit out a vessel for a long cruise.

After the chain-cables, which were to be used to pass under the Pearl and fasten to the rafts, had been laid aside for transportation, Captain Sammy selected a number of smaller chains, which he explained could be used to fasten the ends of the logs together.

Hammers, wrenches, and a quantity of stout staples to fasten the ends of the chains were also selected from the general stock, and when at last the little man concluded they had enough with which to begin work, it was found that it made altogether too much of a load for the small boat to carry.

"You can take the smaller things with you, an' I'll send the heavier stuff by the same team that takes the lumber," said Captain Sammy, and the boys started at once, only too anxious to begin operations without further loss of time.

Although they had not spent much time at the dock, they found Charley waiting for them when they rounded the point beyond which the Pearl lay in her watery resting-place.

He had with him a plentiful supply of provisions and a pail of water; but the wonderfully good news which he brought received more immediate attention than the food did, hungry as they were.

The landlord of the hotel, who knew, as almost every one in Tampa did by this time, of the work which the boys had on hand, had proposed to Mr. Evans that the young workmen be saved the trouble and time of walking back and forth from the hotel to the scene of their labors. In order to avoid this he had offered to loan them a shelter tent and some bedding, and Mr. Evans having accepted the offer, the tent would be sent down some time during the day.

It was great news, to be sure, and they felt that even if they did not succeed in raising the Pearl, they should have a glorious time camping out on the beach.

After their excitement had subsided sufficiently, they ate their breakfast, and a very hearty one they made too, and then, the tide having gone down so far as to leave the logs high and dry, they began their work, which they felt confident would be crowned with success.

The two timbers that were to form the sides of one of the rafts were hollowed out at each end, so that the logs which were to be placed on them would rest firmly, and the same work was performed on those that were to serve as ends. Then the four were laid together, forming very nearly a square, and around their overlapping ends were placed chains, which were made secure by driving staples through the links into the logs.

It was nearly two hours before the first one was thus made ready for the planking, but the time was well spent, for the timbers were fastened as securely as a carpenter could have done it.

This work was hardly completed when Captain Sammy, seated on a huge load of lumber, rode slowly down the beach, and under his direction the planks were laid across the logs and nailed firmly in their places. In this way a double flooring was laid, which, although it was not water-tight, of course, would have very great buoyancy, which even a larger craft than the Pearl could hardly overcome.

While this work was being done some of the men from the hotel brought the tent and bedding, and Captain Sammy exerted himself to give a good many more than the necessary orders in regard to putting it up, at the same time that he was issuing commands thick and fast to the builders of the raft.

Therefore, by the time the boys were ready for their dinner, they were able to eat it within the tent, through the open flaps of which they could see one of their lifting machines all ready to be floated off to the sunken steamer, whose smoke-stack was then showing above the water.

Captain Sammy had invited himself to dinner, and despite the manner in which he had ordered them around during the forenoon, they were glad to have him with them, for with all his bluster and scolding, his companionship was pleasant, and he rendered them a great deal of assistance.

He scolded because he was obliged to stay there and superintend the operations, when both he and they knew that it was his own pleasure to be there. He fussed about this thing and that until the boys were more than ever convinced that his petulant ways concealed a good-natured, cheery old gentleman.

But during all the time, when he talked of almost everything, not one word did he speak regarding the pirate of Dollar Island.

From the time they had returned to the mainland, even though so many things had occurred to make him happy, Dare had been anxious regarding Tommy Tucker, and now, while they were enjoying an after-dinner rest, and Captain Sammy appeared to be in such excellent humor, he resolved to speak a good word for the captive.

At first he tried to bring the conversation around so that the little man would speak first of the prisoner; but in this he was unsuccessful, for he carefully avoided a mention of the ex-pirate's name.

Then Dare spoke of the discomfort of being obliged to remain in such a place as Dollar Island, and concluded by reminding the Captain that Tommy was there with nothing to eat, and no chance of making his escape.

"An' I hope he will stay there, too," said Captain Sammy, savagely. "I just hope he'll have to stay there two weeks anyhow, an' then when he gets over here I'll make it lively enough for him so he'll forget he's ever been lonesome."

"But he would starve to death!" exclaimed Dare, horrified at the thought of any one being forced to remain so long in such a place.

"Starve? Not a bit of it. He knows how to find plenty to eat, an' if he does go hungry a little while it 'll do him a power of good."

Surely it did seem as if, in Captain Sammy's present state of mind, he would never consent to any plan for Tommy's relief; but Dare had no idea of giving up so easily. He told the Captain boldly that he was anxious to go after the boy, and asked him to consent to their going, because, in a certain sense, it was for him to say how much punishment Tommy should receive.

Captain Sammy was, or professed to be, in a towering rage when Dare concluded, and he declared that they should not go to Dollar Island if he was obliged to stand guard over them all night in order to prevent it.

Dare argued and entreated for a long time, but all to no purpose, until Captain Sammy, as if tired at being urged so strongly, said, with a growl of impatience,

"If I'll agree to your goin' after that villain, will you agree to look out for him while you are here, an' be responsible for him?"

Dare hesitated; he was not quite willing to promise so much, for fear he could not carry it out, but yet he felt very anxious to release the boy.

"I'll do the best I can, sir," he replied, after some thought, "and we'll make him promise to behave himself."

"Oh, he'll promise it quick enough," sneered Captain Sammy. "He'll promise anything; but you've got to see that he keeps his word."

"We'll all do the best we can to look out for him, won't we, boys?" asked Dare, pleased at the thought that he had won Captain Sammy over after such a struggle.

Charley and Bobby nodded their heads to show that they accepted their portion of the contract, although Bobby was not as cheerful about it as Dare would have liked to have seen him.

"Now I'll give my consent to the plan if you'll promise that you won't go after him until to-morrow morning," said Captain Sammy, with a terrible frown. "One day isn't enough to give him all he needs of Dollar Island."

Dare thought it the refinement of cruelty to keep the poor fellow there so long, no matter how much wrong he had done; but Captain Sammy was firm in the stand he had taken, and no amount of persuasion could shake him.

"Not an hour sooner," he said, decidedly; "and when you land him, even then you want to be sure an' keep him away from here, or I'll—" Captain Sammy tapped his wooden leg in a way that told plainly enough what he would have said.

Dare was obliged to content himself with having so far overcome the injured Captain; but he promised himself that they would start at a very early hour on the next morning.

"Now!"—and Captain Sammy jumped to his feet as if he had just discovered that they had been wasting valuable time—"if you boys think you can waste your time in this way, you are mistaken. The Pearl will never show her bows above water if you don't go to work."

There was no need of urging the boys to exertion, and as soon as he had shown that he was ready to continue the labor they were at it with a will.

Owing to the little man's disposition to work as well as command, the second raft was built in less time than the first, and when Captain Sammy started for home it was with the promise that he would return at low water on the following day, and help them to make fast to the steamer.

Both rafts were anchored so that there would be no possibility of their drifting away during the night, and the boys felt that they had reason to be satisfied with their day's work.

Shortly after Captain Sammy had left them Mr. and Mrs. Evans paid them a visit. Mr. Evans came for the purpose of bringing them something to eat, and his wife that she might be sure they would be safe and comfortable during the night.

It was while Dare was talking with his parents about the difficulty he had had in persuading Captain Sammy to allow them to go for Tommy, that his mother suggested that one of the boys should find out where Mrs. Tucker lived, so that she might be told of her son's whereabouts.

Charley offered to carry the information to the pirate's mother, and when his parents returned to the hotel he accompanied them, leaving Dare and Bobby to look out for the camp, and to speculate upon their chances for lifting the steamer the next day.

When Charley returned he reported that he had found Mrs. Tucker's house, and had told her where her son was. She had been very anxious about him, but as soon as she knew where he was she appeared to think that he would get home in some way, and seemed indifferent about the matter, save that she said she hoped Captain Sammy would whip some of Tommy's foolish ideas out of his head.

The boys were tired enough to go to bed early; but before they did so they were obliged to wait until the tide had floated the rafts, so that they could anchor them in the proper position for beginning the morrow's work.

When that was done, and their boat had been drawn up some distance on the beach, the boys rolled into their camp-bed, where the ripple of the water on the beach lulled them to sleep in a remarkably short time.

RIDING AN ALLIGATOR.

BY S. MILLER.

I CAME in my journey to the banks of a river which was crossed by a ford. A train of pack mules was passing, and while waiting my turn I went into the ferry-house to escape the heat of the morning sun. Several other gentlemen were there. Presently an Indian came to the door and addressed us in Spanish, saying,

"Would the señores like to see me ride the alligator?"

Standing around his hut, he received with satisfaction gold pieces amounting in value to nearly five dollars. He placed these in his money-belt, and saying, "I am ready," led the way. He then drew out a sharp-pointed knife, and felt its edge as he walked.

The river lay before us, with deep, black water on either side the shallow ford. The opposite bank was steep, and a don at my side remarked that below the water's edge it was dug out in burrows, where the caymans (as they are called in those parts) were wont to lie in bad weather tier above tier. Now they were out in full force, spread over the sand on our shore like scaly logs.

Our Indian, a lithe, active fellow, ran lightly up to one of the beasts, and before the astonished animal could recover himself enough to sweep his tail around and dash him down, his enemy was upon his back, and had seated himself directly behind the fore-legs, clasping the body, and holding the knife still in his hand. Rage and fury entered the beast's heart. He slipped into the deep water, and made for his particular place of refuge. Once there, woe to his rider! But the dominion given to man over all beasts did not fail now. With a prick of the knife in the creature his rider defeated his purpose, and he plunged madly around the water basin.

No ride was ever wilder, no circus-rider more skillful, than the clinging Indian in the wild race that was now begun. Stirring the muddy depths, churning the waves with the greatest commotion, round and round they flew, ever faster and faster, now above, now below the surface. The Indian, cool and wary, by an occasional prod of the knife caused his strange steed to swerve from dangerous points. Whichever direction he wished him to take, he pricked him on the opposite side.

When it became evident to our circus-rider that he had given us a fair display of his powers, we saw him watchfully and cautiously prepare to land. And this part of the exploit was most wonderful of all. How to leap in mid-career from the furious creature—this was the task—and it was as admirably executed as any other part of the performance. As they neared our shore, the Indian, having gathered himself up, leaped lightly off, waded to shore, and came toward us with as much of a smile on his sad countenance as any of his race ever show.

Now downward, swifter than if a thousand spurs were driving him, dived the great creature to solace himself in the cool sunless caverns of the river's depths.

SPRING-TIME

BY MRS M. E. SANGSTER

MY little bright eyed darling,
Pray did you ever see
The dainty flower-angels
Who flit through bush and tree?
They come when April coaxes
The baby leaves apart,
And to and fro on errands
Of gentle haste they dart.

And oh! the joy they feel, dear,
When, in a tender quest,
Some shining April morning
They find a fairy nest,
A pretty birdie's cradle
Just rocking in the air,
With pearly eggs close lying,
Tucked in with fondest care.

The little cherub wachers
Have learned one secret well—
That songs and wings are prisoned
In every fragile shell;
But till the shell is broken
The melodies are dumb,
And so the flower-angels
To free the birdies come.

STAR-FISH.

BY SARAH COOPER.

THOSE of you who go to the sea-shore in summer have perhaps discovered that star-fish like rocky coasts the best. They are found most abundantly where the crevices between the stones afford good hiding-places for themselves and for the animals upon which they feed. They do not thrive upon muddy or sandy bottoms, and boys and girls hunting for curiosities upon such beaches are often disappointed to find no star-fish.

They spend most of their time creeping over the rocks, though they love to be where the tide will ripple over their bodies and keep them well supplied with sea water, which they depend upon for their lives. Those poor half-dead star-fish which we sometimes see in a pitiful condition on the beach will often revive if placed in sea water, or, if left on the beach, the next high wave may restore them by carrying them out to sea again.

Our dried specimens are yellow, but when alive star-fish are of a dull red color, sometimes tinged with purple. They seem plump and fat on being taken from the ocean, but they are only puffed up with water; and if you watch them closely you will see the water oozing out all over the back. No doubt you have learned how tedious and discouraging it is to attempt to dry star-fish. You have perhaps been obliged to go home, as many before you have done, and leave them still drying in the sun. It may help you to know that the best way is to put them first in fresh-water, which kills them at once; then leave them for an hour or two in alcohol to harden the tissues before placing them in the sun or in a warm oven to dry.

Our common star-fish has five hollow rays or arms, extending from the centre like a star. If any of these rays are broken off, others grow in their places. It is a singular fact that these animals can break themselves to pieces, or throw off their rays, when they become alarmed. A gentleman who was not familiar with this odd habit of the star-fish was once strolling on the beach, and carrying carelessly a fine large specimen by one of its rays. Suddenly the inanimate-looking creature threw off one of the lower rays. The look of dismay with which the gentleman dropped the star-fish when he found it was breaking itself to pieces was highly amusing. In this case the star-fish accomplished nothing but its own partial destruction, whereas if it had broken off the ray by which it was held, there might have been some hope of escape for the remainder of its body.

Star-fish glide along smoothly, and without apparent effort. They bend their bodies into various shapes to fit the inequalities of the surface over which they creep, and in order to do this they require a movable skeleton. See how beautifully nature has provided for this necessity by forming the skeleton of thin limestone plates, so joined as to admit of slight motion. These plates are represented in Fig. 1, which is the under side of a ray, and the end having been broken off, we can see the two hollow tubes which it contains.

Look now at the upper side of your star-fish, Fig. 3, and notice the knobs and short spines with which it is covered.

Fig. 2.—INTERIOR OF RAY.

Between these spines are tiny forks, with two prongs that are constantly snapping. The use of the forks is not perfectly understood; they sometimes catch small prey, and they may also be useful in removing particles of matter that would choke up the pores which open on the surface. The first thing your bright eyes will discover is probably the round spot near the middle of the back and between two of the rays. That is called the "madrepore body," and it is an interesting object. Examine it with your microscope, and try to think what those tiny holes can be intended for. It must be a sieve. Yes, it is a sieve, admitting water into tubes which run to the end of each ray. During life the madreporic body is bright-colored, and it strains all the water that enters the tubes, so there is no danger of their becoming choked.

Now if we turn our star-fish over we shall find its mouth on the under side. This is an important organ, too, for the star-fish busy themselves continually with eating. They are especially fond of live oysters and clams, and they have the oddest way of eating them. They turn their stomachs right out into the oyster shell, surrounding the soft body of the oyster, and sucking it up. When the star-fish feeds it not only bends its rays into a cupshape to hold on to its prey, but multitudes of tiny suckers spring up to help, and the prey finds escape impossible. Oysters are generally so quick to close their shells in time of danger that we can not understand why they should allow the sluggish star-fish to catch them napping. It has been suggested that the star-fish drops into the shell some liquid which paralyzes the oyster, but this no one knows.

So you see the star-fish, without any tools, is able to help itself to raw oysters. Do you not think it has the advantage here of boys and girls? It would puzzle any of you, I imagine, to open oysters without a knife or other tool.

The way in which star-fish walk is also curious. It will repay you well to examine the next living star-fish you find, and notice the odd manner in which it glides along. In the middle of each ray is a double row of hollow tubes, which squirm and grope around like a multitude of worms. As these are the organs by which they move, they are called tube-feet. They are lengthened and enlarged, much as the tentacles of sea-anemones are, by filling them with water. For this purpose each tube-foot is connected with a little round bag filled with water from the water tube running down the ray. When the bag contracts it forces water into the foot, which reaches forward and attaches itself by a round sucker on the end to the surface over which the animal wishes to move. In this way one sucker after another is stretched out to cling to the surface, and as the suckers are shortened again by expelling the water, the body is dragged forward. Fig. 2 shows the interior of one of the rays. The tube-feet, g, are shrunk up quite short, which makes the water-bags, h, all the larger. Notice the mouth, a, the stomach, b, and the intestine, c.

The double rows of tube-feet are set in a deep groove. In your dried specimens the tube-feet have shrivelled up and fallen away, and in the grooves you will probably see a number of delicate plates arranged side by side in two rows. These are called "ambulacral plates," and they are sufficiently far apart to allow water to flow out between them from the water-bags into the tube-feet. Notice this in Fig. 1. On the outer edge of the rays is a number of stiff spines.

Star-fish have a liver and intestines. Their organs do not lie wholly in the central portion, but they extend into the five hollow arms. They also have nerves, which surround the mouth and pass down each arm, where they end in a red eye speck. This, you see, gives the star-fish five eyes. You would think that with such a number of eyes that they could see everything that is going on. But these eyes are not perfect like yours, and it is very probable that they can see but little. Star-fish are said to be careful of their eggs, carrying them with the suckers near the mouth.

Mrs. Elizabeth Agassiz tells the following story, which would seem to prove that they not only see well, but that they are very faithful to their young. A gentleman who was watching a star-fish in a large glass dish wished to examine the eggs closely, so he parted the suckers around the mouth, and took the eggs away. After a time he placed the eggs back in the dish, and was surprised to see the star-fish move toward them, and placing itself over them, fold them again in its suckers. Thinking this must be accidental, he took the eggs again, and putting the star-fish in a larger dish, with some obstacle in the middle, he dropped the eggs in the opposite end of the dish. The star-fish, creeping over the obstacle, went immediately to the eggs and took possession. The experiment was tried the third time, and, as before, the mother lost no time in gathering up the eggs and snugly tucking them away under her suckers.

The star-fish's fondness for fresh oysters is a serious matter to the oyster-grower, and causes him to lose large quantities of his valuable property. It is estimated that the damage every year to the oyster beds between Staten Island and Cape Cod amounts to $100,000. Large numbers of star-fish sometimes appear suddenly and unexpectedly upon shores where oysters are raised. They seem to be washed in from the deep sea, and, settling upon the oysters, they begin their work of destruction, and consume many bushels in a short time. These attacks occur chiefly in the latter part of summer or early in the fall, and are much dreaded by the owners of oyster beds.

An account is given of an oysterman on the Massachusetts coast who, after a few rainy days, discovered that the star-fish had come during the storm, and were having a feast upon his oysters. With an eel-spear he succeeded in catching from the shallow water 2500 star-fish during the next two days. Still, notwithstanding his efforts to save his oysters, this unfortunate fisherman lost 300 bushels within one week.

The oysterman has learned the value of these destructive pests for manure, and those dredged from oyster beds are now saved for fertilizing purposes. We might also attribute to the star-fish a certain usefulness as scavengers of the ocean, since they eat all sorts of animal substances, dead as well as living, and do their full share toward keeping the waters pure.

Some kinds of star-fish have long feathery arms, and are much more beautiful than our common ones which we have been studying.

A DEBT OF YEARS.

BY KATHARINE R. McDOWELL.

CHAPTER I.

"WELL, old fellow, I shouldn't object to being in your boots," was the way Will Mortimer announced himself as he entered the room where his chum Paul Channing was studying. "You're in luck."

"If I'm no more in luck than I am in boots," returned Paul, with a laugh, as he glanced at his slippers, "I don't believe the news will turn my head. A fortune left me, of course?"

"Not exactly, but possibly the beginning of one. One of the Senior societies has offered a prize of a hundred dollars for the best design for their invitations."

"I don't know how I'm particularly interested in that," said Paul.

"You certainly are."

"Why?"

"Because you're going to try for it, and going to win it," said Mortimer, coolly.

"Don't talk nonsense," said Paul.

"I'm not," returned the other. "Didn't you design the programme for the theatricals last winter? 'Twas said you did."

"I had something to do with it," admitted Paul, "but Captain Eckels worked up the thing. It would never have appeared otherwise."

"Well, what's to prevent your designing now, and his contributing the fine work?" suggested Will.

"His being at present in the Bahamas makes it a little awkward," laughed Paul.

"Come to think, I believe it's open only to the college fellows," corrected Mortimer; "but even so, if the design is good, the engraver, I should think, could do the fine work. You'll try anyway, Channing? Get your name up, you know."

"Which society is it?" questioned Paul.

"Something sensible from you at last!" exclaimed Mortimer, as he answered him, and went on to urge, "You've six weeks before you, and even if you shouldn't come in first, you might second or third, and like enough your design would be exhibited, and in that way you'd get your name up."

"This getting one's name up will be your hobby yet, Mortimer," laughed Paul.

"I left some of the fellows copying the notice," said Will, "to slip under Doane's door, with a note bidding him go to work, as we wanted the honor in the Freshman Class; and when some one suggested your name, they said, 'All the better; we'll spur him on too.'"

"No harm in trying," thought Paul, as he read the notice that evening, "though I'm about sure Horton or Weaver will get it; still, as Will says, there is the one chance. 'Decision to be made May 15.' Why, mother's birthday! If it isn't! Imagine sending her a check for a hundred dollars! Think of Ethel—she'd go wild. But, pshaw! here I am building castles equal to the little sister herself. But I'm resolved to try for it," he repeated, "and to go to work to-morrow."

He was as good as his word, so far as going to the society rooms to look over invitations of past years and get a general idea of what was required was concerned; but it did not advance his work to any great degree, for no sooner did he begin to outline a design than those he had examined rose before him, until he almost came to the conclusion that everything had been used.

It was not until a fortnight after that he exclaimed suddenly, "Something that will do at last!" and got out his crayons. "Now I wonder if I'll go to the rooms to-morrow and find that I've seen this?" as he gave a few delicate strokes, and then held off the paper. "Not a bad idea," he added, as he went on. "Why didn't I think of it before?"

That beginning led to his setting aside a daily half-hour or more, and as the work grew under his hand his interest so deepened that it was not even lessened when he heard that the prize was being competed for by students from every class.

"Now if I could only think of a novel way to introduce the society motto," mused Paul, one morning, as he took down the sketch from the topmost shelf of his closet and looked thoughtfully at it. "I'm determined not to have a scroll, nor anything that has been used."

An idea struck him not an hour afterward, and as soon as the recitation was finished he hurried to his room with the intention of making a few strokes, for fear the afternoon might find the suggestion less clear in his mind.

He clambered up the shelves and reached for the sketch.

It was gone!

"Why, I couldn't have put it anywhere else, could I?" Paul exclaimed, calling to mind that he had once or twice thrust it in the table drawer when some of the boys had entered rather hastily.

"No," as he pulled the drawer out, "I remember perfectly putting it up there. Let me look again."

He did, searching through the papers, until there was no doubt left in his mind that the sketch was gone.

Paul stood amazed.

"Stolen!" he cried, his face pale with anger. "But it was here an hour ago," he went on, excitedly, "so I may get track of it—if it isn't destroyed." The mere thought seemed to unman him.

He sank into a chair, and tried to think the matter over calmly.

"No one has ever seen me put the sketch there, except Will. Could he, I wonder," and a light broke over his face—"could he have taken a look at it before he went home, thinking that perhaps the telegram he got summoned him there for really more than a day, and that he might not have another chance? I believe he has," he concluded, "and that in some of his absent-mindedness he has locked it up, or even put it in his satchel. That's more like him yet! I'll probably have a note to-night explaining it all. How little the old fellow dreamed what would come of it! Here I've missed nearly a whole recitation!"

CHAPTER II.

"BUT I wish I knew where Mortimer had put that design," Paul said to himself, later in the day, as he pulled out the drawers of a desk absently. "This is my regular time for working, and I miss it; besides, that motto is just going to work in beautifully."

He looked about the room for some time in an aimless sort of way; then, scarce knowing what he did, mounted a chair which brought his head on a level with the top shelf of the closet.

"Well!" he exclaimed, a moment later, in a tone where surprise, pleasure, and inquiry were blended, as he waved the lost design in the air, "Will is back!"

He looked about the room for other signs of Mortimer's arrival, while a cloud gathered on his face as he noticed there were none, and that the room was exactly as he had left it a few hours before.

"Except"—and he spoke aloud in his earnestness—"this design was not here. Of that I am positive. Now what's the meaning of this? Hallo!" another exclamation as he was closing the closet door, "what's this?"

He turned something over and over in his fingers while a strange expression flitted across his face.

"If here isn't a clew!"

He examined it closely. A horn button indistinctly plaid, such as were fashionable at the time.

"And not Will's, either," Paul declared a moment after, "or I greatly mistake. So it seems I've two fellows to look up," and he smiled grimly. "I only hope I'll light on Mortimer first. He's just fond enough of detective stories to enjoy all this.

"The plot is decidedly thickening," he added, as he went toward the college buildings, wondering what course to take in the event of further developments. There was one nearer at hand than he imagined.

A squad of Eighty-fours were coming toward him, to whom he called,

"Any one seen Mort?"

"No," was the answer as he joined them.

"Gone home, hasn't he?" ventured some one casually.

But Paul did not hear. He had started back, stifling the cry that rose to his lips as his eyes fell upon Philip Doane in a passing squad.

The buttons Philip wore corresponded to the one Paul had found, and there was one missing from his coat!

An hour later Paul sealed a note to Philip Doane which read:

"I would return the button from your coat did I not conclude that you left it in exchange for the use of my design. Bear in mind that I do not accept it as such, but retain it as evidence should any question arise regarding our claims to the Senior prize."

"There," said he, reading it over, "I call that the fair thing. I show him I don't mean to expose him unless he defrauds me. I guess that'll settle him. I'll get it off before Will comes. I've thought better of telling him anything about it."

As he turned to ring a bell summoning Dan, the general errand-runner of the floor, he caught sight of a letter that had been slipped under his door.

"From mother," he exclaimed, tearing it open. Finding the letter a long one, he pulled down the shades, lit the gas, and threw himself in an easy-chair as if the more thoroughly to enjoy it, forgetful for the moment of what the last few hours had revealed.

He read the first page with evident enjoyment, and laughed aloud over something that Ethel had said. But as he went on his brow clouded. Before he had finished the second sheet, he tossed them on the table impatiently.

"What was it?" he asked, half aloud. "Do all in my power for Philip Doane? No; that wasn't it."

He sat down again and took the letter, his eye finding these words:

"I came across an old school friend the week that Ethel and I were away. Can you guess? None other than the dear one I have so often talked of and wondered over—Margaret Grenville. I will tell you some time how strangely our meeting came about. She is now Mrs. Clayton Doane, and has a son in your class—Philip. Do you know him? His mother's has been a sad life, but I pray with her that she may find in her son the comfort she hopes. She is anxious about Philip. He has been thrown in the past with those whose influence has been bad, and she fears his associates at college are not the ones she would choose. If you do not know him, seek him out, and do him all the good you can.

"Remember what Margaret Grenville did for me. How I owe every bright spot in my childhood through God to her. Help him if in your power to be worthy such a mother that he may give her the pleasure that seems reserved for him only to give. I need not suggest ways to you, my dear boy, who probably know far better than I how to repay in part that debt of many years ago."

Paul leaned his head upon his hand while the letter fell to the floor. He sat there so long, so quiet, that no one would have dreamed of the battle within. After a time he lowered the gas, but still sat there. When he did leave his seat long afterward, it was to take the note he had addressed to Philip Doane and hold it in the flame of gas until it had burned entirely away. He then slipped his design hastily in an envelope, and sat down to think a moment before he wrote:

"MY DEAR PHILIP,—I had intended trying for the Senior's prize, but this evening decides me to give it up. I understand you mean to compete. Will this attempt of mine be of any use to you? If so, accept it with wishes for your success. PAUL CHANNING."

Again he sealed an envelope, and this time rang the bell so sharply that Dan was almost immediately at the door.

"Take it at once. Philip Doane. No answer," he said, quietly; then, as the door closed, he threw himself on the bed and half sobbed, half moaned,

"Oh, mother, you can never know, nor Ethel, how hard it was! Only God who helped me ever can."

The few remaining days before the 15th of May passed quickly. Philip Doane had acknowledged Paul's design by a card on which he had hastily pencilled, "With many thanks."

The boys met the day following, and Philip began, "It was awfully kind of you, Channing—"

But Paul interrupted him with, "I only hope it will be of some good to you," in a tone which said, "Don't let's talk about it."

"Well, I should rather think so," returned Doane. "My only wonder is that you didn't finish it up yourself. It strikes me as admirable. All done but the motto, wasn't it?" he ventured, enigmatically.

"Yes," said Paul, exhibiting interest in spite of himself, "and I was going to introduce that at the left." He took a pencil from his pocket, and made a few lines in his notebook, with Philip intent on every stroke.

"It seems to me that's the place for it?" he said, half questioningly.

"Decidedly," said Philip, and there they left the subject.

"When does Mortimer come back?" inquired Philip.

"Not for a week yet," returned the other. "I'm quite lonely, too." He paused a moment before he added, "Come in, Doane, and see me when you can."

CHAPTER III.

THE evening of the 15th was come. Paul was lighting up his room in honor of the return of Mortimer, when he heard a great shouting in the hall.

"What noise is that?" he wondered, going toward the door and opening it. "What are the fellows shouting?" as he listened intently.

The sound came nearer and nearer. A moment later and Will Mortimer bounded into the room.

"They're coming!" he cried, excitedly, "right here; but let me congratulate you first," and he made one of his well-known rushes for Channing. "Don't look so innocent, old boy. It's yours as sure as I'm alive!" and he wrung Paul's hand, and called, in answer to the voices in the hall.

"Mine—what?" stammered Paul, trembling with excitement as he heard "C-h-a-n-n-i-n-g" shouted outside his door, followed by a cheer that seemed to shake the room.

"The prize!" screamed Mortimer in his ear, as the fellows rushed in and caught Paul in their arms, exclaiming at the top of their voices.

"Three cheers for Channing!"

Paul essayed to speak, but his voice was drowned.

"Hear! hear!" cried some one, at which the uproar partially subsided, until Channing's name, given and responded to somewhere out-of-doors, found a ready and deafening echo in his room.

"A mistake. I did not compete," Paul managed to make heard.

"Mortimer," said Paul, "I tell you this is all a mistake."

"No, it is not," said a voice at the other side.

"Doane! You—?" began Paul.

But he got no answer, save from the chorus of voices.

It was far into the night, when quiet had succeeded the noisy enthusiasm of the evening, that Philip Doane tapped at Channing's door.

"What's that for?" asked Paul, fancying it to be Mortimer. Then as there was no answer he turned his head, and on seeing Philip sprang to his feet.

"The very one I was thinking of," he cried, putting out his hand. "Oh, Doane, what can I say?"

"Nothing yet," returned Philip. "Nothing until I tell you something. Perhaps then you will not care to offer me your hand."

"But I already know what you would say, Doane," said Paul, earnestly.

"You do not know that our keys are alike; that I once came into this room, and made use of your design."

"I do—I do," repeated Paul.

Philip drew back. "And knowing that you wrote me what you did?" he cried. "Why did you not despise me as I despised myself even before your note came? Oh, Channing, I can never explain what led me on. I tried to think I wanted the prize more to please mother than the boys, but"—his voice had sunk to almost a whisper—"had I won, I could never have told her, knowing that I had gained by theft. Channing, I thank God you wrote me what you did, and that this way was given me to show I am not all you must have thought me."

"Philip," said Paul, "let me tell you how years ago your mother was the only friend mine had. I thought in this way to pay the debt. But now that you have made me win the prize," he added, with a faint smile, "the debt is heavier still. And your mother?" he questioned, in a low tone. "I thought it would make her happy."

"For mother to know," said Philip, forcing back the tears, "that I have broken away from the others; that I resolve to give up the past, to begin anew, will be more to her than any college triumph; and for her to know too that I have a hope of gaining your friendship!"

"A hope! When it is yours already?" said Paul, in a voice he tried to control as their hands met.

"A HOPE! WHEN IT IS YOURS ALREADY?"

"Good fortune has turned his head!" shouted Will, at which the din commenced again, while he and Philip locked themselves with two others, and in an instant Paul was carried out of his room, through the halls, in one building and out of another, the air still ringing with cheers.

THE ORPHAN GIRL.—BY S. S. CONANT.

O FATHER of all forsaken, take pity on me, I pray;
I look to Thy loving-kindness, alone in the world to-day,
Bereft of father and mother, who have passed to the better land:
O list to my supplication, and lead me by Thy hand!

Ah me, when I think it over, the happy life we led Until that sorrowful morning they told us he was dead,
My strong, brave-hearted brother, who in the war was slain,
And our gray-haired father and mother were ne'er the same again.

Morning and noon and evening she sat by the cottage door,
With dim eyes weeping and longing for him who would come no more,
Until in the dreary autumn she could no longer wait,
And passed from us to meet him within the golden gate.

Ah, father, loving and tender, he loved me well, I know,
But his heart was crushed and broken; he sank beneath the blow:
He always seemed to be searching for something he could not find:
So long they had walked together, he could not stay behind.

Alone in the world, O Father! 'Tis hard and cold, they say;
In trial and temptation, be Thou my help and stay!
Bereft of father and mother, to Thee alone I plead;
O Father of all forsaken, be with me in my need!

My father, mother, and brother, they rest with Thee above;
And I, Thine earthly orphan, I rest me in Thy love;
I go as Thou wilt lead me, upon Thy will I wait Until Thou bid'st me join them within the golden gate.

HOW KATY CAUGHT HIM.

BY ADA CARLETON STODDARD.

"YOU'RE sure you won't be afraid, Katy?"

"Oh no, father!"

"But Tilly is so deaf," added Mr. Dillingham, pausing with his foot on the carriage step. "Shan't I stop and ask Aunt Priscilla to let one of the girls come up?"

"No indeed, father; I won't be a bit frightened."

"Well, there's nothing to hurt you, and I shall be back with your mother some time to-night if it's a possible thing. Good-by, daughter."

Mr. Dillingham seated himself in the vehicle, touched the old gray lightly, and drove away. Katy stood in the door and watched her father off. She was just thirteen years of age, and she didn't feel a bit afraid, and when the carriage was out of sight she bounded off the door-step and across the road to the big barn, whence she presently returned with her apron full of eggs.

"Tilly," she screamed, going into the kitchen—"oh, Tilly, let me make a sponge-cake, all myself, for dinner to-morrow. I've found some eggs, and I want—to make—a sponge-cake."

"Oh yes," said Tilly, quite with the air of one who can hear as well as another one, but who likes to play sometimes at being deaf, "make half a dozen sponge-cakes if you want to, dearie."

So Katy beat the eggs, whites and yolks separately, for ten minutes; she put in the sugar and beat five minutes, and the flour and beat three minutes more, exactly by rule, and when all this was done, and the cake browned to delicious perfection in the big oven, the short November afternoon was already half-way through.

"I'm going to put my cake in the preserve closet, Tilly."

Tilly didn't offer any objection, and Katy carried her sponge-cake through the pantry into the little dark closet beyond. There were rows upon rows of preserve jars, and above them on the upper shelf Katy caught a white gleam from the silver—the ewer and sugar bowl and cake basket and tea-pot, besides a quantity of spoons that had belonged to her great-grandmother. They were very heavy and all of pure silver; and suddenly, as Katy stood gazing up at them, she remembered, with a little shiver of dread, the face of a tramp who had looked in at the door the day before while Tilly was cleaning the silver at the table. He asked for a drink of water, and when he had got it he went away; but it seemed to Katy at this minute that he looked at the silver a great deal longer and sharper than was at all necessary. What if he should come back? He wasn't a vicious-looking tramp; indeed, Tilly had thought and said what a pity it was that he should be a tramp at all—such a bright face he had and such a pretty way of speaking, but—

"You can't tell much by looks," said Katy, wisely, to herself. "I believe mother would almost rather lose the farm than that silver. Anyway I'll put on the padlock before I go to bed. I suppose it's foolish, though."

Perhaps that was the reason she forgot all about it. She sat at the window for a long time, busy with her knitting and with thinking of how glad she would be to see her mother again. Two weeks is so long a time; and Mrs. Dillingham had been a day more than that with a sick sister in Wakefield, almost twenty miles from home. The clouds had shut down heavy and gray, and it would be dark early.

But by the time Katy was ready for bed she had forgotten all about the padlock, though she was really a little nervous and frightened, and wished more than once that Tilly's cot bed in the little room over the kitchen would hold her with Tilly. But she felt better when she had gone upstairs into her own cozy chamber, and had fastened the door; and pretty soon after saying her prayer she crept into bed and fell fast asleep.

When she awoke the clouds had cleared away and the moon was shining full in at her window. She awoke suddenly, with thoughts of the silver in her mind, and presently she heard the chimes of the old clock ring through the house like a bell—twelve.

"I declare," said she to herself then, sitting upright in bed, "I didn't think to lock that closet door. But it's safe enough—mother never thinks of locking it."

She lay down and tried to go to sleep again, but it wasn't a bit of use, though she counted more than two hundred sheep jumping over a gate. She couldn't help thinking of how badly her mother would feel should that silver by any chance be stolen. It seemed to her that there were strange noises all about the house; and once a sound as of a window being moved softly up set her heart to thumping in a very lively way.

"What a goose I am!" she said at length, aloud, and jumping out of bed as she spoke. "It's nothing but a rat. But I'll go down and lock that door. I can't go to sleep till I do."

She slipped into a wrapper, laughing at herself all the while, and went softly down-stairs—so softly that she could scarcely hear the sound of her own stockinged feet as she walked. She took down the padlock and key, which were seldom used, from a nail in the kitchen, and went bravely into the pantry. The moon shining in at the window lighted her way, but it was surely not the moonlight which shone in that dreadful preserve closet, streaming out at the door, which stood wide open.

Katy's heart stood still with horror! There in the closet, on the wide lower shelf, was a lighted lamp, and beside it glistened the heavy old-fashioned cake dish that had belonged to Katy's great-grandmother, and before it stood—Katy was sure—the tramp.

She could hardly keep from screaming, and her hands shook as with the ague; but with one quick dart she slammed the closet door, put the heavy hasp in place, and sprung the padlock. There was a startled exclamation from her prisoner as she did so. It was all Katy heard before she fled from the pantry to the outer door, unlocked it, and sped away through the moonlighted night toward Aunt Priscilla's, a mile distant.

"He can't hurt Tilly," she panted, "and she won't wake up, and he—can't get out. But maybe he'll burn the house up. Oh, why can't father come! and what makes it so far to Aunt Prissy's?"

She didn't get to Aunt Priscilla's. Just at that moment came the sound of carriage wheels, and before Katy had time to do more than recognize the old gray she heard a startled cry from her mother.

"Why, Katy! child alive, what brings you here?"

Then poor little Katy, how she trembled when her father picked her up and placed her in the carriage; and how, almost sobbing with the fear and excitement of it, she told her story; and how, by the time they reached home, she was as nearly in hysterics as it is possible for a well-ordered little girl, with no nerves to speak of, to be.

"There, there, dear! And in your wrapper, too!" said her mother, anxiously. "You might have put on a shawl, Katy. You'll catch your death."

"You must have dreamed it all, daughter," said her father. But he lost no time in entering the house, and he provided himself with a huge pistol, which hadn't been discharged for a dozen years, before he unlocked the closet door and began to open it cautiously. Then Katy and her mother, waiting by the kitchen door, which they took the precaution to hold wide open, heard an exclamation of surprise.

"Aha! you'd better come out, sir, and give yourself up peaceably."

"With the greatest pleasure." It was a laughing voice, and it was a laughing, remarkably good-looking face that presently showed itself over Mr. Dillingham's shoulder in the pantry doorway.

Katy's mother took an eager step forward. "I believe—it is Frank!" she cried. "Why, Frank, Frank Sawyer, where did you fall from?"

The minute Katy saw her mother half crying on the young man's shoulder, with her arms around his neck, she knew that this was the uncle she never remembered to have seen, who had been abroad for years. Poor little Katy once more! How astonished and ashamed she was! To think that she had locked her mother's only brother up in the preserve closet for a thief! How dreadful it was! Katy, with burning cheeks, drew back in the shadow of the open door.

"But how—I declare," laughed Mrs. Dillingham, "I don't much blame Katy."

"It goes without telling," said Katy's uncle, laughing too. "I came on the ten-o'clock train, and made up my mind to walk over from the station. When I got here I knocked at the door, but nobody woke up, so I just made my way in through the window. I was hungrier than a cannibal, and thought I'd get something to eat without waking anybody up. I was after preserves—you know I've a sweet tooth—when I saw grandmother's silver, and I was taking a look at it for the sake of old times, when—presto! I found myself a prisoner."

"It was Katy," said Mrs. Dillingham, laughing until she cried. "Katy—why, what are you hiding for, child? Come here." And Katy reluctantly obeyed.

"Now how was it, daughter?" asked her father, when this new strange uncle had shaken hands with Katy, and kissed her half a dozen times on each cheek.

So Katy told the story over again, this time with a good many laughing interruptions.

"And you were kind of a burglar," she said, stily glancing up, "because you were after the preserves, you know."

"I got in through a window too, Katy. And I ate a whole sponge-cake while I was locked up."

"It was mine," said Katy, laughing again.

Mr. Dillingham sat down, and took his daughter on his knee. "Well," said he, "you'd have done just the same if he'd been a genuine tramp, as he ought to have been, poking around folks' houses in that fashion. I'm proud of you, Katy—did."

"So am I," said Uncle Frank Sawyer, and he rolled up his eyes in a comical way at Katy.

"And so am I," said her mother, and she kissed Katy.

HOW TO PLAY MARBLES.

BY JAMES OTIS.

IN an article published a week ago, boys, you were told where our marbles come from and how they are manufactured. Now for a few new games and some directions how to play them.

The game of Lags is a favorite with the French boys, and is played by any number, who take their places opposite a stone wall. Lines are drawn as in the diagram, about fifteen feet from the wall, the first player having the advantage given him of standing at B, in a direct line from the point to be aimed at, as shown at A. The other players must shoot at an angle, from the points C or D. The first player shoots or throws his marble at the wall in such a way as to make it rebound. The next throws in a similar manner, and if it stops within the span of the player's hand from the first marble, the owner wins one.

All play in the same manner, no one but the first player standing at B, and if the last player should be within a span from all the others he wins a marble from each one. After all have played from the stations, they continue to throw from the spot where their marbles fell. If the alley should strike another one when it rebounds, the owner of the striking alley receives one from him who is at rest, or the latter is put out of the game, as may be decided upon at the beginning.

Bridge-board is played with a little bridge, as shown in the illustration. Eight arches are cut through it, each being large enough to allow a marble to pass through easily. The arches are numbered from 1 to 8, the lowest numbers always being in the middle, and the highest outside. Each player deposits ten marbles in the pool, or less if agreed upon, and then pays one marble to the pool for each shot.

If the alley passes through either of the arches, the player takes from the pool as many marbles as are indicated over the top of the arch through which he passed. If the alley should not pass through the arch, the player receives nothing, and if he misses the bridge altogether he pays another marble into the pool as a fine. In order to win, the alley must pass completely through the arch, and to test whether the marble be through or not, in the event of the question being raised, pass a knife-blade close by the outside of the bridge; if it touches the marble in the least, the player is considered to have missed.

Picking Plums is a game not unlike Bridge-board in principle, but can be played without any board. A line is drawn on the ground, and nine marbles, or "plums," are laid out in it in a row, the space between them being just large enough to allow two marbles to stand side by side. The players contribute a certain number of marbles, so there shall be sufficient to put the plums on the line and leave some in the pool.

In front of the row of plums, and about five inches from it, are three holes, as shown in the illustration. The players pay three marbles to the pool for six shots, and have all they can knock out of the line; but if at any time while they are taking the six shots the player's alley falls into one of the three holes, he not only is obliged to pay one marble to the pool, but loses the number of shots which may be remaining to him. The game can be continued as long as there are any marbles in the pool to make good the row of plums.

Spanners is a simple game, but one which is well calculated to teach correctness of aim. The first shoots his marble to the distance of a few yards, and the other tries to strike it with his own. If he can succeed in doing so, he wins one marble. But there is another point in the game, which is that if No. 1 can shoot his alley so close to No. 2 that he can span the distance between them with the thumb and fingers of one hand, he wins the marble just as if he had hit it. Attempting the span, however, is rather a dangerous plan to follow, since if it fails the opponent is sure to be able to place his own alley so as to secure a span.

The game of Conquerors is probably well known to every boy, and hardly one who reads this article but that can show a favorite conqueror. Yet it should not be called one of the games of marbles, since there is no skill whatever in the playing of it, and he who has the hardest marble wins without effort on his part. Conquerors may be played with stones just as well as with marbles, and then many a favorite alley will be spared to serve its master in the more skillful work of shooting.

Practice shooting; for if any game is worth being played at all, it is worth being played well, and a boy should never be satisfied until he is certain that, either at his sports or his tasks, he is doing the best he can.

Do not be too anxious to hit your opponent's alley when it is at such a distance from you as to make the shot a chance one rather than a certainty. If you are not reasonably sure of the shot, it is far better to simply shoot your own alley into such a position as will give you a good chance next time, or, if your adversary be a good player, get into as secure a place as possible without going too far away from the objective point. There is a great advantage in holding the marble correctly, so that your own alley has a certain spinning motion imparted to it as it leaves your hand, which causes it to fly off at an angle when hitting the object, instead of falling "dead," and remaining perhaps inside the ring.

A GOOD SUBJECT.

BY CHARLES BARNARD

THOMAS LITTLEJOHN POPPENHAMMER was one of those wise boys who believed in that beautiful sentiment, "What boys have done, a boy can do." T. Littlejohn Poppenhammer had heard that boys had learned to take photographs. There were boys' cameras to be had in the stores. Pop decided he must have a camera. The other boys and girls considered it distressing to give T. L. P.'s whole name, so they called him Pop, for short. Some of the more hardy boys called him Little Pop. Pop's father was a wise man, and when his son asked for a camera he gave him one.

It came in a neat box, tripod, camera, dry chemicals, scales, trays, and all. Pop studied the book of directions, and worked hard for a whole day picking apples to earn enough money to buy a dozen dry plates. Intelligent readers of YOUNG PEOPLE will know exactly what all this means—Pop meant to become an amateur photographer.

When the dry plates arrived Pop lighted his red lantern and took the box of plates and the plate-holders of the camera into his mother's linen closet. It made a first-rate dark room, for there was no window, and the door shut tight. Every boy in the neighborhood wanted to see the plates, and Pop took four of them into the dark room.

When the white sheets of glass were seen they felt disappointed.

"Wait till they're exposed," said Pop. "Then you will see things. I tell you it will be fun."

The mysterious work was finished, and Pop and the boys went out to see what they would take first. Every girl wanted to have her portrait taken, and Susie Glover wanted her doll in the foreground with Rover by her side.

"You don't think I'm going to waste my plates taking dolls and dogs? I'm looking for better subjects than that."

Somebody suggested one thing, and some another. There was the old well with the moss growing on the stones. There was the "Fairy Ring," up at Parker's Woods. There was the "Lovers' Lane," and "Poverty Scrabble," and other picturesque places.

It was a very hot day, and while they were preparing the camera they heard a hand-organ in the street. After a while the music stopped, and they thought the man must have gone away.

Just then Sarah Lipstone came along and said, "Oh, such a queer thing! The hand-organ man has fallen asleep with his monkey at Deacon Green's stone wall."

"Hurrah!" said Pop. "Let's take him."

Sam Terry took the camera box, and Pop shouldered the camera on its tripod, and they all crept softly down the street toward Deacon Green's. As they went along they met Sadie Green and Freddy Stinson, and of course they joined the procession. They crept up as softly as possible, and Pop set up the camera, and put the black cloth over his head. Every one looked on with the greatest interest, the boys ready to laugh, and the girls curious to see what would happen.

"It's a good subject," said Pop, in a muffled voice from under the cloth. "I'll focus on his nose."

"Steady, now," said Pop, as he took the cap off the camera. "Look pleasant. One, two, three, four, five—done!"

Pop put on the cap, pushed the slide into the plate-holder, and folded up the tripod. The monkey never winked, and the organ man slept peacefully on. The whole party stole carefully away, every one just ready to laugh at Pop's capture.

When he had arranged all the chemicals in his mother's kitchen that night, he closed the doors and blinds, and by the light of the red lantern he developed the plate. The boys and girls who came to see it done thought it was truly wonderful to see the picture appear on the white plate. It was a great success, and a perfect portrait of the man and the monkey. The expression on the monkey's face was truly beautiful.

The next morning there was a tremendous excitement in the village. The constable was asking every one if he had seen a hand-organ man about.

"He stole a white scarf with black stripes from old Mrs. Smith's clothes-line."

"Here's your man," said Pop, showing a fine blue print from his negative.

"Sho!" said the constable. "That is just complete. It's a regular picture. Why, the man has the scarf round his neck. Will you give me the picture?"

"Oh, certainly," said Pop. "I can print another in five minutes."

They soon caught the man, and Judge Pettis said the photograph was good evidence. The fellow begged hard to be allowed to take his monkey and organ to jail, and the Judge said that he might do so, as it would serve to amuse the prisoners. As for the man, he never knew to this day how it all happened. Pop kept the negative, and often told the story to his friends, presenting them with blue prints of his first subject.

THE INFANTRY.

THE SPECTATORS.

THE CAVALRY.

I HAVE splendid news for you, children! Open your eyes wide, and clap your hands!

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE'S COT, IN ST. MARY'S FREE HOSPITAL, IS ENDOWED!

You need not send any more money, as the treasurer has the full sum—three thousand dollars—in hand.

I think it quite wonderful that the whole amount should have been raised in less than two years. I am sure you will all be as glad as I am.

All the particulars of the conclusion of this grand effort will be given in the next number of YOUR PEOPLE.

Here is a letter from a little correspondent who sees Mount Olympus from her father's door:

SALONICA, TURKEY.
I am nine years old. I live in Turkey in Europe, in the town of Salonica. I have seen the dancing dervishes three times, and they twirl around like tops for an hour at a time. I have also seen howling dervishes once, and they howl like dogs. We have a Turk called a cavass, whom you would call a guard, who goes out walking with us, and hits us the door down a long time to see how his name is usual. The man who buys for us is a Jew, and his name is Sagitto, which means Isaac, but the Jews here call him Isca.

There are the red camels, and the white camels, and it looks very beautiful now, covered with snow. There are a great many camels here, which carry goods into the interior, where there are no roads. They know how to load, and a good many are tied together with a string, and are led by a donkey or a small horse.

I speak Greek, French, and English. My mamma is from America. I was born in America, and so were my two little sisters. I enjoy reading HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I have two volumes of it. I hope you will print this.

HARriet M. D.

BENJON, NEVADA.
I have never written to you before because I never knew anything about you until the 19th of March. I was sent a year-old cat that day, and for a birthday present my cousin Herbert subscribed for HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. It was such a surprise! and I do like it, oh! so much. I must have taken him a long time to give so much money—it would me—and he will not be eight years old until June. What can I give him for his birthday? We can not buy anything in these parts. I wish you would be kind to see this letter in the Box, for he has taken YOUR PEOPLE several years?

Now, dear Postmistress, you will open your eyes when you see the message I have put into your mail; it is a loaf of bread. I made it all myself, even to the yeast, and it is the first I ever made. I should like to join your cooking class. This is the way I mix my yeast and bread:

First, I put on a big apron, and wash my hands. I peel six good-sized potatoes, and put them out to boil. When well done I wash them, and put them back in the water they were boiled in; this water must be very hot. Then I sift enough flour into the potatoes and water to make it quite thick. I put a table-spoonful of hops in a tin cup, and water over it. I do not add salt. I strain the hot water into the mash (dough, potatoes, and water), stir all well together, and set one side to cool.

When cold I add your yeast; that is, some yeast left from the last making. If you have none, buy a yeast-cake, dissolve in warm water, and add this; or you may be able to buy some baker's yeast, but here my mother has to make her own yeast and bread. Now your yeast is made, and it made right, will be very smooth, white, and creamy; if it all lumps, put it through a wire strainer into a stone jar, and let it be in warm room, when it will rise very rapidly, and if your jar in the first place is more than half full it will overflow. We make our yeast bread, when we have our bread ready, we do not add salt to our yeast. Some add a cupful of sugar to a quart of yeast; this takes off the bitterness of the hops, and makes the bread a very little sweet, but we do not use it with the sugar in.

To make bread I see that my bread-pan—a deep clean tin used only to make bread in—is all clean and nice. I put on my kitchen apron, and wash my hands clean my mother then I sift my flour into my pan until it is quite full (an eight-quart pan), with my hand make a hole in the centre of the flour, put in four or five table-spoonfuls of salt, and a half of my yeast, and about two cups of water, cold in summer and tepid in winter. I then with my hands work this up, and gradually add more water until I get my flour all worked in, and the dough so stiff it will not stick to my hands. I cover it with a clean towel, and set near the stove in a warm but not hot place; it is not hot, it will not rise evenly. Be careful, too, not to let it chill.

When it has risen to the top of your pan, and is full of little bubbles, it is ready to knead. Put in your bread-pan and grease them, and put your bread-board on the table, also have ready a pan of sifted flour. Put some of this flour on your board, and take of the risen dough, a spoonful at a time for a loaf of bread. You will find it (the spoutage) very soft and sticky. Work up all the flour the dough will take. The more you knead it the finer-grained your bread will be, for the better the flour the more it takes. Then mould your loaf into shape smooth and nice, put it into your bread-pan, previously greased with a little lard. Put your pans of moist clean muslin (we keep our flour sacks for this purpose) to keep off any dust or ashes (we use wood here to cook with). When your loaves are risen do not let it get a little hot and hot. Do not have too hot a fire. Thrust a straw in the loaves, and if the straw comes out clean, your bread is done.

As our bread is done we put it between two clean cloths we keep for this purpose, and we spread on the table double, lay the loaves on this, and put the other double over it; this prevents the crust from hardening. When cold we put it in an covered tin, which keeps it moist and from getting dry and stale.

I hope you will think my bread nice, and my letter not too long. Have you a cabinet? My mamma says she wishes you had a cabinet of your very, very own. If you had, you would not have time to amuse other people's children.

Ever and ever so much love from your little friend and admirer, ESTELLE S.

The small loaf—white, firm, and sweet—came safely, and I thank you that I was very much pleased, and felt very proud when I took it in my hands. People need never be hungry who have the chance of eating such good bread as yours. Tell mamma if she may be mending torn garments, and sewing buttons on snaques and jackets, and signing school reports, and helping certain young people over puzzling places in their lessons, she would change her opinion. If I hadn't children of my very own, do you think I would know so well, dear, how to talk to my throng of little folk, far and near? I have a cabinet. Who will tell Estelle what to make for her cousin's birthday?

BLOOMINGBROOK, OHIO.
As you have taken such kindly notice of our little girl, she wishes you had a cabinet. I thought it well to write that Betty Boy died of an earth-worm on Easter. Many thanks to those who told us of their turtles; and our pets now are Bessie (our cat), four sets of little chickens, and a Jersey cow and calf. Won't the dear Postmistress come out and drink a pint of warm sweet milk with each of us?—our allowance at each milking. DOTY AND AUNT E.

Farewell to Pretty Boy. Thanks for your kind invitation. Wish me cozy checks like your own when you check your milk, and I shall be satisfied.

This comes from one of my boys:

CLAREMONT, MISSOURI.
I am thirteen years old, and will be fourteen on the 6th of June. I have a twin brother and two sisters, one older than myself, and the other younger than I. My father is a Postmaster. I go into the Post-office every Thursday night, and wait for HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. My brother and I bring in all the wood and feed the horse and cow.

I have no pet except a dog, whose name is Sancho. When I go hunting I take him with me. He goes into the water and brings out ducks and geese about there. The most of little chickens, and silver-corn, and wear a lake about nine miles from town. We usually stay there two weeks. LESTER F.

NEW YORK CITY.
I am a boy twelve years of age, and attend school regularly, and when I come home from school I practice on the piano, and afterward study my lesson for the next day. I like my music very much. I read YOUR PEOPLE, Golden Days, and The Youth's Companion, but of all I like YOUR PEOPLE, the best. I take HARPER'S MAGAZINE too.

I see the boys and girls tell whether they have pets or not. I have a few. The few are my mother's cat, my sister Betty, and my brother Will. We had a bird, but he died of a broken wing, and I think that is enough. Last year I had my HARPER'S MONTHLYS bound, and they made two volumes. EDDIE GRAHAM S.

THREE RIVERS.
I am a little boy twelve years of age. I go to the High School, and I take YOUR PEOPLE, and I am glad to tell you how I subscribed for it.

One day my grandmother asked me what I would like to have for my birthday present, and I told her I would like to subscribe for your beautiful paper, so she gave me $1.50. And she also gave me a beautiful gold watch.

I have a couple of bantams, and the hen lays every day, and I take good care of them, and love them very much. My neighbor has a little pony, and I go out to ride her; she is very wild.

WILLIE F.

MY LITTLE SISTER.

I have a little sister
Whatever she does I kiss her
Although this little midget
Always keeps me in a fidget

She mixes up my play things
And tangles up my kite strings
And I thought she was a baby
She can always lose my ball

She's in mischief all the day
She insists on her own way
But I kiss her what else can I do
When she says Erty I love 00

These pretty verses are the work of Ernest B., a Brooklyn boy nine years old. It sends regards to Jessie C. S., of Montreal, a little friend of his who had a letter to No. 74.

PORTSMOUTH, RHODE ISLAND.

I read the letters from your little girls and boys every week, and so I want to write to you myself, and see how my letter looks in print. I am a Rhode Island girl, and I live on the island of Rhode Island, close, very close, to the shore, on Narragansett Bay, an hour's ride from Newport. I have a great deal of amusement on the shore finding shells and sea-weeds, and little lobsters and crabs and fishes, and digging clams, and bathing in the summer. I have two brothers and two sisters, and we put on our bathing clothes in the house and go to the beach.

I live on a farm, and have plenty of pets—a large water-dog named Joe and two small dogs, besides ducks and hens and guinea-pigs, and my mamma, and I wash dishes, and I can attend to—and a rabbit yard for my rabbits. It is very pleasant here, because we have pears and peaches and cherries and apples. We all help our mamma, and I wash dishes, and I love to do it. I have wanted to write to you a long time, and now I have done it, so good-by from

DAISY S.

LIVERPOOL, ENGLAND.

I am a girl fourteen years old. My brother, who is sixteen, and is in America, sends YOUR PEOPLE to Joseph, my brother, aged twelve. Any, my sister, who is ten, and my mother, and I enjoy it very much. I think "Nan" was by far the best tale; it was so brave in her to be silent when her cousin was in fault. Then, next to "Nan," I think the Post-office Boys is interesting. I am a little American, and staid there eight months. I visited Niagara Falls, and thought they were magnificent. We James, Lillie, Benjie, and myself, saw the Falls during the winter holidays. My brother Benjie is still in America, keeping my aunt company. He is becoming quite an American.

I have had the scarlet fever, but I am well now. I was beautiful with an aunt at Seaford. We have a beautiful pet at home; it is a Persian cat named Pie. She has a lovely gray skin. MARY A. B.

TALLAHASSEE, FLORIDA.

I am learning to keep house, and would like to join the club. I send you a splendid receipt for corn egg bread. It is delicious, and so delicate! I have two canary-birds; they are very sweet to me by my name. I am hanging over the front door. The other day one of the cages was knocked down, and Janie broke her leg. I fear she will die. I never have succeeded in raising any birds. Janie would have eggs, and Robie would eat them.

I am going to have a strawberry bed this summer, and attend to it myself. My mother and I are in the habit of going to the farm. We live on a large farm. This summer I am to attend to the chickens for grandmother. I have nearly a hundred eggs ready to set. LILLIE S. B.

CORN EGG BREAD.

Two cups of buttermilk, one cup of sweet milk, three eggs beaten separately, half a pound of soda, spoonfuls of meal, and one tea-spoonful of salt.

CLACKA, TENNESSEE.

I am a boy twelve years old. I have just moved to this village to attend school. This is my first year, and my mother has taught me at our home in the country. This school is conducted by the Messrs. W., and we think it the finest school in the State. I have about one hundred and thirty-five pupils. The Young Men's Christian Association have services in the school-room every Friday evening after school is dismissed, and practicing once a week.

Will you tell you how we study YOUR PEOPLE in our school. We have a class of forty-four. A lesson is selected by the teacher, and when we are called to our recitation our teacher reads a verse, which we are required to write correctly; then we pass our slates to the one below us for inspection, and if he finds a mistake in writing, spelling, or punctuation, he traps us; then we have to read the lesson, and give the meaning of all the hard words. I have hunted out the meanings of as many as fifty words in one lesson. The one who is at the head and says the lesson gets a distinction. I like YOUR PEOPLE very much, as it supplies the place of both history and geography. Our next lesson will be the last chapter of NAN. WILLIE D. L.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO.

The day had been cold and blustering, and in the night came a wonder: behold! the moon was everywhere. It was surrounded with a large circle, and on either side was something that had the appearance of a rainbow, and in the middle was a cross. This happened in the year 1861, and was very beautiful sight it was. It was because particles of ice in the air acted like so many little mirrors, being reflected upon by the moon.

WORHALL W.

NEW YORK CITY.

I thought I would write and tell you how I employ myself. I am fourteen years old, and have gone through a course of lessons. I can now make up with every alchemy, and will play the circle, and on either side was something that had the appearance of a rainbow, and in the middle was a cross. This happened in the year 1861, and was very beautiful sight it was. It was because particles of ice in the air acted like so many little mirrors, being reflected upon by the moon.

I read of Mamie L. B. and her quilt in No. 177, and will tell her of my crazy quilt, as you asked. I have made one, and will play the circle, and on either side was something that had the appearance of a rainbow, and in the middle was a cross. This happened in the year 1861, and was very beautiful sight it was. It was because particles of ice in the air acted like so many little mirrors, being reflected upon by the moon.

What a clever girl! you have learned dressmaking! But mind the doctor, and do not sew too steadily, especially at the machine.

PITTSFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS.

On seeing a letter from my little cousin in Dresden, Germany, a short time ago, I decided to write one myself for the Boston office. I had written the authors in YOUR PEOPLE are Jimmy Brown and Mrs. John Lillie. I have lately tried several of the Little Housekeepers' receipts, some having been a success and others a failure. The "Mashed Turnip pudding" turned out to be heavy, but the Dolls' Cup Cake was very good indeed, and by adding a little coconut to this receipt it makes it delicious. A dabby dish for tea is mashed potatoes formed into the shape of balls, but let pears, and with a small stick of cinnamon stuck in at the top for a stem they look very tempting when browned over a little in the oven.

MATTIE C.

I am a boy twelve years old, and live on one of the Sea Islands, near Charleston, South Carolina. As there is no school here, I go to my mother. I have a softer dog named Max, and often go shooting, and take him with me. Our place is called Seven Oaks, from a very remarkable old tree on it. This live-oak tree is fifty feet in circumference, with seven distinct trees growing from it. Five are still standing, one is lying on the ground, and the other rotted away years ago. R. C. S.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

My little boy has had the mumps, and has amused himself very much by cutting these designs while he has been in bed, and wishes me to send you these, that perhaps some of the other little children can pass a little time in the same way. The paper can be obtained at the Kindergarten stores, where it is sold for paper-folding. He folds and then cuts the paper in different ways, each time making a new creature when opened. Of course the paper must be folded very exactly, or the designs will not be true. Let me thank you again and again for this beautiful paper; it is everything to be desired for the little ones.

EVELYN'S MAMA.

The designs were very pretty indeed, and I am glad Evelyn can cut them so nicely. Another friend suggests that children amuse themselves by cutting doll heads from the illustrated papers, and pasting them on other bodies with very comical results.

READING, NEW JERSEY.

As I have never written before, I will write now. I have begun a diary; I started it on the 1st of April. Papa says he don't believe I will keep it well. He says if I keep it a year he will get me a nicer one. My papa is a school-teacher, and we children have to study. Sometimes we think it is a little hard, but mother says it is a good thing. Amelia, we made some of your cream almonds, and they were very nice; they tasted like French-candies. I like the story of "Raising the Pearl" very much, and also think that Jimmy Brown's stories are very funny. I would very much like to hear some more about Nan, and how she is getting along in her new home. I am eleven years old.

A LOAF OF BREAD.

Out of a window came a loaf of bread,
And lit a boy on the top of his head;
It scared a horse that was hitched to a gig,
And he took a man run over a pig.

The boy took the bread, and home he posted,
And told his mother he wanted it toasted.
The boy he ate, and he ate, and he ate,
Until he got up with a stomach-ache.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE from the first number. I liked the story of "Nan" so much, I was sorry when it was concluded. I must tell you of the dear little bird I had for a pet. I gave him every three days a drawful of seed, and every day fresh water. One day, when in the room where his cage hung, I looked up at it, and saw him put his head far out and look about, but I thought he was growing tame. That evening my papa saw two mice in the same room, and killed them, after morning on going to his cage to give water as usual, I found him sitting on the bottom of his cage, looking so weak, and on looking into his drawer it was empty, so I hurried and gave him some soaked bread in water, but too late; he died in half an hour—starved to death. The mice had eaten his seed all up, and poor little bird was hungry when he put his head through the bars the day before.

As I can not possibly crowd in all the letters which I want to publish this week, I will answer some of them here. John A. P.: I am sorry that you have been disappointed about your letters. Thanks for your puzzles.—A. H. J.: What a pity to shoot the dear little robins—Alice S.: "Madge" is a very pretty story. Send another some time. I can not make room for this.—Ethel H. Andrews is making a crazy quilt, and exchanging silk and plush scraps with other girls; she lives at No. 322 1/2 Guerrero Street, San Francisco, California.—Frank B.: It was too bad your goats were poisoned. Who could have been so wicked? I would like to see your squirrel.—Willie C.: Kiss Bessie for me.—Henrietta T. P.: My compliments to Tap.—Ella M. P.: There is no charge for the insertion of exchanges. Which of your numerous pets is the favorite? The pug, I fancy.—Carrie B. F.: Thanks for your letter. I am glad you want to learn housekeeping.—George H. P.: So you are to be a cabin-boy and sail to the South Seas. I hope you may become a Captain in time.—Nannie D.: How unfortunate you have been to have all your pets run away or die!—George M. D.: For a boy only eight you write well. Your governess must take pains with you.—Grace J. V.: I remember your other letter. Try a third time, dear. I will think of your suggestion about "Denaerotic."

BOYS' LIBRARY COMMITTEE.—I thought of you on the evening of your reception, and had Belle open on the line of cars that runs through Dream-land you would have seen me there. I wish one of the eight would write and describe your association and its object.

PARLOR GAMES AND FORFEITS.

THE ANIMAL CLUB.

IN this game two of the party are elected to fill the office of President Bergh and his Vice-President; the others each choose some animal, bird, or insect which they will represent. The President then relates an anecdote slowly. At the occurrence of any of the words with an initial letter the same as that of any of the animals, the cry peculiar to it must be imitated by the person who represents it; for instance, if there be a dog, at any word commencing with a d the dog must bark. The Vice-President must be on the watch for any omission. When one occurs, the delinquent must pay a forfeit.

FORFEITS.

The Statesman.—Ask the penitent what State he would like to represent in Congress. When selected, he must be made to spell its name backward without a mistake. If he fails, he knows not the requirements of his constituents, and must lose his election.

THE ECLIPSE.

You are to take an ordinary tea-tray, then mount a chair, and holding the tray up before your face, gradually withdraw it in the manner of an eclipse. A pretty little girl can make this a very pretty picture.

THE EXCHANGE.

You are to give a five-dollar bill in return for your forfeit. This is done by writing out a note as follows:

"To one handkerchief" (or pencil, or whatever the case may be), "five dollars," which you present to the distributor in exchange for your forfeit.

Then you may ask the penitent a conundrum, which, if he answers correctly, of course lets him off.

"Why does a hen cross the road in wet weather?—Because she wants to get to the other side."

"What most resembles a cat?—A kitten."

"How many little girls would it take to reach from Philadelphia to New York?—Seventy-five, for a miss is as good as a mile."

"If a bear should go into Stewart's, what would he want?—Mnsliu" (muzzling).

"If the alphabet were invited out, what time would U, V, W, X, Y, and Z go?—They would go after tea" (T).

AN APE'S REVENGE.

APES, when their anger is aroused, are very dangerous creatures, as they will dare almost anything in order to avenge their wrongs. Many of their deeds of revenge are well known; but the following anecdote, which comes from Italy, is as amusing as any we have yet heard of.

Il Rosso, a disciple of Michael Angelo, resided in Florence, in a house overlooking a garden belonging to some friars. Il Rosso possessed an ape which was on very friendly terms with one of his apprentices called Battistoni, who employed the animal to steal the friars' grapes, letting it down into the adjacent garden and drawing it up again by a rope.

The grapes being missed, a watch was set, and one day a friar caught the ape in the very act. He tried to inflict a thrashing; but the ape got the best of it, and escaped. Il Rosso, however, was sued, and his pet sentenced to wear a weight on its tail. But few days elapsed ere the culprit had an opportunity of avenging this insult.

While the friar was performing mass at a neighboring church, the ape climbed to the part of the roof under which the altar stood, and, to quote Vasari's words, "performed so lively a dance with the weight on his tail that there was not a tile or vase left unbroken; and on the friar's return a torrent of lamentations was heard that lasted for three days." The revenge which the ape took upon the friar was, however, more easy to bear than the vengeance of an elephant who was disappointed in regard to some expected sweetmeats.

A French gentleman living in India had a tame elephant, which was accustomed to go into the dining-room after dinner, and beg from the guests. One day the elephant came when they were at dessert. A gentleman refused to give it anything; but the elephant would not go away. The gentleman, angry at its asking, gave it a stab with his fork. The elephant went into the garden, tore a branch, covered with black ants, off a tree, and shook them over the gentleman's head. The ants got into his ears and down his neck, and at last he undressed and took a bath to get rid of his tormentors.

THE MAY-DAY FÊTE AT BEVERLY HILL.

BY AGNES CARR.

"MISTRESS MAY BEVERLY requests y^e pleasure of your companie at a Maie-day fete, according to y^e custome of y^e olden tyme, at Beverly Hill, on y^e firste daie of Maie, 188-."

This was the invitation, written in old English characters upon rough note-paper, and sealed with wax, that Edith Dinsmore gayly opened and read aloud one mild morning in the middle of April.

"How charming!" she cried, addressing a party of girl friends, each of whom held a similar missive.

"The only thing I don't like about it," remarked Laura Marly, "is that little Brownie Le Brun has an invitation too."

"Has she?" exclaimed Edith. "What could have induced May to ask her? It would have been much nicer if she had kept to our set."

"May is too kind hearted to slight any one," put in Elsie Duncan, "and Annette belongs to our class, and ought to be considered one of the set."

"I am not accustomed to associate with charity girls," said Laura, with a scornful shrug of her shoulders.

"Oh, hush! she must have heard you," whispered Elsie, as a little figure in a well-worn brown dress entered the room, and took a book from a distant table.

"Listeners never hear any good of themselves," remarked Edith. "But here comes May now."

"Good-morning—good-morning, May," was heard on all sides, and the girls gathered round the new-comer, asking eager questions about the coming fête.

"Grandpa, you know," laughed May, "is a real old English gentleman, and delights in ancient customs; and it was his idea to celebrate my sixteenth birthday in this fashion. And we want you all to dress in quaint old costumes; it will make it so much more picturesque."

"We will. Oh, what fun!" exclaimed all the girls.

Annette Le Brun alone was silent, until May Beverly, breaking away from the noisy group, approached her, saying, "And you, Brownie, will come to my fête, of course?"

The girl's dark eyes were misty with tears as she said, softly, "No, I think not; no one will want me."

"Nonsense! I want you, and you will surely not disappoint me on my birthday." And thus urging, May at length won a half-unwilling consent from the plain little French girl to accept her invitation.

Annette Le Brun, or Brownie, as she was more often called, was the daughter of a former French teacher in Mrs. Merwin's "Select School for Young Ladies and Children," but now Madame Le Brun's health had failed, and, unable longer to teach, she eked out a scanty livelihood by doing for large stores the exquisitely fine embroidery that had been taught her years before in a French convent. Mrs. Merwin felt a warm friendship for the poor gentlewoman, and kindly kept Annette in the school, that she might at least have a good education as her capital in life, and for which she partially paid by teaching one or two of the primary classes.

Brownie was bright and capable, but was rather looked down upon by members of her class, only May Beverly and Elsie Duncan ever showing her anything like real kindness. So the poor child's life was a very dreary one, and much as she dreaded to accept it, this invitation to the May-day fête was like a glimpse of paradise.

In direct contrast to little Annette's gray-lined life was that of May. Her parents gave her every care, and she had the loveliest of homes. Beverly Hill was a grand old place overlooking the noble Hudson, and it was Mr. Beverly's delight to form his American home on the model of an old ancestral hall in merry England. So there was an "approach," a large wood-fire place in the spacious hall, and a picture-gallery hung with many portraits of Beverlys of past generations, while the conservatories were a wonder to all the country round.

Unlike the usual 1st of May, the day of the fête dawned bright and warm, and ten o'clock found a gay party of young people collected in the Grand Central Depot awaiting the special car that was to transport them to Beverly Hill. And Annette Le Brun was among them, with an unwonted color on her sallow cheeks and a sparkle in her dark eyes.

It was but a short run through the peaceful spring-awakened country, and on the platform at Beverly Station stood May herself, with her cousin Carl, dressed like two Arcadian peasants, to welcome her guests. Large open carriages were in waiting to convey them up the hill, while at the lodge gate they were met by a gay procession in quaint costumes, which escorted them through the grounds to the house. Some of the girls, clad as milkmaids, bore upon their heads tin pans and pewter plates adorned with garlands; others held aloft on tall poles May wreaths formed of hoops twined with flowers, while the boys carried cows' horns and hollow canes, and waved branches laden with buds and blossoms. As they marched they sang an old May-day song:

"A branch of May we have brought you,
And at your door it stands;
It is but a sprout,
But it's well budded out
By the work of our Lord's hands,

"The hedges and trees they are so green,
As green as any leaf;
Our heavenly Father watered them
With His heavenly dew so sweet.

"The sun shines bright and sheds its light
Upon this festal day;
So God bless you all, both great and small,
And send you a joyful May!"

Arrived at the house, May led the girls to an upper chamber to lay off their wraps, and many were the "Ohs!" and "Ahs!" over the pretty fanciful gowns now revealed, and in which these nineteenth-century maidens looked like village rustics of "y^e olden time." But all were amazed when Brownie Le Brun threw aside her gray cloak, and stepped forth as the daintiest of dainty shepherdesses. The material of her dress was an heirloom, brought long ago from France, and her mother had skillfully fashioned it into an exact copy of a costume worn by Marie Antoinette when she descended from her throne to masquerade at Little Trianon. It well suited Brownie's style, and she looked almost pretty. May and Elsie hugged her in delight, and then the merry party went down the staircase to the grand old hall now decked with greens, and where a wood fire blazed cheerfully upon the hearth.

A collation awaited them in the dining-room, which Mr. Beverly assured them was much like a May-day feast once given by an English ambassador to a Queen of Sweden. The centre piece consisted of three large cheeses adorned with flowers and boughs of trees, and was surrounded by an infinite variety of English sauces, creams, puddings, custards, and tarts, while there was no lack of substantial in the way of broiled chickens, tongue, and cold meats. It was an odd meal, but all enjoyed it from the novelty.

Unfortunately in our climate wild flowers are very chary about appearing by the first of May, only a few hardy dandelions venturing to creep out so soon from their snug winter-quarters; but Mr. Beverly had prepared for this, and the conservatory supplied the flowers that were to be woven into garlands, the prettiest of which was to serve as a crown for the May-Queen.

But before the task of preparing the wreath was begun, and while the girls were walking about the gardens, Laura Marly, Edith Dinsmore, and two or three of the others suddenly found themselves in a lonely dell beneath some drooping willow-trees, whose bending branches swept a little stream that ran foaming and whirling over the stones, forming a series of seething rapids around a group of moss-covered rocks, and finally falling in a silvery cascade down into a deep ravine below.

"What a charming fairy-like nook!" cried Edith.

"And look," said Laura, "at that graceful little maiden-hair fern growing out of the highest rock. It must be the first of the season, and I shall try and get it to twine in my wreath."

"Oh, Laura, don't!" cried the girls. "The current is very swift here, and if you should slip in you would be carried over the falls and surely killed."

"I don't intend to slip," said Laura, stubbornly, "but I do mean to have that fern," and grasping one of the willow sprays as a support, she leaped lightly upon the first slippery stepping-stone leading to the rock in the centre of the stream.

Her companions implored her to return, but with a willful shake of her head she went steadily on, picking her way, while the water boiled around her, until the height was gained, and she reached up for the prize. "You see, I am sure-footed as a chamois," she cried, gayly, as her hand touched the feathery fronds. But at that instant a tiny water-snake, gliding from a crevice in the stone, made her start; she lost her balance, and fell with a loud cry into the rushing water.

"Help me, girls! save me!" she called, in despair, as she tried in vain to regain her feet on the moss-covered stones.

But her friends were panic-stricken, none daring to venture to reach her. One fainted away, another covered her face with her hands and sobbed wildly, while Edith ran up and down, wringing her hands and uttering frightened cries for help.

Laura succeeded in throwing one arm around a stone, which prevented her drifting nearer the fatal fall; but she was soon chilled through, and felt herself losing her hold, when the bushes were pushed aside, and Annette Le Brun appeared upon the bank.

"Will you let Laura drown before your eyes?" she exclaimed, indignantly, as she instantly grasped the situation; and hastily untying a wide sash that she wore, she fairly forced Edith to stand still and hold one end, while, fastening the other about her own waist, she ventured bravely out upon the slippery rocks. Laura watched her approach with eager eyes, and, when near enough, fiercely clutched the gay skirt of the little shepherdess, thereby almost dragging Brownie also into the stream.

"Let go!" commanded the French girl, sternly, "or I can do nothing for you. Wait until I can brace myself against the rock; then take my hand and try to rise."

Laura did as she was told, and with Annette's help succeeded in climbing up on the rock, which was high enough to be almost dry.

"Now we must wait," said Brownie, "until they can bring a board. I will not risk returning on the stones."

By this time Edith's screams had been heard, and boys and girls came trooping from all directions. Mr. Beverly too appeared, with a troubled face.

"What hare-brained girl has been so silly as to cross the Naiad Rapids?" he exclaimed. "It was tempting Providence indeed."

"But that little French girl is a brick," said Ralph Duncan, as he and Carl hastened up with a long plank, which they threw across the stones, and on this rudely constructed bridge the trembling maidens returned safely to land.

"You are indeed a good, brave girl," said Mr. Beverly, with a kind smile, taking Brownie's cold hands in his. "I am proud that May should have such a friend; and Miss Marly will feel that she owes her life to you, for some years ago a laborer's child attempted the same feat, and was swept over the falls forty feet below."

Annette was now the heroine of the day, and all crowded round to praise her presence of mind and courage; but poor Laura was sobbing and shivering with cold; so Mrs. Beverly hurried her up to the house to change her wet clothing.

This was soon accomplished, and the girl, dressed in one of May's suits, seemed to feel no ill effects from her sudden bath. But when Brownie stole softly into the room to try and remove the spots which the spray had made on her pretty costume, she could hardly believe it was her haughty, self-willed class-mate who now threw her arms affectionately round her neck, and in such a humble tone begged her forgiveness for her past unkind treatment.

"For," she said, with a shudder, "Edith, Maud, and Clara were perfectly helpless, and if you had not come as you did I should have lost my hold, and been carried down into the dark ravine below."

To kiss and forgive was very easy for Brownie; and now May too came to thank her for keeping such a shadow away from her birthday fête, and to beg them both to come down to the great hall, where all were now engaged in twining the May wreaths. While they were at work the boys disappeared, and the "flower fays," as some of the ladies called them, were suddenly startled by a cheering and shouting without.

Hastening to see what it might mean, they beheld coming up the road eight yoke of oxen, with daisy-chains about their necks, their horns tipped with tiny nosegays, and drawing after them the old-fashioned May-pole, wound with bright ribbons and flowers, and on which were seated all the merry lads in their picturesque costumes.

With much ceremony and laughter the pole was erected, and then came the choosing of the May-Queen. The lot fell upon the gracious little hostess, who with a queenly air ascended the mossy throne prepared for her, and was crowned with the French girl's wreath, all having agreed that it was the prettiest among them all, and with a kiss for each May chose Brownie and Laura to be her maids of honor. A graceful dance—borrowed from the German—then took place, and merrily they waltzed on the greensward, while the last rays of the setting sun lighted up the pretty scene with a roseate hue.

It had been a merry day in spite of the accident, and after a bounteous tea, served in the hall, the evening hours too sped by with dance and song and jolly cheer. The train left at ten o'clock, when, as she bade her friends good-by, May put into the hands of each of her school-mates a spicy little bouquet, composed of sixteen May-flowers, within which was hidden a golden keepsake as a memento of the day, while in those for Laura and Annette were mingled tiny sprays of maiden-hair fern which Carl had secured from Naiad Rock.

"I shall press mine," said Laura, "and always keep it in remembrance of Brownie's bravery, and I hope it will teach me to be less foolish and self-willed in future."

"And I," said Annette, with a happy smile, "will do the same, as a souvenir of my two dearest friends, May and Laura, and of this lovely May-day fête."

BY D. A. MUNRO.

IT was not till tops came in at the Edinburgh High School that the boys began to see that, after all, James Nasmyth was a very smart fellow. There was, indeed, no reason why he should be dull. He came of a very clever family: his father was a distinguished painter, and had been an intimate friend of the great poet Robert Burns, and his home was the resort of many of the great men of the Scotch capital, like Sir Walter Scott and Dr. Brewster, who liked to spend their evenings there.

But James did not get on so well with his lessons as many of the other boys who had no such advantages. He had been taken from the first school he attended because his teacher had been so annoyed by his stupidity as to give him a brutal whipping, which confined him to bed for more than a week. Since coming to the High School he had always manfully tried to master his tasks, but he was slow at learning from books, and he remained steadily near the foot of his class.

He could read very well, but he often got into trouble about his spelling. The rules of grammar and the names of the tenses puzzled him sadly, and he was fairly distracted by the irregular verbs. So his teachers and companions put him down as one of the dunces of the school.

When top-time came the mistake was found out. Instead of going to the stores like the rest to purchase a top, he brought one down which he had made with his own hands, and that so well that it would spin twice as long as any other top in the whole school. No top could spin so sweetly as his, and the boys gathered in crowds and listened with envy to its hum. It was this top that led to the discovery that the little left-handed boy of nine years had a wonderful skill in making things, and from the time when that became known he was a hero among his school-mates.

* James Nasmyth, Engineer. An Autobiography. Edited by SAMEL SMILES, LL.D. Author of "Lives of the Engineers," "Self-Help," "Character," etc. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; 4to, Paper, 20 Cents.

"THE FAIRIES."—FROM A DRAWING BY JAMES NASMYTH.

Every one of them was anxious to possess something of his manufacture, and he was kept constantly busy in making toys for his friends. He made kites for them, and tissue-paper balloons, and even the brass cannon for celebrating the King's birthday. Then he turned old keys into beautiful little guns by boring touch-holes in their barrels, and putting sliding brass collars on them. In fact, there was scarcely anything that James could not do, and the boys were continually calling for Nasmyth to give them advice or assistance in their difficulties.

It must not be imagined that this skill had come to James only when his companions found out about it. He had always been an observant, old-fashioned child, and had begun to notice things, his mother used to say, when he was only four days old; and from his earliest years tools and things made with tools were his greatest delight. When the servants took him for a walk past the Calton Hill, he would steal away from them and peep in at the doors of the workshops, where men were at work of different kinds amid the blaze of fires and the beatings of hammers.

The greater part of James's knowledge was acquired in his father's work-room. This was an apartment in which Mr. Nasmyth kept a large variety of tools with which he amused himself when tired of painting. After James had learned to walk he would follow his father thither at every opportunity, and sit for hours near the bench, trying to understand all that was going on. As he grew older, Mr. Nasmyth explained to him how the different tools should be used, until at length he was able to handle them himself to such good purpose that he was dubbed "the little jack-of-all-trades." It was in his father's work-room that he made the toys which won the admiration of the High School boys. Mr. Nasmyth gave his son also careful training in the art of drawing, and James soon learned to express his thoughts clearly and exactly by a few strokes of the pencil. In after-years this accomplishment was invaluable to him in the pursuit of his profession, as well as a source of amusement in his leisure hours, which were frequently beguiled by sketching places he had visited, or scenes conjured up by his imagination. The accompanying illustration, giving his idea of the dainty little inhabitants of fairy-land, is a specimen of a series of fanciful drawings made by him as a rest after his day's labors.

James was very glad when he left school. He longed to be an engineer. He set himself in earnest to increase his knowledge of mechanics, and by the continual use of his eyes and his fingers he made rapid progress. He turned his bedroom into a small brass foundry, taking up the carpet to prevent its being soiled, and he would work there at night long after he should have been sound asleep. When he was seventeen years old, he made a small working engine, which he gave to his father to use in grinding the oil-colors for his pictures; and as Mr. Nasmyth took great pride in exhibiting the beautiful machine to the friends and patrons who visited his studio, people began to talk about James, and to predict great things of him. One of his inventions was described in a scientific journal, and he constructed a steam-carriage for the Scottish Society of Arts, which for several months was the amazement of the whole town.

At length James felt that he had learned as much as was to be learned in Edinburgh, and he went to London, where he was engaged as private assistant to a noted engineer, whose factory was the perfection of mechanical excellence. Here he made the best use of his rare opportunities of forming an acquaintance with the principles of his profession, so that when his kind master died he determined to set up in business for himself. Manchester was selected as the place where he should try his fortunes, and thither he went, with a collection of tools which he had made for himself, and a few letters of introduction.

He soon found, however, that the small sum of money which he possessed was not enough to pay the rent of a suitable shop, and as his father was poor and could give him no assistance, it looked as if he must fail at the very outset of his career. There lived in Manchester at that time three brothers—William, Daniel, and John Grant—sons of a poor Scotch candle-drover, who by means of economy and hard work had raised themselves into positions of wealth and influence. They had never forgotten their own early struggles, and were ever ready to give a kindly word or a helping hand to young men starting in life. Under the name of the Brothers Cheeryble, the employers of good old Tim Linkinwater, the great novelist Charles Dickens has given a charming description of them in his story Nicholas Nickleby.

A friend took young Nasmyth to the office of the Messrs. Grant. One of the brothers invited him to lunch, and as they sat at table the good old gentleman listened with interest to the young stranger's account of himself, and then, with a warm pressure of the hand, whispered to him—for there was a large company present—that if he needed money he could have the use of twenty-five hundred dollars. James could scarcely believe his ears, but Mr. Grant winked at him in such a knowing way that there could be no further doubt about the generous offer, for which James returned his most grateful thanks.

As soon as the party broke up James lost no time in engaging a flat in a large factory near the centre of the city, and he had not been there long before he became well known among the people of Manchester. His business increased with great rapidity, to the terror of a glass-cutter who occupied the room underneath, and who, as he heard the clang of the hammers and the movements of the great masses of iron overhead, expected to see the machinery and engines come crashing down upon him through the floor.

At length the ceiling gave way beneath the weight of an immense iron beam, and the glass-cutter with dismay saw his tumblers and decanters shivered to atoms by a shower of broken plaster. Nasmyth was immediately informed by his landlord that he must quit the premises. With characteristic energy he at once secured a vacant piece of land in a convenient place, and there he built a factory of his own, which, as the Bridgewater Foundry, was soon known all over the world as the home of some of the most useful inventions of modern times.

Nasmyth's most famous invention was the steam-hammer, by means of which large masses of iron can be forged with the greatest ease. It is a very heavy machine, of immense power, and yet so delicately made that the workman, by means of a lever, can direct its operations with the utmost nicety. The great steam-hammer at Woolwich Arsenal, in England, can be made to give so gentle a blow as to crack the end of an egg placed in a wine-glass on the anvil, while the next blow may be given with such force as to be felt two miles away. The original drawings for this wonderful contrivance were made by Nasmyth in about half an hour.

RAISING THE "PEARL."*

BY JAMES OTIS,

CHAPTER IX.

A DISCOURAGED PIRATE.

THANKS to the early hour at which the young wreckers went to bed, they were up almost as soon as the sun was on the day when the success or failure of their plan for raising the Pearl was to be decided.

* Begun in No. 175, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

THE BOYS DISCOVER THE PIRATE.

The rafts floated securely where they had been anchored on the previous night, and as the boys looked at their stout frames, which would offer so much resistance to any weight that might be put upon them, it was easy to believe that when they were made fast to the steamer the action of the tide would lift the Pearl very readily.

They had three hours at their disposal before the water would be low enough to admit of their beginning work, and this time was to be employed in releasing Tommy from his imprisonment.

Breakfast was hurriedly eaten, and without any fear that their belongings in the tent would be disturbed, even if any one from the town should come to pay them a visit, they started for Dollar Island and the pirate.

The pull over was not as hard as when they had rowed Captain Sammy, for the boat they were then in was not as large as the one Tommy had wrecked, and besides it was earlier in the day, and consequently much cooler.

They had supposed that Master Tucker would keep a very sharp lookout for approaching boats, and had no doubt but that he would be on the beach awaiting their arrival.

But when they landed he was nowhere to be seen. They began to think he had already been rescued, and that their labor had been in vain. But they did not propose to return until they had made a thorough effort to find him; therefore they went to their old camping place as a good starting-point from which to begin the search.

When they arrived there they understood why it was the prisoner had not welcomed them to the island.

There, on the ground, on the same spot where they had encamped, lay the once brave but now thoroughly cowed pirate, sleeping quite as soundly as if he had been in his own bed at home. Around him were a number of shells, showing that Captain Sammy was right when he said the boy would find something to eat, and by his side was a club almost as large as himself, which he had probably taken to bed with him in case it should become necessary to defend himself.

Dare leaned over and shook him several times before he awoke. Then, as soon as his eyes were opened, he leaped to his feet and looked anxiously around, as if he expected to see Captain Sammy pop out of the bushes somewhere near him.

"Where is he?" he asked, as if doubting whether he could trust the intentions of his visitors.

"He's at home, if you mean Captain Sammy," replied Dare; "and we have come to take you home too."

"Are you goin' to take me to him?" he asked, with very little of the piratical swagger that had frightened Bobby at the time he captured the boat.

"No; you shall go wherever you want to." And then Dare told him of the arrangement they had made regarding him.

"If you promise us that you'll behave yourself in the future, he won't trouble you unless you go where he is."

"No danger of that."

"And will you promise?" urged Dare.

"Yes," said Tommy, "I'll promise, an' I'll keep it too. I did think I wanted to be a pirate, but somehow it ain't as much fun as I thought it would be, an' now that the flag an' my sash an' cap are gone, I'll let Ikey Jones be the pirate, an' I'll look round for somethin' else."

Dare told him they had heard that Ikey Jones had also reformed, so that the pirates of Tampa no longer had an existence, save in the memory of Captain Sammy, and it would be likely to remain green there each time he thought of his wrecked boat.

They remained on Dollar Island about half an hour, and when they started on their return trip Master Tucker took one of the oars, working at it manfully until they were within about a quarter of a mile of the shore. Then he ceased rowing, as if he began to mistrust what had been told him, and looking Dare full in the face, he asked:

"Now you ain't foolin' me, are you?"

"How do you mean?"

"Cap'n Sammy ain't hidin' anywhere 'round here where he can jump out an' nab me jest the minute we get on shore, is he?"

"If you don't believe us," said Dare, with considerable dignity, for he felt hurt that they should be doubted after all they had done, "you can land wherever you say, and then you will be sure we are not deceiving you."

"I ain't 'zactly 'fraid, an' I don't think you'd tell any lies about it," said Tommy, with some hesitation; "but if it don't make any difference to you, I'd rather get out further down the beach."

The boat was headed in the direction he desired, and when the land was reached Tommy first made sure that his enemy was nowhere in sight, and then jumped out quickly.

"Now see here, fellers," he said, as he held on to the bow of the boat for a moment, "you've helped me out of a bad scrape, an' I'll keep my promise to you jest as long as Cap'n Sammy lets me alone." Then with a "good-by" to the boys, he ran as fast as his legs could carry him in the direction of his home.

There was not one of the boys who did not believe but that Tommy would keep his word, and had they been told then that they would be sorry that they had released the prisoner, they would have laughed at the idea.

It was not a long distance from where Tommy had been landed to where the Pearl lay, and when they arrived at the scene of their labors Captain Sammy was just coming up in a boat rowed by two men.

The little man looked at them savagely, as if he was angry with himself for having given his permission for the release of Tommy; but he said nothing, which was quite a relief to the boys.

The tide was nearly down, and it was evident that the little man had come there to work, for after ordering the men to row him directly to the rafts, he called out for the boys to bring him the cables.

It was quite a task to carry the long chains from the beach to the boat, and while it was being done Captain Sammy and his men busied themselves in examining the rafts and the position of the sunken steamer.

"Now, then," said Captain Sammy, when the chains were finally placed on one of the rafts, "we are goin' to help you make fast to the Pearl, and after that you will have to do all the work yourselves. While we are passing the chains under the steamer you had better be stretching a hawser from the rafts to the shore, so that you can haul them in at high water."

Even the fastening of the hawsers was not such a simple task as it looked. It was necessary to attach a short one first to each raft, and then fasten the two ends on to a longer one, so that when the boys pulled the rafts and their burden inshore, they would move at the same time, and under the same amount of force. Otherwise a swinging motion might be imparted to the yacht as she hung in the chains, and thus become displaced or wrenched.

Long as it took the boys to get the hawsers arranged properly, Captain Sammy did not seem to have begun his portion of the work when they had finished; at least that was what Dare thought at first, although he afterward changed his mind.

One end of each of the two cables had been wound several times around the log that formed one side of the raft on the port side of the Pearl, and then made secure by two heavy staples. The middle, or bight, of the chains hung down in the water, while the other ends were thrown over the raft lying to starboard.

"We're all ready now to hook on, and it must be full low water," said Captain Sammy, as he consulted his watch, and the boys looked upon the remark as an order for them to be ready to assist.

They rowed out to the port raft, and there waited the little man's pleasure. The two men had gotten into their boat, which they anchored directly over the bow of the Pearl, and there, each holding a long boat-hook, they too waited for Captain Sammy to give the word.

The little man was on the starboard raft, and when he was satisfied that every one was ready, he shouted, as he grasped the unsecured end of the cable,

"Dare, you and Charley lean over the raft and swing your end of the cable inshore; and you," he added to his men, "stand ready."

The boys obeyed the order without understanding what they were to effect; and when the heavy chain was slowly swung toward the beach, the men in the boat fastened the iron-shod end of their poles into it at its lowest point in the water, pushing it directly under the bow of the sunken steamer.

Captain Sammy quickly made his end of the cable fast with a piece of rope, and then exactly the same work was done on the other.

After the two cables were thus in position the two rafts were swung nearer together, and the two logs which the boys thought had been uselessly cut were placed across from one raft to the other, about ten feet apart.

The cables on the starboard raft were hauled as taut as possible, after which their ends were secured as firmly as on the other raft.

Captain Sammy then produced from his boat four stout chains, each about twenty feet in length, and having large clamps at one end.

These he hooked on to the cables a short distance below the surface of the water, one on each side, and brought them up around the two logs.

"There, my lads," said Captain Sammy, triumphantly, "when you want to take up the slack to-morrow, all you have to do is to anchor the rafts as far apart as possible, drop the clamps farther down on the main cable, and belay the short chains. Besides, by this means, you see, there is no chance for the rafts to swing one way or the other, and drop the Pearl out just when you thought you had her fast."

It was a contrivance which the boys would never have thought of, and Dare was now very glad that Captain Sammy had been anxious to aid them.

All hands now turned their attention to drawing the short chains taut, and this was done by the means of a capstan bar, a turn being taken around one end of it, and then the bar being used as a lever.

Each one had been drawn up as taut as the strength of the workmen could make them, a double hook was fastened through the links, and then their portion of the work was done. It was for the water to do the remainder.

The tide had commenced to flow, and all hands went on shore to watch the effect of their labor, the boys so excited that it seemed as if the minutes had twice the usual number of seconds in them.

THE LOST BOAT OF '37.

BY ARTHUR LINDSLEY.

"THAT is a splendid skin, that white bear's. What a magnificent carriage robe it would make! I should think you would use it for that purpose."

"Carriage robe! No, no. It is too precious for that, or for anything else which could tend to wear or to soil it. There is too much history written all over its white fur; it carries too many associations with it, some of them pleasant, some of them sad, to let it ever go into common use. Why, the very fight in which it was won deserves a poem, to say nothing of what the result of the fight disclosed. I must tell you the story.

"But before commencing, just look at this wood-cut.

Only a week ago I came upon it by accident, as we may say, and it fairly took my breath away for a moment. Where the artist found his material I do not know; but if he had looked through the sights of my rifle one day in the summer of '72, and then sketched what he saw, he could hardly have drawn more correctly the objects which had brought my rifle to my shoulder.

"There they stood, those two brutes, with just that lovely smile on their faces and that peculiarly expressive snarl which you can almost hear as you look at the picture (at least I can), and the next instant things were lively.

"But I must go back to tell you how it was that I chanced upon a spot which brought finally so much romance to light. Our ship had been for two days solidly blocked in the ice on the southern side of Jones Sound, about a mile and a half northwest of Caledon Point. As there seemed no prospect of any motion in the pack which would release the ship, half a dozen of us had started out early that morning for a walk and a scramble toward and along the land, ready for any adventure that might occur. We headed into the deep bight between Caledon Point and Belcher Point, entering a small cove, whose position, as I afterward determined it, is quite accurately in 75° 46' N. and 81° 40' W.

"The ice which we had crossed since leaving the ship had been rough, formed of cakes tumbled here and there by the movements of the floe, and was clearly of recent formation. We had no sooner entered the 'gate' than we were in another region. The surface was comparatively smooth, and no words were needed to assure us that the ice was old. It bore the stamp of age on every side.

"'I should not wonder,' said one of the men, 'if this here cove froze up five thousand years ago, and forgot to thaw out again.'

"'To be sure it did,' said another. 'It is the very place where old Adam used to do his skating. See, there is an 8 that he cut on the backward roll.'

"But my curiosity was so strongly excited by the strange, old look of everything about us that I pressed on rapidly, and when we reached the rocks that marked the left border of the inlet already mentioned, my comrade Howard and myself were about a hundred yards in advance of the men. We passed the point, and, sure enough, a smooth surface of ice stretched between the hills several miles inland; but we saw nothing of ice or hills, for right before us, and not thirty yards away, was the picture.

"As I said before, it seems as though Mr. Specht must actually have seen what I saw then. The positions, the expression, the intention, are all there. That sweet-looking old she-bear on her hind-legs, with one paw on her cub's shoulder, stood there for a second just as you see her, but it was only for a second. They seemed to have been examining the ruins of the old boat when they heard our approach, and were ready instantly for fight.

"'Quick, Howard! Ready with your rifle, man. Here they come!' and like a flash they did come. The horrid snarl changed to a burst that was the beginning of a howl, but ceased abruptly, and they made their dash without a sound; they were too much in earnest to waste breath in that way. Howard was on my left, and of course the mother fell to me. The reports of the rifles came together, and the two bears went down together. The old one never stirred a muscle; the force with which she had sprung doubled her in a heap, and whirled her over till she lay on her back with her tail toward me. My ball had struck her right eye, and ploughed up the entire base of her brain. Death came in a moment.

"The cub dropped like his mother, but scrambled to his feet again. Howard had aimed at his left eye, and had struck it not quite fairly. But before the bear could recover himself the second ball did its work, and the fight was ended.

“Well, well, old fellow,” said Howard, turning around coolly to me, “lively bit of a breeze we have had.” “Breeze,” said I. “I should think so; sharper and quicker than a West African squall.” By this time we had reached the two huge bodies. The size of the mother you can see, for this is her skin; we judged that her weight must be in the neighborhood of nine hundred and fifty pounds. The other I have called a cub, but he was as large nearly as his mother—certainly as heavy within a hundred pounds.

had not noticed them. Of course our interest was intense. In that fearful world of ice and cold an abandoned boat tells always a tale of woe and horror.

“The first thing we noticed was that, old as the ice all about us might be, the boat was older. And the next was that she had been frozen in and made fast by the ice at the very point where we found her. Her top-sides, it is true, were shattered and broken, but in such a manner as to show that it had been done by time, storms, and bears, rather than by floating and running ice. Her lower works were still entire, and if taken into open water she could still have carried an ordinary crew. This latter fact we could not learn, of course, till we had removed the greater part of the ice and snow which mostly filled her. But everything in relation to her showed that she had been built long, long ago; how long we could scarcely venture to think.

“How long, Tom?”

“Heaven only knows, sir. Before we were born, I’m a-thinking,” replied he, very solemnly. This was as we had only commenced removing the ice. Not another word was spoken, until, nearly down to her keel, one of the men broke out a piece of ice, and called out, “Look here, sir—look here. This is a jacket. No; it is only a bit of a pocket, after all.” And a pocket it was—the only remnant we found of her ill-starred crew.

“But what a tale it told! The bears had doubtless dragged away and devoured the bodies long years before, this little piece being in some way torn off and left. In it we found a scrap of paper. It was the commencement of a letter of which the main portion had been carried off with the garment, probably with the body of the writer. It was written in pencil, and evidently by a hand cramped and stiffened with cold, though the heart was warm as ever. This is what was written, or rather what is written, for here on the inside of the bear-skin I have fastened the original scrap. Look at it, and think of the heart-ache that went with it:

“August 24, 1887.

“MY DARLING MOTHER,—I shall never see you again. God help you! God help you! Our ship is crushed in the ice. Seven of us took to the quarter-boat, and we have been now six days without food. The others have died, and I am—

“That is all. Thirty-five years that boat and that pocket with its scrap of paper had been in the ice. Poor mother! who she was, where she lived, we never knew. All we could say was, ‘God help her!’”

“THEY SEEMED TO HAVE BEEN EXAMINING THE RUINS OF AN OLD BOAT.”

“The men now came hurrying up, and for a while great were the excitement and the rejoicing. We were making preparations for carrying the skins and the meat to the ship (no easy task over such a rough surface), when a cry from Howard aroused us: ‘The boat! look at the boat!’ and forthwith the bears were forgotten and abandoned, and we hastened away to the spot where they had been standing as we first saw them.

“Projecting just a little from the ice were the worn and broken timbers of a boat. It was not at all strange that in the whirl and the excitement of the moment Howard and I

CROWNING THE MAY-QUEEN.

"FIVE FINGERS."

BY MRS. LUCY C. LILLIE.

I WAS once staying in a foreign hotel, where for an hour daily I used to be tormented by hearing some one overhead play five-finger exercises. Now fifteen minutes of five-finger exercises may seem to the listener an hour, but by the clock on my mantel this "Da-da, da-da," with only the variations usually introduced, went on for fully that length of time.

"Unhappy child!" I used to say to myself; "can she or he never get beyond that drudgery?" But it was evident the five-finger student was not alone, for, later, would come the most astonishing practicing, which showed a master-hand. It perplexed me until I found that but one musician was at work. The student of the five-finger exercises proved to be no other than one of the most famous pianists in the world.

I mention this fact simply to show my young readers that the greatest musicians do not disdain to employ this simple method of improving their execution. In some conservatories of late there has been a great deal of discussion as to how the finger exercises should be played, and I am going to tell you all I have ever heard on the subject which can be applied to general practice.

Look at your fingers—the left hand and the right. What do you wish to do with them if you are to be a pianist of any merit? You wish to gain perfect control over them, so that you may strike any note with any finger with equal ease, making the sound suit the music?

"Oh," says a discouraged young reader, "I never could make my fourth finger as strong as my first." That is, however, just where you are mistaken. The third and fourth fingers can be made precisely as strong as the first, and, oh, the relief of being able to execute a difficult passage without tiring any one finger in particular!

Now while general exercises are very valuable, according to the best masters we can not possibly do without the five-finger exercises if we would gain the force needed in piano-playing, and so we ought to consider most carefully what to do with them. Not very long ago nearly all masters taught their pupils to hold down one note while striking the next, but I believe this practice to be discarded now. Squeeze the note ever so slightly, but lift each finger after striking with it, holding the hand slightly elevated, and the knuckle part a little sunken.

It would not be possible here for me to give you all the ideas of the best masters of the piano-forte on finger practice, nor, indeed, to do more than offer suggestions as to what is really necessary in beginning the study of music, but a few words I can say about various methods.

The best conservatories and the best masters teach as a leading principle that you must take things slowly—it can hardly be too slowly. A pupil of Deppe (one of the most successful teachers in the world) told me that he spent sometimes one hour a day with his master simply learning how to hold his fingers and hand. "And yet," said this young man, "when I went to Deppe I thought myself a fine pianist, but Deppe discovered at once and showed me very plainly that I had never learned how to lift my fingers and touch the note properly."

"And what did you begin with?"

"Oh," he answered, "the simple five-finger exercises."

I remember once hearing a little girl of fourteen play surprisingly well, and on asking her if she practiced a great deal, she said not so many hours a day, but so carefully. She also told me that her master made her practice her finger exercises for fifteen minutes at the end of each hour. Now let any discouraged little student try what even fifteen minutes a day will do. The reward will surely come in the satisfaction you will have in finding yourself able to do well what you have been doing badly.

At a musical gathering in Paris a young man performed very brilliantly, and two famous musicians standing near the piano discussed his merits. "What a pity," said one of them, "that he never was taught the real use of these," and he stretched out his five fingers in the air.

"Oh," but a young reader may remark, "I always practice my finger exercises an hour a day." But the real question is, how do you practice them? I once heard a young player boast that she had learned so many pages of Virgil during her practice of finger exercises. "They are just da-da, you know," she said, "and of course I never had to look, so I used to put my book before me and learn Virgil at the same time." Her family were very proud of this double feat of study; and yet, think over for a moment what is the intention of the exercise. No doubt it may be "just da-da, da-da," but every note must be listened to by the player.

A pretty story is told of Liszt, the great pianist, for whom a certain young lady was playing. In the music occurred a passage where after each single note in the scale the next was struck twice. The young girl did the passage very well, but Liszt was not satisfied. He seated himself at the piano and played it delicately for her. "See," he said, "you strike this C; then D listens—says yes, yes. You must always watch for what the notes say to each other." So be player and listener as well.

It seems to me that the use of the digitarium, or dumb piano, is an evil, since how can one possibly learn tone from it? The only benefit is exercise of muscle, but generally at the cost of what is called touch, for one never knows quite how to touch if sound is wanting.

The greatest ends in music, as well as in other arts, are arrived at by the simplest means. Show your fingers how to fall properly on the notes, and how to move from one to another, and you can hope to be a great pianist.

THE PROFESSOR'S RUBBERS.

BY DAVID KER.

"TELL us a story, Uncle Dmitri," cried three tiny voices at once, as two little Russian girls and a curly-headed Russian boy clustered around their uncle's arm-chair.

Knowing by experience that the request would be granted, the rest of the company drew closer, and General Milutine began as follows:

"When I was about thirteen I used to go to school at the St. Vladimir Lyceum. There were several of my chums in the same class, and a wild lot they were, always in some scrape or other; but the wildest of all was a lad from the Lower Volga. We used to call him 'Prokaznik' [Madcap], and a very good name it was, for he couldn't be happy without playing some mad trick or other. One evening he caught the Professor of History—a crabbed old fellow who was always scolding—asleep in his chair, and rubbed his bald head with phosphorus, and when the poor old gentleman came into the classroom, half an hour later, he lighted up the whole place like an Eastern illumination, and scared some of the smaller boys so much that they ran away screaming.

"On one occasion it was the old Professor of Mathematics at the Lyceum who became Madcap's victim. Among the Professor's queer ways—and he had plenty of them—was his custom of going about, winter or summer, wet or dry, in a pair of enormous rubbers, whether to save his boots or from mere force of habit I can't say. Regularly every afternoon he took off his rubbers at the door of the classroom before going in, and put them on again when he came out, and all the boys knew them as well as they knew the dome of the Isaac Cathedral.

"Well, our friend Madcap took it into his head to have some fun with the Professor's rubbers. One afternoon he contrived to come up just as the Professor had gone in, leaving his rubbers outside as usual. Madcap pounced upon them at once, drove a nail through each of the heels right into the floor, hid the hammer in a corner, and walked into the classroom looking as innocent as could be.

"You may fancy the poor Professor's dismay when, on slipping his feet into the rubbers and trying to shuffle away as usual, he found himself rooted to the ground, and unable to stir an inch. He struggled, twisted, tugged, jumped, and at last, thinking he was bewitched or struck with paralysis, he began to shout and scream till the whole place rang. Madcap and his chum, who were looking on from the stairs above, got scared, and ran to help him; but just then the Professor gave a tremendous tug, and tore one of his rubbers almost in two.

"When the boys saw the old man look troubled, they began to think that he might not be able to afford a new pair, and they at once repented of their joke. Out rushed Madcap to a store round the corner, bought the best pair of rubbers in it, and put them into the Professor's hand as he came slowly and sadly down the steps; and there were tears in the poor old man's eyes as he took them. But it didn't end there, for Madcap had a friend at the court in the shape of his godmother, the Czar's own sister-in-law, and through her influence the Professor got such a good appointment that I don't think he'll ever have to wear worn-out rubbers again."

"And what's become of him now?" asked all the three children at once.

"His Excellency the President of the Imperial University!" announced a servant at that moment, throwing open the drawing-room door.

In came a tall, fine-looking old man in black, so erect in figure, so firm in step, and with such a clear bright eye that it required the evidence of his snow-white hair and wrinkled forehead to make one believe that he had really celebrated his eightieth birthday nearly six months before.

"Ia, Stefan Yakowitch"* (Stephen, son of James), cried General Milutine, springing up and grasping the new-comer's hand heartily, "you've come exactly at the right moment. Do you know, I've just been telling our friends here how you had your rubbers nailed to the floor by a mischievous young student at the St. Vladimir Lyceum a good many years ago."

"What!" cried all the company, with one voice, "was the Professor—"

"The Professor was our good friend President M——," answered the General, laughing, "and I was the young Madcap."

LET GO YOUR ANCHOR!

BY FRANK H. CONVERSE.

THE new ship Texas, all ready for sea, lay at one of the large wharves on the Bath side of the Kennebec River. She expected to sail on the following morning for Savannah, at which port she was to load with cotton for Liverpool, England.

Captain John Sears, part owner of the Texas, was her commander, but in the eyes of his son Johnny, aged twelve, this fact was not of nearly so much importance as that he, Johnny Sears, was to accompany his father in the ship on the voyage in question.

The Captain was sitting on the quarter-deck enjoying his after-supper cigar. Johnny was restlessly roaming up and down in a fever of excitement, his sharp eyes taking in everything of interest about the ship. Following closely at his heels was a handsome English mastiff, which stood very nearly three feet high, with tawny hair, a broad chest, and handsome head. A friend to be desired was Jack, the mastiff, but a terrible foe. Jack was a pup when given to Captain Sears. Having grown to his present estate on shipboard, he might literally be called an old sea-dog, and it is needless to say that the mastiff Jack and the boy Johnny were great friends.

"If the crew do come in the morning boat, I doubt if we get away to-morrow," remarked Captain Sears, half aloud, breaking a silence of some minutes' duration.

Johnny dropped the spokes of the big wheel with which in imagination he had been steering the ship before a heavy gale of wind.

"Why not, father?" he asked, with a distressed face. "Barometer falling, and the equinoctial close at hand," was the brief reply, as, knocking the ashes from his cigar, Captain Sears glanced doubtfully at the setting sun, which was half hidden by a bank of dun-colored cloud.

* The usual form of address in Russia.

"Telegram for you, sir," said a small boy, who had just scrambled aboard, and stood looking about him with wide-open eyes.

Tearing open the yellow envelope, Captain Sears read aloud as follows:

"PORTLAND, October 19, 187—

"Trouble about crew. Come on at once in 5.30 train.

"J. JENKINSON."

"And it's twenty minutes past five now," said the Captain, rather crossly, as he jerked out his watch, for he by no means liked the idea of leaving the ship that night. Both his officers were ashore, as also were the cook and steward. All of them had families in the vicinity, with whom they were spending this their last night before sailing.

"Well, there's no help for it," finally remarked the Captain, with a sigh, as, slipping into the cabin, he hastily changed his coat, and brushed his hair, "so, Johnny, you must look out for the ship a little while. I'll call at Hortons' on my way to the depot, and have them send down a night-watchman right away. Until the watchman comes down, don't let any stranger aboard. I shall probably be home in the morning boat. Good-night." And swinging himself on to the wharf, Captain Sears rapidly made his way up-town, while Johnny, with a rather disappointed look, began to pace the main-deck in true nautical style.

A repulsive-looking man who bore the marks of a tramp—and a sailor tramp at that—rose up from behind a lumber pile near the edge of the wharf, and shook his clinched left fist in the direction taken by Captain Sears. His left fist, for the reason that his right arm was missing just above the elbow.

"I thought it were you, Cap'n Sears, when I heard your voice whilst I was layin' round here yesterday," he growled, savagely. Then, turning, he looked thoughtfully up at the ship's side. "Nobody in sight," he muttered, "the watchman not like to get here for a good half-hour at best, and only a slip of a boy aboard, while like as not old Sears has left some money or wallyables layin' round his state-room to be had jest for the takin' of 'em. It's wuth rummin' a bit of resk for, anyway." And with another glance up the deserted wharf, the tramp began climbing the side ladder, using the stump of his left arm with considerable skill to help him in his ascent.

Hearing the steps, Johnny turned toward the gangway. A greasy slouch hat, whose tattered brim partly shaded the wicked-looking face of its owner, met his gaze.

"Oh, look here now, I say, we don't allow any strangers aboard," said Johnny, with a very decided shake of the head, as he stopped short in his walk.

"You'll 'low the watchman what Cap'n Sears had sent down from Hortons' aboard, though, won't ye, sonny?" was the cool reply. And without awaiting further remonstrance the intruder drew himself over the rail and stepped down on deck.

"Why, yes, I suppose so," answered Johnny, slowly and rather doubtfully. "Do you know my father—Cap'n Sears, I mean?"

"Oh yes," returned the man, with an unpleasant smile. "I was to sea with yer pa once in the ol' ship Vanguard. It was he cut off this here arm, owin' to an accident that happened to me that v'y'ge," he continued, touching the stump with a very dirty forefinger.

This interested Johnny at once, and he was about asking the particulars, when, rather to his surprise, the supposed watchman turned on his heel and quietly walked into the cabin.

"Hi—I say there!" cried Johnny, rushing after him, "my father don't allow—"

But poor Johnny's speech was brought to a sudden end. For as he entered the cabin he was caught by a strong arm, and dragged toward the open door of the steward's pantry.

"THERE WAS A SWIFT RATTLE OF CHAINS, A TREMENDOUS SPLASH."

"I'm goin' to put you in solitary confinement for a spell, sonny," grimly remarked his captor, as Johnny vainly kicked and struggled.

All at once there came to the frightened boy's mind the remembrance of his powerful friend Jack, whom he had last seen asleep on the quarter. "Jack—oh, Jack! here—come here!" he cried at the top of his voice. There was a scuffling sound on deck—a noise as though a calf were tumbling down the after-companionway—and through the half darkness appeared the glowing eyes and indistinct form of the great English mastiff.

Well was it for the scoundrel that he released his hold on Johnny in time for the boy to grasp Jack's steel collar with both hands, and hold him back by force and voice.

"Get out of this, quick, or he'll tear you to pieces," cried Johnny, excitedly, while Jack, growling fiercely, tugged at his young master's restraining grasp. And as Johnny forcibly though inelegantly represented it afterward to his father, the man "got." Johnny heard him scrambling over the rail and down the side steps at an astonishing rate of speed.

"I declare!" Johnny exclaimed, with a gasp, as he released Jack, who sprang on the rail and watched the flying man through the gathering darkness. "Spouse Jack hadn't been aboard! There's over five hundred dollars in father's desk in the state-room. Wou'd I have a story for father when he gets back in the morning, though!" he added, excitedly, as, lighting a lantern, he hung it in the main-rigging, noticing with some surprise as he did so that the wind was rising, and it had begun to rain.

Hour after hour passed, and still no watchman. Captain Sears had left the message with the Hortons' clerk, who had forgotten to deliver it; that was all. And so, wrapped in his oil-skins, Johnny paced the wet deck, with Jack by his side, while all the while the continually increasing gale piped and shrieked through the rigging.

By midnight it was blowing harder than ever, and Johnny began to feel very uneasy, though he scarcely knew why. Ascending to the quarter, he steadied himself by the mizzen rigging, and peered shoreward through the thick darkness. All at once there was a loud twang, and the stern hawser, which had been as taut as a steel bar, slacked suddenly, and fell with a splash in the water. Another similar noise, and then another, and still another.

Rushing frantically to the top gallant forecastle, Johnny saw that the great ship's hawsers hung helplessly at her side, while the Texas herself was swinging rapidly off shore with terrible force.

It was not fear of personal danger which made poor Johnny, as he stood half paralyzed for a moment, cry, "Oh, what can I—what shall I do?"

It was the remembrance that his father's savings of twenty years were invested in the Texas, and Johnny had heard him say that he knew he ought to keep his share insured, but he could not well afford it. And Johnny well knew that a collision with the vessels anchored in the river, or, still worse, striking the Hawkbill ledges on the other side of the channel, would bring a heavy bill of expense to the Texas' owners.

Now, after the launching, the great anchor was hove up and hung by the ring stopper at the cat-head, ready to let go. Johnny, who had been on board when the Texas was launched, had watched the whole operation from beginning to end.

"It's all I can do," said Johnny, aloud, as a sudden thought flashed through his mind. The carpenter's iron-headed maul lay on the forecastle. Seizing it with fast-beating heart, Johnny placed one foot on the cat-head, and with a strength born of excitement and despair, struck once, twice, thrice, at the strong iron trigger which, when in position, confines the hauling part of the ring stopper.

There was a swift rattle of chains, a tremendous splash, and then followed the grinding rush and roar of the great chain-cable as it flew through the hawse-hole from the ranges under the forecastle. Then came a sudden tautening of the cable, and lo! the Texas was safely riding at anchor nearly in the middle of the river.

"I guess we'll go below and turn in, Jack," said Johnny, with a great yawn; "the ship's all right now." And they went.

"What did the man mean by saying that you amputated his arm, father?" asked Johnny, on the following day, as a steam-tug was taking the Texas swiftly down the river toward the ocean.

"He was the ringleader of a mutiny, and the worst man I ever had in a crew," was Captain Sears's answer, as he rested his hand fondly on his boy's shoulder. "He fired at me twice, and to save my own life I shot him through the arm, shattering the bone. This ended the mutiny, but the wound would not heal, and if I had not cut off his arm he would have died. He made a great many threats, but I had entirely forgotten that such a man lived until I heard your story. By cutting the hawsers he hoped to do me a great injury, and would have accomplished it, only my twelve-year-old son was too quick-witted for him."

"Now, father," exclaimed Johnny, "Jack deserves ever so much more praise than I do." But I don't wonder that Captain Sears is proud of his boy. Do you?

Note.—This story is founded upon an event that actually took place. A ship went adrift from a wharf in Bath, Maine, in an equinoctial gale, and a young fellow, the only one on board, saved her from going ashore in the manner described.—F. H. CONVERSE.

THE PEACOCK AND THE SEA.

By WILL CARLETON, AUTHOR OF "FARM BALLADS," "FARM LEGENDS," ETC.

A PEACOCK stood by the sea,
And said, "How grand 'twould be,
To take a sail
With my bright-eyed tail
A-streaming out after me!

"I should then the credit gain,
With my long glittering train,
To be the first one
Of peacocks known
To have navigated the main.

"How the peacock tribe would glare,
And scold the listening air,
To see me afloat,
Like a palace boat,
With decorations to spare!"

So he launched him on the sea;
But rods he had not sailed three,
Ere water he drank,
And soaked and sank,
And went where the fishes be.

Three times he sank and rose,
And screamed his sudden woes,
Till by great good luck
An honest duck
Came and hauled him out by the toes.

He lay on the clean sea sand,
Right glad to have come to land,
And heard some concise
And sound advice,
That the old duck had on hand:

"If you would keep more near
Your own legitimate sphere,
It seems to me
You would happier be,
And very much better appear.

"I go, you understand,
By air, and sea, and land;
But every one
Is modestly done,
And I don't lay out to be grand."

The peacock rose with a wail,
And combed his dragged tail,
And slouched away,
With a sour "Good-day";
And that was his farewell sail.

ACCORDING to promise, the final report of the treasurer of the fund for Young People's Cot is given this week. All eyes will turn eagerly to that column, and everybody will read with interest the letter from Aunt Edna, who is the lady, as some of you may remember, who originally proposed that we should endow this Cot.

I hope that in coming days you will not forget the child who is to occupy it. I shall go and see the first little inmate, and tell you all about him or her, and I expect to regard that child always one of my dearest little friends. You know the Cot in time may be a resting-place for many little ones, who without it would have had no comfortable bed on which to lie, and no kind care while ill and suffering. It will probably never be without an occupant who shall owe happy hours to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE:

NEW YORK CITY.

MY DEAR LITTLE FRIENDS.—Perhaps some of you remember my telling you long ago about the high mountain of $3000 we were to reach when we reached the top we were all to burst! Well, I am both glad and sorry now to tell you that the time has come for the burst; and a hearty one, I am sure, for you. I have to tell you that the top has been reached, the $3000 won, and Young People's Cot no longer among the things that will be, but is really our own; and the brass plate that is put over each engraved head is now in its place over ours, with this inscription:

YOUNG PEOPLE'S COT. The loving work of the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. "Little children, love one another."

And I know those of you who can go there and read it will never regret the self-denial you had to practice to be among the contributors. There may be some of you, but not many, who are here to tell me where they all came from so suddenly. I say not many, for most of you know that a fair was held in New York city March 28 for our fund, and brought in the largest sum yet, and I thought you can do it in person; you must all thank our treasurer, Miss Fanshawe, for this great addition to our fund, for she worked hard to make the fair successful. Of course you would all have liked to see, but it was through her efforts entirely that it was carried on so well through in my discouragements. I want also to remind you that thanks are due to Miss Fanshawe for the good care she has taken of your money all this time, in receiving and answering the many letters sent, and looking after various things connected with the work, all of which she cheerfully attended to.

At the fair were more beautiful things than I can begin to tell you about, but one thing I saw there I must tell you. It was something I had thought you all have liked to see, but it was not for sale; it was nothing less than our good Postmistress, who, to show her interest in our work, kindly came to the fair, and we had the pleasure of seeing her and talking to her.

As I have before told you, our money, while awaiting its completion, has been in the Greenwich Savings Bank, and the interest has amounted to $24 for the good use, which amount to be handed to the hospital $319.11. This, you see, is more than the sum needed for our endowment fund. Part of this extra amount will go to the brass tablet at the head of the Cot, and the remainder will go to some of the many needs of the hospital. I am to tell you that any contribution after this time will not be allowed, unless Miss Fanshawe without an address, and so leaves her without any means of returning it, will be given to the hospital, where we know good use will be made of it, so that the Postmistress will also say to you that she is going to have all the numbers of YOUNG PEOPLE which contain the Cot acknowledgments since July, 1881, taken and given to the hospital, keeping a record that you see of every name that has helped on the work.

When I began my letter I said I was both glad and sorry that they had come to this hour, — oh no! very glad on that point,—but sorry that our pleasant acquaintance of nearly two years must in a measure be broken to the hospital, keeping a record that you see of every name that has helped on the work. I have been wondering how many of the little children who have been working to help raise the $3000 have died at the same time, something that will outlast even the Cot itself; I mean the kind, unselfish love that you have been building up in your hearts, leading you to deny yourselves that you may help those less favored and happy than you are, and bring you, perhaps slowly but surely near, to that dear Saviour who gave up so much for us all that His love might bring us to Himself. Be sure He has noted and helped each little soul who has carefully read my letter to you, however small and insignificant it may have seemed to others.

And that His love may strengthen you in all your good and blessed work now and all your life through, is the good-by of your friend, AUNT EDNA.

NORMAL SCHOOL, HAMPTON, VIRGINIA.

I am a little Indian girl and twelve years old. I thought I will write a few lines to day. I am at Hampton school. And I am going to tell you a little of my home. I came from Dakota. And the name of the City is Yankton Agency, well, I live in Yankton. I like it very much. My mother and my father are living and two little sisters and one little brother. My little brother was born when I came away from my home. I am going to stay here three years. Sometimes I want to go home and sometimes I want to stay here. I like my home very much. And now I am going to tell you about the school here. I go to school every day. I like to go to school very much. My mother and father have a new building and we named it; we call it Winona Lodge; it is a very nice house indeed. We scrub every Saturday; we like to scrub the floor. We have a large yard, and every week we scrub it. It takes about eight girls to scrub it. When we all begin to scrub we all begin to sing something and it is very nice. We like to scrub very much, the girls like to scrub very much, and the teachers like it too. Every Saturday we always scrub the horse stable. And we got two little Indian babies here at the school. They are very nice little babies. I go to school every day from the school till the morning and we have sewing school in the afternoon. Some of the girls and boys go to school in the afternoon, because they work in the morning, and some of the girls and boys work in the morning school and I work in the afternoon. My wash day is on Tuesdays, and I iron in the afternoon; wash on Tuesday morning and iron on Tuesday afternoon. Our teacher reads letters out of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I thought I will write one too. So I wrote this letter. I like the letters that our teacher reads very much. I like my friends I like very much. From a little girl, MERCY L. C.

The Postmistress is very much pleased with Mercy's letter, and thinks her a brave and good girl.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have no brothers or sisters, and so I make first among the animals. Our good friend Tiger is a very gentle bison there; her name is Kate; and when I call her she will come and eat cake or crackers right out of my hand. She has a calf about six months old, and another one who is just born. The father died last winter; his name was Big Ben. He was given to the Park Menagerie by General Custer. He was an immense fellow, and his horns also were very large (see the picture), and a beautiful zebra which is striped black on the body and white on the legs. I prefer these animals to the fierce lions and tigers.

I go to the Academy every day, and I am going to the academy of Art and Natural History. At the former place are many rare treasures and pictures and a fine view of the Obelisk. At the Academy of Natural History are stuffed birds and animals from all parts of the world and curiosities from savage lands. A fine gorilla has been lately added; he is a dreadful-looking fellow.

My favorite books are travels, particularly in Asia and Africa. My favorite study is geography. I am nearly nine years old, and have taken You See Paper for a year, and I like it very much. I see how glad I am when it arrives on Tuesdays.
S. H. M., JUN. (per mamma).

GREENSBORO, MISSISSIPPI.

I send the kind Postmistress a few violets. They are wild, but I have no sweet violets to send. My teacher gave me a little piece of ground in her garden, and I took a part of it for flowers. I had some sweet violets, and I wish that I could write you a letter during the overflow, and was very glad to see it come out in print, and hope this one will too.

Those who are sick call her little brother Walter, who has a little piece named Annie, who is very cunning. She calls me Aunt Maggie very sweetly. I think the Little Horsekeepers' Society is a very nice name. I wish that I had a horse, but I know of none, unless I should tell you how to make pean candy, or do you all know how? I copied some receipts from Young People's Paper, and I think you will like them. I am going to go home. I heard with a lady some distance below papa.

I like this paper very much, and always read it with great interest. I like the letters, and I go horseback-riding nearly every day at recess. I am very fond of riding that way, and in summer we go horseback-riding every evening. I did not like my middle name, so a lady called me Daisy; so I ask every one to call me that, but only one young gentleman will do so, and that is because he has not known me long, and had not got used to calling me Maggie, which is my real name. I am thirteen years of age. I hope the Postmistress will accept my violets. DASH D.

Daisy, the violets were very beautiful, and quite fresh when they arrived. I will answer you your postscript in another number of the Post-office Box. Please send your receipt for the pean candy.

MAY.

Merry May says:
From the hills green clad,
From the silvery stream,
From the bright and glad,
Her ways are winsome,
Her rays sunshine bright;
The flowers greet her,
All color and delight.

The birds sing lightly,
And twitter and chirp.
Their tidings brightly,
MAY, sweet MAY, is come.
April's eyes were sad,
And wither'd wither'd,
MAY is always glad,
Seldom April smil'd.

But we loved April,
Her weeping, sweet wiles,
Tears and smiles combined.
My kisses and my love,
Came with all the smiles.
Merry, merry MAY,
Your steps betray you,
Flower-strew your path,
Gold and red and blue.

Buttercups golden,
Red for the clover,
Blue for corn-flowers,
Daisy and odon.

Flowers strewn your path,
In hill, meadow, and wood.
Darling, merry MAY,
"Thy smiles are for good!"

NEW YORK. HELENE GREENELLE.

BENT OAKS, MISSISSIPPI.

I am a little girl nine years old. My sister Sara Felix subscribes to YOUNG PEOPLE. We read it together, and we love to look at the pictures. We have two little brothers six and seven years old. They are so mischievous, but they are fond of their kindfolk.

My father has an orchard, and he has rare times fishing and rabbit-hunting. Our dog is an Irish setter, and is up to all sorts of tricks. We have a baby sister named Alice, for mamma. Papa thinks she is the sweetest thing in the world, and so do we all. I guess you would think so too if you could see her walk and hear her talk.

Good-by and God bless you, dear Postmistress, and all the young people in the world, and so do we all. I guess you might to say, "And God bless all the old folks too."

W. B.
Thanks for the letter, and that, which is more than a wish, because it is a prayer.

SAN LEON OBISPO.

I have often wished to write to you, but I feared you received more letters than you had time to read. I am seven years old, and my brothers have taken YOUNG PEOPLE since its first number. Now it comes to me in my own name. Mamma reads all the pretty stories and letters to us, and we enjoy it very much. I am very much interested in the sketches of the lives of great musicians, and hope to see more of them. We have a nice saddle-horn; her name is Music. She is very young, but she is very good.

This is a pretty town, about nine miles from the coast, and at this season the hills are covered with grass and beautiful wild flowers. We have ten very nice oranges, which bear fine fruit. There are many Spanish people living here. Before going to school I help my brother feed the poultry, and after school I play with my baby sister Fern. I do not like very much, as my eyes are not very strong, but mamma reads from YOUNG PEOPLE or St. Nicholas to us, and sometimes a chapter from Dickens's Child's History of England. My favorite book is Godson Cruise, favorite game Authors. My pleasantest amusement playing soldiers (I have a fine drum), and my favorite motto, "Always speak the truth."

My sister Fern, I do not like very much. I send you my best love, and hope if you ever come to California you will be sure to visit your little friend

STUCKY W. S.

GREENWELL, SOUTH CAROLINA.

I have not been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a very long time, but my sister took it two years, so you will see it is an old friend that we did not like to part with. I was very much interested in the story of "Nan," which was so sorry when it ended. We all laugh over Jimmy Brown's tricks, and I would like to know if there is a real Jimmy Brown. We all enjoy reading the letters every week, and I would write you a letter from California, if I thought I could write, as a letter from this part of the country might be interesting to some of our readers. I am a little child who live in the suburbs of the beautiful mountain city of Greenville, with a splendid view of the mountains in front of our home. Although we have a great deal of cotton in our garden, I am not much older than you, and spring comes much sooner. We have a number of flowers in bloom in the open ground early in March. I have four cats, Dot, Partridge, Polly, and Browney; one dog, Bessie, the last a cat. My brother has a Newfoundland dog. He had a funny way of stealing the hens' eggs; he would take them in his mouth and take them to the barn and then eat them. A great deal of cotton is planted here in the summer, and if any little readers of your paper who have never seen it growing will send me their address, I will send them some of the blooms and the bolls.

NANSIE D.

QUISQUAMOND.

Seeing in No. 175 that you wished for those who made pets of chickens to write about them, I would say that I have two fantail chickens, rooster and a hen, which I think very much of; their names are Dick and Dot. My sister also has a hen, whose name is Dull. My sister also has a pair of many eggs. But my hen has laid over eighty-five eggs, each one being about three times the size of a robin's egg.

One morning last winter my mamma went to the door, after it had been snowing hard all night, and found the coop that the chickens were in buried in the snow. My brother then went out and shovelled the snow away, not expecting to find them alive, but after a while he found them all alive and well.

I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and do not think that there is any other story paper that can surpass it.

MURIE S.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I send a receipt for makinz cherry blossoms open in the house. Get some nice branches (any size you please), and put them in water that has in it five grains of nitrate of soda to every quart of water. Add one grain of the same every day until the flowering is over. Of course the water is never changed. I should like to make the following exchange.

To any one sending me a pair of tame young crows which are healthy and can eat, I will send a pure Bramah rooster or pullet after July 1, as it would not be old enough to lay.

JANE DUDLEY, 23 Boston Building.

110 Tremont Street, Boston, Massachusetts.

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

As I have a very interesting story of a turtle to tell, I thought the readers of the Post-office Box, especially those who own turtles, would like to hear it. My turtle was fed in the yard with a piece of bread. The turtle remained there for a few days; then, to my surprise, one morning I found the peg gone, and about three yards from where it had been, a hole in the ground. I took it out and I had almost forgotten about the truant, when I heard that he had been seen coming out of a hole in the ground in a neighbor's yard, about one furlong from our house. Do you think I am telling the truth, or is it all a fancy story? Has any other boy had similar experience?

FRANK B. H.

Hands up, turtle-owners! Who answers Frank first?

GREENSBORO, PENNSYLVANIA.

I tried the receipt for cream almonds which Amelia Norris F. sent, and they were very good indeed. We found some hepatitis and a little arbutus in the woods on April 8, and one anemone bud, but there were no signs of any other flowers, except the leaves.

ELLIE E.

Mia E. J.: Wee-Wee and Jink, I really think, are very sweet when seen they eat, but that dear cat exceeds by half all other pets.—Alice A. N.: You must teach your bird to come to you when you call. Did you think you were forgotten, my little seven-year-old girl?—Bessie V. D.: I hope the painting lessons go on bravely.—Arnie M.: You will very readily find the answers to your questions by looking into your school history. I see that you are a studious boy, and I am sure you are a dear helper to your mother.—S. M. B.: I approve of all your treasures, except the gun.—John T. L.: You printed your letter quite nicely.—Clara H.: Yours is a good letter too. I am so glad you are safely through that dreadful thing, the scarlet fever.—Nessie H. H.: I hope Mr. Brodway will furnish covers for YOUNG PEOPLE on receipt of 48 cents by mail, and my book-binder will put them on for you at a small expense.—Anna G.: Your writing is very plain, and I read it with ease. No wonder you like your pretty Maltese kitten.—A. B. P.: I don't quite like the idea of bestowing so heroic a name on a cat, however smart he may be.—M. S. B.: Your Easter gifts were lovely. I had a number too.—Jennie C. J.: I liked your dear little letter, but could not make room for it.

Write again by-and-by.—Lora C.: Busy boys ought to be like clever me.—Jan W.: I think Gertrude or Grace would suit the little sister.—Carrie M.: You will enjoy the long walk to school now that the spring has come.—Madeline W. P.: I hope Ching and Pepper agree. That was a dear little picture on your note-paper. I am glad you have a park for a play-ground.—Battie H.: Your postal told me almost as much as a letter. Your kitties have very pretty names.—Phil W. J.: Your wee sister Mabel must be a darling, with her bright little speeches.—Fred B.: It is not so easy to get your coat on fire, do not run as fast as you can, but be down and roll over and over to smother the flame. If I were you I would be careful, and I would get into such a predicament.—Little M. G.: I would like to hear your bird sing, and still more to hear you, while your sister plays.—H. E.: So Dick is a good mouse? That is a good quality for Puss.—Mary C. P.: How sorry I am for that poor little baby!—Sallie W.: I think botany a delightful study myself.—Ella F. W.: Please send me a card telling me whether you composed the pretty rhymes about Ranger your own self, or copied them out of a book. Be sure to do this, dearie.—Edna H. L.: Nancy is no doubt a cunning cat; she knows her little mistress will not forget to feed her. Jimmy Brown is very mischievous; but then you little folks encourage him by laughing at his tricks.—Maude C.: Cherry, Goldie, and Frisky are very nice names for pet birds.—R. W. A.: What a shame to kill the poor chicken with the funny name of Lamey-Taney!

The Little Housekeepers are informed that a number of excellent receipts will be published in the next Post-office Box.

LIVE OAK, FLORIDA.

I am a little girl twelve years old, and Cousin Frank is mine. We are staying away at grandma's in Live Oak, Florida. We are having fine large strawberries now. Cousin Frank takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE and I think it is a fine paper. I want to get down to take it for me when I go home. There are oranges on the trees as large as pease. I read in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE about the Col in St. Mary's Free Hospital for Children which children are paying for. Frank and I have earned one dollar to send. We enjoyed it all. I hope my letter is not too long, and should like an answer very much.

GEORGIA BROCK.

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl nine years old. I have no pets to write about, except my two sisters, who are younger than myself. We girls make a paper, and called it "Daisy Petals." We made up the stories ourselves. Mamma said they were real good. We all enjoy YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and have had it ever since it was published. I often take YOUNG PEOPLE to school on Friday and read it. I read Jimmy Brown's stories to grandpa, who is sick, and he laughs at them. I wrote a letter to you once before, but it was not published. I hope this will be. I send you fifty cents, which I earned myself, for the Col. I hope you will soon have enough money to pay for it.

GEOGRAPHICAL ACROSTIC.

The first letters of the words in the answer read downward in the order given will give the name of a celebrated navigator of the fifteenth century.

- My first is a city on the southern coast of Spain.
- My second is a city in New England.
- My third is a city which once ruled the world.
- My fourth is an island in the north.
- My fifth is a country in Southwestern Europe.
- My sixth is a State in the Union.
- My seventh is a river in North America.
- My eighth is a beautiful city in Europe.
- My ninth is a river in New York.
- My tenth is one of the great lakes.
- My eleventh is a river of France.
- My twelfth is an island in the West Indies.
- My thirteenth is a river of Siberia.
- My fourteenth is a city in England.
- My fifteenth is a range of mountains which forms a boundary between two countries.
- My sixteenth is one of the New England States.
- My seventeenth is a city in Switzerland.
- My eighteenth is a river of North America.
- My nineteenth is a desert in Africa.

ACTING ANIMALS.

THE public has always taken kindly to performing animals. The pleasure-seekers of Queen Anne's time fully appreciated the little marmoset, from the East Indies, that danced the Cheshire Rombs and performed several other pretty fancies, and very much applauded the playing horse, which, being told there was a warrant come to press him into the service of the French King, fell so lame he could hardly set one foot before another. Upon learning he must go if alive, he threw himself down, with his legs stretched out stiff and his tongue hanging out of his mouth, lying as if he were dead. But when this remarkable animal was told to rise and serve Queen Anne, he jumped on his feet and became "extraordinary brisk and cheerful."

Animal performers, be their parts ever so simple, are not always to be depended upon. An effect never dreamed of by the composer of Tannhäuser was produced one night at Covent Garden, thanks to a couple of goats. With the first note of the goatherd's song, the two goats tethered to the rock began to bleat most piteously, and in her own interest Mademoiselle Cottino hastened to set them free. One made a hasty and undignified exit; but the other, less bashful, made its way to the foot-lights, and insisted upon delivering itself of a solo as unmelodious as the most ardent admirer of the music of the future could hope to hear.

Determined to put the Forty Thieves upon the stage in as realistic a manner as possible, a Nevada manager provided Ali Baba with a real live mule to carry off the proceeds of his raid on the robbers' cave. Either from lack of proper instruction or from the perversity of his nature, that animal behaved so badly as to upset the entire performance. No sooner was he on the stage than he put his fore-feet down firmly, and kicked as only a mule knows how to do, sending the prompter into the orchestra, a small boy after him, and every member of the company on the stage at the time off in various directions. Having the stage to himself, he exercised his heels until he had kicked the cavern, the jars of oil, and an expanse of forest far into space, and utterly wrecked the whole scene. That mule's first appearance was his last, although the spectators were so delighted with his spirited performance that they wanted him to take a benefit, but the manager declined to give him a night.

A parrot lately distinguished itself at the Denver Opera-house, the manager of which had borrowed it from a restaurant-keeper. During the first act of Old Shipmates the bird was quiet enough, but as soon as it had become accustomed to its novel surroundings, commenced to display its accomplishments, to the amusement of the audience and the dismay of the actors. "Lamb chops or breaded veal?" screamed Poll, bringing forth a loud "S-sh!" to which the bird responded with, "Shut up; you make me tired!" "Stop eating so much!" and other remarks about as absurd. An actress pushed the cage to the wings of the stage, to be seized by the manager and carried to the property-room, the voice of the indignant parrot gradually dying away in the distance, until the slamming of the door shut it out altogether, but not before the offender Poll had revenged its removal by nipping the captor in the leg. A little later the manager thus addressed his treasurer: "Mr. Morse, let it be understood once for all that hereafter no living wild beasts will be introduced on our stage."

"SEE! THE CONQUERING HERO COMES"— TO GRIEF!

I've a pasteboard helmet upon my head,
My shield is a smooth-planed board;
The Star-spangled Banner's above me spread,
And look!—do you see my sword?
I'm bold as St. George himself, I vow;
I wish the old Dragon would come just now!

Should I meet with a giant, a robber knight,
Or a painted Arrapahoe,
I'd strike at the wretch with all my might,
And down 'neath my blade he'd go.
Ha! ha! to o'erthrow him and lay him flat,
He'd need but one blow from my hand—like that!

Ow! ow! Oh dear! it's gone right in
To the bone, I do declare;
Who'd ever have thought that nasty pin
Was stuck in the table-cloth there?
Oh, don't it hurt! and it's bleeding, too!
Quick! tie it up for me, sister Sue.

DAN'S SHIP.

BY ELIOT MCCORMICK.

"Who can tell what coming people are aboard the ships that may be sailing to us now from the unknown seas?"—DICKENS.

I.

"WILL you please show me the way to the steerage?"

It was a timid little voice that asked the question, and an anxious little face that looked up into the faces of the group of passengers around the forward companionway of the steamer Sahara. The ship had just weighed anchor, and was slowly steaming down the river Mersey on her passage across the Atlantic. It was a chill December afternoon, and most of the passengers had already gone below. Among the few who remained on deck was a little girl, hardly more than eight years old, who did not seem to have any one with her, and who had for some time been glancing shyly at her fellow-travellers, as if to invite their protection.

"Will you please show me the way to the steerage?" she asked again.

A kindly looking woman took it on herself to speak.

"Why, to be sure," she said; "the steerage is right down these stairs. But where's your mamma?" she asked, curiously.

The tears came into the child's eyes.

"My mamma is dead," she faltered.

"You poor child!" exclaimed the woman, sympathetically. "But who takes care of you?"

The little girl looked up wonderingly.

"Why, I take care of myself," she said; "I'm all alone."

"And did they let you go to America that way?"

"There was no one to hinder," the child replied, "and there wasn't anywhere else to go. Mamma bought my ticket before she died. If she hadn't done that I must have gone to the work-house."

A little murmur of interest went through the group.

"And where are you going," the woman asked, "when you get to the States?"

The child drew aside her little shawl.

"There it is," she said, pointing to a piece of white muslin that was sewed to her dress; "mamma put that there before she died. She said I never could pronounce the name of the place, and so she'd write it down for me. The trouble is," she added, as though she ought to apologize for not being able to pronounce it, "it's got eight syllables, and I never went beyond three in school."

The woman bent over and studied the placard.

"What does it say?" some one asked.

"Well," she said, after a moment, "I ain't much of a scholar, and I can't read the name of the place any more than the little girl can herself. It's one of those red Indian names that they have over there. But the child is Myra Church, and it goes on to ask if those whom she meets will do a kindness to a dying mother by helping her on her long journey. Ay, lass," she exclaimed, heartily, taking the child's hand in her own, "we'll do that."

The people who stood around nodded their approval.

"And is the person you're going to," the woman went on, "any of your kin?"

"She's my mother's cousin," the child explained.

"There was nobody else to take me."

"And does your cousin know you're coming?"

Myra shook her head.

"She doesn't know anything about me at all," she said; "she doesn't even know that mamma is dead. There wasn't time to write a letter. I'm afraid she won't be very glad to see me," the child added, pitifully. "I wish there was some other place."

The woman had her own fears about the warmth of Myra's welcome, but she did not express them.

"Ah, well!" she said, consolingly, "don't borrow trouble. I dare say it will come out all right. Perhaps some other place will turn up."

Myra's lip quivered, but she did not speak.

"At any rate," the woman continued, "you're here, and the only thing to do is to keep on until you come to America. It won't be so bad when you once get started."

The ship by this time was well under way; the shore was rapidly receding, and Myra had turned to look over the bow in the direction of the New World to which she was going.

"If I only knew," she murmured, "that there was some one who wanted me on the other side!"

The woman laid her large hand tenderly on the frail little arm.

"Mind this, now," she said: "whether your cousin wants you or not, there's many another who would be glad to have a little girl like you. Don't fret any more about it, and I'll find you a place near mine to sleep."

Myra followed her new friend below, a good deal encouraged by the woman's cheering words. The other people in the steerage received her quite as cordially, and before long the little girl was very much at home in her narrow and dimly lighted quarters. Fortunately, though the sea grew rough and the weather became stormy, she did not get sick; and while she could not go much on deck, she did not want for company in the steerage.

As the voyage continued, the storms grew worse; the wind kept dead ahead, blowing almost a gale; and on the twelfth day out the Captain calculated that they were still four hundred miles from Boston. For three days, however, he had not been able to take an observation, the sky was still dark and threatening, and he was not quite certain of his whereabouts. Indeed, he might be nearer the coast than he supposed. The passengers, on their part, were confidently planning to take their next day's dinner on shore. "You'll eat dinner with us, Myra," one and another had said; "you can bide over the day before you start on your journey."

But Myra was less confident than they.

"Do you think we'll get in to-morrow?" she asked, that evening, in response to one of their invitations. "Do you suppose the Captain knows where we are? Ah!" she cried, as the wind came with a sudden howl down the open companionway, "listen to the wind. Has it blown like that before?"

Her fears might have been caught by the others had not one of the men broke into a loud laugh.

"A thousand times," he cried. "The ship has been through it over and over again. Go to bed, little one, and to-morrow you'll be safe in America."

Myra was not wholly satisfied, but she went to bed, and her alarm did not prevent her falling sound asleep. In a little while most of the passengers had followed her example, and presently, but for the creaking of the ship and the roar of the wind, the steerage was still.

While they slept, a sudden shock made the vessel quiver from end to end. A dull grating noise followed, as though the keel were dragging over rocks; then the engines stopped for the first time in thirteen days, and the vessel swayed upon its side. At the same time the noise of loud outcries and of hurried tramping on the deck above told those who were waked up that some calamity had happened. Bewildered and terror-stricken, the people poured out of their berths, while the man who had encouraged them only an hour before, and who had been the first to mount the stairs, called hoarsely down the companionway, "All hands on deck! the ship has struck a rock!"

II.

Hardly any house could occupy a more exposed place than the little cottage in which Dan Roberts lived with his father and mother. It stood on the top of Indian Head, a bold peak jutting out into the ocean, and besides the light-house and the life-saving station on the beach below, it was the only house within two miles. Though it was so solitary, and though the wind often threatened to blow it away, and the waves sometimes lashed its strong foundations, Dan was fond of his home, and would not exchange it for any other that he knew of in the world. It was a saddened home at this season of the year, for just twelve months ago Dan's little sister Lucy had been taken away. To-morrow would be the anniversary of her death, and Dan recalled with pain how empty the house had seemed when they came back from the distant grave-yard, and how empty, indeed, it had been ever since.

Dan's father was on the life-saving service, and Dan himself expected to take up the hardy and perilous work when he should be a little older. The sea had a fascination for him, and there was nothing that he enjoyed more than to watch it tossing in the fury of a storm, or gently bearing on its unruffled surface the white-winged ships. He was an imaginative boy, and, looking seaward, he used to wonder, without knowing that a great writer had expressed the same thought, whether among all the ships there might not be one from over the unknown seas coming to himself. What would it bring him? he wondered, as he stood down by the life-saving station and looked out on the angry scene. Would it come on a wild, stormy night like this, or when the sea was calm and the sky clear? Most likely, if it came at all, it would be in a storm, for few ships sailed nowadays into Winter Harbor, though it had once been a great port, and many were wrecked on Hangman's Reef, whose low black surface lay above the water a quarter of a mile away. Just now, however, Dan could see neither ships nor reef through the darkness of the night.

The two patrolmen, one of whom was Dan's father, had some time since started on their respective beats up and down the beach; the five other men were asleep upstairs, and Dan was all alone. He was just thinking of going up to the cottage and turning in, when suddenly out of the darkness, above the din of the waves, boomed a gun. At the same moment a flaring light shot up from the direction of the reef, plainly showing through the night the outline of a stranded vessel. Dan rushed into the house and bounded upstairs.

"A wreck!" he cried, waking up the sleepers—"a wreck! There's a ship on the reef!"

The men sprang out of bed and jumped into their clothes, while Dan rushed down again, and lighting a signal, waved it over his head in response to the lights of the vessel, which were still burning. Meanwhile Mr. Roberts, further down the shore, was answering them with his own torch. A single glance when the men came down showed them that the surf-boat could not be launched, and that they must depend on the life-line. In five minutes they had run the heavy apparatus out of the building, and were dragging it through the sand to a point opposite the position of the ship. Half-way there they met Mr. Roberts coming toward them, and with his help they were soon at the spot. So far no time had been lost. It was important, indeed, that none should be lost. Looking through the night-glass as the blue-lights made the ship visible, they could see it rising and falling on the rocks at every break of the waves. With such pounding it could not last long. It was a great steamer, and the crowd of people whose anxious faces they could see gazing over the bulwarks warned the surfmen of the seriousness of the work that lay before them.

To train the gun and send the life-line flying over the steamer's deck was the work of a moment. It fell, as they could see, a little aft of the foremast, and presently the great hawser on which the buoy was to run had been drawn on board, and safely secured to the mast. Then the whip-lines by which the buoy was to be pulled were attached, the buoy itself was lung, and everything was ready. An anxious crowd on the ship and another on the beach watched its approach to the wreck, and then its return to shore. When it came back it contained two men, who told the Captain of the surf crew briefly that the vessel was the steamer Sahara, bound from Liverpool to Boston, with one hundred emigrants and twenty cabin passengers on board. The women, they said, would be sent next. The car was then run out again, and on its return brought one woman and a child, who were promptly hurried, under Dan's charge, to Mr. Roberts's cottage. Meanwhile a large bonfire had been made, over which the rescued persons as they arrived dried themselves. When Dan came back a large number had been brought ashore, and it was not long before all the passengers were landed, and the sailors began to arrive. At this spectacle a woman who had come in the third trip of the buoy, and refused to go up to the house, and who had anxiously watched each load as it came in, laid her hand on Dan's sleeve.

"Have you seen a little girl come ashore?" she asked—"a fair-haired little girl with blue eyes?"

Dan shook his head.

"I haven't seen any but the one I took up to the house," he said, "and she had black hair; but I'll ask my father. Say, father," he called out, "have you seen this lady's little girl?"

His father, who was busy with the line, shook his head.

"Only three little girls came ashore," he said, "and they were with their mothers."

"Yes," said the woman, nervously. "I saw them; they weren't mine. This isn't mine, either," she explained. "The poor little thing is all alone; but she slept near to me, and I ought to have looked out for her. But I was so frightened I ran up on deck the first thing, and then they made me come off the third trip."

"Oh, well," said Dan, encouragingly, "somebody else will have found her. She'll come along one of these trips."

But she did not. Time after time the buoy came in without the child; and at length, quite unexpectedly, when it was pulled in, out stepped the Captain of the ship. He took the keeper of the station by the hand.

"We owe you our lives, Captain," he said, warmly. "The old ship can't hold out ten minutes longer. But there isn't a soul left on board."

The woman rushed forward with a loud cry.

"Oh, there is! there is!" she exclaimed; "there's a child asleep in the stowage."

The surfmen looked at one another in dismayed surprise.

"Who is it?" angrily demanded the Captain of the ship.

"It's the little girl that came on board alone, sir; little Myra Church."

Without waiting to hear more, the keeper turned to his men.

"Men!" he cried, "the ship is breaking up; it may not last ten minutes. But there's a child on board asleep. Will any one go out in the buoy and bring her off?"

There was a moment's hesitation, while each man weighed the perilous service in his mind. Then Dan's father stepped out, while at the same moment Dan himself pushed forward into the waiting circle. His handsome face burned with an excited glow, and his dark eyes were lit with the fire of courage.

"I'll go, sir!" he cried. "Father, you know I've got to do it some time; let me go now. It's my place," he went on, hurriedly; "I saw the ship first, and I can be better spared than you, anyhow."

While Mr. Roberts hesitated, painfully uncertain whether he should let the boy have his own way, the keeper decided the question.

THE LITTLE MUSICIANS.

"All right, Dan," he said; "you shall go. Hurry up, now! there isn't any time to lose."

Dan wrung his father's hand and jumped into the buoy. Urged by the surfmen's strong pull, it shot out into the darkness, and in a moment Dan had left the crowd, the fire-light, and the land behind. Only the creaking of the pulley over his head and the roar of the waves beneath kept him company as he made the solitary and perilous trip.

III.

When Dan at length had reached the vessel and climbed out of the buoy upon the wave-washed deck, he hurried down the forward companionway, lighted by the lantern which he had taken the precaution to carry, into the steerage. Myra's berth, the woman had told him, was well forward on the port side. He had no difficulty in finding it. The little fair head rested on the pillow as quietly as his sister Lucy's had ever done in her bed at the cottage, and as though no storms were threatening every minute to break the ship in pieces. With the first rays of the lantern, however, falling on her face, the child woke up. "What is it?" she cried, raising herself on one arm, and looking up into Dan's face with an expression of alarm. "Where are all the people?"

He took down a large shawl from the peg on which it hung.

"The ship is wrecked," he said, quietly, "and I've come to carry you ashore, where all the people have gone."

Her face, flushed with her sleep, suddenly grew pale. She had heard of shipwrecks from the others, and knew what they meant.

"Now?" she asked.

"Yes," he said, "now; there isn't any time to lose.

Let me put this shawl around you, and you'll be as warm as though you were all dressed."

He wrapped her from head to foot in the shawl, and then took her up in his arms. He could hear the quick beatings of the little heart, but she made no sign of fear, and clasped her arm tightly around his neck, as he told her to do, when they went up the steep and slanting stair. In a moment more he had crossed the slippery deck, mounted the bulwarks, and seated himself in the buoy.

"Are you all right, little one?" he asked.

"Are you sure it's safe?" she whispered.

He laughed, though his heart was filled with a hundred fears.

"Oh, the buoy is safe enough," he said.

With the words he flashed a signal which he took from his belt. Presently the car began to move down the incline which the hawser made from the ship with increasing speed toward the fire that glowed and flickered in the distance. Would the ship hold out, he wondered, until they should reach the shore? Underneath them beat and roared the sea, dashing its spray up into their faces; and once a great wave broke over the buoy, drenching them through and through. Myra struggled to recover her breath.

"Oh," she cried, "won't we be drowned?"

Dan drew her closer to himself. It was now only a minute longer, and the car was moving with great swiftness. But how it seemed to drag!

"Not a bit of it," he declared. "See! we are almost there."

Myra peered out through the shawl. There, only a few rods ahead, blazed the great fire. In another moment they would reach it. But while she strained her eyes as if to bring the fire nearer, the hawser over their heads suddenly tightened, drawing the buoy upward, and while the buoy was tossing on top of the angry waves.

"Keep tight hold of me!" cried Dan, struggling for breath, as the sea threatened to swallow them up. "Don't open your mouth," he gasped. "It will only be for a minute, and the buoy will float us in to shore." He held the little figure with a grasp that even the fury of the waves could not loosen, though they lashed the buoy and its freight with almost resistless force.

"Won't we be drowned?" the little girl murmured, between the breaking of two waves.

"No indeed!" he cried, pointing to the shore. "See! the men are running down to meet us."

She raised her pale and frightened face from his shoulder and looked out. They were already riding the crest of a wave that promised to land them within the men's reach. Swiftly it bore them on, and when at length it threw them on the beach they were grasped by strong hands and drawn safely out of the threatening clutch of the under-tow. Drenched to the skin, stiff, and lame, but with no bones broken, Dan stepped out of the buoy, and was folded, with his light burden, in Mr. Roberts's capacious embrace.

"There!" the father exclaimed, while surfmen, sailors, and passengers crowded around to offer their congratulations, "take her up to your mother, Dan. Or are you too tired to carry her any further? Perhaps you had better let one of the men take her."

But Dan shook his head, while Myra clung the more closely to him.

"No, sir," he said; "she isn't heavy. I'd rather take her myself."

"Very well," said his father, looking compassionately in the child's white face. "Poor little thing! she looks like our Lucy."

Dan started up the shore, and for a moment or two nothing was said.

"Did the ship go down?" she asked at length.

Dan nodded. "Yes," he said, "when I cut the ropes." She looked down at him in an awe-struck way. "And just to think!" she exclaimed. "If you hadn't come I should have been drowned. I wish I might stay with you always," she added, impulsively.

Dan's heart thrilled. Why might not this little girl replace the sister who had been taken away?

"Where are you going to?" he asked.

"Oh, I don't know the place," she said; "nobody could pronounce it: it was written on my dress."

"And where is the dress?"

"Why, I left it on the ship, of course."

Dan drew a long breath. "And is that all you know about it? Haven't you got it written anywhere else?"

She shook her head. "No," she said, positively, "I haven't got it anywhere else, and that is all I know about it."

He then touched her forehead lightly with his lips. "Well," he said, gladly, "that is all you ever will know, then, for the ship has gone down, and your dress has gone with it."

They were now drawing near the cottage, where Mrs. Roberts was standing in the doorway. Dan looked up at the sky, and the east was streaked with the dawning of the new day.

"See, mother," he cried, placing Myra in her arms, "my ship has come in, and here is what it brought."

And so "on the other side" Myra found those who wanted her, and would give her the mother-love which she had lost. Not a person of those who remained at Indian Head that day could remember the eight-syllabled place where she had been going, and Myra herself had not the least recollection of it. It did not matter, however, since the far-off cousin did not know anything about her coming, while Mrs. Roberts was delighted to keep her as a little daughter, and Myra herself was only too glad to stay. The sadness of the anniversary was chased away from the little cottage, and Dan will always remember it as the day when his ship came in, bringing to him the little sister from the unknown seas.

A PLEASING EXPERIMENT.

BY JIMMY BROWN.

EVERY time I try to improve my mind with science I resolve that I will never do it again, and then I always go and do it. Science is so dreadfully tempting that you can hardly resist it. Mr. Travers says that if anybody once gets into the habit of being a scientific person there is little hope that he will ever reform, and he says he has known good men who became habitual astronomers, and actually took to prophesying weather, all because they yielded to the temptation to look through telescopes, and to make figures on the blackboard with chalk.

I was reading a lovely book the other day. It was all about balloons and parachutes. A parachute is a thing that you fall out of a balloon with. It is something like an open umbrella, only nobody ever borrows it. If you hold a parachute over your head and drop out of a balloon, it will hold you up so that you will come down to the ground so gently that you won't be hurt the least bit.

I told Tom Maginnis about it, and we said we would make a parachute, and jump out of the second-story window with it. It is easy enough to make one, for all you have to do is to get a big umbrella and open it wide, and hold on to the handle. Last Saturday afternoon Tom came over to my house, and we got ready to try what the book said was "a pleasing scientific experiment."

We didn't have the least doubt that the book told the truth. But Tom didn't want to be the first to jump out of the window—neither did I—and we thought we'd give Sue's kitten a chance to try a parachute, and see how she liked it. Sue had an umbrella that was made of silk, and was just the thing to suit the kitten. I knew Sue wouldn't mind lending the umbrella, and as she was out making calls, and I couldn't ask her permission, I borrowed the umbrella and the kitten, and meant to tell her all about it as soon as she came home. We tied the kitten fast to the handle of the umbrella, so as not to hurt her, and then dropped her out of the window. The wind was blowing tremendously hard, which I supposed was a good thing, for it is the air that holds up a parachute, and of course the more wind there is, the more air there is, and the better the parachute will stay up.

The minute we dropped the cat and the umbrella out of the window the wind took them and blew them clear over the back fence into Deacon Smedley's pasture before they struck the ground. This was all right enough, but the parachute didn't stop after it struck the ground. It started across the country about as fast as a horse could run, hitting the ground every few minutes, and then bouncing up into the air and coming down again, and the kitten kept clawing at everything, and yowling as if she was being killed. By the time Tom and I could get down-stairs the umbrella was about a quarter of a mile off. We chased it till we couldn't run any longer, but we couldn't catch it, and the last we saw of the umbrella and the cat they were making splendid time toward the river, and I'm very much afraid they were both drowned.

Tom and I came home again, and when we got a little rested we said we would take the big umbrella and try the pleasing scientific experiment; at least I said that Tom ought to try it, for we had proved that a little silk umbrella would let a kitten down to the ground without hurting her, and of course a great big umbrella would hold Tom up all right. I didn't care to try it myself, because Tom was visiting me, and we ought always to give up our own pleasures in order to make our visitors happy.

After a while Tom said he would do it, and when everything was ready he sat on the window-ledge, with his legs hanging out, and when the wind blew hard he jumped.

It is my opinion, now that the thing is all over, that the umbrella wasn't large enough, and that if Tom had struck the ground he would have been hurt. He went down awfully fast, but by good luck the grocer's man was just coming out of the kitchen door as Tom came down, and he lit right on the man's head. It is wonderful how lucky some people are, for the grocer's man might have been hurt if he hadn't happened to have a bushel basket half full of eggs with him, and as he and Tom both fell into the eggs, neither of them was hurt.

They were just getting out from among the eggs when Sue came in with some of the ribs of her umbrella that somebody had fished out of the river and given to her. There didn't seem to be any kitten left, for Sue didn't know anything about it, but father and Mr. Maginnis came in a few minutes afterward, and I had to explain the whole thing to them.

This is the last "pleasing scientific experiment" I shall ever try. I don't think science is at all nice, and, besides, I am awfully sorry about the kitten.

CLOCKS AND THEIR INVENTORS.

IN the Kensington Museum at London is shown an ancient clock that was made in 1325 by a monk for Glas-tonbury Abbey. It is going still. For more than five centuries it has been keeping time. It told the hours long before Columbus came to America, and when a few painted savages wandered over the sites of New York and Brooklyn. It was going when Hendrik Hudson first sailed into New York Harbor. It still measures time, while steam and electricity are moving all around it.

But when it was first made the venerable clock was as much an object of wonder as a steam-engine or an electrical machine. Only kings and rich monasteries could purchase a clock. There were only a few in all Europe. It was thought at first that these wonderful machines were the inventions of sorcerers and magicians.

There are two kinds of clocks—spring clocks, in which the wheels are moved by power from the uncoiling of a coiled spring, and pendulum clocks, which are moved by the gradual falling of a weight, the falling being regulated by the swinging of a pendulum. When a pendulum is set swinging it makes each swing backward and forward in just the same time until it stops, no matter whether the swing is over a long or a short space. Its swing is over a longer space at first than toward the last, when it is about to stop, but it goes faster, so that the time of the swing is always equal. This is called the "isochronism" (equal time, from Greek isos, equal, and chronos, time) of the pendulum.

But the real inventors of clocks were probably the Arabs. These children of the desert soon became as fond of invention as the people of Connecticut or New York. Bagdad and Cordova, their fine cities, were famous for their wonderful machines. Our ignorant ancestors thought the Arabs gained their rare learning from a compact with Satan. The clock was one of these inventions, and it appeared in Europe about the twelfth century. At first it was used only in the monasteries to direct the monks in their prayers. But very soon clocks were set up on some high tower or steeple in the European cities. In New York we have the City Hall clock, clocks at court-houses and on many churches. But in the cities of early Europe there was no way of telling the hour except by the sun and the stars.

When the first clocks were set up they were thought to be the most wonderful of inventions. The first public clock was raised on a tower at Padua, in Italy. A famous striking clock was placed on a tower at Bologna in 1356. From Italy the invention was carried to France and Germany, and in 1364 Paris for the first time possessed a public clock. It was set up on a tower of the King's palace, and was built by German workmen. No one in France, it is said, could make a clock.

Town clocks and church clocks are made to move by trains of wheels in much the same way, but the wheels are very large and strong, and the weights and pendulums very heavy. It is very hard work to wind up a church clock, and it needs a strong man to do it. In winding up the clock in the tower of Trinity Church, New York, the crank or handle has to be turned round 850 times. Many wonderful clocks have been made, in some of which the machinery moved figures of men and animals in a very curious way. At Heidelberg, in Germany, was formerly a town clock which, whenever it struck the hour, caused the figure of an old man to pull off his hat, while a cock crowed and clapped his wings, and soldiers fought with one another. This clock was destroyed by the French when they burned Heidelberg in 1693.

About the year 1500, clocks, which had been too expensive to be used even in many cities, are found in private houses, but still only the very wealthy could purchase one. Watches seem to have been made about this time, but were also very expensive. It is hard for us to conceive of a city without its public clocks, but in the year 1500 not many large towns possessed one. Three centuries and a half have made a wonderful change.

The clock has become one of the commonest articles of furniture. American factories pour out millions of them annually. They are found at all prices, from the cheapest to the most costly. In the year 1483 the revenues of the city of Auxerre were thought too small to purchase the costly invention, and the people asked the King's permission to buy one. In 1883 a wooden clock may be bought for half a dollar, and every village has its public time-keeper.

It seems strange that we should owe our clocks and watches to the dark-skinned and half-savage Arabs. But it shows us that all races and nations have been useful to each other. Once the Arabs were very intelligent and powerful; but they have become indolent and barbarous. They probably buy their clocks and watches, if they use them, in the European cities.

THE RAMBLES OF A DOG.

BY L. M. FINKELSTEIN.

I AM a Newfoundland dog, born in Mexico, and reared in New York city until I was three years old, when my master decided to take a trip round the world. A friend of his then asked him,

"What are you going to do with your dog?"

"I really don't know," he replied, looking at me kindly. "I would like to take him with me, but I am afraid of losing him."

I trembled lest he should decide to leave me behind.

"I'll take care of him until you return," said the friend.

"How do you like that, Bavard?" said my master.

I jumped up, and, placing my great paws on my master's shoulders, licked his face, and whined. My master seemed to understand me, for he said:

"I guess I can not part with the old boy, but will take him along. Ha! what do you say to that, now, Bavard?"

I said and did a good deal, for I barked, and rushed round and round the room, upsetting many a delicate ornament, and finally rolled on the floor, leaving a good deal of my coat on the Brussels carpet. The next day we went on board of a ship, and were soon sailing on the bosom of the mighty ocean.

I will not stop to describe our passage across the Atlantic, nor our journey in Europe, for things there did not strike me as being very extraordinary. It was not until we came to Asia that my curiosity was thoroughly aroused, for here everything seemed to be entirely different—manners, customs, and dogs. Palestine impressed me particularly, for here it was I had a most bitter experience.

When we first arrived at Jerusalem, the Holy City, I was struck by the number of dogs in the streets, and also the variety, who rushed after our horses' heels, barking lustily, and saying; "Come on! bark louder! These are Franks [i. e., Europeans]. Frighten them! bark at them, and frighten them away!"

At first I was alarmed at the noise they made; but afterward I discovered that nowhere was the saying, "their bark is worse than their bite," more true than here.

It would be easy for me to fill a book with descriptions of curious street scenes in Jerusalem. I was bewildered for the first few days, for here you see people from almost every part of the world in their own national costume—the turbaned Turk, the latest Parisian style, and the almost naked gypsy. Such a collection of fashions I never did see!

Carriages of any kind, or sidewalks, are unknown; the streets are narrow and uneven, so that cats, dogs, donkeys, mules, horses, camels, and people have to get on as best they can by jostling each other, and dodging this way and that way. Some streets are so narrow that dogs often lying stretched out block the way, and persons on foot have to walk over them, while the dog coolly sleeps on. Most of the dogs here look like wolves or yellow foxes, and they always seem to bark the live-long night.

One day, while following my master through the lower portion of the city, I lost sight of him at one of the turns, and strayed into a strange street. I was frightened, and was about to retrace my steps, when some Arab boys came out of a dark-looking house. They seemed to recognize me, and exclaimed, "Here is that Frank dog!" I ran up to them, wagging my tail, and licked their hands, and tried to make them understand that I was lost; but, alas for the friendship of boys! They called me into their house, which I trustingly entered. Here they tied me in the cellar, patting and coaxing me all the time. My heart fell as I heard one of them say, "Nobody will find him here; we can keep him tied till his master is gone."

Two or three weeks must have passed, which seemed to me to be years. The boys brought me food from time to time. One day they rushed in and said, "Now we can let him out, for his master is gone." They untied me, and took me into the streets with them. Coming into the Christian's street, I rushed into the hotel; but only to be disappointed, for the hotel-keeper exclaimed:

"Well, Bavard, poor dog! where have you been? Your master has gone long ago."

I heaved a deep sigh, and felt that I was a waif. Oh, the agony I suffered, alone in a foreign land, among strangers, and thrust into the street at night! The dogs rushed at me, yelling, "Get out of here, you detestable Frank, or we will tear you to pieces." I was chased and driven from street to street by various dogs, till I rushed into an open doorway, which proved to be an immense dirty cellar.

I remained in this cellar for about two days, till I felt the pangs of hunger gnawing me. At last I mustered up courage to look about me. Then, weak and faint as I was, I slunk out, and timidly glanced up and down the quiet street. Seeing some garbage lying a little further up the street, I ran across and found a hard crust and an old bone. One day I got a small loaf, and ran into a side street to eat it in peace. Here I found a dog with five little ones. At first she snarled at me; she looked miserable and half-starved. I felt sorry for her, and addressed her in our universal tongue, which is one of the advantages which we enjoy over men; for all dogs, bring them from any part of the world, can talk to each other freely.

"You are hungry, perhaps; take this loaf," I said, laying it near her.

She turned her motherly eye on me with a grateful expression, and said, "Though you are a Frank you are kind. Thank you."

I began to tell her my history, when a string of dogs came into the street, and began barking furiously at me that I should clear out.

"Halt!" said a large yellow dog with a long shaggy coat. "Let the beast alone."

The dogs fell back at once. He advanced, and snuffing my nose said,

"Are you the one who gave your bread to the dog with the pups over yonder?"

"Yes. She looked hungry," I replied.

"Well, you have a good heart, and I will befriend you. Come here on this door-step. I like your face, so I will tell you all about our rules in this city. My name is Samoore, and I am sheik [chief] of this district. We have about twenty-five dog districts, some larger and some smaller; mine is the largest. 1. The strongest dog in his district is the sheik until whipped by some stronger dog, who takes his place. 2. When the sheik barks, all the dogs in his district must bark. 3. No dog must ever go beyond the boundaries of his district. 4. When the dogs in one district bark, all the dogs in all the districts must bark louder if possible. 5. No dog must move out of a man's way. 6. Bark furiously at all strangers. 7. Drive away all foreign dogs. 8. Always bark at night. These are rules which every dog must fulfill, or we kill him or banish him from the city.

"I am very sorry for you," added Samoore, "but if you are clever and daring you can fight and get to be sheik of some district. We are going to have a business meeting to-night of all the sheiks in David's Square, and I will introduce you to them."

I felt highly honored. At midnight we hurried to the square. Most of the dog sheiks had already assembled. On my appearance there was a general growling and barking; but Samoore soon quieted them by saying I was his protégé.

After discussing various forms of management, one of the sheiks called upon me for a speech on Frank dogs.

I related as best I could how dogs were treated in my country. They all looked disgusted when I told them that we had to wear muzzles, and were not allowed to roam about the streets, but that every dog had his owner. "Don't you dogs here ever get mad?" I inquired.

"Mad! What an absurd question! We never heard of such a thing. We are too intelligent to get mad, for we take everything calmly in this country, like our owners the Turks, and the more noise we make, the less fear there is. I don't wonder your countrymen are so frightened when we bark at them. I suppose they think us mad; it amuses us highly. You foreign dogs are slaves; here we have liberty; nobody dares muzzle us, and we have everything our own way."

awakened by some boy flinging a stone at me. One day while I was indulging in a day-dream I heard a familiar voice exclaim,

"Why, I am sure that is Bavard, Mr. Mentor's dog which he lost while here."

I jumped up, bewildered, for I had not heard that sweet name in years. Two gentlemen came up. "Bavard! Bavard!" called one of them. I barked and jumped round him. He saw that I recognized him, and said to his companion:

"Well, Mentor will be happy if I take him back."

My feelings of delight were inexpressible. I left my district and followed them to the hotel.

That night I went and bade farewell to all my dog friends, for we were to start the next morning. They thought I was ungrateful to desert their city. However, a large company of dogs accompanied me next morning to the Jaffa Gate, and barked their farewells lustily. My old friend Samoore's tears ran fast as he rubbed his nose against mine for the last time, and my eyes were dimmed as I answered with a quivering bark. A last glance, and the ancient walled city, with its hundreds of dogs, was out of sight.

It was a long journey, but finally we arrived in New York, and I saw my master standing on the dock. He had come to meet his friend, and little expected to see me, for when I barked he started with an astonished look. As soon as the vessel landed I leaped on shore, and whining, fainted at his feet. When I revived I found him pouring water down my throat, and exclaiming, "Bavard! Bavard! Bavard! Bavard!"

I wagged my tail and opened my eyes, for I was too faint to rise. I was lifted into his carriage, and brought to my old home. My former valet received me with joy. In a few days I was all right again, to the delight of my dear master. Recalling all my adventures, I thought that perhaps my young friends, especially the small boy, would be interested to know that, though I am only a dog, yet I have deep feelings, and understand many things, and have become much wiser in my tour round the world. Hoping my story will interest you, I remain, yours faithfully,

BAVARD.

BAVARD.

Samoore had quite an affection for me, for he said, on our way back, "The sheik of the Armenian quarter has been wounded, so if you go there and fight the dogs you can become chief."

I did so next day, and after a hard struggle I succeeded in conquering all the dogs. They proclaimed me superior to them in strength. The old sheik died after a few days, and I remained chief.

I held this position for nearly two years, and often while asleep on the rough pavement I would dream that I had found my master; but generally I would be rudely

THE GAME OF LACROSSE.—[SEE PAGE 426.]

LACROSSE.

BY SHERWOOD RYSE.

TO the "noble red man," for whom we all have some sort of romantic admiration in spite of his faults, we owe one of the most attractive and manly of games. It is strange that a civilized people should learn a pastime from savages, and even more strange that it should be one that is more free from danger than any of our own games with which it can be compared. Broken limbs and severe bruises are, unhappily, too common in most of our field games; but in lacrosse he is indeed unfortunate who receives a severer wound than a sharp rap on the knuckles, or, at the worst, a broken nail.

The origin of the name is the French words "la crosse," crosse being a bishop's crozier, which the stick resembles in shape, and the crosse is the racquet-like stick with which the game is played. The ball is generally made of solid rubber, of the kind that is called "sponge rubber." With the exception of these and of the goal posts, which are six feet high, and placed six feet apart, and surmounted by flags, no other implements are required for the game. As for dress, that which is suitable for foot-ball, or lawn tennis, or cricket will also do for lacrosse, but as in foot-ball, all the players of the one side must wear the same color, so as to distinguish friends from foes.

It is usual to have twelve players on each side, but let no ambitious team of young players be discouraged if they can only muster two-thirds of that number, provided the other side has as many and no more. Of course each side has its captain, whose word is law. How the players are placed on the field we shall now see.

In front of one of the goals stands a man in red, who is the goal-keeper, and close by him stands a blue, known as "home," whose business it is to interfere with the goal-keeper when he has the ball. If you look over the field you will see that every red is attended by a blue. There is the red "point" standing a few yards in front of the goal-keeper, and a blue fielder attending him. A little further away from the goal is "cover-point," also with his blue shadow, and so on, fielder for fielder, until you come to the blue "point" and "cover-point" with their red attendants. From this it will be seen that a player must be very quick and dodgy to use to advantage any chance that may come to him, since an opponent is always at his side.

When the field is arranged, the referee or umpire advances to the middle of the ground and places the ball on a mark. Two players then take up positions facing each other, one of them perhaps kneeling on one knee, and the other stooping down. These players are called "facing-men," or "centres," and it is they who start the game.

"Play!" cries the umpire. Swish goes the crosse of the stooping player, who has tried to draw the ball out from between the two crosses. But the other, with quick movement, brings his "stick" sharply down between the ball and his opponent's stick, and then picking the ball up with it, he starts to run. But he is not allowed full swing; for the red player hits fiercely at blue's crosse, who, however, draws it back, and tosses the ball over to one of his own fielders. This is a dodger, and wonderfully well he avoids his enemies. A red crosse was descending upon his with a mighty blow that would not only have dislodged the ball from its resting-place on the netting, but would most likely have knocked the stick right out of the blue dodger's hands. But blue is up to this trick. Is he not a dodger, and does he not know just what to do in a case like this? He simply turns aside his crosse, so that the other stick hits only the ground, and passes his opponent before the latter can raise his stick for another stroke.

But another red is close upon him, and as blue has done well in bringing the ball so far, he tosses it to another of his own side. This player is almost within easy throw of the blue goal; it is a tempting shot, and he tries it. But he happens to throw the ball right at the goal-keeper, from whose stick it rebounds, until it is secured by the red "cover-point," who, seeing the blue field somewhat scattered, throws it with great force in the direction of their goal. Unfortunately for him, in the race for the ball the blue player wins, and before the red can stop him he has picked up the ball and is off with it. Soon he loses it, and it is bandied about from one to another, with a great clashing of sticks, and doubling and panting and shouting, until a loud yell of triumph arises from the blues as the ball is carried with a rush through their enemies' goal.

Thus the first game is a victory for the blues; but they had the wind in their favor, and that was a great advantage. Now you will see the sides change goals, in accordance with the law, and with the favoring breeze perhaps the reds will recover their lost ground. Then if, as often happens, the wind dies away as the sun gets lower, you will see a grandly contested game to decide the match. Not, however, that two out of three games are always required for a match. Sometimes it is "best out of five," and in important matches that side has the victory that wins most games in a stated time, say an hour and a half.

The principal art in lacrosse is that by which a player who finds himself hard pressed by an opponent throws the ball to one of his own side who shall carry it out of danger. This is called "tacking," and it is the chief merit of the play of the Canadian Indians, picked teams of whom have seldom if ever been beaten by white men. You will see a player who has been running with the ball on his stick, and who is closely followed by one of his enemies, suddenly relieve himself of the ball and so thwart his pursuer. As likely as not he will throw the ball backward over his head, and the action will look very much like "fancy" play, which should be avoided in all games. But in this case it is not "fancy," but really "scientific" play, for had he thrown the ball in front, his pursuer would have knocked it off his stick as he swung his stick backward in order to throw the ball forward. With good judgment, therefore, he threw the ball backward over his head, and so his body was between his stick and his enemy in the rear until the ball had happily been passed to a friend who was on the lookout for it.

In another case the player who had the ball might resort to other tactics than tacking, especially if he was not closely pressed from behind. It might be that, although he was a long way from the goal, the field was scattered in out-of-the-way parts of the ground, or massed behind him, and the goal, perhaps, unprotected. In that case, then, he might try a long throw at goal, since it might win a game, and not being pressed it would be useless to waste valuable time in passing the ball to a friend who had no better chance of forwarding it than he had.

CHAPTER X.

THE WORK OF THE TIDE.

ANXIOUSLY the boys watched for the first sign which would tell that their plan was a success, and as the water rose higher and higher their fears lest it should prove a failure increased.

Soon it was easy to see that the rafts were settling into the water, and the chains gave forth a dull, muffled clank now and then as the strain upon them forced the links into a more perfect bearing upon each other.

* Begun in No. 175, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"Do you think they will raise her?" asked Dare, unable to bear the silence any longer.

"Raise her!" echoed Captain Sammy—"they'll have to, unless something breaks, and I don't think it will."

Then the boys waited in fear lest something should break, starting in alarm at the slightest sound. But there was no sign but that everything was as strong as Captain Sammy's faith.

Finally the rafts settled down as if the weight of the Pearl was about to sink them, and then, just as the boys were expecting to see them covered by the water, there was a sudden rocking motion, a sort of trembling of the planking, and they rose at once several inches out of the water.

"Hurrah!" shouted the Captain, and the men joined in the cheer, while the boys added their voices to the general uproar.

"Well, lads," said Captain Sammy, in a cheery tone, "the work is as good as done now. If I wasn't getting so old and full of rheumatic twinges, I'd stay over here with you, an' we'd take advantage of the tide to-night, for there's a good moon, but as it is, we'll have to wait till morning, an' I'll toddle over to the dock now to see how things are coming on there. Keep a sharp lookout that nothing happens, an' I'll be here at low tide to-morrow."

He had started off when he began to speak, and by the time he had finished he and his men were nearly out of sight around the point.

The boys were left alone to keep watch that the tide did its duty.

"I'll tell you what we can do," said Dare, after they had remained silent for some time, watching the rafts as they lifted the Pearl higher and higher from the place that had very nearly been her grave. "It will be low water at ten o'clock, and bright moonlight at the same time. We can take in the slack of those cables just as well as if Captain Sammy was with us. It will be high tide about four o'clock in the morning, and we can take turns at watching, so that we shall be sure to pull her in at high water. Then when Captain Sammy comes to-morrow she will be almost ready to go to work on."

As it was necessary to remain idle until high water, which would not be for nearly five hours more, Dare proposed that Bobby should walk to the hotel, for the double purpose of informing his father of their success up to that point, and to supply their larder.

Bobby returned in due time, warm, tired, and loaded down with good things, out of which all three made a hearty dinner. Then there was more lounging around, and laying plans for their trip to the Everglades, until the water had nearly crept up to the line on the sand which marked the height to which the tide flowed.

Then the work began. The long hawser had been made fast to a tree which grew on the bank, and Charley and Bobby stationed themselves there, while Dare rowed out to the rafts and raised the anchors.

"All right!" he shouted, as the last one was raised, and nothing prevented the rafts and their burden from being pulled in toward the shore.

As he spoke he jumped into the boat, rowed quickly to the beach, and did his share toward hauling their prize into more shallow water.

The task required all the strength that they possessed, but they were more than willing to expend it at such work, and by the time the tide was fully up, the Pearl had struck bottom again, and their labor was over for six hours.

The rafts were anchored again, care being taken that it should be done in such a way that they would swing as far apart as possible, as Captain Sammy had ordered, and when the young wreckers were in their tent again they had the satisfaction of seeing that the Pearl was not more than half as far away from the shore as she had been in the morning.

"Now," said Dare, as he looked at his watch, "it is a little past four. Let's see if some of us can't bottle up some sleep before it is time to go to work again. Charley, you and Bob lie down, and I will keep watch until six; Bobby shall stand guard till eight, and you till ten. After that we will divide up an hour at a time, because it will be more lonesome in the night."

This plan was carried out, and although there was not much sleeping done before low water, each one felt refreshed because of the rest he had thus forced himself to take.

The night was so light that it was possible to work quite as well as in the day, and they were cheered in their labors by seeing fully half the upper works of the little steamer above water, when before only her smoke-stack was visible.

The little pilot-house and cabin glistened as white in the moonlight as if the painters had just finished their work, and through the open windows could be seen a portion of the machinery.

"Isn't she a beauty?" exclaimed Charley.

"Indeed she is," replied Dare, who hardly felt like doing anything else but looking at her; "but she won't do us much good if we don't go to work."

Thus reminded that they were there for labor rather than admiration, the boys commenced at once the difficult task before them. The chains were first unfastened one by one, and then made taut and fastened again as Captain Sammy and his men had done at first.

While it was not possible for the boys to take in as much slack of the chains as the three men could have done, they had the satisfaction of reducing the length very materially.

Then the anchors were placed so that the rafts would swing closer together when the tide forced them to begin their work of lifting again, and the night-watch began.

It was fully eleven o'clock, and Dare proposed that they stand guard one hour at a time. As the first watch would be the easiest, Dare gave that to Bobby, with instructions to call Charley at twelve, he coming on at one.

During that night not one of the sentries fell asleep at his post. There were many times when each one of them felt very much like yielding to the slumber that beset his eyelids, but a brisk walk along the beach soon rendered him wakeful.

At one o'clock Dare was called, and when his hour was up he could not bring himself to waken either of the others, who were sleeping so sweetly, and arguing that, as the leader of the party, he should do the most work, he continued on guard until four o'clock, when he roused the others.

Both the boys were very much surprised at finding that Dare had been on watch three hours instead of one, and Charley insisted that in the future he should do no more than his share of the work, whatever might happen.

This time it was a sleepy party who tugged and pulled at the heavy hawser, but when the Pearl grounded it seemed almost certain that she would be fully uncovered at low water, and with the idea that in the morning they would be able to see the extent of the damage done their steamer, all hands rolled into bed.

CHAPTER XI.

HIGH AND DRY.

THE boys did not awaken until a late hour on the following morning, and then, even though it was only about "half-tide," they could see above the surface of the water quite a portion of the upper works of the steamer.

They felt lame and stiff when they came out of the tent, but this actual evidence of progress took that feeling away in a great measure, and all hands were as eager for work as if they had been taking rest for a week.

One of the boys from the hotel had brought them a can of hot coffee, and after a hurried bath, which was hardly more than a dip into the water, they ate their breakfast in quite as much haste, for they wanted to have everything in and around the tent looking in ship-shape order when Captain Sammy arrived.

Each moment that passed revealed more of the little steamer to the view of the eager watchers, and paddling out to the rafts they had the satisfaction of seeing that, without a doubt, she would be high and dry at low water.

Already was the rail of the steamer uncovered, and it was at last possible to see very plainly the little craft that was to be under their complete control.

She was a side-wheel boat, on the paddle-boxes of which were painted in black, with just a trifle of ornamentation, the words,

THE PEARL, OF TAMPA.

The smoke-stack was painted red, and the remainder of the outside work pure white that had suffered but little discoloration by its long bath.

About three feet of the bow was decked over flush with the rail, and evidently served as a tank for fresh-water; then came the main cabin, built straight up from the bottom flooring, and occupying fully twelve feet of the length. At the forward end of this, and rising about three feet above the top, was a tiny pilot-house hardly more than three feet square, in which could be seen a wheel that had once been highly polished, and curiously inlaid with different-colored woods, and what looked to be pieces of bone or ivory.

The interior of the cabin was painted light gray, and it occupied the full width of the craft. A door at the forward end opened toward the bow, and one aft led into the little hall that ran past the engine-room to the stern. Two windows on either side afforded means for the free circulation of air, and between these windows were two berths, one above the other, on each side.

The machinery, which was, of course, directly between the paddle-boxes, occupied about eight feet of space, and aft of this was a small room about four feet deep, that was evidently intended for the engineer.

Aft of this was the standing-room, five feet deep, over which had once been an awning, but this was now merely shreds of cloth hanging in the most forlorn-looking manner.

Now that they had seen the interior of the Pearl, they were doubly anxious to learn just how much damage had been done to her, so that they might know how much labor would have to be performed before she could be floated.

They were so busily engaged in trying to ascertain the extent of her injuries that they did not hear the approach of Captain Sammy, who was stumping along the beach, evidently in a state of the greatest surprise because the work had progressed so rapidly, and it was not until he spoke that they were aware of his presence.

“Now that’s what I call business,” he said, approvingly. “You couldn’t wait for daylight, but had to sit up all night so you could see the craft to day, eh?”

“We thought it was a pity to waste so much time, when it wasn’t a great deal of work to take advantage of last night’s tide,” replied Dare.

“Well, if I had known what you had been doing, I should have brought some stuff to work with this morning. Say, you Charley and Eob, come inshore here an’ put me on to the raft, an’ then row over to the dock, tell one of the men there to give you some canvas, pump tacks, and cold tar; then get back here as quick as you can.”

The boys obeyed the little Captain’s orders very readily, and while they were at the dock Captain Sammy and Dare unfastened the cables from one of the rafts, and poled it ashore.

The planks which had formed the top were now to do service as ways for the boat to rest on while she was being repaired, and these were nailed together and weighted down by the chains and rocks, so they could not float when the tide came up again.

By the time the boys returned from the dock, the entire bow of the steamer was out of water.

EMBROIDERY FOR GIRLS.

BY SUSAN HAYES WARD.

No. VII.

OR a plain bureau a scarf covering is perhaps as pretty as any, and it should be embroidered at the ends, or some simple figure could be scattered over it. But for bureaus that have boxes on either side a square or oblong piece of crash or round-thread linen is the simplest and most useful cover, as it can be readily washed; and this, with a cushion cover to match, any young girl can make. Nothing is required but a piece of crash of a quality costing about twenty-five cents a yard, and a few soft shades of crewel. Cut the linen exactly the right size to fit the opening before the glass; allow an inch for fringe if it is to be over-cast or hem-stitched, an inch and a half if tied in tiny knots, which can be made easily with the aid of a crochet hook. The fringe should be unravelled out last of all, after the embroidery is completed. Draw in the four corners the designs 1, 2, 3, and 4 by holding the pattern up to the window-pane if you have no impression-paper, and tracing the lines with a soft sharp pencil.

Work the border lines and stems in stem stitch, the leaves and flowers in New England stitch, as given in YOUNG PEOPLE No. 59, letting the stitches run in the direction of the shading lines. The pin-cushion cover should be made in the same way, with border lines, and design No. 5 in the centre, and it should be cut large enough, so that the fringe at the corners will touch the bureau. The whole should be worked either in three shades of one color, as olive or blue, or the border lines, leaves, and stems can be worked in three shades of olive or sage greens, and the flowers in pink (scarlet-pink), blue, and yellow. Let the outer bordering line be the darkest.

Pretty and useful tray covers can be made in the same way of small pieces of crash fringed at the two ends or all around, with these little designs in the corners, but without the centre figure, which would be covered by the cups, and without the border lines, which make a little too much color for table use. The more carefully the fringe is finished, the prettier the work will look. Press on the wrong side with a warm iron, laying the work over folds of soft flannel. If the wools are good, this work will bear careful washing.

A LITTLE SUFFERER.

BY ELEANOR A. HUNTER.

I'M taking out my Claribel
This morning for an airing;
She has been sick so very long,
We hope have found it wearing.

She's had the measles and the mumps,
And all since last December,
'Sides several ovver sicknesses
Whose names I can't remember.

I've had her vac-ci-na-ted, too,
And oh! the scar it's leaving!
But all these things are nothin' to
The time when she was teeing.

I sat up all night long wis her;
She grew worse fast and faster;
I gave her pollygolic, and Put on a mustard plaster.

She's been so patient and so sweet,
I love to kiss and pet her.
Poor child, she's suffered ev'ryting!
But now the darling's better.

I hope the air will do her good;
"Dear, don't kick off your cover."
I've been so anxious, no one knows
Or feels it like a mover!

DESIGN FOR BUREAU OR TRAY COVER.

NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—Somewhat or other the letter from John M. in the Post office Box for April 17 brings back the memory of a little boy with whom I came over the ocean two years ago, and whom I particularly remember because he was so fond of reading. He had a brother Gerald, too, and I am quite sure it is his aunt and so, dear Postmistress, I dare say your correspondent and my little friend of the steamer— if he will let me call him so—are the same. It grieved me to hear that he had been ill; but I have no doubt, without knowing about it, that he has borne the illness patiently. I think I saw the patience in his eyes on board ship, and I am quite sure I can read it between the lines of his brief letter.

Somewhat, too, the letter brings back the tender memory of another of my boy friends, who, just three years ago, when about Johnnie's age, was taken with an illness that proved to be long and dangerous. After a while he got better, but whether he staid upstairs or came to the front window when the processions went by made no difference; the eyes that had grown so dim would never see again. This was a terrible trial—more terrible even than the illness—but he bore it so bravely and uncomplainingly that those who were about him grew to respect and admire him, and will be better all their lives for the example of his patience. And that is the way in which we can make even our sicknesses helpful to those around us and to ourselves, by never hurting him. I know, to be ill, but perhaps during the last year Johnnie has been showing his brothers that it is not so hard as they have thought.

I am glad, at any rate, that he is getting better. When I went to Barnum's the other night I wished that he might be riding again on Jumbo's back. Indeed, I fancied I saw Jumbo, as he passed by, turn his little eyes toward the children, and then drop them disconsolately, as though he were looking for somebody who was not there. Do you suppose, dear Postmistress, he was looking for Johnnie?

I would like to be a little mouse in the corner, and peep at John's face when he sits at his desk, and wonder whether it will bring him to think which of all the friends who they remember making on that delightful voyage this may be.

MERAN, TYROL.

You say you would like to hear how boys spend their study and play hours. I get up at eight o'clock and read my lessons, or study, or have English and Bible history from my mamma, and German, French, history, geography, arithmetic, and penmanship from a private teacher. I have my music of the afternoon tea, and generally read or play.

Meran lies in Tyrol, and is a winter resort for sick people. The Tyrolese dress very family. The men wear short leather pants reaching to the knees, a broad black leather belt embroidered with white, a very short-waisted brown coat with red lapels, no vest, but broad green suspenders, low shoes with black garters, their knees are bare.

The women wear their dresses short. The skirt is in pleats so full there are over twenty yards of it, and the bodice is tight, with a high collar, a chief around the neck, and generally a large blue apron.

NEWARK, NEW JERSEY.

How pleasantly one may make enjoyable acquaintances all the more so when the Post Office Box I assure you I enjoy the weekly budget of letters nearly as much as my own, and sometimes, after finishing them, I say, half-rectfully, "I wish I knew who would grow one called best." Sometimes visit the children's ward of one of our hospitals. It is a bright, cheery place, full of pictures and toys, and pretty plants in the sunny windows. The children, whose names the staff nurses are tucked under white covers, are all very well contented. One little fellow, Jamie by name, is a regular little mischief, and keeps Sister Casey by his heels, and grows one called best, he is so droll. He is knock-kneed, poor little fellow! and waddling up to you, he will tell you, in shy zee, that he is the "nurse's pilot." This is his own name, and he would grow one called best, him such a thing. There is a brown-eyed boy of ten whose leg has been amputated. It was pitying to see him raise his anxious eyes to Sister Casey, how soon it would grow one called best.

It is very hard to see little children suffer. Even a bright, cozy ward does not lessen the painful fact, although it does much to soften it.

Bright scrap-books amuse them wonderfully, and I have often been edified by the most original descriptions of the pictures.

We are having April showers here, and the birds are singing and the blossoms. I am so glad spring is coming, for I expect to have an enjoyable time with my botany and flora. And now good-by.

LILLIAN P.

I am glad you go to the little sick children and do what you can to amuse them. I wonder if you will look in one of these days on "our child" in Young People's Cot?

FORT HAMILTON, NEW YORK HARBOR.

I am a big boy six years old. I have a baby brother "Carroll" he is most a year old. I have ten little white chickens, and I had a dog named Tag, but he ruined our flowers, and so I gave him away. The hands are busy every morning at midnight, and Sunday morning we have inspection. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and I expect soon to see my letter in it, and I think Jimmy Brown's stories are awful funny.

NORTON E. W.

BROOKLIN, ONTARIO, CANADA.

While ago I came across three of the longest words I ever saw, and I thought I would send them to the Post office Box. "Winterthurchburgschweidnitzerwartburg" is the name of a German organization. A small Welsh village is named Llanfairpwllgwybregiillannddywyllogo. (Llanfairpwllgwybregiillannddywyllogo) is the name of an extensive mountain range.

We have had a very cold winter here in Canada, and there is still a great deal of snow on the ground. I think yours is a very nice paper. I liked the story of "Nan" very much, and was sorry when it ended. Jimmy Brown is, in my opinion, a bad boy, and deserves to be taken upstairs. I pity Sue if he ever does go to live with her.

ANNIE.

Can you pronounce those words, Annie? It gave me a headache to try.

I think perhaps some of the little ones would like to hear of a little friend of mine "away down South in Dixie." His name is Will, and you must picture in your mind a sturdy chap, sunburned and rough, with big black eyes, and a violent habit of looking out of them. He is only five years old, and lives in a pleasant village, where neighbors are plentiful, and in spite of all his mamma can do to save him from the commission, and to get her sorrow over the first thing he says when he goes into a house is: "Howdy, Mrs. _____ (or Miss). "Have you got a soap?" is one of our safe. I expect you got teakakes in it. 'Tis most starved."

Will's papa has tried to correct his runaway habits, and, as a final resort, got a switch and used it most freely on Will's back. Will's mother whenever he came from the store and his boy was not at home he would "repeat the dose."

All went smoothly for a few days; "then, alas! I hope he forgot—" Will ran off, and did not return. When the two-o'clock bell rang it recalled the fact to our runaway that papa would be home to dinner. Oh, how his little feet flew! He gave out a note of breath as he ran into his mother's room.

"Has papa come?" he asked.

"Yes," said mamma, with a sad face.

"Then take me in your lap, for I s'pees there's going to be a fuss."

When his father finished dinner he came into the room and said: "Oh, my little son, why did you disobey your mother?"

"Then, papa," said Will, "let me off this time. I couldn't help it. It's the time of year all boys run away."

"I can't know whether will get his whipping or not, but I think the little folks will agree it was a very funny excuse." AUNT HETTIE.

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND.

I am one of your little readers—eleven years old—and I send the true story of my pet birds to the Post office Box:

THE SAD STORY OF THE PIPER FAMILY.

There were four of them in all—Mr. Jack Piper (that was the papa bird), Mrs. Jill Piper (that was the mamma), Major Piper, the son, and Miss Piper, the daughter. They were very happy until death came into their family. The papa had had two or three attacks of asthma, but one day he died. They may have missed Mr. Jack, but they did not put on mourning garments.

There was a month after the death of her father, Miss Muff quarreled with her mother, and as she never could agree, they fell to fighting. As Muff was the spryest, she killed her mother by pecking her in the back of the neck, and so she got much about her mother's death, but she was the same, and was as happy as if her mother was living.

As I buried Mrs. Piper in the garden beside her husband, Muff resembled her father in appearance, but her disposition was like her mother's. She inherited the same disease that her father had, asthma, and in about two years after her mother's death she died. Her funeral was private.

The Major was left alone. From his childhood he had been fond of stinging. And he never was happier than when he was playing with his master. Major's health is very good, and if he lives until next Decoration-day he will be six years old.

ALICE C. R.

FORT WAYNE, INDIANA.

I have never written a letter to the Postmistress, so I thought I would like to try to write one, and to see over children and their pets, and so I will. I have three little chickens, a bird, and a cross cat, and I had a dog that had eight cunning little puppies. I have seven dolls; their names are Eva, Rosalia, Cosette, Marguerite, Isabel, Rosalinda, George, and Jap.

We have a large yard and lots of trees around the house, and in a tree near my window the robins always build their nests in the spring, and I remember a dear little robin always flew to the top of the chimney every night and sang, and sang a sweet little song.

CONSTANCE L. W.

MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.

I am a little girl seven years old. I have never been to school, but have said my lessons to mamma since I was five. I have no pets except six dolls and a little baby brother named Herbert. My aunt Blanche has even me a poodle dog, but it is too young to leave its mother yet.

I have a nice swing and many story-books. I have a large brother Tom, who is away at school. I have had letters from him, but they were in my other letter was not printed, so I thought I would write again. I like "Nan," "Raising the Pearl," and the Post office Box very much. I hope this letter is not too long to print.

MADRID J.

LEBON, MICHIGAN.

I am a little lame girl nine years old, and I never went to school in my life, but my sister teaches me to write, and I read nearly all the time, except when I am in my mother's arms, and helping my sister make beds. I go on errands too, and hunt bees' eggs.

My papa gets me a great many books. My favorites ones are: I. M. A. Let's let's let's Progress and Robinson Crusoe. I have read Little Women and Little Men a great many times. I have a yellow bird called Tris, and a red bird called Rubie. I take N. Nicholas, Hilde, Archie, and your paper. I watch every week for the YOUNG PEOPLE.

FAVE K.

ALLEGHENY CITY, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little boy eight years old. I go to school. I am in the Third Reader, and study geography and United States history, and I can read and division. I have no pets, for I have no room to keep them, but I go to the country every summer to visit my cousins. There are three little boys and a girl, and I am the oldest. My mother while I was there they had a pet fox, but it got so cross that we had to give it away. It bit the boy who got it, on his nose. Then he traded it for a sheep.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since Christmas, and enjoy reading it very much. I like the new story of "Raising the Pearl." Will you please tell me how to keep rabbits in the city?

FREDDIE S. M.

IN HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE No. 133 you will find an article telling all about the care of rabbits.

RAHWAY, NEW JERSEY.

I am eight years old, and have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for two years. I enjoy reading very much. I will give you a list of the books that I have read: Robbie, The Sorcerer, Family Robinson, Tom Brown's School Days, Around the World in Eighty Days, Michael Stragg, Arabian Nights, Tom Brown's School Days, A Story of the Old Boy, The Old Boy, and many others. I attend the public school, and am in the grammar department, ready to begin fractions.

MAX.

THOMSONVILLE, CONNECTICUT.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—My children being very much interested in your department, have begged me to write to you. Like all the others, we find YOUNG PEOPLE a more than pleasant visitor, and ever the Jimmy Brown dog comes out the letters. Those written by children from the flooded districts were of more than ordinary interest. They are now quite taken up with Captain Sammy Bunt and the boys pirate Tom and Tucker.

My three children attend my school, and YOUNG PEOPLE must, of course, go too. I open it at the most interesting picture, pin it up in a conspicuous place, and many a time I have not been answer about it. Then the ones who have the best lessons take it to read. They have learned many things which set them to thinking, and that is what children need so much. At the time of the Western Floods I read the school some of the letters, and their lessons were about that section.

so they were open-eyed all through it. Willie has written you a letter, and I will send it, but for fear that you can not read it I will copy it.

MOTHER.

Thank you for so pleasant a letter. Now everybody must read little Willie's:

I am seven years old. I have a little sister Elsa five years old, and another, Ella, nine years old, and we all like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I sit the table and go after the milk every morning. We had a pet cat named GIP, who used to open the door, and he would stand on his hind legs and beg for something to eat. Now we have no pets but the hens. My favorite game is Authors, but we like Hide the Thimble.

WILLIE H. P.

TOGA, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl five years old. I have no pets of my own, except my books and dolls, but have lots of them. My favorite dolly is little Jenny Wren; my auntie gave her to me on my last birthday. But my greatest pets are my papers and magazines. My papa has brought me home YOUNG PEOPLE every Wednesday night since it was first printed. Then he and mamma read every word for me. I saved all the numbers, and on Christmas mamma sent them to the poor little sick children at the hospital. I have been wanting to write to the Post-office Box for a long time. I can hardly wait until it is read to me. I enjoy it so much—it and the Jimmy Brown stories. I can not write myself, so papa is writing this for me.

ETHEL V.

ANDREX, MASSACHUSETTS.

I thought I would write and tell you about a game that we play a good deal at home and also at school, called "Crambo." Perhaps you know what it is. Each person playing has two slips of paper, and on one he writes a word, and on the other a question, and passes the word to the person on his right hand, and the question to the one on his left hand. Then you take your word and question and write some poetry in which you answer the question and put in the word. The word does not have to come at the end of a line. Here are some we wrote one evening:

Word, "Character." Question, "Are you happy?"

How can I be happy
When to school I must go
On Monday the next,
And sit in a row
Of excellent scholars,
The which I am not?
And this on my character
Makes a sad lot.

Word, "Fire." Question, "Do you believe in women's rights?"

I do not believe in women's rights;
'Tis not their place to go to fights
Or any other horrid sight,
And when great fires break out,
I think there is no doubt
That women should stay at home and not pout.

Word, "Gondola." Question, "Do you like to go to school?"

I like to go to school;
I don't want to be a fool,
And so I mind the rule,
But when I have grown old,
And also somewhat bold,
All heaped up lots of gold,
All across the ocean blue
With a dear friend or two,
And travel Europe through,
I'll sail in a gondola,
I'll try my luck on roller
Skates, and become a bowler.
When all of this is done
I shall be tired of fun,
Then I may turn a nun.

I think it is lots of fun.

A week ago to-day I hurt my knee, and have been at home from school since. It was just at the beginning of the term. I was so sorry! My room-mates, Fifiue D. and Eugene V., and myself have named our room the "Nourward" room.

I think of the stories that have been in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE like "Nan" the best. I wonder if you know who wrote this?

"Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever;
Do noble things, not dream them all day long;

This making life, death, and that vast forever
One grand, sweet song."

ANNIE U.

Charles Kingsley is the author of this pretty stanza. Crambo is a good game for girls and boys, and your rhymes are quite ingenious.

Thanks, Annie dear, for your kind fancy about the Postmistress and her looks.—Ella A. M.: Try again, darling, and write a longer letter.—Dayton W.: You were a little man, to have your tooth extracted. I am sure you did not cry.—Virginia M. R.: Be very careful about flying around too fast on your roller skates.—Dora B. P.: How perfectly delightful to live where there are so many birds! The quarrelsome little sparrows drive the singing-birds away from my home, so I do not hear such a chorus as you do.—Dolly R.: Always send the answers to your puzzles when you send the puzzles. Enigmas must rhyme. Very charming letters have been received from Albert G., Arthur S., S. G. S., Will A., Jun., Frank R., Lula H. P., Louis W. C., and Annie E. P.

THE WOODSIDE SCHOOL.—I hope the children have not forgotten Mrs. Richardson's little school at Woodside, near Lincoln, North Carolina. Mrs. Richardson writes that the children enjoyed their Easter festival very much. She wishes to return her thanks to readers of YOUNG PEOPLE who send books, papers, and needed clothing to the poor-colored people whom she is trying to teach and help.

RECIPTS FOR LITTLE HOUSEKEEPERS.

PLAIN OMELET.—It is very easy to make a delicate, delicious omelet, if you know how; yet half the people who make omelets send to the table tough, leathery things of which little Housekeepers would be ashamed.

In the first place, my dears, see that you have a hot fire, and a clean smooth iron spiler. Put the pan on the fire to become heated; break the eggs into a basin, sprinkle over them pepper and salt, and give them twelve vigorous beats with a spoon. Now put butter the size of an egg (for five eggs) in the heated pan; turn it around so that it will moisten all the bottom of the pan. When it is well melted, and begins to ball, pour in the eggs. Holding the handle of the omelet pan in the left hand, carefully and lightly with a spoon draw up the whitened egg from the bottom, so that all the eggs may be equally cooked, or whitened to a soft, creamy substance. Now, still with the left hand, shake the pan forward and backward, which will disengage the eggs from the bottom; then shaking again the omelet a little one side, turn with a spoon half of one side over the other; and allowing it to remain a moment to harden a little at the bottom, gently shaking it all the time, to make room to a warm platter held in the right hand. A little practice makes one quite dexterous in placing the omelet in the centre of the platter, and turning it over as it is tossed from the omelet pan. However, if one can not manage the tossing operation, which is the correct thing, the omelet can be lifted to the platter with a pancake-turner. It should be creamy and light in the centre, and more firm on the outside.

POTATOES IN CASKS.—The following is a nice way of serving baked potatoes. Bake potatoes of equal size, and when done, and still hot, cut off a small piece from each potato; scoop out carefully the inside, leaving the skin unbroken; mash the potato well, seasoning it with plenty of butter, pepper, and salt; return it with a spoon to the potato skin, allowing it to protrude about an inch above the skin. When enough skins are filled, use a fork or knife to make rough the potato which projects above the skin; put all into the oven a minute to color the tops. They will have the appearance of baked potatoes burst open.

SNOW POTATOES.—These are mashed potatoes pressed through a colander into a dish in which they are to be served. The potatoes then resemble rice or vermicelli, and are very light and nice. They make a pretty dish, and must be served very hot.

CHOCOLATE CAKE.—Make a cup cake with the following ingredients: one cupful of butter, two cupfuls of sugar, three cupfuls of flour, one cupful of milk, four eggs beaten separately, one teaspoonful of soda, two tea-spoonfuls of cream of tartar or two tea-spoonfuls of yeast powder; cut the cup cake, when baked, through the middle, or bake it in two or three parts; put a layer of the chocolate mixture between and on the top and sides of the cake.

CHOCOLATE MIXTURE.—Five table-spoonfuls of grated chocolate, with enough cream or milk to wet it, one cupful of sugar, and one egg well beaten. Stir the ingredients over the fire until thoroughly mixed; then flavor with vanilla.

A CAT AND A CATCH.

BY EDWARD I. STEVENSON.

NOT long ago a distinguished writer on animals and their intelligence declared that in his judgment the cat was naturally more clever at lifting a latch, unfastening a gate, or, in fact, getting over any little difficulties in its way, than a dog. The following true story is an argument. Harry was a very pretty white and Maltese cat, with bright eyes and a delightful purr—was, poor fellow! for he is no more.

During the month of December, 187-, a small basement window in the kitchen of Harry's master was found open night after night. The servants were questioned, and each time were positive that the mysterious window had not only been tightly shut, but locked, before the kitchen was left to itself. Water-pipes froze, rain drenched the floor, lectures followed; still the window was discovered unlocked and open when morning brought down the maids to light the fires.

One cold afternoon Harry's mistress was directing a plumber in the kitchen. Presently the cat's cry was heard outside, and in a moment Harry was seen pleading at that identical window for entrance to the joys of the hearth. "Go away, Harry," said his hard-hearted friend: "you must wait until I get ready to open the door for you." What was her surprise to behold Harry, after a few minutes longer of entreaty, lying flat down with his back to the window and against its panes.

Paying no regard to her presence, he began dashing his fat legs and body violently against the sash, when, utterly to her astonishment, the simple lock sprang back. He had, then, long ago found out that it would act thus! The instant he heard its click, and knew that his barrier to comfort was unavailing, Harry pushed up the easy-sliding window with his hind-legs in a twinkling, and stood purring within it, on the sill, before the open-mouthed spectators. The secret of the window was out!

It is hardly necessary to say that when this story was first told by them nobody would believe it to be a fact. The remarkable feat was, however, repeated by Harry several times to the satisfaction of the doubters, one of whom was the writer.

CAST AWAY IN A TREE.

BY F. B. STANFORD.

IT had been raining three or four days—raining hard. Down on the rim of the ocean in the neighborhood of Casco Bay, where the Topham School was encamped, it seemed to several impatient boys that it would never cease raining.

Some of them had been planning to explore the small islands in the bay; others had in view a visit to a fort two or three miles away; and Foo Tong, a Chinese lad who was a pupil in the school, wanted to take a cruise to a neighboring beach in search of specimen shells. Indeed, each and all the boys of the school had some project to carry out when the sky became clear.

Finally Foo Tong became impatient, and concluded not to wait any longer. Rain or shine, he meant to venture forth in a dory of one of the fishermen. Hence, as might have been expected, a catastrophe followed.

Foo Tong was not much of a sailor, and he therefore induced Napoleon Bonaparte Pickens, a colored boy, who was chief lieutenant to the camp cook, to go with him and manage the dory. The two stole away from the camp unobserved, and met in a cove where the boat was fastened.

"No goodee watching rain allee time," said Foo. "Me wantee more great fun."

"We's jes' gwine to hab it, an' no mistake," Nap replied. "T's ben achin' a whole week to try dis yere dory."

Both made haste to untie the dory; and in another moment, after taking aboard Nap's dog Gip, they pushed off from the shore. Although it was raining, the bay was calm, and it was not difficult to row or to keep the boat pointed in any direction desired. But had either of the boys really been accustomed to living near the sea, he would have noticed that a thick fog was threatening in the distance, and been more cautious.

"Jes' you steer wid de paddle, Chimesey, an' leabe de rest to me," said Nap. "I know what I's 'bout when I gits in a boat. Keep her headed for de p'int right afore yer nose."

Foo was quite willing to do as he was bidden, especially as Nap performed the hardest part of the labor; and as he had not yet mastered much of the English language, he also let Nap do most of the talking.

In about three-quarters of an hour they reached the beach for which they had set out, and drew the dory high and dry on the sand. Then Nap went to work, assisted by Gip, digging clams, while Foo wandered off in search of shells. The afternoon undoubtedly would have passed pleasantly enough, and everything would have turned out quite as intended, if that dense fog, which was approaching slowly and surely every moment, had kept out of the way. Nap did not notice it until it began to gather around him, and then he did not stop to think much about it. Clams, big and little, were engaging his attention just then; and as soon as he had filled his hat with them he kindled a fire and proceeded to roast them.

"Guess we'll hab a little clam bake on our own hook, Chimesey," he said.

"Fire much goodee," Foo answered, running up to it a moment, and choking with his mouth full of smoke. "Big fun. Hi! hi!"

Gip barked; Nap heaped the crackling fire with wet drift-wood, and Foo ran hither and thither picking up every shell and pebble that chanced to please him. By-and-by, however, Gip heard the sound of a bell somewhere in the distance, and suddenly became melancholy, as dogs sometimes do when they hear bells. Sitting down, he howled loud and dismally.

"Shut yer mouth, you ole pup," Nap commanded, savagely.

But Gip could not be silenced so easily. He trotted away a rod or two, and began howling again.

"Golly, it's de fog-bell ober on de Cape!" Nap said to himself, after listening a minute. "We's in a scrape. Hey, Chimesey! Chimesey!"

Foo appeared shortly, out of breath and rather startled.

"Hurry up an' help pull de dory into de water," said Nap, tugging at the boat. "Time we's a-gittin' up an' gittin', I reckon."

"What for go?" Foo asked, surprised.

"Too muchee fog, Chimesey," Nap explained.

"Ho! ho! fog no hurt," said Foo, shrugging his shoulders as usual.

"You am only a goose, I guess. Catch a holt ob de boat quick. Do you hear?"

"No, siree, you no bossce me," Foo answered, stubbornly. "Me not go now. Me huntce more shells."

Nap stood up straight, pulled his tattered old hat firmly on his head, and placed his arms akimbo.

"Look a-yere now, Foo Tong, you jes' better believe I's a-gwine for to be cap'en ob dis boat. You help me git her into de water dis minute."

Foo shrugged his shoulders again. "Me no speakee English," he said. "Me no understand."

It did not take more than three seconds more, though, for him to learn what Nap meant, and hastily dropping the shells he held, he assisted to draw the boat to the water. Then he stuffed his pockets with his treasures, and sat down in the stern.

The fog was already so thick that nothing could be seen in any direction except fog, and it was becoming thicker and thicker. Nap believed at first that he knew the right direction to head the boat, but before he had been rowing many minutes he discovered that he was not sure where they were. In fact, he was bewildered, and as the thought occurred to him that perhaps he was rowing toward the open sea instead of the mainland, he grew a trifle frightened.

"Chimesey," he said, in a scared voice, "I's kinder uncertain which way for to p'int. Mebbe's not we's a-gwine de tother way, an' we ougter turn right round."

"You a great cap'en, you!" Foo said, sullenly. "Row ahead. Me steer. Me know which way."

After these remarks both remained silent, and Nap continued to row with all his strength for a half-hour or more. The shore, however, did not appear to be any nearer than before, and he finally stopped, discouraged, and allowed the dory to drift.

Foo now for the first time began to look frightened. He too had supposed that he knew the right direction to steer, but he had found that he was mistaken. He saw that unless the fog cleared soon they would be in a dangerous situation. A vessel or steamboat coming in from sea might run over them, or they might float out among the waves, and be capsized. He talked to himself excitedly in the Chinese language, and, standing up, shouted for help.

"You am powerful stirred up, Chimesey," said Nap, looking at him with wonder. "Guess you tink fogee some hurtee now, hey?"

"Row, row much more," Foo said, entreatingly, taking up the paddle and plying it desperately. "We try again."

They turned the boat and rowed in another direction a long while; then they shouted until they were exhausted; and at last, when they had been rowing here and there two or three hours, and it began to grow dark, they gave up in despair. Foo lay down in the stern, coiled his pigtail, covered his head with part of the loose sack he wore, and fell to wishing that he was back in Hong-Kong. Nap, quite tired and careless, leaned against one side of the boat, and was soon sound asleep. Gip, in fact, was the only one that was on the watch, and he sat in the bow with his ears thrown forward, as if aware of the responsibility that rested on him.

A couple of hours later, while Nap was dreaming that he was on the slippery back of a whale which was frisking around at sea, the dory thumped solidly against something, Gip growled and barked, and Nap awoke just in time to see Foo scrambling out of the boat and stepping on a dark rock.

"Hi! hi! no drownce me here!" Foo cried, greatly delighted. "Waves no tipee over big little rock. Hi! hi!"

The place proved to be a small rock island, in the centre of which was a tall spruce-tree. When Nap had examined it, he remembered that he had seen it once before while sailing with some of the boys of the school. It was near one side of the bay, he believed.

"Guess we'll hiteh up yere till mornin', Chimesey," he said, fastening the boat. "Seems to be better'n loafin' round on de water."

"Yes, yes," Foo answered. "Hitehee boat. We stay here."

It was so dark that neither could see the other two yards apart; but the rain had ceased. Nap squeezed the water from his jacket, made a pillow of it, and prepared, by lying down at full length on the rock, to resume his slumbers. Foo, after some moments, also followed his example. The night, however, was not to be passed so easily. Some time before morning Gip's barking awoke them, and they both jumped up, rather startled, to find that the miniature island was nearly all under water. The tide was rising and covering it; and, moreover, the dory had somehow disappeared. The only way they could escape the calamity that threatened them was to climb the tree, which Nap hastened to do. But first he buttoned his jacket around Gip, then tied a strong fishing-line over it; and when he had reached the lowest limb he slowly drew the dog after him. He then mounted to a higher limb, while Foo took possession of the lower one.

"Reckon you don' want to be drowned no more'n we does, do you, pup?" he said, putting one arm about him.

Gip licked his hand, and expressed his gratitude by wagging his tail in a thankful manner. Before many more hours he performed a service also, as will be seen, that quite paid for the care his master had shown him.

In the course of an hour or more a faint gleam of daylight began to appear; and although the fog still remained, it was not so thick as it had been. Now and then the vague outline of trees could be seen in one direction, not a great distance away. Nap and Foo both shouted for help several times after they had distinguished the welcome sight. But still another long while passed, and no one answered.

"I tell you F's gittin' tired ob dis," Nap said at length. "Seems dough we might stay yere foreber. Mebbe de Professor an' de boys 'll neber miss us."

Foo said nothing. But an idea had occurred to him. He could not speak English, neither could he write it; but several times in his life he had made some more or less extraordinary attempts at drawing. He sharpened a lead-pencil and drew a crude picture on his handkerchief of the tree with Nap and himself among the limbs, and the water surrounding it. When he had completed it he handed it down to Nap, who thought it looked very much like drawings he had seen on tea chests.

"Tie him on dog's neck," said Foo, making many gestures with his hands. "He swimme over there; then over shore. Boys sees picture; then come."

The idea was too novel for Nap's mind to grasp.

"Guessee pup not fool 'nough to try dat," he said.

"Ho! ho! You more seare than dog. He swimme when you drop him in water. I give you one dollar to make him swimme."

Nap considered the proposal, and concluded that he would try it. If Gip would not go he could manage somehow to draw him up again. After trying the handkerchief securely around his neck he patted him a moment affectionately, and then dropped him as easily as he could.

The dog, of course, was greatly surprised by this treatment, and refused to swim away until he found they would not aid him. He then, however, lost no time in reaching the island, where he shook off the water, and barked back at them. When he grew weary of doing that he ran up and down the shore searching for something to eat. But at last Nap and Foo lost sight of him.

Hour after hour passed; the fog all vanished; the sun shone bright; and by-and-by the tide had fallen sufficiently to expose a bit of the rock beneath the tree. The boys descended, and waited and waited, impatiently and desperately hungry. The forenoon seemed a year long, and the afternoon equal to three or four years. But both passed somehow; it grew dark, and the rising tide again drove them up the tree.

Perhaps if it had not been for Gip the catastrophe might have had a very serious ending. How he spent the day nobody ever knew; but he made his appearance among the boys in the camp about sunset in a very drenched and soiled condition. The head master and all the school had been searching high and low the most of the day for the missing boys; and when Foo Tong's handkerchief was found around the dog's neck there was much excitement. An old fisherman to whom it was shown said "he guessed the China boy meant that they was on One-tree Island," and an expedition was fitted out immediately to go in search of them.

At last Foo and Nap saw a light approaching over the water; then they heard the dip of the oars, and a few minutes afterward they were rescued.

"Golly!" said Nap, as soon as he realized that he was safe, "you don' catch me a-gwine to sea agin in dis yere bay."

"Not mucchee!" said Foo, shrugging his shoulders.

LITTLE GIRL AND LITTLE BROOK.

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

"LITTLE brook, little brook, why are you always singing?"

"Because in early morning all the flower bells are ringing
To waken bees and butterflies, and bid them journey over
The fields through which I flow, where grow the daisies and the clover;
Because the live-long day the birds from tree to tree are calling,
And now and then in dancing drops the sparkling rain is falling;
Because when comes the night the moon and stars are brightly beaming
Upon their fair reflections in my silvered waters teeming;
Because I'm happy, little girl; and that is why I'm singing."

"Little brook, little brook, if you find so much gladness,
Why, surely I should know no single thought of sadness;
For all you have I have—green fields and butterflies and flowers,
And bees and birds, and sun and moon and stars, and pleasant showers;
And then I have—and this is far beyond all other blisses—
A darling mother, little brook, who gives me smiles and kisses."

MR. THOMPSON AND THE FIELD-MICE.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

MR. THOMPSON lay under the hedge by the wheat field. He had left the house, because the piazza was crowded with summer boarders, and the chatter of the young ladies disturbed his thoughts, he said. What he was thinking about he did not tell, but he carried with him a large book called The Natural History of Rodentia, and had his finger upon the article on Field-Mice.

He read for a few moments after he had settled himself comfortably in the shade of the hedge; then he shut the book, and gazing out over the swaying field of golden grain, he murmured to himself: "Field-mice! They must be curious little animals. They do not seem to do any harm. I wonder what they live on?"

"Wheat," piped a small voice near his foot.

"What?" said Mr. Thompson, somewhat startled.

"Wheat," repeated the small voice.

Mr. Thompson looked down. There close by his foot sat the cunningest little mouse you could imagine. He was but little over an inch long, and he had very bright eyes and a very long curly tail, and he sat up on his hind-legs and winked knowingly at Mr. Thompson.

"Wheat—we live on wheat," he repeated, with a shrill little giggle at Mr. Thompson's surprise.

Mr. Thompson stared at the tiny creature in amazement, then asked,

"What do you live on after the wheat is gone?"

"Corn," squeaked the mouse.

"But corn don't last always," objected Mr. Thompson.

"What do you do in the winter?"

"Sleep," replied the field-mouse, cheerfully. "We go under-ground and sleep. Now there is our cousin the big field-mouse; he lays up a store of eatables for the winter. And as for our other cousin the house mouse, I don't believe he sleeps at all."

"I don't believe he does," said Mr. Thompson, shaking his head, as he thought of the sleepless nights he had passed while the mice were holding high carnival in the walls. "Where do you live?" he asked.

"Over here in the wheat. Come over and see," answered the mouse. "Not that way," he added, laughing, as Mr. Thompson started to rise.

The mouse ran up Mr. Thompson's arm, and sat on his head. It seemed as if he weighed a ton, and Mr. Thompson slowly began to grow smaller and smaller. His alpaca duster was just the right color for the mouse's back, and his white vest did not change in hue, though it was of soft fur, instead of cotton duck. Mr. Thompson looked at himself approvingly. He really made a very handsome mouse, and he switched his long tail jauntily as he followed his new-found friend. They threaded their way in and out among the wheat stalks, which seemed like large trees now, till at last the mouse paused, and said,

"There is my house up there."

LITTLE FANNIE AND HER PETS.

About eighteen inches from the ground three or four wheat stalks were brought together, and between them there hung a ball of dried grass and long horse-hairs about as big as a base-ball, curiously woven together, making a solid nest. The mouse ran lightly up the stalk, and Mr. Thompson followed. On one side of the ball there was a small hole. Into this the mouse went, and Mr. Thompson followed. Inside was Mrs. Mouse and six children. Mr. Thompson staid in the nest but a moment, for it was small, and the apartment was crowded. After coming down and complimenting the mouse upon the beauty of his dwelling and its inmates, he sat down, and prepared to question his companion.

"You spoke of your cousin the large field-mouse. Does he live in the same way?" he asked.

"No," replied the mouse; "he lives on the ground. He makes his nest of grass; but as he is so much larger than I am, he could not run up the wheat stalk as I do. I have another cousin, the short-tailed or black mouse, but we are not very proud of him. He lives in the ground all the year round, and steals anything he can lay his paws on. Then in the winter he will eat off the bark all around a young apple-tree, and kill it. That is the reason why people dislike us. We don't do any harm, but the black mouse and the house mouse are so wicked that we have to suffer for their faults. But here comes one of my cousins from the house. I'll introduce you to him."

After the introduction was over, the house mouse said:

"Perhaps you would like to walk down to the barn and see how we live there? We have rare sport, I assure you."

"I should like to do so very much," replied Mr. Thompson. "I have been greatly interested in your cousin's house."

"Pooh!" said the house mouse. "That is nothing. I live in the lumber-room, next to the granary. There are several families of us there, and I can assure you we have some queer dwelling-places. My nest is in an old boot, I have a friend who lives in a tea-kettle, and another has a splendid place in an old cushion."

They trotted along as they talked, and soon reached the granary. Here Mr. Thompson saw the nests, and was much interested in one enterprising individual who had taken possession of an old jug which was lying on its side. He had filled it with paper and corn silk, and boasted that he had the warmest house in the lumber-room.

"I was a little afraid of it at first, though," he said, "for I had a brother who crawled into one of those big humming-tops, and couldn't get out. You see, whenever he tried to get to the hole it would roll over, and so he was unable to escape. He had been in it all day, when the nurse-girl came to find the top, and as she came up the stairs he happened to move, so that the top rolled toward her. She was dreadfully frightened, and ran to the house, screaming that the top was bewitched. Then they came out and took the top away, and I have never seen him since."

Mr. Thompson remembered the circumstance, and how the mouse had been shaken from the top into the clutches of the cat, but he said nothing. After he had looked around to his satisfaction he retraced his steps to the wheat field. His friend the field-mouse was waiting for him.

"What do you think of living in the granary?" he inquired, as Mr. Thompson seated himself.

"Well," replied Mr. Thompson, reflectively, "I should think it would be more dangerous. The cat is around all the time, and the folks set traps, and it is so much used by the men that I should think it would not be a very good place."

"Yes," replied the field-mouse; "but then the cats come here too, and the hawks and the weasels, and in the night the owls. So you see we have a pretty hard time of it. There was one nice man, though," he added, reflectively.

"Who was that?" inquired Mr. Thompson.

"That Scotch poet Burns. Haven't you read his poem to a mouse? But here comes a young lady. Now you will see some fun." And the mouse's little black eyes twinkled with mischief as he rushed toward the bars.

Mr. Thompson looked around; it was too late. The young lady was his beloved Angelina. The mouse dashed at her furiously. She saw him coming, and jumped frantically toward a rock, uttering a series of screams which would do credit to a steam calliopo.

The next thing Mr. Thompson knew, he was at her side, and she had fainted in his arms. It was the work of some time to revive her; and as Mr. Thompson gathered up her parasol and fan, which she had dropped in her alarm, and assisted her faltering steps homeward, he made a solemn vow never again to be a mouse, since the inoffensive animal carried such terror to the feminine heart.

TOM FAIRWEATHER AT ADEN.

BY LIEUTENANT E. W. STURDY,
U. S. N.

next port made by the vessel upon which Tom Fairweather was so active and interested a passenger was Aden. Tom had been told that Aden was called the Gibraltar of the East, so that he was prepared for frowning rocks and natural fortresses when his father's ship steamed into the bay. But he was not prepared for anything quite so black and barren as greeted him. Lieutenant Jollytarre was leaning with him over the ship's side.

"I never saw such black hills," said Tom. "They look as though they had just been thrown up by an earthquake."

"And so they were, only longer ago than you and I could count. You see their forms show all the violence of the convulsion which created them—heaps of burned fragments, cliffs divided by deep fissures, and sharp peaks shooting upward. Perhaps the fires are still raging within their sides."

"I shouldn't like to live here. I should be afraid of an outbreak any day."

"That has not happened for a long time. I suppose the earth's fury is gradually dying out. But take it all in all, the other nickname by which Aden is known suits it the best; it is quite often called 'the coal-hole of the East.'"

"And I don't know anything it looks more like," quoth Tom.

"Yes, it is a good name, and for other reasons. A great quantity of coal is stored here, belonging chiefly to steam-ship companies. Aden drives a flourishing trade from the fact that it is a free port. It has almost ruined Moeha by taking away a great deal of the coffee trade from there. It exports also honey, gum, feathers, dyes, pearls, and ivory. Of course it imports but little besides coal, wines, liquors, and some coarse cotton goods."

"To say nothing of very bad tobacco," said Captain Fairweather, joining them. "The worst I ever smoked came from Aden."

All this time they were steaming into Aden Bay. When they had come to anchor, Tom's father suggested that he should go on shore at once with Jollytarre. Tom, you know, was always wild for the first chance to stretch his legs. They were lauded by one of the ship's boats at a fine pier, and found themselves in a village skirting one side of the harbor.

"This is not Aden proper," explained the Lieutenant; "that lies beyond, three or four miles across the peninsula. We'll want a carriage to drive there in."

They stopped a moment and looked about them. Immediately they were surrounded by a crowd of persons eager to supply fifty imaginary wants. One Arab urged them to buy ostrich feathers; another wished to rent them horses.

"I can't stand this," said Mr. Jollytarre. "Life is short, and as we only came here for coal, and are to leave to-morrow, we must make the most of our time. Good! there's a carriage;" and Jollytarre concluded the bargain forthwith.

The road from the inner harbor across to old Aden is of sand and volcanic cinders. It lay between black scorched hills and over blistering sand. The place reminded Tom of pictures he had seen by Doré, who used to delight in such subjects.

Presently they came to a pass cut through the comb of a ridge. It was closed by a heavy double gateway, and the wall crossed by an arch. A soldier stood guard at the gate.

Our two friends passed parties of Arabs bringing camel-loads of their produce to market. Tom stared a good deal. This was the first time he had ever seen a camel outside of a circus, and he was both amused and excited.

"I would give a good deal to get on one of them," said he.

Just then a line of camels coming toward them was stopped by the drivers for a rest. Mr. Jollytarre was not slow in taking a hint. He called out to the coachman to stop also. "I don't doubt those fellows would give you a lift, Tom," he said. And he proceeded, partly by signs and partly by the few words of Arabic he had at his command, to make known Tom's wish.

One of the men nodded pleasantly, and coaxed and pulled his camel down on his knees, so that Tom could mount. Tom felt himself rise higher and higher. The chief impression made upon him was of one prolonged shake. The camel was so big, and it was so long before he steadied himself on his legs, that Tom thought he never would stop going up. Finally the great creature took one huge stride and then another. It was by no means a gentle motion. It was a swaying from side to side; it was a pitching forward; it was the shaking continued; and, above all, there was the sensation of being on the top of a very high mountain.

Mr. Jollytarre had resigned himself to the idea that Tom's ride would be a prolonged one, but in fact it very soon came to an end, for Tom found the camel so dirty that he was glad to get away from the disagreeable smell and greasy feeling, and to return to his seat in the carriage.

THE RESERVOIRS OF ADEN.

Having left the pass behind them, the town of Aden came into view. It lay in a circular sandy basin, almost enclosed by black mountains of volcanic cinder.

Through the town ran the dry bed of a torrent which rarely flowed, since it only rained heavily in Aden once or twice a year.

"Only once or twice a year!" repeated Tom, looking at the dry river-bed; "then what do they do for water?"

"They would fare badly enough if they depended upon natural resources," Mr. Jollytarre said. "To begin with, all the water on the peninsula is brackish. But they have a very remarkable system of water-works here, which we must take a look at. In fact, these water tanks are about the only objects of interest in Aden. They are but a short distance off, and we may as well explore them now."

"When were these built?" asked Tom, as they reached the reservoirs on the hill-sides, a picture of which you see before you. "I suppose in the year after the flood."

"Not quite. But they date back to the year 600 A.D. They were constructed to catch the water draining from the mountains surrounding the town, reservoirs being formed on the mountain-sides, and the overflow from the higher ones running into those below. Once filled, the water would hold out for seven years without a fresh supply of rain. These tanks are so admirably constructed that the British government thought it worth while to restore them, so that now they will hold over ten million gallons of water."

Having made a thorough examination of the tanks, Tom and his friend returned to their carriage and drove back to New Aden.

"The Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb are over there," said the Lieutenant. "By-the-way, they used to be called the Gate of Tears, from the number of wrecks that occurred there before navigation was much studied. Tom, take a look around and see what a strongly fortified old place this could be made. From the beginning of days in Aden wars and rumors of wars have been familiar sounds here. Even after the place came into the possession of the East India Company robbery and murder were constantly perpetrated by the natives in the town, until the fortifications on the land side were completed. After that there was tolerable security inside the walls."

"My father told me yesterday that this harbor was known to the Romans," said Tom, contributing his bit of information. "He says that the Turks, too, found it such a good half-way house on the road to the Indies that they thought it worth while to erect fortifications to keep it in their possession."

"Oh yes," said Jollytarre, "but nowadays the English are famous for adding to their real estate on a large scale. There is a good story told of a former Governor here. The island of Perim is a barren spot with a light-house on it just at the entrance to the Red Sea, near the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb. It belongs to the British, and this is the way they got it. A French Admiral had been sent to plant the French flag there, and take possession in the name of France. This seemed at the outset plain sailing enough, but unfortunately on his way to the Red Sea this gallant Admiral stopped at Aden, where the British Governor showered hospitality upon him, and expressed a great desire to know the cause of the visit. The Admiral, however, kept his own counsel until his visit was drawing to a close. Then, on the last evening of his stay, after an uncommonly good dinner at the Governor's, when, I suppose, his tongue had been loosened with wine, he confided to the Englishman that he should sail the next morning for Perim."

"What a goose!" said Tom.

"No doubt the Governor thought so too, for he lost no time in turning his visitor's folly to good account. Without leaving his seat at the table, he scratched off a pencilled note to the commander of a ship of the Indian navy then lying in Aden Bay. This was what the note said: 'Get steam up with all speed, and plant the British flag on Perim Island.'

"Good for him!" cried Tom.

"Yes, I suppose so. At all events, the steamer was off before the Admiral went to bed, and in about eight hours Perim was a British island, as the Frenchman found when he arrived there next morning."

"Poor old fellow! I wonder what they did to him for being caught napping?"

"History doesn't say. But here we are at the pier, and there is the boat."

HIGH AND DRY.

THE injury the Pearl had received was found to be far less than had been supposed. She had been badly stove in at the bow, but the bottom planking was found to be in good order, and she had sustained no damage save in that one place. The water had run out of the deep hole in the bows as the tide went down, until all that was left in her remained at the stern.

"Now, you boys," said Captain Sammy to Charley and Bobby, "get on board, and go to pumping just as soon as the rail is above water, and when the tide comes in to-night I promise you it shall float the Pearl wherever we want her."

The little man, with Dare's assistance, then began nailing the canvas over the broken timbers, and when it was all done a thick coating of tar was spread over it.

Charley and Bobby had worked hard at the pump until they were nearly tired out, and when Captain Sammy's work was finished Dare took their place, and remained there until the sucking sound of the pump boxes told that the Pearl was freed from the burden of water that had held her captive.

She was high and dry on the beach, and while they were waiting for the incoming tide Captain Sammy ordered the boys to clean out the sand and other dirt which had settled in the cabins and engine-room.

Then her anchors and cables, as well as every other movable thing on board, and some of the chains used for raising her, were piled up in the stern in order to raise her bow as high as possible above the water when she should float.

That done, the tired party went to the tent for the dinner which had been delayed until the work was finished; and again they waited for the tide, though this time it was with the certainty that the little steamer would float upon it unaided.

As soon as the water began to ripple around the stern of the Pearl Charley and Bobby were ordered on board with long poles to force her along when she began to float. Captain Sammy and Dare stood by the hawser that had been made fast to the bow in order to pull her on to the ways that had been laid as high up on the beach as it was thought the steamer would float.

When in sailing trim the Pearl drew but fourteen inches of water; but now, owing to the heavy load in the stern, the tide had risen nearly three feet before she began to swing slowly around.

"Hold her there!" shouted Captain Sammy to those on board. "Don't let her swing one way or the other." And then he and Dare pulled her a few inches ahead until she grounded again.

* Begun in No. 175, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

In this slow way she was forced up the beach until, when the tide began to ebb again, she had settled firmly down on to the plank ways, and so high up that the workmen would not be disturbed by the water more than two hours each day.

"There," said Captain Sammy, as he lighted his pipe, seated himself on the sand, and unbuckled his leg for a more complete rest while enjoying his triumphal smoke, "the Pearl has been raised, an' all you boys have got to do is to patch up the hole in her bows. You want to find some well-seasoned cedar lumber, and you'll have the work done in no time."

Now, after what looked to be the most difficult part of the task was accomplished, Dare began to doubt his ability to repair the steamer in a workman-like manner, and his face told quite plainly just what was troubling him.

"I s'pose you begin to think the worst part of the work has yet to come?" said the little man, as he tapped with his wooden leg on the tarred canvas.

"I'm afraid we sha'n't be able to make it look as nice as it did before, although I think we could make it watertight," said Dare, frankly.

"Well, I'll tell you what can be done. I'll see to getting the lumber, and I'll come over here and boss the job, providing you'll take me out as a passenger when you start on your cruise, in case I should want to go."

There could be but one answer to this, for the boys had come to like the little man so much during their acquaintance with him that they would be only too well pleased to have him with them, and Dare told him as much.

"Then," said Captain Sammy, who seemed to be delighted at the boys' liking for him, "we'll have the Pearl ready in two days, and on Monday you can start."

CHAPTER XII.

THE LAUNCH.

The boys were naturally anxious to start on their cruise to the Everglades as soon as possible, but yet they felt that Captain Sammy was making a very rash promise when he said the Pearl would be repaired in two days.

As much as they wanted to have the work done, they did not think it could be accomplished so quickly; but they resolved to waste no time, in order that they might do their full share toward it.

Therefore, while Captain Sammy was smoking contentedly on the beach, they set about a thorough cleaning of the interior, which promised to be a long task.

Then a new difficulty presented itself; the engine needed prompt and skilled attention, and neither of the boys had the slightest knowledge of machinery. The more Dare thought about the matter the more firmly was he convinced that they were utterly powerless to act in that department, and therefore he appealed to Captain Sammy.

"Of course you don't know anything about the engine, and no more do I," replied the little man, quietly. "What you've got to do is to hire Tom Rogers for two or three days, let him put the engine in good condition, and then teach you how to run it. I'll send him over here in the morning, and you can make a trade with him."

When morning came the boys were so sleepy after their hard work that they did not awake until Captain Sammy arrived, and shouted, "Shipmates ahoy!" in his gruffest tones, and then they scrambled out, feeling decidedly ashamed at being found in bed when the little man was there and ready for work.

It was a very hurried toilet and a still more hasty breakfast they made that morning, and while they were thus engaged Captain Sammy had ordered the two men whom he had brought with him to go to work.

One was the machinist, and he agreed to put the engine in thorough working order in two days, while he thought that in that time, if one of the boys would help him, he could give him such instruction as would enable him to run the engine during the proposed trip.

The man said his charges would be three dollars per day, and Dare engaged him to remain with them as long as was necessary, providing he did not get through as quickly as he had thought he could.

"You'd better keep him with you until you get down to San Carlos Harbor," said Captain Sammy, and Dare concluded the bargain, subject to his father's approval.

When the question came up as to which boy should turn engineer, Dare thought he ought to take that post, since there was likely to be more work involved; but Captain Sammy settled the matter by saying:

"Let Charley attend to the engine, and Bobby can help him. You are the oldest, and should be the skipper, for that is really the hardest position, and one which requires the longest head. You must remember that you are going into waters about which you know nothing, and an error of judgment may wreck the Pearl where she can't be raised as she was here."

Captain Sammy's words amounted, in fact, to a decision. Charley and Bobby went into the engine-room with Tom Rogers, while Captain Sammy, the man he had brought with him, and Dare set to work to close up the hole in the bows.

So simple was the work to Captain Sammy and his man that by six o'clock the hull of the Pearl had been made as good as ever, and the new timbers had received the first coat of white lead, over which was to be put two coats of paint.

Rogers had progressed much slower in the engine-room, because it was necessary to take the machinery entirely apart, and free it from the rust that had begun to gather.

The two workmen stopped work promptly at six o'clock, and Captain Sammy went away with them; but the boys kept at their task of "cleaning up" as long after supper as it was possible for them to see what they were about.

On the following morning they took very good care that Captain Sammy should not find them asleep when he came, and when the day was done, the work on the Pearl was finished. Nothing remained but to launch her.

As it was Saturday night, the boys went to the hotel to remain over Sunday. It was not necessary for any one to keep watch over the Pearl, and they had had enough of camp life to make them willing to sleep in a comfortable bed, as well as to eat their food at a table.

Captain Sammy had agreed to furnish the necessary bedding, cooking utensils, and coal, while upon the boys was to rest the duty of victualling the craft.

Therefore Dare and his father had considerable business to attend to that evening, for the question had to be settled as to whether Mr. Evans would be willing to buy for them provisions sufficient to last during the long voyage they proposed taking.

In order that there might be no mistake about it, Dare first told his father that now that the raising of the Pearl was an accomplished fact, they had come for his permission to make a long trip through the Everglades, or as far in as they could go in the yacht. Dare also told him what portion of the outfit of the steamer Captain Sammy would furnish, and concluded by asking if he would buy the provisions for them.

Mr. Evans's answer was as satisfactory as it was prompt. "I already have to pay for the use of the lumber you hired, and shall be obliged to pay the machinist. Now I am willing to purchase the things necessary for the cruise, provided you all give up your allowance of spending-money, and provided you learn all that is possible of the State which you are in, and the peculiar formation of the lower portion of it."

There was no question as to whether the boys would accept such a generous offer, and it would have been impossible to find three happier lads in the entire State of Florida than Dare, Charley, and Bobby.

The Monday on which the Pearl was to be launched came at last, and the boys were up and on the beach at an early hour in the morning, even though the tide would not serve for the important ceremony until nearly evening.

It was while Dare was making a trip alone from the boat to the tent that he saw a movement among the bushes he resolved to speak with the little man regarding it before he left him that night.

There was no chance for conversation then, for the Captain bustled and fussed around with his preparations for the launch, ordering Dare here and there, until the boy got so confused that he hardly knew what he was about.

When he was ready to put the finishing touches to his work, those in the engine-room were called out on to the that skirted the shore, and then a small familiar-looking head appeared.

"THOSE ON SHORE SET UP A LOUD SHOUT OF TRIUMPH!"

There could be no mistake as to the ownership of that head, for it belonged to the former pirate of Tampa, and the stealthy manner in which it had been shown betokened mischief.

"Where's the old heathen?" whispered Tommy, as soon as Dare had approached him.

"I'm expecting him every minute now, and you must be careful not to let him see you, or I'm afraid he might punish you for wrecking the boat."

"He'll see me more'n he wants to before long," said Master Tucker, with a tinge of the old swagger in his tones. "I was goin' past his dock last night an' he started after me, an' when he found he couldn't catch me, he shied a stick an' hit me on the arm. Now I'm goin' to serve him out, promise or no promise, an' I've come to warn you. That's his steamer; an' even if he has lent it to you, I'm—"

The sentence was not finished, owing to the fact that the head was suddenly withdrawn, and a quick rustling of the bushes told that its owner was carrying it away at full speed, while the sight of Captain Sammy on the beach told the reason of the haste.

Dare was alarmed lest Tommy intended to "serve Captain Sammy out" by doing some injury to the Pearl, and beach, and Dare ordered to go on board. He was to stand in the bows to throw over the anchors as soon as the launch had been accomplished, and both the other boys envied him because of the position.

Mr. and Mrs. Evans, who had promised to be present at the ceremony, arrived about fifteen minutes before the appointed time, and Captain Sammy was kept remarkably busy in trying to do his work and explain everything to the visitors at the same time.

Finally all was ready, the last block was laid, and the Captain and Rogers began knocking away the timbers that held the Pearl prisoner.

Then she started, slowly at first, but with increasing speed each second, until she struck the water with a force that dashed the spray up around her in great volumes, and once more the Pearl was afloat.

Those on shore set up a loud shout of triumph, to which Dare responded by waving his hat, and then he let go both anchors.

Just as this was done, and he was thinking with pride that the beautiful little craft was at his disposal, for some time at least, he caught a glimpse of Tommy Tucker, who was standing among the trees peering out, as if plotting some mischief against the little steamer. The sight destroyed all Dare's pleasure for the time being.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE PRINCE AND THE WHIPPING-BY.

“WHAT is a whipping-boy, anyhow?” All the boys and girls will ask that question when they look at this picture of Edward VI. and his whipping boy.

I must tell you, then, that in old times a Prince, who was to be a King after he grew up, was treated as a person of very great dignity and importance. It would not do to punish him, because his person was held to be sacred; but as a Prince was only a boy, after all, he had to learn lessons and he had to obey his teachers. If he did not get his lessons, or if he was saucy to his teachers, it would not do to overlook the matter; somebody must be punished, and in those days boys were always punished by flogging.

But it would not do to flog a Prince. He was a King's son, and after a while would become King himself. So whenever the Prince did anything for which a flogging was necessary, the flogging was given to another boy. They kept a boy for the purpose. It was his business to take all the Prince's whippings for him, and hence they called him the Prince's whipping-boy.

The boy who took Edward VI.'s whippings for him was named Barnabas Fitzpatrick, and it is said that he and the Prince were very good friends indeed.

In the picture it seems that Edward is trying to save Barnabas from the whipping, and we think better of him for it; but it would have been still more manly for him to have stood up and taken the whipping himself.

"ONLY A GIRL"

BY MARY DENSEL.

THEY lived with their grandmother, did John and Katinka, in the old yellow house by the river. There was plenty of room in the house, in spite of its being only one story high. For the "milk-room" opened out of the kitchen, the "sink-room" was between the pantry and the "pump-room," which in turn led into the "seed-chamber," and was connected by an arch with the "meal-closet" and "store-room," the latter being next the barn, where lived Peter, the fifteen-year-old "colt."

The small garden lay in the rear. The garden was the principal spot, after all, for by means of that John intended to earn his living. He gloried in being a boy, and able to support himself.

To be sure, grandma made his clothes, and Katinka knit and darned his stockings; but John did not take that into account. He thought no more of paying Katinka for her labor in the mending line than he did of rewarding her when she helped to weed the garden. What were girls made for, unless to help?

So twelve-year-old Katinka worked cheerfully by his side, carried water when the weather was "dry," rose at four o'clock A.M. to pounce on potato-bugs at their morning revels, or made herself into a scarecrow and stood half the day waving her arms and shouting at the crows when the corn was planted. But it was clearly understood that John raised the vegetables, especially the cabbages.

"Which will sell at three cents a head, Katinka-tink-tink. Then I'll have enough money to buy a Harp of Judah, and go to singing-school," announced John, who was fourteen years old, and learning to sing a nerve-shattering part called—by himself—bass.

Katinka's eyes shone.

"I wish I could go to singing-school, too," said she.

"So you might, if you were a boy and could earn the money," answered John, loftily. "There's a caterpillar! Go for him, Katinka-tink-tink!"

So Katinka "went for" the worm, then ran for a hoe, afterward fetched the water-pot, and finally, there being no more odd jobs on hand for this particular lord of creation, she was graciously permitted to attend to her own small plot of ground, at the contents of which John smiled scornfully.

There were bachelor's buttons, bouncing-bets, holly-hocks, thrift-flowers, blue "baby's-breaths," and three great sunflowers.

"Trash!" John called them, to Katinka's anguish, for though she was aware that squashes and beans were vastly superior, yet she was very fond of her silly flowers. She even wondered if she might not beg John to carry a few of them to the city, and try to sell them with his vegetables. Then she might perhaps join forces with Sally Lowder, each paying half for a Harp of Judah, from which they could warble in company. But Katinka hardly dared to proffer this request when John's vegetables were ready for sale. The cabbages were especially magnificent.

"Three cents a head, and there are as many as thirty of them," said John, one evening, rubbing his cheek, and gazing out of the window. "To-morrow I'll harness up and take them to town."

Now the reason John rubbed his cheek was that for two whole days it had pained him, and to-night there was a red place puffing out behind his left ear. The next morning there was a swelling behind the other ear, and he had a double chin fit for an alderman.

"John," said his grandmother, "it's the mumps."

It was indeed, and a fiercer boy than Master John you never saw, for mumps being "catching," he could by no means go into town and spread the disease as he sold his cabbages.

"All I can do is to stand here and see them burst open at three cents a pop," said he, bitterly.

Katinka's heart was full of sympathy, but what could she do—being only a girl—except make poultices for the swollen face, and fly out into the garden every five minutes to see if the "cabbage over yonder" had burst yet, or to scare away the blackbirds which were holding high carnival, and jeering in their thievish hearts at the distorted face in the window?

The following day the mumps were even worse, and four cabbages blew open. The waves of misery bade fan to swamp both John and his tender little sister, until suddenly Katinka rose to the surface, and, "I'm going to market," quoth she.

You may be sure there was a sensation at these words. Grandma held up both hands in horror.

"Pho!" said John. And he meant "pho!" He meant it in the broadest sense of the word. "You're only a girl. What can a girl do, I'd like to know?"

"You shall know," declared Katinka, stoutly. "Grandma, please don't say 'no.'"

Now grandma never did say "no" to Katinka. Perhaps it would often have been wiser to do so, but history must speak the truth, and the fact is she dropped her hands as Katinka explained her plans.

"And I must go this very day, grandma," ended Katinka, "for by next week I shall be down with the mumps myself."

"Besides that, the cabbages will be ruined," added John. "The little birds fly about the city unharmed. Who would molest dear little Katinka?"

So reasoned gentle, unworldly grandma.

John still scoffed, but perhaps for that very reason Katinka ent the cabbages with a firmer hand. She gathered the string-beans, some pease, a few radishes, and even went so far as to dig some early potatoes. Then she marched to the barn to interview Peter.

Now Peter had opinions. Alas! some of these ran in the same groove with his young master's.

"A girl put on my bridle! Perish the thought!"

Peter tossed his head so laughingly, and held it so high that Katinka reached upward in vain.

"Absurd little minx!" said Peter, communing with himself.

But suddenly Peter found himself tied to a post; there was a barrel at his side; there was a scramble and a flutter of petticoats. Before he could collect his senses Peter's eyes were fenced in by blinders, the bit was between his astonished teeth, the wagon shafts were clashing his sides.

"We'll see who can manage you, sir!" remarked Katinka.

It took only a moment for the little maid to don her cape bonnet, and to tuck the vegetables into the wagon. Then she mounted the seat, and was off and away.

Off and away at a breakneck pace, for Peter had bided his time. Conquered by a girl? Not he. With a tug and a strain he ran up the first quarter of a mile. His breath came hard. The next, and his run had become a gallop. Two-thirds of the way, and the gallop was a mild trot. His bit was covered with foam. The top was reached. Peter dragged his legs wearily, then stopped short.

"Ha!" said Peter, "times have changed." "Ho!" said Peter, "in these days girls have queer ways of their own." "Hi!" said Peter, "let's be respectable."

Katinka had never dreamed there would be so many wagons at the market-place. Her heart failed her. Who would notice so small a person as herself among these busy, bustling men? Surely she never ought to have come. But she remembered John, and would not turn back. She guided the now meek and weary Peter to the curbstone, and gazed wistfully around.

No one noticed her. One man with butter and eggs was noisily crying his wares. Another, in a white apron, was bargaining for mutton. A third was crying, "Lettuce! nice fresh lettuce here!"

"Oranges! fifteen cents a dozen! Two dozen, twenty-five cents!"

"Any horse-reddish?"

The din almost deafened Katinka. She held out a cabbage, and shouted, but could not hear her own voice.

"I wonder if they would notice a flower?" thought she; for, quite unknown to John, she had brought some posies, thinking that even if she could not sell them, they would like to come to town and see the sights. She caught up a sunflower, and held it high above her head.

"Tell them I have cabbages to sell," she whispered.

All at once there was a lull in the noise about her, and a woman's voice exclaimed,

"Oh, what a panel she would make, papa!"

Katinka became aware of a tall, gray-haired gentleman and a young lady who was clinging to his arm.

"Oh, what a picture!" cried the lady again, and she came close to Katinka's wagon. "I should like to paint you, child," she said.

Katinka's gray eyes opened wider. Then, taking courage from the kindly face, she leaned forward.

"The cabbages are only three cents apiece," she said, appealingly.

"How dear!" exclaimed the lady.

"No, no, ma'am; that's very cheap," said Katinka.

The new-comer seemed to find her very amusing, for she laughed, and showed two rows of dazzlingly white teeth.

"It's you who are dear and simple and truly precious," she said. "Will you come with me, you little Penelope Boothby, and let me paint you?"

"My name is Katinka, and I must sell my garden stuff," said Katinka, solemnly.

"Papa, buy her vegetables," ordered the lady. "What have you, little one? Beans, potatoes, and hollyhocks, I declare! Papa, you go to your office, and Katinka—what a delicious name!—shall drive me home; then I'll buy her goods and paint her picture. Good-by, papa. Give me a seat in your wagon, child."

Katinka was lost in amazement. What was this extraordinary young lady about to do with her?

On they drove, away from the noise and bustle, until finally they stopped in front of a large brick house.

"Julia," said the lady to a white-capped maid who opened the door, "take these vegetables to the kitchen. Call Smith, and ask him to give this horse some oats. Katinka, you come with me."

Still in a daze, Katinka followed her eccentric hostess into a long room hung with pictures.

"I'll keep you only an hour, and I'll pay you a dollar besides the worth of your potatoes and cabbages," said the lady.

Katinka clasped her hands in delight.

"A dollar!" she repeated. "Then I can buy a Harp of Judah!"

The young lady flew about, placing an easel, hunting up pencils and brushes. Then Katinka was whisked into a chair, and bidden to hold tightly to her sunflower, while her captor sketched as if for her life.

"You blessed little old-fashioned cherub!" she was exclaiming. "Turn your head a trifle to the left. There! there! Now don't move for the love of Correggio himself. Oh, you cherub!"

Sketch, sketch, sketch.

"Drop your eyelids. One dollar!—I'll give you two, my beauty."

Sketch, sketch, sketch. The town clock elanged twelve.

"I guess I'll go home," faltered Katinka.

"Only two minutes more. Now raise your eyes. What! Bless me, a tear? I've tired you out, you poor little image! Julia, bring some eakes. Two dollars?—it shall be three! Come here, and look at yourself."

Sure enough, there was Katinka's very face peering at her from the easel, its eyes as big and as gray as her own.

"My, what a handsome sunflower!" cried Katinka.

Two hours later grandma and John beheld Peter racing down the road.

Before they could reach the barn Katinka had sped into the house, waving a five-dollar bill before John's swollen face.

"Say 'girl' again!" quoth she.

"Where did you get it?" demanded the astonished John.

"Sold your cabbages—two dollars. Queer lady made a picture of me—three dollars, because I was a girl."

"A picture of you? In that sun-bonnet?"

"Yes."

"With your hair in your eyes like that?"

"Yes."

"A picture of you?"

"With a sunflower in my hand. And she said I was a che—a che—a chetub or dub or rub. Yes, that's it, a che-rub. And she liked me because I was a girl."

"Well, I never heard the like of that!" cried John, and his cheeks seemed to puff out bigger than ever in his efforts to understand such nonsense.

But there were several facts that John had "never heard the like of." One was that during the next October, when he and Katinka were trotting to singing-school, each carrying a brand-new Harp of Judah, the folk of the neighboring city were in raptures over a certain picture which hung in a public gallery.

It was the portrait of a little maiden in a plaid sun-bonnet, who gazed at the crowd with wide-open, innocent gray eyes, and whose mouth wore such a happy smile that one and all smiled back at her, "just as you would at a lily." But it was no lily the child held in her hand. It was a large rich yellow sunflower.

And no one knew who the picture was, for when they hunted it up in the catalogue all they found was,

"No. 77. Only a Girl."

HOW TO MAKE A TOY STEAMBOAT.

BY VICTOR SMEDLEY.

ROBERT FULTON could not have been more proud and delighted with his first successful steamboat than was the writer when, as a boy, he succeeded in making a toy craft that would run itself.

The drawings and diagrams that are here given explain how to make a small boat, the motor power being a thin band of elastic, one end of which is attached to the centre of the paddle-wheel axle, the other end being tied to the flag-staff in the bow of the boat. A piece of string a few inches longer than the elastic when the latter is stretched out to its full length is also attached to the axle about midway between the elastic and one of the paddle-wheels.

THE TOY STEAMBOAT "ROBERT FULTON."

Do not tie the string on until you have turned the paddle-wheels around backward until the elastic is stretched to its utmost. When you let go the paddle-wheels the elastic will unwind; in doing this it will wind the string on the axle; so to start the boat you simply have to draw the string out to its full length.

The hull is made from a piece of soft wood about a foot long and an inch thick, shaped as shown in the diagrams. The boat is flat-bottomed, and is not hollow, the wood being sufficiently buoyant. The paddle-wheels are made of shingle or cigar-box wood about three and a half inches long and one inch wide, with an incision cut in the centre the same width as the thickness of the board; four of these will be necessary to make the two wheels. They are joined together by the axle, which should be about the thickness of a lead-pencil, and half an inch longer than the width of the boat, to prevent the wheels catching on the sides of the boat as they revolve.

To fasten the paddle-wheels on the axle, drive a small finishing nail through one section of the paddle at the incision into the end of the axle, as shown in Fig. 2; then fit the sections together, and the paddle-wheels are complete. The axle is kept in place by pieces of wire, or pins with their heads filed off, bent like a horseshoe, and placed over the axle and driven into the boat. The cabin is made of white card-board, measuring, when extended out before being bent, about twenty inches; the sides are seven inches long and one and a half inches high. Upon this windows are painted in black. If you have no black paint, ink will do nearly as well. White spaces must be left to represent the sash. In the back of the cabin a small hole is punched through the card-board for the winding-up cord to pass through. The dotted lines in the cut show where to bend the card-board to form the four sides of the cabin. The pilot-house is bent in only one place to form the back, the front curving round in a half circle.

FIG. 1.—WORKING PLANS.

After having fastened the sides of the cabin to the hull, place the boat upside down on a sheet of card-board, and with a pencil go around the cabin; lift off the boat, and you will have a pattern for the roof. Cut around the outlines, leaving a quarter of an inch between your scissors and the outline. When you fasten on the roof it will project beyond the sides of the cabin, and this will improve the appearance of your boat. The smoke-stack is made of the same material as the cabin, blackened to give it the appearance of being made of iron. To make it circular, roll it around a lead-pencil. The pieces are fastened together by pasting a strip of writing paper half an inch wide over the joint, half on each side. Fasten the flag-staff securely in place by boring a hole with a gimlet in the bow of the boat, and then the vessel will be ready to be launched with appropriate ceremonies.

The boilers will never burst, and when the steam gives out it is only necessary to pull the string to procure a new supply that will send the little paddle-wheels whirling with renewed vigor, to the great delight of the assembled multitude of young people.

CRUEL SPORT.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

ONCE had a white fan made of swan's-down, in the centre of which poised a brilliant little bird with gay plumage and open beak. I never liked the pretty fan, although it had been a gift to me, but something happened once which made me put it out of sight.

A dear little girl, not three years old, took it in her hand one day, and touched the bird gently with her pink-tipped finger. Then her eyes filled with tears as she looked at the little open mouth, and said, "Oh, aunty, that was the last song!"

Believe me, boys, when, proud of your guns and of the straight aim you can take, you go tramping through the fields, shooting the merry robins and gay orioles and tiny wrens, you are engaged in very unmanly sport.

Water-Colorist

The darling song-birds that had such happy, care-free lives, flying from bough to bough, and tilting on the flowery sprays, are sent to us for our delight. Their sweet notes make the morning and evening cheery, and a home always seems gladder and brighter when the birds come about it without fear.

What fun they have building their nests, and how patient the old birds are with the little ones, feeding them, teaching them to fly, and indeed teaching them to sing. Did you ever listen when a wren mother was practicing music with her babies? If you ever did, I am sure you would be as indignant as I am at any boy who would put an end to her little life, just for amusement.

The trouble with many boys is that they do not think. If they stopped to consider, they would not like to be seen bringing home a bagful of little birds which are not fair game, and which have been recklessly murdered.

Nor could they bear to lift their guns, take aim, and presto! wound a tiny creature, leaving it to fall on the ground and lie there dying.

These tender-hearted little girls have found a poor bird that has sung its last song. It was shot, no doubt, by Tom or Fred, who goes whistling on, never thinking how cruel he has been.

In some States of the Union the killing of song-birds is punished by fines and imprisonment. But there is another punishment which comes to farmers and land-owners who permit such work. The birds eat insects which destroy grain, and these little pests multiply and ravage great fields when the birds are destroyed.

There are birds which are good for food, and which it is not wrong to kill, provided they are needed for the table or for an invalid's meal. But the little songsters of the groves and hills should be sacred.

MUFFET AND TUFFET.

These pussy-cats are named Muffet and Tuffet, and belong to Miss Jessie, who has taken them with her on a visit. They rode fifty miles on the ears in this pretty basket, and one of these days, when Miss Jessie goes home, they will ride fifty miles again. So Muffet and Tuffet will be travelled cats, and may sit in the chimney-corner and tell stories.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

GILROY, CALIFORNIA.

I am a little girl nine years old. I have two little sisters—Edna, who is seven, and Gemma, who is four years old. We have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE almost a year. We are all very much interested in hearing it read and looking at the pictures. Sometimes we go to Sonoma County, about two hundred miles north from here, to see grandpa and grandma, who live there. We pass through San Francisco, come to Sonoma County, and twice we went to Woodard's Gardens.

There are a great many things there to see. In the garden block there are many kinds of trees, shrubs, vines, and plants, and an aquarium with many kinds of fish, from large sharks to small gold-fish—which we see through plate-glass set in one side of the different rooms. There is also the large stone reservoir—an art gallery with many pictures, etc.

Then they have a menagerie on another block, and have a double tunnel under the street to let visitors go in through one tunnel and come out through the other. There are a great many animals—bears, lions, tigers, camels, bisons, and oh! so many it would take too long to write their names; they have sea-lions and alligators. But I guess this letter is long enough, and I will be as pleased as any of the other children are to see this in the Post-office Box. EDITH V. D.

EDITH V. D.

LYONS, IOWA.

I am a boy five years old, and I had a birthday, and what do you think I got? Why, five marbles and five pipes and five pennies and some mittens. The pipes are to blow bubbles with, and the five pennies I put in my bank, and my two cousins came over and spent the day with me, and we got so hungry because Maggie wouldn't get us our supper until after dark, but then she brought us a nice cake with five candles in it, and that was the reason she wouldn't give us our supper. I have no pets except a cat. I had a dog, but I gave him away to a man that wanted him. I was cross, and I didn't want him. I guess the man won't want him much after a while.

I have HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I look at the pictures, and some one tells me about them. I like the funny pictures best—that old rat was a good one—but I like the letters most, so I wanted to write, only I couldn't, but my papa said he would write if I would tell him what to say. I hope you will keep sending me the paper. My name is CHRIST R.

LEWIS, MISSOURI.

I am twelve years old. I have a little brother seven years old who is very fond of play. I am very fond of reading, especially history. I am reading "Kolin's History," second volume. My little brother would rather have me play, and wishes I had no books except HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

I am seven years old I wrote a letter from the Allegheny Mountains to the Keokuk Gate City. Since then I have lived amid the Rockies, and then in Denver, where I was a messenger boy. Now I live here, but I think the nicest place I have ever been in, and we are going back there.

I have no pets except a little brown Leghorn hen. Brother has a cut little canary named Demi. I have taken St. Nicholas for the past five years, and have only recently been getting Young People, but I like it very much, and will always take it in future. I like "Raising the Pearl," and was sorry when "Nan" was concluded.

A. V. S.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a little boy six years old. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and look forward with pleasure to Tuesday night, for then my papa brings it to me. I like the story "Raising the Pearl," best of all, and read that first. I went to Barnum's circus last week, and enjoyed it very much. I think Jumbo is an immense animal. I gave him some crackers, and when he belid out his trunk to take them it was so large it quite startled me. I saw many wonderful things. I liked the races, especially the chariot race, exceedingly, but it was all splendid.

As I live in the city I haven't any pets except one little kitten named Alice, of whom I am very fond. I am going to Virginia in May. FALK.

BELLEVILLE, MISSOURI.

I am a little girl eight years old. Sometimes there are Indians in town, and one day they were here, and I had just been to the baker's, and I bought a pie, and when I was coming back there was an old Indian and another had a little papoose all sitting in front of a tent, and I went up to see them, and papa and Edith were there, and the old Indian wanted me to give the pie to him, and the old squaw laughed. The old Indian and the little papoose came into the office, and the little papoose's dress was all covered over with elks' teeth, and my uncle Walter showed him his sword, and the old Indian and the old squaw showed the little papoose his watch, and the little papoose ran over to see it.

One Indian had a fur cap with brass-bells tied all around it, and another had a fur cap with a coyote's tail hanging down at the back; and one day we went to Allkall Creek for a drive, and I got three elks' horns, and we saw lots of other things. We drove and we drove, and the fence was all made of cord-wood. There was a little bull tied up. We saw lots of little prairie-dogs. TAYLOR M.

That was a queer way to ornament a baby's dress, was it not, with elks' teeth? We would not think it very pretty, but no doubt the little one's mother admired the effect.

ALSTED, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

I live in a little village among the New Hampshire hills. We have lived here three years. Before that we lived in a larger town across the Connecticut. My papa's health was such he returned to his native village to try and regain it. I am twelve years old, and I go to school, and take music lessons. Vacations I spend in helping mamma about the house and doing fancy-work.

I would like to exchange with some little girl patterns in darned net, and directions for feather-bed and edging and knit edging, and I would like to join the Little Housekeepers, and will send receipts if the Postmistress is willing. The long days of summer are delightful here, and we have many lovely walks in the woods. MARY E. T.

I shall be expecting something nice from you, dear.

CHRISTIE HILL, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—My children, who take YOUNG PEOPLE, and enjoy it too, always laugh at me when I have a certain dessert. They want me to send it to you, with the name they have given it.

MAMMA'S AND KATIE'S DELIGHT.—Half a box of gelatine dissolved in half a pint of cold milk; a pint of chocolate, or red and set over the tea-table with vanilla; stir until cold enough to make in moulds; after the chocolate is added put them on buttered paper to harden. SOPHIE, ALICE, and NORA.

Let me know how you would like to make it, and I will send you the recipe. I am sure you will like it as much as Katie and I do, for we have both given our fat upon eating it. Mrs. G. H. N.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a young girl, and a great admirer of YOUNG PEOPLE. My brother made me a present of it over a year ago, and every Tuesday night he brings it home to me. I liked the story of "Nan" very much, and hope we may hear more about her. I have a little pig named Little Puss, and a little pig named Purr. She is very cunning. Every morning she comes to my bed and wakes me up by walking around my head, and then, sitting down, puts both her fore-paws on my face, and while she sits all the time, works her claws in and out, as though she were playing on the piano. If she doesn't get her breakfast just when she wants it, she will stand up on her hind feet and bow and nod to me.

Perhaps some of you would like to know how to make a headache, as the common raised hair does very apt to do. Take cold water, and stir into it fresh Graham flour until you have a dough thick enough to turn out on the kneading-board and roll it out in sheets. Mix into it a little oil, and not have it run over the board. Mix into it a little enough flour so that you can roll it out and not have it stick to the hands. Roll it about an inch thick; cut with a biscuit cutter, and prick the top of each biscuit with a fork. Have your oven very hot, just as hot as you can get it. Bake until well browned.

The secret of success lies in getting the dough just the right thickness, and having your oven hot. They may not be good at first, for although they seem simple, they are hard to get just right. They will certainly not be good if you do not have fresh flour. These gems are delicious, either hot or cold, eaten in milk, or with butter or honey. I can make Southern corn-bread. LOUISE B.

I shall make some biscuits from your receipt, and have them for breakfast some morning soon. Send your receipt for Southern corn-bread if you please.

JERSEY CITY, NEW JERSEY.

I thought I'd write a letter,

I've never written before,

My brother sent some rhymes of mine,

And now I'll send some more.

I'm living at my grandmamma's

While papa is at sea;

If you don't mind I'll send him

How happy I would be!

I have no birds to speak of,

Except a pet that died;

I got a very nice one once,

I very nearly cried;

We buried him 'neath the pear-tree,

Another girl and I.

We saw a lot of blue birds and robins

That happened there to die.

My grandpa has a parrot,

One that my aunt did give her;

She says it's so excellent it can sing

Is "Way down the Swanny River."

I have a lovely doll,

She is very cunning, too;

She has big brown eyes

And a looking right at you;

Also three pretty hats,

And six sweet little dresses,

And also brushes and combs

To card her golden tresses.

I had her picture taken;

The man said I must be sober,

For I should smile

It would make her laugh all over.

My dear doll's name

Is Amy Alice.

And really she deserves

To live in a palace.

My name is Cora Denniston,

And I'm eleven years old.

I hope at the length of this letter

You kindly will not scold.

DAVTON, OHIO.

According to the request of Amelia Norris F., we write to tell you that the receipt for cream almonds in No. 179 is excellent. We tried it this afternoon, and had lots of fun while doing it. They are not quite hard yet, but we know that they will be splendid, for we have been "tasting" during the day. We will send you a receipt in return, hoping it will be as nice as yours:

CHOCOLATE CREAMS.—Take half a cake of Baker's chocolate, grate and set over the tea-table; while hot drop in the cream moulds, which are made of two cups of sugar and half a cup of water; boil three minutes; after it begins to bubble remove from the stove, and flavor with vanilla; stir until cold enough to make in moulds; after the chocolate is added put them on buttered paper to harden. SOPHIE, ALICE, and NORA.

The Little Housekeepers are coming to the front in force this week.

WALNUT HILL, DELAWARE.

I want to send a receipt to the Little Housekeepers which we have tried and find very good:

GOLD CAKE.—Three eggs beaten separately, one cup of white sugar, half a cup of butter, two-thirds of a cup of milk, flour sufficient to make the mass as stiff as pound-cake, one teaspoonful of Lunford's yeast powder; flavor with vanilla.

I will send silver cake next week, which is much better than gold cake. R. T. II.

ALLGHEWY CITY, PENNSYLVANIA.

A great many of my little friends have asked me for suggestions for building a doll's house. My plan has been so successful that it may be of use to some of the subscribers to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I first procured two boxes, generally tea-boxes, about eighteen inches square. These I placed side by side on the floor against the wall, the side toward the front being open. Boxes an inch or two apart. The floor was made on the top floor. The attic consisted of one small box placed on top of the second story. The inside walls and ceilings I papered with the scraps of wall-paper left over from the rooms in the house had been papered. The floors I covered with pieces of carpet, either new or scraps cut off when an old carpet has been made to fit a smaller room.

In the second story I placed a bed, and in case I did not have enough for all my rooms I manufactured over boxes of tiny card-board boxes, using oblong boxes for the beds, covering them first with pieces of muslin or bright-colored chintz. A ruffle around the edge of the muslin when allowed to fall over the sides formed a screen such as is seen on every four-post bedstead. Across the front of each room I hung curtains of broad cloth, trimmed with fringed runners. The curtains not only looked nicely when drawn for the night, but served to keep out the dust.

A little girl who shows so much cleverness in making a house for her dolls will furnish her own home tastefully when she shall be older.

NICHOLASVILLE, KENTUCKY.

We are two little school-girls who are each aged six, and named Sallie and Jessie. We love to play together; sometimes we fly kites or take walks, and most of all we love to pull our bows and play housekeeping with our dolls. They are named Sallie, Jessie, Belle, and Brown. Our cat has no name. The canary is named Claude, and sings all the time. We like to hear the stories and letters in YOUNG PEOPLE, and have never seen a letter from this place. Sallie's mother is writing this for us, and we are going to put it in the Post-office, and hope you will like it.

SALLIE A. and JESSIE G.

OKLAHLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

A few weeks ago the Postmistress asked for a description of my quilt. It is a diamond shape or in squares, and take a piece of silk, or whatever material it is, any shape at all, and beginning in the middle, and sew all the sides; then pull it over and baste it down very neatly all around. Sew a piece next to it in the same way, and so on until the diamond or square is all covered.

I am very fond of sewing, and I love to read. I have finished our calico quilt, and have nearly done another; I am going to begin two silk ones when I get this one finished. I am also very fond of reading, and have a great many of my favorite magazines are HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE and St. Nicholas. We have had wild flowers now for about a week. I am trying to learn the scientific names for them. We are going to now that Heptacis triloba, the Sanguinaria canadensis, and the Anemone nemorosa. The pressed ones inclosed are for the Postmistress.

I would like to be one of the Little Housekeepers. I send a receipt for TEA CAKE.—Beat one egg very light, put it into a tea-cup, and fill up with sweet cream; add one cupful of white sugar, one of flour, a pinch of salt, and half a cupful of cream or tartar, and half a tea-spoonful of soda. Mix the cream of tartar in the flour, and put the soda in the cream.

MAY E. O.

Thanks for the pressed flowers. Do you ever embroider a flower or fasten a pretty picture in appliqué-work on your silk patches?

DIAMOND, ILLINOIS.

I am a boy seven years old. I go to school, and an learning Long Division. I have a little brother and sister; Horace is four years old and Etta and Isaac the little horses all their names excepting h, d, p, and g, but little Etta can say them the fastest. One day little Horace was cross because he did not find an egg in the old black bird's nest, so he got a stick and tried to drive her out of the nest. I wipe the table dishes for mamma. I hope you will print this letter. If you do not, I shall feel like saying what my little brother says: "Here is a poor little boy that has lots of trouble." Papa gave me YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present, and I like it very much indeed. I expect to go to visit my grandma and grandpa in a few days, and perhaps you will write you from there. I hope my letter is not too long.

LESTER CHAPIN S.

NEW YORK CITY.

A good while ago my mamma read to me in YOUNG PEOPLE about how to fix a box to tame a mouse in. I thought I would try it, for I loved pets. I caught one, and kept it in the trap until papa helped me fix a box. He got a wire, and we tried to put him in, and if he had not run up my sister's dress I would have lost him. I took the wire-box out of my toy barn for his little bed, and hung the little horses all in the wire box, and his food and water. He got real tame; but one morning I was in an awful hurry to go to school, and mamma said she would feed him for me; but she did not see the cage, and she had gnawed a little piece in the box under the wire, and had got away. I was very sorry, but then I thought maybe he might like his own little bed. I took the wire box and put it in the corner of my room, and when I caught another, and named him Mr. Stumber's Brother. He became so tame that he would eat from my hand, and then store away in a corner of his cage, and he could be very warm morning I went to feed him, and looked everywhere for his cage, and at last found it on a wall-splend, where it had been put to keep cool at night. I was so glad to find it, but the poor little fellow was dead; he had been sun-struck. I was awfully sorry; but then I could not help it. I think I never will try to keep an other mouse for a pet, for I have been so unfortunate.

A. ERSKINE G.

Indeed, your mamma and sister must be very brave. I do not think I could let a little boy of mine make pets of mice, especially if they were in any danger of getting away and hiding anywhere about my dress.

BRACKLEB, FLORIDA.

I am thirteen years old, and one of your boys. I want to tell you what I do, as you invited the boys to do so. I have poultry to attend to night and day. I have some Plymouth Rocks, and Cochins, some Pekin and common puddle or English ducks. Then I have young chicks and ducks. These keep me busy quite a while. Then I help on some of the office work, and have lessons to mamma. At night I read the papers (we have one for every day in the week) and study my lessons for next day. In winter I make the bread and butter, and now I make the puddles, set the table, and help mamma. I like to read, and my favorite authors are Jimmy Brown, Mr. Otis, Mr. Stoddard, Mrs. Lillie Alger, and Cassin. I like to play base-ball, and I like to work in my garden, and raise vegetables. I have young orange-trees, and cultivate them. I like to ride, too, and do ride the horse here. We have a good horse, and I like to ride in the woods, especially when there are ripe wild fruits, as there are now. Our blackberries are all gone now. Huckleberries are ripe, and others soon will be.

To-day is a rainy day. We have had some beautiful days. Everything looked so green and pretty. I like the sun-shiny days. I would like to be one of the Little Housekeepers, if you will let a boy. If I am a boy I can do house-work as well as any girl. I tried some cake yesterday from a receipt in YOUNG PEOPLE. It was a rainy afternoon, so I asked mamma to let me, and she said, "I will let you, if you do everything ready. This is the receipt I used: I used nearly double the quantity: Four eggs; half a cupful of sugar; a small amount of butter; one whole lemon, and five grains of salt. Beat the whites and yolks separately. I baked in small scalloped and plain pans, and made thirteen nice little cakes. I made them without a bit of help at all, and mamma says they are as good as any she ever made. This is my first attempt at making cake, but I have often helped mamma make some. I can cook well, too. I have done so when mamma has been sick. She has said to me, "I can make more cake now—that I will have to make it. Mamma has the receipt for ice-cream cake; I will make some some time, and send you a piece, if you would like it. I will send the receipt soon." I would now, but I have not got it with me.

Your boy, FRANCIS C. S.

I am delighted to have such a boy as yourself among the Little Housekeepers, and I hope there may be others who will follow your example. There is no reason in the world why boys should not learn how to cook. The best professional cooks are men, and a knowledge of the art comes in very nicely in ordinary home life. Gentlemen when exploring, hunting, fishing, or camping out acquire great skill in preparing dainty food, which, they say, tastes better than the best diners they ever get at home. In war-times soldiers learn to make coffee, broil meat, and bake biscuits by their camp-fires, and find that they can cook as well as march and fight. So, Francis, be sure you do not forget to send on the receipt for ice-cream cake, and "we girls" will try it at once.

Why should not my boy readers form a Cooking Club of their own, and send reports of their efforts in that line to the Post-office Box? There is in Philadelphia a club composed of gentlemen, and one of its rules is that each member shall know how to cook one dish to perfection. At certain periods this club gives luncheon parties, to which the members invite their lady friends, the skill to eat the nice things and compliment the cook in the best way possible. I think it would be some time this summer you boys, having little cooking circles here and there, should be able to invite your sisters and cousins to a picnic where every viand should have been prepared by yourselves! What do you all think?

Herbert A. Donalds, 24 Earl's Lane, Providence, Rhode Island, would like to correspond with boys who have had experience in the care of rabbits. He is a great reader, and writes for the New York City, edits and prints a very pretty little paper. He would like other boys who edit amateur or puzzle papers to exchange with him, and sends a special request to do so to Robert M. R., of Flushing, Michigan.—Charming letters have been received from Maggie W. K., Richard C. D., John, Johnnie B., Jennie and Belle T. E., C., Ronald M. G., Montie M., J. Rogers H., Bessie C., Charlie D. M., Fannie E. H., Starr H. B., Frederick P. B., Milton T. B., A. Theo. W., St. Elmo S., Eliza E. G., Hannah W. O., May K., Lucy M. M., and Edris B. M. I hope all these children will accept thanks and love from the Postmistress, and write again.—Millie S.: What a dainty cat, and yet he did kill the chickens!—Norman M.: You did not come and speak to me at the fair. Perhaps you did not know I was there.—Mary A. V.: I never heard of a black Snowflake before.—J. C. J.: I hope I may some time hear your performance on the violin, and join in the encores.—Hattie W.: Write whenever you please, dear.—Joseph S. E.: Would "Six Jolly Girls" do as a name for your club, or, still better, "Half a Dozen Sunbeams"? I hope you will have good times together.—R. M. B.: So you waved your handkerchief at Mr. Thomas when you went to the Philadelphia. Well, I have often waved mine. Weren't you sleepy the next day?—Bertha and Marion: Your puzzles are very good.—Alice L. B.: I wonder if any other little girl besides yourself makes a pet of a flying-squirrel?—Jack and Ferdie: There is no charge for the insertion of exchanges, and the columns are open to all our young readers, but the exchanges must be deferred. We have not room for long ones.—Lillie A. D.: Wiggles, sometimes called "recondite forms," are lines which form portions of the outlines of pictures. When a new Wiggie is given it forms part of the outline of a picture already drawn by "our artist." Your object and that of the other girls and boys who try to solve the Wiggie problem should be to draw a picture containing this line. The little artist whose picture most nearly resembles the picture originally drawn by "our artist" is called the Successful Wiggler. This explanation has been made before, but is repeated for your benefit and that of others who have been puzzled to know just what was meant by the Wiggles. Always be sure to draw your Wiggles with care, and send them as promptly as you can after the reception of a new Wiggie.

MOTHER OWL.

WHO STOLE THE CARDINAL'S HAT?*

THE children being seated in a circle, a child who does not take part in the game whispers to each of the rest a name representing some color, as "Red-cap," "Blue-cap," "Yellow-cap," etc. Two players are exempted, one of whom is called "My Man John," and one represents the Cardinal. The latter now leaves the room, first placing in the hands of "John" a little billet of wood, bidding him take care of the Cardinal's hat, which at the same time he declares to be of some particular color, as green. John conceals this somewhere in the room.

The child who went out then enters, armed with a cane, and demands the Cardinal's hat. John affects to have forgotten all about it, and asks, "What color was it—green?" and so on until he guesses the color. Being thus reminded, he declares that some one of the group, as, for example, Red-cap, has stolen it. Red-cap is now asked by the questioner, "Red-cap, did you steal the Cardinal's hat?" He also must pass on the charge, saying, "No, it was White-cap" (or any other color).

* From Games and Songs of American Children. Collected and Compared by WILLIAM WELLS NEWELL. Published by Harper & Brothers.

If he omits to do so, or names a color not included among the players, he must pay forfeit.

Meanwhile the questioner becomes indignant at the numerous demals, and proceeds to extort confession by torture, rapping with his cane the fingers of those whom he addresses. If he succeeds in obliging any child to confess, the latter must pay forfeit. At last My man John owns the theft, produces the hat, and the game is begun again, until a sufficient number of forfeits have been collected.

IS IT POSSIBLE?

BY GATH BRITTLE.

THEN weary, foot-sore travellers,
All in a woful plight,
Sought shelter at a way-side inn
One dark and stormy night.

"Nine rooms, no more," the landlord said,
"Have I to offer you;
To each of eight a single room,
But the ninth must serve for two."

A din arose. The troubled host
Could only scratch his head;
For of these tired men no two
Would occupy one bed.

The puzzled host was soon at ease—
He was a clever man—
And to please all his guests devised
This most ingenious plan:

A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I
---	---	---	---	---	---	---	---	---

In room marked A two men he placed;
The third he lodged in B;
The fourth to C was then assigned;
The fifth retired to D;

In E the sixth he tucked away,
In F the seventh man;
The eighth and ninth in G and H,
And then to A he ran,

Wherein the host, as I have said,
Had laid two travellers by.
Then taking one—the tenth and last—
He lodged him safe in I.

Nine single rooms—a room for each—
Were made to serve for ten.
And this it is that puzzles me,
And many wiser men.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S COT.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

OUR CHILD AT ST. MARY'S.

BY THE POSTMISTRESS.

ONE bright morning not long ago I dropped my pen, looked my desk with a snap, and tied on my bonnet. "Yes," I said to myself, "I will take a little trip to St. Mary's, and see with my own eyes the dear child who is the first to occupy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE'S Cot, for which the boys and girls have been sending their gifts, and about which they will all be wanting to hear."

I found that our artist had been before me, and had already made a pretty picture of the dainty white-dressed Cot, with its small inmate, and its plate which tells to every visitor that your kindness and self-denial have given the gentle Sisters the means to care for your child. As you look at the picture, let me tell you something about the hospital, and about Holy Innocents' Ward, in which our Cot has its place.

The dear child who is in it at present is a little blue-eyed girl with a thin, pale face, and a very shy look. Her name is Sarah H. McShague. She is between five and six years old, and has hip-disease. As I smoothed the soft brown hair which was parted from her high forehead, and took in my own her slender little fingers, I felt glad that Sadie had been brought there for help, and possibly for healing.

She is a sweet and patient child, who smiled and blushed as she talked to me. The Sister said she had been very homesiek for the first day or two after she came, but that most of the little ones were so. In a very short time they became used to the hospital, and fond of the nurses who give them such tender and constant care. And when the hour at last arrives when the doctor says they are well enough to go home again, they are sure to shed a good many tears over the parting.

Little Sadie has a weight attached by a cord to one of her limbs, but it is covered by the sheet, and I would not have seen it unless I had asked the Sister to show me just what was the matter. She was sitting up in her bed, leaning against the pillow, and before her on a little tray were a number of toys. Beside her was a doll, which seemed to be a comfort. Perhaps you will be glad to know that HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is to be sent regularly to the cot, so that if you ever have any messages for our child, whether she is Sadie or somebody else, you may send them to the Post-office Box, and they will get to her in safety.

St. Mary's Free Hospital for Children is under the charge of a Protestant Sisterhood, and is located at Nos. 405 and 407 West Thirty-fourth Street, New York. It receives children of both sexes between the ages of two and fourteen years, without distinction as to belief or color. No cases of contagious disease are admitted.

The children brought here are often sadly deformed, or have met with dreadful accidents from falls or seals through the carelessness of their parents. Often the poor, hard-working mothers are so busy trying to earn bread for the children and money to pay the rent that they can not take proper care of the little ones, who are left to manage as best they may. Many of the boys and girls in the hospital have been sufferers most of their lives.

When they enter St. Mary's the first thing the Sisters do is to give them a nice warm bath in the basement, and to dress them in clean soft clothing from head to foot. Every garment they have worn before coming is sent to their homes at once, and they are made perfectly pure before being taken upstairs.

The wards of the hospital are large, airy, and cheerful. Great windows let in the sunshine, and pictures hang on the walls, while green growing plants and blooming flowers please and refresh the eyes.

The sound of merry voices and of laughter greeted me as I followed Sister Catharine up the broad stair and into Holy Innocents' Ward. These little invalids were not moping. No indeed! Some were sitting up in little chairs, nursing their dollies, many of whom had bandaged heads and limbs; others, though in bed, had their bits of worsted-work, or their slates and books; and in one corner a group was gathered around some young ladies who had come, as they do daily, to teach or amuse their little favorites.

Three times a week a lady who has a lovely voice goes to the hospital to sing with the children. In each ward there is an organ, and the Sister says it is very sweet to hear the song of praise going up from these suffering little ones.

Remember, dears, there are no rosy or dimpled cheeks here, and no round active limbs like yours. And yet the children look and are happy, and do not fret or complain as one might almost expect.

Attached to every ward is a small dining-room, which you would call "cunning," I am sure, for in it is a low table with dear little arm-chairs, and here some of the children take their meals. Of course very many have to eat in bed, and it is quite an event when they are promoted to sit at the dinner-table.

There is a beautiful little chapel in the hospital, where religious services are held. It is a quiet, peaceful place, in which I felt like lingering.

But I think you would have liked better the play-room at the top of the house. Here every day all the little ones who are well enough to play are brought up in the elevator. There are all sorts of toys here—games, balls, tops, marbles, and, crowning splendor, a baby-house, into which the delighted children take turns in gazing.

The hospital is supported wholly by the gifts of the charitable. During last year two hundred and four children were treated within its walls. It has a branch, called St. Mary's by the Sea, on Rockaway Beach, to which many of the patients are taken every summer. Holy Innocents' Ward was furnished by a band of young ladies who belong to the Church of the Transfiguration, of which the Rev. Dr. Houghton is rector. Miss Fanshawe and "Aunt Edna" are members of this band.

It costs $3000 to endow a cot. For $200 a cot may be supported one year, and in some cases this is done by people who wish to help a good work, or to pay in this way a tribute to the memory of some one whom God has taken. Surely the blessing of the Master who loved little children attends those who do this in His name.

Visitors are welcome at the hospital every day from 11 to 12 o'clock A.M., and from 2 to 4 o'clock P.M. I hope some at least of our little readers will go to take a peep at Young People's Cot.

THE OLD MEN OF THE MOUNTAIN.

AN ADVENTURE IN WESTERN INDIA.

BY DAVID KER.

"OH, Ella, we've lost our way!"

There was certainly some reason for Miss Somerford's tone of dismay, and for the startled look which her words brought out upon the face of her charming cousin. For two young ladies to lose themselves in a lonely part of the "Ghauts," as the natives call the hilly region between Bombay and Poonah, with night coming on, and every appearance of a storm, was not exactly the most agreeable situation possible, and so evidently thought Fanny Somerford, and likewise her cousin Ella.

"And it's getting dark, too," whimpered Fanny, who had only the day before been longing for a chance of showing how well she could face any sudden danger. "What ever shall we do?"

"We must just go a little higher up the hill, and try if we can see the road from there," answered Ella, who was the bolder spirit of the two.

"No, don't leave me—there's a dear; I'm sure I see somebody coming up the hill," pleaded poor Fanny.

"So there is," cried Ella, joyfully; "it's a native boy, and we'll just ask him to direct us."

"But—but won't it be rather a risk?" objected her cousin, nervously. "Suppose he should lead us wrong, and bring us into a robber's den or something! I've heard of such things."

"So have I—in romances," laughed the bolder lady. "My dear Fanny, people aren't robbed and murdered here nowadays, in broad daylight, close to a railway station."

She stepped forward and found herself face to face with a creature which, but for the words of astonishment that it uttered at her sudden appearance, might well have been mistaken for a monkey just escaped from some zoological garden. It was barely four feet in height, brown and shrivelled as a dried sea-weed, with just enough clothes upon it to have made a good-sized pocket-handkerchief, and sufficiently monkey-like to puzzle any one who had not been long enough in India to get used to the sight of such hobgoblins.

As the thing came to a halt, Miss Ella mustered her few words of Hindostani to accost it, and ask it to show her the way to the Upper Ghaut House.

"What you give me s'pose I show you?" demanded the scarecrow, in broken English, with the true Hindoo instinct of making the best bargain out of everything.

The young lady offered him a rupee (about fifty cents). "No want rupee—want dis," said the young darky, touching the red woollen scarf that Ella wore around her neck. "S'pose Miss Baba* give me dis, dat time I show right way."

"Let him have it, by all means. Give him anything he wants, and let us get home before it grows dark," said Fanny, in a terrified whisper.

"A likely story indeed!" answered Ella, indignantly, "that I should give my father's birthday present to a little imp like that! Here, boy, I can't give you this, but if you'll take us home I'll give you a rupee and a half the moment we get there."

"No want rupee," repeated the young savage—"want dis," and once more he touched with his lean brown forefinger Miss Somerford's scarf, the bright color of which had taken his fancy very strongly.

"Well," said Ella, with an idea of gaining her object without losing her scarf, "show us the way first, and we'll settle about that afterward."

The boy gave a peculiar grin, and led the way up the hill-side at such a pace that the two girls, active as they were, had quite enough to do to keep up with him.

"Ella," whispered Fanny, drawing close to her cousin's side, "I'm quite sure this boy's leading us wrong. Just fancy, if he should be taking us into a nest of those dreadful strangling people that we used to hear about!"

"If he's led us wrong," rejoined Ella, boldly, "we can soon settle that. I see some old men sitting among the trees, and we'll just ask our way of them."

As she spoke they came out into a kind of clearing, where they beheld a very curious sight.

Grouped together in the centre of the clearing were about a score of dwarfish figures, whose broad, black, ugly faces were fringed with thick white beards, giving them a very queer, unamny look. They seemed to be holding a sort of council, for they were all seated upon the ground, with their hands on their knees; but one and all were perfectly silent, and this utter stillness, together with their extraordinary appearance, impressed Ella so strongly that she hesitated to speak to them.

At length plucking up courage, she approached, and was about to speak, when all at once the supposed old men sprang up, with a shrill chatter, making grimaces hideous enough for the worst lunatic in Bedlau. Then the ladies perceived that their "old men" were neither more nor less than the bearded monkeys of the East Indies.

They at once shrank back among the trees, and aided by the gathering darkness, succeeded in slipping safely by. But the mischievous boy did not escape so easily; for one of the monkeys, either provoked by his antics, or mistaking him for another monkey from some hostile tribe, caught up a stick, and rushed furiously at him. The boy fled in terror; but fast as he ran, the monkey ran faster still, and in another moment shrill cries of pain were heard from below, showing that the young rogue had got his deserts at last.

"Serves him right," said Ella. "He wanted to give us a fright, and now he's got one himself. However, he's done us a good turn without intending it, for I see something like a road down yonder, and I think it must be the very one we're looking for."

It was so, sure enough, and in another half-hour they were safe at home again.

SEA-URCHINS.

BY SARAH COOPER.

WHAT funny, prickly creatures the sea-urchins are! A person might easily mistake them for green chestnut burrs scattered on the beach, and, glancing up hastily, might almost expect to find the overhanging branches of a great chestnut-tree. But we see no tree, and by this time the prickly green things may have stretched out their purple suckers and begun to drag themselves over the beach. This prompts us to place them among the animals. We have seen the same method of travelling practiced by our old friends the star-fish, but surely these round creatures can be nothing like star-fish.

Yes, my dear friends, that is just what they are like, and I think we shall soon discover a close relationship between the two. We might almost say that the sea-urchin (Fig. 1) is a star-fish that has got up in the world, and folding its rays together side by side, has concluded to live henceforth shut up in its beautiful round box.

We sometimes find the empty white shells of sea-urchins that have lost their coating of prickles or spines, as they are properly called. The shells are ornamented with rows of dots and knobs with open lace-work between, and they are very elegant, being scarcely thicker than an egg-shell. This shell is not one globular piece, as you might suppose, but it consists of several hundred little plates exquisitely fitted together, and forming a true mosaic, as seen in Fig. 2. On the inside of the shell you can easily see the lines where these plates are joined, and if I am not greatly mistaken you will be charmed with those double rows of lace-work which divide the shell into five equal sections. Let us see what they mean.

If we should place a star-fish on the table with its mouth down, and bend its rays backward until they meet together on top, and the edges of the rays touch each other, we should have the general plan of a sea-urchin. Do not imagine that star-fish ever do turn into sea-urchins. I merely wish to show you the similarity of their structure.

According to this arrangement the double rows of perforated plates would represent the middle of the rays of the star-fish where the tube-feet are situated, while the broad belt of knobs corresponds with the strip of spines on both edges of the ray. The mouth would be underneath, and you would of course look for the five eyespecks on the top where the ends of the rays meet. You will also find the madreporic body at the top, a little on one side. This small sieve, which is so interesting in the star-fish, performs the same service for the urchin, and prevents the entrance of any sand or other solid substance into the five tubes that pass under those holes in the shell.

are supplied with water from inside the shell. In the diagram (Fig. 4) the madreporic body is shown at f, and the tube-feet with their little water-bags at p. Sea-urchins move by means of their tube-feet, which may be lengthened so as to extend far beyond the spines.

The shell fits the animal exactly in its infancy, and must still serve it in old age, for urchins never cast off their coats as crabs or lobsters do. Being formed of many small pieces, it grows a little all over, as I shall show you. Each plate is surrounded by living flesh. This flesh secretes lime from the sea water and deposits it round the edge of the plates, thus increasing the size of the shell uniformly. After sea-urchins die the spines drop off; the shell is so frail that it too is soon broken, the plates falling apart.

Do not omit to look at the spines with your microscopes, and see what beautifully carved columns they are (Fig. 3). Falling about on the back of the urchin, they remind one of a sadly neglected grave-yard with its tottering monuments.

Each spine is hollowed at the end to fit a knob on the shell. This forms a perfect ball-and-socket joint, which is supplied with delicate muscles to move the spines. As the creature travels along the spines are constantly working, and they look as if they too wanted to help. In some species the spines are very large, and they are used for slate-pencils. We should think it quite luxurious to have such artistic pencils, but many boys and girls in out-of-the-way places, especially where fishing vessels bring home curiosities a, CROSS SECTION.

Through these holes are protruded the double rows of tube-feet, just like those we have studied in the star-fish and worked in the same manner. It adds much to the beauty and interest of the shell to know that these lovely fine dots are openings through which the tube-feet from foreign shores, have puzzled over their examples and written their copies with these elegantly fluted spines. I wonder if they had any trouble to keep their points sharp, and whether they knew their pencils had grown on the backs of sea-urchins?

Did you notice the white spot in the middle of Fig. 1, also the pointed beak near the top of Fig. 2? Both of them show the five white teeth which come together in a point, and may be extended beyond the shell just as they are in Fig. 2. I hope you will observe what a great step forward the sea-urchin has made. We have found nothing like teeth before in the lowly creatures we have been studying, and here comes the urchin, armed with five hard white teeth, having sharp cutting edges like a rat's teeth. Each tooth has a separate jaw of its own, and is worked by its own muscles. This singular arrangement has attracted much attention, and from the shape of the jaws and teeth they are known as "Aristotle's lantern."

Notice, too, in Fig. 4, how well the sea-urchin is supplied with organs—the mouth, a, the stomach, c, the coiled intestine, d, and the anal opening, o—whereas our studies heretofore have been animals with a simple sac for a stomach, and all the refuse was returned through the mouth.

This highly favored individual has also a heart, v, and blood-vessels, although the blood which passes through them is quite different from that of higher animals.

The sea-urchins of the Mediterranean are larger than ours, and are used for food, either raw as we eat oysters, or boiled. They were a favorite dish with the ancient Greeks and Romans. Bunches of their eggs are also offered for sale as food in the Italian cities. The eggs pass out of the shell through small openings near the madreporic body, and they are often seen on top of the shell, surrounded by spines which have been drawn together to hold them.

Young people, I notice, like to use the proper names for things, and now that we know all this about the sea-urehin we will give it its right name, the echinus. In your reading you will also meet with the word echinoderm, and it will give you pleasure to recognize it as an old acquaintance. Echinoderm means spiny-skinned. It is the general name given to star-fish, sea-urehins, and their relations, most of which have prickly coverings.

The echinus has a curious habit of boring holes in hard rocks. It sinks in the hole for a considerable distance, and looks well satisfied with its snug retreat. It is not understood how the rock becomes worn away, unless it is by a rotary movement of the body. Constant dropping, we know, wears a stone, and constant turning and twisting may do the same. There is no doubt but the hole is made by the animal that occupies it, as it fits exactly, whether the occupant be large or small.

It is amusing to watch the echinus in shallow water drag itself along by its tube-feet, and seeking, as if by instinct, to hide beneath the sea-weeds. The animal will sometimes cover itself by drawing together pieces of seaweed and gravel.

In visiting a good museum you will be surprised to see how many different varieties of these creatures there are. Some species are flattened, and pass by the name of sand-dollars (Fig. 5), keyhole-urehins (Fig. 6), etc. During life the skeletons of these animals were covered with skin, and furnished with a furry coat of little spines and small tube-feet.

RAISING THE "PEARL."*

AUTHOR OF "TOBY TYLER," "TIM AND TIE," "MR. STUBBS'S BROTHER," ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE VOYAGE BEGUN.

HOWEVER much the sight of Tommy Tucker standing near the beach as if he were planning some mischief might have troubled Dare, he was not allowed to spend much time in dwelling on his fears.

The speed of the steamer had hardly been checked by the anchors before those on the beach, even including Mr. and Mrs. Evans, got into the small boats and rowed out to the Pearl.

"Now," said Captain Sammy, in his old commanding way, after all were on board, "we have got to get the craft around to the dock so that we can get the supplies on board. Dare, you go into the pilot-house and steer as snug along the shore, toward the dock, as possible, while the rest of us pull her. Charley and Bobby will take one boat, and Rogers and I the other, and if we can't walk her along over the water, no one can."

The anchors were raised, the towing lines made fast, and, under the influence of four oars, the jaunty little steamer did glide over the water at a respectable rate of speed. Dare, who was in the pilot-house, was as proud and happy as any boy could be who had unexpectedly become captain of as fine a steamer as the Pearl.

Mr. and Mrs. Evans, as the passengers, examined every part of the boat, and judging from the admiration on their faces when they finished, it would not have been a difficult matter to have persuaded them to take a short cruise in her.

* Begun in No. 175, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

TAKING IN STORES.

In less than half an hour the steamer was made fast to Captain Sammy's wharf, just opposite a large pile of articles which he had laid out in the morning, and which were put on board of her at once.

There were tables, chairs, bedding for the four berths, and all sorts of cooking utensils. The last mentioned Captain Sammy was very careful about, stating as the reason of his excessive precaution that he had shipped as cook, and wanted to know where all his tools were.

Then came water casks, spare ropes, spars, and cables, and some of the workmen about the dock were set to work filling the tank with water, and putting the coal on board.

Captain Sammy had taken good care that there should be no delay about the start, and to that end had done a great deal of work during the morning, as was shown when he handed Mr. Evans a list of eatables which he had ordered, and which had already been brought to the dock.

By the time the visitors were ready to depart there was absolutely nothing left to be done, so far as getting the steamer ready for her voyage. Rogers had announced that the engine was in perfect running order, the boys were sure that everything that was needed was in the cabins, and when the last bushel of coal was put on board, Captain Sammy said that his portion of the work was done.

All that remained to be done was for the crew to get their baggage on board, and Mrs. Evans thought the boys had better sleep at the hotel that night, so that during the evening they could pack everything which they wanted to take with them.

But now, as the question of leaving the steamer alone came up, Dare remembered Tommy's half-uttered threat, and he begged that at least two of them might remain on board to keep watch against any mischief the ex-pirate might attempt to do.

Captain Sammy growled out something about the foolishness of ever having taken Master Tucker from Dollar Island, and it was plain to be seen that he was not at all easy in his mind regarding Tommy's ability to do harm.

Mr. Evans seemed to understand that it was not exactly safe to leave the steamer alone, and the question of how the difficulty should be avoided had just come up for discussion, when Captain Sammy settled the matter by saying: "You boys go to the hotel and get what things you want to take with you. You can bring them here, and sleep aboard to-night. I'll stay here till you come back, an' if that Tucker boy so much as shows his head around here, there won't be enough of him left to get back, or my name ain't Sammy Basset."

This plan was carried out, as, in fact, anything proposed by the Captain usually was, and the boys left the hotel two hours after, promising to see Mr. and Mrs. Evans on the next morning, when they would come down in the Pearl to the pier nearly opposite the hotel on their way to the Everglades.

When they reached the steamer Captain Sammy was stumping around at a furious rate in the standing-room aft, muttering all sorts of threats against Tommy Tucker, whom he believed he had seen skulking around the head of the dock.

"Keep a sharp lookout," he said, as he went on shore, after the boys had come on board, "and if that villain comes around here, don't stop to have any talk with him, but hang him right up." Then he stumped along up the pier, looking behind and around everything large enough to afford a shelter for a boy of Tommy's size.

Dare lighted the swinging lamp that hung in the centre of the little cabin, and after they had arranged their belongings in such a way as to make the place look home-like, and put their guns where they could get at them readily, the boys went on deck to watch for the approach of the pirate.

But Captain Sammy was either mistaken as to having seen Tommy, or the boy had been frightened away when the little man made the search of the dock. After waiting a little while the captain and crew of the Pearl "turned in."

The novelty of the situation, and the thought that they were actually in the steamer which was to take them on their famous trip, served to keep them in a state of wakefulness that almost amounted to remaining on watch, and it was nearly morning when the last one of them sank into a slumber that was disturbed by dreams of all kinds of possible and impossible adventures.

It was hardly daylight when Dare awoke on the following morning; but he roused up his crew so that everything might be put in the neatest trim before the cook and engineer arrived.

The beds were made, the cabins swept again, and everything on deck disposed of in such a way as to make the best show, and by sunrise Captain Sammy made his appearance at the head of the dock.

He had evidently counted on finding the boys asleep, and had probably enjoyed the idea of scolding them as sleepy heads, for his face showed plainest signs of disappointment when he found them up and at work.

He had brought what he called his "damage" in a canvas bag, and, after throwing it carelessly into one of the berths, he began his official duties by getting the breakfast on the stove that stood in one corner of the engine-room.

By the time Tom Rogers arrived the breakfast had been eaten, and he and Charley went at once into the engine-room. The smoke that soon began to pour out of the smoke-stack told that they were getting ready for the start as quickly as possible.

Soon the noise of escaping steam was heard, and no unmusical sound ever rang on Dare's ears as pleasantly as did that.

He took his station in the pilot-house some time before it was possible to start, and swung the wheel around in anxious expectancy, while Bobby rushed from one end of the boat to the other as if he thought the entire business devolved on him.

"Now keep your eye peeled," said Captain Sammy to Dare, after what had seemed to be a long time of waiting. "Ring the bell once when you are ready. I'll cast off the lines now."

Dare sounded the whistle just once for the sake of hearing it. Bobby seemed to be lifted right off his feet by the music. Captain Sammy cast off the hawsers, and Dare pulled the engine-room bell with a vigor that promised to snap the wire if repeated.

Slowly the wheels commenced to revolve, and the Pearl began to glide away from the dock, while from the pilot-house, the bow, and the engine-room sounded a shout of joy and triumph.

Dare's head almost swam with delight as the little steamer went ahead at full speed; and Captain Sammy took up his station just in front of the pilot-house to assure himself that the young captain was not entirely unfit for duty from excitement.

On approaching the pier at which he was to say adieu to his parents Dare sounded the whistle until he saw his father and mother come out of the house, and then he turned his attention to making a creditable landing.

Captain Sammy contented himself by simply watching Dare's proceedings, ready to give a command if necessary, but allowing the boy to take his own way so long as he was managing the craft properly.

Mr. and Mrs. Evans were already on the pier when Dare rang the first bell to "slow down," and when the Pearl was taken alongside the wharf almost as skillfully as an experienced captain would have done it, both his father and Captain Sammy showed Dare their appreciation of his skill in managing the steamer.

The stay here was not a long one, for all hands were anxious to be as far on their journey as possible before night, since it had been decided that, unless it was quite necessary, the Pearl should not be run after dark, thereby lessening the risks and labor.

Dare proposed to take his father and mother out for a short sail, but Mr. Evans refused, saying that if the invitation was given on the return from the Everglades it might be accepted.

Then the "good-byes" were spoken, the boys were cautioned to obey Captain Sammy, Dare went into the pilot-house again, and everything was ready for the actual beginning of the voyage.

The bell was rung for the engine to be started, the whistle sounded as a parting salute, and when the wheels began to revolve, and the Pearl sailed swiftly away, the trip to the Everglades had begun.

CHAPTER XIV.

CORAL REEFS.

It was all plain sailing before the Pearl, and only necessary for her captain to keep her headed straight down the bay.

When they were well clear of the land Tom Rogers tested the speed of the little craft by putting on all steam, until it seemed as if she flew along the top of the water, rather than in it, and Charley and Bobby, in the bow, where they could have a full view during this trial of speed, could hardly control their joy.

Dare was quite as much excited as they were, but he concealed it in his desire to appear as grave and dignified as he thought the captain of a steamboat ought to be.

Down Hillsborough Bay the Pearl raced, and after about two hours of the exciting sport Captain Sammy explained that they had reached Tampa Bay, which accounted for the increased roughness of the water.

Mangrove Point, at the mouth of Little Manatee River, was passed, and then Dare steered the Pearl as near to the little chain of reefs as he dared to go, heading her directly for Mullet Key as he began to leave them astern.

Captain Sammy left his position of lookout to resume the duties of cook, and when the yacht was nearly opposite Seminole, Charley, Bobby, and the cook had a nicely served dinner of fried fresh fish and plenty of vegetables.

Then the little Captain, with the aid of the boys, spread the table again, and sent Charley to relieve Rogers, while he took Dare's place in the pilot-house, so the captain and engineer had their dinner.

Bobby had been appointed dish-washer, and he waited upon this second table with very little skill, and at the expense of two plates, which he broke through attempting to take them from the stove when they were so hot as to burn his fingers.

When Dare went into the pilot-house again the course of the Pearl had been changed, and she was running down between Ana Maria, or Palm, Key and the mainland.

"I guess we'll lay up in Sarasota Bay to-night," said Captain Sammy. "It's about the half-way place to the mouth of the Caloosahatchee River, and there isn't any need of rushing."

Dare was perfectly willing to come to an anchor anywhere the little man thought proper, and Captain Sammy took up his position in the bows again, in order that he might direct the course of the yacht through the net-work of small keys and reefs that marked the entrance to Sarasota Bay.

The sun was still quite high in the heavens when the Pearl dashed along merrily into the waters of the bay, and came to anchor just inside a jutting point of land that formed a snug harbor, and not more than a quarter of a mile from the shore.

Outside, seeming to shut out the waters of the Gulf from the bay, could be seen Long Boat, Sarasota, and Long Keys, as if standing sentinel over the beautiful body of water that formed the bay.

All hands "turned to," under the little Captain's orders, to make everything snug for the night, and when that was done he said, in his gruffest and most commanding tones,

"Now, then, if you boys are goin' ashore, you want to do it now, for your father told me that you was goin' to find out all about how the reefs was made before you got back, an' I want you to tell me the whole story to-night."

The boys were greatly surprised at this command, for as yet they had had no time to learn anything of the formation of the reefs, and of course were unable to give Captain Sammy the slightest information.

Dare managed to say, however, that they would go ashore for a short time, but that they could hardly tell anything about reefs.

Captain Sammy made no reply, but busied himself with his canvas bag, and the boys started for the shore in the little tender.

There was very little that was interesting to be seen on the shore of Sarasota Bay, and the boys returned to the yacht before the hour had passed. But, quickly as they had returned, they found supper waiting for them, Captain Sammy and Rogers having already had theirs.

When they had finished eating, and helped Bobby in his work of clearing up, they filed into the forward cabin, looking rather mournful because they were apparently expected to recite a lesson they had never learned.

It was quite evident that some considerable preparation had been made for their reception, for the cabin table was covered with books, and seated behind it, with his longest pipe in his mouth, and a pair of cracked spectacles on his nose, was Captain Sammy, assuming all the airs and graces of a country school-teacher of the olden days.

"Sit down and be quiet," said Captain Sammy, glaring at them as if he suspected they intended to disobey him.

The boys did as they were commanded, although Bobby was so averted that he only occupied a very small portion of his chair, and that directly on the edge, as if he believed it might be necessary for him to run away at any moment.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE LAND OF THE FEZ.

BY HELEN S. CONANT.

IT is not often that the people of Europe and America follow the fashions of the East, but one little article of wearing apparel has come to us from this distant part of the world that is certainly very attractive. No rosy-cheeked school-boy skating or coasting over wide fields of ice and snow ever makes so bright an appearance as when his curly head is surmounted by the jaunty crimson "fez." He becomes a picturesque figure in the landscape, and we follow the bright bit of color with its waving tassel, thinking how very, very much prettier it is than the dull cloth cap.

I wonder how many of you that wear your crimson head-coverings with such pleasure ever think anything about Morocco, the land from which they come, or about the strange people that inhabit it? What sort of a costume is the jaunty fez usually worn above, and who are the people who wear it? Let us see if we can find out a few facts about them.

The country of Morocco, of which Fez and Morocco are the two largest cities, lies along the coast of Northwestern Africa, and at the foot of the great Atlas Mountains. The inhabitants are Arabs, Moors, Jews, and negroes, very few Europeans being contented to make their homes in this strange and distant land. Many of these people are well educated, however, and some of them are very rich. As in every country, the Jews are a merchant class, and those who are successful in business live in a very luxurious way.

A JEWISH MAID OF MOROCCO.

Our girl readers will be interested in the beautiful portrait of "A Jewish Maid of Morocco" given on this page. These Jewish maidens are very beautiful, and while they preserve the peculiar features of their race, they are remarkable for their delicate light brown complexions and large dark eyes.

The young girls of every country, I fancy, are fond of dress. Indeed, it would be quite an unnatural little person who did not like to look pretty, and have people around her admire her costumes; but some of the girls of Morocco are positively splendid in their attire. If they are at all wealthy, the amount and variety of their jewelry is quite marvellous. Diamonds are not much in use; but rubies, emeralds (generally uncut), and pearls are scattered about in profusion. They love these glittering things dearly; and on various occasions wear finger-rings and huge ear-rings of gold set with precious stones, necklaces of amber and coral, massive bracelets of gold, and armlets and anklets of silver inlaid with gold.

Let me see if I can describe to you the articles that the pretty maiden whose portrait we have here would wear on a state occasion. First, there would be the fine embroidered shirt (kumja), fastened down the breast by numerous small buttons and loops, and a pair of very loose trousers. Over the shirt is a jacket (caftan), usually buttoned in front, with loose flowing sleeves, and made of silk or satin, heavily embroidered in bright colors.

The hair of the Jewish maid is worn uncovered, but after she is married she will hide it carefully away under a handkerchief of black silk, over which another of gay colors is tastefully arranged. Her little feet would be incased in red slippers embroidered with gold. Then would be added the wonderful masses of jewelry I have told you about.

For out-door wear there is one article which no maid or married lady of Morocco would dream of being seen without. This is the haik, or veil, common in nearly all Eastern countries. It consists of a wide piece of thin cotton, woollen, or sometimes silk material about six yards in length. It is arranged about the head and also the body in a wonderful series of artistic folds. The girls of Morocco have a dainty way of bringing the haik over their faces, so that nothing but one of their bright eyes can be seen.

One or two things we have to record about these pretty African maidens that seem very objectionable. They have a habit of staining their finger-tips a bright red with the juice of a plant called henna, and their olive cheeks are frequently covered with rouge. In addition to this they further disfigure their fair faces by dyeing their eyelashes and eyelids with a black substance rightly named kohl.

There is another custom, however, whereby the maids of Morocco try to increase their beauty which seems even more horrible than the painting of cheeks and eyelids. In this part of the world a young girl is not considered beautiful unless she is not only plump, but what we should call positively fat. In order to produce this flesh she is made to keep quite still, and forced to eat all kinds of fattening things. Bread is broken into crumbs, and these are moulded into pellets which are forced into the throat, and must be swallowed even though the poor girl turns from them in disgust. The name for these pellets is harrabel, and they are about the size of a common cannon shot. A seed called fennyreek is also made use of in great quantities for the same purpose. We should think our lithe and active girls utterly spoiled by all this superfluous flesh, but in Morocco a woman can not be too fat.

The Moors are a lazy people, and as for the women, they may be said never to walk at all. No Moorish maiden would know what to make of a party of merry school-girls racing home after a day spent over their books. She would think they were quite crazy. Indeed, it is from the Moors that we get the absurd adage "Never sit when you can lie,

Never stand when you can sit,
Never walk when you can stand,
Never run when you can walk."

THOR'S JOURNEY TO JOTUNHEM.

BY JAMES BALDWIN.

CHAPTER I

THOR was the greatest giant-killer that ever lived. His home was in Gladsheim, on the towering top of Mount Asgard; and he was said to be the strongest and bravest, though not always the wisest, of all the good folk who dwelt there. When the mist giants of the summer wrapped the world in dark clouds and threatened to destroy the ripening harvest, Thor harnessed his goats to his great iron chariot, and with his mighty hammer in his hand, rode out to battle with the foes of man, and drive them back to their airy homes in the mountains. And, later in the season, when the frost giants of the North-land came rushing furiously from their chilly halls of Jotunhem, and sought to overwhelm all living beings with their icy breath, he met them single-handed, and, after months of stormy warfare, forced them to return, beaten and ashamed, to their own cheerless land.

Early one fine morning, Thor, standing in his iron car, drove out of Asgard at so rattling a pace that all the people were astonished at the noise he made. The din and uproar of a common thunder-storm were nothing to the uproarious racket that followed in the wake of the prancing goats and the rumbling car. But the Thunderer, as men called Thor, was so often riding here and there, and driving over the rough clouds, and hurling his hammer at the giants of mid-air, that everybody had long ago concluded not to wonder greatly at anything he did. This time, however, there was quite a curiosity to learn where he was going. But none of his acquaintances knew, and not even Sif, his golden-haired wife, could tell.

Thor drove furiously onward until he reached the shimmering rainbow bridge, the trembling way that leads from

THOR RIDING THE RAINBOW.

In the peaceful halls of Heimdal, Thor staid many days, a loved and honored guest; and as the brothers quaffed the gladsome mead together, the pleasant memories of former days were again awakened. Then Thor told his brother the secret of his journey: he was on his way to Jotunheim, the home of the giants.

"Ah!" answered Heimdal. "Why dare you thus venture into the stronghold of your foes? Have you not enough to do to ride in the whirlwind and the storm, and to fight our enemies there? What if some mishap should befall you in Jotunheim? Then the earth would miss your thundering presence in the clouds, and the giants, no longer fearing your hammer, would come in the driving hurricane to lay waste the fields and waylay the fair homes of men. I, as well as you, am a sworn foe to the Jotunheim giants, but I dare not leave my post. Why will you rush into danger?"

"I go to slay the wolf in his lair," said Thor. "Is it not better to meet our enemy and overcome him once for all than to keep up this everlasting warfare, which is stayed only to be begun again?"

"But think of the chances against you," answered Heimdal. "Think of what might follow failure."

"Thor never fails," cried the Thunderer, "and he never thinks of chances."

Next day Thor bade his kind brother good-by, and drove out of Himminborg into the cheerless land of Niflheim. In that country the frost giants rule, and the sun shines but half the year, and snow and ice cover the land and the sea. With voice and whip Thor urged his team along, and he travelled hundreds of leagues through clashing cliffs of ice and blinding storms of snow until he stood under the steadfast northern star, and at the farthest bounds of Niflheim. There he saw the giant Hresvelger, the keeper of the north winds, standing upon the very uttermost edge of the world. The grim giant was clad in eagles' feathers, and when his huge wings flapped, dire hurricanes arose, and the bitter winter blasts rushed forth to chill the earth. Of him Thor asked the way to Jotunheim.

"Go south, then east," answered the giant. "Go south, then east over the frozen sea; but beware."

Then Thor gave the reins to his goats, and they sped southward, swiftly driven by a strong blast from Hresvelger's wings. They made no stop until they had passed the bounds of Niflheim, and came into warmer lands and among the abodes of men.

Late in the evening Thor halted at a peasant's hut, and asked for shelter during the night. Gladly the good people welcomed him, and gave him the best of all they had; but there was not food enough for all. Then Thor killed his two goats, and when he had stripped off their skins, he boiled the flesh in the great iron kettle which hung over the fire. And then all sat down to partake of a meal the like of which the good peasant and his family had never tasted before. With great care Thor spread the skins of the goats upon the floor before the fire-place, saying to his hosts,

"Be very careful, when you have eaten all the flesh from the bones, to throw them softly upon these skins."

This every one did; but Thialfe, the peasant's son, thoughtlessly broke one of the shank-bones in order to get at the marrow within.

Thor rested in the hut all night, and in the morning, when the first faint streaks of light appeared, he rose and dressed himself, and made ready to resume his journey. The old peasant, who had also arisen, and was stirring the fire, wondered how his guest would travel that day, and what he would do with the iron car that stood beside the door. But his mind was soon set at rest, so far as that was concerned; for Thor, taking his hammer in his hand, passed it three times over the bones and skins, calling his goats by name; and the creatures took their wonted forms, and rose upon their feet, and walked to their places in front of the iron car. But one of the animals limped painfully on one of its hind-legs. When Thor saw this his wrath waxed very great, and he grasped the handle of his hammer with such force that his knuckles grew white and his hands swelled big with blue blood; and he knit his dark eyebrows, and stamped furiously upon the ground.

"Who has broken my goat's leg?" he cried.

The peasant and his wife fell upon their knees and screamed with fright, and earnestly declared that none of their family had done anything of the kind; and the trembling Thialfe and his little sister Roska, with tears streaming from their eyes, besought the terrible Thunderer to have pity upon them and spare their lives, for they had not meant to do any harm to the goat.

When Thor saw in what great trouble the poor people were, his anger was softened, and he laid his hammer quietly in the ear. Then he turned to the peasant, and said:

"On one condition I will spare your lives. Give to me as servants this fleet-footed boy, Thialfe, and his sister, the golden-haired Roska. Then I will go on my way, and leave you and your wife in peace. And every year the boy, whom men shall call the delver, shall make the ground ready for the farmers' seed, and his sister shall follow him, and reap the golden grain. The one shall have the care of the hopeful seed-time and its promises; the other, of the gladsome harvest and its rich fulfillments."

"Take them," answered the poor man and his weeping wife, "for you offer them a better heritage than we can ever give them."

Then Thor took Thialfe and Roska with him, and they travelled eastward until they came to the great sea. Here they left the goats and the iron car, and taking a swift-sailing vessel, they crossed to the other shore.

No sooner had they stepped upon land than they knew that they were in the country where the giants dwell. The trees, most of them oaks and ashes, seemed to reach upward to the sky; the coarse grass was taller than their heads, and there were no flowers, neither were there any singing-birds. Everything was of hugest size, and seemed rough and harsh and altogether forbidding.

FOREST PLANTING IN SPORT.

BY HUGH CRAIG.

YOU may think, boys, perhaps, that we have trees and woods enough. But men who have studied the subject will tell you that in many parts of our land we have already cut down too many. When all the grand old trees have been removed from a hill-side the rains begin to wash away the soil, and the mountain slope that was once so green and shady soon becomes a barren and stony tract. This is the case near Boston, at a place called Middlesex Fells. The land here was formerly covered with white pine; now whole tracts are bare and useless. The people are therefore trying to replant trees and restore the old forest.

I lately read a pretty story how a forest was replanted in a part of Switzerland. The people in an old town there determined, like the people of Middlesex Fells, to transform a piece of waste land into a forest. They thought it would be a good plan to give the job to the school-boys and school-girls in the village. So they gave the schools a holiday one day, and then arranged all the boys and girls in ranks, with a drummer and fifer at the head, and away they marched merrily. A wagon followed with some light spades, and bags of acorns and nuts and other seeds, and a good many baskets of things good to eat. The planting, you see, was to be a kind of picnic.

When the children—who you may be sure were pleased at this frolic in the country, but were wondering what they would have to do next—came to the spot, the boys were called forward and put in line. Then spades and pick-axes were given them, and they were told to dig some holes several yards apart. While the boys were digging the first line of holes, the girls were placed in line, one girl behind each boy, and a bag of acorns given to each. When the row of holes was finished, the boys shouldered their spades and marched a few yards forward to make another row. The girls then advanced and dropped two or three acorns in each hole.

So the work went gayly on until they all took a recess. The picnic baskets were opened, and, as everybody had a good appetite, were soon emptied. Then after another hour's work the drum and fife sounded, spades were thrown into the cart, and all marched homeward. The children were all in good spirits, because they had enjoyed their holiday and were proud of having spent it usefully. There were no truant for the next few weeks, in each of which a holiday for planting was given, and the work was soon finished. "It is fifty years ago," said the old school-master who told the tale, "and a very fine wood is the one my school made."

A week from to-morrow will be Decoration-day. I want to propose to you that each boy and girl who does not live in the midst of a great city shall on that day plant, in memory of the heroes whose death the day commemorates, one tree, where in time to come it will be an ornament and its shade a blessing. Not that this idea is a new one with me; I only want to call your attention to it. It was first proposed by ex Governor Seymour, of New York, whose mind, in spite of his many years, is always filled with some plan for the benefit of his country and the people he loves.

THE TWINS.

BY F. B. STANFORD.

THEY were a couple of gray parrots that belonged to Guy and Louis Fenton, and the bird fancier from whom they were purchased had named them "The Twins," because, as he said, "they were as much alike as two peas in a pod." Individually they were addressed as Dick and Peter, and each knew his name.

Guy and Louis had obtained them especially for their "Museum of Great and Wonderful Curiosities," which they had established in the loft over their father's stable, and it was not long before all the boys of the neighborhood made haste to see them. The exhibition fee was three cents, and a large poster outside the stable door, printed by Louis, set forth in glowing words what the parrots could do. Besides being able to chatter a good deal of parrot talk, they could march on a tight rope, perform gymnastics on two small swings, and shoot each other with toy cannon.

When they had performed the last trick both would lie still a moment or two as though dead. Then Dick always jumped up suddenly, fluttered his feathers, and called out loudly, "Where's Peter?" and Peter immediately came to life, hopped on his legs, and replied, "Here I am." This part of the performance alone was declared by most of the boys to be well worth double the price of admission.

One fine morning, after the parrots had been in the museum a month or more, the boys hung them out-doors in their cage to enjoy the fresh air, and then went to school. When they returned at noon both birds had escaped and disappeared. Somehow the piece of wire which fastened the cage door had dropped from its place, the door had swung open, and freedom was at hand. The Twins, instead of remaining concealed wonders any longer, were now flying wherever they desired, and at liberty to display themselves free of charge to all the world.

"We are in a nice fix, aren't we?" said Guy, thrusting his hands into his pockets, and talking at the empty cage. "I think we are," Louis answered. "Nobody will care to see the show now. We'll have to shut up shop."

After some deliberation, however, it was decided to make a desperate effort at least to find the birds, and to offer a tempting reward for their capture. As soon as dinner was over the brothers took their dogs and began the search high and low around the stable, in the neighboring fields, and in the woods that were not far off. But it turned out that they might as well have searched for a needle in a hay-stack; for when it began to grow dark, and night came, they had not found even the slightest trace of the fly-aways.

"For all we can tell, they may be twenty-five miles off by this time," said Louis.

"I would rather have given away all the rest of the show than lose them," Guy declared.

They were standing now in the midst of the loft and surveying, under the dim light of a lantern that hung from a cross-beam, their collection of stuffed beasts and birds, live squirrels, pet rabbits, guinea-pigs, and doves. Louis's attention, however, was soon attracted by another noise outside one of the dormer-windows. They both listened a moment, and heard a fluttering of wings against the glass. In an instant they pushed up the window, and Dick, rather the worse for a wetting, flew in and perched himself on the cross-beam near the lantern.

"So you've come back, old fellow?" said Guy, joyfully. "Home's the best place, after all, hey?"

Dick hopped around two or three times, cocked up his head as though an idea had just occurred to him, and called out, "Where's Peter?"

He looked so funny, and the question was so appropriate just then, that both boys burst out laughing.

"That's what we want to know, old fellow," Guy replied. "Where's Peter? We've been hunting all over for both of you."

After trying a moment to imitate their laughter, as if he looked upon the escape as a good joke, Dick entered his cage at one end of the loft, and settled himself for quiet and rest, as if tired out by the day's adventure. His owners took care to fasten him in securely this time, and then returned to the open window to wait patiently for his mate.

But Peter did not come that night, nor the next day. In fact, his whereabouts was to remain a mystery some time. Neither inquiry nor reward brought any information about him. It was not until two or three months had passed that the boys found him.

Happening one day to be in a small city ten miles away, Guy visited a store where birds were kept for sale. Louis and he had decided to buy another parrot to take Peter's place, and he was in search of one like him. The store-keeper showed him several in cages, and at last led him upstairs, where he kept a "happy family" composed of several species of birds all together in one large room.

Guy had scarcely entered this place before he saw, with some astonishment, a parrot perched on a rod across one corner of the room that was the exact image of Peter. Indeed, he was almost certain that the bird was Peter. The store-keeper, however, said he guessed he was mistaken; there was no parrot in the room that knew that name. He had bought this one lately from some one he did not remember, and he had not had a chance to train him. Guy tried to make the parrot recognize his name, and repeat the parrot talk Peter had been taught; but the bird seemed to be dumb, and remained quietly indifferent. The store-keeper then said, jestingly, that he would sell him for the amount he cost if Guy could prove that he had been his.

This suggested a new idea to Guy. He drove his father's old gray horse home that afternoon as fast as he could go, and made haste to talk the matter over with

"'HERE IST DE RIGHT PRISONER, SHUDGE,' HE SAID."

Louis. The next morning both set out for the city together, taking Dick in a small cage with them. When they arrived at the store they asked permission to carry him up to the room where the happy family was, and as soon as they were inside Louis whispered to him.

"Where's Peter?" he cried immediately in his loudest manner.

"Here I am," briskly replied a cracked voice, and Peter himself, without any mistake this time, flew up from behind a barrel, and lighted on the top, with a dignified air, ready to receive his callers.

The store-keeper laughed, and was obliged to admit that Guy had found his bird.

"You shall have him for three dollars, the amount I paid for him," he said. "I bought him honestly, and only want back my money."

This was readily agreed to by both boys, and when Guy had caught Peter they all went down-stairs to the store. Here Guy laid on the counter a five-dollar bill. In another moment a commotion followed. The store-keeper had scarcely stepped to the rear of the store to get money to change the bill when Louis, seeing that his horse just outside was frightened by a passing drum, rushed out to him, and Guy, dropping Peter on the counter, ran to his aid. The observing parrot then quickly seized the five-dollar bill and boldly left the place.

All this soon brought about, as will be seen, a dire catastrophe. The store-keeper, returning with his change, found that the boys, the money, and the parrot had suddenly departed, and being a hasty man, he concluded that Guy and Louis meant to steal the bird. As soon as he reached the door he saw one of them driving down the street at great speed, and the other running after him. He therefore gave chase instantly, and cried to everybody to stop them.

In a few minutes there was quite a hubbub raised; a policeman captured Guy, and a small mob stopped Louis and the runaway Dobbin. The store-keeper, quite out of breath, pushed his way through the crowd to the policeman.

"Take him to the station-house, officer," he said. "He and his brother have stolen a parrot from me."

In vain Guy protested that the man was mistaken, and tried to explain how it all happened. The officer hurried him away before he could think what to do, and in three or four minutes he was ushered into the presence of the Police Captain. Louis was brought in close behind him, and a gaping crowd gathered at the door.

"What's the trouble?" the Captain asked immediately, looking at the boys fiercely.

"Been stealing something," the officer answered, abruptly. "Here's the man who makes the charge."

The store-keeper thereupon began to tell excitedly what had happened, and to accuse the boys of theft. But before he had quite finished, and while Guy and Louis were wondering how they could prove their innocence, the proceedings were disturbed by another prisoner calling out, lustily, "Here I am! here I am!"

The next moment a big German, with a broad grin on his good-natured face, brought Peter up to the railing in front of the Captain's desk.

"Here ist de right prisoner, shudge," he said. "I seed him mit mine own eyes. I was stoundin' in mine shop across de street ven de leetle robber flies in mit dis moneys in his bill."

"Here I am!" sang out Peter again, unabashed, and struggling to get away from his captor.

"What is it you say?" the store-keeper asked, after a pause, looking at the German, rather puzzled. "Do you mean to say that the parrot flew away of his own accord, and took the boy's money with him?"

"Yah, dat ist it. I catched him miueself mit dis moneys in his bill."

While all were laughing, and the parrot continued to declare his presence, Guy managed to tell the Captain his side of the story, and Louis and he were at once released.

"You are welcome to the bird," said the store-keeper, perceiving the mistake he had made. "I'll give him to you, boys, and I beg your pardon also for my blunder."

The crowd cheered, and pushed one another right and left to catch a glimpse of Peter as Guy and Louis hurried him off and sprang into their wagon behind old Dobbin, where Dick in his cage had been watching passing events. In a few minutes more the boys were on their way home, and breathing more freely.

"I reckon we came pretty near getting into a scrape," said Louis, slackening the reins over Dobbin's back.

"Yes, indeed," Guy replied, not yet quite recovered. "But Peter won't get a chance to go off and learn any more new tricks right away."

As soon as they arrived home they made The Twins close prisoners again in the loft. In fact, their performances have since been confined to its limits, and they have been worth a mint of pennies to their owners.

THE MICE AT TEA.

BY PALMER COX.

BY invitation kind and free
Two mice went out one night to tea.
The hostess met them with a smile,
And laid their things away in style.
And soon the table-cloth was spread
With crackers, toasted cheese, and bread;
And when they gathered round the board
The cups of tea were duly poured.
One took a sip, then shook her head,
And setting down the cup, she said,
While looking round, as in a dream,
To find the pitcher holding cream,

"Without a drop of cream, my dear, I'd rather have the water clear."
"Too bad," the hostess made reply;
"But yesterday the cow went dry;
So now I do the best I can,
And carry out another plan:
Until the milk returns once more
I use more sugar than before."
The other guest then laid her bread
Upon the plate, and sadly said,
"A single bite I can not eat
When drinking tea so awful sweet."
"Indeed! I'm sorry that's the case,"
Replied her friend, with sober face.
"That's all the kind of tea I've got—
I sweetened all within the pot."
"Is that the way you make your tea?
Then you should come and visit me,"
The other cried. "It seems a sin
To put the tea and sugar in,
And stir them up while boiling hot."
Why, this is simply soup you've got."

AT TEA.

But when the shadow of the cat
Stole like a cloud across the mat
The argument on tea was dropped,
Their little eyes from sockets popped,
And soon there was a lively race
To see who first could leave the place.
One jumped across two kitchen chairs
And half-way down the cellar stairs;
Another skipped about, and ran
Behind a box and copper pan,
And squeezing through with all her power,
Escaped the danger of the hour.
The third one every effort strained
Until the sink was safely gained,
And lacking pluck to venture out,
Lay hid for days within the spout.
And this all came about, you see,
Through finding too much fault at tea.

RECEIVING THE GUESTS.

With flushing face the hostess spoke:
"Excuse me; I don't see the joke.
You can't give any points to me.
Because, my friend, I've crossed the sea,
And learned the custom, if you please,
From them that know—the Japanese."
"The nasty Japs!" the other cried:
"I thought you had a little pride.
What brought you there, I want to know—
The most outlandish place to go
In all the world to seek advice
Or learn the art of cooking nice."
But while they sat disputing there
The cat came creeping down the stair;
She listened to their chat awhile,
And hardly could suppress a smile.
Said she: "I haven't ate a bite
Since two o'clock on yester-night;
In fact, I scarcely have the strength
To jump a lounge or table's length.
And yet I'd almost do without
To hear this warm discussion out."

THE SURPRISE.

OMEGA, MADISON PARISH, LOUISIANA.

I am a little girl just nine years old, and live, as you may see by my Post-office, in the overflowed part of the State. We are overflowed now, but the water has been down for less than a year as it was last. We had to go up in the loft of our house last year; the water was four feet deep in our rooms. We have kept our cows this year. I help mamma milk. I have seven years old; the other, a baby, is just as sweet and cunning as he can be.

Mamma takes HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE and HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. Brother Will and I like our paper very much, but enjoy Jimmy Brown's pieces most of all. I have no pets except my three dolls; their names are Brenta, Florence, and Lucy.

I must tell you of a dear little vren that has built her nest behind one of the pictures in our sitting-room. Mamma keeps grapes over the picture, and she fastened her nest on the stems. She has little ones now, but I don't know how many, because we are afraid of frightening her away by touching her nest. I study geography, history, grammar, arithmetic, spelling, and writing. M. A. G.

PINE RIDGE AGENCY, DAKOTA.

I am a boy six years old. I have a little baby sister two years old. I live among the Indians. I like our little Indian boys playing with bows and arrows. I bought a bow with four arrows for a dollar and a quarter. I went with mamma to see Chief Red Cloud, who has just come from Washington, and saw some squaws having a dog feast. One of the chiefs gave me a pony, and I named it Lalee, after one of his girls. In taking a long walk to the top of a hill where the Indians have some buffins on the top of the ground I found some wild flowers last Sunday.

I play dominoes and word-game evenings. I go ten cents a week for bringing wood and helping mamma, and am saving my money to buy a velocipede. I like your paper very much. EUGENE A.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEAR POST-MISSRESS,—WE GROWN-UPS ought not to take the space set apart for your little letter-writers, but I must tell you how glad and thankful I was last week, when visiting St. Mary's Hospital, to see Young People's Cot occupied by a dear little invalid girl. I know all the dear children would have rejoiced with me to see the accident that their money is doing.

If any little boy or girl would like to know how to make a pretty needle-book for a charitable fair, I can suggest one. Take two small paper packs (you may buy self-edging ones, or make them yourselves); sketch upon them any pretty device—a flower or Kate Greenaway figure (my little boy drew dogs' heads); cut flannel slips of the same shape (either better than muslin, or pink them out with a scissors); tie these all together, the flannel leaves inside the paper ones, with a bright ribbon run through the thumb-hole of the palette, and you have a very nice and tasteful object for the work-basket.

Is it not time the children began to tell how they are making their gardens? AN OLD FRIEND.

Thanks for this kind letter, and for the writer's interest. Will our little gardeners prove that they have not been idle by sending word about their plants and vegetables, and how they care for them?

*Little Miss Mary, quite contrary. How does your garden grow?"

KALAMAZOO, MICHIGAN.

I'm only six years old, but I want to write to you. I got out my pet. Our cat is named Polong and we had a dog named Fox, and the two used to play together a great deal, and when they got tired would cuddle up on the mat beside each other and go to sleep. One day when I and my sister were visiting at grandpa's in Detroit, and the dog went away. Something must have happened to him, for he never came back. Our horses are called Billy and Bill. One day when I was left after one in Jean Bigelow's "High Tide," besides she has a black face. I had last year an aligator which we brought from Florida, but he is dead now.

This winter papa and mamma took me with them to New Orleans to see the Mardi Gras and the city, and afterward to Cuba, where we saw lions, bears, crocodiles, parrots, and many other strange animals. We went to a plantation and sugar-mill, where we saw the almost-unked slaves standing in the sugar with bare feet while they used a pounder to press it in the hogsheds for shipment to the refinery, where these yellow crystals are made into white sugar.

I must not forget to tell you that while our boat stopped at Key West, colored boys with only a little cloth around the middle of the body were swimming in the water, while people on the boat dropped quarters and dimes into the water to see them dive for them. They hardly ever missed bringing up the pieces of money. If they had not been in their mouths, would call out, "Throw another here, boss." It was fun to watch them.

I have the best volumes of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I think I like "Tolly" best. I think you thought he had found Santa Claus, the best, though all the stories are good. If you print this, perhaps I will write again some day. Of course mamma has to copy it for me.

WILLIE B. McC.

Willie's mother, in a note to the publishers of YOUNG PEOPLE, expresses her approbation of the paper in very cordial words:

I have long thought of writing to thank you for the beautiful wood-cuts (almost like fine engravings) which you send me. They are very beautiful and in so many useful things, such as botany and astronomy and the wonders of the deep, so interesting and instructive to the impressionable mind that I feel the learning of these things is so valuable, and much better than these things are than some of the trashy publications we used to have for children!

GLENDALE, KENTUCKY.

I am a little boy eight years old. I go to school all the time. Papa has a friend who is kind enough to send me YOUNG PEOPLE. I like it very much indeed. Many thanks for his kindness. I have a little sister and a brother, and a dog named Ned. He was a shepherd. Some one poisoned him. We felt so bad about it. I have a mocking-bird; he sings beautifully. I like the letters from the Little ones so much. Your little friend, WILLIE H. C.

ROCKS POINT, NEW YORK.

DEAR POST-MISSRESS,—You will be surprised to hear that when I read the story of the boy who had mamma that Young People's Cot was endowed, and we used send no more money, she said, "Oh, how sorry I am!—not that they have the full sum, but that we have not." I had seen and read my pennies until I should have a dollar, and might have sent it some time ago, but there was still so much needed we thought to be in time. I would like to do for you a good deed. Would it be accepted now? If not, we will send it to the "Tribune Fresh-air Fund."

We think HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE just perfect, so interesting and instructive, so just the thing for the little ones. Mamma says I will never outgrow it, for she and papa like it as well as I do, and I am half past nine. Mamma teaches me to write and I can repeat the Lord's Prayer in French, and recite several psalms and poems nicely. I can not begin music until I have finished my multiplication table. Mamma reads a chapter to us of "Child's Book of Nature," and recites and reads it next day. Can any of the little girls tell why we have two eyes, and two ears, and only one tongue?

I would like to join your cooking club, and will send you a receipt for buns that I make all myself. They are very nice. Will some one please tell me how to make cocoa-nut balls or biscuit? "I would like to tell you all about my dollies, but I have so many, and love them so dearly I should never stop if I once began. I am sorry for the little girls who do not love to play with them. Mamma made a King's Court board for me and I can make a very nice one. I would give a merry time over it. We have never seen a letter from this way. And will you please answer, and tell me if we shall send the money to Miss Faunshaw or to Miss Mary D. Lee at Mamma's.

Little readers, please observe Nance's questions to you, and answer them soon. I would give her the receipt she asks for, but prefer to let the Little Housekeepers tell how they make cocoa-nut balls. Send the receipt for your buns soon.

As the Cot has been paid for, Miss Faunshaw can receive no more money for the fund of which she was kind enough to be the treasurer. No. 367 Catherine at St. Mary's Free Hospital, No. 316 West Thirty-fourth Street, will receive any contributions which children and adults send for the Fresh-air fund of the hospital.

We are pleased to hear that you like the pretty game of King's Court.

WINDOM, MINNESOTA.

I am a little girl who lives away out on the wild prairies of Minnesota. We have a very large natural grove, except around water of some kind. We live on the banks of Willow Lake, so named for the many willows on its shores. We girls, my sisters and I, together with our neighbors' little girls about our own age, formed a club the other day, and the initials are T. T. O. W. Our governess, when trying to guess it, said she thought it must be Teasing Tomboys of Windom. But that is not it. Our badges are going to be steel-colored silk worked with blue silk, and I think they will be quite pretty. Our YOUNG PEOPLE arrives here every Friday afternoon, but we do not get it until Saturday, for then papa comes home, and he brings it with him. Papa takes HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S BAZAR also. Our baby Rita (named for Rita in the Bible) was just a year old on the 1st of this month—April—and is just as sweet as she can be. She's an "April-Fool" baby.

If I wrote all that I wanted to, I'd fill the Post-office Box, I am afraid, so I will say good-bye.

MILLIE K.

What can those letters mean—T. T. O. W.? Tell Tales of Wisdom, perhaps. I am not very clever at guessing, so unless Millie whispers it to me I shall never find out. Well, the secret is part of the pleasure, isn't it, girls?

Although the story which follows is rather longer than those we usually publish in our Post-office Box, it is so very well written that it is due to its author, a little girl only twelve years old, to give it a place here. Valerie may hope, if she keeps on as she has begun, to become a favorite writer for YOUNG PEOPLE at some future day.

THE STORY OF THE WIND.

"Captain, I want a story." So spoke a little maiden, throwing her arms around her uncle's neck, who sat on a rustic bench. She was little Eva, but her uncle called her Puss, because it was his name as a Captain, because until lately he had been Captain of a fine frigate.

"What shall my pay be to-day?" he asked. "Well, Captain," she said, "truly, holding her head on one side and balancing herself on one foot, "I'll speak my new piece."

"You must pay beforehand." "Oh, no, no, no!" "Then I shall keep my story," Mr. Haywood said, feigning anger.

Well, since you are such a baby, I suppose you will excuse your uncle, really holding her forehead visibly, and standing before her uncle with her hands clasped behind her back.

They were in front of a handsome villa, which, with its surrounding grounds, was called Oakland. Scattered over the bottom plantation before them were negroes of all ages and all sizes, and when they saw little Puss with her hands clasped behind her, they knew a "piece" was being preached, and a succession of this said community, with one or two almost in their second childhood, crowded eagerly around her.

Pussy waited until all were quiet, and then commenced in a sweet, childish tone:

"Come, little Leaves," said the Wind one day, "Come o'er the meadows with me and play; Put on your dresses of red and gold—Summer is gone, and the days grow cold. So, little Leaves, come, and let me lead you down they came fluttering one and all—Over the brown fields they danced and flew, Singing the soft little songs that they knew; Dancing and playing, and laughing and shouting, Winter had called them, and they were content.

Soon fast asleep in their earthy beds. The Snow laid a covertlet over their heads."

When she had finished her story, addressing herself to the fat little youngsters around, exclaimed, "Hi, dar, you little black children, w'at you don't here; sho! sho! git out dar."

At this they started on a run for the plantation, followed by old mammy herself.

As soon as Pussy had ended, she ran to her uncle, saying, "Now, Mr. Captain, where's my money? You killed me, and you settled the ruffles of her snowy dress around her."

"Pussy, do you know that the Wind which called the Leaves away, and hid them don't their red and gold, and they don't know it, mammy! I fanned their downy bedclothes from them, and warmed them!"

"Who told you so?" questioned Puss. "So, mammy, my story," was her uncle's reply, and he began:

"One night, while I was a midshipman, I was sent aloft for some slight offense. I took a rest on the cross-benches, and I do not know what it was a bitter cold night, and while I hunched my heavy coat close to my neck I wished that there was no North Wind.

"Oh, what a wicked thing to wish!" interrupted Puss.

"So the North Wind himself seemed to think, for he blew even harder and stronger than before, and this time I felt sharp, and I shivering some. I recognized words. They were these: 'Oh, why do people think so hardly of me?'"

"Hearing this, I exclaimed, 'And why should they think so hardly of me?'"

"This made the Wind stop blowing, and he whispered, 'I will tell you. I was born at the equator. The intense heat made me very thin and light, consequently I rose, and would have fallen from the earth, but you know, I am like a magnet, and attracts everything, so I was saved. Sweeping northward as an upper current, I did no good, but becoming heavier, I sank toward the earth, and was welcomed everywhere as the warm South Wind.

When I reached the Strait of Gibraltar I saw a boy about sixteen years old, the Captain's nephew, on the deck of a ship in harbor. He gazed and stared in open astonishment until one of the crew started for him, walked toward him, and said, as he touched his cap, "If you would become a sailor, sir, you will have to learn to climb. Now you have a good climb the rigging. When he reached the topmast, a sailor who was on the lookout tied him to the mast, and demanded a guinea. This the astonished boy had to do, and then he was released. The Captain, roving from the cabin, laughed heartily, for it was a custom on board that any one climbing the rigging for the first time should pay a golden forfeit. The next I saw some idlers, wrapped in old tattered brown cloaks, and snuoking their little paper cigarettes with evident enjoyment.

When I came to a town to see the Carnival at Bordeaux. The streets were full of merry maskers, and at every corner crowds had gathered around the itinerant ballad-singers, and queer-looking fellows on stilts stalked about where open-eyed children were staring with wonder and amazement at the showman's box. Many other things could I relate of this beautiful sunny France; there, where the grape vine and the silk-worm feeds on the mulberry leaves, I lingered as long as possible.

Then I crossed to England, and there saw a fox hunt among the country, and the Thames filled with foreign ships.

In old Scotland I saw the bonny lassies and the Highlanders in their plaid kilts dance the Highland fling and the hornpipe. I saw the great ice-berg Edward die (travel) until I reached the north pole; then I turned toward the south again, but this time I crossed the western continent. There, while yet in the air, I saw the little Esquimaux children wrapped in furs.

Crossing the United States, I saw a herd of buffaloes being chased by a hunting party of Indians who held their long feathers around their heads, and around their necks strings of glass beads; in their hands they held their bows and arrows, and they rode on spirited horses that seemed to know their duty well. As I went on my way, and along the cotton plant and the sugar-cane fields, and the alligators bask in the sun, I grew warmer, but I still kept enough of my cold air to cool the blood of the fevered and moderate the intense heat of the sun.

But now I am cold—so cold that all hate me; but you will not, will you? I have not the North Wind's medal. But before I could answer, I was called below. I descended to the deck, and heard the cold wind blowing onward."

Mr. Hayward flushed, Pussy thanked him, and he, lifting her on his shoulder, marched into the house.

While Eva was sleeping that night she dreamed that she saw alligators chasing Indians, and the Indians were hugging together, and that a real live Esquimaux was telling her a story.

VALERIE V. B. FRANKEL.

ROSEBUD, IOWA.

I thought I would send you a letter. I can not tell mamma to write this for me. I tell mamma what to say. I am six years old. I have a cat; his name is Tommy. I had a dog once, but he got so old and lame and crippled, and followed around so much, we sent him out in the woods and poisoned him.

I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I like to have mamma read the letters to me. Mamma read all the girl down in Mississippi, and she wanted the pieces of silk, and so I sent her some. I wonder if she got them? I am going to write the Postmistress a letter when I can write. Good-by.

EUGENE D. P.

Probably Lillian W. will write and tell us whether she received the pieces of silk. My little cousin and I others have sent her.

Poor old doggie! How sorry you must have been when he had to be killed, yet it was the truest kindness.

GERMANIA, ALABAMA.

I am a little girl twelve years old, and I have responded to the Young People's paper long time and love it very much. I think "Nan" was the best story that ever was, and Jimmy Brown's too. I have always lived in Cleveland, Ohio, until I moved on the ground now a big black snake. It is all so different. We live in the country, and it is warm, and the trees are green, and we have had flowers for a long time.

When I was doing something that happened last week. Mamma and I were sitting in the parlor, and pretty soon my baby sister, who was on the porch, began to scream, and we ran out, and there on the ground was a big black snake. I screamed, and it ran under the steps. The next day auntie threw some paper behind the logs in the big fire-place it was too warm that day to have fire, and something sprang up and glided away. Auntie screamed, and mamma came running in from the porch and asked what was the matter, and auntie said, "There was a snake, and it was flying in this room now." So they looked, and there it was all coiled up under the table; so they called papa, and he came in, and took a big stick and killed it.

Lots of funny things happen to us here, and if you like my letter I will write some more another time. Mamma says I must not make this one too long.

JULIE V. G.

IRVINGTON-ON-HUDSON, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl nearly five years old. My papa is guiding my hand. I have a little baby brother, but he is sick most of the time; and I am not very well either. I have a good many pets: birds called Toby, Honey-suckle, Surprise, Silver-and-Gold, and Penny; I have also a very handsome peacock, called Adeline because he is so proud, and a lot of chickens and cats. I have a play-room, and lots of toys of all kinds in it, and every time papa and mamma go to the city I always expect them to bring me something, and they generally do. The weather here is just what I like, and the weather would come, so that baby brother and I could play out-doors. I hope this letter is not too long for you to publish.

MABEL D.

Did you ever know a very proud Adeline that you have given that pretty name to the peacock? My Adelines have always been lovely.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am one of the little folks that read your paper every week, and I have noticed so many little boys and girls send you letters that, although I am only five years old, I would like to write also. Not long ago there was such a cold here for jumbles. I gave it to our cook, and she made them for our tea, and, as my little sister says, they were "perfectly lovely." We have them made in the shape of birds, and, as you know, when we have eating them, first we bite off a head, then a foot, and very soon it is all gone.

I would like to know the little girl who sent you this receipt. I could like to have a pattern for a pudding which I could try. And if another little friend could give me a pretty pattern for a silk quilt in the shape of a star, I have been learning to sew during the last year, and now I can sew so nicely that I would like to make something pretty.

LITTLE MAY.

CENTREVILLE, OHIO.

I am a little Canadian boy. I live in a village near the foot of Lake Ontario. In the summer we go down the St. Lawrence River to Central New York, near New Bravelle. It is a beautiful trip, about one hundred and fifty miles. We generally stay from one to two weeks. We pass what is called the Thousand Islands. My favorite stories in your paper are "Stories of the Pearl," "Jimmy Brown's," and "Nan." I have no pets, except my little chickens and two birds. The birds' names are Dick and Polly. I had a fancy for some birds last year, and I am in this spring. Last summer they drowned the dear little things in their dish of water, and this spring pecked them to death.

If Naudin D. of Centreville, or Carolina, will send a sample of the blooms and holls of cotton to me I will be very very glad, as I have never seen cotton except when in cloth.

FRED MARSH.

W. W. C.: The Postmistress is inclined to think your proposal a good one, but would like to wait a little before saying anything about it to the young gentlemen. Your letter is placed on file for reference.—Hattie V. K.: Your home must be lovely, and I have a picture of you in my mind feeding your pigeons and guinea-hens.—Earle J. N.: You have selected a good motto.—Fred N. J.: It is against our rules to publish the full names of our little correspondents, but a message may be sent through the Post-office Text to any one whose letter interests you.—Walter H. L.: Do you mean to be an editor when you grow up?—Florence M. G.: Do be careful how you ride that wild Texas horse. R. B. R. wants somebody to tell him a short and quick way of multiplying five figures by five figures, and six figures by six figures. Arithmetic Class, you may speak, only not all at once, please.—Lillie D.: Your dog was wonderfully kind to the poor hurt pussy; far above those cruel boys, in my opinion, is so wise a dog.—Harry B. Y.: Your letter has a pleasant sound, but it is not quite good enough for publication. Try again.—Sarah F. H.: I am so glad you had so good a time on your birthday.

The following correspondents will please accept thanks for bright little letters: Kate L., Louie Adams W., Margaret B., Elsie E. G. H., Victor J. A. L. R. E. H. W., Hattie R., Mand C., Julius O. G., Helen G. H., and Alice B.—Will the children please notice that their letters can never appear in the next number which they receive after writing to the Post-office Box? They must always wait several weeks for their turn.—Fannie J. M.: The initials N. A. after the name of an artist mean National Academician.—D. K. W.: Follow your own fancy in conducting your party. Read "The May-day Fête at Beverly Hill" in No. 183. It may give you some ideas.—Congratulations to all the dear children who are going after wild flowers. I wish they would show me where the hepaticas, anemones, and violets grow.—Suie M.: We are sorry not to publish your letter of April 29, but if you knew how many similar requests we receive, you would understand why we feel obliged to say no to yours. Your letter is very interesting, and the Postmistress hopes you will not fall to send another soon.

Next week the Little Housekeepers will find in the Post-office Box some hints as to the way to cook for the sick, and also several receipts for dainty dishes to tempt the appetite of an invalid.

DECORATION-DAY—WATCHING THE PROCESSION.—DRAWN BY H. P. WOLCOTT.

"IN FATHER'S PLACE."

(DECORATION-DAY.)

BY MARY D. BRINE.

ONLY a little ragged boy,
 Barefooted, it is true,
 But heaven's golden sunshine lay
 Within his eyes so blue.
 Without the florist's door he stood
 With earnest, wistful face.
 "Got any work, please, sir, that I Can do about the place?"

"It isn't money that I want,
 But I'll work good, you'll see,
 If when I've done, a little bunch
 Of violets you'll give me."
 The florist laughed. "That's cheap enough.
 Here, try your hand at this;
 Since all you want are violets, boy,
 One bunch I shall not miss."

A little later, and the streets
 With uniforms are gay,
 And martial music fills the air
 For Decoration-day.
 The "silent city" reached at last,
 Begins the task of love,
 As soldiers gently scatter flowers,
 Their comrades' graves above.

Then stepped our little lad
 To the humblest grave of all,
 And on it laid a portion of
 His offering so small.
 A soldier asked, "Tell me, my child,
 Why are you here to-day?"
 "I came in father's place, sir, please—
 I could not stay away."

"He was a soldier long ago,
 And he remembered well
 The dark and cruel battle-field
 Where many comrades fell;
 And every Decoration-day,
 Till he got sick an' died,
 In helping deck the soldiers' graves
 He always had a pride."

"An' so, 'cause he is lyin' there,
 An' couldn't come"—the lad
 Here wiped his eyes—"I came to bring
 The only flowers I had.
 I took his place the best I could;
 I hadn't much to give;
 But father would have given more
 If God had let him live."

Oh, tenderly the moon looked down
 That night where slept the dead,
 And lovingly her mantle bright
 Above the graves was spread,
 But long its radiance lingered o'er
 The humblest grave of all,
 Where some kind hand rare flowers had laid
 By Johnny's offering small.

BARBARA'S PINK HAT.

BY JULIA K. HILDRETH.

THE children of Brooklyn look forward to the day of the grand annual Sunday-school parade with delight and excitement. It is a sight well worth seeing: bright-faced boys and girls in their prettiest clothes marching merrily along to the music of the bands, gorgeous silken flags and banners flying, ribbons fluttering, and wafted over all the perfume of thousands of flowers.

Ethel Green and her friend Barbara North belonged to the same Sunday-school, and had been selected to carry the cords of their class banner as a reward for their punctual attendance and good behavior during the year. It was considered a post of honor, and naturally the children were delighted. But it was customary for the cord-bearers to dress alike, and Barbara was very doubtful whether she could match Ethel in any one garment, for her grandmother, with whom she lived, had but a small income, and, besides, held what are called old-fashioned ideas about little girls' dress.

Ethel had never thought of this. So when Barbara had answered that it would be impossible for her to join the procession, she was both astonished and dismayed. When they were alone Ethel asked so many questions, and seemed so hurt and disappointed at her friend's refusal, that at last Barbara said:

"Well, Ethel, if you must know, I can not dress as your mother will dress you, so there's no use thinking any more about it."

"Is that all?" cried Ethel, very much relieved. "I thought it was something a great deal worse. Just tell me what you can wear, and I will ask mamma to dress me the same."

"I can have a white dress," answered Barbara, "for grandmamma said that she would make over for me this summer an embroidered India muslin skirt that she used to wear when she was a girl. But the worst of all is this brown hat. It is new, and quite good enough for me, I suppose; but it certainly will not look well among all the pretty light hats of the other girls. And grandmamma said, when she bought it, 'Take good care of this hat, Barbara; it is fine straw, and must last all summer.'"

"Oh, well!" cried Ethel, "then that's all right. I have a white dress, I know, and I think I have a brown hat."

"That will never do," said Barbara, decidedly. "Let it stand this way—if grandmamma can give me a light hat, I will go. If not, you must find another companion."

"No," answered Ethel, decidedly; "I have made up my mind to stay at home if you do. But when will you know? Remember, this is Monday, and the parade is on Wednesday."

"I shall know to-morrow morning," answered Barbara, as she turned away.

On the following afternoon the girls met in the street near Barbara's house.

"Can you go?" asked Ethel, anxiously.

"Yes," cried Barbara, with sparkling eyes. "Last night I told grandmamma about the hat, and, do you know, she said you were a good self-sacrificing little girl to be willing to give up wearing your handsome clothes for me, and that she would not try your friendship too far. Then she gave me this," and Barbara drew from her pocket a crisp new five-dollar bill. "I am to buy a hat with it—choose it myself, for grandmamma is busy finishing my white dress. Will you come with me to the milliner's?"

"Yes," cried Ethel, eagerly. "I can go if I can take Ida along. Mother and Aunt Nelly have gone out, and Ida would cry dreadfully if I should leave her."

"Let her come, of course," answered Barbara. "Now here's the milliner's card. This is where grandmamma always buys her bonnets—Madame Fanchon. It's in Fulton Street, near the ferry."

A short walk brought them to Fulton Street, where they saw Madame Fanchon's great gold-lettered sign directly before them.

Barbara and Ethel were soon busy examining the wonderful array of beautiful goods. After peeping into nearly every box and drawer in the store, madame brought out a hat which Ethel declared was exactly similar to hers. Cream-white straw, lined with pale pink silk, and trimmed with apple blossoms.

"Oh!" said Barbara, in a subdued tone of delight and admiration. "I never saw anything quite so beautiful."

The hat was soon deposited in a bandbox and delivered to Barbara. Then they turned to look for Ida, whom they had left to amuse herself at the window. To their dismay she was gone.

The two girls hastened into the street and looked about them. Presently they caught a glimpse of Ida trotting briskly along toward the ferry.

"There she is!" cried Ethel. "I do hope she will not try to cross the street."

"There is always a great crowd in Fulton Street about six o'clock; so the girls had a difficult time of it, dodging between the people, to keep the little figure flitting before them in sight. Suddenly Barbara, who was a little the taller, gave a sharp cry, and darted forward. Then Ethel knew at once that some accident must have happened to her little sister, and grew dizzy and faint. But recovering herself almost immediately, she ran on in the direction which Barbara had taken, and soon found herself near a group of people collected on the curb-stone.

"Is she hurt?" cried Ethel, trying frantically to force her way through the crowd.

"But all were too busy talking to notice her.

"Did you ever see such presence of mind?" said one.

"Wonderful! wonderful!" answered his companion.

"A brave, bright girl!" said another.

"Please, please, move and let me go to her," pleaded Ethel, tugging at the speaker's coat.

"Well, little girl," said the gentleman, "what do you want?"

"I want to see her," answered Ethel, lifting a pair of wet eyes and a very frightened face up to his. "She is my sister."

"Your sister?" exclaimed he. "Here, take my hand, and we will find her in a jiffy."

The man forced his way through the crowd, and Ethel found herself face to face with Barbara, who looked troubled and embarrassed.

At the same moment a large, good-natured-looking woman came forward with Ida in her arms.

"Now, children," said she, "the little lass is all right. There's nothing in life the matter with her, barring a big scare. So keep hold of her hand tight, and run home."

"Thank you," answered Ethel, gratefully, as she flung her arm around Ida's neck, and kissed her tear-stained cheek.

"Please come, Ethel," whispered Barbara, impatiently. As Ethel turned to comply she noticed that her friend was empty-handed.

"Where is your new hat?" inquired Ethel.

"There," answered Barbara, pointing to the centre of the street.

And there it certainly was, but its beauty had departed forever. The delicate straw was broken, and the silk and flowers crushed into a soiled heap. More than twenty vehicles had passed over it since it was flung there by the girl's own hand.

When Barbara started forward with a cry she had seen little Ida step off the sidewalk, and try to cross the street. When she reached the spot she found that the child had fallen directly before a large dray, and was completely surrounded by wagons. To save her Barbara was obliged to pass under the poles of several carts and carriages, which she did without hesitation. Then lifting Ida to her feet, she turned to retrace her steps, but found that the way had become blocked, and just behind her a pair of horses had grown so restive as to be almost beyond their driver's control. The man shouted to her to move out of the way, and just as she began to fear that they would certainly be run over, the driver of one of the wagons stooped from his high seat, and cried:

"Hand me the young one. Step on the hub. Be spry, now."

Barbara could not lift Ida encumbered as she was with the bandbox; so without hesitation she flung it down, and quickly followed the man's directions. When Ida was safe she gave one lingering look at the once pretty piece of finery. A horse's hoof had crushed the box and bonnet into an almost unrecognizable mass.

Barbara and Ida were passed on from one vehicle to another, until they were safely deposited upon the sidewalk.

"You dear, good girl!" said Ethel, as they slowly made their way toward home. "How can I thank you enough! You should have heard how every one was praising your presence of mind and bravery."

"Please don't say any more about it," replied Barbara. "I only did just what any one would have done."

"But I am so sorry about your beautiful new hat!" continued Ethel. "What will your grandmamma say? And to think it is all my fault for not watching Ida better! Oh dear, it's just too bad!"

As they turned toward home the three faces were all very sad, and no one would have known them for the happy party that met on the corner only a few short hours before.

"I will tell mamma or Aunt Nelly at once," thought Ethel, as she entered the house. "Perhaps there is yet time to buy another bonnet for Barbara."

Just as she opened the door, Hannah, her mother's servant, came hurrying toward her with a telegram.

"This is for your aunt," said she, "and I'm thinking you had better open it; for Miss Nelly stopped in a short time ago and said she was going to a concert this evening. So she would not be back till late, and the message may be particular."

"Then I suppose I ought to open it," said Ethel, doubtfully.

"Yes, miss, I think you should."

Ethel opened the telegram, and read aloud:

"NELLY.—Take charge of the children. I shall be detained very late.
C. GREEN."

This was a dreadful delay, but nothing was to be done except to wait patiently.

The evening passed slowly. Bed-time came, and Hannah insisted that both children should go to bed.

So Ethel undressed, and lay wide awake, thinking, until a distant church clock struck eleven; then, after a while, she heard a carriage drive up and Aunt Nelly go to her own room.

Ethel could lie still no longer, so she ran up after Aunt Nelly, and peeped into the door.

"Who's that?" said Aunt Nelly.

"It is only I," answered Ethel. "I knew you could not be asleep yet, and I want to tell you something."

"Very well; I am ready to listen. Come in, dear."

It was so pleasant to have some one to confide her troubles to that Ethel told her story quickly.

When she had finished, Aunt Nelly said:

"What a dear, good, brave girl Barbara North is! I don't wonder you love her. She certainly must not be disappointed. I will make her another hat."

"But the parade begins to form at half past seven," said Ethel.

"Yes, I know," answered her aunt. "Now go to bed and try to sleep. I promise Barbara's hat shall be finished in time."

She spoke so decidedly that Ethel ran back to her own room, and was soon sleeping so peacefully that she did not awake until the sun shone full in her eyes.

"What's the matter?" asked Ida, as Ethel sprang suddenly out of bed.

"I told Aunt Nelly about Barbara's hat last night, and she promised to make her another one this morning, so I am going to call her."

"And I'll come too," said little Ida.

They dressed hurriedly, and scampered off to Aunt Nelly's room. But, early as it was, they found her putting the last stitches to a beautiful cream-colored straw hat, lined with pink, and trimmed with apple blossoms.

"It is the very same," cried both children at once.

"No," said Aunt Nelly; "this is my last summer's hat made over. These flowers I wore in my dress last night, and this pink silk is one of my sashes. But don't speak until it is finished.”

So the children kept very still, Ethel leaning on the back of a chair that stood before Aunt Nelly, and Ida, with her elbows on the seat, watching Aunt Nelly's nimble fingers with delighted and astonished eyes.

At last the wonderful bonnet was finished. Ethel gave her aunt a kiss, called her the “dearest little aunty that ever lived,” and hastened with it to Barbara.

The day was lovely, the parade a success, and of all the happy faces Barbara's and Ethel's were the happiest.

After this the two girls became even firmer friends than ever. And although Barbara has had many new bonnets since then, she still keeps a little faded pink hat among her other treasures.

CORAL REEFS.

“NOW, then,” said Captain Sammy, sternly, “when you boys went off I told you that when you came back you was to tell me what caused the Florida reefs, the like of which can't be found anywhere else in the country, didn't I?”

“Yes, sir,” replied Dare; “but we don't know now any better than we did when we started.”

“Why didn't you look at them, an' find out, as we was comin' along?” asked the little man, with a suppressed chuckle, as if he was having a great joke all by himself.

“I don't think the keys look different from any island.”

said Dare, who almost began to think that Captain Sammy knew no more about the matter than they did.

“That's just because you don't know anything about it,” said the little man, triumphantly.

Inasmuch as the boys quite agreed with him in this assertion, they said nothing, and he was disappointed if he had thought he was going to provoke an argument.

“Now listen to me,” and Captain Sammy straightened himself up in order that his words might be more impressive. “I know all about it without any book, but I'll just keep one in my hand as I go along, for since my eyesight's got so bad I can't hold on to some of these names as I used to.

In the first place, the Florida reefs don't run up the coast this way, though some folks hold that all the keys and reefs along the coast should be reckoned in with 'em, but in that I have my opinion and you can have yours. The Florida reef, the way we call it down here, starts from a little north of Cape Florida, an' runs some miles beyond Key West. All that is one big bank of coral, with here an' there spots where it's been built high enough to come atop of the water, an' then the sand washes up on it, the mangrove-trees grow, an' then they're keys like them you can see out there in the offing.”

Captain Sammy stopped long enough to assure himself that the boys were paying strict attention, and then continued:

“The reef runs in a regular curve, croppin' out just a little here an' there, from Virginia Key, which is next to Cape Florida—an' everybody knows the cape is on Key Biscayne—to a little west of the Marquesas, where it opens up in Reef Channel an' Key West Harbor. Then it runs nigh on to sixty miles sou'-sou'-west, an' then about a hundred an' forty miles west-sou'-west, perhaps a little more westerly, but that's neither here nor there. Then for about thirty miles it runs west-nor'-west, taking in the Tortugas. Now you keep them p'int's of the compass in your mind in case you should ever want to coast around that way, an' you an' I won't have any trouble.”

Captain Sammy glared over his glasses in order to learn if there was any chance for trouble then, and finding that there was none, he said, solemnly:

“Now of course these reefs are bein' built all the time, an' what you want to know is how that's done. Here goes for the way these scholars put it, an' you can have your 'pinion 'bout it, an' I can have mine. A reef is a regular limestone wall that a leetle animal they call polyps have built, by sucking in the water that has got lime in it, and throwing the lime out on to the places where they want to build. These leetle animals can't work where the water's more'n fifteen fathom deep, so you see they have to curve around just as the land curves. Now they go to work and build great knobs—coral heads we sailors call 'em—all the way around in this fifteen fathom of water, an' they keep p'ilin' 'em up till they are about six fathoms from the surface. There they stop, for they're sharp, these little polyps are, an' they know that they can't work when they come just so near the surface. Then another kind, pretty near like them, that can't work except in shallow water, come along an' build on top the coral heads another kind of stone. Then the third sort of little fellows come an' put on the finishing touches just at the top of the water, making the coral that fine and delicate that it looks like leaves an' grass."

* Begin in No. 175, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

The little man stopped only long enough to wipe his glasses, and then continued:

"Now, you see, this reef is a regular limestone wall, straight up an' down to seaward, an' sloping toward the land. Well, in time the waves grind the coral that's on the top into sand; then the mud that's in the water washes up, and, take everything together, it makes tolerable good soil. All the mangrove-trees around about shed the most part of their seeds in the water, because, you see, growing over it, they can't help themselves, an' the seeds float around till some of them get washed up on to these reefs. Once they get into that sand they grow, an' that settles it so far as the reefs go, for then folks or turtles can live on 'em, an' they're keys. Now that's the way the books have it that the reefs an' keys are made, an' if I should happen to have a different opinion to that, you see you ain't bound to take it that I'm right, because you an' I never had a reg'lar introduction to each other."

The boys were at a loss to understand how the absence of an introduction could affect a fact, and they urged Captain Sammy to give them his idea of the formation of the reefs, or, at least, how it differed from that which he had stated as coming from "books."

But the little man was so decided in his refusals, and so guarded in his replies to any of the questions intended to draw him out, that they soon came to the conclusion that his opinions did not differ in any way from those of the authorities he had quoted.

"You see there's a good deal more about this end of this snug little State that you ought to know," said Captain Sammy, as he laid aside his pipe, which had long since "gone out," took off his glasses, and closed his book with a bang that caused the boys to jump; "but I sha'n't tell you about it now, for it will keep until we run on to it, and, besides, I want you to go to bed now, so we can make an early start in the morning."

By the way Captain Sammy spoke the boys knew that there was no use in trying to prolong the conversation, and they crept into their berths, feeling that an hour after sunset was altogether too early to go to bed on the first day of the cruise.

CHAPTER XV.

THE NIGHT ALARM.

THE Pearl lay as motionless as if she was yet high and dry on the beach at Tampa, and there appeared to be no reason whatever why all hands should not have a comfortable and quiet night's rest. The night was cold enough to make the warmth of the bedclothes feel comfortable to the occupants of the cabin, but not so cold as to prevent the cabin door from being left open to admit a free circulation of air.

It seemed to Dare that it must have been midnight when he was awakened by hearing Captain Sammy shout angrily,

"Now what are you about? Why don't you lie still and give other folks a chance to sleep?"

Dare supposed, of course, that Charley or Bobby had gotten up. Bobby had the berth above Captain Sammy, and Charley slept in the one above Dare, therefore the latter put his hand up to his brother's berth in order to learn if it was he who had disturbed the little man's repose.

But Charley was not the one who had broken the quiet of the cabin, for as Dare touched his face he cried out,

"Don't fool; let a fellow alone, can't you?"

"Don't fool!" echoed Captain Sammy, unable to see what was going on, and supposing Charley was the culprit who had awakened him. "It's no fooling matter to kick up such a row in the night, and I'll let you know that I'm not fooling."

"What—what—what's the matter?" asked Charley, in surprise.

"What's the matter?" roared Captain Sammy, growing so angry that he tried to sit upright in his berth, and hit his head against the boards above him with a thump that startled Bobby. "I want to know what you're skylarkin' round for at this time of night?"

"I ain't skylarking," said Bobby, roused from his sleep by the thumping of the little man's head against the berth, and thinking, of course, that he was spoken to. "Was I snoring, sir?"

"Hold your tongue until you are spoken to," roared the Captain; to which Bobby answered, meekly,

"Yes, sir."

All three of the boys now began to think that some dreadful thing had happened, and that one of the others was responsible for it, while Captain Sammy was in such a towering rage that he could hardly explain himself.

"Now see if you have got sense enough left to tell me what you were parading around the cabin for at this time of night?" he roared out.

"Whom are you speaking to?" asked Dare, almost beginning to think the Captain had lost his senses.

"Why you, of course. Who else should I speak to?"

"IT'S ME—TOMMY TUCKER—AN' I'M AWFUL HUNGRY!"

cried the little man, as he tried in vain to light a match.

"I haven't been out of bed since I got into it," replied Dare, gravely.

There was perfect silence in the cabin for a moment, during which Captain Sammy succeeded in lighting the lamp, and then he angrily surveyed the cabin.

Each one of the boys was in bed, and there were no evidences of their having been up since they first went to sleep.

Captain Sammy had hopped out of bed on one leg, and now, after seeing what seemed to be proof that the boys had been doing nothing worse than sleeping soundly, he hopped back to his berth, strapped on his wooden stick, and stumped out to the engine-room, where the boys could hear him accusing Rogers of having come in to disturb the sleep of the occupants of the cabin.

Rogers denied having done anything of the kind, but scolded at the little man for having awakened him, when he had probably been dreaming of a disturbance.

Captain Sammy growled out some inaudible reply, and came back into the cabin looking less angry and more mystified than when he left it.

He put out the lamp and got into bed, insisting that he did hear some one, although the proof he had should have convinced him that he was mistaken.

It was some time after this before any of them could get to sleep; but after a while they dropped off into slumber, until Dare was the only one awake.

Just as his eyes were closing, and he had nearly yielded to the same influence, he was conscious of a rustling sound as if some one was moving near him.

He turned over quickly in alarm, and was about to cry out when a hand was laid over his mouth, and the intruder whispered softly in his ear,

"It's me—Tommy Tucker—an I'm awful hungry."

Dare was so surprised that he could not have spoken even if Tommy's hand had not been over his mouth. He understood now that Captain Sammy had really heard some one in the cabin, but how it could possibly be Tommy Tucker was more than he could make out. He was trying to understand it all when the boy whispered again,

"I'm awful hungry."

"But how did you get here?" Dare asked, as soon as he could remove Tommy's hand from his mouth.

"I hid under Captain Sammy's berth this mornin' when you was all eatin' your breakfast. I didn't know he was comin' with you, an' I knew he wouldn't let me come if he knew it; so I thought I'd hide there till you started. I've been in that little mite of a place since mornin', an' I'm 'most dead."

"SCALES AND ARPEGGIOS."

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

"WHAT I want to hear from you," said Von Bülow to a young lady who applied to him for instruction, "is a scale and an arpeggio."

The young lady played the scale of E minor,* and the chord of a flat in arpeggio. Again and again she had to repeat them, each time following some special instruction from the master, and at the end of half an hour she found herself doing them in a manner altogether new to herself, and certainly very much better than she had ever done them before. That half-hour's experience, it seems to me, was invaluable, for it taught her that even when a thing seems to be well done it can always be improved upon, and that the scale she felt so simple a performance really meant a great deal more than young students think.

I have heard elderly ladies say that when they were taught music, forty years ago, for instance, the amount done was almost the only thing ever considered. They rattled off so many scales an hour, practiced the "Battle of Prague," or the "Dew-drop Waltz" another hour, and really felt themselves quite brilliant musicians. But in those days only professional players really studied.

I do not want to say anything against our grandmamas' sincerity, but certainly musical study was not then in any way a fine art. Girls at school or under a governess "took" it, just as they all "took" drawing lessons. Is there any household, I wonder, where souvenirs of the past are cherished without some pictures of large flat-looking flowers on pasteboard, or without a music-book full of old-fashioned, and I regret to say painfully unclassical, music? Unfortunately young people of to-day "take" music very much too often in much of this old martian spirit, but happily such rarely perform after they leave school. The students whose music is nowadays considered worth anything is the student who thinks and feels and is patient.

I suppose no question in musical instruction is more difficult than that of a proper selection of exercises or studies. After and with the five-finger practice must come the scales and some fitting study, and I have heard from the very best masters that what may be called a "jumble" is of all things most ruinous to style and correctness.

"I study twenty different kinds of exercises," I heard a young miss remark to a friend.

"Oh," exclaimed the other, with a look of the greatest admiration, "and I have only five!"

I felt as if I should like to have tested the playing of those two young people comparatively.

Of course every school or conservatory has its own ideas, and I am sure my young readers could tell me of fifty different and perhaps equally excellent methods of teaching used by their different teachers, but the main points, if successful, must be the same; and of course our object is not to teach; rather is it to help the teacher by a little outside impetus—something to make study seem a little more entertaining and worth while.

The best foreign masters, I think, recommend for études, or exercises, Cramer, Czerny, Moscheles, Gradus, and Hummel, but Czerny much more carefully studied than most young students think necessary; and, for strengthening the playing, most emphatically dear old Bach. A very famous young pianist told me that she made the most careful study of Czerny and Bach, and never found herself able to play in public without going through beforehand half an hour of the simple "five-finger" and half an hour of Bach; then a third half-hour of her old friend Czerny in one of his études de vélocité.

Now it seems to me, for an every-day rule of musical practice, one could hardly do better than follow Mademoiselle G—'s rule, only I would enjoy better giving fifteen minutes at a time to the five-finger, and fifteen to each of the others, alternating between Bach and the five-finger. If one adopts a regular system of practice, there is such a satisfaction in feeling one is doing something thoroughly. I think the only striking advantage in studying in a conservatory is that one must do things slowly and systematically; but any young student at home, and with a good teacher, may do this, if the mind and heart and will only can be made to act together. Three months of Czerny might be replaced by three months of Moscheles, and so lay the foundations for Chopin, which is an admirable study, even as a study, and for Beethoven, whose music can always be divided and subdivided as studies for a student of almost any age.

Although study with a view to making music a "career" is different in one sense from study simply for love of it as an art and a personal resource, yet the same guiding rules must be the same, and the young student who says to herself, "Oh, but I never should want to play in public!" ought to work with the same spirit as the one who looks forward to a public life, the only difference being in the time bestowed upon it. If for a professional future six and eight hours a day are required, besides a complete musical life, but two hours a day well employed can work wonders with the amateur student, and with what a feeling of joyful possession does not such a one reach a day when she can really interpret the master's meaning! It ought never to be considered in the light of an accomplishment, only as an art to be acquired for itself, and for the joy there is in acquiring and possessing it. If you do not feel that your music will make you yourself happy, even though you were alone and never to be heard, then do not try to pursue it. Be very certain that no one will care for what you can do in it.

On the other hand, there are many people who for some reason—usually a defective touch or lack of proper feeling for music—can never become executants; yet such a one can nearly always derive the greatest profit and enjoyment from the theoretical study of music. I often wonder why this is not considered a necessary study, independent of musical performance, just as other sciences are taught, for by this means you can open up a whole field of thought and enjoyment.

Listening to music becomes another and newer delight, and, besides, you can be in possession at least of the science of one of the noblest arts. The best composers have by no means been the best performers; indeed, the very reverse has often been the case, and some of the very best teachers abroad play but indifferently well; that is, the best teachers of technique, for when people speak of taking lessons from Liszt, or Rubinstein, or Bilow, etc., it usually means only playing pieces the notes of which they have learned for these great masters, who correct their style and offer suggestions.

Music as a theory requires, no doubt, years of study before the whole, or even the suggestion of the whole, is attained; but a great deal that is very satisfactory may be learned in a much shorter time; and to the young student who feels no "instinct" for performance let me suggest fifteen or twenty minutes a day of "theory": perhaps it may develop the lacking instinct; at all events, if persevered in, it must lead to much satisfaction in hearing and understanding the music on all sides of us to-day.

THOR'S JOURNEY TO JOTUNHEM.

BY JAMES BALDWIN.

CHAPTER II.

FOR a whole day Thor and his two young companions wandered in the forest, and yet they met not a single person, nor saw, indeed, a single living creature. At night, foot-sore and hungry, they sought some place where they might lie down and rest, for the dinner bag which Thialfe carried was empty, and they must needs go supperless to bed. Just as they were about to give up all hopes of finding shelter they spied what seemed to be a large brown house without a single window, and with but one great door as wide as the building itself. As they proceeded it seemed to be entirely empty, and when they entered they found no chairs nor beds, nor, indeed, any furniture at all. On their left was a great round empty room, upon the floor of which they lay down; and as they were very tired, they soon fell asleep.

How long they slept they did not know, but they were awakened by an earthquake which shook the forest, and threatened to tumble the house down upon their heads. When the earthquake was over, a loud and harsh rumbling and roaring continued to be heard, and this was kept up until the dawn of day.

As soon as it was light enough to see, Thor went out and looked around. Under a great oak-tree he saw a giant lying asleep; and he knew then that the noise they had heard in the night was but the snoring of this huge monster. While Thor stood gazing at him in wonderment the giant awoke, and rubbed his eyes, and lazily arose. Then Thor was mightily amazed, for of all the giants he had ever seen this one surpassed them all. Far up to the very tree-tops, whose branches were among the clouds, the giant towered, and puny Thor could scarcely reach as high as his ankle. Yet the Thunderer was not afraid. He looked up at the great giant, whose face was hidden in the mists of the morning, and called out,

"Good giant, tell me thy name, I pray."

The giant answered in hoarsest thunder-tones:

"My name is Skrymer; but I know who thou art, without asking thee. Thou art Thor; for nobody else would dare to come unbidden into the giants' country. By-the-way, I see before you one of my mittens which I lost last evening."

And he reached down with his great hand and took up the house in which Thor and his comrades had passed the night; for it was, indeed, nothing but the giant's mitten, and the chamber where they had slept was but the thumb of the mitten.

"Where is little Asa-Thor going with his two little servants?" asked Skrymer, in tones of mock gentleness.

"I am going to the castle of Utgard-Loke, the King of Jotunhem," answered Thor.

"How would you like for me to go with you and show you the way?" asked the giant.

Thor readily accepted the giant's offer, for he had not the remotest idea where the great castle of Utgard-Loke was, nor in what direction he should go to find it.

Skrymer kindly shared his food with the three travellers, and after they had eaten a hearty breakfast they set out on their journey. All day long they jogged onward through the forest, the giant striding before, and never making the slightest pause. At sunset they halted under a wide-spreading oak, and Skrymer at once lay down to sleep, saying to Thor,

"Take the bag that holds my food, and when you have opened it, help yourselves to what you find in it. I want no supper for myself."

Thor took the bag, and they went to a neighboring grove, where they tried with all their skill and patience to open it. But the more they pulled at the strings the tighter they became, nor could they unloose a single knot. For a whole hour Thor worked with the stubborn bag. At last his good nature as well as his patience entirely gave out. He dropped the bag upon the ground, and seized his hammer in both hands, and in a very angry mood walked over to the place where the giant Skrymer was sleeping. Thor raised his hammer high in air, and then struck him upon the head with all his might.

The giant yawned and opened his eyes, and when he saw Thor standing near him he said:

"My dear little Asa-Thor, are you still up? Why don't you find a soft quiet place and lie down to sleep? I have been having a very pleasant nap; but just now something fell upon my head and waked me. I think it must have been a leaf from the branches of this old tree."

"I am just making ready to go to sleep," answered Thor, and he tried to hide his hammer under his cloak.

Thor went back to the grove where he had left Thialfe and Roska, and as they could not get at the food in the bag, they made up their minds that they must go to bed supperless again. But Skrymer snored so loudly that not one of them could sleep. At about midnight Thor's wrath waxed so great that he could bear it no longer. He seized his hammer again, and running quickly to the giant, struck him a most fearful blow upon the top of the head, so that the hammer sank into his skull clear up to the handle.

Skrymer jumped up quickly and scratched his head, and cried out:

"What is the matter now? It is very strange that I can not be allowed to sleep. The acorns keep falling from this tree, and just now one struck me square upon the head. How goes it with you, Asa-Thor? Have you been asleep?"

"I have been sleeping as soundly as I could," answerstreaks of dawn were seen in the east that he settled himself and recommenced his snoring. Then Thor crept slyly up to him, and swung his hammer with all his might, and struck him full upon the temples, and the heavy steel sank out of sight in the giant's brain.

Skrymer sat up and stroked his long beard, and said:

"How short the night has been! Here it is already daylight, and it seems as if I had hardly slept at all. There must be birds flying through the tree-tops, for I was awakened by a piece of bark falling upon my head. How did you rest last night, good Asa-Thor?"

"Not so well as one might wish, kind giant," answered Thor; "yet as soon as I awoke I hurried over to ask about yourself, for I heard you groaning in the night, and feared that you were sick."

"I am not so well as I might be," said Skrymer.

"But I am still able to travel. I think it is about time that you were making ready to start, for the road to Utgard's eastle is long and rough. I shall be obliged to leave you here, for the eastle is east of us, and I must go on toward the north. But before we part let me tell you something. When you come before Utgard-Loke don't boast about what you can do, for there are many big men there. You think that I am tall, but I am a mere child by the side of some of the Utgard folk. They will not think much of such little fellows as you. So, above all, beware of bragging."

Having said these words, Skrymer slung his dinner bag over his shoulder and set out with long strides toward the north.

Thor and his two comrades turned their steps eastward, and in a short time came to a broad highway which they followed. About noon they reached the outskirts of a broad plain. In the plain they saw a large castle, the towers of which rose above the clouds. Thor knew that this must be the palace of Utgard-Loke, the Giant King of Jotnheim. He now pushed rapidly forward; but although the eastle seemed quite near, it was late in the afternoon before the walls of the huge fortress were reached. The wide moat was full of water, and the single draw bridge was down. But when they had crossed the bridge and come to the great gate they found it shut and locked.

For a long time Thor beat lustily upon the gate; and they all cried out as loud as they could for the porter to open and let them in. But no one seemed to hear or heed them. At last, when the sun was almost down, they became so impatient that they could wait no longer; and they climbed up to the key-hole and crept through it, and, one by one, dropped quietly into the court-yard below. The gate-keeper, who was a very large giant, sat on his bench fast asleep, and they hurried past him without being heard or seen.

ed Thor; "but hearing you complain, and fearing that something might ail you, I came over to ask how you were resting. Now I will go back. Good night!"

"Good night!" said the giant.

Thor went back to his place, but he still felt very angry with Skrymer, and he thought that if he could but strike the giant again he would put an end to him. But Skrymer seemed to be wakeful; and it was not until the red

WAITING FOR SUPPER

A QUEER KIND OF HOLIDAY.

BY DAVID KEEL.

"FINE day we've got for it—eh, Bob?"

"First-rate, old fellow; and the wind all in our favor, too. I say, let's stand out to sea a bit; it's no fun dodging about the coast this way."

They were young sailors who spoke thus. Neither could have been above fourteen; and in 1742 the eastern coast of England was very different from what it is now in 1883. Light-houses were few and far between. Sunken rocks and shoals, not yet set down on any chart, abounded all along the coast. Worse still, the savage fellows that haunted the shore, and lived upon the plunder of wrecked vessels, thought nothing of showing false lights to lure a storm-beaten ship to her doom, or of quieting with a timely knock on the head any one who might have survived to dispute their right to her cargo.

But all this did not trouble Bob and Jim in the least. They were out for a day's sport, and a day's sport they meant to have, come what might. Young as they were, it was not the first time they had taken a boat out to sea in rough weather; and when Jim, taking the tiller, shouted to Bob to "let go the sheet," and they felt themselves flying over the water like sea-birds, both boys fairly shouted with delight.

"When I'm a man," cried Bob, "and have money enough, I'll be a pilot, and have a craft of my own, and cruise about all day on the lookout for jobs."

"And I'll be Captain of a frigate," added Jim, "and sail all round the world, into all sorts of places where nobody's ever been."

For two or three hours the young sailors were perfectly happy; but at length Jim said, rather seriously:

"Hadh'n't we better put her about? I can hardly see the shore, and you know we promised Sam to bring the boat back before dark."

"Just one half-hour more," pleaded Bob; "we don't have a cruise like this every day."

Away they went again; but meanwhile the breeze had freshened to a strong wind, which was fast rising into a gale. The dancing ripples had turned into white, leaping waves, one of the hugest of which burst suddenly over the gunwale, drenching both lads to the skin.

Jim's clear gray eyes were bright and fearless as ever, but his firm lips were set, while even the reckless Bob began to look serious.

"I—I think we'd better put about," faltered he.

"Too late," replied Jim, decisively; "all we can do now is to keep her before the wind. If this wind don't change, the next land we shall see (provided we see land again) will be the coast of Holland."

"Pleasant!" sputtered Bob, ruefully, as another wave filled his eyes and mouth with brine. "I wish I'd let you turn when you wanted to."

"Never mind, old boy; it can't be helped now. Catch hold of this bit of bread and red herring; we shall want all our strength before long."

They did so, indeed. A few minutes later a furious squall burst upon the devoted boat. Before Bob's numbed fingers could obey Jim's shout of "Down with the sail!" the gale struck her with its full force. The light mast snapped like a stick of sealing-wax, down came yard and sail with a rattle, and the hampered boat careened till the sea poured into her like a cataract.

How Jim managed to get forward and cut away the wreck he never knew. But the boat righted at last, and they began to bale her out, having first lashed the helm amidships to keep her steady.

Afternoon waned into evening, and evening deepened into night—a night that seemed endless to the forlorn boys, now wholly at the mercy of wind and wave. About an hour after midnight a deluge of rain burst upon them, showing that the storm was near its end, and they hailed the favorable sign with a cheery hurrah. But the next moment Bob shouted frantically,

"Port your helm! here's—"

Before he could finish, a huge black shadow seemed to start up over them right out of the sea. There was a tremendous shock and a deafening crash, and their shattered boat went down like a stone into the depths of the sea, leaving them clinging convulsively to a tangled mass of cordage.

"I say!" cried Jim, who was the first to reach the deck of the vessel against which they had been dashed, "this is 'out of the frying-pan into the fire.' The old tub's half full of water, and there's not a soul on board!"

"Isn't there?" shouted Bob, bending his head eagerly forward. "Listen!"

Sure enough, at that very moment a faint knocking was heard right under their feet, and a feeble cry of "Help!"

"There's some fellow shut in here," cried Jim, pointing down the after-hatchway, which was quite choked with broken spars and fragments of wreck. "Bear a hand, Bob, and we'll soon have him out of that."

The hatchway was speedily cleared of rubbish, a door at its foot flung open, and a man, gasping and gurgling as if strangled, fell forward into their arms. They dragged him up into the fresh air, and he began to revive at once, although it was some time before he could speak. While Bob was attending to him Jim examined the condition of the vessel. The foremast was still standing, but the main and mizzen masts had gone by the board, and the planking on the starboard-quarter was completely stove in, while the hold was nearly full of water. The only comforting facts were that the wind had fallen, and that the sea was evidently going down likewise.

"He'll do now," said Bob, coming up. "I've propped him against a spare sail, and he says he'll be all right presently. He tells me his name is Crossley, and that he's a rich merchant homeward-bound to London from the Baltic. When they took to the boats he ran down to get some money or something, and those timber fell and blocked him in, and the crew went off without him."

"Well, look here," cried Jim; "this craft's loaded with timber, so that she's not likely to sink; and I don't believe she's leaking either, or the water in her would be a deal higher. Let's try the pumps and see."

To work they went, and were soon joined by Mr. Crossley, who, now that his faintness had worn off, did as much work as both of them together. After a long spell of pumping Bob went to "try the well," and returned with the good news that the water had fallen six inches.

"Bravo!" cried Jim; "we'll pump her dry in a few hours at this rate, for it's only the after-hold that's been filled. Let's look about for something to eat, and then at it again."

After some search they rummaged out a biscuit chest and a small cask of water still unharmed by the sea. While they were eating, a faint gleam of light began to show itself in the east.

"Hollo!" cried Bob; "I thought this was supper, and it turns out to be breakfast. Look alive, mates; the sun 'll be on deck soon, and he musn't catch us skulking."

At it they went again, and by sunrise the ship was so much lightened and the sea so calm that the three worn-out workers thought they might venture upon a nap. When Jim awoke again the sun was well above the horizon.

"Bob," cried he to his chum, who opened his eyes at that moment, "here's a breeze getting up from the east. Now if we can only manage to get some sail upon the old craft, I think we'll find our way home yet."

Bob and Mr. Crossley were on their feet in a twinkling, and the three set to work to make sail. The foremast and jib-boom being still sound, they succeeded—not without some difficulty—in hoisting the jib and foretopsail. Then Jim went to the helm, while his crew of one man and a boy stood ready to obey his orders. For even in this first boyish adventure of one who afterward became so famous he seemed already to command and be obeyed quite as a matter of course.

The breeze freshened, and the lightened ship went pretty rapidly through the water. All that day she ran before the wind on a westerly course, and just about night-fall our three voyagers saw the distant coast of England looming shadow-like along the horizon.

"Thank God!" said the merchant, drawing a long breath.

"We haven't made such a bad voyage, after all," laughed Jim. "We went out in a boat, and we're coming back in a ship. I'm sorry for poor old Sam, though, losing his boat, because he was so kind as to lend it to us. If we get any salvage for bringing this craft into port we'll give it to him."

"Never mind the boat, my boy," rejoined Crossley; "I'll make that good; and you may rely upon some salvage for saving my life, whether you get any for the ship or not. By-the-by, what's your name?"

"James Cook," answered the boy.

"I'll remember it," said Crossley; "and I'm much mistaken if all England doesn't some day remember it too."

He spoke truly. Thirty years later that barefooted boy was the greatest seaman and explorer in Britain, and Mr. Crossley, then a white-haired, wrinkled old man of seventy-five, was never tired of telling his friends about the strange voyage that he had once made in a water-logged vessel with CAPTAIN COOK.

AN ENCOUNTER WITH A BEAR.

AN Indian hunter, who knew of two litters of cubs, which he intended to capture as soon as they were old enough to be taken from their mother, was anticipated in one case by a black cat, and in the other by a fox. The latter paid the penalty of his adventure with his life, and was found in the den literally torn into shreds by the furious bear. The fox had killed one of the cubs, and the old bear, hoping to find a more secure place, had gone off with the two remaining cubs. The Indian overtook and slew her, and captured the cubs.

Upon another occasion he was not so fortunate. Wishing to secure the large price offered by the officers of a garrison town for a pair of live cubs, he was unceasing in his endeavors to find a den. One day, when accompanied by his little son, a boy of ten, he discovered unmistakable traces of a bear's den near the top of a hill strewn with granite boulders, and almost impassable from the number of fallen pines. One old pine had fallen up-hill, and its upreared roots, with the soil clinging to them, formed, with a very large rock, a triangular space into which the snow had drifted to a depth of ten or twelve feet.

The Indian was about to pass on, when he detected the whining of bear cubs. By taking a roundabout way he reached a place on a level with the bottom of the boulder, and there saw the tracks of an old bear leading directly into the centre of the space between the tree root and the boulder. The old bear in her conings and goings had tunneled a passage under the snow-drift. Getting down on his hands and knees, the Indian, with his knife held between his teeth, crept bear fashion into the tunnel.

After entering several feet he found the usual bear device—a path branching off in two directions. While pondering what to do under such circumstances a warning cry came from his little son, who was perched on the top of the boulder, and the next instant the old bear rushed into the tunnel, and came into violent contact with the Indian, the shock causing the tunnel to cave in.

The Indian, after dealing the bear one blow, lost his knife in the snow, and seized the bear with his hands; but she proved too strong for him, and was the first to struggle out of the drift, when unfortunately she met the little Indian boy, who had clumbed down to his father's rescue. He received a tremendous blow on the thigh from the bear's paw as she passed, which crippled him for life.

Four days afterward, the Indian, determined to avenge the injury of his son by slaying the old bear, returned to the den, and discovered her lying dead upon the snow in front of the boulder; his one blow had gone home, and the poor creature had crawled back to her young to die. The Indian dug away the snow, and found the cubs; one was dead, and the others died before he could reach the camp.

KITES.

BY A. W. ROBERTS.

OLD sheets and old shirts! How I used to pester my good and over-indulgent mother for them! And didn't they make splendid kite tail—so long, so clean and white! And the gangs of "kite cutters" and "slingers," how "big brother" used to "shake 'em up" and bump their heads together when he caught them after my kites! All this was many years ago; and yet I can make as good if not better kites now than when I was a boy. We will see.

Our first kite will be "mother's kite" for "the boy" (Fig. 1). This kite is made of the common brown straw paper used by grocery men. From this paper a good-sized heart is cut; the paper is then strengthened with numerous broom whisks or splints, which are introduced through small holes that are made with a coarse darning needle. For a tail several thicknesses of grocery cord is preferable, and for the captive cord linen thread (not twine or cord) is best. For a face-band No. 3 is most suitable.

Fig. 2 is a diamond pin-wheel kite. The frame consists of two sticks of well-seasoned white pine; the shorter stick crosses the long upright stick at right angles, and they are tied together where they cross one another. The ends of the sticks contain notches in which the frame cord is secured, giving to the kite its diamond shape. To this kite pin-wheels of stiff paper of various colors are attached as shown in the figure. For a tail strips of old sheeting are best. Face-band No. 3 is used. This kite is a medium high flier, but does not behave well in a strong wind.

Fig. 3 is a shamrock or Patsy kite. The frame (Fig. 3, A) consists of an upright and a cross stick; the three circles which form the outline of the shamrock leaf are of split bamboo or split rattan. These circles are bound together and to the frame sticks with sewing silk or strong linen thread as shown in Fig. 3, A. It is best after the binding is completed to apply hot glue to the parts; this gives greater strength, and holds the binding together. The covering of this kite consists of emerald-green tissue-paper, which is veined with greenish-yellow paint to give the leaf a more artistic and finished look. The stem of the shamrock is formed by winding green paper around the prolonged end of the upright stick of the frame. For this kite face-band No. 1 is used. The Patsy kite is a low flier, and rags are the proper material for the tail.

Fig. 4 is a Union Shield kite, and consists of two slender cross sticks and a stouter upright stick. The outline of this kite is formed around the sticks with curving sections of split bamboo or rattan, which are bound together firmly with silk, and secured with glue. The staffs for the three streamers consist of very thin splinters of bamboo, which are fastened in position with silk to the side strips of bamboo and to the upright centre stick. These streamers and the covering for this kite consist of heavy white tissue-paper, on which the Stars and Stripes are painted with water-colors. Face-band No. 5 is used.

Fig. 5 is the "Evening-Star" kite. The frame is the same as that of the diamond pin-wheel kite. When the frame cord is run around the sticks a diamond kite is formed; but by using four short "gathering-in cords" a star kite is formed. These gathering-in cords are first fastened by their ends where the sticks cross one another; they are then passed over the frame cord and are drawn tight, and the remaining ends tied in the same place as the first. By this means the frame cord is drawn inward, thus changing the diamond shape of the frame cord into a star having one long and three short arms, as shown in Fig. 5.

The masses of slender rays which are shown in Fig. 5 spreading out from the angles formed by the gathering-in cords consist of numerous and very slender splints of bamboo; these splints are first glued in radiating positions to a piece of thin card-board, which is known as the "spreader" (Fig. 5, A). This spreader is then glued to the kite where the gathering-in cords form the outer (obtuse) angles.

FIG. 5.

FIG. 5, A.

The covering of this kite is of light blue tissue-paper bespangled with gold-leaf. The bamboo rays are also gilded with gold-leaf. In bright sunlight the effect of this kite is very beautiful; it is a medium high flier. Face-band

No. 3 is used. Fig. 6 is a combination of star kite and a Greek cross (in open-work). This kite is much the same in its construction as the evening-star kite, the only difference being the two inner circles of split bamboo or rattan and the open-work Greek cross.

The outer and largest circle of bamboo is securely fastened in four places to the two frame sticks, and to this circle are also fastened the gathering-in cords of the star portion of the kite. All that part of the kite which is contained within the arms of the star and the outer circle is covered with light blue tissue-paper, which is bespangled with silver-leaf. The smaller or inner circle is also fastened to the sticks of the kite wherever it crosses them. From the corners of the angles formed by the crossing of the sticks eight strings are fastened; these are again fastened to the inner circle of bamboo at equal distances so as to form the arms of the Greek cross. This cross is covered with brilliant crimson paper bespangled with gold-leaf.

When covering the cross the paper is cut a quarter of an inch larger than the actual size of the cross, to allow for the lapping of the paper over the string and inner circle. For this kite a strong wind is required.

In the group of face-bands (Fig. 7) the letter A stands for the sticks of the kite, and the dotted line B shows where the captive cross is attached to the face-band.

SING · A · SONG · OF · SIXPENCE ·

To MARTHA GRASS. S. B. MILLS.

Allarghetto

Sing a song of six-pence, a pocket full of rye, Four and twenty black birds baked in a pie; When the pie was opened the birds be-gan to sing, Wasn't that a dainty dish to set be-fore the King! The King was in his count-ing-house, count-ing out his mon-ey; The Queen was in the par-lor, eat-ing bread and-hou-ey; The Maid was in the gar-den, hang-ing out the clothes. By came a black-bird, and sipped off her nose.

Fin. Fin. Fin. Fin.

CENTREVILLE, MISSISSIPPI.

The exchange proposed by Lillian W. in a letter which appeared in No. 180 has called forth many beneficent suggestions on the part of the young people. Twenty-five packages, great and small, have arrived in excellent condition, and as many white-winged messengers sweetly laden with kind words of sympathy, as the invalid mother in her little woodland prison, "shut in" from the beautiful light of day.

The pretty diversion of opening and looking over the beautiful silks has refreshed me, while the letters have rested and comforted me more than I can tell you. If in a dark moment I should ever be tempted to say, "This is a cold world," my little box of letters will rebuke the thought, but I must ask you not to make the weight of obligation too great. If we find it impossible to send leaves and tea-flowers to all, we shall take advantage of the thoughtfulness of friends who have said, "If you receive many packages, do not feel under obligations to me, for it has given me pleasure to send the scraps."

I have received several pretty patterns for the little brother's quilt, but as I have quite a number of large and handsome pieces, I shall attempt one of large blocks. When this one is complete L. will assist me in making a "crazy" quilt. Her own acknowledgments, and the fact that my little nurse and housekeeper has begun school in earnest. She will write a letter for the Post-office Box soon.

The little brother was delighted with the books sent by A. W. I have answered some of the letters, and I trust the kind Postmistress can make room in her delightful department for this general acknowledgment. Let it be known that my little nurse and housekeeper will be pleased. Little children! how my heart goes out to them. It is the privilege of only a few to know just what self-sacrificing and faithful friends they are. One must be dependent upon them for comfort and companionship before they can justly appreciate their real worth. L. W.'S MOTHER.

I told you last week that I thought Miss Lillie W. would write again, and here is something better. Those who have been interested in the little girl, and who sent their packets so promptly on reading her offer to exchange pressed flowers on reading her offer to exchange pressed flowers for boxes of silk, will be rewarded when they see how much happiness they have given Mrs. W. Only by reading her own words can you get an idea of the brave and cheerful life a sufferer may lead shut away from the world within four walls. Are you not glad that through the Post-office Box, and the little daughter's artless and touching letter, a bit of sunshine has found its way to the mother's couch? As I read her pencilled lines I thought of a favorite stanza by Keble:

"Meek souls there are who little dream,
Their daily life an angel's theme,
Nor that the rod they bear so calm
In heaven may be a martyr's palm."

And will you not try to be brave and cheerful too when things are not quite as you wish them to be?

BEAUFORT, NEW YORK.
I am one of your most devoted readers, and I heartily enjoy every word of YOUNG PEOPLE. I am fifteen years old, and attend school. On Saturday I take a painting lesson. I have no vacation at all, as I study Latin and geometry in the summer.

I have been down the street this afternoon purchasing stationery. I buy it by the dozen sheets, and in various styles. I have bought a pair of crushed straw berry, a shrimp pink, and terracotta, all ragged edge. I have very fine collections of autographs, minerals, corals, advertising cards, perforations, coins, and, in general, anything that is new and beautiful. I have one very beautiful specimen of brain coral that I have been offered fifty dollars for. I have the autographs of many distinguished poets, statesmen, and patriots, among them Abraham Lincoln, Garrison, Fillmore, Hayes, Grant, and many others—about two thousand in all.

My perforations are very curious. One fragment is perforated with leaves underneath so distinct that you can at once discern the variety. My papa has just read my letter, and says it is egotistical. I so, I beg your pardon.

CORINNE S. L.

There is nothing to pardon, dear, in what your papa calls egotism in this letter. We all want to know about each other, and thoughtful collectors can not give more pleasure to those engaged in the same pursuits than by stating what articles they have been able to obtain, and telling in which possessions they take most pride. As for those brilliant colors in stationery, I shall be sorry if they ever become popular among my young correspondents. I am glad you wrote to me on plain cream-finished paper. When I receive a rosebud, or shrimp pink, or navy blue letter, I feel a little shiver creeping over me before I begin to read it. Please remember, boys and girls, that the Postmistress prefers white paper and black ink from her contributors.

NEW YORK CITY.

Mamma, Lil, Ted, Buckie, Baby, and I all live together in a tiny house 'way up town. Mamma has been an invalid for nearly a year, and as we have no room for a servant, I keep house. I don't like teaching, as a washing woman, and I don't like to leave school. Nobody that has not little brothers knows how they tear their clothes, and then look so penitent one has not the heart to scold them. I like cooking very much, and would be glad if I might join the Little Housekeepers when I have a little more experience.

I wonder if the children have seen any of Pilot's skin? It is nearly an inch thick. We have—

MIRA W. 11 1/2 YEARS OLD.

Pilot, as the children may not know him, was an elephant which I purchased when I was twelve, which it unfortunately became necessary to kill. A girl who at thirteen is actually a housekeeper, taking charge of everything, and mending the boys' torn jackets and trousers, is entitled to an honorable place in our Society, isn't she? Never mind about having to leave school, Meg. There are more schools than one, and your home life, with its opportunities of making your dear ones happy, is doing better for you just now than teachers' or text-books can. And your turn to go to the school you love may come again by-and-by.

CREATOR POINT, ON THE HUDSON, NEW YORK.

I am a little boy seven years old. I live on the Hudson River. I have seven little boats: four are sail-boats, two are steam-boats, and one is a row-boat. In the summer-time, my papa and I get a row-boat with papa or my cousin Willie, and sail them.

My sister takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I like "Rising the Pearl" very much. I am the treasurer of a club. My sister and three cousins belong to it. We publish a paper called The Merry-Go-Round every month.

This is my first letter, and I hope you will print it.

HARRY L. C.

Won't you send me a copy of The Merry-Go-Round, Harry? I would like to see it.

EIKS, NEW YORK.

I will write and tell you about my kitten. He is black and white; his feet are white, and he has a black spot on his chin. He is just a real old boy, but he is a splendid mouser. My sisters and I caught a turtle, and named him Frank, but he fell out of the window one day, and went home. I like the Young People's Society, and when I get a good receipt I will send it. Good-by until I write again.

ISABEL N.

Ask mamma to give you a nice receipt for breakfast pancakes. Some of the Little Housekeepers want one.

GLENWOOD CITY, COLORADO.

I have had HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it was first published, and I like to read it very much. I like "Nan" and "Mr. Stubbs's Brother" better than any of the other stories. I have been printed seven times, and am ten years old. I live on a ranch seven miles from Gunnison City, Colorado. We like it here because we have plenty of cows and horses. There is a creek running through our ranch, and in summer we catch a lot of trout. There has been good skating on it this winter. I hope this letter is not too long to print.

GEORGE A. C.

No, indeed, George. It might have been longer. Do you help take care of the cows, and have you a horse? Have you a big cat named Tommy Grey, and every time when he wants to come in he rattles the door-knob or else sneezes.

WORCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a boy who is ten years old, and I hope you will print this letter, because it is the first one I ever wrote. I have a very big cat named Tommy Grey, and every time when he wants to come in he rattles the door-knob or else sneezes.

I go to Winslow Street school, and study arithmetic, geography, spelling, music, drawing, language, and writing. I like the story of "Raising the Pearl" very much, and the Jimmy Brown stories are splendid. I sell candy at the Worcester Technical Institute, and lay up in the bank about $200 a week. Some evenings I sell as many as twenty dozen sticks of candy.

H. X. P.

What famous appetites for candy the fellows at the Institute must have!

HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT.

I am going to write you a letter and tell you about my pets; but first I will tell you where I get my pets. I have an uncle Cyrus in Providence who feeds the Young People's WEEKLY, BAZAR, and YOUNG PEOPLE, and after reading the last named he sends it to me. Isn't he kind?

Now I will tell you of my pets. One is a cat named Crumbo—a queer name, isn't it? Another pet is a turtle; he is about two inches long. A while ago I put him in mamma's fernery, and he buried himself under the moss; but now he is in a fish globe with water and stones. My sister has a canary bird.

I am eleven years old, and go to school every day and study geography, arithmetic, spelling, drawing and writing, language, reading, and music. I am in the South School District, which is the largest in the city. The Capitol, near which we live, is very beautiful. It is made of white marble, and the dome is gilded. Above the dome is a place called the Lantern, where those who choose may go and have a view of the surrounding country for many miles; I have been up several times.

If you are pleased with this letter, and would like to have me write more about Hartford, I will do so some time.

PERLEY R. W.

I am always pleased to hear more than once from my boys.

WHITESBURG, ALABAMA.

As I have not seen a letter from this part of the country, I thought I would write one. I have five brothers and three sisters. We live on the mountain about seven miles from Whitesburg. We have a lot of sheep and twenty-five lambs. I like YOUNG PEOPLE very much. We began taking it last year. I have never been at school, as there is none near enough, but I try to learn all I can at home.

WALTER A. II.

Please write again, Walter, and tell us more about the mountain and your life in summer.

WHITESBURG, ALABAMA.

I would like to join the Little Housekeepers. We have eleven to do for, but I do not mind the dish-washing. I have a sweet little pet lamb; its name is Bubby. I think that "Nan" is the best story, and Jimmy Brown's the funniest that I ever read. I have a wax doll. I have never been at school, because we live too far from an school for me to go. Dear Postmistress, please print my first letter. Good-by.

SALUDA G.

I think Saluda and Walter must be acquainted, as their letters were written on the same day. Would it not be a good plan to have a little family or neighborhood class for the children who live so remote from a town, and ask one of the young lady sisters to teach it?

COURT, ILLINOIS.

A kind friend in Chicago has sent YOUNG PEOPLE to us since September, 1882. We are all glad to see your papers, my two sisters, my brother, papa, mamma, and myself.

We have no pets except our little baby sister, who is only four months old. Papa has a windmill sixty feet high, with which he grinds and shells corn. The wheels are thirty feet in diameter. I have been up to the top of it two or three times, and Arthur, my brother, often goes up to the machinery. Arthur often grinds Saturdays, and sometimes he has to stay out of school when papa goes away.

We take YOUNG PEOPLE, St. Nicholas, and Youth's Companion.

AMY A.

I live in San Francisco, but during the summer months I go to our mountain home up in the Santa Cruz Mountains. I have two dogs; their names are Old and Spot. We have traps in the woods near the house, and catch quail. There are wild-cats in the woods, and one night one of them sniped the fresh meat in our safe, and we had to close it, and were awfully frightened. The dogs scared it off. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE from the first number. W. S. D.

CHATTAHOOCY, TENNESSEE.

My brother takes your paper, and I like to read it very much. I am ten years old. I want to tell you about my pets. We have a very big cat named Rando, a cat named Fanny, and a large dog named Don. He is an Irish setter. I want to tell you about Don playing 18-55. He will play like a real person. He will put his front paws around a tree and shut his eyes, and look (my brother) and myself run and hide, and when we were hid we call "Ready!" and he jumps down, and he can smell our tracks, and finds us, and then he looks at us right hard, and then he runs back and looks at us. I like to read the letters in the Post-office Box, and I like the story of "Raising the Pearl" very much indeed. I don't think Captain Sammy ought to be so very cross to Tommy Tucker.

NELL H.

CATSKILL, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl seven years old. I commenced going to school last September, but have had to stay at home since the holidays, as I have had the whooping-cough. I have two dolls, Emma and Pearl, and a canary I call Ned, who is a sweet singer. My mamma reads me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE every week. Mamma is writing this for me. I wanted to write it myself, but she was afraid you could not read it very well.

DELLA LOU.

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO.

I am eleven years old. I love to read. Mamma is very particular about what books I read. I like Brown's is just dreadful. If he belonged to our family, I would want to have him stolen. I don't think his family has very good government over him. We would not have any articles more than our own. Sometimes I think the paper ought to be called HARPER'S OLD PEOPLE, for at our house the big folks sit down and read it first. When I can catch the postman I take the paper and hide it, then I leave it when I want it.

LUCIA C.

NEW BRITAIN, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little girl ten years old. My uncle Horace sends me YOUNG PEOPLE. I think "Nan" was a splendid story. I saw a letter not long ago from a lame boy. I know how to pity him, for I have been lame myself for eight years. I go to a physician in New York. He says I have the hip-disease. I wear one splint all the time, but I can walk a very little.

My papa is a farmer, and I make a pound of butter every morning; he gives me two cents for every pound. I went down to my grandma's yesterday to spend the day. She lives about a quarter of a mile from my home. I am plying a bed-quilt; I have thirty three blocks done. I recite my lessons to my mamma every day. I study geography, arithmetic, reading, writing, and spelling every month, and sisters a few on years old, and the other two. They are full of fun.

HATTIE F. W.

HANTS COUNTY, NOVA SCOTIA.

Ever since I read Rosalie P.'s letter I've thought I would like to write to the Post-office Box. I have a sister and a brother, and a dog named Spot at the time it appeared, I had to wash dishes and do all sorts of house-work. Even now that we have a servant I have to do a great deal.

I am a very young man, I have a brother and a little sister music-lessons, and I play the organ in our church.

Will you please tell me which you think the best to be, an accomplished young lady, or a good housekeeper?

I send a couple of receipts for the Little Housekeepers:

BATH BUNS.—Work half a pound of butter into a pound of flour, to which add five well-beaten eggs, with a table-spoonful of yeast; mix them with a little warm milk, cover the dough, and put it in a warm place to rise for an hour; then mix in four ounces of loaf-sugar, and three ounces of brown sugar, and stir in a few on the top of each bun; bake in a brisk oven, and when done brush them over with milk and sugar.

DELICATE CAKE.—Beat to a cream seven ounces of sweet butter; beat to a stiff froth the whites of six eggs, and mix gradually with it one ounce of fine white sugar; stir in the eggs one pound of flour together with the butter, half a nutmeg, grated, and some essence of lemon, or bitter almonds, or rose-water. Bake in a pan lined with buttered paper.

ANNIE E.

I do not think a young lady can be called an accomplished and understands housekeeping thoroughly. One of these days I will have a little talk with you all on the subject. Thanks for your receipts.

HAGERSTOWN, MARYLAND.

I am a little boy nearly six years old. I have a little brother named Bruce, who has a little dog named Jack. My father has a big dog named Tom. I have a little friend named Margaret, who has two more little brothers, and the baby is so sweet, I call him "the Fairy Queen." I think the Post-office Box is the nicest thing in the paper.

COOKING FOR THE SICK.

Remember, dear Little Housekeepers, that when you are cooking for the sick you must take the very greatest care. An invalid's appetite must be tempted, and often the doctor will tell you that quite as much depends upon getting the patient to take nourishing food as upon medicine. Always serve an invalid's meal daintily, on the prettiest china, with the whitest napkin, and the brightest silver in the house. Make the little meal look like a picture if you can. How very happy a girl or boy who is invited to learn cookery, you know—will feel if the toast or porridge made by careful little hands is eaten with a relish by the father or mother who is ill.

TOAST.

Not one person in a thousand knows how to make good toast. The bread should not be too fresh. It should be cut thin, evenly, and in good shape. The crust edges should be cut off. The best method of toasting bread is to extract all its moisture. Present each side of the bread to the fire for a few moments to warm, without attempting to toast it; then turn upon the first side at some distance from the fire, so that it will slowly and evenly receive a golden color all over the surface. Now turn it to the other side, moving it in the same way until it is perfectly toasted. The coals should be clear and hot. Serve it the moment it is done, on a warm plate.

POACHED EGGS.

Salt the water well; when it is simmering drop lightly each broken egg from a saucer into it. Cook one egg at a time, throwing carefully with one spoon the water from the side over the egg to whiten the top. When cooked just enough do not let it get too hard) take out the egg with a perforated ladle, trim off the ragged pieces, and slip it on a small thin piece of buttered toast, cut neatly into squares. When all are cooked, and placed on their separate pieces of toast, sprinkle a little pepper and salt over each one.

RIE-PUDDING.

This receipt makes one of the plainest and best puddings ever eaten. It is a success with every grain of rice seems lying in a creamy bed. Ingredients: One cupful of boiled rice (better if just cooked and still hot), three cupfuls of milk, three-quarters of a cupful of sugar, a table-spoonful of corn starch, two eggs; add flavoring. Dissolve the corn starch first with a little milk, and then stir in the remainder of the milk; add to this the whites of the eggs and the buttered toast, cut neatly into squares. When all are cooked, and placed on their separate pieces of toast, sprinkle a little pepper and salt over each one.

RISE CONES.

Mould boiled rice, when hot, in cups which have been previously dipped in cold water; when cold turn them out on a flat dish, arranging them uniformly; then with a tea-spoon scoop out a little of the rice from the top of each cone, and put in its place an equal quantity of jelly. When it is well to hold a stick of cinnamon on the rice to flavor it.

In preparing a meal for mamma or auntie, who is ill, it is best not to take her too much on account. A table-spoonful of the rice pudding on a thin saucer will be quite enough; do not show her the whole pudding. Never ask an invalid what she would like you can help it. But try to give her a little surprise at each meal. Be very gentle in your movements in a sick-room. Wear a dress that does not rustle, and shoes that do not squeak, and avoid both whispering and loud talking, which disturb weak nerves. Try to look cheerful, even though you feel anxious. Your dear ones are in God's care, and if the doctor, the nurse, and all the kind friends are doing what they can, you must always hope and expect that the invalid will soon get well.

LAUGHTER GAMES *

THERE is a whole class of games of which the object is to excite to laughter by means of some ridiculous action.

Such games are sometimes played with a lighted candle. The players approach each other from opposite sides of the room, and sustain a dialogue in solemn tones, while they must keep a grave countenance, on penalty of paying forfeit. For example:

"The King of Turkey is dead." "What did he die of?"
 "Doing so" (some ridiculous gesture).

* From Games and Songs of American Children. Collected and Compared by WILLIAM WELLS NEWELL. Published by Harper & Brothers.

A more characteristic version (in Nantucket, Massachusetts) had it, "The royal Russian Princess Husty Fusty is dead." To which it was necessary to answer, soberly: "I'm very sorry to hear it. Even the cats bewail her loss."

A game which was formerly popular with children in Massachusetts was to lean a staff in the corner, while a player was seated in the centre of the ring. Another child now entered, took up the staff, approached and addressed the one sitting, and a rhymed dialogue ensued:

"My father sent me here with a staff,
 To speak to you, and not to laugh."
 "Methinks you smile." "Methinks I don't.
 I smooth my face with ease and grace,
 And set my staff in its proper place."

If the staff-bearer laughed, he or she must take the chair, otherwise the next player continued the game.

A third amusement is for girls to excite one another to laugh by gently pinching in succession the ears, nose, lips, etc., while making use of some ridiculous expression.

In a Swiss game this performance is complicated by a jest. Each child pinches his neighbor's ear, but by agreement the players blacken their fingers, keeping two of the party in ignorance. Each of the two victims imagines it to be the other who is the object of the uproarious mirth of the company.

A MALTESE CAT.

BY EVA LOVETT CARSON.

WHEN papa came home the other night
 He held the lid of a basket tight.

"Now, children," he said, "guess that."
 And when they guessed everything but right,
 He lifted it just a little mite,
 And showed them a Maltese cat.

"And now," said papa, "though puss likes fun,
 Yet, if you torment him, of course he'll run.
 Don't love him too hard and squeeze him."
 "Why, papa," cried Ned, in surprise at that,
 "I thought they called it a Maltese cat,
 Just so's you could maul him and tease him."

THE PET OF THE REGIMENT.

BY E. M. TRAUQUAIR.

AND so you young folks want a story, do you—a story about the war, eh? Well, children, you shall have

it. Story telling is all old Uncle Karl, with his wooden leg, is good for nowadays.

Twelve years ago, when the last great war broke out (to me it seems like yesterday, and yet three of you were not born then), all Germany was in a state of the wildest excitement. There were many old people still living who remembered the former great Napoleonic wars, and the terrible times when the French overran the country. Who could foresee whether these times would not return? The army was got into marching order; the women worked night and day to get their husbands' and brothers' kits ready in time, and the children paraded the streets singing "The Watch on the Rhine."

My regiment was among the first to be ordered to France. Arrangements for the start were made as rapidly as possible. When we were all packed into the cars, and the train, amid the sobs of the women and the hurrahs of the men, began to move slowly out of the station, a boy of about twelve or thirteen years old, a bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked rogue, sprang with a cat-like elasticity into the car where I was standing.

He landed almost in my arms. It was contrary to all rule to take him with us, but my heart was sore at leaving home, and I felt almost as if he had been sent to me. I took a fancy to the boy at first sight, and, in spite of all the railway guards said, I succeeded in keeping him with me, and consequently with the regiment.

He was now one of "ours," and shared all our dangers, privations, and heavy marches. He ran errands for us, laid our dinners, lit the bivouac fires. He was very unselfish and kind-hearted, and endeared himself so much to the rough soldiers that he was soon the acknowledged "pet of the regiment." He never seemed to feel fatigue.

After a long day's march I have seen him run hither and thither, fetch water, kindle fire, or spread his cloak over some tired soldier, chatting merrily all the while. He seemed a little ebullient, capable of being in two places at once.

When the hard fighting began, and hardship and privation increased, we wanted to send the little fellow back to Germany. But he himself would not hear of it. "If I am too small to fight for my country myself," he used to say, "I can at least help those who do. When we have beaten the French and taught them to mind their own business, I'll go back with you, not before. And then:

"Hey, boys, hey!
March and away
To the land of the oaks again!"

Well, it so came about that we were quartered in a French village. This was after the first great battle of Wörth, when we succeeded in driving the enemy from our frontiers. The inhabitants had already fled, all, at least, except a few old people who seemed too indifferent to take the trouble of bestirring themselves. Suddenly we received orders from head-quarters to send every one out of the village.

This seemingly cruel command was given with the intention of protecting the poor old creatures, as, in case we should have to retreat, the place would be fired in order to hinder the enemy from making it a point of vantage against us. A beacon pole was erected behind the village, and a heavy battery had orders to play on the devoted place, and lay it in ashes, as soon as the signal should be given by lighting this pole.

This was in the afternoon. Toward evening a detachment of troops entered the village noiselessly. Fritz was with them. The captain had strict orders to search the village from house to house to make sure that every one had left it, and that nothing of value was destroyed. I went with him in his rounds.

We came to a substantial two-storied house, in the upper window of which a faint light was burning. We went in, groped our way up a dark staircase, and entered a large room heaped up with all sorts of articles. In their midst sat an old woman with a hard, wrinkled face, staring fixedly at the wall.

"Woman," I cried, "why are you sitting here? Have you not heard the order to quit the village?"

"What do I care for your orders!" she replied, in a harsh, deep voice. "This is my own house, and I mean to stay in it."

"But the place is going to be fired, and you will be buried under the ruins. It is to save your life that we have come, and if you won't listen to reason and go of your own accord, we must try force."

"Just try it," cried the strange creature. "Turn me out of my own house like a dog if you will; I'll return to it when you are gone. Kill me if you like, but I shall stay."

I saw there was no use in saying anything more to her, and I had no time for it, besides. There was little chance of the bombardment taking place till morning, so she was safe till then. We returned, leaving all quiet.

About half an hour later Fritz entered the guard-room. He planted himself right in front of me with a sort of half-embarrassed air.

"Well, Fritz," I said, "and so you are not sleeping yet? What is the matter, my boy?"

"There is nothing the matter," he said; "only Louis is here, and I can't make out what he wants."

Louis was a pretty slender boy of about Fritz's age, only not so strong. He was no stranger to us, as he belonged to a neighboring village where we had been in quarters shortly before. I sent for him at once.

"Why are you here, Louis?" I said, when he was brought in. "Boys like you ought to be in bed, and not in dangerous places like this!"

"My grandmother is here in the village all alone," he said, frankly. "I've come to fetch her!"

"Your grandmother!" said I. "Is that the old lady in the house yonder with the two lime-trees before the door?"

"Yes, that is her house."

"Well, you'll have your trouble for nothing, I can tell you. She told me that nothing should make her leave the house."

"I shall try, at any rate. My mother will be very unhappy should anything happen to grandmother."

I took the boy to his grandmother's house. Louis told me, as we went along, that she was a strange old woman, by no means poor, but that she had quarrelled with all her family, and for years had not entered his parents' house. His mother had often taken him to see her, but he noticed that she had a strong dislike to his father.

We reached the house. Light was still glimmering in the upper room, and the door was open. As soon, however, as we began to mount the dark stairs I heard the sound of a key being turned in the lock. The old woman had locked the door in our faces.

Louis implored her to let him in, saying he had a message to her from his mother. On hearing this she opened the door.

"You have come to fetch me," she said, with a softened look. "You have taken a deal of trouble to no purpose, as I mean to stay where I am."

"You surely don't mean to stay till the Prussians shoot your house down about your ears?"

"Why not? The Prussians have beaten our armies, and the cowards have fled. But I, a poor old woman, mean to defy them. Let them beat down my house if they like. It is my own. Here I am, and here I mean to stay."

"In that case I shall stay too," said the boy, decidedly.

"You!" said the old woman, wonderingly, her hard features assuming a softer expression. "You are too young to be food for powder. Go home to your mother."

"Not without you, grandmother," said the boy.

Her face became almost tender. "Take the boy away," she said, turning to me. "He could almost persuade me against my will."

"He'll not go unless you go, I can see that," said I.

"So you had better leave the place with him, if you do not wish him to be killed."

"Is it true, then, that the village is to be destroyed?"

"The order for it may be given any minute."

"Very well, then, I will go, but not till morning. You can stay here, Louis. There is room enough for us both. But what am I to do with my things?"

I advised her to make up all her most valuable things in a bundle, and let her grandson carry it. Then I impressed on Louis the necessity of being off at as early an hour as possible next morning. As I left the room, I heard the key turning again in the lock.

We noticed by various signs in the enemy's camp that there was something brewing against us. What it was we could not tell. One thing only was certain, and that was action on the morrow.

When the sun rose there was a thick gray mist over everything. When it cleared away, the French came toward us with wild hurrahs to storm our position.

We were prepared for them. We let them come on half-way, and then let off a salvo so well aimed that they stopped, and threw themselves into a trench, from whence they rained bullets on us.

We were too well covered, however, to suffer much. But their attack on our left wing was more fortunate. After a short, gallant defense, overpowered by numbers, it was obliged to retreat. The danger now became great for us, as the enemy crowded more and more to the front. The word was given for a general retreat. Whilst our little detachment, fighting and taking advantage of every cover, withdrew slowly from the village, I went, accompanied by a sergeant, to the beacon pole. My orders were to light it the moment the village should be free from our people.

Just at this moment Fritz came running up to say that Louis and his grandmother, whom I believed to be already far away, were still in the village.

"Run and see," I said to the good little fellow. "If they are really still there, send them off instantly. They are lost else."

We could easily see the old woman's house from where we were standing. Fritz ran swift as a young deer across the open field, over which the enemy, now rapidly approaching, were sowing bullets plentifully.

Our situation was growing more critical with every moment. In spite of the attention required for the enemy's movements, I could not help looking uneasily toward the house into which Fritz had disappeared.

He came out at last, but—alone! His usual merry smile was changed into a look of fear and anxiety as he rushed up to us, screaming at the top of his voice:

"An axe! an axe! The lock is hampered. They can't get out."

One of the soldiers in the trench started forward, threw him an axe, and, quick as thought, returned to his post. The brave boy caught it up, and, heavy as it was, darted off with it across the dangerous path for the second time.

"Quick, Fritz, quick!" I called after him. "In two minutes the beacon must be lit."

My reminder was unnecessary. Anxiety for the prisoners, and more especially for his playmate, added wings to his feet. I was getting very anxious about all three, but more especially about my own gallant boy. Three lives hung from a thread. The heavy battery on the heights beyond was only waiting for the signal to open its terrible fire on the devoted village.

The enemy, who had been comparatively quiet for a little, now began to advance again. Some of my people still held the last solitary house in the village. It was high time to call them back. When this was done the moment was come to light the beacon, and Fritz was still in the fatal house.

Used as I was to the horrors of war, it was a terrible moment for me. The sergeant stood beside me waiting my orders. I hesitated for one minute before saying the word which would be equal to a sentence of death for three innocent beings, in no way connected with the great quarrel now being fought out between two nations.

"Light the beacon at once!" called the colonel, galloping up at this moment.

"God help them!" thought I, with a shudder.

The flames licked the straw-clad pole. Almost immediately after, a report from the battery guns seemed to crash into my very brain. The great balls hissed over our heads, and fell crashing on the roofs of the village houses, already beginning to fill with the enemy. Every shot told; but the house on which all our looks were fastened was still untouched.

Still Fritz did not appear. A second salvo was given as destructive as the first. The next house but one was hit. From its shattered roof arose clouds of dust and smoke. Still the walls that sheltered those three were spared.

"Where is Fritz? He's lost!" sounded on all sides.

"No—there he is! He's saved! Thank God! Bravo, Fritz!"

There he was indeed. He had just stepped out of the house. Close behind him came the two whom his heroic courage had saved from certain death.

On he came, nodding to us and smiling. They were scarcely six paces from the house when the terrible shot reached it also and levelled it with the ground.

But the three fugitives were by no means yet out of the reach of danger. Bullets were raining on all sides of them. The space they were crossing was completely unprotected. Fritz, careless about himself, showed himself most eagerly desirous of getting his protégées as quickly out of the reach of the bullets as was possible. He was carrying the old woman's bundle, while Louis helped her along. Onward they hurried in the direction of the other village, where the battery was erected. Soon, however, I lost sight of them, as I had other things to attend to than looking after the fugitives.

It was a brave deed, children, and it might have ended very badly for his gallant little performer. Well, I see, is looking very anxious to know how it all ended. You will be pleased to know that all three escaped safely. Better, still, Fritz's bravery and unselfish conduct had their reward.

The story came to be talked about in the army. It got to the ears of our gallant leader and Crown Prince, "Our Fritz," the soldiers' friend, as we called him. He interested himself, after the war was over, for his poor little orphan namesake. His kindness got him a free place in the cadet school of Berlin, where he studied military tactics, and passed an examination brilliant enough to do credit to his royal patron. He is rising fast in his profession without losing any of the good qualities that endeared him to us in his low estate. So now, guess who is coming to-morrow to pay us a long visit at our country home? Why, who but Captain Fritz, the former "pet of the regiment."

THOR'S JOURNEY TO JOTUNHEM,

BY JAMES BALDWIN.

CHAPTER III.

CROSSING the court-yard Thor and his followers came to the palace, and the door being open, they walked boldly into the broad hall. There they saw a great many huge giants, some sitting, some standing, and some at big round tables engaged in quiet games.

Our three travellers passed entirely through this hall, but they were so small that they were not seen, although they were in great danger of being stepped upon and crushed to death.

At the farther end of the hall was the King's audience-chamber; and when they entered it and saw the great Utgard-Loke upon his throne, they stopped and uncovered their heads and saluted him. Yet it was a long time before he noticed them. At length he looked down, and said,

"Ah! here are three little striplings who have lost their way. Methinks from his looks that one of them is our old enemy, Asa-Thor, from Asgard."

"You are right," said Thor, stretching himself to his full height. "I am he."

"Well," said the King, "what would you have at Utgard's castle? What are you good for? What can you do? For we allow no one to stop with us unless he can do some one thing better than any of us can do it. Now in what way do you think you excel? What feat of strength or skill would you like to undertake?"

Then said Thor, who in truth was very hungry, "There is, indeed, one thing that I can do, of which I am anxious to make trial at once; I can eat more food, and eat it faster, than any of your big Utgard men."

And the King answered, "You have said well, and you have spoken of that about which you may truly boast until you find some one who can outdo you. We will see how fast you can eat."

Then he summoned his vassals, and bade them make everything ready for the trial. A long trough filled with meat was brought and set upon the floor; and then the King called one of his men, whose name was Flame, and bade him eat against Thor. Thor sat down at one end of the trough and Flame at the other, and both ate as fast as they could. In a few minutes they met at the middle. Thor had eaten only the meat, but Flame had devoured the meat, the bones, and the trough itself. And all acknowledged that Thor had been beaten in this contest.

Then the King turned to Thor, and said: "What other feat would our uninvited guests be pleased to try? Or will they now give up, and say that they are beaten?"

"Never!" answered Thor. "Although I succeed but poorly at eating hard wood and bones, yet I can drink almost anything. For no man can drink as fast as I, or as much. Now since I am very thirsty, I should be glad to undertake the feat of drinking."

The King readily agreed, and he bade all the people come into his great banquet hall, and ordered the servants to bring his drinking horn.

"This is the horn," said the King, "out of which we make our courtiers drink when they have broken the rules of our court. Most of them can empty it at the first draught, but some of the weaker ones drink twice. I suppose, of course, that the great Asa-Thor can drink it all at one swallow, and then want more. Come, try it!"

Thor took a deep breath, put the horn to his lips, and drank as much as he could. When he stopped he was amazed to see the vessel as full as ever. The King laughed and said: "I never thought but that Asa-Thor would have done better than that. Yet try again."

Thor braced himself for another long drink, put the horn to his mouth, and drank till he grew black in the face. Then he set the vessel down, and saw to his disgust that the liquor had sunk but a very little; it would still be hard to carry it without spilling.

"Well, well, friend Asa-Thor," said the King, roaring with laughter, "you drink quite bravely. But haven't you saved too much for the third draught? If you are not careful, you will be so good to yourself at first; that, at the last, you will overtax yourself. But, in truth, if you show no greater ability in other feats than you have in eating and drinking, our Utgard people will not feel very much afraid of you."

This speech made Thor so angry that he took up the horn and drank with all his might. But drink as long as he would, the liquor still stood at the same height, and he at last gave up in despair.

The King said, scornfully: "It is plain that you are not so great as men say you are, nor as you yourself think. The best that you can do is to say no more about feats which are impossible to you. Still, if you would like to undertake something else, we shall say nothing against your trying."

"I am not yet ready to say that I am beaten," answered Thor. "I will try any other game that you may choose. What will you have me do?"

The King thought for a moment, and then said: "I think we might try you at a little game with which we sometimes amuse our children. They think it great fun to lift my old cat off the floor."

Thereupon he uttered a low whistle, and an old gray cat came out of a corner, and rubbed herself against his legs, and purred very loudly. Thor grasped her round the body, and lifted with all his might. But the more he lifted, the more the beast bent her back, and all he could do was to raise one paw off the floor. At last, seeing that further trial was vain, he let go of the cat.

Then the King cried out: "We have seen that this boaster who came from Asgard is not what he pretends to be. If such as he is great among the Asa folk, what kind of people must those Asa folk be? We will have no more games and no more trials of strength, for the time is growing late. Let our self-invited guests be shown to the chambers which have been made ready for them, and let them be entertained as friends. But on the morrow let them betake themselves back to their own land, where they may tell their countrymen of what they have seen in Jotunh m, and of what great things they failed to do in Utgard's castle."

The next morning Thor and his comrades were led into the banquet hall, and the choicest food of every kind was set before them. And when they had eaten and drunk to their fill they bade farewell to Utgard's castle, and set out on their journey homeward. And Utgard-Loke, the Giant-King, walked with them across the plain as far as to the boundaries of the wood. There pausing, he said:

"My good friend Asa-Thor, you have met the wolf in his lair, as you boasted you would do; what think you of him? How much honor do you think you have gained in Jotunh m?"

"I must frankly own that I have gained none," answered Thor, ashamed, but always truthful.

Then the giant said:

"Now that you are safely away from my castle, and shall never go into it again, I will tell you something. You have done much greater things in Jotunh m than you think. If I had dealt fairly with you, and used no deception, you might have done us great harm. But from beginning to end I fooled you with trickery. It was I who met you in the forest, where I dropped my mitten on purpose to give you a lodging-place for the night. I tied the dinner-bag with iron wire in such a way that you could find no ends and no knots. When you struck at me under the tree, your first stroke would have killed me had you hit me as you thought. But before going to sleep I had drawn a mountain around me, and it was that which you struck when you thought you had cleaved my skull.

"When you sat down to the eating trial you did not know that you were contending with fire, yet Flame, who ate meat, bones, and trough, was but the wildfire which destroys everything in its way. When you almost killed yourself trying to empty my drinking horn, you did not know that the small end of the horn was in the sea, and that if you had emptied it you would have drunk old ocean dry. And yet you drank most wonderfully well; for when you shall come to the sea again you will find that it is much shallower than when you crossed it three days ago.

"The eat which you could not lift was, in truth, the great Midgard snake, which holds the earth in his coils. And when we saw that you had really raised one paw up from the floor, we were very much alarmed, for at that time the snake could barely make his head and tail meet, and if the earth had slipped out of his embrace it would have been all over with us. Now go home, Asa-Thor; for should you stay here I have other tricks in store with which to fool you, and you would never get the better of me."

Thor was more angry than he had ever been before. He seized his hammer with both hands, and turned to strike the Giant-King; but he could see no one save the fleet-footed Thialfe and the smiling Roska of the golden hair. He looked where the great castle had stood, thinking that he would go back and level it to the ground; but there was nothing there save the meadow-like plain covered with tall waving grass. The palace of Utgard Loke had vanished.

Thor bit his lip with vexation, and returned with all speed to his home on Asgard Mountain, wiser, by far, than when he had left it.

CHAPTER XVI.

UNSUCCESSFUL PLOTTING.

EVEN in his whispered conversation it was easy to tell that Master Tucker was thoroughly disheartened; but how to aid him was an entirely different matter.

"We shall have to tell him you are here," said Dare.

"No, no, don't do that; he'd just about kill me. I'd rather starve than have him know it. Can't you get me a cracker or something and show it under the berth?"

"I don't dare to now; but I will the first thing in the morning."

"Be as early as you can," whispered the hungry pirate, and then he crept cautiously back to his hiding-place, while Dare lay and wondered how it would be possible to keep Tommy's presence a secret until he could be landed.

As might be expected, he was in a very unenviable frame of mind regarding Tommy's presence on the Pearl.

He knew the proper thing for him to do was to tell the little man the exact state of the case, and not attempt to deceive him in any way. But he feared to do this because of the consequences to the pirate.

Captain Sammy was justly angry with Tommy for having wrecked the boat, and there was no doubt but that he would inflict some terrible punishment upon him because of it in case he should meet him. If he should know that Tommy had secreted himself on board the Pearl, thinking to take a pleasure trip in the steamer without the knowledge of its owner, the little man would be still more angry, and thoughts of the revenge he might take made Dare shudder.

It was a long time before he could get to sleep that night, and even then he awakened at short intervals, his fears being so great that sleep could not overcome them.

When daylight came Dare was the first to respond to the little man's call, but he could not look him fully in the face, because of the knowledge that he was deceiving him, and he feared his secret could be read from his countenance.

He did succeed, however, in throwing some bread and cold meat under the berth where Tommy lay concealed, but he had no chance to speak to the self-made prisoner.

The fire in the furnace had been banked on the night previous, and the work of getting up steam occupied but a short time; in fact, so quickly was it done that the little craft was ploughing her way through the waters of Sarasota Bay before Captain Sammy had breakfast ready.

That meal was eaten as was the dinner the day before, first by the little Captain, Charley, and Bobby, and then by Rogers and Dare.

After Dare took up his position in the pilot house again, Captain Sammy remained in the bow, even though the channel was so deep and wide that there was no necessity of his directing the helmsman, and it seemed to the anxious Dare that he was on the lookout for something.

Through the bay, past Sarasota Key, to Chaise's Key, the little steamer continued her course in what might have been called an inside channel; but here this water-way protected by keys came to an end, and the yacht was run through Casey Pass to the clear waters of the Gulf.

Then the course was down past the coast within about a mile of the shore, and when they had run for a few miles Captain Sammy surprised Dare greatly by telling him to give the signal to stop the engine.

"SUDDENLY THEY SAW CAPTAIN SAMMY THROW THE HARPOON."

* Begun in No. 153, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Wonderingly Dare obeyed, and when the little steamer lay almost motionless on the water, the little man explained to Dare and the other boys, who had come rushing out in the greatest excitement to learn the meaning of the sudden stop,

"I want to try and get a turtle or two, so that we can change our bill of fare a little, and I reckon we sha'n't have to row around here very long without finding one."

Then he ordered the tender made ready, while he went below, and took from right in front of where Tommy was lying in fear and trembling a single-pronged harpoon that he had stowed away there.

While he was below Dare had an opportunity of telling Charley and Bobby, in a very hurried way, of the cause of the previous night's disturbance.

Their surprise, and in Bobby's case fear, was written so plainly on their faces when Captain Sammy came on deck that it was a wonder he did not suspect that something was wrong, and he probably would have done so had he not been so deeply engaged in the matter of getting a turtle for dinner.

It was while Captain Sammy was making the boat ready that a sudden thought presented itself to Dare. If he could arrange matters so that Rogers and Bobby went in the boat with Captain Sammy, there would be a possibility that he might, in case the chase led the party any distance from the steamer, run the Pearl in close to land, and set Tommy ashore.

Of course he had no idea what the boy would do there so far from home; his only thought was to get him out of the dangerous position in which he had placed himself.

"Now who's going with me? I can't take but two;" and Captain Sammy looked around as if he expected that each one would be eager to accompany him.

Dare had no idea of going if he could help it, and Charley and Bobby were so dazed by the strange news they had heard that they paid no attention to the question.

It was while all three stood silent that Rogers said,

"I should like to go, if the boys don't care to, for it has been some time since I have been on that kind of a lark."

"You can, of course; but I thought the boys would be just crazy for it," said Captain Sammy, in surprise at the indifference displayed by the crew.

Dare realized that it was necessary for him to say something in order that their singular behavior might not excite suspicion, and he said, in a hesitating way,

"If you would take Mr. Rogers and Bobby with you, it would give Charley and me a chance to see how we could handle the steamer alone, and we could come after you whenever you were ready to come on board."

"All right," said the little man, as he motioned the others to get into the boat; but it was quite plainly to be seen that he thought the affair very strange, despite this apparently plausible excuse.

As soon as the boat left the steamer, Dare and Charley went below, where they found the pirate had already emerged from his concealment, and was in the engine-room, eating at a rapid rate. From his hiding-place he had heard the conversation on deck, and as soon as the sounds told that the small boat had started, he made a frantic rush for the tables.

In a brief, hurried way Dare told Tommy what he proposed to do, and asked him if he would be willing to go on shore at any point it would be possible to land him.

"I'll go anywhere, no matter what kind of a place it is, jest so's I'm clear of him," said Tommy, speaking rather indistinctly because of the quantity of food in his mouth.

Thus assured that the party whom they wanted to aid was willing to be aided, the boys went on deck in order that they might keep watch of the boat, so as to take the first opportunity of landing the fugitive.

They could see Captain Sammy standing in the bow of the tender, with his harpoon raised ready for throwing, as if he already saw his prey, while Bobby and Rogers were steadily pulling away from the Pearl.

The little boat was soon fully a mile and a half in advance of the steamer, and it seemed certain that they could reach the shore without being discovered, as to their intentions, until after it was too late to capture Tommy.

Suddenly they saw Captain Sammy throw the harpoon, and in another moment the boat dashed ahead with increased speed, showing that the iron was fast in a turtle, which was dragging the boat along at a rapid rate.

It seemed to Dare that the time had come for him to put his plan into execution, and he headed the boat directly for the shore.

"Now start her up!" he shouted to Charley, and an instant after the little craft leaped through the water at a rate that told every ounce of steam had been applied.

For just one moment, and only one, Dare felt sure that he would be successful. Then Captain Sammy's boat was whirled suddenly around, as if the turtle had made up his mind to travel in another direction, and dashed along within fifty yards of the shore at right angles with the course the Pearl was on.

"Slow down!" Dare shouted to Charley, and as the steamer's speed was slackened he saw Captain Sammy waving his hand for him to approach.

"It's all up now," shouted Dare to the engine-room. "Captain Sammy's coming right for us, and you'll have to hide Tommy again."

Between turtle-power and steam-power the two boats came together very rapidly, and by the time they were within hailing distance Captain Sammy succeeded in passing a rope around one of the turtle's flippers, and thus making him prisoner.

"You did the thing just right," said Captain Sammy, as he came on board, "and if you should go turtling all the rest of your life, you never could handle a boat as near right as you have this one."

CHAPTER XVII.

ABOUT TURTLES.

It was a huge turtle which Captain Sammy had captured, and when it was pulled in aboard of the Pearl its jaws opened and shut with a snap as it bit furiously at everything near it.

"Now," said Captain Sammy, assuming the same learned air he had worn during the talk about reefs, "what I want you to tell me is what kind of a turtle that is."

Up to this time the boys hardly knew that there was more than one species of turtles, and with some hesitation Dare confessed as much.

"Why, you boys don't know nothin' at all—nothin' at all," cried Captain Sammy, in tones of disdain. "Thought there wasn't but one kind of turtle, eh, an' you claim to have been brought up among civilized creeters? What was your father thinkin' of, and how did he expect you was going to earn your own living if you didn't know anything about turtles?"

Dare was on the point of saying that inasmuch as they did not intend to become turtle fishers, save for the few months they were in Florida, such knowledge was not of very great importance, although it might be useful. But he checked himself, and said, instead,

"How many kinds are there, sir?"

"There's a good many kinds, and you ought to have known it," replied Captain Sammy, solemnly. "There's the hawksbill, for instance, that what is called the tortoise-shell comes from, an' there used to be a good many of them around here. They are the ones that only lay two sets of eggs, one in July and one in August, and then they lay about one hundred and fifty at a time, or three hundred in all. Then there is the green turtle—and I've seen one that weighed over five hundred pounds. Some folks say they do go as high as seven hundred, but about that you can have your opinion, and I'll have mine. Green turtles commence with the egg business in May, laying two litters in that month, and one in June, averaging about eighty to the nest. That's the kind of turtles that make the best eating. Then there's a kind called the loggerhead that's great on eggs; she lays three sets at about the same time the green turtle does, and when she gets through with her work she's laid five hundred. The trunk turtle ain't so far behind, although she only lays about three hundred and fifty eggs in the season."

The boys almost forgot their pirate under the berth in their surprise at the great number of eggs one turtle would lay, and they were about to ask some questions regarding the manner in which the eggs were deposited, when the little man continued:

"The loggerhead and trunk turtles are mighty savage creatures, and run a good deal larger in size than the others do; they lay their eggs anywhere around here. The green turtle is moreshy, and she gets off where there isn't so much of a chance that any one will find her eggs; but I have known her to come right up on the coast here to make her nest. But the hawkbill, she's the one that takes good care no one finds her out, and when she wants to lay eggs she gets 'way off on the smallest keys. It's my opinion"—and now Captain Sammy looked very wise—"that turtles are a mighty knowing animal. I don't go so far as to say that they know jest what you are talking about, but they come pretty near it."

"How do they make their nests, sir?" asked Dare.

"Now that's where their cunning comes in," said the little man, earnestly. "They don't come out till high water on a moonlight night, and they know when it's high water as well as I do. They go up jest above the highest point of the tide, and scoop out a nest with their flippers in the sand. Then they commence to lay their eggs, doing it very quickly, and when they're done they cover them over with sand and go back into the water again. The sun hatches the eggs, you know, and when the little turtles come out they make a bee-line for the water. They ain't more than an inch long, and the birds gobble up as many of them as they can before they get into the sea."

"How deep are the nests?" asked Charley, wondering whether they might not remain there until it was time to hunt for such nests full of eggs as the Captain had described.

"About a foot and a half deep, and it only takes the old turtle about ten minutes to fill it."

"Now what kind of a turtle is this one?" asked Dare, pointing to the enormous fellow that was snapping savagely at everything near him.

"That? Why, that's a loggerhead, of course, and you ought to know it, after all this talk," cried Captain Sammy, impatiently; and then, as if he had just noticed that the steamer had not started again, he shouted, "What do you mean by loafing around here? Get on at once, for if nothing happens we must anchor off Punta Rassa to-night."

Dare rushed to the pilot-house, Rogers and Charley went to the engine-room, and Bobby was forced to help Captain Sammy in the preparation of turtle soup for dinner.

When Dare went on deck they were just passing Laeosta Island, and Captain Sammy seated himself in the bow again.

Then Boca Captiva and Captiva Island were left astern. Quite late in the afternoon Sanibel Island was reached, the yacht swung gracefully around Point Ybel, up past Fort Dulany and into San Carlos Harbor, anchoring off Punta Rassa a short time after night-fall.

TWO OBSCURE HEROES.

HOW THE PARTISAN WARFARE IN THE CAROLINAS WAS BEGUN.

BY GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON.

WHEN the British marched up from Savannah and took Charleston, in the spring of 1780, they thought the Revolution was at an end in the Southern States, and it really seemed so. Even the patriots thought it was useless to resist any longer, and so when the British ordered all the people to come together at different places and enroll themselves as British subjects, most of them were ready to do it, simply because they thought they could not help themselves.

Only a few daring men here and there were bold enough to think of refusing, and but for them the British could have set up the royal power again in South Carolina, and then they would have been free to take their whole force against the patriots further north. The fate of the whole country depended, to a large extent, upon the courage of the few men who would not give up even at such a time, but kept up the fight against all odds. These brave men forced the British to keep an army in the South which they needed further north.

The credit of beginning this kind of partisan warfare belongs chiefly to two or three plain men, who did it simply because they loved their country more than their ease.

The man who first began it was Justin Gaston—a white-haired patriot who lived on a little stream called Fishing Creek, near Rocky Mount. He was eighty years of age, and might well have thought himself too old to care about war matters; but he was a brave man and a patriot, and the people who lived near him were in the habit of taking his advice and doing as he did.

When the news came that Tarleton had killed a band of patriots under Colonel Buford in cold blood Justin Gaston called his nine sons and many of his nephews around him. Joining hands, these young men promised each other that they never would take the British oath, and never would give up the cause, come what might.

Soon afterward a British force came to the neighborhood, and all the people were ordered to meet at Rocky Mount to enroll their names and take the oath. One of the British officers went to see Justin Gaston, and tried to persuade him that it was folly to refuse. He knew that if Gaston advised the people to give up, there would be no trouble; but the white-haired patriot told him to his face that he would never take the oath himself or advise anybody else to do so.

As soon as the officer left, the old man sent for his friends, and about thirty brave fellows met at his house that night, with their rifles in their hands. They knew there would be a strong force of British and Tories at Rocky Mount the next day, but in spite of the odds against them they made up their minds to attack the place. Creeping through the woods, they suddenly came upon the crowd, and after a sharp fight sent the British flying helter-skelter in every direction. This stopped the work of enrolling the people as British subjects, and it did more than that. It showed the patriots through the whole country that they could still give the British a great deal of trouble, and after this affair many of the men who had thought of giving up rubbed up their rifles instead, and formed little bands of fighting men to keep the war going.

Another man who did much to stir up partisan warfare was the Rev. William Martin, an old and pious preacher in the Scotch-Irish settlements. These Scotch-Irish were very religious people, and their preacher was their leader in all things. One Sunday after the news had come to the settlement that Buford's men had been killed by the British in cold blood, the eloquent old man went into his pulpit and preached about the duty of fighting. In the afternoon he preached again, and even when the service was over he went on in the open air, still preaching to the people how they should fight for their country, until all the men in the settlement were full of fighting spirit. The women told the men to go and do their duty, and that they would take care of the crops.

These little bands of patriots were too small to fight regular battles, or even to hold strong posts. They had to hide in the woods and swamps, and only came out when they saw a chance to strike a blow. Then the blow fell like lightning, and the men who dealt it quickly hid themselves again.

They had signs by which they told each other what least kept them in a hornets' nest. If they could not drive them out of South Carolina, they could keep them there, which was nearly as good a thing to do, because every soldier that Cornwallis had to keep in the South would have been sent to some other part of the country to fight the Americans if the Carolinians had let the British alone.

In this way small bands of resolute men kept Cornwallis busy, and held the State for the American cause, until General Greene went South and took command. Greene was one of the greatest of the American Generals, and after a long campaign he drove the British out of the they were going to do. A twig bent down, a few stones strung along a path, or any other of a hundred small signs, served to tell every patriot when and where to meet his friends. A man riding about, breaking a twig here and there, or making some other sign of the kind, could call together a large force at a chosen spot within a few hours. The men brought out in this way would fall suddenly upon some stray British force that was off its guard, and utterly destroy it. The British would at once send a strong body of troops to punish the daring patriots, but the redcoat leader would look in vain for anybody to punish. The patriots could scatter and hide as quickly as they could come together.

Finding that they could not destroy these patriot companies, the British and Tories took their revenge on women and children. They burned the houses of the patriots, carried off their crops, and killed their cattle, so as to starve their families; but the women were as brave as the men, and from first to last not one of them ever wished her husband or son to give up the fight.

If the patriots could not conquer the British, they at State. But if it had not been for the partisans the South would have been lost long before he could be spared to go there; and if the partisans had not kept a British army busy there, it might have gone very hard with the Americans in the rest of the country.

When we rejoice in the freedom of our country we ought not to forget how much we owe the partisans, and especially such men as Justin Gaston and the Rev. William Martin, who first set the partisans at their work. It would have been much easier and pleasanter for them to remain quiet under British rule; and they had nothing to gain for themselves, but everything to lose, by the course they took. Gaston knew that his home would be burned for what he did, and the eloquent old Scotch preacher knew that he would be put into a prison-pen for preaching war sermons to his people; but they were not men to flinch. They cared more for their country than for themselves, and it was precisely that kind of men throughout the land, from New England to Georgia, who won liberty for us by seven years of hard fighting and terrible suffering.

ELEPHANTS MOVING TIMBER IN BURMAH.

USEFUL ELEPHANTS.

IN the town of Maulmain, in Burmah, the whole business of moving timber is done by elephants. There are many large timber-yards at Maulmain; indeed, it has always been famed for its exports of teak logs, which are cut in the forests upon the banks of the Salween, and then floated, sometimes hundreds of miles, down to the capital. In these timber-yards elephants are employed in drawing, stacking, and shifting the immense teak logs, some of them weighing as much as two tons.

A log that forty men could scarcely move the elephant will quietly lift upon his tusks, and holding it there with his trunk, will carry it to whatever part of the yard his driver directs. They will also, using trunk, feet, and tusks, pile the huge timbers as evenly and correctly as one could wish. They will select and pick out particular timbers from the centre of a stack or heap of more than a hundred simply at the command of the driver. The huge beasts are directed by the mahouts, or drivers, by spoken orders, pressure of the feet on their necks, and by the use of the autobus, or elephant goad.

It usually requires a year or a year and a half to teach them the "lumber business," and when thoroughly taught they are worth from 500 rupees ($250) upward, according to their abilities. Sometimes an animal breaks his tusks through being forced to carry an excessive weight by a stupid or brutal driver, though the elephant knows his own power, and generally refuses to lift more than his tusks can safely bear. If these should be broken off close to the head, death would ensue; if only cracked, they are hooped about with iron bands, and are thus rendered serviceable for many years.

HOW TILDY DROVE THE COWS HOME.

BY SOPHIE SWETT.

"WHERE is that boy 'Bimelech'?" said Aunt Huldah, in an aggravated tone. "There ain't a chore done, and the white turkey has gone across the field to steal her nest again, and the guinea-pigs are squealing for their supper enough to deafen you, and the wood wantin' to be chopped, and Jonas gone to see his mother. Why he couldn't have a mother livin' in this town instead of ten miles off I don't see; but hired men have no consideration for other people, any more than boys have. I should like to know who is going for the cows!"

Aunt Huldah was a little cross, but then—poor woman!—she had had a hard time to manage the farm and make both ends meet since Uncle Joshua died. And although she did scold sometimes, she was very kind to 'Bimelech and Tildy.

"I will go and bring home the cows," said Tildy. "I can ride Lightning bare-backed. I have done it ever so many times."

"I don't think poor old Lightning will ever run away with anybody," said Aunt Huldah. "But it's hard work for you to take down the bars and put them up again. I don't believe in girls doing such things, when it's what boys are for. But there's no telling what time that boy'll be home. Perhaps you may as well go. And you'd better hurry, for it's a lonesome road, and it will be dark before long."

Tildy had old Lightning out of his stall and was on his back in a twinkling. But there was no such thing as hurrying old Lightning. He knew as well as Tildy did that they were only going for the cows, and he didn't mean to hurry his stiff old bones on any such commonplace occasion. It was a long time ago that Lightning had earned his name. Jonas, the hired man, said he was "slower than stock-still" now.

Tildy broke off a beech switch, and tried that as a persuader. She did want to get the cows home in good time, so that Aunt Huldah need not think too much about 'Bimelech's absence. He had a bright new half-dollar that he had earned by picking berries, and there was a circus over at Cranberry Centre. Tildy didn't know that he had gone there, but she was pretty well acquainted with boys. You couldn't have 'Bimelech for a brother without being.

Instead of having his pace quickened by the beech switch, Lightning, not being accustomed to such things, stopped short, and turned his head around to look at it. Then he twitched it out of Tildy's hand, and serenely munched the green leaves.

After that Tildy returned to moral suasion, and told him how important it was to have the cows milked, and the milk taken care of at the proper time, for of the cream was to be made Aunt Huldah's goldenest, sweetest, fragrantest butter, that was expected to take a prize at the Agricultural Fair, and out of the prize money Aunt Huldah had promised to buy her, Tildy, a new cambrie dress—bright blue with tiny spots—to wear to the Sunday-school picnic.

I can't say that old Lightning was touched by these arguments, but he did begin to go a little faster, and before Tildy had fairly decided what color to have the hat trimmed with which Aunt Huldah might have money enough to buy her, to go with the dress, she had reached the pasture.

Instead of being close beside the bars, as they usually were at night, the cows were huddled together in a distant corner of the field, as if they were frightened, and suddenly, as she stopped Lightning at the bars, he began to shiver and pant with terror.

"What can it possibly mean?" said Tildy, aloud. But before the words were out of her mouth her heart seemed to have stopped beating. From behind a clump of bushes there suddenly appeared a huge shaggy brown creature, that walked with a lumbering gait straight toward her.

Tildy knew in a moment that it was a bear. 'Bimelech was very fond of natural history, and knew as much about animals as the school-master himself, and he was always showing pictures of animals to Tildy, and explaining all about them.

A bear he certainly was, and a big one, but how he could have got there was a question. Since the days of her great-grandfather Tildy knew no bears had been seen about there.

She had not much time to think, however, for Lightning, quivering in every limb, dashed over the fence—Lightning, who had not leaped a fence for twenty years!—and, with Tildy clinging for dear life to his neck, went on a dead run across the pasture, over a stone wall on the other side, through the brook, and half-way up the hill, where he stopped exhausted.

Tildy slipped down to the ground. She thought the bear, at that distance, was preferable to Lightning in his present state, which might lead him to dash off again at any moment, for Lightning's terror had not abated; he was only exhausted.

Tildy thought of the cows with a dreadful sinking of the heart, and looked about her for help. But there was not a house or a person in sight.

She stole softly down to the stone wall, as if she expected the bear to appear from behind any bush by the way, and peered over. The cows were still huddled together in a distant corner of the pasture. Against the bars she could see the huge outline of the bear.

Could a bear climb a fence? Tildy had forgotten the teachings of 'Bimelech's natural history books on that subject, but she thought it more than probable that he could. But he certainly did not seem to be making any attempt to do so. Slowly, and with her heart in her mouth, Tildy climbed the stone wall. She was very nimble, and she was sure she could get over it again before that unwieldy creature could reach her, and she might by some means save the cows. If she could only drive them over the stone wall! She walked slowly toward the bars, armed with a large stick.

The bear did not seem ferocious; perhaps she could drive him away. She stopped at a respectful distance and stared at him; she dared not go very near, although the bars were between her and the huge creature. As she stood gazing at him a very strange thing happened. The bear rose on his hind-feet, looked over the bars at her in a friendly fashion, and held out his paw as if for a cordial shake!

This proceeding was so entirely foreign to Tildy's previous ideas concerning the habits of bears that she did not know what to think. But when the bear, finding his friendly overtures disregarded, began to dance a slow and stately minuet, Tildy felt like the little old woman on the King's highway, who cried, "O lauk a-mercy on me, this surely can't be I!"

"Bimelech's natural history books said nothing about this kind of a bear. He seemed to belong in a fairy book. He looked at her as if he really wished her to admire him. Tildy remembered a fairy story she had read of a Prince who was turned into a deer by a wicked fairy; perhaps somebody had been turned into this queer bear.

But being a shrewd, sensible little Yankee girl, Tildy soon came to the conclusion that there must be a more practical solution of the mystery. And suddenly there flashed into her mind a story that Jonas had told of a performing bear he had seen at a circus. She had almost forgotten it, because she had been so much more interested in the other wonders of which Jonas told—the baby elephant, the giraffes, and the talking hyena; but Jonas had said that the bear was perfectly harmless—"as gentle as a baby."

This was certainly a trained bear, and he seemed harmless. Tildy had ceased to tremble now, and she took a long look at him. He was muzzled! Tildy's courage arose with astonishing suddenness. It was not easy to believe in the gentleness of a bear after reading those dreadful stories in 'Bimelech's books; it was a comfort to know that this bear could not bite if he wanted to. He might hug the breath out of her body with those great shaggy paws of his, but he did not seem in the least disposed to any such violence, and Tildy began to feel as brave as a lion.

"What silly cows, to be afraid of a tame creature like that, when he didn't try to touch them!" she exclaimed, forgetting how her teeth had chattered ten minutes before.

There was a collar around the bear's neck, and from it hung a stout rope. If she only dared to take hold of the rope and lead the bear home, what a sensation she should create! thought Tildy. She extended her hand over the top bar, and the bear immediately placed his paw upon it and gave it a little friendly shake. It was such a huge, shaggy paw! Tildy felt a cold chill creeping over her, but she did not flinch. He certainly was a very sociable bear.

Tildy took the bars down slowly, watching him narrowly all the time. She took the rope in her hand, and he still looked at her in the mildest manner possible. She might lead him home with safety, she thought, but she could not leave the cows behind, and their objections to the bear could not be easily overcome. But she resolved to try an experiment; she led him down the road, out of sight and, she hoped, beyond the scent of the cows, he following her with the docility of a dog. She fastened his rope to a tree, and then went back and drove the cows out into the road. They were a little wild and unruly, being evidently still in terror of the bear, but once in the road they started on the trot for home, and Tildy brought up the rear with the bear.

"Bimelech was sitting on the door-step eating apple-pie. Jonas had also returned, and was looking anxiously down the road for Tildy and the cows.

Tildy and the bear were attended by a throng of admirers. Men, women, and children had run out of their houses, and were following the bear.

"Jehosaphat!" said Jonas.

Aunt Huldah rushed to the door, uttered a shriek, and fainted at the sight.

"There isn't another girl in Ponkadonk who would have dared to do that. That comes of being my sister, and knowing all about bears and things," said Bimelech, with his mouth full of pie. "That's the bear that strayed away from the circus. There are posters all over Cranberry Centre offering ten dollars reward for his return. Won't you be rich, Tildy? I'll take you to the circus, and you can pay for both."

Jonas went in search of old Lightning, and soon brought him home, looking thoroughly ashamed of himself, and neighing humbly to Tildy.

"Bimelech carried the bear over to Cranberry Centre to his owners that very night—although Tildy felt very sorry to part with him—and brought Tildy the ten dollars. And Tildy had her new cambric dress and the prettiest hat in Ponkadonk, without waiting for Aunt Huldah's butter prize; and she bought for Bimelech a very big book on natural history, full of pictures of animals and birds, and a beautiful new butter stamp for Aunt Huldah, and a gray neck-tie for Jonas. And when the circus came to Ponkadonk Tildy met her bear again, and he greeted her like an old friend.

SOME MORE KITES.

BY A. W. ROBERTS.

ONE of the newest styles of Chinese kites that is being offered by toy-dealers is known as the tailless fan kite (Fig. 1). The frame of this kite consists of five thin and flat strips of bamboo, the ends of which are shown in the figure as extending beyond the face of the fan. The centre upright strip and the two side strips cross one another at the bottom of the fan, and form a small handle, which acts as a balance weight, and answers the purpose of a tail. The covering is pasted over the entire surface of the fan, and is painted to represent a fan.

The paper covering of this kite is left very loose toward the two upper corners of the fan, so as to form pockets. When flying, the wind fills the pockets and sustains the kite. This style of kite is now selling for from two to five cents each. For a face-band, No. 5, shown in the article of last week, is used.

Fig. 2 is another new style of Chinese kite, the general shape of which is that of a banner. The frame consists of four very thin and flat pieces of split bamboo, which are glued to the back of the kite. The face of this tailless kite is concave; this concavity is produced by a cord which is tied to the ends of the horizontal strips of bamboo, and then tightened. For this kite No. 5 face-band is used.

The round fan kite (Fig. 3) consists of an ordinary Japanese fan, the bamboo handle of which has been cut away, so as to make it very light. This kite requires a strong wind and plenty of tail. Face-band No. 3 is used.

Fig. 4 is a banneret kite. The frame consists of two sticks, the upright one being the stoutest and the cross stick the thinnest. The frame cord starts from near the right-hand end of the cross stick, and passes through a deep notch in the lower end of the upright stick. It is then brought up, and is securely fastened near the left-hand end of the cross stick.

The upright staff of the banneret is ornamented with a small silver paper star. It is strengthened by two cords, which are fastened just below the star and to the cross stick. To each end of the cross stick is attached a bunch of very narrow tissue-paper streamers. The frame of this kite is covered with white paper, on which is painted with water-colors the Stars and Stripes, as shown in the figure. For this kite face-band No. 3 is best. Fig. 5 is a single and very long streamer Union shield kite, which is constructed on the same principle as the shield kite described last week.

Fig. 6 is the "champion American kite" in all respects, it being the highest flier and the best behaved when carefully balanced in all its parts, and will remain motionless in the air for hours at a time. Its proportions are graceful, and will admit of a great deal of ornamentation.

The frame of this kite contains two long and one short and light cross stick. The three sticks are so arranged that they cross one another at three different points. In this way greater strength and solidity are obtained in the frame, and the sticks can be much lighter than when they all cross at one point, as is the case with all three-sticked store kites. To the outer frame cord red, white, and blue tissue-paper fringing is attached, and on the inner frame cord is pasted the red, white, and blue tissue-paper covering of the kite. The pennant staff consists of a very thin strip of bamboo, and is tied to the cross stick and to the two frame cords. It is also braced with two cords, which are fastened near the pennant and to the upper ends of the long sticks. For this kite face-bands Nos. 1 and 2 are used.

When making and flying kites the following suggestions will be found useful: The tailless Japanese and Chinese kites are for light winds; for strong winds they need tails. For pasting, boiled flour paste is best, and the less paste used on a kite the better. There should be as little pasting-down margin as possible, as a perfect kite should combine great lightness with strength.

The covering of a kite can be made water-proof and transparent by applying cheap furniture varnish that has been thinned down with spirits of turpentine, or by applying a coat of hot paraffine; the paper then becomes the so-called "waxed paper" used by confectioners.

When attaching the captive cord to the face-band, remember that it must be so placed as to hold the kite in the teeth of the wind; also fasten thoroughly every tie of the face-band, so as to avoid slip-ties and slip-knots. When selecting thread or twine for the captive cord always choose that which is the lightest, strongest, and most closely twisted, as the constant winding and unwinding will soon tell upon any but the best quality. A good way to preserve the cord is to give it a light coat of melted paraffine; this will hold it together and preserve it from dampness. But it must be borne in mind that the kite has to sustain the weight of the captive cord, and that when it becomes too heavy it sags and bears the kite down.

I have found some of the American sewing-machine threads just the thing for medium-sized kites. Some of these threads are to be had on single spools of a length of two thousand four hundred yards. For large kites carpet thread and upholsterers' twine are the best. It is always the safest rule when kite-making to tie with fine silk thread all parts of the bamboo fishing-rods. From these can be obtained various lengths of bamboo which they have no use for, and any of them will sell for fifty cents an entire but slightly worm-eaten pole, which will make excellent kite sticks. When shaping the sticks for the frame always make them flat, so that when bound together they will not slip, as will round sticks. When using bamboo the projections of the joints should be sand-papered down. The straightness of all sticks should be constantly tested on a level surface.

frame of a kite that cross one another, and to also apply a small quantity of hot glue to the ties. The covering of a kite will never become baggy if the frame is held together firmly by the ties and the frame cord.

The best parties to apply to for bamboo cane are the dealers and makers of

MIXING THE PUDDING.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

HOW does it happen that so important a thing as the mixing of the pudding for papa's birthday dinner has been left to the children? Of course Ethel and Susie have tried their skill in making some of the nice cakes for which receipts have been given in the Post-office Box, and have succeeded very well; but a birthday dinner, and in papa's honor, too, is a great event. No wonder that Gertrude is interested and anxious, and even little Tina has crept down from the nursery and perched herself on the table, ready to give her advice. It would be dreadful to spoil a birthday pudding.

By the time you are as old as Aunt Marjorie, dears, you will have learned never to be surprised at anything, however unexpected. That Bridget's second cousin's wife's sister should arrive from Ireland this very morning, and there being nobody in the world but Bridget to go and meet her at Castle Garden, and that mamma should be seized with one of her worst, most blinding headaches just when she felt as though she had not a moment to spare, and could not be ill, would have been astonishing, I own, if things did not often turn out in precisely that way.

"Perfect quiet in a darkened room will cure me, daughter," said mamma to Ethel, "and if Bridget does not return in time, Norah can cook some sort of a dinner. We'll put off the pudding, and have it to-morrow, and somebody may go to the baker's for a pie."

To the baker's for a pie! Susie said she thought that would be disgraceful, and Ethel and Gertrude agreed with her. So they resolved to steal around like mice, on tiptoes, and make a magnificent pudding, and amaze mamma.

"Pleatse poor mamma!" said lisping Tina.

"Indeed it will," answered capable Ethel.

A good cook once told me that she would rather make nine puddings than one pie. I believe I would myself, for pie-crust is such a dainty thing to manage.

These little girls were always very neat about their cooking, so you may be sure they washed their hands and slipped on clean aprons before they began their work. Then they brought their suet, their eggs, their sugar, and their molasses, and arranged them all on the table, so that they needed to take no extra steps. Norah came down and coaxed the range fire into burning splendidly, and so the small cooks were saved from one great worry. So much depends upon dampers and ovens, you know!

As they were to steam their pudding, Norah set the steamer on for them, and told them to be careful to butter the mould well, so that when done the pudding would not stick fast, but would come out smooth and whole.

Tina and Gertrude stoned the raisins, Susie measured the sugar, and Ethel mixed the mass. This was the receipt they used (they found it in one of mamma's books):

"One cupful of suet chopped fine, one cupful of molasses, one cupful of sweet milk, one cupful of raisins, one tea-spoonful of salt, one small tea-spoonful of soda mixed in the molasses, three and a half cupfuls of flour."

For the sauce, when the pudding was done, they stirred to a cream a half-cupful of butter and a cupful of sugar; they added the white of an egg beaten to a froth, a half-tea-spoonful of vanilla, and a cupful of boiling water thickened with a tea-spoonful of corn starch dissolved in a little cold water. This was allowed to come to the boil, and was taken off to serve with the pudding.

Mamma's head was well by the time dinner was ready, and papa said he was very proud of his clever little daughters. The pudding was excellent.

came to me, and finally he ran off. Then another dog came, and he was killed; and then I had a cut, and he ran off. I can hardly wait for my one Young People to another day for my paper. I liked the "Cruise of the Canoe Club," "Mr. Stubbs's Brother," and "Nan." My motto is "Less talk and more work." C. J. T.

NEWARK, NEW JERSEY.

Having seen so many nice letters in our Post-office Box, May and I thought we would write also, and hope to see it in print. We think that Young People is the jolliest paper of any, and only wish it were three times larger. We have a garden, and intend to raise tomatoes, potatoes, pease, radishes, lettuce, onions, and cutwip. May we join the Little Leaguekeepers? We enclosed a receipt for corn-meal cakes, and also some puzzles. Will the Postmistress kindly let us when modern sewing-machines came into use?

MAY E. H., and SOUROW A. L.

You will find the receipt printed in the next column. Needles of steel were brought from Spain to England in the days of Queen Elizabeth; and you may be surprised to learn that these useful and delicate little tools of the housewife actually pass through one hundred and twenty hands before they are ready for a lady's work-basket. The needle itself is very ancient, and made of ivory, wood, or bone, it was used in India, China, Africa, and, in fact, everywhere, long before Europe became civilized.

FRANKTOWN, NEVADA.

We have an aquarium with two gold-fish in it. We have a great many flowers. The mountains around here are very steep. My brother Henry has two telegraph instruments; my brothers practice telegraphy every night. I have four brothers and two sisters. The stories I like best are "Toby Tyler," "Nan," and "Raising the Cais." We live within one and one-half miles of the railroad. I would like to see your building very much. I was twelve years old on the 6th of April. We have a rooster named "Toby." ALBERT L.

One of these days you may visit New York, and if so, you must come to Franklin Square.

PLYMOUTH, WISCONSIN.

I am four years old. Papa and mamma call me Ref. Papa is an editor, and I have a great many books to read. I like Young People very much. I have a cat by the name of Gardie; he was given to me by a dear friend. I have five picture cards. I am printing this letter myself. Mamma tells me how to spell most of the words. With love. REGINALD A. W.

The dear little man printed every word of this himself in such beautiful plain letters as it did me good to see.

CAMBRIDGEBOROUGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I send you by this mail a specimen of coral from the cave of which I told you in No. 128, also a pebble from the Pacific Ocean for you to keep. We had a dreadful drought the night the line of the floods in February; had to leave the house where we then lived in a boat. The water was three feet deep in the first floor. We now live in my mamma's old home, and the house where I was born. I went from here to the Pacific coast and back here for a year, and had have since lived in Minnesota, Nevada, California, and Arizona. Don't forget to let her papa and mamma, and as she was the only little girl on the vessel, she was often to be found sitting up by herself in a cozy corner of the deck, watching the sails and the wind, and when needed, making a pretty white foam about the side of the vessel.

"Oh dear!" she exclaimed aloud to herself on one morning, "I hope that what would I not give to take a trip to the bottom of the ocean, and see for myself all the wonderful things they say are there!"

"Would you really like it?" asked a sweet little voice at her elbow. "On looking up she beheld one of the sweetest little creatures she had ever seen. Holding out her hand, she said, "Come with me, and I will show you the wonders of the ocean."

Before Ruth had time to think, she was following her little guide down, down to the very depths of the ocean. She was not prepared for the grand sights which everywhere met her. Here were trees of the loveliest hues she had ever seen, and seaweed of all colors and shapes, and shells, and various other jewels in the form of shrubs and plants. Suddenly they came to a most beautiful range of blue mountains, and, turning swiftly round the corner of these, a splendid castle met Ruth's astonished eyes.

"This," said her little companion, "is the Ocean King's palace. Is it not beautiful?" And Ruth looked almost unable to describe. The castle itself was built of coral, beginning with a deep crimson, and ending at the top in a most delicate shade of pink. The doors and windows were studded with all kinds of precious stones, and the conservatory was of diamonds, while the flowers within were the loveliest she had ever seen. The high wall which surrounded the palace was composed of pearls and trapezoids.

In and out of the doors and windows fluttered lovely nymph-like creatures, their great beauty marred only by their having tails instead of feet and limbs. As Ruth reluctantly followed her guide (who had now become the same as these pretty creatures) past this gorgeous palace they came to the ruins of a large vessel that had lately been struck by the waves of a cyclone, and it was with a feeling of great sadness that she turned away and again followed her guide.

Now they came to the dwellings of the poorer classes of mermaids; these were chiefly cottages of dark brown coral studded here and there with garnets. The mermaids that they saw here were almost similar to those they had seen at the castle, but their eyes, instead of being so brilliant and luxuriant, was out close to their heads; for, as the little guide (whose own hair was flowing far beyond her tall) informed Ruth, the ladies had it cut to a mere fringe, and they were obliged to wear, every day, which Ruth thought was rather selfish of the rich ladies who had so much hair of their own.

They travelled much further, seeing many more villages, their guides being the sea-king's daughters, who must have, hoping that she had enjoyed her little trip, and satisfied her curiosity. Before she had time to thank her and kiss the little hand she held toward her, she was gone, and Ruth found herself once more in her cozy seat on the deck of the vessel, wondering if all she had seen was true, or if it had been a dream.

Ruth is now an old woman, but she still looks young, and many have seen her wonderful trip; and of the many stories she tells her little grandchild-her favorite, as well as theirs, is that of the "Ocean's Wonders." V. GIE.

Will Nannie D., of Greenville, South Carolina, oblige the Postmistress by sending her full name?

The Postmistress acknowledges favors from PERRY S., L. L., L., Ray C., Hattie M., Louie B., Mary B., R. F. M. (thanks, dear for your violets), Katie B., Fannie D., Robert P. M., Freddie M., Milton G., B. Gertrude M., Ida M., S., Lydia, Marie, and Carrie, and Archie A., Stanley B., and Edith M. She only wishes she could invent some way of printing these letters, every one of them, without taking up more than the space which can be afforded in the Post-office Box.

GOOD RECEIPTS FOR LITTLE HOUSE-KEEPERS.

CORN-MEAL CAKES.—Take a quart of sweet milk and boil with half a cup of sugar and half a cup of butter; add enough Indian-corn meal to make a stiff batter; beat three eggs to a foam; add half a tea-spoonful of salt, and four eggs; send the milk, and melt the butter in it; when partly cooled, stir in the yolks of the eggs, well beaten, then the salt and flour; when quite cold, stir in the whites of the eggs, well beaten, with froth; bake in rather large patin pans; serve immediately with a sauce. The puddings should be filled with pulp. Strawberry sauce is especially nice with these puddings.

BATTER PUDDINGS, BAKED.—One quart of sifted flour, butter the size of an egg, one pint of milk, half a tea-spoonful of salt, and four eggs; send the milk, and melt the butter in it; when partly cooled, stir in the yolks of the eggs, well beaten, then the salt and flour; when quite cold, stir in the whites of the eggs, well beaten, with froth; bake in rather large patin pans; serve immediately with a sauce. The puddings should be filled with pulp. Strawberry sauce is especially nice with these puddings.

ROLLY POLY PUDDING, BOILED.—Make a biscuit dough, and roll it out into a square about a fourth of an inch thick; spread over it (leaving an inch square at the edge) with any kind of fruit, or berries, such as strawberries, raspberries, etc., sweetened, or preserves; roll it tight; seal it in a cloth, giving room for it to swell; boil it for an hour; serve with almost any kind of pudding sauce. A nice rolly-poly pudding may be made with sponge-cake baked in sheets, spread with preserves or jelly, rolled, sprinkled on top with the crumbs of the cake, and with any kind of fruit.

BAKED BERRY ROLLS.—Roll biscuit dough thin, in the form of a large square; roll this into small squares; spread over with berries; roll the crust, and put the rolls into dripping pan; close together until full; then put into the pan water, sugar, and pieces of butter; bake them; serve any of the pudding sauces.

THE MERCHANT TRICK.

BY G. B. BARTLETT.

THIS is a very amusing game, for it can be found out quite easily by paying close attention, and as its secret dawns upon the players one at a time they do not fail to enjoy the efforts of their companions to discover it also. The players sit in chairs placed in a circle around the room. Several of them should be already familiar with the trick, so that their correct answers will keep up the interest and excite the curiosity of the less fortunate.

One of the players begins by turning to the person at his right, with the remark, "I am a merchant." The player addressed replies with the inquiry, "What do you sell?" He then names some article, as chair, table, nail, tack, sofa, hair. The next player then in his turn informs the player on his right hand in the same words, "I am a merchant," and replies to the inquiry "What do you sell?" with the name of something which he guesses may be the proper article. The leader, he who begins the game, will probably inform the player that his guess is incorrect. The next player then takes his turn, and he too will probably be informed that his guess is not correct. This seems surprising, as he will often try without success the very same articles which have been found to be correct when mentioned by some of the knowing ones.

Profiting by each other's mistakes, the trial goes merrily on, and many ways are tried to discover the process upon which the knowing ones are working. They try the initials of their names and many other devices, and carefully watch the manner of asking and answering the questions.

After puzzling long enough they are somewhat mortified to learn that the answer is correctly given only when the article named is touched with the left hand of the person who is naming it. A little ingenuity will enable the player to touch a great many objects without exciting much attention; but as the game goes on, and the manner of playing begins to be suspected, more caution is needed.

A BATTLE IN THE GRASS.

AFIGHT between a rattlesnake and a black snake was recently witnessed near Fort Worth. The black snake forced the fighting, gliding around in swift circles, while the rattlesnake lay coiled. The circles grew smaller, and the rattlesnake appeared confused as the black snake drew closer. His rattles ceased to give out their usual sharp sound, and his head dropped as if vertigo was seizing him. The black snake seized, by a lightning movement, the rattler by the throat, and, winding about him, the two rolled over and over together. In a few moments the rattlesnake ceased to breathe. An examination of the dead body of the rattlesnake revealed a fracture in the spine as complete as if done by a blow with a club. The rattlesnake measured five feet and three inches.

open, I wonder?" exclaimed Gus, indignantly. "It's a shame! they'll give my pony cold."

"And where is the pony?" said Harry, peeping over his shoulder.

"Gone!" exclaimed Gus, in a startled voice, as he entered the building.

"But where?" asked Harry, looking around.

"FRISKY;"

OR, GUS ANDREWS'S REVENGE.

BY JULIA K. HILDRETH.

"If you make haste, Harry, we can harness the pony and ride ten miles and back before tea," said Gus Andrews, running toward the stable.

"I am ready, Gus," answered Harry.

"Who left the stable door

"See here, Gus, these must be his tracks, leading toward old Mr. Beggs's garden."

"Are you looking for your new pony, Gus?" said a ragged little urchin, who had been watching them from the road.

"Yes," answered Gus, turning around quickly. "Do you know anything about him?"

"I saw old Miser Beggs larrupping him like fun all around his door-yard this morning. My! how Frisky did hop and kick! But old Beggs caught him at last, and shut him up in his barn, and there he is now, I think," said the little fellow, as he walked away.

"Well, if that is not too bad!" grumbled Harry. "What will you do now, Gus?"

"Why, go after him at once," answered Gus.

As the boys approached Mr. Beggs's house, which was close by their own, a small wrinkled old man came out of the gate, leading a beautiful bay pony. The pony seemed very much subdued, and walked with his head down. It was the truant Frisky. Gus ran up to the old man, and said, politely:

"Mr. Beggs, will you be kind enough to tell me how much damage Frisky has done, and let me pay for it, and take him home? I promise he shall not trouble you again."

"Get out of my way, boy," snarled the old man. "You can pay the pound-master fur him, 'cause that's where he's agoin'. It's the law, you know, and I sha'n't break the law fur nobody."

"Please, Mr. Beggs," pleaded Gus, "let me have my pony. They will starve him, I know, at the pound."

"He's 'most starved a'ready," chuckled the old man. "But it will do him good, and take some of the nasty tricks out of him."

Frisky turned his head and tried to pull away from Mr. Beggs at the sound of his master's voice, but the old man struck him several blows with a knotted stick which he carried, and the pony became quiet again, and followed him dejectedly.

"Stop beating my pony!" screamed Gus, in a rage, as he saw the stick fall upon Frisky's sleek sides. "I'll be even with you—see if I don't."

He was so angry that he stamped his feet, and shook his clinched fist furiously after old Mr. Beggs. Then, as soon as the pony and his jailer were out of sight, he threw himself upon the ground and cried aloud. Harry tried to comfort him, but in vain.

"He will starve," sobbed Gus. "Father will not be home in time to get him out this evening, for they close the pound at six, and I don't know what may happen to poor Frisky before morning."

"I think they will take good care of him, Gus. Come home with me and try my new scroll-saw, and forget poor Frisky until to-morrow."

"I can't," replied Gus. "It's no use."

The two boys sat talking until the short afternoon was over and it began to grow dark. Then they walked slowly homeward. Their houses stood side by side, only separated by a small garden. As Harry bade his friend good-by, he said,

"Don't fret, Gus, it will be all right to-morrow."

"I hope so," answered Gus; "but I know I'd like to beat that miserly old mummy to a jelly."

After tea Gus went to his own room and tried to read, but he could think of nothing but Frisky, and how to revenge himself upon Mr. Beggs, or Miser Beggs, as the children called him. The old man lived all alone in a half-ruined little cottage that stood at a short distance from Gus Andrews's home. He was supposed to have a great quantity of money hidden in various nooks and corners of his dwelling. But he himself declared that he was so poor that he expected to die in the work-house. As he was very ill-natured, and seemed to dislike everybody, he was shunned by all. He had no companion but a poor one-eyed dog, almost as disagreeable as his master, and who, like him, appeared to take delight in snapping and snarling at every one. This dog was named Cyclops, and was the terror of the neighborhood.

Gus remained up until he grew very tired and cold; then he went to bed. "Morning will come all the sooner if I can sleep," said he, as he drew the blankets over his ears.

But Gus did not sleep until morning. About eleven o'clock he was awakened by a flash of light across his face. He sprang up to ascertain the cause, and found that the light came from the direction of Mr. Beggs's cottage, which was in sight of his bedroom window. There was a little half curtain at the miser's dingy window, and over that Gus saw that the room was brilliantly lighted up with a flickering glare that sometimes burned brightly and at others died away altogether.

"His house is on fire," said Gus to himself, "and I am glad of it. I hope every stick of the old shanty will burn up."

He watched for a few moments longer, thinking to see the old man run out and give the alarm; but everything remained quiet. No one seemed to notice the fire, and it kept growing brighter and brighter. Then Gus began to be uneasy.

"It will never do to let the old man burn to death in his bed," said he, as he began dressing hastily. "I'll go and see what Harry thinks we ought to do."

He slipped down-stairs softly and across the garden to Harry's window. It was so near the ground that he could reach it easily. So he tapped loudly on the pane, and after a few moments Harry lifted the window, and inquired, in a sleepy voice:

"Is that you, Gus? What's the matter?"

"Old Miser Beggs's shanty is on fire. Come out, Harry."

"Good!" said Harry. "Let it burn. He has money enough to buy a thousand old shanties like that."

"But, Harry, I am afraid Mr. Beggs is in the house asleep; for I can't see any one moving, and old Clops is howling frightfully."

"Oh!" said Harry, in a startled voice. "I'll be dressed in a moment."

Gus watched the light in Mr. Beggs's window impatiently while waiting for Harry, who presently climbed out. Then the two boys scampered off in the direction of the old man's house. No one had yet been alarmed, and the fire was spreading rapidly. When they reached the window with the half curtain Gus climbed upon the sill and peeped in.

"Harry," he shouted, "beat on the door! The room is full of smoke, and I can see something on the bed. Old Clops is running backward and forward. The whole side of the room seems to be on fire. Be quick! Pound as hard as you can."

Gus and Harry tried for some time to arouse the old man, but he did not even stir, although Cyclops added to the turmoil by howling and barking more furiously than ever.

"I shall have to break through the window," said Gus at last, when he found nothing would arouse the old man. Together they pulled the rickety window from the casement, and Gus jumped into the burning room. Clops flew at him as his feet touched the floor, and snapped and barked at him with what little breath he had left, for he too was almost smothered by the smoke.

Gus hurried to the bed where the old man lay. The smoke was so dense that he could scarcely breathe, but he shook Mr. Beggs, and called his name several times. He did not move. So Gus ran to the window, and between coughing and gasping told Harry that they would have to carry the miserable old man out, for he could not awake him.

Harry sprang into the thick smoke, and followed Gus.

The boys half-dragged, half-carried the old man to the window. The smoke blinded and choked them, and old Clops bit and snapped at their heels; but at last they got him to the window, and propped him up until the fresh cool air had revived him a little. Then they coaxed him to climb out and sit on a stone in front of his house. Gus wrapped a quilt that he had snatched from the bed around the poor shivering old man. He was only half-conscious even now, and sat mumbling to himself, his head buried in his hands. Old Clops crouched at his feet, whining.

"Here comes some one," exclaimed Harry. "Let's call fire. Perhaps we can save Mr. Beggs's house."

"Fire! fire!" screamed the boys at once, and Cyclops gave a long, melancholy howl.

A man ran down the narrow road leading to the miser's cottage, and said, "Hello! what's the matter?"

"Mr. Beggs's house is on fire, and he has been half-suffocated with the smoke," answered Gus.

In a few moments the little door-yard was full of busy people engaged in extinguishing the flames, and it was not long before the only signs of the fire left were a strong smell of burning wood and a little smoke.

"I say, Mr. Beggs," said the man who had come to the fire first, "you had better knock the fire out of your pipe before you put it in your pocket another time. It may save tobacco, but it's rather expensive in the long-run. See here," said he, holding up a badly burned coat, and taking a pipe from the pocket, "this garment is good for nothing, and your house will need some repairing before it's a pleasant place to live in."

Mr. Beggs sprang up with a growl, snatched the coat from the man's hand, and holding the quilt around him stalked into the house, without a word of thanks, and banged the door after him.

The men who had worked so hard to save the miser's house looked at each other and laughed. Then they went quietly home, and Gus and Harry were alone again. After saying a few words to each other they also returned to their beds.

Early the next morning, while Gus was dressing, Harry called him from the garden.

"Gus," he said, "come down; I want to show you something."

Gus hurried to join his friend, and said,

"Well, what is it, Harry?"

"Look at that," answered Harry, pointing down the road.

Gus turned, and saw old Mr. Beggs coming slowly toward them leading Frisky by the bridle.

"Here's your horse," mumbled the old man, looking everywhere but at Gus. "I am sorry I used you so mean. You said you'd pay me up, and so yer did. You saved my life. I'd rather you had hit me. In general I don't set much store by boys, but I kinder think you two are different from other boys."

"Thank you, Mr. Beggs, for bringing Frisky back," cried Gus, delightedly. "How much do I owe you?"

"Nothing, boy," said the old man, shaking his head. "If anybody owes anything, it's me, I guess. I'll pay you some day, my boys—some other day."

"We have done nothing to deserve pay," said Gus. "Have we, Harry?"

"No, indeed," answered Harry, as he stroked the pony's nose.

The old man pulled out a large red cotton handkerchief, turned away, wiped his eyes, and went into his own house.

Frisky was as pleased to return home as his master was to have him safe again. That afternoon Gus and Harry took their long ride. On their return, as they passed Mr. Beggs's house, they saw the old man leaning over the gate. He stopped them and asked,

"Did you have a fine ride, boys?"

"Yes, thank you," answered Gus.

Then Mr. Beggs gave Frisky a lump of sugar, and immediately went into the house and shut the door, as though he were ashamed of what he had done.

After that day whenever Gus drove Frisky out, Mr. Beggs would watch for him over the garden gate, and nod his head and grin as he passed. He never said a word about the burned house, but patched it up himself as well as he could with a few old boards from his tumble-down barn.

About three years after the fire old Miser Beggs died. He left a will bequeathing his old dog Cyclops to Gus, and his property to be divided equally between the two boys. His money, instead of being hidden about the old shanty, was deposited safely in various banks, where it was to lie and accumulate until Gus and Harry became of age.

Cyclops proved to be at first rather a troublesome bequest, for he snarled and snapped at every one who approached him, and flatly refused to leave his old home. But after a while he grew a little less savage, and would wag his stump of a tail when Gus brought him a piece of meat.

Then one day of his own accord he followed his new master home, where he remain'd ever after. And although he never grew beautiful, the boys became so fond of him that he was their constant companion in all their sports. Especially did he take to Frisky. When Gus was on his back Clops would follow close behind, and when the boy was grooming him Clops would hold the bridle in his mouth, and superintend the operation with all the gravity in the world. Never was there such a good understanding between a dog and a pony before.

ON COLLECTING MOTHS.

BY HELEN S. CONANT.

MOTHS belong to the order of insect life called Lepidoptera—a name signifying scaly wings. If you touch the wings of these insects too roughly, what appears to be a fine mealy powder is left on your fingers. If you examine the wings with a powerful microscope, you will find that they are covered with little scales so fine that to the naked eye they seem like powder. These scales cover the entire wing, overlapping each other like the scales on a fish.

Directions for catching butterflies were given in YOUNG PEOPLE, Vol. III., No. 142. The same method should be followed in capturing moths, only you can not take your net and hunt for them in the sunny fields as you hunt for butterflies. In the evening, when the lamps are lighted, they will fly in at the open window, and bump their heads against the ceiling of the room, or flutter blindly about the lamp on the table, and if you have your net and ether ready you can easily catch them and add them to your collection.

It is very easy to distinguish a butterfly from a moth when the insect is at rest. A butterfly always has its wings upright. The little skipper butterflies are the only exception to this rule, and even those always elevate the fore-wings. But the moth when it alights always puts its wings in a horizontal position, folding the fore pair backward so that the hind-wings are almost concealed. Another difference is that while butterflies flutter about in the sunshine and at night creep in among the leaves and go to sleep, moths sleep all day, coming from their hiding-places as it grows dark, to spend the night hunting for the sweet little honey cups of flowers where their food is stored. In scrambling about among the bushes in the daytime you will often disturb some moth. Then it will flutter about blindly and be easily caught. There is also a great difference between the caterpillars of moths and butterflies, and in the manner in which they form their chrysalides and cocoons, which you will find fully described in books on Lepidoptera.

Moths are divided into two great families, Hawk-moths or Sphinxes, and Moths or Phalena. The Hawk-moths are called sphinxes because the caterpillars have a curious habit of elevating the fore-part of the body and remaining immovable for hours, which reminded Linnaeus, the great naturalist who named them, of the Egyptian Sphinx. The hawk-moths hover in the air like a humming-bird while they suck honey from the flowers.

CHRYSLIS OF THE HAWK MOTH.

There is one very large hawk-moth which may be found any summer evening taking its supper from the honey-suckle and other sweet flowers. As it poises in the air fluttering its large wings, it makes a loud humming sound like the buzzing of a beetle. Throw a net over it carefully, and give it a good dose of ether, for it is a strong insect, and will not yield its life easily. Its large gray wings, which expand about five inches, are ornamented with blackish markings, and on each side of its thick body are five dull orange spots which give it the name of five-spotted sphinx. You will think at first that in catching it you have broken off the long tongue which you saw it thrust into the flower cups; but look under its head, and there you will find the tongue snugly rolled up like a watch spring. Take a pin and unroll it carefully before it is dry, for it is a wonderful tongue, five or six inches in length, long enough to penetrate to the bottom of the largest flowers. The caterpillar of the five-spotted sphinx is the large green potato-worm familiar to every country boy. It crawls into the ground to form its chrysalis, which is of a shiny brown color.

The great elm

moth is another sphinx which is easily captured. It lives in elm-trees during July and August. It is as large as the moth just described, and has light brown wings, marked with dark brown and white. In summer evenings these creatures often fly into the lighted parlors of country houses, especially when elm-trees grow on the lawn.

There is one group of sphinxes which, unlike most of their family, fly in the daytime. They look like humming-birds as they flit about over sweet-scented flowers. They have thick dark brown bodies covered with down, and their wings are like lace with a downy border of reddish-brown. These moths are called Aegerians.

The division of Lepidoptera, which Linnaeus named Phalena, contains a great multitude of moths. The tiny creatures which as caterpillars eat woollen and fur in the summer belong to this family, and in some tropical countries there are moths among the Phalena with wings expanding twelve inches.

One of the largest moths which flies here in the North is the Attacus cecropia. Its wings expand fully six inches. They are reddish brown in color, with a gray margin ornamented with wavy black lines. Near the centre of each wing is an oblong white spot shaded on the edge with brick red. This handsome moth appears in June, and is rarely found during the latter part of summer, but its great caterpillar crawls about on fruit trees and currant bushes in August. About the first of September, when it is fully grown, it is an enormous creature, larger and longer than a man's finger. It is then of a light green color, and covered with red, yellow, and blue warts. It spins its cocoon early in the autumn, fastening itself to the side of the twig where it has been feeding. The cocoon looks like an oblong bunch of thick brown paper, and is fastened to the twig with threads so strong that it is very difficult to break them. If you find a cocoon, do not try to detach it from its resting-place, but break off the twig, and if you keep it all winter in a cool place, the beautiful moth will crawl forth in the spring.

The Dryocampa imperialis is another large and very handsome moth. Its wings, which expand about five inches, are pale yellow, dotted with purple, and crossed by wavy purple bands. It leaves the chrysalis in June, and flies about until early in July, when it disappears. The last of August you will find its caterpillar crawling about on buttonwood-trees. It is a great green creature with a red back and orange-colored head. The last of September it goes into the ground to form its chrysalis, which lies safely hidden all winter, and works its way to the surface of the earth in spring just before the time when the moth will burst forth.

It is well to gather all the cocoons and chrysalides you can find, but do not keep them in close covered boxes, for the moth can not expand and dry its wings without room and air. When the moth first crawls forth its wings are folded around its body, and it looks like a worm. It takes several hours for the wings to open and become soft and velvety. If you are successful in getting a good collection of chrysalides, place them on a shelf where they will not be disturbed, and cover them with wire covers or baskets of fine wicker-work.

Watch them carefully, otherwise the moth may come out and die, and become so dry before it is found that it will crumble if you try to arrange it in your collection.

Nearly all of the small gray millers which flutter around the evening lamp belong to the Phalena family. These little insects are not very pretty, but sometimes you will find one among them with beautifully colored wings. The Deiopeia bella, which flies all through the summer, is a very pretty little creature. It expands only one inch and a half. Its fore-wings are yellow, marked with white bands and black dots, and the hind-wings are scarlet, bordered with black.

Many of the Aretians, or woolly bears, are pretty moths. They are called woolly bears because the caterpillars are covered with hair. The black and tan-red caterpillar which rolls itself into a little ball when touched is one of the woolly bears. Its moth is dull yellow spotted with black. One of the prettiest of the woolly-bear moths is the Aretia acrea.

You will find it more difficult to classify and name moths than butterflies, because there are so many varieties which vary very little in appearance.

Make your collection as large and perfect as possible, and if you can examine your specimens through a good microscope you will admire more than ever before the wonderful delicacy and perfection of nature's handiwork.

"HE PINCHED JUST AS HARD AS HE COULD PINCH."

AN ACCIDENT.

BY JIMMY BROWN.

UNT ELIZA never comes to our house without getting me into difficulties. I don't really think she means to do it, but it gets itself done just the same. She was at our house last week, and though I meant to behave in the most exemplifying manner, I happened by accident to do something which she said ought to fill me with remorse for the rest of my days.

Remorse is a dreadful thing to have. Some people have it so bad that they never get over it. There was once a ghost who suffered dreadfully from remorse. He was a tall white ghost, with a large cotton umbrella. He haunted a house where he used to walk up and down, carrying his umbrella and looking awfully solemn. People used to wonder what he wanted of an umbrella, but they never asked him, because they always shrieked and fainted away when they saw the ghost, and when they were brought to cry, "Save me take it away take it away."

One time a boy came to the house to spend Christmas. He was just a terror, was this boy. He had been a District Telegraph Messenger boy, and he wasn't afraid of anything. The folks told him about the ghost, but he said he didn't care for any living ghost, and had just as soon see him as not.

That night the boy woke up, and saw the ghost standing in his bedroom, and he said: "Thishyer is nice conduct, coming into a gentleman's room without knocking. What do you want, anyway?"

The ghost replied in the most respectful way that he wanted to find the owner of the umbrella. "I stole that umbrella when I was alive," he said, "and I am filled with remorse."

"I should think you would be," said the boy, "for it is the worst old cotton umbrella I ever saw."

"If I can only find the owner and give it back to him," continued the ghost, "I can get a little rest; but I've been looking for him for ninety years, and I can't find him."

"Serves you right," said the boy, "for not sending for a messenger. You're in luck to meet me. Gimme the umbrella, and I'll give it back to the owner."

"Bless you," said the ghost, handing the umbrella to the boy; "you have saved me. Now I will go away and rest," and he turned to go out of the door, when the boy said,

"See here; it's fifty cents for taking an umbrella home, and I've got to be paid in advance."

"But I haven't got any money," said the ghost.

"Can't help that," said the boy. "You give me fifty cents, or else take your umbrella back again. We don't do any work in our office for nothing."

Well, the end of it all was that the ghost left the umbrella with the boy, and the next night he came back with the money, though where he got it nobody will ever know. The boy kept the money, and threw the umbrella away, for he was a real bad boy, and only made believe that he was going to find the owner; and the ghost was never seen again.

But I haven't told about the trouble with Aunt Eliza yet. The day she came to our house mother bought a lot of live crabs from a man, and put them in a pail in the kitchen. Tom McGinnis was spending the day with me, and I said to him what fun it would be to have crab races, such as we used to have down at the sea-shore last summer. He said wouldn't it, though; so each of us took three crabs, and went upstairs into the spare bedroom, where we could be sure of not being disturbed. We had a splendid time with the crabs, and I won more than half the races. All of a sudden I heard mother calling me, and Tom and I just dropped the crabs into an empty work-basket, and pushed it under the sofa out of sight, and then went down-stairs.

I meant to get the crabs and take them back to the kitchen again, but I forgot all about it, for Aunt Eliza came just after mother had called me, and everybody was busy talking to her. Of course she was put into the spare room, and as she was very tired, she said she'd lie down on the sofa until dinner-time and take her hair down.

About an hour afterward we heard the most dreadful cries from Aunt Eliza's room, and everybody rushed upstairs, because they thought she must certainly be dead. Mother opened the door, and we all went in. Aunt Eliza was standing in the middle of the floor, and jumping up and down, and crying and shrieking at the top of her voice.

One crab was hanging on to one of her fingers, and he pinched just as hard as he could pinch, and there were two more hanging on to the ends of her hair. You see, the crabs had got out of the work-basket, and some of them had climbed up the sofa while Aunt Eliza was asleep.

Of course they said it was all my fault, and perhaps it was. But I'd like to know if it's a fair thing to leave crabs where they can tempt a fellow, and then to be severe with him when he forgets to put them back. However, I forgive everybody, especially Aunt Eliza, who really doesn't mean any harm.

CHAPTER XVIII.

UP THE CALOOSAHATCHEE.

IT was at Punta Rassa that Tom Rogers was to leave the Pearl, and Charley take his place at the engine. That night, while Captain Sammy was on deck making everything fast and snug, Dare found an opportunity of whispering to Tommy that he hoped to get him ashore in the morning.

A mail steamer made weekly trips between Punta Rassa, Tampa, and Cedar Keys, and it was very probable that Tommy could get a passage upon her, even if he could not induce Rogers to take him home with him. It seemed, therefore, to be of the highest importance that the pirate should leave the Pearl at that point.

It would have been impossible for the prisoner to have moved around the cabin any that night, for Captain Sammy was up and down like a jack-in-a-box, and the first move would have been sure to result in detection.

At last the boys dropped off to sleep one by one, and when they awakened again Captain Sammy was in the engine-room preparing Rogers's breakfast, so that he could get on shore very early.

While Dare was in the cabin, on the alert to every move Captain Sammy made, he saw Tommy's head cautiously appear from under the berth, and heard the unhappy pirate whisper,

"You'll be certain to get me out of this to-day, won't you?"

"I'll do the best I can," replied Dare, bending low over the berth, that no one should hear his whisper; "but I don't see how it's going to be done."

"I shall die if I have to stay here any longer. I know I shall, for it's just awful," and the two tears that rolled down the pirate's cheeks attested to the fact of his suffering.

There was no time for Dare to express his sympathy, for Captain Sammy entered the cabin just then, and Tommy withdrew his head so quickly that he hit it a terrible thump on the berth above.

"Do any of the boys want to see the town?" the little man asked.

"I don't think they do, sir. Of course, if you want to send there for anything, any of us will go."

"No, I don't want to send, for I am going on shore myself to carry Rogers. I thought if any of you wanted to go, you'd better be getting ready. But it's just as well you don't want to, for there ain't more than twenty houses there, and really nothing to see."

Dare's heart seemed to come up into his throat, so great was his delight that Captain Sammy was going ashore, for it seemed almost certain that, once left alone, they could dispose of Tommy in some way.

* Begun in No. 173, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

He found an opportunity of warning Charley not to express any desire to see Punta Rassa, and then went on deck to say good-by to Rogers.

"Have everything ready so that we can leave the moment I get back," shouted Captain Sammy, as the little tender left the Pearl, and even as he shouted, the boys could hear Tommy scurrying around below, probably engaged in stretching his legs.

Strange as it may seem, the boys had not once thought that they should be without the means of reaching the shore after Captain Sammy left in the tender, and Dare's joy at his going was very short-lived, for he realized when the little craft left the Pearl, that he and his crew were quite as much prisoners as was Tommy.

"There's only one chance," he said, mournfully, to Charley, "and that is that a boat may come alongside, or near us, while he is gone. Let all hands keep a bright lookout, and if we see any kind of a craft, hail her."

Tommy was perfectly quiet below, and there was no doubt but that he was making rapid inroads on the larder.

The watch on the bow of the Pearl was not continued very long, for in five minutes after Captain Sammy stepped ashore he was seen returning with some bundles in his hands, and he started directly for the steamer.

"It's all up now," said Dare, with a groan. "Our trip is spoiled all because of Tommy, for I know something dreadful will happen when Captain Sammy sees him, and there isn't much chance that we can keep him hidden very long."

Then he went down to tell the prisoner that he must get into his dungeon again, or what would be altogether for the best, show himself, and be set ashore as soon afterward as the little Captain would permit.

But at this last proposal Tommy showed such signs of fear that it was useless to urge it. He declared that he had rather jump overboard and run the risk of being eaten by sharks, which death, he thought, would be far easier than the one the Captain would mete out to him. He insisted that there would be plenty of opportunities for him to get on shore after they were farther up the river, and that he would gladly take the chances of the walk through the woods to Punta Rassa rather than face his enemy.

Then Charley proposed that he should hide under the little berth off of the engine-room rather than in the forward cabin, since in that place they would have a better chance to give him his food, and he could go into the standing-room after all the others were in bed.

This change was gladly accepted by the disconsolate pirate, and he hastened to stow himself away as quickly as possible.

"You'll certain let me know when there's the littlest chance for me to get ashore, won't you?" he asked, imploringly; and Dare assured him decidedly that he was quite as anxious to land him as he was to be landed.

When Captain Sammy stepped on board he looked around him for some evidences that preparations had been made for getting the steamer under way, but everything was as he had left it. The crew bustled around lively enough as soon as he was there; but their idleness during his absence was something he could not understand, and Dare believed the little man had grown suspicious. He well knew that if the Captain should seriously suspect that something was taking place on the steamer which was kept a secret from him, it would not take him long to discover everything, and then would come the tragedy he had been fearing.

It was not many minutes after this before Charley announced that he was ready. The anchor was weighed, and the Pearl steamed swiftly up the sluggish waters of the Caloosahatchee River.

They had been about two hours on their journey when Bobby crept into the pilot-house, and in a way intended to be secret, but which would instantly attract attention, whispered to Dare that Charley and Tommy had formed a plan which they wanted him to consent to. It was that one of the boys should call Captain Sammy into the cabin, and there engage his attention until the pirate could creep out on deck, jump into the tender, and row ashore. After he had made his escape into the woods some one could discover that the boat had gone adrift, and the steamer be put back for it. In case Captain Sammy should discover the plot after Tommy had east the boat loose from the steamer, and while he was yet in sight, Charley was to pretend to misunderstand the signals given, and thus the pirate would escape before the steamer could be stopped.

Dare did not like the plan because of the deception necessary to practice on the little man, but something must be done, even if it was desperate, and he told Bobby to go away for a while until he could think the matter over.

All this time Captain Sammy was leaning over the rail in a careless sort of way, as if he was paying no attention to what was taking place behind him; but had any of the boys watched him carefully they would have seen that he was on the alert for everything around him.

Dare realized that if they did not part company with the pirate very soon they would be so far from any settlement as to make it impossible that he could ever reach home; therefore, much as he disliked Charley's plan, he concluded that it should be tried.

He made motions to Bobby to come into the pilot-house again, and there another whispered consultation was held as to how Bobby should contrive to get the little man into the cabin and keep him there.

Then Bobby returned to Charley, telling him what Dare had said, and warning him to have Tommy all ready when Dare should give the signal by whistling through the speaking-tube.

Dare proposed to wait until they should come to a bend in the river before the plan was carried into execution, so that Tommy could be more sure of getting out of sight quickly. In less than half an hour the Pearl approached what seemed to be the very place of all others in which to try the experiment.

Dare whistled to Charley, and was about to motion to Bobby to do his portion of the work, when Captain Sammy started to his feet as if he had received an electric shock.

"I don't like this!" he shouted, in what to Dare seemed a stern voice. "Tell Charley to stop her."

It was with a sinking heart that Dare rang the bell, for he felt that the critical moment had come, and that in a very short time Captain Sammy would know all.

CHAPTER XIX.

CAPTAIN SAMMY'S PERIL.

WHEN the little man gave the order to stop the Pearl he spoke in such a loud voice that every one on board heard him, and for a few moments confusion reigned in the engine-room.

Of course each one thought, as Dare had, that the pirate's presence was discovered, or would be in a very short time, and Tommy's knees trembled so that he could hardly manage to creep into his new hiding-place in the after-cabin.

But the cause of Captain Sammy's apparently singular action arose from a more innocent reason than the guilty boys believed.

"I don't like this idea of rushing ahead as if everything depended on our getting to Lake Okeechobee at a certain time," he said, when the boys stood before him, "and it is too bad not to take our share of these fish before we go any farther."

The faces of his listeners lightened up at once when they found that they had no cause for fear on Tommy's account. As soon as they learned that he wanted some fish, the boys produced their lines and hooks with an eagerness which caused the little man to smile.

It did not take the three boys—Captain Sammy not caring to try his luck—very long to catch all the fish, and even more, than they could possibly use, and when they drew in their lines they had as many black bass, bream, cat-fish, and perch as it was possible for the hungriest crew to dispose of before they spoiled.

Captain Sammy surveyed the catch with a grim satisfaction, and while the boys were winding up their lines preparatory to starting on their journey again he pointed out to them four quite large sharks which were lying motionless near the surface of the water, as if they expected a portion of the spoils.

“Look at ‘em!” cried the little man, as he shook his fist in helpless wrath toward the members of the same family that had dined off his leg. “You’ll find folks so ignorant as to tell you that sharks won’t come up a river, and here we are fully twelve miles from the bay. I tell you a shark will follow a boat for days in hopes that somebody will be foolish enough to tumble overboard, and just as likely as not those fellows have followed us all the way from Tampa.”

The boys could not repress a shudder as they gazed at the wicked-looking fish, and it was not difficult to believe that Captain Sammy had told the truth, and that they were following the steamer in the hope of making a meal of human flesh.

The view of the sharks was not a pleasant one, and when Captain Sammy called Bobby into the standing-room with him to help clean the fish, Dare and Charley started the Pearl again.

The farther up the river they proceeded the more numerous had the alligators become, until now it required no small amount of skill on the part of the helmsman to prevent the little craft from running into the unwieldy creatures.

Once or twice the Pearl went so near to them as to rub against their scaly backs, and Captain Sammy, perched upon the rail at the extreme stern of the boat, ordered Charley to tell Dare to “keep his eye peeled or the steamer might get another hole knocked in her bow.”

When the little man asked Bobby to come into the standing-room he stated that it was to help him clean the fish; but when the work began Bobby was the one who was obliged to do the greater portion of it, while Captain Sammy, from his elevated seat on the rail, gave his youthful assistant scientific lectures as to how the work should be done.

Dare now had little time to think of the pirate, for it seemed almost as if the alligators were doing their best to strike the Pearl with their long ugly snouts.

One seemed to have risen from the bottom of the river not a dozen feet from the bow of the steamer, and Dare was obliged to swing his wheel hard down to avoid him. As it was, the little craft struck him about half-way from bow to midship, riding up on his scaly back in a way that caused her to careen until the starboard guard was even with the water.

Dare had tried to escape one danger without noticing whether he might not be running into another, and the consequence was that the steamer struck full upon one of the largest of the monsters at the same time she careened so badly.

Dare had no thought of anything save the possible damage that might have been done to the boat, and therefore gave no heed to the cry which came from the stern. In fact, so alarmed was he lest they were in a sinking condition, that he could not tell afterward whether or no he heard any cry whatever.

But in a very few seconds he saw that the engine had been suddenly reversed, and then came the startling cry, both from Bobby and Charley:

“Captain Sammy’s overboard! Captain Sammy’s overboard!”

A VOYAGE OF DISCOVERY.

BY S. D. A.

TROTTY is standing at the window, looking disconsolately up at the clouds, and wondering if it will ever stop raining. She is so tired of the rain, and of hearing mamma and Miss Carlotta talk!

"How long they have been at it!" thinks Trotty. "Most the whole afternoon."

Then she leans her golden head against the curtain and listens attentively, with a vague hope of hearing something that may be interesting.

It is such a pretty room she is looking into. The wainscoted walls have lovely plaques hanging on them, the shelves of the mantel hold many a rare bit of porcelain, and the hangings and the furniture are so bright and warm with their rich folds and soft coloring. Mamma sits in her low chair with her slim foot resting on the brass fender, idly smoothing her pet kitten Royal as he lies curled up like a great white caterpillar on her soft dress.

Mamma's friend Miss Carlotta stands at the end of the mantel shelf, where the lamp, with its globe covered with gold butterflies, sheds a soft light on her golden hair and the pale blue folds of her dress. She looks, as she stands there tall and straight, like the angel in the church window, thinks Trotty.

The fire flashes up, and seems to put some of its own life into the locket mamma wears around her neck, so brightly does it shine. It catches Miss Carlotta's eye.

"Whom have you in that locket, Helen?" she asks.

"Fred," simply answers mamma. But a shade comes over her sweet face.

"May I see it?" says Miss Carlotta, coming closer to mamma's chair.

Mamma unclasps the chain, and lays the locket in Miss Carlotta's outstretched hand. Miss Carlotta looks at it a little while in silence.

"Have you no clew to him yet?" she asks presently.

"None at all," replies mamma, so mournfully. "Oh, Carlotta, how I wish he would come back! I think father's heart is almost broken."

"I am sure he will," says Miss Carlotta. "Indeed, Helen, I can not help thinking he will come home. You will certainly see him some day—when your ship comes in."

"Yes," repeats mamma, smiling sadly, "when my ship comes in."

"Has mamma a ship?" thinks Trotty. "How very interesting!"

But what follows is more interesting still.

"What a handsome face," Miss Carlotta says, "and how much it is like your little Trotty!"

But before mamma has time to answer, papa's voice is heard at the door, and she and Miss Carlotta go out into the hall to get the letters he has brought. The locket slips from mamma's lap, where Miss Carlotta has laid it, and falls on the rug.

Trotty is about to follow the others, when the glistening bit of gold attracts her attention. The opportunity is too tempting for Trotty to resist. She feels that she must see the mysterious "Fred" who looks like her, and who is coming home in the still more mysterious ship.

"ROCKED BY THE MOTION OF THE BOAT, TROTTY FALLS ASLEEP."

"Come right along, Jemima," she says, taking her long-suffering doll by the arm, and starting for the fireplace.

Jemima, sympathetic as usual in her wooden and sawdusty way, submits passively to being dragged over the carpet until she reaches the hearth-rug, where she falls prostrate before the superior attractions of the locket.

Trotty picks it up, opens it, and sees a frank, boyish face, with a pair of laughing blue eyes, very much like her own, only she does not know that. There is nothing at all about the ship, which disappoints her. She had expected to find something quite different, though she could not have told what. She drops the locket, chain and all, into the wee pocket, and proceeds to pick up the fallen Jemima. Just then nurse comes in at the door.

"Come, Trotty," she says, "it's bed-time."

So Trotty is taken into the library to say good-night to papa, mamma, and Miss Carlotta, and then walks up the long stairway alone by herself like a grown-up lady. Jemima goes too, carried by the head.

Nurse sits down by the nursery fire, and takes Trotty on her lap to brush out her pretty yellow curls. This is soon done; the little white night dress is put on, and presently Trotty is safely tucked in bed.

But before she has had time to get to sleep, mamma's own maid Anne comes in to have a little chat with nurse. At first they speak in whispers, which is rather foolish, Trotty thinks, as she watches them lazily. She does not pay much attention, and is just about falling asleep when she hears nurse say, "Her uncle Fred."

She is wide awake in an instant.

"You know I never heard the whole of that story," says Anne. "Tell me about it, won't you?"

Then, to Trotty's great joy, nurse tells Anne how, long ago, grandpa's pride and delight had been in his handsome boy. But though he loved him so dearly, he was very stern to him sometimes, too; and one day when grandpa had punished him very severely for some slight fault, the boy's proud spirit had rebelled against it.

"And," continues nurse, sinking her voice a little, "he just ran away, and we never heard a word of him since."

"Dear me!" says Anne.

"Dear me!" repeats Trotty under the pink curtains.

"The poor old man," says nurse, wiping her eyes, "his heart's most broken."

"Maybe he would come back yet," says Anne, in her funny Irish way.

"Maybe he would," replies nurse, rather doubtfully.

Trotty, listening attentively, can not quite understand all they are saying. She only understands that the handsome boy who looked like her ran away years ago, and that grandpa has been very sad ever since.

"But then," thinks Trotty, triumphantly, "mamma said he was coming home in her ship. I wonder if nurse remembers that?"

She listens once more to what nurse and Anne are saying. But they are talking of other things now. Presently the white eyelids fall gradually over the pretty blue eyes, shutting out the rose-colored curtains, the baby brother by the fire, the flickering light on the ceiling—and Trotty is fast asleep.

When the morning comes, the sun is shining, oh, so brightly? The minute nurse has finished dressing her, Trotty goes carefully down the stairs, and runs out upon the broad piazza. How fresh and green everything looks after the rain! Over the gate at the end of the garden walk she can see the blue ocean, with myriads of little waves dancing in the morning sunshine. She runs down the walk quite close to the water. There is a beautiful green wave rolling in toward the sand. Trotty looks at it admiringly.

The wave breaks into a long line of white foam, and runs back again, leaving a curious-looking star-fish lying on the sand.

Then she suddenly remembers what she heard nurse say last night about Uncle Fred, and a new idea comes into her mind. "If I could only get the gate open, I would go and look for him. Maybe I could find him," she thinks.

She gives the gate an impatient little shake, and to her intense delight it swings open. Trotty runs quickly out on to the beach. Her friend the star-fish lies at her feet. Trotty picks him up, examines him carefully all over, and then invites him to go with her on her travels.

"I'm going to find my uncle Fred," she says. "You may go too, if you like, little fish." Then the poor star-fish is rudely pushed by some chubby little fingers into a wee pocket, and Trotty, with her pretty golden curls flying in the wind, walks gravely up the beach. She stops every now and then to look at some lovely shell, or to watch the odd little fiddlers running over the sand. She is just beginning to feel tired, when she turns a point running out into the water, and catches sight of what she thinks is the most fascinating thing she has ever seen.

It is a little white boat drawn half way up on the shore. Stretched over it is a dainty blue and white awning, with blue fringe around the edge. Trotty gives a scream of delight. She climbs on a large stone close by the boat, and finally, after many struggles, succeeds in getting inside. She walks cautiously toward the stern, and looks down into the water. She sees a curious little fish swimming about—very curious indeed, thinks Trotty, as she bobs from one side to the other, trying to follow his movements. Whoever left the little boat on the shore that morning must have forgotten that the tide was rising; for in a very short time, loosened by Trotty's exertions, and raised by the incoming waves, it has worked gradually away from the sand, and when Trotty, tired of the fish, looks around in search of other amusement, she finds that she is, what seems to her, a long way out at sea. At first she does not mind it very much, for she is quite used to the water, papa has taken her out in his own boat so often this summer. But after a while she grows hungry, and tired of dancing over the waves. She thinks of the nice breakfast at home, of nurse and baby, of mamma, and wonders if she misses her little girl. Two great tears come into her blue eyes.

"Oh, mamma, I want you! Why don't you come and look for me?" she sobs, sitting down disconsolately in the bottom of the boat.

The tears in the blue eyes roll down Trotty's cheeks as she lays her head against the cushioned seat, and draws her white apron over her face. She cries bitterly for a while, then the sobs grow fainter and fainter, until, rocked by the motion of the boat, Trotty falls asleep as soundly as if she were under the pink curtains of her own bed at home.

Now this same May morning, returning home after a long voyage, a great ship comes sailing over the sea. There are a number of passengers on deck watching the land they have not seen for so many days. The Captain stands on the bridge, looking through his glass at the different places they are passing. By-and-by he looks at something nearer, something small and white, that comes dancing over the waves. As the ship approaches, he sees that it is a little boat, and that there is a pretty child lying in it. Now the Captain has a little girl at home just the age of Trotty, and when he sees her sleeping under the striped awning, he thinks how badly he would feel were his own little one carried away like that; so he gives orders to have the vessel stopped, and sends some sailors in a boat after the little wanderer. By-and-by Trotty wakes up suddenly, and finds that she has been carried on to the great ship, and that she is lying in some one's arms, surrounded by strangers, who are all looking at her. But although Trotty was very much frightened at the water, she is not at all afraid of people; so she struggles down from the Captain's arms, and says, gravely, as nurse had taught her,

"How do you do?"

This makes everybody laugh. Then a tall young man, who is sitting close by her, lifts Trotty on his knee.

"Come here, little one," he says, "and tell me your name, and how you happened to be so far from home."

"It's Trotty. I'm looking for Uncle Fred."

Just then she sees one of the passengers waving a white handkerchief to an outgoing steamer; they are passing. She jumps down, and pulls out the wee handkerchief, together with the poor star-fish and mamma's locket, both of which she has entirely forgotten. They fall on the deck, while Trotty dances about, waving a good by to the steamer. Her new friend stoops, picks up the locket, and tosses the star-fish back into the water, where he is quite happy again.

"Trotty," he exclaims, suddenly, "who is this?"

"Oh, that's Uncle Fred," answers Trotty.

Then Trotty is more astonished than she has been all day, for the young man, snatching her up, kisses her, and asks her so many questions that she can hardly answer them; but she tells him all about mamma, and thinks it very strange that he has never heard of papa or the baby brother. He is never tired of asking about grandpapa; but when they speak of him, Trotty thinks her new acquaintance is a very strange young fellow, for when she tells him what nurse and mamma said about Uncle Fred, and how grandpapa grieved for him, a tear rolls down his cheek.

"Bless me!" cries Trotty, wiping it away with her handkerchief. "Pears to me Uncle Fred makes everybody cry."

"And pears to me," answers her friend, "when Trotty goes home she will make everybody very happy. You dear little girl, I believe you are a little angel sent to bring me a hope of forgiveness."

"No, I'm not," replies Trotty; "but Miss Carlotta is. She's a blue one."

Then Trotty is interrupted in her turn by the Captain, who brings the stewardess to take her to luncheon, which pleases Trotty, for she is very hungry indeed by this time. After luncheon she takes another nap, and then wakes to find that the great ship has stopped, and that her new friend is waiting to take her back to mamma. They have to go a long way, for they take first a cab, then a ferry-boat, and finally the cars, before they arrive at the little village by the sea, the name of which Trotty has fortunately remembered. They walk up the street, as the sun is setting, until they reach the pretty cottage with the roses growing over it. Mamma and grandpapa are standing in the doorway, looking, oh! so worried. The young man swings the gate open.

"Father!" he falters.

"Oh, dear mamma!" cries Trotty.

Then Trotty thinks that every one has gone crazy, for Miss Carlotta comes from the parlor, papa comes from the library, and in a moment there is such laughing and crying both together, that poor Trotty is quite bewildered. By-and-by she gathers from what is going on that she has really and truly found her uncle Fred, and brought him home safely to grandpapa, who is holding him now by the hand, as if he never meant to lose sight of him again.

"Dear little puss!" says Uncle Fred. "If it had not been for her, I should not have found you for a long time, you have moved so far from the old home."

"She's a perfect little angel," says mamma, stooping to kiss her. "Do you ever expect to see a sweeter, Fred?"

But Uncle Fred looks at Miss Carlotta. Trotty goes off to the nursery, and tending poor Jenima, tells her all about the wonderful day she has had.

FAIRY ARMOR.*

IGWIGGIN arms him for the field,

A little cockle-shell his shield,

Which he could very bravely wield;

Yet could it not be piercèd;

His spear a bent both stiff and strong,

And well near of two inches long;

The pile was of a horse-fly's tongue,

Whose sharpness naught reversed.

And puts him on a coat of mail,

Which was of a fish's scale,

That when his foe should him assail,

No point should be prevailing;

His rapier was a hornet's sting;

It was a very dangerous thing,

For if he chanced to hurt the King,

It would be long in healing.

* From Nymphidia: The Court of Fairy. By MICHAEL DRAYTON. Born 1563; died 1631.

His helmet was a beetle's head,
Most horrible and full of dread,
That able was to strike one dead,

Yet did it well become him:
And for a plume a horse's hair,
Which, being tossed with the air,
Had force to strike his foe with fear.
And turn his weapon from him.

Himself he on an earwig set,
Yet scarce he on his back could get,
So oft and high he did curvet,

Ere he himself could settle:
He made him turn and stop and bound,
To gallop, and to trot the round;

He scarce could stand on any ground,
He was so full of mettle.

When soon he met with Tomalin,
One that a valiant knight had been,
And to King Oberon of kin;

Quoth he, "Thou manly Fairy,
Tell Oberon I come prepared,
Then bid him stand upon his guard;
This hand his baseness shall reward,
Let him be ne'er so wary.

"Say to him thus, that I defy
His slanders and his infamy,
And as a mortal enemy

Do publicly proclaim him:

Withal that if I had mine own,
He should not wear the Fairy crown,
But with a vengeance should come down,
Nor we a king should name him."

This Tomalin could not abide,
To hear his sovereign vilified;
But to the Fairy Court him hied
(Full furiously he posted),
With everything Pigwigin said:
How title to the crown he laid,
And in what arms he was arrayed,
As how himself he boasted.

'Twixt head and foot, from point to point,
He told the arming of each joint,
In every piece how neat and quaint,

For Tomalin could do it:
How fair he sat, how sure he rid,
As of the courser he bestrid,
How managed, and how well he did,
The King which listened to it.

Quoth he, "Go, Tomalin, with speed,
Provide me arms, provide my steed,
And everything that I shall need;
By thee I will be guided:

To straight account call thou thy wit,
See there be wanting not a whit,
In everything see thou me
fit,
Just as my foes provided."

Soon flew this news through Fairy Land,
Which gave Queen Mab to understand
The combat that was then in hand
Betwixt those men so mighty:
Which greatly she began to rue,
Perceiving that all Fairy knew,
The first occasion from her grew
Of these affairs so weighty.

A while there let we Mab alone,
And come we to King Oberon,
Who, armed to meet his foe,
is gone,
For proud Pigwigglin crying:

Who sought the Fairy King as fast,
And had so well his journey's east,
That he arrived at the last,
His puissant foe espying:

Stout Tomalin came with the King,
Tom Thum doth on Pigwigglin bring,
That perfect were in everything,
To single fights belonging:
And therefore they themselves engage,
To see them exercise their rage,
With fair and comely equipage,
Not one the other wronging.

So like in arms these champions were,
As they had been a very pair,
So that a man would almost swear,
That either had been either;
Their furious steeds began to neigh,
That they were heard a mighty way;
Their staves upon their rests they lay;
Yet ere they flew together,

Their seconds minister an oath,
Which was indifferent to them both,
That on their knightly faith and troth
No magic them supplied;
And sought them that they had no charms,
Wherewith to work each other's harms,
But came with simple open arms
To have their causes tried.

Together furiously they ran,
That to the ground came horse and man;
The blood out of their helmets span,
So sharp were their encounters;
And though they to the earth were thrown,
Yet quickly they regained their own,
Such nimbleness was never shown,
They were two gallant mounters.

I SUPPOSE that many of you are at present very busy with school. Examinations are going on with a high spirit, and your teachers are trying to find out how much you have learned during the past year. After examination comes vacation, and although that period is still a little way off, I have a word or two to say about it now.

It may be that some of the older boys will go on pleasant walking tours with their comrades, perhaps under the care of a professor or a grown-up brother, perhaps by themselves. If so, the Post-office Box would like to hear some of their experiences. Write of your adventures, boys, and you have any, or tell on the other hand, about your discoveries. If you are able to add any curious specimens to your cabinets or herbariums, be sure to send the rest of us a bit of description, which we will be glad to read.

The girls, no doubt, will prove the skill they have acquired as Little Housekeepers by making up dainty luncheons for fishing excursions and forest picnics. All young fishermen and fishermen may write about their setting out in the early morning, their delightful scampers over the early fields, and their patient, silent waiting by the stream for the fish to bite. Oh, the thrill which flies from the fingers to the heart when there is a sudden, strong pull on the line! Let me whisper it, girls and boys, and don't laugh at me, but that pull is a thing that frightens me so that I want to turn and run away, and come to fish another day.

What do you take in your baskets when you go on a picnic? I would like to hear of some nice places.

The children who stay at home through vacation often have quite as good times as those who go away. The good times we have, dears, depend so very much on ourselves, you know. Who can find in the Book of Proverbs a certain verse about a merry heart? Whoever learns it may recite it to mamma, and then take it for a vacation motto. I am very glad that verse is in the Bible, for I so dearly love merry hearts and cheerful faces.

Remember that we want the Post-office Box to be as bright and sweet as the summer itself in this season of flowers and fun. Little travelers must think of it when they see wonderful things in foreign lands, and little ones at home be on the watch for the pleasant things that happen nearly every day.

There is always a welcome, too, for the big brothers and the young lady sisters. I need not say one word with regard to the letter which is so, to me, I on our list this week. You will all be delighted to read it. I am sure!

ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL, NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR POST-OFFICE: Each day when I go into Holy Innocent's Ward the babies of Young People's Cot reminds me that we Sisters have not yet written one word to tell the readers of YOUNG PEOPLE how earnestly we thank them for their loving work. But the fact that we have written have been here will be able to realize how very like we are, in some respects, to a certain "old woman who lived in a shoe" (the great difference being in the fact that we try to get "them all out of bed" as soon as possible), and will, we trust, be ready to accept the assurance that our silence has not been owing to any want of gratitude.

Since the first subscription was given we have watched with the greatest interest the progress of the enjoyment, and so, to our eyes, the little "red" hat that they wear, and the very sentimental (only known only to Him who blesses the giver of a "cup of cold water" if offered in His name. In His name, therefore, and on behalf of all the suffering children who have been here, we bid you thank your readers for relieving us for all time from any anxiety in regard to the support of the hospital, and that we are getting our Sea-side Home ready for use, we depend on their assistance. Those whose gifts were too late for the enjoyment of the Cot will be glad to know that their money will be used to pay little Sadie's expenses at the sea-side, and those who have not grown weary in well-doing will find in the Fresh-air a new and interesting field.

Through Miss Fanshawe we have received from Harold B. Fobes $2 that he had sent last winter, and from Lonie N. Marcotte $1, also, through the Postmistress, $1 from a friend in Paris, and 50 cents from the Post Office at Toledo, Ohio. This money will be put in the Fresh-air Fund.

To-day two packages have been received from readers of YOUNG PEOPLE. One contained wild flowers for Sadie from a young friend in South Greenland, Long Island; the other was a box of toys and books from Robbie and Eddie Dodge and Cassie, Mrs. Cook and their mother. Sadie was charmed with the flowers, and the toys and books have been distributed among the home-sick children, eighteen of whom have been admitted recently. Your grateful friends, SISTERS OF ST. MARY (per Sister S.).

FORT WHIPPLE, PRESCOTT, ARIZONA.

We came out to this place last September with General Crook and several other officers from Omaha, Nebraska. We had a long and hard winter until we came to the terminus of the A. and P. R. R., and then we came over a terribly rough road sixty-three miles in an ambulance. I and my little brother, who is just a few days older than I, were jolly and out at night and sleep in a tent, but our mamma was terribly tired.

This is a beautiful country, but wild and desolate. We have picked up a great many pretty stones here, and have quite a collection. General Crook has gone down into Mexico with a number of Indian scouts and some white soldiers, and our mamma is excited to go with the Indians, the Apaches, and bring back safely little Charley McCombs, whom they captured not long ago.

We have a little pet squirrel, and James, our man, has made him a very nice cage with a wheel. When we first came here we had a scorpion and a centipede and several horned toads for pets, and our mamma is excited to go to the squirrel ranch here. This is a delightful climate, except in the spring. Since March the wind has blown almost constantly, but we boys manage to stay out of doors most of the time, and enjoy ourselves very much.

There is a band here, and we have dress parade twice a week. Our grandmamma, who lives in Texas, has subscribed for YOUNG PEOPLE for us, and mamma is excited to see every number of the stories, but especially "Raising the Pearl." I shall be ten years old next month. If this letter is not too long, I would be glad to see it in the Post-office Box. I have a stamp book with 375 stamps.

CHARLES DUVAL R.

P.S.—A friend sent us in some cherries to-day that were sent her from Tucson, and my little brother says his motto is, "Eat all the cherries you can get," which is a very safe one here, as cherries are scarce enough at Fort Whipple.

BRECKEN, SYRIA.

My uncle sends me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I like it very much. I think it is a very nice idea to have a Young Housekeepers' Society, and I would like very much to be a member. I am very busy here, and the only thing I can do is when I am sent into the kitchen to do anything there. I have a big apron, which I wear when I am going to cook; it covers my dress and sleeves, and is just like the apron which mamma and you get out for an Arab dish that we often make; it is called mabuly.

One scant tea-cupful of pounded rice, four table-spoonfuls of sugar, two tea-spoonfuls of pounded caraway-seeds, one tea-spoonful of ginger, one tea-spoonful of cinnamon, and a little more than one pint of water: mix and boil until it is about as thick as oatmeal porridge; pour into a bowl, and stir with your hands, almonds, pistachio-nuts, walnuts, and pine-cone seeds. It may be eaten hot or cold, but hot is better.

This dish used to be made whenever a little boy was born, and the parents used to give it to all the friends, but now it is made for girls too. If any of the readers of YOUNG PEOPLE make it, I hope they will write and tell the Post-office Box how they like it. I think it is very nice, but others may not.

FLORENCE VAN D. (12 years old).

This is a novelty indeed. An Arab dish, the receipt coming all the way from Syria! We are very glad to include you among our Little Housekeepers, Flossie, and before you receive this number of YOUNG PEOPLE ever so many of us will have tried mabuly, and be able to say whether or not we like it. There is one sentence in your letter which tells a great deal to thoughtful readers here. Formerly the rejoicings were made only when a boy was born; now the parents are glad, and look for congratulation, when a dear little girl is added to the family. It would seem very strange to you, would it not, children, if everybody were to cry and be sorry because a darling little daughter was lying in her mother's arms yet in heathen lands feelings of grief and anger at the birth of a girl. You see sudden and sudden looks and dark frowns, and there is no love ready for the poor forlorn little babe, who thought to have been sent to show the wrath of the gods. Wherever the Christian religion prevails this dreadful state of things is stopped, and Flossie's letter is to me like a white flower, showing that spring has come after a long cold winter. How glad we shall be when we hear that all over the world girls are as much prized as boys!

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I want to tell you a true story about two birds of ours. Their names are Dick and Daisy. One day we let them out into the room, after shutting the door behind them, and they flew out. After a while my brother Louis went into the room, and not seeing Daisy, he said to Dick, "Dick, where is Daisy?" Dick flew to the top of a picture and looked as he usually does when he is excited, and sure enough, as Louis pulled the picture from the wall, she flew out. She was not a bit hurt.

LOTTIE P.

I think we ought to be careful how we talk before birds, cats, and dogs. They often seem to understand us in a very wonderful way.

GERMANTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA.

So often did I enjoy the stories about the young people's pets that when the incident described before occurred I thought I must tell it to you. One day Nemo, a large Newfoundland dog lay by the garden, and began to dig around and played in gnawing and scraping a ridiculous hole presented to him by the cook as a reward for having waited for one so long and so patiently. The neighbor's little child, who happened to have noticed the large dog with his treasure, and feeling his appetite growing too keen, stopped to see what could be done to satisfy it. After a moment's deliberation he began to crop the grass slowly, noiselessly, until he was nearly behind his victim, when he suddenly gave the fiercest howl he was able to give. Nemo, completely unawares, in a moment's anger, was frightened and he took to his heels with all his might, leaving the coveted feast to the cunning cur, who this time did not wait, but ran off with his ill-gotten booty in the opposite direction.
ARRARR P.

WALNUT HILLS, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

I am a little girl twelve years old, and as I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE I thought I would write a letter. I go to school, and have ten studies but I don't like which take up too much time to school very much. Last winter, during the flood, each teacher in the school requested the scholars to bring a pound of something that afternoon, and more than a hundred children did something, and almost everybody brought six or seven different things. That evening the principal had to order a furniture car to take them to the city.

I have no pets except a little sister three years old. I tried the chocolate creams last evening after school, and we all thought they were splendid. I had a letter from my Little Housekeepers, and will soon send some nice receipts.

FLORENCE T. C.

I suppose the pounds contributed by the pupils were sent to the poor people who had lost everything in the flood. If so, it was a very good idea on the part of the teachers, and no doubt you all took pleasure in helping to carry it out.

PAWNEE AGENCY, INDIAN TERRITORY.

The Post-office Box is very interesting to me, and I can't wait to get the letter which is to come. This is a beautiful place, surrounded by high hills on every side. Black Bear Creek flows through the place, and is a nice little stream filled with fish, and I like to go fishing. I hope you it is fine sport. Sometimes some of us fall in and get wet.

There are only a few white people here, this being the Agency for the Pawnee tribe. They used to be a very powerful and warlike tribe, but civilization does not seem to agree with them, as there were only 1300 at the last census. My father is carpenter for the Indians, and he has two Indian boys as apprentices. There is an industrial school here for the boys and girls, in which there are eighty scholars. My sisters and I went to the Indians' school a long while, but now we have been sent to the school for white children, all children of government employees.

I can talk Pawnee quite well. I am a girl, and ten years old. I can have lots of pets, such as horses, foot, lizards, centipedes and scorpions. The story about Pawnee Joe delighted the Indian boys and girls. They always enjoy reading YOUNG PEOPLE. Some of them are pretty well educated, and they are all good people.

MERIDEN, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little girl ten years old, and I have a cat which is just as old as I am. Her name is Pussy, and she has been with me ever since I was a kitten in a basket in the coal shed. One Sunday not long ago she took the kitten in her mouth and brought it around the house to the front door, where she laid it down. I went in and put it into the room where we were, and put it in the corner back of a chair. I thought I would let her stay there a little while. When I called her to come and eat her dinner, where do you suppose she pat her kitten? On the register, to keep warm while she was gone. Wasn't that cunning in Mrs. Tipton's eyes?

My papa gives me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a birthday present, and he couldn't give me anything I would like better. I enjoy reading the stories so much. MAY E. M.

OSWEGO, NEW YORK.

My teacher asked me to write to the Post-office Box. I will be twelve years old the 23d of November. I am the son of a Methodist minister and my father is now stationed at the city of Oswego. I go to school, and like my studies very much. I study reading, spelling, geography, arithmetic, and Latin, and I have many lessons. Our programme has both writing and drawing lessons for this time.

Oswego is a very fine city, and lies on the southern coast of Lake Ontario, and there are excellent places for fishing here in the summer.

WILLIE O'D.

CYPRESS HILLS, LONG ISLAND.

I am a little boy twelve years old. I go to school, and study reading, spelling, geography, and arithmetic; I read in Harper's United States Fourth Reader, and spell from a Speller issued by the same publishers. I have two brothers and one sister. I have a black and white rabbit, a black and white cat, and a black and white rabbit. I like natural history; I have collected some cocoons this year. We have two canaries. I have one sister; her name is Daisy. I found some yellow violets in the woods. Has the Postmistress seen them? WILLARD P. C.

I think you must be busy, with so many pets. Yes, I have seen yellow violets, and think them pretty, though I prefer the blue ones.

NEW YORK CITY.

I am a boy eleven years of age. This is my first letter. I am writing to you, and I want you and mamma to see it. I have a brother and sister. We have three pets, a canary and two kittens. One kitten is all black, and if we throw a small ball he will jump and follow it back to us. We have had HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE from the first number. JULIUS C. G.

BEMBLEY, ILLINOIS.

I am just ten years old. I have two brothers or sisters, except my little brother Willie in heaven. My dear papa died with consumption four years ago, so that mamma and I live alone. My home is very pleasant, and mamma does everything she can to make me glad and happy. I love pets. We have an old cistern, and I put all the fish I can catch into it. I enjoy watching them. Then I have a bird and chickens. I would like to belong to the Hunspeckers' Circle, and I am a boy. Please count me in. JOSEPH RALEIGH N.

PORTLAND, OREGON.

I am a little girl six years old, and my mamma is writing this letter for me. My sister Betty and I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE ever since it was first started, and enjoy it very much. I am learning to read so I can read the stories to myself, and I am interested where they go, and sing songs, then we go to our desks and read, then we play games again, and have recess. We have a little pet kitten that we call Snowball, which is as cute as can be, and we come to our room in the mornings, and we have lots of fun with her in bed till it is time to get up and dress. We love a good horse, but my mamma doesn't mind. My papa has a horse, and now he is very white. We have many nice rides about town and out into the woods. In summer we take our lunch and eat it out there, and hunt for wild berries. The other day mamma left her horse, while she went into a store, and we walked up and put his head into a baker's cart, and ate a doughnut; he always seems hungry, though he looks very fat, and loves to be fed with grass or clover when we let him anywhere. We enjoy riding for we have owned him a long time; and he is always kind and good, and can go real fast also. We have a little Mediterranean pony named Billy that is also a great pet, and my sister likes to learn to ride on him; he is gentle, but likes to go so fast that mamma is afraid to have Helen ride him by herself. My mamma, and I have written this letter, and want to say hello to you when she sees it printed in the YOUNG PEOPLE. MARGARET B.

WYOMING, EL PASO COUNTY, COLORADO.

A friend of papa's has been sending me YOUNG PEOPLE for the last year. When I was born, I was sent it to my cousin in Pennsylvania. I live on the Fountain Creek, near Colorado Springs. It rises in the Pass, eighteen miles above Manitou, and flows into the Arkansas River at Pueblo, fifty miles below. The Spanish name is Fountain qui Bonille, which means boiling fountain, because it roars and tumbles among the boulders and rocks for several miles. I have been to school eight months this year.

I have two brothers and one sister younger than myself. I have no pets, except my little black and white cat, and my dog, a cow named Buttercup. I have a pony named Jolly. I have to ride to the Post-office every Saturday afternoon. I found some wild plums in bloom the 1st of May. We have a lot of a ranch, and keep sheep, and have a hundred of little lambs. We have Mexicans to herd them.

My brother and I are learning to speak the Spanish language. We have lovely views of Pike's Peak, Pikes Peak, and the mountains, and Spanish Peaks. I hope to go to the Denver Exposition this summer, and I will write and tell you what I see there. BELLAH D.

COLD SPRING, NEW YORK.

As I have been having the measles, and can not read very much on account of my eyes, I thought I would write. I have sent two wiggles to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, the second one has been published. I had a turtle and a carp, but the turtle died. I have eight elephants, and they all have blankets and head-dresses except the two little ones. They are made out of Canton flannel, and are very nice for my circus. My smallest sister, who is ten years old, can play the piano and sing very well. My other sister, who goes to boarding-school, is going to play at Commencement. E. H. W.

WATKINS, IOWA.

I have been taking YOUNG PEOPLE for two years, and think it is a very nice paper. I like "Raising the Pearl" and Jimmy Brown's stories very much of all. I have not many pets to tell about, only a dog that will sit on a chair with a hat on his head, and then I have a cat that I have lots of fun with. I have one of the sweetest little sisters that ever was; she is eight years old. Her name is Flora. I am ten. RALPH D.

MARION, ILLINOIS.

We have twenty four hens and fifty five young chickens. We used to live in Kansas, and there was a river there; once we went in swimming, and we got into the swift current and nearly got drowned. We have three little pigs; whenever we go to feed them they squeal. My papa is a miller; so will I be a miller. Once my father worked in a water-mill; when it is high water the mill will run with it. Once I pulled the net up and caught a buffalo-fish, but the net fell down into the water, and the fish got away. I like "Raising the Pearl." I have to saw five cords of wood, and my brother splits it; my little brother carried the wood into the shed or the house. We used to have a cat. In the morning when my mother got up and laced her shoes, the cat jumped on her back and looked down at her. WILLIE S.

SPONGE CAKE.—One good heaping cup of sugar, one good heaping cup of flour, three eggs, flavor with orange or vanilla, and bake in a quick oven. This makes one hot loaf. ELM S. W.

ICE-CREAM CAKE.—The whites of eight eggs beaten to a stiff froth, two cups of sugar, three of flour, one of corn starch, one of butter, one of milk, and two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, or you can use a cup of sour milk with one teaspoonful of soda. Bake this first in jelly thus, then make a syrup of four cups of sugar and half a pint of hot water; let it boil and stir till it runs a little when dropped in cold water. Beat the whites of four eggs to a stiff froth, add the syrup when ready, beating hard until nearly cold, and then add jelly and vanilla. Add one spoonful of citric acid to this white beating.

LEMON PIE.—One lemon squeezed into a cup of cold water, two eggs, one cup of sugar, one large spoonful of corn starch, flour, or a cracker rolled fine, one large spoonful of butter. Separate the eggs, and make a meringue of the whites to put on top after the pie is baked. This only makes one pie. F. C. S.

NEWBURGH, MASS.

Would you like to hear from A little girl way down in Maine, Susie May B. by name? I have got two large sheep, and some little chickens. Saying peep! peep! peep! I have got three cats: A large one named Jack, Another named Jet, And another named Pet; Very knowing cats they are, And they all know how to play. I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE a long time, And think the stories very fine. And now I will give you a receipt For all of you to keep: BROWN BREAD.—Two cups of Indian meal, two cups of flour, two cups of sweet milk, one cup of sour milk, half a cup of molasses, one heaping tea-spoonful of soda; steam two hours. And now I will close my letter. Perhaps next time I will do better. S. M. B.

The Postmistress thanks Elsie D. R., Madge H., Victor J., Elsie F. G. H., Belle A. L., Lillie M. G., Attie A. De L., Sue S. T. W., Aunt Alameda, Kate L., Walter K., Archie P., Hugh F., and Mollie G., for their pleasant letters.—Florence B. You are a busy girl with so many chickens and turkeys to care for.—Kate B. M. I have no doubt you have found a great many wild flowers since you discovered the earliest hepaticas.—Sarah T. H.: You must have a good many friends who love you dearly.—True Friend: You ought to have told me your name, dear, even though you preferred that it should not be published. How am I to know the children apart if they do not sign their names?—Abby L. Y.: You have a number of pets. I hope you will visit St. Mary's when you come to New York.—May H. Y.: I am sorry your cat met so sad a fate. I think your Sunday-school teacher is very sensible to present HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE to punctual scholars.—Lillie C. H., L. J. K., Woodworth C., Two Little Playmates, Wable L. A., and May A. H., deserve each a good mark.—Several Inquirers: Exchange is inserted without charge.—E. H. Williams, Chardon Hotel, Cleveland, Ohio, wishes the address of the boy who lately sent him a package of thirty advertising cards.

A CASE FOR MR. BERGH.

THE GOLDEN GAME OF GEOMETRY.

BY FRANK BELLEW.

THIS game can be played by two or more persons. One player, who is selected by lot or vote, is called President Euclid. He places before him on a table the diagram containing the geometrical figures. The other players range themselves round the table with their backs to it, so that they can not see the board or diagram. Each player is given a certain number of beans or other counters, but the President receives double the number of any of the other players.

The President begins by placing a button on one of the geometrical figures, and he calls out to the person seated next to him on the left-hand side,

"Ho! most Noble Prince Pnpil. I place my button on the sixth figure of the third row" (this will be a dog in a decagon). "Now what have I under my button? You know the number, you know the row; guess my riddle, and away you go."

Then he counts twenty aloud. While he is counting, the player must tell him on which figure he has placed his button. If he tells him correctly, the President must give him three beans, but if he answers incorrectly, he must give the President two beans. If, however, his answer is half correct, he only forfeits one bean. For example: in this case the proper answer would be, "You have under your button a dog in a decagon." But if the Prince Pupil should answer, "A duck in a decagon," or "A dog in a hexagon," the answer would be half right, and he would only forfeit one bean.

If the Prince Pupil is altogether incorrect in his answer, he not only forfeits three beans, but also his title of Prince Pupil, and is called for the rest of the game, until he gives a correct answer to some other question, by the name of the animal and figure he ought to have named. For example: in the case we have chosen his answer should be, "A dog in a decagon," but should he answer, "An otter in an octagon," or "A sow in a septagon," he is afterward addressed as Mister Dog in a Decagon until he retrieves his position by making a perfectly correct answer.

When the first Prince Pupil has answered the question correctly, the President places his button on another figure and appeals to the second in order, something in this style, to which he may add a little fun made out of his own head:

"This Dog in a Decagon Brown having failed to give me a correct answer, I now come to you, Prince Pupil Baldwin, to tell me what I have under my button." Then he repeats and counts as before.

As soon as a Prince Player has lost all his counters he retires from the game, and is said to have gone over the Pons Asinorum to the other side of Jordan.

The first Prince Player who gives three correct answers becomes President, and holds the position until another player gives three correct answers during his Presidency.

If, as the players become familiar with the game and the diagram, it should grow too easy to be exciting, the President may then count on either the left or right side as he pleases, in which case he will say either, "I am working on the philosopher's side," or "I am working on the fool's side."

On the philosopher's side the quadrangle will commence the first row, and the mixtilinear quadrangle will be the seventh figure on it. On the fool's side the mixtilinear triangle will commence the first row, and the equilateral triangle will be the seventh figure on it.

THE LEAP AT BAYOU CARR.

BY MARY A. BARR.

IT was long before the dawning, while as yet the camp was still.

Our colonel, keeping anxious watch, said, "Call me Texas Bill."

Then quick as the order came the man—a man with an eye like fire.

With a heart that never knew a fear, a strength that naught could tire.

"Bill, you can ride?" "I reckon." "Then saddle; I want to know

All that a man with open eyes can tell me about the foe."

Rapid and still as a man in a dream, Bill he galloped away; And he saw the enemy on their arms, just at the break of day; He noted them well, then backward turned, keeping an easy pace, To rest the steed he dearly loved after her well-run race; He praised her gait, he stroked her head, he said, "My bonny lass,

The bridle's slack, walk at thy will, and taste the fresh green grass."

They sauntered on till he heard a sound that made his pulses beat.

That made the mare prick up her ears, and paw her restless feet; The sound of galloping horses and men, and soon there came in view

A gay little squad of cavalry, all of them men in blue. He gathered the reins as quick as thought, "Oh, Bess, I'll trust to thee;

Now up and do thy very best for life and liberty."

But just as he pressed his Bessie's side, he turned with pleasant face,

"I am unarmed—you will not fire; I'll trust you for that grace; Then if you take me, I will yield to good men cheerfully." He waved his hand, cried "Good-by, boys!" Off like the wind went he;

Off like the wind, while close behind his foes came swift and hot,

But never a man among them dreamed of a pistol-shot.

A reckless race! a desperate chase! What ending would it find? Bessie and Bill were still in front, the rest not far behind, While just ahead was Bayou Carr, a bayou wide and deep, Full thirty feet from side to side—would Bessie dare to leap? She never made a single pause, she cleared it in grand style, While heartily the men in blue were cheering her the while.

She stood one moment. Then Bill turned—"Boys, once again good-by!"

They sent him back a ringing shout; he need no longer fly. There wasn't a man that chased him but freely bade him go; Not one to send a pistol-shot after an unarmed foe; And sure this act of self-restraint was a grander thing by far Than the daring leap of Texas Bill over the Bayou Carr.

MR. GRUBBY'S OLD POCKET-BOOK.

BY JULIA K. HILDRETH.

ONE warm day in June, when the sky was all covered with flying black clouds, and the distant hills half hidden by a thick veil of gray mist, Hope Hunter scampered along a wide country road that ran between the school-house in the village of Burbank and her home, which was about a mile distant.

Hope was in a desperate hurry to reach home before the rain fell, for she wore her new blue dress, and her mother had said, as she fastened the last button,

"Now, Hope, this dress looks very nicely, and it took me a long while to make it. So try not to spoil it in one day, as you did your last."

Hope looked anxiously at the frowning sky as she flew along, her school-bag swinging on her arm and her hat pushed far back on her head. She had almost reached the garden gate, when her foot caught in a projecting root of an oak-tree in the road, and she fell full length upon the ground, strewing the contents of her bag in all directions.

The tears stood in Hope's eyes as she collected the scattered articles and crammed them hastily back in the bag.

They were all safe, but the beautiful pearl penknife her father had given her as a birthday gift, and that she could find nowhere. A steep bank covered with long grass and weeds sloped away from the road near the tree over whose roots Hope had just now fallen. As the knife was not upon the road, it must have slipped over this bank. So Hope scrambled upon the gnarled roots and peeped down.

Yes, there it was, shining brightly among the grass and leaves. She jumped down, snatched it up, and was about to spring back to the road, when her eye fell upon an old leather pocket-book lying close to where she had found her knife, and half hidden under a large stone. Hope picked it up, and, climbing back to the road, unbuckled the broad strap with which it was fastened, and looked in. It was filled with papers neatly folded and crowded together so closely that the pocket-book bulged in all directions.

"I thought it couldn't have any money in it," said Hope; "it looked too old and greasy. Some one must have thrown it away. Oh, how nice and thick!" she exclaimed, as the paper rustled between her fingers—just the thing to make pin-wheels of."

At this moment a large drop of rain fell from a cloud and splashed down upon Hope's nose. She flung the pocket-book hastily on the ground, thrust the papers into her bag, and ran hurriedly down the path to the house. The rain fell briskly as she flung open the hall door and ran panting into the front room, where her mother sat reading a letter.

"Did the rain catch my little girl?" said mamma, as Hope lifted up her mouth for a kiss.

"Oh no, I ran too fast," answered Hope, laughing. "I ran so fast that I tripped over the scrubby roots of that old tree on the road."

"Did you hurt yourself?" inquired her mother, anxiously.

"Not much."

"Those roots must be cut off," said mamma, going to the window and looking out. "Only yesterday I saw old Mr. Grubby stumble headlong across the road. He might have killed himself."

"Mamma, there's that nice sailor man who gave me the little ship," said Hope, suddenly, pointing out of the window to a young man who was just then crossing the road—"Mrs. Barus's son, you know."

"Dear! dear! the root has tripped him up too," cried Mrs. Hunter.

"He's not hurt, mamma. See! he jumped up as lightly as a bird. I wonder what he is looking at in his hand? Oh, I see now—it's the old pocket-book."

"What pocket-book, Hope?" inquired her mother.

"I found an old pocket-book on the bank, but it was so greasy that I threw it away."

"Hope, the postman brought a letter for you this morning from your cousin Amy," said Mrs. Hunter, turning away from the window, and forgetting all about the pocket-book.

"Did Amy write it all herself?" inquired Hope, wonderingly.

"I think so," answered her mother, with a smile.

"Please read it to me, mamma; I can't read writing very well."

"This is what Amy writes," said Mrs. Hunter, holding the letter so that Hope could see it distinctly, and pointing to each word with a needle:

"DEAR COUSIN HOPE,—I am coming home Saturday. I have a new doll and a new doll carriage. Don't forget to make the pin-wheels you promised. Your ever-loving cousin, AMY."

"I think that's a very nice letter," said Hope, as her mother finished reading. "I'll go right away and make the pin-wheels if you will let me have your sharp scissors, mamma."

"Yes, dear, you may have them. And I will go and tell Sam to cut off those roots in the road before they do any serious damage."

As her mother left the room Hope took the scissors from the work-basket, and the paper she had found in the old pocket-book from her bag, and skipped upstairs to her little play-room in the garret.

The rain was pattering over the roof and dashing against the window-panes as Hope seated herself upon the floor and began her work. The paper she had found was of a light blue color, with a narrow dark blue line close to the edge. Hope spread these strips of paper out upon her knee and counted them over. There were twelve in all, and just twice as long as they were broad; and as a pin-wheel must be square, Hope cut them in two, and had soon made twenty-four pale blue pin-wheels. The few words written on each did not mar their beauty at all, for Hope had hidden these so carefully that no one, unless by looking very closely, would have discovered that the paper was not perfectly clean.

When they were finished and pinned to their handles Hope stacked them in one corner of the room, and looked proudly at her handiwork.

"There!" said she, aloud. "Amy can write a letter, but she can't make pin-wheels like those. I'll leave them up here until next Saturday, so that they will not be spoiled. This is Tuesday, and Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday are three more," said Hope, counting on her fingers. "That's a long time." Then she closed the door and went down-stairs.

The next day as Hope came home from school she saw a large crowd collected around William Barns's house, and heard loud voices within. She hurried home with the news to her mother.

"I am afraid they are going to arrest William Barns for stealing," said her mamma, sadly.

"What has William Barns stolen?" cried Hope, in astonishment.

"Old Mr. Grubby accuses him of stealing a great many hundred dollars."

"Oh, mamma! I don't believe he ever stole anything, he has such a nice brown face and always smiles at me."

"I am afraid that is no proof of his innocence," said her mother, patting her on the head. "But I am very sorry for poor Mrs. Barns."

Hope thought frequently of William Barns during the week, and missed his kind face in the village. It made her feel quite sorrowful to see the door of his house closed, and the shades drawn down over the windows. But when the day for Amy's return came, Hope forgot everything else in the delightful expectation of seeing her cousin and presenting her the wonderful pin-wheels.

It was no easy task to carry twenty-four paper pin-wheels safely through the village streets. So Hope thought, as she moved slowly along, with her eyes fixed upon them in anxiety for their safety. She was so intent upon this that she ran plump against a boy standing in the road. Hope looked up to see who it was, and warn him not to break her pin-wheels, when she found that she was close by the Court-house, and that there were five or six people standing around the door talking excitedly.

The boy Hope stumbled against was one of her school-mates, so she said,

"What's the matter in the Court-house, Tom?"

"William Barns stole old Grubby's pocket-book crammed full of money," answered Tom, "and they're trying him now."

"Did Mr. Grubby see him do it?" cried Hope, wonderingly.

"No, he didn't see him steal it, but it's all the same. He saw the pocket-book in his hand, and so did I and a heap of other fellows, too. We were all on the dock fishing, when old Grubby comes along grumbling, and stands behind us. Just then a big fish pulled off my hook, and I asked Will Barns for another. He took an old leather thing out of his pocket and began fumbling in it for one. Then I heard Grubby scream something, and I looked up. He was standing close by Will with his hands looked just like the claws of a bird and his teeth all showing. The next moment he made a spring at Will and screeched,

"You thief! you rogue! you highwayman! give me my money!"

"Your money!" said Will. "You must be crazy, Mr. Grubby. I have no money of yours." Then he shook Grubby off, and putting the pocket-book back in his pocket, walked off as cool as you please. Next day Grubby had him arrested, and they found the pocket-book with a lot of fish-hooks in it on a shelf in Will's bedroom. But he says he found the greasy old thing empty near the roots of that big oak-tree by your house."

"So he did," cried Hope, who had been listening with her mouth and eyes open to this long story—"he did, for I saw him, and there was not one cent of money in it when I picked it up myself—nothing but little pieces of paper, and I took them out and threw the old thing away. And I'll just go and tell Mr. Grubby so," and Hope made a movement toward the door.

"I wouldn't," said Tom; "they'll all laugh at you. Who ever saw a girl walking through a court-room with an armful of pin-wheels?"

"I don't care if they do laugh at me," answered Hope, angrily. "I shall not let Mr. Grubby say that William Barns stole his money, when I know better."

"Well, I suppose you're right," said Tom. "But let me hold those things until you come back."

"No," replied Hope, decidedly. "You might break them."

So she walked in at the open door and half across the room, but could see nothing of Mr. Grubby. Although there were a number of persons in the room, it was so silent that the whirring noise made by Hope's pin-wheels sounded so loudly that those sitting near turned and looked at her. She tiptoed along quietly until she came to the end of a long row of benches. Then she saw an open space with three or four tables in it and a raised desk. Men sat at the table writing, and a very large red-faced gentleman, with his eyes closed, as if listening intently, was behind the desk.

Old Mr. Grubby was speaking when Hope first saw him.

"Yes," he said, "that is my pocket-book; the same that I missed Monday afternoon. It then contained twelve hundred dollars in certified checks of one hundred dollars each."

"Oh, Mr. Grubby!" cried Hope, stretching her head forward, and speaking in a very high voice, "it did not have one cent in it when I picked it up."

As her voice rang through the silent hall every one stood up and looked at poor Hope. She had not meant to speak so loud, and was very much mortified at the attention she attracted, and tried to hide behind the nearest bench. But a gentleman came forward and whispered,

"Come, little girl, and tell these gentlemen what you know about Mr. Grubby's pocket-book."

As he lifted her up on one of the tables in the open space a gust of wind came through the open window and set the twenty-four pin-wheels whirling around all at once with a loud noise. At this every one laughed, and Hope, remembering Tom's words, held her head down, and turned very red indeed.

"Never mind," said the gentleman who had lifted her up on the table. "They are not laughing at you. Now speak loudly, and tell us where you found the pocket-book."

She was quite alarmed now, and almost ready to cry, for she saw that the man behind the high desk had his eyes open, and was looking intently at her, and that those who had been writing held their pens suspended in the air while they turned their heads her way.

"Tell them where you found it," said the gentleman again.

Then Hope did as she was requested. "But," said she, turning to Mr. Grubby, "there was no money in it, only pieces of blue paper, and I threw the pocket-book down on the ground after I had taken the paper out, because it was so old and dirty."

Again every one laughed, and Hope, feeling very much distressed, whispered to the gentleman near.

"Please take me down and let me go home."

"In a moment," he answered; "but first tell Mr. Grubby what you did with the papers."

"Here they are," said Hope, pointing to her pin-wheels. Mr. Grubby sprang across the room, and, snatching one from her hand, tore it from its handle and spread it open upon the table.

"Yes," he cried, "it is part of one of the checks. You wicked little girl, how dare you destroy my property, and frighten me half to death?"

Hope opened her eyes very wide at these words, and the tears streamed down her cheeks as she cried,

"Oh, Mr. Grubby, I did not mean to be wicked. Here, take them all, I won't keep one." And she thrust the beautiful pin-wheels into the old man's hands, and sobbed aloud. Every one crowded about old Mr. Grubby as he pulled off the papers and spread them open one after one. They were so much amused that they quite forgot Hope, who stood alone upon the table with her face buried in her two small hands.

But presently she felt some one touch her, and looked up to find William Barns's kind face close to hers.

"Don't cry, little Hope," said he, softly. "I'll take you home."

"What made Mr. Grubby call me wicked?" said Hope, wiping her eyes. "I did not mean to do any harm."

"I don't believe he quite knew what he was saying," answered William. "He has been very much worried about those papers, for they were worth a large sum of money."

"I did not know that," sobbed Hope; "and I am so sorry about my pin-wheels. I made them all myself to give to Cousin Amy."

"Never mind," said William Barns, coaxingly. "Don't cry, but jump on my shoulder, and I'll find you some of the prettiest paper in the world. It came from China, and it's all covered with pink and blue and gold and silver butterflies, and I will help you make ever so many new pin-wheels."

He lifted the little girl upon his broad shoulder, and in this manner they left the Court-house.

William Barns not only kept his promise, but carried Hope and her brilliant paper pin-wheels on his shoulder all the way to Cousin Amy's.

And now whenever Hope passes William Barns's house she is greeted with loving words and kisses from his mother. And many a beautiful shell, bright piece of coral, and curious toy has found its way from William's seachest to Hope's play-room, for the sailor never forgot that she had saved him from being thought a thief.

RAISING THE "PEARL."*

CHAPTER XIX.—(Continued.)

CAPTAIN SAMMY'S PERIL.

FOR an instant Dare let go of the helm and rushed out of the pilot-house to see what could be done; but before he could get aft he realized that, with the engine still in motion, he, by deserting his post, was not doing anything toward saving Captain Sammy, but was actually hindering operations by allowing the steamer to back where she might ground, or work herself worse injury.

Grasping the spokes of the wheel firmly, as if by his strong hold he could also retain all his presence of mind, he looked astern for some signs of the man who was in such deadly peril.

The steamer had run ahead some distance after the blow had been struck which knocked the little man from his lofty perch, and now he could be seen fully fifty yards below, while the reversing of the engine was taking the Pearl toward the bank of the river.

Captain Sammy was splashing around in the water and screaming loudly, evidently for the purpose of frightening away the sharks and alligators; but owing to the fact of his having but one leg, it was with difficulty that he kept himself afloat.

* Begun in No. 175, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Charley, Bobby, and even Tommy had by this time rushed into the bow, as if for Dare to tell them what to do, and he knew only too well that the saving of the little man's life depended almost wholly on him.

"Go back to your post!" he shouted to Charley, "and put on all steam ahead!"

It needed the stern command to arouse the engineer from his panic; and as Dare swung the wheel around, the laboring of the boat told that the order had been obeyed.

It was necessary to traverse nearly half of a circle before the apparently drowning man could be reached; and when Dare rang the bell to "stop her" he saw at a glance that Captain Sammy could do very little toward helping himself, lest, if he ceased his exertions for a moment, either the sharks or the alligators would seize him.

Dare was completely at a loss to know what to do, and even as he hesitated he could see that Captain Sammy's struggles were growing fainter and fainter. It was only too evident that he could not hold out many minutes longer.

Dare rushed for the tender, calling Charley to follow him, but he knew, even in his excitement, that they could not pull him in over the rail of that frail boat without upsetting her and endangering the lives of all.

The condition of his mind was little short of agony. Then just when his fear was the most intense he was conscious that a form had darted past him and plunged into the water.

He could not prevent himself from screaming as he saw what seemed to be a leap to certain death, and he looked quickly around to see whether it was his brother or his cousin who had gone thus bravely to die.

But Charley and Bobby were both standing behind him, and he passed his hand over his eyes as if he fancied he must have been deceived in what he thought he saw.

It was certain, however, that some one had jumped over, for a swimmer could be seen making directly for the nearly exhausted man, and splashing in the water at a furious rate.

"Why, it's Tommy!" he cried, astonished that he had not thought of this one of their passengers before, and then all his faculties were restored to him again.

"Give the wheels a couple of turns," he shouted to Charley, as he picked up a heaving line and ran to the bows.

The steamer was only about a dozen yards from the two who were struggling in the water against so many perils, and he hoped to be fortunate enough to run alongside them, where a rope could be flung around Captain Sammy.

CHAPTER XX.

THE RECONCILIATION.

FORTUNATELY for Dare's plan the Pearl's helm was still hard down, and the slight motion given her by the wheels caused her to circle directly around the two in the water.

Dare was thus enabled to swing the bight of the rope to Tommy, and in an instant after it was placed under the little man's arms.

"Now climb up on the rope, and then we'll all pull him in," said Dare to Tommy.

"That won't do," replied the little fellow, as he renewed his efforts at splashing, "for, you see, when I was out of the water, they'd take his leg off quicker'n a wink. Haul him in, and when you pass the rope to me be ready to snake me in sudden, or it'll be all up with me."

Surely Tommy was showing himself to be a hero, and neither of the boys thought of his past misdeeds as they admired his courage.

It did not take long to pull Captain Sammy on board when all hands had hold of the rope, and, exhausted as he was, he managed to walk unaided into the forward cabin, where he applied his own restoratives.

Then came the more difficult work of rescuing Tommy, for since the boy had spoken, all now knew the danger with which it would be attended.

"YOU HAVE SAVED MY LIFE, LAD."

The fins of the sharks as they circled round and round their expected prey, which they did not dare to touch, could be seen in dangerous closeness to the brave little pirate, and at times the ugly noses of the alligators seemed almost to touch him.

He was making as much noise as possible, but the exertion was telling on him, and when at last Dare succeeded in getting the rope around his shoulders it was quite time, for he was as nearly exhausted as Captain Sammy.

Bobby at this moment thought of what should have been done before, and taking an oar he reached out as far as possible, striking the flat of the blade on the water.

By this means they succeeded in getting Tommy on board safe and whole. But the moment he was landed on the deck he scurried to his old hiding-place, as if he expected Captain Sammy would give immediate pursuit.

Dare tried to urge him to come into the cabin in order to get some dry clothes, but Tommy displayed quite as much terror now at facing the little man as he did before he had made such heroic attempts to save his life, and he crawled under the berth without regard to the water that ran from him in little streams.

Tommy had hardly hidden himself, when Captain Sammy came on deck, apparently none the worse for his involuntary bath.

He looked at the three boys in silence for a moment, and then in a voice not wholly free from traces of emotion, but still gruff, he asked, "Who was it jumped in to help me?"

"It was Tommy Tucker," replied Dare, and before Captain Sammy fully understood that assertion he related the story of Tommy's being on the boat, speaking very rapidly, as if fearing that he should be interrupted.

For fully a moment Captain Sammy stood in perfect silence, and then he asked, in a voice which the boys were almost certain trembled, "Where is he now?"

Charley told him of Tommy's fear at meeting him, and where he had hidden himself.

"Go and fetch him out," and from the tones of the little man's voice it was hard to tell whether he intended to meet his late enemy in friendship or with the long feud still open.

It was one thing to order Tommy to be brought, and quite another to bring him. Charley had coaxed and entreated, all to no purpose, and it was not until he threatened to go and tell Captain Sammy to come himself that the pirate could be induced to roll out from under the berth.

Then when he went aft to where the little man was waiting for him he appeared like a boy who expects to be knocked down each minute, and fears some harder fate is reserved for him because the blow is not dealt.

But the reception was far different from what he had imagined it would be.

Captain Sammy went to him as he came up, and taking both the dirty hands in his, he said, in a voice that was husky with emotion:

"You have saved my life, lad, and that's something I can't repay by thanks. But for you this shattered old hulk would have been food for the sharks, and I standing before the great Captain. I never believed there was any good in you, Tommy, but you have shown that you are braver than most men would be. I'm going to take you home with me, lad—for if it hadn't been for you I should never go there again—and so long as I've got a timber to float on you shall be at the other end of it. Now get one of the boys to give you a dry suit of clothes till I can fix you up something to wear that looks more trim than the one you've got now, and take hold and have a good time with the rest."

And thus it was that Dare's troubles were over, and the not overbold pirate made one of the crew of the yacht Pearl.

As soon as Tommy was clad in a dry suit of clothes the Pearl was started on her voyage again, and the trip seemed to have just begun for Dare, who had hardly had a moment's peace since he knew of the stowaway.

Despite his previous calling Tommy proved a most valuable addition to the company. He was both willing and anxious to do everything in his power, and Captain Sammy soon began to like him as heartily as he had once disliked him.

Owing to the delay of the first day on the Caloosahatchee, Lake Kachpochee, through which they must pass, was not reached until noon of the second day after leaving Punta Rassa. Three hours later the Pearl glided out upon that large lonely-looking body of water.

The boys felt a sense of awe and isolation creep over them. Lake Okeechobee, as Dare had read when the first idea that he might visit it had come to him, is from forty to fifty miles long, about twenty-five wide, and with a depth of from five to twenty feet.

This was to be their abiding-place while they remained in the Everglades, and Captain Sammy at once looked around for a good anchorage, which he fortunately found not far from the mouth of the river, where a piece of hard shelving beach ran down into the water.

"Now, boys," said the little man, after everything had been made snug for a long stay, "I suppose you are aching to get on shore to try your hand at shooting. You can all take the afternoon off, and I'll stay here to keep ship. Keep your weather eye open, for you'll find bears, panthers, and wild-cats hereabouts, as well as small game, and it wouldn't do to let any of them catch you napping."

Hastily promising to be careful not to allow any animal to get the best of them the boys rowed ashore, and it was not many moments before they learned that on the shores of Lake Okeechobee it is not necessary to hunt very long for game, for the woods appeared to be literally teeming with life.

Dare's greatest ambition in the hunting line had been to shoot a deer, and from the time his parents had first spoken about the trip to Florida up to that moment he had resolved that he would undertake any labor, however great, for the purpose of seeing one of those noble animals fall before his rifle.

Therefore it was that while the other boys were growing excited at the abundance of feathered game near them, and were discharging their weapons whenever a bird with particularly brilliant plumage would rise, Dare stood by, a silent spectator of the wholesale slaughter, as if waiting until his companions' spirits should have worn themselves out a little.

It was not long before the boys did tire of this wanton sport, for it was hardly anything else, since one could remain at a stand-still and shoot right and left without disturbing the numerous flocks save for a few moments at a time, and when Charley suddenly discovered that it was too bad to bring the birds down simply for the sake of killing, Dare was ready with his proposal.

"Let's divide into two parties, Charley and Bobby in one, and Tommy and I in the other; then one party can take a long hunt for big game while the other stays nearer the steamer, in case Captain Sammy should need us. By that means we shall get on without trouble, and by changing around each day all hands will have an equal chance of getting a deer or a bear. Now, Charley, do you want to take a long tramp to-day?"

Charley, who had slaughtered a quantity of birds, had no desire for such violent exercise just then, and with the understanding that he and Bobby should remain within sound of a signal from the Pearl, Dare and Tommy set out in search of game more worthy the hunter.

Tommy had not the slightest idea how deer should be hunted, but since the taint of his piratical calling had been removed from him he was ready for anything, and he accompanied Dare in high glee.

After settling the points of the compass as well in his mind as he was able, Dare started into the woods in such a direction as would keep the sun on his left side, and in a very short time they were where the forest was as dense as though they were in the very heart of the Everglades.

Still Dare pushed on until the cover was more open, and just as he caught sight of a small space which was nearly free from trees he saw that for which he sought.

Three deer and a buck were feeding in the open, and the wind was blowing directly from them to the hunters.

Under such circumstances it was not a difficult matter for the hunter to creep quite near them, and with hands trembling from the excitement of seeing the game he had so long desired to reach, Dare took as good aim as was possible, and discharged his weapon.

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECINCT.

BRAVE AND TENDER.

WHEN Sir John Lawrence was Governor-General of India he was told one day of a little girl who had been taken ill, and was pining away with grief at the loss of a very curious pet. The pet was a tame ostrich, which the child had raised from the egg, left by the ostrich mother in the grass of the park at Barrackpore.

The little girl's father was the keeper of the park, and soon after her discovery of the egg he died and his successor was appointed.

Fearing that foxes or jackals would eat her treasure, or that the cold dews would destroy it, the little girl carried the big egg to the bungalow, and buried it safely in a lidless box filled with dry white sand. This she took pains to set out in the sun every day just where the fiercest rays would pour on it. At night she coaxed a motherly hen, whose own eggs she transferred elsewhere, to brood over the box.

By-and-by, to the great fright of the poor hen, a giant chick broke the shell, and stepped into view. The hen ruffled her feathers, spread her wings, and fled.

The little girl and the ostrich became fast friends, and one was never seen without the other. What, then, was her dismay when the park-keeper took it into his head that the ostrich was public property, and must go to the government aviary!

The child was so distressed at the removal of her pet that her mother feared she would die. But the military surgeon who came to see her thought he knew of something better for her than medicine, and he wrote a letter to Sir John Lawrence telling him all about it.

The Viceroy was a very great man, and had pressing affairs of state to attend to, for millions of people looked to him as their ruler. But he had a very tender heart, and far away in England he had little girls of his own; so he wrote a reply, by the return mail, that the ostrich was at once to be given to its rightful owner, who lost no time in getting well.

Does anybody ask, "How can Aunt Marjorie make a bit of advice out of this little incident?" Well, you know we wrap pills up in sugar; and so we tell stories, and hide lessons within them.

A brave heart is always a tender heart, children. No matter how busy you are, you may, like Sir John Lawrence, take time to do a kind act for some one who is weaker than yourself.

THE DISAPPOINTED PICKEREL.

BY CHARLES BARNARD.

FRED LARKIN lived on the shores of Lake Umbegaygogolik. They called it Gaygog for short. Fred said it was because they had such gay fishing there. Lake Umbegaygogolik was deep in the woods, and for a long time only the few hunters or fishermen who lived along its winding shores knew what particularly fine fishing could be had there.

But lately, somehow or other, the boys had found it out. Never was there such fishing as on the shores of Gaygog. Early in the morning, after school was out, and Saturday afternoons, there was always a party of boys perched somewhere on its banks, and floating over its surface in old punts and scows after those fish. Then something happened that upset the boys.

It is always so. When you are having the best fun, some one comes along, and that's the end of the good times.

"Here is this new hotel," said Fred. "They have built a frame house on the shores of Gaygog, and started a stage line through the old wood road. The people down in the city will be coming here in crowds. They'll have the greatest lot of new-fashioned rods and poles, and all sorts of queer inventions besides, and they'll just spoil the fishing."

Sure enough. In June the hotel was opened, and a lot of people came up from New York to go fishing in Gaygog. They brought all kinds of new-fangled fish-lines and make-believe bugs on fish hooks. Of course all the fish would be scared away, and that would be the end of the fun. It was queer how the fish behaved that summer. There were so many fishermen that half the young trout in Gaygog were caught, and all the old ones retired in disgust to the deep pools, where not even such a skillful fisherman as Fred Larkin could find them.

Besides this, these city people at the new hotel were such monstrous eaters that not all the fishermen on the lake could keep the great frying-pans filled. The cooks were in despair. "More trout," they cried, "or the hotel will fail." Before the hotel was built, anybody could have a string of fish for the trouble of catching them; now the fish were worth money.

Now came Fred Larkin's chance. The cooks would pay ten cents apiece for good trout, and twenty cents for a big pickerel. Fred had never earned any money before in his life. He saw a small fortune just in reach, and he meant to have it. The first thing he did was to go home and have a complete overturning among all his old treasures. He got out everything that had to do with fishing. From among the collection he selected his best lines and his brightest fish-hooks. Then he made a net out of a strip of old muslin, and with it he captured a lot of young fry—"minims" he called them—and made ready for a big haul.

Somehow it didn't seem to be a good day for fishing. There was a mackerel sky, and not much breeze on the water. It ought to be splendid fishing, and yet he could not get a bite.

"I do believe those city fishermen have scared every trout out of his senses."

All day long he fished and fished. He rowed into all the favorite coves where the fish used to be plentiful. Not a fish to be found anywhere. The sun went down, and Fred rowed home, hungry and tired, and without a single fish.

"The fishing's ruined, and no mistake. Those new-fangled fish-lines just scared every trout away. As for pickerel, I do believe they have all dove into deep holes out of sight."

The cooks were in despair. "No fish. The city boarders had beefsteak three times a day. Unless we have fish, the hotel will fail."

Fred vowed he would have some fish, or know the reason why. While he stood in the hotel kitchen he happened to see a big wide-mouthed glass jar on the table. It had a label on one side, but was empty.

"Will you give me that old glass jar?" said Fred.

"What do you mean to do with it?"

"I want it to help catch fish."

"Oh, take it, then. Anything to get some fish. Bring some fresh trout, or the hotel will fail."

"I'll try," said Fred, as he took the big jar in his arms and went home.

Early the next morning Fred took the glass jar, his scoop-net, and a piece of string, and went down to the creek to catch "minims." He filled the jar with water, and as fast as he caught the little fish he put them in it. Soon he had a hundred or more of the small fry swimming about quite lively in the jar. Then he tore off a strip of his net, and with the aid of the string tied it over the mouth of the jar. Then he started for his boat.

He rowed out to a place where the water was clear and the bottom smooth. Taking the boat's painter, he tied it around the jar, and lowered it gently overboard. There were the small fry in the jar at the bottom of the water, and yet not able to get out, as the netting held them fast. Fred leaned over the side of the boat to see what would happen.

Presently a fish swam lazily under the boat. Then he saw the small fish through the glass sides of the jar. He stopped and looked at them in a surprised way. He wriggled his tail, as if greatly excited, and then came a rush they too stopped to see what was going on. The excitement below was tremendous. A whole school of little fellows, and not a single big fellow able to get at them! Fred knew they must be very mad about it, for the moment he let down his line two of them snapped at it, and one was soon flapping on the bottom of the boat.

It seemed as if there were a score of fish swimming round and round the glass jar. One or two big fellows at the "minims." He only bumped his nose against the glass, and swam away, disgusted.

"IT WAS THE BIGGEST PICKEREL EVER SEEN IN THE LAKE."

Fred waited patiently. In a few moments back he came, bringing six others with him. He had evidently told them of the feast prepared for them.

Never did fish behave in such a remarkable way. They circled round and round the glass jar, poking their noses against it, and unable to understand why they could not get at the small fry inside.

Some more fish happened to sail past at that time, and stood off, and said it was some kind of a game they didn't understand. Fred dangled his bait in front of one of these wise old chaps, and of course he came up lively.

Fred never caught so many fish before in one day. He was just baiting his hooks and watching the convention, when suddenly the meeting broke up, and not a fish was to be seen.

"They have found it out. No! My! that is the father of all the pickerel in Gaygog!"

It was the biggest pickerel ever seen in the lake. He thought he would have a look at the little fellows. He stood a little way off eyeing the fish in the jar, and gently waving his ancient tail.

Flash! he had gone. Oh, the jar has upset. Mister Pickerel had charged into it, and tipped it over, and it lay on its side. The little fellows were still inside, for the netting was over the mouth of the jar. Fred was on the point of pulling up the jar when he saw Mister Pickerel coming. He was evidently very angry, and meant mischief. He was aimed right at the big mouth of the jar.

"The show is over," said Fred. "He'll get the whole school, and the jar too."

Swoop! there was a sudden pull on the painter that made it swing. The rope stretched out this way and then that, and in a fever of excitement Fred pulled it in. He had to tug, for there was something heavy at the end.

Poor old pickerel! He had rushed at the mouth of the jar, and thrust his head right into it. The netting broke, and all the little fry ran out, but Mr. Pickerel was trapped. He shook himself, and rushed hither and thither, but the glass jar held on tight.

Everybody at the hotel said it was the finest fish dinner they had ever had. The baked pickerel was magnificent. The hotel was safe, and the next week Master Fred Larkin bought a real Waterbury watch, which he wears to this day.

LA LUZ DE BOGOTÁ.

BY ARTHUR LINDSLEY.

AMONG all the birds there is no family which for brilliant colors and sparkling beauty can compare with humming-birds. And in saying this it is not at all necessary to except even the gorgeous sun-birds, or the birds-of-paradise. Both of these are certainly provided with plumage of marvellous splendor, and from their superior size they make a rich display; but the lovely little humming-birds seem to me to far surpass them in beauty.

Their plumage is extremely bright and beautiful in its general coloring, and then, in addition to that, almost all the species are provided with extra ornaments in the shape of scales which scarcely seem like feathers. They are feathers, it is true, and nothing but feathers, but they are so short and so crisp and so stiff and elastic that they look more like fish scales; and, to make the resemblance more complete, they shine in the light as do pieces of polished metal, in which respect they are like the scales of many tropical fishes. These scales of the humming-birds are very commonly arranged in patches.

How well do I remember one morning on the table-land of Mexico! I had ridden till late in the evening, for I was in a region where water was very scarce. Neither I nor my horse had had anything to drink for a number of hours, and I kept on in the bright moonlight, hoping to reach a spring. None, however, appeared, and some time before midnight I halted and lay down on the ground to sleep till morning. When I awoke the sun had just risen, and I wish I had it in my power to give you some idea of what I saw, but I fear words will do it but very poorly.

All about me grew the yucaes which are so characteristic of that land. As I opened my eyes I looked up at one of them which was towering nearly twenty feet above my head. A large coarse stem stretched up about ten feet, and from its top spread out an enormous crown of strong, heavy, sword-shaped leaves, each leaf being five or six feet long. From the centre of this crown there rose a more delicate stem, and at a height of five feet there grew the flowers. Such flowers! Five feet more they went up, snow-white lilies, making a mass not less than a foot across, like an enormous white plume, the white broken only by the golden-colored anthers.

I looked to one side, and there stood another like it; I rose to my feet, and they were all about me. I had not seen any of them before in such a state of splendor, and to crown it all, as I looked up to the one above me, a hundred blazes of colored fire were flashing all around it. They were red, they were blue, they were green, they were black, they were white, and they were dancing here and there in the most bewildering fashion, and keeping up all the time a hum and buzz like that of swarms and swarms of bees. I could scarcely persuade myself that I was awake, that I was not still dreaming.

You can well understand how, in the days of the old splendor of Mexico and of Peru before the white men came, the brilliant scale-feathers of the humming-birds would be used by the natives for ornament. Of course such things, as is the case with objects of elegance and luxury now everywhere, could be possessed only by those who were wealthy, or what was the same thing then, by the nobles. Montezuma and his princes, at the time of the invasion of the Spaniards, had many garments, even large robes, which were composed entirely of these little scale-feathers. A piece of strong cloth of the proper size was taken, and each little feather was sewed singly upon it, the next being placed so as to overlap it just as they do on the neck of the bird, and so on till the work was completed. Some of the finest of these robes could not have been made without using the skins of fifty thousand humming-birds at the least, and several years of labor were required to accomplish the work.

And not only were such robes made, but Cortez describes most elegant pictures which were formed by fastening or embroidering the shining patches of the skins in such a manner as to work out the design of the artists. The Aztecs even called their capital Tzinzunan because of the abundance of the humming-birds, and they ornamented the statues of their gods with their feathers, often in the form of such robes and mantles as I have mentioned.

And you can not be surprised that most extravagant names have been given to them by various writers in trying to describe their wonderful colors and beauty. I remember one who closes his account of their sparkling tints by comparing them "to the hue of roses steeped in liquid fire." Another calls the little birds themselves "the tresses of the morning star": beautiful idea, and charming title, is it not?

And then only look at the name which is printed at the head of this article. It was given me for that lovely little fellow shown in the drawing. I dare say the name is not very widely known, and even in the place where I heard it there is much probability that only a certain class of persons would recognize it, those being the Indians and the lower Spanish population.

I was in the capital of New Grenada. The windows and doors in that climate were open day and night, and it was no uncommon thing for humming-birds to dart in and out again, but one day a little fellow flew in and in some way became entangled in a curtain. As soon as he saw him, my Indian boy began shouting, "La Luz! la Luz!" and dancing about as though something remarkable had happened.

I soon caught the little hummer, and as I held him in my hand, admiring his most wonderful display of colors, Matéo had crowded up close to me and was watching with staring eyes and an interest that surprised me, and so I asked him, "Que tiene, Matéo" (What is the matter?). "Nada" (Nothing). "Que nombre hay la chiquita?" (What is the name of the little thing?) And after a minute he answered, with some degree of hesitation, "La Luz de Bogotá" (the Light of Bogotá). The name struck me as being very beautiful, and I think that it quite plainly means something, that there is some story connected with it, though I could not induce Matéo to tell me anything definite, yet his first effort was to get me to set the bird at liberty.

Before I left New Grenada I collected many specimens of this exquisite species, and I found it so perfectly lovely in colors and in shape, and its manner of nest-building so wonderful, that I thought it might well be called the Light of Bogotá. I wish I could color the drawing which you see here as the bird really looks in life, but as that can not be, I will color it in words, and you can apply them to the figure.

Do you see that wonderful ruff which stands out from each side of his neck? The species belongs to one genus of the humming-bird which is called Lophornis, a Greek name meaning crested bird, because all the species of the genus have some of the feathers of the head or the neck, or perhaps both, long and beautifully colored. This species is Lophornis ornatus, and surely he is most remarkably ornate. These long ruff feathers (you see some of them are much longer than the others) are of the brightest chestnut red, each one having its tip of an emerald green that sparkles, and as the throat patch from which these chestnut plumes spring is made of those glossy metallic scale-feathers, which are themselves also emerald green, the contrast made by the throat and the ruff is fairly bewitching. That long crest on the top of his head is of nearly the same hue as the ruff plumes, bright chestnut red, while the patch between it and the bill is made of emerald-green scale-feathers. Above he is of a bronze green all down his back, with a patch of snow white between this and his chestnut tail.

The female, as in all the humming-birds, has none of the gorgeous colors of the male. She is quite plain, and you can see that they are both of them very delicate and graceful; the figures are drawn of the natural size. But I spoke of the nest as being one of the charms of this Lophornis. Look and see. The body of it is built up of the soft down of plants about as white as cotton, and then is stuck all over on the outside with small scales of lichens, just enough to hold the down together; they look as though the wind might blow them away. And to help their beauty they are commonly set right among the flowers, say of a cantua twig. Only notice them, flowers, nest, and all together. La Luz, surely.

All of the humming-birds are natives of America only, and this species seems to be fairly confined to South America, for though a straggler or two now and then cross the Caribbean Sea, yet they are only stragglers. From New Grenada the bird abounds as far south as nearly to the limit of Brazil, being specially numerous in Guiana, all about Demerara and Surinam, and so on to Para and beyond.

HOW TO SKETCH FROM NATURE.

BY FRANK BEARD.

WOULD you like to learn to draw? Don't you think that it would be a delightful occupation, on a long summer day, to take out your pencils and paper and copy some scene you want to remember, or produce a likeness of some queer bird or animal which strikes your fancy?

Many will say, "I'd like it very well, but I can't draw." Why not? You can write, you can hold a pencil and trace lines upon the paper; and if you can do this, you can draw a little. Anybody who can learn anything can learn to draw if he will give the same attention to it that he gives to other things.

Now we are not going to talk about copying pictures which some one else has already drawn, for there is not much satisfaction in making imitations of other people's work; it is much more gratifying to make the original drawings ourselves; but to do this we need some direction.

The reason it is more easy to copy a picture than to draw the real object is because the lines to be copied are all laid out on the flat surface of the picture; but to draw the object we must find out where to trace the lines for ourselves.

For instance, suppose we are to draw a flower-pot and plant. If we have the picture before us, we can readily see where all the lines are placed upon the paper, but in viewing a real plant and pot we are apt to become confused in trying to discover the directions and proportions of the lines.

Therefore we must learn to see things as they appear, not as they really are. This may seem strange to you, because one is apt to think that a thing must appear as it is; but let us look into the matter.

We will take a square box (Fig. 1). Now we know that all the sides are the same size, that the top is as large as the side, and that one side is as large as another; but if you try to draw it so, you will find it impossible, because, although you know that the top and sides are the same size as the front, they do not look so, and you draw things as they look, not as they really are.

What would your cube look like if we tried to make the sides 2 and 3 just like the side 1? Or the line C D as long as the line A B? Why, like Fig. 2. Don't you see that would be no box at all?

Take another example. We all know that a man's leg is longer than his arm, but it doesn't always appear so.

Measure the arms and legs of Fig. 3, and you will see by actual measurement the arms are longer than the legs, and yet it looks right, because the legs are projected toward you; in other words, the legs are foreshortened.

The great secret of drawing from nature is to train the eye to see a real object just like a picture.

Now let us return to our flower-pot again. We will suppose we are drawing from a real flower-pot and plant. We determine how large we will make our sketch, and begin operations by drawing a vertical line (a straight upright line). Along this line we will mark out the proportions of the plant and pot, as in Fig. 4.

We may easily discover that the plant is longer than the pot. This can be done by holding the pencil upright before the eye at arm's-length, as in Fig. 5, so that it will cover the pot, and measuring by the thumb the height of the pot, then raising the arm so as to cover the plant, and comparing the measurement of the pot with the plant. The dotted line shows the arm when lifted to compare the plant's length with the length of the pot. The lines drawn from the eye show how the pencil makes the measurement on the object.

After settling the question of the height of the flower-pot and plant we will mark the measurements on the line. And now we will draw in the pot, leaving the straight line through its centre.

On observing the plant we will see that it is not exactly straight, and here again the straight line will be of assistance.

By holding up our pencil, which represents the straight line, we will discover that the stem of the plant leans considerably to the left. Guided by the line we can get the curve of the stem about right. Now we sketch the stem. Along the straight line we again measure the distance from the top of each leaf from the pot, as in Fig. 6. We can see several leaves, each reaching a certain height. Observing the same plan of measurement, we find that the top of the lowest leaf is about the same height from the pot as the height of the pot itself, and again from the top of the lowest leaf to the top of the plant measures the same distance.

By drawing another vertical line just touching the right side of the pot, we find that it touches the extreme edge of the leaf. Thus we find the exact situation of the leaf. By the same method we find the right places for the other leaves, and after we know just where they belong, we draw them in, and find that we have produced a very creditable outline from nature.

We need not confine ourselves to one or two guiding lines in sketching an object; in fact, we may use as many straight lines as will help us to get the correct proportions; not only vertical and horizontal lines, but slanting lines will also assist us in most cases. The sketch of a puppy (Fig. 7) will give an idea of the way to employ all lines necessary in sketching from nature. A few words will be all that is necessary to explain this illustration.

There lies the pup on the floor, and we seat ourselves at a little distance from it with pencil and paper. We will start off with a horizontal line A; then we can form some idea as to whether the little dog lies along a straight line, or in case the bottom line slants, how much it slants. Then draw the vertical line B E. Now suppose we hold our pencil upright in such a position as to touch the back edge of the ear, we will find that it passes through the shoulder of the fore-leg and the knee of the hind-leg, as represented by the line B E; so we have found the places for these parts. Another horizontal line, C D, drawn through the body, will touch the nose and hip, cutting the lower point of the ear. This will show us that the nearest hip and the nose are on a line. It will also help us to get the proportions above and below the line. Then by drawing a slanting line from D to E, we find that the hind-leg, the nose, and fore-paw are all on that line; so we can not go far astray in our proportions.

One of the chief difficulties in following this method of drawing from nature is to hold our measuring stick exactly vertical or horizontal. This difficulty can be overcome by providing yourself with a T-square (Fig. 8), and attaching to it at the point A a string with a weight attached so that it will hang plumb. By using this we can be sure whether we hold it straight or not, for in case we tip it too much on one side or the other the string will swerve from the middle of the upright stick. Of course, whenever we hold the T-square perfectly straight, the string will fall straight down the middle of the upright, and the top of the T will then give us a true horizontal line.

A little thought and practice will lead you to thoroughly understand this method, and when you really understand it you will have an unerring guide to assist you.

Of course as the eye and hand become trained with practice and observation, the work will become easier, and you will have less need of the T-square.

In beginning the practice of drawing from nature we had better confine our first efforts to things that will stand still, for without a practiced hand it will be almost impossible to sketch a restless subject; but if we attempt to do so, we should follow the methods before taught as nearly as possible.

Now suppose we start off on a sketching tour. We have hardly entered the barn-yard before something strikes our fancy—a goose. We would dearly like to take his picture, but he will not keep still an instant, now presenting a side view, now a front view, or turning his back toward us, and if we really must have his picture, we have nothing for it but to catch him and tie him up. Yet even now he is a hard subject, twisting his long neck, and bobbing his head about; but we feel that we must have his picture. So we observe the position in which he remains the longest time, or assumes oftenest, and begin our work.

We first note the general proportions. Is his body as thick as it is long? Is his neck as long as his body? Are the legs nearest the tail or head? Is the head as long as the neck? What part reaches the highest? or what part the lowest? We hastily consider these questions, and determine in our own mind the answers, for we want to get an idea of the proportions before we begin to draw. Now we draw a horizontal line along our paper, and then hold up our pencil horizontally so that it will answer for a straight line drawn across the body of the real goose (Fig. 9). This will represent the horizontal line already drawn on the paper. Noticing then the directions the outlines of the goose take from the horizontal line (represented by the pencil), we sketch them in on the paper, remembering that one of the most important things is to get the right directions of the lines. Observe that in Fig. 10 the line A is directed to too high a point, and makes the body too thick and out of proportion.

FIG. 6.

FIG. 7.

In sketching it is best to make all straight lines instead of curves, for in this way we are more likely to get the right directions. Our first rough sketch ought to have something of the appearance of Fig. 11, and as we work it up more carefully it will become as nicely rounded as we could desire.

One of the most common faults a beginner is apt to commit is to try to do too much either by choosing too great a subject, such as a large landscape, or by putting too many little things into the composition. Take care of the large things, and the little things will take care of themselves.

If our subject be a clump of trees at some distance, we should not attempt to draw in separate leaves, but endeavor to get the true shape of the tree, simply indicating the leaves by a few lines. Neither must we attempt in sketching to put in all the shadows; an indication of the stronger shadows by a thicker line is generally enough to give the idea of shadow. Notice in Fig. 12 how few lines there are, after all. The background of hills and trees is merely suggested by a few characteristic and light lines, because the light oil, and a sheet of white paper are all you really need to begin with.

FIG. 8.

striking upon them gave a very light appearance. The nearer objects are produced by thicker and blacker lines, and the water is shown by a few horizontal lines.

Draw as simply as possible. Ten pictures are spoiled by putting in too much work where one is spoiled by too little. Don't be discouraged. Every effort will show improvement if you really put your mind and heart in your work. As for material, a piece of soft rubber, a No. 2 pen-

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

TERRY, MONTANA.

I am a little Ohio Buckeye girl just ten years old, and we have moved out on a big farm or ranch in Montana. I have a shepherd dog named Bu Bu, and a cow named Jute. I have lots of fun hunting eggs. I watch for your paper, and enjoy reading the letters from the little folks, and send much love to them.

DAISY CALDWELL P.

MARBLESFORD, IOWA.

We have been taking YOUNG PEOPLE for two years, and like it very much. I agree with Rosalie P. about red hands. I am sure I wash dishes enough for any one. Many children tell about their pets. We have a few—a pony, a bird, cats, and chickens. Our pony is sorrel, and has white feet and face. We have many rides on him; his name is Dandy. I can ride as fast as he can go, and have never once fallen off, but my sister Mabel has had many curious adventures riding him, he is so skittish. Mamma has a great many flowers in the garden, and in winter keeps them in the house. I am intending to act a part in a drama or play at our exhibition. The play is, Among the Breakers.

ABBIE D.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl eleven years old, and have been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since No. 39. I was much pleased with "Nan," "The Talking Leaves," and all of the serial stories. In fact, with each number of the paper I have seen so many new beauties that I am firmly wedded to its interests. I suppose many of your correspondents will envy me when they hear that I know and love the Postmistress; but notwithstanding that fact I have written her two letters, neither of which has been printed. Papa says there are so many little folks who write letters to the Postmistress that he wonders sometimes how she can find time to read them all, not to speak of arranging them for publication.

I enjoy Jimmy Brown's stories very much, and hope he will write oftener. I have a dear little Maltese kitten only two days old, a French doll, and a great many books. I love to read, and think it aids me in my studies to have what is generally dry history presented in the form of fiction. Can I join the Little Housekeepers? I am very fond of cooking, but I prefer to read, and as I am only eleven years old, papa thinks that if I store my mind now with literary knowledge and music, the Housekeeping Department can be added later, but if I become a member of your Little Housekeepers it might keep alive my interest. I hope this letter is not too long. The letters you publish seem to be the short ones.

EVA A. MCK.

There is no rule about longer or shorter so far as our little correspondents are concerned, but short letters do not take up so much room in this crowded Post-office Box, and so we can get more of them in, you see. Eva has been very sweet about her other letters which were not printed, and so deserves to have her patience rewarded. Tell papa that you will be a Little Housekeeper in vacation at least.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

I am a Cleveland boy fourteen years old. I am fond of reading, and I have read so many books that I believe their titles would fill a page. I am now reading The Old Curiosity Shop, and like it very much. We boys are fond of playing lake and bouquak, and we chalk the letter A for second. I am very fond of studying, and I go to the public school, and am in the B. Grammar class, second division. In the summer vacation I go down to papa's printing-office and set type, and am paid so much for many hours in the beautiful city. While I read a little book for the week. I advise Jack C. not to go to sea, for I don't think he would like to be a cabin boy.

PERCY V. F.

LIMONA, FLORIDA.

I am reading "Raising the Pearl" aloud to mamma. We are greatly interested in the story, for we live only ten miles from Tampa, and have spent many hours in the beautiful city. While I read my little brother Carl sits near, and draws doll little things, or plays with his blocks, or reads his Mother Goose, in a very comical fashion, quite softly to himself. We are always together, and mamma calls us the twins, though I am twelve and Carl but four. He doesn't seem to pay much attention to me when I read, but his little ears have a way of hearing everything, and last night when he was drawing as usual, and I asked what he was making, he said, "Oh, just a picture of Captain Sammy," and here it is, just as he made it all by himself, and don't you think it pretty good for a little fellow only four years old?

CLAUDE M.

Indeed I do.

GERMANTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am nine years old. I have to lie in bed, for I had a fall of my bicycle. I have no pets, except a little dog, Dot, and a large white cat, Snowdrop. We go to the country in the summer. We find turtles in the woods, and harness them to little post-board wagons, and they trot along very nicely; we feed them on fruit. We often go to the woods with papa to gather wild flowers and ferns. In the winter we have a fernery, and an aquarium with a great many little fish in it. I have sent wiggles twice, but they have not been published. My brother and I used to take St. Nicholas, but have taken YOUNG PEOPLE for some time, and are always glad when the day comes for the postman to bring it.

C. N. T.

That was an unlucky ride on the bicycle, was it not, dear? Keep on trying your hand at the wiggles; you will succeed in time.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little boy eight years old, and have just commenced taking YOUNG PEOPLE. I am going to the country next month, and my papa thinks of buying me a pony. I expect to have a garden filled with flowers and take care of them myself. My little brother George has a black bear that growls and shows his teeth when he is wound. I have two birds, and expect to be a happy boy this summer in the country.

HEERY E., JUN.

I have two guinea-pigs, two rabbits, two dogs, and one canary-bird. We have two little baby brothers. We are five altogether—no sisters. We live in the country in the summer, and in town in the winter. I had four alligators, but my uncle sent me about twelve inches long. We go to school. Your little friend, Tom C.

Where does Tom live? He forgot to tell us.

FOR THE LITTLE HOUSEKEEPERS.

BREAD Pudding.—One pint of bread-crumbs soaked from thirty to forty minutes in one quart of sweet milk. Then add one cup of sugar, three eggs, and butter the size of an egg; bake until it looks like custard.

DELICATE CAKE.—One cup of sugar, half a cup of butter, half a cup of sweet milk, the whites of four eggs, and one cup of flour. Beat the whites of eggs with my big brother. In a large field near the house may be found bunches of flints. They are of all colors—a delicate pink, white, dark blue, and black. Some are as thick as a paper, and some as thin as a leaf. They are very much like the flints found in the same field in a mound, on which we are going to build a summer-house. On an adjoining farm is a large stone mound about forty feet long and eight feet high. It is supposed to have been placed there by the Indians.

My home is near the banks of the Hockocking River. Every spring the river becomes very high, and great masses of ice float down in the muddy waters. In the summer it is like a little silver thread glistening in the sunlight. On the banks are great sycamores, some of which are covered by trailing grape vines. It is very nice to walk under them with my big brother. In a large field near the house may be found bunches of flints. They are of all colors—a delicate pink, white, dark blue, and black. Some are as thick as a paper, and some as thin as a leaf. They are very much like the flints found in the same field in a mound, on which we are going to build a summer-house. On an adjoining farm is a large stone mound about forty feet long and eight feet high. It is supposed to have been placed there by the Indians.

This is the first letter I ever wrote to a paper, and if it shall be printed I will write again, and tell you about a rock horse not many miles from here.

It is a very good letter, although your name, and shows that you use your eyes in watching the beautiful and interesting sights near your home.

I am ten years old, and live in three miles out of town. I like to swing in our big swing, and to swing in the tower. The tower is eighty feet high. In the top is a tank which holds 400 barrels of water. This is to supply the house. A small mill runs the water from the pond and into the tank. My sister and little brother Archie go to school with me in the tower. I take painting lessons, and have three boxes of paints. My favorite author George Macdonald. My motto is "Patience and perseverance lead to honor and success." Good-by.

I am a little girl ten years old, and live in the country. We have a nice large house with grounds around it, and my little brothers Bertie and Allen and myself have a great deal of fun playing. We have a dog named Rover, and lots of hens, and ten little chickens, hatched this spring. We expect to have a great many more, as we have seven hens sitting on eighty eggs. I had a little pet chicken last summer. I called it Tiny, and if you tapped on the floor or table it would come to you; it would eat out of your hand, and follow you around like a dog. It grew to be a large chicken, and then became sick and died.

As Beatrice has had to wait some weeks for her turn, I presume the ten chickens have become respectable pullets, and that she has a great many more feathered pets to care for.

I have two boats, a steamer called "The First City," and a little bark named "The First City." I don't think many little boys would want to see me with my little candles and go in a boat to work. I have a pet calf, and I call her Rosa; I feed her myself. Papa says a calf is better than a cat, because there is more of it. I have my little brothers Johnny and Willie, and two little sisters, Jennie and Emma. I read every letter.

I am a little girl nine years old. I live in the mountains, and men dig gold here. I have been in tunnels, and know how the gold is got out. I guess some of your readers would think it funny to see me with my little candles and go in a boat to work. I have a pet calf, and I call her Rosa; I feed her myself. Papa says a calf is better than a cat, because there is more of it. I have my little brothers Johnny and Willie, and two little sisters, Jennie and Emma. I read every letter.

GRANDMOTHER.

Grandmother sits in her old arm-chair, Knitting as grandmothers can; The fire-light gleams on her silvery hair, And lights up her thin white hands.

Grandmother's thoughts are a long way off, "Way" way back in the past. Her thoughts keep time with her needles, As she knits along so fast.

For mother's days are nearly over— For she is aging fast; Her many, many, many eighty-four— They soon will all be past. LETTIE L. B. CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

The verses about Grandmother are very good for a little writer who is only twelve; and the composition on "A Dog named Phil" deserves a place, because Josephine G. is just ten.

A DOG NAMED PHIL.

This is about a dog that my cousin Rob has. He is eight years old, and his name is Phil. He is a very smart dog; he can say his prayers, and in Rob asks Phil if he wants his dinner, and Phil barks; then he goes and gets his pan, and takes it out to Cousin Rob's mother, and barks again, as if to say, "Please give me my dinner." I don't say that say that when he says his prayers he will get down on his hind legs and put his head on his paws, and stay there until some one says "Amen," when he jumps up. I can not think of any of the other things that Phil does, but I think that he is a very smart dog. Mamma was in Concord last summer—Phil lives in Concord—and she says that Phil steals his meals, and makes himself sick. JOSEPHINE G. PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

Now Florence has something to tell us concerning a pleasant time out of doors:

DAISY'S DAY IN THE COUNTRY.

BY FLORENCE N.

Once upon a time there was a nice little girl, eight years old, whose name was Daisy. She was a very good little girl, and always did what her mother told her to do. One day she went to visit her cousin in the country, and it was a very long, pleasant day for her. She went to her cousin's farm, and helped to feed the pigs, ducks, geese, chickens, dogs, and sheep. Then they both played with May's dolls, and were having a charming time, when the dinner-bell rang; so they left the dolls and got their dinner.

After dinner Daisy, May, Charlie, and Fanny went down to a little river not far from the house, and they went into a row-boat, and put the luncheon basket in the bottom of the boat, and then they rowed away up the river until they came to a small island with sloping stony shores, and pretty green trees and grass all over it. Charlie helped them all out, and then took the basket. They strolled about looking for wild flowers, and soon had their aprons full of daisies, buttercups, wild roses, and jenny-jump-ups, which they carefully put in the boat to take home to their mamma. Then Charlie waded into the water to catch frogs and minnows, while the others were looking for shells and pretty stones. While they were laughing and playing a scream was heard from Fanny, who, while listening to a story which May was telling, had tumbled over a log and fallen into the water. Cousin May immediately came forward and soon brought her to land, and May got Daisy's warm coat and wrapped it round her, and she soon went to sleep. When she was up, her clothes, which were hanging out to dry, were all ready to put on, and when she was dressed again they all sat down to their tea. After tea they put the things in the basket and carried it down to the boat, and went in, and were nicely seated, when they heard thunder. May looked up at the dark rolling clouds, and Daisy said, "Hurry up, Charlie; it is going to rain."

If I don't want to be soaked, I guess I will answer Charlie. And as he spoke another peal of thunder and a flash of lightning came, and before they were gone the children felt some drops of rain. But soon as they came to the bank of the river they saw their house there. They presently landed and hurried up to the house, where they found Daisy's father waiting for her to go home to the city. So, after saying good-by to them, Daisy drove home with her father, having had a very happy day.

THREE ARTISTIC MAIDENS.

BY MARGARET JOHNSON.

TWAS on a lovely summer day
That three artistic damsels gay
Set forth to sketch together.
Each bore her book and lunch-bag small,
And each her ample parasol,
For sunny was the weather.

"Come," cried the first, "we'll draw that tree!"
"Nay," said the second, "don't you see
There's quite too little shadow?
Let's try instead this bit of stone,
With moss and lichen all o'ergrown,
Here in the shady meadow."

"How can you choose," exclaimed the third,
"So commonplace a thing! I've heard
A rustic bridge is charming."
At which the other two declared
To speak of anything so hard
Was really quite alarming.

And thus from early morn till noon
They walked, that lovely day in June,
And as they walked, disparted.
On nothing could they all agree.
Sure as one said, "That pleases me,"
The others were not suited.

At last the three, with sigh and frown,
Upon a log did sit them down;
And while their bags grew thinner,
They speedily became once more
The best of friends, as heretofore,
And quite enjoyed their dinner.

DOING HIS DUTY.

CÆSAR and his master had gone from home together, and while they were away the master found in his pocket a key which he should have left behind. He gave the key to the dog and told him to take it back. This Cæsar started off to do. On his way he was attacked by a butcher's dog, but he tore himself from his enemy and delivered the key in safety. Cæsar then returned by the road he came, hunted up the dog that had attacked him, and then ensued a combat which lasted a long time, until the dog that had dared to interfere with another in the execution of his duty had been most soundly whipped.

Monograms on left of bridge: two persons connected with the history of the structure. Monograms on right of bridge: two prominent officials of New York and Brooklyn. The letters which are found in numbered spaces give the names of five well-known bridges in this country and England; all the letters marked 1 make the name of one bridge, those marked 2 another, and so on until the five are found. Now find the names of towns, rivers, etc., which are indicated by fourteen numbered rafts which are floating down the river. The initials of these names, when found, will make, if used in the same order as the rafts are numbered, the name of one of the most prominent invited guests at the bridge opening. GEORGE FOLSON.

THE CHALLENGE.

A BUNCH OF CLOVER.

BY MRS. M. E. SANGSTER.

IT grew within a sunny field,
This little bunch of clover,
And day by day the singing wind
Just kissed it, blowing over
The bending rye, the feathered grass,
The brier-woven hedges,
Until it reached the dancing waves
With foamy silver edges.

O rosy red, O snowy white,
The dainty bunch of clover
Knows all the secrets of the winds
That kissed it blowing over;
And when a little fevered cheek
Shall feel the breezy flowers,
Each tiny top will whisper sweet
Of Love surpassing ours.

CHAPTER XXI.

IN THE TRACKLESS FOREST.

DARE had aimed at one of the females, instead of at the buck, because she had chanced to be nearer to him, and although she did not fall at once, he knew from her movements as she started away that his bullet had taken effect.

The herd were off at once, but the wounded doe ran so unsteadily that Dare, believing she would drop almost immediately, raised a shout of triumph, and started after his game, closely followed by Tommy.

The trail was not difficult to follow, even for inexperienced hunters, for it was distinctly marked by the blood that fell from the wounded animal, and Dare's heart beat high at the thought that at last he had killed the game he so ardently desired to kill.

But the doe was not so near her death as he had thought, for they continued to follow, catching glimpses of the wounded animal, as, left far behind the others of the herd, she ran with increasing difficulty, until the sun had sunk almost below the tree-tops.

In the excitement of the chase they had not noticed the passage of time, and when at last they came to where the poor animal had fallen, never to rise again, they were surprised to find that it was so nearly dark that it was with difficulty they could see the game they had killed.

"We must hurry back to the Pearl," said Dare, as he looked about him with a troubled air, "for it won't be long before it will be too late for us to be able to tell where the west is."

It seemed as if Tommy did not care whether they could distinguish the points of the compass or not, and he answered, "All right," much as if they only had the question of a five minutes' tramp before them.

Dare was so thoroughly anxious about their position that he did not even stop to try and skin his game, but commenced hurriedly to cut out one of the haunches that they might at least have proof of what they had killed.

Inexperienced as he was, and with only a small-sized hunting-knife to work with, it was no slight task to cut out the meat he wanted to carry, and when the job was finished, the darkness, which in tropical countries succeeds the light so quickly, had formed a thick veil around the hunters.

During the operation of cutting out the haunch Dare had turned the doe several times, and had changed his own position so often that when he was ready to start again he had no more idea of which direction he should go in order to find the Pearl than if he had been led there blindfolded.

Not wanting Tommy to know that he was so utterly confused, he called to him to follow, and started off at hap-hazard, stumbling over trunks of trees, and tripped up by the running vines, until it seemed worse than folly for them to continue on their blind course any longer.

"Tommy," said Dare, solemnly, as he stopped and took one of his companion's hands in his, "we're lost!"

"I know that," was the cool reply from the ex-pirate, but he appeared perfectly indifferent about the matter.

"But what shall we do?" asked Dare, irritated by the calm manner in which his companion spoke.

"Get up in a tree, an' wait till morning," replied Tommy, calmly.

The ex-pirate's advice was not only good, but it seemed as if it was the only thing that could be done, and without being able to see toward what new peril they were going, they began to climb the nearest tree.

With their guns slung on their backs, the boys tried to get themselves into something approaching a comfortable position on the crotch of the limb.

But it is hardly possible to make one's self comfortable on the branch of a tree when it is a question of remaining all night, and the hours that came before daylight seemed the longest that Dare had ever known, although it is possible that Tommy had had some experience in dreary hours when he was hiding from Captain Sammy in the cabin of the Pearl.

Whenever sleep did visit their eyelids it was only for a few moments, and then they would awake with a start as they found themselves slipping from their perch.

In a state of continual awakenings, intermingled with the greatest desire to sleep, the time passed, and daylight came quite as suddenly as it had disappeared.

The first thing Dare did when it was light enough for them to pursue their journey again was to fire off his gun several times, that the report might serve as signal in case their companions were anywhere near them.

The first thing Tommy did was to build a fire and cook some slices of their venison, for they both felt nearly famished.

The breakfast of hot meat gave them renewed courage, and they started out almost thoroughly refreshed.

They had walked nearly an hour without seeing any indications that they were on the right course, when Tommy, who was in advance, uttered a cry of joy, and rushed toward a flat stone, at which he gazed intently.

"Here's a feller what 'll show us our way!" he cried, as he pointed to what looked more like the skeleton of an insect than anything else. "You wait a minute, and he'll stand up and point right to where the Pearl is."

Dare had heard since he had been in Florida of an insect called "the spectre," which superstitious people believed would point out the way to travellers lost in the forest, and without believing that it possessed any such power, he examined it with much interest.

Tommy, sincere in the belief that the spectre would point out the right direction for them to take, asked very solemnly if it would tell them the way they ought to go, and then he waited patiently for an answer.

It was not many moments before the insect partly raised its body, and waved its fore-legs to and fro as if really answering Tommy's question.

The ex-pirate started off at once in the direction pointed out; but Dare, who remained a moment longer, saw the spectre seize a fly in its feet, killing it instantly. It had waved its legs for the purpose of catching the fly, rather than to show Tommy the way, although no amount of reasoning could convince the boy of that fact.

Fortunately the insect had pointed directly in the course the boys had been pursuing, so that there was no need of any discussion as to whether they should follow its directions or not.

It was nearly noon before Tommy lost faith in the spectre's power, and then there was good reason for it, since they had walked steadily without finding even a stream which might give them a course for the lake.

They had suffered from the lack of water, but this suffering had not been severe, since they had found pools of brackish water now and then, which they drank as eagerly as though it had sparkled like crystal.

They were now as hungry as they had been in the morning, and Dare proposed that they should cook more of the haunch of venison, to which Tommy had elung firmly.

But it was only necessary to attempt to cut it in order to find that it was no longer fit for food, the heat having thoroughly spoiled it.

"We must shoot the first thing we see, for we shall never get out of this if we don't keep ourselves strong by plenty of food," said Dare, and Tommy promised to obey, which promise came very near being fatal to both of them.

The ex-pirate was in advance, and in less than ten minutes from the time he had promised to shoot the first object that presented itself, Dare saw him raise his gun to his shoulder.

It was impossible to see what kind of game the boy was aiming at, but Dare waited silent and motionless, hoping that the result of his shot might be a good dinner for both.

The instant the report of the rifle died away Dare heard a loud snarl, and a rustling of the bushes a short distance ahead, as if some very large animal had been wounded.

At the same time Tommy sprang back and began to reload his gun.

"What was it?" asked Dare, beginning to grow alarmed as the noise in the bushes increased.

"A panther," replied Tommy, in much the same tone he would have used if he had said "a bird," and then he added, quite calmly, "I fired 'cause you said I must at the first thing I saw; but you'd better look out, for he ain't dead yet."

It seemed an aggravation of their misery to be obliged to fight a panther when they were exhausted from the long tramp and lack of food; but there was no way out of it, and Dare peered cautiously around in order to be prepared for any move the wounded animal might make.

It was hardly a moment before he saw the panther, as, reared on its hind-legs, it seemed to be coming directly toward them, and not more than ten yards away.

CHAPTER XXII.

OUT OF THE WILDERNESS.

It was anything rather than a pleasant or even safe position in which the boys found themselves, with a wounded panther advancing directly toward them, and with no weapons other than two muzzle-loading rifles.

But there was only one way in which they could hope to get out of the difficulty, and that was by continuing the attack which Tommy had so rashly begun.

Reared on its hind-legs as it was, the animal presented a fair mark at short range, and Dare fired at him quickly, certain that he hit him full in the breast, but without causing any change in his movements.

Tommy, who had taken refuge behind a tree, where he loaded his gun with all the coolness and precision of an old hunter, was ready to take up his portion of the thread of the difficulty, and he also sent a bullet with apparently as true an aim as Dare's.

At receiving this shot the furious animal was brought to the ground, where he gave such evidences of strength as warned the hunters that there was plenty of fight left in him despite his wounds.

Dare followed Tommy's example of loading while behind a tree, and two heavy charges were put into the guns. The monster was still writhing on the ground, and the boys, stepping cautiously up to within ten or twelve feet of the brute, sent two bullets crashing into his skull, which had the effect of killing him instantly.

It was a short but hard battle, well fought, and the boys stood viewing the evidence of their skill as marksmen, without a thought of the fact that they were lost in the forest, when suddenly a familiar sound greeted their ears, causing them to shout for very joy.

It was the whistle of the Pearl, and could not have been more than half a mile away.

"They must have heard us while we were firing at the panther," said Dare, joyfully, "but we will fire once more to make sure."

The guns were loaded with powder, and both discharged at the same time. Then came three short whistles, showing that the signal had been heard, and after that, prolonged whistling at regular intervals, so that the lost ones would have no difficulty in retracing their steps.

Dare was anxious to carry the skin of the panther with him as a trophy, and he insisted on skinning the carcass before starting again to rejoin their friends.

The hide was not taken off in a remarkably workman-like manner, but it was off, at all events, and then came a hurried march over fallen trees, among climbing, clinging vines where poisonous reptiles lurked, until at last the waters of the lake could be seen from among the trees.

The little steamer had never looked half so beautiful as when Dare and Tommy stepped out on the hard beach where they could see her a short distance from the shore, while Charley and Bobby were just putting off in the tender.

Five minutes later and they were in their floating home once more, trying to eat as many as three meals in one, and tell their story at the same time.

"It won't do to try any more such hunting adventures, lads, for you might not get off so easily next time, and I don't propose to leave any of you here in the Everglades," said Captain Sammy, in as stern a voice as possible; but his joy at their safe return was too great to admit of his speaking as gruffly as he could sometimes.

The Pearl, which had been cruising along the shore all the forenoon, until the reports of the guns were heard, was run back to her former anchorage, and after everything was made snug for the second time Captain Sammy said:

"Tommy, there's a cabbage-palm right over there. Can't you climb it?"

"Of course I can," replied the ex-pirate, in disdain that there should be any question about his ability to do such a simple thing.

"All right—here's my belt and knife, and if the boys will row you ashore, we'll show them what a cabbage that is raised on a tree tastes like."

The boys were only too willing to do as the little man suggested, for they were anxious both to see a cabbage-palm and to find out how a leathern belt and sheath-knife could be used in climbing a tree.

After they were on shore and Tommy had started in the direction Captain Sammy had pointed out, the boys could see the famous cabbage-palm, as it reared its graceful head above the surrounding trees. Fully ninety feet the trunk rose straight as a reed, with not a branch to mar its tapering symmetry, and the top was one immense mass of dark green fan-shaped leaves.

"DARE FIRED AT HIM QUICKLY."

It was in the centre of these leaves that the cabbage, which is really a young, tender shoot, would be found, protected by numerous fibres or folds, and Tommy set about his task of getting it with the greatest unconcern.

He buckled the belt around the trunk of the tree and his own body, and by holding on with his knees while he shoved the belt further up on the trunk, he was enabled to make reasonably rapid progress, at the same time teaching his companions a lesson in tree-climbing.

On reaching the top Tommy cut off some of the large leaves, which would make an excellent camp on shore, and then cut the cabbage from its secure and cozy home.

Captain Sammy was as delighted with the prize when it was brought to him as if he had received one of the vegetable treasures from which the tree takes its name; but when it was cooked that night the boys could not detect very much of a cabbage flavor. Dare thought it was more like a boiled chestnut in taste, and the others were of his opinion, all save Captain Sammy, who would insist that the flavor was that of a cabbage and nothing else.

The little man showed them how to tan the skin of the panther, and Tommy and Dare worked at it while Charley and Bobby went on shore to shoot some sand-cranes, coming back with two fine specimens, which Captain Sammy promised to stuff for them.

This offer raised the greatest enthusiasm on the subject of stuffed birds among the boys; and the little Captain found that if he granted all the requests he should have work enough on hand to keep him busy about two months, therefore he proposed to teach the art of taxidermy to them, so that they might carry with them a goodly collection of specimens from the Everglades.

Dare and Charley were delighted with this plan, and for the next ten days little was done save stuffing and mounting the birds which Tommy and Bobby brought in.

When every available inch of space in both cabins was filled with birds of gorgeous plumage or grotesque shapes, Captain Sammy proposed that they start the idle engines once more, and make a complete tour of the lake, which proposition was accepted without a dissenting voice.

"KATIE'S WORK."

BY ADA CARLETON STODDARD.

"HURRAH!"

The door flew open with a bang as Phil Payson burst into the little room where his mother and his sister Katie sat sewing, his face flushed, his eyes shining, and his cap swinging high over his head.

"Why, Phil!"

"Give three cheers, mother! Dance like a dervish, Kate! I'm going to be night-watchman in Mr. Medway's mill, at fifteen dollars a month. Oh, mother, ain't you glad?"

"Very glad indeed," answered Mrs. Payson, and for a moment she looked pleased enough to satisfy Phil's highest expectations. Then her face clouded.

"But your school, Phil dear; I can't have you leave that."

"I don't mean to, mother," said Phil, earnestly. "It's all fixed just right. I'll study nights—it will help keep me awake, you know—and Miss Cary is going to hear me recite every afternoon at five o'clock. She offered to, mother. Oh, mother, do say you're glad, really!"

Mrs. Payson pulled her tall boy down, and kissed him tenderly on both glowing cheeks. As for Katie, she was literally on tiptoe with delight. She was a little brown gypsy, with dark eyes full of fire and fun.

"Good for Miss Cary," she cried, twirling lightly around on her toes. "Isn't she just splendid?"

"She is very kind," said Mrs. Payson, smiling; "and I am glad, Phil, more glad than I can tell you. How came Mr. Medway to give you the place? It is a very responsible position, you know."

"Yes," said Phil, and he blushed and hung his head. "Squire Deems recommended me, mother. Mr. Medway said he told him I was a very trustworthy boy. I'm sorry I said such hard things about him."

"I'm sure he deserved it," Katie flashed forth, "for advising mamma to 'put us out'—that is just what he said—when—papa—went away, and offering to find good homes for us. The idea! What would a home be without mamma? and what would she do without us, I'd like to know?"

"What, indeed!" echoed her mother. "I can't tell, Katie. But Squire Deems thought he was acting for the best. He has been very kind all through our trouble, and I am sure it was his influence that procured Phil this situation."

"But it's mean for Phil to do it all," argued Katie. "I wish I could do something."

Phil wrinkled his nose at his sister and laughed.

"I'm the man o' this house," said he. "You and mother are ladies, Katydid. I don't mean you shall do much more sewing for people."

"My fifteen-year-old man," said his mother, laughing too; but there were tears gathering in her eyes.

And Katie dimpled, and then relaxed into swift gravity.

"I know what I can do, Phil," she said, going close to her brother: "I can hold up your hands the way that somebody in the Bible did. I can see the mill from my window, and every night—every night, Phil, before I go to sleep, I shall ask God to take care of my brother; and every time I'm awake I shall look down at you, so you needn't feel lonesome."

"Something of the guardian angel style?" laughed Phil, trying to joke away the moisture he felt creeping into his eyes. "You're a trump, Katie; but of course that's all nonsense—the looking out, you know."

Katie wasn't sure of that, however, and she meant to do just as she said if it were. She would feel as if she were somehow helping Phil, and that would be a comfort. Their little dwelling, though on the same side of the river as the mill, was above it, and around a wide bend; and so the long low structure under the river-bank was in plain view from the window of Katie's little chamber. She kept her word faithfully; and once or twice every night she would creep out of her warm nest to the window, and look down across the bend to the mill. Often, not always, she could see Phil's light shining out of the engine-room, and sometimes she watched it go from window to window as Phil went his hourly rounds over the mill. As for Phil, I am sure that, though he would hardly have acknowledged it, the lonely place where his nights were passed seemed far less lonely to him when he remembered that Katie might at any minute be looking from her window and thinking of him.

So a month passed by, and Phil performed his duties to Mr. Medway's entire satisfaction. There were some, indeed, who considered him much too young for his post, and did not hesitate to say so. But Mr. Medway always answered with a smile:

"Well, Squire Deems recommended him, and guaranteed I wouldn't be sorry I hired him. I've tested him all times o' night; he's always wide awake and about his business. He does the work of a man, and I get him ten dollars on a month's hire less."

Which was very true, and Mr. Medway ought to have blushed for it, though, to be sure, Phil was more than satisfied with what he received.

"I'm only two-thirds of a man yet," he said to his mother, laughingly. "I'm lucky to get the place. There are enough more who would be glad to take it."

He kept well up with his classes too, he was so ambitious. Miss Cary declared she was proud of him to Katie, and Katie's heart swelled with joy to hear it.

One day early in March something happened. Mrs. Payson was taken suddenly and violently ill. Katie, terrified beyond measure, could do nothing but rouse Phil from his sleep; and when the boy, startled by his sister's white scared face, had brought the doctor, he felt as though he could never sleep again.

There was no great cause for alarm, however.

"It's a bad attack of cramp," Dr. Daley said, with a re-assuring smile in Katie's direction. "You're doing just right. Apply hot cloths, and keep them hot. The spasms will ease away in a little time."

It was not until nearly night-fall, nevertheless, that Mrs. Payson became perfectly free from pain and quite herself again. Then Phil, light-hearted enough, and whistling a merry air, took up his lunch-basket and his books and trudged off to his work. Katie, troubled, followed him to the door.

"I'd get some one else to-night, Phil," she said. "You have always been used to sleeping all day. What if—"

But Phil laughed, and opened his dark eyes to their utmost. "I'm as wide awake as an owl," said he. "I couldn't go to sleep if I wanted to. See!"

Katie laughed too at the comical, strained expression on Phil's face. But she couldn't help feeling a little anxious as she went slowly back into the house. Suppose Phil should go to sleep, and Mr. Medway have a notion to visit him, as he often did, Katie knew, what a sad thing that would be for them all, and how dreadfully Phil would feel!

"It would just break his heart, I know," said she to herself. "But of course he won't."

Katie's prayer for her brother's welfare was much longer that night than usual; and, once in bed, she tossed and tumbled, only to fall at last into an uneasy slumber. More than once before the little clock on the sitting room mantel struck ten she sprang to the window and gazed down across the wide white river bend, only to see Phil's lamp beaming cheerily in the engine-room. How Phil would laugh at her if he knew, she thought, feeling really out of patience with herself.

"I won't look out again," she said. "It's nonsense, just as Phil said. I will not look out again to-night."

But she did—once more. The lamp in the engine-room still burned steadily. It would have been a relief to see the light flashing from window to window as she had seen it so often, Katie thought. She could feel sure then that all was right. Now—

Was that the lamp? It flickered strangely. One instant it died into the ghost of a light, and the next it flared brilliantly. Katie rubbed her eyes in wondering terror. It was no illusion; the light shining from the engine-room window was not clear steady lamp-light. It was red—like fire!

Katie was already hurrying on her clothes. There was a dreadful lump in her throat, and her breath came in short, quick gasps. She did not pause for her boots with their endless rows of buttons; she pulled on her stockings and rushed swiftly out of her room and down-stairs, catching a shawl from the hall stand as she ran. Behind the kitchen stove hung a pair of Phil's thick woollen stockings, and these she hastily pulled on over her own. There was no question in her mind as to the course she would take. It was more than half a mile by the road to the mill; across the river bend it was less than half that distance.

The late rains had swelled the river, and overflowed its banks, but the bridge was still there, even though many of the country people had begun to think it unsafe. Katie did not doubt for a moment but that it would hold her light weight, and over it she flew. She thought that it creaked and swayed under her, and she fancied herself breaking through once or twice, but on she sped, her large dark eyes strained and fixed on that flaring red light. It seemed hours to her before she reached the mill. She had been there before to take Phil his lunch once when he had forgotten it, and she knew the way perfectly well. In at the dark yawning door she darted, and up two or three narrow steps. There was smoke in the air—surely.

She opened the door of the engine-room, and closed it hastily behind her, with a quick, shrill cry of dismay.

"Phil! Oh, Phil!"

For the room was full of smoke. Through it the lamp-light showed pale and dim. Little tongues of flame were running over the floor before the great furnace, lapping up a shaving here and there, and crawling, snake-like, up the wall very near the window. And Phil sat by the rough table, his face buried in his arms, asleep—so sound asleep and so stupefied by the smoke that Katie's first cry failed to arouse him.

She screamed with all her might, and shook him then.

"Phil! dear Phil!" she cried. "Oh—fire!"

It all happened in very little time. That one last word shrieked in Phil's ear awoke him effectually. He understood the situation, and sprang to his feet.

"Don't whistle!" cried Katie, catching his arm. "Don't rouse the town, Phil. We can put it out."

They fell to work then with a will. After all, it was not much of a battle. There were pails and an abundance of water at hand, and the fire was not really under headway. The flames, though wide-spread, had not begun to burn through the solid floor, which was soon thoroughly flooded. In a very few minutes it was all over, and Phil had opened the window. He turned to Katie then, who stood pale and trembling, as she had not trembled before.

"Oh, Katie!" he cried, chokingly, "how did you—"

And Katie told—or tried to tell him; but long before she had finished she was crying hysterically around his neck.

"Oh, Katie darling, don't. Don't, Katie."

The door opened at that moment. Phil knew who stood there before he heard Mr. Medway's voice.

"Heyday! What's all this fuss about?"

"There has been a fire, sir," answered Phil, readily, though with a shake in his voice. "But it is out now."

Mr. Medway stepped into the room without another word, and taking up the lamp proceeded to examine the wall, the floor, and the furnace itself carefully.

"Gibbs must look after this a little in the morning," he said; and he placed the lamp on the bench again, while Katie and Phil stood by with sinking hearts. Suddenly he looked at Phil's sister. "Why, what are you here for?" he asked, not unkindly.

Ah, how easy it would have been not to tell him—to say that Phil was lonesome and wanted her for company; to say anything but the dreadful truth. But Katie's honest little nature abhorred a falsehood.

"I—I—he was—I—" she stammered, with many painful pauses, "I—"

But right here Phil came bravely to the rescue.

"I was asleep, Mr. Medway," he said, "and if it hadn't been for Katie your mill—"

"Asleep!" repeated Mr. Medway, his face stern and cold.

It was an awful moment, and Katie ended it by springing forward and grasping Mr. Medway's hand.

"Oh, if you please," she cried, "may I tell you how he happened to do it? Mamma was ill, and he could not sleep at all yesterday. It was not his fault, sir—indeed it was not. Poor Phil! Oh, sir—"

Mr. Medway was not at all a hard-hearted man, though perhaps a little too intent on his own particular interests. His voice was husky when he spoke to Katie.

"How did you happen to see the fire?"

"Why—I—I—"

"She looks out of her window a dozen times a night to see that I'm all right," said Phil, with brusque earnestness; "and she prays for me before she goes to sleep. That's how, Mr. Medway. Oh, Katie, little sister!"

"Well! well!" said Mr. Medway, who seemed to be having a great deal of trouble with his throat and eyes. "Well! well!" And he was silent for what seemed to Katie and Phil a long, long time.

"I suppose I needn't—needn't come here again," Phil mustered courage to say presently.

"Not come again?" echoed Mr. Medway. "Why not, boy? Of course you'll come again, every night." He put his hand on Katie's head. "And I'm going to pay you a man's wages after this, remember. A boy with a sister like yours ought to be encouraged. I'm pretty sure you won't let this happen again."

And he slammed the door behind him.

"Oh, Phil!"

"Oh, Katie!"

They went home in the morning early, and Mrs. Payson heard the story of the night's adventure.

"Twenty-five dollars a month, mother!" cried Phil. "Think of that! And it's all Katie's work, every bit."

But Mrs. Payson, thinking too of Katie's work, shuddered and drew them close, and kissed them both.

PERIL AND PRIVATION.

BY JAMES PAYN.

IN SIGHT OF HOME.

ONE of the most striking "personal preservations" ever recorded took place on the familiar coast between Dartmouth and Torbay, England, and it did not happen to a "bold smuggler," as it ought to have done, but quite the contrary, that is, to a coast-guardsmen. He was first lieutenant of the Dart, the revenue cruiser on that station, and on news being brought him one evening of a projected "run," as the smuggling traffic was called, it was the second lieutenant's duty to go with an armed galley to prevent it.

"As my brother officer, however, was going ashore that night," he says, "I took his place." The lieutenant started with six sailors and a marine. Their oars were muffled, and they soon lost sight of the Dart. "The lights of the near and overhanging houses shone for a minute or two between her masts and yards; then the lofty black land and the glittering lights of the elevated town, never to be beheld again by most of us."

It was the 1st of March; the night was cold and showery, and as they pulled toward "Berry Head" a heavy ground-swell seemed to foretell a gale. In rounding the Head they shipped several seas, which made them chill and cheerless enough. At half past one, on reaching the entrance of the sound that separates the Mewstone from the mainland, the lieutenant determined to pass through it, ordering the bow man "to keep a very careful lookout, and of course very careful myself." In this manner they had half threaded the dangerous passage, the "Ay, ay, sir," of the man at the bow repeatedly replying to the lieutenant's directions to "look out," when, to their great surprise, the boat struck on something forward.

"There's a rock under the bow, sir. Back off all—all."

Before the men could do so, however, the retiring swell left the galley suspended, "and being of that class justly called 'Deaths,' she almost instantly fell on her broad-side." While the words, "Throw the ballast bags overboard!" were passing the lieutenant's lips, she sank under him. "For a second or two the men forward appeared high and dry out of water; then she slipped off the rock, disappeared, and not a splinter of her was ever seen again."

The lieutenant could swim better than most men, and had great confidence in his powers, but benumbed as he was with cold, on an iron-bound coast, and with such a sea, "it appeared little short of a miracle that could save me."

As to saving others, "all such thoughts were quite out of the question." His first object, indeed, was to escape the grasp of his drowning crew, more particularly of the poor marine close behind him, "whom I had seen comfortably settled, and apparently fast asleep, a few seconds ago." He accordingly seized the stokesman's oar, as it floated past him, and "giving myself what little impetus my sinking footing would admit of," he struck out in the opposite direction to the rock, which he foresaw the rest would make for.

After a few strokes he looked behind, and this is what he saw—and heard: "The galley was gone! But as I rode on the crest of the wave, the sparkling of the sea beneath me and the wild shrieks that rose from the watery hollow too plainly pointed out the fatal spot where the poor fellows were sinking in each other's embrace. For a few seconds a sea arose and hid the place from my view; and on again getting a glimpse of it the sparkling of the water was scarcely discernible, and a faint murmur only crept along the surface of the waves. Another sea followed. As it rose between me and heaven I saw on its black outline a hand clutching at the clouds above it. A faint gurgle followed, the sea rolled sullenly by, and all was dark and silent around me." A sight, as our lieutenant truly observes, which many must have witnessed, but few have lived to describe.

As for himself, his ease seemed desperate enough, for if he should reach the shore the surf would dash him to pieces, and even if he should land, the cliffs were so steep that it would only be to die a more lingering death.

The lieutenant, however, was one of those men who "never say die," and clutch hope by its last skirt. He had a suit of heavy "Flushings" over his jacket and trousers, and a large boat cloak, which, however comfortable for sitting in, were quite too clumsy to swim in. By help of his supporting oar he got rid of his cloak and his two jackets, but he did not dare attempt to rid himself of the two pairs of trousers, lest they should cling round his ankles and hamper his movements; nor did he cast off his shoes, since, he reflected, they would save his feet from being cut against the rocks.

The coolness and common-sense of this gentleman, considering the circumstances in which he found himself, were such, in short, as it would be difficult to surpass. Thus lightened, and "with the oar held fore-and-aft wise under my left arm, I struck out boldly for the shore, and having been Heaven only knows how long in the water—to me it seemed an age—I got into the wash of the breakers, and after receiving several blows I scoured a footing, and scrambled up above the break of the waves."

Here one would think his story ought to have ended, but as a matter of fact the poor lieutenant was now as badly off as ever. "As I lay panting, breathless, and nearly insensible, the words 'Save me, save me; I am sinking,' appeared to rise with the spray that flew over me." At first he thought it was fancy, but on hearing the cry repeated he aroused himself, and beheld a man struggling to reach the shore. "Never shall I forget the sensation of that moment: I could not stir a finger to save him. At this crisis the oar that had saved my own life floated within reach of his hand." He saw it, grasped it, lost it, was swept away, and again returned, and eventually clung to the shore. Presently he rose, scrambled up slowly to his commander's side, embraced him, and murmured, "They are all drowned, sir."

It must have been a most pathetic meeting.

After a time they recovered themselves a little, and by means of stamping and swinging their arms persuaded the blood to flow through their chilled veins. Then they strove to climb the cliff. By helping each other they attained some thirty feet, when suddenly the lieutenant found himself on the edge of a precipice. A chasm yawned beneath him, through which the sea was dashing violently. "We were not on the mainland, but only on a rock!"

It is impossible to exaggerate the distress of mind of the two castaways at this discovery. Even the lieutenant, who was by far more vigorous and hopeful than his companion, was utterly cast down by it. He staid upon the edge of the precipice, just to make sure that there was no hope of escape save through that foaming channel with the steep rocks beyond it, and then "descended to the nearest ledge in deep despondency."

His shirt "clung with icy coldness" to his body, and his shivering frame warned him of his fast-failing strength. Though to attempt to cross the chasm was almost certain death, he preferred that risk to perishing by inches. His companion, on the other hand, the type of quite another class, shrank from the more immediate peril, talked of "the consolation of dying together," and clinging to the lieutenant besought him in the most moving terms not to leave him. In order to escape his grasp, our lieutenant had to feign to look for a more sheltered place, and then descended to the edge of the channel.

"The distance was not very great, but the water was one sheet of foam, edged by the long black sea-weed that adhered to the rocks, except where a heavy black sea rolled through the passage, drove the one before it, and flowed over the other. An apparently perpendicular cliff hung over the whole." It was hard to imagine a more terrible and hopeless position; nevertheless, reflecting that not only his own life but that of his wretched companion depended upon his making the venture, our lieutenant, watching "a smooth" (i. e., when the foam was less furious), and committing his spirit to God, plunged into the gulf. A few strokes brought him to the other side, but it afforded no footing and, save for the sea-weed, no hold. "Again and again did I seize the pendent slippery weeds, and as often did the drawback of the sea, assisted by my own dead weight, drag me with a giant's force, and rolling down the face of the rock, I sank several feet under water."

It was no wonder if this time, with the sea whizzing in his ears and rattling in his throat, he thought that his last moment had arrived. He rose, however, once more to the surface, dug his nails into the rock, clung to the sea-weed with his teeth, and was torn from his hold by a tremendous sea, which cast him up many feet. In descending, he caught a projecting point above the weeds, "and at the same instant my leg was thrown over another; the sea left me, and, gasping for life, I hung over the abyss once more. Successive seas followed, but only lashed the rocks beneath me, as if enraged at having lost their prey. . . . The dread of being forced away caused me to make an almost superhuman effort. I gained a footing, climbed upward till even the spray fell short of me. God be praised, I was safe!"

"I SAW ON ITS BLACK OUTLINE A HAND CLUTCHING AT THE CLOUDS."

Having ascended some forty feet, he stopped to take breath, and between the roar of the breakers distinctly heard the frantic shrieks of his companion imploring him for the love of God not to leave him. In vain the lieutenant endeavored to comfort him by the assurance that if he succeeded in reaching the cliff-top he would send him help. He could not make himself heard, and indeed needed all his breath for what lay before him.

He now began to ascend the almost perpendicular face of the cliff, "now with tolerable ease, now hanging with scarce a foot hold over the pitch black ocean," until the cries of the man were lost, and the roar of the ocean itself was but faintly heard. Suddenly he "beheld the heavens all round him, and fell rapidly, head-foremost," he knew not where.

He thought he had fallen into the sea, but he had really toppled over the cliff on the landward side, a fall of only a few feet, but which had been sufficient under the circumstances to deprive the poor lieutenant of his senses. When they returned to him he found himself in a furze-bush, almost frozen to death. Unable to move his limbs, he contrived to roll out of it, which caused his blood to circulate, and made him conscious of that intense pain which "none but those who have been frost-bitten can have any idea of." At length, however, he felt the prickles left by the furze-bush, and "could with truth affirm that that was the happiest moment of my life."

He presently came upon the track of cart wheels, and, after a narrow escape from being shot as a burglar, made his way to a farm-house, where every attention was paid to him. Men were dispatched to the cliffs to exhibit lights all night to keep up his companion's spirits. In the morning a boat was dispatched, when he was found half dead. After three days' nursing, however, he recovered.

Only one relic of the ill-fated boat was ever discovered—its mast, floating on end, with a corpse tied by the hand to it! Such a night's adventure as that which fell to the lot of our brave lieutenant has probably few parallels, and I think it will be agreed that as a narrator of such matters he is without a rival.

DOGS AND THEIR MANAGEMENT.

BY SHEERWOOD RYSE.

NO animal deserves better treatment, or enjoys it more when given, than the dog. Like a human being, he should be well housed, well clothed, well fed, and when he is sick (which will be rarely if the other conditions are observed), he must be well doctored.

First, as to his house. As a general rule dogs should not be kept in a dwelling-house, since, as they do not wear overcoats, they are liable to take cold when they go out. A small dog may be kept in a stable or other out-house; but a large dog enjoys a house of his own. This should be oblong in shape, with a peaked roof at least eight inches higher than the dog, and it should be what most people would call too large for the dog. This will give him room to turn round, and when a driving rain or wind comes, he will be able to get away back out of its reach. For the same reason, the entrance should not be in the end of the kennel, but on one side, and near the end, so that he will be the less exposed to the weather.

The best kind of bedding is straw or yellow-pine shavings (sawdust and hay are too dusty), and it should be changed once a week, and the floor well brushed with a stiff broom. New bedding should always be dry, or the dog will be liable to get rheumatism. A strip of wood about three inches high is generally nailed across the bottom of the opening, so that the dog shall not drag his bedding with him whenever he comes out. In order to keep the kennel dry both above and below, it should be raised two inches above the ground, and the roof should be covered with canvas well coated outside with tar.

No dog should require any other coat than that with which nature has provided him, but it is his owner's duty to keep that coat in good condition. In-door pets of the fancy order may be washed as often as their doting mistresses may choose, and dogs that have frequent swims in clear running water, and plenty of exercise, may go without their "tubbing" the whole summer long. But as a rule a dog should be washed once a month, and a warm bath, with plenty of soap and a thorough rinsing with clean water afterward, ending with a drenching with cold water (to keep him from taking cold), is the proper treatment.

As the dog strongly objects to this process, and especially to having his head washed—in which, perhaps, he will be like his master—it is well to tie him, unless you want a chase, and to begin with his head before you get him wet all over; a struggling wet mass of hair is not a comfortable thing to handle. After washing him, rub him well with a rough towel, and then put him in a clean place to dry. Of course he must have a perfectly clean bed to go to on "tub" night.

If a dog is regularly and well washed, brushed, and combed, and his house kept clean, he ought not to suffer from vermin; but it is an easy thing for him to catch fleas from other dogs. When this is the case, he must be treated with oil, well rubbed in, from the tip of his nose to the end of his tail. After a few hours the oil may be washed off. Fleas like dog, but they can not bear an oily dog. Sometimes (and generally through neglect) a worse trouble fastens upon a dog, and causes him much annoyance. This is known as lice. A good and safe treatment is a thorough rubbing as before with petroleum. It is not poisonous to the skin, but it is as well to muzzle the dog while the oil is upon him, or he will lick a good deal of it off.

Finally, whenever a dog has been treated for vermin, the kennel should be well washed inside with hot lime. In fact, such washing should be done every six months, on a warm, dry day, in any case.

Most dogs are fed too much. Either they should be fed at table or at their own kennel, but not at both places. A meal once a day is sufficient, and then the animal should be allowed as much as he wants. Very little meat need be given; indeed, for a dog that has but little exercise and no work, only about one-tenth of his food should be meat. The rest may be bread, potatoes, and cooked green food from the table scraps. All these things he will eat if mixed with gravy or pot broth and such meat as he is allowed. Bones, of course, are a standard dish in the kennel, and they are principally useful because they make the teeth strong and clean. Do not be stingy with drinking-water for your friend. Let it be always clean, and freshly drawn from the pump or well, and in warm weather see that it is frequently changed. A small lump of sulphur in his water once a week or so will help to keep him in good health.

However otherwise well cared for, no dog will be healthy if always kept in-doors, or always chained up. He requires plenty of exercise. Indeed, except in the case of hunting-dogs, it is difficult to allow him too much. Chaining is a good thing, especially at night, and it should be remembered that to unchain him is a kindness which a dog will remember. When you have a new dog, therefore, always take care to be the only one to unchain him until he becomes greatly attached to you.

Dogs have been companions of man for so many generations that their natural instinct is in most cases to do right; and where they do wrong, it is generally owing either to the carelessness or bad example of their masters. Many a dog has been turned into a fighting or cat-worrying animal through thoughtless encouragement on the part of its owner.

There are many other things to be learned about the care of dogs, and an observant owner of a dog that he cares for will gradually pick up much knowledge by "comparing notes" with his dog-loving friends. If your dog becomes really sick in spite of your care (and by "care" we do not mean pampering), the best way is to write to one of the agricultural or sporting papers, describing the symptoms as clearly as you can. If it is one of the first-class papers, you will probably be answered in the next number by an experienced veterinary surgeon. If, however, your dog is suffering, or is in danger, and you can not wait a week, the best thing to do is to take him to the veterinary surgeon, and let him treat the dog. A good dog is a friend that is worth a great deal of trouble and expense.

IN THE HEART OF HUMPBACK HILL.

JIM was fifteen, Sam was twelve, Johnny was nine, and then came the twin babies, who were not of any age to speak of. Their father was a miner who had come from England to the mining region of Western Pennsylvania, having heard that work was plenty and living easy in the new country. He had been killed by an accident in a mine only three months after his arrival, and his family were left to fight their way alone in the world. Jim worked in the mines now, but he was not large or strong for his age, and his wages were small, and there was not always bread enough to go round, to say nothing of butter.

People were kind to them, especially the members of the Iron Company, in whose employ their father had been; but times were hard, and there were many poor families to be helped, and lately there had been a great robbery, by which the Iron Company had lost many thousand dollars, and they did not feel that they could afford to give away as much as they had done.

Sam carried Jim's dinner to the mine whenever there was anything better for dinner than a piece of bread. One day their nearest neighbors, who were as poor as they except for the possession of a pig, which they had converted into roasts and fries and sausages, sent them, as a present, a fine roast. Not one of them would have cared to eat such a fine dinner as that unless Jim could have some too. Sam had been so unfortunate as to cut his foot in chopping wood that morning, so that he could not take a step, but Johnny declared that he could carry Jim's dinner just as well as Sam.

There seemed to be no reason why he couldn't, except that he was such a little fellow, not larger than most boys of seven, and the mine on Humpback Hill was a good ways off from where they lived.

His mother cautioned him a great many times not to wander out of the path, and she followed him to the door, and called after him to be sure to go into the right mine, because some of the old ones were very dangerous, especially the old Conoshawen Mine, which was very near the one in which Jim worked.

Johnny was somewhat impatient of her warnings. He had been up to Jim's mine two or three times with Sam, and he rather thought he could tell which one it was, even if the queer little square openings did look just alike. It was the third—no, the fourth—at the left hand, as one stepped upon the little table-land, half-way up Humpback Hill, where was the semicircle of tunnel-like mines, extending not down into the ground, like the mines Johnny remembered in England, but straight into the heart of the hill.

But was it not, after all, the fifth opening? Johnny was conscious of a little confusion in his mind about that point as he struggled up the hill, and wished he had asked Sam; but he should be sure to know it when he saw it. And there were almost always miners about the openings, or men bringing the ore out in drays drawn by queer little donkeys that kept their eyes blinking when they came into the light, as if they never could get used to it. There was no need of making a mistake about the mines, Johnny thought. He did wish his mother would get over thinking he was such a little fellow, and worrying about him if he wasn't tied to her apron string!

When he reached the mines there was nobody in sight. He peered into the openings of four or five, and could not see so much as a twinkling light in the distance. And he had forgotten whether Jim's mine was the third, or the fourth, or the fifth.

He was wondering what he should do when there suddenly appeared out of one of the distant mines an Irishman with a dray full of ore and a blinking donkey.

"I say, mister, which mine is it that my brother Jim—Jim Pringle—works in?" called Johnny.

The Irishman, who was busily engaged in filling his pipe, nodded carelessly in the direction of the opening at Johnny's left hand. It was the fourth mine.

"That's the one I thought, but I wasn't quite sure," said Johnny, and ran into it, fastening the little miner's lamp which his mother had given him into his cap, and hoping that Jim's good dinner would not get cold before he found him.

Before he had gone so far into the mine that daylight refused to follow him the atmosphere became warm and oppressive, like that of a hot-house. The walls were dripping with water, and if he had not walked upon the rails which were made for the drays to run upon, he would have had to walk in mud and water over his shoes.

"It wasn't so wet the last time I was here," said Johnny to himself.

On and on he went. Jim's dinner would surely be cold before he got it.

"Surely it wasn't so far to go the last time I was here," he thought. "It doesn't seem as if Humpback Hill could be so thick through as this. This seems like a tunnel going under the whole world, without any end."

Could he be wrong? But no, the man would have been sure to know, and he thought he remembered that it was the fourth opening. He wasn't exactly afraid, but it did make him a little nervous to think that he was under the ground. The roof was supported only by wooden beams; it seemed very easy for the tons upon tons of earth above his head to fall and bury him. He wished Jim didn't have to work in a mine. Suddenly the feeble flickering rays of his lamp were cast upon a solid wall of earth in front of him. He glanced upward. One of the wooden beams had given way.

Johnny's heart beat like a trip-hammer, and he grew sick and faint. There had been an accident. How much of one it was impossible to tell. Perhaps the whole mine beyond that point had caved in.

Where was Jim?

Johnny uttered a piercing cry—"Jim! Jim!"—that the echoes brought back to him, but nobody answered.

After a minute or two, growing a little calmer, he examined the wall of earth carefully, and saw that at the top in one corner there was a large chink. He climbed up carefully and peeped through. There was an open space on the other side, and the chink was large enough for him to crawl through. For the first time Johnny was thankful that he was a little fellow. Jim might be suffering, dying, on the other side, and because he was small he could get to him.

The chink was a very close fit. It almost squeezed the breath out of Johnny's body. And in spite of all his care, when he did get through, he fell head-foremost into a pool of water on the other side. In utter darkness—for the water had extinguished his lamp—he picked himself up, and felt in his pocket for the matches which his mother had put there. He had a terrible fear that he might find them soaked with water; but no, they were happily safe and dry, and in a moment the cheerful little flame of his lamp lighted up the darkness.

The tunnel was all open beyond him. Nothing seemed to have fallen except in this place where the earth formed a partition. It was so straight and even on this side that it looked as if it must have been made with hands.

It struck Johnny as being somewhat singular. But as he looked closely at the beams, he saw that they were all old and decaying; they looked as if they might give way at any minute.

He must have wandered into one of the old mines; perhaps the very one in which his father had been killed, thought Johnny, with a thrill of fear.

But that could not be, because there were tracks all about; there were a great many in the mud near the wall. As Johnny looked about him in wonder, trying to find some explanation of the mystery, he suddenly caught sight of something which looked out of place in a mine. It was a seal-skin coat, and it seemed to be thrown over a heap of something on dry ground near the wall. Johnny lifted it, and disclosed a heap of tools, small and large. Very queer looking tools they were, and if it had not been for a ring of skeleton keys among them Johnny might not have guessed at once, as he did, that they were burglars' tools. There was a tin box too, which he tried to open, but found it securely locked. He remembered that when the burglars stole the money and valuable papers from the Iron Company's office they had also stolen a seal-skin coat belonging to Mr. Bingham, the superintendent.

He had stumbled upon the hiding-place of the burglars' stolen treasures. It was one of the old mines, probably the Conoshawen, the most dangerous, where they thought nobody would dare to come. All the stolen money might be in that tin box.

The blood went dancing through Johnny's veins, and his heart beat so loud that he could almost hear it.

Keen detectives had been for a long time in pursuit of those burglars and the stolen property, and had not found a clew. It had been left for him, little nine-year-old Johnny Pringle, whom nobody thought good for much of anything, and whom the doctor called Hop-o'-my-thumb. And the reward offered was a thousand dollars!

Johnny scrambled back through the chink faster than he had come. He wanted to take that tin box with him, but it was too large. It is doubtful whether a boy ever ran faster since the world began than Johnny ran out of that mine. He couldn't spend time to walk on the rails now; he went splashing through the mud and water, falling now and then, and picking himself up without stopping to think whether he was hurt or not.

But at last he found himself in the open air, all safe and sound. The pail with Jim's dinner in it was still hanging on his arm, but he couldn't stop to attend to that.

He ran down Humpback Hill, across three fields where the snow-drifts reached to his waist, then down the railroad track to the village, and burst into the Iron Company's office with only enough breath left to gasp out,

"Burglars' tools!—seal-skin coat!—tin box!—old mine!" But you may be sure it did not take the gentlemen in the office long to put those detached remarks together, and an expedition was instantly formed, with Johnny as guide, to the old mine.

In the tin box they found intact all the money and papers that had been stolen from the Iron Company. And a watch was set, and the very next night the burglars were caught in the mine.

Johnny was the hero of the hour, and what was of much more account, he received the thousand dollars' reward.

Jim said it was the first time he ever knew it to be lucky for a fellow not to get his dinner.

But in spite of the thousand dollars—which, indeed, she wasn't quite able to believe in all at once—Johnny's mother couldn't quite get over being nervous because Johnny had been in that dreadful old Conoshawen mine, where everybody said the least jar was likely to bring disaster. She hugged and kissed him, and cried over him, and felt of his limbs to be sure they were sound, and even in the night she kept going into his room to be sure that he was safe under the bedclothes.

Jim doesn't work in the mines now; they bought a little farm with the thousand dollars, and live "in clover."

HOW THE OWLS WENT TO SINGING-SCHOOL, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

OOH! pooh! nonsense! I won't do it! To singing-school, indeed! Pooh! pooh!" and old Judge Owl straightened himself up on the limb of the apple-tree and looked very wise indeed.

"But, my dear—" murmured Mrs. Owl, pleadingly.

"Won't hear of it—won't hear of it. Pooh! pooh! Singing-school!—pooh! Why, the children can sing well enough now; and to go to that impudent Cat-bird, too!

Pooh! pooh! And four cherries a lesson—perfectly outrageous! Where am I to get the cherries, I should like to know? If she would take her pay in mice, or even in young cat birds, it would be another thing. But cherries! I would look pretty, at my time of life, picking cherries. Pooh! pooh!" said Judge Owl, contemptuously.

"But, my dear—" said his wife again.

"There's no use of talking; I won't hear of it," interrupted the Judge, crossly. "I haven't time to talk to you about it. I must go over to Farmer Jones's chicken yard and get something for dinner;" and with a parting "pooh!" the Judge was off for the chicken yard.

Mrs. Owl sat silent on the branch for a few moments; then she flew swiftly through the wood, swooping suddenly on her way to pick up an unlucky little rabbit, which paid the penalty for staying out late at night. When she arrived at her home, which was high up in the hollow branch of an old oak, she perched just above the hole, and called, "Maud! Augustus!" For, you see, Judge Owl having made a large fortune speculating in chickens, she was ashamed to call her children by the good old names which had been in the Owl family for years. The Judge did not like it very much, for he wanted the boy to be named Hoot, after him; but in this case his wife had managed to get the best of him. "How will it look on his visiting-cards?" she had asked her husband, "Hoot Owl, Jun. ? It's horrid!"

"You didn't seem to think so when you married me, and used to call me Hooty and Hootsy-tootsy," grumbled her husband.

"But, my dear, times have changed since we were young, and it would be hardly fair to make our little ones unhappy through life with such horrid old-fashioned names." So she called them Maud and Augustus, after two young lovers whom she had seen walking in the wood one evening.

"Maud, Augustus, come here," called Mamma Owl again. "Yes, mamma," squeaked two very small voices, and then followed a scratching and fluttering in the hole, and every now and then a sharp hiss, and one would squeak, "Gus, stop pushing me; I'll tell mamma," and Gus would hiss in answer, "I don't care; you began it."

Mamma fed the young ones, and had just finished when Judge Owl came flying heavily but noiselessly, bearing a fine spring chicken in his claws.

"Have you had enough?" he inquired; then added, "I'll leave this, anyway. I'm going to attend a meeting of the Antiquarian Association. Good-night."

"Oh, papa, can we go to singing school?" asked both little ones at once.

Now it is a remarkable fact that owls, being on a lower scale in the order of nature than man, are influenced to a certain extent by the feeling of their stomachs; they are apt to be cross and irritable when hungry, and good-natured after dinner. Judge Owl had just finished a fine young chicken at Farmer Jones's yard, and a nest of young robins in the orchard, so he felt contented and happy.

"Well, yes, I guess so, if you want. Old Screech Owl was telling me the other day that his daughter wanted some scholars, and—"

"But we want to go to Miss Cat-bird," piped the young ones in concert.

"Well, you can't, and there's the end of that. To Miss Cat-bird! Pooh! impudent thing! Pooh!" and the Judge flew off, in no very good humor.

"Oh, ma, I knew it would be so!" snarled Maud. "Pa is just as mean as he can be."

"The gov'nor is cross to-night. Wait till I can do as I choose. I won't ask him to let me go. I'll go if I want to," growled Gus.

Now, as you can see, neither of the Owl children had been well brought up; they were not respectful, and they had bad tempers. The bad temper was inherited, however, and the disrespect was not rebuked by their mother, who said, "I'll see if I can't arrange it. Your father has gone away for a few days, and in the mean time you can take two or three lessons from Miss Cat-bird. I'll go and make arrangements, and you must stay very quiet while I am gone." So Mamma Owl flew off, and the young ones slid down into the nest again.

The morning came, and Maud and Augustus, with Mrs. Owl, set out for Miss Cat-bird's. At last they reached the nest, and Miss Cat-bird proceeded to give the lesson, but the youngsters were so stupid, and there was so much to learn, and the sun rose so fast, that before the lesson was finished it was so light that Mrs. Owl began to fear that she would not be able to get Maud and Augustus home again. Then the smaller birds found them out, and the old robin whose nest Judge Owl had robbed the evening before accused them of having eaten her children. The robins and the black-birds and even the quiet little chippies flew at them and pecked them, secure in the fact that Mrs. Owl could hardly see to defend herself.

The noise attracted the attention of Farmer Jones, who exclaimed, "There's the very old owl that's been eating my chickens," and he hurried into the house for his gun. "Harry," he shouted to his son, "the old owl that has been killing our chickens is out in the hedge with a couple of young ones. I shall shoot the old one, and you can catch the young ones if you like." Harry hurried out to the hedge, and as his father shot the old owl he prepared to catch the young ones. The fright of the shot, and seeing their mother fall, made them tumble off the branch; they ran a few feet and hid in the grass, but Harry soon found them, and put them in a cage. He kept them for some time, and finally gave them to a city cousin, who writes sometimes, and as the owl is the bird of wisdom, and as Harry's cousin hasn't any wisdom to speak of, they were a most suitable gift.

Harry's cousin lets them sit in his desk sometimes, where they run into the pigeon-holes as far as they can, and sit watching him with their glassy eyes, making violent remonstrances if he moves his hand or the paper on which he is writing.—Get out, you scamp! Excuse me, but they do bite so hard, and just then one ran out and caught me by the thumb.

HOME BEAUTY.

BY AUSTIN DOBSON.

"MINE be a cot," for the hours of play,
 Of the kind that is built by Miss Greenaway,
 Where the walls are low and the roofs are red,
 And the birds are gay in the blue o'erhead;
 And the dear little figures in frocks and frills
 Go roaming about at their own sweet wills,
 And play with the pups, and reprove the calves,
 And do naught in the world (but work) by halves,
 From "Hunt the Slipper" and "Riddle-me-ree"
 To watching the cat in the apple-tree.

O Art of the Household! Men may prate
 Of their ways "intense" and Italianate;
 They may soar on their wings of sense, and float
 To the au d'la and the dim remote;
 Till the last sun sink in the last-lit West,
 'Tis the Art at the Door that will please the best;
 To the end of Time 'twill be still the same,
 For the Earth first laughed when the children came.

THE NAUTILUS.

A SAILOR COSTUME FOR YOUR FAVORITE DOLL, IN TWO SIZES.

The Postmistress has great pleasure in calling the attention of the girls to this beautiful picture. The pretty little sailor costume which these dolls are wearing is the height of fashion, and just the thing for the season. What fun it will be to try your skill at cutting out the pretty pattern and putting it together neatly! I expect to hear reports of success from a host of clever little dress-makers. Although the pattern is to be furnished in two sizes only, your mamma will be quite willing to help you make it a little larger or smaller should it not precisely fit your dolls. I would advise you to make the dress of a soft woolen material, either a pretty check or stripe, or a plain color. Find a cool seat on the veranda or the lawn, and take plenty of time, for such a suit as this is worth all the pains a little girl can take. Now let me tell you something else.

Cut paper patterns, with full and plain directions for this stylish dolls' suit, inclosed in a neat envelope, will be sent by Messrs. Harper & Brothers to any little girl on receipt of 5 cents. Be sure and write your full name, and give your Post-office address very plainly, when ordering the Nautilus. The patterns are for dolls twelve inches or sixteen inches in height, without the head. Please state which you prefer.

SUMMER'S GIFTS.

RED and white cherries,
Beautiful berries,
Fragrant roses,
And other odors,
Daisies and buttercups,
Lilies and hollyhocks,
Brier and vine,
Sweet eglantine,
Lamb's in the meadow,
Fish in the brook,
And something lovely
Wherever you look.

GENEVIEVE L. D.

Well, girls and boys, can you believe your eyes when you look at the date of this number of Young People, and see that it is June 26? How time flies, and how careful we should be to improve it! Now for our letters. The first is from a young lady, who kindly tells us about the Indian school at Hampton.

LITTLE MERCY and HER COMPANIONS.

BY ROSALIE.

Perhaps some of the boys and girls who read little Indian Mercy's letter from Hampton Normal school, in the Post-office Box of No. 183, would like to hear about that little girl, her Indian and negro companions, and their home. Situated very near Chesapeake Bay, well sheltered from winter storms, the windows of Mercy's home look across a creek, and over the green and lovely Virginia meadows on one side, and over the treacherous to the wide waters of the Chesapeake on another. Mercy is an Apache, I think, and is as fat and jolly-looking as a happy little girl of twelve should be. Quick and bright at her studies, her daily tasks are soon disposed of, and she is free to sew, play, and talk to her companions in her native tongue.

At Hampton all the girls are taught to sew, and make their own clothes and uniforms for the boys. The boys each learn one or more useful trades in the various shops connected with the school, and which they like best of all, are formed into a corps, with a real military officer (Captain B.) in command. Taught by him, they learn to march, and execute many pretty manoeuvres. They wear a neat dark uniform, with gold stripes and brass buttons, and have officers chosen from among themselves, and graded according to their school standard and general behavior; these latter are greatly respected by their more-dilatory comrades, and are a fine-looking set of young fellows.

There is, too, a well-trained band composed of colored boys, who play with spirit and skill. After three or four years at school, during which time their expenses are paid by the government, and as the Indians return to the West, to help civilize their tribes, and to teach the useful arts they have learned to the friends and companions of their early childhood. For the negroes good situations are found, where they can practically work their trades.

If any of the Young People boys and girls should visit Hampton, they must not fail to ask for little Indian M., who reads and writes well, and loves them all dearly. They will find her, as I have said, fat and jolly, with a sweet smile and a gentle word for every one.

Here is a letter for the little girl in Young People's Cot. Won't she laugh when she sees it?

TALASSER, ALABAMA.

DEAR LITTLE SADIE.—The Postmistress told us that HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE was to be sent to the little child in the Cot, and if any of us wanted to write to her we might, so you will see this in our paper. As you are so kind, I thought, Sadie, I was going to send some money to the Cot, but as they have the sum required, you must ask the Sister to let me send some, if not much, to help with the children's clothing. I'll give something to remember your friend Libbie. How would you like, Sadie, to live on a large farm, as I do? It is very nice, I can tell you. I sometimes help milk the cows, and when I do I always get some nice fresh milk.

I had a beautiful pair of canaries, which my aunt gave me, named Robbie and Jennie, but Jennie died, and I sold Robbie to a man who wanted to present him to one of his friends. If he had not wanted him so very much I could not have parted with him. I am going to try some of the receipts in the Libbie's book. I wish I could send you some of the things. Would you like to get a little box of moss and fern from a pretty little branch near my home? If so, I will send it to you. LIBBIE S. B.

As Sadie is in bed, dear, and can not move about, I am sure she would be pleased with the box of ferns and moss from the branch, which, let me explain to those who do not understand, is not the branch of a tree, but a little stream. I think the kind Sisters would prefer that gifts of money should not be sent either to Sadie or the other children individually, though toys, books, and flowers will be very acceptable. Little friends who wish to help along may send their pennies to swell the Fresh-air Fund, and then all the hospital children will share in the benefit.

CANTON, ILLINOIS.

I want to tell you some incidents concerning birds. We have a great many birds nesting on our place—bluebirds, robins, lettuce-birds, indigo-birds, yellow-birds, and many others. I saw martins, wrens, and three kinds of sparrows—the white-throated, field, and chippy sparrow. We have from two to four nests of each kind, excepting skylarks, white-throated, and sparrows, indigo-birds, and wrens, which have one apiece.

The picture I send you is one brood of bluebirds, and it is just as we saw them one morning in a cherry-tree in our yard, and papa drew them to send to you. That afternoon a little bluebird lit on his head while he was resting from his plounged, and I went down the chimney, and into the stove, but there was no fire in it. We heard it chirping, and my sister Edith opened the stove-door and it flew out. There is a big robin that follows papa, and he goes to plounged, and to catch the worms that he turns up. We caught several baby birds this spring, but we let them go again. We also have several rabbits, which live in our currant patch.

I like the stories in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and though "Nan" is a lovely story. I like the letters too. I send a receipt to the Cooking Club that is very good:

SET PADDING.—Three cups of flour, one cup of stimp chopped fine, one cup of sweet milk, two-thirds of a cup of milk, one-half cup of sugar. Turn into a cup of chopped raisins, spice and salt to taste, and half a tea-spoonful of soda: steam three hours; eat with liquid sauce.

HELENA B.

Thanks for this nice letter, and for the pretty picture and the receipt. What charming oper-air concerts you have had these mornings! The birds know their friends, you see. It is a great compliment to have a bluebird perch on one's head, for they are very shy little things, and do not make everybody's acquaintance.

Who does not feel happy and honored when a kind grandma draws her chair into the circle, and tells a story to eager listeners?

WATERWORKS, NEW YORK.

My sister Agnes and I spend our summers with grandma, and when mamma goes out for the evening, the dear grandma has only to say, "I will read you a story," and she has her story "told to you," and we hurry into bed, but not to sleep, the letters are too lovely. We do like to hear the boys and girls tell about their dogs and cats, and we want grandma to tell you about her bird.

A PET ORIOLE.

One summer night after a lovely shower, the sun shone out a few minutes, and the rain-birds, and a song-bird, emptied by its beauty, thought he would not stay in the little nest: but alas! his wings were not strong, and he fell to the ground from a tall maple-tree. A jockey, who was enjoying the sun, and the birds, saw and brought him to me. I was surprised to see how strong was the almost featherless bird as he chirped and struggled for his freedom. I put him in a cage, and thought of the sun, and the birds, and the garret. When I fed him I took him out, and gave him a fine cracker soaked in milk.

When he began to feed himself I felt quite relieved. His dish was the wooden water-ladle, with the handle off. After a while he decided he had had baby dinner enough; as soon as I put it in his cage he would tip it bottom side up, and was enjoying the sun, and the birds, and the meat, raisins, apple, potato, bread, and sugar. He would take the lump, drop it in water, swatch it up very quickly, and hold it in his claw at least, was enjoyed very much. I always left the skin of the raisin. He never refused to step on my finger when I held it for him, nor tried to get off until I placed him on his perch, even after he had his freedom in the ball, with one window open. He always gave a peculiar chirrup when I came toward him, which he never gave to any other person.

He was a home-bird, little brown bird, and we did not know how to write. My husband and daughter thought I had better let him go; so one pleasant day I put him up in the maple tree from which he fell. After two or three days he was the wife, and called "Petie," (that was his name). He came flying to me. I put him in his cage, I said, to stay.

All winter he amused us with his cunning little tricks. I put a new spool of thread on the window-sill he would run to it, peck a hole through the paper, and cock up his eye to me as much as to say, "Was it not funny that I should know there are holes in the window-sill, and I run to it every new spool. He enjoyed tumbling over the contents of my work-basket. He would take a small ball of yarn, fly to the top of a picture-frame, and tuck it in. When he was very tired, he would light on my arm, run up to my fingers, and peck at the ends of my needles, as if he were very mad. He did the same when I threaded a needle. He always did everything with great deal of vim. When it got to be cold winter weather he was fond of sitting on grandpa's nice woolen coat sleeve when he was reading his paper. If he was very tired, how much he folded, and unfolded his paper, Petie, like Greely, kept his seat. He would go to a shelf where there was a tin match-box which opened with hinges, lift the cover, and take out the matches, and he would sniff; drop it, peck down to see it fall, and then get another. If grandpa said "Tut, tut," and shook his head at him, he would drop his wings, and bristle up at him as a rooster does when he is going to fight.

One day I came into the room with some white frozen clothes in front of me. His cage was opposite to the door, and he saw that they were cold. He was so frightened he fell on the bottom of the cage invisible. I held him, and called "Petie, Petie." He soon came to. In the spring, when he had been in the cage for many months, he no longer called him homely; he was the beautiful colored English oriole. He was our bonny bird for another year, and then in the spring, when he began to moult, he did not seem to be so fond of feathers did not come out nicely. We were afraid he would die, so I concluded to give him a chance

"I'VE GOT A WHACKER THIS TIME, SURE."

WHO WAS HE?

BY L. A. FRANCE.

HE was born in England, at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire, in the first year of the present century.

When he was very young he showed a great fondness for reading. When only three years old he would spread his book open on the floor, and, with a piece of bread and butter in his hand, would read lying on the floor beside his book.

When he was seven years old he had written several cantos of a poem and several hymns.

He was not fond of toys or playthings, but delighted in long walks, and especially, as he grew older, in romping plays with his brothers and sisters, with whom he was a great favorite.

He was a bright, good-tempered boy, always pleasant, and full of fun.

He had a remarkable memory. After once reading anything that pleased him he could repeat it word for word. He could recite the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," Pilgrim's Progress, and "Paradise Lost."

When he was twelve years old he was sent to a private school, and at the age of eighteen entered Trinity College, Cambridge University. He disliked mathematics, and from neglecting that branch of study came near losing his chance of getting a fellowship.

In 1826 he was admitted to the bar, but gave little attention to the practice of law. In 1825 he became a contributor to the Edinburgh Review. Five years later he became a member of the House of Commons. He was elected to Parliament a second time, and made a speech on the Reform Bill that became famous.

In 1833 he received an appointment which took him to India. He returned in five years, and again went into Parliament, and was made a member of the cabinet. He left the latter at the end of two years. He then began a historical work which he had planned some years before.

He had great conversational powers, but had an aversion to general society, and disliked to go to a dinner party. He was very fond of his little nieces and nephews, and often played with them and took them to walk.

In 1852 his health failed, but was soon restored sufficiently to enable him to engage in his Parliamentary duties. In 1857 he was raised to the peerage. He died in 1859, and is buried in Westminster Abbey.

BUTTERFLIES.

BY AGNES M. ALDEN.

"WHAT lovely groups of yellow flowers
Bloom in the grass to-day!
I'll quickly run and gather them
To add to my bouquet."

As little Toddlers hastened on
To pluck the blossoms gay,
These living flowers spread their wings,
And lightly flew away.

CANISTER SLIDE;
OR, HOW AN ENGLISH SCHOOL KEPT THE FOURTH.
BY ELIOT MCCORMICK.

IT was the queerest Fourth of July that Harry Tremaine had ever spent in his life. Half the day had already passed, and he had not heard a fire-cracker nor seen a flag. Except for the almanac he would not have known that it was the Fourth; and the absence of all those noises and sights to which he was accustomed made him feel homesick and sad. Of course he could not expect to find the day celebrated in an English school, but it provoked him that it was not, and the unceasing questions of the boys about America added to his annoyance.

"FASTER AND FASTER THEY FLEW."

It would not have vexed him if their questions had been intelligent, but in fact they were very stupid. None of the boys knew anything at all about the United States, though some of them thought they did, and professed to doubt Harry's plain and simple answers, while if he romanced and exaggerated they were quite likely to believe him. Just now they were particularly curious, and Harry found it hard work to keep his patience.

"I say, Tremaine," Tom Owen had just remarked, "didn't you say to-day would be some sort of a holiday in your country?"

Harry nodded.

"Why, of course," he said; "it's the Fourth of July."

The boys looked mystified.

"But we don't know what that is," said Owen. "Why is the Fourth more than the fifth or the sixth?"

Harry had to stop and think for a moment what the Fourth really meant.

"Why," he said, "it was on the Fourth of July, 1776, that the Declaration of Independence was signed."

"The Declaration of Independence!" Owen repeated. "Pray what was that?"

This utter ignorance about things that Harry had always known was very trying.

"Oh dear!" he exclaimed, "why don't you read history? Why don't you learn something about America?"

Owen was disposed to be indignant.

"Learn about America!" he exclaimed. "I assure you, Tremaine, we know a great deal about it. There's your Niagara Falls, for instance; I fancy there isn't a boy here who doesn't know it's in New York. It will be a favorite afternoon resort, I suppose, with you New-Yorkers."

"Ay," remarked Dick Wentworth, "and the new suspension-bridge between New York and Brookville—how odd, you know, that all your towns should end in 'ville'!—that crosses just below the Falls, doesn't it? It must be a grand sight. Just fancy the two cities on either hand, and the great Falls rushing down between, and the Bridge spanning the rapids below!"

Owen nodded.

"You see, Tremaine," he said, complacently, "we're not as ignorant as you think. In fact, we know a great deal about America. There's your civil war now. That's been going on about twenty years, hasn't it?"

Tremaine stared.

"Going on!" he exclaimed. "What do you mean?"

"Oh, not in your Northern States, of course," Owen hastened to explain, "but down South, in Chili, you know, and Peru. I see they had another battle there only a little while ago. Seems to me your government ought to be strong enough to put all that sort of thing down before this."

Harry did not imagine any one could be so ignorant.

"Why, look here," he exclaimed; "that's South America. It hasn't anything to do with the Southern States. Our war was over a dozen years ago."

Owen shrugged his shoulders.

"Oh, well," he said, "South America or the Southern States; it's all the same. There's a war there somewhere, I know, because I read about it in the papers—"

"But, Tremaine," interrupted Charlie Fairfax, who was younger than most of the rest, and whose questions Harry answered more patiently, both on that account and because he reminded the lad of his own little brother at home—"but, Tremaine, tell us about your Fourth of July. How do you celebrate it anyway?"

"Oh, we have fire-works and parades, and people fire off their guns and cannons and make speeches and read the Declaration of Independence. It's an immense day, Charlie, at home. If I'd only thought about it in time and the Doctor had let me, I'd have had my father send me some fire-works here."

The boys looked at one another, while a larger one, who had not yet spoken, laughed rudely.

"Well, you must be fresh," he said.

Harry's face flushed.

"Why, what's the matter, Cornwallis?" he asked.

"What's the matter?" the other repeated. "What is the Fourth of July anyway? Isn't it the anniversary of the day when you declared yourselves independent of Great Britain?"

Tremaine nodded.

"Of course it is," he replied; "that's what I said."

"And do you suppose we're going to help you celebrate that?"

Harry drew himself up a little proudly.

"I don't know why you shouldn't," he said, "if you felt right about it."

"Well, we don't," declared Cornwallis, "and we never will. We don't take any stock in America, at any rate. It's a nation of day-laborers; there ain't any gentlemen there, you know."

Tremaine's eyes flashed.

"Do you call yourself a gentleman, Cornwallis?" he asked.

"The Cornwallises have been gentlemen since the Conquest," the other replied, grandly.

"Is that so?" Harry inquired. "Well, we haven't many of your kind; that's a fact."

Cornwallis grew very red.

"I'll whip you for that, Tremaine," he cried, rapidly beginning to take off his coat.

Harry did not move. His face flamed, and his hands were clenched at his side. If it were necessary he would defend himself, but he had promised his father that he would not get into any fights, and was resolved that Cornwallis should not make him break his word. The boys meanwhile had formed a ring, and were looking on in keen anticipation of the affray.

"Why don't you take off your coat?" demanded Cornwallis, angrily.

"I'm not going to fight," said Tremaine.

Cornwallis raised his hand, and brought it down on Harry's cheek. "Now we'll see if you won't fight," he said.

Harry's face grew white. He moved a step forward, and raised his hand. Then letting it drop, he stepped back to his old place.

"I sha'n't fight," he said, simply.

Cornwallis laughed tauntingly. "You're a coward," he sneered.

Some of the other boys repeated the odious word, and the ring widened and broke up as Cornwallis resumed his coat.

"You're a coward, Tremaine," he repeated; "all the Americans I ever knew were cowards."

Harry could not trust himself to speak, and as he turned away all the boys drew back to let him pass. He felt that he was in disgrace. It had been lonely enough before: how much worse would it be now! He went into the school-room, and sitting down at one of the forms, tried to keep back the tears that would persist in coming to his eyes. Presently he heard some one come in the door, and then a child's voice at his side said, "I'm awfully sorry, Tremaine."

It was little Fairfax, and the few words of sympathy took a load off Harry's heart.

"Thanks, Charlie," he said. "I was a little broke up, but I'm all right now."

"But why wouldn't you fight?" the boy asked, wonderingly. "I'm sure you weren't afraid."

"The others think I was," said Harry.

"Well, yes, they do," admitted Fairfax; "but I don't believe it."

"Gentlemen don't fight in my country," said Harry, "and I promised my father I wouldn't do it here. Wasn't it better, Charlie, not to strike him back than to have the Doctor write home to my father that I was a fighting character, and he didn't want me here?"

"I don't believe the Doctor would have done it," said the boy; "he's used to such things. But I think it was pluckier in you than if you had struck him. Are you going anywhere this afternoon, Tremaine? It's Wednesday, and a half-holiday, you know."

Harry's face clouded again. "I was going up Santhwaite Pike," he said, "with Cornwallis. But that's over now."

"Oh, can't I go with you?" asked the little boy. "I know the paths, and any of the fellows will tell you I'm good at a tramp."

Harry rose up from the seat. "Why, of course you can," he said, "if you ain't afraid the fellows will send you to Coventry: I suppose that's what they're going to do with me."

Charlie laughed.

"Oh, I'm too little," he said; "it don't make any difference what I do."

"All right, then," said Harry. "Come along. If Cornwallis goes the mountain's big enough for three, and we can keep out of his way."

II.

The boys' route to the mountain lay through Overdale Valley, at the entrance to which the school was situated, to the foot of the Pike, and then by a path leading around the back of the mountain to its top. Looking at it from the valley below, it presented a precipitous front, the highest and steepest part of which, reminding Harry of the Palisades on the Hudson River, was known as the Canister Crag. Very near the top the face of the cliff was terraced by a number of old slate quarries, while an almost perpendicular track, over which the quarry-men had been in the habit of sliding their slate, descended from these to the valley below. The climb up, though leading half around the mountain, was not difficult until they neared the summit. Then the path could hardly be traced; great bowlders blocked the way, terraces of slaty rock rose up before them, and chasms yawned under their feet. Harry began to wonder if Charlie's recollection had not failed him, when, on scaling one of the terraces, he found himself unexpectedly at the top. Around them spread the mountains, some higher, others lower, than themselves; on the one hand Lake Derwentwater glistened, and on the other Buttermere, while far away they could just catch a glimpse of the sea. The view was worth the trouble, Harry declared; and throwing themselves on a rock, the boys spent an hour in resting and taking in its details.

When at length they started to come down Charlie proposed that they should explore the slate quarry at the top of the crag, fifty feet, perhaps, below the summit of the Pike. This might be done by following a rough path, which the boys accordingly took, and which brought them in a few minutes to the brow of the cliff. Only a few feet away lay the quarry, which it seemed was not in use, with the slide to the valley below, looking steeper even and more fearful than it did from underneath.

"A man used to come down there sometimes on a sledge," Charlie remarked, as they stood gazing at the precipitous slope. "He was one of the quarry-men, and when he saw the Buttermere coach coming he'd slide down and meet it, and the passengers would give him sixpence. I believe he fell off one day, though, and got killed."

Harry shivered. To a boy who had coasted down

American hills all his life it was a terribly fascinating place.

"Come away," he said, turning abruptly round. "I feel as if I'd like to go down myself."

Charlie was not unwilling to leave a place that suggested such dangerous desires, and they moved up the path once more. They had only gone a few steps, however, when for some cause Charlie's foot slipped, and with a cry of pain he fell to the ground.

"Oh, Tremaine," he exclaimed, "I believe I've come to grief!"

Harry, who was a step or two in advance, turned around in dismay.

"Oh, come," he said; "it isn't as bad as that. Pick yourself up, old man, and start off."

But Charlie tried in vain, while the pain of the attempt turned his face ashy pale.

"I can't touch it to the ground," he said, despairingly; "it hurts even to move it. I couldn't get down the mountain to save my life. I say, Tremaine, you're an American; what shall we do?"

Harry looked up at the sky. It was not yet late, but there were clouds of vapor rolling in from the sea. Unless they made haste they might be caught on the mountain in a fog; and yet in Charlie's condition they could not even stir.

"I wonder if I could carry you," said Harry, in desperation. "Put your arms around my neck, Charlie, and see."

The boy did as he was told, and Harry struggled for a few steps under his load. But the path was too steep and too treacherous. In a few moments Harry stopped, and gently lowered his burden to the ground.

"I can't do it, old fellow," he said, mournfully. "I'm afraid of falling myself, and that would only make it worse. Now if Cornwallis would only turn up, both of us might get you down."

At the same moment, as if his wish had been heard, Cornwallis appeared around a turn some distance below.

"I say, Cornwallis!" Harry cried, in great excitement—"Cornwallis!"

The other did not slacken his pace nor even look up.

"Cornwallis!" Harry cried again. "For Heaven's sake, stop! Fairfax has lamed himself."

The wind carried down the words so that Cornwallis could hardly escape hearing them, but he paid no attention. Another moment would take him around the turn, out of sight. Harry felt as one might feel on a raft at sea when a ship goes by without heeding the signal of distress.

"Cornwallis!" he cried once more.

But while he cried Cornwallis turned the corner of the path, and was lost to view. Harry stamped his foot.

"Mean fellow!" he cried; "I'll whip him when I get back to school—see if I don't!"

Meanwhile the top of the mountain was wrapped in vapor, and it could not be long before they too would be enveloped in the soft white garment. If anything was to be done it must be done at once. Harry looked around in despair. All at once his mind went to the quarry not a hundred feet away.

"Charlie," he cried, "I've got an idea."

The little fellow smiled through his pain.

"You Americans are full of 'em," he said; "I knew you'd work it out."

Meanwhile Harry had rushed to the quarry. In a minute he had explored it, found what he wanted, and hurried back.

"Say, Fairfax," he cried, "will you trust me to take you down that slide? The sledge is there all right, and I can do it. Will you try it, Charlie?"

The boy raised himself on one arm.

"Are you sure you can do it?" he asked. "It's an awfully risky thing, you know."

LITTLE FRITZ AND HIS SOLDIER DOLL.

"Do it!" Harry exclaimed. "I've coasted all my life, and I've tobogganed in Canada too. If a fellow can do that, he can do this. All you will have to do will be to shut your eyes, take a long breath, and hold on. Hullo!" he cried, looking down into the valley, "there comes the afternoon coach from Buttermere now; if we can catch that we're all right. Get on my back, Charlie; the sledge is at the quarry, and when you're once on that I'll have you down in the valley in less than a minute."

Roused by the other's enthusiasm, Fairfax allowed himself to be carried to the head of the slide. Here Harry placed him on the sledge, taking his own position in front, with his legs outstretched in order to steer.

"Are you ready?" Harry asked.

Charlie hesitated. "You're sure you can do it?"

"Sure!" he exclaimed; "if I wasn't sure, Charlie, I wouldn't try it. Shut your eyes now, and hold on tight; I'm going."

He gently propelled the sledge to the top of the slide, and gave it a push with his foot. Away it went with the speed of the wind. Fairfax gave a little gasping cry, and grasped Harry more tightly around the waist. Harry, when he found that the track was as smooth as ice, and that the sledge answered to his touch as well as a coasting bob or a toboggan, lost his fears. A tremendous sense of exhilaration took possession of him. Faster and faster they flew. Sometimes it seemed as if the sledge had left the track and was careering through the air. Not even on the toboggan slide had Harry ever gone so fast, and while his own wind was all right, he could hear Charlie panting for breath. Presently, however, it would be over. Indeed, their speed had already begun to slacken as the sledge gained the level ground; and looking ahead, Harry could see that there was ample room for their momentum to spend its force. Skillfully guiding the sledge down to the little stream that ran through the valley, Harry ran it on the bridge, the arch of which checked its further progress, and stopped it within ten yards of the waiting stage-coach.

Harry turned around to his companion.

"Well," he said, "it's over."

Charlie rubbed his eyes in a dazed way.

"Thank Heaven!" he said, reverently.

"To tell the truth, Tremaine, I never expected to get down alive. It was just terrific. I suppose it took about five minutes, didn't it?"

Harry had now shouldered the boy, and was carrying him toward the coach.

"How long did it take?" he called out to the driver.

The man, who had heard Charlie's calculation, laughed.

"Thirty-three seconds, sir," he said, approvingly, "and very well done too. I never see poor Jim—the quarry-man, you know, sir—do it quicker." He looked at Harry curiously for a moment, while the lad helped Charlie inside the coach. "You are bound for the school, sir?"

Harry nodded.

"Ay," he said; "my friend here had a fall, and it was the only way I could get him down."

"And begging your pardon, sir," the driver went on, "you're the young American gentleman, I fancy?"

This time Harry laughed.

"Why, how do you know that?" he inquired.

"Oh, I know'd it by your accent, sir," remarked the man, gathering up his reins, "but I know'd it more by your pluck."

III.

Three or four hours later Cornwallis came along the valley road toward the school. He had found himself caught in the fog, had lost his way, come out on the wrong side of the mountain, and added eight or ten miles to his already long walk. To these vexations was added the accusing sense that he had left Tremaine and Charlie on the mountain, and that Fairfax, as he had heard Tremaine call out, was lamed. What if they could not get down? Indeed, if Charlie were lame, how could they get down? Most likely they were still on top of the crag. It was now quite dark, and even if he reported it at the school, it would be too late to hunt them up. The nearer he got to the school, the more contemptible his own part in the business seemed.

By-and-by he drew near the house. Ordinarily one or two lights would be shining through the windows, but now every room in the lower floor was brilliantly illuminated, as though a party were going on. Wondering what it could be, he trudged up to the gate, and pulled the bell. In a moment the porter's form appeared on the other side of the bars.

"What's the matter?" inquired Cornwallis. "What's going on?"

"They're celebrating the American holiday, sir," the man said, letting Cornwallis in.

Celebrating the American holiday! What did the man mean? Cornwallis stared at him for a moment, then brushing by, walked up the path to the door. Sounds of applause greeted his ear as he opened it, and as he entered the hall and looked through the door of the school-room, an extraordinary sight met his astonished gaze.

The boys were all seated at their forms; the head master's figure occupied the platform; in front of him, though Cornwallis could hardly believe his eyes, stood Tremaine, while over the latter's head waved a very small American flag. Tremaine was reading from a book, and as Cornwallis listened he heard these words:

"That these united colonies are and of right ought to be free and independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is and ought to be totally dissolved."

Cornwallis leaned over and touched Wentworth on the arm.

"What is it?" he asked. "What does it mean?"

Wentworth looked up in surprise.

"Oh, it's you, is it?" he whispered, while Harry kept on reading. "Well, don't you ever call Tremaine a coward again."

"What's happened?" asked Cornwallis.

"Wait a minute," said Wentworth; "I fancy he's nearly through."

Harry's face was flushed with the excitement of reading the stirring words of the Declaration to an audience of British boys, none of whom had ever heard it before, and his voice rang through the hall as he repeated the closing sentence: "We mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

During the applause that followed Wentworth found a chance to tell what had happened.

"You see," he added, after reciting the story of Harry's daring, "we all felt ashamed of ourselves for calling a fellow that had so much nerve as that a coward. No fellow in the school, you know, ever came down Canister Slide before. We all apologized to him, but that didn't seem to be enough; we felt as if we ought to do something by way of penance. So we asked the Doctor if we might celebrate the American holiday, and if Tremaine might read us his Declaration of Independence, and that's what he's been doing. And really, Cornwallis, if it's all true, I believe myself the Americans were right."

Without answering, Cornwallis walked across the room to where Harry was still standing. His relief at finding that the boys were not fog-bound on Canister Crag, and his British admiration for a plucky thing, had quite overcome his sense of resentment.

"I behaved like a brute to-day, Tremaine," he said, "twice."

But Harry held out his hand.

"Never mind, Cornwallis," he said, heartily, "it's all come around right, you see, and it's the happiest Fourth I ever spent in my life."

"IN HONOR BOUND."

I.

EVERYBODY dislikes her. I'd just leave her out of the whole thing."

"And serve her right too."

"Of all things I hate a mean girl more than anything."

The last elegantly expressed idea produced silence for a few minutes among the group of girls on Miss Barrington's lawn. They were half a dozen in number, varying in age from twelve to sixteen, and were like most young people of their kind who are country born and bred—robust, healthy, thoughtlessly happy girls, with no specially distinctive traits unless in the case of the first speaker, Kitty Jenners, who had a sharp, quick method of speech and gesture, keen black eyes, and a general air of almost military command, or in the last, May Blake, a rosy dimpled girl of fourteen, who as she spoke tried to look very calm, but only seemed to show more completely her inability to do so under any circumstances.

"I think it is time to give her a lesson," said Kitty's voice, rising rather shrilly again. And Hattie Barnes added,

"I hope she'll learn it."

Kitty flashed a quick look around at Hattie, as though that young lady had expressed too decided an opinion, and went on in a milder tone:

"I don't suppose we need be positively horrid to her, but just show her what we think. Here is a girl who came to the Academy three months ago with heaps and heaps of clothes, and piles of money, and a guardian who just gives her everything, and yet she never has taken part in any school fun or treat, and only contributes the meaneast little sums to everything."

As Kitty stopped for want of breath—it could never have been words—Hattie ventured to remark,

"And the worst of her is that she never has anything to say about herself."

"Oh," said Kitty, with an expressive gesture of her hand, "we all know that her guardian is a rich gentleman, who took her when her mother died at sea because her father had been his friend."

"How did you hear that, Kitty?" May inquired, eagerly.

"Oh, I know," rejoined their commander-in-chief, one of whose principles was never to give her information too definitely. "I know. She and her mother were on their way from California, and Mr. Symes was on board, and when Mrs. Rodman died he promised to take Amy. My aunt knows the ship's doctor. Have you ever seen Mr. Symes? He's the queerest looking little old man. I don't envy Amy once her school-days are over."

As Kitty paused again, the figure of a tall young lady with a very lovely face came around from the garden, and as she drew nearer the girls every face brightened, and Kitty exclaimed,

"Oh, Miss Martin, do come here! We're talking about the fair."

"Well," said Miss Martin, smiling good-humoredly as she joined the little group, "and what about that? Are not all the plans made?"

"Nearly all. Of course Miss Barrington has been kind about it, and we are to have the refreshments from Volkes's, you know, and can invite all our friends but—" Kitty colored slightly; something in the English teacher's fair quiet face made the words die on her lips. But courage was Kitty's strong point; she rose above her sudden timidity, and went on: "But we are going to show Amy Rodman that we don't need anything from her. We asked her to contribute, and what do you suppose she said?"

"Yes," chimed in one or two voices, as the speakers turned eager glances upon their favorite teacher, "just what do you suppose?"

"I'm sure I can't tell," she said, smiling quietly.

"Well," pursued Kitty, with her nose rather high in the air, and using a tone of calm disdain, "she asked the object of the fair, and when we told her that it was to buy decorations for the school-room she fumbled and hesitated, and at last gave fifty cents!"

Miss Martin looked a little pained or puzzled, and Kitty, evidently thinking she had triumphed over any possible defense the teacher might offer, went on to say:

"I'll tell you what we have done. We have returned her the money with a polite note of thanks, and have assured her that we would not think of such a thing as even asking her to attend the fair, as everything will be so expensive."

Kitty laughed.

There was silence for a moment, during which one or two of the girls showed signs of uneasiness. Then Miss Martin said, very gravely,

"Well?"

"Well," echoed Kitty, flushing a very little, "don't you think that ought to settle her?"

"Yes," said Miss Martin, smiling, but still with something repressed in her manner—"yes, Kitty, I think it will."

"Oh, come now, Miss Esther," exclaimed Kitty, "you have something on your mind. Do say it."

Miss Esther laughed gayly.

"Of course I have, Kitty. But what good would it do for me to argue with you in poor Amy's favor? You have chosen to set yourselves against her, and consider her a miser. Now I can't entirely defend her conduct, and it would do no one any good for me to persist in saying that I feel she is misjudged. And as for the course you have taken in regard to the fair, it is done; but I hope you will not have to repent of it too bitterly."

And nodding brightly to the girls, Miss Esther walked on, disappearing a moment later through one of the side doors of the Academy.

The girls stood still and in silence for a brief space of time after this; then May said, with a furtive glance at Kitty's face,

"I wonder what Miss Esther really thinks, Kitty?"

"Oh," said that young person, with an effort at loftiness, "I'm sure I wish I could always feel on the charitable side of things as she does, though I don't think it's just. I don't believe in submitting to actual injustice even in such a case as this. Now remember, girls, this is a decisive time. Amy Rodman has to be taught a lesson which I hope no girl who comes after her will forget."

This was their commander's order, and if any one of the number felt inclined to rebel a very little it was May Blake, whose heart was always soft and tender; but May's weak point was that she never could oppose any ruling voice. Had it even been Hattie's, I fear her moral courage would not have been sullicient to battle against it, but Kitty Jemmers had in earlier days at the Academy been her champion and defender, and as she had always looked up to her as a superior being, it was but natural for one of her clinging, rather yielding nature to allow Kitty to give her opinion of Amy Rodman as well as of nearly everybody and everything else. It was not alone because of a belief that Kitty, with her quick, domineering ways and fertile imagination, her truthfulness and firm belief in her code of school honor, was always right, but because little May had a fashion of preferring to be guided, petted, and loved, that she did not openly that morning express some of the doubts she felt as to the justice of excluding Amy Rodman from their preparations for the fair. May looked at Kitty again, with the words of charity almost trembling on her lips; but she let the moment pass, as so many of us do in large and small matters—the moment for decision which leads to action, perhaps to a whole field of new loftiness in purpose and results.

Meanwhile Miss Esther had gone into the house and made her way down the cool matted halls toward a small school-room. It was a holiday; the sun was shining bravely, and the young teacher's heart felt very full of peace and good cheer. She liked her work and her pupils and her home, and could look forward to pleasant vacation weeks spent with her only brother in his sea-side home, and she could afford a great part of her thoughts and her time for those among the pupils who needed them. Just now her heart was full of the girl Kitty had been discussing with her—Amy Rodman, the orphan, who had been among them just three months.

Miss Esther stood still in one of the hall windows a moment before going into the school-room, trying to think the matter over calmly. Reprove, exhort, insist as she might, there was a very warm corner in Miss Esther's heart for Kitty Jemmers, and the teacher well understood how, without brilliancy or any touch of intellectual genius, Kitty had obtained the power over the girls which she certainly possessed. And if only she could be made to see that influence rightly used, that subtle power of guiding the will and inclination—nay, even the belief of others is a divine gift—how much such a girl as Kitty might do, not alone here, in the limited circle of school-girl friends, but out in the larger, busier world where she would one day go to carry the power of her truthful, upright, eager nature among many who would bend to the charm and be influenced by all her words and actions! Miss Esther knew well that to many of the girls Kitty was an oracle never to be questioned. But whether from the inexperience of youth, the narrow-mindedness impossible to separate from fifteen, or mere thoughtlessness, Kitty rarely seemed to value her responsibility, to consider how, like the pebble thrown into water, and which causes a multitude of ripples reaching onward to the very ocean, her words, her actions, her opinions, could be.

Had she chosen to make a friend of Amy Rodman, to think carefully of and for her, Miss Esther felt sure that the child would have been won from her reserve, would have shaken off the half-shy, half-melancholy manner which enveloped her, and gone among her new companions with freedom and naturalness. But Kitty's generous disposition had from the first revolted against what she considered signs of miserliness in the rich orphan. Amy had passed, as it were, in review before the general of the Alsford Academy, and been found unworthy; but as she could not be absolutely dismissed from the ranks, she could at least be subject to the severest military discipline; and hard even upon herself, Kitty never flinched with others when she considered such discipline necessary.

Miss Esther's smile, as she watched Kitty's tall, lithe figure among the others on the lawn, ended in a sigh when she opened the school-room door and quietly went in.

At the upper end of the room a girl of about fourteen was sitting, writing rapidly, with her arms spread out at angles on the desk, and her head bent low above the paper. She lifted her face suddenly as Miss Esther entered, and flashed a sweet smile of recognition upon the young lady; her near-sighted eyes were quick enough to know the face she cared most to see, and as Miss Esther came forward, the tired, anxious look about the girl's mouth and eyes softened as she stood up, her face looked almost pretty in spite of its thin outline and sallow color, and about it was something so womanly and gentle that again Miss Esther felt Kitty was losing one of the golden chances of life in not making Amy Rodman her friend.

THE CHARGE OF THE HOUNDS.

AN INCIDENT OF THE CREEK WAR.

BY GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON.

A TERRIBLE bit of news was carried from mouth to mouth through the region that is now Alabama at the beginning of September, 1813. The country was at that time in the midst of the second war with Great Britain, and for a long time British agents had been trying to persuade the Creeks—a powerful nation of half-civilized but very war-like Indians who lived in Alabama—to join in the war and destroy the white settlements in the Southwest.

For some time the Creeks hesitated, and it was uncertain what they would do. But during the summer of 1813 they broke out in hostility, and on the 30th of August their great leader, Weatherford, or the Red Eagle, as they called him, stormed Fort Mims, the strongest fort in the Southwest. He took the fort by surprise, with a thousand warriors behind him, and after five hours of terrible fighting destroyed it, killing about five hundred men, women, and children.

This was the news that startled the settlers in the region where the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers come together. It was certain, after such a massacre as that, that the Indians meant to destroy the settlements, and kill all the white people without mercy.

In order to protect themselves and their families the settlers built rude forts by setting timbers endwise in the ground, and the people hurried to these places for safety. Leaving their homes to be burned, their crops to be destroyed, and their cattle to be killed or carried off by the Indians, the settlers hastily got together what food they could, and took their families into the nearest forts.

One of the smallest of these stockade forts was called Sinquefield. It stood in what is now Clarke County, Alabama, and as that region was very thinly settled, there were not enough men to make a strong force for the defense of the fort. But the brave farmers and hunters thought they could hold the place, and so they took their families there as quickly as they could.

Two families, numbering seventeen persons, found it was not easy to go to Sinquefield on the 2d of September, and so, as they were pretty sure that there were no Indians in their neighborhood, they made up their minds to stay one more night at a house a few miles from the fort. That night they were attacked, and all but five of them were killed. Those who got away carried the news of what had happened to the fort, and a party was sent out to bring in the bodies.

The next day all the people in Fort Sinquefield went out to bury their dead friends in a valley at some little distance from the fort, and, strange as it seems, they took no arms with them. Believing that there were no Indians near the place, they left the gates of the fortress open, and went out in a body without their guns.

As a matter of fact there was a large body of Indians not only very near them, but actually looking at them all the time. The celebrated Prophet Francis was in command, and in his sly way he had crept as near the fort as possible to look for a good chance to attack it. Making his men lie down and crawl like snakes, he had reached a point only a few hundred yards from the stockade without alarming the people, and now while they stood around the graves of their friends without arms to defend themselves with, a host of their savage enemies lay looking at them from the grass and bushes on the hill.

As soon as he saw that the right moment had come, Francis sprang up with a savage war-cry, and at the head of his warriors made a dash at the gates. He had seen that the men outside were unarmed, and his plan was to get to the gates before they could reach them, and thus get all the people of the place at his mercy in an open field and without arms to fight with.

The fort people were quick to see what his purpose was, and the men hurried forward with all their might, hoping to reach the fort before the savages could get there. By running at the top of their speed they did this, and closed the gates in time to keep the Indians out. But to their horror they then saw that their wives and children were shut out too. Unable to run so fast as the men had done, the women and children had fallen behind, and now the Indians were between them and the gates!

Seeing that he had missed his chance of getting possession of the fort, Francis turned upon the women and children with savage delight in the thought of butchering these helpless creatures in the sight of their husbands, fathers, and brothers.

It was a moment of terror. There were not half enough white men in the fort to master so large a force of Indians, and if there had been it was easy to see that by the time they could get their rifles and go to the rescue it would be too late.

At that moment the hero of this bit of history came upon the scene. This was a young man named Isaac Haden. He was a notable huntsman, who kept a famous pack of hounds—fierce brutes, thoroughly trained to run down and seize any live thing that their master chose to chase. This young man had been out in search of stray cattle, and just at the moment when matters were at their worst, he rode up to the fort, followed by his sixty dogs.

Isaac Haden had a cool head and a very daring spirit. He was in the habit of taking in a situation at a glance, deciding quickly what was to be done, and then doing it at any risk that might be necessary. As soon as he saw how the women and children were placed, he cried out to his dogs, and at the head of the bellowing pack, charged upon the flank of the Indians. The dogs did their work with a spirit equal to their master's. For each to seize a red warrior and drag him to earth was the work of a moment, and the whole body of savages was soon in confusion. For a time they had all they could do to defend themselves against the unlooked-for assault of the fierce animals, and before they could beat off the dogs the men of the fort came out and joined in the attack, so that the women and children had time to make their way inside the gates, only one of them, a Mrs. Phillips, having been killed.

The men, of course, had to follow the women closely, as they were much too weak in numbers to risk a battle outside. If they had done so, the Indians would have overcome them quickly, and then the fort and everybody in it would have been at their mercy, so they hurried into the fort as soon as the women were safe.

But the hero who had saved the people by his quickness and courage was left outside, and not only so, but the savages were between him and the fort. He had charged entirely through the war party, and was now beyond their line, alone, and with no chance of help from any quarter.

His hope of saving himself was very small indeed; but he had saved all those helpless women and little children, and he was a brave enough fellow to die willingly for such a purpose as that if he must. But brave men do not give up easily, and young Haden did not mean to die without a last effort to save himself.

Blowing a loud blast upon his hunting horn to call his remaining dogs around him, he drew his pistols—one in each hand—and plunged spurs into his horse's flanks. In spite of the numbers against him, he broke through the mass of savages, but the gallant horse that bore him fell dead as he cleared the Indian ranks. Haden had fired both his pistols, and had no time to load them again. He was practically unarmed now, and the distance he still had to go before reaching the gates was considerable. His chance of escape seemed smaller than ever, but he quickly sprang from the saddle, and ran with all his might, hotly pursued, and under a terrific fire from the rifles of the savages. The gate was held a little way open for him to pass, and when he entered the fort his nearest pursuers were so close at his heels that there was barely time for the men to shut the gate in their faces.

Strangely enough, the brave young fellow was not hurt in any way. Five bullets had passed through his clothes, but his skin was not broken.

SCENE AT A FRENCH FÊTE.

IN France every town and hamlet has its patron saint, and every patron saint has one or more days set apart in each year in which he is especially honored. These are called fête or feast days, and during them there is a general holiday and merry-making. The village then becomes a fair, full of eating and drinking, music and dancing, booths and shows. Those of our young people who have been at Brighton Beach or the Iron Pier on Coney Island this summer will have a very good idea how a French village enjoys itself during the fête of its patron saint.

There are amusements of all kinds, but the boys and girls are sure to buy "mirlitons." A mirliton is a tube of hollow wood, covered at the end with a piece of membrane, and having a hole on each side near the end. With this toy, which costs a cent, they can make a very loud noise, and as they all seem to enjoy doing so, you may imagine what a Babel there is. But no one seems to mind it; the squealing blends with the cries of the showman, with the singing and music, the laughing and bargaining, and with that peculiar thud occasioned by the game which the artist has illustrated—the macaron balls.

You will see that there is a large box or trough containing a number of wooden balls, and this part of the box is also made of wood. At the top of the box is a huge human face, with staring eyes and wide-open mouth, and behind this face is a smaller box, which is made of tin. The game consists in so throwing a ball that it will go through the open mouth and strike the tin behind it. The player pays one or two cents for each chance, and if he succeeds he gets a paper of those delicious little macaron cakes which both young and old are generally fond of.

The gentleman in the picture is evidently a very good player, for his pretty companion, who has both a pet dog and a parasol to carry, seems to have quite as many sheets of macarons as she can manage. I dare say, however, that the dog will need a great many for his dinner, for most dogs are extravagantly fond of macarons, and if you have a pet dog I am sure he will gladly prove this statement.

The vender, or man who keeps the macaron box, generally dresses as absurdly as possible in order to attract attention. In the case illustrated he wears spotted pantaloons and a false nose, while he shouts continually, "Come along! All come along! One sou, two sous a chance. Ladies and gentlemen all the same."

GYP.

BY MARY B. DODGE.

TWO brownest of eyes, soft peering
Through a shock of slaggy hair;
Two brownest of ears, down drooping,
And a tail (whisked everywhere)
Brown, like his curly jacket,
Yet white at the waving tip;
This is our doggie's outline,
Our frolicsome, kindly Gyp.

But not for his brave appearance,
Though that is unique indeed,
Do we value our foreign poodle
Of notable Spanish breed;
But more for his comprehension,
And his willing way and quick
To learn and to do at bidding
The oldest and newest trick.

"Speak?" Yes, he speaks, at asking,
In loud or in lower key;
Walks, on his hind-feet jumping,
As cunningly as can be;
Plays dead, while nothing will rouse him,
Though you shake him and tease and coax,
Till you shout "The police are coming!"
When he's up, and enjoys the hoax.

He begs, and he catches biscuit
On the bridge of his nostrils laid;
Sits, pipe in mouth, with a cap on,
Like an old judge grave and staid;
Finds, with the truest instinct,
What is hidden in "hide and seek";
Steals handkerchiefs "for a living"
From pockets wherout they peek.

Charles Reade named a dog once Tonic,
A compound of steal, bark, whine;
But Gyp, you see, is an actor,
And judged on a higher line.
Besides, he's more than a tonic
In the sense of the novelist's wit—
He's a genuine jolly companion,
Full of gayety, "go," and grit.

I wish I had space to tell you
The half of the things he'll do;
He bounds through a ring, he dances,
He carries and fetches too.
In short, he's a wonderful creature,
Yet doggie from tip to tip—
Only a dog, yet splendid
In his dogship is our Gyp.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE EVERGLADES.

IT was at an early hour in the morning after the tour of the lake had been decided upon that the Pearl left her anchorage, and sailed to the southeast along the shores—or at least the geographical boundary—of the lake. It is necessary to speak only in a technical sense of the shores of the lake, for the greater portion of the distance the boundary was marked only by tufts of grass or small patches of land looking like little islands.

This marsh, or submerged meadow, was really the lake shore, over which the water had flowed into what a writer poetically terms "that vast island-studded lake, the Everglades."

Captain Sammy talked during that first day of the voyage of discovery as if he had some stout internal spring which prevented his jaws from closing; but as all he said was entertaining and instructive, the boys would not have stopped him had they been able to do so. He pointed out among the trees palmettoes, oaks, cocoa-trees, crab-wood, mastic, and cypress, and among the birds very many varieties which they had not secured.

It was during their first night's halt that Captain Sammy said, as he armed himself with his formidable spectacles and a book:

"I did think when we struck in here that we could take a tramp inland, but the water is so high that you will have to get what information your father insisted you should have, from this book," and he handed them Professor Agassiz's Methods of Study in Natural History.

"Now this book will tell you that what is called the Everglades consists of seven parallel lines of hummocks, each of which has formed in turn the Florida reefs. After they were reefs they became keys, and then mainland, and some do go as far as to say that the whole point of this State was built by them little polyps I was telling you about."

The boys had been trying to resign themselves, in a sleepy way, to what they supposed was a long lecture on the formation of that portion of the State; but when Captain Sammy ended thus abruptly, and then handed the book to Dare that they might study it at their leisure, their relief was as great as their surprise.

Dare had but one question to ask, and the subject of it had troubled him considerably at the time he and Tommy were lost in the forest.

"Do you think there are any Indians around here, Captain Sammy?"

"None of any account, my lad. Time has been when they had their own way down here, and, for the matter of that, pretty much all over the State; but there's only about a couple of hundred left now, and they don't show themselves very often."

Before the Pearl was gotten under way the next morning Captain Sammy gave Tommy a suit of clothes he had been making out of some old ones of his. It was a full sailor rig, cut man-of-war fashion, and the ex-pirate looked as nice and trim in them as if he had been fitted out by the most expert tailor in the country.

The trip around the lake was not nearly as exciting or interesting as they had fancied it would be, save now and then when they landed to get some new specimen of bird to add to their collection, and all hands were beginning to weary of what was becoming monotonous, when Captain Sammy came to the rescue.

* Begun in No. 175, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"We'll come to an anchor early this afternoon, and see if we can't fix the tender up for a night's fishing."

Tommy nodded his head approvingly, for he knew what was meant by fishing by night; but the others looked at the Captain in surprise, for they had not supposed the fish would bite at night, and Dare told Captain Sammy as much.

"I don't suppose the fish would bite," said the little man, "but that don't make any difference, for, you see, this time we will bite the fish," and then he chuckled over what he evidently thought was a very good joke, until the boys began to fear he would choke.

With some pieces of stout wire the little man made what looked like the grates such as are used in open coal stoves, and when these were done he and Tommy went on shore, returning with a quantity of pine knots.

Four short spears with barbs on them were put into the tender, the grates were hung on either side, and Captain Sammy's arrangements were complete.

It was easy now to understand what he had meant by "biting the fish."

The Pearl was brought to an anchor about three o'clock in the afternoon, the fires were allowed to go out in order to save coal, and all hands waited for the night to come.

The evening proved to be a good one for the sport, for there was no moon, and the stars were partially obscured by clouds.

"We couldn't have had a better time for the sport if we'd been waiting round here for a month," said Captain Sammy, as he gave the order for the boat to be hauled up alongside. "Before long I'll show you lads something you can tell about when you get home."

The boys thought they had considerable of that sort of material already stowed away, but they were eager for anything novel, and they lost no time in getting on board the tender.

Captain Sammy assigned to each of them a place in which to sit, for the little craft was uncomfortably crowded with so many, and he ordered Tommy to the duty of attending to the fires.

Each of the others had a spear, while Dare and Charley both had an oar, their task being to row to such place as the little man thought best suited to the sport.

Tommy had provided himself with some bits of tarred rope and paper, and by the time Captain Sammy had given the order to stop rowing he had the fire burning fiercely in the grates, with pieces of sheet-iron over the boat's side to protect the wood-work from the flames.

"Now look down at the fish!" exclaimed Tommy, in delight, and the boys peered down over the sides of the boat.

Great was their surprise to find that they could see through the water so clearly as to distinguish even the smallest pebble on the bottom, and fish of all sizes were darting in every direction.

"Pole her along with the boat-hook, Tommy," said Captain Sammy, and then he gave the others an example of how the fish were to be caught by spearing and hauling on board a large-sized one.

Tommy poled the boat gently along, at the same time keeping the fire burning brightly, while all hands engaged in the exciting sport, capturing some that required all their strength to land in the boat.

Even Captain Sammy grew so excited over the sport that he failed to notice that the wind, and not Tommy, was urging the boat along, while the sky was completely overcast by the large dark clouds that seemed hurrying along for the purpose of starting a storm.

"You'll have to stop now, for that's the last of the wood," said Tommy, as he threw a large pine knot on the fire, and as he said this Captain Sammy started up in something very like alarm.

Hurriedly he gazed around, noticing for the first time the signs of the coming storm, and the means by which the boat had been propelled.

A dense darkness shut out from view everything beyond the circle of light, and it was impossible to see any signs of the little steamer.

For two or three minutes Captain Sammy stood erect and silent, mentally scolding at his stupidity in not hoisting the signal lantern before leaving the steamer, and then he seated himself in the stern again with the air of one who, knowing he has committed a grievous error, resolves to take desperate measures to repair the wrong done.

"Take up your oars and pull as hard as you can," he said to Dare and Charley, and speaking as if he was simply in a hurry to get back to the Pearl. "Keep your fires ablaze as long as you can, Tommy," he added, "and if you haven't got wood enough, use one of the thwarts."

But it was more difficult to return than even the little man had imagined. Urged along only by the wind as they had been, the increasing roughness of the water had not been noticed. Now as Captain Sammy steered her right in the teeth of the wind, for that was all he had to guide him in his course, the little boat danced and rocked on the waves, while every now and then, owing to her heavy load, one would break over the gunwale.

"Throw those fish overboard," said Captain Sammy to Bobby, who sat nearest him.

"All of them?" asked Bobby, in surprise, not willing to lose such a fine cargo.

"You may keep two; but put the others out as quick as you can. Tommy, bear a hand on that bow oar with Charley, and wake her up."

Tommy's position as fireman had become useless, since the waves had been fighting his fire from the time the start homeward had been made, and just before Captain Sammy spoke they had quenched the flames in both grates, coming in over the bow in no small quantity at the same time.

The darkness was now so intense that the old sailor could not see more than three boat-lengths ahead, and he knew, even though he was hardly willing to admit it to himself, that their chances for reaching the Pearl that night were well-nigh hopeless.

CHAPTER XXIV.

LOST ON LAKE OKEECHOBEE.

THERE was no word spoken by those on the boat save now and then as Captain Sammy uttered an order in a sharp, quick tone that told quite as plainly as did the surroundings the peril in which they were placed.

Bobby was kept bailing steadily, and even then the water would have increased faster than it could have been disposed of if the little Captain had not assisted from time to time.

The wind was fast increasing in violence, until the waves in that inland sea appeared almost as high as on the ocean, and all the skill of the helmsman could not prevent them from breaking over the frail craft every few moments.

The boys labored manfully at the oars, but much of their strength was spent in vain, owing to the fact that at least half of the time the oaken blades were too high out of the water or too deep in because of the violence and height of the waves.

For nearly an hour this useless struggle was continued, and nothing had been seen of the Pearl. Owing to the fact that he had no means of directing his course, it was very probable that they were headed in any other than the right direction, and Captain Sammy also knew very well that they might have run within a dozen yards of her without being aware of the fact.

It had begun to rain, and if the gale continued to increase, as indeed it promised to, the little boat could not ride another hour.

Captain Sammy would have put about and let the wind drive them on to the shore some time before he did if it had not been for the danger that would attend the turning of the boat. Their only safety had been to keep her right in the teeth of the wind; but now that it was certain that they would be swamped very soon as they were going, the little man decided that the attempt must be made.

It was the only chance to save their lives, and after waiting for a few moments he gave the order to cease rowing.

"I am going to try to get her around," he shouted so as to be heard above the wind. "Be ready with your oars the instant I give the word."

Not one of the boys there, with the possible exception of Bobby, was ignorant of the danger attending this attempt, and they knew the peril they were in, and that don't put out too much strength," said the little man, as he devoted all his attention to keeping the boat full before the wind.

After this order was given there was nothing more that could be done, and the party waited in terrible suspense for the shock which should tell them they had reached the land, while the little craft scudded before the raging gale as if she had a sail set.

Of course Captain Sammy knew that if they should strike the shore of the lake where there was a hard beach the boat would be stove, but against such an accident he could take no precautions. He had thought the matter over, and decided that it was far better to wreck their boat where they could gain the land than try to save the craft and be swamped.

The rain seemed to descend in torrents, and Tommy was obliged to help Bobby in his work of bailing, or they might have been swamped by the weight of rain water that poured into her.

"Of course you know that we're running for the shore," said Captain Sammy, after they had dashed along in silence for some time, "and when we strike it will be with great force; so keep yourselves prepared for it. After the first shock tells that she is fast, make for the land if you can see it; if not, stand by the boat until I've made the attempt."

From that time for fully an hour—and in their suspense it seemed as though it must be nearly morning—the party waited for the boat to strike the beach, all knowing only too well that if they chanced to come upon some one of the tiny islands instead of the shore, there was every danger of their being washed entirely over it.

When at last the shock did come every one save Captain Sammy was hurled from his seat, and it was impossible to distinguish anything which told that they were near the land.

The boat's bow was stove in such a way that she filled with water almost immediately, and it was as if they had been thrown into the lake.

Captain Sammy was about to leap over the side to attempt to make his way to the land, if indeed they were on the shore of the lake, when Tommy scrambled toward him, and said, almost imploringly:

"I can swim better than you can, an' it won't make so much difference if I should be drowned; so let me go first." And then, without waiting for an answer, he plunged over the side, being immediately lost to view.

It would have been useless for Tommy to have waited for a reply, for Captain Sammy made none. It seemed as if it was impossible for him to speak, and when he passed his hand over his eyes it was not all fresh-water that he wiped away.

Clinging to the sides of their shattered boat, the party waited for some sound which should come from Tommy telling that he had gained the shore in safety, or for the long silence which would proclaim the horrible fact that he had lost his life in trying to save others.

their lives depended upon the promptness with which they obeyed orders.

For a few moments the wind forced the little craft directly backward, and then, as her bow rose on the wave, it swung her around, flinging her down into the chasm of waters sideways.

"Pull, Charley! Back water, Dare!" cried Captain Sammy, sharply, knowing only too well that if she was not turned while in the trough of the sea she would almost certainly be swamped as she rose on the next wave, and at the same time he leaned over, helping Dare with his oar.

The manoeuvre was successful, but it was not accomplished a second too soon, since almost the instant it was done the little craft came up on the crest of the wave, and the wind howled around them in a gust that was almost like that of a hurricane.

All hands breathed a sigh of relief and thankfulness. It had been only a chance, but that chance was successful, and whatever might be ahead of them, they were safe for a few moments at least.

"Now row just enough to keep steerage-way on, and

The musical score consists of three systems of staves. The first system includes a vocal line and a piano accompaniment. The second system continues the vocal line and piano accompaniment. The third system concludes the piece with a final cadence.

WHAT a popping of fire-crackers, and rattling of torpedoes, and fizzing of pin-wheels, and flaring of Roman candles, and fluttering of flags, and soaring of rockets, and shining of lanterns, and shouting of boys, and laughing of girls, and clapping of hands, and blowing of trumpets, and beating of drums, and blowing of trumpets, and ringing of bells, and pealing of bugles, and rattling of cherries and berries and ice-cream will be going on soon after this number of YONGE PEOPLE shall issue forth, with its bright pictures and pretty green cover, from the great printing-house in Franklin Square!

There, children, what do you think of that for a long sentence, written without stopping to take breath? Don't you think I've done it pretty well? And what will you say, and what shall I do to the forelinger just landed on our shores who inquires why all America, or at least all the United States, which is a good part of America, is throwing up its cap, and singing etc.? Why, of course, you and I will tell him that we are celebrating Independence-day, our country's great day, and if he wants to know more about it, we will sit down with some green tree, and relate, as we may, with pride, the true story of the Fourth of July.

"Hail, Columbia, happy land!
Hail ye heroes, heaven-born band!"

Thinking of the dear and splendid day, little friends, my thoughts go back to the time when I myself was a little girl. I lived just across the way from a pretty white church, with tall pillars supporting the roof over a broad porch. When my sister and I went to bed the night before the Fourth we were too excited to go to sleep at once, and our dreams went on and on until about the Fourth of July in those days the Sunday-school children started early in the day, and walked together in a parade, escorted by soldiers and citizens, to a grove or bit of woodland. There they heard speeches, and listened patiently and reverently to the Declaration of Independence, and then sang stirring patriotic songs, and went home at last, after feasting on dainties and drinking lemonade, to enjoy themselves for the rest of the day.

I wish I could feel just as glad as I then did when I now lie down at night, saying, "To-morrow will be the Fourth!" I hope that my boys and girls, every one of them, are proud of their country. I hope they have read the history of their nation. I am sure that it will hurt none of them, in the pause about mid-day, when it is time to think of saving some of the torpedoes and crackers for use in the evening, to gather around papa, and beg him to read aloud that glorious Declaration, which should be familiar to young Americans.

IRVINGWOOD, VIRGINIA.

I send you my method of making bread, as you requested. I think the Little Housekeepers give very good receipts; several of them mamma and I have tried with success. I think, too, that there are many things besides cooking that little housekeepers should learn; so will you or one of the L. H.'s tell me how to clean lamps in the best and easiest way? I have a little story we ever read. I think there ought to be a better way than with soap and water, a piece of newspaper, and little sticks to push the paper through the long thin chimneys of the library lamps. I worked out the bread for mamma to-day. We read "Nan" in school in our reading class, and we were sorry when it ended. We all think it one of the most interesting that I do ever read. We also read "Cruise of the Canoe Club," and thought it splendid. We have such a nice little school, and I really feel sorry for girls who have to leave home for boarding-schools. MAY 11, S.

You might make a little mop with a long, slender handle, and use it for the troublesome chimneys. A few drops of ammonia in the water will do away with the need of soap, and soft tissue-paper is better than newspaper for polishing them. An old silk handkerchief polishes chimneys nicely. If any Little Housekeeper can give a hint about this, she may speak.

SALT FOAM YEAST.—The one good handful of hops in cloth, drop set in two cups of water and in ten minutes; then take out hops, and stir in nine small or six large potatoes, peeled and grated raw, with one cup of sugar, one of salt, and one table-spoonful of yeast; mix all together, and mix until it comes to a boll; then take it off immediately, and set it away to cool. When lukewarm, add one half-pint of water (good measure), and set in the yeast, and mix, and stir. Then bottle, and cork it tightly.

BREAD.—The night before baking-day take one and a half pints of warm water or potato water, and mix a stiff batter with a table-spoonful of salt, meal and sifted flour and a table-spoonful of yeast; lastly, beat in thoroughly one tea-cupful of yeast, and place in a moderately warm place overnight. Next morning mix a new yeast, buttermilk, clabber, or potato water, and mix stiff with sifted flour, into which beat thoroughly the light rising of the night before, and pour into pans, but do not let it rise. This bread will stand any amount of cold. In cold weather the dough can be set away, and warm bread be baked whenever wished. The greener the dough is, the whiter the bread. When risen to the tops of the pans, make into dough, then knead, then stand it away to rise. When up again, and ready to run off, knead and roll, and bake in rolls. Do not let the loaves, more in the rolls; raise again; then bake in a hot oven. This yeast keeps well, and the bread never fails to come; it is very moist, white, and fine-grained. M. H. S.

IOWA CITY, IOWA.

We are a family of four little brothers, and when HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE comes we want to see it at once. Even the baby cries for what he calls "Barber's Hung People." Yesterday, when the paper came, Irving (the third brother) hid it behind a looking-glass, so he could have it first, and then from school.

My brother Harry drew a picture which was printed among the Wiggles. We had a double-nosed dog named Dashi, but he is in Dakota now. He is very tall, and has some hair on his back, and will climb a ladder to the kitchen roof, and will climb down again head-foremost, then jump into Harry's arms, and from his arms to his shoulder, and from his shoulder to his feet, and so on. He is as nimble as the midshipman in the crew of the captain's gig. I am a little Hawkeye boy ten years old. RAY B.

COLD SPRING, MISSISSIPPI.

We live some miles from the Mississippi river. Our post-office is in a town on its banks. We enjoy the sweet spring and summer, and love to gather roses for the vases. I have two sisters; one just a few weeks old, with some curls and brown hair. My two brothers go with me on horseback to a school near us, and a number of my cousins attend there. I enjoy meeting every day at the dress-making part of the school, and to play with my sister Kate. The paper reaches me every Monday, and I like to read the story "Raising the Pearl." I have a white-and-gray cat which we call St. Nicholas. FANNIE.

I am a little boy seven years old. I go to school, and get on the Roll of Honor. I have one brother and one sister older than I am. I live in the place where Governor A. H. Stephens was born, and I have seen the house that I ever saw; I sit on the fence to see it pass.

LEMAR, J. H.

NEW YORK CITY.

Here is a little story I have written:
EDWARD AND FRISK; OR, WHAT COMES OF BEING LAZY.

Edward and Frisk were very good friends, and they played with each other a great deal. You must know that Frisk was a dog, but Edward was a little boy. One day Edward called Frisk; they were very close, but they can't go to home yet. Edward took his little cart with him. He harassed Frisk to it, and when it was full of sticks he would make him draw it to a place in the woods. Edward would put him down, and Edward would dump them out in a little heap. By-and-by Frisk got tired and warm, and he said, "I want to go home." No," said Edward, "you are very lazy, and you can't go to home yet." This made Frisk very mad, and he tore himself away and ran off. When it was time to go home Edward could not find Frisk anywhere, and he had to go and find him. One morning Edward heard a noise at the front door, and he went down to see what it was. There was Frisk; he was thin and forlorn, and as he dragged himself into the hall he said, with a pitiful howl:—"That day I ran away. I met a man, and he took me up and went with me; and he beat me, and did not give me enough to eat, and after I had got very thin and weak he gave me a kick and told me to go off, and so I came home. And you have a new man, and he is a very lazy man, and Frisk kept his promise, and worked hard ever after." LOUISE S. B. (9 years old).

AMHERST, MASSACHUSETTS.

I saw the letter from Mamie L. I thought you had better, and I want to tell you I thought you began it when I was six, and finished it when I was eight. You wanted some one who had made a crazy quilt to tell about it. I have not made a quilt, but I have made an ottoman cover, and am making a sofa cushion. I take a square piece of cotton cloth, and baste on it pieces of silk, satin, velvet, or plush of any shape, and then take pieces of bright floss, and make a pretty fancy stitch where the pieces join. Will any girl who may make one like this please let me know of her success? I tried Katie McL.'s receipt for ginger snaps, and it was splendid. SAKAKI C. K.

GERMANTOWN, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little boy eleven years old. I shall be twelve the first day of August. I have two nice dogs; one is a setter, and the other is a little Blenheim spaniel. The setter's name is Ash, and the other's name is Frank. Frank and I can sit up, shake hands, and kiss you; he is a very cute little dog.

I have a very nice magic lantern; it cost $20. I have also a very nice set of glass; they are photographs. I often give exhibitions for neighbors and persons at our house. This is the first year I ever took HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I like it very much. We read it in school, and at my reading lesson. ROBERT P. M.

FERRISBURG, INDIANA.

I am a little orphan nine years old, and live with my mother and sisters. I have a garden when I was three years old, and my papa when I was six. Our home is a brick cottage in the centre of a large green yard. I am the youngest of three brothers and three sisters. My oldest brother calls me his pet. I am very glad of this. But sometimes he vexes me a little; he often teases me when he returns from a trip to his parents. I like to read the story of the party in the tent. He is a good and kind brother; he gets me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I enjoy reading it very much. The other day my sister Fidelity helped me to make some cranberry sauce. After I finished it, we flavored them with extract of lemon, and they were very good. Wishing all my little unknown friends good-bye, I am
ALLIE K.

FLEATHUR, NEW YORK.

I am nine years old. I go to school, and study grammar, geography, and arithmetic, and read in the Fourth Reader. This is the first time I wrote to YONGE PEOPLE, and I like the paper very much. Papa has taken it for sister and me for a long time. I did not go to school to-day, because I cut my finger badly. I will tell you what I did.

My father bought me a kitten after I came out to Florida, and brought me home some sugar-cane. I took some of the cane to school with me. At recess I was cutting it, and the knife slipped and cut my finger. I have several pets—a gold-fish, two chickens, and a cat named Dick. My fish I caught in Parakee Creek. I had to fill my hat with water to catch it. My mother bought me a kitten, and the fish; it looks handsome in it. One of my chickens is a rooster, the other a hen. Dick is a knowing old cat, and understands more than most cats do.

Since I wrote this letter my fish has died. Sister was getting from the table, and her chair hit the stand, and broke it and the globe, and a few days ago I had to go to school, and I have a turtle in its place. I caught it in the creek.

ROSBY, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a little boy six years old. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, and I go to school. I like it; I've been since December. I like to play with my seventy-eight pups. I go long walks with my uncle. Papa liked the soft gingerbread from your receipt. W. H. K. JEN.

Seventy-eight tops! Well, well!

WASHINGTON, D. C.

I am a little boy eleven years old. Genie, my little brother, listens to the stories in YONGE PEOPLE with eager eyes. You don't know how much it annoyed him. He says he reads the Post-Office on Mendelssohn. I think the best stories you have had were "Nan," "Toby Tyler," "Talking Leaves," and "The Cruise of the Canoe Club." I did not go to school, because I have a turtle in its place, and I am not going until next year.

Washington is a very large city. I have lived here over eight years, so it seems natural that I should have a turtle. I have a turtle in its place, and I hope I may see my letter printed in it. Genie says if you think he can write a letter well enough to be printed he will try to write one. I have a beautiful bird dog, and a sweet little black and white kitty, which is very playful, and Gemie has at least fourteen pigeons. I take a few lessons, use Robbins' Grammar, and Wood, and love very dearly. KATIE F.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

I am a little girl twelve years old. I am taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, for which my papa has subscribed for me. I like YOUNG PEOPLE very much better than the MAGAZINE. Mamma has five children, four girls and one boy; she has a sweet little baby seven weeks old, and we have a new name for it. We had a little bird last summer that was shedding feathers, and as soon as the feathers began to come out I again the little children loved it if they were all very sorry, because it would chirp to you and sit on your finger and eat crumbs out of your hand; so we got a strip of muslin and wrapped it up, and buried it in a deep hole. I hope it will come out this fall, or I would like to see it. The street on which we live has so many children that it is playfully called Baby Avenue.

GEORGE M. S.

TOLEDO, MICHIGAN.

Good-morning. I am a little Michigan boy. My age is six years and eight months. I go to school, and read in the Third Reader. School is almost two miles from here. I never will attend this term. My dear grandmother, who is dead now, taught me to read at home. She died last November, and the last word she spoke was my name. I like the red ink in YOUNG PEOPLE, and the pictures are the cutest and prettiest I ever saw. I want the children to guess what it was I had for a pet last summer. His mother was sick by a doctor. One of our friends once bought it and carried it home to me in his pocket. It would not eat at all for more than a week, and mamma says all its family spend the money called it Dr. Hunter. At last it learned to suck a bottle, and would hold the bottle with its own little fore-paws, just as if they were hands. It had two long sharp teeth in its mouth and would devour. After that I carried it on our wood pile to live, and would only come out when it was hungry. What was it? Your friend, DAVY T.

Who will guess right first? Be quick, that I may print your answer.

HARRISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

This is the first letter I ever wrote to you. I am nine years old, and will be ten in August. I like Jimmy Brown's stories—he how he made a pig-trap, and the young gentleman got hooked in it. I have a twin sister and brother, both younger than I am. My little sister's name is Annie, and she likes to dress up in mamma's silks and trills like a queen and clover. After that she goes to school, and are five years old. Paul is in the Second Reader, and Annie is in the "Pycner" (as she calls it), and they both started together. I have a sister older than I am. I do not go to school, because I have not been feeling well. I have no pets to tell you about. I hope this letter is not too long to be printed. Good-by. LILLIE COYLE H.

PATERSON, NEW JERSEY.

I am a boy thirteen years old. I live on the outskirts of the city. I have two brothers and a little sister younger than myself. The brother next to me is eleven years old, and is much larger than I. I hope I won't always be smaller than he; I don't want to be a small man. My little sister is a beautiful girl, four years old, and she is not so small as I think who she is. My boys take her out sleigh-riding and dump her in the snow.

Beauty and Witty are our two pet canaries. Willie, the male, and sings sweetly. I don't know if she has four little ones. I drew a pretty picture for the fair that was held in New York for the benefit of Young People's Cot. My drawing was the best school. We are all taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. WILLIE R.

Do not mind being small, Willie. Merit is not measured by inches. Some of the greatest men the world has ever seen have been very small in stature. And don't be discouraged yet, for you may take a sudden start, and be a tall fellow after all.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I want to tell you about some tableaux we had one night in our school-room. We children got them up all ourselves. We called it the "Picture-gallery." First we took a strong string, and miled it to each side of the room, on which we then hung the pictures. We had a picture of a ladder about three feet high; we put a chair on each side, the back facing the audience, on which we hung a bright red shawl so that it covered the ladder, and the picture of a ladder. We had a good-sized gilt picture-frame in place, and one person sat down behind the step-ladder so as to hold the frame, which rested on top of the ladder. The pictures were dressed in the following present Summer, Winter, George Washington, etc., who then sat down on the steps of the ladder so that nothing but the head and neck could be seen, and there was a beautiful painted picture. For background we had a dark screen as black shawl would do as well. The effect was very pretty.

I would like to join your Young Housekeepers' Society. I send you the receipt for some cakes. Because he likes them so much. I do not know any other name for them. I got the receipt in Paris:

Two ounces of butter, two cups of sugar, the rind of two lemons, three eggs, three spoons of flour, one cup of sweet milk, a tea-spoonful of baking soda, and two tea-spoonfuls of cream of tartar; drop on the pan in spoonfuls. ANNA C.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—The following lines by a little girl in her sixth year may interest some of the little readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

UNDER THE GREENWOOD TREE.

Under the greenwood tree,
Where the zephyr breeze
Slightly blows the spring leaves,
On the other side of the brook
Sits the shepherdess with her crook;
The shadows fall on the buttercup flowers,
Where the shepherdess spends her happy hours.

FURLEY'S ISLAND, SOUTH CAROLINA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—My grandmother sent me YOUNG PEOPLE for a Christmas present. I think it was the best present I received. My favorite authors in the paper are James Otis, William O. Stoddard, and Mrs. Lillie. I live by the sea-side, near Georgetown, South Carolina. I have no pets except my hens and birds. We would like to have a blue jay for a pet, but he swallowed a piece of a match, and died. Sometimes I hunt for coon-eggs, and also find turtle-eggs; the turtles usually come out of the ocean about June at high tide, at night, and deposit their eggs. I am eleven years old. I feed the horses, hogs, and hens. My father is a rice planter. I have two brothers and five sisters. Good-by. DAVID E. F.

MOUNT PLEASANT, IOWA.

I have been wanting to write to the Postmistress for a long time, but I have been afraid that there were so many letters that mine would not get a chance to show itself. I have been sick for over a week with asthma, and have it so much that papa says I had better go to Canada. I think "Raising the Pearl" is very nice, but I liked "Nan" better. Why does not Mrs. Lillie write some more interesting stories? I have a great many dolls, the Princesses are Dorothea, Martha, Queen Victoria, and several others. Please put my name down with the Little Housekeepers. I am going to get a book and copy all the receipts. SUSIE B.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—The other day, when mamma, Edgar, and I were out walking, we saw a young robin on the grass near a nest, and mamma thought he must have been a mother bird. The nest, or the crows had carried him off and dropped him. The nest was on a very high tree, but still he was not hurt. Edgar picked the robin up, and I hunted up a cage, and we put him in. At first we fed him bread soaked in water, but Aunt Molly thought perhaps that would not be good for him, and we gave him just worms. He grew and weaker, and finally we were afraid we first got him our gardener said that he had seen in a paper that some man gave a young robin eighty worms a day, and to another he gave eight, and that one starved to death, so we thought maybe ours did. Can you tell me how to feed another one? I would so catch him? I am having a dreadful time at school now—the exercises are very long, and these bills to be sent in. I don't like to go to school, but I don't want to be left out; and it has been so warm here the last few days that we have been nearly roasted. ELLIE E.

It would be better to put the robin back in the nest with its mother than to try to feed it yourself, should you ever find another in the same plight. It takes an immense amount of food to keep a very young bird, these bills to be sent in all day. The parent birds are kept very busy catching flies and worms to feed their children. I want to beg my boys and girls to say No very strongly and promptly when people ask them to catch and kill song-birds either for the market or the milliner. I hear that thousands of the pretty darlings are being captured that they may help trim ladies' bonnets. I want you to be bird-protectors, and defend the little warblers who do so much to make our homes pleasant.

THE POETRY MACHINE.

BY GEORGE FOLSOM.

PEOPLE who never write poetry have no idea what a mechanical business it sometimes is. It would be quite impossible for them to imagine how a poet will twist and turn his syllables, putting them first here and then there, and transposing lines in order to get the best effect. Some idea of this process may be had by studying the "poetry machine."

The three wheels in our illustration contain a stanza of four lines rhyming in complets, each line being divided into three sections. There are four arms to each wheel, and each one contains a one-third section of a line. The stanza can be worked so that it may be read in twelve different forms, with no section occupying the same position more than once, and while still rhyming in complets it will in each distinct form have the same general meaning.

To show the method of working the wheels we give a small diagram, which shows the position for making one line with three sections. When the wheels are placed in this position read straight across.

After you decide which are the proper sections for one form, you will with care be able perhaps to make all of the changes. It will be necessary, of course, either to cut out the wheels or make copies of them for working the puzzle. When you have made the stanza pick out the letters inclosed in the diamond-shaped frames, and by transposing them you will find a description of the day on which the events mentioned in the stanza are supposed to occur.

“KEEP STILL, ROBBIE!” SHE CRIED.

“IN HONOR BOUND.”

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

AUTHOR OF “MILDRED’S BARGAIN,” “NAN,” ETC., ETC.

II.

“AMY,” Miss Esther began at once, “why don’t you go out on such a fine day, instead of staying in this warm room?”

Amy colored and looked troubled.

“Oh, Miss Esther”—she began.

“I know,” said the teacher. “You think the girls don’t want you with them. Isn’t that it, my dear? Now let me tell you, Amy, you are making a great mistake. Why didn’t you join with them in their fair? Don’t you know that girls feel such things very keenly?”

“I know,” Amy said, in a low voice, and turning away her eyes. Miss Esther sat down, and took one of the little girl’s cold hands in hers.

“You see, dear,” she said, very gently, “they may perhaps misjudge you; they may think”—Miss Esther paused, it was so hard to suggest that they considered her mean. Evidently the idea had not occurred to Amy herself, for she only turned a troubled but wondering gaze around upon Miss Esther.

“They do not like me,” she said, simply.

“Perhaps that is true,” assented the teacher. “But ask yourself why, dear. It is only because you have kept out of their sports whenever you would have had—to go to any expense. Do you see, my child?”

Amy looked down, her cheeks flushing painfully. She had not failed to notice Miss Esther's glance at her expensive costume of silk and crape—one of the half-dozen rich dresses provided for her first mourning.

"I know," she said, in a low, quiet voice. "I do not want to spend the money, and as I don't do that, I prefer to keep away from the treats. I will go to the fair and buy some things," she added, quickly looking up. "That is, if they have what I want."

Miss Esther felt suddenly a sense of despair. Strongly against her will she felt almost convinced that Kitty's point of view was right. Amy must be naturally miserly, for it was well known in the school that her guardian's allowance was most liberal, and just how liberal only Miss Barrington and Miss Esther knew. It was difficult as a teacher to know how to advise the child—how to advocate spending, and how to impress upon her the fault in extravagance, and yet Miss Esther felt something ought to be said.

"I hope you will buy at the fair, Amy," she said at last. "Do you know the meaning of the motto, 'In honor bound?'"

"It means that we ought to do what is right, because it is expected of us, doesn't it?"

"Not exactly. It means, I think, that we all have peculiar duties to the world and to society which we must perform because we are what we are. If I am rich, I must give to the poor and to my friends because I owe it them; if I am needed as a companion or a friend, the thing within me which makes me anyway a worthy companion or friend calls upon me to live up to it. A great general owes the best kind of generalship to his soldiers, a mother to her children, even a school-girl to her companions."

"Yes," assented Amy, in a low voice.

"Well, dear," said Miss Esther, standing up, "you and I must go to the fair together this afternoon. I hope you will contrive to enjoy it."

Amy smiled in her wistful way upon the young teacher, and as soon as she was left alone she put away her portfolio, and from the school desk drew out the little note returning her fifty cents which Kitty had written so triumphantly that morning. One or two hot tears fell upon it, and into the girl's face a hard sad look came which had not been there while Miss Esther was talking, but she dashed the tears away presently, and returned more eagerly than ever to her writing. Outside she could hear the gay voices and laughter of the girls as they busied themselves over their tables and felt the bright influence of the lovely day. It was hard to stay indoors. Amy could remember long happy June days like this so far as sky and earth were concerned, but oh! how unlike it in other matters!

"I believe," she said to herself at last, "I'll ask Miss Barrington's permission to go down to the beach a little while. There I can talk to old Andy anyway."

Ten minutes later Amy was hurrying off down the white dusty road to the sea-shore and the cottage of an old fisherman whose acquaintance she had made early in the year. Miss Barrington's girls were allowed more freedom than many critics of her school thought wise, but it was equally well known that not one of her pupils had ever taken advantage of her freedom to break a school rule or do anything to discredit herself or her teacher. The school was like a home, the girls and their teachers like a family, and all was regulated by the same principles which would govern a well-ordered household.

Miss Barrington knew that Amy Lee was fond of talking to the old fisherman's wife and crippled daughter, and as, so far, no harm had resulted, she had allowed the lonely little girl to go down to the cottage an hour or two at a time to amuse them and be herself amused. Had she known how often of late the humble cottage had seemed to the child a paradise compared to the school-room, where she was scorned and slighted on every possible occasion by the girls, the good teacher would have been surprised and pained. Even the tenderest mother of a family can not always reach every wounded place, and Amy, so far, had never complained, never broken rules, and never missed in her classes, so that the little school cabal had risen and been acted upon without the principal having suspected its existence.

III.

"There she comes, girls; now don't forget!"

So spoke Kitty Jenners from her table at the fair that afternoon about four o'clock. The fair had been a great success. Although Miss Barrington had insisted that only the families of pupils should be invited, they had come in numbers quite sufficient to make the scene gay and trade at the tables very brisk.

During the afternoon not a few had whispered inquiries as to the whereabouts of Mr. Symes's rich ward, reports of Amy's wealth having spread far and wide. The answers given, if not exactly unkind, were quite enough to prejudice the popular mind against poor Amy, who, as Kitty spoke, was slowly making her way through the garden and toward the shady part of the lawn, where the fair was gayly in progress.

In her black dress, and with the sad look now habitual to her in her eyes, she certainly did not seem to be a very good object for the shafts of sarcasm the girls had prepared. When, as she came up a little timidly to one table, saying quietly, "Have you any aprons?" and trying to smile, Kitty's heart nearly smote her, but Hattie, whose malicious eyes were dancing, hurried forward.

"Oh yes," she said, in bland tones; "here are aprons, Amy," and she displayed two of the kind known as "kitchen aprons," which Kitty had made.

Amy glanced at them, and took out her purse.

"How much?" she said, pleasantly.

"Sixteen dollars—weren't they?" Hattie said, trying to repress her laughter, and looking intently at Kitty.

"Sixteen," asserted the commander.

Amy looked in surprise at the group of girls, but she entirely failed to understand the point of their conduct.

"How much is that book rack?" she said, pointing to a small cheap-looking stand.

It was in May's department.

"Twenty-five dollars," answered May, fairly crimson from a desire to laugh.

Amy stood still a moment, with a strange, wistful, perplexed look deepening to pain in her dark eyes and about the thin lines of her mouth. That something was wrong she knew very well. She had known that when they sent her back her money; but she had determined to please Miss Esther by ignoring the slight, and going as a visitor to the fair. Brought up though she had been on a California ranch, far away from the society of other girls of her age and station, Amy was a lady to the core of her simple unsuspecting heart; and now she felt instinctively that some vulgar weapon of ridicule was levelled against her, for what reason she failed to understand.

"If you have anything—useful," she said at last, making a desperate effort to retain control over her voice and keep down the color from her cheeks, "for about five dollars, I'd like to have it, please."

Hattie's face glowed with triumph as she said, in her most cutting tones:

"Very sorry indeed, Miss Rodman; but, you see, there is really nothing for you to buy. Knowing that you intended to honor us to-day, we felt obliged to procure articles of the most luxurious and expensive kind. We had not the least idea you ever possessed so insignificant a thing as a five-dollar note. Isn't it a pity?"

Amy stood still for a moment, looking from one to another of the girls, whose faces told her all that she needed to know.

This final slight had been intended, discussed, rehearsed, no doubt. Amy understood it all now, and, with a rush of feeling which she vainly strove to master, she realized how much the girls must have despised her to do this thing, and how completely in so doing they had added the last stone to the barrier between herself and them. She stood still, as I say, looking from one to the other in a silence the meaning of which they all knew as well as she did; and then, without a word further, she turned very slowly and walked away.

Amy did not care particularly where she went. The miserable aching feeling was so heavy upon her heart that she felt as though it burdened her steps, and it was only in a blind sort of way that she went down to the old fisherman's cottage, where his daughter sat near the window watching for her father's return from a place called the Reefs, where he had more than once in summer-time rowed Miss Barrington's girls.

Hetty Joyce, the fisherman's daughter, gave Amy the cheeriest possible welcome, and in talking to the crippled girl Amy almost forgot her own depression. But as it grew later, and above all as a storm seemed to be rising, she recalled the miserable fact that she must return to the school, and go among girls who were not her friends, perhaps to submit to fresh indignities from them.

"Good-by, Hetty," she said at last, standing up and kissing the poor girl's thin cheek tenderly. "I wish I could wait and see your father come back with the fish, but I can't. I'm going to walk home on the shore road, though."

"Then, perhaps," said Hetty, "you will see him. Miss Barnes's little brother went with him to-day, so he'll be sure not to stay late."

"And it's beginning to rain already," said Amy, looking up in some dismay at the fast-darkening sky; but she was not particularly mindful of weather. More than once she had received a reprimand from her teachers for going out without sufficient protection, and now she thought a little ruefully of her thin boots, and her silk dress, and the feathers in her hat. But other things lay too deeply in her heart to make her more than half conscious, as she walked along the shore road, that the storm had begun, and that the sky grew angrier every instant, and the sea more turbulent. One or two people passed her, hurrying from their boat houses, and glancing in some surprise at the daintily dressed little maiden, whose sad eyes seemed so absent, and whose whole mind was unconscious of the storm. But when the full torrent of rain came down Amy had the road to herself; not a creature was in sight, and the wind and rain were beating furiously about her.

Amy quickened her steps—began, indeed, to run; but she could not forbear glancing now and then at the wild waters to the right, and wondering how Mr. Joyce would make out on his homeward way. Then suddenly a shrill cry reached her ears. She stood still, straining her gaze in the direction whence it came.

The waves were black and wild, and the sky full of lurid lights. But for all this, and her near-sightedness, Amy could see on the breast of the angry water a small boat in which a child's figure was standing helplessly.

Not then, and indeed not until long afterward, was Amy conscious that, dimly, Miss Esther's words and those of the motto came into her half-bewildered mind. She stood there half a moment in a desperate silence, with a fierce straining of every nerve, as she thought what she could do, and how to do it. Up and down the long wind and rain blown road there was no one in view—only that little tossing boat, with the helpless child's figure standing in it.

Afterward Amy could not remember how she contrived to get into the boat-house she had just passed, and pull out one of the boats. Happily she had been brought up to row, and she did not think of fear as she pushed out on the angry water toward the child, nor did she see and hear the people who were hastening down the cliff and calling to her to stop. One thought, and one only, possessed her mind: Hattie's little brother, separated from old Joyce by some strange chance, was out there alone, and in one minute more would be battling with the waves themselves.

He was a little happy-hearted, fair-haired child, whom Amy had often seen with his mother when she came out to the school, and she thought wildly of what it would be to them all at the gray house in the village were she to fail in bringing him back to them.

"Keep still, Robbie!" she cried out, as with a desperate effort she rowed on nearer to the child. The little fellow laughed aloud with delight. When she came to recall it all Amy could dimly remember a terrible clap of thunder, the sweeping away of her oars, and then it seemed as though a dark veil fell, and in a moment she was struggling in the water with the child's fair hair in her hands.

SEA-CUCUMBERS.

BY SARAH COOPER.

THE shore of Maine, you will remember, is very uneven, being broken by a succession of sharp promontories and quiet bays, and skirted with a fringe of lovely islands. Here is an endless variety of bold rocky cliffs, of secluded caves and quiet little pools, with the pleasing surprise of occasional short sandy beaches. We can scarcely imagine a shore better fitted than this to suit the various tastes of the sea creatures, and our search here is pretty sure to be rewarded by finding sea-anemones, starfish, sea-urchins, sea-cucumbers, etc., besides a variety of shell-fish. Sea-weeds also grow in abundance, coloring the water with their beautiful tints.

This is true of the New England coast as far south as Cape Cod, while below that point the sandy beaches of the Atlantic shore are not favorable for the growth of these animals. In addition to the loose sand which is washed up on the beach, the great number of rivers emptying fresh-water into the sea renders it still more unfavorable for their abode.

As found on the beach, a sea-cucumber would remind you of a leather bag, somewhat worm-like in form, with no hard shell, and marked with rows of warts down the sides like a cucumber (Fig. 1). The skin is tough, yet it may expand and contract in a curious manner. This gives the animals the power of changing their shape, which often makes them look ridiculous.

A group of young people watching the movements of a sea-cucumber were once greatly amused at the odd shapes into which it changed, as if performing for their special entertainment. It sometimes lengthened out its body like a worm, then drawing itself in tightly around the mouth, the other end of the body swelled out like a jug. Suddenly, tiring of this freak, it began to make an hour-glass by contracting its body, as if a string were tied around the middle of it, with bulges above and below. The children were anxious to see its tentacles, but it would not put them out. There was no way to persuade the funny creature, and they wondered if it had grown obstinate.

The tentacles of a sea-cucumber form a feathery fringe around the mouth. Their number is usually ten, and they have the same curious power of changing their shape that we have noticed in the body of the animal. Sometimes the tentacles are contracted in the middle and swollen both above and below, or drawn in very thin at the base and bulged out above like a balloon. The mouth may be distinctly seen in Fig. 2, which represents another species of sea-cucumber. It opens into a pharynx leading to the stomach. The long intestine passes to the other extremity of the body.

From the general appearance of the sea-cucumber you will scarcely suspect that it is one of the Echinoderms, but watch it creep over the rocks, and the relationship is at once established. The tube-feet will steal out noiselessly from those wart-like spots, as seen in Fig. 3, and it will travel just like a sea-urchin. The tube-feet are arranged on five muscular bands running from end to end, and dividing the body into five segments. The spaces between the tube-feet correspond to the spaces which are covered with spines in the sea-urchin. One species of sea cucumber has the tube-feet all collected on the under side of the body (Fig. 4). It is called a "sea-orange," probably from the rough rounded markings on the skin. In those species which have no tube-feet the animal is dragged along by the aid of anchor-shaped spicules scattered through the skin.

The madreporic body is not on the outer surface, as it is in other members of the family. It opens upon a little canal in the interior, which supplies the tube-feet with water. Although hidden from our view, this tiny sieve filters the water perfectly, and allows no irritating particles to enter the tube. The only resemblance to the Radiates which we detect in these animals is in the arrangement of their tentacles and their tube-feet and muscular bands.

The sea-cucumber does not break itself to pieces as the star fish does, but it has a peculiarity quite as remarkable: when alarmed it throws out various organs from the interior of the body, and, strange to say, these castaway organs are soon replaced by others. Dr. Johnson writes of a sea-cucumber which parted with its organs in this manner when he had failed for several days to give it a fresh supply of sea-water. Still it did not die, for other organs grew in place of those so recklessly thrown away.

Sea-cucumbers, or holothurians, as they are properly called, are most abundant in tropical seas, where they lie in the mud or in shallow water, with their tentacles floating in expectation of prey. These creatures, as found on our shores, with their tentacles snugly stowed away, have no pretensions to beauty. One species from the Pacific Ocean is described as being much handsomer than the rest of its kind. The body is as transparent as glass, and of a lovely rose-color, with fine white stripes running from one end to the other, and crowned with a wreath of pure white tentacles.

Another kind of sea-cucumber, called the trepang, is a favorite article of food with the Chinese. Many thousand junks are engaged in the trepang fisheries in the Indian Ocean. The trepangs are caught with a harpoon as they creep over the rocks and corals, or, when the water is shallow, they are brought up by divers. While yet alive the animals are thrown into boiling sea-water, and stirred with a long stick. After being boiled and flattened with stones, the Malay fishermen spread them on bamboo mats, where they are dried and smoked; then they are packed and shipped to the Chinese market. I do not believe that you or I would care to taste them; but the Chinese appetite is different from ours, and we seldom covet their dainties.

Fig. 3.—A SEA-CUCUMBER (Pentacta frondosa).

Fig. 4.—SEA-ORANGE.

Some of you, no doubt, have found little lumps of clear transparent jelly left on the sea-shore by the retreating tide. Many of these jelly lumps are the undeveloped young of the class of animals we have been studying, and if some time you should place a number of them in sea-water, and change the water frequently, you may have the pleasure of watching their development, and see what special forms they assume. These animals produce great quantities of young ones. It is necessary they should do so, or the race would soon die out, as they are devoured in such numbers by the fish that a small proportion of them live to maturity.

The sea contains myriads of animals that prey upon each other, the larger ones eating the smaller; and we can form but little idea of the amount of life continually sacrificed for the support of that which remains. It seems almost marvellous that any of the delicate little ones should escape the hungry hordes that pursue them.

RAISING THE "PEARL."*

BY JAMES OTIS,

AUTHOR OF "TOBY TYLER," "TIM AND TIT," "MR. STUBBS'S BROTHER," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.—(Continued.)

LOST ON LAKE OKEECHOBEE.

THE waves were making a clean sweep over them, and it seemed as if each minute of that waiting was fully an hour long.

Then Dare fancied he could hear some one calling, and as he raised himself up to listen, he saw Tommy close beside him, the wind causing his voice to sound as if he were a long distance away.

"We are on a good hard beach," he shouted, "and all you'll have to do is to wade ashore."

At this news, which told that they had been waiting in dread within twenty feet of the mainland, the boys jumped out, and Captain Sammy ordered them to drag the wreck of the boat up with them, that the surf might not entirely destroy her.

On the beach it was no more possible to distinguish objects than when they had been on the water; but Captain Sammy led the way straight ahead, that they might gain some shelter from the storm in the woods.

The gale was so furious that it was impossible to find any shelter deserving of the name; and as they stood beside the enormous trees, which bent before the storm like reeds, they had even a better idea of the force of the wind than when they were scudding before it on the lake.

While they were standing there, and before they had done anything toward trying to better their condition, Captain Sammy bethought himself of another and still more serious trouble which might have befallen them.

"You let go the anchor to-night, Tommy, didn't you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Which one did you use?"

"The smallest one. It had been used the night before, and so I let it go to-night."

"Then there is every chance that the Pearl is a greater wreck by this time than the boat is," said Captain Sammy, solemnly; "for it doesn't seem possible that one anchor, even if it had been the heavy one, could hold her against this gale."

There was no reply made to this suggestion. Each one of the party knew of the dangers and privations which would be theirs, even though they did succeed in getting out of the Everglades, in case the Pearl had been wrecked, and to their present misery was added the horrible fear that they were in truth hopelessly wrecked on the shores of that inland sea.

Their two days' voyage of discovery had taken them just so much farther from the Caloosahatchee River, down which they must go to the coast, and they were that distance further in the Everglades, through which it might be impossible to make their way on foot.

Their situation was a desperate one, whether the Pearl was safe or not, and they were far from bettering it by standing there in the storm thinking of the dreadful fate the future might have in store for them.

"Come," said the little man, who was the first to arouse from the stupor of dread and fear into which all had fallen, "standing here shivering won't mend matters, and what we've got to do is to try to get up some kind of a shelter, or we shall all be dissolved before morning."

He had tried to speak in a cheery tone, and it had a good effect, for the boys began to move around, which was far better than standing idle, even if they could not better their condition.

CHAPTER XXV.

SUNSHINE AFTER THE STORM.

THE darkness was so intense that it was only by feeling their way among the trees that the shipwrecked party on the shores of Lake Okechobee could manage to move along, and then it was, of course, impossible to do anything toward erecting a shelter.

Captain Sammy had aroused them from the despair which had begun to creep upon them, and that was all he cared to do, for he knew very well that it would be impossible for them to put up so much of a shelter as would shield a cat from the storm, owing first to the darkness, and next to the wind, which would have torn away anything in the form of a camp quite as fast as it was built.

After the boys had learned how useless it was to try to make a shelter, and were settling down into discomfort again, the little man started them out along the beach under the pretense that they might be able to discover some traces of the Pearl.

In this manner, urged on from one useless effort to another, the night passed. At about the time for the sun to rise the rain ceased to fall, the clouds dispersed, and when the orb of day came up on the eastern sky the heavens were clear and bright for his journey across them.

With the first light of dawn each one of the party gazed anxiously around the shores of the lake, but as far as they could see there were no signs of the little steamer.

"Look for wreckage on the shore," cried Captain Sammy, eagerly, as, from mere force of habit, he shaded his eyes with his hands from the light which was hardly strong enough to permit of their seeing the shore on either side of them.

But no such ominous signs were in sight, and there was still hope that the little craft was yet afloat.

They had been thrown ashore where the smooth hard beach extended for nearly half a mile, and to the left was a point of land around which it was possible the Pearl might be in view.

"Bobby, you run over to that point, and see if the steamer is in sight from there, while the rest of us try what we can do toward patching up the tender," said Captain Sammy; "for we shall want her, whatever has happened to the Pearl. Then if it should be that the little steamer is afloat, we must have the tender to get to her in."

Bobby started off at full speed, while the others examined the boat that had been hauled up on the beach. Her bow was stove past all hope of mending properly, but Captain Sammy believed he could fix her so that a short trip might be made in her.

One of the oars and the rudder were gone, while the forward seat had fallen before the flames Tommy had tried to keep burning the night before.

But fortunately for the party the two fish that Bobby had saved when he threw the others overboard were still there. They had gotten wedged in under the stern seat, and thus was a breakfast provided for the party, who otherwise would have gone hungry.

"Now, Dare, you see if you can't cook these fish, and, Tommy, take the bailing dipper and go for some gum."

No one save he who had spoken and he who was spoken to understood what kind of gum was desired, or what it was wanted for; but Tommy took the dipper and trudged off into the woods as unconcerned as ever.

It was not as simple a matter to cook the fish as at first appeared, owing to the difficulty of kindling a fire, for each one of the party had been thoroughly drenched the night previous, and of course the matches had shared the same fate.

But Captain Sammy was equal to this emergency, as he had been to many others since the cruise commenced.

After ordering Dare to find some wood which the heat of the morning sun had already dried, and have everything ready for the fire, Captain Sammy laid the wet matches on a rock in the sunlight. Around them he piled such dry material as he could readily find, and then with the glasses from his and Dare's watch he made such a sun-glass as speedily lighted the matches as well as the dryer portion of the wood.

"There's your fire," he said; "now get breakfast."

By this time Bobby, who had for a while disappeared around the point, came into view, running at the top of his speed, and while he was yet a long distance away those on the beach could hear him shout, "The Pearl's all right! the Pearl's all right!"

Then when he was nearer he told them that almost as far ahead as he could distinguish objects he could see the steamer riding at anchor, and apparently uninjured.

Captain Sammy's face expressed the thankfulness he felt at thus knowing that their situation was simply one of uncomfortableness, and not actual danger, while his feelings were shared in a greater or less degree by all the others.

Now as the fish began to splutter and hiss at being impaled on sharp sticks in front of such a hot fire, all hands began to feel very hungry, and Bobby and Charley tried to hurry the breakfast time along by piling the fire high with wood—an operation which only served to sprinkle the fish more plentifully with ashes and cinders.

Some time before this not particularly nice breakfast was ready Tommy returned with his dipper nearly full of gum, and when questioned by Charley as to what it was and where he got it, he replied that it was a substance which oozed from the gum trees, and that he had been obliged to visit several to get that quantity, because, owing to the rain-storm, it did not flow as freely as it would after three or four days of hot, dry weather.

"Captain Sammy's goin' to try to patch up the boat with it," he added; and the little man's actions now showed that Tommy had told the truth.

He had taken off his flannel shirt and torn it into strips, which he forced into the seams of the boat, that had opened, with the point of his knife. When the gum was hauled to him he looked at it critically, told Tommy to put it on the fire, and went on with his work.

The ex-pirate knew all about boiling gum down to use instead of tar, and he stirred the mixture carefully until fully two-thirds had boiled away, leaving a thick dark material almost like melted glue.

Breakfast was ready before Captain Sammy had finished calking the boat with the flannel, and all hands partook of it as best they could with neither plates, knives, nor forks, but no one made a remarkably hearty meal owing to the exceeding freshness of the food.

After the rather unsatisfactory meal was ended, Tommy proposed to the Captain that he should go opposite to where the Pearl was lying, swim out to her, and try to work her in toward the shore, in order to do away with the necessity of spending so much labor on a useless boat.

Captain Sammy looked up at him a moment as if to assure himself that Tommy was really in earnest, and then said, as he pointed to an alligator that was swimming by just then,

"How far do you suppose those fellows would let you swim?"

"Oh, I'll risk but that I could get out to the steamer before they could get hold of me," laughed Tommy.

"But I don't propose to have you risk it," said the Captain, in a tone that showed he considered all argument was at an end. "I'm about done now, all but putting the gum on. As soon as I spread that, you take the dipper and fill it again, while the other boys walk as far toward the Pearl as they can go on the shore. Then you boil the gum down, and follow them. I'll go in the boat, and I don't want to carry any more of a load than I can help, for she isn't over and above strong."

Captain Sammy spread a thick coating over the seams, and while it was hardening Tommy started off gum gathering again, while the other boys went down the beach in the direction of the steamer.

When at last Captain Sammy had repaired the boat as well as was possible under the circumstances—and Tommy was obliged to fill the dipper twice over before he had finished—she was very nearly water-tight. There were two or three small leaks, but it would be impossible for any more water than enough to wet their feet to come in during the short voyage they would be obliged to take.

"Now run on an' join the other boys, Tommy, an' I'll pick you up when you come to the end of the beach," said Captain Sammy, as he got into the boat, using the solitary oar to scull with.

Tommy started off, and when he reached the others at a point where the beach merged into swampy land, he found that they were hardly more than half a mile from the steamer.

When Captain Sammy came up he took Dare and Tommy in the boat, and, after they reached the Pearl, sent Tommy back for the other two.

When the party were once more on the steamer they found to their great satisfaction that she had suffered but little damage from the storm. Some of the lighter articles that had been on deck, including two birds Dare had just finished mounting, had been either blown or washed overboard, and considerable water had been shipped.

The little craft had swung around and overridden her anchor-chain in such a way as to chafe her side. But everything could be set to rights in a short time, and it is safe to say that a more thankful party never gathered on Lake Okeechobee than was this, when the inspection was finished.

THE FAITHFUL TIGER.

A CHINESE LEGEND.

IN the town of Chao-Ch' Eng many years ago there dwelt an old woman who had an only son. One day Hsia, the son, went up to the hills to look for work, and a tiger sprang upon him and killed him.

When the news was brought to his mother she ran to the nearest magistrate, weeping and wringing her hands, and begged for justice.

The magistrate laughed, and said, "Foolish woman, how can the law be brought to bear upon a tiger?" But she tore her white hair, and lifting up her voice, cried, "Justice! justice!" until the hall rang. Then he lost his temper, and bade her begone. But with streaming eyes and trembling limbs she ran around the court-room. "Justice!—my son, my son!—justice!" was still her cry; and the magistrate, seeing her great age and grief, took pity on her, and promised to have the tiger arrested.

But even then she would not go until the warrant was issued. The magistrate, much puzzled as to how he could do it, began to draw up the papers, and thought and thought until the perspiration rolled down his fat cheeks. Finally he asked his attendants which of them would take the case. Li-N'eng, who was a very young lawyer and something of a jester, stepped forward and said he would, whereupon the warrant was immediately issued, and the old woman went away.

The next morning when Li-N'eng awoke, and began to think seriously about what he had done, he was at first much frightened, but after breakfast he concluded it was a trick of his master's to get rid of the old woman, and a few days later he handed in the warrant as if the arrest had been made.

"Not so," cried the magistrate. "You said you could do this, and now you shall."

Li-N'eng was at his wits' end, and, in great trouble, begged permission to impress the hunters of the district to assist him.

This was granted, and, calling together the men, he went up to the hills, where he spent days and nights watching for the tiger.

But a month passed away, and he was fast growing too lame to hunt; for constables and detectives in China are bamboozled at intervals of three and five days until they accomplish successfully what they have undertaken to do.

At last in despair he went to the Ch'eng-huang temple, in the eastern suburbs, and, falling on his knees, he wept and prayed by turns. Suddenly a tiger walked in, and Li-N'eng shut his eyes, and waited to be eaten. But the tiger did not seem to notice him, and sat still in the doorway.

Seeing this, Li-N'eng plucked up courage and addressed him.

"O tiger, if thou didst slay that old woman's son, let me bind thee with this cord;" and drawing a rope from his pocket, he threw it over the tiger's neck, and went out of the temple. The tiger followed, drooping his head, and trailing his tail in the dust.

When they got to the hall of justice the magistrate asked,

"Did you eat the old woman's son?"

The tiger nodded his head.

"That murderer should suffer death has ever been the law. Besides, this old woman had but one son, and by killing him you took from her the sole support of her declining years."

Then the magistrate stopped, and the tiger hid his face on the ground.

"But," added the justice, "if now you will be as a son to her, your crime shall be pardoned."

The tiger looked up and nodded again, and he was unbound and went his way; at which the mother of the dead man was angry, for she thought the tiger should have been slain.

All night she lay hungry and sorrowful, but when she opened her door in the morning there was a dead deer before it. It was a fine fat buck, and she sold the flesh and skin and the handsome horns for such a good price that she had food for days.

Again a deer was brought, and then the tiger came often, always with a gift, and sometimes with money and jewels; so she grew rich, and was much better cared for than she had been even by her own son. The widow even became very fond of her wild guest, and she used to watch anxiously for him, fearing that some day he would forget to come. But the tiger was very faithful, and he became very gentle and harmed no one; he slept on the porch, and lay at her feet, and in cold weather breathed on her hands to warm them.

This went on for seven years, when she died, and all her relations came to her funeral. While they disputed for the first seat of honor, the tiger walked in and stood by it, roaring his lamentations until the walls trembled—so did the relations.

That night he ran off to the hills, and was seen no more. The people thought he had gone forever, and went on making preparations for the funeral. Finally everything was ready, and they were about to lay her in her grave, when, as the mourners stood about, he came rushing down with eyes like fire, and roaring a thunder-peal. They scattered in fright, but he disappeared as suddenly as he came, and was never seen again.

Then the people built a shrine in his honor, and called it "The Shrine of the Faithful Tiger," and it remains there to this day.

MY BABY BOY.

BY MRS. MARY H. TAYLOR.

MY baby boy, o'er whose golden head
 But two short years had their brightness shed,
 Had dropped his playthings, and climbed with care
 Till he stood erect in a neighboring chair,
 With his dainty ankles and bare white feet
 Half hid in the depths of the ensnared seat.
 He poised himself as he caught a view
 Of the pleasant picture the mirror drew
 Of his own sweet face. The violet eyes
 Were lifted a moment in glad surprise,
 As, with smile as sweet as my baby's own,
 The other Charley looked kindly down.
 "Dot boo eyes too? dot my pritty dess?
 You're the other Tarley boy, I guess."
 Then his face was grave, and he nearer bent,
 Stroking his cheek with a look intent;
 He touched his chin, and the ripe red lips,
 Sweet as the bloom the honey-bee sips.
 "What is it, Charley? what do you see?"
 With an air of conscious dignity
 This man in miniature turned to speak,
 And said, still stroking his rosy cheek,
 And touching his chin with his small pink thumb,
 "I'm lookin' to see haws my 'iskers come."

A PORTUGUESE GHOST.

BY LIZZIE W. CHAMPNEY.

KING JOHN I. of Portugal was expected at his home at Cintra, and there were bustle and preparation at the palace. And nowhere was the bustle greater than in the royal kitchen.

As the traveller to-day approaches Cintra from Lisbon, the most remarkable architectural objects which meet his eye are two enormous chimneys. They might belong to a foundry or to the furnaces of chemical works, they tower aloft so imposingly, and bulge at the base into great white kilns; but they are only the kitchen chimneys of the ancient palace, originally built by the Moors, and therefore one of the oldest landmarks in the kingdom.

The kitchen into which these capacious chimneys open is in itself remarkable. In the first place, the chimneys, seen from the interior, are even more interesting than when they appear as two obelisks on the distant horizon. From the kitchen we peer wondrously into the throats of the sooty caverns, and the odors of dead dinners seem to linger like reluctant ghosts. One chimney was used for roasting and boiling, and here hang great spits that worked by clock-work, slowly turning huge joints of meat, and whole kids, lambs, and fowls, before the blazing fire. Here, too, is an enormous crane, with pot-hooks and chains for hoisting and lowering, which reminds one of a derrick or complicated elevator apparatus.

By the side of this chimney are ranged rows of gleaming brass and salmon-tinted copper kettles, shining as brightly as the plate armor in the principal hall of the palace. With the other chimney a long row of ovens is connected, and near by stands a long marble-topped table, on which the cooks are busily employed rolling out vast plains of pastry, which are bounded on the east by floury snow mountains, and on the west by ocean tanks of olive oil.

Idelfonso Soares de Silva, the head cook, was noted for his pastry. He was pastry-cook at the convent of Alcobaca, the most princely religious house in the world. How the monks doted on his eel pie and his pâté de foie gras, his guava tarts and his pâtés of fried bananas! He was so much prized by the superior of the convent that it is doubtful whether he would ever have willingly parted with him had not King John dined at the convent shortly after the memorable battle of Aljubarrota.

The monks were all so glad that his Most Christian Majesty had succeeded in routing the combined forces of the French and the Spaniards that they bade Idefonso do his best, and sixteen different kinds of pies were served before the conqueror. It is fortunate that they did not speak English, for then the King might have complimented them upon their piety; but as it was, they were saved any poor puns of that kind. The King was so delighted with his fare that he begged as a favor that their pastry-cook might be transferred to his own kitchen, and he granted the obliging monks important privileges in return for the favor.

One reason why King John was so anxious to obtain this wonderful cook was that he expected soon to marry an English lady, Philippa of Lancaster, and he feared that she might find ordinary Portuguese cookery little to her taste.

The new Queen had been married and crowned, and had come to live in the palace at Cintra. Her sister Catherine had come too to pay her a visit, and now, his warrings over for the present, King John himself was expected. Idefonso, in his paper cap and white apron, braided his rolling-pin, and determined to invent a pie that should carry his fame down to the remotest generations. Queen Philippa had been pleased to compliment him on his bell-shaped pastry flowers with hearts of marmalade. Such trifles as these might please the ladies; but the King was as valiant a soldier with the knife and fork as with the sword, and it would be another matter to win his praise.

Idefonso was not pleased with his promotion: he would rather have remained at his dear convent, but, since he had been brought to the palace, he determined to please the King so well that he would allow him speedily to return, never thinking that for the success of this design it was quite as dangerous to please him too well as to fail in his profession. He remembered that the King had expressed his admiration of all of the sixteen different pies with which he had served him, but had mentioned one cause for regret. A man could not eat sixteen pies regularly at each dinner, and it was a pity to lose the exquisite flavor of any one of them. Idefonso determined to invent one pie which should combine the qualities of the whole sixteen.

Accordingly he lined an enormous saucepan with fluted pastry, and within this he cunningly commingled minced pigeons, meats, suet, partridges, quails, snipes, woodcocks, with sliced lemons, apples, pears, quinces, peaches, apricots, nectarines, melon, pine-apple, custard apples, bananas, figs, pomegranates, cherries, almonds, raisins, plums, berries, currants, candied citron, marmalade, jelly, preserves, spices, red wine from Oporto, and white wine from Spain, with sugar-plums of all flavors. It was a wonderful pie, and the odor which it diffused while baking was so delicious and so penetrating that the King and his retinue, when hardly in sight of the great chimneys, put spurs to their horses, and came charging down the Lisbon road as though they heard before them the challenging battle-cry of "Santiago for Spain!"

The poor servants, who had hoped that, as the pie was so enormous, they might all come in for a share of the fragments, were greatly disappointed. The King would make his dinner of nothing else, and indeed the pie was a complete bill of fare in itself. The rest of the royal family were obliged to content themselves with narrow slices, for the King ate fully half of the pastry. The two court physicians looked at one another knowingly, and neither of them retired that night, expecting every moment to be called to his Majesty's couch. But, wonderful as it may seem, the King slept soundly, and remarked in the morning that he had enjoyed the most delightful of dreams.

He devoured another of the pies at dinner, and demanded that the cook should be brought in to hear, before the whole table, his master's august approval. Ildefonso stood with quivering lips trying in vain to summon courage to ask for his dismissal, while King John praised his masterpiece, and swore that henceforward, so long as they both should live, no one but Ildefonso Soares de Silva should make pies for the royal table.

The heart-broken cook left the King's presence humbly, but as soon as he reached his kitchen he gave way to frantic grief. He vowed that the King should rue his cruel selfishness, and salted the pastry with bitter tears. The threats of the poor cook seemed ridiculous to the other servants, and little notice was taken of them at the time, for another topic of conversation interested every member of the household.

Two nobles lodged in different parts of the palace had been each disturbed by a ghost in a long gown, holding in one hand a lamp, and in the other a drawn sword. This occurrence formed the table-talk at breakfast for both nobles and servants. The affair would have been discarded as a dream had not two gentlemen borne witness to it. The ladies became nervous with fear that a robber had visited the palace, and the King commanded that the entire building should be thoroughly searched, and a double watch placed that night at every door. Almost in the same breath he commanded Ildefonso to serve up for dinner another pie as nearly as possible a counterpart of the first.

"If this spirit has any news to tell," mused the King, "why does he not address himself to me, instead of alarming the ladies, and making a disturbance to no purpose?"

It was a fact, the singularity of which had been much talked about, that while every other member of the royal household had been more or less disturbed, the ghost had steadily avoided the King. Every night he unsheathed his sword, and laid it on the cloth of gold counterpane. Every night the lamp was left burning, and every night the King slept soundly until the dawn. At first he congratulated himself upon the circumstance, and dared all the ghosts and hobgoblins of the air to bewitch him, but, little by little, he found himself in an uncomfortable minority.

There was one other person besides the King who had not yet seen the ghost, and this was maid Catherine, sister of the Queen. She was as unhappy as any of the others, however, for she dearly loved her sister, and she could not help seeing how miserable Philippa was. She was walking one day in the curious old court of the palace, when she noticed the cook, Ildefonso. He appeared to be observing one of the fountains, commonly called the Weeping Lady, a rudely sculptured Niobe showing her prostrate children with astonishingly abundant tears, which gushed in jets from her eyes.

"Is it not absurd?" laughed Catherine; but when Ildefonso turned she saw that he was weeping too. "Surely the statue is not so pathetic as to cause the beholder to shed tears!" she exclaimed, wonderingly.

"Nay, lady," he replied, "I wept at my own grief, and not for those of the marble woman yonder."

"What is your grief?" Catherine asked, kindly.

"It is homesickness," he replied, shyly. "I long for the convent where I was a lay brother, where, though I performed menial offices, I was yet regarded as an equal by the monks, and enjoyed walking in the cloister garden, or hearing the choir chant in the chapel, or even gossiped with the illuminators in the library, and found many a design for my confectionery in the arabesques of their missal borders."

"But here," suggested Catherine, "you are a member of the King's court."

"Better," replied Ildefonso, quoting from memory from something which he had heard read in the refectory while the monks took their meals, "is a dinner of herbs where love is than a stalled ox and hatred therewith."

"You are not polite," said Catherine, with dignity.

"We are not bidden to be polite to the Evil One, and he has vexed me sore since I came here."

"How is that?" asked Catherine, curiously.

"He comes into the kitchen nearly every night, and makes havoc with all my preparations for the next day. Sometimes I find the currants and raisins strewed about the floor. Sometimes a fire will be kindled under the ovens, and good substance placed therein and burned to a cinder. If there chance to be a pie in the larder, it is invariably broken into and damaged, so that it is no longer fit to be set upon the King's table. The jars of confiture are often broken, and the paste trampled upon in the kneading-troughs. Neither bolts nor locks, nor charms nor talismans, avail against the plague, and I am an undone and miserable man."

"It is the ghost," said Catherine.

"Yea, I have heard that the great people of the house have seen a ghost, but as for myself I would not look upon it for the world. Spirits have the power of the evil-eye, and if they look upon you will change you to stone. And in that case there would be two weeping fountains, a man as well as a woman."

"If this ghost could be driven away, would you then be content to bide with us?" Catherine asked.

"No longer than the King compels me. I have said that I long for my convent. I was not made for a king's kitchen."

"Then why do you satisfy the King so well? If your pies were less toothsome he would soon give you leave of absence."

"If they were poor I would be remanded to the chambers of torture, or perhaps lose my head. Alas! I fear there is no relief for me; and a pie of mine will never again grace the board of the merry monks of Aleobaça."

Catherine sighed. "Both gentle and simple have their hearts' grievances," she said, and entered the palace, pensive and troubled.

The King's dwarf, a merry little jester, whose business it was to keep the court in good humor, plucked at her sleeve.

"Good mistress," he said, "did I not see you conversing with that saucy knave the cook?"

"Yes," replied Catherine; "but what grudge have you against him?"

"Simply that it is he who has raised all this fright of ghosts and phantoms to wreak revenge on my royal master. I'll wager that the ghost is none other than he of the saucypans, and if his gracious Majesty will permit me, I will lie in wait for him and finish him upon his next appearance."

Catherine was troubled. "Do nothing as yet," she said. "I myself will thoroughly sift this matter."

She sought her sister, and held a long conference with her.

"Would it not be well," she suggested, "to imprison the cook for a time in his own room, and see whether there is any truth in what the dwarf says?"

Philippa's face only assumed a deeper shade of gloom.

"This is no child's play of masquerade ghosts," she said, sadly. "Would that it were! The evil lies deeper, and has its seat in the King himself, though he, poor man, is unconscious of it. I have twice awakened in the dead of night, seized with a great trembling, whose cause I knew not, to find the King gone. When I left the room in search of him, and wandered up and down the corridors, I found him not, nor dared I awaken my attendants or alarm the guards, for I would not have them to know how grievously their master is plagued. Once when I returned to my room I found the King sleeping peacefully, and when I awakened him he persisted that he had not left the chamber. At the second alarm I sat me down, alone and trembling, to watch what would happen, and presently the King entered the room, but so bewitched that he saw me not, and answered me strangely when I spoke to him, and on the morrow he confidently affirmed, as before, that he had not left his bed."

"Surely," said Catherine, "the plot thickens, and I know not what to think."

But even while she spoke a cold and deadly suspicion almost stilled her heart. What if Ildefonso were not shamming, but had bewitched the King in earnest! She had heard of such things, and the cook had a dark look which would well befitt a magician or a wizard. She knew that if she breathed her suspicions to her confessor there was evidence enough to condemn the unfortunate cook to torture, perhaps to death, and she had been touched by his grief, and could not believe it feigned.

She wandered into the library, and selected an old book on the Black-Art. She sat reading this until late in the night in her sister's boudoir. It was filled with stories of Moorish sorcerers, and was enough of itself to frighten a nervous girl into convulsions. Suddenly she heard a step on the tiled floor of the passage upon which this room opened. With the step came the slow solemn sound of the clock striking midnight. The footfalls kept time with each stroke, and seemed to be approaching. In a moment more a figure in a long gown, holding a lamp and sword, passed the open door. Catherine sprang to her feet.

It was not a ghost, but the King himself.

Catherine followed him, bravely determined to solve the mystery. He passed by the room occupied by the court physician, and Catherine paused long enough to knock and arouse the learned doctor; but when she turned again the gliding figure had disappeared. She ran up one staircase and down another, but she had completely lost him. The physician joined her in a moment, and they wandered about for a little time to no purpose. Suddenly the memory of what Ildefonso had said of the havoc which the ghost made in his pantry came to her mind, and exclaiming, "Let us go to the kitchen!" she ran fleetly in front of his eminence the doctor, who was a portly man, and somewhat slow to follow an idea. When she reached the kitchen a strange sight met her eyes. There, comfortably swinging in one of the great brass kettles, which happened to be attached to the crane, sat King John, with his royal legs dangling over the side, and his royal hands engaged in dissecting a pie which he held upon his knees. The sword and the lamp stood upon a dresser-table. The former had clearly been used in carving the pastry upon which he was now lurching.

Catherine approached him and spoke to him, but he made no answer.

"He is asleep," said the court physician; "it would be exceedingly dangerous to awaken him now."

But just as he spoke, a small lithe figure which had been concealed in an angle of the chimney sprang to a crank by which the kettles were lowered and hoisted, and loosening a bolt, the chain ran down with a rattling noise, and down came the kettle with a ringing crash upon the hearth-stone. It was the dwarf, who had concealed himself, as he had threatened to do, and who would now have attacked the confused monarch with a poker had not Catherine wrenched it just in time from his tiny hand. The doctor flew to the assistance of the King, helping him out of the kettle. "Where am I?" asked the bewildered monarch.

"You have been walking in your sleep, sire," replied the wise physician. "Doubtless the memory of this toothsome pie haunted your dreams, and so wrought upon you that you came in search of it without your own knowledge. But leave it, sire, leave it; you have already had more of it than is good for your invaluable health, and hereafter I fear you must bring yourself to give it up entirely."

It was a hard trial for the King to do so, but the relief which he experienced in knowing that he was not really bewitched, and that the ghost was, after all, no more frightful than himself, was such a delight that he was enabled to make the sacrifice.

When Catherine besought that Ildefonso might be allowed to return to his convent, the King readily granted the request, insisting only that three times a year—on the anniversary of the battle of Aljubarrota, on his wedding day, and upon Christmas—one of the magic pies should be sent him, and that a detachment of cavalry should be detailed to escort it from the convent to the palace.

NOTES ON FISHING.

THE SPIDER MONITOR, AND HOW I MADE ONE.

BY WILL WOODMAN.

EVERYBODY can not be expected to carry a fishing outfit with him, nor is it necessary, for I think I could always contrive somehow to catch a fish if I were where the fish was. When I was a small boy I used to spend my summers with my grandfather on the Delaware River, some miles above Philadelphia. One day I was fretting and whining, as disagreeable small boys sometimes do, because I had no money to buy a hook and line with.

"Do you really want to go fishing?" asked my grandfather, looking over his spectacles at me.

"Yes, sir," I answered, promptly, with pleasant anticipations of money to come.

"Well, then, I'd go, if I were you."

"But I haven't any hook and line," I answered.

"Make one, then. If I wanted anything as much as you say you do this, I'd have it, if I had to make it myself."

"But how can I if I don't know how?" I inquired, with an injured air.

"My boy," said he, "the Indians, who did not have anything like the quantity of material you have, made hooks and lines. They made hooks from crooked bones, and even from stones, which they carved into a seniecular shape. They made lines from the sinews of animals. If they had had the pins that you can easily get, they would have soon bent them into hooks, and they would never have asked for money to buy a line if they had the balls of cord or spools of cotton that you have to select from."

"Oh!" I said, somewhat ashamed that I had not thought of such a simple plan myself, and yet not quite sure that it would work. And then suddenly, as a new difficulty presented itself, I added, with something like pleasure, I am afraid,

"But what am I to do for a bob or a sinker?"

"You could do without them, but they are easily enough made," said my grandfather, with a twinkle in his eye that showed he was pleased to be able to overcome any difficulties his grandson could suggest. "For a bob get a cork from Sarah, run a stick through the middle so that it will project about an inch at each end; let the line run through with the stick, which will help to prevent it slip-what looked like a turret ship, such as was used during the late civil war—a Monitor, in fact.

The can I had previously pierced with holes large enough to admit the ends of my poles; when, therefore, the can was securely nailed to the deck, I put my poles into the holes, and let them rest on the railing of the boat. In this way the outer ends of the poles were raised some distance from the water, and being pliable, would easily bend under the struggles of a captured fish.

The boat, when everything was in readiness, was taken to the lake, on the windward side, and with sail set, started on her voyage. A light cord attached to the stern enabled me to stop her when she was far enough out, and all I had then to do was to wait patiently until my poles should bend and announce to me the capture ping through too easily. If you can't find a piece of lead for a sinker, take a piece of iron, a part of a nail, for example."

I did as my grandfather told me, and, with a small hickory sapling for a pole, I caught many a perch and sunfish, and occasionally, to my sorrow, even an eel.

The lesson in self-help I had received was most useful to me, for it started me thinking for myself, and among other things I devised a plan whereby I combined the pleasures of toy-boat sailing with wholesale fish catching.

I found an old piece of two-inch board in the wagon-house loft, and chipped one end to a point to resemble a bow. I tacked a narrow strip of wood on the under side from the point of the bow to the middle of the stern; that was my keel to keep the boat steady in the water. (A rudder like the one in the illustration can be used in place of a keel.) My mast, which was usually a pine stick about the length of the boat, was placed between the middle of the boat and the bow. My sail, which was square in shape, was of cloth when I could get it, or of tough brown paper, and once I did use a cabbage leaf.

My fishing apparatus consisted of from six to ten tough but slender poles, not more than two and a half feet long. To these were attached lines varying from three feet to six feet in length, the longest line having the largest hooks.

I found an old tomato can, and cut it down to three inches in height. Then I cut a number of slits in the can an inch deep, and turned the slit edge up at right angles with the side of the can. This edge I nailed to the floor of the boat, as near the middle as possible, and thus I had of the finny prey.

There is one advantage which the fisherman has over the hunter, and that is that he may always have his tools at hand for instant use wherever he may be.

I remember how I once got me as dainty a meal as ever Delmonico served, and that too in a desert place, where I am sure only a fisherman would have thought of finding a feast. It was when the railroad to San Francisco was first opened.

We had crossed the great Rockies, and were bowling along toward Ogden through a gorge in the Uintah Mountains, when we came to a stop. It was a wild place, with a precipitous, frowning cliff on one side, and a bare boulder-strewn mountain slope on the other.

Everybody was grumbling at the prospect of being kept in such a desolate spot; but my fisherman's eye had caught sight of a rippling mountain stream singing to itself as it danced along under the dark cliff, and I determined to ask some questions before I joined the army of grumblers. I went to the conductor.

"How long do you think we will stop here?" I asked, in my politest manner.

"How should I know?"

Evidently the conductor was cross; but I did not blame him; for I was sure that each passenger had already asked the same question at least once, and perhaps twice; so I tried another plan.

"Of course you can't tell exactly," I said; "but I was thinking that if we had time enough you and I might have a nice mess of baked trout out of yonder stream. I'm sure there are trout in it."

The conductor was only human, and he liked trout. He said he guessed we might stay there three or four hours, and he thought he might scare up a piece of cord for a line somewhere, but he didn't know about a hook.

"I'll look out for hook and line," said I, "if you will get the oven ready."

"That's easy enough," said he. "I'll make it of some of these flat stones, and I'll heat it with coals from the engine furnace."

Thereupon I took off my hat, turned down the inside band, and selected a suitable hook, with a good artificial fly on it, from a number I had there. Out of my pocket I took a line, and with my knife I cut a pole from one of the clumps of trees.

"You go armed, don't you?" said the conductor, jovially, as he watched me.

"Yes, sir," I answered; "and in the words of General Grant, I'm prepared to fight it out on this line all summer."

I was not mistaken in the stream. It was full of trout, and some of them were big fellows, too. I would have spent all the time fishing, but the conductor was interested in the oven, and insisted upon trying it. I never ate such fish in my life before, and as for the conductor, he smiled all the way to Ogden, and shook hands with me when I left him. Some of the ill-natured passengers said he would surely be sick after such an unusual fit of politeness, but you see they felt ugly because they had not had any of the trout.

TOMMY AND THE PLUMS.

IT was a summer morning.
Said Tom, "I'll have some fun."
He started for the orchard
As fast as he could run.

He stood beneath the plum-tree,
And this is what he said:
"Those plums must be delicious.
They look so ripe and red.
"If I could only reach
'em
I'd have a splendid treat.
It's very tantalizing:
They must be very sweet."

Then Tommy jumped his highest,
But couldn't reach the limb
On which the plums were hanging,
And seemed to mock at him.
They nodded and they nodded,
And they really seemed to say,
"We know you can not reach us,
And you'd better go and play."

The very leaves seemed laughing
As they rustled overhead,
Till Tom got tired and angry,
And this is what he said:

"I really wouldn't touch one
If it was in my power;
They can't be worth the trouble;
They must be green and sour."

A MISHAP.

Poor Harry has dropped his bowl, and it lies here in a half-dozen pieces. All the nice bread and milk is spoiled and gone. Never mind, little man. Run home and tell mamma. She will give you another breakfast, and you may eat it under the trees if you wish to, and at the same time watch the birdies feasting on the crumbs at your feet. Perhaps mamma will find a way to join these bits together, and make the bowl over again as good as new.

"Never cry over spilled milk."

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

NAPLES, ITALY.

I think that some of you may like to hear about a small country town called Laserta, which few people know, although it is almost as interesting as Naples. It is about twenty miles from Naples, north of Vesuvius, and lies near the Apennines.

Last year when I was thirteen, my parents and I spent a few months there. The place is noted for its royal palace and surrounding parks. The palace is one of the largest and most beautiful in the world. It was built by a celebrated architect named Vanvitelli, an Italian, for one of the Kings of Naples, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, when, owing to the constant revolutions in Naples, the Bourbon Kings were rather glad to be out of it.

The rooms are all large, the different-colored marble floors are various and beautiful, and the entrance hall is vast, and has some beautiful pictures. The ball-room is very spacious, and is still unfinished, as the ornamental part is not yet done. One room is lined on every side with great mirrors.

The park near it has its mention too. Its chief attraction is a lovely water-fall, which begins high in the hills, and becomes alternately a canal, where ducks and swans swim, and a cascade, until it reaches a place where it disappears underground. There is a great deal of statuary, representing chiefly gods and goddesses. There is a beautiful lake, and many large trees grow beside it, and overhang and touch the water. In the middle of the lake there is an island, and on it a small house in the Pompeian style, with broken statues. The grounds are garden wall, and make it lovely with their dark green leaves and bright flowers. A bridge is fastened to a cord, by means of which one can pull one's self from the shore to the island. Many artists keep their sketches in the little house on the island.

I read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE there not long ago, sitting beside the lake, on a hot summer's day, and from this city, so we thought, we would write one. We have been out picking daisies and buttercups this afternoon, and have got a large pretty bunch. Have any little girls ever tried to make little old women out of daisies? The way they are made is to take a good-sized daisy and cut the leaves all around half-way down, leaving two petals (for the cap-strings) at the bottom. Then take pen and ink and make as funny or as pretty a face as you choose, and the effect is very droll. We send you one by this mail, and hope you will get it without its being crushed.

CLARA G. M. and EDITH N. S.

The little old lady was not at all disturbed by her journey. Her cap was not a bit ruffled.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little girl ten years old, and have taken your paper three years. I have never written a letter to you before. Last summer I was in bed with rheumatism four weeks, and it was so pleasant for me when Tuesday came and brought YOUNG PEOPLE for me to read. I have no brother or sister, and for pets I have a canary bird named Bob Goldfeather; he is a fine singer. And I have a Maltese cat named Tippy-toes; he weighs sixteen pounds, and is very intelligent. I must copy something written by a young bird named Tomline on something that happened to Tip:

In the city of Elms there dwelt a cat,

A cat of high degree;

Big and glossy, sleek and fat,

A king among cats was he.

He lived on the very daintiest fare,

The choicest the land could boast—

Cream and canned, cooked with care,

And humming-birds fried on toast.

From the tip of his nose to the end of his tail

He was clad in a Quaker gray.

Except each toe and little toe-nail,

Which were milk-white, strange to say.

And so they christened him Tippy-toes—

A singular name for a cat;

But this Olive Street child, as you may suppose,

Was a high-bred aristocrat!

It happened on one fateful day

In Italy, bright September;

That dreadful day, though brief its stay,

Tip ever will remember.

He scented dimer in the air,

His noonday meal of dainties rare,

And bounded to the kitchen, where

The cook arranged his bill of fare.

Ah! luckless haste! Unhappy Tip

He tripped and fell on his side,

She closed the door as he flew through,

And almost sawed poor Tip in two.

He rose from that a-dooring grip

A sadder and a wiser Tip.

Our cook was very fond of Tip, and he of her, but our visitor, Aunt J., did not like cats, and Tip never forgave her for the accident. M. A.

ELKSBROOK, ENGLAND.

I am a little girl ten years old. I live in a little country place close to the railway station. Our house is shaded in front by elm and acacia trees. The orchard and garden are inclosed by a spruce hedge. We have pears, plums, grapes, and 140 chickens, and a nice kitchen garden. It is a very pretty place, especially in the summer months. We have a fine large church, a large hall, two school-houses, besides other nice buildings. I like my school and teacher very much. I hope you will not think I am too backward in my studies. I read in the Fifth Royal Reader, study geography, grammar, and spelling, cipher in decimal fractions, and draw an hour every Monday and Wednesday afternoons. I have no pets like many of the little girls I read of, but my sister Florie has a Maltese cat, that can open the door to her little sister three months old. She is so small that we all pet her. IDA M. S.

ORANGE, CALIFORNIA.

I would like to see a letter published from Southern California. I will tell you about a mocking-bird I had in my cage. I had it with four eggs in it, but I did not touch them, and watched anxiously for them to be hatched. One day as I approached the nest the little birds seemed to be pecking my hand and hit my ears with their wings with more anger than ever, when I discovered only two eggs in the nest. On going there the third day I found the nest empty, but the eggs were hatched and did not hatch. When the little bird had feathered out and was nearly ready to fly, it had hopped out of the nest on the ground, where it was in danger of being killed, when he bit me on the hand, the butcher-bird, which will cut the throats of all birds it can, and also cats and dogs, which do not hesitate to kill a rat, and to save the bird's life, put it in a cage and hung it in the top of a fig-tree, where the old birds fed it every day. I thought by having it caged a few days it would be able to fly and keep out of its enemies' reach, when I would let it loose, my morning I saw my brother coming to the house with the cage in his hand, and as he approached I saw a snake hanging half-way out of the cage, and the bird flew to it, loosed its wings, and was ready to fly, and it had crawled up the body of the tree, then into the cage, where it swallowed the bird, and after doing so was unable to get out. My brother did not let the snake escape alive. We felt very sorry for the bird, but was a beautiful singer. We do not care mocking-birds here, they are all made up of cruet cage birds. The mocking-bird is a very interesting bird, and there are a great many here among the orange groves. We have birds and flowers all the year. My mother says that the YOUNG PEOPLE, and it is a welcome guest in the family. EVA J. H.

Many thanks to the lady who kindly sent the Postmistress a budget of letters from her little pupils at Farmington, Connecticut. We have not room for all, though all are entitled to praise. M. A. F., Lizzie C., Julia B., Minnie C., Mary A. H., Jessie A. H., Maude M. P., A. D. H., Henrietta S. H., Nellie B., Mattie P., F. J. C. and Gracie M. J. C. you have each received a good mark. F. J. C. is very considerate in collecting birds' eggs, and I am glad he obeys his teacher in taking only one egg from any nest. Here is Gracie's letter:

FARMINGTON, CONNECTICUT.

I am a little girl ten years old. I will tell you how I happened to have YOUNG PEOPLE to read. My teacher and we scholars have each saved ourselves this last winter at school, and we sent the money we saved in this way to the Harpers for YOUNG PEOPLE. We all have it to read every week. Teacher excused us from our spelling lesson to-day so that we could write to the Post-Office Box. I have one sister; her name is Jessie. I never had to stand on the floor in my life. We have to speak every two weeks, and each one has a flower, and we are all going to count the blossoms and tell her how many we have had at the end of the term, to see which had the best luck. My mamma and papa do not know how to read. This is the first letter I ever wrote by my hand, and I hope it is not too long to print.

GRACIE MAY H.

HOBOKEN, NEW JERSEY.

A great many girls in my class take YOUNG PEOPLE for themselves, and we scholars. I am eleven years old, and go to school. Dear Postmistress, did you like to study grammar when you were a little girl? I can not say that I do. We are right in the middle of our school year, and this year was a splendid story. BEATIE L.

Yes, dear, I did like grammar, and like it still.

THE GIANT KING AND HIS LITTLE FRIENDS.

Once upon a time there lived a mighty Giant King who was a very kind man, and there were none he loved more than the little boys and girls. He gave them gifts of all kinds, from palaces and houses to live in to horses and ponies to ride. He was very careful that they should have all they needed in the world. The Queen of the Fairies thought, as it seemed as if he used his money for to make them comfortable. They loved him in return, but could not think of any way to repay him for his great kindness. One night the Fairies thought, and at once they gathered them all about her, and said: "I know you all wish to do something for our friend who has been so kind to us, and I have a plan to propose. It is this, to go to the Gnomes' Mine and each select a different kind of precious stone, all as nearly of the same size as possible. These we will shape like little balls, and polish them by means of the diamonds." They all agreed to do this. When they finish them we will bring them to the King." They all thought this a good plan, and acted upon it the next day. When they arrived at the mine they were ushered into the presence of the Gnome King, who, after listening to their plan, gave them wands, as the Fairy Queen had said, and ordered one of his subjects to escort them to the mine. They all went, and they let them choose the jewels they wanted, which they then put on the floor before them and rolled them to and fro with their wands until they were round and polished. Then returning them to the Gnome King, they went out for the Giant King's palace and presented him with the jewels. Then they returned to their homes, and there they lived long and prospered. And this was the story of "The Giant King and His Little Friends."

PEASEL CREEK, NEW YORK.

HARPER'S, SEBASTIA, ENGLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—Since I wrote to you last year we have had a very interesting story of a dear father died last March, and we do miss him so much! We used to live in Brighton, but we have moved into the country now. The other day my mother and I were out for a walk, and everything she had on was wet through, excepting her hat; she got hold of a root and pulled herself out, but her dolly floated away. She cried that I was obliged to help her, and she was as wet as I, as fast as we could, so she did not catch cold. I can not go out to-day, as last night I ran the fork

WATERBURY, NEW YORK.

We are two little girls, great friends, who both take this splendid paper. We have never seen a letter from this city, so we thought we would write one. We have been out picking daisies and buttercups this afternoon, and have got a large pretty bunch. Have any little girls ever tried to make little old women out of daisies? The way they are made is to take a good-sized daisy and into my foot as I was digging up the garden. I do not go to school now, but mamma teaches me and myself a case to learn to read. I am quite old enough to study yet. I liked "Nan" very much, and so did mamma. I hope Jimmy Brown will write again. Good-by. With love—

Percy WILLIAM S.

ABBEVILLE, SOUTH CAROLINA.

I am a girl eleven years old. My father is the editor of the Abbeville M. He gave my sister Anne and myself a case to learn to read. I have four sisters and one brother. We live on a hill, and down in the valley is a beautiful stream flowing. There is a mass of willows growing over it, and a plenty of grass. In one place there is a torn-up bridge, it is quite picturesque. Our house is a two-story house, with a large front and back yard. We have a large orchard, with plenty of fine fruit trees. The railroad runs from the front of the house. We have two cows. One is named Daisy, and the other Brindle.

May I join the Little Housekeepers? I like to cook when there is nothing to bother. I made the dinner biscuits to-day. I can make pound-cake. I have a pet kitten and a pet rabbit. I have a talent for drawing. Papa is going to let me and myself have lessons. I am going to the country this summer, and I expect to have a good time. I have never seen a letter from here before, or nearer this than Greenville, and that was from Nannie D. I think, with Susie, and Mabel M. S., that there is no story paper or book like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. One of your girls, HANNAH H.

I am glad you are learning to set type, and that you think of learning to draw, while you already know how to cook some things. You must be superior to "mother" if you wish to be a house-keeper, dear child.

SARASOTA, NEW YORK.

I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and think it is very nice. Papa had the numbers bound into three large volumes for me. I have a dear little brother three years old, I am seven. I have never been to school. I had a pet cat for three years, but at last she ran away. RALPH R. B.

Thanks for the daisies which came with your letter, and kiss mamma for the dear little note she sent with yours.

JOHNNIE'S ACCIDENT.

I am going to write not a letter but a story about a boy named Johnnie. He was in general a good boy, but, like other children, he had his faults, and one of them was curiosity. If his papa or mamma brought in a bundle, Johnnie was always the first to open it, whether it was a good one or for somebody else's. His sister Nannie called him Peeping John, which served him right.

One day his mother called him into the parlor and said, "Johnnie, how would you like to go on a visit to Aunt Martha?"

Aunt Martha lived in the country. Johnnie jumped up and down for joy. Of course he was wild to go. On Friday he was ready, and set out, a happy boy.

Johnnie had been there two or three days he thought he could go anywhere by himself, and told Aunt Martha he was going for a walk.

The bad boy really went out bird-hunting. He soon spied a tall tree, on which was a nest. To be climbed, when the branch broke, and down he fell on his back. Some men in a field near by saw this happen, and ran to the rescue. One of them was Uncle Fred, Aunt Martha's husband.

Johnnie was carried to the house, put to bed, the doctor was called, and a telegram sent to his papa and mamma. It was a long while before he got well, and he was never known to go after a bird's nest again, and he is also stopped peeping. ALICE S. (aged 11).

HAWAIIKOPONAKA, SANDWICH ISLANDS.

I am a little girl ten years old. My brother takes Young People. I enjoy it as much as I can. I ride horseback, I use a fine man's saddle, but I have learned to ride with a side-saddle. I live in a small yard, but I have a little pig and a cat and two kittens, and a doll to play with. I am six years ago, when I was a little girl about five years old, I saw a calf with a double head. I can see the sea on one side, and on the other side the mountain called Haleakala, which is the highest extinct crater in the world. It will put a Kanaka sentence in that I have learned since I have been here, "o aole maikai o Iolo." It means, "You are no good, you are silly." I have lived here seven years. EMMA W.

MARIETTA, OHIO.

This is the third year I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE, and although I take other papers, I like this the best of all. Mamma has made me a book for me every year, and they are made beautiful books. I read a letter in the Post-office Box one week from Marietta, Pennsylvania, but have never seen one from Marietta, Ohio. This city is built where the first settlement was made in Ohio, and on Saturday, the 7th of April, we celebrated the ninety-fifth anniversary of the first settlement here. In five years from now we expect to have a grand centennial celebration in our beautiful city.

Yesterday I visited our cemetery, which we call Mound Cemetery, on account of a very large mound that stands in the centre of it, supposed to have been built by a race of people called the Mound-builders. This mound is about sixty feet high, and about two hundred yards in circumference. It has a ditch running around it. We have other works of these builders, but it would make my letter too long to describe them all. Mamma pointed out to me the grave of General Rufus Putnam, and also that of Commodore Abraham Whipple, who lived here in Marietta, and built and sailed out of the Ohio River with the first vessel. Quite a number of the pioneers are buried here. J. HERBERT W.

Herbert, I regret that I could not have given your letter a place a little sooner. You must write again.

EUREKA SPRINGS, ARKANSAS.

I am a subscriber to the paper, and I like it very much, especially the Post-office Box and "Kissin' the Book." I am about four or five years of age. I have no brother nor sister living. I live with my papa and mamma at the famous watering place, Eureka Springs. I have been eight years in this. We think of going home next week to Illinois, where my papa has a farm, and where all my relations live. I am very anxious to see them and my pets. I have a pet sheep, a canary bird, and a dog. My papa says he is going to buy me a pony and a horse, but I am a good boy and apply myself to my studies. GEORGE A. T.

RECIPTS FOR LITTLE HOUSEKEEPERS.

POP-OVERS.—One quart of milk, seven eggs, a little salt, a little more than a table-spoonful of sugar, one egg, and four cups of a batter as soft as buttermilk; beat the eggs until very light, but not separately; bake in cups in a hot oven for one half-hour.

QUEEN'S CAKE.—One cup of butter, two of flour, two of sugar, one of cornstarch, one of sweet milk, one egg, two spoonfuls of cream, one of soda, the whites of seven eggs, and a little vanilla; bake until it is a light brown. D. E. S.

COFFEE-CUSTARD.—One egg beaten to a froth, three-quarters of a cup of milk, two tea-spoonfuls of sugar, a pinch of salt, and a little cream; beat thoroughly together; pour into a coffee-cup; bake until it is brown, and then take it out. LOUIS R. S.

CREAM CAKE.—One egg, one cup of sugar, one table-spoonful of butter, two-thirds of a cup of milk, one tea-spoonful of baking powder, one tea-spoonful of vanilla, one and two-thirds cups of flour, and salt; bake as for jelly-cake, in three layers. Cream for the above: one half-pint of milk, one egg, one tea-spoonful of cornstarch, one table-spoonful of flour, two table-spoonfuls of sugar, and a little vanilla; seal your milk; beat your sugar, flour, egg, and cornstarch together; let it boil until it becomes thick; add a little salt; spread each layer with this custard, and put them together. The above is nice for jelly-cake.

SPONGE GINGER CAKE.—Melt together half a coffee-cup each of butter and sugar; let them stir in half a coffee-cupful each of sugar and cold water; then add one table-spoonful of ginger, one egg, two and a half coffee-cupfuls of sifted flour, and four tea-spoonfuls of baking powder; bake in a moderate oven.

SPICE CAKE.—Half a cupful of butter, one cupful of brown sugar, two and a half cupfuls of flour, one tea-spoonful of baking powder, four yolks of eggs, half a cupful of molasses, one tea-spoonful of cinnamon, one of allspice, and half a tea-spoonful of cloves; rub the butter and sugar to a cream; add the eggs; beat a few minutes; add the molasses, cinnamon, and cloves; mix, and mix into a smooth batter, rather firm; have a paper-lined cake-tin; bake in a rather quick oven. JAPANESE FAN TALES.

BY KIRK MUNROE.

FIVE little birds and five little boys,
All of them making a terrible noise;
The boys to drive the birds away,
The birds because they'd rather stay.

For Japanese boys and Japanese crows
Can always be found where the white rice grows;

The crows say "caw," but the boys say
"shoo!"
And wave their stieks of long bamboo.

To be a scarecrow in old Japan
Is fun alive to a little man,
And to him there is nothing that tastes so nle
As sweetened eakes of fine white rice.

Here you have a pretty game,
Played in all Japan the same;
"Apple luck" they call it there,
And each player gets a share.

Every apple in the basket
Has a name, but do not ask it;
Keep the one you chance to get,
Without a murmur of regret.

Some are wealth, or love, or beauty,
Others industry, or duty.
As the players sit in line,
Each one holds an end of twine.

The other ends are gathered tight
By her whose age gives her the right.
Each one, as she draws a prize,
From her place must quickly rise.

A small white dog is Shiro,
And happy as he can be,

Playing with two little girls,
Otake and Tome,
Just outside the school-house door,
In Jamagata city;
But if he eats the name eard up
It will be a pity;
For on the wall it ought to hang,
Just over Tome's seat,
In a row with all the others,
And like them clean and neat.
O-kama-san, the teacher, calls,
"Now, children, come to school,
And do not soil a name eard,
For that's against the rule."
To the dog she says, "Go home, sir,
We do not want you now."
And Shiro answers, "Yes, ma'am,"
With a Japanese bow-wow.

AN INDIAN GAME.

KORUNGATTAM; OR, THE MONKEY GAME.

TWO or more boys go up a tree and constantly move up and down, each keeping to a branch by himself. A large circle is drawn round the foot of the tree, in which an active boy is posted to move round and round and watch the boys above.
One at a time may come down the tree, and, jumping on the ground within the circle, run away, evading the hold or touch of the guard posted in it. The sport lies in the boys above attempting to come down from the tree, and the one below striving to touch them.

Should any one on the tree cease to move for one moment, or get into a branch already occupied by another, or be touched by the boy below, or jump down on the ground outside the circumference of the circle, he is counted "dead." The boys on the tree may exchange positions by leaping, at one and the same time, from one branch to another. This often gives relief, and adds variety to the sport.

IV.

THE fair had certainly been a success, so far as enjoyment and profit were concerned. Before the storm broke, the tables were all cleared, and the girls gathered together in the school-room, a merry, excited, eager crowd, each one anxious to talk over the day's experiences, and to contribute to the general delight of the occasion by repeating the various little amusing incidents which had befallen her during the afternoon.

Hattie Barnes, trying to hang affectionately upon Kitty's arm, was very loud and demonstrative as she described Amy Rodman's discomfiture on being told that the aprons were sixteen dollars apiece.

"You should have seen her, girls," said Hattie, with a little giggle. "She twisted this way and that, and looked mortified to death."

KITTY ACTING AS AMY'S NURSE.

Kitty turned rather a piercing glance upon Hattie. "Did she?" she said, calmly, and Hattie hurried to say, "Well, she looked awfully ashamed, anyhow."

Little May Blake glanced furtively at Kitty before she ventured to say, "I don't suppose she'll ever be so mean again."

"Well," said Kitty, slowly, indeed, almost solemnly, and as though the words had long been forming themselves in a very perplexed mind. "I hope, girls, it's the last time we'll be quite so mean. Oh, I know what you are going to say, Hattie: it was I who suggested it. I know it, and that's why I am speaking now. I blame myself heartily, because—" And here Kitty's honest face colored. "Do you know, as she stood there looking at us when we told her those ridiculous prices, something made me suddenly feel myself not half the lady she was. I felt we had done a real vulgar sort of thing. There!"

"Why, Kitty?" cried May.

"Yes, I did, though," persisted the general-in-chief, with rather a hysterical sort of gurgle, though she tried to command her thin features. "It came over me all in a sort of rush, and I thought how could we possibly know what her reasons may be. Girls"—and here the general's tones grew very impressive—"I believe that there is something in Amy's life that we know nothing about."

There was profound silence after this. The girls, who were seated around the wood fire which Miss Barrington had had kindled in the stove when the storm began, looked at each other with wondering, perplexed faces. They had so long been accustomed to follow Kitty's leadership that never for one moment had it occurred to them to question her loudly expressed prejudice against Amy Rodman; but now it was hard to turn so suddenly in an opposite direction; too hard for Hattie's narrow mind, for she burst out with,

"Shame, Kitty, to change so! Remember all you said only this morning." Hattie's voice was so shrill that it seemed a part of the storm that was beating against the windows.

"Do you think I'm likely to forget?" cried Kitty, with blazing eyes and cheeks. "Didn't I say I felt ashamed of myself? What can be worse?"

And indeed for the hitherto successful commander of their forces to feel ashamed of anything she had done did seem about as terrible a thing as could have happened. After that, what might not be expected?

"There'll have to be some sort of an apology," Kitty went on, a little dolefully. "And I suppose I must make it. I haven't any idea of making a chum of her all at once, but what I have decided upon is"—and Kitty cast a meaning glance around the circle—"that she shall be given a chance."

A low murmur, half dissent, half tamely agreeing, greeted this, and Kitty leaned back in her chair, folding her arms with an air of grave reflection.

Suddenly Miss Esther's voice, eager and anxious, was heard at the door.

"Girls," she was saying, "do you know anything of Amy Rodman?"

Two or three sprang to their feet, and Hattie said, with a giggle, "Speak of an angel, etc."

But Kitty darted forward, exclaiming,

"Oh, Miss Esther, she hasn't been with us since this afternoon."

"Come outside," whispered the teacher, drawing Kitty into the hall, and shutting the school-room door tightly. "I am afraid she went down to the beach," said Miss Esther, looking rather white about the lips. "Mary, the cook, saw her hurrying off in that direction about half past four. Miss Barrington has gone to bed with one of her dreadful headaches, and I dare not disturb her. Suppose—What is that?"

For just then there was a sound of heavy feet on the porch, followed by a knock at the door.

Kitty flung it open, letting in the wind and driving rain regardlessly.

Outside old Joyce, the fisherman, was standing.

"I beg your pardon, miss," he said, in his slow way, "but doctor says you're to come at once. We got little miss out o' the water, but she's pretty bad, down at my place."

"Oh! oh! oh!" moaned Kitty, and Miss Esther nearly staggered against the wall.

"Amy Rodman?" she said, faintly.

"Yes'm," said Joyce. "Seems she went out to try and get that little Barnes chap in. He'd been to the Reefs with me, and he was fooling with my boat, and got adrift; and little miss she seed him, and went after him. Some o' my men seed her then. That's how it was."

Miss Esther was accustomed to think and act quickly, and her good sense and self-control speedily returned. She consented to Kitty's accompanying her to Joyce's, and they started off in the Academy rockaway, after giving directions for a room with a fire in it, and a well-aired bed to be prepared on their return.

Kitty Jenners never will forget that drive in the storm, nor any detail of their going into the little cottage, where lights were twinkling, and where, in Hetty's room, on her small bed, Amy Rodman, white as death, lay seemingly asleep. Life had very nearly ebbed away before they rescued her, clinging desperately to Robbie's golden hair; but youth asserts itself sometimes even over death, and God had spared her. But Miss Esther knew before the doctor told her that Amy would be a long time very ill.

Kitty found it hard to tell just how the first hours of the night passed. They waited for the storm to die away before they tried to move her, and Kitty talked with Hetty, who had so much to say of Amy's kindness and goodness that Kitty's remorse awoke anew, and she felt, if ever the chance were given her, she would almost ask Amy to be her friend.

It was nearly morning; the violence of the storm had entirely ceased, when a melancholy little party came back to the Academy. As was to be expected, no one had slept that night, and every door opened as Amy was carried down the upper hall to the room made ready for her. Hattie Barnes had heard of her brother's danger, and how Amy had saved him, and had spent the night in foolish hysterics, which were very nearly beginning again, when Miss Esther came into the room and sternly commanded her to silence. This reduced Hattie's anguished cries to a sort of whimper, which she kept up while Miss Esther told them about Amy's courage and her peril, and how the doctor feared she would be a long time ill.

In spite of glorious weather the next day, and very easy lessons, it was hard for the girls to feel anything but subdued after the excitement of the evening, and as days went on, and Amy Rodman hovered between life and death, the school party grew very hushed and awe-stricken. Kitty, who by her own request was given the place of nurse, was welcomed once or twice a day by an eager set of girls, who had nearly forgotten their dislike in their compassion for the sufferer.

V.

Amy had been ill a fortnight, when, one warm and dusty day, an elderly woman arrived at the Academy, and was closeted some time with Miss Barrington, after which the news spread through the school that Amy's curious old guardian, Mr. Symes, was dead. And then, the night before school broke up, while the girls were sitting about waiting for Kitty's usual evening bulletin, Miss Esther came into the room, and, sitting down at her desk, remarked that she had a little story to tell them.

Every face wore an eager air, for Miss Esther was famous for her stories.

"I want each one of you," said the young teacher, "to accept this story without any questions. I can give no names, and I must leave all personal details to your own imagination." Then she began:

"I once knew a girl of about fifteen who came to a school with every appearance of wealth both in her dress and her allowance; and she had money—a large sum given her every month by her guardian. Now this girl knew nothing of schools or school-girls and their ways, and she was too shy to make friends readily, and the girls, not finding her all the 'fun' they had expected, began among themselves to criticise her and slight her, and above all to try and detect miserliness in her. It was true that she rarely spent a penny, and on several occasions declined to share in treats; but while she gave nothing toward them, she never availed herself of their advantages. All the same her conduct increased the ill feeling against her. Now not one girl in the school had the heart and thought to go to their lonely little Western comrade and help her to be one of themselves, and to speak of the burden on her mind; for all the time while she was called mean and a miser in the school, she was anxiously saving for a noble purpose.

"Let me tell you what that purpose was.

"Years and years before, this girl's brother—he is dead now—had defrauded one of his employers, and only been saved open disgrace for his mother's sake. But that mother, when her boy was dead, had begun to save in every way to pay back the stolen money, and when her only daughter was adopted by a rich man, who gave her this liberal allowance, the girl resolved, almost with a vow, never to spend one penny unnecessarily until that money was every cent paid back; for not only was there the burden of her brother's sin on her mind, but she knew that the children of the man he had wronged were in actual need, which might not have been but for her brother's wrongdoing. Denying herself all girlish luxuries, she saved her money, and, as it accumulated, sent it out to California to the widow of her brother's old employer.

"Now I ask you, girls, how many among you would have had the moral courage to accept a false position, even for such a purpose? Don't we all know how delightful it would have been for this girl to have been the petted heiress of the school, with pockets full of money, and all sorts of devotion and attention? Instead of which she had to accept the lowest place, where, I regret to say, she was not only pined by the suspicions of her companions, but treated in a way unworthy of discussion."

Miss Esther paused. She did not tell the girls that she had with difficulty obtained from Amy permission to speak in some such fashion of her motive for saving; she never mentioned Amy's name; but every girl present understood.

After a short silence, Miss Esther said, more cheerfully: "Girls, Amy Rodman can see you all to-morrow. She will be moved into Miss Barrington's sitting-room, and I hope you will all be able to congratulate her." And without another word Miss Esther nodded to the girls and went away—back to her post in Amy's room.

Whether Kitty ever made her formal apology no one knows; but this I do know, that before her illness was over, Amy was on excellent terms with all the girls, even to a certain degree with Hattie Barnes, and in the autumn she went for a fortnight to Kitty's home in the mountains, where the friendship that has ever since endured was firmly cemented.

Her return to the Academy was celebrated with as much delight as a public holiday. Little Robbie Barnes was sent to greet her with a bouquet of his own choosing, and to this day—he is a university "stroke out" now—he never ceases to speak of Amy with gratitude and affection. But this being a perfectly true story, I must add that Amy's first care after her guardian's death was to pay every penny, with interest, which remained due in California. I saw Kitty Jenners only the other day, with Miss Esther, who is principal of the Academy now, and among other things she told me that one of Amy's dearest possessions is a locket the girls gave her years ago, on her sixteenth birthday, and, at Miss Esther's suggestion, they had inscribed across the back the motto, "In Honor Bound."

THE END.

ATTILA THE HUN.

IN the troublous old times, when the right to possess belonged to the strongest, there lived a brave, bold warrior called Attila. He was the leader of the Huns, who were a formidable race of men, noted for their cruelty. Many countries were at this time becoming civilized, were forsaking their idolatrous religions in favor of Christianity, and it seemed, indeed, as though at last the world was going to be happier, wiser, and less selfish.

But when the nations had grown tired of quarrelling and fighting, and were inclined to live peaceably, they were interrupted in their efforts by these barbarous Huns, who came pouring down over Europe from Asia, causing misery and desolation.

The half-civilized natives were frightened by the appearance of these bold savages. So cruel were they, and so great was their number, that the very sight of them was enough to cause alarm and terror; but when at their head, as king and leader, was seen the cruel Attila, the fear of the people amounted to dismay.

In appearance the Huns were hideous objects, having very large heads, flat noses, broad shoulders, and thick, bony, ugly arms. Most of them were very short, and had thin, weak, crooked legs, which looked quite unfit to support their large, square bodies; indeed, altogether they were more like demons than human beings. For some reason or other they were seldom seen walking. They were nearly always mounted on horseback, and when seated on their horses, one could have imagined that horse and rider were but one animal.

Attila was the leader of these savage tribes. It was said and believed that where his horse's hoofs had trodden the grass could grow no more; and, indeed, after invasion by Attila and his men, nothing but wild, dreary wastes were left.

Through Germany, toward France, they swept on, like a great army of locusts, feeding upon grain, fruit, or flesh, whatever they could find, their numbers being scarcely reduced at all, and to Attila was given the name of the Scourge of God.

At length it occurred to the Emperors of the West that by uniting their efforts these powerful enemies might be overcome.

Forgetting all the little quarrels among themselves, they agreed to combine their forces, and challenge Attila to fight with them. The spot chosen for the attack was in France, near the river Marne, and here all the troops arrayed themselves, with their brave monarchs at their head. Among them were Theodorie and Merovic.

Attila, confident of success, stood facing them, having for his warriors not only his own men, but also a horde of barbarians whom he had enlisted for the occasion. Before the battle he delivered an address, telling them all that if the victory should be theirs he would reward the brave handsomely.

The battle began, and to Attila's astonishment and rage he saw his own troops beaten down. Although the strength was on his side, the discipline and skill of the civilized armies won the day. For the first time he saw thousands of his followers lying dead, and rather than lose any more, as soon as evening approached he gave up the combat.

During the dark hours of the night each side wondered what steps the other intended taking.

To the amazement of the victors of the previous day, when morning dawned a most remarkable scene presented itself to their view.

On the top of a huge mound, made of the wooden saddles of the horses and of timber of all kinds, stood Attila, with a blazing torch in his hand. Around him was a fort made of wagons, while within this stood a number of the brave Huns, also holding lighted torches. The idea was that, rather than submit, or be delivered into the hands of the enemy, the pile should be lighted, and Attila would perish in the flames.

The victors could not help admiring the bravery displayed by this proud barbarian, and, instead of making any further attack, they ordered their men to remain passive. Attila, with the remainder of his army, retreated in humiliation.

He never regained his former power, and before very long died in Italy. His body was laid in a coffin of gold, outside of which was a shell of silver; and in order that there might be no possibility of the corpse being disturbed for the sake of the valuable coffin, the slaves who had dug the grave were all put to death.

As soon as the Huns had buried their leader they hastened back to the East, sorrowful and subdued, for they had imagined their champion to be unconquerable and almost immortal. Nevertheless, they revered his memory, and made a vow never to disclose the place of his burial. Even to this day no one knows where his body rests.

A BRAVE LAD.

BY ELIOT McCORMICK.

CHARLES BILLER, a lad of thirteen, was rowing down the Passaic River, near Rutherford Park, one summer day in 1877, when he saw a flat-bottomed boat with four girls in it struck by another boat containing three boys. The collision stove in the side of the scow, and tipped over the boat, so that both parties were thrown in the water. Quick as thought Biller threw off his coat—he had been bathing, and his shoes were already off—and jumped in after the girls. His companions were younger than he, and too terrified to do anything but sit in the boat and stare.

Two of the girls were about his own age, and the others a year younger. Biller himself was used to swimming, and, grasping two of the girls, he struck out for the shore which was 150 feet away. Reaching it in safety, he left his freight, and went for the others, who were still struggling in the water. Some boatmen had meanwhile gone to the rescue of the boys who had caused the accident, and one of these caught one of the remaining girls, while Biller saved the fourth. For this brave exploit, the boy was rewarded with a gold medal from the Humane Society of New York. When, some time afterward, he came to go into business, his courage and manliness were not the least of his recommendations.

The boy or man who does one brave deed very often has the opportunity to do another, and although in the case of Charles Biller the opportunity was delayed six years, he was quick to improve it when it came. One bright day this summer he started from his home in Newark, New Jersey, for a day's excursion to Coney Island, and was walking from Brighton to the Iron Pier, a distance of about a mile.

As he trudged along, Biller saw ahead of him a carriage standing on the sand, and near by a girl, who, as he gazed, suddenly ran down to the water and plunged in. She was not in bathing costume, and the unusual sight excited the lad's wonder and curiosity. At the same moment he saw a gentleman get hurriedly out of the carriage, using a crutch to help him in the descent, and then hobble down to the shore, where he stood waist deep in the surf, wildly waving his hands.

By this time, persuaded that something must be wrong, Biller had run to the spot, and now he saw, far out in the surf, a little head, toward which the girl was bravely swimming. I dare say his thoughts went hurriedly back to the Passaic River, and the day, six years before, when almost the same scene went on before his eyes. But he did not stop to think. Kicking off his shoes and throwing aside his coat, he ran into the surf, dashed by the man, and swam for the girls, the elder of whom had already caught and was buoying up the little one.

"Keep her head above water," Biller called loudly as he drew near the girl, who was as brave and plucky as he.

She managed to do as she was bid, and then Biller directed her to take hold of his shoulders, at the same time leaving his arms free to carry them both inshore. The man meanwhile had dropped his crutch in his excitement, and when Biller, having landed the two girls, looked around, he saw the cripple swept away by the treacherous surf.

It was only the work of a moment to plunge in again; but the man was now as far out as the little girl had been when Biller first saw her, and every moment was carrying him further away. With a few rapid strokes Biller neared him, but, afraid of coming too near, tried to grasp him by the hair. This, however, was too short, and when Biller took hold of the drowning man's neck, the other turned and fastened on the swimmer his deadly clutch. The lad swam as well as he could in the man's terrible grasp, but lost consciousness just as they reached the shore.

In the course of the same afternoon Biller's employer in Newark was shocked by receiving a telegram announcing that the young man had been drowned at Coney Island while courageously endeavoring to save a Mr. Benedict and his little girl, who were perishing in the surf. The father was sent for, and the sad news communicated to him. But before he left the office to convey it to his wife a second message came, reading as follows:

"Don't be alarmed. Was senseless for a time, but am all right again, and on my way home. Had the good luck to save Benedict and two daughters; was rewarded with a diamond ring, gold watch, and other presents.

C. H. BILLER.

Biller's unconsciousness had lasted for half an hour.

When he came to himself he found the gentleman and his daughters anxiously awaiting his revival, and insisting that he should accompany them to their cottage, where he was fitted out with a dry suit of clothes, and overwhelmed with thanks from Mrs. Benedict for the preservation of her husband's and children's lives.

The father pressed upon the lad a sum of money, and when this was declined, compelled Biller to accept the gold watch and chain which he had carried in his own pocket, and a valuable diamond ring, as an expression of his gratitude and regard. These the young man shows to any one who may be interested in the affair, though he does not fancy the publicity it has brought him. "I have had so much said about me lately in the papers, and it was merely an accident," he remarks in a letter I have just received from him, and which I am sure he will pardon me for quoting, for the glimpse that it gives of his character.

Some one, trying to be witty, has said that absence of body is better than presence of mind, but this is the way the coward looks at it. One who is brave will try to be prepared when the danger comes, and will not shrink from meeting it. A little boy in the school panic the other day helped his teacher by dragging other boys, who were trying to escape from the window, back by their legs.

A young lady—I mention this incident for the sake of the girls—was riding horseback near her country home last week, when the animal took fright and ran away. The girl clung to his back, knowing that to be her only chance, though he dashed with terrific speed down a long hill, at the foot of which she knew there was a river and a bridge. The road, moreover, makes a sharp turn just before it reaches the bridge; and when it came to this point she saw to her horror that the horse was headed for a narrow space, not more than three feet wide, between the side of the bridge and a tree.

If he struck either the tree on the one hand or the bridge on the other she would be dragged off and killed, while if he leaped that seemed to invite a more terrible death on the rocks twenty feet below. Still she clung to his back while the horse leaped. He landed, not on the rocks, but in a pool just beyond, and was so hurt by the fall that he had to be shot. The girl escaped without harm, except for the shock to her nervous system. Had she not kept her self-possession and retained her seat on the horse's back, and guided him as well as she was able, she must certainly have been killed.

Had Charles Biller waited to see if some one else would not jump in the water his opportunity for heroism would have been lost. It is the boys and girls who are ready when the opportunity comes that do the gallant deeds and win the prizes in the struggle of life.

A PILLOW FIGHT.

BY JIMMY BROWN.

WE'VE been staying at the sea-shore for a week, and having a beautiful time. I love the sea-shore, only it would be a great deal nicer if there wasn't any sea; then you wouldn't have to go in bathing. I don't like to go in bathing, for you get so awfully wet, and the water chokes you. Then there are ticks on the sea-shore in the grass. A tick is an insect that begins and bites you, and never stops till you're all etup, and then you die, and the tick keeps on growing bigger all the time.

There was once a boy and a tick got on him and bit him, and kept on biting for three or four days, and it etup the boy till the tick was almost as big as the boy had been, and the boy wasn't any bigger than a marble, and he died, and his folks felt dreadfully about it. I never saw a tick, but I know that there are lots of them on the sea-shore, and that's reason enough not to like it.

We staid at a boarding-house while we were at the sea-shore. A boarding-house is a place where they give you pure country air and a few vegetables and a little meat, and I say they give me a jail where they feed you if they do keep you shut up in the dark. There were a good many people in our boarding-house, and I slept upstairs on the third story with three other boys, and there were two more boys on the second story, and that's the way all the trouble happened.

"I NEVER WAS SO FRIGHTENED IN MY LIFE."

There is nothing that is better fun than a pillow fight; that is, when you're home and have got your own pillows, and know they're not loaded, as Mr. Travers says. He was real good about it, too, and I sha'n't forget it, for 'most any man would have been awfully mad, but he just made as if he didn't care, only Sue went on about it as if I was the worst boy that ever lived.

You see, we four boys on the third story thought it would be fun to have a pillow fight with the two boys on the second story. We waited till everybody had gone to bed, and then we took our pillows and went out into the hall just as quiet as could be, only Charley Thompson he fell over a trunk in the hall and made a tremendous noise. One of the boarders opened his door and said who's there, but we didn't answer, and presently he said "I suppose it's that cat people ought to be ashamed of themselves to keep such animals," and shut his door again.

After a little while Charley was able to walk, though his legs were dreadfully rough where he'd seraped them against the trunk. So we crept down-stairs and went into the boys' room, and began to pound them with the pillows.

They knew what was the matter, and jumped right up and got their pillows, and went at us so fierce that they drove us out into the hall. Of course this made a good deal of noise, for we knocked over the wash-stand in the room, and upset a lot of lamps that were on the table in the hall, and every time I hit one of the boys he would say "Ouch!" so loud that anybody that was awake could hear him. We fought all over the hall, and as we began to get excited we made so much noise that Mr. Travers got up and came out to make us keep quiet.

It was pretty dark in the hall, and though I knew Mr. Travers, I thought he couldn't tell me from the other boys, and I thought I would just give him one good whack on the head, and then we'd all run upstairs. He wouldn't know who hit him, and, besides, who ever heard of a fellow being hurt with a pillow?

So I stood close up by the wall till he came near me, and then I gave him a splendid bang over the head. It sounded as if you had hit a fellow with a club, and Mr. Travers dropped to the floor with an awful crash, and never spoke a word.

I never was so frightened in my life, for I thought Mr. Travers was killed. I called murder help fire, and everybody ran out of their rooms, and fell over trunks, and there was the most awful time you ever dreamed of. At last somebody got a lamp, and somebody else got some water and picked Mr. Travers up and carried him into his room, and then he came to, and said "Where am I Susan what is the matter O now I know."

He was all right, only he had a big bump on one side of his head, and he said that it was all an accident, and that he wouldn't have Sue scold me, and that it served him right for not remembering that boarding-house pillows are apt to be loaded.

The next morning he made me bring him my pillow, and then he found out how it came to hurt him. All the chicken bones, and the gravel-stones, and the chunks of wood that were in the pillow had got down into one end of it while we were having the fight, and when I hit Mr. Travers they happened to strike him on his head where it was thin, and knocked him senseless. Nobody can tell how glad I am that he wasn't killed, and it's a warning to me never to have pillow fights except with pillows that I know are not loaded with chicken bones and things.

I forgot to say that after that night my mother and all the boys' mothers took all the pillows away from us, for they said they were too dangerous to be left where boys could get at them.

"MOTHER'S DEAR COMFORT."

BY MARY D. BRINE.

THE kitchen is clean and cozy,
And bright with the sunshine gay,
And "Mother's dear Comfort" for mother's sake
Is busily working away
Paring potatoes, and thinking
"It's humdrum work to do;"
But little Miss Comfort is willing and quick,
And the sunbeams are helping her through.

For mother is sick and is sleeping,
And baby is quiet at last;
And father 'll be wanting his dinner soon,
The minutes are flying so fast.
Oh, she knows he will kiss her, and love her,
And call her his "Busy Bee";
But mother's pet name is the truest of all,
For "Mother's dear Comfort" is she.

THE KING OF THE MONKEYS.

BY EDWARD I. STEVENSON.

I.

OVER the narrow plain of Gelloor, which extends through a portion of the Punjab, the thick-sown rice and maize fields waved. The morning breeze was fresh, and stirred lightly the waters of the winding little Gelloor River. Curious bright-colored birds squawked and waded through the shallows. In the far distance sharp blue peaks could be seen.

An ugly yellow snake lay flat on a clump of river-grass. It had its eye upon a giddy young parouquet that was taking a dip but a few yards beyond its reach. The slimy body of the snake glided between the grass roots; nearer and nearer its hideous head drew to the luckless parouquet. But lo! just as his snakeship drew himself together for the fatal dart, down came a thick stick, the blow from which broke the reptile's backbone and sent him to writhe in the water. The little parrot flew off in terror. A slender dark-skinned lad of perhaps ten years sprang up from his hiding-place with a triumphant cry, "Wicked serpent, you will kill no more birds!" And little Rham Puggee hit the thick yellow body another hard blow with his stick, which completely finished the snake's business forever.

Poor little Rham! It was not often now that he had as much variety in his hard life as killing a snake. In fact, he had nearly rid his master's land of them.

Rham's master was a ráyat, hard-working, and very bad-tempered. He had bought little Rham, like a slave, from a band of strolling vagabonds. He fancied he could make the boy useful in tending the crops for him.

It was a hard life, but Rham endured it as well as he could, working all day in the hot sun, and dropping down at night-fall, like a dog, upon his coarse mat, to sleep until sunrise. He could remember nothing of himself before the days of his gypsy friends, not even whether he had really belonged to any of them.

Sometimes when the lad was sent by Jheer Narry, his master, to the village, a mile or two away, on an errand, and happened to see a group of brown-skinned boys of his own age playing around the great tank together, or sitting at the feet of a priest learning wisdom, Rham sighed. "I do not care about the playing," he thought; "I should not know how. But I would like to learn to read and write, and have a chance to become somebody better than the slave of a ráyat like Jheer Narry."

One day he ventured to say something of his ambitions to the ráyat. Jheer Narry struck him two or three hard strokes with a rattan, and laughed aloud as he scoffingly answered, "Wretched little pig, without a friend in the world but me, what business has such as you to think of aught except my maize fields? Away with you!"

Rham worked on carefully for an hour, cutting off with a sharp knife the ears of maize which were touched by a disease that threatened the whole crop. At the end of that time he found that he would have to hunt out Jheer Narry to ask him a question or two. He walked down the long rows of maize. The field was not small. As he drew near to the corner of it he suddenly heard Jheer Narry's harsh tones.

"Ah, let me catch them at it—let me catch them at it!" the riyat was shouting hoarsely.

Jheer Narry stood, waving his arms excitedly, on the farthest edge of the plot. Rham could see that for many yards around the maize stalks had been uprooted, trampled down, and crushed to splinters. Hundreds of ears seemed to have been plucked off and then carried away, leaving only a few dozen that still strewn the earth among tangles of leaves and roots.

"The monkeys—the odious, wicked robbers!" stormed Jheer Narry. "They it is who have been here since yesterday. They must have trooped down from the great banyan grove last night on purpose to destroy my field of maize."

Jheer Narry continued walking out in fresh rage as he observed the amount of mischief the long-tailed robbers had brought about in perhaps not more than an hour.

"May the wicked thieves perish!" he cried again and again. "They came to visit me in just this way years ago. How they love to tear up and steal the corn before it is hard!"

"See you to it that it does not chauce again," said Bhat Gee, the friend of the enraged riyat. "They will come in greater numbers the next time—perhaps that will be to night. You should have your maize field watched, Jheer Narry."

"And indeed I shall have it so," replied Jheer Narry. "This little good-for-nothing pest who stands staring shall lie on a mat here with a cudgel to drive the thieves off. I shall be ruined by them. They have learned the way; they are sure to return."

Rham was startled at the idea of filling the post of watchman after this fashion.

"But, master, suppose they enter the field at some other spot? How shall I hear them? And, besides that, there are wild beasts prowling—"

"Be still, torment that you are!" interrupted Jheer Narry. "I neither know nor care how you will be able to keep these thieves out; but woe to your skin if you let them root up and pull off in one corner while you are pretending to do your duty in another!"

II.

The yellow moon was up. The night wind, cold as it ever is in the Punjab, tossed about the river-grasses and the rustling maize fields. Wrapped up in a castaway cotton robe of Jheer Narry, Rham squatted flat upon an old mat a good distance within the shadow of the uninjured maize, and where he could have a good view of the late scene of the monkeys' mischief-making. Poor lad! He was very tired.

"I shall have to lie here quietly," he said to himself, "and hope that if the monkeys do come back to-night they will choose this same spot for stealing. If they get into the maize elsewhere, why, I must bear my beating as best I can. If I could only tell the monkeys what I must suffer for their wicked tricks, I wonder if they would pull up the maize? The priests say that they are like gods, and understand many things. Oh!" exclaimed the boy, struck by a sudden trouble, "my master did not tell me, but suppose these should be sacred monkeys from the temple! Jheer Narry said something about a banyan grove. If they are such, I shall do wrong to try to keep them away. Did not I hear Bhat Gee once say that a man will die who does not let them always do what they please? Ah, what shall I do?" continued poor little Rham. "I dare not even frighten them lest the gods who love them injure me or ruin all the maize with a charm. My master is a wicked man."

Rham thought so hard and long that presently his ideas became strangely blurred. He nodded, and drooped over, and presently lay flat on the mat, with his cotton cloth pulled over him, fast asleep.

Most marvellous to tell, not ten minutes after the exhausted lad's breathing had become regular, a something black skipped nimbly up from the other side of the rude fence, and stood there listening. Another black agile form followed. Rham was motionless, but the presence of some unseen enemy was suspected, and the plunderers were wondrously careful to make little noise. Gradually there began a rustling, leaping, and skipping, and then a subdued chattering. Over the low fence a dozen, two dozen, three dozen of the long-tailed scamps flung themselves. How could Rham sleep, clear back there in the gloom, weary as he was? Others approached boldly. Scores of the plunderers descended, and keeping well out of the way of Rham, glided down the field to a new point of attack. Innumerable heads and tails poured over that roughly twisted and tied fence, and darted like cats past the spot where some of the oldest and wickedest uncles in the horde had discovered Rham's small person, and given proper warning. Not until the wary visitors were fifty yards below Rham's seat the mischief began. Down came the maize stalks, off went the toothsome ears. The little monkeys laid hold of their fathers' tails, and pulled with them.

Altogether the business of the expedition was getting well under way, and no small mischief had been already once more done to Jheer Narry's crop, when, presto! a flying little human figure came running toward them, beating about with a stick, and shouting:

"I will not look at you to see if you are sacred monkeys. I do not wish to know, I tell you. My master sends me. I beg you to forgive me."

Whish! dash! away flew the terrified army, caught in the act. Rham could not help discovering, as he rushed toward them in the moonlight, that they were the sacred monkeys, as he had feared. Hence came his last requests for pardon. He had no need to strike one blow, though he would not have done so. The corn was dropped; the babies were seized by paws and tails, and pulled along; a tremendous screeching and chattering arose and passed away with the fleeing host. At length nothing but a faint murmur borne upon the night air from the road leading to the banyan groves could Rham hear. The field of maize was still as if undisturbed. Rham trembled with excitement.

But there lay the trampled and spoiled stalks and ears. Enough to cost Rham the promised beating to-morrow. Just then something very warm and soft touched the boy's bare foot. Rham started and looked down. It was a very young, a very tiny monkey, perhaps only a few days old. It was too young, indeed, to be afraid of a human being. It plainly was shivering with the cold where its mother had lost hold of it. Rham bent down, examined the small creature, and finally took it up in his arms. An idea struck him. The bewildered little monkey made no effort to escape from the warm breast that sheltered it.

"I shall be beaten," said Rham to himself, "for to-night—yes; but I will try not to have the corn robbed again, and so be beaten worse another time. I dare not hurt the sacred monkeys. So I will go now to the banyan grove and ask a priest from the temple that is sure to be there to speak for me to the King of the Monkeys. The priests understand their tongue, I think. And I will ask the priest to tell the King of the Monkeys that Rham Puggee, the servant of Jheer Narry, brings back one of his black people, and that he has not hurt it; and that this same Rham Puggee begs, because of his bringing the monkey back, and out of kindness to him, and to save him from being often beaten very cruelly, that the King of the Monkeys will command his people not to come again to do harm to the fields of Jheer Narry.

III.

Not long after sunrise the next day the gate in the wall before an old temple in a large banyan grove, about a mile from Jheer Narry's plantation, opened. Out came, not a priest, but a young English officer, dressed in an Indian hunting costume. He had started for a morning stroll with his gun.

Captain Cecil was a good deal startled by nearly falling over a sleeping Hindoo boy. Much to his surprise, the boy seemed to hold, nestling with great good-will against his bosom, a remarkably tiny monkey. The monkey also slept.

Poor Rham had reached what he supposed was his journey's end only to find the gate leading to temple and grove locked. He had not counted upon that. He therefore sat down before it, in the cold moonlight, to rest before setting out on his return to Jheer Narry's fields. The lad was sadly discouraged.

"Halloa, here!" cried Captain Cecil, starting back in surprise. "Who in the world are you? and what are you doing here so early this morning? Are you in trouble, youngster?" The questions were repeated in Rham's own musical language. Rham contrived to make answer, and finally Captain Cecil drew out the whole history of his life with Jheer Narry, and of his night's adventure, ending with his intention to implore the good-will of the King of the Monkeys. Captain Cecil laughed as he listened; but the story was a sad one of ill-treatment and heathen folly after all, and the young man's face was sober ere Rham was done.

"Look here," he said, "I think I can help you, my poor boy. I can not take you to the King of the Monkeys; I do not believe any one about here can. This old temple has been a government depot these many years, and all the priests of your queer religion that lived here have moved to some other big temple not far away. But I will ask my friends here, who are all Englishmen, to help me buy you from this cruel master of yours. If you will, you shall stay here and make yourself useful; and if you prove worthy of good treatment, why, you shall be helped all the more."

Rham's story, as Captain Cecil repeated it at breakfast in the mess room, found sympathy. If any distrusted the boy's tale, his simple air and the pathos of his dark eyes won them over. Captain Cecil rode down to Jheer Narry's fields, and came back, having bought Rham Puggée—that is, as much as any Englishman can buy a human creature. Rham never set eyes upon Jheer Narry more. The regiment was ordered away to Madras a few days after, and before many weeks were over Rham set out for England with his master, Captain Cecil. The captain did not intend to remain long at home, but he found that he must; and Rham staid, and was presently sent to an English school. Bright and eager to learn, he advanced until his master saw that Rham could never be kept a mere servant, nor did he wish to so keep him.

Years passed, and by every means he could grasp Captain Cecil helped Rham on his upward career until Rham could help himself. He became an educated, Christianized, successful young merchant in the India trade before Captain Cecil's head grew gray. Who would have supposed that all this was the result of the attacks of the monkeys on Jheer Narry's maize field, and of Rham's effort to save himself from a beating by having an interview with the King of the Monkeys?

"THE UPS AND DOWNS OF LIFE."

THE CAPTURED FLAGS:
 A STORY OF THE CANARY ISLANDS.
 BY DAVID KER.

THERE are few prettier places in the world than the Canary Islands. All over the bold ridges that surge up one beyond the other in endless succession dainty little white villas and tiny clusters of cane huts are scattered broadcast among the dark masses of tropical foliage that cover the hills to the very top. Between the purple mountains and the smooth, shimmering sea the low, flat-roofed, white-walled houses of the little town of Santa Cruz

(Holy Cross) straggle over the narrow strip of level ground like a half-finished game of dominoes; while high over all the magnificent Peak of Teneriffe, with its huge dark green pyramid and sharp white summit, rises far up against the cloudless brightness of the deep blue sky.

"What d'ye think of that, Bill?" said one of a party of sailors who had just landed from an English frigate. "Didn't I tell yer as you'd see some'at here worth looking at?"

"It's a grand place," assented Bill; "but think o' this here little biscuit-box having the cheek to call itself a town! I'm a Frenchman if it don't look as silly as a ha'porth o' treacle in a two-gallon jug. If I was a mountain, I wouldn't stand a thing like that holdin' on to me, like a barnacle to a ship's keel; I'd just give myself a shake, and send it rolly-poly down into the sea."

"True enough," said another of the party. "Who'd ever think as how that little place could ha' stood out agin Nelson himself, and beat him off too!"

"Beat off Nelson?" cried the man beside him, fiercely. "What fool's yarn's that as you're a-spinnin'? D'ye think there's any place on earth as could beat off him? Why, he'd ha' took Gibraltar Roek itself, he would, if it hadn't been British ground already."

"Sam's right, though, for all that," struck in a hard-faced old quartermaster. "I don't say it's any disgrace to the old flag, boys, that fifty men couldn't whip five hundred; but it's true enough that Nelson did get beat off from there, and lost his right arm into the bargain."

A smothered growl broke from the listening blue-jackets.

"And what's more, Jack my hearty, they took a couple of Union-jacks from us in that scrimmage, and they've got 'em hung up in that old church yonder, where I see'd them with my own eyes some three years ago."

"What? British flags captured by them Spanish lubbers?" cried Jack Hartley. "I don't believe that, even though it's you as says it."

"Well, my boy," answered the veteran seaman, coolly, "seem's believing, they say. It ain't far to the church, and you can just step up there and see for yourself."

"Now hark ye, my mates all," cried Jack, turning to the rest with a stern light in his bold blue eyes. But the words which followed were spoken in a whisper, though they seemed to have a very exciting effect upon all who heard them.

"I'm game for it," said one, squaring his brawny chest with a business-like air.

"And I."

"And I."

"You'll get us into trouble, Jack," said the old quartermaster, shaking his gray head; "but if it's got to be done you won't catch old Tom Crossrose skulking."

"Come along, then, my hearties," sang out Jack; and the tars, closing up, tramped steadily up the steep narrow street to the church door, and entered in a body.

Two or three of them looked rather blank on seeing that there were a good many people in the church; but old Tom, now that he was fairly in the business, seemed as much in earnest as any one, and was instantly ready with a word of encouragement.

"Never mind, boys. If it comes to a fight, one blue-jacket's a match for three Spaniards any day."

The old sexton, knowing by experience how freely sailors scattered their money, hurried forward to receive his new guests, and began pointing out to them the picturesque carving of the roof, the holy images along the walls, the various offerings placed around them by pious Spaniards, and last but not least the two captured Union-jacks.

He had just opened his mouth to tell the story of their capture, when a gag was thrust into it by Jack Hartley's brawny hand, while the old quartermaster pinioned his arms from behind. Two others snatched from the wall the dusty, moth-eaten flags which they had come to re-see, and then the whole party made a rush for the door.

But the scuffle had attracted attention, and while some of the native visitors ran out to give the alarm, the rest attempted to hold the doorway, and keep the English from getting out. A few knock-down blows, however, from the sledge-hammer fists of the sailors soon cleared a passage; but meanwhile the alarm had spread, and when the party burst out of the church they found the whole street blocked up by an infuriated mob yelling for vengeance upon the "sacriligious heretics."

And now the fight began in earnest. Showers of stones, mud, and decayed fruit darkened the air. In front the crushing blows of the tars bore down all opposition, but the throng gave way there only to press more fiercely on their rear with clubs, stones, and even knives. More than one serious wound had been given on either side, and the bugle call from the garrison warned the English that the soldiers would soon be upon them likewise, when the crowd parted suddenly, giving passage to their own first lieutenant and thirty seamen armed with cutlasses.

"Come, my lads," cried the officer, "give back those flags, and let's have done with this. It would be too bad to grudge these poor beggars one trophy, when we've got so many of theirs; and even if they'd taken fifty flags they can't rub out St. Vincent and Trafalgar."

The last words hit just in the right place. The men answered with a hearty cheer, and restoring the flags, filed down to the shore without another word.

"Who were the ringleaders in this business, Mr. Seaforth?" asked the English Captain half an hour later, trying hard to look very stern.

"I'd rather you didn't ask me, sir, if you'll excuse me, for if I'd been one of them, I really think I'd have done the same myself."

But what the Captain thought we shall never know. He was silent for a while, and when he did speak it was about something else.

NOTE.—This story was told me rather confusedly by the old sailor; but the main statements, as far as I can learn, are correct.—D. K.

CHAPTER XXVI.

HOMEWARD BOUND.

WITHIN two hours after the shipwrecked party were on the Pearl all the mischief wrought by the storm had been repaired, save in the case of the tender, and she could not be made thoroughly serviceable again until the proper tools and material could be procured.

When Captain Sammy had patched her up with gum and flannel it was only with the idea that she might be used for taking them back to the Pearl again. He knew very well that she would not be serviceable for a longer time than that would occupy, and when, everything else being done, the little tender was pulled on board the Pearl, it did not require a very careful examination to see that it would not be safe to venture in her again.

"We can't land again, boys, unless at some place where we can run the steamer right up to the bank, for it would be worse than fool-hardy to attempt to get any distance in this boat, especially in waters where the alligators are as plenty as they are around here."

The boys were rather disappointed when they realized that their hunting trips were over; but they did not understand that the loss of that pleasure was not all that the wrecking of the boat meant for them, until Captain Sammy said:

"And if you can't go on shore we shall be sadly put to it for provisions. We shall be obliged to eat fish three times a day, and I reckon you'll get rather tired of that kind of a diet before long."

"But what can we do?" asked Dare.

Then it became evident from his reply that Captain Sammy had been leading the conversation up to the point where such a question would necessarily be asked, for he replied, quickly:

"I'll tell you what I think we'd better do, and then you can decide matters to please yourselves, for I'm willing to go or stay, just as you say. It's settled that we can't land here unless we keep steam up all the time, and that we can hardly do, on account of coal. Now it will get lonesome after you've been shut up on the boat a few days, so I propose that you go on shore for a grand hunting excursion to-morrow, and that we lay still the next day, of course, for it is Sunday. On Monday we will start for the sponge fisheries, where some of my vessels are, and from there go home. In Tampa we can get our boat fixed, fit the Pearl out anew, and then start for the Florida reefs. What do you say?"

Since returning to Tampa did not mean giving up the cruise, but simply making two installments of it, the boys readily agreed to the little man's plan, and began overhauling and cleaning their guns preparatory to the next day's hunt.

Some fishing was done over the rail that afternoon, not for the sake of the sport, but that they might have food; and when the party went to bed at night there was not one among them who felt sorry he was so soon to leave the Everglades.

On the following morning there was a light breeze setting toward the land, and Captain Sammy concluded to allow the little craft to drift in to the shore rather than go to the trouble of getting up steam; but he took very good care to let go the anchor some distance from the beach, paying out the cable till her bow struck the beach, so that she could be hauled out to a safer anchorage at night.

His orders to the sailors-turned-hunters were that they should not go into the woods more than a quarter of a mile at the most, and that under no circumstances were they to follow any wounded animal more than a hundred yards.

Not being particularly in search of large game, the boys were perfectly willing to obey the commands which were given with a view to their own safety, and their hunting that day was chiefly directed to getting more specimens of the feathered tribe to add to their already rather large collection.

But Dare was careful to see that their larder was provided for, and he bagged quite as much game as could be eaten before it would spoil, after which he joined the others in their search for rare birds.

During the entire day the hunting match was kept up, the boys going on board the steamer once or twice for the purpose of carrying their game, or of getting something to eat, and when night came they were quite tired enough to go to sleep as soon as they had rolled into their berths.

The next day, which was Sunday, was spent quietly on the steamer, Captain Sammy talking to them in a way which was as impressive as any sermon they had ever heard.

Bright and early Monday morning Charley was up and in the engine-room, and by seven o'clock the paddles of the Pearl began to revolve as she started on the home-ward trip.

Down through the narrow stream leading from Lake Okechobee to Lake Kackpochee the steamer glided, and if the tender had been in condition to use, the boys would have pleaded hard for one day on the smaller lake, so much more cheerful-looking did it seem than the vast body of water on which they had been so long.

The first day's journey ended about five o'clock in the afternoon, when the yacht came to anchor a short distance below Fort Deynaud, and after supper all hands went into the standing-room, as had come to be their custom at the close of each day.

After they had been there a short time Captain Sammy pulled out of his pocket a small piece of printed paper, which was very much crumpled and soiled.

"There," he said, as he handed it to Dare—"there is a piece about sponges that I cut out of an old book I found, an' I want you to read it aloud, so's you an' your mess-mates will know all about what they're goin' to see, an' won't be worrying the life out of me asking questions."

Dare took the printed slip in silence—for he had learned that it was better not to argue with Captain Sammy, even when he appeared to be unjust—and read the article, as he had been told to do, while the little man smoked and stroked his chin with evident satisfaction.

This is what Dare read:

"The kind of sponges that are fit for use are found in the seas of warm climates. Two species are brought from the Levant, and a very inferior one from the West Indies and coast of Florida. The trade in sponges is very considerable, and is carried on chiefly by the Turks and the inhabitants of the Bahama Islands. The number of men employed in the Ottoman sponge fishery is between 4000 and 5000, forming the crews of about six hundred boats. These boats find their chief employment on the coasts of Candia, Barbary, and Syria. Here the sponge is obtained by divers, who take down with them a flat piece of stone of triangular shape, with a hole drilled through one of its corners. To this a cord is attached. When a diver reaches the growing sponges, he tears them off the rocks, and places them under his arms; he then pulls at the cord, which gives the signal to his companions in the boat to draw him up.

"The value of sponges collected in Greece and Turkey is from $450,000 to $500,000 annually. The Greeks of the Morea, instead of diving, obtain sponges by a pronged instrument; but the sponges thus collected are torn, and sell at a low price. The best sponges are obtained from detached heads of rock in eight or ten fathoms of water. The sponges from the Bahamas and the Florida coast are of a larger size and coarser quality. They are torn from the rocks by a fork at the end of a long pole. To rid them of the animal matter, they are buried for some days in the sand, and then soaked and washed."

"There," said Captain Sammy, when Dare had finished reading, "I could have told you all that just as well as for you to read it; but now you've got it just as it was writ down, an' if it ain't right you can't be throwin' it in my teeth that I don't know nothing."

Then Captain Sammy relapsed into a moody silence, looking as if no amount of coaxing or persuasion could thaw him out, for fully ten minutes. At the end of that time he began to tell stories, only stopping when it was absolutely necessary they should go to bed.

Just before they retired Captain Sammy announced that he was anxious to anchor in Charlotte Harbor the next night, so that they could reach the sponge fishers at an early hour Wednesday morning.

To do this it would be necessary to begin their preparations for the start as soon as it was light enough to admit of their working.

It hardly seemed to the boys as if they had been in bed ten minutes when Captain Sammy called them next morning; but they got up, regardless of their desire for another nap, and the result of their early rising was that they swung around the point of Boca Grande Key just at sunset.

THE BOYS ADDING TO THEIR STOCK OF CURIOUS BIRDS.

The yacht had been kept running at full speed all day, and, as a natural consequence, each one of the boys had been obliged to work so hard that he had not the slightest desire to visit the picturesque little town on the key.

They retired at once, and the start for the sponging grounds was made at nearly as early an hour on the following morning, each one on the alert to see this strange fishery, where a marine plant was the kind of fish sought for.

HOW TO MAKE A CAGE FOR WHITE MICE.

BY W. G. CAMPBELL.

TO make a cage with sleeping-boxes in the upper part and a ladder for the mice to ascend and descend by is by no means difficult nor expensive. It is very pleasant to watch the little inhabitants climbing up and down and running in and out of the holes in their upstairs rooms, and to see them swinging about in their boat-swings. And after one or two days they do not seem at all to wish to get out or to gnaw their bars, as many mice do if confined in a narrow space. I will first give a list of the materials and their cost, and then proceed to describe how the cage is to be made:

Thick wire	Cents.	Emery-paper	Cents.
Thin wire	10	Handle	2
Zinc	2	Screws for handle	6
Perforated zinc	16	Iron bar	1
Hinges	2	Screws for iron bar	12
Screws for hinges	5	Total	73
Staples	4	Without handle and bar	53
Brads	2
Tacks	6
	4

These articles can be readily obtained at any hardware store, except the emery-paper; that is to be bought at a paint store. The thick wire should be about as thick as a thin knitting-needle; the other wire, as it is for binding purposes, should be as thin as possible; so also should the zinc; the hinges ought to be about an inch long. The iron bar will be described hereafter.

The following are the sizes and descriptions of pieces of wood for a cage eighteen inches long by thirteen inches high and ten inches deep:

FRAME-WORK.
A	11	by 18	inches. Bottom.
B	10	" 12 1/2	" " Ends
B	10	" 12 1/2	" " Ends
C	5	" 18	" " Front half of cover.
D	3 1/2	" 18	" " Upper half of back.
SLEEPING-BOXES.

The wood should be one-half inch thick.

First of all, the pieces B B should be nailed at the ends of A, leaving one inch of A projecting at back, and then from the top of each of them a strip five inches by one-half inch should be cut, so that the piece C can now be nailed to join the ends and form the front half of cover. Across upper half of back we will next nail D. The frame-work is thus finished.

Now let us make the sleeping-boxes. First, we must with a centre-bit bore three holes an inch in diameter in piece F for entrances to nests; then let us nail G and G' on one side of F to divide sleeping-box into three equal compartments; to these we should next nail E, projecting an inch and five-eighths beyond F to form run in front of nests. Two holes should then be bored with a brad-awl near the front edge of this run, opposite middle hole to F, to receive ends of ladder, which will be described hereafter. Next, we must tack a strip of zinc along this run with eight or nine tacks, punching small holes just above those bored with brad-awl; then nail the sleeping-boxes thus made to B B and D as shown in drawing, leaving a slit of one-eighth of an inch between F and back edge of C, through which a piece of zinc four by seventeen inches is to be slipped, to keep the mice in their boxes while cleaning out the cage. The ends, bottom, and large door should then be lined with zinc inside, leaving a space of half an inch all round front of cage, where the wires are to come; and just under the holes bored in the run outside the sleeping-box punch two others the same distance apart in the zinc which lines the bottom; these are to hold the lower spikes of the ladder. The zinc should be tacked down as well in the middle as at the edges, having holes punched in it for the tacks to go through.

Now bore holes a quarter of an inch apart along C, and same in but not through A, about a quarter of an inch from front edge of each; then cut off from your wire enough pieces twelve inches and three-quarters long to go through these holes, which will be about sixty-eight in number. Let the wood of A be about half an inch thick or a little more, so that the wires can have as much hold in it as possible. Straighten your wires, emery-paper them, and push them through the top holes, and bring them down to the corresponding ones in the bottom; then fix two longitudinal wires from B to B across the front of the others, and bind these upright wires to them with the pliant wire.

Hinge the doors to D, as shown in drawing, and splay front edge of each of small doors K, K, and K', and top edge of F, so that these doors may shut closely. Each small door should also have a hole made with the centre-bit in the middle, and a piece of perforated zinc should be tacked over them inside to ventilate the nests.

We now come to the ladder. Get two pieces of wood eight inches and three-quarters long by a quarter of an inch broad, and a quarter of an inch thick, and make holes every half inch along them, and in each end of them bore a hole, and drive a piece of thick wire five-eighths of an inch long in all these end holes, leaving three-eighths of an inch projecting from top ends and a quarter of an inch from bottom; then break off enough pieces an inch long to go into remaining holes of one of your sticks, and drive them in, but not so as to come through the other side; then drive the other ends into the remaining stick, and your ladder is finished. The boat-swings can be easily made in the same manner after looking at drawing, and fastened at the top of the wire that they are hung by with two staples to floor of sleeping-box. The fastenings can be made from staples, those marked a for large door, and b for small doors; the hooks of a should be put a little lower than the middle of large door, and the catches in ends of cage.

Now if you are going to have a handle, get as small an iron one as will comfortably lift your cage, and screw it on to C, as near sleeping-boxes as possible; then as you will find the sleeping-box side will be the heavier, you might get a bar of old iron eighteen inches long, between one-fourth of an inch and three-eighths of an inch thick, and broad enough to make your cage weigh equally. Have three holes drilled in it, and screw it underneath the cage in front.

When mice are first put in such a cage as I have described, the ladder appears steep for them, but they soon get used to it, and reach their nests in two or three bounds from the floor.

"SHIP AHOY!"—DRAWN BY H. P. WOLCOTT.

ABOUT EARNING MONEY.

SOME of the boys have written to the Postmistress asking her to tell them how they may earn a little money during vacation. One bright-eyed little man—George R., Jun., is his name—has solved the problem for himself. He has a boat called the Pocahontas, and as his home is near a favorite summer resort, visited during the season by numbers of people from the city, he rows passengers across a certain little stream at five cents a trip. He intends to buy a pony with his money when he shall have earned enough to pay for one. I will not tell you where George lives, but it is not at all improbable that among my young friends there may be a half-dozen who, before vacation is over, may take a seat in the pretty Pocahontas, and have my brave little lad die for their ferryman.

Another boy of my acquaintance, who expected a year or two ago to spend his vacation wholly in town, asked his father's permission to learn something about business life in the ten weeks before school should re-open. He sought and found a place in an office, and pleased his employers so well by his promptness and intelligence that when he had been graduated they at once gave him a permanent situation.

But I want to tell you about Hal W. and his sister Bessie. They wanted ever so much to go to the mountains (this summer), and weeks ago they asked their mother if she would give her consent. She shook her head rather sadly.

"Where is the money to come from, my dears?" Bessie knew, if Hal did not, that there was no money to spare. Mrs. W. paints pictures, and is sometimes paid very well for them, and sometimes, alas! the pictures do not find purchasers.

"If you and Bessie can manage to earn enough to pay your own expenses, you may go to Wild-rose-ville in August," said the mother.

Now some children would have said, "What's the use of trying?" Not so Bessie and Hal, who are young Americans, and have plenty of pluck and persistence. They shook all the pennies out of their savings-banks and counted them, and added to their sum several silver pieces which had been given them about the Fourth of July by uncles and cousins to invest in torpedoes. They had not wasted a penny on torpedoes, and when they footed up their wealth it amounted to three dollars. With this Bessie went a good many yards of strong brown gingham of a close-checked pattern. After she brought it home you might have heard a sewing-machine singing a merry tune. As its little needle flew up and down the seams it seemed to say, with its quick elick, elick, click,

Hal and Bess are going, I guess.
Up the beautiful mountains.
Where the streamlets flow, where the green ferns grow.

In the spray of the snowy fountains.
Hal and Bess, they mean, I guess.
Although it is very funny,
To pay their way, on a summer day,
With their own bright golden money.

I see that you are puzzling your brains over the wonder what my dark-eyed Bessie was making, while Hal danced a jig as each finished thing was neatly folded and laid away in a flat basket. As you never will find out, I will tell you. She made a dozen aprons such as working-men wear to protect their clothing from soil and dust, and when they were done Hal took the basket on his arm, and went to a great building, where he saw men employed, some in one way and some in another, and there he offered the aprons for sale. He asked a quarter of a dollar apiece for them, and he sold the dozen in an hour. Bessie went on making and Hal went on selling these useful aprons to men who were glad of the chance to buy them, until they had disposed of no less than two hundred.

Another girl who wanted money, not for herself, but for charity, to bestow on some poor children who were in great need, went every day for a month to read the newspaper and the Bible to an old lady whose eyes were failing, but who wanted to hear the Psalms and chapters she loved, and also to know what was going on in the world. The lady paid her liberally for her trouble.

There is a boy who writes a wonderfully good clear hand, almost equal to engraving. His name is Ambrose. He is in request among the ladies who know him, to write their names on their visiting-cards.

Other boys earn money with their printing-presses, or by weeding in the neighbors' gardens, going errands, or lending a hand generally.

If you wish to be of use, you must keep on the lookout in your own neighborhood. Above all things, be punctual, steady, and honest, showing that you are worthy of trust.

I have a great deal of respect for such a little girl as Cassie R. (ten years old), who picked berries all through the long hot days of last summer, sold them, and thus earned the money to subscribe for HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, which she wanted so much that she was willing to work for it.

Honor to willing workers! Though I say this, I do not want any of my boys or girls to think that in itself the pursuit of money is a very grand thing, that purpose be unselfish. Professor Agassiz once said, when urged to lay aside his scientific pursuits and engage in lecturing, so that he might secure a fortune, "I have no time to make money." Everybody honored him for feeling that his life-work was above mere gain or loss.

Now I think you will agree with me that you have had a long epistle, and that it is time for me to sign myself your loving friend,

THE POSTMISTRESS.

BARTON, GEORGIA.

I have vacation now, and mother keeps me busy setting hens and hunting eggs. We have two little calves—one named Jim, and the other that purpose be unselfish. Professor Agassiz once said, when urged to lay aside his scientific pursuits and engage in lecturing, so that he might secure a fortune, "I have no time to make money." Everybody honored him for feeling that his life-work was above mere gain or loss.

Now I think you will agree with me that you have had a long epistle, and that it is time for me to sign myself your loving friend,

R. S.

DANVILLE, IOWA.

I have read many nice little letters in the Post-office box. I wrote a letter once, but it was not printed, and now I will try again. One of my nice letters was from a boy who wrote for a birthday present last year, and I like it very much. Another one of my aunts gave me an old hen and fifteen little chickens, and when I first saw the chickens, I had a piece of paper pinned on the coop, pretending to be a letter from the little chickens, but it was a piece of poetry that my aunt composed for me, which I send you, hoping you will publish it with my letter.

FRENZ II.

We are only little chickens, so very small
And scratch around with thirty feet;
So feed us well, and make us fat,
And let us never see a rat.
The more you feed the more we'll eat,
And scratch around with thirty feet;
We'll pick the bugs out from the grass,
And keep them from the garden-sass.
But long before we grow so big
We'll scare the real rats with my pig.
And ne'er again will I go to rhymes,
So feed us well, and many times.

MONTROSE, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a boy ten years old, and am spending my vacation at a little village near Jones Lake. This is my first letter to YOUR PEOPLE, and I want to surprise my mamma. Now I will tell you about my pets. I have a very nice horse named Max, which is very gentle, and I can ride anywhere with him. I have also a bull-dog named Ben; he is very gentle, but will bark at strangers.

ROBERT A.

CRITCHFIELD GROVE, WISCONSIN.

We have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE two years, and we think it the choicest paper we ever read. I am twelve years old. We used to live in Texas, and almost everything was different with him. I have also a bull-dog named Ben; he is very gentle, but will bark at strangers.

Papa and I went out and picked a dish of dewberries for breakfast. They grow on low vines on the ground; they look like our blackberries here in the North. One time papa was digging sweet potatoes, and he found a centipede which I describe to you. It is a worm eight inches long, and as big around as my forefinger, black on the upper side, and yellow on the under side, and people living there say that its bite is very poisonous.

My sister and I tried a receipt given in YOUR PEOPLE for making rice-pudding. We made it for mamma when she was sick, and she liked it very much. It was very dainty and nice. Thanks for the receipt.

EMMA J. G.

MARSHFIELD, NEW YORK.

I am a boy twelve years old, and have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since the first number, and like the stories very much. I think "Raising the Pearl" is splendid. I live on the Sound, and have a great many nice sail boats. I have one just opposite Long Island, and every night we can see the lights in the light-houses.

HARRY II. F.

NEW YORK CITY.

I would like to send the Little Housekeepers the receipt of a Creek dish we often have, and like very much.

Two cups of tomato juice well strained; two cups of good beef stock; two cups of Italian rice, or, if you can't get that, Carolina rice will do; wash and dry it well; when the tomato juice and beef stock are brought to a boil, add the rice; then add one cup of butter and a little salt and pepper; let it all boil together until it gets quite stiff and dry and the rice is soft; eat it with jelly, or sugar, or nothing at all, just as you like.

I am a little Creek girl, and my name is MARGO G.

P. S.—This dish was originally a Turkish dish, and is called Pilau.

M. G.

LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS.

I think, perhaps, that you would like to have a letter from Lenox, which is situated in the mountains among the Berkshire Hills. Now is the season for laurel, and we have got a great deal already; it is very pretty. It is so pink when it first comes out! It is lovely up here now, and there are a great many people here for the summer. I live here all the year with my papa and mamma. I have two brothers, but they are away at school all winter. I have a pony, and his name is Jack. I ride nearly every day. We have lots of strawberries in our garden. I wish I could send you one, so that you could see how large they are. Your loving little friend

J. B. H.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have never written to you before. Mamma takes the MAGAZINE, and I like it almost as well as my own YOUNG PEOPLE. I read all the articles in it. I liked the one about Wales very much. I have been there. We lived in the little village called Blausteppan. I have often been in the old castle. Mamma and I went up to the highest tower. The people are very nice; the older women wear very high-crowned hats. I have a little sky-terrier; her name is Jessie. Every morning in winter I take her for a walk in Central Park.

MAT S.

OAK GROVE, MARYLAND.

I am fourteen years old, and have never written to YOUR PEOPLE before. I have taken it ever since it was first published, and I like the stories and pictures as splendid. I have two little brothers, named Albee and Raymond, and Raymond is just as sweet as he can be. I have two pets, except a jar of tadpoles that I got when we were little black eggs, although a girl has promised to give me a kitten to take home with me when I go. We live in Baltimore in winter, and papa has rented a place near the city for the summer. In June some of my friends and I went to a grand county for a few weeks, and leaving a money time riding horseback, and so forth.

EMILY B. A.

ST. JOHNS, MICHIGAN.

I am going to write my first letter to the Post-office box. I am a little boy seven years old. My sister Ploy and I take YOUR PEOPLE together. We are cousins of the Postmistress. We live in a pretty place on a point of land, and can see water on nearly all sides of us. I have been going to school since last October, and now I am policeman. In the morning, at six o'clock, there was a Polymorphous Procession of Antiques and Horribles, and at ten a procession of firemen,

JOHNIE M.

CHEROKEE, YARMOUTH.

I am ten years old. My sister began to take YOUR PEOPLE this year, and I have been reading it always love to read the letters in the Post-office Box, and of the stories I think "Raising the Pearl" is the best, and Mr. Thomson's and Jimmy Brown's are the funnest. I have to get, except a large Newfoundland dog, of which I am very fond. I live on a farm. Yesterday was a holiday, to celebrate the first settlement of Yarmouth. In the morning, at six o'clock, there was a Polymorphous Procession of Antiques and Horribles, and at ten a procession of firemen, and in the afternoon, at two, races and games on the Sunday forenoon. But in the evening it was the best. The houses were lighted with wax candles and Chinese lanterns. There was a torch-light procession, headed by the brass band in a chariot.

OLYMPIA, WASH.

I think the letters and Jimmy Brown's stories are very nice. My brother has taken the paper ever since the first number. He had the scarlet fever so long ago, and as I have never had it, I had to stay away from him for five weeks. Mamma staid with him night and day, and she read to him nearly all the pieces in the bound volumes of YORSE PEOPLE. I have a canary-bird named Beauty. I go to the Fifth Ward Public School, and I like it very much. We have arithmetic, geography, grammar, reading, and spelling. I am seven years old.

Dear Mattie forgot to give me her address, which I regret, for this is a nice little letter.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

I am a boy nine years old, and I like YORSE PEOPLE very much. I like the story of "Raising the Pearl," but I don't exactly like a dog, though. This is the first letter I ever sent to your paper. I like to read the letters in the Post-office box, and send much love to the young people who write them.

GEORGE B. CALVERT.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

I have no brothers nor sisters, nor any pets, so I play with my dolls. I would like to join the Little Housekeepers' society, but I don't know how to get a receipt given in this paper; it was very nice. I now send a very nice receipt for bread pudding and for cookies.

BREAD PUDDING.—Moisten with boiling water enough bread to fill a large earthen dish; add one cup of raisins, one cup of sugar, and a cup of well-chopped stuf, some finely chopped citron and mixed spice, 2½ cups of brown sugar, and five eggs well beaten. Bake 1½ hours in a slow oven.

COOKIES.—One cup of sugar, three eggs, just enough flour to roll, half a cup of butter, and one tea-spoonful of yeast powder.

Will some one give me a receipt for jubilee paste?

NANNIE D.

NEBRASKA CITY, NEBRASKA.

I am a little boy seven years old. I have taken HARPER'S YORSE PEOPLE since it was first published, and I love it so much that I can hardly wait until it comes. I like "Raising the Pearl" and the other stories. This is my first letter to the Post-office Box. I can't write very well yet, so my sister is writing for me, but I am telling her what to say.

I haven't any brothers, but I have one little sister ten years old and five big sisters. I have a pig, and two kitties, and lots of little chickens. It is raining to-day, and I can't go out to play. I do like the Postmistress very much, and she writes me nice enough to print. I just love her, and I ever go to New York I am going to see her. I send lots of love and a kiss to her.

WILLIAMS, S. H.

The Postmistress loves all the children, and would always thank them for the nice things that come to her, and she has a nice Post-office Box instead of this one, which has just so many columns, and no more. A kiss to you, Master Willard.

I am a girl who will be twelve years old on the 25th of next August. Mamma is without help just now, and I assist her. This is my first letter, and I hope she will make light bread, and to-morrow I am going to see if I can make it without any help at all. On last Wednesday I made some rice congee, and in a piece of jelly I put cream. Papa ate more than any of us; he likes rice and cream. I want to join the Housekeepers' Society, but the school-teacher says we must not be well enough to go to the final examination, and I will have to be examined when I begin next year.

I have two sisters and one brother, all younger than myself. The day before yesterday a playman and myself built a house in our back yard, and we have a sofa, chair, doll, dolls' bed, and a table and some shelves in it. My two sisters have fixed up the servants' house for their play-room, and we go to visit each other.

C. BESSIE W.

LAFOURCHE CROSSING, LOUISIANA.

I have already written your paper several times, and every week when I receive it I look up the story they let me write, and I find that now I have not seen one of them, so please do me the favor to publish this one.

I have two pet dogs; one is a rat terrier, and the other is a pointer that has gone blind from old age, and he is twelve years old. I have also three pet kittens; their names are Beauty, Twilight, and Tommy. I like your paper very much. I liked "Nan" the best of all the stories. I know how to speak both French and English, and understand German. I send you a receipt for sponge-cake, and hope that it will please you. I bid you good-by.

CLEMENCE L.

SPONGE-CAKE.—Take five eggs, and separate the whites from the yolks; beat the yolks with six spoonfuls of white sugar; then add two spoonfuls of flour and two tea-spoonfuls of yeast powder; beat the whites to a froth, and mix all together; bake in a moderate oven.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl seven years old. I have a canary named Nellie, after my teacher. We mated her with my sister's bird, and she had three little birds, and she has more eggs. I have a dog named, and although the birds were not injured, all the eggs were broken.

NIX M.

Nix's mamma, in a charming postscript, says: "YORSE PEOPLE is a most delightful paper, and has earned the thanks of every mother in the land for the good and useful reading it furnishes both children and parents. May it flourish," she adds, "while there are children to read it!"

FAIRBORN, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl eight years old. I have a beautiful home in the country, eight miles from Athens City, on the Ohio River. I have four little sisters younger than myself, but I have no brothers. I have a dog named Jerry, and a cat named three months old and four cats. I have a beautiful doll; I call her Edith. We had our Commencement last Thursday. Our school is not very large. It is a private school. I am six weeks' school. Mine was called "Beautiful Grandmamma." We had a good many visitors, and we had our dinner out under the trees, and after that music, and we danced and had very nice time all evening.

MARY LOUISE O.

JEFFERSON, INDIANA.

I have never written you a letter, so I thought if you would give a little girl a small place—a very small place—in your Post-office Box, I would write you readily. When papa comes in the house on Wednesday I always ask him if my HARPER'S YORSE PEOPLE has come. So you see I have taken a place in your paper whether you have asked or not. I live in Louisville to school, though I do live in Indiana. We live on the river bank, or at least very near it. I was at school when the flood first came, but papa came after me when it was at its height. I was just within four inches of coming in at our front door. I was in New York last summer a year ago. I did not know you then. If I had, I would surely have stopped to see you. I want to see that dear Postmistress. Will she please tell me what would be a pretty name for a doll? I must stop now, as I am afraid my letter will not be published.

KATIE H.

How would you like Jessica?

ETNA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am twelve years old, and live on a large place here in Western Pennsylvania. I have a cat called Tabby that has four dear little kittens, of which I am very fond. Last winter, a great South-western papa, and his brother Fred, and I enjoyed the trip very much. When we came home we had a big box of curiosities, a little alligator, and a little terrapin. Can any of the readers of YORSE PEOPLE tell me what terrapin eat? The poor little alligator is dead. I have a garden which I take care of myself. I have parsnips, verbena, lady's-slipper, and geranium. I liked "Nan," and I like "Raising the Pearl."

SADIE S.

ETNA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl nearly twelve years old. I have two old Seabright bantams and five young ones. I have a dog named I don't know, and I am going to give my cousin Sadie one, and she is going to give me one of her little kittens. I like "Raising the Pearl" and "Nan" very much. I am spending the day with Sadie S. I have been wishing to write a letter to HARPER'S YORSE PEOPLE for some time, so we thought this was a good opportunity.

MARY L. L.

CADIZ, MICHIGAN.

I was six years old on the 5th of July. Papa and mamma and I went to Traverse City on that day, and returned the next. I sat at the window in the hotel that evening and watched the big steamer coming over Traverse Bay from Grand Haven. The boys were playing football on the street in front of the hotel; it was such fun to watch them.

I have a little dog for a pet; he weighed two pounds and one ounce about three weeks ago; he was five months old then. I found nearly a gobbleful of four and five leaved clover to day. I do not go to school now. I am in Kindergarten now; our teacher is married. I have a little friend who is just the same age that I am. My mamma thought it would be pleasant for me to celebrate our birthdays together, but some of our little friends were sick, and could not attend, so we didn't have any birthday party at all.

ADA E. N. II.

Rose W.: I am sorry that your exchange is not in accordance with our rules. The members of YORSE PEOPLE containing the story of "Mr. Stubb's Brother" will be sent to you by Messrs. Harper & Brothers on receipt of $1.00. For the same amount you may buy the story in a dainty volume by itself.—Katie B.: I hope you will succeed with your dollie in the new costume. A great many little girls are thinking of trying to be dolls' dressmakers this summer.—Minnie B. M.: So two canaries, "stupid little things," and a dog of high degree, whose mother took a prize at the Paris Exhibition, constitute your family of pets? I should have rejoiced to have had both rats chloroformed, had I been you, instead of only one. Their being Chinese rats would have given them no favor in my eyes. I hope when you become a Vassar girl you will still continue fond of the Post-office Box, and as full of fun as at present. Your doll pattern has been sent as requested.—Lora A. S.: I am not surprised that you are discouraged about your exchanges. It is always best to write in advance and receive a receipt, before sending any article. Thanks for your receipts, which appear elsewhere.—Frank D.: I am sorry your bird died.—George H.: It is a great pity to be sick in vacation, and I sympathize with you in the trial. Perhaps by this time you are well again. Ezra D. B.: You are a little chemist. If you try any more experiments, send me word. Perhaps some of the other boys would like to dissolve ten cents' worth of blue-stone in one half-pint of rain-water, making the solution in a stone jar? Then they must drop some common nails into this jar, and leave it for three days, after which they may take a peep to see what change the nails have undergone.

PRINCE LAZYBONES TAKING HIS EASE.

THE ADVENTURES OF PRINCE LAZYBONES.

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS,

AUTHOR OF "PRINCESS IDLEWAYS," "PHIL'S FAIRIES," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

OF all the illustrious families who have shone like gems upon the earth's surface none have been more distinguished in their way than the Lazybones family, and were I so disposed I might recount their virtues and trace their talents from a long-forgotten period; but interesting as the study might prove, it would be a difficult task, and the attention I crave for Prince Leo would be spent on his ancestors.

Of princely blood and proud birth, Leo was a youth most simple-minded. He knew that much was expected of him, and that he was destined to rule, yet so easily was he satisfied that his greatest happiness was to lie all day basking in the sun or dawdling through his father's park with his dog at his heels, the heels themselves in a very down-trodden state of humility, watching with languid gaze the movements of the world about him.

And the world just where he lived was very beautiful. On a fertile plain, surrounded by mountain-peaks of great height, threaded by silver streams, and so well watered that its vegetation was almost tropical, was the estate of Leo's father, Princee Morpheus Lazybones. It had been in the family for ages, and was so rich in timber and mineral resources that none of its owners had cared to cultivate the land. Timber was cut sparingly, however, because the market for it was too distant, and the minerals remained in their native beds for much the same reason.

The family thrived, notwithstanding, and were well supplied with all manner of delicacies, for the servants were many, and there was never a lack of corn or wine.

Leo was most fair to see. To be sure, his drooping lids half concealed his azure eyes, and his golden locks sometimes hid his snowy forehead; but his smile was charming; his face had such an expression of calm satisfaction, such a patient tranquillity, that his smile was as the sudden sunshine on a placid lake. It was the smile of the family, an inherited feature, like the blue blood of a Spanish Don. And then it was given so freely; the beggar would have preferred it to be accompanied with the jingle of a coin, but as the coin never came and the smile did, he tried to think that it warmed his heart, though his wallet went empty.

There were those who said a smile cost nothing, else it would not have been bestowed. It had a peculiarity of its own which these same critics also objected to—it nearly always ended in a yawn.

But Leo heard none of these ill-natured remarks, and if he had would not have minded them any more than he did the burrs which cling to his garments as he rambled through the woods. Poor fellow! he would gladly have shared his coppers with a beggar, but he had none to share.

Morpheus Lazybones never seemed to think his son required anything; so long as the boy made no demands, surely nothing could be wanting, and every one knew he was not equal to any exertion. For years he had lived the life of an invalid, shut up in his room most of the time, venturing out only in the sunniest weather, and then with great caution. He had no particular malady except that he was a poet, but surely that was burden enough. To have to endure the common sights and sounds of this earth when one is composing poetry is indeed a trying and troublesome thing. So Morpheus found it, and therefore he frequently staid in bed, and allowed his fancy to rove at its own sweet will.

They lived in what had been a monastery. There had been houses and farms on the Lazybones property, but the money not being forth-coming for repairs, they had been each in turn left for another in better condition, until the monastery, what was left of it, with its solidly built walls, offered what seemed to be a permanent home.

Here Morpheus lined a cell with tapestries and books, and wrote his sonnets. Here Leo slept and ate, and housed his dogs. The servants grumbled at the damp and mould, but made the chimneys roar with blazing logs, and held many a merry carousal where the old monks had prayed and fasted. The more devout ones rebuked these proceedings, and said they were enough to provoke a visit from the Evil One; but as yet the warning had no effect, as the revels went on as usual.

Besides being a poet, Morpheus was conducting Leo's education. Undertaken in the common way, this might have interfered with the delicate modes of thought required for the production of poems, but the Lazyboneses were never without ingenuity. Morpheus so arranged matters that Leo could study without damage to his father's poems. The books were marked for a month's study, and Leo's recitations consisted of a written essay which was to comprise all the knowledge acquired in that time. Thus writing and spelling were included, and made to do duty for the higher flights of his mind.

I do not tell how often Leo made his returns, neither do I mention how many papers Morpheus found no time to examine, but I may urge that Leo's out-door exercise demanded much attention, and that his father's excursions in Dream-land were equally exacting. But Leo, though he hated books, did not hate information. He knew every feathered thing by name as far as he could see it. He knew every oak and pine and fir and nut tree as a familiar friend. He knew every rivulet, every ravine, every rabbit burrow. The streams seemed to him as melodious as the song-birds, and the winds had voices. He knew where to find the first blossom of spring and the latest of autumn, the ripest fruit and most abundant vines. He could tell just where the nests were and the number of eggs, whether of the robin or the water-fowl. He knew the sunniest bank and shadiest dell, the smoothest path, with its carpet of pine-needles and fringe of fern, or the roughest crag and darkest abyss. He could read the clouds like an open page, and predict fine weather or the coming storm. He knew where the deer couched and where they came to drink, and when the fawns would leave their mothers, and no trout was too cunning for him.

But he did not know the use of a rifle. He had all sorts of lures for the creatures he wanted to tame, but no ways of killing them. For why should he kill them? There was always food enough; he was seldom hungry, and these were his friends. He liked to look them in the eyes; he liked to win them to him, soothe their fears if they had any, and then watch their pretty joy when their liberty was regained. And how could he have done this if their blood had been upon his hands? How could he have quieted the throbbing little hearts if murder had been in his own?

Thus Leo spent his time, delightfully and innocently. If life were only a summer's day! But already winter was approaching. Discontent was brewing on the estate. Taxes were unpaid; tenants were grumbling at high rents; laborers were threatening and their wives complaining.

Frequently, in the very midst of composing a poem, Morpheus would be called to adjust a difficulty, settle a dispute, or revise an account. This so disturbed his delicate nerves that illness, or the appearance of it, was sure to follow. He would then take to his bed, refuse all but a little spiced wine, allowing no coarse food to pass his lips, and strive to remember the beautiful words of which he had intended to make verses; but, alas! the words had flown, as well as the ideas which had suggested them, like so many giddy little butterflies.

CHAPTER II.

The monastery had been a grand old pile in its day; it was not one simple building, but a cluster of habitations which had grown with the growth and resources of the order which founded it. Like all feudal structures it had its means of defense—its moat and draw-bridge, its tower of observation, and in its heavy gates and thick walls loopholes and embrasures for weapons.

But grass grew now in the moat and birds nested in the embrasures, while Leo's dogs bounded through chapel and refectory and cloister, parts of the latter being converted into a stable.

Many of the walls had tumbled in hopeless confusion, but those of the buildings yet in use had carved buttresses and mullioned windows, on which much skill had been displayed.

Leo knew, or thought he knew, every nook and cranny of his home, for when it rained, or heavy fogs hung threateningly about, his rambles were confined to the various quarters of the monastery.

On such days the stone floors and bare walls were very inhospitable, but he would sometimes find a new passage to loiter in or a window-ledge to loll over and look from as he watched the rain drip from the carved nose of an ugly old monk whose head adorned the water-spout.

I don't know whether it ever occurred to Leo that this world is a busy one. The very persistence of the pattering rain might have suggested it, as well as the bee-hives down in the kitchen court, where some of his many friends were storing their winter provision, for bees as well as birds were familiar to him; but he had the true Lazybones instinct of not following a thought too far, and so he looked and lolled and yawned, wishing for fine weather, for a new lining to his ragged old coat, or soles to his slipshod shoes, but never once supposing that any effort of his own could gain them.

When it was cold the kitchen was apt to be his resort. It was a long and low apartment on the ground-floor, and its wide fire-place, with stone settle beside the hooks and cranes for pots and kettles, had doubtless been as cheery a corner for the old monks to warm their toes after a foraging expedition as it was for Leo, who liked to smell the savory stews.

On the day of which I write the rain had fallen incessantly, and Leo had been more than usually disturbed by it, for cold and dreary though it was, the servants had turned him out of the kitchen. They would not have him there.

"Idle, worthless fellow!" said the cook; "he lolls about here as a spy upon us, to repeat to the master every word he hears."

This was quite untrue and unjust, for Leo rarely conversed with his father, and seldom saw him when Morpheus took his meals as well as his woes to bed with him, as he had done at the present moment.

But the household was in revolt; the uneasiness from outside had crept within, and there was quarrelling among the servants.

"What shall I do?" said Leo to himself. "The rain is too heavy, or I would go out in it; but I have no place to get dry when I become soaked, and I can't go to bed in the daytime, as my father does. I wonder what he'd say if I went to him? Probably this: 'You have given wangs to the finest of rhymes, and spoiled the turn of an exquisite verse; now, sir, what atonement can you make for so great an injury? It's the world's loss, remember.' That's the way it always is when I disturb him. Heigh-ho! what a dull day!"

"A very dull day indeed, your highness."

Leo started, his yawn ending abruptly, and he turned more quickly than he had ever done in his life toward the sound which saluted him. Surely he had been alone. Who ever came to this corridor? He looked up and down its dingy length, but saw no one. He must have been mistaken. Then he listened. The wind swept waiving through its accustomed approaches; shutters and windows shook with the blast, but no foot-fall was to be heard. He turned to the diamond-paned lattice, and again watched the drops trickling from the nose of the water-spout. No one had spoken. Again he yawned prodigiously, but brought his jaws together with a snap which might have damaged his teeth; for, to his great surprise, a voice said,

"I think I could amuse you."

"And pray who are you?" asked Leo, feeling very queer, and as if he were talking to himself.

"That is of little consequence, so long as I do what I have proposed," was the reply.

"Very true," said Leo; "but I never before heard of a ghost in the daytime."

"I am no ghost, your highness; I'd scorn to be such a useless thing."

"What are you, then, and where are you?"

"You will find out what I am after a while; and as to where I am, why, I am here beside you. Do you suppose you human beings have all the world to yourselves?"

"Not quite, to be sure; the birds and beasts have their share. But one can see them."

"So could you see me if your vision were not imperfect. How about all the living things you swallow every time you drink?"

"I have heard of something of the kind, but it was too much trouble to understand it."

"Poor boy! It's a pity some old ghost of a monk could not interest himself in your education; but, as I said before, ghosts are absurdly useless, except to scare people whose consciences are bad, and nothing more is needed to make me doubt their existence than the fact of your living here in what should be their stronghold, and they never raise hand or foot to help you. It's quite in keeping with their ridiculous pretensions. Believe in ghosts? No, I never did, and I never will."

The voice, small and weak though it was, grew quite angry in tone, and it seemed to Leo as if it were accompanied by the stamp of a foot; but he saw nothing, not so much as a spider crawling over the stone corridor.

It was very peculiar. He pinched himself to see if he was awake. Yes, wide awake, no doubt of that; besides, he seldom dreamed—indeed, never, unless his foot had slipped in climbing a crag to peep into a nest, when the fall was sometimes repeated in his sleep. Who was this speaking to him? As if in answer to his thoughts, the voice went on:

"So far from being a good-for-nothing old ghost, I am one of the founders of the S. P. C. C., a very old society—much older than people of the present day imagine."

Leo was quite ashamed to be so ignorant, but he ventured to ask,

"What is the S. P. C. C.?"

"Is it possible you have never heard of it?"

"Never," replied Leo, still feeling as if he were talking to the walls.

There was a queer little gurgling "Ha! ha!" which was at once suppressed.

"Well, how could you know away off in this remote region?"

"I am sure I don't understand you at all," said Leo.

"No, I see you don't; and it's by no means remarkable. You live so entirely alone, and are so wretchedly neglected, that it is a wonder you know anything."

Leo began to be angry, but it was too much of an effort; besides, what was there to be angry at—a voice? So he remained sulkily silent until the voice resumed, in a changed tone:

"I beg your highness's pardon; I quite forgot myself. I am very apt to do that when I am much interested; it is a great fault, for I appreciate fine manners. But to explain. In the far-away cities where people live like ants in an ant-hill, all crowded together, there is often much cruelty and oppression, as well as vice and poverty. Now for this state of things they have laws and punishments, means of redress; but they relate principally to grown people's affairs, so the kind-hearted ones, noticing that little children are often in need of pity and care and protection, have an association called the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. It is as old as the hills, but they think it a modern invention. I am one of the original founders of that society, little as they know me; but human beings are so vain."

"Indeed," said Leo, lazily; he was already tired of the whole matter.

"Yes, vain and pretentious. Look at your father and his poems; he thinks his doggerel verses a mark of genius."

"What has my father done to you that you attack him so rudely?" asked Leo, angrily.

"Ah! you are aroused at last. I am glad. What has your father not done, you had better ask. But I acknowledge that I am rude, and I won't say more than just this: Your father has failed to prepare you for your duties. Trouble is coming, and how are you to meet it?"

"Don't know, and don't care," came out with characteristic Lazybones indifference.

"Ah! my dear Prince, do not speak so; it is quite time you knew and cared. Do you study geography?"
 "Sometimes."
 "All surface work, I suppose?"
 "Probably."
 "Now my plan of study comprehends an interior view of the earth's formation."
 Leo gave a tremendous yawn, and said,
 "Oh, please don't bother any more; I am awfully tired."
 "So I should think. Well, do you want to be amused?"
 "No; I don't want anything."

"Come with me, then."
 "Where?"
 "No matter where; just do as I bid you."
 "How can I, when I don't even see you?"
 "True. It will be necessary to anoint your eyes; shall I do it?"
 "Just as you please."
 Leo felt a little pressure forcing down his eyelids, and the pouring of a drop of cool liquid on each.
 When he opened his eyes again there stood before him the quaintest, queerest being he had ever beheld.

"THERE'S MERRY LAUGHTER IN THE FIELD, AND HARMLESS JEST AND FROLIC ROUT."—MARY HOWITT.

WATER-SPOUTS.

BY ARTHUR LINDSLEY.

"THIS morning Mr. Wilson brought a newspaper with him to school, and read to us an item in it, which we wrote down in our note-books. He said we were to learn all that we could in relation to it, and be ready to repeat what we had learned to him to-morrow. I wish you would explain it to me, Uncle Arthur. This is what we wrote:

"The brig Starlight, of Bangor, arrived here yesterday from Cape Haytien. She reports that while she was lying becalmed off Hayti a water-spout formed near her, which she burst after firing several shots.' What are water-spouts, Uncle Arthur? How do they look? Did you ever see one? What did the brig fire at?"

"Well, well, Harry, you must be nearly equal to the brig; you have fired a perfect volley of questions at me. Which shall I answer first? But perhaps I can answer them all in one by telling you a little story of what I saw myself once in the Windward Passage.

"I was in a small schooner going from Kingston, in Jamaica, to Turk's Island for a load of salt. It was a very dull, heavy day, and there had been thunder at intervals all the morning, but no squalls. Cape San Nicolas was about ten miles north-northeast from us, and for at least two hours it had been hidden from sight by a mass of black clouds, but no wind had come from them, though the lightning and thunder had occasionally been very violent.

"Along toward noon I saw that something was going on in and behind that black screen that really was terrific. There was a fearful commotion. It was not only the flash and roar, but the boiling of the clouds themselves, which attracted my attention. They were whirling at an awful rate, and showed that some force was driving them, which, if it struck our little craft, might easily send us to the bottom at merely a moment's warning; and what made the matter worse, they seemed to be plunging straight toward us, and were already within about a mile of the schooner. All at once their progress was checked; they came no nearer, but began to whirl about just where they were."

"What was that for, Uncle Arthur? What stopped them? The water was all open, was it not?"

"They were stopped, I have no doubt, Harry, by the same force that had been driving them, and which had been making all the uproar and commotion of the lightning and thunder and the wind."

"Why, the lightning is caused by electricity. I learned that a long time ago."

"Very true; you learned correctly. And I believe the water-spouts are caused by it also; they are electrical phenomena. But let us go on with what I saw. When the clouds stopped in their progress, the noise of thunder and of wind was perfectly awful. I could see that the sea at that spot, for a diameter of a hundred yards or more, was white with foam, and that it was dashing and tearing about with dreadful violence, and yet it did not advance. I took a glass to watch it, and then I could see that it was going round and round; it was whirling about one central spot.

"But my attention was drawn away from the water to the clouds above. They had settled very low, and had grown black almost like ink, or so at least it seemed to me, and in the midst of this blackness they were also whirling in the same way as the water, and what was very striking, they began to draw down right over the white spot of the waves. While I watched I saw the black cloud apparently sucked down in a long, dark, conical, whirling mass, which grew smaller as it stretched and stretched until it fairly reached the white water.

"The surface of the foaming and boiling sea was perhaps lifted a little, though I think that was probably only a deception of my eyesight. But I perfectly well recollect how that black finger of cloud went wavering and twisting here and there as though it could find no rest for itself, which doubtless was simply the fact. It reminded me of a gigantic blaek leech poking his body about, hunting for a place at which to take hold and bite. It did not rest for a moment."

"It must have been horrible to see."

"It was horrible, and it was frightful even as I watched it in its formation. But the worst of it was yet to come, for after spinning around in that one spot for a time (I dare say it was only one or two minutes, though it seemed much longer) it suddenly started to move. The whirling did not slacken in its violence, but the entire process, the whirlwind, bodily began to advance, at first very slowly, but gradually increasing in speed. It came directly toward us, and had it continued in that direction nothing could have saved us from instant destruction. But when within less than half a mile it turned abruptly to the south, and passed us at a distance of about three hundred yards with a roar and a dash that were awful beyond description, though the wind, even at that little space from it, was not sufficient to cause us any trouble whatever."

"What became of it, Uncle Arthur? Where did it go?"

"It went to pieces, Harry. It wore itself out. It expired by its own violence, or rather the force was exhausted by which it had been caused. When it had passed off a mile and more from us it began gradually to diminish in force. There was no sudden change. The cone of cloud contracted and grew shorter little by little till it was gone, and presently the cloud itself broke up, and after a time the sun came out beautifully, and the remainder of the day was bright and clear."

"Then a water-spout, Uncle Arthur, is caused by a whirlwind on the sea? But how does electricity do any such thing? You said they were caused by electricity."

"I said I believed so, for I think there are many proofs of it, though we may not consider it certain. As to the manner in which the electricity acts we can not yet speak with any certainty. We may say this, however—it doubtless produces a rush of air from all sides toward one point, and the currents meeting produce the whirlwind."

"But why does not electricity, then, do the same things on the land? I should think it would."

"You are very right, Harry. It does precisely the same thing, though of course the effects are different, for the whirlwind must pass over a different surface. There can be no water spout unless there is water to be whirled. But houses and trees and fences and cattle and human beings can be tossed about by it at a fearful rate. There is never a summer that we have not accounts of more or less of such events. They occur in various parts of the country, though they are more common on the open plains and prairies of our Western States than elsewhere, because the surroundings are such as to give better opportunity for their formation. They are often called in the newspapers cyclones, from the Greek word which means a circle. And on the desert plains of Nevada and Arizona and New Mexico they often raise the sand in huge columns which go marching along at a very stately pace. I have sometimes seen three or four of them at one time within a few miles of each other, each being from one to two thousand feet in height. I should be glad to tell you about them, but we have not time for it now."

"But why did they fire at it, and what good did it do?"

"It is the common belief of sailors that a cannon fired at a water-spout will break it down, but I do not know any evidence that the idea is correct. If the shots are fired at the time when the whirlwind is about to come to an end they would naturally think that their shot had done the work. But how the passage of a shot through such a storm as a water-spout really is could produce any effect on it I can not understand."

FIRING AT A WATER-SPOUT.

HAREBELLS.

BY SUSAN HARTLEY SWETT.

DO you know what the harebells are
That hang from the rocks by the sea,
And nod to the silver call of the wind
And the drowsy hum of the bee?
Oh, they are the bells that were stolen away
From fairy steeples one summer day.

The thief was a spiteful elf,
Who, banished from Elf-land,
Brought them with him into the earth,
And scattered them over the strand
Where a little beach bird was telling its dream
To a sand-flower pink and a gay sunbeam.

Then the little bird straightway flew
To Elf-land and told the queen,
Who sailed that way on a dragon-fly,
And, lifting her wand of green,
Touched the bright bells that told the hours
Until they were only some pretty flowers.

There was no soft greensward there
By the great blue hillyow sea,
So she hung them by a light green thread
To the rocks and moss tufts we see,
Where the first soft kiss of the evening dew
Changed them from silver to deepest blue.

But though they are only flowers,
If you softly bend your ear
Over their dainty drooping cups
A faint sweet chime you'll hear,
Swelling and dying like falling showers:
They dream they are still in the fairy towers.

DICK WENTWORTH'S SWIM.

THE TRUE STORY OF A BRAVE BOY'S DEED.

BY GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON.

I.

DICK WENTWORTH was the poorest youth in the university, and the proudest. Without a dollar to begin with, and without any kind of help, he had made his way through the first two years of his college course, and meant to make his way to the end. He did it by "working like a slave and living like a pauper," as he himself said; but he did it proudly, with his head erect. When anything like help was offered him, he refused it almost resentfully; but he was not too proud to earn money by sawing wood for those who could pay, or by doing any other honest work for wages; and he was not too proud to cook his own food and wash his own dishes.

At first there were his students who turned up their noses at Dick Wentworth, and called him a pauper, but after a while even they began to see that while Wentworth was as poor as a pauper he had not a trace of the pauper's spirit. He was a hard-working, independent gentleman, who respected himself and was soon respected by his fellow-students.

Still, nobody thought much about him. He had no intimate friends, and was nobody's hero. He was the best swimmer in the university, and was captain of the students' life-saving crew—to which the government had furnished a life-boat for use on the lake—but that did not count for much in college life.

II.

There was a hurried running through the college at day-break one morning, and a loud knock at Wentworth's door. "What's up?" he asked, leaping out of bed.

"Steamer ashore! We're going to man the life-boat!"

"I'll be with you in half a minute," answered Wentworth; and hastily drawing on his trousers and undershirt, he ran toward the lake shore, where all the students and half the towns-people were gathered.

The scene on which the people looked was appalling. A large passenger steamer lay stranded about four hundred yards out, and the sea was beating her to pieces. Her upper works were already a mass of splinters, and shattered doors and bits of painted bulk-heads were every minute thrown up by the billows at the very feet of the people on shore, telling the sad story of what was happening out there beyond the furious surf. The pelting rain and the driving spray nearly hid the vessel from view, but in such glimpses as were to be had of it the people on shore could see the passengers and crew clinging to the wreck. Fragments washed ashore showed plainly enough that the ship's boats had been beaten to pieces, probably in the attempt to launch them, and the whole ship's company were now helplessly awaiting death.

The students of the life-saving crew, with Wentworth at their head, brought their life-boat to the beach and prepared to launch it. They placed themselves in two lines, every fellow stripped to the waist, and at the word pushed the boat into the water. The bow was instantly swung around by an in-coming wave, and the boat was driven beamways upon the shore.

A second effort was made, with greater care and a nicer calculation of time between the waves. The boat rose upon the crest of the billow, and the young athletes bent to their oars; but the water was too strong for them. The surf tossed the boat back upon the beach, capsizing it, and seriously injuring one of the crew.

"We want a volunteer to take Stokes's place," cried Wentworth, whereupon three stalwart young fellows offered themselves. "I'll take you, Mason," said Wentworth; "you're the best oar. Take your place."

The boat was righted, and a third attempt to launch her was made. For a moment it seemed that this time success had been attained. The boat rose upon the wave, and two vigorous strokes of the oars carried her beyond the curling crest. Then an oar broke; a rower fell backward. There was a moment's pause in the stroke, and the life-boat was dashed upon the beach by the angry sea. This time, alas! the good life-boat's ribs were crushed to a shapeless mass, and several of the crew were stunned by the fall.

A murmur of terrified despair ran through the crowd, which now included every man and woman of the college town. It was evident to all that nothing more could be done. Nothing frailer than a life-boat could live for a moment in such a sea, and there was now no life-boat to be had. The people were dumb with horror as they realized that there was nothing to do but stand there in the pitiless storm and wait for the bodies of the ship's company to come ashore. They were already beginning to come, indeed. Two men and one woman—all dead, and all more or less bruised and broken—had been drawn out upon the sand. These were the first swept overboard, but others would follow, and but one fate awaited all that company of people who could be seen clinging to the ship, unable to help themselves, and without hope of help from others.

"Let us pray!"

It was the college President—a venerable man, loved and revered throughout the town—who spoke. The people knelt at once, and the old man prayed fervently, with his white head bared to the storm. As he ceased, Wentworth approached and said to him,

"Send the women up the beach, sir, if you please."

"Why, Wentworth?"

"Because I must strip; the least rag of clothing may be fatally in my way."

"Why, what are you going to do, my boy?" asked the President, in astonishment.

"I'm going to try to carry a line to the steamer," said the youth, calmly.

"It is impossible!—it is madness to try!" exclaimed the President.

"So it is," said an old fisherman who stood by. "That sea will beat you to a jelly in two minutes."

"I suppose it is impossible," replied the boy; "but I'm going to try, sir."

The President looked into the youth's face, and catching something of the enthusiasm of his heroic purpose, laid his hand upon Wentworth's head, saying:

"When God gives it to you to attempt such a service to your fellow-men, it is not for me to interfere. May He strengthen and keep you!"

Wentworth bowed his head to receive this benediction, and then stripped himself at once, while the people looked on in awe-struck admiration of such heroism, and shuddered at the thought of its seemingly certain end. The symmetry of the youth's person, his superb beauty of body, seemed to make the matter worse; for was it not a special pity that a youth so perfect of limb and so full of life should be given as a sacrifice to the fury of the storm?

"Now, then, Thorpe," said Wentworth, after tying a slender cord about his body, "I want you to pay this out carefully. Remember that a single ounce of unnecessary pulling may cost all these people their lives."

"And your life too," said Thorpe.

"Yes, I suppose so; but I wasn't thinking of that."

After giving his fellow-student careful directions as to the management of the line, Wentworth stood for a moment cying the water. Then following a retreating wave, he plunged head-first into the wall of water, his purpose being to dive under the wave, and come to the surface beyond the break of the surf.

A moment's suspense followed; then the people saw the lad's body lifted up and borne in on the crest of the wave. He had failed, but at least he was unhurt. Taking time to recover breath, he plunged in again, and disappeared in the bank of in-coming water. The slow seconds passed with no sign. Men felt their hearts beat violently as they waited. The wave came in and broke upon the beach, but still the diver did not re-appear.

"That ended him, poor fellow!" said the fisherman.

"No, there he is!" cried Thorpe, as Wentworth's head came to the surface. Unfortunately the dive, long as it was, was not quite long enough, and as the diver came up he was caught by the next wave and dashed upon the beach.

For a time Wentworth seemed exhausted; but the breath came again, and looking toward a lumber-yard near at hand, he bade the people bring lumber and make a spring-board.

"Put it on the edge of the bluff down there where it overhangs the water—as near the edge as possible."

The students obeyed, shuddering, for they knew that to be dashed ashore against the bluff would be certain death to their comrade.

"He can't try that more than once," said the old fisherman; but somehow nobody thought it worth while to beg Wentworth not to try it at all. There was a resoluteness in his look which made them feel that persuasion would be useless.

When the spring-board was in place he examined it, and then, walking back a dozen yards, ran rapidly up the board, made a great leap forward, and went down among the waves. There were seconds of breathless waiting and eager scanning of the water. Then:

"Hurrah! I see him," shouted a student, "and he's beyond the break of the surf."

"Yes, and he is swimming steadily," said another; "but he'll never make the ship in such a sea as this."

"He's the strongest swimmer I ever saw," said Thorpe.

"That may be, but this is an awful swim. It is a quarter of a mile to the ship, and with such a sea on it might as well be ten miles."

It was impossible now to see the swimmer, buried as he was in a raging sea, and blinded as the people were by the mist and spray. But the line was slowly drawing out, and that showed that Wentworth still had strength to swim.

Students climbed trees for a better view. The women came back and crowded the bluff in their eagerness to learn how matters went with the swimmer. One young woman ran out upon the spring-board. She stood there, watching the bold swimmer through a large spy-glass. Her hair was blown loose, and tossed about by the wind. A gust carried away the shawl she had worn about her shoulders. But she knew nothing of these things, or of the pitiless pelting of the storm upon her. She knew only that there was a young hero out there among the mad waves, daring death in an effort to save the lives of others.

After a while the paying out of line came to a stop. The cord hung limp in Thorpe's hands, and even began to drift back upon the beach. Five minutes, which seemed five hours, passed away. Then the line stretched again, and the paying out was resumed. Not for long, however. The intervals of rest increased in frequency and length, while the spurts of swimming grew steadily briefer.

He was still alive, however, and that was something. After a while the swimmer seemed to have recovered strength, for the line drew out slowly and steadily for a very long time, and by the amount of cord left it was judged that he must be within a hundred yards of the ship. Then he ceased to draw the line. Minute after minute passed without a sign. That long swim, they were now sure, had been a last desperate effort to reach the ship, and when that failed the swimmer had sunk to the bottom.

There was a low murmur among the people as this thought was forced upon them. Then there was a twitch at the line in Thorpe's hand, and a moment later it began again to run out.

"We give Thee thanks!" said the President, reverently baring his head and looking upward, and not another word was spoken by any of the people on the shore. There was no need of speech. The line still drew. Wentworth was still swimming.

The young woman on the spring-board had not lowered her glass for a moment. She had stood there like a statue, scarcely moving a muscle. Now she changed her attitude a little, and in a voice quivering with excitement, she said, "They see him, and are getting a line ready!" Then, after a pause: "They are throwing the line! He has caught—no, he has missed it! He is drifting past the ship and out of reach! He has caught a line thrown from the bow! They are hauling him up! He is on deck! Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!"

And the girl, wild with joy, threw down her spy-glass, and waved her arms as she shouted.

A larger cord was now attached and drawn on board. Then a cable was carried out, and a little after noon the first load of passengers—women and children—was brought ashore. When all the women and children were saved the men followed, and with the last careful came Wentworth and the Captain. The youth was greatly exhausted, and much bruised from being hauled aboard the ship, but no bones were broken, and a day's rest in bed was all that he needed.

III.

No, Wentworth did not marry the spy-glass girl. If this were a made-up story that is the way it would end; but it is not a made-up story at all. It is simply a true account of something that actually happened, though I have changed the names of the real persons somewhat. Wentworth was the hero of the college and the town, of course, and when it was known how poor he was there was an effort made to raise some money for him. There were wealthy men who wanted to subscribe liberally to a fund for his benefit, but the proud fellow refused to receive a cent, saying, when the matter was mentioned to him:

"I'm not an object of charity. Give your money to the poor."

And so Wentworth went on "working like a slave and living like a pauper," but in truth being a self-respecting gentleman. He made his way through college, and, as a matter of course, such a young man made a place for himself among men. If I were to mention his real name here many readers would recognize it as that of a distinguished clergyman and scholar, who, in spite of added years, is still strong for the doing of his duty.

"SHE STOOD WATCHING THE BOLD SWIMMER THROUGH A LARGE SPY-GLASS"

SOME HINTS ON HORSEBACK-RIDING.

BY CAPTAIN JOHN CODMAN.

I HAVE often wondered why horseback-riding is not a more popular amusement among our young people. "It is very expensive to keep a horse," some of you may say, "and papa does not feel that he can afford it."

But is it more expensive than many amusements that he already allows you, and is there not more pleasure in a breezy gallop through the Park and over country roads than can be had in many ways that cost as much? In England there are three times as many boys and girls that ride on horseback as we have here, and perhaps this is one reason for their ruddier looks and the stronger physique, that can only be gained by plenty of exercise in the open air.

If you can not own a horse, one may be hired for a comparatively small sum, and this may be greatly reduced if the arrangement is a regular one. I would, however, prefer to think of every young rider as having his own horse. With a hired horse you are not at home in your saddle any more than the horse is at home with you upon his back. You do not take a personal interest in him, and he can not take the same kind of an interest in you.

Let me tell you the relations that exist between my horse Jeff and me. I have owned him seven years, and he thinks that he owns me. Nobody else rides him; but one day I put my wife upon his back. The groom was alarmed for her safety; but when she came back, pleased with her ride, he said to her, "Well, ma'am, he carried you only out of courtesy to the Captain."

Jeff and I are very fond of riding up and down the east bank of the Hudson from New York to Peekskill. He knows all my friends on the road as well as I do, and I think he enjoys the scenery as much. We talk together as we go along; at least I talk to him, and he understands me. It is a pleasure, you know, sometimes, to have a companion who appreciates your conversation, and shows his appreciation of it by silence.

I wish that every one of you might have a horse like Jeff. Some one of you who reads this may ask his papa to buy him a pony. I hope his papa will not listen to him. Little boys think ponies are nice, but I don't think that generally they are. The only possible advantage that a pony has over a horse is that when his rider falls he does not have so far to fall.

But then you must not fall at all. You ought to "stick on": that, after all, is the great secret of horsemanship. There are ever so many books which give minute directions as to "the seat." If you go to a riding-school you will hear more of it there. But Indians and ranchmen don't read books, and don't go to riding-schools. I would like to see some of our fancy horsemen try to ride a bucking horse on the prairies.

A great deal depends on habit and the style of saddle. I don't like the English saddle, for I don't think it is as easy for the horse or for the rider as the McClellan, the Whitman, or the Mexican. Nor do I think the style of riding upon it is as graceful, or that the "sticking on" is as sure. Nevertheless, we know that jockeys do adopt it with success, and that it has hitherto been more popular than any other. Whichever kind of saddle you prefer, commence your practice without stirrups; then your knees will get the all-important "grip"; afterward you may indulge in the luxury of stirrups to make your riding less fatiguing.

You will notice that most saddles are placed so far forward upon the horse's back that they are close upon his withers. This is very wrong, as the horse would tell you if he could speak. When a clumsy hostler puts a saddle upon Jeff in that way he immediately remonstrates, but when it is put six or eight inches further back, as it should be, he becomes as quiet as a lamb. Not only will the horse carry you easier with the saddle in the right place, but he will carry you with greater safety. He will not be so likely to stumble, whereby he might break his knees and your neck.

Now I want to tell you about the reins. Try to ride as if you had none. Place no dependence upon them whatever for keeping your seat. Martingales should never be used; neither should a snaffle or a double bit. Every horse should be trained to go with a simple easy curb, and it is well to have a slide upon the single rein so that you will hold only one part, as it were, of the bridle in your hand. Thus you will not be tempted to steer the animal as if he were in harness, but by a gentle pressure of the rein on his neck upon the side opposite to the way you intend that he shall go, he will understand your wishes without any appeal to his mouth—the mouth which you should never spoil, as by so doing your horse would be totally ruined. By handling him in this way you will soon find that you can control him with your thumb and finger.

Riding-whips should never be carried excepting by ladies. They frighten horses, and do them no good. Those great clumsy clubs with loops on the end are only serviceable in England, where they are used to open gates in the lanes that are much frequented by horsemen. Wear a pair of light spurs. This advice may seem cruel, but it is not intended that the spurs should be used for any other purpose than that of giving an occasional hint, so that the horse may know that he is under your control.

Ladies may carry a light riding-whip, not a club, and they should never raise it, for a horse has the useful faculty, denied to us, of back sight. So the whip should be carried in the right hand over the flank.

There is an old rhyme well worth remembering. The horse is speaking:

"Up hill, spare me;
Down hill, spare thee;
But on the plain spare me not;
Cool me well when I am hot."

Only do not take his suggestions too literally. Do not let him cool off in a hurry. Slacken your pace if possible some time before arrival at your destination, so that he may come in not overheated. Above all things do not let him drink while warm—at any rate, not more than a sip to moisten his mouth. By neglect of this precaution many valuable horses have been foundered.

Almost all side-saddles are instruments of torture to the horse, if not to the rider, and not infrequently to both. This is owing chiefly to the trees, which are a combination of wood, iron, and padding. The California and the Whitman tree is the same for a lady's or for a man's saddle—a long bit of wood, open in the middle for air, and making the pressure on the horse's back more general than local. Two or three thicknesses of blanket are worn under it. You may say that such an outfit is not genteel. Perhaps not; but there is another old saying—"Handsome is that handsome does." I am glad to see that fashion has somewhat relented in shortening something that ought to be dispensed with altogether; I mean the riding-habit. How much more sensible is the practice that obtains in some South American countries of wearing frocks and riding trousers!

But we must be thankful for what we can get. Every inch cut off the riding-habit is in the way of a guarantee of the rider's life. Girls should practice riding without a stirrup, and when a stirrup is used lengthen out the strap as much as possible. As in the case of the man's, keep the side-saddle well back from the withers. It is even more important in your case. Sit up straight if you can, but "stick on" any way; and, above all things, keep your hand off the pommel, and do not be afraid, or you will never learn to ride.

Bear in mind, all of you boys and girls, what I have said about ponies. They are generally more vicious than horses. I do not mean that you should be mounted upon a very large horse. For young people, and for people of any age of light weight, the most desirable size for a horse is fifteen or fifteen and a half hands, and he should weigh about 850 or 900 pounds.

RAISING THE "PEARL."*

CHAPTER XXVII.

RECKLESS STEERING.

THE sponge fishers were employed not far from Tampa Bay, and therefore when Captain Sammy had finished his business among them, it would require only a few hours for the Pearl to run into Tampa.

Three hours after they had left Boca Grande Captain Sammy pointed directly ahead to some low islands or keys, lying almost level with the water, and around which a number of vessels or boats could be seen.

"There are the sponge fishers," he said, "and in less than an hour we shall come to anchor among them."

The boys fully expected to see a novel sight when once they were among the sponge fishers, despite Tommy's assertion that there "wasn't much to be seen," and they were all excitement as they approached.

But when the Pearl was anchored in the very midst of the fleet of vessels, and nothing more unusual was to be seen than a number of small boats, each containing from two to four men, all engaged in plunging long poles into the water, and drawing them up with a mass of sponge at the end, they were disposed to feel that they had been defrauded in some way.

It was no more novel and not nearly so interesting as to see a party spearing eels, and after the boys had watched them for half an hour they had seen all they cared about.

Captain Sammy had been bustling around, making frantic signals with his hands, from the time the Pearl had first come to anchor. All his noise and fuss finally resulted in a spare boat being sent to them from a schooner of his called the Bonita.

The little man proposed to visit all the vessels lying there—those which he owned, to see that the work was being conducted to suit him, and the others for the purpose of bargaining for the sponge, the greater quantity of which was sold in Key West.

It was not his intention to take any of his own men away from their work to row him around on his tour of inspection and purchase, for he said in the most benevolent manner possible, and as though he were conferring some great favor, "I'm going to let Bobby and Tommy row the boat, and Dare and Charley can stay here to keep ship."

Neither of the two boys selected had any very great desire to labor at the oars on an errand which would be so uninteresting to them; but they were careful not to let

* Begun in No. 175, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Captain Sammy see that they looked upon it as anything but the greatest favor.

After the party had left the steamer Dare and Charley found it rather hard work to amuse themselves in a place where there was really so little to be seen. They watched the sharks as they glided around among the boats in search of prey, their dorsal fins visible above the water, looking sinister because of the very grace and swiftness of their movements.

After this they set to work catching fish for the purpose of surprising Captain Sammy by having a chowder all ready for him when he should come on board for dinner, and they did succeed in surprising him, for neither he nor any one else could have told what the dark-looking mixture was simply by judging from its taste and appearance.

Captain Sammy really appeared to be grieved because the captain and engineer of the Pearl knew no more about cooking than was shown by this chowder, and he obliged them to watch all his movements while he cooked two ducks, giving them a long lecture on cooking which was only finished when the dinner was.

"I'm goin' to take you in hand on the next cruise," he said, as he got into the boat again, "and by the time we've been the whole length of the reef, you will be able to get up almost as good a dinner as I can."

But he seemed to think they could wash dishes well enough, for he left the yacht without doing anything toward helping to clean up the little cook-room or the dining-table, and it was fully an hour, owing to their awkwardness, before Dare and Charley succeeded in doing it in anything like a proper manner.

After this work was done the boys lounged on deck wishing that Captain Sammy would return, so that they could get away from the very disagreeable odor caused by the decaying sponges, when suddenly the movements of an incoming schooner attracted their attention.

She evidently was one of the fleet of sponge-gatherers, but the singular manner in which she was handled caused the boys great surprise, amateur sailors though they were.

It seemed as if the helmsman had no idea as to where he wanted to go or what he should do, for he steered his vessel in the wildest possible manner, and without the slightest regard to the direction of the wind. The craft would be headed directly for one of the anchored vessels, as if the only purpose was to run her down, and then she would come about with sails flapping, blocks rattling, and men shouting, her prow directed toward another vessel.

This singular behavior on the part of the crew or captain of the schooner caused the greatest excitement among the other fishermen, and they shouted and yelled at those on board the offending vessel until there was a perfect Babel of confusion.

"It won't be many minutes before some craft gets smashed if they keep on at this rate," said Charley, when the vessel grazed the side of one that was anchored not far from the Pearl.

"The men must have been drinking," said Dare, and in a few moments the craft was so near that the boys could plainly see those on board, and it was only too evident that, from the captain down, all hands were in a state of complete intoxication.

They had probably just received pay for their cargo of sponges, and the money which they had labored hard and braved so many dangers for had been used to degrade them to a level many degrees lower than that of the brutes.

But those on the yacht had no time for watching the besotted sailors, for their position of spectators was quickly changed to that of participants in the general excitement.

The vessel, which had been some distance from them, now changed her course, heading directly for the Pearl, and in such a direction that it would strike her about midships.

"They'll run us down sure!" cried Dare, as he jumped to his feet with the intention of signaling them; but as he realized how useless that would be, he shouted to Charley, "See if there isn't steam enough on to send us ahead a little way, and I'll trip the anchor."

Since they had intended to remain on the sponging grounds twenty-four hours at least, the fires had been drawn, and Charley knew even before he rushed into the engine-room that there was not an ounce of steam in the boilers, but yet he made the trial, shouting to Dare almost immediately afterward, "It's no use; the water isn't even warm."

Dare was tugging away at the cable, and as Charley spoke he looked up at the approaching schooner.

Her sails were full, she was not more than a hundred feet away, and coming with a force that must crush the yacht like an egg-shell.

"Help me launch the boat!" Dare shouted. "She will keep us from the sharks a few moments, at all events."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE NEWS AT TAMPA.

The excitement among the fishermen was now intense; there seemed to be no chance but that the little steamer would be run down, and in such an event the lives of those on board were in great peril.

It was hardly possible that they could remain in the water a single instant without being devoured by the sharks, and the vessel that was sailing toward them was so high out of the water, owing to having no cargo on board, that it would hardly be possible for the boys to gain any hold of her as she came crashing on to them.

Every boat in the vicinity was headed at once toward the apparently doomed steamer, but yet not one of them could by any possibility reach her until some moments after the crash would come.

Meanwhile the boys on board were working with an energy and desperation such as could only have come to them in a moment of great peril.

The boat would hardly be of much service to them after they got her launched, for, lying in the sun as she had been, the seams that were only imperfectly closed at the first, were now opened, so that she would hardly float more than five minutes. But, as Dare had said, she might serve to keep them from the sharks a few moments, and in that time some one of the other boats might pick them up.

It was no light task to launch the boat unaided in the few seconds they had at their disposal; but yet they succeeded just as the schooner with her drunken crew was within ten or twelve feet of them.

At this moment, whether by chance, or because some idea of the damage they were about to do gained an entrance into their stupefied brains, no one ever knew, the helmsman jammed his wheel hard down, and the craft was just beginning to sheer around in obedience to it when she struck the Pearl.

Dare and Charley were all ready to leap into the almost sinking boat when the final crash came, and Dare saw the helmsman's movement.

"Hold on!" he shouted to Charley: "she won't strike us full, and there are a good many chances that the Pearl won't sink."

Even as he spoke the blow came, and both boys were hurled to the deck, while the tender, which had cost such labor to launch, was sunk immediately.

It was hardly more than a hair's-breadth which had saved them, for they were saved, even though such a blow had been struck the little craft.

When Dare had started to trip the anchor he had, almost unconsciously, let off the turn of the cable from the miniature windlass, and the consequence was that the yacht was riding almost as free as if no anchor had been down. The wind, acting on her upper works as on a sail, had begun to force her through the water sideways, which had the effect of diminishing the blow very sensibly. The schooner having begun to veer around, did not strike the Pearl with her cut-water, but hit her a glancing blow that had the effect of forcing her along, instead of bearing her down. The force was so great, however, that the Pearl was carried along to the full length of her chain cable, which was snapped apart as if it had been a thread, and nearly flung on to a vessel anchored on the port side.

The starboard rail was entirely stove in, but no damage had been done below the water-line, and Dare and Charley, scrambling to their feet, made every exertion to get the other anchor down before they should drift into some of the other crafts, and thus work more damage to themselves.

Captain Sammy with Bobby and Tommy, who had pulled for the yacht with all their strength when they saw the peril she was in, came on board almost immediately after the second anchor was down, and the little man occupied at least ten minutes of his time in shaking his fist and scolding at those who had been the cause of the accident.

When he had thus freed his mind he went to work to find out the extent of the damage done, and after that was ascertained he said, with a sigh of relief:

"Well, we ought to be very thankful that it was no worse. When I saw those drunken brutes sailing right down on you I made sure that the Pearl was gone forever, and your being saved was only a question of how long it would be before we could get at you. It won't cost much time or money to make the rail as good as new, and we have got out of the scrape cheaply."

By this time the career of the vessel with her drunken crew was over. They had tried the experiment of running one of the islands down, as they had attempted to do with the Pearl, and the consequence was that the vessel was ashore in what looked to be a sinking condition.

Captain Sammy had nearly completed his work when it became necessary to start to the aid of Dare and Charley, and now he concluded that he would try to do no more that day.

"We can stop here on our way to the reef," he said, "and then I can see those whom I have not already talked with. We will spend the rest of the day in fixing the rail, and to-morrow morning we will start for Tampa."

The tender which they were to repair having now gone to the bottom, or floated off full of water, it would be necessary to have a new boat for the Pearl, and Captain Sammy concluded to keep the one that had been sent him from the Bonita, which fact he announced to the vessel's captain with a great deal of unnecessary scolding about those who had done the mischief.

Now that they had a boat again, the boys concluded that they would go on shore to see what the little village on the key looked like; and when Captain Sammy announced that the rail was patched as well as it could be until he could get the steamer home, they started for the land, leaving the little man alone to keep ship.

There was nothing on shore to interest one save the "crawls," or pens for turtles, which appeared to make up the belongings of each household as much as a hen pen does that of a farmer's in the interior States. They inspected the occupants of these crawls with a view to distinguishing the different species Captain Sammy had told them about, and then returned to the yacht.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

HO! RUB-A-DUB-DUB!

BY ANGELINE MAY.

HO! rub-a-dub-dub! Ho! rub-a-dub-dub!
You may drum till your wrists are sore,
Till your elbows droop and your shoulders stoop,
But they'll never come back any more.

For the three old maids, the dear old maids,
Who dwell on the king's highway,
Have been wooed and won by three merry men;
For I heard the gossips say

That the butcher he came in a pea-green coat
And a wig of autumn red,
And he sighed such sighs and vowed such vows
As would turn any old maid's head.

The baker he came with a huge bouquet
And his pockets full of tarts,
And he wooed and won the oldest old maid,
With the tenderest of tender hearts.

Then up the mighty river Scrub
The candlestick-maker sailed
In a boat shaped strangely like a tub,
And a polka-dot coat that trailed

He tied his tub to a juniper tree,
And strode up the king's highway,
With his polka-dot coat tails over his arm,
And a smile that was blithe and gay.

First he piped a serenade
On a jew's harp made of tin,
While with sugar kisses and chocolate hearts
He strove his lady to win.

In compliments sweet and yards of verse
His love he did confess,
Till she gently leaped on his polka-dot sleeve,
And timidly whispered, "Yes."

And there they embarked in a graceful
And sailed out on the river wide.

Now all the folks in the country round
Came running from far and near
To bid farewell to the three old maids,
And hear what there was to hear.

They crowded down to the river-side,
And waved and shouted "Good-by!"
Till the oldest old maid stood up in the tub,
And made them this reply:

"Farewell, farewell, to all our friends;
We are off for Thistle-down fair.
We shall stop at the Isle of Needles and Pins,
And there'll be three weddings there."

Then the drums they beat and the dogs
they barked,
And the people
shouted a song
That echoes still through nursery rhyme,
And will be remembered long.

"Ho! rub-a-dub-dub!
Ho! rub-a-dub-
dub!
And who do you think was there?
The butcher, the baker, the candle-tick-
maker,
And all of them going to the fair."

So the maids were won,
But each happy heart these troublesome questions vexed,
When and where should the wedding be?
And what ought they to do next?

Then up spoke the candlestick-maker bold,
"Oh, brothers and sisters dear,
You shall come with me in my gallant tub
That lieth in wait at the pier."

So the butcher and baker and candlestick-maker
Each offered his arm to his bride,
And gayly they marched down the king's highway
To the juniper-tree where the gallant tub lay,

Ho! rub-a-dub-dub! Ho! rub-a-dub-dub!
You may drum till your wrists are sore,
Till your elbows droop and your shoulders stoop,
But they'll never come back any more.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

CINCINNATI, IOWA.

I am a boy nine years old. I have two brothers and four sisters. I am the eldest of the family. I read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and enjoy it very much. The story I like best is "Raising the Pearl." I always read it the first, grandpa, papa, and Uncle Richard own a packing-house. They built a large boat, and named it The Pearl. Uncle George painted it. He painted its name on the stern. We have two dogs, Grace and Sam. Grace is Sam's mother. She is as old as I am. We have a large apple orchard. When the apples get ripe we have a very nice time gathering them.

I have a nice little flower garden. I fixed it in the spring, and I have flowers in it now. I had some pink roses, but they are all gone. I have a lot of white roses. Grandma is very fond of gardening; she gives me lots of flowers and plants. She says my white roses are the prettiest of all. I give her ever so many of them. I will be as glad as any boy to see my letter printed.

BERTIE G.

I am a girl fourteen years of age. I go to school, and I like my teacher very much. I have two brothers; one is a young man, and the other is eight years old. The latter goes to school, reads in the Fifth Reader, and has the large arithmetic, geography, and grammar. I have pieced one nine-square bed-quilt, and have two more commenced. One is called "Around the World," and the other the "Tea Pattern." I saw in No. 154 of Young People a letter signed Bita M. Westport, California, saying she was piecing a quilt by the name of "Lincoln's Platform." I would like to exchange one of my patterns for that one. Will Bita M. please mail the pattern, with her address, and state which pattern she would like me to send her in return, and I will promptly forward the pattern she names in her letter? I have a pattern called the "Philadelphia Payment," and I can get one called the "Cat's Claw." I will send either of these or one of the others, as she may prefer.

ELEEN M. MOSHER, South Westport, Mass.

JAMESTOWN, NEW YORK.

In No. 191 I saw the pretty sailor costume for dolls, and thought I would like one for my doll. I would like one of the twelve-inch patterns, if you please. My address is—

I think HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is the best paper in the whole world. I would not take five cents a dollar for all the numbers I have, now unless I were sure I could get them all again. We have a large lawn, and lots of rose-bushes, and three hammocks, one for each girl. For pets we have a dog named Curly, and four birds. My bird is named Major, and he sings from morning until night. One of his notes sounds like a sewing-machine or a saw.

One thing everybody here enjoys is Chautauqua Lake. There are quite a number of boats on the lake, of which the Jamestown is the largest, and the Cincinnati is the fastest. Sometimes, when we go up the lake, we see turtles in the water. The lake is twenty-one miles long. I think it is beautiful.

If I ever go to New York again, I am coming to see the place where YOUNG PEOPLE is published, and to see you. I wish I could send you a bunch of roses, but I am afraid they would wither before they could reach you. I send you a puzzle.

K. T. S.

In some regards this is a very good letter indeed. In the first place, the way in which our correspondent asks for the pattern which she wishes sent to her is really a model. It is very straightforward and business-like, and in addition to what is here printed, the unfilled blank contained her name and post-office address in full. In the next place, it gives us a good idea of K. herself. We hope the little lady may, one of these days, step into the office where YOUNG PEOPLE is at home, before it starts out weekly on its trips to other homes all over the wide world.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

Having never written before, and as YOUNG PEOPLE is a dear friend of ours, we thought we would write now. May we belong to the Little Housekeepers? Here is a receipt for molasses candy:

Two cups of molasses, one cup of sugar, one table-spoonful of vinegar, boil from twenty minutes to half-an hour.

This is splendid. Will some one give us a receipt for butterscotch?

MARIE C. and HALLIE W.

LEASTOWN, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl twelve years old. Papa gave HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE to my brother Carl, and he gave me HARPER'S MAGAZINE. I have no pets except a bird, and I am afraid he is going to die. I like to make out my puzzles, especially those referring to geography. It rained yesterday, so I did not shoot off my fire-crackers. I saved them until to-day.

MAY A. B.

Is your bird mouling? If so, he may soon be quite lively again.

WELLSBOROUGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a boy twelve years old, and am in the Junior Academic Department at school. My home is surrounded by a yard with a great many trees, affording a fine place for playing "Tispy." I have a family of batskins composed of two roosters, two hens, and a chicken. I have the charge of about twenty other fowls besides. Papa is going to get me a canary-bird. I have taken HARPER'S

YOUNG PEOPLE every year but one since it was published, and like the stories very much. Will you please tell me whether Jimmy Brown is an older or younger boy? I have an older brother and sister away at school, but they are expected home soon. I take music and drawing lessons. My mamma gives music lessons. I have sent two Wiggles, but neither was paid.

CHARLEY G. O.

Do not despair of seeing yourself by-and-by among the Wiggles whose efforts are published. Everything comes round right in time to those who persevere. I should think nobody who reads Jimmy Brown's funny stories would fancy him an old boy. Only a very young one could perform such pranks.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

My mamma has promised for a long time to write a letter for me, and at last she is ready. I have a pet cat named Willy; he is very, very thin now while shedding his coat, but in winter he is very large. We think Willy quite intelligent. When the dinner bell rings he is generally asleep, but he rouses up and trots to the dining-room, and on reaching it, if none of the family is there before him, he walks to the foot of the stairs, and meows until some one comes. He will not take anything from the table at this time, but after we have begun our meal, and one rises for any purpose, he will dart to that chair and snarl something from the plate. Was it not a squirrel that Davy T. had for a pet? I am glad to see Mrs. Lilly's new story, as I liked "Nan" so much.

NANNIE T. B.

SHERBURNE FOUR CORNERS, NEW YORK.

I think the pet Davy T. mentions was a woodchuck. I have three little nephews; the youngest is four months old, and the oldest is five years old. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I have been sick with diphtheria, and my eyes are very weak, so that I can hardly see. I am thirteen years old.

FANNIE A. II.

ORANGE, NEW JERSEY.

I have seen so many letters in YOUNG PEOPLE from the boys and girls that I thought I would write too. I am a little girl eleven years old, and one who thinks a great deal of your nice paper. I have nine dolls; one is a widow, another is a colored servant named Chloe. My widow doll has two children, Mabel and Marian. I could tell you about the others, but I am afraid it would make my letter too long. I think Davy T.'s pet must have been a woodchuck.

LOUISE C. S.

WELLESLEY, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a little girl eleven years old, and I have a little sister nine years old. We live in the city of Philadelphia, but have come to visit my grandpa and grandma and spend the summer. They have a horse named Pansy, and she will eat cake out of your hand. My sister and I go to the Friends' School. Like the story of "Raising the Pearl" very much, and I have it read to me as soon as it comes. We have beautiful times at grandpa's going fishing and reading down at the wharf. I wrote this letter all myself, and I hope you will print it. So good-by.

THE DAISEIES' LESSON.

What do all the daisies say,
Sparkling in the heavy grass,
Lifting up their pretty heads,
Nodding to us as we pass?
"We are like the golden stars,
They shine upward, we shine too;
Both are doing just the work
God has given us to do."

Let us, then, the lesson learn
Of the pretty daisies teach,
Not to wish, with longings vain,
For the work beyond our reach;

But to do with all our might,
Every moment while we may,
Whatever our hands may find
Ever near our feet by day. — ALICE E.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT.

LESON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a little girl nine years old. I like reading in the Postmaster. I have written several letters myself, but not one has been printed. I have a large cat, whose name is Spicy; he is very handsome, and I think he would win the prize at a cat show. The other day I went to see a little girl, and we climbed up into a tree, and after the girl and I had gone out on a limb two more children came out, and one of them fell down, and I hurt my knee and my arm pretty badly. — LORNA S. B.

I like to hear of girls who climb trees, for I think a girl should excel in out-door sports, just as her brother does; but, dearie, four or five children on one limb were just three or four too many. It is a mercy you were not injured for life.

CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA.

I have been taking Young People two years, and like the stories ever so much. I will be eleven years old on the 16th of October. I have a sister older than myself. I wish you could see the little colored birds down here. They have feathers they wear their hair in little pigtails, forming a sort of halo around their fat shining faces, but on Sundays their mothers put little blue bows on the ends. Carrie once a sack to little honey baby whose name is Pearl. I take World's Companion too. I hope this is not too long. My sister Carrie is going to copy it for me.

Does the Postmistress ever play Go-board?

NED L.

She would if she ever had time, but you can't keep her too busy.

BROOKVILLE, MARYLAND.

I am not one of your subscribers, but my little sister Laura, who is thirteen, takes the Young People, and I am sure I enjoy reading it quite as much as she does, and my brother, who is a young man of twenty three, is a great admirer of it. Even papa enjoys the adventures of Captain Sunny and the boys. I had no idea that Tommy would prove himself so brave as he did in the shark adventure. I always feel a deep interest in Jimmy Brown's exploits. He certainly has an original mind, and if he continues to improve it at this rate he will be a very brilliant man. One little girl said she would pity Sue if Jimmy ever did go to live with her; but I think you and Tray would be quite as kind to Sue to be pried. I wish the wedding would come off, for I would like to see how Jimmy will improve his mind—or that of some one else—on the occasion.

Will some reader please tell me who is the author of the following lines?

"I slept, and dreamed that life was beauty;
I woke, and found that life was duty."
Was this, the dream a shadowy lie?
"Toll on and on heart, courageously,
And thou shalt find thy dream to be
A nocturnal light and truth to thee."

ELIZABETH, NEW JERSEY.

I have a little story to tell which I think the readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE would like to hear. One morning we went to the barn, and we saw an old hen with five little heads peeping from under her wings. And what do you think they were? We lifted the old hen up, and there were five little kittens. One was white, and the other four were dark. A day or two before the mother cat killed and ate some of our little white chickens. I think it was a kind return for the old hen to take care of her little kittens.

I have a box of paints, and I am beginning to paint flowers, and I thought I would put some on this letter.

SOPHIE M. S.

The flowers were painted very nicely, dear, and the story will charm the children. The old hen was a darling.

May's pretty rhyme, which comes next, matches the song we give you this week, does it not? Read it both. If you all love summer as I do, you will be pleased with this verse of May's:

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a little girl nine years old. I have a little sister; her name is Emma. My brother Andrew takes Young People; we also take Golden Days and St. Nicholas. My papa is writing this letter for me. I have composed a little piece of poetry, and here it is. I hope to see it printed; it would please my little brother Andrew very much:

The summer has come! the summer has come!
The flowers are nodding in the beautiful sun,
The children are singing their happiest songs,
The grasses are green, and the sidles are blue,
The world is lovely to me and to you,
The squirrel is hopping from tree to tree,
Happy as ever he can be. — MAY CLIFFORD 8.

PORTLAND, OREGON.

I have written once to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and the letter was not put in, so I thought I would write again. I think Jimmy Brown's stories are so funny. Margaret B. I think, wrote very nice letters. I am nine years old, and I have two sisters, Lucy and Genevieve. We had a nice dog, but he ran away all the time, so we sent him away. His name was Fetch. Don't you think that was a nice name? — EMILY S.

I ought to have been Scamp, when he was so naughty.

JANESVILLE, WISCONSIN.

I have been thinking I would write to you for some time. I have a little sister Mabel, who is four years old; I am nine. I have a very pretty bird called Winnie, and a dog Beauty. I had a red bird, but he died a few weeks ago. My auntie and cousin are visiting us. I was so glad when school was over! — MAYDIE L.

Bessie W. H.: Croquet is a pleasant out-door game, and I am glad you are fond of it. Write again, dear. — Percy S., Painesville, Ohio: The Postmistress would particularly like to receive a letter soon from this little boy, who has, she is afraid, felt a wee bit neglected. — Harold, and Harold's mamma, who live away off at Kona, Hawaii, are assured that the Postmistress clapped her hands with pleasure when she read little Harold's loving messages. She wishes she could see the passion-vine growing all over the veranda, and would like to kiss the pretty boy, and play hide-and-seek with him. — J. Friend L.: Good luck to your rabbits; they are very nice pets. Did you ever read about the poet Cowper and his pet hares Puss and Tiny? — Anna H.: A pet wild cat? Be careful. — John G. W.: Pora boy! only eleven years old you write a remarkably clear business hand, and I enjoyed reading your letter, although I am not able to face room for it. With six boys and three girls your mother must have a very houseful, and she at least has no need of other pets. — Emma L.: A pony, a kitten, two mocking-birds, and six dolls are enough for one little girl, I think. — Alice S. thinks Davy T.'s pet is a rabbit, and Lulu W. B. is sure it is a woodchuck. Some of the other children have guessed that it is a squirrel, and now, Master Davy, send a postal, and solve your conundrum. — Mary D. G.: Do not be discouraged because your letters are not printed. — G. J.: You will like to hear an orange grove must be charming at some periods of the year. — May R., Lucy L., Bessie P., Anna B., Herbert S., Theodore F., Sandy P., and M. G. will please accept thanks for their letters and messages; Helen K., Bertie T., Mattie F. E., M. K., and Susie S. deserve great praise for theirs. — Reuben L.: Birds' eggs are excluded from the articles which may be offered or asked for in exchange. — Sadie M. T.: You are a bright little seamstress.

THE FLOWER.

BY GEORGE FOLSOM.

THE beautiful Princess Nogodon had a great many noble suitors for her hand and heart. Ten had been put off with gentle regrets, when one day a strange knight, handsome as Apollo, presented himself at the castle gate. He was granted an audience with the Princess, and his gentleness and manly bearing won her favor at once. Fearing to give him too much encouragement at the first meeting, the Princess tried to think of some plan by which she might contrive to have him go away with the hope of winning the prize at last.

At this moment an attendant announced that there were four more cavaliers at the gate. Begging the knight to excuse her, the Princess gave her esquire orders to announce to all the suitors that the test of the Royal Maze should decide who should marry the Princess Nogodon.

There were fifteen paths to the Maze, one for each suitor, and but one led to the centre, where blossomed a lovely flower. The knight who returned with this flower would be entitled to claim the hand of the Princess. Each knight was to pick up the letters which he would find strewn along the path.

The Princess told an attendant to hang the cage containing her pet canary at a certain path, and then sent a message, in a feigned handwriting, bidding the favorite knight to select the path where he heard sweet singing. The knight did so, and returned bearing the flower, and the letters forming a name, while the other knights brought back nothing but letters, and were weary and disconsolate.

We show the Maze, with its fifteen paths. See who can find the one leading to the flower. Pick up the letters as you go, and form words with them in the order in which they are found in the path traversed.

OPEN and shut, yet have no lid;

And devote my time to art with zest;
I am found in all countries, and bought with a dime;
Though a thousand years old, I am still in my prime.

THE EGG-DANCE IN INDIA.

THE Indian egg-dance is not, as one might expect from the name given it, a dance upon these fragile objects. It is executed in this wise:

The dancer, dressed in a corsage and very short skirt, carries a willow wheel of moderate diameter fastened horizontally upon the top of her head. Around this wheel threads are fastened equally distant from each other, and at the end of each of these threads is a slip-noose, which is kept open by a glass bead. Thus equipped, the young girl comes toward the spectators with a basket full of eggs, which she passes around for inspection, to prove that they are real, and not imitations.

The music strikes up a jerky monotonous strain, and the dancer begins to whirl around with great rapidity. Then seizing an egg, she puts it in one of the slip-nooses, and with a quick motion throws it from her in such a way as to draw the knot tight. The swift turning of the dancer produces a centrifugal force which stretches the thread out straight, like a ray shooting from the circumference of the circle. One after another the eggs are thrown out in these slip-nooses, until they make a horizontal aureole or halo above the dancer's head. Then the dance becomes more rapid—so rapid, in fact, that it is difficult to distinguish the features of the girl.

The moment is critical: the least false step, the least irregularity of time, and the eggs dash against each other. But how can the dance be stopped? There is but one way; that is to remove the eggs in the way in which they have been put in place. This operation is by far the more delicate of the two. It is necessary that the dancer, by a single motion, exact and unerring, should take hold of the egg and remove it from the noose. A single false motion of the hand, the least interference with one of the threads, and the general arrangement is suddenly broken, and the whole performance disastrously ended.

At last all the eggs are successfully removed; then the dancer stops, and without seeming in the least dizzied by the dance of twenty-five or thirty minutes, advances with a firm step to the spectators, and presents them with the eggs, which are immediately broken in a flat dish to prove that there is no trick in the performance.

THE WEDDING PARTY.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH TAKEN IMMEDIATELY AFTER THE CEREMONY.

GENERAL TOM THUMB.
BY ELIOT McCORMICK.

OVER forty years ago a lady from Waterford, New York, who was visiting Hartford, Connecticut, told this bit of experience to her friends there:

"When I was in Bridgeport last week," she said, "I saw the finest, funniest little fellow in the world. The friends whom I was visiting wanted me to go to a children's school to see the smallest boy that ever attended any school. I went, and the school-mistress called up 'Charlie,' when a mite of a fellow came and stood on her held-out hands and recited his letters."

This little fellow was Charles Sherwood Stratton, afterward known as General Tom Thumb, and the story gives a good idea of his size and the impression he made on people when he first came before the public. It was in November, 1842, that Mr. Barnum discovered him at his home in Bridgeport, Connecticut, and a few weeks later that he made his appearance in New York. "He was not two feet high," says Mr. Barnum; "he weighed less than sixteen pounds, and was the smallest child I ever saw that could walk alone. After some coaxing he was induced to talk with me, and he told me that he was the son of Sherwood E. Stratton, and that his own name was Charles S. Stratton. After seeing him and talking with him I at once determined to secure his services from his parents, and to exhibit him in public."

Hereupon, however, occurred a difficulty. The child was very small, it was true, being not much higher than a man's knee. But then he was only five years old, and if that were known people might refuse to believe that he was a dwarf. Accordingly, when he was advertised in New York, six years had been added to his age, several inches subtracted from his height, and the place of his birth changed from Bridgeport to England. Here is the announcement that appeared in the Courier and Enquirer of December 17, 1842:

"General Tom Thumb was born in Lancashire, England, and arrived in this country in the steamer Columbia a short time since. He is eleven years of age, weighs fifteen pounds two ounces, and is exactly twenty-two inches high. Beyond all question he is the greatest dwarf of whom we have any account, being smaller than Sir Jeffrey Hudson, who was accidentally sewed up in a pyc to the amusement of his friends, and alongside of whom Major Stevens declares himself to be a giant. Of a verity he is the greatest curiosity we have ever seen. . . . No description can possibly enable the reader to form any idea of the diminutiveness of this little gentleman. . . . We shrewdly suspect that his cane is no more or less than the handle of a steel pen with a button on the largest end of it."

The General at once made a great sensation. People who are middle-aged now recollect with what delight they went to his entertainments when children, listened to his songs, enjoyed his quick wit, and admired the presents he received. For a year he charmed the children and interested the grown people of New York, and then Mr. Barnum determined to take him to England.

Here his success was even greater than at home. A house was hired in one of the fashionable neighborhoods, cards were sent out to the nobility, and in a few days elegant carriages blocked the street in front of the door, while crowds of distinguished people thronged the drawing-rooms for a glimpse of the little General. Mr. Barnum even managed to let the Queen hear of him, and in a few days he was summoned to Buckingham Palace.

An older person might have been frightened by the importance of the occasion and the elegance of the company, but the General was only a child, and was too used to crowds by this time to show any shyness or fear. He talked to the Queen as if she were his mother, and delighted all the royal household by his bright manner and clever speech. Her Majesty presented him with a beautiful gold watch and chain, and other gifts were made to him by the different members of the family.

When it became known that he had visited court the interest of the public increased. Entertaining stories were everywhere told of his cleverness and wit. On one occasion, it was related, the Duke of Wellington came into the hall while the General was representing the character of Napoleon Bonaparte. Walking up to the platform, the old Duke pleasantly inquired,

"What are you thinking of, General?"

The little fellow, who had been pacing up and down the stage, lost in thought, looked up from underneath his cocked hat and recognized the Duke.

"I was thinking," he said, quickly, "of the loss of Waterloo."

One can get a good idea of the excitement that prevailed by reading what was said at the time. Haydon, an artist who was exhibiting his pictures in the same building, and to whose exhibition no one came, tells us that in one week twelve thousand persons paid to see Tom Thumb, while only one hundred and thirty-three and one-half came to see his show. So great was the enthusiasm over the little General that he is said to have made half a million of dollars out of his two years' European tour.

In 1863 Tom Thumb's public career reached its highest point in his marriage to Lavinia Warren Bump. This young lady, who was also a dwarf, had been discovered by Mr. Barnum the year previous at her home in Middleborough, Massachusetts, and placed on exhibition at the Museum in New York. She was then about twenty-two years old, and quite attractive in her personal appearance. Crowds flocked to the Museum to see her, and the excitement rivalled that caused by Tom Thumb twenty years before. The General himself became interested, and not unnaturally formed the idea of making her his wife. Happily Miss Warren, as she was called, listened favorably to his suit, and in a short time the little couple had become engaged. Their wedding was arranged by Mr. Barnum on a scale of great splendor, and many who are yet young remember the sensation which it caused. New York had fewer sensations then than now, and the marriage of General Tom Thumb was quite a wonderful event.

On the 10th of February, 1863, the ceremony was performed at Grace Church, New York. A large and fashionable company was present, no one being admitted who had not a card of invitation; it is said, indeed, that as much as fifty dollars was bid for a ticket, of which, however, none were sold. The best man was the rival dwarf, Commodore Nutt, and the bridesmaid Miss Minnie Warren, Lavinia's sister. After the wedding a reception was held at the Metropolitan Hotel, and the little couple went off on their bridal tour.

They have since exhibited both in this country and Europe, but with their marriage public interest in a large measure died out, and of late years little has been seen or heard of them. On the 15th of July Tom Thumb suddenly died. He had grown since he was first exhibited to be forty inches in height, and at the time of his death weighed about seventy pounds.

COUSIN TOM'S WEDDING.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JUN.

IT was to be in the church, with music and flowers, and my brother Claude and I were to walk up the middle aisle and lead the procession.

"Now you must both put on your best behavior," said mother, after we had worried ourselves into our new clothes on the all-important night; then she kissed us just as if we'd been going to bed, and sent us off to the church an hour before the time.

We found the sexton just opening the doors, and he let us go round with him while he lighted up, and then I proposed that we should stand outside and watch the people come.

"I wonder if Cousin Tom feels nervous," said Claude, as we walked down the steps under the awning. "I shouldn't think he would, though, for you know doctors— But I say, Bert, what's the matter down the street there? See all that crowd? Let's run and find out."

"Come on," I cried; "I'll beat you there," and forgetting all about our good clothes and "best behavior," we both started off down the block.

"Oh, somebody's been run over, or something!" I exclaimed, as I won the race and found a lot of people bending over the form of a man lying on the grass in front of the Baptist church.

We both stood still for a minute, and I was trying to listen to what a gentleman next to me was telling a policeman, when Claude pulled me by the sleeve and whispered that it might be the very case Cousin Tom, who had just graduated at the Medical School, was waiting for.

"Let's tell him about it!" I cried. "Quick, before they get somebody else;" and then we both tore off to his lodgings, around the corner, and pulled the bell as if the house was afire.

I tell you, the girl came to the door in a hurry, and without waiting for her to announce us we bolted upstairs to Cousin Tom's room, and rushed in to find him just putting on his white satin neck-tie.

"Oh, do come quick!" we both fairly shouted. "Such a—"

"Why, boys, what's the matter?" he exclaimed, making a muddle of his cravat. "Has Alice fainted, or the dressmaker forgotten to send her dress home, or what?"

"No, no," cried Claude. "There's a man hurt, and an awful crowd, and—"

"Quick, how far from here?" interrupted Cousin Tom, leaving the two ends of his tie hanging, and snatching his pea-jacket. "I can spare just twenty minutes."

"Why, it's only around the corner, in front of the Baptist church," I replied, dancing around the room in great excitement; and then we all three raced off.

"Where is he, boys?" cried Cousin Tom, and Claude pointed inside the railing that ran in front of the church, and against which, strange to say, nobody was leaning.

Then, not waiting to hunt up the gate, our cousin, who was a great strapping fellow, shouldered his way through the crowd, and without paying any attention to the efforts some of the people made to hold him back, he placed his hands on the top rail of the fence to vault over.

The next instant he gave a spring backward instead of forward, and fell against Claude, who of course fell against me, and we all three went down one after another like a row of bricks, while the people set up such a yell that you might have thought they had all turned into wild Indians on the war-path.

Being nor, and quite used to hard knocks, neither Claude nor I was hurt, and we sprang up as lively as ever when Cousin Tom was lifted off of us. But there was not much spring about him, and we were awfully frightened when we found that he couldn't even speak.

Then they explained the whole thing to us, which was something like this: there was an electric light in front of the store next the church, and in some way the stuff—the electric fluid or whatever it is—had got off the track, or the wires, and run into the fence, and so whoever touched it got a most tremendous shock. That was what was the matter with the man inside, and the crowd had tried to warn Cousin Tom, but he was too excited about getting an interesting case to listen.

"Oh, if he's killed, it's all our fault for telling him about it!" moaned Claude.

"And he was going to be married in half an hour," I added, despairingly. "And Miss Lord 'll be in the church waiting for him, and when he don't come she may have a fit or something, and oh, Claude, how can we tell her?"

By this time they had picked Cousin Tom up and carried him into a drug store a few doors off. They told us he was only stunned, and would probably be able to sit up in the course of half an hour. As he hadn't lived in town a week yet, nobody in the crowd knew who he was, and so the burden of carrying the dreadful news to the wedding party fell upon Claude and me.

"It's five minutes to eight now," announced my brother, nervously, as having left word with the druggist that we would soon be back with friends and a carriage, we hurried off to the Episcopal church. "Cousin Tom't was to be in the vestry by this time, and, oh my! won't it be awful to have Miss Lord walk up the aisle on her father's arm, and then find nobody to marry her?"

"But, Claude," I proposed, a bright idea suddenly striking me, "if we can't only get to the church soon enough to see her drive up, we can tell her then, and have the coachman keep right on to the drug store."

"The very thing!" cried Claude. "Let's run for it."

And run we did, but, alas! arrived at the church just in time to see the bride's carriage drive away from the awning—empty.

We could hear the organ playing and the people whispering that the procession would soon begin to move toward the altar.

"Oh, why don't they make sure Cousin Tom's here first?" I exclaimed, in a whisper.

"Perhaps they will," returned Claude. "At any rate they ought to wait for us to lead off; but, stop, I've got a plan, and though it's a kind of desperate one, it 'll save Miss Lord having a scene before everybody. I'll—" and he spoke the rest very softly in my ear.

"Why, Claude, dare you?" I cried, under my breath. "And do you know how to do it?"

"Yes, I noticed the place when we were in here with the sexton. Now do you think you can get up close to Miss Lord before I count twenty slowly?"

I nodded and hurried into the church, leaving Claude to take up his station in a dark corner of the vestibule. The procession was evidently waiting for us, and as fast as I could I squeezed a way through the crowd to take my place in front of the bride. She smiled when she caught sight of me, and put out her hand. Then just as I took it every light in the church went out, and I knew Claude had succeeded in his plan of turning off the gas.

"Don't be frightened, Miss Lord," I whispered, still keeping hold of her hand, "but come out with me to the carriage, because Cousin Tom's hurt, but not very bad, only he can't stand up long enough to be married yet, and— But I'll take you to him right away."

Well, she didn't scream nor say she was going to faint, but just held on to my hand tight, and let me lead her out in the dark. We found Claude on the sidewalk, holding the door of the carriage open; and ordering the coachman (who looked as if he thought we were eloping with the bride) to drive to the drug store. We all three got in, and were off before the people in the church had a chance to think of anything else but the darkness into which they had so suddenly been plunged.

"But—but did the electric fluid put out the lights in church?" asked Miss Lord, after we had explained to her about Cousin Tom's shock.

"Oh no; I turned off the gas," said Claude, promptly. "Don't you think it was a good way to keep people from staring at you and gossiping when they found the groom didn't come?"

"Yes, I see now, and I am sure I am very much obliged for your thoughtfulness; but what will papa and mamma think has become of me?"

"That's so!" I exclaimed. "We forgot all about that part of it. Stop the carriage, and I'll run back;" which I did, and found the church lighted up again, a bigger crowd than ever inside, and Mr. and Mrs. Lord rushing about in every direction in search of their daughter.

I was a little frightened at first, but remembering how much the bride had been spared by our plan, I walked boldly up to the "distracted parents," and began to explain the whole thing. This took some time, but I told the story as quick as I could, and I had scarcely finished when back came the carriage with Cousin Tom and Miss Lord both in it.

I jumped as if I had seen a ghost, and indeed Tom looked like one, but declared that he was every bit strong enough to go through with the ceremony. Miss Lord was already in her mother's arms, and I was awfully afraid we'd have a scene, after all, but luckily everybody thought it was because the gas had gone out, and in ten minutes they were safely married, and nobody out of the family the wiser.

THE HOSPICE OF ST. BERNARD.

BY KATE VANZANDT.

WAY up among the loftiest of the snow-clad Alpine mountains stands the Hospice of St. Bernard. This is the good saint who, if the legend tells us truly, was born at the little village of Menthon, in the upper Alps, and who thought that he could serve God better by building here a monastery, so high and so removed from the world that he and his followers might live safe from temptation, spending their lives in prayer and holy thinking, and in helping travellers whose business led them through this dangerous region.

This is the highest winter dwelling in all the upper Alps. Elsewhere the hardy Swiss come when the spring sunshine begins to warm the earth, bringing their flocks with them, but at the first whistling of the autumn winds back they go into their sheltered valleys. Only the good brothers of the Monastery of St. Bernard remain, holding their place here and on the Simplon, keeping a sharp watch day and night, and ready always to expose their lives if they can succor some wayfarer whose struggle with the difficulties of the mountain pass has worn out his strength and exposed him to a terrible death from cold and hunger.

The society connected with the monastery has at present about forty members. It was founded in 962, since when the regular brotherhood has consisted of from ten to fifteen Augustinian monks. To these may be added a number of lay brothers, who attend to certain charitable and religious work in various parts of the adjoining valley. A word, too, must be said for the good and faithful dogs, which, though their names are not registered on the roll of the society, play a part that no human being could fill.

Some three weeks ago, when we were travelling through Switzerland, climbing great peaks and clambering over billowy frozen glaciers, we met one of the good Brothers of St. Bernard. He was a young and broad-shouldered gentleman, who had recently been sent from the Hospice of St. Bernard to that on the Simplon. From him we learned the ways of the brotherhood and something of the life they live during the winter days, when only the visit of a traveller or the rescue of one from a terrible death breaks the long and weary monotony.

There are nine months of winter on the St. Bernard, and nearly as many on the other Alpine passes. The snow covers the landscape for miles around, the wind whistles fiercely through the great upright peaks, and all the desolateness of stormy skies shrouds the poor lonely hospice in terrible gloom.

The present massive building dates away back from the sixteenth century. There are two buildings. One contains the church, the rooms of the brothers, and numerous apartments for the reception of travellers; the other and smaller is called the Hôtel de St. Louis, and serves for a refuge in case of fire, and as a granary, and a lodging for the poorer class of wayfarers.

All travellers, come they upon any day or any hour, are welcome at the hospice. On arriving each is received and welcomed by a brother clad in black robes, with the cross embroidered on his breast, who sets forth what the house has to furnish, or who offers a neat room where the visitor may rest and lodge so long as he chooses to remain.

No money is ever received by the brothers from the traveller who rests or refreshes himself at the Hospice of St. Bernard. If he will he may place a deposit in the little box which bears the inscription "For the Poor"; but no money is demanded and none received by the brothers themselves.

Yet the monastery is not rich. In older times it was, but of late years people have been less liberal toward it. It is said that of late years nearly twenty thousand travellers have been accommodated every year, but that they have scarcely left behind them money enough to pay for the entertainment of one thousand. But that some have been generous we know from the pictures that hang upon the walls, and from the valuable objects that adorn the church and the various rooms.

The provisions for the hospice are mostly brought from Aosta, on the Italian slope of the Alps. Sometimes twenty horses are daily employed in the transport of articles in the way of food and of fuel for the use of the hospice. The latter, of which vast quantities are consumed in winter, is brought from the Val de Ferret, twelve miles distant.

From our good friend the brother who explained to us so much of the life and the purpose of the noble band who spend their days, or such part of them as their health is spared, at the two hospices, we obtained a photograph of himself and his associates, and also of some of the noble dogs that share their labors. From these photographs our artist has drawn the accompanying picture.

The original stock of the St. Bernard dogs is believed to have come from the Spanish Pyrenees. This genuine old stock is now extinct, but there are many noble fellows to succeed them, who, if their lineage is a little doubtful, are certainly as intelligent and faithful as their predecessors.

Some of the four-footed heroes have a record of which any human being might be proud. One has saved three or four lives, another six, another scarcely less than a dozen; yet they wear no decorations, and their names are not known to the world. They go about with their soft intelligent eyes, intent upon their duty when duty calls, but at other times gentle and playful as children, demanding nothing but a caress, or a piece of meat if there is one to be spared from the table where their masters are dining.

"THE FAIRY PLACE WHERE DAISIES GREW."

The following is one of the latest instances of the wisdom and devotion shown by these dogs: A short time ago Father Nicholas, a monk of the Grande Chartreuse, once aide-de-camp to the Czar, was returning from Fourvoirie to his monastery, followed by a fine St. Bernard dog, to which he was greatly attached. Instead of keeping to the highway, he took a foot-path which runs along the left bank of the river Guirs, which is thereabouts very steep. As he walked he read his prayer-book, and being intent on his devotions, he made a false step, and falling down the precipice his course was not stopped until he reached—unconscious and terribly bruised—the edge of the stream. The dog followed, and, as is supposed, tried to rouse him. Not succeeding, he returned to the foot-path, and did his best to attract the attention of two shepherds who happened to be passing; but alarmed by the mastiff's manner, and thinking him mad, they ran away as fast as their legs could carry them.

The next day the dog presented himself at the monastery, and the monks, thinking from his appearance that he was hungry, offered him food. But the animal refused to eat, and by his plaintive barkings and gestures did his best to tell the monks that something was wrong. In the end some of them decided to follow him, and the dog, with many signs of delight, led the way to the place where he had left his master. When he reached the part of the river-bank whence Father Nicholas had fallen he began to bark, and the monk, who had by this time recovered consciousness, was able to utter a feeble shout. When his rescuers, preceded by the mastiff, reached him, they found him lying with his feet in the stream, and quite unable to move. With the help of the shepherds, whom the barkings and shoutings had drawn to the spot, they contrived to drag him to the top of the precipice and carry him to the monastery. The mastiff remained by the bedside of his master, whom his intelligence had saved from a frightful death, until he recovered.

Sometimes these brave dogs fail to discover a traveller until the terrible cold of the mountains has done its work, and no effort will bring him back to life. Then the monks bring the body and place it in a small building called the Morgue. Here it will remain without decaying, for the cold is so great that the process can not go on, and years afterward persons have recognized their friends lost on the terrible Alpine heights.

No traveller can visit the Hospice of St. Bernard without a feeling of respect and admiration for the heroic and devoted band who have charge of it. When they go to take their places there they know that within a certain time their health must fail, and that, while still young in years, they must return, old and broken, to the valley to wait for death.

THE LITTLE GIRL OF THE "FRESH-AIR FUND."

BY MARY D. BRINE.

IT WAS little she knew of the sweet green grass,
With its wonderful wealth of clover,
Which, far outside of the city's walls,
Was spreading the broad fields over.
Yet blue her eyes as the summer skies,
And as sunny her tangled hair
As the goldenest sunbeam ever sent
To lie on the earth so fair.

What wonder she opened her blue eyes wide
When she learned, one happy day,
That she and many a child beside
Were to travel far away,
"To the fairy place where daisies grew,
And the streets were soft and green,"
And her little heart o'erflowed for joy
Of the glad things yet unseen.

Old Farmer Jones on the platform stood
When the train came in at last,
And the little "waif" who was sent to him
He clasped in his strong arms fast,
"For it's never a chick nor a child have I,"
Said he to the agent then,
"An' just as true as the heavens are blue I'll be good to this gal. Amen!"

And he bore her home to the shady farm,
And he "turned her out to grass,"
As he merrily said. And the sun and breeze
Made free with the little lass,
And kissed her cheeks till they blushed as red
As the reddest rose that grew,
And innocent mischief peeped from out
The ooze sad eyes of blue.

"Dear friend," says a letter from Farmer Jones,
"There's no two ways about it,
This farm's got used to the wee gal's laugh,
An', in fael, can't thrive without it.
Why, bless your soul! it would do ye good
To watch the chick each day
A-turbin' the old place upside down
A-toug of her happy play.

"An' me an' my wife we don't see how There's anything else to do
But just holl on to the kettle gal,
If it's all the same to you.
An' I reckon the blessed child that lives
With the angels in the skies
Won't mind if the little uew one stays
To wipe the tears from our eyes.

"An' the mother this gal has lost will find
My pet in the angel land,
An' I make no doubt but they'll both be glad
As they watch us, haud in haud.
So, now, whatever there is to do,
Just write it fur me to sign,
An' God's blessin' rest on the 'Fresh-Air Fund'—
Your work as well as mine."

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS,

AUTHOR OF "PRINCESS IDEWEAYS," "PHIL'S FAIRIES," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

LEO had heard of kobolds and gnomes and elves, but in all his wanderings over the Lazybones estate in the brightness of noon, the dewy dawn, or dusky eve, or later when the moon bathed every shrub in silver, he had never so much as caught a glimpse of fairy folk.

Here, however, was a real elf—a most peculiar person. He was extremely small, thin, and wiry, about two and a half inches high, and his costume a cross between that of a student or professor and that of a miner, for on his bushy head was a miner's cap with a lantern, and on his back was a student's gown, while his thin legs were incased in black silk stockings, and his feet in rough hob-nailed boots. Slung over one shoulder was a leather bag, and in his hand was a curious sort of a tool.

"The Master Professor Knops has the honor of saluting Prince Leo Lazybones," was the way in which this extraordinary person introduced himself, making at the same time a deep bow and a military salute, but with no raising of the cap from which the little lantern gleamed with a bright blue flame. Leo returned the salutation with lazy grace, smiling curiously upon the queer little object before him, who proceeded to say:

"And now let us go; I lead—you follow."

"Forward, then," responded Leo, rising from his lounging attitude.

The elf went nimbly down the corridor as if accustomed to it, and paused before a door which led to a flight of stone steps.

"Are you going down cellar?" asked Leo, who knew where the stairs led.

"I am," replied Knops; "but these huge doors and heavy hinges bother me. Be so good as to open and close them for me. By-the-way, you may get hungry; shall we find food down here?"

"Perhaps so," said Leo, following, and doing as requested.

They went down step after step, and it was wonderful how much light came from that little blue flame.

On skipped the elf, his gown pulling out, his nailed boots pattering over the stones, and Leo found himself quite breathless when they reached the cellar, so unused was he to any rapidity of movement.

"Suppose we meet some one," said Leo.

"And what have we to fear if we do? No one can see me, and if you are afraid of a scullion or house-maid you are not the Prince I take you for. Tut! tut! don't be afraid—come on."

The cellar was damp, and great curtains of cobwebs, like gray lace, fell over the empty bins and wine vaults. From a heap of winter vegetables Leo filled his pockets with apples and turnips.

They came at last to a door which Leo remembered having opened once, but finding that it led to a passage which was dark, dismal, and unused, he had not cared to explore it. He now followed the elf through it, but not without misgivings, for as he groped along he stepped on a round object which, to his horror, when the little blue flame of the elf's lantern revealed its empty sockets and grinning jaws, proved to be a skull.

Knops turned with a smile when he saw Leo's agitation, and said, blandly,

"You are not interested in this form of natural history, I see." Then taking up the skull, he placed it in a crevice of the wall, saying, "Here is another proof that there are no ghosts about. Do you think any one would be so careless of his knowledge-box as to leave it to be kicked around in that way? Oh, those old monks were miserable housekeepers; the idea of stowing away their skeletons so near their kitchen closets!"

Leo smiled faintly, and went on after Knops, who every once in a while gave a tap on the walls with his tool, starting the echoes.

"There!" said he, "do you hear that? This is the way we make old houses haunted. I don't do it for fun, as do the elves of folly. I have a sensible purpose; but they like nothing better than to frighten people, and so they make these noises at all hours, and get up reports that a house is bewitched; but even a common insect like the cricket can do that, human beings are such ridiculous cowards."

Leo made an effort to assume the courage which he did not feel, and asked his guide how much farther he intended to lead him.

"Now," said Knops, stopping, and putting on an air of intense gravity, as if he were about to deliver a lecture, "I must beg you, my dear Prince, to place perfect confidence in me. I promised not to harm you. As a member of the S. P. C. C., I am pledged to protect you. As a member of the S. P. C. C., I am pledged to protect you; besides, you have no idea how much I am interested in you; this expedition has been planned entirely for your benefit. Trust me, then, and give yourself entirely up to my control. Ask as many questions as you wish, provided they are useful ones. Just say, without ceremony, 'Knops, why is this? or, Knops, what is that?' and I, in return, if you will be so good as to allow me, will say, frankly, 'Leo, this is this, 'or 'that is that.' But here is the entrance to our habitations. You will have to stoop a little." Striking again with his tool, a panel slid open in the wall, through which they crept.

It was still dark, but the air had changed greatly; instead of the musty dampness of a vault, there was a soft warmth, which was fragrant and spicy, and a beam as of moonlight began to illuminate the passage, which broadened until they stood at its termination, when Leo found himself on a ledge or gallery of rock, which was but one of many in the vast cavern which opened before them.

On its floor was burning an immense bonfire, which flashed and flamed, and around which was a bevy of dwarfs, shovelling on fuel from huge heaps of sandalwood. Every gallery swarmed with elves and dwarfs in all sorts of odd costumes, but all bore little lanterns in their caps and tools in their hands. Some were hammering at great boulders, others with picks were working in passages similar to the one Leo had left, and others seemed to be turning lathes, sharpening knives, cutting and polishing heaps of brilliant stones. Every once in a while a party of queer little creatures much smaller than Knops would trundle in wheelbarrows full of rough pebbles, and, dumping them down before those employed in cutting and polishing, would be off again in a jiffy for another load.

Leo was so astonished that he stood perfectly silent, gazing now at the flashing fire which reflected from all sides of the brilliant quartz of the cavern, and now at the tier upon tier of galleries full of busy little people.

"This is one of our workshops," said Knops, "but not the most important. Now that you have rested a moment I will take you to that."

Lie upon line of red and green in rubies and emeralds were at the base of the grotto, and then he found that the emeralds sprang up into long grasses and the rubies into flaming roses, and on slender spars were lilies of pearls and daisies of diamonds, and blending with these were vines of honeysuckle and strawberries, gleaming with sapphires and topaz and amethysts, wreathing and flashing up to a ceiling of lapis lazuli blue as a June sky. The floor was a mosaic of turquoise forget-me-nots on a turf of Egyptian jasper.

When Leo had looked at all this bewildering beauty

* Begun in No. 195 HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Knops pushed open the mica door again, and they began to traverse the galleries of the rock cavern. He was surprised that none of the elves noticed him, nor even looked at him, and he asked Knops the reason.

"I have rendered you invisible to them, my dear Leo, for two reasons: one is that you may be undisturbed in your examination of their work, and the other is that they may not be interrupted; for of course your presence would be a source of lively interest to them, and yet any stoppage of work would necessitate punishment."

"Punishment?" repeated Leo, questioningly.

"Oh yes; most of our hardest workers are elves of mischief, and it is only by keeping them thus constantly employed that we prevent disorder. You have no idea what pranks they play."

"And what is your authority among them?" asked Leo.

"I am one of our King's cabinet; my title is Master Professor. My learning qualifies me to decide upon the plans of work, where to search for precious stones, and how best to prepare them for man's finding. Nothing is more amusing than the wonder and surprise men exhibit at what they consider their discoveries of minerals and gems, when for ages we have been arranging them for their clumsy hands."

"How do you do this?"

"Ah! it's a long story. Here you see the result of our long searches, and were it not for the processes we conduct none of these stones would ever be found. We can penetrate where man has never been; we can construct what man has in vain tried to do. Come with me to our diamond-room; we do not make many, preferring to find them; but as an interesting scientific experiment we have always liked to test our ability."

So saying, Knops turned down a little lane lighted by what looked like small globes of white fire.

"Electric light," said Knops, with a gesture of disdain, as he saw Leo blinking with wonder, "the commonest sort of a blaze; and yet men have nearly added their brains over it, while we made it boil our kettles. It's the simplest and cheapest fuel one can have; but having utilized it so long, I am on the lookout for something new. Here, this is the way;" and again he opened a mica door.

CHAPTER IV.

BLOW-PIPES and retorts, crucibles and jars, porcelain and glass vessels of all odd sorts and shapes confronted them on tables and shelves, and, seated before small furnaces, with gauze protectors for their faces and metal ones for their knees, and queer little rubber gloves for their hands, were the very queerest of all the elves Leo had yet seen. They were thinner and much less muscular than the miners and stone-polishers, with eyes too large and legs too small for their bodies, so that they resembled nothing so much as spiders.

"See how in the pursuit of the beautiful one can lose all beauty," said Knops, confidentially.

"How hot it is here!" said Leo, gasping for breath.

"Yes, my dear fellow, there's no doubt of that; the heat is tremendous. Now some of your thermometers go no higher than a hundred and thirty, while ours can ascend to three and four hundred; that is, for the common air of our dwellings. Of course the heat demanded by many of our experiments is practically incalculable; for instance—"

"Oh, get me out of this!" entreated Leo.

"Here, step into this niche, put your mouth to this opening?"—and Knops pointed to one of many silver tubes which projected near them—"now breathe. Is not that refreshing?"

"Yes," said Leo, reviving, as he took a long draught of fresh cool air. "How do your people endure such heat?"

"They are used to it; besides, they can come to these little tubes, as you have done, whenever they please."

"Where does this air come from?"

"It is pure oxygen; we manufacture it, and here is a lump of pure carbon which we also manufacture," and he laid in Leo's hand what looked like a drop of dew. It was a diamond of exquisite lustre.

As Leo looked with surprise and admiration at it an elf came staggering up to the niche. After breathing the oxygen he turned to Knops with a heart rending cry.

"I have lost it—lost it, Master Knops."

"Lost what, Paz?"

"The finest stone I ever made, and I have been years at it."

"How did that happen?"

"Burned it too long—look!" and he produced in his spidery hand a small mass of charcoal.

"Never mind, Paz; better luck next time," said Knops, kindly.

"No, I am no longer fit for the profession; such a mistake is inexcusable. I can not hold up my head among the others. I meant that diamond for our King's tiara or the Queen's necklace—bah! P lease, Master Professor, put me among the miners, or take me for your valet. I care not what I do."

"You are depressed just now; wait awhile."

"No, I must go. I have broken my crucible and put out my furnace. I will not stay to be scorned."

"Come with me, then, and I will see what I can do for you."

"He may be useful to us," said Knops to Leo, adding, "we never allow these diamonds to be put in the quartz beds; they are all reserved for our own particular uses. It takes so long a time to make them that only elves of great patience and a certain quiet habit of mind are trained to the task. Look!"

He pointed toward what appeared to be a glittering cobweb hanging from a projection on the wall. It was composed of silver wires, on which were strung numbers of small but most exquisite gems, each of which sparkled and flashed with its imprisoned light.

"In the same way," he resumed, "all the pearls we use are of our own cultivation, if I may use the term. We secure the oysters and insert small objects within the shells, generally a seed-pearl of insignificant size, leaving it to be worked upon by the living fish; when enough time for the incrustation has elapsed we find our pearls grown to a remarkable size, of rarest beauty and value. These processes are not unknown to man, but men are so clumsy that they seldom succeed in perfecting them."

Leo by this time was quite exhausted both by what he had seen and by what he had heard, and he begged Knops to allow him to rest.

"Certainly, certainly, my dear," said Knops. "Pardon me for wearying you. I am more scientific than hospitable. Come to our sleeping apartment. I think I shall allow Paz to see you, for, as he is so unhappy, it will divert him to serve you while you remain with us, and perhaps, too, he can suggest something suitable for your food. I ought to have thought of this before."

Leo had, with three or four bites, disposed of an apple, and had already begun on a turnip, when Knops, giving Paz a peculiar sign, the spidery little fellow reached up and snatched the turnip from Leo's hand.

"What's the matter now?" asked Leo, too tired to regain it, easily as he could have done so.

"I can't see anybody eat such wretched stuff as that; wait till I cook it," said Paz.

"Well, Paz, I am glad you can help me out of my difficulty," said Knops. "I really am puzzled what to do for Prince Leo's hunger. My breakfast is a wren's egg; for dinner, a sardine with a slice of mushroom is enough for four of us; for supper, a pickled mouse tongue. How long could you live on such fare, Leo?"

"Not long, I fear."

"So I supposed. Well, here is the dormitory; by push-

"THEY WENT DOWN STEP AFTER STEP."

ing up a dozen or more beds, you can stretch out awhile. Meanwhile I can attend to some professional duties, after I have dispatched Paz for your food. What are you going to do with that turnip, Paz?"

"An elf who can make diamonds from charcoal can perhaps produce beefsteak from a turnip," said Leo.

"Ah! don't remind me of my bitter humiliation, kind sir," said Paz, in a sad tone. "I will do what I can for you. Do you like soup?"

"Immensely."

"And roast quail?"

"Delicious!"

"Apple tart?"

"Nothing better."

"Adieu, then, for an hour."

Knops too departed, leaving Leo to look about him, with curious eyes, upon rows of little beds, each with a scarlet blanket, and each having its pitcher and basin conveniently at hand. But he soon was fast asleep.

While all this was happening to Leo, at the Monastery was great confusion. The servants had gone in a body to Prince Morpheus's bedroom to demand their wages. With tearful eyes and wailing voice he had protested that he had no money, that his life was hanging by a thread, and that his brain was on fire. They loudly urged their claims, declaring they would instantly leave the premises unless they were paid. As they could not get a satisfactory reply from their master, who hid his eyes at the sight of their angry faces, and put his fingers in his ears to keep out their noisy voices, they concluded to go; so, packing their boxes and bags, and pressing the mules and oxen into their service, they one by one went off to the nearest village.

One old woman, who had never known any other home, alone remained, and when the storm subsided and the house was quiet, Morpheus, being hungry, crawled down to the kitchen fire to find her boiling porridge.

"Where is my son?" asked Morpheus.

The old woman was deaf, and only muttered, "Gone—all gone."

"Alas! and has my son also deserted his father?" cried Morpheus.

The old woman nodded, partly with the palsy, and partly because she knew of nothing to say. Morpheus smote his forehead with a tragic gesture, and allowed himself to fall—gently—upon the floor. When he had remained in an apparent swoon long enough he was revived by some hot porridge being poured down his throat, and his hair and hands sprinkled with vinegar. Rousing himself as if with great effort, but really with great ease, he stood up, and finding the kitchen warmer than his cell, concluded to remain there; but the old woman was too stiff with rheumatism to wait upon him, so he had to ladle out his own portion of porridge, get his books and candle for himself, and finally bring in some fagots for the fire.

When he sat down to study he found himself in a more cheerful mood than he had been in for many a day, though he could not help wondering what had become of Leo. As he went on thinking where the boy could be he was inspired to write what he called a sonnet upon the subject. Here it is:

My boy has fled his father's home,
No more he treads these halls;
In vain my voice invokes his name,
In vain my tears, my calls.
The night winds sigh, the owlets cry,
The moon's pale light appears,
The stars are shivering in the sky—
I tremble at my fears.
Has then the Knight of Shadow Dread
My Leo forced away
From his fond parent's loving heart
In Death's grim halls astray?
I bow reluctant to my fate;
'Tis mine to weep and mine to wail!

He counted the lines over carefully; the eighth and tenth seemed short, but it scanned after a fashion. On the whole it suited him, and was rather better done than many of his verses, so with soothed nerves he sought his pillow.

The old woman had slumbered all the evening in her chair. Indeed, her snoring had been even and regular enough to act as a measure in marking the time for the musical cadences of the sonnet.

Morpheus, having a pretty good appetite, ate some bread and cheese and drank some ale before retiring.

BRAVO, STICK!

BY MARGARET EXTINGE.

ONE day in autumn a fine flower bulb was planted some five or six inches deep in the rich brown ground, and a stick that the gardener had found lying in the field just outside of the garden gate was stuck near it.

"Well," said the stick, in a dry little voice, as soon as the gardener had gone, "I never thought to be brought into this beautiful garden, at which I have been peeping through the fence for a month or more. I wonder if I am to live here always? I hope so."

"If you do live here always," called the flower bulb from her snug resting-place, "I don't see what good it will do you. You're only a stick, and a stick you'll remain. Now I—and, by-the-bye, if it hadn't been for me you'd have staid in the field, for you were wanted only to mark the place where I am planted—shall greet the spring with handsome green leaves and the summer with lovely blossoms."

Now it happened, before the winter was over, a hungry mole burrowed its way into the garden, and, sniffing about in search of something to eat, found all the roots and bulbs too bitter for its taste with the exception of one—the very one that had spoken so boastfully to the stick—and that it speedily devoured. And so when spring arrived nothing came from the spot where that bulb had been placed to greet her.

But, lo and behold, the stick had taken root, and was covered with the prettiest tiny green leaves. The gardener, coming that way, looked at it with wonder. "Why, that's the stick I picked up outside last fall," said he. "I'll let it stay there, and see what it comes to." And it came to a sturdy trelet, covered before the summer passed away with fragrant pale pink flowers. Some chrysanthemums, who had heard the conversation between the bulb and the stick when they paid their autumn visit, cried, "Bravo, stick! you have done well, but how did you do it?"

"Oh, I tried so hard!" said the trelet, in a mellow little voice; "and I never lost heart, no matter how cold the winter wind and snow. But I'm sorry the mole ate the poor flower bulb."

SEA-BATHING AND FLOATING.

BY CAPTAIN MATTHEW WEBB, THE CHANNEL SWIMMER.

ONE of the first points to decide upon with regard to sea-bathing is, Who should bathe and who should not? I do not, you see, put the question, Who should swim and who should not? The fact is, that if you can swim you will be sure to want to bathe.

Now many persons will declare that this point is one for a doctor to decide, but this I deny, except in very exceptional cases. It is a question of common-sense. The first question is, Do you feel inclined for it? If you do, it will probably do you good. The next point is, If you don't, how far are parents justified in making their boys bathe who would rather not? This entirely depends upon how they go to work to make them bathe. You must treat young and nervous lads like puppies. If you throw a puppy into the water you will spoil it forever. The proper course is to coax it in, and as with the puppy, so with the boy.

There is a great deal of difference between pluck and fool-hardiness, and I recollect a case many years ago which will explain what I mean. Two boys were bathing where there was considerable tide. One of these boys tried to persuade the other to swim out to a rock some little distance away. The other refused, notwithstanding that his companion called him a coward; and in order to show his own superior courage, the first boy tried it himself. But the tide ran sideways, and the boy, failing to reach the rock, became tired, and finding he could not have the rest he anticipated, turned for the shore; he took short quick strokes, and called out for "help." The "coward," however, now swam boldly out to help his companion, who but for his assistance would probably have been drowned. The two reached the shore very much exhausted.

A common cause of danger in bathing in a strong tide is when a boat is anchored out fishing. Though the bather may not get more than a couple of yards away from the boat, he can not reach it, and if only a very moderate swimmer he might get flurried on finding this out.

In bathing from a boat the boat should always be free. Again, it is often dangerous to bathe from a boat when the bather is alone. I remember a case some years back in Windermere Lake. A fairly good swimmer took out a boat by himself for a dip. There was a fair amount of wind, and the boat, lightened by the absence of his weight, sailed away from the swimmer, and eventually came ashore. The unfortunate swimmer, however, had to swim ashore at once, and regain his boat by walking along the edge of the lake in a very light costume. Had not the man been a good swimmer the end might have been far worse than merely laughable.

There is a great difference between fresh-water and salt-water as regards danger in bathing. Salt-water is much heavier, and consequently more buoyant. It is therefore much easier to float in salt-water, and there are thousands of persons who can float in the sea who can not float at all in fresh-water.

In learning to float you should remember that the only part of your body that should be out of the water is the face, and not the head. Many persons fail to float because they keep their head too forward. In floating keep your head well back, and stick your chin up in the air as high as you can. Recollect that it is your body that floats, being rather lighter than water, bulk for bulk, and that your legs, head, and arms sink, being rather heavier than water as a rule, bulk for bulk. In floating, the difficulty at starting is to balance yourself; for this purpose you must use your arms.

Sometimes, after throwing yourself on your back and drawing in a deep breath, you will find that your legs have a tendency to slowly sink. When this is the case you must balance them with your arms, which you must hold straight out over your head as far back as you can reach, keeping the back of your hands on the water close together, flat and side by side. You will now find that your toes will come up and pop out of the water. In fact, you are like a balance, the trunk of your body, especially the lungs, full of air, floating in the middle, and your head and arms on one side balancing your legs on the other.

It is very important to be able to float well, and floating requires practice. To be able to float well gives one great confidence in the water, as when you feel that you are growing tired you know that you can get a long rest whenever you like. The longest time I ever remained in the water was seventy-four hours, i. e., over three days and three nights. Of course I rested a great part of this time by floating on my back. This was at the Scarborough Aquarium, in salt-water. Of course the water was warmed, the temperature being about eighty degrees.

When I swam across the English Channel the great difficulty I had to contend with was the cold, and not the mere fatigue of swimming. If the temperature of the English Channel were like that of the Gulf Stream or the Red Sea, there are hundreds of good swimmers who could cross it with ease.

I can when in training in a bath swim a mile in half an hour. Were I to again attempt to swim the Channel, the first thing I should have to do would be to get fat. I want to weigh nearly forty pounds more than I should, my present weight being about one hundred and do not mind, and the consequence of this would be that I fifty pounds not be able to swim a mile in less than thirty-five should not, or perhaps even more. On the other hand I minute would not feel the cold.

It is impossible to float in what is known as a choppy almost when you are floating be careful how you draw in sea. Veath. You should watch your opportunity. Always keep as much air in your lungs as possible—that is, ways keep your breath and hold it in rather more than you draw into in ordinary breathing. Then, when you breathe would so quickly, and refill your lungs as soon as possible. out, do not draw in your breath through your nose rather it is better through your mouth. A mouthful of salt-water, especially than fresh, is very uncomfortable; you have to get into in a better position almost directly in order to cough; be an upright often makes one feel very sick. The moment a sides, if water gets into the nose you will feel it and be drop out of stop in time. Still, this is very disagreeable, and it able to be careful in taking breath while floating so as to be best of any unpleasantness of the kind.

As a rule young lads float easily, and also men after to avoid to "fill out with age." A healthy, active, muscular being—say a good cricketer in good training, without a superfluous flesh about him—will rarely float in fresh any sea. On the other hand, a fat sleek man will always water. In case, the simple reason of this being that "fat float well" swims.

THE NEWS AT TAMPA.

IT is nine o'clock on the following morning when the Pearl, Darrell Evans commanding, swept around the Key into the waters of Tampa Bay, and three Mullet later she was made fast to the pier at Captain Sam-hours back. "My own, you boys, run home, so that your parents will know what I brought you back whole, and the pirate and I know tend to cleaning up," said Captain Sammy, and the will at ere not long in obeying him.

Boys wing into the hotel like a young whirlwind, in the most surprising Mr. and Mrs. Evans, their joy was consoled only checked when the landlord said to them, just as a side-ere almost tumbling up the stairs in their eagerness, they war father and mother went home last week."

"Y three stood looking at the man as if they could not All stand what he had said, and, as a way of making under- realize the truth of his assertion, he handed Dare a them r

It wddenly away, and Mrs. Evans was not willing to be him suid. He had left passage tickets for the boys, and left be vere to return home as soon as they received his they v letter. "I dear! and we have got to go back without finishing "Oh, ise," said Charley, in a mournful tone.

"Our erbs," replied Dare, "we must go, for he says come as

"Y ts we get the letter. Of course if he had known soon to should get it before the voyage was over, he would that waid that we could stay until it was done; but since have sn't know that, we must go home." he did

It was a sorrowful party that retraced their steps to the dock to tell Captain Sammy and Tommy that, so far as they were concerned, the cruise was over. And the other members of the Pearl's crew were quite as sad about it as the boys were.

"It can't be helped, lads," said Captain Sammy, as cheerfully as possible. "All we can hope is that you will be back here again before the winter is over. You can't leave here until four o'clock to-morrow afternoon, so you had better pack up your birds and other things you've got aboard here this afternoon, and to-morrow morning, not later than ten o'clock, come around to my house, and the pirate and I will give you a dinner such as you ought to learn how to cook."

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE FAREWELL DINNER.

By the arrangement which Captain Sammy had made, the whole of the last day they were to remain in Tampa was to be spent with him.

The steamer sailed for Cedar Keys—at which point they were to take the cars for Fernandina, leaving there in a steamer—at four o'clock in the afternoon, and an early dinner was to be served, in order that they might have as much of the afternoon as possible in which to visit for the last time the little steamer which had been their home for so many days.

It lacked fully ten minutes of the time appointed when Dare knocked at Captain Sammy's door, which was immediately opened by Tommy.

They were almost too much surprised for words at the pirate's changed appearance. His hair was combed neatly, his face was perfectly clean, and his costume was that of a particularly neat sailor out for a holiday. White flannel trousers, and shirt with blue collar and cuffs, in the corners of which were worked white stars, gave to the once disreputable-looking boy the neatest possible appearance.

Captain Sammy could be seen in the adjoining room, dressed with the same neatness, but he was too busily engaged about something to be able to stop to speak or even scold.

But the room into which they had been ushered was the most wonderful of anything they had seen in the State, for it was as full of odd little things as an overstocked museum. The mantel-piece fairly bristled with whales' teeth, sharks' teeth, and alligators' teeth; each corner of the room was completely filled with sprays and branches of coral, while every available inch of space on the walls was covered with pictures of all kinds of possible and impossible vessels.

A stuffed bird was standing on his head under one of the windows, as if it had been frightened at the many strange things around, and had assumed that attitude in sheer desperation. The model of a vessel, possibly the same one Captain Sammy had commanded, stood against an enormous turtle-shell, and at one end of the room lay at least a bushel of shells of almost every conceivable variety.

Bits of rope in which were tied all kinds of curious knots, complicated blocks, and odds and ends of every description littered the room, save directly under the mantel-piece, where stood what the visitors thought was the most beautiful thing of all.

This was neither more nor less than a trim little schooner about six feet long, rigged in the most perfect manner, with neither a block nor a line missing or out of place.

Captain Sammy entered the room just as the boys were gazing at the vessel, and a grim look of satisfaction came over his face as he observed the visitors' admiration of this, which was probably his favorite among all the curiosities.

"Can she sail, Captain Saummy?" asked Dare.

* Begun in No. 173, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

THE FAREWELL DINNER WITH CAPTAIN SAMMY.

"That she can," replied the little man, enthusiastically. "She can live in almost any weather; an' I've seen more lives saved through the craft that this one's the model of than I ever saw lost, which is sayin' a good deal. Sail? why, that 'ere craft could turn a square corner if anybody that knew how much twice two was could get on board of her. Sail? why, she could get clean away from the wind, an' have to lay to till it caught up with her."

Captain Sammy patted the sides of the little craft as if it was some living thing that could understand his caresses, and then, glancing up at the clock, he rushed off to the kitchen in the greatest possible haste.

Master Tucker seemed to take naturally to this great change in his surroundings, and in answer to Dare's questions he told them that Captain Sammy had announced his intention of regularly adopting him. The little man had already visited Mrs. Tucker, and by promising to contribute a certain amount each month toward her support, had induced her to consent to the plan.

Therefore Tommy was to begin to attend school on the following Monday, and he would persist that all the changes in his circumstances were wholly due to the boys, who had shown him by example that true pleasure and right doing go hand in hand.

All this conversation, which was broken in upon from time to time by their admiration of the schooner, had occupied them so long, that when it was finished Captain Sammy popped his head in at the door and shouted, as if he thought they were miles away:

"Shipmates, ahoy! All hands to dinner!"

They went into the kitchen, where Captain Sammy, with great pride, gave them seats at a table that seemed almost groaning under the weight of evidences of his skill as cook.

Turtle, which was cooked in every imaginable way, was the principal dish, and in addition to it were fish, fowl, and fruit sufficient for at least a dozen hungry men. It was Captain Sammy's purpose to have them partake of everything on the table, and so strictly did he carry it out that even when Bobby had eaten so much that he had serious doubts as to whether he could walk home, or would be obliged to get the others to roll him along like a barrel, the little man glared at him so fiercely that he ate another turtle steak and two more oranges through fear of personal violence.

And it was a jolly time, for when Captain Sammy was not scolding nor frowning at his guests because they did not eat more, he was brimful of fun, and told stories until their heads were as full of the wonders of the sea as their stomachs were of food.

"Now," said Captain Sammy, after he was satisfied that full justice had been done to his feast, and the table looked as if it had been swept by an invading army, "I'm downright sorry that you're going away, for I'd counted on having you here with my pirate for a long time yet. I'd made up my mind that we'd all go out turtle-fishing in May, and that would have been rare sport, for all you would have to do would be to walk up to an old turtle after she'd hid her eggs, an' tilt her over on her back."

Even though the boys did not speak, their faces showed so plainly how sad they were at not being able to participate in such glorious sport, that Captain Sammy added, quickly:

"If it can't be done this year, it can another, an' whenever you come you know you'll be welcome here. The pirate an' I shall stay right on this spot till my old bones are laid away like a bale of sponges, to make 'em ready for the great Captain, who won't ask where I hail from, but will only want to know if I sailed close by His compass. It was Tommy here"—and the little man laid his hand affectionately on the boy's shoulder—"who saved my old life when it wasn't hardly worth the saving, an' he an' I'll be together as long as I stay in this world, an' next to him it was you who saved me, for if it hadn't been for you he wouldn't have been where he was. I ain't much on talkin', lads, but my heart is in the right place, an' all I can say is that jest so long as I've got a roof over my head or a deck under my feet, jest so long I'll give you up three-quarters of it, an' be glad of the chance."

Captain Sammy's eyes were getting suspiciously red, and when he finished speaking he arose hastily from the table, went out on the veranda, where the boys found him shortly after, sending up great clouds of tobacco smoke in the most furious manner.

After that the Pearl was visited for the last time, and with hearts heavy at leaving this strangely assorted couple, whom they had learned to like so well, the last adieus were spoken, and the boys were on the steamer bound for home.

Although Dare, Charley, and Bobby fully intended to visit Florida during the following winter, circumstances prevented, and it was not until last year that they succeeded in so doing.

Then they went by the way of Jacksonville, and although they had never seen that beautiful winter resort, they did not remain there an hour longer than was necessary.

There was but one place in Florida they were anxious to reach, and but two persons they particularly wanted to see. That place was Tampa, and those persons Captain Sammy and his pirate Tommy.

They started on the first train that left Jacksonville for Cedar Keys, and there they were so fortunate as to land an hour before the time for the mail steamer to start for Tampa.

They had given no hint of their intended visit, answering Tommy's last letter without once mentioning the subject that for five years had lain so near the pirate's heart—their visit to him since he had become a steady, honest boy. Therefore there was no familiar face to greet them as they landed from the steamer, and they were all the better pleased that it was so, for the surprise would be the more complete.

During the five years they had been absent from Tampa they had by no means forgotten the way to Captain Sammy's house, and when they approached it, they were thoroughly well pleased at seeing evidences that the "family" were at home and unaware of their presence.

Captain Sammy's familiar gruff voice called out "Come in!" in response to their knock, and, opening the door, they saw the little Captain leaning back in his favorite chair smoking, while seated at the table was Tommy Tucker Basset—he having long since been legally adopted by Captain Sammy—reading aloud from one of the little man's favorite authors.

It was a hearty greeting that both the occupants of the cottage gave them, and the three weeks they spent there were as full of enjoyment as Captain Sammy and his pirate—as he would still persist in calling him, very much to Tommy's confusion—could fill them.

Although they did not attempt to reach the Everglades again, they took many a cruise in the Pearl, which looked as bright and new as if she had just been built, and when at last their visit was ended, Captain Sammy and Tommy took them to Cedar Keys in the yacht.

"Come soon again," said the little man, as they parted at the railroad station. "I don't tell you not to forget us, for that I know you never will, and you may be sure that we shall never forget you, for my pirate learned what pleasure there was in leading an upright, God-fearing life when you boys came down here and took the job of raising the Pearl. Good-by."

THE END.

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S CONCERT.

they were a lot of fools. I caught one boy going out of the window, and made him sit down quiet, and after that they all sat down quiet."

When asked if he was not afraid himself, Freddie replied, "No, sir, not a bit." Then some one put the question, "If there had been a real fire, how would you have felt?" To this he answered, very simply, "I'd have felt bad, sir, but I'd have tried to get out of it the best I could."

Freddie is a bright-eyed little lad eight years old now. But one of these days we are going to hear of him as a cool, determined man doing his work in the world bravely, and winning distinction by some heroic action worthy of one who showed so much courage and spirit when a very little boy. And as for little Miss Jennie, though we do not know the particulars, we are sure she was equally prompt to act with presence of mind. (City children, you must remember, are not used to these noisy insects as country children are, and this accounts for their fright.)

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLORADO.

I am a little boy nine years old, and I have no brothers nor sisters. For pets I have two kittens; their names are Tiny Tim and Puss. Rebecca isn't my pet at all. I have a garden, which just now is keeping me busy, because it has been raining for two or three days, and the weeds are got a good start.

A few days ago I went over to Manitow to visit the Cave of the Winds, which is about a mile up Williams Canon. As we went, we passed through a cabin which we pass on the way to the cave in the cañon. In one place the walls of the cañon come so near together that there is only just room enough for a cart to pass between ledges of rocks hanging over our heads which looked as if they would fall down on us. The walls of the cañon are from four to six inches thick, and at the top they are worn into strange shapes, like towers and castles and arches.

The trail to the cave goes up in a zigzag course until it reaches the trails. The stairs were about the entrance, which is four hundred feet above the road. In the first room we registered, and mamma put on an alster to protect her dress from the drippings of the candles which we carried.

We went through a long passage, and came into Canopy Hall. There is a projecting ledge of rock in this room, with stalactites growing up from it. There are two large dome-like holes in the canopy, near the edge. The canopy is of rock, and grows into the room. You can see a place on the floor where the water used to run over the top of the plates, and in one place the stalactites looked like icy curtains. Then there is a basin more than five feet deep, where water used to stand, and, and at the top they are worn into strange shapes, like towers and castles and arches. This is crossed by a bridge.

There are a great many ladders, bridges, and stairways in the cave, and a great many curious shapes worn in it. One of these is called "Mary's Little Lamb," another is the "Old Hog." There is a room called Music Hall, because the formations give out musical sounds when struck. There are a great many other things in the Bridal Chamber, is the prettiest room of all. There are a great many stalactites, resembling small snakes and serpents, twisting upward. Then there are stalactites growing together in pairs, and stalactites which look like vases, urns, candlesticks, vegetables, and a chandelier. There are stalactites which look like figures of people: one is shaped like a girl, and is called "The Judge." Stalactites are formed by water dripping downward, like icicles, and stalagmites by water dropping on the floor, and they grow upward. As still drop in the Bridal Chamber, the stalactites in the Bridal Chamber, and the floor is slippery, and they have placed a hand-rail to keep people from slipping. Before the rail was there a gentleman slipped and laid a brick on a fine stalactite. There are many more wonderful things to be seen in the cave, but there is not time to tell about them. OUR STORIES.

"Pearl" is the work of a youthful contributor whose mother says, in a note to the Postmistress: "My daughter of fourteen years has written this little story, and has asked me to send it to you. I send it without a correction, right from her pen." If the Postmistress may venture a prediction, it is that the writer of "Pearl" may hope to do still better in a not distant future. "The Garden Party," by a Brooklyn girl, is also well written, and full of promise.

PEARL.

I had been at the hotel four months before I began to take any notice of her. I did remember seeing every Saturday and Wednesday night a little figure going through the hall carrying a large basket, but I never noticed the girl until one day, until my friend Mrs. Tichenor suggested Mrs. Adams for a laundress. "Nearly all of the ladies here have employed her for long time, and since your washer-woman has disappointed you, you must try her, my dear friend," she said.

"How can I see her?" I asked.

"I'll tell Pearl when she comes for my things Saturday," my friend answered.

Saturday evening came, and with it Pearl. I remembered Mrs. Tichenor's promise when I heard a tap at my door and "Is this Mrs. Hyde's?"

"I said, 'Come' and 'Yes,' and then asked if this were Mrs. Hyde's things."

"Yes, missy,"—dropping me a courtesy—"and Mrs. Tichenor said as how you wanted mamma to do yer wash."

"I do; but, little one, you are not large enough to carry a great basket."

"I knows I looks little," but, missy, I's awful strong; I's used to it, too."

What a funny little picture she made, with the crimson velvet pottice for a background, a short blue petticoat, green shawl, and old red hood, looking from which was a thin but peculiarly expressive black face.

"Pearl," I cried, impulsively. "Why were you named that?"

"Reckon cause I's so brack. Our folks is always got 'em things by their contraries," she replied, bitterly.

I gave her some cake and fruit, and she finally walked down stairs with my large basket hooked gracefully on her head, and one thin arm held up the red shawl. The next day she came that day, and she came regularly twice a week, taking the clothes Saturday, and returning them Wednesday evening. But one Wednesday evening came, and Mrs. Tichenor called, and Mrs. Adams called, and some of the ladies came to my room to ask if I had heard of the child, for I was known to be one of her special favorites among the hotel ladies.

"Friday mornin' she waxed impatient—ungrateful creatures! served faithfully so long, and now agin on account of the non-appearance of a polished bit of linen! But Saturday mornin' the clothin' was done, and I had no more to do but my mammy's head, and I'm comin' no more, please tell her lady."

PEARL.

"What is the child to do?" I inquired of the Irishwoman who returned the clothes.

"Niver a bit do I know. Dade if it wasn't for my own six childer, I'd take and kape her mesself."

It was Friday mornin', and finally Mrs. McGray decided to take her in her suite to have charge of her baby evenings, for her regular nurse refused in having her evenings to herself at least. This was kindly consented to, and finally Mrs. McGray decided to take her in her suite to have charge of her baby evenings, for her regular nurse refused in having her evenings to herself at least.

"My husband himself said, 'If that Pearl of yours succeeds in keeping the McGray baby quiet, I'll give her a gold eagle Christmas.'"

"Pearl" had been so entirely given up to little Freddy McGray, her days to running errands for the other ladies of the house.

So she came. Though naturally of a bright disposition, she mourned her own dear death, and longed for her own sunny South, whence she had come five years before. "Pappy's brother's there, and mammy's aunt, and all de folks," she said so often; but it was long time before her desire was fulfilled. Her work was not hard, but by degrees she grew thinner, and the nurse maid of a fashionable hotel longed once more for the wash-tub and ironing-table.

Her third birthday brought her a rich surprise. The ladies selected me to tell her. I took her into my room, and opened the conversation by saying, "Pearl," suppose you had a pretty Miss Stacy is to be married in two weeks to the Southern gentleman, and will leave der Boston for Richmond."

"Yes, missy, I heard 'em tell of it; but I didn't say no, but was Richmond whar she was a-goin' to live. That's whar de folks live 's a-goin' to live, two or three miles out."

"Yes, little Pearl; but guess what we are goin' to do for you? We'll give you a grand present."

"Don know. Is it anything to wear?"

"Nothing to wear, dear; but Miss Stacy has everything she can possibly wish except a little colored maid, and you are going to be her one. The maid is a little girl who has been here at the V— for many months, and wishes very much to return to her own der Southern home. Can you guess whar the name of her is?"

"Oh, missy, missy! it can't—it can't be me! It can't be true!"

"But it is true. Are you glad now?"

Her cheeks filled with tears. Sobbing, she threw herself at my feet and wept, and cried, every now and then, "So happy! so happy!"

The two weeks passed only too quickly. The ceremony was performed at the end of the day, the infinitely happy people were seated in a parlor car, waving adieus to a sorrowing group of friends. The two oldest of the three were happy, but I did not think they were more than little Pearl, who seemed to fairly glow in her great new-found joy.

A month afterward I received this postscript in haste: "Adieus, my friends."

"DEAR MISSY, I's just as happy as I can be. Please tell 'em all so. PEARL."

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

THE Postmistress would like to have every boy and girl read the following letter:

"Frederick Schultz, Esq.,"

"DEAR SIR,—At the time of the panic in Grammar School No. 25, June 8, I noticed from the published accounts that your little boy Frederick, aged eight, showed great courage and presence of mind in endeavoring to allay the panic in the boys' department, instead of getting frightened and increasing it, and that a young girl of the same age, Jennie Beck, was equally cool-headed in the girls' department. I consider it so important that such qualities should be commended as an example to others that I have taken the liberty of having a gold badge prepared commemorating the action of each of these children; and having ascertained your name and address from Mr. Pettigrew, principal of the school, I send the one for your son herewith, and trust you will permit him to accept it, and hope that it may be a means of encouraging others not to lose their heads under like circumstances. A single person with courage and presence of mind can stop a panic in the beginning that afterward probably nothing could allay, and nothing but just such presence of mind as that exhibited by these children can prevent disastrous consequences when an accident or foolish person occasions an alarm. Congratulating you and Mrs. Schultz upon the qualities shown by your son, I remain,

"Very truly,
F. B. THURMAN."

This letter was addressed to the parents of the quick-witted little hero. The badge which accompanied it is in the form of a double Maltese cross suspended from a clasp. It bears this inscription: "To Frederick Schultz, eight years old, for courage and presence of mind at Grammar School No. 25, June 8, 1888."

The story of the panic is one which I would like to have you all remember. There was in reality nothing the matter, the whole trouble having been caused by the foolish behavior of two or three little folk. One of Freddie's companions, when questioned after the affair was all over, said: "There was no fire in the school. It was simply one of those strange bees they call dancing-bees that came in the window and frightened the class. When they began to holler and scream, Schultz cried out, 'Keep still; it's nothing at all.' One little boy ran to the window to throw himself out, and Schultz caught him and pulled him back, saying, 'You'd better not let me catch you doing that thing again.' He kept the whole class back from running to the door or the windows, and so none of 'em was hurt."

Freddie himself tells the story as follows: "There was a big sting-bee came in and frightened a little girl next me, and she hollered, 'Oh! oh!' and then other boys and girls cried, 'Oh! oh!' and 'Fire!' Then they began to run for the doors and windows, and I shouted to them that were racking their brains for a plan to celebrate it. After much thinking and some suggesting, Lulu Rogers, Effie's cousin, proposed a garden party. Garden parties were uncommon and almost unheard of things in the small country village of Weston, and Mr. Thorpe's house was large, and the grounds extensive. This plan, they were sure, would meet with approval. Besides, Lulu had the notion that her plans also had successfully carried out, so this was hailed with joy, and accepted amid shouts and cheers.

In a short time it was all arranged. The only thing wanting in the matter was a young girl, Mr. Thorpe, which it was easy to obtain, as Effie was the only child of wealthy parents, who thought they could not do enough for her. Indeed, they would be glad to give her a very good girl, and dutifully repaid all their affection.

It is needless to say that Effie entered into the arrangements with spirit. Invitations were issued for rich and poor, and she had a grand affair. Nothing was talked of in the village but the "party up at Thorpe's," and the young folks waited impatiently for the important day to arrive.

At last it dawned, and although it was bright and clear, it was not sultry, and every one was delighted with the weather. At seven o'clock in the evening the party assembled, and a very bright night. Lulu Rogers were hung every where available place about the house, on the piazzas, and on the trees, and nearly every girl who possessed a white or light dress wore it. This made the scene appear all the prettier.

Games were introduced, and as one game led to another they had a merry time. The hours passed very pleasantly, for Effie did her duty well as mistress. Game after game was played till supper-time. The servants had been directed to set a table in the arbor for supper. Every kind of fruit in season was on it. Cakes, pyramids of nuts, almonds, raisins, etc., were all arranged with taste. Bricks of cream were set elegantly upon the ends of the table, and the birthday cake, with a silver knife with which to cut it, was laid out on a table which had been placed directly in front of the seat Effie was to occupy. At last all was ready, the bell was rung, and the children trooped into the arbor, where many exclamations about the beauty of the table.

Supper, like all things, only lasts for a time, and this was soon over.

The piazzas in the parlor were broad and smooth, and a dance was proposed by Effie. Several boys and girls were soon whirling around, while those who did not care to dance played quiet games, or watched their partners.

It was a happy evening to Effie and her guests, and one they would always remember.

After a while Mr. Thorpe and John the coachman began to talk out some things that looked very queer. There was to be a surprise to Effie. Each of the children tried to guess what it was, but each guessed wrong, until a girl exclaimed: "Oh, I know what it is. Fire works!"

It was right, and for two hours the children were amused by them. The party broke up about half past eleven, and every one was tired.

Garden parties are now the fashion with the Westons, but not one is so well kept as Effie's, and Lulu declares it was her most successful scheme.

GRACE RANDOLPH T.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

HILLSBOROUGH, OHIO.

Papa gave me your pleasant paper for a Christmas present, and I like it very much. I liked the story of "Nan," although I did not get to read all of it, as it was about half finished when I began talking the paper. I am glad Mrs. Lillie is going to write another story.

My papa is a Presbyterian minister, and we have lived here fourteen years. Hillsborough is a small city of about four thousand inhabitants; and I have six sisters and four brothers, two brothers, one older and one younger than I am, and no sisters. My older brother goes to college. My little brother Jamie will be nine next month. He is very much like me in "Kissing the Pearl."

ELLA G. MCS.

St. JOHNSBURY, VERMONT.

I always read the letters from young correspondents, and find them quite interesting, and perhaps some one may enjoy reading a letter of mine. I am fourteen years old. When I was six months old I had the scarlet fever, and lost my hearing, and have never heard a sound since. When I was four years old papa died; I remember it quite well. I began attending the Clarke Institution for Deaf-Mutes at Northampton, Massachusetts, when I was eight years old, and am still in that school. I can read the lips quite well, and my friends think I talk very nicely. My mother died two years ago, and now I live with some dear friends, Mr. H. and his wife, during the three months' vacation in the summer. My papa has a horse that I ride very nicely. I like riding in it very much. I sit with my back to the horse, so I can talk easily with the others. My friends have very many hens and chickens, and I like to take care of them.

When I read the letters in the Post-office Box I often think of my pets. Spot, the dog, is very fond of following the dog-cart, and chasing all the birds. He will sit up and beg for food or drink. Beauty is a large Maltese cat that is very smart and handsome. My friend gave him to me last summer, when he was very small. Now he performs many tricks. He will sit up, move, jump through your hands, etc. He has a silver collar with my name engraved on it, and a small padlock. Royal is a small tiger kitten about two months old. He is the smartest little I ever saw. Very often he fights with Beauty, and they play together all day long. I have three small bantam chickens that are very tame and cunning. They follow me every where, and will sit on my feet.

Next week I am going to visit my uncle on a farm, and then I shall go to the sea-shore for a few weeks with my friends.

NETTIE P.

Though deprived of hearing, your letter shows that you are a cheerful and happy girl, and that you are all delighted with it.

URBANA, ILL.

I thought I would write a little letter to the Post-office Box to tell you how much I enjoy "Young People." We have taken it for four years, and I like it very much. I would like to live as we all like to read it, even mamma and Aunt Maggie; and Ethel, my baby sister, never can tell her mamma a story when she is going to sleep without her having read her one to her. I can't find a word, but tells her stories from the pictures, and makes them very cunning.

We all went to a family picnic on the Fourth of July, and had a very nice time. I was fishing and gathering shells. I haven't any pets, but I have a pretty flower bed, and the flowers are growing splendidly. In our Sunday school they distribute flowers every week to all scholars, and then in the fall we have a flower-soi-fair, and have written enough now.

Laura S.

MERRILL, MICHIGAN.

I am a little girl eleven years old. I sent Bob T.'s letter. I think his pet is a squirrel. It is very warm here. On the Fourth of July I shot off fire-crackers. One little boy here put out one eye and injured the other, so he can not use it. I thought I would send you a receipt for sponge-cake. I make it, and it is good:

One egg and half a cup of sugar beaten together, half a cup of water, half a cup of flour, and a teaspoonful of baking powder.

I think "Nan" and "Toby Tyler" are the best stories I have read in "Young People."

AMELIA N. F.

MOUNT WASHINGTON, MARYLAND.

I am a little girl twelve years old. I have taken "Young People" since the first number, and I like it very much. I am going to collect moths and butterflies this summer. I like the new story "In Honor Bound." I have two cats—or I should have said kittens; their names are Shep and Tod. Ted is black and gray striped, Shep is black and white; they are both very cute. My sister Bartie has a canary-bird which is very tame; he will hop on your finger; his name is Cherry Junior. "The first Cherry was my bird, and was as old as I was when she died; he lived to be ten years old. My papa is going to get us a goat and a four-seated wagon, and as there are four little sisters of us, it will be great for us."

BESSIE D.

I wonder if the goat will tick me too.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE: I have taken you from the first number, and I think that you are splendid. I am eleven years old, and very tall for my age. I have one sister, five or six children years old. I was not well last winter, and did not go to school, but I had French and music lessons at home. We live opposite a large square, so it is nice and airy in summer, and a splendid place for sledding in winter.

MARGARET WILLIS B.

Justeen B.: I have placed those pretty pressed ferns in my Bible. Thank you.—Fannie D. and Betty: I have your book, and will send you two letters. I am sorry there is not room for them in the Post-office Box.—S. Portis S.: Write again some time.—Veneta E. D.: I would like to see that gentle calf with the dainty name Star.—William H. D.: You must get another turtle.—Birdie F.: Send your toys for Sadie to Sister Catherine, St. Mary's Free Hospital, 407 and 409 West Thirty-fourth Street, New York. I hope your pets do not quarrel. Is puss friendly with the bird? You are spending the summer in a charming neighborhood. You will have a very busy day at a loss for pleasant occupation if you are really fond of reading.—Marion Mitchell D.: You were very kind to gather the pretty grasses and daisies for me. Thank you very much.—Frank V. S., Edith J. S. W., and Tarie N. S.: Thanks to you.—Lulu P.: What fun you have in your play room!—Annie M. P., Ora W., Edith S., and Arthur: Write again.—Warren B.: Too bad about your beautiful goats. I am glad you are a gardener.—M. A. P. sends word to Grace May

H. to pick her pansies if she wants to have plenty more.—Maggie D. must send her full name if she wishes any one to exchange with her.—Young gentlemen can not offer fire-arms for exchange.

RECEIPTS FOR LITTLE HOUSEKEEPERS.

YORKSHIRE PUDDING.—Two cups of milk, six table-spoonfuls of flour, two eggs, four tea-spoonfuls of baking-powder, and a pinch of salt; beat the eggs, then pour in one cup of milk; then add the flour, then the other cup of milk; sift the baking-powder with the flour; bake in a hot, greased pan fifteen minutes.

COOKIES.—Half a cup of butter, half a cup of lard, two cups of sugar, two eggs, a cup of milk, three tea-spoonfuls of baking-powder, and eight cups of flour. Roll them out.

ALICE.

TARTY.—Two table-spoonfuls of molasses, eight table-spoonfuls of sugar, eight table-spoonfuls of water, and three table-spoonfuls of butter; cook until it is crisp when dropped in cold water.

MARGARET WILLIS B.

HOME-MADE CANDY.—Two cups of molasses, half a cup of sugar, half a cup of butter, and tea-spoonful of vanilla; boil fifteen minutes, and put in buttered pans in a very cool place.

AN ELEPHANT BAZAR.

BY GEORGE FOLSON.

ALTHOUGH many of our young readers, no doubt, have seen or heard of this peculiar structure, to the majority it will be a novelty. The Elephant Building is situated at South Atlantic City, in New Jersey, and is visited daily by large numbers of excursionists and those who live on the sea-shore. As you look from the window of the car, when within three hundred yards of the mammoth, it is hard to believe that the object is not a real live animal. When you get closer, however, the mechanism becomes apparent, and certain sharp corners in the limbs and toes reveal the deception.

The body of the Elephant is 38 feet long and 88 feet in circumference; the head is 26 feet long; the legs are 22 feet long; the ears are 17 feet long, 10 feet wide, and each weighs 2000 pounds; the tail is 26 feet long; the trunk is 36 feet long; the tusks are 22 feet long; and the eyes are 18 inches in diameter, and are made of glass.

The entrance to this curious house is in the hind-leg, and may be seen in our illustration. After climbing a very narrow and steep staircase we come to the only room of any importance in the Elephant. Here we find photographs and souvenirs of the monster on sale, and by mounting a platform in the front part of the room, and passing through a small door to a little space hardly worth calling a room, we find by climbing on a convenient beam that we can look out to sea through the eye of the animal.

In going to the small rooms which were made by the space left over after the main room had been laid out we are enabled to see what an immense number of pieces of wood make the body of this funny house. The plan for this building is said to have been made in Europe; and the scheme for building it there having failed, the plan was secured by the persons who now own the building. How any one could have carried the plan in his head, or have written definite directions for the construction, will puzzle most persons who have seen the criss-cross manner in which the wood-work has been put in. However, the plan has been carried out, and the result is certainly very pleasing. The whole animal is sheeted with tin outside, and the howdah which surmounts the body is a very pretty observatory, as you can see in the picture. The trunk runs down into a circular box or stand. This was done presumably to give steadiness to the front end of the animal. The mouth has a red wooden "clapper," fixed on a hinge, I believe, to represent the tongue.

The mammoth looks straight out to sea, and some of the eyeglass venders in the vicinity say that it is wondering if it will ever get back to Africa. There is a story told to the effect that when this structure was being finished a large whale came up near shore, looked at the Elephant for a moment, and then, with a snort of defiance, sank again into the depths.

THE FIVE-DOT GAME.

IT is capital fun, we assure you. Any number can play, but each player must be provided with a sheet of white paper and a pencil. All must then mark five dots in any arrangement on the piece of paper before him, and pass it to his next neighbor at the left hand. He then takes the dotted paper which has been handed to him, and tries to draw on it some human figure in such a posture as to bring one of the five dots at the middle of the top of the forehead, one at the point of each foot, and one at each hand.

But no one must take longer than a certain time, say five or ten minutes, in making his picture. The results sometimes are very laughable, and the game calls for a good deal of invention and skill.

We do not see why a number of these rude drawings should not be collected into an album, with the author's name to each. It would be as sensible and amusing as a pigograph album, or an album for mental photographs. What do you say, little people?

THE FLOWER MISSION.

BY AUNT MARIORIE PRECEPT.

ALL children, rich and poor, love flowers. A wee girlie of my acquaintance was told by her grand-mamma that she must not pick the flowers in the garden without permission. She looked very thoughtful, and by-and-by said, "When you come to my house you may pick the fowers wivout asking me."

I have never yet walked through a certain narrow city street crowded with ragged children without being touched by the eager way in which they look at a rose or a pink if I happen to have such a thing. "Oh, please give me one?" is a request I have heard many a time. See how wisful and delighted are the faces in the picture, as the child within the gate hands the pretty bouquet to the child on the other side. It was from just such scenes as this that a sweet girl in Boston, so long ago as 1869, got the idea of the first Flower Mission.

She observed that whenever she went into the city with flowers in her hands she could easily distribute them, one by one, among the poor children she passed on the street. She consulted with friends, and presently a notice was read in one of the churches, stating that a mission-room would be open at a given hour on a day which was named, and that ladies would be there to receive all the flowers which might be sent. They would then see that they were taken to the homes of the poor and the sick, to the hospitals, and even to the prisons.

Everybody was charmed with the thought of this lovely charity. The next year it was begun in New York, and it is of the New York Flower Mission, which I visited the other day, that I will tell you. The plan of the mission is so simple that a few young people, in any place, who wish to make others happy, may adopt it if they choose. Very little money is required. A great deal more depends upon willing hands and ready feet to gather the bright blossom from garden and field. After this you will need a convenient room, with two or three tables and chairs, and then the same willing hands must be ready to scatter the cheery messengers where they will give the most comfort and do the most good.

Strangers in New York are not likely, once having seen it, to forget the handsome red and white striped church on the corner of Fourth Avenue and Nineteenth Street. Next door to this, at No. 239 on the avenue, tucked away in the rear, are the rooms of the Flower Mission, to which you are directed by a modest little sign over an alley. Here, every Monday and Thursday from the middle of May until the first of November, between the hours of 10 A.M. and 2 P.M., ladies may be found caring for and dispensing the flowers which are sent from far and near.

One hundred and fifty-seven towns of New York, New Jersey, and New England contributed their offerings to this mission last year, and in several instances the fragrant gifts came all the way from Florida and Texas. The express companies carry and deliver this precious freight free of charge.

During the summer as many as one hundred and fifty thousand bouquets were given away in the various homes, asylums, and hospitals of the city, and besides these a great many are taken by city missionaries, Bible-readers, and charitable ladies, to the tenement-houses where air and sunshine do not penetrate the gloom, and where the poor mothers and babies suffer so terribly.

A sweet-faced woman who devotes her time wholly to the poor said to me, as I asked her about her work, "I have one blind girl, who watches for my footsteps every Monday, and her smile is something wonderful when I slip a fragrant posy into her thin hand."

Flowers sent to this mission, or to the one nearest the little reader, in any other city, should be carefully packed. A pasteboard box or a flat basket will carry them nicely. Cover the bottom of this with a damp newspaper or a few leaves and ferns. Tie the flowers in bunches, each kind by itself, and pack them in layers, with damp paper over each. Sprinkle the upper layer, and cover it tightly to exclude the air.

At Christmas the Flower Mission opens its doors for one week; you will be glad to hear that last winter it was able to decorate the walls of the hospitals with wreaths of evergreen, that it sent beautiful hot-house flowers to the beds of the sick and the dying, and that it gave four thousand "splendid little Christmas eards" to the city missionaries, who bestowed them on the children at Randall's Island, and in other charitable institutions, as well as in the tenements.

I almost forgot to speak of the children's meetings which all the year round are held once a week, in the down-town mission schools. At the close of each of these, during the summer, a sweet bouquet is given to each child as he or she leaves the room, and you may be sure it is lovingly cared for until its last bit of bloom is faded.

Just think of it, Pansy, Maudie, and Reggie, the flowers which you gather and send, not knowing to whom they will go, are little missionaries of joy and good-will. Be sure the Lord, who makes the flowers grow, sees this service done to His little ones, and is pleased with it.

WHO IS TO DIE?

A STORY OF THE SOUTHERN SEAS.

BY DAVID KER.

"STAND by to lower the boat!" shouted the Captain; and then he muttered, gloomily, to himself, "It's our only chance now."

It was, indeed. For three days the French brig St. Pierre, homeward bound from the Isle de Bourbon, had fought against as fierce a gale as ever swept around the stormy Cape of Good Hope. Captain and crew had done all that men could do to save the ship, but in vain. Their only chance now was in taking to the one boat that the storm had left them.

As Captain Picard turned round from giving his orders he found himself suddenly face to face with a pale, delicate-looking lady in deep mourning, who had just come up the after-hatchway with a little boy in her arms.

Poor Madame Laehaux! she might well look wrod and sad. Her husband had gone home, an invalid; her only daughter had died a few weeks before; and now, just as there seemed a chance of her seeing home and friends once more, Death in his worst form was hovering over herself.

Captain Picard broke to her as gently as possible the fatal news that the ship was sinking, and that their only hope was to take to the sea in a small boat. At this announcement the poor mother's sickly face grew paler still, and she pressed her child convulsively in her arms.

"Ma'amselle no fear," said a huge Senegal negro, emerging from the hatchway at that moment; "old Achille and Pierrot take care of her and Monsieur Henri too.—Monsieur Henri, come to Achille!"

He took the child in his arms as he spoke, while a second negro came up to help the Captain in lowering Madame Laehaux into the boat, which was so fiercely tossed by the surging waves that it was no easy matter to reach it.

At last the boat was full, and they shoved off. Hardly had they got clear of the ship when she gave a violent roll, plunged forward, rose again, and then, with a sound like distant thunder, the in-rushing water blew up the decks, and down went the doomed ship head-foremost.

But those in the overloaded boat soon found that they had only exchanged one danger for another. The huge waves that broke over her every moment, drenching them all to the skin, filled the boat faster than they could bale her out; and, crowded together as they were, they had no room either to row or to make sail. The sailors whispered together and looked gloomily at the lady and her party, and at last one was heard to mutter:

"Better get rid of them that can't work than of them that can, anyhow."

"Our lives are as precious to us as theirs are to them," growled another. "If the boat's got to be lightened, they're the ones to go."

The Captain, who had heard and understood, felt for his pistol, but it was gone. Several sailors were already on their feet to fling the helpless mother and child overboard, when the two gigantic negroes stepped between.

"Look, see, you men," cried Achille; "you want lighten boat. Blaek man heavier than white lady. Suppose you swear let madame and Monsieur Henri live, I and Pierrot jump overboard!"

It was all over in a moment. Scarcely had the savage crew, moved in spite of themselves, given the required pledge, than the brave fellows, kissing their mistress's hand and embracing little Henri with a quiet "Good-by, little master," plunged headlong into the sea.

The heroic sacrifice was not made in vain. The boat, thus lightened, could be more easily managed, while the gale began at length to show signs of abating. On the following afternoon they were seen and picked up by an English schooner, and a few weeks more saw Madame Laehaux safe in her husband's house at Lyons.

Three months later madame and her sick husband were on a visit to Saint-Malo, the fresh sea air of which was thought better for little Henri at that season than hot, dusty Lyons. The child and his mother (this time accompanied by Monsieur Lachaux himself) were sitting on a bench under the trees of the boulevard facing the harbor, when the lady's attention was attracted by a few words that fell from a rough-looking man in a well-worn pilot coat, who was talking to a friend a few yards off.

"And now that they are here," said he, as if finishing a story, "I don't know what to do with them, for they don't even know where their mistresses live."

"Where did you say you picked them up?" asked his companion.

"A bit to the south-west of the Cape, hanging on to some broken spars that must have floated off from their vessel when she foundered. When I found out that they were Senegal negroes I offered to put 'em ashore there on the way to France; but no, they must come home to find their mistresses, and I can tell you they worked their passage like men. But how they're to find her, I can't think, for they know nothing except that her name's Madame Lachaux."

"And here she is," broke in the lady herself, stepping up to him.

A few minutes later the faithful negroes (thus rescued as if by miracle from the death to which they had devoted themselves) were embracing their "little Monsieur Henri" with uproarious cries of joy; and from that day until their death, thirty years later, they were the happiest as well as the best-cared-for servants in the whole south of France.

BY MRS. W. J. HAY'S,

AUTHOR OF "PRINCESS IDEWAYS," "PHIL'S FAIRIES," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

LEO was awakened by being rudely jostled about and tumbled upon the floor. When he opened his eyes the cause was apparent. The elves had found their beds in disorder, and not being able to see him, had, in their efforts to restore order, pitched him out. Hardly had Leo reached the floor when came Paz to the rescue.

"I beg your pardon, sir, for being so long absent," he said, "but the hunters had not come in with any game, and the cooks had use for all the skillets, so that I was obliged to go to the laboratory for a vessel large enough to hold your turnip. Soup is made in great quantities for our work-people, and by adding a few sauces I hope I have made it so that it will please you. If you come with me now I think you may relish your meal."

Leo followed Paz to a small cavern hung with a velvety gray moss, on which were clusters of red berries. A small electric light burned in a globe of crystal set in hands of turquoise, and shone upon a table which, like the bed he had used, was composed of several small ones, covered with a cloth of crimson plush, over which was again spread a white fabric of the thinnest texture and edged with lace. On this was laid a dinner service so small that it was evidently more for ornament than use. Plates of crystal were bordered with gems, and jars and cups of embossed metal glittered with precious stones. He was obliged, however, to eat his soup from the tureen, and the turnip, now cooked in a sort of pâté, was presented on a silver platter. Slices of smoked rabbit, with salted steaks of prairie-dog, were offered in place of the quail, which had not come; but Leo, having a fondness for sweets, saw with wonder one tart made from about a quarter of an apple. This proved to be such a sweet morsel that he kept Paz running for more until he had eaten a dozen. No wine was offered, but ices which looked like heaps of snow with the sun shining on them were dissolving in glass vases, and water as pure as the dew filled his goblet. Rising refreshed from his meal Leo met Knops coming toward him. He had exchanged his dress for what looked like a bathing suit of India rubber.

"Are you rested?" he inquired, kindly.

"Oh yes, very much, and I must thank you and Paz for so good a dinner," responded Leo.

"Don't mention it. If I had not acted on the spur of the moment, when the impulse to amuse you seized me, I would have been better prepared. We use many things for food which you would disdain, but I might have secured antelope meat or Rocky Mountain mutton, and by way of rarity something from Russia or China. Have you ever tasted birds' nests?"

"Never."

"But I suppose you know why they are thought so great a delicacy?"

"No."

"It is merely the gluten with which they are fastened together, so to speak, by the birds, which renders them agreeable. The Chinese like rats, and in this we agree with them. Well dressed, stuffed with chestnuts or olives, and roasted, they are delicious."

Leo made a wry face.

"Ah! you are not cosmopolitan."

"What is that?"

"A citizen of the world, a person free from national prejudices. Ah, these words are long for you; I will try to be simple: you have not learned to eat everything that is good."

"But rats are not good; they are vermin."

"Bah! yes, because you let them feed like your hogs on anything. We do better; we pen them, and give them grain until they are fat and sweet, and make them eatable."

Leo could not disguise his dislike, so Knops, shrugging his shoulders, did not attempt any longer to convince him, but said,

"Are you interested in what I have shown you?"

"Certainly I am," said Leo, with more spirit than he had ever put into words.

"And you care to go on?"

"Very much."

"Prepare then for great exertion. As you are so large it will be necessary for you to creep through many passages. I am going to take you to see our water-works. The visit may be tiresome, but I think you will be repaid. It is generally supposed that giants have more power than we. It may be that it is true, but I think it is doubtful. But you may wonder why I speak now of giants. It is because they have originated the opinion among men that the great water-falls and cataracts, such as those of the Nile and Niagara, are entirely of their producing, but we all know the familiar adage, 'Great oaks from little acorns grow.' I am going to show you where the little springs and rivulets have their rise."

Leo's attention had flagged during this long speech—he was so unaccustomed to many words—but now his interest revived.

"Do you remember a certain shady spot about half a mile from the monastery, beneath a group of birch-trees, and overhung with alders?" asked Knops.

"Do I not, indeed?" responded Leo, eagerly. "It is the sweetest, coolest water on the estate. The moss around that spring is just like green velvet. Many a time I have plunged my whole head in it. The birds know it too, and always come there to drink. I sometimes find four or five of them dipping in at once; it is a pretty sight to see them bathe; they throw the water up under their wings until they drip, and then they are hardly satisfied."

"Well," said Knops, "we have the supplying of that spring."

All the time they had been talking Knops had been leading the way through long passages and down steep steps, of which Leo's long legs had to compass several at a stride.

Now they came to a low tunnel through which Leo had to creep for what seemed to him miles. Strange to say, the weariness which so often compelled him to rest or doze seemed to be leaving him. He felt an altogether new impulse, a desire to explore these recesses, and a great respect for Knops's learning also made him desirous of conversation, which was something he had always avoided by answering questions in the shortest possible way.

The tunnel was not only long and low, but it was dripping with moisture, and the air oppressive with what seemed to be steam. Leo heard wheezing and groaning sounds, which, though not frightful, were very peculiar, and then the thump-thump, as of engines.

Very glad was he when the tunnel opened into another large cavern, at the bottom of which was a lake. He could not have seen this had it not been for the electric fluid which blazed like daylight from a great globe overhead. On the margin of the lake were all kinds of hydraulic machines, small as toys, but of every conceivable form; derricks and wheels and screws and pumps, and all under the management of busy little elves, who panted and puffed and tugged at ropes and wheels and pipes as they worked, and kept up a constant chant not unlike the song of the wind on a stormy night.

Leo watched them intently. Once in a while one restless little sprite would turn a hose upon his companions, when the chant would stop long enough for the rest to dip him head and heels into the lake, which had a very quieting effect. Leo noticed great numbers of pipes running up the sides of the cavern in all directions, but Knops soon opened the door of what he called "the model-room," and here were new wonders displayed.

CHAPTER VI.

THE model-room of the elves' water-work department was a grotto of salt-glittering, dazzling, sparkling, and flashing—divided into two equal parts, or as if a huge shelf had been placed across it.

On the top of the shelf was a tiny park or forest, with all the natural differences of the ground exactly represented by grasses, plants, flowers, rocks, and trees, living and growing, but on a scale so small that Leo was forced to use a microscope to properly enjoy its beauty. Even the herbage was minute, and the trees no larger than small ferns, but as his eyes grew accustomed to the glass he was amazed to find the hills and dales of his home here reproduced in the most familiar manner.

It was truly an exquisite scene. Field upon field dotted with daisies, woodland as dense and wild as untrained nature leaves it, and hill upon hill clambering over one another, all so minute and yet so real, and dashing down from the tiny mountains was a stream of foaming water, winding about and gathering in from all sides other tributary brooks so small that they would hardly have floated a good-sized leaf.

And now Leo understood the meaning of it all, as he looked underneath the shelf where tiny pumps and rams were forcing up the water for this stream.

Knops touched a spring and set a new series of wheels in motion, when, instantly, a gushing fountain flowed up in a small stone basin beneath a rustic cross; then a little lake appeared, on which were sailing small swans; and finally, a rushing, roaring flood started some mill-wheels and almost threatened destruction to the tiny buildings upon its banks.

"This," said Knops, "shows you how we use the power of our reservoirs, but it can give you no idea of the immense trouble we have in laying pipes for great distances. Some of our elves find it so difficult that they beg for other work, and many run off altogether and live above-ground, inhabiting the regions of springs and brooks, and so muddying them and filling them up with weeds that men let them alone, which is just what they desire."

"Do fish ever clog your pipes?" asked Leo.

"Never. We have none in our lakes; the water is too pure and free from vegetable matter for fish. It is doubly distilled. Taste it."

Leo took the glass which Knops offered, and confessed he had never tasted anything more delicious.

"We sometimes force carbonic gas into mineral springs, but that, as well as the salts considered so beneficial, is left to our chemists to regulate. Puz, do you know anything about this?"

"Not much, Master Knops. I have seen iron in various forms introduced, but think that is usually controlled by the earth's formation."

Leo sighed at his own ignorance, and vowed to study up these matters; but Knops, seeing his look of dejection, asked, "How would you like a bath?"

"Delightful. Where? Surely not in the lake; it looks so cold and glassy I should not dare."

"Oh, no, no," laughed Knops. "Do you think I'd let you bathe in a reservoir? Never! We are too cleanly for that, begging your pardon. Here is our general bath. It's quite a tub, isn't it?"

"I should think so," said Leo, surveying quite a spacious apartment, about which were pipes and faucets, clothes-lines and screens.

Here his friend left him, and he was glad to doff his garments for a plunge. He found that he could make the water hot or cold at will, and so luxurious was it that he would have staid in any length of time had not a crowd of elves come chattering in, and with whoop and scream surrounded him. Though they could not see him, they were conscious of some disturbing force in the water, and in an instant a lot of them had scrambled on his back, and were making a boat of him. They pulled his hair and his ears unmercifully, and because he swam slowly with their weight upon him, they whacked and thumped him like little pirates. But he had his revenge, for with one turn he tumbled them all off, and sprang from the bath, leaving them to squirm and squabble by themselves.

Laughing heartily at their antics, he rejoined Knops and Paz, whom he found poring over some maps spread out before them.

"We have been discussing the length of a journey to the Geysers of Iceland, also to the hot springs of the Yellowstone, but I am afraid either would require too much time. Was your bath agreeable?"

"Very," said Leo, describing how he had been pummelled.

"Those were the fellows from the steam-rooms—stokers probably. Rough enough they are. Do you care to have a glance at them at work?"

"Don't care if I do," said Leo, in his old drawing manner; then, correcting himself, he added: "If it suits your convenience, I shall be very happy to take a look."

"That is all it will be, I promise you," said Paz; "the heat is awful."

Leo thought as much when Knops, having tied a respirator over his mouth, opened another door. Such a cloud of vapor puffed out that he could but dimly discern what seemed to be a tank of boiling, bubbling water resting on a bed of soft coal, about which stark little forms were dancing and poking with long steel bars until flames leaped out like tongues of fire.

"Oh," said Leo, as he quickly turned from this place, "how do they endure it? It is dreadful!"

"They are used to it; they all came from Terra del Fuego," replied Knops, calmly. "And now, as a contrast to them, look in here."

A hut of solid ice presented itself. Long pendants of ice hung from the ceiling, snow in masses was being formed into shapes of statue-like grace by a company of little furry objects whose noses were not even visible, and others were tracing out on a broad screen of lace-like texture patterns of every star and leaf and flower imaginable.

Leo was so delighted that, although shivering, he could not bear to leave them, but begged Knops to lend him a wrap.

Taking from a pile of furs in a corner several small garments, Paz pinned them together and threw them over Leo's shoulders, and as he continued to watch the beautiful work Knops explained its character.

"This is our place for working out designs for those who are unskilled in frost-work. Frost-work is something too delicate for human hands, but in it we excel. Have you never seen on your window-pane of a cold winter morning the picture of a forest of pines, or sheets of sparkling stars and crystals? I am sure you have. Well, we do all that work on your windows, not with artificial snow and ice such as you see here, but by dexterous management we catch the falling flakes and mould them to our will, sometimes doing nothing more than spangling a sheet of glass, and again working out the most elaborate and fantastic marvels of embroidery. But in art our productions are almost endless. We color the tiniest blades of grass and beds of strawberry leaves until the moss upon which they rest looks like velvet with floss needle-work. We polish the chestnuts till they appear as if carved of rose-wood. We strip thistles of their prickly coat, and use the down for pillows. The milkweed, as it ripens its silken-winged seeds, serves us for many beautiful purposes. We tint the pebbles of a brook till they compare with Florentine mosaics. We wreath and festoon every bare old boulder and every niche made barren by the winds. Indeed, the list of our works would fill a volume."

Leo listened and looked, though his feet were getting numb and his fingers nearly frozen. Many a time he had seen just such cappings to gate posts and projections as were here being moulded, and just such rows of pearly drops on a gable's edge; but when, as if to specially please him, the busy workers carved a little snow maid winding a scarf about her curly locks, he clapped his hands in admiration, making such a noise that each little Esquimau dropped his tool in alarm.

"Gently! gently!" said Paz and Knops; "they are easily frightened. Though they do not see you, their instinct is so fine that they can nearly guess your presence."

"I am sorry if I have frightened them," said Leo. "Can't you say something to soothe them? Tell them how lovely their things are. I long to try and imitate them."

Knops said a few words in a language Leo did not comprehend, and the little people gathered up their trowels again. But it was time to go, and Leo had to follow his guides and leave the snow people with more reluctance than anything he had yet seen.

HOW THE BIRDS LEARN TO SING.

BY ELIZABETH ABERCROMBIE.

DO you know why the birdies, my darling,
Sing so sweetly the whole summer long,
Chirp so smoothly their trills and their twitters,
Make so rarely "false notes" in a song?

'Tis because they are up in the mornings
And out by the first peep of day;
They meet in the woods and they practice,
And Love is their leader, they say.

HOW TO SKIN, STUFF, AND MOUNT A BIRD IN FIVE MINUTES.

BY DOCTOR STRADLING.

THE process which I am about to describe briefly is a rough-and-ready one, to preserve and display to advantage the full plumage of the bird, and may be practiced by those who have not the time or the materials—or, shall we suggest, the patience?—necessary for the more artistic operation.

I have found it very useful in tropical countries to retain a souvenir of brilliant-hued pets that came to an untimely end, in a climate where the bodies went too rapidly to decay to permit of skinning properly with a view to subsequent setting up. Many birds, also, which are considered too commonplace for regular mounting well repay the small amount of trouble necessary to display them in this manner. You need not go and shoot or trap them for the purpose. Let your subject be some pet or other bird that has died a natural death. Again, you will find that, unfortunately, the dealers in live birds have always a number of their poor little bodies to sell for next to nothing or to throw away.

The apparatus required is simple in the extreme. A pair of lady's sharp-pointed scissors, a little cotton-wool, which may be just flavored with a drop of spirits of camphor, turpentine, carbolic acid, or a light sprinkling of pepper to discourage any possible insects, and a few ordinary pins; nothing more. And the whole operation may be performed, with a little practice, on a small bird, in the short space of time mentioned in the heading of this article.

Trace the tail feathers down to their root, under the short feathers of the back. You will find that the tail works on a hinge or joint, and can be detached clean and entire by a snip of the scissors severing this joint. A small bit of bone comes away with it. Lay the tail aside.

Carefully dividing the body feathers, cut the skin around, commencing in front of the legs below, but sloping a little backward above, and proceed skinning forward, turning it inside out as you go. Very little cutting is necessary. The skin separates readily, only requiring a fibre to be clipped here and there. When you arrive at the wings, peel the skin off down to the first joint (still turning the whole inside out), and there nip it through with the scissors, thus leaving the first bone of the wing, covered with thick flesh, attached to the body. At the neck a little more caution and delicacy of treatment will be called for, as the skin is thin here, and may be torn by rough handling or dragging. The windpipe, gullet, and slender bone do not give firm ground to work upon either, but shift about and require to be "rubbed loose" from their covering with the finger and thumb.

Peel away until you have exposed the back of the white glistening skull as far as the top of the head, or the broadest part, where cut it through. The scissors will divide it like thin card-board. Scoop out the brains, break through the little plates of bone which partition off the eye-balls, and withdraw them from the inside, and cleanse and dry the cavity of the skull with a small piece of wool. Remove the tongue from the mouth in front, and cram in some cotton-wool in its place, but not enough to prevent the beak from closing.

Now stuff the inside of the head and the neck firmly, bringing back the skin to its proper position by degrees as you fill it, and fastening it with the pins. Use small pinches of wool, and take care that the neck is evenly but not unduly distended. The pouches at the wings will be filled in the same way. When it is completely full, lay it in position on a board and run a pin through at the back of the neck, which will cause the head to stand up and display the breast in a very elegant manner. The wings must now be distended, the two or four pins required for that purpose not piercing them, but so inserted into the board as to prevent their shutting up again. The feathers are plumed out and straightened, another pin or two put in, if need be, at any part which seems imperfectly fixed, and the job is done.

It will be dry in a few days. I have found it the least trouble and safest to pin the birds against a wall or inside a cupboard door, twisting a cone of paper over each to keep off the dust. When it is dry and set, the pins are withdrawn, and the edge of the skin is fastened with a little gum to whatever the bird is destined to adorn, the tail being placed in position behind, with its bony knob concealed under the feathers of the body. Thus it gives by no means a bad idea of a bird in full flight.

The different ways in which the birds may be disposed of are of course innumerable. I have seen one sewn on as a crowning decoration to a highly ornamental pen-wiper, another placed in a lady's hat, others very prettily arranged in the centre of plates to hang against the wall, with scenery painted around them, so that they appeared to be flying amidst palm-trees or over rivers. A young friend of mine, being of a mechanical turn, has fixed one to the middle of a wooden disk, which he has got his sister to paint for him. A strong wire is inserted securely into the wood, passing through the body and coming out at the beak. When he has set up another in like manner he is going to present them to his uncle, to hang one on each side of the chimney-piece, supporting a pair of light wire letter racks.

If you think of making a similar contrivance I should advise you to pass the wire through as soon as the bird is skinned, and stuff around it, as the compressed wool is very hard to pierce. It would look better, too, to mask the wire issuing from the beak with a berry or twig, and it might be arranged so as to carry a paper-balance, taper-stand, pen-rest, or even a candle.

THE WIND'S REBUKE.

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

"I SHALL go this morning," the young Prince said,
 "With a haughty toss of his regal head—
 "I shall go this morning across the sea
 To yonder island that seems to be (I have watched it long from my palace tower)
 All the year round like an evergreen bower.
 "Ere the bells cease ringing the hour of ten
 My ship must be ready; so hasten, my men."
 They low bowed the courtiers, and meek answer made,
 "Your Highness but speaks to be quickly obeyed."
 "See to it I am. And if any be late,
 On shore he will tarry. We Princes ne'er wait."
 "Ah! there you're mistaken," the rude Wind cried,
 And the trees began treubling on every side,
 "I have just this moment come in from sea
 To wander awhile over mountain and lea,
 And until I return, great Prince though you be,
 Your ship and your Highness must wait for me."

THE CARRIER-PIGEON.

BY JULIA K. HILDRETH.

"VIDA! VIDA!" shouted Roger Lynn, thrusting his head out of the window in the second story of the barn, and calling to his sister, who was sitting on the porch, "I am going to take two pigeons over to Tom's. Run, put on your hat and things; mamma says you may go with me."

"Good!" cried little Vida, clapping her hands, and disappearing instantly through the hall door. Before Roger had caught the birds and climbed down the ladder she was waiting, ready and dressed for her walk, at the garden gate.

"Last time Tom was here," said Roger, as he came slowly down the path, carefully carrying a small covered basket in his hand, "I promised him two pigeons as soon as he had built a house for them. So I am going to give him Goldneck and Cushat."

"He will have to cut their wings," said Vida, pityingly, "or else they will fly right home again."

"Tom knows that, and it don't hurt them either," answered Roger, as he closed the garden gate after him.

The road the children took led down by an inlet of the bay, where two or three boats lay fastened by long ropes to posts driven in the ground. They were swashing backward and forward noisily, for the water was rough and the wind high.

"What's that in papa's boat?" exclaimed Vida, pointing to one that had a great bag lying in the stern.

"Well, I declare, if it's not the bag of corn father sent Jerry for this morning!" answered Roger, as he stopped to peep in. "Jerry must have gone home for his dinner and forgotten all about it. I'll just lift it out and put it in a dry place, for see how the water is splattering all over the side of the boat. Hold the basket, Vida, please, and don't let the cover slip off."

"You will never be able to lift that great bag, Roger; it's most as big as yourself," said Vida, as she took the basket from him.

And she was right, as Roger soon found; for although he tugged manfully at the heavy bag of corn, he could only move it a few inches. Presently, however, he managed to do something that he had not intended. As he was hauling first one way and then the other, the cord that fastened the mouth of the bag came undone, and all the bright yellow kernels poured out into a great heap at the bottom of the boat.

"Oh dear!" said Roger, "now you must come and help me, Vida, or we will be too late for our walk."

"Yes, Roger, I'll come, but what shall I do with the pigeons?" answered Vida, looking anxiously at the basket.

"Give them to me and I'll put them under the seat. Now take hold of my hand and jump in. I wish I had never touched the bag!" grumbled Roger, as they both stooped down and began throwing back the corn. The four hands worked as hard and as fast as they could; but it took a long time to gather up the kernels, and, besides, after a while the boat began rocking so hard that it shook the corn all over.

"There!" said Roger, with a sigh of relief, as he put in the last handful and tied up the bag again, "that's done. Now come, Vida." He turned to pick up the basket and climb out of the boat, when he was startled to see that there was a great stretch of little white-capped waves between him and the land. While the children had been busily engaged, with their backs to the bow, the boat had become unfastened and drifted slowly away, and was now many yards from the shore.

"Well, if that's not too bad!" cried Roger, as he looked wistfully at the receding land.

"Can not we push it back somehow?" inquired Vida, as she climbed over the seat and stood by Roger's side.

"I don't know of any way," answered Roger, looking anxiously around. "The oars are not here."

As the boat drifted farther and farther from the shore, the wind increased, and the frail vessel rocked so violently that the two children crouched down in the bottom and held fast to the seat. Every now and then Vida or Roger would peep over the side to see which way they were going.

Almost at the mouth of the inlet was a long narrow strip of land covered with weeds and rushes. It was called Heron Island, from the number of great blue herons that frequented it, tiptoeing over the mud near the water, or rising, when disturbed, with a whirl and shriek, from the tangled weeds and shrubs in the centre. This islet was so surrounded by soft black mud that it was nearly impossible to land at any point. So the herons had almost undisputed possession of the place. It was to this strip of land that the boat was now drifting, and as they drew nearer, the children watched with curiosity the great birds spread their wide wings and sail away to the opposite shore. The boat moved slowly past tall clumps of coarse grass and rushes, then suddenly stopped in the thickest and blackest of the mud and stood perfectly still.

"Now," said Roger, in a troubled voice, "there's no knowing how long we shall have to stay here. That tall grass hides us completely from the shore."

The children sat and watched the reeds over their heads bend and sway in the wind for some moments in silence. Presently the pigeons in the basket began to coo loudly and rustle about, as though tired of their willow prison.

"Poor little things," said Vida, "why don't you let them fly? They can find their way home, and it's too late to go to Tom's now."

"I will," answered Roger, "if some one don't come for us soon. How I wish I had a long stick!"

"What would you do with it?" asked Vida.

"Oh, I'd tie a handkerchief to the end and wave it backward and forward until somebody noticed it."

Vida looked up at the cloudy sky and then down at the black mud. After a while she said, "It's dreadfully ugly here; I wish I could get out."

"But you can't, Vida. That mud is so soft and deep it would swallow you up in no time. Don't you remember last spring how Will Banks tried to wade ashore, and sank down, down, down until there was nothing but his head above the mud, and if some men fishing had not heard him scream he would have gone altogether underneath and never been seen again?"

"Yes, I remember," answered Vida, "but that was a year ago, and the mud may have grown hard by this time." Vida was silent after this for a few minutes, but presently her eye fell upon a long slim pole, and she cried, "Roger, I see a splendid long stick over there, only a little way off."

"Well, I wish it was here," answered Roger, as he picked up the basket, and peeped in at the pigeons.

"Are you going to let them fly?" asked Vida.

"Yes, I think so," replied Roger. "They seem so miserable, and we may have to stay here all night."

"Oh dear! I shall be dreadfully frightened when it grows dark," said Vida, mournfully. "What a pity pigeons can't talk! If they could, I would ask Goldneck to carry a message to papa or Jerry."

"That puts me in mind of something," cried Roger, looking up quickly. "Suppose we turn them into carrier-pigeons?"

"Why, how could we do that?" inquired Vida, wonderingly.

"Just write a note and tie it to one of their necks. Then let them fly. Some one will be sure to see it, for you know the pigeons always stand by the kitchen door to be fed before sunset."

"Oh, what fun!" cried Vida, laughing merrily.

Roger thrust his hand first in one pocket and then in the other; presently his face grew very grave, and he said, "No use; I've lost my pencil."

"That don't matter," said Vida. "Write it with a pin—little dots, you know. There's a piece of paper in the basket."

"Just the thing!" cried Roger, as he tore off a long strip of paper. Then he formed each letter by pricking its shape in the paper with a pin. When it was finished the message read thus:

WE ARE ON HERON ISLAND
IN THE MUD COME PLEASE AND TAKE US OFF

B. L. YNN.

Vida held one of the pigeons gently while Roger fastened the note about its neck by a ribbon from his hat.

"Now let him fly," said Roger, as soon as this was accomplished.

Vida opened her hands. The bird plumed its wing, and plucked unceasingly at the ribbon around its neck; then it flew high into the air, circled around two or three times, and came back. Finally it perched upon the farther end of the boat, turning its glossy neck from side to side.

"Now what is the matter," exclaimed Roger, wonderingly.

"I suppose he is waiting for Cushtat," said Vida. "Shall I let her go?"

"Oh yes, I forgot. Open the basket quick," replied Roger.

But when the other pigeon was free they both kept flying around and above in the most tantalizing manner, always coming back to stand just out of reach, as though they did not quite like to go home alone.

"I wish I had that long pole now," said Roger, as he sat, with his back turned to Vida, watching the pigeons; "I would soon make them fly home."

Vida heard what he said. She sat still for a moment, looking thoughtfully at the smooth long rod half hidden in the rushes about twenty feet away.

"Roger does not know how light I am," said she to herself, "or he would never think the mud could swallow Vida hesitated only one moment, then walked boldly out. At the first movement her foot sank into the mud up to the ankle, at the next she went down, down, down, just as Will Banks had done. She gave one loud scream of horror.

"Vida! Vida! where are you?" cried Roger, in alarm, as he turned quickly around. In a moment he saw what had happened, and with a shout of encouragement sprang from the boat. Leaping lightly from clump to clump, he reached the bare spot, and grasping the nearest rushes in one hand, swung himself into the black slimy mud to his sister's side. Fortunately his foot struck against a long slender root, which offered him a slight support. With his disengaged hand he seized Vida's cloak, and drew her toward him. Then he endeavored to raise her in his arms, but at each movement the root under him bent more and more.

me. I know I can run over there and back again before he turns around, and I mean to try."

Then, without another thought, Vida slipped over the side of the boat, and cautiously placed her two small feet upon a hummock of earth, out of which grew a great bunch of long green rushes. It was quite firm, so she nodded her head triumphantly, and took a step forward.

"I knew it," said Vida, as she hopped to the next bunch of roots. She progressed very safely as long as she had the reeds and rushes to support her. But presently Vida came to a bare place that must be crossed before she could reach the rod. She looked back at the boat. Roger was still engaged with the pigeons, and had not missed her.

Poor little Vida had sunk almost to her shoulders, and was so weak with fright that she was incapable of doing more than clasp her small hands over Roger's arm, and look imploringly into his face. And Roger, realizing their danger, closed his eyes and silently prayed for help.

Minutes, which seemed like hours to the children, passed by. The gray clouds turned to pink, and far off in the west the great golden sun sank nearer and nearer to the water, but still no sound of voice or splashing air broke the silence to give them hope.

At last Vida raised her head and said, with a sob, while the tears rolled down her pale cheeks:

"Don't stay here, Roger. I know you could climb back by yourself if you would."

"Do you think I would be mean enough to leave you all alone, little Vida?" answered Roger, stoutly; for although the hand that grasped the rushes was torn and bleeding, and the slender root under his feet was bent almost to breaking, the thought of saving himself without his sister never entered his mind.

"I have been dreadfully naughty," said Vida, after a pause. "Poor papa and mamma will have no children now." She gave another little sob, leaned her cheek against Roger's arm, and cried silently.

"Don't cry, dear," said Roger, coaxingly. "Perhaps some one may find the note we sent by Goldneck and come for us soon."

"It's too late," said Vida; "the pigeons went to bed long ago."

"Hush!" cried Roger, earnestly; "I hear a sound."

"That was only the big herons coming back," answered Vida, hopelessly.

"Listen, Vida! listen! I hear it again. It is our papa's voice. Papa! oh, papa! come quick!" shouted Roger. "Here we are, away behind the rushes."

"Coming," answered their father; and in a moment more the rushes were parted and a boat appeared, pushed laboriously through the mud by Mr. Lynn and Jerry. They both uttered exclamations of astonishment and horror when they saw the plight the children were in, and quickening their efforts, they reached them not one moment too soon. For as Mr. Lynn bent forward to seize Vida, the root under Roger's foot snapped, and he would have been engulfed in the mud but for Jerry's strong hand.

The pigeon had indeed proved a good messenger, and carried Roger's note safely home. It was discovered just in time to save the children from a dreadful death.

Goldneck was returned to the dovecote and another bird substituted in its place as a present for Tom. Because, Roger declared, he would not part with that one for a fortune; and, besides, he says that he intends to turn it into a carrier-pigeon in earnest some day.

PIPPY'S FIRST TOILETTE. DRAWN BY F. S. COURTEL.

PAT.

BY SYDNEY DAYRE.

"YES, they're sending the poor things from the city all over the country for a mouthful of fresh air and a bite of something wholesome to eat. We ought to do our share, Aunt Nancy."

"Maybe so, Ruth, but it's risky, to my mind."

"Risk of what, Aunt Nancy? A couple of children can't do much mischief on an old farm in two weeks, if they do any."

"They'll do enough, you may be sure; but that ain't all. They do say there's no tellin' what you may catch from that sort, and that these people that goes among 'em just takes their lives in their hands. They lives in dreadful holes—all dirt and disease."

"Well," said Mrs. Pritchard, rather indignantly, "I think they must be about the same kind of poor the Lord went about among, only not so bad, perhaps, as those He used to see. Seems to me He never told His disciples to keep away for fear of catching things."

"And then how do you know what evil they may teach them two boys of yours?"

Mrs. Pritchard looked sober. "Well, I had thought of that, Aunt Nancy, but I don't believe any children we were befriending would do them harm, and in such a little time as two weeks."

"Well, well, Ruth, you're mistress here, so it ain't for me to dictate; but it's risky—that's all I have to say."

Two boys came, perhaps twelve years old as to form, but older as to face, with gaunt limbs, and eyes astare with the wonders of the journey and of the strange things all around them. In the eyes of one familiar with their class they would be recognized as having graduated in all that goes to make up the poor little street Arab. News-boy, boot-black, wharf-rat, or vagrant, they were fair specimens of the outgrowth of the great city's slums. Mrs. Pritchard's heart warmed toward the neglected boys with an earnest desire that a stay under her roof might be fruitful of lasting good to them.

Their ignorance of everything belonging to country life was wonderful. Jack and Harry Pritchard followed their guests about, doing the honors of the place, now listening with awe to Pat's talk about the shipping in New York Harbor, as he skipped like a monkey to the top of the tallest elm-tree to show how the sailors went up the masts, now shouting with laughter at their questions and remarks concerning things on the farm.

"Do look at him!" said Aunt Nancy, pointing out of the window as Pat dropped from the elm. "One would think he was brought up in a circus. This mornin' I heard a noise on the roof above my room, and the first thing I see that boy went a-past my window hand over hand till he come to the water-pipe, and then a-moost without touchin' it he slid down like a cat. He'll be teachin' our boys all sorts of tricks. Look there—now!"

Harry and Jack were being hoisted upon a shed overlooking the poultry-yard and stable. On the edge of this, with four pairs of legs dangling in what to the ladies appeared a most uncomfortable position, such an animated conversation went on that Aunt Nancy stole near enough to hear, feeling sure some mischief was brewing.

"Now, thin," says Pat, "it's meself can't kape in mind the names at all at all. It's the elegant little white beauty 'd be the calf?"

"Pshaw, Pat!" said Jim, with a wise air. "That's a pig."

"Niver!" said Pat. "It's the purty darlin' wid the wool, I'm manin'."

"Oh!" said Jim. "Yes, that's a calf."

"No," said Harry, laughing till he nearly lost his balance, "that's a calf over there—the calf's colored—see?"

"Dark it is. Thin it's another calf 'll be over in the corner there?"

"No, that's a black sheep—the pretty one's a white sheep."

"Arrah, thin," Pat shook his head comically, "it's a brave little head ye'll be havin' to kape 'em all shlthraight. But see—" he settled himself so as to get an outlook in another direction, "d'ye mind the purty little hins down there, now!"

"Oh, Pat, those are ducklings: see 'em swim in the little pond." Pat jumped down and ran toward them, forgetting the small boys, one of whom jumped after him and had a very solid fall, while the other scrambled down the rough end of the shed, reaching the ground with torn clothes. Aunt Nancy went into the house with a grave protest against such "goin' on," but mamma, who had observed that in order to appear manly before the others neither of her boys cried, as was their usual habit in small misfortunes, wisely made up her mind that a little roughing with strangers would not hurt them.

"Ducks, is it?" went on Pat, "an' sh'wimm' like any boat! Here's more of 'em—shoo, now! Go 'long in the wather wid yez!"

"Oh, stop!" cried Harry. "Those are chickens. They can't swim."

"Asy, thin!" Pat rescued from drowning a chick he had driven in, and then began checking off on his fingers.

"Ducks, hins, chucks—an' would that be a hin, too, the jewel?" pointing admiringly to a pigeon whose soft plumage of white and purple caught his eye as it came tamely among the boys.

"No, that's one of my pigeons," said Harry, catching and caressing the gentle little creature.

"Pigeon. An' the fat ladies by the fence?"

"Geese."

"Geese it is. The top of the mornin' to yez, ladies," said Pat, making a low bow as the geese waddled toward the pond. "It's a plinty of your kin I've seen in the markets, but they'd taken off their foine clothes and was hangin' heads down, so I didn't quite recognize yez at first. Ducks, hins, pigeons—be the howly poker!—will ye mind the burrd wid the big thrair to 'er gown!"

Both strangers stared in open-mouthed wonder at the beautiful thing which suddenly flew down near them. And then Jim gave a shout of delight, but Pat fairly held his breath as it spread out before them its glory of blue and gold many-eyed plumage.

"Och! an' it's a bit of the country shky she's been gettin' to dress herself in!"

"Didn't you ever see a peacock before?"

"A paycock, is it?" Pat solemnly counted off another finger. "A paycock!" He climbed upon the granary, and seating himself upon the ridge-pole, remained in close watch of the proud bird, as she turned this way and that, as if aware of his admiration, until dinner-time.

The bright days passed without giving Mrs. Pritchard reason to regret that her hand had been one among the many holding out a gift of sweet country sights and sounds to those into whose lives so little of sweetness enters. Harry had a sprained wrist as the result of a fall from some height to which he had followed Pat, and neither boy had a whole garment left. Miss Nancy shook her head disapprovingly, but Mrs. Pritchard observed with pleasure the instinct of manliness and of kindly consideration for guests developing in her boys, and smiled as she mended for the four. Jim went among the animals with a voice and touch which the dumb creatures always recognized as belonging to a lover of their kind, and before many days they came and went at his slightest call. Quiet hints and suggestions from the mistress of the place had been generally faithfully attended to, and nothing in the way of wilful mischief had been done. No bird's nest had been robbed, nor tree nor flower injured.

"I don't quite like the look of the weather," said Mrs. Pritchard one night, just after the noisy quartette had trooped off to bed.

"It's comin' up a reg'lar old-fashioned thunder-storm, to my mind," said Aunt Nancy. "I'm glad them boys is in, and not down to the fur end of the pastur' lot, or atop of the barn, or some other such place."

Mrs. Pritchard watched the gathering of the clouds long after the sleep which comes to blessed boyhood had gathered the four into its soft embrace. As the dead lull which often comes before a storm gave place to puffs of wind, and the lightning grew more vivid, and the noise of the thunder rose in an almost continuous roar, she went from room to room closing windows and blinds. This finished, she went into the back yard to unloose a dog which whined and fretted against his chain.

"Poor Watch! Lonely out here in the storm?"

He gratefully licked her hand, just as a blinding flash seemed to wrap her in its fearful whiteness. Whether it was this or the deafening report in the same moment which struck her to the earth she never could tell, but for a few seconds she lay stunned and bewildered, then staggered to her feet with a cry of dismay.

The porch lay a splintered ruin at her feet. Had the dark-winged angel been borne under her roof in the grasp of the lightning? Her own two were on the same floor with her. Ascertaining that both were whimpering with fright, she called to Aunt Nancy, Jim, Pat, and the maid, and hearing an answer from each one, thankfully sat down to quiet the boys.

But a sound in the next room alarmed her, and springing up, she opened a door. A red angry demon glared at her—one who had come to dispute with her the possession of this her old home, who would wring it from her, and lay it in a heap of ruins before her eyes.

Shrieking "Fire! fire!" she rushed upstairs to find that all were astir; then down again, hurrying her boys to a place of safety, and striving with trembling hands to secure some valuable papers and old silver. The maid came and helped her, and soon the farm hands, who lived at a little distance, and other neighbors, gathered. But the old house was doomed. The flames spread rapidly over and through the back part of it, shedding a brilliant light on the surrounding gloom, before only broken by the lightning flashes.

"Are we all safe?" cried Mrs. Pritchard. She could see Jim among the men unloosing the animals and leading them to places of safety. She was sure she had heard a shout from Pat; Susan, the maid, was wringing her hands and making exclamations of woe close beside her.

"But where's Aunt Nancy, Susan?"

"She's about here somewheres, ma'am; she was a-comin' right down after me."

But Miss Nancy was not about anywhere, and Mrs. Pritchard's rapidly growing fear was brought suddenly to dreadful certainty by the sight of the poor old lady at the window of her room, looking dazed and helpless with fright. A cry of horror went up as men ran for ladders, for the stairs were a sheet of flame.

But the ladders were always hung under the roof of the long back porch, and were now burning with it. And as swift-flying feet went to others, many a fear was felt that their help might come too late.

Through Mrs. Pritchard's terror had just broken the thought, "I haven't seen Pat yet—where can the boy be?" when a light figure flew around the corner of the house, and shot up the old elm-tree with almost the quickness of the flickering shadows cast by the flames. Next he was seen at the end of a rope, swinging back and forth between the tree and the window. And those who looked on scarcely drew breath as he presently sprang to the window-sill and disappeared within the room. Miss Nancy had sunk upon the bed, a slight touch of the lightning having partially stupefied her.

"Arrah, ma'am," said Pat, taking in her condition and the danger of the situation with one glance of his keen eye, "it's sorry I am to come into a lady's room without shtoppin' to knock and say, 'The top o' the mornin' to ye,' but there's a gentleman beyant there," pointing to the closed door, on the other side of which could be heard the snapping of the burning wood, "as wants to take possession inimmajety, and won't take no denial, ma'am—aisy, thin, just a shtep now." With a coolness far beyond his years, born of his training among city excitements, he was half coaxing, half supporting her through the fast-thickening smoke to the window, around which those below were eagerly watching.

"Jump, Miss Nancy—jump! We'll catch you," cried a dozen voices.

"See them all waitin' for ye—an ilegant jump 'twill be. What if ye was in a five-shtory timent-house and the cruel bricks below? Now, thin!"

But poor Miss Nancy could not jump, and Pat tore the sheets from the bed and knotted them together as he hurriedly resolved on making a desperate attempt to lower her to the ground. The slight doorway behind them had fallen in glowing embers, and the fire flew half-way across the room, when the welcome sound of a ladder outside scraping against the weather-boarding was heard. Pat, exerting all his boyish strength, and disregarding Miss Nancy's nervous screams, managed to place her in the arms stretched to receive her. Then, with a bound, he reached the ground first, and stood ready to help as she was brought down, while a tongue of flame darted after them as if in wrath at their escape.

A crash of thunder drowned the cry of triumph which greeted them, and then the welcome rain poured down, saving the barn and other buildings from the fire.

Jim took his departure for the city at the time set, but he went without Pat. A boy was wanted on the place to assist in cleaning up the wreck left by the fire; then to wait on the masons who laid the foundations for a new house; then to fetch and carry for the carpenters as the walls rapidly arose under their lively hammering; then to help remove rubbish and get things settled in the new home. And then Aunt Nancy said:

"If a big storm should come, and this house should get struck by lightnin', and get a-fire and burn down some night, there isn't a livin' soul but Pat could get me out of it alive. Ruth, I think Pat had better stay."

And Pat staid.

ALL ABOUT GOLD-FISH.

BY A. W. ROBERTS.

I.

THE gold-fish, or golden carp, is a native of China, where for hundreds of years it has been under domestication. It was first imported from China to England by Philip Worth in the year 1728, where it was successfully bred, and became distributed throughout Europe. In 1831 some six or eight dozen were brought from France, and successfully established in numerous ponds in New York State, particularly on Long Island.

Gold-fish spawn from two to three times during the summer months, according to the temperature of the water. The females begin to leave the deep water in April, and by May are all on their spawning grounds. The favorite places for spawning are those parts of the shore where the water is shallow, and is constantly exposed to the warming rays of the sun, and where the water plants grow abundantly. In such places the gold-fish assemble in large schools, keeping the edges of the pond in a foam with their constant gambols. You would think they were having a game of tag on a grand scale, so earnestly do they chase one another. On such occasions they become very tame, and can be taken in the hand.

Each spawning season lasts about ten days. The eggs are fastened by the females to the stems of plants. They are of a clear salmon-color when first deposited; in course of time they become somewhat darker, and two very small black spots appear in each egg; these are the eyes of the young gold-fish imprisoned in the egg. In a day or two more he begins to wiggle his tail pretty actively, and is about ready to break out of his confinement, and enter a new life of freedom and danger, for you must remember that fish of so intense and brilliant colors as are gold-fish must always present a shining mark for hungry fish, turtles, frogs, storks, and bitterns, not to mention small boys and big men.

All the fish hatched from the egg are not gold-fish at first, and some never become gold-fish; no matter how long they live or how large they grow, they always remain silver-fish. During the first and second years nearly all the gold-fish that were born silver-fish gradually become of a golden color. The first change of color is to a deep copper or bronze; they are then called "turners." Those that do not change are always destroyed by breeders of gold-fish.

The gold-fish having been under domestication so many hundred years, the order of nature seems to have become somewhat turned aside, so that many curious freaks of color, forms of body, and variations in the number and shape of fin, have appeared, as, for instance, fish with double and treble tails (Fig. 1), and examples having malformed bodies and minus the proper number of fins (Fig. 2).

In color, there are two varieties of all gold—one

FIG. 1.

Fig. 2.—A MALFORMED GOLD-FISH.

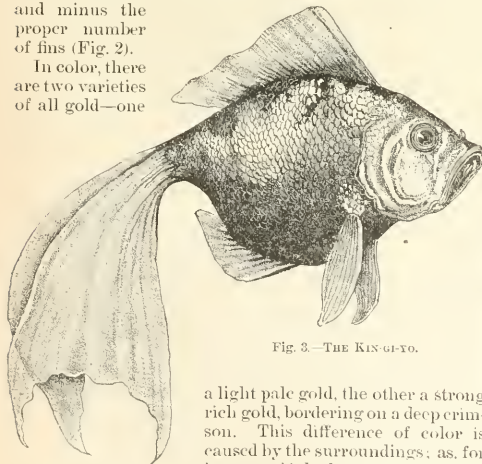

FIG. 3.—THE KIN-GI-YO.

a light pale gold, the other a strong rich gold, bordering on a deep crimson. This difference of color is caused by the surroundings; as, for instance, if the bottom of the pond consists of a light-colored clay, and is exposed in all parts to the direct action of the sun, the gold-fish will be of a very pale gold and of a weak constitution. A pond having a bottom of rich black vegetable earth (peat), plenty of water plants, and a moderate amount of sunlight will contain fish of a strong reddish gold-color.

As a rule, nearly all fishes take the color of their immediate surroundings, be they dark or light. I have kept striped bass in a tank of light-colored rock-work, and a white gravel bottom, with strong sunlight, until they became of a uniform soiled white color. There are also gold-fish mottled with black, copper, gold, and white. Then come the "pearl" fish, which are pure white, with blue or pink eyes, and are albinos.

Those ingenious people the Japanese have taken advantage of the tendency of the gold-fish to develop odd and strange forms, and have produced some truly wonderful and beautiful types. Among them is the double-tailed gold-fish called the Kin-gi-yo (Fig. 3). Too much can hardly be said in praise of the singular beauty of this fish, the united tail fins being nearly the length of the entire body, and resembling the most delicate tissue as they float slowly and gracefully through the water.

Of the first lot of Kin-gi-yos, some eighty in number, that started from Japan for this country, only fifteen reached San Francisco, in a very weak condition, and out of the fifteen only seven reached Baltimore, their place of destination. One of the most exquisite specimens of the seven was purchased by the New York Aquarium for five hundred dollars, and it was acknowledged that this single gold-fish had yielded a profit of three thousand dollars (Fig. 3).

Another wonderful variety of gold-fish exhibited at the Aquarium was the Chinese Tong-tsing-yo, or quadruple-tailed and telescopic-eyed gold-fish (Fig. 4). On examining the illustration it will be seen that the eyes are very large, and instead of occupying a cavity are placed at the extremity of two eye-stalks, the same as are the eyes of all crabs and some kinds of insects. The quadruple tail of this fish is also wonderfully developed. Instead of drooping, it projects in fan-like form. When it is remembered how many thousands of miles these fish travelled before reaching New York, and how many hundreds of people admired their beautiful colors and strange forms, I think you will agree with me that they were the most wonderful gold-fish ever known.

In one of the tanks at the Berlin Aquarium in which carp were kept it was noticed that they began to act very strangely, and were thought to be sick (Fig. 5). Some would curve their bodies so that their heads and tails rested on the bottom of the tank, thus describing an arch; others rested their heads on projecting rocks, with their bodies extending outwardly, and again others balanced themselves on their heads, or lay down on their sides. In these curious positions they remained stationary and rigid, but when food was placed near them, or they were disturbed by splashing the water, they would resume their natural positions, swim about the tank, and take their food. When all was quiet they would carefully examine their old resting-places with their noses, and when satisfied would resume exactly the same strange positions.

As all fish have eyes which are without lids, and are always open, it has been very hard to distinguish their sleeping from their frequent long periods of rest when not in search of food. The question so often asked, "Do fish sleep?" the possibility of which has been denied by most naturalists, is now definitely established, for the curious actions of the carp described are acknowledged to be absolute proof that long and sound periods of sleep were being indulged in. I have often had gold-fish become bent and rigid, and had supposed the cause to be paralysis, which I generally cured by placing the fish in warm water, but I am now of the opinion that they were sleeping.

THE FATE OF GRUMBLE TOWN.—BY CARRIE V. SHAW.

HERE are the ruins of Grumble Town,
 And here is the pathway stretching down
 To where the waters so blankly frown
 In the face of the smiling sun,
 And there is the spot where the Princess sat,
 The vain little Princess Ernestadt,
 While wishing the terrible wishes that
 Were granted as soon as done.

The song-birds sang in the leafy wood,
 The frogs were croaking loud as they could,
 The sun was going to bed, as he should,

When the cross little Princess went
 And sat her down by the water-side,
 And suddenly stared in the rushing tide,
 And noped and gazed and grumbled and Cried

Till she gave her feelings vent,

And said: "I wish that the frogs would hush;
 I wish the waters would cease to rush;
 I wish that the west would never flush

With a sunset glow any more,
 But ever the sun keep blazing down,
 And burn the world to a coffee brown,
 And all of the people in Grumble Town,
 From the Palace down to the shore."

The milk of kindness
 Was turned to curds
 In the breast of a fairy who Heard her words,
 And he hushed the sound of
 The singing-birds;
 The frogs all at once grew Still,

The sun flew up to the zenith high,
 And blazed and gazed with a brassy eye,
 Till it burned the people brown and dry,
 Thus working the Princess' will.

Seeing the woe she had brought about,
 The little Princess began to pout;

She tried to complain—her tongue fell out,
 So she tore at her golden hair,
 And in the face of the heavens' frown
 The tongueless race to die lay down,
 And that was the end of Grumble Town,
 And of all the people there.

OUR BABY.

O baby, dear baby,
Whatever you do,
You are King of the home,
and we all bend to you;
We run on your errands,
We haste at your call,
For baby, dear baby,
You're King of us all.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

THE Postmistress is glad to see that the children do not grow tired of writing to each other, even when the thermometer climbs up among the nineties. Every mail which comes to Franklin Square brings great bundles of the nicest little letters you ever saw, and the puzzle is to choose which may be published for everybody to read, and which the Postmistress must keep and enjoy by herself.

One thing is certain, and that is, that HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE has won an honored place in thousands of homes. "The children who read its bright pages with eager interest from week to week are not the only ones who speak in its praise. All the way from far-off Queensland, for instance, comes this cordial indorsement from a mother, sent with the letter from her boy. We are sure that her feeling is shared by very many others to whom this paper is a constant assistant in the nursery, the school-room, and the parlor:

"Allow a stranger to thank you for the good work you are doing among the young. Living in a new country, where the conditions of life are much the same as in country districts in America, I find your paper an invaluable aid. My children depend entirely on my teaching at present, and with a large household, many callers, and one servant, I often find lessons a heavy task. You may imagine how I welcome anything which makes learning a pleasure, as your charming paper does.

My second boy, whose letter I inclose, is ten, and has developed a great taste for letter-writing, which I attribute to the Post office box.

BERTIE'S MAMMA.

ROCKHAMPTON, QUEENSLAND.

I have been sick for some days, and am so tired of doing nothing that I have asked mamma to let me write to you. We always look forward so much to seeing YOUR PEOPLE, but it comes as us only once a month. I don't get the time to wait. We like the letters and the pictures the best of all. Tell Mr. Otis we are very glad he is writing another story. Mamma often lets us do our reading lesson from the Post office Box. This month (May) is the beginning of our winter, and the oranges are nearly ripe, so you may guess it's not very cold.

We are covered all over with pictures. We thought it fine fun at first, but now we are very tired of it, and mamma is afraid we will never finish it. My favorite books are The Gull's Island, The Adventure, and Mr. Brassey's Voyage in the Submarine. Wouldn't I like to have with her! My grandmamma has gone to England on a visit, and we want her back again awfully. She offered to take my other brother for a trip, but he said he didn't want to go without me. Some day we all mean to go and see the places we read about, and to see some old ruins and castles. We have only two Brassey's houses here. My pony is having a holiday now, and I expect he'll be very flush when I am able to ride him again. I am quite tired now, so good night.

About that screen, Bertie, I would certainly finish it if I were you. I know how weary one sometimes gets of a large piece of work, and how strong is the temptation to neglect it after the first interest is over, but remember, dear, that there is such a thing as just pegging away until the very last bit that you can do has been done. A little time spent every day by each child in the family, and the pretty screen will be covered.

"Then how delightful to surprise mamma! It would be a good rule for all boys and girls always to finish whatever they begin.

CANTON, ARIZONA.

I am not a little boy eight years old, but I know one who is, and it is about him I am going to write. He has a pretty name, Orman Allen, but when he was a tiny baby his papa called him Hard Times, and Hard Times he is called still. But this name has not hardened his disposition, for he is the happiest boy I know. When his grandmamma sits in a chair and she can hear his voice, on his return, long before he gets in sight, rising and falling in a peculiar way, which she thinks says very plainly, "All's well," but any one else would hear, repented over and over, the words, "Who ah! he ah! who ah! he!"

Last spring his mamma went to Nashville, and left him a few weeks with his grandmamma. He grew tired making "frog-houses" in the sand, he played being a blacksmith, and gathered all the old iron he could find, and placed it under a large hickory tree. With the help of his grandmamma he could make merry music to his heart's delight (and his grandmamma's too). He would strike away for hours so industriously that his grandmamma was reminded of Longfellow's "Village Blacksmith," and made a parody on it. For the amusement of the young people I will send a few lines:

Under the spreading hick'ry tree

With the wood he smiteth stands;

The smith, a little man,

With small and grimy hands.

Hard Times has a little sister, called Rat by her papa, and I think if some of the little folks could see her they would think she was the sweetest Rat they ever saw. Her mamma only knows how many nice things there are in the world waiting for him to take possession, for you know, almost everybody lays by occasionally something nice for hard times. I would tell you what he loves best in the world, but some of the little girls might laugh.

ONE WHO KNOWS HARD TIMES.

"It is too bad." I hear some of the little people saying, "that this nice lady stopped without telling us that funny secret." 'Tis it possibly be kisses that Hard Times loves so well!

HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT.

This is our first letter to the Post-office Box, but having read YOUR PEOPLE ever since the first number was issued in subscription, as a Christmas gift my papa has sent me every year by a friend of papa and mamma, we thought we should like to write a few lines to the kind Postmistress, who takes such an interest in us. We two brothers are not remarkable in any way, except that we were the first young children to make the ascent of Mount Mary, the highest peak of the Adirondacks, in 1877, when we were four years of age. We were walking every step of the way. We went into camp, accompanied by a maid and a good trusty guide, and were gone four days and three nights, and we four days from the way we had to go to the summit, where we rested and had luncheon, and from the summit down to Beede's Hotel, past the Abbe lakes, a distance of seven or eight miles. The way we came to our tented home at half past six, having walked, with a brief interval for rest at the top, since seven in the morning. People could hardly believe two such small boys were able to accomplish such a feat, and we felt ourselves the heroes of the hour. I should like to write more, but will not use too much of your precious space.

FREDERIC W. and WILLIAM M. B.

Such a performance was something to be proud of.

SARASOTA, MISSISSIPPI.

My paper comes on in Saturday's mail, and I enjoy reading it on Sunday, as my parents do not let me read it any more. I am now a boy ten years old, and have vacation now, but will begin school again on the 1st of September. We have a private school, with one of the nicest young ladies in the world for a teacher, and am now without a pet, as my last one (a redbird) died not long ago. I fed it too much, which caused its death. A bluebird built and hatched a nestful of little ones on top of one of the posts in our front gallery. My two little brothers and I have had a great deal of fun fishing since vacation. We have a beautiful spring branch near our house, where there are quite many small fish. This is my first letter to any paper, and if you give it a place in the Post-office Box, I will try to write a better one next time. E. O. H.

This little correspondent sounds a warning note: "Begin school again in September! Vacation is flying, isn't it, boys? Now let the girls speak.

Here is a little lady who has something to say:

FORT BROWN, BROWNSVILLE, TEXAS.

I have thought lots of times I would write you a letter, and have always put it off for some reason or other, but when I read that letter about the little Indian girl at Hampton, Virginia, I made up my mind to do it at once. I lived several years at the Institute there. My papa used to be the military instructor, and an number of the Indian girls there then. I was just delighted to see the letter from Hampton, and all about it.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for years, and don't think that we could quite keep house without it. We feel that we are a long distance from you, for they don't even use American money here; we change all our money into Mexican before we spend it in the stores or anywhere, and the people generally speak Spanish.

From our front porch we look into Brownsville, but Matamoros is full in sight, and is a very interesting city in Mexico, just across the river. They all speak Spanish, and we have a hard time when we go there because we can't talk in that language.

We have a number of pets—five mocking-birds, one beautiful Mexican canary with a red breast, bright blue head, and green wings, and a finch. We keep them in cages, and I have a cage for a snake in a cage the other day sold for seventy-five cents.

I am ten years old, and I have a brother eight years old; his name is Charlie. I have had a pony, but he died, and after I was named Tommy Tucker, after the boy in "Raising the Pearl." My pony behaved badly, and threw me off, and broke my legs, and stepped on my foot and arm, bruising the latter dreadfully. It has been bandaged nearly two weeks, and isn't nearly well yet. It is my right arm, and I had to get mamma to copy his letter because it is so lame, and I can not practice my music lessons either.

It is very hot here, and we went and camped out on Brazos Island, five miles out in the Gulf. Mamma and papa and I went, and my brother and she was a little girl. We had a number of tents, and took everything to make us comfortable. We had one tent as large as a good-sized room; then we had two tents for beds, one for the dining-room and kitchen. It was fun at first, but we were all glad to get home. We went in bathing, but were afraid to swim in deep water. We had a very good time, and my brother and Charlie and I learned to swim at Hampton. We gathered lots of shells, pink and white ones, and all kinds; but I would rather live in a house, wouldn't you? We had a very good time, and to Young People's (ot if I thought the sick children would like them to play with. Do you think they would?

I have written you a long letter, but, as I want to join the Little House-keepers I send you two receipts—one of Grandmama L.'s, who lives in New Mexico, and one we made up. I wish somebody would tell me how to make them. They never were known to fail if made right.

GRANDMAMA'S CARE.—Six eggs beaten separately, two cups of sugar, one cup of butter, three-quarters of a cup of milk, two heaping tea-spoonfuls of baking powder, four cups of flour (previously sifted), and two tea-spoonfuls of vanilla or one of almond, favoring according to taste; beat the sugar and butter together well; then add the four cups of milk, and mix thoroughly. Sift the eggs, and then the flour with the baking powder; while this is in the oven take half a cake of Baker's chocolate, and let it melt on the stove with two tea-spoonfuls of water; then beat it up with a cup of sugar and the white of an egg beaten to a froth, and spread this on the cake well as soon as it comes out of the oven, and you will have one large of two small cakes fit for a queen. Mamma and I made one yesterday.

CANDY.—Three cups of sugar, one cup of water, and one lemon; don't stir at all; don't put in the lemon until it is nearly done. All the Little House-keepers should know how to make it when candy is done, which is when it hardens in water. Your loving friend, NINA I.

As I remember perfectly how Coney Island used to look, I readily imagined you on Brazos Island. I prefer a house to a tent, decidedly. I am sorry your pony was so naughty, and I hope he will behave better when next you ride him. The children at St. Mary's Hospital would be delighted with a box of shells; most of them can play only with things which are paper, but not play things. Thanks, Nina, for the receipts. I intend to have grandmama's cake for tea some day soon.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

I have a little dog, and he is very funny. I spend the Sunday with my papa and he goes to the sea-shore, and go in bathing every day. I look forward with great pleasure to every Tuesday when YOUR PEOPLE arrives. I liked "Nan" ever so much, and was pleased to see "Honor Bound."

KATIE McI. T.

ADAMS, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a little girl eight years old. I live in a beautiful country place, and at the foot of Mount Greylock; it is a large manufacturing village. I have no brothers and sisters like most of the children who write to you; I had a little brother who loved very much, but he died when I was winter. I have for pets a canary-bird, which I

A SEA-CANDLE.

In these days of gas and electric lights it seems very strange to hear of burning whale-oil in lamps, or even to use petroleum, but an actual candle that grows in the sea, and is alive, too, is still more strange.

This candle is the fattest of fat little fish, and it is found in the Northern seas, the very region where it is most needed. It is quite ornamental by moonlight, and glitters like pearls in the water because of its shiny armor. The Indians of Russian America and Vancouver Island catch the little fish—which are about as large as snails—with immense rakes, having teeth made of bone or sharp-pointed nails, and every time the rake is swept in one fish at least, and sometimes three or four, will be found fast on each tooth.

To make them into candles the women take a long wooden needle, and thread it with a piece of rush pith, which is drawn through the fish from head to tail. When this wick is lighted the fish burns steadily in its rough candlestick—only a bit of wood split at one end to hold the candle—and gives a light bright enough to read by. It is not very probable, though, that the natives use many of them for this purpose.

Large quantities of these useful little fish are turned into oil—but not to be burned in lamps. It is the favorite supply of winter food, and helps to keep out the terrible cold of those long Northern winters. When Mrs. Indian has oil-making on hand the children probably find it worse than washing-day or cleaning house, and are glad enough to take their little bows and arrows or spears and go off until things are quiet again around the lodge.

First the squaw makes five or six large fires, and throws a number of large round pebbles into each to be heated very hot. Four large square boxes of pine-wood are ready by each fire, and in every box she piles a layer of fish, which she covers with cold water, and then puts in five or six of the heated stones. When the smoke has cleared away small pieces of wood are laid on the stones, then more fish, water, stones, and wood, until the box is filled. The liquid from this box is used for the next one in place of water, and the floating oil is then skimmed off from the surface. This oil is put into bottles which are also found in the sea. An immense seaweed with hollow stalks that widen like a flask at the root is gathered for this purpose, and each bottle will hold nearly a quart of oil. Candle-fish is the every-day name of the oil-giver, but on great occasions it is Salmo pacificus.

WATER POLO.

In the sketch below we have a picture of an amusing game that took place at the Alexandria Regatta, in the harbor off Ras-el-Teen Palace, over which his Highness the Khedive of Egypt and a number of English officers presided. The competitors, attired in bathing-dresses, dived into the sea, and mounted floating wooden horses, upon which they paddled after a foot-ball which floated on the surface. Owing to the horses not being properly balanced, the contest was not a success except as a first trial. The foot-ball disappeared mysteriously, and no prize was awarded. Profiting by experience, the defects in the wooden horses can be remedied, and a water polo race will perhaps form an attractive feature in the future sports on the water.

"I WANT THIS VINE," HE ANSWERED.—SEE STORY, PAGE 642.

"ALL THE SAME."

BY ELLA WHEELER.

I KNOW a darling baby girl—
Miss Clytie is her name;
She has the cutest little way
Of ending anything she'll say
With three words—"All the same."

We tell her she's an angel child,
That straight from heaven she came;
She'll listen, wondering the while,
And then she'll answer, with a smile,
"I'm Clytie, all the same."

Again she's naughty, and we scold;
She necks from our blame—
Pouts just a little, hides her face,
And then asserts, with matchless grace,
"You love me, all the same."

Sometimes we laugh when we should frown—
I own it, to our shame,
I tell her to put down my pen;
She minds, but says, "Thome day again
I'll take it, all the same."

All sweetness and all mischief both
Dwell in her fairy frame,
And anything the elf may do—
Alas! I think she knows it, too—
She's charming, "all the same."

MORNING-GLORIES AND SHOES.

BY JENNIE M. BINGHAM.

SUCH a chattering! One might think a flock of birds had been disturbed, only it was very human chattering, every bit issuing from the mouths of some half-dozen school-girls, who with baskets and books had just tripped down the steps of the venerable stone school-house, and were loitering along to their homes.

"It must be the very best exhibition we've ever had," said the tallest girl, decidedly.

"I'm so glad I've got that new mnsic! You'll have to help me select, girls," cried out a little midget in blue ribbons.

"And oh, Mabel, what will you wear?" shouted another girl, as if this were the question.

"It's an easy thing for you, Mabel," suggested a quiet voice, as its owner glanced from her own plain calico to the dainty muslin of the other girl.

"I'm going to have a dress straight from New York," she answered, dwelling with emphasis on the "straight."

"Mother said I should if I took part in the Ex."

"Lucky child!" groaned little Blue-Ribbons. "Mine'll be that everlasting muslin straight from the closet, where it's been my bestest for two years," ending up with a comic sigh and a laugh, in which they all joined.

"Rachel, you may have all the scarlet geraniums you want."

"Oh, splendid! By-by," and Rachel turned in before a humble little house, and bounded up the steps.

"Oh, mother, I'm going to recite at the Ex!" she called before she was fairly in.

"Ain't it jolly?" puffed Johnnie, breathless in his attempts to be the news-bearer.

"Why don't you say something, mother?" demanded the girl.

"What do you want me to say? Minnie is glad enough for both," answered the mother, smiling a very faint smile over her sewing-machine, and glancing toward the invalid-chair, where a pair of very thin hands were being elapped vigorously.

"Of course Minnie is pleased," advancing to bestow a rapturous hug.

"What will you wear, Rachel?" asked the mother, a trifle anxiously.

"The same old thing," answered Rachel, trying to say it cheerfully. "A new dress is out of the question. But I'll have my cambric laundered. Don't you think it looks real nice, Min, when it's starched? And some new shoes, eh?"

"Won't your old shoes answer?" asked the mother, hesitatingly.

"Why, mamma, look!" and Rachel raised up a decidedly shabby shoe. "Oh, don't sigh so."

"We've had so many expenses lately. I know, dear, you're very cheerful to get along without a dress. But where shoes are coming from I don't know."

"What will you recite?" asked Minnie, giving her sister's hand a little pat of sympathy.

"I haven't quite decided," began Rachel, shaking off her sad air. "Miss Moore spoke of Alice Cary's 'Order for a Picture.' But I like 'Kentucky Belle' best."

"Oh yes, you know that so well, Rachie."

"Do I?" and Rachel stepped out on the floor, with a stage bow, and began in a very sweet voice:

"Summer of sixty-three, sir, and Conrad was gone away, Gone to the country town, sir, to sell our first load of hay."

"Oh, I think this is so pretty!" and she lowered her voice and waded her hands gracefully:

"From east to west, no river to shine out under the moon,
Nothing to make a shadow in the yellow afternoon;
Only the breathless sunshine, as I looked out all forlorn;
Only the rustle, rustle, as I walked among the corn."

"It's beautiful. I know you'll get some flowers. Won't she, mamma?" asked Minnie, clapping her hands again.

"Hush, child, don't get excited. It's tea-kettle time, Rachel."

Such busy times as those were among the girls and boys, plump up to the time of the dress rehearsal! Such trials of skill before home critics and mirrors, such a thumping of pianos by the musical part! You will perhaps understand when I tell you that the annual exhibition was the event of that little village.

And then the dress rehearsal! On the authority of the blue-ribboned girl they had "such a good time."

This dress rehearsal was where the trouble began for my heroine— But, there! I'm getting ahead of my story. Well, Rachel practiced, you may be sure, and ironed out her pretty cambric, and hoped against hope that something would turn up. Sometimes she felt like rushing into the shop and demanding some shoes of those provoking shop-men who would set up the daintiest ones in the window right before her eyes.

But the dress rehearsal came, and absolutely nothing had turned up. And so Rachel (doesn't she deserve to be called a heroine?) covered up the ache in her heart, and declared that the patches (mother's painstaking work) didn't show a bit. She had "never thought they could look so nice." And then she practiced slipping the worst one a little out of sight in a manner pronounced by all quite easy and graceful.

But the boys and girls were every one severe critics. Poor Rachel! She had not thought it would be so difficult to wear only a cambric. And then all the butterfly girls right on the front seat, where they must stare straight at her feet! She stammered and hesitated, and with the last word left the stage chagrined and disheartened.

Perhaps Miss Moore saw something of the need of encouragement. At any rate, she detained Rachel with a few kindly suggestions and some whispered words of praise, while the others rambled on ahead.

"Isn't it too bad about Rachel's shoes?" asked the tallest girl.

"Yes. When we had set out to make this exhibition so perfect, to have one of our best speakers wear such shoes!"

"It just spoils her speaking," added another, just the least bit spitefully, because she had hoped to be on the programme.

"It's had enough to have a cambrie dress, but this is too much," groaned Mabel, in a grieved tone.

"Just too much," groaned the chorus, even Blue-Ribbons going with the majority.

How much of this Rachel heard nobody knows. Enough, however, to keep her outside the house winking and blinking against the tears which would come; enough to make her utter a tragic vow that she would never disgrace herself and the school again—never.

Every well-behaved story must have a hero, you know. I wonder if it is too late to introduce mine? Tom Taylor, Mabel's brother, if you please, who with his cronies had formed the rear-guard for the group of girls. Perhaps I might say that in the Taylor family Tom was a little at discount. His mother had to acknowledge that he never yet had reflected credit on his bringing up. Robert, who had actually carried off a prize at a Boston school, declared that Tom was everlastingly backward. He liked outdoors ever so much better than books. I really think he never was known to get through a recitation, and as for stage performances, he invariably broke down in dire confusion.

"Say," he began, when they were safely within their own yard, "I think you're awful mean to Rachel."

"Now, Tom, you don't know anything about our plans."

"Both your plans!" shouted Tom, recklessly. "I say if plans make you act so mean to a jolly girl like Rachel, they ain't much;" and he frowned more fiercely than ever.

"You don't know anything about it, Tom Taylor; so there! We're always good to Rachie. Haven't I told her dozens of times to get all her flowers here? And we like her; but we can't help making a fuss over those shoes."

"What good does it do to clatter 'bout it? Ten to one she'll hear it. Get her some shoes."

"The perfect idea! You'd better start about shooing poor people, Tommy," laughed Mabel, twisting her lips.

"If I do, won't get you to help me," answered Tom, gruffly, as he shuffled off to bed.

Between you and me, Tom meant just what he said, and he never puzzled over any problem in his algebra half so hard as over this.

The next morning Tom, armed with a trowel, and a basket on his arm, tapped at Rachel's door.

"Good-morning," he began, as Rachel presented a surprised face. "I came to see if I could get some of your morning-glories. I want some awfully bad to grow up my pole."

"Of course; take all you want," answered Rachel, more surprised than ever, as she thought of his conservatory and flower beds at home. Perhaps he saw something of the surprise, and so explained, knocking his trowel bashfully against his basket:

"I always did like morning-glories, and I've got to have 'em for my pole."

"I'll come with you," said Rachel, running down the steps toward the trellis where the vine hung its clusters of purple and pink. "And please take all you want. I suppose they may be nice for a pole, but other flowers are prettier," observed Rachel, as he began digging.

"They're just the thing for a pole," agreed Tom, eagerly. "There isn't another vine I like so well, especially for a pole."

And then, when the vine was safely in the basket, Tom drew some silver from his pocket, dumped it into the hole the vine had made, and before Rachel's astonished eyes began covering it up.

"Tom Taylor, you shall not do it. You'll lose it. I won't have it;" and as he seized his basket and started she unearthed the money, and started after him, shouting wildly.

Tom was forced to stop. "I want this vine," he answered, turning square around; "but if you won't let me pay for it like business I won't have it—nary a bit;" and he put down his basket, and looked very stern and business-like.

"But," began Rachel, quite awed by this dignity.

"No buts about it. I must plant this 'fore school. Good-by;" and off he ran, leaving Rachel quite bewildered.

At first, of course, she protested that she wouldn't keep the money—for anything she wouldn't. But after a family council on the matter, it ended in a very joyful journey to a certain store just around the corner.

If Tom could have guessed the happiness which had suddenly bloomed from the vine he was that minute training over his pole, I wonder if he would have called it a bad bargain. Mother smiled off the anxious look, and Johnnie, after examining the leather critically, worked off his ecstasy by standing on his head a full minute.

If I had time I might tell you about the "Ex." They were all there. Minnie with her pillows, and Johnnie with a shining face and painfully slick hair, occupying a front seat.

No matter now that the neat cambrie was a trifle short, for when "Kentucky Belle" was announced Rachel forgot everything but the beautiful story.

Perhaps you remember it—about the young wife from Tennessee going with her husband to the prairies of Ohio, how she longs "for the sight of water, the shadowed slope of a hill," and about her husband who goes to the country town to sell the first load of hay. Morgan and his terrible band of raiders pass that way. She hides her Kentucky Belle in the bushes, the dear old horse brought from the blue-grass country of Tennessee. One of the men frightens her by stopping and demanding a drink. But he is only a blue-eyed laddie, worn and sick with the terrible marches. He tries to be brave, but when she tells him she too is from Tennessee, he faints and falls. Before he is conscious Morgan's men are galloping on, and the Michigan cavalry in wild pursuit. She keeps the boy until evening, and then—can you believe it?—brings out her pretty Kentucky Belle, clothes the boy in a suit of Conrad's, and guides him to the southward. When he is gone, and nothing is left but the ragged suit of gray and the drooping horse, she falls to crying, and Conrad finds her so. How could he blame her when she says it is all for Tennessee? But she hears from the boy she has saved, and Kentucky Belle, who is thriving down in the old blue-grass.

As the story was told in Rachel's sweet sympathetic voice, the audience grew more and more quiet until, with the last words,

"Ah, we've had many horses, but never a horse like her!"

they burst forth with the most uproarious clapping you ever heard. As for Johnnie, he came very near one of his prize somersaults, and Tom—Tom clapped as if he had an undisputed right to.

This was what Rachel said when she had survived the congratulations and was safely home:

"How little Tom Taylor knew what he did for me!"

"I had to laugh to think how surprised he would have been to know about your shoes coming from his vine," added Minnie, smiling.

When Tom had demurely listened to Rachel's praises at home that night he just pranced off to his room, where he could chuckle it out by himself, and declare in the face of the mirror, "Thomas, that's a joke worth havin'—eh, my boy?"

A SWALLOW flitting through the trees
 Carols this song upon the breeze:
 Here on the leafy apple bough
 Two little maidens swing all day.
 The face of one is clouded now;
 A moment since it laughed in play.
 The other smiles; I wonder why
 She does not also grieve and cry?

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS,

AUTHOR OF "PRINCESS IDEWAYS," "PHIL'S FAIRIES," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

KNOPS now led Leo through so many places full of machines and contrivances which the water-power kept active that he was glad when they went up a long inclined plane, and came out into a wide gallery lined with mother-of-pearl, and paved with exquisite sea-shells.

Here was a luxurious couch of beautiful feathers, the plumage of birds he had never beheld, and he was not sorry to see Paz bringing out another dozen of tarts for his refreshment. As he ate them he asked of Knops, who was peeling a lime, "Have you no women and children among your elves?"

"Oh yes," said Knops, smiling; "but they are not to be found near our workshops."

"Where, then, do they live?"

Knops put on an air of mystery as he replied: "I am not permitted to reveal everything concerning us, dear Leo—Our private life is of no public interest; but I may tell you that our children are bred entirely in the open air. Many an empty bird's nest is used as an elf cradle, for so highly do we esteem pure air, sunshine, and exposure as a means of making our children hardy that we even accustom them to danger, and let them, like the birds, face the fury of the weather."

"And do they all work as you do?"

"They do, not at the same employments, nor is all our labor done by hand, as you might suppose. The songs which you hear are not all sung by birds or insects, the crying child has often a pretty tale whispered in his ear to soothe his grief or passion, and your garden roses are witness to many a worm in the bud choked by the hand of an elf. But we have many tribes, and the habits of each are different. I do not conceal that much trouble is made by some of them. But look at the Indians of North America and the Afghanistans of Asia."

Leo was yawning again fearfully, when a little "tum, tum, tum," came to his ears, and as Knops ceased speaking a band of elves, habited as troubadours in blue and silver, with long white plumes in their velvet caps, climbed over the balustrade and began to play on zithers.

The music was a gentle tinkle, not unlike a rippling brook, and appeared to be in honor of Master Knops, who listened with pleased attention, and dismissed them politely.

Then came a message for Knops. A council was waiting his presence; so, leaving Leo to Paz, with promise of a speedy return, he departed.

"How do you get about so fast?" asked Leo. Paz took from his pocket a tiny pipe curiously carved from a nut; then he opened a small ivory box, showing Leo a wad of something which looked like raw cotton sprinkled with black seeds.

"One whiff of this, as it burns in my pipe, and I can wish myself where I please."

"Let me have a try," said Leo, taking up the pipe.

Paz smiled. "It would have no more effect upon you than so much tobacco—not as much, probably, for tobacco makes you deathly sick, does it not?"

"Yes," said Leo, listlessly, disappointed that he could not go to the ends of the earth by magic.

Paz noticed the disappointment, and said, by way of diversion, "Where do you like best to be?"

"At home I like the kitchen," said Leo, with a little shrug.

"Good! Come, then, to one of ours; we can be back by the time Master Knops returns." So saying, he started off, and Leo followed.

Paz trotted down a winding staircase that made Leo feel as if he were a corkscrew, and in a little while ushered him into a place where jets of gas gave a garden-like effect, sprouting as they did from solid rock in the form of tulips and tiger-lilies, but over each was a wire netting, and from the netting were suspended shining little copper kettles and pans of all sorts and shapes.

Busily bending over these was a regiment of cooks, but instead of paper caps on their heads, each wore a white bonnet of ludicrous form, which they could tip over so as to shield their faces from the heat. It gave them a top-heavy appearance which was extremely funny.

In the centre of the kitchen was a long table, before which were seated a number of elves tasting each compound to see if it were properly prepared, and examining the cooked dishes as they were brought in that all should be served rightly.

"I had an idea," said Leo, "that elves and fairies lived on rose leaves and honey, and that you never had to have things cooked."

"The truth is," answered Paz, "we do both; it all depends on what are our employments, whether we are living in the wild wood or down in these caverns. I would ask nothing better than to dine off honeysuckle and a bird's egg, or fill my pockets with gooseberries; but I must adapt myself to circumstances, and while toiling here have to share the more solid food provided for us." As he said this he handed Leo a pudding of about three inches in the round, iced on the top.

Leo swallowed it down with such zest that Paz asked him to dispense with ceremony, and help himself to anything he saw. The tasting-table was full of puffs and tarts, and in a twinkling Leo had eaten two or three dozen of them. They were really so light and frothy that they were hardly equal to an ounce of lollypops such as an ordinary child could devour, but Paz cautioned him, telling him that the sweet was so concentrated he might have a headache.

* Begun in No. 195 HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

While he was doing this Leo watched with interest the bringing in of some squirrels and rabbits skinned and ready to be roasted. It took six elves to bear the weight of an ordinary meat dish on which these were; then they trussed and skewered them, and put them in small ovens.

"How do you kill your game?" asked Leo.

"We trap everything, and then have a mode of killing the creatures which is entirely painless."

By this time Knops would have returned, so Paz hurried Leo off, not, however, without first filling his pockets with goodies. Up they clambered until it seemed as if they might reach the stars by going a little farther, and now Leo was really so tired that when he sank down on the feathery couch in the sea-shell corridor he was asleep before he could explain to Knops the cause of his absence.

He must have slept a very long while—a time quite equal to an ordinary night, if not longer—for when he awoke he was thoroughly rested and refreshed, and ready for any exertion he might be called upon to make; but he found himself entirely alone.

At first this did not affect him, for he supposed his elfin friends had taken the opportunity to rest themselves, but after minutes lengthened into hours he began to be uneasy. What should he do if they never came back? How would he ever find his way out of these caverns? The thought was frightful, and to relieve his fears he began to call. His calls became shouts, yells, and yet no answer came; nothing but echoes responded.

CHAPTER VIII.

AFTER a long and impatient listening the echoes of Leo's calls seemed to prolong themselves into musical strains, which, faint and far away at first, gradually came nearer and nearer.

Soft as the sighing of the wind was this elfin music, but swelling into mimic bursts of harmony and clashing of small cymbals.

Leo leaned over the balustrade of the corridor, and gazed down into the depths of a cavernous abyss. Instantly the space seemed filled with sprites in every conceivable attire. Some were dressed in the party-colored habits of court pages, some in royal robes of ermine, others as shepherds with crooks, and again others as cherubs with gauzy wings; but all were whirling like snow-flakes to the strains of the music.

Leo looked in vain for Paz or Knops. Indeed, so many were the fantastic forms, and so rapidly did they move, that it was like watching a snow-storm, and this effect was heightened by misty wreaths, upon which were borne aloft the more radiant members, who danced and flashed as heat lightning on the clouds of a summer's night. The light, instead of being a bright glare, was soft and mellow, and fell from crescent-shaped lanterns on the staffs of pages, who moved in a measured way among the throng, producing a kaleidoscopic effect.

Leo watched them with eager eyes. Beautiful as the sight was, he yet was oppressed with fear, for he knew not how to reveal himself to these sportive beings, and he could not imagine how he should ever be released from his imprisonment.

Suddenly the dancers fled as if pursued, the music became martial, and the steady tramp of a host of elves was heard. They were clad in mail, with helmets and shields of flashing steel, and armed with glittering lances; half of them had blue plumes and half had crimson. And now began their mimic warfare. Ranged line upon line, facing each other, with shouts and drum beats and bugle blasts, they fell upon each other in the fury of combat. Swords clashed, javelins were hurled, and the slain fell in heaps; but still the leaders charged, and still the martial blasts were heard; and over and over were repeated the manoeuvres of the advance, the retreat, the parrying of blows, the redoubled ardor of assault, until Leo's breath came short and hard with the excitement of the scene. It seemed a veritable battle-field, and to add to the glamour shone rays as of moonbeams, now and again eluded by the shadows of an approaching storm.

Gradually the rage of the combatants subsided. Those who were able withdrew with those of their companions who were disabled, leaving the prostrate forms of the dead and dying.

And now the music portrayed the rising of the wind, the falling of rain, the roar of thunder. This was succeeded by low plaintive strains, as of people weeping, and a party of elves in the garb of monks headed a procession bearing lighted tapers and carrying biers, upon which they placed the inanimate forms of the warriors. Slowly they paced about, chanting in low tones, and constantly accompanied by the funeral dirge of the musicians.

And now to Leo's almost overtaxed vision came a picture of a lonely grave-yard in the mountains, where the procession stopped. Even as he looked it faded away; the sun streamed forth, shining upon a field of grain where merry-reapers swung their scythes and sang with glee. Trees sprouted from fissures in the rock, birds flew about and perched undismayed, and little hay-carts, piled high with their loads, came creaking along, led by peasant elves, who were also seated on top of their fragrant heaps of hay. Then the sun beamed upon a party of drovers—elves in smock-frocks or blouses, driving flocks of sheep and horned cattle, while the bleating of the sheep and the lowing of the cattle were well imitated by the music. All this was succeeded by vineyards, grape trellises, and arbors, with busy elves gathering the fruit which hung in purple clusters, and beneath the arbors other elves rattling castanets, beating tambourines, and dancing.

Again the scene changed. Snow fell; the birds disappeared; the tree boughs were glittering with ice, and were bending over a wide field of the same glassy substance. On it were elves in bright costumes, merrily skating. They glided about, cutting curious figures, pausing to bend and bow to each other, or to warm themselves at bonfires blazing on the banks.

Then night came again, and the darkness was only broken by twinkling stars. The music became softer and more plaintive; it sounded like little flutes.

A church tower loomed up, and then a blaze of light issued from its arched doors. Two by two, in white array, came forth the elves, and from the floating veils Leo saw that it was meant to represent a bridal procession. Garlands were on their arms, and ribbons fluttered from their caps. Roses were strewn in their path.

Again these were followed by a company of elves in the habit of nuns and Sisters of Charity. The music became a hymn. The church grew dark and vanished. The space filled again with shadowy forms, as if all the little actors had poured in. The sound of their coming was like that of a bevy of birds with wings fluttering. Suddenly a starry cross appeared; it flashed and flamed with a light which was as if it were composed of myriads of gems, and then a clear radiance streamed from it, revealing the whole multitude of elves kneeling in devotion. This lasted but a few moments, and again all was still and dark, and Leo was alone.

But he was no longer afraid. His mind was filled with the beautiful scenes he had witnessed, his imagination stirred to activity. Why might he not behold these things again as a reality, instead of only a semblance of it? How grand it would be to travel and see novel and beautiful sights, to learn also wonderful things! And as he quietly thought, he heard the click, click of little boots, and Knops was beside him, followed by Paz. Leo greeted them warmly.

"Did you suppose that we had deserted you?" asked Knops, sitting down on the couch by his side as if exhausted.

"Yes, I was a little alarmed; it was so strange to find myself alone in such a place, for of course I had no idea which way to turn or what to do."

"You were so soundly asleep that I had not the cruelty to disturb you, and it was necessary for Paz to go with me. From what you have witnessed you may guess how we have been employed and how much we have had to detain us; but you may rest assured that nothing would keep me from finishing what I have undertaken. You have now had a Vision of Life and a Vision of Labor, for such I call our two pantomimes. Am I wrong in supposing that they have pleased you?"

"No, indeed," said Leo, quickly, his usual drawl giving place to a tone of bright animation. "I thank you a thousand times for your entertainment and instruction. I have been so pleased and delighted that I can hardly express myself as I ought to do. I am afraid I seem a very good-for-nothing fellow to you."

"Indeed you do not. Don't suppose I would waste time on a good-for-naught. Paz can tell you what attracted me to you—can't you, Paz?"

"Yes, sir; the Prince Leo's kindness of heart is the secret of his power with us."

Leo blushed as he looked up and asked, "How did you know I was soft-hearted?"

"By your kindness to animals and all living things. Ah! we are close observers, are we not, Paz?"

"Necessarily, Master Professor."

"Our powers of observation have revealed to us many of the mysteries which man longs to solve. There's the Gulf Stream, for instance. But you are not up in science yet. No matter. You have time enough before you if you will only apply yourself. Has anything you have seen made you anxious to know more?"

"Oh, don't mention it!" exclaimed Leo. "I am so awfully ashamed of my ignorance that I would do anything to get rid of it. I want to know all about those curious things."

"Good! the seed is sown, Paz," said Knops, complacently, with the nearest approach to a wink Leo had seen on his grave little countenance. "Now you must rest again before we start for home."

Leo would have been very willing to do without more rest, remembering his alarm, but he could not be so selfish as to deprive his companion of it; so he at once assented, tempted to ask only that he might not be left quite so long again alone. But fearing this would imply distrust, and being really no coward, he said nothing. He was relieved, however, to hear Knops command Paz to remain with him.

THE SEA-SHELL.

BY PALMER COX.

COME, old conch shell, tell me
All you know about the sea.

Is the bottom bright with gold?
Does the whale his baby scold?
Where do mermaids ever go
For their combs, I'd like to know?
Do the little fish agree?
Can they say their A B C?
Are they never tired out,
Swimming, swimming all about?
Don't they often try their best
On the land to come and rest?
Seems to me the little elves
Have no chance to dry themselves.
Do the sailors really see
Serpents larger than a tree?

I will listen while you tell
All about it, conchily shell.

ONE YEAR OF PIANO STUDY.

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

ONE day a group of girls in a foreign conservatory sat down to discuss what music they liked best; and as, with one exception, all were Americans recently entered at B—, the preference was for operatic music—with, of course, some Beethoven, and a little Mendelssohn.

Evidently their musical education had been of the ordinary sort. They had studied compositions selected with no view to progress, and with no systematic idea of the right sort of cultivation; and yet all were tolerably good performers; that is, their facility had justified them in coming abroad to study in a regular musical school.

A year later any one of the group would have been surprised had she been reminded of the opinions expressed by her that day. System had stepped in, with the slow but sure culture of hearing only the very best music. If you were studying astronomy or chemistry would it occur to you that you could by any chance profit by mixing up all the chapters of your text-books, taking up any part at any time, and giving the cud the first place in your mind? I am sure it would not, yet so few young people studying music stop to consider the necessity of avoiding just such a jumble, that in this little paper I want to talk about certain arrangements for musical practice which I have seen work very well.

To begin with, remember that every half-hour, every ten minutes, you can give to your piano is valuable, if used in the right way. Five minutes at a time is profitable; and, on the other hand, every moment wasted in stupid, careless playing is a direct injury. Of course, even in our severest studies, we like to be amused, and one always can be amused at the piano except when one is playing finger exercises, over which you can at least be interested.

Supposing you have learned enough to read simple music: you are practicing finger exercises and a little of Czerny, we will say an hour daily. Then Schumann's Kinderseiten would come in admirably, and some of the first Sonatas of Mozart. Suppose that for two months you devoted yourself absolutely to these two composers in their simplest works; the result would be a certain comprehension of their respective styles which would carry you on wonderfully when you came to study their larger works.

Every composer has his peculiarities, a knowledge of which one ought, as it were, to absorb by long study of some one or two works. Two months later Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words," carefully chosen, and some fugues and gavottes of Bach's, would follow very well, while a short time might be given to practicing what had gone before. Three months of such work would open the way to Beethoven. Perhaps the "Sonata Pathétique," although really one of the most difficult, is the most interesting to young people; but unless a decided improvement has taken place I would suggest only trying some portions of the simpler sonatas, and the shorter pieces, like the waltzes. This would afford musical study enough for the year, and if taken slowly and carefully, the result would be, I am sure, intensely satisfactory.

A very interesting thing to have is a musical diary, in which one records each day what was practiced or learned, with comments on the composer's style, any peculiar formation of chords or arrangement of notes, and any portions thought most difficult. You have no idea how such a book marks one's progress, and how interesting it becomes to look back upon. Glancing at such a one the other day, I was greatly amused and interested in noting how difficulties which in January seemed insurmountable had vanished by May. At the end of each month it is well to sum up the results, and note what has been accomplished. Perhaps a quotation from such a diary may serve best to illustrate the idea:

"February 1.—Practiced an hour to-day on Czerny, and half an hour's Plaidy. Then tried Mozart's Minuet, hoping to make the staccato parts less heavy. Hunted out some bits of my exercises just for this purpose, and after ten minutes found I could go back to the Minuet much better. Read some Haydn.

"February 2.—Usual exercise practice and the Minuet, with Schumann's 'Slumber Song.' Noticed the peculiarities in the bars, and how very necessary it is to make the left hand play smoothly. Worked ten minutes extra on left-hand finger exercises. Found it all hard work. Went to one of Von Bülow's concerts in the evening, and returned wondering if I could ever accomplish anything. Was delighted to hear that he practices finger exercises an hour a day. He played Beethoven's 'Sonata Appassionata,' and fairly rushed it. I heard that Beethoven composed that during a terrible thunder-storm, and Miss — says no one can play it like Liszt, and that when Rubinstein plays it he alters little bits here and there, differently each time, just to suit his mood. I heard Madame Essipoff play it, and she takes a great deal of it very tenderly. Von Bülow is more tremendous over it.

"February 3.—Tried to read the 'Appassionata' with Miss —. Too much for me, but it gave me an idea of the majesty of the whole thing. In practicing Mendelssohn's 'Spring Song' I suddenly caught at the arpeggio in the bars, and found out how to do it. I believe he wrote the 'Spring Song' for one of his sister's festive occasions. When Moscheles went for the first time after Mendelssohn's death to see his wife, Cécile, he played the 'Spring Song' for her, and it brought back to them both all their tenderest memories, so that it must have been most dear to him.

"February 6.—Miss H— spent two hours here to-day, and played all sorts of things. She has just come home from four years' musical study abroad, chiefly in Dresden and Berlin. She showed me how Deppe teaches his pupils to hold their fingers, to curve the hand always slightly outward, and sink the knuckle part a little. She did some exercises very well, but her manner was very much too languid. I hear that she really has no musical instinct. It is all study, and so it seems waste of time. She described Liszt's manner very entertainingly. He is never twice quite alike, sometimes satirical, sometimes playful; but she says his playing can never be described. It is simply perfect, especially in all legato passages. She used to see Tausig very often, and said, that except Liszt, he was the most wonderful player she ever heard; but such an eccentric creature—like some half-tamed thing, quite elish! He died very young, and was a great loss to the musical world."

These quotations from a young girl's diary, which, as you see, was concerned only with musical matters, will perhaps show you what might be done in this way, and I am very sure such a diary adds greatly to the interest of musical study. From one of the monthly "summings up" I will quote a passage:

"May 31.—This month I feel I have accomplished nothing in the way of expression, but a great deal in overcoming certain difficulties. I play the E minor scale really to my satisfaction, and the close of the andante in Mendelssohn's 'Rondo Capriccioso' I can at least execute tolerably. I have made a study of musical terms, writing them all down with definitions."

At the end of the year the diarist put down a list of what she had learned, and what concerts she had attended, and in a companion book the programmes of the concerts, with photographs of the performers. There was no literary merit in that little book, but I can safely say it carried her over dull places, and now suggests many an hour of work made fascinating instead of prosaic. The romantic element in musical study can be carried to a very ridiculous extreme, yet it may safely be allowed to tinge one's labors, for no art possesses such a field for poetic, romantic aspirations.

I would not for worlds suggest to my young readers to follow the example of a young person of twelve whom I once knew, and who went through a whole year of very commonplace musical study, pretending to herself she was in Vienna studying at a conservatory, and a protégée of a famous master, giving concerts, and being treated as a prodigy. Little Miss K—, who, as you see, had a most vivid imagination, used to take her lessons with her little head full of these fancied scenes, and on leaving her teacher's house would walk home with a servant, still assuming to herself she was in Vienna, the observed of all observers. No profit came of all this to her playing, as you may easily believe, for in her ease the ardor all went to the imaginary side, and the necessity of real work did not occur to her. It is well for young students to feel the poetry and loftiness of the art they are pursuing, but they should at the same time avoid eccentric vagaries.

HAVING HIS HAIR CUT.

IN THE OLD ORCHARD.

BY ADA C. STODDARD.

LAST summer Hal and I went out to Grandfather Cotton's farm for a good long vacation. You see, the scarlet fever got around our town, and mother was afraid we would catch it.

"She said we'd be sure to," Hal told Grandfather Cotton, who was waiting for us at the station. "We're all the time catching things we've no business to."

Grandfather Cotton laughed, and tumbled us into his big express wagon without any ceremony. He's a jolly old gentleman, with a round face and gray whiskers. I wish you could see him and hear him laugh. Hal says he looks just like the pictures of Santa Claus.

"Ever catch any whippings 'long with everything else?" he asked, twinkling his eyes at us. "Well, you can try your hand at catching fish up at the farm. The farm's a good place for boys—a pretty good place."

It was all of that, and no mistake. I don't believe there is another such place for having all sorts of jolly good times in the world as that old side-hill farm. The house itself seemed made just for playing hide-and-seek in. It was a very small house when Great-grandfather Cotton built it, but it's been added to, piece by piece, a bit here and a bit there, until it wouldn't know itself—that's what Grandfather Cotton says. Anyhow, now it's a great rambling old ark, with all sorts of odd corners in it, and turns and twists when you aren't looking for 'em. It's a high old place for rainy days. There isn't any upstairs to it hardly. Hal said he felt just like Christopher Columbus, when he was going to discover America, that first afternoon we went over it.

"It's just like a Jill-run-over-the-ground," said he. "But isn't it gloriferous?"

You may believe I wouldn't dispute that. It was pretty as a picture, too, to look at—that old red farm-house resting like a sleepy giant half way up the hill, which trailed long skirts of grass and grain quite to the edge of the tumbling sparkling little river in the hollow below.

Then there were the two great barns, and the orchards. And you never ate such doughnuts and turn-overs and pound-cakes as Aunt Hannah Cotton made. She wasn't scripping with 'em, either; that was the best of it. There was always something new turning up for us to do, too. One day it was a ride to the village to do trading with Uncle Zadok; and the next, maybe, grandfather would take us sailing down the river to see Deacon Seavey's new-fangled pig-pens. We didn't have time to think of such a thing as getting homesick.

One morning there were warm biscuits and honey for breakfast. You never saw such honey! I know I never tasted anything half so good before. Grandfather Cotton laughed a little when I passed my plate for the third helping.

"Like it?" said he, cutting off a big slice. "Well, now, I'll give you boys a chance. I've got thirty swarms o' bees in the old orchard. You watch 'em, and the first one that sees a new swarm shall have it."

Hal dropped his knife and fork and slapped his hands together. "Oh, good!" said he.

"To carry home?" said I.

Grandfather's eyes twinkled. "I'm afraid they'd turn out to be a white elephant if you did that," said he; "but I'll keep 'em for you, and you shall have all the honey they make. That's fair, isn't it?"

"Yes, sir," said we. And wouldn't you say so?

Well, every day after that Hal and I kept good watch of those bees. We were up in the old orchard twenty times a day.

"You'll wear your shoes all out," said Aunt Hannah, laughing at us.

"Then we'll go barefooted," said I. And after a while we did.

One day—it was a day in June, and the sky was clear and the sun was hot—we'd just got in from the orchard. In another minute in came grandfather too. He took a drink of water from the long-handled dipper, and wiped his forehead with his yellow bandana, and then he winked at Aunt Hannah.

"The bees are swarming," said he. "There's a master lot of 'em, too. Where's Zadok?"

"Hoing corn in the garden," said Aunt Hannah. But Hal and I we sat and stared.

HIVING THE BEES.

"Bees swarming! And we had just that minute come in, and we didn't see them! Grandfather looked at us and laughed.

"I was right behind ye coming down across," said he, "and they were getting pretty well out then. They're out in a minute. It always makes me think of a freshet when they start, there's such a flood of 'em, and they make such a roar. Too bad you didn't see 'em first; but there's a lot more to follow, and it's better luck next time, sure."

"Well, sir," said we; but we did feel streaked.

Well, Uncle Zadok got a hive down from the shed chamber, and washed it out with sweetened water.

"We always do that," said Grandfather Cotton; "the bees are likelier to stay in it. I suppose it makes 'em feel at home. Some folks use salt 'n' water."

Then out came Aunt Hannah, with her sun-bonnet on, and her arms loaded with a saw, and a sheet, and a square piece of board, and a little brush-broom. It was great fun. Everybody was in a hurry. Uncle Zadok's face was red, and grandfather's was all over smiles. It wasn't half so long as I've been telling about it before we were all out in the orchard.

"Why, they haven't lit yet," said grandfather. "See there, boys!"

"O-oh!" said Hal and I together; for there the bees hung high in the air, a little black wavering cloud. Uncle Zadok stopped a little ways behind, and scowled up at them with the sun in his eyes.

"I guess they're thinking of leaving," said he.

"I do believe they be," cried grandfather, fairly jumping around. "Run t' the house, Hannah Jane, and fetch the big dinner bell. Holler, boys, holler! Make all the noise ye can. Now!"

Well, then, I can't begin to tell you how funny it was. You ought to have been there and heard us. Hal stopped once to catch his breath and listen, and he said he got to laughing so he couldn't begin again. It sounded like a whole menagerie turnd loose, he said. Uncle Zadok barked like a dozen dogs, and Hal hooted like an owl, and I cawed like a crow, and grandfather—I can't tell you what he didn't do, only that he wasn't quiet; and in a minute, in the midst of it all, Aunt Hannah was ringing that dinner bell like the world was afire.

"All right," said grandfather; then, mopping his face as calm as a clock, "they're going to stay a spell. I never knew such a racket to fail of stopping 'em before they got well under way. Better get the ladder and a rope, Zadok. They're lighting high."

So they were; that little cloud was settling thick and black around one of the topmost boughs of a knotty old apple-tree.

"There's no end to 'em!" said Hal, walking up nearer.

Grandfather Cotton laughed. "I've found different from that a good many times," said he, winking at Aunt Hannah. "And you'll be lucky if those bare feet of—Why, Harrison, what's the matter?"

For, if you'll believe me, Hal was jumping up and down like a Jack-in-the-box gone wild.

"There's a red-hot needle in my foot!" he screamed; and then he plumped down on the grass and began looking for it. He found a tiny black point.

"That little thing!" said he, puckering up his face—poor old Hal. But I had to laugh all the same; and grandfather's eyes laughed too, though his face was as sober as a judge's. He mixed up a little dirt plaster and put it on Hal's foot.

"It'll feel better in a minute," said he; "but I wouldn't step on any more of 'em than I could help."

By this time Uncle Zadok came back with the ladder and rope and a pail of water. Grandfather set the ladder against the tree.

"I'll go up and saw 'em off," said he, rolling his eyes at us in a funny way. "I always want to let Zadok hive 'em. He's young and spry, and he enjoys it."

"Humph!" said Uncle Zadok. "Boys, you'd best climb that big apple-tree yonder. You can see there, it be out o' the way besides."

It didn't take us long to get up among those branches. We watched grandfather go up the ladder and tie the rope to the bough, and pass it up over another bough, and let the end drop down to Uncle Zadok. Then he sawed off the limb, and Uncle Zadok let it down, down, until he got hold of it. Aunt Hannah had been getting the hive ready. She spread the sheet on the grass, and laid the board on it, and set the hive on that, raised a little at one side. Uncle Zadok gave the bough one great shake.

"There, now!" said he, and he began to sprinkle 'em with the broom, so they'd think 'twas raining, and hurry in.

Just then I heard an awful roar. I couldn't think what it was. But just at that minute Hal laughed.

"Look!" cried he.

And then I laughed too; I couldn't help it; for there was grandfather going one way and Uncle Zadok another, and Aunt Hannah another still, and every one of them bent up as if they had the colic.

"But what makes 'em look so funny?" said Hal.

I knew then what the roar meant. There was another black cloud around a bough right below us on our apple-tree.

"Bees!" I roared. And then we both roared together, Hal and I:

"Grandfather! Uncle Zadok! Aunt Hannah! here's another—swarm—of bees!"

We sat right there in that tree until they were hived too. You never saw such fun!

Grandfather laughed when we slid down.

"Pretty good," said he. "That swarm o' bees meant for ye to see 'em, didn't it, boys?"

TOSSED IN A BLANKET.

BY PAUL BLAKE.

TOSSING was an institution when I was at school. I fancy the boys had started it in imitation of the practice as described in Tom Brown's School-Days. At any rate, when I was sent to school at Halehurst, in England, it was a recognized institution; that is, recognized by every one except the authorities. They did not recognize it: how could they, when they had never seen it?

But, alas! all our old institutions are dying out, and before I left Halehurst tossing was as dead as Cicero. This is how it happened, and the story is as true as Hume's History.

Dormitory No. 8 was well known as a noisy room. Charlie Briggs led the sports there, and Charlie was a boy of considerable invention and perseverance. It was he who introduced "camping out" in the dormitories. This was managed as follows: Two beds were pushed close to each other, sheets were pinned or tied together, a cricket bat fixed between the beds, and the enlarged sheet spread over and tucked in. In this way a tent was formed which accommodated, more or less comfortably, four boys, who indulged in a forbidden supper under the covering. A candle was lighted to see by, and it was through an accident happening to a sheet that the camping out was discovered and stopped. No one was able to give a satisfactory explanation of a burned hole in the tent.

But "tossing" apparently involved no risk of danger; at any rate, it flourished much longer than tent-making. Charlie was very great at tossing; every new boy had to undergo the ordeal. It was difficult to perform the operation properly in the dark, so on tossing nights every one prepared for bed as rapidly as possible, and the affair was all over by the time the master came round to put the lights out. On the night of which I am writing there was a new boy named Dick Playfair, of just the right size and shape for tossing—not too heavy, but yet compactly built. Unfortunately he was a timid lad, and greatly objected to being experimented on.

"Come along, youngster," urged Charlie; "'twon't hurt you a bit, and you shall have no end of taffy when it's over."

"You leave me alone!" was the reply; but the request was in vain. The boys did not think there was any cruelty in the operation, and they were not much given to considering the feelings of new youngsters; their own had not received much consideration when they were small. So in spite of his protests Dick was rapidly put into the blanket, held by six or eight boys eager to begin.

Dormitory No. 8 was at the top of the house. The ceiling was about ten feet high, and plastered. On a former occasion, well remembered by many, a small boy had been shot up with rather too much force, and a considerable fall of plaster was the result. It would not do to risk damaging the ceiling a second time, so recently it had been the practice to do the tossing in the centre of the room, underneath the "lantern."

This lantern consisted of a large hole in the ceiling for purposes of ventilation. It was like a large square box, with no bottom, but with movable glass sides. These were generally open to let fresh air in. Its depth was at least four feet, so that there was no danger of a boy's being shot to the top.

"Now, then, hurry up," cried Charlie; "we haven't too much time. Take a good breath, Dick, and you'll go up like a cork. It's better than being in a balloon any day. Now—one! two! three!"

At "three" the blanket grew suddenly taut, and up went Playfair splendidly, into the lantern for a moment, and then back with a thud into the blanket, which needed some holding.

"Let me out!" cried the victim.

"Wait a moment; there's no hurry, youngster. You have the whole of your life before you. Up she goes!"

The "she" was of course "he," and he went up. But on this occasion a hitch occurred. Charlie's side of the blanket was more strongly manned than the other; the consequence was the living shuttlecock did not fly quite straight. For a moment they feared he was going to strike the ceiling, but no; he flew up into the lantern.

But he didn't come down. It was such a near shave that he was nearly shot through the open side of the lantern. He wildly grasped at it, and just at the top of his flight, when there was no more force, he caught hold of the frame-work, and clung to it with all his might. His body was half in and half out; his legs were dangling helplessly in the air.

The boys burst into a shout of laughter; he looked so comical up there. But they stopped laughing when Charlie cried, "Come down, you little rogue; you'll get caught in a minute."

"I can't come down," was the reply, in a frightened voice.

"Nonsense! drop into the blanket. We'll catch you right enough."

"I sha'n't; I won't; you'll hurt me."

"Charlie," cried Tom Wilkinson, "here's Mr. Morgan coming."

Mr. Morgan was the master who made the rounds every night. Things were looking serious.

"Push a bed under him," said Charlie. "Look sharp!"

A bed was quickly placed in position, and Charlie mounted it; but it was in vain that he tried to seize little Dick and drag him from his strange retreat. The youngster curled his legs up under him, and still held on. Mr. Morgan's footstep was heard in the next room; it was too late to try anything else. The bed was pushed back into its place, and everybody leaped beneath his counterpane. When Mr. Morgan entered there was perfect order—apparently. It is true, Charlie's blanket was under his bed instead of upon it, but that detail did not attract the master's notice.

What did attract it was the strange spectacle of a boy's legs hanging down from the ceiling.

"What is the meaning of this?" shouted Mr. Morgan, angrily.

The boys looked up innocently, as if Dick's adventure was brought to their notice for the first time, and as if it were quite a usual thing for a boy to go to bed à la the ceiling.

"Who is that up there?" thundered the master.

"I think it is Dick, sir," replied Tom, seeing that a discovery of the identity of the owner of the legs must come sooner or later.

"How did he get up there? You, Charlie?"

Thus appealed to, Charlie confessed—not sparing himself, to do him justice. Mr. Morgan did not waste much time in getting Dick down; he stepped on a stool and soon "collared his leg," as Charlie put it. Dick's grasp was loose by this time, and a gentle pull brought him into the master's arms.

Next day—but I won't enter into details about that inevitable "next day" which follows wild pranks at school. Suffice it to say that tossing was stopped that night once and for all.

ALL ABOUT GOLD-FISH,

BY A. W. ROBERTS.

II.

I HAVE found that there is a constant inquiry about how to keep gold-fish, particularly what to feed them on. The best food for gold-fish is a grain suitably prepared. In proof of this I have known gold-fish at the New York Aquarium when fed on animal food to become so fat and bloated that their scales stood out from their bodies, and in course of time they died in convulsions; this was the case with the Kin-gi-yo, which was fed on grated hog's liver. Boiled rice (not boiled too soft) I have found to be a very excellent and convenient food, and when fed to the fish a few grains at a time there is no fear of injuring the purity of the water. Next to rice is flour (not "prepared flour") and milk worked into a very tough dough; a few pellets at a time are dropped in the water, never faster than the fish take them.

There is a preparation sold under the name of "gold-fish food" that I have found to be a very good and safe food to introduce in the water. It is composed of albumen (the white of eggs) and the finest and whitest of wheat flour made into a dough, which is run through highly polished and hot steel rollers which both polish and cook the material. It is sold by wholesale druggists under the name of "wafer."

The disease most common with gold-fish is "fungus." This never occurs unless a fish is scratched, bruised, or has had some of its scales torn off; then the "fungus" will attack the wounded part. It can readily be known by its white and fluffy appearance. The best remedy for fungus is to pass the diseased fish as rapidly as possible, but once only, through a strong solution of salt and water.

In an aquarium where gold-fish or other kinds of fish are kept, a small portion of the bottom of the tank ought to be covered with fine and clean washed sand. Many fish eat sand, just the same as chickens eat gravel, for the purpose of assisting in the grinding up or digestion of their food; again, all fish are covered with a thin coating of slime, which at times becomes too abundant, and to get rid of it they strike and rub their bodies against any rough surface, such as sand or rocks. All gold-fish ought to have at least two hours of morning sunlight every day.

Fig. 1.—A GOLD-FISH POND.

The construction of a gold-fish pond, as shown in the diagram (Fig. 1), is a very simple matter. The centre of the pond should be not less than four feet in depth. This part of the pond is known as the "basin," and constitutes the winter-quarters for the gold-fish. As the cold weather approaches, the fish assemble from all parts of the pond and huddle close together, burying their bodies almost out of sight in the soft mud. When the frost comes and the ice forms, they pass into a half-sleeping condition, which lasts during the winter months, and live entirely without food. While in this condition and under the thick ice one would think them safe from all enemies; but the musk-rat and the mink dive swift and deep, and can swim long distances under the ice, and they both love fat gold-fish dearly. The only defense against these enemies is poison and steel-traps.

The grade of the bottom of the pond should fall gradually from two inches at the margin to two and one-half feet where it joins the "basin." In case an old pond is used, it should be run dry and allowed to bake all summer, or a quicker way is to "burn" it out with lime so as to destroy all kinds of fish, particularly eels, water animals, and insects. The shores of the pond must be planted with water-plants for the fish to deposit their eggs on (Fig. 2).

In the selection of plants a splendid opportunity is offered for studying the habits of some of the wonderful and beautiful water-plants so common in our lakes, rivers, and ponds, and also for a display of ornamental water gardening. What more beautiful than the white pond-lily, Audubon's pond-lily, Lobelia cardinalis, or more interesting than the carnivorous pitcher-plant and the bladderworts? Then comes Valisneria, the water-net, and the water-violet.

The proper-sized gold-fish for stocking ponds are called by dealers "fountain" fish, on account of their being the largest gold-fish, and the custom of using them for the ornamentation of the waters of fountains. This kind of fish can be bought for from five to eight dollars per hundred. Fifty fountain gold-fish are sufficient for stocking a medium-sized pond. You must remember that the gold fish is wonderfully prolific under favorable conditions, and increases very rapidly. When purchasing them see that each is perfectly formed (Fig. 3) and apparently healthy.

The demand this year for gold-fish has been far greater than the supply, good colored and medium-sized fish being eagerly bought up at eight dollars per hundred. There is one color in gold-fish that ought to be carefully avoided when purchasing fish for stocking ponds. I refer to the pale or light colored gold-fish now so plenty in the market. Fish of this color when kept in aquaria or globes seldom live for more than two weeks before they begin to show signs of sickness. Stock fish ought to be of the highest colors, perfectly shaped, and with all the fins fully developed. Now that so many of the young folks are in the country, why not construct a gold-fish pond and stock it with a few fish, which by this time next year will have so increased in numbers that they can be disposed of to dealers in any of the large cities at a very great profit.

One day when sauntering down Eighth Avenue, New York, I was attracted to a druggist's window by a curious display of some five gold-fish contained in an aquarium, on which was the sign "Performing Gold-fishes." On each of these fish was seated a small painted figure of a boy, made out of elder pith. This was fastened to the body of the fish by means of a narrow elastic band, as shown in the illustration (Fig. 4). In the hands of each of the figures was a fine thread of silk, the ends of which passed through the thin tissues that connect the upper jaw of the gold-fish with the head part. Entering the store, I found the proprietor to be a good-natured German. Said I,

"My friend, how long have you had those fish harnessed up?"

"Oh, about two weeks."

"Have you had any die?"

"No, they can't die. They don't perform after nine o'clock in the evening, when they are unharnessed and fed; they don't have to 'go on' till nine o'clock next morning."

Fig. 4.

Having a strong personal prejudice against humped and malformed gold-fish, and not admiring this German's attempt at "fish-culture," I determined to effect a very radical change of performance for the next few weeks.

"Don't you think the public are tired of this play, and it's time to change the bill? Now I'll tell you what I'll do for you: you take those gold-fish out of the tank, and I'll bring you in an hour's time a handsome pair of nest-building sticklebacks, and some plants and material for them to construct their nests out of, and will promise you that in two days you will have in your aquarium as handsome a pair of sticklebacks, with their nest and young, as ever was seen."

It was a bargain, so back I went to the Aquarium, and in less than an hour's time the sticklebacks were in the druggist's aquarium, and the humped gold fish were inside of—my oldest, handsomest pet pickerel at the great New York Aquarium.

A BOY WITH BRIGHT IDEAS.

BY KIRK MUNROE.

He had an idea
That with shoes of cork
On top of the water
He could walk.

But his feet went up
And his head went down,
And he greatly feared
That he should drown,

Until his father,
Who happened about,
Reached into the water

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

I HAVE another brave girl to tell you of to-day. She is a brown-eyed, rosy-cheeked lassie of fourteen, and her home is in Jersey City. Since her mother's death, eighteen months ago, she has been her father's housekeeper, and he says she is a very good one. But it was not for her housekeeping that I wanted to tell you about Mary Anne Atkinson. She is a favorite with some young ladies who live near her, and they have taught her to row. She is a fearless swimmer, and manages a boat with ease and skill.

One afternoon lately she heard the cries of four small boys who were adrift in a boat in Communipaw Basin. Suddenly one of them—Thomas Koslow, twelve years old, the only one who could handle the oars—fell overboard. He had sunk twice when Mary Anne, who had seen the accident from the bank, and had put forth to the rescue, reached him, grasped and drew him into her boat. He was unconscious when she brought him to land, but soon revived under the measures which were at once taken. Meanwhile the brave girl rowed out again, and towed in the boat in which were the little frightened boys.

Remember this new name on our Roll of Honor, Mary Anne Atkinson, a strong, prompt, and courageous girl.

The Postmistress is glad to insert the following letter, which will make your eyes sparkle with pleasure. She hopes before long to receive another letter, telling more about the children, and acknowledging contributions from readers of YOUNG PEOPLE which have reached the hospital since this was written. Gifts for the child in Young People's Cot, or for the Sisters to use for the other little invalids, should be sent to Sister Catherine at the address here given. You must also send your votes directly to her if you do as she suggests in the last sentence of her letter.

ST. MARY'S FREE HOSPITAL FOR CHILDREN,
407 and 409 WEST THIRTY-FOURTH ST., NEW YORK.

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS.—You will all be glad to hear that our Sea-side Hospital is now open, and that little Sadie is among the thirty of our children who are out of the hot, dusty city enjoying the cool breezes, the shells, the sand, and all other delights that only the sea can give. I wonder any of you can at all imagine what a busy family we were on that twenty-eighth day of June—so many baths to be given, so many surgical dressings, splints and bandages that must be on, long before the usual time, and so many last things to go into the already full trunks. As soon as the early dinner was over the carriers arrived, and in them were placed all who could not walk, while those who could use their limbs were taken in the horse-cars to the ferry at Thirty-fourth Street. The two parties met at Long Island City, and here we were much disappointed in not being able to get on board the train as early as we hoped. The little ones were restless and fretful but some petting and scolding judiciously applied, and above all, a small package of candy given to each one by a kind man, helped to keep them comparatively quiet before the crowd of strangers.

As soon as the train was ready we were allowed to pass out first, and so secure for the children all the cushioned seats in one of the large cars that carry hundreds of happy, healthy people daily to Rockaway Beach. Just as the train was starting, Pete, the turtle, was taken from George's pocket, and, much to the children's delight, was allowed to have a crawl on the floor. This was our first intimation of the fact that he was being taken back to his native air for the summer months.

When the train reached our station we found the stages waiting for us, and we were driven over the hard beach, where the water touched the horses' hoofs, and made some of the wee ones fancy that they would certainly be drowned. We soon reached St. Mary's-by-the-Sea, and great were the exclamations of delight over the fence, the plant walks, and other conveniences that some young readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE had enabled us to build this spring. Supper was ready for the little ones, and soon the tired limbs were laid in the white beds that look out on the sea, and most of the occupants were quickly in dream-land. Most, but not all, for some of them can not at once get accustomed to what "the wild waves are saying," and last summer a small boy was found alone on the balcony calling to them to "hush up!"

It is just two weeks since the children went down and shipwreck they have improved most wonderfully. Little Sadie is able to be up all day, George can wheel himself down the broad plink walk to the water, and the appetites are so great that we tell their owners the Fresh-air Fund will soon be eaten up. Since our last letter we have received from readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE the following contributions: Jennie M. D. Shipley, $5; Chit, Patty, and Joe P., Lewistown, Penn., $3; Maggie Kydie, $2.

Each week has brought Sadie a box of fresh flowers from a young friend in South Greenfield, and flowers have been sent from Montclair, N. J., Staten Island, Hackensack, N. J., Liverdale, and other places, paper dolls from Jennie Shippey, and some paper furniture from a little girl in Washington. Yesterday some charming paper dolls, all the way from Neuchâtel, arrived, and were sent down to Sadie. She was delighted with the letter from Libbie, and will be no less pleased with the one in rhyme which came from Kansas City. If Sadie continues to improve, perhaps she may not be put back in Young People's Cot, and I wonder if any of you care whether the next child to be a girl or a boy? Perhaps those who are interested might send their votes here between now and next September, and we will decide in favor of the sex receiving the largest number. Your grateful friend, S.

COMMISSARY, INDIANA.

I want to tell you what happened to one of our chickens yesterday. My little sister was at play, and she heard the chicken chirping, and went to see what was the matter with it. It was fluttering, and she thought it was dying, and what do you think was the trouble? It had been trying to eat a Boss bug, and the bug had caught the chicken with its pinners right above the nostrils, and I guess the poor thing thought it was going to be killed. I would like to join the Little Housekeepers. Will you please put my name down? My little sister's name is Lucy; she likes to hear the stories read to her. Thanks to you for the explanation of Wigzles, but I forgot to ask what kind of paper to draw them out. Will you please tell me? Good-by.

Use whatever paper you choose. Note-paper is as good as any for the purpose.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT.

Having never written before, and as we like YOUNG PEOPLE very much, we thought we would write now. We are getting a collection of butterflies, but have not many. Will some one please tell us a nice way to kill them? We are enjoying our vacation very much, and dread to have the time come when we shall have to go to school again. We belong to a society. The name of it is the T. C. C. We would like to tell you about it, but it is a great secret. Fond and Frances.

A drop of camphor or a little ammonia will kill your butterflies painlessly, and will not hurt you as other might.

LENSCHER, TEXAS.

I saw in the Post-office Box a letter from Georgia M. S. saying she had a little sister seven weeks old not named. I would like to name her, so that I never lose the child I may know it is the baby I named. If Georgia likes the names I have selected, will she please let me know through the Post-office Box? Call the little darling Lillie Olivia, or Pearl Bonella, after myself.

I live near the San Jacinto battle-ground, where the bodies of the dead Mexicans once covered the ground, and where the Texan soldiers are buried. There is now a monument erected to the memory of the latter by the citizens of Galveston and Houston. The ground is a beautiful hill situated on the banks of Buffalo Bayou.

We have our picnics and camp-meetings there frequently. In fact there were eighteen hundred people there on the 21st of April, celebrating the day. The most noted men of the State were there to make speeches. There was at the celebration a brave old man who fought a powder horn that saved his life at the battle. The ball struck the horn, and it flattened it. The horn was an old-fashioned cow's horn. He had both ball and horn with him. The poor old man is dead now.

PEARLIE II.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

Having read the description of the pleasant evening game Crans we thought we could attempt it. It is a very funny and interesting game, and affords us a good deal of amusement. At first we found it difficult to make rhymes, but a little practice soon settled that. I send some specimens of our efforts:

Word—"Fly." Query—"Do you like to travel?"

I'd like to travel the whole world round,
And visit every clime.
The fly a pesky insect is—
And now away with rhyme!

"Shin." "What color has the air?"

The air is blue,
The grass is green.
The skin is white,
He has a spleen.

"Ball." "Do you like to read?"

Some will spend their leisure moments
Lying idly in the chair,
Others while away the hours
Building castles in the air.

Some will sweep the grass-green meadow,
There to romp and skip and fall,
Others with excited interest
Watch a party playing ball.

Each does that which gives him pleasure
And which he likes best to do;
I, for my part, take to reading,
And I hope you do so too. RICHARD C.

I am a little girl eight years old. I have a burro, and his name is William the Conqueror, but I call him Billy. I ride him every morning. I have a little pug-dog, and his name is Squib. I have five pigeons. I have a cat, and its name is Frisky.

MARIE N. B.

STATEN ISLAND, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl seven years old. I have twenty-one dolls, and they all have pretty names. I also have three birds, doves and chickens, and a good cat named Marc Anthony. I am sick, and I am sick I can not write this story. My Nanna writes it for me. I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE for a year and a half, besides other papers. I like YOUNG PEOPLE especially. My Nanna has been reading the letters for me this morning. I hope you will put this letter, because I want to surprise my mamma. Good-by. I love you.

MAUD GERARD P.

Dear little Mand has been sick a whole year. I hope she will soon be well again.

LA CROIXE, WISCONSIN.

I am a little girl eight years old, and will be nine this week, Thursday. I have a little brother; his name is Roy; he is a year and five months over. I go to school, and when I come home Roy comes to meet me. It is vacation now. I have many little friends here. I expect to go to Iustford this week. It has rained steadily for four days here. Please may I join the cooking club. Do please put in this letter. Allie P.

Yes, dear, you may join. Your receipt appears in another column.

CANE ISLAND, SOUTH CAROLINA.

We live on an island five miles from Beaufort. Across the river, nearly opposite the house, is a beautiful grove of live-oaks and magnolias, called "Old Fort," where there are the remains of an old Spanish fort; some of its walls are still standing. Directly opposite to us is the town of Fort Royal, with its cotton pines, its main square, and very large wharves for shipping. A mile down the river, lying at anchor, is the United States coal ship Janette, and last year we had the United States steaming ship Albatross anchored nearly in front of the house. We have no neighbors here, so I have no little girls to play with; but my two brothers and myself go in bathing every day, and very often we swim, sailing, and on eleven years' old, and I have chickens and guinea-bens and ducks to take care of, and lessons to say to mamma in the morning, so that I am busy all of the time. I have tried the paper over, and they were very nice. I have never seen any letters in the Post-office Box from this part of the State.

MARY M. E.

CLETON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a boy nine years old. I have a dog named Rob Roy, who will stand on his hind-legs and wave his front paws in the air if you hold a piece of gingerbread in your fingers above his head. I am staying at the sea-shore, and I like it very much, only I don't like the cold water. I like Baseball, and I like to swim. I wish Mr. Alden would write another story, because he has written such interesting stories before.

L. M. B.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

My father and mother are visiting in Denver, Colorado, and I am keeping house. I would like to join your Little Housekeepers, as I am very fond of cooking. I tried a rook-pie, rice pudding and one for jumbles, and found them both very nice. My brother has taken YOUNG PEOPLE since the second year, and we are all delighted with it. I must close now, or I am afraid this will not be printed, and I would like to surprise my mother and father.

RABENA M. B.

Your mother must be proud of a girlie who can take her place in her absence.

I am a boy nearly twelve years old. I have no pets, but my sisters have cats apiece. Louie S. B., whose letter was printed in the YOUNG PEOPLE a short time ago, is our cousin, and my eldest sister's best friend. Louie's brother is a friend of mine, and we play together all the time. Although I am a boy, I can cook for myself, and have not tried any of the receipts in the Post-office Box, but I mean to try them by-and-by. I can sew and knit a little, and instead of being ashamed of these things, as I am, I am proud to belong to a club called the C. C. Club; we meet twice a week, and each one must make up a story and tell it at the meetings. The whole club are going to write to the Post-office Box in a little while.

JACK R. O.

BOVINE BEND, TEXAS.

I take YOUNG PEOPLE, and would tell you how I got it. My grandpa took it for me and my two cousins, Arthur M. and Walter H. We think it the best paper we ever read. My sister Bettie has taken it for grandpa took it for her three years. She would like to have her numbers bound. I could you let her know the cost of three bindings, and where she could get them?

I have a pony and saddle, one little rat-dog, and two cat-noses with ten plaids. I dress up the cows every evening, and help papa milk. I can help mamma a good deal in the kitchen. I have four sisters, three younger than myself. I am nine years old. Mamma has a paper with General Washington's obituary in it, and a piece of poetry on "The Death of Washington," by a young lady. Isabel Young Janette is the name of the paper I dated January 1st, and I had some of the receipts for our parties, and they were nice.

NATHAN P. W.

If Miss Bettie will write to Messrs. Harper & Brothers, enclosing $1.05, they will send her the bindings for her three volumes. The price of each binding, postage paid, is 35 cents.

WINDSOR, VERMONT.

This is the second year I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE. I like Mrs. Lillie's stories best of all. I hope she will not "let another little girl steal into our hearts," but that Nan will come back. I like Jimmy Brown sets a bad example. I had a brother who acted as he does I would be ashamed of him. I have read Ellie E.'s letter, and think if she has studied well in every-day lessons she need not dread examination. I think girls can have a motto as well as boys; mine is "Choose the good." I am twelve years old.

MIRNIE A. S.

A good motto.

FORT PLAIN, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl eight years old. I take YOUNG PEOPLE, and I used to take The Nursery. I like to read the stories in it; I liked the story of "The very much." I had a little Mamma, but it died. Do your little girls and boys know what a Manx kitten is?

A NEW SERIAL.

"DICK AND D."
BY LUCY C. LILLIE,
Author of "MILDRED'S BARGAIN," "NAN," etc.

The little people who, ever since the conclusion of "Nan," have been writing us such pressing letters about another story by Mrs. Lillie, will be glad to learn that next week we shall publish the first chapters of a new serial story by this popular author. Dick and D. are two splendid fellows, one doing his part among pleasant scenes and rich surroundings, while the other shows his heroism amid the gloom of tenement-house life, where he provides for and watches over the little blind brother left to his charge by a dying mother.

The beginning of a new serial is always a good time to subscribe.

OFF FOR A VISIT.

INDIAN GAMES.

I.—AMAIYOTTAM; OR, THE TORTOISE RACE.

TWO or more boys sit down in a line, with their knees touching their chins, and crossing their hands, hold their feet, the right with the left hand, and the left with the right hand. Thus contracted, they move toward a fixed goal. Should any let go his hold with either hand, he "dies," and remains motionless on the spot where he fails. He that reaches the goal successfully returns in the same manner to the person who had lagged behind, and says, "Dead tortoise, what are you doing?" He replies, "I am waiting for some one that would give me life."

Instantly the victor goes round him in the same posture, when the other is said to "revive." The two move back, as before, and reach the point from which they had started, and the game is concluded. The essence of the game consists in holding hard, often under very trying circumstances.

II.—KOOCHARAI ATTAM; OR, THE HORSE-LEAP GAME.

In this the sport consists in one boy jumping over another, who puts himself successively in various postures, in which the height increases in gentle gradation, as described below:

1. Sitting down, with his legs stretched out before him side by side.
2. With one foot over the other vertically, in the same posture.
3. A span over the second foot, the palm being stretched out, and the tip of the thumb resting over the tip of the toe.
4. Another span over it similarly.
5. Standing up and bending down, touching his toes with his thumbs.
6. Increasing the height by holding the calves of his legs, in the same posture.
7. Then the knees.
8. Then the thighs, bending his head, to keep it out of the way, like a horse under curb and rein.

He who jumps over has to increase his distance and speed in proportion; and should he touch the other in any attempt, he has to sit down and let others jump over him in the same manner.

III.—NALCÚLAI THATCHI; OR, THE FOUR-CORNER GAME.

Three boys stand at three corners of a large square, while one keeps within, moving round among them. Availing themselves of the vacant corner, the three constantly change places, taking special care not to be touched by the fourth while in actual motion from one corner to another. Should any be so touched, he has to give up his place to the victor, and go round like him.

“THAT’S THE BOY THAT DOES ERRANDS FOR COOK.”

“DICK AND D.”

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

Author of “Mildred’s Bargain,” “Nan,” etc., etc.

CHAPTER I.

THE TWO BROTHERS.

“AND there’s glory curtains to the windows.” Dick selected a good place, and took another bite of apple very carefully after saying this.

“Glory curtains,” a very thin little voice repeated. “What’s those, Dick?”

“Well, sort of all covered over with flowers—yellow flowers. Don’t you ’member wot yellow looks like, Norry?”

Norry thought half a minute, and then said, very quietly, “Kinder.”

“And when you look inter the winders you can see the big fire on the hearth, and it dances up sorter, and makes you wish so you was warm. And there’s pictures on the wall—here, take a bite of apple—and beautiful carpets and chairs and—oh my! all sorts o’ things.”

"Ain't that fine?" said Norry, with half a laugh. "And tell about him and her, Dicky."

"Oh, she's like—like a angel, I should think, and the old gentleman he takes her out a-ridin' in a carriage all lined in with satin—smooth, shiny satin—and yesterday I just went up and held the door open for 'em as they got in, and says she, 'Oh, that's the boy that does errands for cook.'"

Norry laughed, and Dick laughed with him; and then they ate their apple a moment in silence.

Presently Norry said, "Ain't it gettin' dark?"

Dick jumped up exclaiming: "So it is! Well, good-by, Norry, for a while. I'll be back for yer supper. You ain't very hungry, are you?"

Norry hesitated a short time.

"N—no, not so very," he said, in his little weak voice. He could not see how the tone affected Dick. The elder boy's face drew together with a strained, hard look.

"Well, I'll hurry—quicker'n ever to-night, I guess," he said, shortly, and then, as if with an effort, forced himself away.

The room upon which Dick closed the door was the poorest part of an attic in one of New York's poorest streets. It was bare and cold, and great cracks in the walls and floor let in the wind and let out whatever warmth came from the fire built from the few poor sticks the two boys had managed to get together. A broken table in the middle of the room and an old chair were the only pieces of furniture, and on a poor straw mattress at one side, facing the dormer-window, lay the boy Dick had left. Outside, a furious snow-storm was sending whirling flakes down upon the old roof of the house and against the broken window-panes. A little pile of snow, indeed, had drifted in across the window-ledge, and made the room even colder than before. Norry, lying on his hard little bed, wondered how this happened. He felt the added chill, but he could not see its cause, for Norry's eyes were closed to all sights. He was blind.

How the boys came to be living in so desolate a fashion is a story quickly told. Just one year previous to the day of which I am writing they had come from the country for the first time to a large town. Their mother was a widow who had supported herself and her boys comfortably, if very plainly, by needle-work, but ill health finally compelled her to give up every such effort, and seek the advice of some good physician in New York. There the first suggestion made to her was that she should place her boys in some institution, and herself enter a hospital. At this poor Mrs. Devine was panic-stricken. Accustomed to regard all large cities as places of iniquity, where her boys might at any time be spirited from her, and with all an invalid's nervousness, she determined so far as possible to keep them away from dangers of the kind, and so, with fast-failing strength, she shut herself up in their one room, and, refusing medical assistance, went on with her work.

We all know how poorly paid and how hard to procure is needle-work in any large town. Mrs. Devine shrank from the very name of a charitable institution, and with her peculiar kind of obstinacy shut her eyes to the fact that any such place could mean comfort or well-being for her children and herself. The origin of this was the mismanagement of the only place of the kind she had ever seen. The horrors of starving and whipping had been brought to light, and she had determined that as long as she could hold up her head the "authorities" should do nothing for her boys or herself.

As the months went by, and the poor woman's strength grew less and less, she endeavored to impress her feelings strongly on Dick's mind. Come what might, he was made to understand that he was to keep Norry with him until he, Dick, was legally old enough to have the child in charge. He was never to place himself where any one could question him too closely about his little blind brother, never to make friends with boys who would lead him astray, or talk to policemen or other grown people who would insist upon their being given to the "authorities" to look after—a strange prejudice, which poor Mrs. Devine's nervous state increased hourly!

Six months after they came to New York the widow died. It was a day Dick never could forget—a burning August morning. And so entirely secluded had she kept herself that Mrs. Devine had no friend to stand beside her except a poor old Irish woman whose heart had melted many a time as the three—Dick and Norry clinging to the mother's hand—had passed up and down the stairs of the house. Dick, in his first agony of terror, had called to Mrs. Macvoxy, but, on her reaching the widow's bedside, it was to find the poor woman almost speechless, her one effort being to murmur a prayer and commend her children to God's keeping.

"Trust—trust," she said, and Dick knew well what that word meant, for in all their trials he had never known his mother's faith to fail.

And so the elder boy found himself a few days later sitting alone in the dusk of the room, holding Norry's hand tightly in his, and wondering what to do next.

Mrs. Macvoxy had attended to the widow's simple burial. Money was found under her pillow for that purpose, and all the rest of her hard-earned savings—ten dollars—sealed in a paper and addressed to Dick.

As the two orphans sat clinging to each other in the hot, still dusk a step sounded on the stair, and the door was opened on their one most dreaded enemy—a man named Gurdle, who occupied one of the rooms in the house, and who had for some time tried to entice Dick and Norry out with him.

We have all seen dozens of such men, yet it is hard to describe just the look of mean cunning and brutality which darkened Gurdle's face. He was a thickset, powerful man, with bloated cheeks, a low forehead, and small, sharp eyes very near his nose, altogether about as repulsive-looking a creature as could be imagined.

Dick shuddered, and drew Norry closer to him. Happily, and yet perhaps unfortunately, little Norry's eyes, closed to all sights, could not quite take in what Dick saw to detest in their neighbor. Yet even he, not seeing the coarse face, heard the voice, and instinctively dreaded the man.

"Well, boys," Mr. Gurdle began, "so yer ma's been took. Well, I s'pose you've got to look around for a living, a honest living, ain't ye?"

Dick tried to say, bravely, "Yes, I am going to see to my little brother."

"Oh, you are, are you?" laughed Mr. Gurdle. "Well, I'll put you both in the way of earning your bread and butter as long as you leaves yourself entirely to me, Jem," he called out, and at this moment a second figure appeared in the door—a young man with a slouching gait, and a bandage over one eye—"Jem, don't you think this little chap" laying his dirty hand on Norry's head—"would just about suit the business?"

"Very well, if he won't be up to no tricks,"

"We don't want any help," cried Dick, in trembling tones. "Thank you very much, but—we—we don't want help."

"Oh, indeed!" said Mr. Gurdle, sarcastically. "Well, I guess I've made my mind up on that question, so you needn't trouble yourself, my lad. Now you can stay where you are, and we'll be back with your supper very soon—nice sausages, you know, hot and steaming, and then we'll just talk this matter over."

They were gone. Dick, standing still a moment in the fast-darkening room, felt all the horror his mother had ever had as to what might befall them. What could they do? There was, it seemed, no course for them to pursue but to run away, seek a new lodging, and stay a few days in hiding.

Dick was only twelve years old, and a country boy who had led a lonely life, but he was manly and resolute, and poverty had taught him the sort of independence and self-reliance that boys in a different station might not have acquired. He had no hesitation about starting out to face the world with Norry; his one dread was to be "taken in hand" by any one, Mr. Gurdle of all other human beings in the world.

"Norry," he half whispered, "did you hear those awful men? We must go away—quickly—at once. The rent's paid up to to-morrow, and there's the ten dollars, you know."

"Go where, Dick?" the little blind boy said, eagerly.

"I'll tell ye. Do you remember the old apple woman I helped up in Grand Street?"

"Yes."

"Well, I know she has two rooms, and I think she'll give us a place to stay in until I look around; only we must be quick."

Norry was very patient while Dick hastily put their possessions together. He dared not light a candle nor make an unnecessary sound, and indeed his preparations were too few to take him long.

With the ten dollars pined inside his coat, and a bundle in one hand and Norry's little palm in the other, Dick started forth, down the rickety stairs, swiftly and silently, scarcely stopping to breathe until they were well into Broadway and on their way to Grand Street. His one idea was to leave Gurdle and the other man behind them.

CHAPTER II.

A NEW HOME.

MRS. JAMES, the old apple woman, was sitting sleepily by her stall as the boys approached. She was a stout, kind-hearted, rather cross-mannered old woman, but Dick had once rendered her a service which she had promised never to forget, and as he explained that he had money to pay for a lodging, she was all the readier to take them in, and after some deliberation she gave Dick her key, with instructions where to find her rooms. One of them had been until very lately occupied by her own sons, and until their return at least she was willing to give the Devine boys a shelter.

No time was lost by Dick once the arrangement was made. He was thankful it was an attic and in an obscure street. There, while he sought for work, he might feel that he left Norry safe from the clutches of Gurdle.

But then arose the question as to what to do. Dick feared he ought not to seek for regular employment. He would be "found out"; they would question him, and so all his mother's fears might be realized. Untrained as he was, Dick had been taught well what his mother's "trust" meant, and his heart as well as his lips prayed earnestly.

A chance occurrence the next day opened a way for him. While standing near an old-fashioned corner house on Fifth Avenue an old gentleman in a doctor's chaise drove up. The horse took fright, and an accident might have happened but that Dick rushed forward and saved the wheel from turning against the curb-stone. The old gentleman as he got out thanked the boy, and bade him go down into the kitchen, where the servants would be having dinner. The master of the house must have given some instructions to the cook, for she received Dick graciously, and he enjoyed a capital meal, after which he was asked to go on some errand for Brooks, the butler. The reward of a quarter for this made Dick wonder if he might not get the chance of odd jobs here and there, at least until he dared find regular employment.

So it came about that two or three times in the week he presented himself at the house with the "glory curtains," where his willing, prompt manner rendered his services well worth having. Once or twice Dr. Field had sent him down-town on an errand; sometimes the cook asked permission to have him go out for her, or the butler procured his assistance with the silver or the fires. But with it all Dick never dared talk of himself, or of Norry, or of anything that might lead to questioning.

It was an easy-going household, The Doctor was a widower, and had but his one little grandchild with him. She it was whom Dick was wont to describe to Norry as "a angel." Often there would be company, when Dick's services were sure to be needed below-stairs, and one such occasion had arrived on the night when my story begins.

Mr. Brooks, the butler, had warned Dick to "look sharp" and be there by half past six, and Mr. Brooks could make himself very unpleasant when he chose. Dick could not help regarding him with something of the same fear that Mr. Gurdle had inspired. But he tried to dismiss any such idea from his mind on this evening as he made his way hurriedly up to the large, quiet-looking house, with its many windows, its "glory" curtains, and so much comfort and good cheer within.

STONE LILIES, OR CRINOIDS.

BY SARAH COOPER.

I REMEMBER seeing in the Post-office Box of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE some time ago a letter in which the writer speaks of the museum at Ann Arbor, and of the interesting things to be seen there. The next time he visits the museum if he will ask the janitor to show him the crinoids and other fossils he may find new objects of interest.

I hope all of you who live near a good museum will make frequent visits to it, and examine for yourselves the wondrously beautiful things which we have been studying; they are so much more real when we see them for ourselves. The boys and girls near Cambridge, Massachusetts, should prize the privilege of having access to the Agassiz Museum. Here they will find a choice collection of specimens, distinctly marked, and grouped in such a way that the first glance will show to what class of animals each specimen belongs. We shall have to content ourselves with this way of studying crinoids, as the living ones grow on rocky beds in the deep ocean. They are obtained only by dredging, and few of us will ever have a chance to see them.

Crinoids are attached during the whole or a part of their lives to the sea bottom by means of a jointed stalk which is so flexible as to bend freely in any direction. At the upper end of the stalk is the cup-shaped body, with its waving arms, which may be folded together like a flower bud, or spread open like the petals of a full-blown water-lily. Swaying to and fro in the bright water, this curious animal closely resembles a flower tossed by a gentle breeze, and as it really has a hard skeleton throughout, "stone lily" is not a bad name for it.

The specimen which I have chosen to illustrate this article was obtained during the famous voyage of the Challenger, and was named by Sir Wyville Thomson Hyocrinus Bethellianus, after one of the members of the expedition. This is a very unusual and beautiful member of the crinoidal group. The length of the stem was between six and seven inches, but the lower part was wanting, so that there was no means of ascertaining what its whole length may have been. The head, including the cup and arms, was about two and one-third inches in length. The arms are five in number, like those of the star-fish.

Let us imagine a star-fish supported in this way upon the end of a long stalk, and we shall have a pretty good idea of a crinoid. In comparing the two we must invert the star-fish, however, as the mouth of a crinoid is on the upper surface, whereas in the other echinoderms the mouth is underneath. The crinoids differ from the star-fishes we have been studying in having no tube-feet. They creep about by using the rays like legs. There are slender little pedicels in the path-like grooves, which might easily be mistaken for tube-feet; and the membrane lining the grooves, not the pedicels themselves, appears to be covered with cilia, which create currents of water toward the mouth, and carry to it the minute plants and animals upon which the crinoid feeds.

HYOCRINUS BETHELLIANUS.
(About twice the natural size.)

Like the star-fish and sea-urchins, these cousins of theirs secrete lime to form a solid frame-work for their bodies. The lime is deposited in circular plates, which are surrounded and held together by living flesh, so that they bend with great ease. Indeed, crinoids may be known by the little rings of which they are composed.

In some crinoids, as the Comatula, or feather-star, the animal is fastened to the ground only when young. Later in life it drops from the stalk, and is free after this to travel about. It can swim freely through the water; still it prefers to remain quietly settled on some stone or sea weed, waving its feathery, bright red arms while it feeds upon the little animals floating around. It now resembles a star-fish more than ever, though it moves only by means of its flexible arms.

The family of crinoids is very ancient, and was perhaps at one time the most numerous family which inhabited the sea. Like some other old families it has almost died out. There are but few species now living, and two or three of these have been recently discovered by scientific explorers while dredging the deep parts of the Caribbean Sea and the Atlantic Ocean.

Fossil remains of crinoids are abundant in rocks, showing that in past ages they must have lived in great quantities on the bottom of the ocean. In France large beds of rock are formed of their remains, and the same is true of many other parts of Europe and North America. The circular plates of the crinoids were so loosely held together by flesh, that when the animal died they fell apart, and the little disks now found in the rocks look like button-moulds ornamented with beautiful patterns and markings.

See how the crinoid stems are piled upon each other in the limestone rock, and notice the little hole in the middle of each. No wonder that such fine old crinoids as this should have been mistaken for petrified flowers.

Perhaps you will wonder how animals could be imbedded in hard rocks. To understand this we must remember that most of our rocks are formed of sand or mud which has become hard from the constant pressure of other layers of sand and mud that have accumulated above them. The rocks must have been in this soft condition when the animals died and were buried in them. As the rocks hardened, the solid parts of the animals were preserved in a stony bed, the hard rock fitting closely into every crack and cranny. When these rocks are split open we sometimes find the animal on one side of the crack, and a perfect impression on the other. These petrified remains are called fossils, and they tell us a fascinating story of the curious animals and plants that lived a long time ago.

The true nature of fossils, and the causes which placed them in solid rocks, interested the poets and philosophers long before the Christian era. It is only within the last century, however, that they have been accepted as records of the history of our earth. There are many animals now entirely extinct of whose existence we should know nothing but for their fossil remains. These relics of the past tell also of great changes from heat to cold in certain parts of the earth. For instance, the bones and teeth of elephants, rhinoceroses, and other animals that require warm climates are found in Siberia and in other cold countries, which shows that the polar regions were once much warmer than they are now. Again, remains of reindeer are found in Southern Europe, showing the existence of extreme cold at another period in the earth's history.

So you see these fossils have wonderful secrets to tell. Strange, old-fashioned secrets, for the formation of the rocks has been very slow, and the animals buried in them must have died thousands of years ago. Crinoids and corals and shells which live only in the ocean are found in the interior of the dry land, which proves beyond a doubt that these parts of our earth must at one time have been beneath the sea.

Is it not a lovely thought that these delicate crinoids which beautified the ocean long before we were here to admire them are not utterly destroyed, but that some of their skeletons have been preserved and are waiting for us in the gray old rocks if only our tastes are simple and cultivated enough to find them out?

The more our thoughts dwell upon things which are true and beautiful, the more true and beautiful our lives will become, and from mere admiration of these virtues we may find ourselves growing into what Charles Kingsley calls a "self-forgetful worship."

SUE'S WEDDING.

BY JIMMY BROWN.

SUE ought to have been married a long while ago. That's what everybody says who knows her. She has been engaged to Mr. Travers for three years, and has had to refuse lots of offers to go to the circus with other young men. I have wanted her to get married, so that I could go and live with her and Mr. Travers. When I think that if it hadn't been for a mistake I made she would have been married yesterday, I find it dreadfully hard to be resigned. But we ought always to be resigned to everything when we can't help it.

Before I go any further I must tell about my printing-press. It belonged to Tom McGinnis, but he got tired of it and sold it to me real cheap. He was going to write to the YOUNG PEOPLE'S Post-office Box and offer to exchange it for a bicycle, a St. Bernard dog, and twelve good books, but he finally let me have it for a dollar and a half.

It prints beautifully, and I have printed cards for ever so many people, and made three dollars and seventy cents already. I thought it would be nice to be able to print circus bills in case Tom and I should ever have another circus, so I sent to the city and bought some type more-aminch high, and some beautiful yellow paper.

Last week it was finally agreed that Sue and Mr. Travers should be married without waiting any longer. You should have seen what a state of mind she and mother were in. They did nothing but buy new clothes, and sew, and talk about the wedding all day long. Sue was determined to be married in church, and to have six bridesmaids and six bridegrooms, and flowers and music and things till you couldn't rest. The only thing that troubled her was making up her mind who to invite. Mother wanted her to invite Mr. and Mrs. McFadden and the seven McFadden girls, but Sue said they had insulted her, and she couldn't bear the idea of asking the McFadden tribe. Everybody agreed that old Mr. Wilkinson, who once came to a party at our house with one boot and one slipper, couldn't be invited; but it was decided that every one else that was on good terms with our family should have an invitation.

Sue counted up all the people she meant to invite, and there was nearly three hundred of them. You would hardly believe it, but she told me that I must carry around all the invitations and deliver them myself. Of course I couldn't do this without neglecting my studies and losing time, which is always precious, so I thought of a plan which would save Sue the trouble of directing three hundred invitations and save me from wasting time in delivering them.

I got to work with my printing-press, and printed a dozen splendid big bills about the wedding. When they were printed I cut a lot of small pictures of animals and ladies riding on horses out of some old circus bills and pasted them on the wedding bills. They were perfectly gorgeous, and you could see them four or five rods off. When they were all done I made some paste in a tin pail, and went out after dark and pasted them in good places all over the village.

The next afternoon father came into the house looking very stern, and carrying one of the wedding bills in his hand. He handed it to Sue and said: "Susan, what does this mean? These bills are pasted all over the village, and there are crowds of people reading them." Sue read the bill, and then she gave an awful shriek, and fainted away, and I hurried down to the post-office to see if the mail had come in. This is what was on the wedding bills, and I am sure it was spelled all right:

Miss Susan Brown announces that she will marry
Mr. James Travers
at the Church next Thursday at half past seven, sharp.
All the Friends of the Family
With the exception of the McFadden tribe and old Mr. Wilkinson are invited.
Come early and bring
Lots of Flowers.

Now what was there to find fault with in that? It was printed beautifully, and every word was spelled right, with the exception of the name of the church, and I didn't put that in because I wasn't quite sure how to spell it. The bill saved Sue all the trouble of sending out invitations, and it said everything that anybody could want to know about the wedding. Any other girl but Sue would have been pleased, and would have thanked me for all my trouble, but she was as angry as if I had done something real bad. Mr. Travers was almost as angry as Sue, and it was the first time he was ever angry with me. I am afraid now that he won't let me ever come and live with him. He hasn't said a word about my coming since the wedding bills were put up. As for the wedding, it has been put off, and Sue says she will go to New York to be married, for she would perfectly die if she were to have a wedding at home after that boy's dreadful conduct. What is worse, I am to be sent away to boarding-school, and all because I made a mistake in printing the wedding bills without first asking Sue how she would like to have them printed.

TWO GIRLS.

BY WILLIS B. ALLEN.

"I WONDER if they are so different!"

Edith Moreton's pretty young forehead had a puzzled little wrinkle as she stopped rowing for a moment and leaned forward, with the oar-blades rippling through the water, and the muslin sleeves falling back from her brown wrists.

"Are they so different, Cousin John?"

Her companion gave an impatient twitch to his straw hat.

"Why, of course! They are not like you, Edith. They are ignorant and poor and—and not clean, you know. They were born to it, and they like it."

"But it doesn't seem right. I heard a lady on the piazza this morning say something about 'those creatures' in such a way that I thought she was speaking of rats or snakes. It turned out she meant the convicts who attacked their keepers at the prison last July."

Edith spoke warmly, as she was apt to do when she once took up a subject. She was one of those earnest girls with whom young men at summer hotels are rather shy of entering into conversation. She was only fifteen, and one by one the terribly real problems of the day were marshalling themselves before her. She would not pass them by with a gay laugh, after the prevailing mode of her merry companions. She felt somehow that it belonged to her to help the world and make it better, as well as to the missionaries and other good people upon whose shoulders we so willingly pack responsibilities.

"It must be the way these people live and are brought up that makes them so rough and bad. Isn't there any way to help them?"

"None that amounts to much. Besides, that isn't our business. There are men enough who do nothing else—are paid for it—missionaries and the like. And you can't make everybody rich, you know. The Bible itself says, 'Ye have the poor always with you.'"

"Perhaps that doesn't mean that we ought to have them," replied Edith, slowly.

"Well, they're here, and we may as well make the best of it."

"But what is the best? That's just it."

"What is the use of your thinking about it? You can't do anything, and you don't even know the kind of people we're talking of; the North-Enders, for instance. You have never seen and touched them; and if you should meet them face to face, I don't believe you would care for any further acquaintance. They're simply disgusting."

Edith said no more on the subject, and just as the sun dropped into the arms of the waiting pines on the hill they reached the little wharf on the river-bank, moored the boat, and walked up to the hotel where she was spending the summer. She went straight to her mother's room, and, after her fashion, as straight to the point.

"Mother, I want to go into the city right away, and spend a day with Aunt Augusta."

"But my child, it's tea-time already, and there's a hop to-night. Besides, you can not go alone at this hour. You had better wait till morning."

"Mother, I so much want to go now. The train leaves in fifteen minutes. Alice can go with me. I don't care for the hop, anyway; it's too warm to dance. Please, mother?"

Of course energetic little Edith had her way, and with Alice, her mother's maid, seated by her side, was soon whirling along toward the city, with a strong resolve in her mind.

"I'll walk up to aunty's from the depot, and to-morrow I'll go down to North Street with Cousin Will."

The train stopped at all the small stations, and was delayed by various causes, so that it was quite dark when she started on her walk. She was glad, after all, to find the streets well-lighted, and filled with respectable-looking people.

While Edith and her attendant were making their way along Washington Street in the dark, another girl about thirteen years of age, named Bridget Flanagan, was standing on the third gallery of the Crystal Palace, in the good city of Boston, looking down into Lincoln Street. Bridget was a delicate and sickly child, her pale cheeks and slender limbs showing an intimate acquaintance with want and misery. Like Edith, she was wondering whether anything could be done to aid the poor. Not that any such words passed through her mind. Dear me, no! I doubt if she would have even known what "aid" meant, that word being in her mind associated solely with lemons of a shrivelled and speckled character. If she had spoken her thoughts, which she sometimes had a queer way of doing, she might have said something like this: "Don't I wish I could git out o' this! An' the rich folks w'd all the money they wants, an' nothin' to do but buy fans an' use 'em up. My! ain't it hot?"

It was hot. There was a man playing on a hand-organ in the street below, and not only had a crowd of children and idlers surrounded him as he stood before a brilliantly lighted liquor store, but the long rickety galleries which run in front of each floor in the "Palace" were full of half-dressed, red-faced women and children, who leaned on the dirty railing and listened to the music, just as the guests at the "Pines" at the same time were listening to their orchestra of a dozen pieces.

In the gallery overhead Bridget heard two women dancing and shouting noisily. Somewhere in the building a child was crying loudly in a different key from the hand-organ. Bridget didn't notice these things particularly; she was used to them. Only there came over the young human girl-heart which was beating beneath the rags and in the midst of this wretchedness a sick longing for—what? Bridget did not know.

"It's the hot weather it is," she said to herself; "it is usin' me up intirely. I'll jist go an' have a bit av a walk."

Accordingly she issued forth, and walked slowly down Lincoln Street toward the Albany Station. The air was stifling, and as Bridget reached the corner she saw the groups of belated people hurrying out to the Newtons and Wellesley, where they might cool themselves in the pure air, with whatever means of comfort money could purchase.

Edith Moreton and Bridget Flanagan both reflected upon this as they unconsciously drew nearer and nearer together. Edith was tired, and was beginning to look for a horse-car to take her to her aunt's house. The little Irish girl had turned and left her "Palace" until she was now near the head of Summer Street.

Ten steps further, and they met upon the corner, with the great gilded eagle's wings outstretched above their heads. Both paused for a moment. Edith was dressed as she had been in the boat—all in white, with a pretty fluffy ostrich feather curving around her broad straw hat, and a fleecy shawl thrown over her shoulders. Bridget's shawl was not fleecy, and her dress was not white. Nor did she wear lawn shoes.

What either would have said I do not know. Perhaps nothing. But at that moment something happened.

"Look o' that!" cried Bridget.

"See!" cried Edith at the same moment; and they both pointed to the third story of a high granite block across the street. One of the windows was slightly open, and through this narrow space a delicate curl of blue smoke floated softly out, laughed noiselessly to itself, and disappeared. Another puff of smoke, and another; then a steady stream, growing blacker and larger every moment.

It was in vain that the maid urged her to come along. Edith only stood still, wringing her hands and crying out, "What shall we do? it's all on fire, and nobody knows." Instinctively she looked at Bridget for an answer. Somehow the difference between herself and the ragged little Irish girl did not seem so great just then.

The fire had broken out near the place where the great fire of 1872 started. Each of the girls could remember dimly that awful night of red skies and glittering steeples. The massive blocks had been rebuilt, business had rolled through the streets once more, property of value untold lay piled away in those great warehouses on every side, and only these two slender, wide-eyed girls knew of that ugly black smoke, with its gleaming tongues of flame, gliding about over counter and shelf.

"Sure we must give the alarm," said Bridget, hurriedly, gathering the faded shawl about her neck.

"But I don't know how. Do you?"

"Don't I? You jist come along wid me—run, now!"

They almost flew down the street, dainty shoes and bare brown feet side by side.

"Here's the box," panted Bridget, pausing suddenly before an iron box attached to a telegraph pole. "Can yer read where it says the key is?"

Edith read: "Key at Faxon's Building, corner of Bedford and Summer streets."

To reach the corner, rouse the watchman, snatch the key from his sleepy hands, rush back again, and whisk open the iron box was the work of two minutes. Perfect silence everywhere.

"Look a-here, now," said Bridget, breathlessly, standing on tiptoe. "I've seen 'em do it."

She pulled the handle once, twice. Then they waited, their hearts beating fiercely. They were off the travelled ways, and no one passed by them. All this time the smoke was creeping up the stairways of the lofty building, and the red fire was quietly devouring yard after yard of wood-work.

Bridget raised her hand to pull the lever for the third and last time. After this there was nothing more to do but wait. Alice again urged Edith to come away, but only in vain. She drew closer to Bridget, and grasped her hand. Even Bridget seemed dismayed at first, but quickly recovering herself, she half pushed, half drew Edith up a flight of high stone steps near by.

"Yer'll git yer dress all kivered wid mud, if yer don't kape out o' the strate," she said, as she turned away. "I'm a-goin' ter stay down an' tell 'em where the fire is. It says so on them little cards."

"But the crowd! When they come you will get hurt."

"Hm! I'm used to worse crowds nor ever you saw. There! I hear 'em now!"

As Edith listened there rose a faint, far-off rattle of wheels upon the pavement, mingled with a jangling sound of gongs and horns.

"It's the engine!" cried Bridget, in great excitement. "It's comin'!"

But other things were coming too. Bridget had taken her stand directly in front of the alarm-box, and a stream of men and boys who poured around the corner jostled her roughly and pushed her to and fro.

"Come!—come quick!" called Edith, just able to make herself heard above the noise of the crowd. But Bridget shook her head, and pointed down the street.

It was a grand sight: the engine, with its scarlet wheels, and its polished stack sending out a long trail of brilliant sparks like shooting-stars, the two powerful black horses tearing furiously over the pavements, yet subject to the slightest word or touch of their driver, who sat behind them firmly braced against the foot-board, the reins taut as steel, and the gong sounding beneath without pause.

"Get out of the way here!" shouted a brisk fireman, forcing his way through the crowd.

The men surged back, and nobody noticed the little barefooted figure who was hurled violently against the building. She uttered a faint cry, and held up one foot, as a lame spaniel might do. A young man with delicate clothes and a light cane, who had stopped on his way to the station to "see the fun," had placed his heavy boot on the little, shrinking foot. She might have got out of the way more quickly, but she must keep to the front to tell the firemen.

The engine thundered up to the box and stopped, hissing and smoking furiously. The black horses quivered and pawed the pavement, shaking white flecks of foam over their sleek bodies.

"Where's the fire?" called the driver, sharply.

"Blest if I know—" began one of the men addressed, but he was interrupted.

"Sure it's on Summer Street, sir, 'most up to Washington, on the other side."

It was a surprisingly small, shrill voice for such an important piece of information, but it sounded reliable. The driver knew that every moment now might mean the loss of thousands of dollars, and, giving his horses the rein, was galloping off up the street again, almost before Bridget's words were out of her mouth. A few moments after, the panting engine and the distant shouts of the firemen told of the work they were doing.

Well, the block was saved. A few thousand dollars' damage on goods fully insured was all. Next morning the papers, being somewhat hard pressed for news, gave "full particulars" of the fire. "Five minutes later, and the loss must have been almost incalculable."

"Full particulars?" Perhaps not quite full. No re-ostrich feather, and Edith's eyes. And once more Edith forgot the difference.

A policeman found them there a few minutes later. Edith had her arms around the faded shawl, and Bridget's tously little head was lying wearily against her shoulder. The poor trampled foot was bound up in somebody's embroidered handkerchief.

Edith did not give the officer time to speak. She was on her own ground now.

"Will you call a hack or a Herdic, please? This girl is sick."

The tone was quiet, but plainly said that it was accustomed to giving directions, and having them obeyed, too.

The policeman had approached with a rough joke on his tongue's end, but it turned into a respectful "Yes'm, certainly."

Of course they went straight to Aunt Augusta, who was still sitting by the window, and who was so used to emergencies that she took the whole affair quite as a matter of course.

Bridget was promptly put to bed in one of the servant's rooms, and Aunt Augusta's own maid installed as nurse. In the course of a few days the injured foot was all right, and Aunt Augusta had learned her whole history. She found out that Bridget had no father or mother, but lived with an uncle, who took turns with her brother in the Criminal Court. Even Bridget might have taken her turn before long if she had been left to herself. Aunt Augusta had a good long talk with Bridget; and knowing of a place in New Hampshire where the air is sweet and pure, and where the great hills hold a little village in their everlasting arms, she sent Bridget there to find a home.

Edith returned to the hotel, and was pronounced more singular

"'WHERE'S THE FIRE?' CALLED THE DRIVER, SHARPLY."

porter had heard of Bridget's prompt action or secured her name.

When the engine rattled away, with the crowd after it, Edith had come timidly down the steps. Alice had been borne away by the crowd, and was not to be found.

"Where are you?" she called. "I do not know your name—oh-h!" She stopped with a pitiful little cry.

Bridget was crouched in a miserable heap just around the corner. She was stroking her bruised foot with trembling hands, and crying softly to herself. The pain was so bad, and her head felt so dizzy!

Then she looked up, and saw the white shawl and the than ever. She found friends enough that were interested in her adventure, but very few who cared to hear much about Bridget or the part she took in it. Bridget was not "interesting"; it required Edith, with her white dress, and sunny hair half hidden by the long white feather, to figure as a "heroine."

But neither Edith nor Aunt Augusta forgot Bridget. She writes to them frequently from her new home; and when Edith hears people like Cousin John talk about the "difference" between these people and themselves, she thinks of one girl whose ragged shawl and tattered dress hid as true and noble and self-sacrificing a heart as ever beat beneath velvet and lace.

A GARDEN PARTY.

HOW TO FORM A BASE-BALL OR TENNIS CLUB. BY A CLUB SECRETARY.

AMONG the many pleasures of the summer season not the least are the delightful out-door games such as base-ball and lawn tennis, archery and croquet, golf and bowls, bicycling and tricycling, and a dozen others that we have not space to mention. It is probable, therefore, that a few suggestions for the formation of a base-ball or lawn tennis club, and a few hints for its after-management, will be of general interest, more especially when it is borne in mind that most of the suggestions and directions here given apply equally well in the case of any other club—archery, bicycle, or what not.

Should there be a desire for a base-ball club in any village or district, it must be started by one or two energetic boys, who will not hesitate to devote considerable time and trouble to the business. These promoters should collect the names of all those who are likely to be active playing members; they should make all inquiries as to suitable playing grounds, and they should be prepared with all necessary information as to probable income and expenses.

Thus prepared, a preliminary meeting of those who are likely to be strong supporters of the club should be called; and at this meeting a code of rules should be drawn up; two or three names for the club should be selected; the question of ground should be fully considered, and the amount of entrance fee and annual subscription decided upon. Then all is ready for the first general meeting, to which all who are likely to take an interest in the club should be invited.

At the general meeting the first business, after the election of a chairman for the evening, should be to call upon one of the promoters to state the objects for which those present have been called together, and this speaker should conclude by introducing the question of the most suitable ground.

This is a very important matter, as upon its cost will depend largely the amount of the annual subscription for each individual member, and the prospects of the successful launching of the club. It may sometimes happen that a piece of waste or common land is available for the purpose, or that a land-owner in the district is willing to lend a portion of a field free of charge. Under such circumstances the only expenses in connection with the ground will be those of levelling, rolling, and cutting the grass, and a very moderate subscription will be sufficient. But if it be necessary to hire a field, an entrance fee of five dollars and a yearly subscription of the same amount will certainly be required, even if the number of members be large.

In order to settle the amount of the entrance fee, it should be remembered that members' subscriptions should be retained to meet current expenses only, and that all first expenses—the preparation of the ground, the purchase of tents, nets, bats, etc.—should be paid out of the entrance fees and any special donations received for the purpose.

Having fixed upon a suitable ground, and having settled the financial business, the next step should be to determine upon the name of the club, and with regard to this one hint only can be given. If another club of the name be not already in the field, it is wisest to select the name of the village or town in which the majority of the members reside; thus, if the meeting be called at Plainfield, let the club be known as "The Plainfield Base-ball Club." But if for any reason a local name is not available, then choose some very simple distinguishing word, avoiding anything of a comic or eccentric character; and at the same time be careful to discover whether your name has been previously appropriated or not.

The question of name suggests that of colors, which should next be determined upon. Some clubs prefer that their members wear white flannels, and never any colors; still, it is as well that something distinctive should be worn, whether it be a cap or sash or coat. Moreover, the flags should bear the club colors. In making the choice, however, it is well to err on the side of simplicity, and to avoid colors which have already been selected by neighboring or well-known clubs.

And now some very important business should follow—the election of officers. First of all, it will be well to elect a president and vice-president; these should be boys of some position, who are likely to take a deep interest in the welfare of the club and to introduce new members. These two officers will, of course, be, by virtue of their office, members of the committee, but their duties will consist merely in presiding at meetings, dinners, etc.

The captain should stand first on the list of the working officers, and he should be chosen mainly on account of his skill at and thorough knowledge of the game. But beyond this he should possess a large amount of tact and self-control; he should know something of his fellow-members and of their capabilities, and he should be respected by those whom he is called upon to lead.

Next should come the secretary, upon whom it will chiefly depend whether the club shall be a success or failure. It does not matter about his being a good player, but he must be an enthusiast at the game, and must love his work, for assuredly he will have plenty to do. Upon him will devolve all the little details of the club management, the arrangement of matches, the selection of the players (in concert with the captain), the care of the ground, the calling of meetings, etc. Of all the officers, then, it is most important that the secretary should be the right man in the right place.

The treasurer should next be elected; but his duties are light, and it should not be difficult to find a trustworthy member for this post. To him it will fall to collect donations, entrance fees, and subscriptions, and to pay all accounts, which should first be passed by the secretary or the committee.

The committee should be from five to ten in number, and in them, together with the officers, should vest the election of new members, and the settlement of all important business. When once the committee and the officers are elected, the general body of members should cease to have any voice in the management.

If the club be a large one, and can afford it, a ground man should be engaged for the season, both to look after the ground, the rolling, etc., and to act as professional pitcher at practice, and as umpire in matches. Too many liabilities, however, should not be incurred at first, as nothing is so damaging to a club as to be in debt.

It is frequently the case that two clubs can be formed in connection with each other, as, for instance, a tennis and a base-ball club, part of the base-ball field being marked out for tennis courts. In this case there should be two classes of subscribers—members of the base-ball club, and non-members; and the subscription of this last class should be double that of the former; or one subscription might cover both base-ball and lawn tennis, and the sisters and friends of members might be admitted to play tennis free of charge.

The only officials needed in a tennis club are a secretary and a treasurer, and in the case of a small club the two offices might well be combined. In either event the duties can only be light.

Should the club possess two courts, one of these should be reserved on certain days of the week for ladies only, and on other days for gentlemen only. This arrangement allows some of the best players among the boys the opportunity of a fast game on certain occasions, while it also provides a court on fixed days for girls who are new to the game.

The rules of the club should contain one relative to single-handed sets, should members require a court for the purpose, and one fixing the number of sets any quartette may play when other members are waiting for a game.

The nets and marking apparatus alone should be furnished by the club; the rackets and—if it can be so arranged—the balls should be supplied by the members themselves. Of course when four members play together a difficulty may at times arise as to who shall bring the balls; but this is after all only a matter of arrangement, and when the club declines to provide balls it gains one great advantage—it can not lose any. Any one who knows how easy it is to lose a dozen balls in one afternoon at tennis will recognize the desirability of, at any rate, making each set of players responsible for the balls they use.

From the fact that the game may be played by only two, three, or four players, a lawn tennis club is one of the easiest to start, and may comprise a very limited number of players. Moreover, when once the ground is obtained the expenses are very small, and the pleasure derived is far in excess of the outlay. Seeing, then, what a very healthful exercise lawn tennis is for young people of both sexes, it is to be hoped that hundreds and thousands of lawn tennis clubs may spring up and prosper all over the country.

The tennis court might be made of asphalt, with a view to erecting a light wooden structure over the court for play during the winter months.

THE ADVENTURES OF PRINCE LAZYBONES.*

AUTHOR OF "PRINCESS IDLEWAYS," "PHIL'S FAIRIES," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

LEO tried to go to sleep; but after doing everything he could think of, such as imagining a flock of sheep jumping a fence, and counting a hundred backward and forward, he gave it up as useless. All the strange things he had seen would come back, and his eyelids were like little spring doors that bobbed open in spite of his attempts to close them. As they lifted for the hundredth time he saw Paz doubled up in a heap, with his knees drawn up to his chin, his elbows resting on them, and his face in his hands. He was intently watching Leo.

"Hallo!" said Leo, "can't you go to sleep either?"

"No need at present."

"Why not?"

"I was going through a formula in D."

"What under the sun is that?"

"Something relating to my pursuits. Don't trouble yourself to try and find out everything. In my opinion Master Knops has crammed you too hard. What do you say to my telling you a story or two?"

"Splendid! I'm ready when you are."

"No, you are not; you're hungry. You must have a bite first; what shall it be? Oh, no matter; I'll get you something if you promise not to ask any questions."

"All right," said Leo, inwardly cringing at the thought of stuffed rats.

Paz was gone but a little while. When he came back he was carrying a basket, from which he produced a small flask of a very sweet fruity syrup, a dish of something that looked like little fish swimming in golden jelly—salt and savory Leo found them—and a sort of salad garnished with tiny eggs. These were followed by nuts of a peculiar flavor, and small fruits as exquisite to look at as they were delicious to taste.

When Leo had done ample justice to all these things Paz looked relieved, as if he had feared they might not suit.

"Never ate anything better in my life," said Leo.

"I am glad to hear it; tastes differ so. Now these things come from all parts of the world—the fish from Spain, the eggs from Africa, the nuts from Italy, the fruits from France, and the syrup from Portugal."

"Oh dear!" said Leo, wondering how their freshness was preserved.

"Yes, I suppose you have no idea of our canning business."

"None in the world."

"I presumed as much," said Paz, wisely, "nor am I going to bore you with any more information."

Leo looked quite shocked.

"Oh, well," said Paz, profoundly, "there's a limit to all things, and I'm not a Knops."

"But have you been to all parts of the world?" asked Leo.

"Oh yes," answered Paz, carelessly. "I have wandered far and wide in my time. Until I caught the diamond fever I was used as an envoy."

"Indeed!" said Leo, having but a faint idea of what an envoy was. "What did you do?"

"I went on errands of importance."

"Who for, and where did you go?"

"I was sent generally to carry messages from our King to the Queen of the Wind Fairies, or the Herb Elves, or the Sylphs, sometimes to warn them of trouble or danger, sometimes to tell them that imps were rampaging or giants were about to make war, but oftener to inform them of some plan for assisting man, or some good to be done for a child: in these things we delight."

"How kind!" said Leo.

"Kindness has so much power, if people only knew it. But you are waiting; I must not detain you." So, without further preface, thus began

PAZ'S STORY.

It was a time of trouble to mankind—a year of strange events, and yet so stupid are ordinary mortals—begging your pardon—that none were making preparations either to meet or to avoid disaster. The King of the Kobolds had been negotiating with our King for the purchase of some immense tracts of iron ore, and in the course of conversation said he had received news from Italy that there would soon be a volcanic outbreak, that the giants there were quarrelling fiercely, and had not hesitated to declare that unless matters were arranged to suit them they would bid Vesuvius pour forth its death-dealing fires.

Now on the side of that well-known mountain were living some friends of our King—two children, a girl and a boy, Tessa and Tasso, daughter and son of an Italian peasant.

In their little vineyard one day our King's son, an infant, was swinging in his leafy cradle; it looked like a bird's nest, and so I suppose they thought it, but a rude playmate of theirs tried to tear it down from its airy height, and would have succeeded had not both Tessa and Tasso resolutely opposed him.

First they sought to make him stop by appealing to his feelings, asking him how he would like to have his cottage ruined, his home desolated; but at this he only mocked and jeered. Then they urged that birds had the same right to live and rear their young as had human beings, which having no more effect, they openly forbade his attempt, saying that the ground was theirs, the birds were their friends, and they should defend them. Blows followed, Tessa and Tasso bearing their part bravely, and compelling the young ruffian to take himself off. Little did they know whom they were defending.

Our King heard of the occurrence, and vowed unending friendship, so when the King of the Kobolds told him of the danger impending at Vesuvius I was at once sent for to convey the information, and do what I could to save the lives of Tessa and Tasso. It took but a whiff of my pipe to bring me to the desired place, but so calm and bright and peaceful was the scene that I found it hard to believe in the threatening evil. Never had I seen a bluer sky reflected in a more silvery mirror than were the clouds and bay of Naples that day. The people were merry and careless, tending their cattle, gathering their fruit, singing their songs, and as indifferent to their old enemy as if he had never harmed them.

How should I approach the object of my mission? how put fear into the hearts of joyous innocence? Their father had bidden them go to the city with a load of oranges. These were to be conveyed in large baskets, or panniers, on the back of a faithful donkey. If I could keep them away from home, delay them by some pretext from returning for at least a day, I might aid them. So with this determination I proceeded to act.

At every place or with every person to whom they offered their fruit I whispered objections, asked if their prices were not very high, or if the fruit were not picked too early. So well did I succeed that I had nearly upset my own plans, for poor Tessa, becoming discouraged, wanted to return home at once, but Tasso stoutly declared he would sell every orange before going back—that his fruit was good and ripe, and it should be appreciated. I was pained to see Tessa's tears, but what could I do? Already thick smoke was pouring down the mountain's side, and so many were the rumbling sounds that although these children were accustomed to such disturbances, fears began to assail them.

They were now well away from home, and had paused at the road-side to eat their bread and cheese. People were becoming unusually numerous. Excitement was prevailing, and Tessa saw with alarm women and children hurrying past. At that moment a travelling carriage appeared. One could see at a glance from its neat compactness that it was English. I put my head in the window, and whispered something. At once a gray-haired lady leaned out, and beckoned to Tessa, who tremblingly obeyed.

"My child," said the lady, kindly, "I want some oranges. Can you give them to me quickly? You know we have no time to spare."

"Yes, madame," said Tessa. "But what is the matter? You and every one look so anxious."

Instantly, as she spoke, there was a terrible quivering of the earth, which made every one shudder. The driver could scarcely hold his horses; they plunged and reared and trembled.

"Ah! we can not wait," said the lady; but seeing the terrified looks of the children, she paused to ask, "Are you children alone?"

"Entirely so, signorina."

"And where are you going?"

"Home, to the mountain."

"You can not go there; it is too late." Then with a sudden resolution she turned to the maid beside her. "We will take them with us; their load is too heavy for them to get on fast enough. Quick, quick. Leave your donkey; he is tired; every one is so frightened he will not be stolen if he escapes. Come in here," pushing open the carriage door.

Tessa turned irresolutely to Tasso, who was also uncertain what to do; but the tone was imperative; they were accustomed to obey. Crowds were now jostling them; women were crying; children were pushed hither and thither, their little toys trodden under foot, more a grievance to them than the quaking earth. With a regretful glance at the donkey Tessa and Tasso jumped into the carriage, which drove away as fast as the frightened horses could get through the throng. Miles and miles away they went until the horses could go no farther. Then they stopped for the night at a little inn overflowing with strangers, where they heard that Vesuvius was pouring forth lava, and where they could see the lurid glare of its flames reddening the evening sky. They were saved. My mission was fulfilled.

Paz stopped; but Leo was unsatisfied.

"And what became of them? Did they ever go home again? Were their father and mother killed?"

"No; their parents escaped, but their home was buried in ashes. The children were cared for by the English lady until it was safe to return. All that was left them was the one poor donkey which, unharmed, strayed back to the place of its past abode, and with it they began a trade in lava which proved very remunerative."

"Trade in lava?" repeated Leo, inquisitively.

"Yes; the people pour the melted lava in moulds before it cools, and so fashion ornaments out of it—perhaps they also carve it. I know they color it beautifully, for I have had to carry bracelets made of it to various people with whom we are on friendly terms, and they were blue as a bird's egg or turquoise."

"How curious!"

"No; they were not remarkable, not half as singular as coral formations."

"What are they?"

"Don't tell me you know nothing of coral?"

"I believe I have seen it, but that is all."

"Coral is made by wonderful little animals who live and die in its cells until their structures are big enough for islands; but I will leave that to Knops; my plan is not to cram."

A BOY WITH BRIGHT IDEAS.

BY KIRK MUNROE.

HIS next idea was
To tie a balloon
On each of his feet,
And walk to the moon.

But again his feet went up
And his head went down,
And thus he hung
High over the town,

Until papa sent a bullet
Through each balloon plump,
And brought his dear boy
To the ground with a thump.

FISHING IN THE BROOK.

The brook runs through the farm, my boys—

A merry brook, they say—
Beside it haunts the children still,
And there for hours they play,
And in that brook Eugene and Ed
Went fishing one whole day.

Eugene he stood upon one side,
And Ed upon the other;
Eugene he had a brand-new line,
And Ed he had another.
Eugene was quite a fisherman,
And so was Ed his brother.

How many fish they caught that day
I do not dare to tell,
But in that little brook were found

Not trout nor pickerel:
They here a cat-fish now and then,
Which answered just as well.

When home Eugene and Edwin came
They here a string of fish,
The cook she fried them crisp and brown,
And laid them in a dish,
And both the boys had appetites
As good as heart could wish.

So now this story I relate

About one summer's day
When by the brook two laddies brave
For hours were said to stay;
Is fishing work? the question is,
Or would you call it play?

have again been ill, and though I began a letter several times, I was never able to finish it.

I am in the country now, where the mountains remind me of the Vorarlberg in Austria, though I miss the lake, one winter we had a great deal of fun there. Lake Constance froze over for the first time in fifty years. The people were wild with delight. They had a printing-press which printed a daily paper on the ice all the time it remained. They had bonfires, dancing, and a carnival. When the ice broke up two foolish men tried to cross over to Lindau, three miles off, on the pieces, jumping from one to another. They succeeded, but nearly lost their lives. Though the ice gave pleasure to the people, it gave some trouble to the government, because people from Bavaria were constantly smuggling goods across the border on the ice, and though the police often gave them chase, it was very hard to catch them, and they used to return breathless and panting after the sailing miller, after a smuggler who was too expert to be caught.

The smugglers had been so troublesome that a reward was offered by the government for their capture, and armed police were stationed in the woods and mountains day and night to catch them. One day we boys—Gerald, Arthur, Cecil, and I—were playing in the woods on the mountain, and armed police were stationed near, and soon saw three policemen in full chase after us. They could not see us; they only heard us, and thought we were smugglers. We gave them a fine run up and down the mountain, until we came near our house, and then we stood still and let them come up to us. How provoked they were to find they had wasted their time, and worse yet, had tried themselves out, chasing four little boys who were simply enjoying a game of tag! The story got about among the other policemen, and they were well joked and teased about their courage in chasing such "dangerous enemies to the government," as they called us.

I wish I could hear some more about that little fellow the gentleman wrote about in Yocco's Progress. I would like to know one who can bear his pain so well. Good-by, dear Postmistress. Your attached friend,
JOHN J. M.

Perhaps the friend who wrote that letter which so gratified you will answer this personally. The Postmistress has promised not to reveal the secret, so she can not even tell you whether you have guessed right or not. She is very, very sorry you have been ill again, and she expects that one of these days you will be well.

BATHURST, MARY ANN.

I wrote a letter once before, but I did not see it in the Post-office Box, so I thought I would write you a line. My two pets except my little brother, five weeks old. We have a cat and one little kitten. We have a horse named Billy, and we had a squirrel which we tamed, and he grew to be such a mischievous little animal. I shall be twelve years old in November. I want to see how this letter looks when printed.

One day we went crabbing, and left the basket of crabs in the bath-tub. Afterward we heard a knock at the door, and on opening it we saw two policemen with clubs in their hands. They said that we had left the front door open, and there might be thieves in the house. Presently we heard a scrambling noise in the bath-room. The policemen looked around, but found nothing. All the while we sat up there on the floor, and what had they seen but the crabs getting out of the basket and crawling along on the tub? I am a little girl thirteen years old, and I have taken YOUR PEOPLE ever since it has been printed. Papa could not see up to a friend on the Yonkers County Record. We have a horse and buggy, and I go after papa and bring him home from the office. I have a sister older and a brother younger than myself. We have a dog named Andy and a dog. There is a river back of our house, and we go rowing on it.

FRANKIE E. M.

THE WONDERFUL APPLE-TREE.

There was once a little girl named May. She was of a quiet disposition, perhaps because she was left much alone, being an only child, and having few playmates living near her. One evening her father told her a story about a horse that lived only at night, and he could fly over the earth, and every tree was a nice little home for a fairy. The strange thing about this horse was that he had wings. Wherever anybody wanted him he could fly to them, and he would come in and give the beautiful creature would spread his wings, and come and take him wherever he wished to go. But it was not everybody who could have him, and only to those who had pure and lofty thoughts would he come. In her little room May often thought about this wonderful horse.

"Oh, if only I could have seen him!" she would think, as she lay in bed one evening. "I wish a horse would be too big for me. I want a dear little pony. It must be perfectly white, with two ganzy wings, so fine that when folded on his back no one can tell them, but when spread out, and with all the colors of the rainbow. His eyes will be so bright that he can see things far, far away. I shall call him Pegasus, because he is a little horse, and people call a little brook a brooklet, and a little river a rivulet."

May thought so often about this pony that at last she began to fancy the kind of journeys he would take, and she could see his wings he would fly way up in the blue sky until the earth would look dark and brown beneath. Her father laughed when she told him about her little pony.

"You have been up in the clouds, have you?" he said. "Pegasus often took his riders there."

One day May went out into the orchard, and sat down under an apple-tree when the sun was setting, and cast a ray of light all about her, and especially, it seemed to May, on the apples, making them look almost golden.

"I wonder," thought she, "if there ever were real golden apples."

Hardly had the fancy passed through her mind when she heard the flapping of wings, and beheld her dear little Pegasus close beside her.

"I want to see the place where all the apples come from," he said.

So away they flew, over the fields and the cities and the rivers. Pegasus did not fly forward, but he flew in a circle, and the apples came. He answered, "I am taking you into the region of Long-ago, and so, of course, late to go far, far back."

At last they came to an island. In the centre stood an apple-tree. As May came nearer she could see it was loaded with apples—golden apples, rosy apples, and green apples.

"I want to see the place where all the different kinds of apples that have ever existed have come."

May naturally picked a golden one first. On it was printed in black letters, "Miss V." She cut it open, and a cloud surrounded her. When it had cleared away she found herself on a green hill with three little girls and a boy. A city could be seen in the distance. The children did not notice her, but seemed to be quarrelling among themselves about a golden apple the boy held in his hand.

"The one with the dark hair," said Pegasus, "is Miss Joan Raven-tress of the Peacock plume. See how her dress is embroidered with peacock feathers; she is a haughty, proud girl. Now that light-haired one is her friend, and her true name is Miss Venus Rose-tilt of the Golden belt. The third is somewhat of a tomboy, as you see she dresses in a full suit of mail; but, like all girls, she is fond of pets, and she has a cat without that owl. Her name is Miss Minerva; and though not so pretty as her companions, she knows more than all the rest. That boy is Paris, the shepherd who once loved her. He is to give the apple to the one he thinks the prettiest."

The boy at that moment handed the apple to Miss Venus. Miss Joan looked very angry, and so did Miss Minerva. Then words ran high, and blows fell fast, until at last the apple rolled down the hill, and the whole scene vanished.

May could not keep her eyes off the golden apples, and hastened to pick a large red one. She let it drop very quickly, however, when a snake dashed at her, fierce head out of the branches.

"That apple has cost a world of trouble," said

BRANDYVILLE, MISSOURI, NEW JERSEY.

I am nine years old to-day. I got a pencil, a book, a check, a game of rescent, and a bottle of perfume. I have got a little baby brother seven months old, and a big brother ten years old. My big brother is the one that is picked up coming from school, this as a rail when he first got her, but now she is fat. She is two years old, and a great big cat, too. We fed her on milk at first, but now we feed her on meat. When my brother first found her she did not have any teeth—that's the reason we fed her on milk; but now she has teeth, and that's the reason we feed her on meat and milk. Good-by, Papa.

I don't know whether or not my small correspondent took very great pains, but there was not one word misspelled in this nice little letter, which is very good indeed from a person who had just reached the age of nine. It is a very good idea, by-the-way, to celebrate your birthday by writing to the Post-office Box.

MADISON, WISCONSIN.

I am ten years old, and will soon be eleven. I have two sisters—one nine, and the other eighteen. I have no pets. I had a bird and a cat, and they both are dead now. Papa has taken YOUR PEOPLE for us since Thanksgiving. "Raising the Pearl" and "In Honor Bound" are very good stories, but I think Jimmy Brown's are the funniest. I go to school, but it is vacation now. I take music lessons. We are going camping out next week. Your little friend,
JENNIE P.

"My bird is dead," said Nancy Ray—

"My bird is dead; I can not play."

He sang so sweetly every day

His sings no more; I can not play."

Did you ever hear that, Jennie? Did you feel so when your birdie died?

GALVESTON, TEXAS.

A little over a week ago I was in Austin on a visit to my aunt. I like Austin very much, and I visited very much to go across the river, but the bridge was broken, and the ferry was being repaired. I wish George R. Jim, had been there with his Peacock to row me across. The Bench Hotel here is finished, and there are a great many people in it. Yesterday we went to see a lady who boarded there, and I found out that it was not only pretty, but it was out in the inside too. The barbing here is delightful. I could write a much longer letter with pleasure, but I don't think it would be published, and I am afraid it is too long now, but I hope it is not.

ETHEL T. S.

DETROIT HOUSE, FAWCETT, NEW YORK.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I WAS GLAD TO SEE my letter published, and I was all more pleased to see the letter in the Post-office Box of May 8. It was very kind of the writer to remember me so long. I remember a gentleman on the Behemoth who spoke to me sometimes. I think he was Mr. McCormick. I should like very much to know if I am right. I was very much interested in the story he told in the letter. Is he the gentleman who writes such interesting stories for YOUR PEOPLE? I wanted to write you before, but I

Pegasette, "and is best left alone, though the rarest one here, for it is the first apple, and the one from which all the others have come."

"Now," turned her attention to an insignificant green apple.

"Now that," said Pegasette, "is really about the most wonderful apple here. A man once saw it fall from a tree. 'Why does it fall?' he said to himself: 'why don't things go up instead of down?' So he thought and thought, and learned so much that he was able to tell people ever so much about the earth, even the stars, and that came from the fall of that apple; so, you see, his name 'Newton,' printed on it."

Pegasette then told her she could take a little basket to her father. Then she took her basket back under her own apple-tree. The supper-bell rang as they reached it so during the meal she told her father about the trip, and gave him the apple. He opened it, and what do you suppose was inside—why, a picture of little May herself! He laughed when he saw it, and said, "So your fancy tells you you are the apple of my eye."

Then May knew that he knew what Pegasette was.

We have rarely printed a story from a young writer with which we have been so charmed as this.

NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—Here are some verses by a little girl in her sixth year:

LITTLE GOLDEN-HAIR.

A little girl that was so fair,
With blue eyes and golden hair,
With her pet sheep she stood there,
And sang a pretty song
All the day long.

Oh, mother dear, oh, do come here!
Your little "Blue-eyes" is in fear;
For she was walking in the wood,
All alone in the moonlight,
All through the long night,
Longing for the daylight.

She saw the fairies dancing so gay,
And wished she could dance with them all day,
But when the morn began to break,
And the birds began to wake,
Then the fairies were all gone,
And she was left all alone and cry.

And wiped the tear out of her eye,
And said, "O fairies, come and dance some other night."

With little golden hair in the moonlight!"
Then she went home to her mother,
And told all about it to her little brother.

GRANDPA'S PET.

A little girl with curly hair,
Sitting in her grandfather's chair—
Oh, it is a pretty sight
To see that cunning little mite
Sitting in that great big chair!

When he wanted it she ran with glee
To fetch the old man's cup of tea,
And sipped with him out of his cup,
Until she had sipped it nearly all up.

J. W. K.

WASHINGTON, GEORGIA.

I have two pet partridges. They are very tame, and will exit out of your hand. They were hatched in an incubator, and were brought up without any mother. We also have chickens and turkeys, brought up the same way. I send some balloon fancies in my letter.

JENNIE A.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have written before, but my letter was not printed, so I thought I would write again. As my mamma and little brother are in the country, I have a long letter. My sister takes Fanny's Companion, and I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I like "Raising the Pearl" and "Jimmy Brown's" stories. I went to Coney Island, and saw two very large snakes, and had a lovely time, and came home on the iron steamboat.

I have a stamp album, but it is not full of stamps yet, as I have had it but a short time. I am going to try again. The highest class before vacation, and will have to study very hard next fall when I return. Will the Postmistress please give me some information about the Wiggles, as I do not understand what they mean.

ESTELLA H.

In the Post-office Box No. 185, May 15, you will find a full explanation of the Wiggles.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS—I HAVE WRITTEN TWO LETTERS TO THIS PAPER, BUT NEITHER WAS PRINTED, SO I AM GOING TO TRY AGAIN. WE WENT DOWN TO LONG BEACH AND PAPA, MAMMA, AND MYSELF WENT IN BATHING, AND IT WAS GREAT FUN. I EXPECT TO HAVE A CAUARY-BIRD. I LIKE THE STORIES IN YOUNG PEOPLE, ESPECIALLY "THE BEAR," "TOBY TYLER," AND "MR. STUBBS'S BROTHER." I HAVE FOUR DOLLS, I SENT FOR THE NAUTILUS PATTERN FOR MY DOLL, AND THINK IT IS VERY PRETTY. I MADE IT UP FOR WINNIE OF GRAY TRIMMED WITH BLUE. MAMMA AND I THINK that the pet Davy T. spoke of was a woodchuck. Now I must stop, for we are going down to Brighton Beach.

ROSE M. B.

Winnie no doubt looks perfectly lovely in her new dress.

LANSING, MICHIGAN.

I wrote a letter to you once before, but it was not published. Fanny has a bird that we caught, and I have one that was a birthday present. I will tell you how we caught it. Fanny's bird, one night papa's chair was out on the step, when a bird came and lighted on it. Mamma was opening the window to let it in, when it hopped away. My bird's cage was hanging out-doors, and the bird got in it and tried to get in; so mamma took the cage in the house, and let the bird in. My bird does not sing yet. Fanny is making a quilt, and so am I. We have a kitty named Blackie, because she is so black, and a dog named Rover. I am ten years old.

EDITH A. V. C.

SHARON SPRINGS, NEW YORK.

I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE for two years, and enjoy it very much. I am a little boy ten years of age. I am spending the summer at my grandpa's in Sharon Springs. I live in Brooklyn. I like the stories very much. I think the story of "Pearl" is very nice, and Jimmy Brown's stories are very funny. All the other little girls and boys write about their pets; I have none except a goat, which I am training to drive.

LOTTIE N. M.

BRATTLEBORO, VERMONT.

I want to report my success with preserves. I put up some jam, and washed them nicely, then weighed three pounds of granulated sugar, added a little water, and put it on in the preserve kettle, let it melt, and then put in the jam, and let them boil for about ten minutes; then took them off and put them in the self-sealing preserve jars. I made two jars of preserves and a nice bowl of jelly. The jelly is so thick and nice, and I like it very much. It is so good, and it tasted good, she says. I wish some other boys would report their success with cooking.

F. C. S.

I am glad that I have one boy who is in earnest about learning to cook, and I hope there will be others to imitate him before long.

Question in your letter will be answered by mail as soon as I can obtain the information you ask for.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA.

I have no pets, as I live in the city and have no place to keep them. I can draw a little. I am going to learn descriptive art. Like the stories "Raising the Pearl" and "In Honor Bound." I am eleven years old; my birthday is the 22d of September. I will close now, as my little sister wishes to write a few lines in my letter.

W. M.

This is my first letter to any paper. I enjoy your paper very much, and we all wait anxiously for the postman to bring it to us. With my best regards,

F. M.

ADIRONDACKS, NEW YORK.

I live in Montclair, New Jersey, but when summer comes I go to the Adirondack Mountains. The Hudson River runs but a short distance from the house. There is no one here but our family and the people who keep the house. I have a little sister that is just a little over two months old, and two brothers, whose names are Augus and Langdon. Langdon calls Austin "Ans," and Austin calls Langdon "Lang." I hope my letter will be printed.

HELENE E.

JONES'S PASS, FLORIDA.

I see there is one Florida boy who writes to the Post-office Box, and as he lives inland, I thought perhaps you would like to hear from one who lives on the coast. I wish some Northern boys would write to me through your paper, and tell me about things up his way, and in return I will tell him something about this far-away country in which our mountains are made of marble, and run down here which I would like to tell you about. There is an eagle that builds its nest every year in an old pine tree near our house. Our waters are full of alligators, sharks, and all kinds of strange fish. I would like to send you a saw-fish and some alligators' teeth.

SAMUDY A.

What is the name of the Northern boy who will send the first reply to Sammy's letter?

MACONESTER, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

I thought I would tell you how to make a hammock. First, bring an old four barrel from your cellar or store-room, knock it to pieces, and chop them up, and put them in a pile. Then chop four times the length, each place, where it is to be suspended, and in size a little larger than a clothes-line. Now halve the rope, double each end in the middle, and, by counting two ends, cut so from the end, weave it over and under each stay about three inches from the end of each one, which will bring the rope crossed between each; do both sides the same, and your hammock is complete. At first this may not seem firm, but when there is a heavy weight on it the rope becomes "taut," as the sailors say, and there will be no openings.

MRS. T. P.

NEWBERA, NORTH CAROLINA.

I am a little boy nine years old. I go to school, and study arithmetic, spelling, reading, and geography. I have no pets. I had a little kitten, but a boy hit it, and made it bite fits, and we gave it away to a colored man. Please publish this letter, for it is the first one I have written to any paper. I wrote it, and our mamma to copy it for me, as I did not think my writing good enough.

GOOD-BYE.
D. D. W.

Here is a pretty game for you to try:

THE SHEPHERDESS AND THE WOLF.

Arrange yourselves in a long line, each holding the dress of the neighbor in front. The person at the head of the line is the Shepherdess. Her little followers are the Lambs. One player stands apart, and is called the Wolf. She prowls stealthily around the flock, and the Shepherdess calls out, "Who goes round the flock this dark night?"

The other replies, "I am a Wolf."

The Shepherdess says, "Please, oh, please do not hurt my lambs."

The Wolf says, "I wish only one, and I mean to have this little lamb."

The Wolf then jumps at the last player in the line. The Shepherdess springs round to save her, followed by all the lambs, and tries to jump on one side, but really tries to catch a lamb. If she does catch one, the Shepherdess pays a forfeit. If the lamb can slip from her hold, she must run and put herself before the Shepherdess, when she, in her turn, becomes Shepherdess.

The Wolf then pays a forfeit, and loses her place, giving it up to the last lamb in the line, and taking its place at the end of the file.

PAUL A. K.: I am very sorry your exchange turned out such a disappointment, but I fear you did not attend to the notice always printed at the head of the Exchange column. A SHORT CRUISE.

A NEW KIND OF BEAN-SHOOTER.

BY A. W. ROBERTS.

A WELL-MADE bean-shooter will send a bean or a pea a great distance, and with practice precise accuracy of aim may be attained. The latest and most approved style of bean-shooter now in use among the boys of New York is the one shown in the illustration.

The first thing necessary is to secure a forked stick of the right size (A). The length of the stick from the end of the prongs to the handle is five inches. To the prongs are fastened with black thread the elastics, B B; these may be made of the halves of an elastic band half an inch wide and five inches in length. Sew the ends of these elastics to the ends of the bean-holder, C. This consists of a strip of thin and soft leather, or a piece of felting cut from a discarded soft felt hat.

In using the shooter the bean is placed in the centre of the bean-holder, C (which is so shaped that it is widest at this point), and is held in position between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand. The handle, A, is firmly grasped in the right hand, and the elastics are distended between the tines of the fork outwardly from the left hand to their fullest extent. On releasing the holder the bean is shot forth with great force and rapidity.

There is, of course, danger in the careless use of the bean-shooter, as in the case of bows and arrows and guns. There are cases on record of boys whose eyes have been put out by the careless use of the bean-shooter. But boys are not always the thoughtless creatures some people imagine them to be. If so, how would they ever learn the use of fire-arms and of the many other things that are handled by them at times which are perilous when improperly used? Sooner or later they must learn to be careful with dangerous weapons. If they begin by using a bean-shooter with care, the habit will help them when the time comes to learn the use of fire-arms, etc. The bean-shooter is an amusing plaything if properly used, and we do not think that any readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE will be so wanting in this quality as to use it recklessly, thereby making it unsafe or harmful to others.

AN ADVENTURE WITH A LIONESS.

A PORTION of the crew of a ship which was anchored off the coast of India once went ashore for the purpose of cutting some wood, and one of the sailors, having through some cause become separated from his companions, was considerably frightened by the appearance of a huge lioness which he saw approaching him. Much to his surprise, however, she did not on coming up appear to have any evil designs on him, but instead crouched at his feet, and looked steadfastly first at his face and then at a tree some little distance away.

For a time the man could not understand this conduct; but presently, on the lioness rising and walking toward the tree, looking back at him as she went, he found out what it meant. Up in the branches of a tree was a large baboon with two little lion cubs in its arms, and it was because of this that the lioness was in such trouble. The difficulty now presented itself of how to save the cubs, for the sailor was afraid to climb the tree. So, having his axe with him, he resolved to cut down the tree; and this he did, the lioness watching him most anxiously during the whole time.

When the tree fell, and the three animals with it, the lioness, it is said, dashed with fury upon the baboon and destroyed it; then, having gently caressed her cubs for some time, she returned to the sailor, showed her gratitude by fawning upon him and rubbing her head fondly against him, and at length carried away her offspring, one by one.

“DICK AND D.”

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

Author of “Mildred’s Bargain,” “Nan,” etc.

CHAPTER III.
 “MASTER DICK.”

DICK DEVINE arrived at Dr. Field’s house in very good time. There was to be a large dinner party, and on such occasions the mind of Brooks was apt to be what Jenima, the cook, called “lifted.” He was very pompous at all times, but when any fine company was expected he needed to relieve himself by ordering everybody about, and leaving all trifles for others to attend to: so Dick’s quick services came in very well.

As he went down the kitchen hall he could hear Mr. Brooks’s voice in unusually important tones, the cook’s in evident remonstrance, and in the midst of it a boy’s gay tones and laughter.

"Well, indeed, then, Master Dick, you must go upstairs. This is no place just now for a young gentleman to be."

These words from Jemima caught Dick's ear, and stopped him in the doorway.

The usual bustle of preparation was going on, Brooks was declaring that "he never saw anything like the way his things disappeared in that kitchen," while Jemima had turned a heated face from the fire as she spoke.

Sitting on the kitchen table, dangling his legs, and eating a huge piece of cake, was a boy of about Dick's own age. But there all resemblance ended, for whereas my little hero was a slim, dark-eyed lad, with something indicative of not overstrong health in his face, the other was a broad-shouldered, rosy fellow, with tight rings of yellow hair, laughing blue eyes, and a handsome if freckled countenance. He was dressed in the uniform of a military school, and decorated with some society badge.

"Now will you, Master Dick?" Jemima said again, imploringly.

"Will I?" said the boy, in her tone. "No, I won't; I mean to stay and see what there's going to be for dinner, so I can tell Brooks what Barbara and I want to have upstairs. And we want it hot, do you hear, Brooks, my boy?"

Mr. Brooks gave a sigh at this, and Master Dick, wheeling around, caught sight of his namesake, who was standing in the doorway, struck with a sudden admiration for the gay young gentleman on the table.

"Halloa!" said Master Dick, staring at him. "Who's this?"

"Oh!" exclaimed Brooks, with an air of relief. "Here!—it's young Devine. Now sharp, my boy—you make your way quick around to Bell's, and get me a bottle of salad oil. Do you hear? Good and fresh."

Dick—our Dick—was accustomed to Brooks's sharp, quick orders, and lost no time in hastening toward the door, although he would have liked very well to stay and listen to Master Dick's jolly voice and way of talking to the servants. But he was not prepared for what happened. He was hardly around the corner before a voice called out behind him,

"I say!—stop!—I'm coming," and looking around he saw the other Dick hurrying after him.

Boys, I am sure, have an instinctive drawing toward each other which makes it hard for them to realize or even think of class distinctions. Dr. Field's grandson, Richard Dearing, had not the slightest hesitation in seeking Dick Devine's acquaintance, and when the first sense of shyness had passed away, Dick Devine himself felt quite at home with the other. As they walked along, young Dearing, with his hands in his pockets, did most of the talking.

"Are you a new servant?" he began. "You see, I'm just home for a few days from school. Ha! ha! it was a good thing. You see, Packer—he's a new boy—got the mumps, and for a while he didn't let on, so that he could give it to the other boys, and have the fun of seeing a whole lot of 'em with their faces swelled up. But the first thing he knew he'd given it to Filiper—he's one of the teachers—and I wish you could have seen him! Then Packer had to get the measles, and there was a precious row, and we broke up for a few days. Packer's mumps ain't gone, and he says he's going to spread it all he can."

Dick Devine laughed, and the other said, after a minute, "It's rather hard, though, I must say, and poor old Filiper does look such a guy. So you come to help—odd jobs—do you? Where do you live?"

Dick gave the address.

"All alone? My! but that must be fun!"

"There's Norry, my little brother," said Dick, quickly. "Only he's blind."

"Blind! But can't he be cured?"

"Oh, please," exclaimed the other boy—"please don't tell of it. I've a particular reason."

"All right," Dick Dearing said, after a moment's shrewd study of his companion's face. "But I say, if I went blind I tell you I'd make a jolly time of it if they didn't cure me. Blind! that must be awful."

And there was something so genuine in the boy's voice and manner that Dick Devine, under the influence of it, ventured to tell his companion something more of his own story—just enough to be a relief to his own mind, although not enough to make Dearing too inquisitive.

"I'll tell you what," the latter said, finally—"I'll come down and see you. I ain't afraid, and we'll have some fun out of the old apple woman. We'll buy up her whole stall just to see her stare. Would you mind if I brought another fellow?"

"Oh, but, Master Dick," Devine said, earnestly, though he looked as if he would have gladly welcomed the bright-faced boy beside him to his attic, "I don't think Dr. Field would like it. I should, and—my stars!—how glad Norry would be! But I'm afraid—"

"Oh, hold up," interrupted the other boy. "You let me alone. Grandfather never cares as long as I don't do wrong."

It was certainly a pleasant prospect, though Dick felt all the objections to it, which so occupied his mind that he with difficulty attended to Mr. Brooks's orders, and very narrowly escaped a sharp box on the ear two or three times.

When the boys had returned to the house Dick Dearing disappeared upstairs, and the other went to the pantry, where Mr. Brooks was preparing the salad, while in the dining-room beyond Dick beheld what seemed like a scene from fairy-land. The long table, with its crystal and flowers on a rich lace and damask cloth, looked to Dick's eyes prepared for a banquet for a king, and he sighed as he wondered how rich people could live through the joys and luxuries of existence.

The party was given for Dr. Field's widowed daughter, Mrs. Thomason, who had just returned from a short trip in Europe, and when the company were all assembled in the dining-room he caught a glimpse of her at the head of the table—a tall, prim-looking lady in a rich dark silk, with jewels and soft lace; but how unlike what Dick would have supposed a rich, happy lady would look.

Not far away a young girl was seated, who looked very different. She was not exactly pretty, and yet something in her face warmed Dick's heart as he looked at it. The dark eyes were so bright and kind, the lips parted with such an honest sweet smile as she spoke to her neighbors. She was very simply dressed—a white silk, with some roses in her belt, and a little band of pearls about her throat. Ah! thought Dick, that's one of the rich and happy ones; and he would have liked to watch her longer, but at this moment he heard his name called, in a sort of whisper, and looking into the hall, beheld the other Dick in peril of breaking his neck over the balusters.

"I say," he whispered down, "tell old Brooks we want our dinner. What does he mean by keeping us? It's to be sent up to the school-room at once."

And in a few moments Dick, under the weight of a heavy tray, was going upstairs to the school-room.

CHAPTER IV.

THE SCHOOL-ROOM PARTY.

DICK DEVINE had never seen any young person at Dr. Field's house except little Barbara, his granddaughter, and so, on being admitted to the school-room, he was rather surprised to find three children sitting about the table—Master Dick, Barbara, and a tall boy who looked so like Mrs. Thomason that he was not surprised to hear he was her son.

"Here, Devine—that's your name, isn't it?" said the other Dick—"do bring that dinner in; we're famished."

Dick contrived to put his tray down carefully, even while he answered Barbara Dearing's gentle greeting.

The boy had described the child's looks very naturally in saying she was like an angel, for her type was of that exquisite fairness which in a slim, fair-haired little girl is so spiritually lovely. Her hair fell unbound in rippling waves of pale gold to her waist, her gray eyes were soft and very gentle, and her face had a look always of half-wistful earnestness in it, as though she would like to say something very kind and gentle.

"Devine," as young Dearing called him, saw at once that the eyes of young Master Thomason were cast rather contemptuously upon him, and he felt himself turn very red as he set out the dishes on the school table. Indeed, the young gentleman was engaged in thumping his cousin Dick rather heavily under the table, trying at the same time to catch his eye and wink at one of Dick Devine's awkward movements. Dick Dearing understood it perfectly, and, after saying, "I say, Tom, leave off, will you? Do you think a fellow's shins are made of cast iron, or that your feet are made of paper?" he rose suddenly, adding, "Here, Devine, I want to show you a book of mine," and made a dash over to a cupboard, to which he beckoned Dick, while Thomason began to look very sulky.

Dearing fumbled over his book-shelf, finally producing a well-worn volume of Robinson Crusoe, which he pressed upon Dick, whispering, "For Norry."

Dick could only look his gratitude; but, untutored boy that he was, his instincts told him just why Dearing had done this, and he said to himself, "He is what I should call a gentleman," and the boy would like to have added, "and a friend."

Marie, Barbara's French nurse, was busy waiting on the other two children when Dick came back to his place. Before he left the cupboard he had whispered to Devine, "I shall be down to see you to-morrow, sure pop, about three o'clock."

And our Dick by this time felt the other boy to be such a superior person that it did not occur to him to question whether he would even need permission from Dr. Field.

Little Barbara seemed highly entertained by the school-boy wit of the two boys, and laughed at all their jokes, so that it led Will Thomason on to rather too brilliant a display of his powers. He instructed her in the fine art of putting a lump of bread on the back of her hand and then by striking her fingers "flying" it into her mouth. He ate like the Chinese, pretending he had chopsticks, and produced hideous sounds with a wet finger around the rim of his glass. Barbara laughed till the tears stood in her eyes, and Dick Devine, who was sent back and forth for various viands, was on a broad grin such as his face had not known in months, while Dearing wound up the performances by making a face in an orange, and balancing it above a napkin in a tumbler.

How long this kind of fun might have continued it is hard to say, but suddenly the door opened, and the young lady in the white silk gown and roses came quickly into the room. Although the laughter ceased, Dick Devine saw that she was very welcome. Barbara sprang up, clapping her hands.

"Oh, Cousin Maud, how lovely! Are we to go down to the parlor?"

"Yes, dear," Miss Field said, in a bright, sweet voice. Then her eyes fell on Dick Devine, who was standing over near the wall, taking in with eyes and ears all this bright family picture.

"Is that—" she was beginning, when Dearing said quickly:

"Oh, Cousin Maud, that's Dick Devine, who comes in sometimes to help Brooks or to do errands; he's gone for grandpa even."

The young lady smiled kindly. "That is very nice," she said with a pretty nod of her head as she stood smoothing down Barbara's frock and the blue sash at her waist.

In a few moments they had all gone gayly down-stairs.

Dick began piling up the dishes, and something very heavy seemed to have come upon his heart. It was not that he had any memories to be stirred by the happy, luxurious scene he had witnessed, but in all young hearts there must be an instinct for home ties, home faces and voices, the something which we feel makes a warm circle if we but stretch out a hand on either side, and will poor Dick be blamed if he thought of his cold attic at home with poor blind Norry, half sick and hungry, waiting for his return?

"There's only us two," he thought, with a lump in his throat, "and none of this ever for us!" And then something brighter came to his mind. This was the first time he had ever done more than help Brooks in the pantry or go of errands. Might it not be the beginning of something like a warm life, with plenty to eat and wear? But no, thought the boy, as he went down the back stairs with his tray. They might take Norry and put him into an institution.

"And there's only him and me," he went on, mournfully. But was it not something that there were the two? and would not "mother" be glad, even up in heaven, to know that they were together, and that Dick had kept the little boy all to himself?

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

ADVICE TO BOYS.

BY H. C. VAN GIESEN, M.D.

ON TAKING EXERCISE.

BOYS who take a great interest and an active part in out-door sports often bring needless illness upon themselves by overexertion and want of proper care after violent exercise. Attacks of pneumonia or inflammation of the lungs frequently occur from getting very warm and then cooling off too suddenly.

When about to engage in a game of ball or any sport that requires continued activity, it is best to lay aside the outer garment, and put it on again when the game is finished; and instead of sitting down to "cool off," it is safer to walk around for a while. It is also dangerous to drink large quantities of cold water when very warm, as the system receives a shock which may lead to sickness.

To go in swimming after a long walk through the hot sun is also injurious, as the blood is driven to the internal organs from the surface of the body, and produces congestion, and cramps are also liable to occur, which in many cases have been the cause of death by drowning. It is always safer to wait until the body has cooled before plunging into the water, which is generally of a lower temperature than the body.

Violent exercise taken occasionally will not develop the strength as well as a regular amount continued every day. If a boy wishes to develop his muscles, let him play ball or row a certain time every favorable day. Let him cease at the moment a sense of weariness or disinclination seizes him. The next day he will be able to stand a little more exertion, and so by degrees he will attain to a certain standard, and have a reserve force of strength that will be the foundation of continued good health in the future. It is necessary that the growing body should have exercise. Air and sunlight are necessary to growth, and active out-door sports are the means by which their benefits can be obtained.

Soon the summer vacation will give place to the restraints of school. Let boys have all the out-door exercise they can. Ball-playing, rowing, horseback-riding, swimming, all are prime factors in muscular development, and with care and judgment in their proper use will tend to stronger and healthier growth.

The world needs strong men as well as wise ones, and indeed the mind will develop more rapidly in a sound body than in a sickly one. It is a grand thing to be able to stand hardship and privation in the search for truth and knowledge, and any man with good physical strength is equal to the task of combating the world if with it he has the stimulus of a strong will. Let boys then seek to build up in their growing days a sound constitution, and life will be more than doubled in value to them.

THE LAND OF NOWHERE.

A Song for Boys and Girls who are always discontented.

BY ELLA WHEELER.

Do you know where the summer blooms all the year round,
Where there never is rain on a picnic day,
Where the thornless rose in its beauty grows,
And little boys never are called from play?
Oh! hey! it is far away,
In the wonderful land of Nowhere.

Would you like to live where nobody scolds,
Where you never are told, "It is time for bed,"
Where a supper of cakes is not followed by aches,
Where snarls never pull when they comb your head?
Then oh! hey! you must lie away,
To the wonderful land of Nowhere.

If you long to dwell where you never need wait,
Where no one is punished or made to cry,
Where a supper of cakes is not followed by aches,
And little folks thrive on a diet of pie?
Then ho! hey! you must go, I say,
To the wonderful land of Nowhere.

You must drift down the river of Idle Dreams,
Close to the border of No-man's Land;
For a year and a day you must sail away,
And then you will come to an unknown strand.
And ho! hey! if you get there—stay
In the wonderful land of Nowhere.

THIMBLE'S LAST HUNT.

BY MARIA LOUISE POOL.

"PERMIT me."
"Allow me."

The voices that spoke held laughter in their tones. The first speaker took off her Derby with a flourish, and stood with bare head beside Elsie Chapin, who had led her white pony from the stable near the Academy where she came every morning, being a day pupil of that somewhat celebrated school. She lived four miles away, and cantered back and forth, taking care of her steed herself. She had no riding skirt, and her little plain brown dress fluttered back in the wind as she looked at her companions, both of whom were gayly dressed, with flounces flying and ribbon ends streaming, their mannish collars tied by square bows.

Bright girls all of them; and is there anything brighter than girls of fifteen and sixteen are nowadays?

Elsie's wide red mouth and big eyes put on a look of scorn.

"As if either of you could put me on Thimble!" she said.

"Try us," cried Marion. "I can at least do as well as Bob Morris, who fell on his knees in the dust."

Then the three laughed ringingly, just from sheer youthful spirits.

Marion stepped forward and bent down with her two hands clasped tightly together.

"Give me happiness by making me your slave, O fairest of the fair!" she cried, with a solemn air.

Kate went to the pony's head and laid her hand on the weather-stained bridle. Elsie put her foot lightly on the clasped hands and sprang into the saddle.

"Somebody spread down a cloak, so that my pony's feet may not be soiled by that mud," she said, as she made sure that the hemp satchel of books was securely fastened to the pommel.

"Now you ask too much," replied Marion. "My hopes, my heart, my life, you may have, but not this lovely new plaid wrap," hugging the article closely about her.

"Adieu, then, until to-morrow," responded Elsie, gathering the reins more securely in her hand.

Thimble danced a little, which was his way of saying he was more than ready. His mistress shook the lines and he started, his "banged" fore-top flying backward, his snowy hogged mane standing up very thick and straight.

The two girls watching could not help envying Elsie the fleet Texas pony which she had ridden constantly for more than a year.

"You know we can't afford to have him," Elsie had said in confidence to Marion; "but father consented to buy him if I would really wear my old dresses and hats, so that Thimble could have the money for his food. I promised, and now if I get so shabby that you are ashamed of me, why, I shall have to bear it, that's all. But I wouldn't give up Thimble; he knows more than all of us put together."

"I believe it," Marion had said, standing with her arm over the pony's neck. "His eyes are not as bright as that for nothing. And as for being shabby, why, I'd rather wear blue gingham all the rest of my life and have such a love of a beastie!" and she kissed him on the end of his soft nose—a caress which he bore with calmness, evidently having his own opinion about the usefulness of girls in purveying him goodies.

Now as Elsie rode out of the yard the northeast wind came sweeping full in her face, bearing with it a fine storm. But what cared she? Her blue jacket was buttoned tightly across her chest, and her hat pulled firmly down over her forehead.

"You'll have it full upon you," called Kate.

And Marion put her hands to her mouth, and shouted, "Elsie, 'ware the marshes of Saugus."

The rider turned and waved her hand, and then the pony settled down into his quick lope, and in a moment Elsie and Thimble were out of sight, shut in on the long, straight road by the thick storm, which came on with that sudden sweep which characterizes one phase of a north-east storm on the New England coast. It did not rain; it was a thick mist, and smelled as salt as though the ocean were tossing up its spray just the other side of the road. It had been a sort of "dry storm" all day, and the ocean had been moaning loudly.

The two girls turned and strolled toward the large boarding-house which stood at the farther end of the academy yard. It was now almost dark, but there was going to be a moon.

A side door opened suddenly, and Miss Monroe, the principal, appeared.

"Elsie Chapin has not gone?" she asked, quickly.

"Yes, a few moments ago."

"I am sorry. I intended to ask her to stay here overnight. The storm is coming on furiously. It was only yesterday I spoke to her mother, telling her not to be anxious when it was very bad weather, for I should keep Elsie. It is too late in the fall for her to go so far when it is not pleasant."

The kind face looked so worried that Marion said, with the earnestness of conviction, "Miss Monroe, the pony will take her home safely; he will get there in less than half an hour; you've no idea how fast he can go."

Out in the increasing storm Elsie was sitting her pony with her head bent down, and her left hand holding the bridle loosely. Thimble's small feet clattered swiftly over the stony road, and every time he felt the bridle shaken on his neck he dashed forward still faster, the darkness thickening all the time.

Their way lay along a wide stretch of salt marsh, and the road was only a few feet above the level of the low field which stretched out for hundreds of acres. In such a storm one might wander here for days even and not find his way, nor see a sight save the fog, nor hear a sound save the swash of the sea far down at the shore, and the cry of wild birds who were hurrying to their Southern homes.

Far ahead—or it looked far in the dark mist—Elsie suddenly saw the gleam of a light; it shone palely in the watery atmosphere. It seemed to be on the road, and the girl rapidly approached it, pulling up her pony a few minutes later as she saw it was a market wagon which went by her home twice a week. The man was walking by his horse, and swinging a lantern as he went.

"Hullo!" he cried, spying the white animal, "Be you 'Liab Chapin's darter?"

"Yes, sir."

"I was about sure of it from the pony. I never calculated to see you, but there's a mighty row down to your house."

"What?" said Elsie, sharply, her mind going instantly to her mother, whom she loved with all the faith and affection of a loyal, upright nature, and who had been an invalid so much of the time that Elsie always felt a kind of care for her.

"Yes," went on the man, with that curious satisfaction in telling unpleasant news that is so marked in some people. "You see, Miss Chapin she was sent for 'bout nine o'clock this mornin' to go to Bill Karter's on the marsh end 'cause his child was sick. The child died, so they tell me, and Miss Chapin— Yer own mother, ain't it?"

"Yes! yes!" said Elsie, breathlessly.

"Wa'al, she started about two o'clock to come home, and she ain't got there yit. Yer father he happened to see some one that knew she started, and now there's a parcel of men gone out to find her. They think she's got bewildered in the fog, ye see."

Elsie's voice was high and strange as she asked:

"How long ago?—did they start, I mean?"

"Goin' on two hours."

"Did they take the dog with them?"

"Don't know; guess not; I didn't see no dog."

Elsie's mind ran riot for a moment without her having the least control of it. She turned Thimble so that the cart passed on; but instead of allowing the pony to go on, she checked him, and he stood impatiently shaking his handsome head, switching his square-cut tail, and putting back one ear, as if to ask what was the meaning of this.

The light the market-man carried was soon swallowed up in the darkness; and now Elsie, looking before her, knew that if her pony had not been white she could not have seen its head, so dense was the atmosphere that encircled her.

"BE YOU 'LIAB CHAPIN'S DARTER?"

Not for many seconds of time did the girl hesitate.

"There's small chance of finding her unless they went after the dog," she said. "I can find her with Max." She knew that Max had gone home with a cousin of hers who lived a mile beyond her own home; he frequently staid there for several days at a time.

"I can find her; I will find her!" she cried. "Go, Thimble—go as you never went before!"

The pony jumped forward, neighed shrilly, and then settled down. Elsie knew he could do his mile in four minutes well enough, and she had no uneasiness concerning the way, for Thimble could have gone blind-folded, and in fact he was utterly blinded by the darkness and the storm. But he did not flinch; he leaped through the darkness, the thud of his swift-hitting hoofs being the only sound in the noise of the wind. That motion had in its rapidity something inspiring and triumphant.

In a few minutes she saw, close by her, a light shine from what she believed to be her cousin's house. Almost at the same instant the gravel of the road was scattered by scratching feet, and then she heard the deep bay of welcome from Max's throat. Her pulses gave a bound, "Thank Heaven!" came unconsciously from her lips.

Here was her ally, and without her having to lose a moment in finding him.

"Come, Max," she called, and wheeled her horse.

She could not see him, but she heard him cantering along abreast of her as she rode, and the sound gave her courage. She must trust all to her pony and her dog, for no human instinct could guide her in such a time as this.

Leaning over from her saddle, she spoke to Max, who was nosing around among the stubble. Then she drew out the silk handkerchief from her pocket; it was her mother's; she had only taken it from her that morning.

The dog smelled of it.

"Find her," cried Elsie, and there was a pathetic entreaty in the command. Max sniffed again, then gave a quick bark, as if asking a question.

"She is lost—here on the marshes. Oh, Max, I shall die if we do not find her!"

The dog's instincts had been sharpened by training, and he would show now of what he was made. He started off. Elsie heard him rustling in the brown grass. She felt the pony quivering under her; he too was getting excited. Far away on his native Texan plains he had hunted many a day, and the baying of dogs and the crack of rifles were inspirations to him.

"Go!" said Elsie, not thinking of her own safety, remembering nothing but that her mother, who was so far from being strong, was on this desert, buffeted by this merciless storm, vainly trying to get on, as one in a nightmare struggles to find the right way.

Thimble leaped across the narrow ditch that separated the marsh from the road, and the next moment Elsie felt as if she were flying through unlighted space, the salt air cutting her face and thrashing her wet, unfastened hair about her.

She dared not think of her mother: she must banish from her mind every memory of that tenderness which made her mother so dear to her. Was it yesterday that she had sung with such a care-free heart,

"The blinding mist came down and hid the land?"

The words went like a knife. "Oh, mother! mother!" she moaned aloud.

Farther off Max barked, and Thimble made longer leaps, splashing in pools of salt-water, the sharp, stiff grass cutting his legs, his chest wet with his own foam and with the chilly water. But he did not slacken nor pant, bardy, long-breathed fellow that he was.

Was that the report of a gun, dulled, deadened by the daupness? The sound gave a new terror to Elsie; she did not think that it might be a signal. She knew that, earlier in the season, men prowled about for coots and geese, but why should they shoot at such a time as this? Such a shot might hit her mother; the girl never thought that it might hit herself as well.

Far off she now heard Max barking frantically.

"Thimble, go on!" she shouted, and the brave little animal needed not to be told a second time. He dashed on like a wild thing, straight over sedge and pool, and Elsie's breath came heavily, for in the wind that rushed by her face she still heard confusedly the sound of the dog's furious bark.

An exultant throb was now in Elsie's pulses. Already, in her mind, she had slipped from her seat and was holding her mother fast and close; a sob rose in her throat. Not yet must she give way to such imaginings; yet longer she needed her strength. Wild and high came the roar of the sea.

Was Thimble moving? Would he never get to where Max barked in such a victorious note?

Elsie rose in her stirrup, her fingers clinging round the pommel.

"Mother! mother!" she called, "are you there?"

"Is it you, Elsie?" responded a faint voice from out the mist, and there came the sound of some heart-felt thanks.

Trembling, and now at last panting, the pony made the little remaining distance between the daughter and mother.

Just as Elsie slipped from the saddle another shot sounded, and this time close to them—not the shot of a gun. A prick, as of a needle going through her flesh, Elsie felt in her side, but forgot it instantly. She did not notice that the pony swerved oddly to one side as she withdrew her foot from the stirrup. She was groping in the fog for the owner of the soft voice that now called her again.

"Dear Elsie! It is you who have found me!"

Now her mother's arms held her, and Elsie could bear the choking in her breath, knowing that the work she had set out to do was done.

In a moment she said, "I will put you on Thimble, and I will go by his head; the dog knows the way home even if the pony does not. If you are only not ill after this! if you do not have pneumonia again! Here is Thimble, noblest fellow in the world! He shall have sugar and apples all his life. You don't know what a darling he has been.—Oh!"

The last word was uttered with such horrified shrillness that Mrs. Chapin started and grasped her daughter's hand more closely.

But before she could speak Elsie had flung away from her, and was down in the mud by the side of a white shape that lay on the ground. She gathered the lovely head into her arms; she felt again the soft dark nose she had so often kissed. The pony's breath came distressfully; he was lying on his side. At that moment the fog was pierced by the rays of a lantern, and footsteps were heard among the sedge.

"Hullo, here! I say, I guess I've got you!" cried a man's voice. "Don't shoot any more or I'll use my own pistol!"

Elsie heard, but she did not care to look up from the head she held, and which she could now see by the light of the lantern.

Mrs. Chapin, without moving her eyes from her daughter, asked, "For whom are you looking?"

"That fellow accused of murder over there in Norley. Of course you've heard about him. We've tracked him all the afternoon, and got him to this horrid place. It was he that fired. I declare! Has he killed that little horse? Lucky he didn't hit anything else!"

The barking of Max had by this time given notice to others on the marsh who were looking with Mr. Chapin for his wife. In another moment two more men with lanterns had come, but Elsie neither saw nor heard them. She was sitting in a pool of water, the pony's head held fast, but gently, tenderly in her arms, while her gaze was watching the light go out in the brilliant eyes that looked up at her.

In the heaving, muddy side was an ugly bullet-hole which dripped blood.

It seemed to her that plainly the pony asked her to help him. Did he reproach her for the pain he was suffering? Did he tell her that he had done all, given all for her, and why did she not help him?

Elsie felt her heart bound tightly with steel bands. She could not breathe. She saw the spirited eyes glaze, but their blinding gaze was still on her face. A shudder went over the shapely white form. Then Elsie knew there was no sight any more in the eyes.

With a broken cry the girl bent her head down on the pony's neck. She did not know her mother's arm was over her shoulders. Presently stronger arms were put around her; her father had come, and he took her up.

Not until they had reached Bill Karter's—which was thought to be the nearest house—did they find there was blood on Elsie's dress—her own blood mingled with Thimble's—and then, on being asked, Elsie became conscious that her side was sore. She had been stooping over in such a way that the same bullet that had killed Thimble had given a flesh-wound to his mistress.

"Let it comfort you to know that you saved your mother's life," the doctor said to the girl, after he had dressed her wound, and she was lying on her own bed. "She could not possibly have borne a long exposure. You did well to take the dog with you."

"Your father says," said Marion to her, a few days later, as she sat by the big chair where Elsie was reclining—"your father says he is going to sell that Jersey cow, and get you another Texas pony from Mr. Nolan when he comes North with another lot in the spring."

"No! no!" cried Elsie, with energy. "I never want another pony. There was but one Thimble."

Her voice broke, her eyes filled. Marion bent over and touched her cheek gently, not saying anything.

DICK'S DEER PARK.

BY IRVING L. BEMAN.

ABOUT a mile from Dick Smith's home, at a lovely bend in the river, was a wide cove where the water was shallow and thickly grown with lilies for several rods from the shore. Along the bank was a belt of thicket, sprinkled here and there with larger trees. Through the thicket were numerous paths by which the deer came down to the water to eat the lily pads—a diet of which they are particularly fond.

Here Dick and his father sometimes went in the evening, in a boat with a torch blazing at the prow, to shoot a deer for their family meat. To make the spot still more attractive they had deposited a quantity of salt at one point, making what is called a "lick," a place to which deer often go, as they, like most animals of their kind, delight in licking anything salty. Sometimes the deer came here in the daytime, and more than once had Dick watched them as he floated in the canoe far over near the opposite shore of the river, and wished he had one of them where he could tame it and teach it to take salt and other things right from his hand. When children see any beautiful wild creature, be it bird or beast, they always wish to possess it, and keep it a prisoner in some cage or yard.

One warm September day Dick was watching a doe and her fawn at the salt-lick, when it seemed to him that perhaps if he should cover the bow of the canoe with green bushes, he might sit in the stern behind them and paddle right up to them. Paddling around the bend out of sight, he took the hatchet from the boat and quietly clipping off some leafy boughs, heaped them, as he had planned, for a screen. Then he paddled back, and turned the bow straight toward the lick. By peering intently through the not very dense pile of brush, he could see the deer still busy licking salt. Closer and closer he came, until, when within a few rods, he stopped paddling, and creeping forward to the bushes, took a long look at the game.

Talk about the cat or the fox! what is more sly and less noisy than a barefooted boy, when he tries? And what sight is more enchanting than a dapple-skinned fawn? Barefooted Dick looked his full at the beautiful little thing, until he began to think to himself: "Why can't I catch it? It's young and foolish, and if I paddle very softly, maybe I can get close up, and then jump out and grab it."

Fortunately there were no lily pads just at that place to give the boy trouble, and pretty soon the canoe touched shore, and Dick found himself within a dozen feet of his game. Gently he thrust the paddle down into the soft soil against the stern of the boat, and crept forward to the brush. He calculated that at two short bounds he could clear the boat and seize the fawn. Gathering his feet under him, he gave one spring over the brush, and then another, quick as a cat, and, sure enough, the delicate spotted baby deer was his captive. It struggled a little, gave one faint cry, more like a human child than the bleat of an animal, and then yielded as if its strength were all gone.

One swift, triumphant thought flashed through Dick's mind—"I've got it! I've got it!" The next instant he was knocked heels over head and half stunned, his hands let go their hold, and lo! he was a badly beaten boy.

This change in Dick's fortunes was due to the mother deer. Timid as are the wild deer of the woods, they are not altogether wanting in some of the bolder traits; a doe is a dangerous enemy sometimes in defense of her offspring.

As soon as she heard the outcry of her child she sprang to its rescue, and with her fore-feet taught Dick a lesson he has never forgotten. But he rallied in time to see the two run off together, and to note how the fawn was half entangled in a wild vine that crossed its pathway.

When the adventure was ended he rubbed his shoulder, which felt not a little bruised by the blow from the deer, and muttering to himself, "Well! well!" clambered into his canoe, tossed off the brush, and paddled slowly homeward. That night he lay awake a long time thinking over his adventure, how beautiful was the fawn, how near he came to success, and how suddenly he failed, and wishing more than ever that he had a tame deer. Before he slept a novel plan, suggested by the fawn's tripping over the vine, flashed on his mind, by which possibly he might accomplish his desire.

The next morning he obtained of his father two or three strong thongs of leather, and, going into the woods near by, gathered enough bark of the moose-wood, or leather-wood (Direa palustris), to make several more similar ropes. At one end of each of these he made a large slip-noose, so arranged that it could not draw quite tight. In the afternoon he paddled down to the cove again, and selecting the paths that seemed most frequented by the deer, he suspended in each a slip-noose, attaching the other end of the thong tightly to some strong branch or tree. The noose he distended on small twigs in such a manner that a deer in passing would be likely to walk right into it, and draw it up so as to become ensnared.

Dick hardly expected to succeed immediately, for deer have exceedingly sharp senses, and would probably smell his foot prints, and avoid for a while the passages where he had spread his snares; but he trusted that time would dispel the odor, and then his device might work.

However, the very next morning he could not refrain from returning to the place, though of course he found nothing. Day after day he paddled down to the cove, and passed along near enough to inspect the snares; but they remained as he had left them.

A week or more thus went by, when one morning he had an excitement. The first snare to which he came had been entered, but whatever the animal may have been, it had escaped. The second snare was undisturbed, and the next, and so on to the last one.

But here, lo! our little hero found a deer, a real deer, caught and alive. Ah, how the boy's heart leaped! He came more familiar with its happy master. Dick named it Lightfoot.

Within a few weeks two does were captured and added to what Dick began to call his "park of deer." Before the winter closed they became as tame as cosset lambs, eating out of Dick's hand, and thrusting their noses into his "round-about" pockets to discover any choice bits he might have brought them. When spring came they showed intense eagerness for the first greens from the woods. And later, when he plucked lily pads, and brought them fresh and wet to his pets, they almost seemed to thank him with their great lustrous eyes.

LIGHTFOOT AND HIS COMPANIONS

did not wait a minute to examine it, but made all haste to bring his father to secure the captive. Soon they returned in the canoe with whatever they might need to take the animal home alive, and after much struggle Dick had the long-wished-for gratification of a deer safely shut into the great log barn. His father showed him by the horns that the creature was two years old, and assured him that by careful management it would become tame during the winter.

The nearest neighbor was hired to assist him, and in a few days they had constructed a high stockade back of the barn, inclosing nearly an acre of ground, in the farther corner of which was a never-failing spring surrounded by a dense little grove. The stockade was built by digging a narrow ditch some two feet deep, and setting up endwise in it and close together straight poles about twelve feet long, and then filling in the earth at the bottom and tramping it down hard. The barn formed one side of the stockade, and when the yard was ready the back door was left open, and in an hour or two Dick had the satisfaction of seeing the deer walking about its new quarters. For many days it would not eat when anybody was in sight, but it contrived to live and grow, and steadily be-

The following June two fawns were added to the flock; and these never learned to be wild as their mothers had been, thus atoning to Dick for his overthrow at the cove.

This occurred many, many years ago; but "Dick's Deer Park" is still in existence, in Crawford County, near Meadville, Pennsylvania, and is now an inclosure of several acres, with an iron fence, a handsome hay barn, three or four fanciful open sheds, and a herd of forty or fifty deer. Their tameness shows the remarkable influence of long-continued domestication, it being as difficult to frighten them as if they were a drove of cows.

It is probable that quite a number of my boy readers live in a part of the country where young deer can be caught and tamed. Those that do, might, with a little trouble, follow Dick Smith's example, and build for themselves a deer park with these beautiful, gentle animals for friends and pets. How much better this would be than hunting and destroying them, as is done by so many boys who fancy themselves great huntsmen when they have only succeeded in killing some soft-eyed, timid fawn, which might have been trapped with little difficulty and converted into an interesting and affectionate playmate and pet.

PERIL AND PRIVATION.

ARCTIC TRAVEL.

I.

IN modern days it is thought to be no very great undertaking to spend a winter in the arctic regions; but in earlier times this was not so; every one shrank from the dreadful climate even in summer, and feared the terrors of the sunless land. It is true that in old times we did not possess all the advantages afforded by modern science to those who undertake arctic travel, but still it seems strange that the prospect of such an undertaking should have been regarded with such terror.

Certain Muscovy merchants, we read, actually obtained a pardon for some malefactors condemned to death, on condition that they should remain a year in Greenland, where "all necessaries of clothes and provisions were to be provided, and ample payment made for accomplishing the task." The terms were accepted, and the convicts embarked; "but on viewing the place of their banishment they rejected the offer; they preferred death to living there."

In 1630, however, the feat was accomplished, against the will of him who did it, under far less favorable conditions. Captain Goodler, of the Salutation, one of the vessels engaged in the whale-fishery, left the Foreland of Green Harbor, in order to take in twenty men who had been transferred to one of the other vessels. Finding himself near a part of the coast famous for the abundance of its venison, he sent eight men ashore in a boat to hunt. This was on the 15th of August. They carried with them a couple of dogs, a matchlock, two lances, and a tinder-box, and were so fortunate as to kill no less than fourteen deer that very day.

As they were extremely tired, they resolved to rest on shore that night, and return to their ship the next day. But the weather being hazy, and much ice arising between the sea and the land, the vessel was forced to stand out to sea, and they lost sight of her. "Under these circumstances they decided to hunt along the shore to Green Harbor, where she was to pick up the twenty men. They killed eight deer more, and, with their boat well laden with provisions, arrived at the place to find that the twenty men had been picked up already, and that their ship had departed."

The time for leaving Greenland being the 20th of August, they lost not a moment in pushing into Bell Sound, the place of general rendezvous, some fifty miles away. But though they threw their venison overboard, they made but slow progress, and "being without a compass, and uncertain of the navigation, they reached the place too late. The fleet, having a fair wind, had sailed away."

Their disappointment was very great, and the misery of being entirely deserted was increased by the conviction that they must winter in a cold, inhospitable, and desolate region, without anything wherewith to make themselves comfortable.

If they had been mere sailors taken at random, instead of picked men accustomed to hunting, all would have been over with them. As Dr. Rae, the arctic explorer, once pointed out to me, this is the real secret of life or death in these regions. In his own marvellous expedition he had the Hudson Bay Company's men with him, who do not waste powder.

These eight poor fellows, however, were not sensible of the advantage they possessed in this respect, or, at all events, it comforted them but little. They only remembered stories of desertion, and how nine of their fellow-countrymen had been abandoned at that very place and had come to a miserable end, their bodies having been found the next spring, "miserably disfigured by beasts of prey."

They took counsel, and resolved to winter at Bell Sound, where a hut had been built by the Dutch for the whalers. It was, however, eighty feet long and fifty broad, so that it was necessary to build a much smaller compartment within it for themselves. They were thus, it will be observed, well provided with fire-wood—an immense advantage in those regions.

Even provisions were not wanting, though at first fresh meat was so scarce that they confined themselves to one meal a day. On Wednesdays and Fridays they had only whale fritters—scraps of fat thrown away after the oil had been extracted. They mended their clothes, which were worn out, as well as they could with threads of rope-yarn and needles of whalebone.

On the 14th of October the sun sank to rise no more for months, and their spirits sank with it. Nevertheless "the moon was in view all this time both night and day, shining for the most part as it does during bright weather in England. When it was obscured they used an oil lamp with wicks made from rope-yarn."

As the new year commenced the cold grew more intense; "blisters would rise on the poor fellows' flesh as though they had been burned with fire, and iron stuck to their fingers like bird-lime." At first they procured fresh-water from a spring beneath a cliff and under thick ice; but from the 10th of January until the 20th of May they had to melt the snow for it with hot irons.

During February no less than forty bears visited the hut, of which seven were killed, and they trapped fifty foxes. On the 24th of May the first deer was seen, but their only remaining dog had grown so fat and lazy that it refused to hunt. On the next day, "being all but one, Thomas Ayers, collected together for prayers in the smaller hut, they suddenly heard voices calling 'Hey!' to which, not without surprise (as one can well imagine), Ayers answered, after the custom of seamen, 'Ho!'"

Their visitors were from two Hull steamers just arrived at Bell Sound, and much astonished they were at the sight of the eight men "in rags and blackened with smoke." On the other hand, they were "well entertained with venison, roasted four months ago, and a cup of water, which on account of the novelty they accepted." The Greenland fleet arrived two days afterward, with Captain Goodler himself, who spared nothing to promote the comfort of the castaways.

What strikes us here is the good fortune these men enjoyed in losing none of their number; but it must be remembered that they had a roof over their heads, and fire-wood, and above all could provide themselves with provisions. The general experience of those who have been in like condition has been very different.

II.

Only four years afterward the Dutch government offered inducements to any party of Greenland whale-fishers who would winter on the island of St. Maurice, commonly called Mayer's Island, from John Mayer, its discoverer. It lies between seventy-one and seventy-two degrees of north latitude (whereas that of the little English settlement above described was sixty-seven degrees), but is barren, mountainous, and inhospitable enough.

Seven Dutch sailors volunteered for this adventure, and were left behind by the fleet, accordingly, on the 26th of August. At that time "the heat of the sun was so powerful that they pulled off their shirts, and sported on a hill near their abode." There was an abundance of sea-gulls, and a few vegetables—or at least something that served for salad—grew in the vicinity.

They did not resort to fires until the 9th of October. As winter advanced, however, their privations set in with unaccustomed severity. At the end of the old year they "went to prayers, wishing each other a happy new year and good success in their enterprise." This is the last glimpse of cheerfulness we get among them.

January was dark and stormy; bears were scarce, and the poor fellows had little skill in killing them. In March many of them were attacked by that arctic scourge, scurvy, caused by the absence of fresh provisions. On the 3d of April only two were in health, and the rest extremely ill. On that day the last two of the pullets that had been left them were killed. The "clerk" (i.e., I suppose, the purser) died on the 16th, whereupon the rest implored Heaven to have mercy upon his soul and on themselves.

They were, indeed, in sad straits by that time. On the 23d one writes in his journal—and the journal is all the record we have of their doings, for they all perished:

"We are by this time reduced to a deplorable state, none of my comrades being able to help himself, much less another; the whole burden, therefore, lies on my shoulders, and I shall perform my duty as well as I am able so long as it pleases God to give me strength. I am just now about to assist our commander out of his cabin; he thinks it will relieve his pain, for he is struggling with death. The night is dark, and the wind blowing from the south."

What a miserable utterance of human misery is this! How difficult it is, as one reads it, to reflect that all this happened two centuries and a half ago! One seems to hear the moans of those solitary, sick men even now. On the 27th of April, we read, they killed their dog. As there is no further note of what took place, it is supposed they must have all died in the beginning of May.

On the 4th of June the Dutch landed to seek for their comrades, and "presaged ill from their not having come down to the shore to welcome them." They found them all dead men. "Near one of the bodies stood some bread and cheese; a box of ointment, with which he was wont to rub his teeth and joints, beside another, whose arm was extended toward his mouth; a prayer-book was near a third. Each of the men was found in his own cabin." The commander of the fleet caused the bodies to be put in coffins, "and interred, on St. John's Day, under a general discharge of cannon."

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS,

AUTHOR OF "PRINCESS IDLEWAYS," "PHIL'S FAIRIES," ETC.

CHAPTER X.

"WELL," said Leo, "you are not going to stop, I hope."

"Oh no," said Paz, cheerfully. "I can spin yarns with any sailor. What will you have now?"

"Something funny."

"I wish I could oblige you, but fun is not my strong point. I went from Greenland to the South Seas one day in search of a laugh, but I failed to find it; indeed, I came near doing worse, for in getting into the hoop of a native's nose-ring for a swing—just by way of a new sensation—I forgot to make myself invisible, and he caught me, thought I was a spider, and would have crushed me, had not a baby put out its little hands in glee to play with me. I can assure you I was for a time averse to trying new sensations."

"How did you get out of your scrape?"

"I travelled down that baby's back in a hurry, and hid in an ant-hill; he poked about with his little black fingers for a quarter of an hour, but he did not find me. Ah, those were the days of my youth!"

"Do you ever have anything to do with witches?"

"Mark my words, ghosts and witches live only in the imagination of silly human beings. We useful people scorn them. Now imps might be said to belong to the same family were it not for the proofs we have of their existence. They are everlastingly getting children into trouble by suggesting things to them they never would have thought of—"

"Such as what?"

"Do you suppose I am going to tell you? No, indeed; they can do it fast enough for themselves. Persons who take too much wine are their most constant companions; they pounce upon them and twitch and tease and torment them until the poor wine-bibber trembles from head to foot. They won't let him sleep or eat or think, and fairly drive him crazy. Oh, imps are really to be dreaded! But I must now begin my second story."

PAZ'S SECOND STORY.

"There was to be a grand birthday festival among the Fays, who inhabit the tropics. The wind fairies had brought us news of it as well as urgent invitations for our royal family to be present; but so deeply engrossed was our King at that moment in supplying the oil wells of Pennsylvania with petroleum that he could not absent himself. The Queen never goes from home without her liege lord.

"The princes and princesses were all too young, and could not be allowed to leave their lessons; so the regrets were inscribed on lotus leaves, and sent by special messenger—a bird of the Cypselina family. He was a great sooty-black fellow, with a tinge of green in his feathers, strong, well able to fly far, as his family generally do from America to Asia. But the gift could not be intrusted to him. I was chosen as bearer of that.

"Much discussion had taken place as to what this gift should be. It was desirable that nothing ordinary should be offered, for the Fays are, as a rule, fastidious. Gems they possess in abundance. Flowers are so common that their beds are made of them. Their books are 'the running brooks,' and their art treasures hang on every bough. The Queen had woven a veil of lace with her own fingers; it was filmy and exquisite, but my heart sank within me when she declared that nothing less than a wreath of snow-flakes must accompany it. To obtain this wreath and carry it to the Fays as a birthday gift was to be my duty.

"How should I accomplish it? I dared not suggest the difficulties, for at once I should have been displaced, and another elf chosen for the performance of this arduous task. Besides, if it could be accomplished by any one, I must be that person, having always been unwilling ever to allow difficulties to deter me from any duty. Pride of the right sort is a great help. I went to the frost-workers and told them what I wanted. They said they could imitate any flower; but the Queen had expressly said that the wreath must be of snow-flakes. Now the fantastic impulse of a snow-storm is well known, but it is not so generally known that there is a scientific accuracy even in the formation of snow-flakes."

Here Paz stopped, shook his head, smiled, and said: "I do believe I am as bad as Knops."

"Please go on," said Leo.

"Well, you must forgive me, for I shall have to tell you that the frost-workers said there were no less than a thousand different forms among the crystals of which snow-flakes are made.

"Now how could I tell what pattern to choose? It was impossible; so I told them I should have nothing to do with the pattern. 'Make the wreath,' said I, 'box it, and I will carry it, or die in the attempt.'

"They did so. The crystals were more beautiful than diamond stars. They put it in a solid square of ice, which was packed in charcoal and straw, and then cased in coeca matting. To this I attached cords, and slung it about my neck. The veil, in a satin case half an inch square, was in my wallet.

"I started in the track of the marten that carried the dispatches, but changed my course many times, striving to keep in cold currents. Finding, however, that as I neared the Equator this was impossible, I took to the sea, and went down to its highway. Of course I had on garments impervious to water—that is to say, water-proof—and my wallet was as dry as a bone; but not being in the habit of travelling under ocean, my eyes were a little affected by the salt, and I became conscious that I was being followed.

"Fishes, you know, are not down on the hard rocky bed of the sea, and I had passed the homes of mer-men, so I was puzzled to know who could be my enemy. I would not so much as betray my fears by looking behind, and I had enough to do in looking forward, for at every other step there were fissures which had to be leaped, deep abysses to be avoided, chasms to be crossed, and sands which might engulf me.

"Still, as I struggled on, I could hear the sound of other feet following mine, now nearing me, now farther away, as my speed asserted itself. It made me shiver to think what might be my fate, and I can honestly say that the thought of failing to fulfill my errand bore as heavily upon me as the sense of personal dangers; for it is a great thing to be trusted, to be looked upon as honest and true,

"So was I at that time, and I resolved to get into the first empty shell I could find where I might hide. There was soon an opportunity. A heap of cast-off shells presented itself, and I popped into an enormous crab cover where I waited for my unknown companion to overtake me.

"As the steps came near I peeped carefully out, and what should I see but an ugly South American river-wolf, about three and a half feet long, with a short close fur of a bright ruddy yellow. I could not imagine what had brought him after me, but the ways of the wicked are often difficult to explain. There he was, and if once he could get me within reach I was lost. On he came, snuffing and barking like a dog, making my very hair stand on end. I waited for him to pass, but I think his instinct must have told him I had paused, for he began to turn over the shells with his ugly nose as if searching for something. My single weapon was a small dirk, as we kill only in self-defense.

"Bracing myself against the wall of my slight shelter, I stood in expectation of an assault, and I had not long to wait. With an angry cry he rushed upon me. His size seemed to me enormous, but my little knife was a trusty blade, and with a great effort I drew it across his dreadful throat.

"I will not dwell on these particulars. I had overcome my enemy. I resumed my journey, and soon came to a region of the most beautiful water-plants growing in greatest profusion. I knew by these that I was not far from the home of the Fays.

"I neglected to tell you that before starting out the chief frost-worker had given me a small vial of a clear liquid, which, in case of any danger from heat, I was to use for the preservation of the snow wreath. In my tussle with the wolf this vial must have become partly uncorked, for I became aware of a strong odor diffusing itself about me, and an overpowering sleepiness getting the better of me. I had drawn the bottle out, reworked it, and put it away again; but this was no sooner done than I fell in a sleepy swoon on the road-side.

"I have no idea how long I slept: there is neither day nor night down there, only a dim sort of twilight, which at times becomes illuminated by the phosphorescent rays of fishes, or the fitful gleam of ocean glow-worms. I was startled from my swoon by a rattling, dragging noise, and came very near being scooped up by an uncouth-looking iron thing which was attached to a cable. It flashed upon me, stupid as I was, that this must be a deep-sea dredge; and as I was not at all inclined to be hauled up on shipboard in a lot of mud and shells as a rare specimen of the sea, I got as quickly out of the way as possible.

"But it was now time for me to get on terra firma, as Knops would say, or dry land, as I prefer to put it. Among the beautiful vermilion leaves or tentacles of the curious half animals and half flowers I observed a vine not unlike the honeysuckle, only of tougher fibre. On this I elambered up to take a look about me, and discovered that I was much nearer shore than I supposed. Hardly had I done this when, to my horror, I saw the arms of an octopus stretching out toward me, its horrid beak projecting from between its ugly eyes. More alarmed than at any previous danger, I strove to retain my self-command, but the fearful creature was already touching me. Remembering, with wits sharpened by distress, the effect of the drug in my little bottle, I drew out the cork, and making a sudden lunge, dashed the ether in its face—if you can so call any part of its disgusting head.

"Instantly it lost all power over its members, curled up in a writhing, griggling mass, and I with a bound reached the sandy shore."

and deemed capable of transacting affairs even of small moment.

"But this was not a trifling matter. The neglect to deliver this gift could bring about serious trouble. The Fays were our friends, and friendship is never to be slighted. It is not kind to allow selfish matters to stand in the way when we are bidden to a joyous celebration, and had not our King felt that the claims of man were more urgent than those of the Fays he would have attended this feast in person. As he could not, the gift was to represent him, I trust I have made it clear to you."

"Quite so," said Leo. "But I am crazy to know who was following you."

Ye Romantic Adventures of Three Tailors.

Three little men went a jogging along
 Along in the sunny weather,
 And they laughed and they sang an occasional song
 Which they all of them caroled together.
 And the great white clouds floated over the sky,
 And the day it was warm and the sun it was high.

By Howard Pyle.

As three jolly tailor men all were they,
 As you'd find in a dozen of years,
 One carried the yardstick another the goose,
 And the bravest of all bore the shears.

So they merrily trudged until after awhile
 They came where three milkmaids sat all on a stile.

The grass it was green and the flowers were gay,
 And it was the pleasantest weather,
 And the milkmaids were pretty as blossoms in May,
 As they sat on the stile
 all together.

Then they stopped on the highway those three gallant men
 For they never had seen as fair ladies as then.

Then up spake the first of the tailor men three,
 And the one with the goodliest parts

"We are all of us good men gallant and free.

And have never yet plighted our hearts,
 So pri thee fair maids will you marry us all
 For our hearts they be great tho' our bodies be small."

Then up spake the first of the three pretty dears,
 "Pray tell what your fortunes may be, sir."
 "Oh three loving hearts and a yard goose and shears.

"Then you've not enough fortune for me, sir,
 So get you along while your boots are still green,
 For richer young men we shall marry I ween."

Three little tailor men jogging along
 Along in the sunny weather,
 No longer they laugh with a jest and a song
 But they walk very sadly together,
 For when maidens are proud like the milkmaids cold,
 The lads they grow sad like the tailors so bold.

STANDING UP FOR OUR RIGHTS.

"WHAT do you think?" said Lewis, addressing me. Lewis and his brother Dick had been having a discussion. It had almost grown into a quarrel, for both the boys were very much in earnest. You will laugh when I tell you that the question was simply which young gentleman should lie in the hammock and read YOUNG PEOPLE, and which should go with sister Blanche to the church and blow the organ for her daily practice.

"It's my turn to have the paper first," said Lewis, "and I'm only standing up for my rights, besides, I hate to blow that old organ."

"It's my turn," replied Dick, "to stay at home and enjoy myself, for I went with Blanche twice last week when you were ill."

"A fellow can't help having a headache."

"No," Dick answered, scornfully, "not if he eats too much plum-cake, as you did."

"Boys" (this was mother's voice), "I should think either of you would like to go with your sister. How can you be so selfish? I shall be obliged to look YOUNG PEOPLE up until to-morrow if this goes on."

It was at this moment that my little friend appeared to me. You may imagine how I felt at the bare mention of so dreadful a thing as the turning of a key on my beloved YOUNG PEOPLE, and I was really quite troubled that two manly boys, of whom I had, upon the whole, a high opinion, should waste their time and become angry about such a trifle. But I have lived long enough to know that most of the disputes in the world begin about nothing. A very little selfishness on somebody's part would prevent most of them; the Golden Rule, "Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you," would make the rest impossible.

"Boys," I said, dropping my fancy-work, and looking into the two flushed faces, "there is a better thing than standing up for our rights; it is nobler and makes everybody happier to yield our rights that we may add to the comfort of our neighbors. But only the great souls do this. Small minds never think of others' first."

"Just then Blanche called, 'Come, dear; I'm ready to go.'"

I was delighted when both brothers hastened down the garden. Lewis carried my trunk, Dick held the gate open, and the three went along the shady street in company. I learned afterward that they took turns in blowing the organ, and toward evening I saw Miss Blanche in the hammock, while Dick was swinging her gently, and Lewis was reading aloud to her.

ELIZABETHTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

I have read so much in YOUNG PEOPLE about silk quilts and cushions, I thought I would tell you and the readers how to make a cushion like mine. First procure a piece of muslin the size you desire your cushion to be, then lay out by stitching a piece of velvet or plush in the very centre of it. Then stitch a piece of light silk down on one of the sides, then add another piece of the same color, being sure to lay out around, then a piece of dark, then another of dark, and then the light again, and so on until you have pieced down to the edge. Edge with cream-tinted lace. This will make a pretty top to the cushion. Be very careful to have all your pieces of silk of the same length and width. Of course you will use as wide as you near the bottom. I will be pleased if the Postmistress tries to make one. T. E. H.

FREMONT, NEBRASKA.

I have not written in so long a time, I thought I would write. My sister has a cat, my brother and I own a cat too. My brother is going to have a white rabbit with pink eyes, so is my sister, and so am I. Papa is going to Omaha next week; afterward my brother is going, and then I.

BURNELL, C.

NORTHPORT, NEW YORK.

I am spending the summer by the Sound, and enjoy bathing very much. We have thirty-one pigeons; they are very tame, and eat out of my hand, and hop on my head. We have a large dog named Rex, and a cat named Tom Blacknose. We have also a squirrel named Fritz, and two horses whose names are Bessie and Jennie.

I had a beautiful canary, which would perch on my finger and kiss me, but the cat caught it, and it died from fright. Its grave is in the garden. EDITH V. D.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I thought I would write to-day and send you a piece of poetry my aunt wrote about our dog Dart. It is all true. I hope you will think it good enough to print in the Post-office Box. My Aunt says she is afraid it is too long. I was ten Goo-goo when Dart ran away, but now I am ten years old, and Dart is an old dog, and has the rheumatism. With kind regards to you, I am,

GUYVERNEUE E. S.

The children will be very much obliged to you for sharing this pretty bit of rhyme with them.

DART'S ESCAPE.

We have the prettiest doggie
That ever you did see,
His hair so soft and silky,
His eye so dark and clear;
So quick in all his motions
That we have called him Dart,
For scarce a door is opened
But through you see him start.

He came across the ocean
From the far-off isle of Skye,
And for his home we wonder
If he ever leaves a side;
For we live within the city,
And only have a yard;
For little Dart to play in:
No doubt he thinks it hard.

One morning after breakfast,
When papa he had left,
And Dart sat in the yard,
Was barking at the cats
That promenade the fences
Instead of catching rats,
The cook to get the fishes
Opened wide the kitchen door,
Dart peeped right through the doorway,

And saw the front door too
Was standing with the area
Right open to the view;
He took one right quick look,
Then slipped beside the cook,
And out into the street
He ran with flying feet.

Ah, then the great commotion,
The children up in arms!
Jack jumped from the piano
All full of wild alarms;
Charlie he was silent,
Too manly for to cry;
The dog belonged to him,
And he valued him so high.

Dear little Goo-goo he
First stood in mute surprise,
Then seemed to take his fun
He raised his bright blue eyes,
And to my face looked up
Half-angrily to say,
"I'll tell papa to-night
That Dart has run'd away."

The cook forgot her ashes,
The maids start up in fright,
But Dart, like lightning flashes,
Is quickly out of sight;
But to the nearest corner
Maggie ran without her hat,
And Mary tried the other
In hopes he was at that.

But so long both staid away
That we feared our darling doggie
We had had seen that day,
"I'll tell papa to-night,"
And sorrowfully we stood
Wishing, dreading Maggie's coming,
For we thought that say she would,
"Little Dart is gone for good."

At last in joy we saw her,
And from underneath her arm
Flew she to us with the same grace
That had caused all our alarm;
His tail in glee was wagging,
His eye was bright and clear;
He'd had a right good time,
And he cared not for our fear.

We welcomed him right warmly,
But thought it wouldn't do
Not to punish him a little,
Or he'd run again we knew;
So to the table tied
He passed the whole sad day;
He whimpered and he cried,
But still he had to stay.

Since then the best of doggies
Our little Dart has been,
And when he goes an airing
He's fastened to a string,
He may wag his tail and frisk,
But still we hold him tight,
For we will not run the risk
Of another such a flight. E. D. S.

NORWALK, ILLINOIS.

I am a little girl nine years old. I have thirteen dolls and two cats, one of which is six-cats. I like to climb trees and romp very much. Do you like the story of "Laising the Pearl"? I do, because I like boys so much. I have written twice before, but neither of my letters was printed; so I thought I would write again. ESTIE R. R.

Please send the Postmistress your full name, date. It is best, let me say, for the children to sign their names in full, although the initials only are printed.

OPELIKA, ALABAMA.

I live in a small railroad town, and mamma, my little friend Kate, and I went out to a brandy ferns. We plant them in pots, and they grow beautifully. I send you a pressed leaf. Kate and I waded up and down the branch, and just as we were going into the deep water, mamma cried, "There's a snake!" But she was mistaken; it was only a frog jumping into the water, though we scrambled up the bank much frightened. When you were a little girl did you love to wade in branches?

I want to join the Little Housekeepers. I wish to thank Clement L. for the sponge-cake receipt. Mamma will make one by it for the party, and it was a success. T. L. K.

Of course I was perfectly charmed to wade in a brook when I was a little girl, and I liked going after ferns as well as you do, though I could never coax them to grow. I still like to pick the ferns and press them, and I thank you very much for the pretty leaf.

CLIFTON, STATEN ISLAND.

I wrote a letter not long ago, but it was not printed, so I thought I would write again. Some of the readers wrote that they have made crazy quilts; my sister and I made a crazy tidy for papa, and there are more than thirty different stitches in it. Two or three years ago my sister and I went to Cot was endowed my sister and myself were visiting a friend in New York, and we went to St. Mary's Hospital, near Sadie. As I was walking through the wards I saw several numbers of YOUNG PEOPLE there. I think my letter is rather long, so I will say good-by. I send you a receipt for bread-and-butter pudding. MARION L. Q.

The receipt appears in another column. I am glad you went to see our little Sadie.

ROCHESTER, NEW YORK.

I thought I would write a letter to the Post-office Box. I have so many things to tell you. I wrote once a long time ago, but my letter was not published. I think I have been so many lovely pictures in YOUNG PEOPLE, and the letters almost always speak about the stories only. I think "A Beautiful Dreamer," "Rich and Poor," "In a Thousand Terrors," and "Ducked in the Cradle of the Deep" were splendid. I have had YOUNG PEOPLE ever since the first number. We think it such a nice paper. I get all the little girls I can to take it, and I have been so many times to take it, and papa gets it for one little girl besides me, and he also takes eleven for the Sunday-school. He is a clergyman, and the name of his mission is St. Mark's.

I have five sisters and two brothers older than myself. We have a dog named Dow. When the whistle blows for noon or for six o'clock he sticks his nose in the air and begins to howl; sometimes he gets just the tone of the whistle. We live near the bank of the Genesee River, and it is lovely here in summer. Last summer we got boats and rowed clear down to the lake, and when we got there it was moonlight.

I would like to belong to the Little Housekeepers. MARGARET W.

You are very welcome as a member of the Sociable, and I am particularly pleased that you like the beautiful pictures which make YOUNG PEOPLE a feast to the eyes.

You show that you sincerely like the paper by your efforts to get others to subscribe for it. Many of the children are doing this, and the lists of new subscribers are growing. The more people who take YOUNG PEOPLE, the better and more interesting and more beautiful the publishers will be able to make it.

PLATTE CITY, MISSOURI.

I am twelve years old, and have a brother who is nineteen. I live near Fort Leavenworth, and often go there; also near Kansas City, which I often visit. We have a splendid school in Platte City, which I attend, and I have been taking music lessons for three years. My brother plays on the guitar, and he often accompanies mamma or me on the piano. I have had a very nice time, very much, and was sorry that "In Honor Bore" was so short. I have been in the country a part of the vacation at grandma's. Enjoy being there, for then I can take a splendid walk, and have very delightful times. While there I made and mended a set of toilet mats. I have a collection of dolls, seventy-eight in number. I have them on the mantel, and they are quite a curiosity. Mamma has a collection of Mexican pottery, made by the Aztecs, sent her by my aunt from Albuquerque. I am learning to cook, and would like to be one of the Little Housekeepers. I send a very nice receipt for cocoa to you. GRACIE M. M.

Thanks. Can you find the receipt? Look for it. Thirty-eight dollars are enough to keep you busy. They must crowd the mantel-piece.

MOSTKILLER, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl eleven years old, and I have only one sister, and she will be thirteen in September. I have not taken Young People very long, so I could not read much of the story of "Nan." I like Jimmy Brown's stories very much, and wonder if he will try any more experiments. There is a French family living next door to us. They have two little girls about my age; they are twins, and their names are Adele and Emily. We have fine times, although we have no pets. Mostkille is quite a nice place for city visitors. Papa keeps a book-store, so I have plenty of books to read, but I think I enjoy Young People as much as any book. MAMIE A. S.

COPENHAGEN, NEW YORK.

I am a boy ten years old. I live on a farm, and am learning to be a farmer. I take your nice paper. Mamma lets me raise sows and sell it. I like to keep the pigs for my own. I like raising the "Pearl" and Jimmy Brown's stories best of all.

Next time Johnnie M. is poisoned with Ivy, if he will apply sweet cream it will cure him. BERTIE C.

St. Joseph, MISSOURI.

I have never written a letter to you, so I thought I would write you one. I had a big bird that fell down, and it flew away. Papa got me a kitten in place of it. I have one little sister, who is five years old, and two brothers, one twelve and the other nine, and I was eight on the Fourth of July. We have seven chickens, five of them Plymouth Rocks; their names are Tom, Pet, Biddy, Topknot, Browlie, Speckle, and Snowball. I go to school, and am in the sixth grade. I have a very sick bird, but am well now. My bird was named Dick. Will you please tell me a name for my kitten? On my birthday mamma gave me a doll carriage. My grandpa was here on the Fourth of July.

I did not mean my cage flew away, but my bird. I wrote this all myself. MAGGIE G. D.

I understood you, dear, about the bird; and the pronoun is all right. Would Frisk suit the kitten?

REIGNON, MICHIGAN.

I am twelve years old, and I think I have a good name, Daisy, and nineteen chickens. Nine of them are tame, and they eat my bread, and I will feed the old hen. I have some eyes. Will you tell me what is good for them? I am trying salt-water now. My papa is a doctor. I don't like doctors' pills, but I must stop. I fear I have written too much now. Wednesday is a very happy day to me; you know it brings Young People. GERTIE McH.

If papa is a physician, he can probably prescribe for the poor eyes. I think you must run about in the fresh air, drink plenty of milk, get a good long sleep every night by going to bed when the chickens and birds do, and become very strong and healthy, and then the eyes will not trouble you much. Never read anything, dear, not even the Post-office Box, between daylight and dark. It is a very bad time for eyes of any kind to pore over print.

LEON, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am living in this country for two years only. I was born in Germany, in the town of Oeynhausen. It is a watering-place, and every summer there come numbers of rich people to use the baths for their health. There are two kinds of salt water—one kind is as yellow as a dandelion, and the other is as pure as crystal, only when you go into it you are all covered with millions of little things which look like pearls, and when you reach them they go up to the surface. We have a large park, which is called the Kurgarten. Twice a day there is a lovely concert in the little music-house. Besides this there are a reading-saloon, a play-ground, a ball-room, a theatre, beautiful flower beds, fountains, and a long row of booths nicely built, where you may buy all kinds of things. I like the booth where they sell dolls the best.

This little city is a dear little place—the best I ever saw. From mamma's garret window we can see the Porta Westfalica. That is the place where the Westphalians had their camp on the mountain, but since then it has been widened, and the railway and many roads go through it, and there is a suspension-bridge between the two mountains, so that you can walk to the pictures, and climbed the mountains. There is still the little chapel where Wiltkind, or Wittekind, was baptized, and I saw also the place where his horse had kicked the ground, and a spring came out of the earth. I tasted the water, which is very cool and clear.

I want very much to know whether it is proper to say something is that long. Must you not say something is so long? Please tell me. I want to make something for a little baby fourteen months old, and I do not know what. Could you please tell me some things I could make? I like the letters and the stories about musicians the most. I think everybody ought to like music. DON'T YOU, A. S.

Your letter is charming. It is right to say so long, not that long. You might knit a little sack for the baby, or a soft worsted ball for him to play with, or a bright band to which you might fasten bells for him to jingle. Perhaps he would like a doll, dressed in a crocheted suit, cap, trousers, and jacket, though to manage the costume nicely one must be quite handy with the little steel hook.

PITTSFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—We are seven little consins visiting grandpa's. Something terrible has happened here this summer. The house is built on a hill, and during a heavy rain a terrific thunder-shower the land on one side of the house was washed out by the rain to the depth of seven feet. Next day another fearful shower came, and washed out much more. The next morning, that in the night, when we all were asleep, the foundations caved in, and the house sunk down about six feet on one side, and waked us all up, besides frightening us dreadfully. Several fire-trusses were blown down and fell over into the hole, and one fell on the house and broke lots of windows and one chimney. Grandpa is going to have the hole filled up, and the house raised into position by jack-screws.

You have passed through a thrilling experience, and it is a mercy you all lived to tell about it. The thunder-storms, cyclones, and showers of hail this summer have been marvellous.

HERNON, OHIO.

I have taken both St. Nicholas and The Scholar's Companion, but I like Harper's Young People better than either of the others. My mamma gave it to me for a Christmas present. I think "Raising the Pearl" is the best story in it. I am sorry it is finished, and hope Mr. Otis will write another story. I live with my grandpa in the country, and have a nice patch of potatoes, which I planted myself. My grandpa has two large mules, and we call one Jack and the other Tom. The men like to work the mules better than the horses, because they are so strong.

I had a present of two books this winter, The Tiger Prince and Little Me. I have had quite a good many books given to me, some histories and some story-books. I hope to have a library some time. I have been going to school in the country, but am going to town next year. I like to read the letters in the Post-office Box. JAMES R. E.

The way to secure a library is to begin just as you are doing, taking care of all the good books you receive as gifts, and sometimes buying one with your own money.

CORRECTION.—In answer to an inquiry from Nathan P. W. in the Post-office Box of our issue for August 14, 1888, we inadvertently quoted the prices for the volumes of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE at 35 cents, postage prepaid. The price should have been 50 cents—35 cents being the price for the covers, and 15 cents the cost of mailing.

Thanks are due for favors received from John B., Jerome Henry F., Nettie Henrietta M. (who made the pretty sailor suit for her doll with her auntie's help, and is pleased with it), Mary O. J. (whose dog died, and whose bird was stolen, but who has a ring-dove for a pet at present), Daisy H., Jennie Burton S., Josie D. F., Hattie H., Joseph C. (try again, dear; an old song says, "there is luck in odd numbers," and so you may find it), Laurence G. B., and Pearl F.—Emily Lee T. must not forget her promise to send the bean-pole story.—George B. I am very sorry to hear of the death of your dear little brother Nattie B. H., a bright boy, and a correspondent of the Post-office Box.

RECEIPTS FOR THE LITTLE HOUSEKEEPERS.

BREAD-AND-BUTTER TUNING.—Take a much bread, and fill an earthenware pudding dish of the size you prefer; cut it in thin slices, and butter them; then put a layer of bread, and sprinkle it with raisins, another layer of bread, and so on, until you reach the top; make a custard of a quart of milk, three eggs, three table-spoonfuls of sugar, and a little cinnamon; pour this over the bread, and let it stand half an hour; grate a little nutmeg over it, and bake it a nice brown. M. L. Q.

A hard sauce of butter and sugar beaten smoothly, and flavored with vanilla, will be nice to serve with this, and at this season, when fresh fruit is abundant, you may substitute sliced apples or cut a peach or apple, and the pudding will then make what some people call Apple or Peach Charlotte, but what the Postmistress's children welcome on the table as Brown Betty.

ALMOND CAKE.—Two cups of sugar, two and a half cups of flour, two-thirds of a cup of cold water, five eggs, one tea-spoonful of cream of tartar, and half a tea-spoonful of soda; beat the sugar and yolks together; sift the cream of tartar and the flour together, and stir them in with the water; add the beaten whites and the soda, and bake in a very hot oven fifteen minutes. KATE E. M.

COCA-NUT DROPS.—One pound of graded coconut, half a pound of pulverized sugar, and the whites of six eggs beaten to a stiff froth; drop on buttered pans, and bake. GRACIE M. M.

"WHAT ON EARTH ARE YOU DOING WITH THE CRUET-STAND?"
 "OH, WE'RE ONLY OILING THE JOINTS OF THE TORTOISE. IT MOVES ALONG SO SLOWLY, POOR THING!"

THE SPARROW AND THE MONKEYS.

OF all the hanging nests the most curious is made by the little baya sparrow of India. I dare say you wonder why any birds build hanging nests: you may be quite sure that they have a reason, and this reason is, I believe, that they think them the safest.

In the country where the baya sparrow lives there are snakes and opossums and troops of monkeys, all of whom delight to regale themselves on birds' eggs. Now the monkeys are more to be feared than all the other egg-eaters, because they can climb so well.

From an ordinary nest, open at the top, a monkey can easily take the eggs with his long slender fingers. The baya sparrow knows this, so she takes care to hang her nest on the very tips of light branches that will not bear a monkey's weight, and to inclose it on all sides, and to enter it from underneath through a long neck—longer than the monkey's fingers.

When the monkeys found that she had thus outwitted them they laid their heads together. Eggs they liked, and eggs they must have, and those of the baya sparrow were especially tempting. At last they thought of a novel plan how to get them.

One monkey climbed to a high strong branch above that from which the nest was hung, and let himself down from it, holding on with both hands, then another monkey crawled down, holding on by the heels of the first, and another below him, and so on until they could reach the nest of the poor little sparrow, which they plundered.

This was too bad. Nevertheless, the sparrow did not sit down and cry because the monkeys were so clever, and all her eggs were gone. She knew there is nothing a monkey hates so much as to get his sleek coat wet; he would rather go without eggs than do this. So she hung her nest on the extremity of a branch stretching over the water, and so low that the entrance of the nest was close to the surface. The monkey thieves did not dare to make a chain of themselves long enough to touch that nest, for fear the bough should bend and let the lowest monkey go souse into the water. Clever little sparrow!

A BRIDGE there is most wonderful,
 Yet o'er it never man did go;
 And strangely, too, the waters are

Above its span, and yet below.

 Beneath it bold the song-birds fly;
 In wildest tempest it will stand;
 Nor doth its keeper toll demand.

THE FIRST LESSON.

MOST bright little fellows like this one mean, when they grow up, to do what father does. Jaek is taking his first lesson in mending the fish net. His fingers are rather clumsy, but he is paying close attention to every direction, so it will not be long before he finds out the secret of the net.

In a few years he will be old enough to make one of the crew that man the fishing-boat. Then as his muscles become tough and strong he will tug manfully at the net when the time comes to land the glittering prizes, which will be sold in the market to bring comforts to the fisherman's home.

There are several kinds of nets, and Jaek will no doubt learn the uses of them all. The landing-net is a round bag-net mounted on a wire hoop, and fastened to the end of a staff. It is made of stout twine, hardened with caoutchouc, or India rubber, and the meshes are small.

The casting-net is a large affair, thirteen yards round, and is weighted with lead to permit far casts. It takes skill to throw it well. It must first be laid on the grass, then gathered up on the left arm and hand, and with a side swing thrown gently on the water, while the fisherman keeps hold of the end of the line. The net must be thrown very gently, so as to sweep in the fish without making a violent splash and frightening them away.

A hoop-net is in the shape of a barrel, and has channels at each end, down which the fish swim into the net. It is used for eels and small fish.

A bunch of flowers hung in the middle of a hoop-net is sure to attract the fish, which wish to see the pretty thing with the gay colors, and go toward it without fearing any danger.

Nets are very ancient. They were used by the Egyptians, and by the Phœnicians, who were daring mariners in the far distant past.

DOLLIE IN THE OCEAN.

BY A. C.

A DEAR little girlie went down one bright day
To the shore of the sea to have a good play;
She sat with her dollie awhile on the beach;
Till each of her cheeks was as fresh as a peach;
And then, having taken a nice little run,
She tried to look out for some new kind of fun.

'Twas bathing-time now, and all rosy and brown
The bathers were coming from out of the town
In suits of bright red or else suits of dark blue,
Some funny and old and some pretty and new,
To play in the waves and to play in the sand,
To splash in the sea and then run on the land.
Thought girlie: "Now why can't my doll have some fun?
I'm sure she's tired sitting here in the sun;
Her blue flannel dress is a good suit to wear;
It won't take a minute to fix her, the dear;
I'd like to know what are these little waves for
If not for the dollies who come to the shore?
So in you may go, darling dollie, you may,
And splash like the others, and have a good play."

So the dear little girl ran down through the sand,
And, holding her dollie quite fast by the hand,
She gave her a splash in the first little wave."
"Why, dollie, you like it; you're ever so brave!"
Then splash number two, and then splash number three,
Till dollie was soaked through and through—oh, dear me!
"There, that is enough, dear; the docters all say
To take a few breakers is much the best way.
I know it is dreadful to come out so soon.
I'll let you go in again this afternoon.
Now run up, like a good girl, and try not to cry.
Now run up the beach, and make haste to get dry."

To get dry! Oh, that is the thing to do now;
The poor little mother, she doesn't know how.
'Tis easier said than it is to be done.
Poor dollie! she'll have to hang out in the sun.
Her blue bathing garments about her they cling,
Her sawdust is dusty no longer, poor thing!
The eyes that were dark they are now but pale blue,
The color is washed from her little cheeks, too;
And as for her hair, it is ruined to-day;
"It comes out in cart-loads," as all the girls say.

Alas for the dollie! alas for her fun!
It would have been better to sit in the sun;
For dollies the little waves never were made:
Of this I am certain. Their beauties will fade
If ever they venture to enter the surf.
'Tis safer for dollies to stay on the turf.
So bright little mothers of bright little dolls,
Who happen to be where the sea water rolls,
Take warning, take warning, and never, I know,
Will you foolishly play with your dear babies so.

ABOARD THE "SEA SPRAY."

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JUN.

"SHE'S just a beauty, Ned. Come on down and take a look at her;" and Charlie Park linked arms with his friend Ned Niles, and together the two walked across the lawn and down the many wooden steps to the river, where at a neat little wharf lay a handsome steam-launch, with polished engine and newly painted hull.

"Why, where's Joe, the engineer, I wonder?" exclaimed Charlie, as he hurried out on the dock. "I suppose, though, he's gone up to call on his friend the coachman. Come, hop aboard, Ned, and see how handsomely Uncle Frank has had her fitted up;" and the enthusiastic lad proceeded to display the yacht's charms with the ardor of a circus showman.

It was just before sunset on a lovely summer evening, and the broad river lay placid as a mirror in its winding bed between the hills. This was the Sea Spray's first trip since Charlie's uncle had bought her and had her fitted up. On this occasion he had steamed up in her from the city to take tea with his invalid friend, Mr. Niles, who resided in a handsome house on the banks of the stream. Charlie, to his great delight, had been invited to accompany his uncle, not only for the enjoyment the trip would afford him, but also for the opportunity it offered of renewing his acquaintance with Ned, whom he had met at school the previous winter.

Now Ned was an exceedingly quiet fellow of fourteen, fond of reading, and not much given to boyish sports. Charlie, on the other hand, was of a much more lively disposition, and was on the move all the time. After a separation of a month or so the two found plenty to talk about, as they reclined on the Sea Spray's soft cushions.

"Isn't it queer, Charlie," Ned remarked, a light puff of vapor suddenly calling his attention to the yacht, "how such light stuff as steam can do so much heavy work? I've read a good deal about it, but somehow I don't understand the thing yet."

"I'll show you in half a minute," returned the impulsive Charlie, springing to his feet and casting off the stern line. "Joe explained to me lots of points about the engine on the way up: how to start and stop, and—watch, now, Ned; I'll turn on the steam, and just let you see how the Spray can scoot."

"But I don't think you ought to do it, Charlie," protested the other. "Your uncle wouldn't like it a bit, and, besides, it's dangerous if you never ran an engine before."

"Pshaw! didn't I keep an eye on Joe all the time, and as for Uncle Frank, I don't believe he'd care, as long as I only make a circle out into the middle of the river and back again. So here goes;" and as he spoke, Charlie pushed the launch away from the dock with the boat-hook, and then ran back to start the engine, Ned watching his every movement in a dazed state of helplessness.

"Ah—h, here we go!" cried Charlie, gayly, as he opened wide the throttle-valve, and the Sea Spray shot quickly ahead. "My! isn't this fine? I wish I dared blow the whistle, but I'm afraid Uncle Frank might hear—not that I don't think he'll be mighty pleased to know that I can run the launch all by myself; but I'd rather tell him about it afterward, when I've brought her snugly back to the dock, with everything left ship-shape."

"I wish we were back there now," said Ned, holding on with a tight grip to the tiller, as if that would save him in the event of any accident.

"Oh, come, Ned, don't be girlish! Haven't I told you that Joe taught me lots about the management of an engine this afternoon? Just see how beautifully we're running; it seems a pity to go back so soon."

And, truth to tell, the Spray was going along at very fair speed. But it was of short duration, for even as Charlie boasted of the fact, the engine's workings became perceptibly slower, and before the boat could be headed back to the wharf the machinery came to a full stop.

"Hello! what's up now, I wonder!" exclaimed Charlie, and he went peeping in and out among the cranks and pistons with an important air of knowledge.

"Something must have got caught in the screw," he suddenly cried out, hardly able to conceal from nervous Ned the rush of fears which now began to overwhelm him. Then, crawling out upon the narrow space of deck at the stern, he took off his hat, and bent his head down to look behind the rudder.

"I can't see anything," he reported, as he drew himself back, very red in the face, and with a decidedly puzzled, not to say anxious, expression in his eyes.

"Oh, Charlie, what shall we do?" exclaimed poor Ned, faintly. "See, the boat won't steer a bit without head-way, and there's not even a puff of wind blowing in any direction. Couldn't we row some way?"

"No, for there are no oars on board. I believe they used to keep one under the deck last summer, but when the yacht was overhauled they must have taken it out, and forgot to put it back. But there must be something wrong with that engine, because I'm positive I've done exactly as Joe said."

"Then what is the matter? Oh, Charlie, it isn't probable that you could have learned all about the machinery in one lesson, so you ought not to have attempted to run the Spray by yourself, and I shouldn't have let you try, and— Oh, see how dark it is growing! What if some big boat should run into us! Can't we anchor somewhere?"

"No, for we've no matches with which to light the lamps; so we're as safe drifting as we would be anchored, if not safer. I'm no end sorry, Ned, to have got you into such a fix, and I see now I had no business to meddle with such a complicated thing as an engine. However, this 'll take some of the conceit out of me, I guess. Now don't worry, old fellow, for I don't think we're as badly off as we might be, and I'll do my best to set you safely ashore, after which I'll be ready to take the consequences."

This was rather a hard speech to make, and Ned admired greatly the manly way in which his friend acknowledged himself to be in the wrong; but before he could reply a grating sound was heard, and the Sea Spray came to a stand-still.

"We've run aground," cried both boys in a breath, and each experienced a momentary feeling of relief at the thought that they were no longer in deep water.

But as the darkness closed rapidly in about them, and a breeze sprang up to set them shivering in their overcoatless condition, they decided that they had better shout for help, which they proceeded to do with the full strength of their young lungs.

"There isn't much use in this, though, Charlie," panted Ned, as they paused to listen for a reply, "as most of the houses near the river belong to city people, who haven't come up yet."

"But the tide must be falling now, so we'll have to stay here all night unless we get help. I suppose we're safe enough, in one sense, but think of the state of mind your father and Uncle Frank will be in when they miss us and find the Spray gone. All my fault, too. I'm bound to do something; it's simply awful to sit still and think." Then, after an instant, and in solemn tones: "Ned, do you know much about this part of the river? I mean, whether we are on a flat in the middle of it, or on the gradually shelving bank running out from the shore?"

Ned peered intently into the darkness for a minute, held his head in his hands in an attitude of deep thought, and then replied: "Charlie, I can't tell you for certain. You know I haven't taken much to the river, but I think this shoal forms part of the beach. But what difference does it make?"

"Just this," answered the other, quickly: "I mean to let your father know where you are within half an hour, if I possibly can;" and, as he spoke, Charlie began taking off his shoes and stockings, while Ned stared at him wonderingly.

"Why, what—what are you going to do, Charlie?" he stammered.

"Walk ashore, and then run along the beach to your house, which can't be more than a mile below us."

"Walk ashore from here!" exclaimed Ned, drawing in a long breath. "And what am I to do?"

"Sit quietly in the launch till I send some one to take you off. You won't have to wait more than an hour at the farthest."

"But what if this is only a flat in the middle of the river?"

"Well, I'll soon find that out, and then I'll have to come back here, that's all."

"But you may step off into deep water before you know it."

"I can swim," returned Charlie, firmly, as he took off his hat and placed it on the seat; then catching up the boat-hook he plunged it into the river, and after withdrawing it, measured the wet portion against his body, ascertaining that it reached nearly above his waist.

"Whew!" he exclaimed, "how much the Spray must draw! But here goes;" and, with a wave of the hand to his friend, he sprang overboard, uttering a shivering "Ugh!" as the cold water struck him. "All right, Ned!" he called out as he waded carefully away from the launch. "You're not afraid to stay alone, are you? The tide's running out fast, so there's no danger of your drifting off, and the water's too shallow for any bigger boat to run into you."

Fainter and fainter sounded his voice, although Ned could hear him long after his form had been swallowed up in the darkness. How terribly lonely it was out there in the stranded Sea Spray, with no one to talk to! and—hark! was not that a sudden splash?

"Charlie, oh, Charlie! are you all right?"

"Prime," was the characteristic answer from over the waters.

Then the dreadful silence fell again, and Ned sat there listening until he could bear it no longer.

"Charlie, oh, Charlie!" he called again.

No answer, and Ned's heart beat with quickened throbs as he thought of the deep channel and the treacherous tide.

How slowly the minutes dragged! Usually quiet, Ned was seized with a spirit of restlessness that kept him pacing ceaselessly up and down in the confined quarters of the yacht, casting anxious glances now and then at the sky, where the gorgeous tints of sunset had been succeeded by heavy banks of clouds threatening rain.

At last, after what seemed hours of weary waiting, he had almost determined to follow Charlie's example, and seek to make his way to the shore. Perhaps the chill of the water might serve as an antidote to the sensation of nameless dread which had now fastened on him.

"Ned, oh, Ned!"

Surely that was Mr. Park's voice.

Springing up as if from an electric shock, the lad threw his whole heart into the answering shout, "Here! here!" And within five minutes the Niles's large row-boat ran up alongside.

"And Charlie?" were Ned's first words as Mr. Park seized him by the hand.

"Safe at home in your bed, between double layers of blankets. He did a brave thing simply to relieve us of our anxiety, and both your father and I are well assured that he is thoroughly repentant as well as punished for his thoughtlessness in starting out in the Spray."

Meantime Joe, after fussing over the boiler, to which Charlie had not given a thought, with the help of Mr. Niles's coachman and gardener, pushed the launch off the flat, and in a little while she was steaming back to the dock.

"Why, she goes all right now," exclaimed Ned.

"In course she does," answered Joe. "Yer see, when I left her to git my supper I jist 'banked' the fire, which, as Mr. Charlie had gone up to the house, I couldn't explain to him, and, not knowin' this, he turns on the full head o' steam 'thout haulin' for'ard the fire, and phst! he lost it all in a jiffy."

"ALL RIGHT, NED" HE CALLED OUT."

Having landed Ned and the two men at their wharf, Mr. Park kept on in the Spray back to town, leaving Charlie to spend the night at the Nites's while his clothes were dried.

He returned home the next morning by train, but did not offer to run the locomotive.

"DICK AND D."*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

Author of "Mildred's Bargain," "Nan," etc.

CHAPTER V.

AN UNEXPECTED GUEST.

IT seemed to Norry as if Dick never would come back. He had no need of a candle, for day and night were alike to him. But even Mrs. James, the apple woman, had failed in her usual evening visit, and two big tears had formed themselves under his eyelids and were slowly trickling down his thin little cheeks when Dick's footsteps sounded on the stairs. There was a whiff of cold air as he came in, but Norry sat up in bed and could have screamed for joy.

Oh! how cheery Dick's voice sounded!

"Just you wait till you see what I have," he said (it was always an understood thing to speak of Norry's seeing). "I must light up a bit of fire," he went on; and producing from their meagre store a few bits of wood, he soon had a blaze on the little hearth. "Why, you can't think all that they gave me. Oysters"—and Dick produced from a tin box some fried oysters, and prepared to heat them. "Then lobster salad—oh! ain't it lovely!—and broiled chicken!" As each article was called out, Norry kept looking more intent, and when the climax was reached with "Ice-cream, all packed in tight in a little tin box," he could not sufficiently express his emotions.

"Don't you think," he said, in accents of delight, "that we might give Mrs. James some?"

"That's so," said Dick; "I'll go and find her."

And as soon as he had filled a wonderful plateful for Norry he prepared a second, and went down to the floor below, where Mrs. James's own little room was situated. A knock was answered by rather a wail of "Come in"; and entering, Dick found the old woman weeping, rocking herself back and forth, and mopping her eyes alternately on the end of her shawl and her apron.

"Oh, wirra! wirra! Come in, my darling, till you hear," she began; and then related her adventure of the afternoon. Nearly all her nuts and apples had been stolen by mischievous boys, and not a bit of redress could she get.

"And the rint due to-morrow! Ah, wirra! wirra!"

"I wish I'd been around," Dick exclaimed. "I think I'd like to have my fist against their heads."

This pugnacious sentiment seemed to comfort the poor woman, and the sight of the tempting plateful was even more substantial consolation, so that Dick left her quite ready to feel that something lucky might "turn up" before the next night. "Well, she's worse off even than we are," the lad thought, as he mounted the stairs; "but I suppose somebody always is worse off than somebody else," and a dim feeling came across his mind that all—all, even the very "worst off," had One to go to, to ask, to trust in.

The two boys had very little chance of any religion just then, I fear, for young people must have guidance, and since the mother's death Dick's one thought had been to hide from "institution people," and earn enough to keep himself and Norry even a little warm and tolerably fed. No one must suppose Dick a model boy, for he was often rough, fighting his way among other boys, and rude in his ways and speech; but the lessons of good, the standard for right and wrong, which the mother had implanted in her children, could not but bear good fruit.

Dick found Norry lying back with a most superior expression of content after finishing his plateful, and when Dick said, "There you are, sir—one ice-cream!" he laughed almost hysterically. Dick told him all about the young people at Dr. Field's, and saved for a final bonne bouche the news of Master Dick's intended visit, and the fact that he had bestowed upon him twenty-five cents. Altogether both the boys as they fell asleep declared this had been a wonderful day.

Early the next morning Dick began some of his preparations for the important visitor. He had rather strange ideas, I am afraid, on the subject of housekeeping, and it is hard to make an attic with a broken window and no carpet, and only a straw mattress for a bed, and an old chair and still older table as furniture, look very like a drawing-room on reception-day. But Dick, as he said, "cleaned up," and their one ornament, a large picture from an illustrated paper, was repinned on a more conspicuous part of the wall.

After some debate between the boys it was decided to spend about ten cents upon a plant, their country bringing up suggesting flowers as the best things to brighten any dull place. So a geranium was found for the money, and when Dick had placed it on the table, he felt that the appearance of the room really did them credit.

They decided to save their fire until about an hour in advance of Master Dick's arrival, and the better to strengthen the blaze, Dick went to a neighboring street where building was going on, and obtained a pile of shavings.

The last performance was dressing Norry, who felt very stately, sitting up in bed ready to receive the guests.

Then the fire was allowed to blaze up, which it did, just as though it knew how much was required of it, and when a neighboring clock struck three the two boys found themselves full of suppressed excitement.

* Begun in No. 159, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

CHAPTER VI.

THE WELCOME VISIT.

A low rat-tat-tat sounded on the attic door.

"There!" cried Dick, jumping up and opening the door. Behold! there was young Dearing, his hands full of parcels, and a beaming expression on his good-humored face.

Whatever the young fellow may have thought of his host's apartment, he did not show any surprise. He put down his parcels and went straight up to Norry.

"Well, how do you do?" he said, and took the blind boy's thin hand kindly in his own warm, boyish grasp.

"I'm so glad you came, sir," said Dick Devine. "It isn't much of a place to bring you to, but—"

"Oh, cut that!" said Dearing, in his off-hand way: "I like nothing better. How clean you've got it! I wish you could see my work-room out at The Cedars—that's grandfather's country place, you know. But here, let's open the parcels."

As the boys began, making strings and papers fly in their eagerness, Dearing whispered to Dick, "I got him some noisy things, 'cause he can't see, you know."

And then was disclosed a very good accordion. Dick exclaimed, with delight:

"Oh, how glad I am! He had one once, and could play a tune on it." And as soon as it was placed in Norry's hands, and he had expressed his thanks, he began fumbling with the keys, at last bringing forth "Home, sweet Home."

"It was a man who lived near us in the country who taught him," Dick explained; "and mother always wished he could learn music, he loves it so."

"Why, yes, and then he might have a hand-organ," said Dearing. But even Dick's imagination refused to take in a picture of little Norry with a hand-organ strapped to his back, and he added, "But I don't suppose they teach hand-organs; you just sort of turn 'em."

The other parcels contained one or two games, a lot of marbles, a top, and a big ball. When Dick Dearing's imagination had gone thus far in his purchases it had failed him; but he announced at once his desire to purchase for Norry "something alive."

"I thought of a dog," he said—"a real smart little dog, and you could train him to lead Norry around."

After this it was almost impossible to express surprise, gratitude, or any emotion, for apparently wonders would never cease while Dick Dearing was around.

The two older boys decided to go out to "a man Dear-

"BEHOLD! THERE WAS YOUNG DEARING."

ing knew" for the purchase of the dog, leaving Norry happy with his accordion. If Master Dick had wanted any reward for the expenditure of his pocket-money he had it when he returned with a little dog warranted to be quick and good-tempered, and "just the thing for a blind boy."

With the keen instincts of the blind, Norry seemed at once to understand the little animal and to win it to him. When the question of naming it came up he declared it ought to be called something that would mean how glad he was to get it. So Dearing said that his sister Barbara was "awfully quick" about such things, and he would get her to choose a name.

An hour was delightfully whiled away by the boys. Dearing told them all about his grandfather's country place at Marplains, in New Jersey—how glad he always was to go there. He had a pony and a dog of his own, and Barbara had a goat carriage.

Norry thought he could listen forever. "Where is Marplains?" he asked.

"Oh, about twenty miles from New York, on the Field and Dearing Railroad. Sometimes we drive there."

Then Dick Devine told how they had been brought up in the country until last year, how he had always gone to school, and how he wished he could again. Upon this Master Dick made a wry face.

"It's a jolly good thing you don't have to," he exclaimed. "I wish I didn't have to grind away at it. I think a lot of the things they do at our school is just on purpose to torment boys and make 'em hurry and grow up; and grandfather's always telling me I must get prizes."

All of this was very entertaining, for I am inclined to think Master Dick liked to talk quite as well as the other two to listen; but five o'clock struck, and the visit had to come to an end.

As Devine was escorting his new friend down the stairs he told him by chance about the loss poor Mrs. James had endured. It was only a dollar, but to the old apple woman it seemed a small fortune. Then nothing would suit Master Dick's generous mood but to go to the stall and surprise Mrs. James with the money. Nothing, I am sure, could have surprised her more. She poured forth so many thanks and blessings that Dick Dearing had to fairly run away, but not before he had promised his new friend to come again soon.

Perhaps on his way home Dick had just a little pang as he remembered the last twenty-five cents of his savings was gone. Still, there had been a good deal of fun as well as comfort in the day. But even when satisfied by recalling the delight of those he had helped he little knew what a store he had laid up for the future, just how the bread he had this day cast upon the waters was to come back to him—a thing no one of us in any good or kindly action can tell, for even though there be no reward that is visible, it is written somewhere, and, like all good seed, must bear an eternal fruit. If Dick's tree blossomed forth in a way that he could see and feel, it would not make less necessary those kindly deeds whose reward comes not in things earthly.

WHO DR. JOHN HUNTER WAS.

BY WILLIAM H. RIDEING.

THIS knowledge of dumb animals and his amusing stories about his pets have made Frank Buckland's name familiar to most readers, and especially to those boys who are interested in natural history. He has done more than any one else to make the animal world known to man, and his writings about the creatures he studied seem like stories of private life.

A few weeks before his death I sat with him in the study of his house in Albany Street, London, chatting with him about his favorite pursuit. Upon his shoulder sat Margate Jack, a very small monkey. A still smaller monkey had crawled into my lap, where it took advantage of the situation by gnawing apart my silk watch guard.

The chair which Mr. Buckland filled was singularly massive, and he called my attention to a medallion inserted in the back, which announced that this heavy and ancient-looking piece of furniture had been made out of the bedstead of John Hunter. I soon learned that John Hunter was a man for whom Mr. Buckland had the greatest reverence.

"A canvasser called on me in behalf of some hospital the other day," he said, brusquely, "and I asked him if he knew who John Hunter was. It was enough for me when he said, 'No.' He didn't get any money out of me. None of my money goes to a hospital whose canvassers do not know John Hunter."

It was very evident that not to know John Hunter was a very great offense in Mr. Buckland's eyes, and I did not feel quite at ease, as I too shared the canvasser's ignorance. We both ought to have known, for he was one of the most useful men the world has ever had. He was one of the greatest of surgeons, and his researches and experiments have been of the greatest value to his profession. At the time of his death Dr. Hunter had anatomized over five hundred different species of animals, some of them repeatedly, and had made numerous dissections of plants. His manuscripts are stated by one of his biographers to have been "literally a cart-load." It is worth our while to find out something about him, because he was not only a learned man, but one whose methods of work were full of interest and suggestiveness.

Dr. John Hunter was born at Long Calderwood, Lanarkshire, Scotland, in 1728, and he died in London in 1793. In his boyhood he undertook to learn cabinet-making, but at the age of seventeen he gave up this trade in order to study surgery with his elder brother William. While he was yet a young man his name became widely known as that of a most successful surgeon. He constantly wrote books explaining the results of his researches, and began to be referred to as the best authority on subjects connected with anatomy.

Mr. Buckland used to say that personal experiment was the best way to study the natural sciences—that a boy with a trowel and a pair of scissors in the field, a hammer among the rocks, and the smallest chemical laboratory in the house, could learn more of botany, geology, and chemistry in a week than by a month's reading, unless the reading was followed by experiments. The secret of John Hunter's success was that he was always experimenting in every direction, always trying to learn more about things than books could tell him.

For the purpose of his experiments he made his house and grounds a museum and menagerie, and the small boys of his time anxiously peeped through the chinks at some of the wonders the walls inclosed. He had strange creatures from all parts of the globe—the queerest of birds, the oddest of beasts, the rarest of fish, and sometimes a few giants and dwarfs. All round the house was a covered cloister, dug about six feet into the earth, and in this he kept a stock of bats, dormice, snakes, and snails. He was very fond of experimenting with hedgehogs, and in letters to his friend Dr. Jenner, the great discoverer of vaccination, he wrote at various times as follows:

"I received yours, with hedgehog, but want more. I want you to get a hedgehog in the middle of winter, and weigh him. Put him into your garden, and let him have some leaves, hay, or straw to cover himself, which he will do; then weigh him in the spring, and see what he has lost. Secondly, I want you to kill one in the beginning of winter, to see how fat he is, and another in the spring, to see what he has lost of his fat. . . . If you can send me a colony of hedgehogs I shall be glad, as I have expended all I had but two; one an eagle ate, and a ferret caught the other. . . . Can you send me more hedgehogs this spring? All those you sent me died, so that I am hedgehogless."

Nothing was too small or too large for him. At another time he had a whale brought up to his house, and dissected it in his laboratory.

There was a conservatory which was wholly given up to bees, of which he was very fond, and a pond in which he kept a stock of fish, frogs, and leeches, and in which also he tried to make pearls by putting strange substances into oysters for them to form on. Elsewhere in the grounds there were dens, sties, stables, and bear-pits.

Though the little boys of the neighborhood peeped in, they scarcely had courage enough to trespass. The front of the house was awful to look at. Four stone lions guarded the double flight of steps leading to the vestibule, two standing at the top and two lying down at the bottom. Over the front door was the tremendously wide mouth of a crocodile, and on each side of the area was an immense pyramid of curious shells. The cries of the queer birds and animals sounded ghostly in the twilight; savage dogs, half jackal, roamed about the grounds, and occasionally a young leopard could be seen winding with stealthy grace in and out of the shrubbery. The simple villagers of Kensington looked on the doctor with some suspicion, and called him "the cunning man."

The disorder made by his pets was not liked by Mrs. Hunter, and she took possession herself of the upper floors of the house, which in contrast with the lower ones were daintily furnished and decorated.

"I'll be bound to say," said Mr. Buckland, laughingly, "she used occasionally to lead him a life, and scold him well if he did not confine his subjects to his own part of the house."

No doubt she did, and no wonder.

The house is at Earls Court, between London and Kensington, and it is still standing, though Dr. John has been dead ninety years.

Dr. John was a very busy man, not wholly occupied with experiments. He was Surgeon Extraordinary to the King, and Deputy Surgeon-General to the British army. Much of his time was spent with private patients, some in the medical colleges with his students, and some in the great hospitals, where he did much to cure the pains of the suffering poor. His work at home was a relaxation to him, and we have a picture of him driving to Earls Court in a carriage drawn by tame buffaloes.

He made playfellows of some of his pets, which were not always as good-natured as he was. He had a young bull given to him by the Queen, with which he used to wrestle and play, amusing himself with its exertions in its own defense. In one of those contests the bull got him down, and was angrily attacking him, when one of the servants came by and frightened it away.

Another of his adventures was still more exciting. While he was working in the house he and the other members of the family were alarmed by loud and savage noises in the garden. Two untamed leopards which he kept chained in an out-house had broken from their confinement, and got into the yard with the dogs, and a fierce encounter was going on. Instantly, though he was quite unarmed, the doctor rushed out. He seized one of the leopards, which was engaged with the dogs, by the collar, and while holding this one, grasped the other, which was escaping over the garden wall, by the tail, and then triumphantly led both of them back to their quarters.

I have only pointed out a few characteristics of this great man; but a great surgeon has said of him that, with the exception of Sir Isaac Newton, no one in recent times has done so much for the science of medicine, and therefore to relieve the sufferings of mankind.

LAWN POOL.

BY SHERWOOD RYSE.

SINCE its younger rival, lawn tennis, entered the field, croquet has "had its nose put out of joint," and it is now so rarely seen that it is quite a curiosity. But there still remain people who cherish a spark of tender feeling for poor croquet, and one of these has lately invented a game that is at once very like it and very unlike.

The new game is called Imperial Croquet, or Lawn Pool. Doubtless it will soon be known only by its second title. It is more scientific than croquet as ordinarily played, and it is more easily mastered than lawn tennis. At the same time it does not call for so much active exertion as the latter game.

Briefly the game is this: Nine balls are placed on nine stakes set in the ground in much the same relative positions as croquet wickets, and the object of the players is to hit the stakes in regular order, so as to knock the balls off them. The balls on the stakes are numbered, and every ball that is dislodged from its stake counts to the score of the player who dislodged it as many points as the number on the ball.

And first, to describe the stakes and balls: As the stakes—or pedestals, as they are called—are very prettily painted, they would soon be disfigured by being hammered into the ground. Accordingly, wooden sockets, the shape of a cornucopia such as candies are put up in, but narrower in proportion to length, are driven into the ground, and the stakes fit into them. Thus, when the sockets are once driven, the whole apparatus may be removed or replaced in a few minutes. Moreover, the lawn-mower may be run over the sockets without injury either to itself or to them.

The balls are of two sorts, but both sorts are exactly like croquet balls. First, there are nine balls painted in solid colors, and numbered, there being two each marked 2, 4, 6, 8, and one marked 10. These nine balls are placed on the pedestals. Then there are four players' balls with a red stripe for the one side and four with a blue stripe for the other. Besides these there are mallets exactly like those used in croquet, and a counting-string composed of a row of little wooden balls or buttons running on a string, such as is used to mark the game in billiards. All these things—sockets, stakes, mallets, balls, and counters—are sold in a box at very moderate prices; in fact, one great advantage that lawn pool enjoys is that it is so inexpensive an amusement.

The plan of setting out the stakes is shown in the diagram. The sides having been chosen, the first player—with a blue-striped ball—aims at the first stake and dislodges the ball; he then plays for the next stake, and perhaps he misses it. His turn is over, and one of his opponents plays with a red-striped ball. Now, supposing that this player makes his first stake (counting two to his side), and finds that his opponent's ball is easier to hit, he may play at either a ball or a stake. If he hits a stake in its proper order he adds to his score the number of that stake, but if he hits a ball he may do one of several things. If the ball is an enemy's ball, first he adds its number to his score, then he may use the ball in exactly the same manner as in croquet—he may "tight croquet" it or "loose croquet" it. The act of hitting a ball, whether it be that of friend or foe, entitles a player to two strokes, which are played in exactly the same manner as in croquet; but if the ball struck is a friend, the two strokes are all the player gets. He is not allowed to add the friendly ball's number to his score.

It will be seen that lawn pool is in many respects very much like croquet, the principal points of difference being that stakes are the objects of the aim instead of hoops, and that the winning side is that which has scored the largest number in the game, and not the side that has gone all the way around the course soonest.

A GAME OF LAWN POOL.

When a ball has gone all the way around, striking all the stakes in proper order except the finishing stake, it becomes a "king ball," and enjoys all the privileges that a "rover" has in croquet. At the same time, there are certain penalties attaching to this otherwise independent ball. A king ball plays in his regular turn; he may help his friends or harass his enemies, but he must not strike a stake, otherwise he loses the number of the ball on that stake. To make up for this, however, he is allowed to add to his score the number of any ball that he may hit, whether friend or foe. Thus the king ball can make himself very useful to his friends and very annoying to his opponents. When all the balls on both sides are king balls, or have hit the final stake, the side having the largest score is declared the winner.

The proper number of players is four on each side, but as few as one on each side may play: in this case each player should use two balls. A game in which there should be only one ball on each side would probably be voted "slow," and certainly there would be little scope for good tactics. If three persons wish to play, the best and the worst player (with one ball each) should play as partners against the other player with two balls.

When two good players are engaged, the game will be found more interesting if they play a double round; that is, go over the course twice instead of once. Thus the lucky accident of a very good start does not count for so much as in a short game, since the other player has more time to make up the distance between them. A very good player—especially when he plays last, so that he has several balls to use to help himself along—will sometimes make his ball a king ball in one turn, if they are playing a single round.

Although among good players skillful tactics generally win the game, yet the best of generals can not win unless his men are fairly well equipped, and in lawn pool a practiced shot will often be able by his superior shooting skill to offset the advantage which his opponent may have in a "long head." First, therefore, acquire a straight aim at reasonably long distances; but do not allow yourself to be careless in what appear to be easy shots, and do not attempt a long shot when an easier one presents itself.

In the old days of croquet there was a general disposition among players, both old and young, to cheat. Why it should have been considered almost excusable to cheat at croquet, when it would have been thought disgraceful to take an unfair advantage in other games, it is difficult to say. Perhaps people thought that as it was open cheating there was no harm; and if one cheats so that others can see it, certainly it is not so much wrong as foolish.

It is as though each player should make his own rules. Rules are necessary to every game; in fact, the rules are the game, and unless you play according to them you play neither lawn pool nor croquet, nor any other game. When once the few simple rules of lawn pool are mastered, it will be found a fascinating amusement for summer days when it is too warm for games requiring more violent exercise.

A RIDE ON OLD HOVER.

THE PICNIC AT PINE CENTRE.

BY MRS. M. E. SANGSTER.

HALF a dozen houses had subsided into quiet after an unusual amount of stir and flurry, one lovely summer morning, among the green hills of Vermont.

Baskets, pails, bundles, and children were all mingled in confusion at Deacon Bates's gate, from which the load was to start.

"Now, Polly Anne," said Mrs. Bates to her red-checked daughter, "be sure you look out for Miss Rosalie. She's not so strong as the rest of you. Don't neglect her, dear."

"I'll do my best," said Polly Anne, slipping from the detaining hand, and climbing to her place.

"Miss Rosalie!" she whispered, in an aside to Araminta Guest, a shade of contempt in her tone. "How can I take care of her? She's gold."

Araminta returned a glance of sympathy. Little Rosalie, already lifted up over the wheel by brother Jed, saw and heard nothing.

"All aboard!" cried Uncle John, with a merry twinkle in his eyes. And with a snap of the whip, the horses were off at a rollicking pace for the "Centre."

A month ago if anybody had told Rosalie's mother that she could be without her darling for a whole summer, that summer to be spent by the child with comparative strangers, she would have declared the thing impossible.

But Dr. Haswell, worn out by overwork, broke down suddenly, and his physicians said nothing would save life and reason but a season of complete rest at the German baths. They discouraged the mother's desire that Rosalie should go too. Mrs. Haswell would have enough to do, they fancied, in taking care of the doctor.

"Besides, madam," said bluff Professor Harkinson, "Rosie needs a summer up-country, with children of her own age to play with. Send her to some plain farmhouse, and let her nurse go along, and you'll find her worthy of her name when you come back."

Naturally, in this emergency, the mother's thoughts turned to Deacon Bates and his wife, whom she had known from childhood, and it was all arranged so promptly that within a week Rosalie was established there with the faithful Bettine, and her parents were out on the Atlantic. Things followed each other so quickly that mother and child had scarcely time to realize their parting till the sea was between them.

Uncle John, on the front seat, had eyes perhaps in the back of his head, as the picnickers went bowling over the road. At any rate he noticed that the little city girl was rather lonesome, so he asked her to come and sit by himself, while Ames Darbee changed places with her.

It was splendid to ride beside the kind man, who glanced keenly from under his shaggy gray eyebrows, and saw the longing look in the wistful little face.

"Wants her folks, I reckon," he said, and then set himself to cheer her up.

Meanwhile an animated conversation went on behind them in very low voices, alas!

"Proud!" said Polly Anne. "My! you never saw such dresses and hats—a red parasol, and shoes enough to set up a store!"

"She don't know one single thing!" was Jerusha Dean's exclamation. "Afraid of the gobbler and of the geese, and runs away from old Brindle—the peacefulest cow! My mother says she don't believe in bringing girls up to do nothing but play the piano and dance."

"She's brought her nurse with her. Thirteen, and has a nurse tagging after her!"

"That big girl!" said Lidie Stelle, with profound surprise. "Polly, what does the nurse do for her?"

"Everything," said Polly—"combs her hair, mends her kid gloves, brushes her dresses, goes with her wherever she goes. When she's home Bettine takes her to school, and goes after her when it's out, and always escorts her to the Park, unless the sweet pet's mamma goes instead."

"Stuck-up thing!" said Mattie Keyes.

"Why didn't the nurse come to the picnic?" asked little Sue Parsons, who privately thought this talk rather mean, and who liked Rosalie's looks.

"Sick headache," said Polly, briefly. "Wanted Miss Rosie to stay at home, only ma said it would be too bad, and put the dear child under my care."

As they drove on, the day grew hotter. "The breeze came in puffs, and died away. The sun sent his fierce rays down on the fields and the highway, and Uncle John wiped his brow with his silk bandana, and felt relieved as he drew rein in the grove.

"We're going to have a steamer to-day," he remarked. "You youngsters had better not exercise too much."

"Oh, it's cool under the trees, and we're too far up the mountain to feel the heat much," said Ames Darbee, with confidence.

Polly Anne, who was not, after all, without some good traits, did not neglect Rosalie. The little maiden was allowed to help set the table, squeeze the lemons, and prepare the dinner, though the girls let her see that they thought her clumsy in doing for the first time what they did every day.

One and another began to tell of the bread they had made, of the jelly and the cakes which were the products of their own skill.

"I have been to cooking school," said Rosalie, shyly.

Just then, unfortunately, the coffee-pot, set for Uncle John's benefit on a fire of brush-wood lighted in a hollow between two blackened stones, boiled over.

Lidie Stelle flew to the rescue. "If I'd been at a cooking school," she said, "I'd have watched the coffee-pot if I'd been the nearest one to it."

Rosie's lip quivered, but she held her little head high.

"It was not her place to attend to the coffee, Lidie Stelle," said Polly Anne. "Come away, Rosie, and have a swing."

Ames Darbee and Frank Parsons were on the alert, and swung the girls as high as they wished to go. Most of them enjoyed the swift steady flight through the air, but it alarmed Rosalie, and she pleaded to stop before she had had half a good swing. The old cat died at last, and Polly assisted out a child with a pale face, who was indeed very nearly seasick.

"Pouf!" thought Polly Anne, "what a baby! Why, I wouldn't mind going to the top of the tallest tree here."

But Rosalie was not the coward they fancied her, as some of them were to find out before the day was ended; nor yet was she a dunce.

When dinner was over somebody proposed an expedition to a pond where the boys were sure there were lots of fish aching to be caught.

Uncle John was a famous fisherman. He declared that the fish knew too much to be wiled out of the water in the middle of such a hot day. "Remember, children," he said, "that long meadow on Sim's Hill is an awful stretch through the sun."

"Oh, it won't hurt us!" declared the boys and girls.

So, leaving Uncle John to sit on a cool rock with little Sue Parsons on his knee, and Rosalie beside him, the rest tramped bravely toward the pond, with their fishing-tackle and baskets.

Some time had passed—Rosalie never knew how long, for she had fallen asleep in the midst of one of the old man's stories, and was with her mamma in a charming dream—when there was a sudden outcry.

She awakened to see the children dragging themselves into the clearing, pale and exhausted, and as she looked a dreadful thing happened. Polly Anne, the color faded out of the ruddy cheeks, a vacant stare in the black eyes, sunk in a heap on the ground at Uncle John's feet.

"She's overcome by the sun!" exclaimed he, dazed. "And I don't know what to do for her first. What will the Deacon say?"

"Somebody should go for the doctor, if there's one anywhere round," suggested Ames.

"Put some water on her head," said Uncle John, "and maybe she'll come round. I'll go for Dr. Anselm. He's on the turnpike, a mile below."

But Rosalie Haswell was not a doctor's daughter for nothing. She had happened, a year or two before, to have been in her father's office one day when a sun-struck patient had been hastily carried in from the street. Hidden behind the curtains, her presence had been unobserved, and when Dr. Haswell discovered later that she had been a witness to his treatment, he had said, jestingly,

"Well, little woman, you'll know what to do if you're ever called upon in a hurry."

Into the midst of the weeping and wailing a clear and imperative voice broke with the ring of command:

"We must not wait for the Doctor. There was a good lump of ice left from the lemonade, and Lidie wrapped it in the blanket; Frank, will you crush it into small pieces and bring it here, please. Miuta, isn't there some dry mustard in a box in our basket?"

Without haste, but with no delay, the capable girl, who knew what she was about, had put crushed ice on Polly Anne's head, and mustard draughts, spread on strips of her own fine handkerchief, at her wrists and feet.

By the time Uncle John with the Doctor came up the steep road as fast as Dr. Anselm's mare could trot, Polly Anne had revived, had said she felt better, and had been sternly forbidden by the little Doctor to say another word.

As for Dr. Anselm, he almost hugged Rosalie on the spot, and praised her presence of mind till the wild-flower face was dyed with blushes as deep as the hue of a Jacqueminot.

It was a quiet party which wended its way homeward in the cool of the evening. Polly Anne's head ached, and she was very still indeed, and down in her heart there was another pain, which did not go away till she had confessed to Rosalie that she had behaved unkindly, and had received her full forgiveness. From the day of the picnic the children were all very fond of Rosalie, and for her sake accepted Bettine as their companion on many a pleasant excursion. But I have not told you the crowning joy of the day to Rosalie. When she went to her white-draped chamber, ready to go to bed, her nurse handed her a thick letter with a foreign stamp. It was from Carlsbad, and mamma wrote that dear papa was better.

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS,

AUTHOR OF "PRINCESS IDELWAYS," "PHIL'S FAIRIES," ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

PAZ, taking a long breath, and looking at Leo to see the effect of his narrative, went on:

"It was quite time for me to be on land, for in the moonlight, which bathed everything in silver, were to be seen troops of fays hurrying to the festival. Some sailed along the shore in mussel shells, others were on the backs of black swans whose bills looked like coral, and others were skimming along with their own gauzy wings, or lolling luxuriously on the feathers of flamingoes.

"I joined the ones on foot, and with them reached the plantation, which presented a scene of great brilliancy.

Gold and silver ferns hedged the rose-leaf path which led to the bower of beauty; on every leaf were myriads of fire-flies, and glowing from higher plants bearing many-hued flowers were Brazilian beetles. Plunging into the thicket, I made a hasty toilet at a brook-side, and then rejoined the advancing guests. The bell-bird could be heard clearly summoning our approach, while sweetest warblers poured out their melody. The throne was formed of the Santo-Spirito flowers, and beneath the wings of its dove-like calyx was the lovely fay in whose honor was all this gayety, surrounded by her young companions.

"Approaching quickly, I unstrapped my package, took the satin case from my pocket, and fell upon my knees in the customary manner; perceiving which, the beautiful being motioned for me to rise, and with the most unassuming grace received my burden. As she unfolded the lace from its silken cover a cry of delight escaped her, and shaking out its gossamer folds, she threw it over her head. With all the care I could use I had laid bare the block of ice, which shone like silver in the moonbeams, and now with a sudden blow of my dagger I cleft the ice, and lifted out the wreath, placing it as I did so on the head of the fay.

"There was no time for ceremony. Had I waited to pass it from hand to hand of the attendants it would have been gone. There was a hush over all as I crowned the fay. Each snowy star stood out in perfect beauty. She alone could not see its peerless charm. But I had provided for this. Chipping off a thin layer of the ice block, I laid a silver-lined leaf from a neighboring bough behind it, and held this mirror before the fay's wondering eyes. Never have I seen anything so beautiful or so fleeting. Even as I held the reflected image before its reality, drops as of dew began falling over the lace, and in a moment the wreath was gone.

"Like a little child robbed of a treasure, the look of wonder and delight gave place to one of bewildered disappointment. She turned a questioning gaze upon me.

"Alas!" said I, "most sovereign lady, 'tis not in elfin power to reproduce this wreath; it was the emblem of human life, as brief, as fleeting. My Queen desired me to bring it. I have met with great difficulties in so doing, but none has saddened me like your disappointment."

"With eager sweetness she bade her cavaliers respond. They assured me of her gratitude and delight, and bade me welcome. The warbling birds again started their liquid strains, and a mazy dance began which resembled a fluttering band of snowy butterflies tangled in a silvery web. Slipping off, I came to the side of a lake on which were boats and Indian canoes of the moccasin flower. Here I rested, watching the measures of the dance, and taking little refreshing sips of cocoa-nut milk. A swift-winged night-hawk having been placed at my disposal, I had a safe and speedy journey home."

"And is that all?" inquired Leo.

"Yes," said Paz, "for here comes Master Knops."

Leo thanked Paz warmly, and turned toward Knops, who, with hat in hand, stood gravely waiting to speak.

"Is it the wish of Prince Leo to make further explorations, or will he now return to his father and his home?"

With some self-reproach at having quite forgotten that he had a father and a home, Leo said he was ready to return.

"And may his humble servants, the distinguished servant Paz and the Master Professor Knops, have the pleasant assurance of Prince Leo's satisfaction at this visit?" asked Knops, still in the most formal manner.

"I can not thank you half as I should like to do," replied Leo, "but I hope to be able to show you that your entertainment and instruction have not been wasted."

"Come, then, we will go."

"Adieu," said Paz. "Look out for me some fine frosty night when you are skating. You may think you see some of your furry friends started out of their winter sleep, but just give a whistle, and say 'Paz,' and I will be with you."

"Good-by," said Leo. "I hope it will be soon that I shall see you."

But Knops was off and he had to follow. Away they went, climbing and clambering, slipping and sliding, crawling and jumping, through forests of coal, over mines of iron, and beside walls glittering with silver. Presently, however, Leo found himself where they had started from, viz., his own cellar door, and Knops preparing to leave him. Dropping his ceremonious manner, he said:

"I am sorry to bid you farewell, my dear boy; I have become heartily interested in you and your welfare. The only souvenir I have to offer is this little compass; it is a mere trifle, but the needle has the power of finding precious metals. Learn how to make it useful. Good-by."

"GOOD-EVENING, MY DEAR PRINCE."

Leo found himself alone. He pushed open the cellar door, and mounted the steps to the kitchen. It was early morning, and the cocks were crowing lustily. The one old deaf woman was striving to make a fire burn, but the wood was wet and she found it difficult.

"Where are all the people?" shouted Leo in her ear, for he well knew her infirmity.

"Gone—all gone," she answered.

"And my father, where is he?"

"In bed yet, and he had better stay there, for I've no breakfast for him."

Leo suspected what was the matter. Taking a basket from a peg and a bowl from the dresser, he went out into the fields. Everything was sodden with the rain, but the birds were singing with all their might; those that were not were repairing the ravages of the storm.

"Even the birds are busy at their nests," thought Leo; "everything, every creature, has its work to do. Shall I alone be idle? Never."

Putting aside the wet boughs which sprinkled him well, he sought an old tree trunk for its store of honey. Filling his bowl with this, and his basket with fresh eggs, he returned to the monastery. Here he helped the old woman with the fire, and between them they soon had the kettle steaming. The tray with his father's breakfast was made ready, and with his own hands he took it to him.

"Leo, my long-lost son," exclaimed Morpheus at sight of him, "where have you spent the night?"

"In Dream-land," was Leo's reply; and then, without preface, he asked of his parent the privilege of looking over his accounts, and doing what he could to assist him in his difficulties. Morpheus smiled indifferently, but gave Leo his keys, with permission to do as he pleased.

All the morning Leo puzzled his brain examining books and papers, with little result. Then he saddled his horse, rode into the nearest town, and sought a lawyer whom his father knew. To him he related their grievances, telling him that he was sure their property, well managed, could be made to yield handsome returns, and informing him of his wonderful compass, which could indicate the presence of minerals. The lawyer was not very sanguine, but he put a young clerk in charge of the matter, who, becoming much interested, took up his residence at the monastery, and went to work with diligence. Under his guidance Leo studied and strove to regain their former prosperity. Laborers were eager to resume their duties as soon as they saw the prospect of payment. Crops became abundant. By the aid of Leo's compass—which was only a scientific novelty yet to be discovered—mines were opened and vast wealth displayed.

And Leo had become a different lad. No longer idle and careless, with slow and lingering tread, he was now alert, vigorous, and manly. The servants were glad to return and obey his wishes. The monastery was rebuilt and repaired. Lawns and gardens were in trim array. Warm tapestries and curtains lined the bare halls and windows, while ivy and rose vines clambered without.

Even Morpheus, roused from his invalidism, rewrote his poems, sent them to a publisher, and favored all his friends with copies bound in blue velvet, with his monogram in silver on the covers. His pride in his son became so great that at Leo's request he undertook to renew the library, and the time that he had spent in bed was devoted to the step-ladder. It was in this way he discovered that their name had been incorrectly written. For his own part he did not care to make any change, but he insisted that Leo should use the portion omitted, which an old copy of the Doomsday-book had revealed to him, and sign himself in full, "Leo Sans Lazybones."

Christmas was approaching, not a green Christmas, but an icy, snowy, frozen one, with holly wreaths on his shoulders and a plum-pudding in his hands.

The monastery was full of guests, relatives of Morpheus. These guests were all poor—in one way—but they had a wealth of their own which made them delightful to Leo. They were poets and painters and scribblers, and as merry as larks; and as they all admired each other's productions, there was no end of cheerful nonsense. The children, however, were the brightest of all. Each child was as merry as it was lovely, and the painters were almost frantic in their efforts to make Christmas cards of them, while the poets edged their brains for rhymes.

To prevent too much industry in that way Leo had induced them all to put on their skates on Christmas-eve, and glide over the frozen ponds, while he made ready the tree which stood in the great hall.

It was an immense spruce, all powdered with silvery fringe, and Leo had only to tie on the little gilt tags numbered to correspond with the packages of gifts, which were heaped on surrounding tables, and fasten on the candles of red and blue wax. When this was done he put on his own skates, for it was yet too early to light the tree, and away he went skimming after the shouting, laughing crowd of friends and relatives.

Suddenly a squirrel darted from its hole and went scudding across the river. Leo started in pursuit, giving a low whistle. Instantly it stopped, sat upon its haunches, threw off its skin, and out stepped Paz.

"Good - evening, my dear Prince, good - evening; we are well met; just in time to exchange Christmas greetings. I have been looking for you lately, but you seemed always so occupied that there was no chance for me. You have no idea how pleased Knops is to hear of your prosperity. He has sent for me a dozen times lately merely to express his satisfaction; and he wants me to ask a favor of you, which I know already you will grant."

"Anything in my power, dear Paz," replied Leo, eagerly.

"Of course; and we know how good a use you make of your power. Times are greatly changed. You are benefiting every one about you; I hear it on all sides. We are proud to be your friends. All that Knops asks is that in clearing up your property, and cutting down all the rank growth of weeds, you will spare a patch of wild flowers here and there, and all the empty birds' nests. Leave these for the use of our children, and we will be greatly obliged."

"But that is a mere nothing; can I in any other way serve you?" asked Leo.

"No," said Paz, "not that I know of. I am on my way now to see some new minerals supposed to be similar to those of the moon. I haven't much faith in them."

"How about the diamonds?"

"Don't mention them. I shall never try my hand at those again; and you, if you are wise, will be contented to let nature remain her own chemist. Adieu. A very merry Christmas to you."

"The same to you," echoed Leo, but Paz was already muffled in his furs and running rapidly away.

THE END.

HAYDEN AND HIS EDUCATED FIG.

LITTLE POLLY.

Little Polly is thirsty, as plainly you see, And I think, children dear, that you all will agree, When people are thirsty there's nothing so nice As a glass of clear water that sparkle like ice. It was drawn from the well where the shadows are deep, And far from the sunshine the crystal drops sleep; So now little Polly may skip off to play, She won't need a drink for at least half a day.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

NEW YORK CITY.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I have read the story of Freddie Schultz in HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE of July 31, and think he was a very cool-headed boy. I think you would like to hear of another boy, who is spending the vacation at the Dutchess House, Pawling, New York, and who did a very brave thing last year. One day last summer he and his brother Eddie were down by a brook in Patterson, New York. He suddenly saw smoke and fire coming out from under a bridge over which the cars had to pass. He knew that the eastern passenger train would be due in a few minutes, and if the engineer was not warned a terrible accident would happen. He left his brother, and ran as fast as he could, waving his hands and shouting loud. A quarter of a mile on the train came along at full speed. Little Stuart at last succeeded in attracting the engineer's attention, and he shut off steam; the train was stopped, and no harm done. If Stuart had not given the alarm, many lives would have been lost, for the flames rose twenty feet in the air by the time the train had stopped. The boy's name is Stuart Patterson, and he is now twelve years old. He never got a medal for this act, or had any particular thanks, as far as I know. I believe that the passengers do not even know of their narrow escape.

GERALD G. M.

Although this little hero did not receive a reward, he merited one, which was better. There are a great many unknown heroes, and I like to think that God keeps a record of them, and that though they miss the praise of men, their heavenly Father is pleased with them. I have no doubt that somebody somewhere every day does heroic, prompt, resolute things which help others, and save the world from a great deal of trouble and pain. Whenever we hear of a boy or girl who thinks quickly, acts wisely, and makes no fuss, not trying to be thanked, we are glad to tell the rest of the young people about the deed, and to publish the name of the doer. It is a grand thing to be remembered for what one has done, and it is grand to have done a thing worth remembering, even if it seems to be forgotten. So I thank you for telling us the story of how Stuart saved the train.

GERMANIA, FLORIDA.

I would like to tell you about a drive and a party we have had. My cousin Eddie came to stay with us, and he was just crazy to drive, so we hitched up the mule and wagon, and got down the hill, and Eddie did not know which way to turn, and he went around by the spring, and it is a very short turn, and he upset the wagon, and the man fixed the wagon, and we went on, and got a little farther, when the mule began to run. Eddie was so frightened he jumped. The mule and out of the wagon, but I turned the mule so that he faced home, then I got out, and the mule started pell-mell for home, with neither of us in the wagon. But we ran after, and caught him at the foot of the hill, and we got my little brot to drive him home. Eddie has never taken any one out again.

But oh! we had such fun at the party the other night. All the young ladies and gentlemen came over from Jacksonville, two miles away, to see mamma. It was a beautiful bright moonlight night. Our cottage is on a hill in a grove of oaks, and though the moon was so bright, the large oak-trees threw such deep shadows we thought we would rival the moon, and illuminate with a flambeau. So Mack made a small platform covered with pine knots, which he placed on the top of the earth, and when we heard the sound of carriage-wheels he lit the old yellow moon looked a little astonished at first, and hid herself under a cloud, but pretty soon she came out to see what we were doing. Everything was so pretty. The front and back porches were lighted with Japanese lanterns. The old fiddler was on the back porch (which is very large, and was brilliant from the moonlight, tuning up his old fiddle, telling them to come out and dance, which they did.

"And hand in hand, by the edge of the sand,
They danced by the light of the moon—
The moon—
They danced by the light of the moon."

And now all was laughter, dancing, and singing until twelve o'clock, when they one and all came to mamma to bid her good-night, saying how glad they had had. Then they rode home, happy as happy could be, in the brightest moonlight you ever saw. How I did hate to have them go, for then we children had to go to bed. Postmistress, how I wish you had been at our party!
JULIE V. G.

And indeed it was bedtime for children, and I wonder very much whether you did not feel a little bit crisp-cross the day after so much pleasure. The flambeau was a fine idea, and I've no doubt the party was a great success. The mule must have been surprised at the behavior of his drivers. I fancy, and perhaps that was why he ran away.

COLDWATER, MICHIGAN.

I am eleven years old. I go to school, and study reading, writing, spelling, intellectual and higher arithmetic, grammar, history, and geography. My name is Dick. I would like to join the Housekeepers' Sociable.
TINA M. D.

The pattern you ordered in this letter was duly sent, Tina. Did you succeed in cutting and making the Nautilus?
PANS CHRISTIAN, MISSISSIPPI.

I am a boy ten years old. I received a year's subscription to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE as a birthday present, and I enjoy reading it very much. For a long time it was my pleasure to borrow the paper from a friend. We have a pretty home at this watering place, with a large oak in front, near the beach. The tree measures four yards in height, and is the trunk of a great big oak, and our hens lay all over the house, in the funniest places, even on our beds.
SIMEY H.

What enterprising hens!

ST. HELENA, CALIFORNIA.

I am a little girl eleven years old. I am staying at the house of a lady in the country for a little while. She has a little baby girl whose name is Cora. I like Young People very much, and I think "Nan" and the Jimmy Brown stories are very nice. I have a kitten named Tabble; she hurt her eye, but it is getting well now. I have fifteen dolls. My largest is named Zilla; she is very pretty.
IDA B.

Fifteen dolls are a throng, I think, With golden hair and cheeks of pink;
Blue eyes, brown eyes, gray eyes too—
The little mother finds work to do.

MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.

I wrote to you once before, but as my letter was not published, I concluded I would write again. I hope this one will be published. I have never taken any other paper except Young People, and I enjoy that exceedingly. In fact, I do not know what I would do without it. Will you please tell me exactly how to direct my letters? I am glad to say that Memphis is more healthy this summer than it has been for some time, and as it is now August we do not think that the yellow fever will come this year, at least we hope it will not. There are a great many buildings going up in Memphis; just now two on the street we live in—the Jewish Synagogue and the First Presbyterian Church. The latter was burned last spring. At Memphis we make and sell our favorite place to sew and make doll clothes in a tree. I am just beginning to make my dolls' winter clothes, as they have summer clothes. I fear my letter will tire you, and so I will close with my love to you.

ELISE.

Are you making the Nautilus for one of your dolls? I would like to peep at you in the tree; a cozy little work-room. Address your letters to Messrs. Harper & Brothers,

Franklin Square,
New York.

and they will come safely.

WOODLUFF, ILLINOIS.

I thought I would send you a letter in rhyme; it may do for the first time.

I'm a little boy aged ten;
I work in the field with the men;
I plough and harrow and work all day,
And sometimes at night, when I'm tired for play,
Run after the colts with a halter,
Help feed and water the pigs too,
And many other chores I have to do.
I have thirty turkeys, counting in six that are lame,
Chickens one hundred, fifty of Plymouth Rock faun.

A cow and a calf all my own,
Which will give me quite a start when I'm grown.

I have a fine black dog named Trip;
When he hunt squirrels he makes them just skip.
In this sport I'm helped by my brother Will;
Pa gives us a nickel for every one we kill.
I have twenty-five kinds of grasses and grains,
But I do not know all their names.
Whenever I can I go to school,
And there I am careful to mind the rule.

LUTHER O.

Very well done for a young person of ten. I am sorry you hunt the squirrels, but I suppose they are so numerous that they are looked upon as vermin on the farm. One sat on a tree and looked at me the other day with, oh! such bright eyes! I am sure he wanted to know what I was doing, and he came close enough to peep over my shoulder. But nobody is allowed to frighten or molest a squirrel on that estate, so the little fellows are very tame.

I would like to see your chicks and the young turkeys, the cow, the calf, and the colt. Now let me try if I can rhyme a wee bit for you:

I hope 'tis not often that Luther at night
Is too tired for play; that would hardly be right.
I am glad that a lad who is husky and clever
Is going to school, for I'm sure he will never—
No, never—receive a demerit, but stay
Near the head of the class every hour of the day.

LAWRENCE, KANSAS.

I live in the northeastern part of Kansas, on the Kansas River. The river is pretty to look at, but it drowns too many people. The other day a little boy was drowned. I am thirteen years old. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, Wide Awake, and St. Nicholas. I have a younger brother, who is four years old. I have two sisters here in Lawrence, and one in Carthage, Missouri. I liked "Nan" very much.
FLORENCE.

Rivers will drown people who venture into their deep waters without having learned to swim. Every child who drowns is near a river or lake should be taught this accomplishment. As you liked "Nan," you will like "Dick and D.," of course.

MANCHESTER, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

We have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE from the first number, and like it very much. We all read the stories—"Toby Tyler" and "Mr. Stubbs' Brother," and wish there would be more of the same kind. We also enjoy Jimmy Brown's stories, and "The Bird." We have a goose, we do not keep a bird. We had a rabbit, but it ran away. I am a little boy ten years old. I have two brothers, one twelve and the other seven years old, and we all enjoy reading your letters. I send you love to HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but it was not published. I hope to see this one in print. Good-by.
MINOT T. P.

DEBRAW, CALIFORNIA.

I am a girl twelve years old. I live in the country. I have three sisters and one brother. I like Jimmy Brown's stories and "Nan" best of all. I will tell you about my pets. I have a goat named Lily Dale. I have three cats and three kittens. My oldest cat's name is Tommy; he is eight years old, and he will shake hands with you. My other cats' names are Charley and Polly; my kittens' names are Pussy Pinktoes, Peppergie, and Spidertrack. I have three birds, and a sister has a canary bird. My bird's name is Pip, and her bird's name is Dick. I had a wild oriole, but he died. I have seven dolls—two wax, and the rest are dish. My wax dolls' names are Nancy and Clara; my other dolls' names are Cris-tina, Tilly, Cecellian, Casian, and Paranie. Have been very busy taking music lessons for the last month.

NOEL S.

Your kittens have very funny names. I suppose the dish dolls are made of china.

CHEERY VALLEY.

I am a big boy six years old. I have a little baby brother; his name is Alfred. I have a dog; his name is Tig; and I have a cow; her name is Nancy; its name is Spitfire. I have a cherry-tree; it did not have very many cherries on. This is my first letter.

BERTIE S. D.

Very well done for a big boy of six.

A FAIRY STORY FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

Most children do not like to hear their hair combed, and I do not like it, either. Here it is. Because Mr. Smart comes and bothers us, Mr. Smart is a bad fairy. As soon as we go to have our hair fixed he comes too. He does not like the brush; it is too sooty for him. He comes and as soon as mamma takes it he begins and snarls and tangles our hair. Then the good fairy comes and drives him away. The good fairy likes the brush, and makes our hair all nice and smooth. I like the good fairy best; don't you?

C. M. (8 YEARS OLD).

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.
What is the good fairy's name? Miss Patience, I suppose.

BUFFALO, NEW YORK.

I am a boy ten years old, and I have taken your paper since the beginning of "Toby Tyler." I know K. T. S., and I go to Chautauque Lake nearly every summer. I have three cats—Katy, Lucy, and Lucia. We also have four pets—two dogs, Tramp and Trouble, and two cats, Peleg and Phoebe Jane. When I go to the lake I am going to make that toy boat I saw you talk about. This is the first letter I have written to you, and I want to surprise papa by his seeing it in YOUNG PEOPLE.

HARRY STONEMAN W.

Let us know whether you succeeded in making the little boat.

I am a little girl seven years old, and live in Burlington, New Jersey, and now we are in the Catskill Mountains for the summer. I have a sister thirteen years old, and a brother eleven years old. My brother has a setter dog named Spot. I had a very cunning little pet dog that we bought in Dresden, and when we crossed the ocean he was not a bit seasick, but we were; but after that he was sick, and died; then we had a real funeral, and we all cried, and he was buried in the garden, and now there are violets on his grave, and I was very sorry.

MARGUERITE H.

It was a comfort to have the funeral, was it not, dear?

FORT WORTH, TEXAS.

We have been taking YOUNG PEOPLE only a short time, but we think it is the nicest paper we ever read. We have lived in Texas ten months, and I don't think there is any nicer place than Tennessee. Mamma has seven children, two boys and five girls; so you see we have no need of any pets. We did have three canaries this summer, but they died, and the other one died. We attend the public schools, and our favorite study is arithmetic. Our teacher is one of the best ladies we ever knew. Heading is our chief amusement, and Miss Alice is our old home, we prefer. We would like to join the Little House-keepers, and send a receipt.

FLORENCE and ASHLEY A.

Your receipt is in another column. Thanks.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

I am a little girl ten years old. I am in the Fourth-grade Grammar School. I like Tuesday to come, so that I can get my paper, YOUNG PEOPLE, and Miss Alice subscribed for it for me as a Christmas present. I love my Aunt Maggie. I have a little brother; his name is Gussy; he will soon be seven. He loves to go to school, and he says when he becomes a man he is going to be a doctor.

ALICE C.

DENTON, TEXAS.

I am a little boy eight years old. I have been taking YOUNG PEOPLE this year, and like it ever so much. I was sorry "Raising the Pearl" stopped so soon; I enjoyed reading it very much. I have a little white pup; Ponto is his name. Papa and me will go to school and learn to read; we would take YOUNG PEOPLE for this year; and I learned in just a little while, and now I read it all. I am very anxious every week for it to come, and I want to see the letters; I read them first. I would like to see the Post-mistress. I think she ought to head the Post-office Box with her picture; can't you head the Post-mistress? This is my first letter to YOUNG PEOPLE, and sister wrote it for me, but I told her what to write.

Your little Texas friend,

JIMMIE B. B.

Very much obliged, Jimmie, but the Post-mistress would not like to have her picture flying around the world at such a rate. Look at your mamma, dear boy; perhaps you may fancy me something like her.

PHENIXIA, NEW YORK.

I will write a letter for the Post-office Box to sisters nor brothers. My papa is a blacksmith. I am most of my time in the shop. I make rail-roads, and cars that run on a track. I am conductor. My name is Herbert T., the baggage-man; Newton D. P., and the brakeman is Theodore G. I have an engine that goes by steam. I think when I grow up I will be an engineer. I go to school, and am in the Fourth Reader. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE two years, and I like the stories very much, especially "Raising the Pearl."

HERBERT T.

ELMIRA, NEW YORK.

I have often thought I would write to you, but did not know what to say. I do not know now, but will think of something as I go along. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE since No. 63. I went with my cousin Carrie B. F. when she went after hers one day, and it looked so interesting, and the pretiness were so pretty, that I thought I would take it too. I am very glad I do take it. I enjoy the Post-office Box as well as anything else in it. I also take St. Nicholas. My sister and I have spent part of our vacation in riding on trolley-cars. We had a social one, so that we both go together. We have had real nice rides on it. I presume you have seen some like it. It was made in England. Only about three more weeks of vacation. How fast it will go. At least it seems so to me. But I love to go to school, so I am not very sorry.

GERTRUDE F. G.

We invite all the readers of this paper between the ages of fourteen and twenty-one, who are interested in natural history, to become members of a natural history society, the name of which is the "League of the Young Naturalists," and the object of which is the collection, study, and preservation of natural objects and facts. For further particulars address the President, L. Searing, 338 West One-hundred-and-thirtieth Street, New York City.

RECIPTS FOR LITTLE HOUSEKEEPERS.

A SIMPLE LEMON TAET.—Six butter crackers, one cup of molasses, half a cup of sugar, a tablespoonful of oil, and three lemons cut in half and grated fine; soak the crackers in cold water until soft; stir in sugar, molasses, and butter, and add the lemons; bake three-quarters of an hour in small or large dishes.

This may do for boys who are going on a fishing expedition.

LEMON PIES.—Six eggs, whites and yolks beaten separately; four crackers, broken up, and boiled a cup of sweet milk; when cool add the beaten yolks of the eggs, half a cup of sugar, a table-spoonful of butter, the juice of four lemons, and the grated rind of two; bake in pie-pans, with a stiff crust of flour; when done add three cups of white sugar with the whites of the eggs, and spread on the tops of the pies, and brown.

BY MARGARET EYTINGE.

A LITTLE ragged orphan girl, who ne'er
 Had had a home nor known a parent's care,
 And who, with shoeless feet and hatless head,
 Newspapers sold to earn her scanty bread,
 Was taken from the city far away,
 With others of her kind, one summer day,
 To look upon the ocean. At the sight
 Her thin, sharp face was filled with grave delight;
 And some one said, "I wonder what can be Her thoughts, poor child, about this mighty sea."
 She heard the words, and quickly turned her head,
 And in low tones, "I's thinkin', ma'am," she said,
 "I's glad I comed, because I never sor Enough of anything at wunst before."

WHO WAS HE?

BY L. A. FRANCE.

HE was born one hundred years ago, the date of his birth being April 3, 1783, and the place the city of New York. He was the youngest of eleven children.

He was four years old when General Washington was inaugurated President in New York. He was then attending a school in Ann Street, kept by Mrs. Kilmaster. Later he went to a school taught by Benjamin Romani. He was fond of reading, and had quite a reputation in school for his composition. He disliked arithmetic, and would often write compositions for the boys if they would work out his examples.

He devoted his spare time to reading books of travel, and had a great desire to go over the sea.

He left school when he was sixteen, and spent the two following years studying law.

When he was nineteen he wrote a number of articles for a paper printed by his brother, which attracted considerable attention.

In 1804 his health failed, and he made a trip to Europe. While in Rome he met an American painter, and for a short time thought of becoming an artist and studying with him.

After an absence of two years he returned home, with his health restored. He again began his literary work. He and eight of his friends called themselves "The Nine Worthies," or "The Lads of Kilkenny," and formed an informal club.

He was admitted to the bar in 1806. When Aaron Burr was tried for treason he was engaged as counsel against him.

In 1815 he again went to Europe, where he remained seven-teen years. During that time he was appointed Secretary of Legation to the court of St. James. While in Europe he became acquainted with persons of note, and continued his literary work.

After his return to the United States he travelled extensively. He went West as far as Arkansas, where he hunted buffalo, and enjoyed the wild scenery of what was then the extreme West.

He declined various invitations to engage in political life. He was nominated Mayor of New York city in 1838, and to be Secretary of the Navy under Van Buren. He accepted the post of Minister to Spain in 1842, and returned to the United States four years later. He still continued his literary work.

He took a great interest in all improvements of schools and churches, and was always ready to give to any one who needed help. He was fond of children, and took an interest in whatever they did.

He died on the 28th of November, 1859.

THE IRREVERSIBLE CARD.

CUT a playing-card in half lengthwise, and turn down the ends about a third of an inch, as in diagram.

A whole playing-card is too heavy. A lady's visiting-card is sometimes used, but it is not so good as half a playing-card.

Place the card on a table as in diagram, and ask any one to blow it over. This seems easy enough, but unless attempted in the proper way it is almost impossible.

To blow the card over, blow down on the table, and not at the card. Suppose the mouth is about a foot above the table, say at the spot marked A below (the straight line representing the top of the table, and B the card), about a foot and a half from the edge of the table. Blow on the table about at C, and the card will turn over readily. Somewhat different distances suit different people, according to the way in which they blow.

PEARL.

BY SYDNEY DAYRE.

"LISTEN, Pearl, and mind all I say."

"Yes, papa."

"Can you take care of mother all day?"

"Of course I can, papa. Are you going away?"

"Yes; Sam and I have to go after those yearlings. And like as not auntie won't be home till to-morrow."

"What a cozy time mamma and I will have!"

"And, Pearl, if I should not be home till late, can you call old Snow into the stable, and push down a little fodder for her?"

"Yes, papa, and I'll get the chickens in too."

"But let everything else go for mother, dear. Always remember that."

"You know I will, papa."

Her words were as earnest as his own as she ran after him for another kiss; and he added, as he laid a braid of her pretty hair against his lips:

"If she's the least bit nervous toward night, don't leave her a moment, my bird, but let the animals take care of themselves."

Pearl lived on the shore of the great Mississippi, far down, where Jack Frost never gets a very tight grip on things, and lets go very early, as Madam Spring comes smiling about. Her father was getting poorer and poorer year by year, as his worn-out land grew less productive with every season of slack tillage, until he found it hard to wring from it a living for his small family.

The stock dwindled down to a few poor ill-kept creatures, which looked as if forlornly wondering within themselves whether it were really worth while to live or not. Pearl's father had something of the same look himself, which increased as his wife grew weakly, and gradually sank into the condition of a gentle invalid, content to be waited upon, without, perhaps, ever pausing to ask whether she really stood in need of it.

You may think Pearl must have had a very sad childhood. But she had never known any other place nor any other children, and was so happy in her own bright, unselfish little nature as never to have suspected anything depressing in her surroundings. Pearl threw as nothing else on the place threw, even under the burden of care which came to her too young—showering back upon her mother so many caresses and such loving care that it would be hard to say which looked most upon the other as a child.

"I'll get your breakfast, pet. Wait till you see what I've got for you."

Pearl skipped about in great glee at being left in charge for all day, and, after the usual amount of small fussing, carried in the tray with a face full of anticipation of her mother's delight.

"The first branch of crape myrtle. I found it peeping out in the sunny corner of the old pasture. You poor dear little mamma!—a dozen kisses on her thin hands—'if you only could go with me to see all the beautiful things! But I'll bring you every one. Papa thought he had found the first magnolia bud the other day, but I had seen it the day before, and never said a word. No, I won't take a single taste of egg. There isn't enough for you.'"

"Just a taste, little one."

"Not one bit. See what a great strong thing I am! You must have the good things to make you well."

The lassie set her foot down, and mamma never dreamed that there was something almost heroic in the refusal of the tempting morsel, the little girl having just turned away from her own uninviting breakfast of bacon and corn-bread.

"The river looks curious, mamma dear," she said, chatting over the wild flowers she was arranging on the table as she spread their feast. "I went into the boat to play, and when I wanted to get out, the water was between it and the shore, so I had to jump."

"Why, Pearl, are you sure?"

"Yes, mamma; and I was afraid I couldn't get in it again, so I untied it and held the rope till it floated to the little bayou, and then I pulled it in and tied it. It was hard work, too."

"Can the river be rising? I wish they were not all away, daughter."

The helpless woman looked out of the window with a troubled face. The floods of the year before had done but little injury in their neighborhood, the land lying much above the river level. But she knew that this was due to the strength of the levees many miles above, and remembered having heard people say that they never would stand another pressure of high water. The river was not yet as high as she had seen it, but she observed with some uneasiness that it had advanced upon them perceptibly during the last few hours.

"I don't believe the levee will break, though," she said, trying to encourage herself and Pearl.

Their dinner was eaten rather more soberly than quite suited the little girl; but after everything was cleared away, and she had taken another look outside, both felt better at perceiving that the waters seemed at a stand-still.

"Bring me the brush for your pretty hair, Pearl."

It was one of the few things she still had energy to do, this brushing and fondling of the child's hair. No one, seeing its beautiful luxuriance, could wonder at her loving admiration. Pearl took innocent pleasure in it as one of the things which made her sweet to father and mother, and laughed as mamma loosened the soft braids and held up the wavy mass to catch the sunshine.

"Papa says it's my golden flag," she said. "When I was out hunting old Snow last week he knew it was me when I was a mile away."

"Then you must hang out your flag whenever you want him to find you. I wish auntie were here to help you to-day, my pet."

But the hand which held the long golden braid suddenly dropped.

"Look there, Pearl!"

Pearl sprang up, and saw trees not far from their door standing in water, where water had never been before. In one moment's glance she marked how the river was broadening and swelling. There was no sudden rush or roar, as would have been the case with a narrower stream, or one with high banks; but there was still something mysterious and terrible in the low sound, half-hissing, half-murmuring, with which the pitiless flood was fast creeping upon them.

She turned with one thought in her brave little heart—of caring for her mother as she had promised.

"Mamma darling, don't be frightened. You must get to the boat—you can, I know, when I most carry you."

But the poor woman cried and trembled.

"Oh, why did they leave us! The levee has broken. We shall be drowned, Pearl, all alone here."

Pearl had rushed out to the boat. Most fortunately the bank to which she had towed and secured it was high. Drawing it now much nearer the house, she came and hurriedly prepared her mother, cooing to her all the while endearing words of encouragement, never letting her guess how her own face grew pale and her heart stood still at sight of the danger which gathered faster and faster so near them. Again she ran to the boat, and this time, with dripping feet, moored it to the door.

"Now, mamma—quick!" Pearl never could tell how she got her in. When it was accomplished, she brought a few of the more valuable articles in the house and placed them beside her.

Before all this was done she perceived with increased alarm the violence with which the long-imprisoned waters bore down upon them. They beat angrily against the house, and redoubled her anxiety to get away from it. But at the last moment she observed how the boat rocked and tossed, and the idea suddenly flashed upon her that her mother would be safer if she herself remained behind.

"Mamma, I'm going to stay here while you go in the boat. When you get below the bend they will see you and get you. Tell papa to come for me. Tell him I took care of you; and don't be frightened, you dear, dear mamma!" She gave her one long embrace, untied and threw in the rope, and carefully stepped back to the upper step of the door. Her mother had not guessed her intention till the current was carrying them far apart. She half rose with a scream of dismay.

"Oh, Pearl! my Pearl! come to me! I shall die without you! And what will become of you?" She caught one glimpse of the brave little white face smiling at her, as the child called cheerily after her:

"Don't be frightened, darling. I'll come to you just as soon as I can. God will take care of you." And then the rushing waters shut out every other sound.

In her alarm and despair the mother could have flung herself from the boat. How tender the little face was, and how small the childish figure, as it stood there for a last word of encouragement to her!

Pearl's face grew paler as the timbers of the old house groaned and creaked. Her little white kitten came mewling pitiously to her feet, and she took it in her arms, while she hastily took a bundle of papers from her father's desk. Then she walked through water ankle-deep to reach the stairs to the half-story above, and she climbed them wondering if the water would come to her there before papa came. He had gone some distance inland, but she knew he would come for her as soon as he could.

What a wild waste of water she looked out upon! She saw barns, sheds, sometimes a house, sweeping down the river. She saw their own barn swing out into the current and float away. She could hear the water rushing through the doors and windows below, and wondered how soon the house would break away, and follow those she had seen going down the stream.

"I must hang out my golden flag, so papa will see me." Pearl unbraided her bright hair, and looked wistfully out.

But the weary afternoon wore away, and night came with its gloom and its chill. Poor little Pearl's courage almost failed in the darkness. She sobbed pitifully for papa—everything seemed so much more terrible than when it was light—then knelt down and said her prayers, asking first that mamma might be cared for, then herself, and, feeling comforted in the full faith that God would remember them both, resolutely set herself to keep awake until papa should come.

But her head dropped on the window-sill, and she soon slept quietly. The winged messengers who wait on the prayers of a child surely guarded her rest with gentlest care, for when at last the strained timbers gave way, and the old house bade adieu to the foundations on which it had stood for many a long year, she never knew it, but slept on.

"I saw your shining flag, Pearl, my blessing."

Pearl opened her sleepy eyes to see the early morning sun beaming upon her. All the trees on the bank were running past her in a most confusing manner. Papa was lifting her from the window into a boat held by two other men close to the house, which still rocked and heaved as it settled deeper and deeper into the water.

"Papa, where is mamma?"

"Safe, dear. Some steambot men brought her inshore, and I found her late last night."

"Oh-h-h! Well, then, papa, get my kitty and poor old Biddy. Oh dear! my neck and my shoulders hurt."

As the boat neared the shore she opened her eyes in amazement, almost in fright.

"That's mamma," she cried. "Standing up! Oh, mamma, you'll hurt yourself!"

But mamma met Pearl at the very edge of the water, and led her to the house whose friendly doors had been opened to them. Doctors have talked learnedly of such cases—about will power, nerve force, and other things hard to understand. All I can tell about it is that the great excitement and some very serious thinking had worked a wonderful change in Pearl's mother.

She now looked out at the house, and saw the water pouring in at the window from which the idol of her heart had just been rescued. With arms tight about her, she said:

"He has taken care of us, Pearl, better than we could have dreamed."

CANADIAN DAYS.

BY EDWARD L. STEVENSON.

PRINCE'S SETTLEMENT, where Cal Calvert lived, was as rough a Canadian village as one often sees. Seven or eight log houses straggled along the lake shore. Behind these rose the forest, largely a pine one, dark green and dense.

There were few boys of Cal's own age (seventeen) in the place. Instead of going to school, since school there was none, they had to trap and hunt. In place of playing marbles or ball they dressed skins or made snowshoes and leggins. Occasionally they spent the whole morning together, fishing from the rude wharf, where once a fortnight only a small steamer touched, bringing supplies and the mail.

Calvert endured more or less chaffing from Job Waller, Gabriel De Zouche, and some others of his cronies as being the worst shot and the unluckiest trapper of them all. He had some excuse. The Calvert family had arrived in Prince's Settlement only eight months before, and Cal could hardly have been expected to become a very skilled woodman within so short a period. But in due time there came to Cal his first real adventure. It was directly in this line, and it won him great glory in the settlement, not merely with the boys, but with every one in it.

It happened thus: Wednesday was usually Cal's day for visiting his scattered traps, stripping them (if there was anything in them to strip), and fixing up matters generally. Accordingly, out into the road Cal strode one Wednesday morning in October, his new gun over his shoulder, in case anything should "turn up," and hung to his back his bag full of odds and ends for trap mending and baiting.

"Coming along, Job?" he called out, as he passed Waller, who sat in the sun before his father's door, whistling, and busy over something.

"Can't," returned Job, looking up; "father wants me all this mornin'. Where you goin'?"

"Trapping," answered Cal; "and then to fetch back the net my father left up at Namoak Cove last night. They had so much else to carry that they put it behind the Pulpit, and I'm to come around that way to get it. Good-by."

NOW FOR WORK.

Cal walked up the road, whistling. The woods were about him in a few minutes. Off upon his left hand the lake shimmered like silver between the trees. Where a "blaze" on a trunk or some similar landmark warned the boy of one of his traps waiting to be looked after, he turned aside and halted. There was little in them, all told, this morning—one inexperienced young mink and a solitary rabbit. Calvert inspected the whole set, and by the time he had finished was well along the north shore of the lake. The last trap being considerably off the line of the rest, and therefore well within the edge of the woods, it occurred to Cal that it would be better for him to look up the net now, and then, after examining the trap, take the sledge track back to Prince's Settlement.

Accordingly he turned down directly to the beach. He found the object of his errand where he had been directed to seek it, behind the pile of boulders known to the settlement as the Pulpit. Cal folded the net into as small a compass as he could, and slung it loosely across his back. Carrying the gun well out of its way, he struck into the woods again. The net was tough and bulky, but not too heavy to hinder him from making his way along lightly and rapidly.

As he turned to look for his gun, which he had laid on one side while folding the net, he suddenly heard a crackling in the underbrush on the other side of the clearing. A crashing of twigs and a hoarse bellow held him motionless with fright. Opposite him, and looking at him with eyes which, if small, were at least very red, startled, and angry ones, had halted a large dark animal. The great mule-like head, crowned with immense branching horns, the shaggy throat and powerful ash-colored body, propped up on four awkward, shuffling legs that stamped the fallen leaves—all these things told Cal in an instant that the creature to which they belonged was no other than the great Canadian moose, an animal already become rare around Prince's Settlement.

The moment that Cal recognized it he did the most natural and foolish thing he could have done. He ran, without thinking of gun or anything else, to the nearest tree that looked large enough to climb. The moose bellowed again, and shambled, head down, after the flying boy.

Only at one time of the year, October, is the Canadian moose an offensive animal. The rest of the year, unless brought to bay, he will rarely show fight, much less attack. But there are occasionally found "rogue" mooses, just as there are "rogue" elephants. The lonely one which tramps the forest angrily at that season is a thoroughly dangerous foe on four feet, and many a veteran hunter has fled from such a one for his life. He is even bold enough to pick a quarrel with what excites his distaste.

Cal remembered these things in a flash of thought; hence our hero's unheroic action. Discretion is sometimes better than valor. So seemed it to him, as, panting and badly scared, he found himself perched out of harm's way in the ash-tree. He had had just presence of mind enough to jerk the cumbersome net over his head before his upward scramble. The moose smelled of this as it lay in a heap at the foot of the tree, and struck his big forehoofs upon it with the peculiar roaring bellow that his kind make.

Cal got his breath. The moose looked about the clearing. Then a movement of the boy drew his attention upward. He uttered again his angry defiance of all the men and boys in Prince's Settlement, or anywhere else in the world. He shambled a few yards away, stood still, and began licking himself. He kept on licking, occasionally lifting up his voice and bellowing for variety. Poor Cal saw that his enemy was a gentleman of leisure, and designed holding the fort until some new notion should get into his formidable head.

Cal thought of his gun. His buckshot was up the ash-tree with him, but not the gun. There it lay, only a dozen yards from the ash trunk, below. Cal recollected the boys. "Treed by a moose" did not sound exceedingly pleasant. He also remembered the approach of afternoon, the coming on of sunset, his being missed, the probable alarm of the settlement, the raising of this siege in one way or another, but possibly not until after the cold and misery of a night in the forest. Perhaps it was thinking of all these unpleasant things so seriously that made the boy move his head. His hat fell off.

At the sight of the falling object, the moose lowered his horns and rushed. He sent them crashing against the bole of the tree for his folly. More than that, he entangled his antlers in a loose fold of the seine. He tossed up his great muzzle. The net fell like a coarse bridal veil over his mooseship's nose. He roared and shook his head and neck in a rage; the whole length and breadth of the tough, stout mesh-work unfolded and cascaded over both. The exasperated animal started to run. He progressed several hundred feet within the trees, shaking and tossing his lowered head. Then Cal saw the creature halt and throw itself down upon the ground in the thickest, crashing the twigs and leaves beneath its weight. Unfortunately for the moose, the net was a comparatively new and strong one, and by this time it was hopelessly twisted and wrapped about the broad horns and head.

Cal's mind was made up. Our hero was no coward, though he had been badly frightened. He did not wait one instant longer to give the somewhat exhausted but powerful animal time to get rid of the source of his bewilderment and anger. Down he slid from his niche. The moose was still stumbling about blindly in the brush. He was safe for more minutes than Cal needed.

The boy darted, shaking with excitement, to his gun. He seized it, and reloaded it with musteady fingers. Breathless, he glided toward the scene of his foe's confusion. The moose was actually upon his side now, rolling his enmeshed head, and with one leg seemingly caught fast also for a moment. Cal tried to keep the quick beats of his heart from spoiling his aim. He fired. The moose belowed and plunged over. Cal fired again. The second barrel did the business. The animal ceased his mad struggles, rolled once more, and was dead.

Two hours later Job Waller and several other of the Settlement folks were startled at the sight of a boy rushing up the sledge track where they stood, and calling out, triumphantly, "Hurrah! I've killed a moose." It is to be feared that many of his hearers had doubts as to the truth of Cal's odd story as they set out at once for the scene of it. But with twilight "the biggest moose seen in Prince's Settlement for two years" was brought back in procession.

It is hardly necessary to record that after such an event Cal never was twitted by his hunting chums for empty traps or stray shots. He had made his reputation. It was only Long John Capiteau who dared to make a little good-natured fun at his expense by asking Cal now and then "whether it still took his gun, a twenty-foot net, an' a ash-tree to land one horn-pouter." Such was the first of our hero's chances in the North. But one far more serious, and involving others besides himself in its course, was to come soon enough after.

"DICK AND D."*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

Author of "Mildred's Bargain," "Nan," etc.

CHAPTER VII.

DICK TEACHES GYMNASTICS.

IT may readily be imagined that Dick Devine and Norry awaited with impatience another visit from their new friend. It was not that the delights of the first visit had ceased to give them both occupation for thinking and talking, or that they needed new material; but with Master Dick's appearance something seemed to have come into the hearts of the lonely boys which made life seem altogether a happier, more hopeful thing, and Dick felt as if his hardest searches for work could be undertaken in a newer and brighter spirit.

* Begun in No. 199, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"IT WAS A MOST DISGRACEFUL SIGHT, MA'AM-SIR."

He had no occasion to go that week to Dr. Field's, although he longed to do so, and once he had to indulge himself in a walk around the house, hoping for a glimpse of Dick Dearing or Barbara, but no one appeared at the windows, and he went home a trifle down-hearted. The work he found during those days was chiefly carrying parcels for travellers at railway stations, or going errands for people who went in or out of the large hotels. Often his earnings were not more than fifteen cents, and as it was his habit, learned from his mother, always to lay aside a certain portion for the weekly rent, very little remained for food or fire. But Norry, with his accorcion, seemed perfectly content on bread and milk, and as Dick would return from his long rambles he heard the strains of "Home, sweet Home" long before he reached the attic door.

Hurrying in one windy day, he found a joyful surprise. Master Dick was seated by Norry, regaling him with nuts and cakes, and talking in his gayest voice, while Norry's shrill laughter greeted Dick's entrance.

"Oh, I am glad!" Dick exclaimed; and his first idea was to help along the little fire, at which Dearing assisted very good-humoredly.

"Why haven't you been up at the house?" he asked Dick. "I told Brooks to ask you."

"Well, he said he wouldn't need me this week," Dick answered. "And I didn't like to go else; but I walked around the house once, hoping to see you."

"I meant to take you to the circus," said Master Dick, a little loftily. "Can you do any gymnastics?"

Dick announced that he could turn a somersault.

"All right; let's see you do it," said Dearing. "Perhaps you could teach me. We fellows at Barnabas always like to bring back some new dodge, you know, and I don't believe any of them know that."

So with true boy's love for such performances Dick Devine turned his somersault, to the great delight of his young patron, who immediately tried to imitate him. But somersaulting isn't to be learned in a moment, and so it came about that there was a great deal of knocking around, and rubbing of shins, and a general air of rioting, to which Norry listened appreciatively.

Both boys were purple with their efforts and with their laughter. Dick Devine was in the act of a most daring turn, when the door was suddenly opened. A chill horror struck them. There stood the awful Mr. Brooks, with an expression on his majestic countenance which I dare not venture to describe.

Dick Devine came to his feet, panting and subdued. The other Dick's face had assumed rather an angry glare.

"Is this where you run away to, Master Dick?" said Brooks, in a terrible tone. "And lured along by this low, ungrateful varmint, as ought to be had up for deceiving us all, and taking you into bad company."

"Oh, you hold up, Brooks," said Master Dick, as boldly as he could, although, truth to tell, he was a little frightened. "He isn't bad company, and he didn't lure me here, as you call it, and I won't be bullied by you, either; and I'd like to know how you knew I was here."

Brooks waved his hand contemptuously.

"Miss Barbara knew it, and your aunt and your grandfather are in a most awful way about it."

"Did Barbara send you?" Dick flashed out. "It isn't a bit like her. She knew I was coming, but she's no sneak, if she is a girl."

"You're to come home at once," pronounced Brooks, "and you'll see for yourself what 'll he said and done. And as for you, you miserable rascally boy, you are to come up to-night and see the old gentleman himself."

Dick Devine had found it impossible to speak. He stood still with a terrible sense of guilt in this matter, even though he knew he had never done Master Dick any harm. Yet he might have known this attic in a low street was not the place for a boy like his new friend to come to. Yet it had been such a happiness—and for Norry too!

"I ought to have known better," he stammered, looking very wretched indeed. "And I hope—oh, I do hope—I haven't got Master Dick into trouble!"

"You may well say you'd oughter have known better," Brooks said, with withering emphasis. "But you'll see! Come along now, Master Dick; you're wanted immediate."

There was nothing for it but to go. Dick Dearing departed, however, with a great show of sympathy for both Norry and Dick Devine, and refused to do more than walk along by Brooks, who, with a policeman's air, was for holding him by the shoulder.

When the sound of their footsteps had died away, Dick Devine, feeling more wretched than ever since his mother's death, crept close to Norry and explained it all. I hope no boy will scorn my young hero when I confess that the two brothers, holding each other very closely, cried as they had not cried since that August morning long ago.

CHAPTER VIII.

LOST FAVOR.

THE gas was already lighted in Dr. Field's library when Brooks and his captive reached the Fifth Avenue. On the way home Dearing had not condescended to discuss the matter with his companion, and if he dreaded to encounter Mrs. Thomason and the Doctor, he betrayed no such fears to Brooks himself.

On reaching the hall door the boy sprang upstairs without a word to the man, and burst into the library, ready to tell his story, and if possible to clear Dick Devine of all blame.

Mrs. Thomason was seated at one side of the fire, looking as only she could look when she was going to pronounce sentence of doom. The Doctor was by his study table, apparently reading, although he had not turned a page in half an hour.

Just before Dick appeared, Mrs. Thomason had been saying in her iciest tones: "Something must be done with that boy, father. He is perfectly incorrigible. I can not tell you half the mischief he has done since he has been in the house, and now picking up with this low boy! I don't doubt he's taught him pocket-picking."

Poor Dr. Field rubbed his forehead with his hand, and looked very unhappy. He knew well enough that he was overpartial to Dick, and for that reason felt it right to yield more decidedly to his daughter's government and ideas concerning the boy, and he did above all things dread for him evil associations. Naturally enough Dick Devine, living in an attic in a down-town street, was, to the Doctor's mind, like any other common vagrant boy. He had never asked about Devine or his family, and we know the lad himself had tried to keep his history and Norry out of every one's knowledge. Therefore Dr. Field could not be supposed to know how carefully the poor dead mother had reared her children; and in fact I think it was wrong for Dick Dearing to have made his visits in the way he did. Perhaps he felt instinctively that Dick Devine was not like other common boys; yet he had no right to form any acquaintance without consulting his elders.

"When we remember his father's recklessness," Mrs. Thomason went on, "we have all the more to fear."

Dr. Field winced.

"You know how often and often you said that poor Richard's troubles all came from his getting into low company. His tastes were always so extraordinary. Do you remember that wretched German violinist he picked up?"

Mrs. Thomason was going on in a higher key, but her father suddenly held up his hand and silenced her.

"There, Julia," he said, looking pained; "don't go over the past. Whatever poor Rick's faults were, he is gone."

"But he has left us a son who may inherit his worst faults. Surely we owe it to our poor Mary to bring him up so that he shall not disgrace her memory."

At this moment the door was burst open by the culprit himself.

Cast iron could scarcely have been harder than Aunt Julia's face as Master Dick appeared. He well knew what it meant when she folded her hands over each other with the knuckle joints so prominently in view.

"Well?" she ejaculated.

"Dick," said the Doctor, in the sternest tone he could assume, "I am ashamed of your conduct, sir." Aunt Julia's steely eye was upon her father, and he dared not falter.

"You know that you are expressly forbidden to make any acquaintances in town without my permission—or—your aunt's; and yet I am told that you have picked up a low boy who lives in an attic in a low street, and actually made a friend of him, and run away to go and see him. Is not this true?"

Brooks was standing within the door by this time, looking so anxious to speak that Aunt Julia said, "What is it, Brooks?"

"It was a most disgraceful sight, ma'am—sir!" he said, with his angust nose very much in the air. "When I got there I found 'em fighting and going on like wild Injuns; and such a low, dirty place! and Master Dick's heels in the air, sir, and that low boy a-turning himself into a sort of jumping-jack, if I might so call it, ma'am; a most disgraceful rioting sight it was, sir!"

"It's not so!" cried Dick, flashing around upon Brooks, who smiled scornfully upon the heated boyish face. "Grandfather, it is true that I've made a friend of Dick Devine, and he's a poor boy in an attic, but he's honest, and not a bit rougher than any of the fellows at Barnabas; and we weren't fighting. He was teaching me somersaults."

Here Aunt Julia interrupted, with a horrified scream:

"Father, do you hear? do you hear? He owns to this himself. He'll be running off with a circus next. Oh, father, do not be weak and blind!"

Brooks regarded Mrs. Thomason with an air of most admiring compassion. Poor Dr. Field found it hard to know what to say. He felt, and no one more keenly, that Dick must be taught to make no friends unknown to him, and particularly among a low class, yet something in the honest fearlessness of the boy's tone touched him. Perhaps if Aunt Julia had not called up a vision of the reckless father who had broken his daughter's tender heart he might have relented so far as to investigate the character of the Devines, but he knew what he had to dread if Richard Dearing's son were to revive any of his father's folly.

A VISIT TO THE QUEEN OF BURMAH.

MRS. ROWETT, an English lady who was travelling with her husband in Burmah, received from the Queen of that country an invitation to pay her Majesty a morning visit. Invitations from royal personages are very much like commands, and the lady, though she felt a little timid about venturing within the palace walls, at once decided to go. Her husband could accompany her only to the gate, as no men were allowed to enter the presence of the Queen.

She was not obliged to go entirely by herself, however, as Sister Teresa, the Superior of a convent in Mandalay, who had been the Queen's teacher in her childhood, kindly offered to present her.

According to custom, the lady provided herself with a gift for the Queen, filling a tray with the most beautiful articles in glass and china and delicate perfumes which she could obtain in the shops of Mandalay.

At 7 A.M. Mrs. Rowett, luxuriously seated in a rattan chair carried by coolies, set out on her way to the palace, accompanied by Sister Teresa and one of her nuns in a bullock carriage, and by her husband on his pony. The hilly roads were shaded by many trees, and the procession wound along through masses of flowers in brilliant bloom.

A half-hour's ride brought them to a high wall of red brick inclosing an area a mile and a half square. This wall surrounded the city of Mandalay. Passing through a great gateway, they found themselves in a crowded town, and a few more steps brought them to another thick and lofty wall, within which was the palace. Here the gentleman took his leave, and the ladies went in.

Though the sun was very hot, etiquette compelled them to close their umbrellas when inside the palace inclosure, but as the lady had on a thick hat made of pith, she did not suffer from the heat.

The royal guards were a droll-looking set, some clothed and some half naked, but adorned with shiny red helmets, and armed with harmless old muskets, and brandishing cruel-looking spears of great length.

It was not enough to close umbrellas, but shoes also were forbidden in the Queen's presence; so when the house itself was reached, the ladies had to stop and take them off. Mrs. Rowett had prudently put on several pairs of stockings, so she walked over the passages very comfortably.

What was her surprise and delight to be greeted in this strange place, by a cheerful English voice, with a pleasant "Good-morning!" The owner of the voice turned out to be an English nurse who was in regular attendance on the Queen. This lady took Mrs. Rowett to rest awhile in her chamber, where she showed her quantities of silks and velvets which her mistress had given her. She was bare-footed, of course, but was richly dressed, and blazing with diamonds. Costly ear-rings, pins, and bracelets are worn by Oriental women, and this nurse had adopted the fashion. She was in high favor, and the Queen loaded her with jewels.

By-and-by there came a summons to the throne-room, where the foreigner was met by a number of princesses and maids of honor, who chatted with her freely, the Sister acting as interpreter. These ladies were dressed in the Burmese costume. First there was the tamine, or skirt, very tight around the hips, but flowing freely at the feet and trailing slightly. These skirts were of the richest silk, in gorgeous colors and rich designs. A loose jacket of fine white cambrie, open in front to display a bright silk band which reached from the waist to the armpits like a sash, and the simple dress was complete. The effect was that of a square bodice, and the necks of these ladies were almost covered with chains of pearls, rubies, and diamonds. The jackets had close sleeves, heavily embroidered, and so tight that they had to be worked over the hand like kid gloves.

The princesses wore their hair in thick coils, low at the back of the neck, and their heads were ornamented with flowers.

The room in which Mrs. Rowett awaited the Queen was a wonder of beauty. It was very large, and the lofty ceiling was supported by massive pillars overlaid with the purest gold. All the walls and doors were covered with gilded lattice-work. Mirrors were placed everywhere, and the floor was carpeted with the thickest and softest of velvety rugs.

Two hours passed slowly by, and then a slight stir or hubbub proclaimed that her golden-footed Majesty was coming.

Instantly the ladies of the court put themselves into a position of reverence, prostrating themselves and folding their hands far in front of them, as if in prayer.

The young and pretty Queen, only twenty-one years old, was as shy as a school-girl. She seated herself on a cushion of purple velvet at the foot of the throne, puffed away at a large cheroot, and asked after her guest's health, and how old she was. A maid of honor then handed the visitor a golden cup and a splendid piece of silk, presents from the Queen.

Then Mrs. Rowett inquired if she might see the baby, but the little princess was asleep, and her mamma did not wish her to be disturbed.

Soon after this the Queen, who noticed that the European lady was growing very tired of sitting with her feet tucked up under her petticoats, brought the interview to an end by herself rising and leaving the room.

The audience being over, Sister Teresa escorted Mrs. Rowett into several of the finer apartments of the palace, where she saw many of the royal treasures, among them some wonderful specimens of carving in wood, and some elegant silks woven by hand.

At the outer gate the husband was waiting with his coolies and the lady's chair, and she was carried back through the streets of Mandalay, which were all brilliant with roses and gilding.

A religious festival was in progress, and there were processions, in which golden umbrellas swayed aloft, grantees were perched on the backs of elephants, and people were arrayed in the brightest-hued silks.

All the women wore wreaths of flowers; and as the English party embarked on their steamer for Rangoon, the last thing they saw was the flashing to and fro of golden boats over the deep blue water.

THE LITTLE MESSENGER OF LOVE.

BY LOUIE BRINE.

IT WAS a little sermon preached to me

By a sweet, unconscious child—

A baby girl scarce four years old,

With blue eyes soft and mild.

It happened on a rainy day;

I, seated in a car,

Was thinking, as I neared my home,

Of the continual jar

And discord that pervade the air

Of busy city life,

Each caring but for "number one,"

Self gain provoking strife.

The gloomy weather seemed to cast

On every face a shade,

But on one countenance were lines

By sorrow deeply laid.

With low-bowed head and hands clasped close,

She sat, so poor and old,

Nor seemed to heed the scornful glance

From eyes unkind and cold.

I looked again. Oh, sweet indeed

The sight that met my eyes!

Sitting upon her mother's lap,

With baby face so wise,

Was a wee child with sunny curls,

Blue eyes, and dimpled chin,

And a young, pure, and loving heart

Unstained as yet by sin.

Upon the woman poor and sad

Her eyes in wonder fell,

Till wonder changed to plying love.

Her thoughts, oh, who could tell?

Her tiny hands four roses held;

She looked them o'er and o'er,

Then choosing out the largest one,

She struggled to the floor.

Across the swaying car she went

Straight to the woman's side,

And putting in the wrinkled hand

The rose, she ran to hide

Her little face in mother's lap,

Fearing she had done wrong.

Not knowing, baby as she was,

That she had helped along

The up-hill road of life a soul

Cast down, discouraged quite,

As on the woman's face there broke

A flood of joyous light.

Dear little child! she was indeed

A messenger of love

Sent to that woman's lonely heart

From the great Heart above.

This world would be a different place

Were each to give to those Whose hearts are sad as those of love

As went with baby's rose.

SOAP-BUBBLE SECRETS.

BY THE REV. C. G. CHILD.

PROBABLY there is not a reader of YOUNG PEOPLE who has not at some time amused himself with a pipe and a bowl of soap-suds. Few, however, know all that a bubble can afford in the way of amusement at a slight outlay. Does my reader know how to make a giant bubble? has he learned how to employ soap-bubbles as magic-lantern slides? did he ever see them used as parlor ornaments? or is a soap-bubble in harness an every-day thing with him? If not, he will find these uses of the bubble described in the present article, and I would add that the experiments will prove interesting and beautiful to old as well as young.

We must first learn how to make the giant bubble. This is the king of bubbles, the largest, the longest-lived, and the most beautiful. If you can imagine a bubble two or even three feet in diameter, with an existence measured by hours instead of seconds, glowing with colors five times as gorgeous as those of the ordinary bubble, you have just such a one in your mind's eye as you can make for yourself by carefully following directions.

Procure two ounces of palm-oil or Castile soap; the former is preferable. Cut it in pieces the size of a pea, and place them in a bottle of clear glass with a pint of rain-water. Shake violently until the water has taken up as much soap as it will hold. You have now what is called a saturated solution of soap. Place it aside, and leave it from twenty-four to thirty-six hours, until it has settled, either perfectly clear or of a very light pearl-color. If, after thirty-six hours, the solution still remains clouded, pour off a little of the water and add more. This time it will scarcely fail to settle as desired. Carefully pour off, straining through flannel, add half a pint of pure glycerine, and when the two have had time to mingle thoroughly, you are ready to blow a giant bubble.

To blow the very largest bubbles it is necessary to have a larger pipe than the clay pipe commonly used, though such a pipe will produce large bubbles. A glass funnel two or three inches in diameter, fitted with a piece of rubber tubing, produces enormous bubbles. There is a very ingenious apparatus used, which admits of putting the finger within the pipe itself. By this means fresh soap solution may be smeared within the pipe, affording renewed nourishment to the bubble, and enabling the experimenter to blow it to an incredible size.

These bubbles are distinguished not only for their size, but for their beauty and durability. I have known bubbles made by this method to last two or three hours in the open air, and from twenty-four to thirty-six under glass, precaution being taken that the air of the room be pure, and that no rough touch destroy their fragile lives. But now let us find out how we may examine the bubble with the greatest ease and to the best advantage.

Procure a piece of pine board about three inches square. In the middle of this fix a piece of iron wire, free from rust, twenty inches in length. At about six inches' distance from the board bend the wire into a circle, the plane of which is parallel with that of the board, and with a diameter of five inches. Blow a bubble of six or seven inches diameter, and gently place it in the ring; it will not break, and by tilting the pipe you may free it from the bubble. Thus placed the bubble shows off the colors to great advantage; for, as has been said, the glycerine bubble will last for hours, unlike the ordinary one, as fragile as it is lovely. Three or four bubbles of various sizes, placed under glass on such standards, form a beautiful object for a drawing-room, especially if their colors are seen against a background of some black material.

Next as to employing soap-bubbles, or, more correctly, soap films, as magic-lantern slides. Those who do not possess a magic lantern may try the experiment, though to less advantage, in the following way: Dip the mouth of a tumbler lightly in the soap solution, raise it gently, and a soap film will remain stretched across the mouth. Hold the tumbler horizontally, and the same beautiful effects of color may be seen on the film as are thrown on the wall when the magic lantern is used. For a magic lantern, go to work as follows:

Take a slip of card-board, the same size as one of your slides, and in it cut a circular hole, proportional in diameter to the width of the slide. Pour some of the solution into a shallow dish, and dip the slide into it. Raise it gently, and a film will be left in the hole. Slip the slide with care into the lantern, and await results. For a moment the circle of light on the wall remains clear, but soon at the bottom a faint tinge of color appears, growing stronger and stronger, and moving upward. It settles into a band of color at last, still moving steadily upward, and succeeded by another band of another tint, which follows it, and so on, until the great circle on the wall is gorgeous with the same beautiful hues as appear on the bubble, but not stirring uneasily together as these seem, but in regular bands ever moving upward. Now jar the slide gently, and, presto!—the bands break and whirl together in an astonishing maze of color, wonderful in beauty. This is really one of the most beautiful experiments imaginable, and will never fail to call forth hearty admiration.

Now for an exceedingly amusing experiment—the harness soap-bubble. Take a piece of the thinnest writing-paper you can find, and from it cut a circular piece a little less than a dime in size. To one end of this attach a thread by the aid of a tiny drop of sealing-wax—the less the better. Blow the bubble to an ordinary size, and then touch the round piece to it gently. The bubble will adhere to it, and by gently tipping the pipe you may leave the bubble suspended by the string.

A bubble blown from the mouth sinks, but if the pipe is attached by a piece of rubber tubing to a gas fixture, the bubble then blown being filled with a gas lighter than air will be carried upward as far as the string will allow. Thus you have a veritable balloon, and it just sufficient string is allowed to keep it balanced midway between floor and ceiling, it will perform very curious antics. Those currents of air which exist in every room, unfelt by the inmates, are strong draughts to the fragile and delicate bubble. It will follow these currents, now visiting the ceiling, now running along the floor, and escaping as if by a miracle the obstacles in its path. If there is a lamp or gas jet in the room it will be gradually attracted toward it, and, carried by the upward current of hot air, will dash toward the ceiling, as if bent on committing suicide. But bounding on the cushion of dead air, which always lies on the surface of every solid object, it bends at right angles, and darts off, escaping as if by some inward power the fate into which it was apparently plunging headlong, and again circles round the room, till drawn a second time into the current of hot air.

The ingenious reader will be able to work up the hints above given into a variety of amusing and beautiful experiments. The last described will perhaps afford most amusement in various ways, which will readily occur to his mind while using the novel toy. The true secret of success in these experiments, as in everything, is carefulness. If the soap solution is prepared with care, there is no reason why the reader should not be entirely successful in the experiments that follow.

Bubbles are most curious and lovely things. There is neither time nor space to go into their connection with science, and the deep natural truths which they are used to prove. The reader can at least admire their gorgeous coloring and airy grace, and find a moral in their short but lovely lives.

SOAP-BUBBLES.

BY ELEANOR A. HUNTER.

BERTIE, the mischief, Kitty, and Fan,
Two little maids and one little man,

In gingham aprons from toe to chin
Snugly and cozily buttoned in,

Sit by the table all in a row,
With pipes and bowls as white as the snow.

Six pink cheeks that are rounder growing
Look like cherubs a trumpet blowing.

Warm and as soft as velvet each is,
And as sweet as a harvest peach is.

Bubbly-bubble, blow and blow;
That is the way the soap-bubbles grow.

Larger and larger. Toss it away—
A little round world with colors gay.

Lightly it floats through the air o'erhead
In rainbow purple, orange, and red,

Then vanishes; for, you see, the worst
Of soap-bubbles is the way they burst—

Burst in the air, on the walls, the floor,
But never mind, darlings; make some more.

CAPTAIN KIDD'S MONEY.

BY THOMAS W. KNOX,

AUTHOR OF "THE YOUNG NIMRODS," "BOY TRAVELLERS IN THE FAR EAST," ETC.

ALONG the coast of New England, or that part of it east of Boston, there were formerly many traditions about treasure buried by Captain Kidd and other freebooters of his time. The spots where the treasures were buried were usually revealed in dreams; the happy dreamer confided the secret to a friend or two, and they arranged to secure it whenever the time should be favorable. But it always happened that something went wrong, and the treasure vanished from sight or touch generally at the moment when it was just within grasp.

One of my neighbors was a firm believer in the existence of the hidden wealth of the pirates. He often dreamed where it was to be found, and on several occasions he devoted an entire night to digging. Once he took me into his confidence, and told how I could become the possessor of "Kidd's money," provided I would follow certain rules, in which he believed thoroughly.

"First off," said he, "you must dream where the money is, and be able to find the spot you dream about. Then, if you've got the nerve to go alone, you have a better chance of getting the money, as there won't be so much likelihood that anybody'll break the spell."

I asked what he meant by the suggestion, and he explained as follows:

"All this money of Kidd and the other pirates is guarded by spirits, and if you break the spell you can't get it. In the first place, you must dig on a night when there isn't any moon; the moonlight is part of the spell, and no money can be got when it is shining. Then when you've begun to dig you mustn't speak; if you do, the treasure sinks down, and you are thrown out of the place with your eyes full of dirt. The spirits watch the money, and if you don't open your mouth you'll get it—if it's there."

I was somewhat doubtful about the matter, and he proceeded to convince me of the correctness of what he had told me.

"About two years ago," he continued, "I dreamed three or four nights running where there was a chest full of Kidd's money, about half a mile back of Foster's Cove. The spot was shown so clear that I went and picked it out, and then I told Sam Fowler about it, and he agreed to go and dig with me, and share the money. I marked the place with a stake so as to find it in the night, and one night when there wasn't any moon, and the clouds made it almost pitch-dark, we went there and dug. We hadn't thrown up a dozen shovelfuls when the air was full of hissing noises, and there were voices calling us all sorts of names. We kept on without saying a word, and soon we hit the top of a chest, or, anyway, something that sounded hollow. When we struck it there was more noise than ever, and the spirits not only made a tremendous racket, but kept knocking us from side to side. We'd got the top of the chest almost uncovered, as well as we could make out in the dark, and I was just laying down my shovel, and reaching for the pickaxe to bust it in, when I was knocked clean from one side of the hole to the other. I forgot myself, and hollered out, and in less than a second we were sprawling on the ground outside, the hole was all filled up, and the chest gone, and when I felt round for the stake I couldn't find it. We went home feeling mean enough. Next day I went back and looked at the place, and there wasn't a sign of the stake nor of our digging, and the whole spot was so changed that it wasn't like what I saw in my dream."

This story and others like it had such an effect on my mind that I too dreamed of Kidd's treasures. The dream was repeated, and I had no difficulty in discovering the spot. It was certainly a good one for the purpose—about ten yards to the north of a large stump on the edge of a bit of woodland, and just such a place as an intelligent pirate ought to select.

"I hadn't the nerve" to go there alone on a moonless night to recover the treasure; besides, I wasn't greedy, and had a decided willingness under the circumstances to share my future wealth with others. Under a pledge of secrecy, I confided the story to two of my school-mates; one consented to join in the enterprise, but the other declared a decided dislike for it, and refused to go. As I had secured one companion, I was indifferent to his objections, and continued with my plans.

I marked the spot with two stakes about four feet apart, and it was arranged that we should dig between the stakes. We selected a night when there was no moon, and settled upon a place where we were to meet. During the day preceding the great occasion we conveyed two shovels and a pickaxe to the meeting-place, and also an empty meal sack in which to bring away the money.

We went to bed at the usual hour, and then escaped by the back windows to proceed on our search for wealth. My companion, Charley, slept on the ground-floor of his father's house, and therefore had less difficulty than I in getting out, as my bed was on the second story. But with the aid of a short rope, and two or three nails in the side of the house, I was quickly and noiselessly on the ground, and able to get back again by the same means.

Charley had been waiting a few minutes when I reached our rendezvous. We hastily secured our tools, not forgetting the bag, and proceeded, with some insteadness of step, to the treasure ground. The truth is that just then I did not altogether like the affair, and no more did Charley; but neither was willing to back out, and so we went on. The night was cloudy, but without rain, and we could see only a short distance around us. We knew well enough how to find the old stump, and once at it, there was no trouble in finding my stakes. It was agreed that we were not to speak after reaching the stump, and so the commencement of our trench-work was made in silence.

The spirits did not disturb us for the first quarter of an hour. Just as I was congratulating myself with the thought that perhaps we had taken them unawares, and might get the money and be off before they found us, there was a loud hiss close to my ear. It startled me a good deal, and had the same effect on Charley, as we dropped our shovels, and struck our heads against each other in stooping to pick them up. Then there were more hisses, followed by mutterings and threats, of which I could not make out any intelligible words. We worked like beavers, and kept perfect silence in spite of the temptation to speak; as a matter of precaution we had each fastened a handkerchief tightly across the other's mouth when we reached the stump, as we thought it would be a discouragement to conversation. It was lucky we did so, as both admitted afterward that we should have been certain to say something when the first hiss sounded in our ears if the handkerchief had not stopped our utterance.

The noises went on for perhaps another quarter of an hour. By this time we had made a hole more than a yard square and about two feet deep, and I began to feel we ought to be near the treasure. I had previously concluded that no good and honest pirate would bury money more than three feet below the surface; he would naturally think of the difficulty of digging it up when he came to get it, and would probably be in a hurry, owing to the fear of discovery by the king's men. I thought I heard a hollow sound beneath me. I had been told that when the lid of the chest was broken the power of the guardian spirits was gone, and there was no further danger of their interference. Determined to secure the treasure, I extended my hand to the spot where we placed the pickaxe when we began working with the shovels.

It was gone, and so was the meal sack which was to contain the money!

I turned to see if Charley had taken it; he was working with his shovel, and paid no attention to my movements. As I turned I was violently pushed across the hole, and fell upon Charley. The bandage slipped from my mouth, and gave me the opportunity to ask, "Where's the pickaxe?"

Hardly had I spoken when we were both dragged from the hole, and found ourselves sprawling on the ground. As we struggled to regain our feet we were again thrown down, and dragged for several yards. We were held in a noose at the end of a rope which was controlled by invisible hands. As we struggled to release ourselves from the entanglement, the air was filled with laughter, and it was evident that my fatal question about the pickaxe had broken the spell, and caused the chest and its contents to vanish from our reach.

We escaped from the noose, and were just starting to run home as fast as our legs would carry us, when we were seized and thrown to the ground again.

Then there was more laughter and more noise, but to our great relief we found ourselves in the hands of our school-mates. The boy who declined to join us in the enterprise had induced half a dozen others to help him play a joke on us. They were concealed near the stump when we reached it, and by lying close to the ground had been able to see our preparations through our outlines against the sky. Of course when we began to dig we were too intent on our work to notice that they removed the pickaxe and meal sack, and as we had expected supernatural noises we were easily deceived. They placed the noose around us unperceived, and it was arranged that the first word uttered by either of us was to be the signal to "haul away." And they did haul away with a vengeance.

It was long before we heard the last of our adventure, and neither Charley nor myself ever went again in search of Kidd's treasures.

THE CRÈCHE.

BY M. E. SANGSTER.

THE word crèche means cradle. In the beautiful city of Paris there are a number of crèches, or day nurseries, to which babies are brought every morning, and where kind Sisters of Charity take the very best care of them while their mothers are away at work.

These crèches are open at six o'clock, and the little ones are left for the day. They have a sunny room and plenty of company, and they do not hear a loud tone or a cross word from morning until night.

As soon as their mothers are out of sight the infants are washed, dressed in clean clothing, and either laid in a little bed to go to sleep, or, if old enough, are allowed to roll about and creep as they like on the soft matted floor. The mothers come at noon to visit the little creatures, and then what a lovely sight! One who visited the crèche says, "The infants, lying in their nests, hear the steps and voices of their mothers approaching, and raise their little heads like so many young birds."

For the privilege of having their babies thus taken care of the sum of two cents a day is paid by women who are able to spare it. Of course this does not nearly meet the expenses that are necessary, and so the rich and kind people of Paris pay a great deal of money to help the Sisters who do the work. Many little children on their birth days or at Christmas send their gifts to the cradle, which they like to think is theirs. Often, when a dear child has been taken to heaven, its parents and friends send presents to the crèche in its name.

There is a sadder side to the picture, however. In Paris there is a great Foundling Hospital, which is intended for little ones whose parents have deserted them. The children who are shown you in these pictures belong to the crèche of this institution. They are all dressed alike in a uniform of flannel, with a checked apron, and a little white muslin or else a black woollen cap. Of course where there are so many babies, though the Sisters are as kind as they can be, yet each child can not have the care which it would receive in the poorest home. It is washed and fed, and kept warm and clean and comfortable, but it is not kissed, petted, and played with as the baby is at your house.

So these babies learn to be very patient. When they are hungry they whimper and fret, but do not cry very loudly; they sit still in their little chairs, and wait until the nurses bring them their cups of milk or broth. They do not laugh and play merrily as other little ones do. The prettiest toys, the nicest tarts, are dropped from the listless hands. The fact is that children can not thrive and grow rosy, plump, and pretty without ever so much love.

Many of these babies die while still very young; but others pull through the first feeble year, and are taught to walk and to wait on themselves. You see in the first picture the Sister who is encouraging them to walk to her; she smiles and says cheering words, when the timid steps become brave.

As for the sturdy-looking rogues who have survived babyhood, and are old enough to march to the dining-room, we think their happy faces show that they have learned to laugh. After a while they will go to school, or be taught some useful art or trade, and perhaps when they are men and women they will forget that they were once such forlorn little babies.

Many of the foundlings are sent to the country to become the foster-children of strong, good-hearted peasant women, who nurse them as they do their own little ones, and are well paid for their trouble and care. These are the fortunate babies. They are treated as one of the family where they live; they have brothers and sisters to play with; and they have the dogs, cats, and chickens for pets. When large enough, the boys help in the fields and the girls in the house.

Sometimes, too, the little ones who have grown up in the asylum to the age of three or four years are selected by kind farmers and market-women, and taken home as their own. Of course they want the prettiest children, but the Sister in charge chooses for them, and generally uses so much tact that the new parents go home quite proud and pleased with the boy or girl they have adopted.

ON THEIR WAY TO THE DINING-ROOM.

SKETCHES AT DIEPPE.

No doubt some of our little readers have visited Dieppe, and enjoyed the pleasure of sitting on the sands, where the waves come rolling in. If they have not, they have, perhaps, spent long summer days on the beach somewhere in their native land, and they know how delightful it is to lie in the shelter of a bluff, or sit on the shingle, talking and telling stories. Well, well, now that summer is over, and the autumn sun is shining, Reggie and Max here, and the rest of the children, must begin to think about school. I wonder if that is what makes these laddies wear so pensiv' a look.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Tell Marcia M. V. I have a Manx cat. It is just like other cats, only there is a little bunch of hair instead of a tail. The breed of cats is called Manx because it was found in the Isle of Man. It is also called the rabbit, on account of the length of the hind legs, which gives the cat a gait like a rabbit. My cat has been a great traveler, for she came from Northern Vermont to Washington in a basket, stopping at Lowell and Boston, a week in each place. She is very affectionate, and will put her paws on my face, and try to pull it down so she can kiss me. I have three sisters, and at night she will hunt in the beds where we sleep until she finds me, and then she will get down under the clothes and go to sleep.

There is a little dog that has been greatly petted. It is very funny, when he barks for his food, to see her go up to him and give him a good box on the ear, as if to say, "If no one else will make you mind, I will"; and she does. I am very fond of all animals, but especially of cats, and I was delighted when the Humane Society presented a man from experimenting with cats and parachutes from the dome of the Capitol. I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE from the very first number, and enjoy it very much. I am real glad Mrs. Little is going to write another story.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.

I am a little girl twelve years old. I have two brothers and one sister, all older than myself. I have only taken YOUNG PEOPLE since Christmas, when it was given to me by a friend, and I think it is lovely.

FLORENCE A. W.

OLD WESTBURY, LONG ISLAND.

I am a little New Jersey girl, and am visiting here for the summer. The people with whom I am staying live on a farm, so there are plenty of things for me to amuse myself with. Among the pets are two black-and-tan dogs, Topsy and Gypsy, and four cats, one of which has four kittens. One of the kittens has had eyes, one brown, the other blue; another is still more curious; it has three extra toes on one of its fore-feet, two on the other, and one on each of its hind-feet. Dick, my canary, died two weeks ago. I feel very badly about it.

I read Nina R.'s letter to YOUNG PEOPLE this morning, and it reminded me of a large box of scallop shells which I have, and would be glad to give if they will be acceptable.

I think "Nan" is the best story I have seen in YOUNG PEOPLE, but my little brother Willie likes "Bing" and the "Pearl" best. EFFIE E. H.

Nina will let you know about the shells through the Post-office Box if she would like them.

MY WONDERFUL RIDE.

When I was a very small boy—that was a long time ago, for I'm seven now—I took a ride on our old horse Topsy. I wanted her to take me any way of going, but she didn't seem to want to try my way, for my way was to have her gallop back-wind. I tried my best to persuade her, but I could not change her mind, and when I tried to make her stop kicked, and the next thing that I knew there were four doctors standing over me, and all the family trying to make the wife town think I was killed. But I wasn't, only I couldn't move one leg, nor open one eye, and I was all blue in patches where they said I was hit by a lot of bricks that were just at that moment falling from our chimney. In a few days the bricks were in their place, and I was in mine. So good-night to all.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

YOUNG PEOPLE comes to me every Wednesday morning. I think the best stories were "Nan" and "In Honor Bound," only the latter was a short story. I think it is fun to play "Nan." I have three dolls, whose names are PANSY, FRUITY, and DOTTY Dimple. I expect to go to St. John in October to stay a month.

ALICE S.

LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS.

Have you room for another boy? If you have I will write on a short letter. I have never written to YOUNG PEOPLE before, but I hope this will be printed, for I want to surprise my father and mother. I like YOUNG PEOPLE ever so much, and so do we all. I am working in the Little Rock Furniture Factory at present, but will go to school soon, so good-by until the next.

OSCAR G. McC.

JAMESTOWN, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl just nine years old. I have a brother seven, and a little sister four years old. We have taken this paper since the first number, and have three volumes bound in them. We have always lived in Brooklyn, New York, until last March, when we moved here. Our house is on a high hill, and we have a very fine view of Chautauque Lake. There are some beautiful places on the lake. The 20th of August was my birthday, and mamma took us all up to Lakewood on a little picnic. Oh, how we enjoyed it! There were two or three tents with Indians in them, making fancy baskets to sell. Mamma bought me one to remember our trip by. There are two or three very large hotels and a great many very pretty cottages all filled with boarders.

My brother's birthday was the 23d of June. We went to Long Point then. We liked that better than Lakewood, because we could dig in the sand, and it reminded us of our dear Brighton Beach. Mamma made us each a handsome large birthday cake. Some day we are going to Fair Point, where they have the Sunday-school Assembly every August. We have three pets—a bird called Beauty, who sings all day long, a large Newfoundland dog, Jet, and a tiny Maltese kitten, Muff. She has had two or three kits. Does any one know what will cure them? We all love YOUNG PEOPLE dearly, and watch anxiously for it. I do hope you will think this worth printing, for I want to surprise papa and brother Leo Roy.

ANNE M. S.

I think that Kitty will outgrow her tendency to fits if you do not pet and cress her too much, and at the same time see that she is not overfed.

SANPENEVILLE, GEORGIA.

I enclose five cents for the Nautlius; please send sixteen inches. I never have written before, so I enjoy I would write and tell you how much I enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. I am a little Southern girl, and see cotton growing near by, and hear the mocking-birds singing in our yard every day. We do not want a caged bird for a pet; they sing so much better free. We have three cats and a dog. The dog is very intelligent; he will shake hands with his right paw.

Two weeks ago an Italian with his family passed here; they were loaded with plenty of clothing and plenty of work to do, rather than go through the country begging from the people, both white and black, and teaching their little children to do nothing but beg.

I want to join the Little Housekeepers. I have made blackberry pies to-day. I am tired now, and I guess you are too. I am nine years old, and have a cousin who lives in the Post-office Box, will find space for me in your Post-office Box.

MATTIE BELLE T.

I agree with you about the Italian family. From Mattie's mother comes this gratifying letter:

DEAR POSTMASTER,—Allow us to express our admiration for your management of the Post-office Box, as well as our satisfaction with the whole of the paper, throughout the year, without hesitation that the paper is faultless, and are lending out our numbers in order to induce others to subscribe. We should not omit to say that great pleasure and joy are derived as much as the children do.

MES. M. E. T.

MISSOURI, CAMPERDOWN, AUSTRALIA.

I am nearly ten years old. I have a younger sister Margie nearly two years old. We live in Camperdown, one of the suburbs of Sydney, and every morning drive in with father to go to school, coming home by the tram. I learn reading, geography, history, dictation, grammar, arithmetic, and music composition. This quarter I got 274 marks more than I did the last. We have our midwinter holidays now. Father is an American citizen, and has taken YOUNG PEOPLE for me ever since it was begun. It is very nice reading, and I have often thought I would like to write a letter to you from this far-off Australian land, but hardly knew what to tell you, yet I would so like some little American girl to write to me and tell me all about little girls over there, and then I could write to her, and tell her what we do here, and perhaps in a few years, when father says he will take me over to America, I could go and see her, and be great friends.

I am going to tell you how we kept Independence day this year. We woke up Wednesday morning (July 4) was greeted with anxious eyes by the Americans of Sydney. There had been a little rain the night before, and the day broke with light misty showers, but brighter as the day wore on; so we took our way to the American Studio, George Street, where the company was to meet. Then we stepped into the carriages, and drove round and round the square; there were about forty carriages, all decorated with small flags, and many of them had large banners. When all were ready we drove, headed by the Mayor, down the main street, which was crowded with people to see the procession pass by, out to Botany Bay, about five miles from town. Some people hung out flags and green and white streamers. We were there when we got to the pavilion, Botany, we had a nice lunch of oysters and sandwiches. Then dancing was arranged, and kept up until dinner-time—two hours of free dancing, and then every one was so kind and obliging. After dinner the chairman, General Bennett, called upon Mr. Sheridan to read the Declaration of Independence. Then we drank the toast of "The day we celebrate," the band played, and the gentlemen cheered and sang "The Star-spangled Banner." Then the chairman proposed "The Queen, and the King, and all the games." Then the American and Australian, sang "God save the Queen." Then there were more toasts, and after that more dancing. Some of the gentlemen played cricket, and baseball, and all the games. At four o'clock there were tea and coffee, and plenty of nice cake. Only that it was winter we had had ice-cream. At sunset we took the carriage again, for the night was a clear starlight night, and as we drove along our company sang "Marching through Georgia," "Red, White, and Blue," "Our Jacks' come Home to-day," and "The Stars and Stripes." It was a fine time of it. There was a large ball at night of over three hundred. Father says that the ladies were splendidly dressed, and that it was a great success.

Thanks for this pretty description of a Fourth of July on the other side of the world.

LAWRENCE, LONG ISLAND.

I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for ever since the first number, and I like it very much. I tried the receipt in No. 196 of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for fifty, by Margaret Willis B., and I think it is splendid. I am having a lovely time this summer at Lawrence. I go in bathing quite a good deal, and enjoy it very much indeed. I always read the Yellow-Pepper, and try to find out the answers to the puzzles. I think that Mrs. Lillie's and Jimmy Brown's stories are the best of all. I like especially Mrs. Lillie's stories about music, as I am very fond of it. FANNIE S.

THE WOODHINE.

Shall I tell the reason why I love
The scarlet woodhine best
Of all the gentle swaying vines
That summer winds dress in bloom
This because it climbs and blossoms
On a far-distant shore,
Over the grave of one I loved
In the happy days of youth
He was my cherished brother,
Whose tender heart was true;
Orphans in this wide world alone,
Our pleasures told were few,
But in our little garden home
Were hessius pure and meek,
And hand in hand we gathered
Those way-side blossoms sweet;
And when the shades of evening fell
Round our dear cottage home,
Where fragrant lilies mingled
With odorous perfume,
When through the open windows
Came breath of summer hours,
To me the scarlet woodhine
Seemed fairer for vines or flowers,
Climbing the olden lattice,
Hanging its berries red
Over the low south windows.
By dew and sunlight fed
In after-years a spig of green
I sent across the wave
To him who searched for golden sand
By rocky gleam and cove;
'Twas planted by his cabin door,
Where, when his work was done,
The lamp-light shining on his leaves
Would whisper him of home,
It curtained with a veil of green
The toiling miner's cot;
Their blossoms stole to his homesick soul
From the blue of foreign clime,
He sent me many a treasure
Of fragrance pure and rare,
With gold his willing hands had found,
That I his gains might share,
Then ceased his kindly letters:
Was he coming home to me?
The very thought made my glad heart
Beat fast and joyous;
But the summer bloom had faded,
And autumn's chilling rain
Beat with a dreary, lonesome sound
On the cottage window-pane,
I was thinking of the absent one,
When, lo! as in a dream,
There rose a silent cabin home
Gregarious with smiling green,
No cheerful lamp-light shed its rays
From window-sill or door,
I heard the Sacramento moun
Sounding the rocky shore,
While mournful voices seemed to say,
"We sadly miss his merry song
Since his comrades laid him down to sleep
Among the woodhine leaves of June."
Then the vision slowly faded:
I woke as from a dream;
The rain had ceased, the sun shone bright
The glistering leaves between;
But with evening came a letter,
With some leaves and berries red;
Too well I knew they mark the spot
Where sleeps my cherished one.
MARION HELEN BASSETTE.

MY COMPOSITION CLASS.

My class, forty in number, has just entered the room. I call the roll. Fat Dickson is absent. He came to me yesterday at recess, turned his fast-swelling cheek to me, giving it two or three excruciating scratches, and said, "Miss Florence!" "He is now at home, enjoying both holidays and mumps." Inquiring faces are waiting for the subject to be announced. "What do you think it is?" "Afflict of the Great, or Decline and Fall of Rome?" "No, no, not this time; it is simply, "What I saw at the Picnic." "I am greeted with a low murmur of pleasure and joyous bright smiles." "They are now writing busily, and I, dear little teacher, will write to you. What I say may be helpful to you in the hardest task of school life, namely, writing a composition." Presently Blanche calls to me, saying, "I can't write about 'What I saw at the Picnic.' I didn't see anything, except some old rocks, and the ones that've been working on for a year or two, and it is not finished yet." Bustling Andrew looks up, and says, "That is just what I'm writing about; for when I got to the picnic, I saw the same thing when public works are once begun, money enough shall be given to finish them, and not waste what has been given by buying new tools, paying men to work and repair the first work." "There is romantic Mac; she is describing the grand bluffs reaching almost to the sky. Bright, elvery Maggie is writing of the sunbeams on the water; they are still lingering on her golden head. Bessie, the geographer, is actually drawing a map of the river. Sympathetic but rather rosy Bob is telling of the poor little Irish boy who was killed three weeks ago—how the huge robber saw him receive his wages—only five dollars—followed him up the tow-path, took his money, and threw him over the side into the river; how he clung to the willows and called for help, but none came, the bluff being so high that no one could reach him in time to save him. Let us hope the story is made up by John Turner, the mathematician, is describing the fine, exact work of the engineers.

You see, Blanche was surrounded by the same things and scenes as her companions, but saw nothing. Kathie, a bright girl who had been a little depressed, listened to the flow of the river and took courage; the rest saw and wrote.

This is what will help you, listen to your compositions; look around you; listen to people talk; watch what makes them laugh or cry. Every flower and sunbeam has a voice; look and listen, then write.
The bell rings; the class is exuded. Thomas, the philosopher, hands me his composition. I glance down its lines. He has described the engine in use on the canal, and tried to moralize on the three tests to find the height of water in the boiler. I will apply his thoughts to you, dear young people, and when the tests of temptation are brought to bear on you, may you be found with strength and power to move on, overcoming all with honor and glory!

SISTER FLORENCE.

I had a little bird; it was a canary, and a good singer, but it died. I have a sister; she is a head taller than I am, and one year older. I am just half past seven. We have one big cat and two little kittens; they are very cunning, and they play most all day long. We have an Alderney cow. The cream that we skim off her milk is so thick we can nearly cut it with a knife. Mamma has made three-quarters of a pound of butter for this morning's milk. I spend most of my time playing croquet. I wrote a letter before, but you did not print it. I hope you will print this one. I think I can make my letter quite long, so I will close right here with a period. Your little friend and steady reader,
ETHEL V.

HOOSICK FALLS, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl nearly twelve years old, and as I read about little girls telling about their pets, I thought I would write something about mine. I have a cat, and its name is Colonel, and it will let me dress it up like a doll, and wander around in my little sister's doll carriage, and not try to get out. Don't you think she is a good little kitty? My next pet is a young dove, and as I have not had it very long, it does not know me very well yet, but I sometimes take it out and let it fly around the room, and when I want to put it back again I open the cage door and it goes in. The next and last one is my dog, Jack, a funny pet. I suppose you will think, for a girl to have, but I like him as well as any of my others, for he is so full of play, and I have lots of fun with him. My father has been taking HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for me a long time, and I always like to hear the stories read, especially the letters in the Post-office Box, and I hope you will print this letter.
E. H.

INDIAN HEAD, NORTHWEST TERRITORY.

DEAR POSTMASTER, I am a boy nine years old. I have been taking YOUNG PEOPLE ever since "Toby Tyler" was commenced in it. My uncle gave it to me for a Christmas present for two years, and my aunt this year. I like the Post-office Box very much, and I thought I would write a letter and tell how I like this country, which is my new home for me. There is a school at the principal buildings of the Bell Farm, the great farm of the Northwest. Before I came here I lived on the banks of the St. Lawrence, in the town of Pressville, at the foot of the Thousand Islands. I came through the chain of lakes to the head of Lake Superior; from there here on the trains. We are 312 miles from Winnipeg. We kill lots of Indians here. There is a kind of a little animal called a gopher that lives on the prairie. We have fine sport catching them. We get a string and make a slip-knot on one end; then we pass one into its hole, and it is the slip-knot over the hole, and when it goes to come up we jerk the string, and we have it. The string is around its neck. You may think it cruel to kill the gophers, but they destroy the grain and gardens.
NORBERT H.

JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA.

I live down South in Florida, and see lots of alligators, small and large. We have a pet dog, Java, that is very nice, and very good, and in his hind-foot, and we give him a piece of cake. Sometimes my aunt's girl will make him walk across the room that way. My mother tried to train him to walk on his hind feet, and it is the receipt from YOUNG PEOPLE. My sister and brother and myself have taken the paper for three years, and I like Jimmy Brown's stories and the Post-office Box. We have a nice river called the St. John's River; it is, I think, 85 miles long, and some places five miles wide. This is the first time I have written to YOUNG PEOPLE. I am a little boy ten years old. LEVERETT D.

FAYORS are acknowledged from Daisy L., Emily V., Jack T., Hosalee and Roy B., Walter H., Lottie B. N., Tim, Helen S., Charles T., and Townsend D. —Charles S. N. T. The grape-like object you sent for inspection is a fresh-water alga of very low organization. —B. D. W.: The eggs of the common toad are deposited in ditches and along the shores of ponds. They resemble strings of fine black beads, and each string of eggs is covered with a transparent covering not unlike gelatine. When the tadpoles leave the egg they are very small and very black, and feed entirely on minute vegetable matter for many weeks before they pass through the changes which fit them to eating animal food. Sometimes the toads' eggs are seen festooning a branch of some aquatic plant, and the plant then looks as if it had come into bloom. —Nattie Hall, a dear little subscriber in Bedford, Pennsylvania, died on July 29. CANADIAN DAYS.

BY EDWARD I. STEVENSON.

II.

THE FOREST FIRE.

IT was not hard to see why the name "Arrowhead Point" had been given by Cal and his friends to the sharp tongue of wood land (it was only half a mile wide at its greatest breadth, and perhaps a third more in length) which, about eighteen miles from Prince's Settlement, projected from the Canada shore into the blue waters of Lake Superior.

But the little cape had more than its name to mark it in their minds. Calvert and Gabriel de Zouche had found out that upon Arrowhead Point a colony of otter was enjoying life greatly; and also that from a sandstone ledge along its west shore the white-fishing was a thing out of the common.

"Suppose we camp out there?" Cal had said, in September, to Gabriel de Zouche, Job Waller, and two others. "There's nothing mean about me, when I happen to be perfectly certain of enough trapping and fishing at Arrowhead for twenty fellows, let alone five."

"A good scheme, Cal," spoke Job, approvingly. "We can rig a shanty. Once a week one of the crowd can walk back to the settlement for anything we may want. When we get tired of camping we can all walk back—for good."

None of the fathers or mothers saw much objection to this enticing plan. The shanty was promptly knocked together. Pots and pans, blankets and traps, were transported to it by wholesale. For a freak a large raft was built, and launched in Arrowhead Cove, and even christened—the White Squall. By the middle of September the camping party were comfortably settled, and the other colony in a distressing panic. Job was cook; Calvert acted as a kind of captain-general to the others. The days were busy, the nights jolly. Friends and relatives tramped or rowed over from Prince's Settlement to admire the trophies of the Arrowheads (as the campers took to calling themselves), laughed at their odd housekeeping, and asked when they expected to have killed or caught everything finny or furry in the neighborhood. Altogether the camp quickly proved a thorough success.

It was during the second week that Calvert and his friends first heard of the great forest fires burning in the North. The atmosphere grew heavy and dense. Long John Capiteau met Gabriel in the woods one day and told the boy that unless the wind changed, trouble might be in store for Prince's Settlement. Three days after this small animals suddenly became curiously plentiful. A deer was shot, and a dozen others and a bear seen. The air did not clear. At night a dull glare lit the northwest skies. The pine-needles dropped two inches thick, and the rivulet running through Arrowhead all at once disappeared. The whole world of sky and forest about the boys' camp seemed to have turned to a dull green or a murky gray.

Sunday night came. In the middle of it Gabriel was aroused from a sound sleep by a strong breeze, which had certainly not been blowing at bed-time, and a stifling smell of smoke. The boy raised his head. Was the world outside the cabin door on fire? or what was that scarlet glare, those clouds of smoke whirling past, those strange cries echoing through the night? Gabriel leaped to his feet. "Boys! boys!" he cried, darting out to the little space before the shanty. "Up, up, all of you! The woods are afire." The rest followed him scarcely an instant later.

What wandering spark, blown on the veered wind, had stealthily kindled the mischief? The Arrowhead woods were blazing. Suffocating rifts of smoke swept directly down the point, and flame-colored light alternated with pitiful darkness. The boys could neither tell how long nor how mighty a belt of fire was marching upon the cabin, nor how rapid would be its approach. A danger is always the more terrible when one can not measure it.

For a moment no one spoke. "Do you think the—the settlement is safe?" said Job, in a trembling voice.

"Yes—no; I can't tell precisely," replied Calvert. "I fancy, however, that the fire started far nearer to us than to it. The wind, too, doesn't blow just right for the place to be in danger."

As Cal ceased a dense gust of smoke rolled over the group, and the faint crashing of trunks and lapping of flames reached each ear with startling distinctness.

"It's coming down the Arrowhead," Calvert cried. "We haven't ten minutes to lose. Strip the shanty, all hands! Let nobody take one thing that isn't necessary or valuable—let that be understood. Then for the White Squall!"

"And the rest of the stuff?" exclaimed Gabriel.

"The rest of the stuff must stay behind us, burn or not burn," answered Cal, sharply. "Thank Heaven, fellows, for the Squall! The fire has cut off any retreat to the mainland. Without the raft we should have to stay here and smother, I'm afraid."

Cal's tone was almost merry as he spoke—purposely so; for the boy saw difficulties before him and his four friends that in their excitement escaped the rest.

A very few moments only were lost in hurriedly getting together the guns, the nets and rods, the most precious furs, and some of the other valuables in the hut. At the last instant Calvert, exclaiming, "What was I thinking of?" dashed to one corner, and swept with his arm into a canvas bag the remnants of the week's provisions—to wit, a very few great cakes of corn-bread, some cold broiled meat, and three roasted birds.

Loaded down, the five boys began picking their way toward the beach. Hardly a word was spoken as they did so; but often afterward Cal and Gabriel thought of the curious picture that their excited and silent little caravan must have made, and what queer incidents chanced before the White Squall, lying half in sand and half in water, was fairly reached. That towering curtain of smoke behind their backs, which now reddened like daylight, and now became part of the gloom and darkness of night; the screams of startled wild fowl winging their way to safety far overhead in the sky; the shadows of small unknown animals darting to the right or left of the boys—all these things came back to them in later days. Calvert, too, remembered how once that night, in rounding a tall bowlder, three foxes sped past; and how, a little farther on, he saw a large lynx standing as if puzzled whither next to turn. At the time it actually did not seem to Calvert worth while to speak of it.

The White Squall was reached. "Now, all together—shove her along!" exclaimed Gabriel. With what rude levers lay at hand the raft was floated. Wading in the shallow, the boys laid down their light loads. Denser and more stifling each moment grew the smoke.

"All aboard!" cried Cal. The next moment the rudely shaped oars struck the reddening ripples, and the White Squall slowly glided out beyond the reach of the pursuing flames. For about a hundred feet on every side the surface of the lake could be seen. Beyond that, smoke and mist shut in the water, the raft, and the little party aboard it.

What anxious hours, till daylight, followed! Within what seemed a couple of miles from the coast of Arrowhead, and with the air about them become gradually purer and cooler, Cal and Gabriel ceased pulling at their oars, and sat almost silently, like the others. Each wondered where the light would find them; each thought of the friends at the settlement, friends of whose safety they were not, after all, secure, and who would undoubtedly be only too anxious for tidings from the party now floating on the White Squall. The dawn broke at length, but there was little real light until long after it, so thick was the air.

"Do you know where we are—where we have drifted to?" whispered Gabriel to Cal, later on in the morning, as the eyes of all looked over the gray circle of water and mark of which the raft was the centre.

"No, I don't," responded Calvert, in a low voice, "nor where in the world we are likely to bring up."

Then Gabriel realized that a new and very serious difficulty had arisen. In such an atmosphere, one which might remain unchanged for a week, there was positively no means of telling upon what side lay the coast which they had quitted; and, worst of all, no way of telling in which direction to steer the White Squall.

"Don't say anything much about it to frighten the rest," said Cal to Gabriel, a while later; "but one thing must be put in shape right away."

Presently he added, aloud, in his usual clear, pleasant tone: "See here, fellows. Seeing as we may not get home for supper to-night or breakfast to-morrow, hadn't we better serve out our provisions here in rations, eh?"

The assent was general. The two younger boys, Stephen and Felix Beaubien, even laughed a little over their all having "to play" shipwrecked sailors for a time. Job said nothing, but watched Calvert and Gabriel understandingly as they took account of their little stock of provisions, and while seeming to join in the joking of the two Beaubiens, settled upon the just allowance for each.

"We have quite enough to eat for two or maybe three days," Cal remarked upon finishing the task, "and as to water, there is no danger but that we will have only too much of that. It seems, though, that there wasn't so much meat on the shelf as I thought—and I took such pains to bring it, too."

In spite of the caution exercised by Cal and Gabriel, long before night every one on board of the White Squall came to understand that the situation was a very grave one. Here were five boys adrift on the mightiest freshwater sea in the world, on an open, unmanageable raft, with scant food, and no way of reckoning compass points or course! The sun was utterly hid.

"You might cut the air with a jackknife!" Job said.

As night came on there seemed to be a slight lightening yet straight overhead; but total darkness so quickly followed that nothing came from that. Cal served out the slender supper, and making themselves as comfortable as the length and breadth of the White Squall permitted, the boys drifted along in the darkness. Cal and Gabriel tried to keep up their own and the others' spirits by some lively chat about the chances of finding out their bearings the next day.

Alas! that next day broke in fog and drizzle, and with full as much smoke overhead as ever.

"ALL IS FOR THE BEST;"

OR, THE ADVENTURES OF RABBI AKIBA.

BY DAVID KER.

"AS contented as Rabbi Akiba" was a proverb among the Jews of his time throughout the whole length and breadth of Syria, and certainly not without reason. What thing it was that could ruffle the wise old teacher's calm good nature no one could ever find out.

Once upon a time it happened that a merry youth, with a good deal more fun than politeness about him, pledged himself to make the Rabbi lose his temper. This he tried to do by rushing into his study three or four times in succession, just when the old man was busied, and asking him such questions as, "Why are there mosquitoes on the Nile?" "How come the African negroes to have round heads?" and so on.

But do what he would, he could not provoke the Rabbi, who answered all his annoying questions so quietly and kindly that at last the young fellow was fairly ashamed of himself, and begged to be forgiven. The old man laid his hand upon the youth's head and blessed him.

And as he was in this case, so he seemed to be in every other. If a passing horseman splashed him with dirt, or a spiteful camel bit a piece out of his new robe, or a rude fellow ran against him and almost knocked him down, or a mischievous puff of wind whisked away his parchment just as he was in the midst of his writing, the dear old man would stroke his long white beard, and say with a quiet smile,

"All is for the best; what God wills can not be wrong."

And this seemed to be an all-sufficient medicine for him against any trouble whatever.

Now it happened one day that Rabbi Akiba had to take a journey across one of the Syrian deserts, and he went about it in a very different way from the excursionists who go over the same ground nowadays. His entire baggage consisted of a small lamp and a roll of parchment manuscript (for there was no printing in those days) containing the five books of Moses in Hebrew. As for company, all he had was the donkey on which he rode, and a small rooster, which he carried about with him everywhere to make sure of being aroused punctually at day-break, for our Rabbi was a very early riser.

The first day's ride was a long and a hard one, and the poor old Rabbi was very glad to come in sight, toward sunset, of one of those little Arab villages which lay dotted here and there upon the few fruitful spots in the desert. But the people of the village were a rough set, and when he rode in among them on his donkey to ask for a night's lodging he soon found that he had come to the wrong place for that.

"Do you think, then," cried one, "that we've nothing to do with our houses but to open them to every old vagabond that passes?"

"A pretty idle fellow he must have been," said another, "to have lived till his beard's white without having earned enough to keep himself!"

"Why don't you get down off your brother's back, and let him have a ride upon you?" sneered a third; "every donkey should have his turn!"

"Look here, Uncle White-beard," shouted a fourth, "there are some nice damp caves among the rocks yonder that'll make a famous lodging for a grave old hermit like you."

And then some mischievous boys began to throw dirt over him, and a spiteful dog tore the skirt of his robe, and another dog sprang up and gave him a pinch in the leg that made him jump, till at last the poor old teacher was glad to make off as fast as he could, very sad at heart to think that there were any men in the world who could be mean enough to treat an old man so shabbily.

"Well," said he to himself, "it's all for the best, no doubt; and since there's nothing else to be done, I may as well take shelter among the rocks, as that mischievous fellow advised me."

It was not long before he found a cave dry enough to suit him, and in he went, leaving his donkey to graze outside. Having eaten the few wheat cakes left in his wallet, taken a drink from a tiny spring that bubbled from the rock, and wrapped himself snugly in his mantle, the old man began to feel more comfortable, and thought he would amuse himself by reading a little before he went to sleep.

He lighted his lamp, and set it upon a ledge just over his head. But scarcely had he pulled out his book, when lo! a violent gust of wind blew the lamp out, and, worse still, tumbled it down off the ledge on to the ground, spilling all the oil, so that it could not be lighted again.

"Ha!" said the Rabbi, "not much reading for me to-night, I see. Well, no matter; doubtless it is all for the best."

But it seemed to be all for the worst just then, for at that very moment a terrific outcry and flapping of wings was heard from the nook in which the rooster had perched itself, and Akiba rushed to the mouth of the cavern just in time to see a huge gray wolf seudding off with poor Chanticleer in his mouth.

"Poor fellow!" said the old man, pityingly; "I shall miss him sorely, though I am not likely to sleep too long on such a couch as this. Well, well, I dare say it is all for the best; and, thank Heaven, my faithful donkey is still left me."

Scarcely were the words uttered when a shrill cry of terror, blended with a deafening roar, came from without, and by the dim light our Rabbi could just see his donkey, which had strayed to a little distance, struggling in the jaws of a monstrous lion.

"All gone!" said the poor old man, in a faltering voice, for this last blow almost overcame him—"all gone, and I am left alone. But it must all be for the best, for what God wills can not be wrong."

So saying, Akiba tried to forget his troubles in sleep, and having now no rooster to arouse him, did not wake until the sun was high in the sky.

"Now," said he, after finishing his prayers, "I will try these villagers once more; even they can not be so hard-hearted as to refuse me help in my present distress."

But as he approached the village a very startling sight presented itself. Not a living thing was to be seen, but men were lying dead on every side, while empty chests, broken boxes, doors torn down or beaten in, hoof-prints deeply stamped in the clay, told plainly of a night attack by robbers.

"I see it all," cried Akiba, "and all was for the best, indeed. Had I found shelter here I should have perished with the rest; and had my lamp remained burning, or my rooster happened to crow, or my donkey to bray, I should have been discovered and killed in the cave. Thanks be to God who has saved me from destruction! but I wish these poor souls could have been saved too, ill though they treated me."

Then, taking possession of an old mule which the robbers had not cared to steal, and filling his wallet with such provisions as he could find, the old man started again toward the town whither he was bound, and reached it safely, more than ever convinced that "all is for the best."

"DICK AND D."*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE,

Author of "Mildred's Bargain," "Nan," etc.

CHAPTER IX.

DICK DEARING RETURNS TO SCHOOL.

I AM sure my young readers will believe that Master Dick had not a particularly pleasant time at home during the remainder of his holiday. Dr. Field, it is true, considered he had been sufficiently punished, but Mrs. Thomason chose to treat him as though he had entirely disgraced himself, and had it not been for Barbara, time would have hung heavily on his hands.

Barbara had satisfied him that she had not been a "sneak." She had been asked if she knew where Dick had gone to, and of course had answered truthfully. That was all, and in consideration of this explanation Dick restored her to his favor, even allowing her to play marbles and military games with him. Young Field, Cousin Maud's brother, a Barnabas boy like Dick, was very little comfort at this time, since he chose to be sarcastic on the subject of Dick Devine, and continually joked Dearing about the result of his friendship with him.

Will Field lived not far from the Doctor's, but was not a particular favorite with the old gentleman, so that the school-room did not often have to endure his presence, and but that it would have been "mean" to do it, Dick would have resolved to take it out of his cousin when they returned to school. At Barnabas Dick was a universal favorite, every one knowing his spirit to be one of truthful manliness. That he was so remorseful for his thoughtless disobedience of his grandfather's rules showed that he might be trusted in the future. He resented nothing in Dr. Field's rebuke, and would even have accepted a good deal of scolding from Aunt Julia; but a protracted period of dark looks and icy tones was an infliction hard for him to bear.

So he was rather glad when his holiday ended. He received a kind though firmly spoken word of advice from the Doctor as he was leaving, and he resolved never again to be anything but frank with him. It was a relief to be among the boys at Barnabas again; to hear Packer's lively account of how gayly the mumps had spread at home, and how the various victims looked. Packer had cultivated a wonderful facial power during his absence, and could on a moment's notice imitate the different sufferers, and when on one occasion during study hour he assumed this look, and was called up to see if the disease had recommenced, the joy of the class knew no bounds.

Dearing had not forgotten Dick. He thought of him and of Norry, and of the little dog which they had named Trusty, a great many times, and wondered when, if ever, they should meet again. He well knew that Dick Devine was not a gentleman's son, nor in a social way his equal; yet among all the boys he had known he had never found the something which Devine possessed—a marked natural honesty and firmness. It was something that made it seem impossible that he (Dearing) could ever feel himself above Dick Devine, and yet he must obey his grandfather.

* Begin in No. 199, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Even though they met, they were not to speak; but at least he could remain loyal to his poorer friend in his heart.

An opportunity of expressing this loyalty occurred one day about a week after Dick's return to school.

It had been raining violently, and about dusk most of the boys in the fourth room had crowded about the fire, waiting for the welcome summons to tea. Dick had been up in the master's room for some reason, and returned just in time to witness an exhibition on the part of Will Field which made him turn pale with indignation.

This accomplished young gentleman was sitting up on one of the desks, and giving a most ludicrous and highly embellished account of Dick Devine, relating the circumstances of Dearing's friendship with him, and, having heard it from Brooks, describing the scene upon which that worthy had suddenly appeared.

"There they were," he was saying, with his mean little chuckle, "dancing around like bears on a pole, and the little chap tooting away on his accordion, and Dick just imitating everything this beggar-boy did. Brooks says it was about the queerest sight he'd ever seen. My! didn't he catch it when he got home!"

"What did his governor do?" inquired Packer, who always relished tragedy.

"Flogged him till he couldn't stand," said Field, promptly. What more he might have said we can not imagine, since at that moment a pair of strong young hands were on the nape of his neck, and Master Field found himself suddenly flung into the middle of the room, with his cousin standing over him white and stern.

"You'll lie about me again, Will, I think," he said, in a voice all the boys knew.

Field set up a loud howl, for he was really a little hurt, and in a few moments the commotion was such that it brought Dr. Filliper upon the scene. Field was sitting on one of the forms, holding his head in his hands, Dearing was in the midst of an eager group, and Packer was dancing about quietly, with a grin not altogether malicious, but not quite kind.

"What does this mean?" Dr. Filliper said, sternly; and Field gave another low howl. Then Dearing stepped forward and told his story.

"And the fellows may as well know the truth of it," he said, in a quiet, courageous voice. "That boy Devine is as good as — as any gentleman's son I ever knew, and my grandfather never raised his hand once to me. I did do wrong—I know I did—in disobeying him, for he doesn't allow me to pick up strange friends; but it was not Devine's fault.

Field here says he was a pickpocket, and if you please, Doctor, I'll thrash him within an inch of his life if I catch him or any one else saying a word against Devine again."

He strode up to Field, who was still wailing, and put out his hand.

"I'm sorry if you're much hurt," he said, gravely; "but you'll remember to stick to the truth when you talk about me the next time, I hope."

Dr. Filliper felt it his duty to administer a reprimand all around, but later he called Dearing to his own room, and there, in a calmer fashion, heard the whole story. The Doctor was a kind-hearted man, and he knew enough of the world and the lower classes to feel sure something might be done for the Devines. After Dick left him he sat down and wrote a note to a very charitable cousin of his in New York, asking her to hunt up the boys and find out the actual state of things. Dick knew that this had been done, and one morning he went to the Doctor's room looking a little troubled.

"Don't you think, sir," he asked, "that it would be well to write this to my grandfather? You see, he said I was to have no more to do with Dick Devine, and this might seem a roundabout way of hearing from him."

The Doctor fully approved of this idea, and acted upon it at once, promising Dr. Field that he would let him know the result of his cousin's inquiries.

A few days later Dick was again summoned to the master's room. The Doctor held an open letter in his hand, and looked very grave.

"I am sorry to tell you, Dear," he said, "that the result of our search has not been very satisfactory. My cousin searched out the house and number, and found that the Devine boys had left some days before in company with a very rough-looking man. I am afraid, my boy, that it would be better for you to forget them."

It seemed to Dick as if a mist came before his eyes. Devine, after all, to be proven a vagrant—a low boy! Yet something within him made him refuse to credit this. He looked anxiously at the Doctor, saying, in as firm a voice as he could command,

"I beg your pardon, sir, but I don't believe Devine's that sort. I feel sure he'll turn up all right."

Meanwhile, in the house on Fifth Avenue, Mrs. Thomson was triumphing over a letter from Barnabas.

"There, father!" she exclaimed; "didn't I tell you that that boy was no good. And to think that Richard was actually twice in his very claws—his very claws!"

CHAPTER X.

WHERE IS NORRY?

"Dick, are you awake?"

It was Norry's voice, in a thin whisper.

"Yes—keep still, Norry—speak low." But sharply as Dick spoke, he put out a very tender hand to touch Norry's. There was a little movement on Norry's part of the straw bed, and then he whispered again,

"What'll you do if he comes back to take us out?"

"I don't know—I must think. But don't you be afraid, Norry. I won't leave you."

Silence fell between the two boys after this for a little while, Dick, as he said he would, devoting the time to thinking—not alone of what might happen, but of all that had happened since the night he had found himself turned out of Dr. Field's employment.

It seemed to the boy as if a lifetime had gone by since then, yet it was only six weeks in point of time. But the six weeks had included so much misery that time seemed as nothing in the balance.

For the first few days after his disgrace Dick had contrived to pick up work in the old fashion; just enough to give Norry and himself bread to eat—perhaps not always himself, but enough for Norry and the dog always, for Trusty was now part and parcel of the boys' lives. He was never to be neglected, even though Dick went hungry; and the faithful little creature seemed to know and understand just how true his new friends were to him. While he was waiting for work near a down-town hotel one rainy afternoon, Dick was startled by a voice just at his elbow, and, turning around, found himself suddenly face to face with Gurdle. If that dreaded creature had looked villainous before, his countenance was certainly more cruel than ever as he leered at Dick, saying, with a hoarse laugh:

"So, my fine fellow, you thought to get away from me, did you? Well, you won't do it this time," and whatever the terrified boy could do or say, Gurdle kept close to his side, although Dick almost ran home, with a half fear that the other man might have seized Norry. And, truth to tell, on reaching the attic not a sign was to be seen of the blind boy or the dog.

Although Gurdle had followed him into the room, poor Dick lost all thought of him in his anguish over Norry's disappearance. He stood still in the middle of the lonely attic, wringing his hands and crying out, "What shall I do? Where is Norry? Oh! what has happened to him?"

Mr. Gurdle took it very coolly. He sat down on the old chair, and waited for Dick's wild lamentations to grow less before he spoke.

"Yer'd give a good deal to see him now, wouldn't yer?"

he said, with a grin. "'S'posin' I could take you right to him, what would you do by way of gratitude? Come, now, let's hear!"

"Oh, Mr. Gurdle," cried Dick, turning his streaming eyes upon him, "I'd do anything, anything, I would!"

Mr. Gurdle seemed to think it necessary to reflect a little while before he answered.

MAX RANDER AND THE PROFESSORS.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JUN.

NOT long after the tiger trouble that I told you about some time ago, Thad and I were wandering down the main street of a dismal French village, when we saw the sign, "English spoken," in a store window.

"Here's somebody to talk to!" I cried, joyfully, and rushed right in, without stopping to think that I didn't want to buy anything.

There was an old man and a boy about sixteen behind the counter, and as I didn't know which was the Englishman, I looked at both of them, and said, "English spoken?"

The boy at once replied, "Yes," and then added, "What want you?"

Now, as I hadn't come to buy a sou's worth, this question rather confused me, and all I wanted was to get out in the street again as quickly as possible; so I muttered something about hoping to find an American, and started for the door.

Before I could reach it, however, the French boy, who must have jumped over the counter, caught me by the arm, and cried out, in the most excited manner:

"Oh, you an American, then? How I have long to see one! My father say one come in store last month, but I out for my breakfast-at-the-fork. Will you not speak little American for me?"

I stared at the fellow stupidly, while Thad beckoned to me from the doorway, and the old Frenelman leaned back against the shelves grinning with delight to hear his son talking in a language he couldn't understand. Then the French boy drew his finger across his forehead close to his hair, and I understood him at once.

"Come on, Thad," I whispered; "he thinks all Americans are Indians; so just you screech out some gibberish and dance about, while I make believe scalp you."

So Thad, who was always ready for anything with noise in it, threw his cap on the floor, and gave a war-whoop that actually frightened me, it was so loud; but the French boy clapped his hands, and nodded smilingly to his father, so I knew I had guessed right. Then I made a dash for Thad, saying over backward all the big words I could think of, and every once in a while giving a yell that soon caused quite a crowd to collect about the door. The French fellow explained to them who we were and what we were doing, and then they all joined in the applause.

I stood on my head, walked on my hands, and chased Thad around the store until we were both breathless, when I tucked his head under my arm, and made a bow as a sign that the performance was over.

The French boy came forward and said, "Thanks much"; but as we went out I noticed that the people gave us plenty of room on the sidewalk.

Well, I laughed all the way home, the whole thing was so ridiculous, and had just asked Thad if I looked so very much like a wild red man when I saw a carriage stop at our gate and two strange gentlemen get out.

"Oh, they must be the French professors father said were coming to talk to him about American schools!" I exclaimed.

"And don't you remember papa told us he wanted us to speak our dialogue for them?" added Thad.

I did remember that, but I had forgotten a good deal of the dialogue, which I found was just the case with my brother.

"Let's do the Indian scene for them," he suggested, as we were brushing our hair for lunch, or "breakfast-at-the-fork," as our French boy called it.

Before I could reply father called upstairs, "Boys, I want you to come down and entertain these gentlemen with an example of American eloquence, while I step across the street for your mother."

"Yes, sir," I replied; and then, turning to Thad, told him that we must do the best we could with our speeches.

So we went down and were introduced to the professors, neither of whom, it seemed to me, could talk English much better than the boy in the store. Father explained about our dialogue, and then left us.

Thad and I took our places at one end of the room, and, having made our bows, started off in grand style, both the gentlemen watching us with the closest attention. Suddenly I got a sentence ahead somehow, which so mixed up Thad that he began to repeat the same words over and over. I frowned at him as hard as I could, at the same time brushing back a lock of hair that had tumbled over my eyes; but he thought that this was a sign for him to turn Indian, and at once began to whoop and yell in the most awful manner. I couldn't help rushing for him to make him stop; but as this was exactly what I had done down at the store, he only capered about more wildly than ever, and we had a regular tussle of it.

But even while we were both rolling on the floor I noticed that the professors sat watching us as gravely as ever, and then it suddenly struck me that they must think this was part of the dialogue. So, as I had now subdued Thad, I told him to stand up and look serious while we made our bow, on which the French gentlemen clapped loudly, and assured father afterward that we not only spoke with fire and spirit, but really acted out the sentiment of the piece.

THE MAN-OF-WAR BIRD.

BY ARTHUR LINDSLEY.

ONE clear cold day in February I left New York, bound for Kingston, which is on the south side of the island of Jamaica. By the time that we had been at sea four days the cold had passed away; the northeast trade-winds were blowing delightfully, and it was perfect luxury simply to sit on deck and watch the sea, always the same, yet always changing. Two days later when I rose in the morning I found that we had passed Morant Point, the eastern end of Jamaica, and by ten o'clock I could see on the beach ahead of us a clump of trees, which I knew from their position must be on Port Royal Point, at the entrance to the harbor of Kingston.

We rounded the Point, and whereas we had all the morning been running westward in the open sea, we now turned back, almost east, in the smooth water inside the long sandy point, and ran seven miles up the harbor to the wharf at Kingston. Of course my eyes were open to take in all that was new and strange. Not only the objects on the land attracted me, but those also in the air, for every one of the birds which were hovering or darting about was to me like an old friend seen for the first time. I knew them all well from books and from specimens, and had hoped for years to see them living, and here they were, all about me, in great numbers.

And one of the birds which charmed me most, coarse and ugly as he was, and savage and disagreeable in his manners, was the frigate-pelican, or, as I prefer to call him, the man-of-war bird. You can see for yourself by looking at the engraving on the next page what an inelegant, ungraceful object he is. Notice the set of his head and neck, as well as the manner in which his wings seem to be pushed up against his side, as though they might be some other bird's wings fastened there by mistake. Just look at that fellow in the background, with his wings stretched out; you would think perhaps he was about to launch himself off for flight. No such thing. I am sure I don't know what he does it for; perhaps because he thinks it displays his natural loveliness to better advantage. I have seen these birds sit in this position for a long time without moving, and then quietly fold them, and settle down like the ones on the lower branch.

It is when the man-of-war bird is in motion that he shows himself in his own true character. At rest he is ungraceful, but the instant he is on the wing all that has disappeared as if by magic. You can see that there he is at home. Those enormous wings spread out until they reach nearly seven feet from tip to tip, and every one of their movements is full not only of smooth and elegant sweeping, but also of a power that comes like the rushing of the wind. Without exception, I think the frigate-pelican is the swiftest bird in flight that I have ever seen; I know not one which can equal him. Perhaps I can give you some idea of this wonderful power on the wing in no other way so readily as by telling you what I saw that day in Kingston Harbor.

As we came up the long stretch from Port Royal the frigate-pelicans were all about us in great numbers, and most numerous of all as we came near the city. We were approaching the wharf; the engine had stopped its working, and of course the ship was moving very slowly, and I had a perfectly fair opportunity to observe their actions. Many other birds were also careering about, some of them screaming loudly, though the man-of-war bird scarcely ever utters a sound—now and then a hoarse croak, nothing more. Near the steamer I saw a Cayenne tern dive, and come up with a fish in his bill. This tern is a bird of extremely rapid flight. One of our common barn swallows, I know, would be passed by it with ease, and I feel confident that the famous gyrfalcon, so noted by all writers because of his speed, would have been compelled to chase this particular tern with his fish half a mile before he could have overtaken him. But, alas for the poor tern! he had to deal with an enemy to whom the gyrfalcon would have been but a plaything.

A man-of-war bird saw him as he rose with his prey, and in his usual style—for they live by constant robbery—determined that that fish should be his own at once. The tern recognized his danger on the instant, and started with his utmost speed to escape. The pelican followed on his track, seeming to make no effort in flying, and yet the superiority of his speed was such that, though the tern seemed only like a white flash as he went by me, the man-of-war bird gained upon him as if he had been standing still. When the pursuer passed the stern of the steamer, where I was sitting, he was not more than thirty feet from me, and I well recollect the almost fearful sound of his dash through the air. I can compare it to nothing but the rush of a heavy cannon-shot. He overtook the tern within less than fifty yards, when the latter, to save himself, dropped his fish, and went off to catch another. The man-of-war bird, with a curve as graceful as could be made or drawn, swept down and up again, bringing the fish in his bill, having caught it before it could reach the water.

This bill is an instrument not to be despised. Its snap is like that of a steel-trap, and when it is seized by the whole weight of the bird it carries off what it drives almost as a small steam-engine would do it. And now commenced a struggle in which I rejoiced, for it was fair justice. The robber was not to have his ill-gotten booty simply because he had frightened a miserable Cayenne tern into dropping it. Not at all; there were other claimants. Not less than half a dozen frigate-pelicans, each as fierce and savage and strong as himself, had witnessed the transaction, and each one individually resolved that that fish belonged to himself, or, at least, that if it did not he would have it at any rate, and with one consent they dashed at pelican No. 1. No child's play now; no trusting to speed, for all were equal at that game. It was a savage fight. They struck, and he struck back, and I thought, from the sound of the blows, that a single one of them might knock its victim into the water; but I could see no injury done by them.

In the midst of the tumult I saw one of them seize the fish with his beak and actually force it away. The only result was that now the whole interest centred in pelican No. 2, and the blows fell thick and fast on him, and served him right, I thought. Three separate times I saw the fish torn away in the fight, and at last in some way it was dropped, and as the struggling and angry birds were all too busy in abusing one another to seize it, it reached the water, and went to the bottom to feed the crabs. I had been sorry that the unfortunate tern should lose his fish, which he had fairly caught, but I felt no sympathy for any of this fierce band that had been fighting over it. But I think my sympathy was not needed, for the event was one so common with them that doubtless in another minute it was forgotten. I presently saw the same birds pursuing their flight around the steamer as quietly as though no disturbance had occurred.

Let me tell you another little story to illustrate their wonderful power on the wing. A thunder-squall was coming up from the southwest, and the appalling blackness of the clouds showed plainly that it would be one of terrible force. Port Royal and Fort Augusta had disappeared, completely hidden by the squall as it advanced. Even the birds had taken the alarm and fled to escape its fury. I noticed that every one had disappeared except two or three frigate-pelicans. One of them in particular I watched, because he was close to me. The roar of the wind as it approached was frightful, but, notwithstanding the feeling of awe, I did not take my eyes from the bird, for I wished to see what he would do. I was myself sheltered behind a heavy brick wall, which I knew would protect me.

When the full fury of the tornado struck him he yielded to it for a moment, as though taken by surprise, and then, mustering his strength, he faced the blast, and darted against it with a speed and force that carried him onward in triumph. He did not fly along the water, but went obliquely upward, until he was lost to my sight, and I have no doubt that he went onward until he had risen above the region of the clouds and the squall into the calm atmosphere above, where he floated quietly until the tumult had passed away.

The man-of-war bird seldom comes along our own coast further north than South Carolina, though stragglers may occasionally reach the Chesapeake. But as we go to the south they become more abundant, and on the Florida Keys are very common.

JOHN'S PRESENT.

BY MARY DENSEL.

IT was in vain that John tried to gain his sister's notice. There she stood, rapt in delight, before a pile of mousseline de laine, which had just come from Aunt Maria, who lived in the city. Jo'm thrust his head in at the "sink-room" door, and gave a loud "ahem!" But Katinka's eyes never moved from the mousseline de laine, which, I regret to say, was of a lively green with "polka dots" of yellow. Katinka thought it beautiful.

"And so much of it, grandma! I can have an overskirt, can't I?"

Katinka clasped her hands and breathed hard as she put this question. It had long been her great desire to wear an over-skirt, with points on the bottom and something in the back breadth to make it stand out quite "stiff and genteel."

"So," explained Katinka, giving her flimsy gown a flirt, and glancing rapturously over her shoulder.

Just then there was a knock at the front door, and, as grandma went to answer it, there came a sharp "Hi, Katinka!" from the "silk-room."

Katinka became suddenly aware of John's face with one eye screwed into a knowing wink, and of John's somewhat grimy hand beckoning mysteriously.

"Sh-sh-sh!" whispered John. "Come here, Katinka-tink-tink."

Katinka tiptoed across the kitchen. There was evidently a great secret on hand. John would hardly speak above his breath, even when they had reached the "seed-room," and he pointed to an empty flour barrel.

"I'm going to make an arm-chair for grandma, to give her on her birthday next Saturday. It's to be made out of this barrel," announced John.

"You don't say so! How perfectly splendid!"

"Yes," said John, pleased with this tribute of sympathy. "I'm going to make an easy-chair. You can help if you like. Only it's to be my present, mind."

"Of course," assented Katinka.

"The first thing is to get this barrel sawed, so as to leave part of it for a back, and to make a place for the seat. I guess the saw's on the bench in the barn chamber."

Crafty John well knew whose were the "feet that ran on willing errands." The saw was soon at hand. But John had changed his mind.

"I can no more cut these cross-grained staves than I can fly over the moon. See, Katink, they split if you touch 'em. I know my man. Jotham Bixby 'll do it for me, and fit a seat into the bargain. Only"—John ruffled his hair and meditated—"only he might ask a trifle for his trouble, and I'm saving up my money for Thanksgiving—what I don't need to support myself with."

"So am I," said Katinka, promptly. "I'm going to buy pop-corn balls."

"They're cheap," interrupted John, hastily. "Besides, I don't believe Jotham would charge more than ten cents."

"Perhaps I might spare that," said Katinka, with still a little hesitation in her voice.

"Really, Katinka-tink-tink, you're almost as nice and satisfactory as a boy," said he. "You'll never regret using that ten cents when you see grandmother sitting so lively and comfortable in my present."

Now John's approval was the breath of life to his sister, and with a happy heart she brought a dime from the small hoard which she kept in a box under her bed, safe from burglars and ghosts.

The two hoisted the barrel into a wheelbarrow, when "John! John!" came from the house.

"There's grandma calling," said John.

"O me! O me!" cried Katinka, all in a flutter. "Run and meet her before she sees us, John. I can push this wheelbarrow. Run! run quick!"

Off went John. Away rattled the wheelbarrow with its burden. Long before John arrived on the scene of action Katinka had explained matters to Jotham Bixby, who was ready to saw the barrel into a most inviting shape, and even to fit a board seat to the chair. What was better, fat, good-natured, chuckling Jotham would not take a cent for his pains.

"You're welcome, bless you," said he.

"Now you need a cushion and a coverin'," added Jotham. "Stuff 'em with wool. 'Bijah Crawley's been shearing; he'll let you have some wool."

John's face lengthened. 'Bijah Crawley was not good-natured, nor did he chuckle. Besides, he and John were not on good terms since the day when John had nicknamed 'Bijah's uncouth son and heir "Caterpillar—a cravely creeter."

'Bijah had threatened to "take it out" on John. But surely no one could have the heart to take anything out on dear little Katinka.

"Ahem! Katinka-tink-tink, what do you think, quicker 'n a wink. Suppose you should go—where?—don't you know?—and say to that fool, "Give me some wool." Not that I would call any fellow a fool, except in poetry," added John, apologetically.

"But I'm afraid of 'Bijah Crawley," remonstrated Katinka. "He's dreadful cross."

"Oh, very well. I suppose grandma needn't have any birthday present. She can sit in a hard chair. Of course I sha'n't tell her how disobliging you are, Katinka."

John's face was flushed. His tone was exceeding bitter. Katinka began to move slowly in the direction of the Crawley cottage.

"Seeing Jotham didn't charge," John called after her, "you can have that dime you gave me to pay 'Bijah with."

Whether it were Katinka's blushes, or her timid, trembling tones, which softened 'Bijah Crawley's heart, I can not say, but the gruff old man consented to let her fill her apron with wool.

"And how much shall I pay?" asked Katinka, fingering her ten-cent piece.

"Wa'al," said 'Bijah, drawing the back of his hand across his mouth, "I cal'late about fifty cents."

Katinka's eyes and mouth opened in dismay.

"Those isn't common sheep," said 'Bijah. "But seem' it's you, I'll cheat myself, and call it forty cents."

Forty cents! That meant every penny in Katinka's box—every single penny. Katinka had counted on having such a grand Thanksgiving, and had even dreamed that by economy she might eke out enough money to buy a yellow and green ribbon to wear with her beautiful new dress.

But what would John say if she returned without the wool?

"I've only ten cents here, Mr. 'Bijah Crawley," said she, wistfully, "but I'll bring the rest to-morrow, honestly. Please let me have the wool."

'Bijah did so, and Katinka carried it home in her apron.

"You're a regular beauty, Katinka-tink-tink!"

That was praise indeed from John, and when he added, "I'm glad you happened to be my sister," Katinka's cup was full, and she was more than ready to hold a big nail, which was to fasten two of the staves, that John might have a better "go" at it with his hammer.

"I really feel quite manifest," said she, gleefully.

"Quite what?" asked John, pausing with the hammer in mid-air.

"Manifest—like a man, you know," explained Katinka.

John gave a roar of laughter, and brought the hammer down with a bang.

Oh, John! John! how could you be so reckless? Oh, the dear little soft fingers! Oh, the cruel hammer!

"Ah!" cried Katinka; and then clapped both hands over her mouth. She would not scream, lest grandma should hear and so learn John's secret. But the pain was terrible. Katinka's face grew very white, and she could hardly stand for dizziness. John was frightened enough. He ran for water. He put his arm around his sister, and begged her to lean her head on his shoulder.

"Jiminy cracky!" he kept muttering.

"Never mind," whispered the pale lips. "I'd most rather be hurt, when you're so kind to me, John."

At that John's feelings were fairly too much for him. He gave a tremendous sniff, and even had to demean himself by borrowing Katinka's handkerchief.

"Seems to be something in my eyes," said he.

There was "something" in his eyes. But not dust, nor yet a splinter.

"How jolly it would be if I had some casters on that chair!" remarked he, by way of changing the conversation. "It won't move easily without them. I declare that chair must have casters."

Katinka's mind gave a jump this way and that way

"There are the casters on my bed," said she.

"I declare! so there are," cried John. "Now I never thought of them when I spoke, but really I don't see what good they do the bed."

"They only make it roll easily when I sweep under it. That's no matter, though. I can get down on my knees and creep under the bed with a dust-pan."

Katinka smiled at John's pleasure; so while she still nursed her wounded hand, John was screwing the casters on his chair. The effect was charming. The chair could be trundled hither and thither with scarcely any effort.

And now arose a most momentous question. Where should a covering for the seat and back be found? All that day and the next Katinka and John pondered over the problem, but in vain. None of the bits of cloth in grandma's piece-bag began to be large enough. As for buying new material, that was out of the question. All Katinka's money was gone. As for John's—well, he was saving his for Thanksgiving-day. It almost seemed as if, at its last stage, the present must be given up.

After she went to bed at night Katinka's puzzled brain worked on. She hardly knew when she fell asleep, but suddenly, about the middle of the night, she sat bolt-upright in bed, wide awake. What had she dreamed?

"Why, I wouldn't give him that for the world!" she said out loud.

Whether the same idea had visited John in dreams is a question, but he nodded at Katinka during breakfast, and "Come out here" whispered he.

They stood in front of that unfinished chair.

"It's a shame to give it up now," said John.

"It is," said Katinka.

Then John paused, and for the first and only time in his life was actually embarrassed.

Katinka's chin quivered.

"John," said she, softly, "I thought—"

"Katinka," breathed John, "I thought—"

Both faltered, and gazed at one another. At last John opened his lips and spake: "If I was a girl I'd never wear one of those silly over-skirts," said he.

Katinka sighed.

"Fancy me with a flounce on the bottom of my coat, and a puffy concern on behind!" continued John, soaring into the realms of imagination.

"It would be funny," admitted Katinka.

"Sally Peters tore her over-skirt the very last time we played 'I spy,'" continued John. "Oh, I declare I'm thankful I wasn't born a girl, to care for nothing but frills and fixings, and looking like a stiff-jointed doll that's afraid to move for fear of spoiling her fine clothes. Why, I'd rather be a peacock, and done with it."

Now this speech was terribly unjust. Katinka's gowns were always plain as plain could be. But John's "winged words" bore a sting, as that young rascal knew well.

Katinka turned away, and before long returned, looking very grave, but bearing in her hands the green and yellow mousseline de laine.

"Take what you need," said she, patiently.

But soon her interest in sewing together the breadths for the back, in hemming the ruffle which draped the lower part of the chair, swallowed up all other feelings, and when at last the work was fully done, and John, with both hands thrust into his trousers pockets, beamed upon her with approbation, Katinka's face was fairly aglow.

How inviting was that soft cushioned seat! How supporting were the padded arm-rests! How easily the cast-ers rolled! And as for the covering, it was really enough to drive away melancholy just to look at its gleaming "polka" dots.

"John, how could you ever have thought of such a beautiful present!" cried Katinka, lost in admiration of the superior intellect which had planned this work of art.

She could hardly wait for Saturday, so eager was she to behold grandma's surprise and pleasure. And indeed grandma had never suspected such a treat. She could hardly express her thanks to her thoughtful grandson.

"John, who ever made the frame for you?" asked she.

"Joham Bixby sawed the staves. Katinka wheeled the barrel down to him," said John.

"Katinka wheeled it down?"

"I was busy at the moment," explained John.

"Oh!" said grandma. "And where did you get the wool to stuff it?"

"I bought it of 'Bijah Crawley. There, Katinka, did you remember to pay him?"

Katinka nodded.

"Oh!" said grandma, a gleam of intelligence shooting from behind her spectacles. "Katinka, why have you kept your thumb done up so many days?"

"I didn't mean to hit her," exclaimed John. "You see she was holding a nail for me to drive it in better."

"Oh!" said grandma again. "And here are casters, I declare! Where did you get the casters, my son?"

"Katinka was sure she didn't need them on her bed."

"Oh! And the covering?" Grandma peered hard at the green and yellow mousseline de laine. "Where did the covering come from? It seems to me—"

"I and Katinka like a plain gown best," interrupted John. "There, grandma, Katinka has helped me all along. She's as good as a boy; better, maybe, in some respects. But you must remember, grandma," he ended, stoutly—"you must remember it's my present."

"Yes, it's John's present," declared Katinka, earnestly. Grandma nodded, and all she said was "Oh!"

HOW TO MAKE A BOAT WITH A SCREW-PROPELLER.

BY F. CHASEMORE.

TO make a model steamboat which will go is the ambition of many boys, but the high price of engine and boiler prevents them from doing so. The instructions here given will enable any boy to make for himself, by the exercise of a little ingenuity, at a very trifling cost, the machinery for a model screw steamboat which may be fitted into any craft, the rigging of which may have been wrecked off the dangerous coast of the duck pond.

First you must procure your boat; but if you should wish to make it yourself, remember that it must be very light, and hollowed out as thin as possible. Let it be twenty-four inches long, four inches wide at midships, and three and a half inches deep. The stern-post should be about an inch and a half within the stern, raking, and two and a half inches high, as marked in Fig. 1. Fasten a strip of lead one-eighth of an inch thick along the bottom of the keel. The bows should be sharp, and the boat should have a clean run aft. When it is finished paint it, and when dry put it into water, and mark on the stern-post the height that the water comes. Now you must bore a hole in the stern-post right through into the boat in the direction of the top of the stem. This must be done with a red-hot wire; the hole is to be three-eighths of an inch across.

The next thing to do is to get a brass tube from the gas-fitter's, or get a tinman to make you one of tin, three-eighths of an inch inside measurement. This tube must be long enough to reach from the stern-post to three and a half inches beyond the top of the stem. Four inches from one end of this tube solder a strip half an inch wide and one and three-quarter inches long, bending the middle of it half round the tube, and bending the ends outward; punch a hole in each end of this strip; in this end of the tube cut four teeth like saw-teeth one-eighth of an inch deep, like Fig. 2.

Put this tube in the boat thus: push the end without the tin strip through the hole in the stern-post from the inside of the boat, so that the tube is flush with the wood, and fasten the other end by driving tacks through the holes in the tin strip into the boat. Put some putty round the tube, where it goes through the wood, to keep the water out. Now make the deck of board one-eighth of an inch thick, plane it, and fix it in its place by pins, leaving a gunwale of half an inch all round. Stop up with putty, and mark with a pencil the boards on the deck.

Bore a hole near the stern of the boat thus: push the end without the tin strip through the hole in the stern-post from the inside of the boat, so that the tube is flush with the wood, and fasten the other end by driving tacks through the holes in the tin strip into the boat. Put some putty round the tube, where it goes through the wood, to keep the water out. Now make the deck of board one-eighth of an inch thick, plane it, and fix it in its place by pins, leaving a gunwale of half an inch all round. Stop up with putty, and mark with a pencil the boards on the deck.

Two inches abaft the middle of the deck cut a hole three-quarters of an inch in diameter for the chimney, which is a tube of tin three-quarters of an inch in diameter and four inches long. Bore two more holes in the deck, three-eighths of an inch in diameter, one half-way between the stem and chimney, the other half-way between the rudder and chimney; these are for the masts, which are made of wood, and should stand about nine inches above deck; put a pin into the lower end of each mast, and cut the head off, leaving about half an inch of the pin projecting; put the masts in their places, and the pins will keep them firm by being pushed into the bottom of the boat.

Make the propeller out of a circular piece of stout tin two inches in diameter, cut as in Fig. 3. The dark parts are to be cut away. The projections are to be three-quarters of an inch long. Punch a hole one-sixteenth of an inch in the centre, and fix a piece of brass wire one-sixteenth of an inch, two inches long, in the hole, to form an axle for the propeller. Twist each of the fans of the screw out of the plane of the circle about a quarter of an inch, in the manner of the sails of a windmill, as in Fig. 4. Now make two little wooden plugs three-quarters of an inch long, and half an inch wide at one end, tapering to a quarter of an inch at the other. Bore a hole through each from end to end one-sixteenth of an inch wide. Take the propeller, and put a glass head that will fit easily on the wire, and push the wire through one of the wooden plugs from the large end; bend the wire into a loop at the small end.

Now take another piece of wire two and a half inches long, and make a similar loop at one end, and put the other end through the other little plug from the small end, and bend the wire into a handle (Fig. 5). Now the only thing we want is the power. This is a strip of strong elastic about three and a half feet long and a quarter of an inch wide; tie the ends together to make a band—a large stout elastic ring will do, or two smaller rings looped together. Fasten a string to the elastic, and pass the string through the tube in the boat from the stern end; hook the loop on the propeller wire into the elastic, and push the wooden plug into the tube so that the screw is clear of the rudder; draw the elastic by the string through the other end of the tube, and hook the wire in the other plug into it; take off the string, and push the plug into its place. You must cut the plug away so that the handle can catch in the teeth cut in the tube. Now the boat is ready for use.

FIG. 4.

To use it wind up the elastic by the handle at the end of the tube, holding the screw firmly with the other hand. As soon as wound up enough set the rudder, and put the boat into the water; release the screw, and the boat will go until the elastic is quite unwound. The distance it will travel will be regulated by the extent to which the elastic is wound up.

THE HUNTER-MAN.

THREE little bears went out one day,
Before the sun got high,
To gather berries in the woods
To make a berry pie.

But there they saw a hunter-man,
Who had a monstrous gun;
He scared them out of all their wits,
And my! how they did run!

They never stopped till they got home
And screamed it to their ma,
Who said 'twas very dreadful news,
And their must call their pa.

Old papa bear was very brave;
He took his gun straightway,
And hastened with them to the woods
That hunter-man to slay.

But when they reached the berry patch
He laughed aloud to see
That what had caused them such a fright
Was nothing but a tree.

And very much ashamed were they
To know that they had run
Because they thought an old tree trunk
A hunter with a gun.

THE BEARS AND THE HUNTERMAN.—[SEE POEM ON PAGE 732.]

Friday we started on our return. On our way we visited Tories' Den, which is said to have been inhabited by Tories during the Revolution. Friday night we camped eighteen miles from Salem. We reached home Saturday evening.

A. H. P.

Such an expedition is very pleasant, and I think boys learn to be manly when they share the fatigues of camping out, and, of course, give the easiest and best places to the ladies and the little ones. It is a nice way, too, to freshen up geography and history.

NEW BRUNSWICK, STATE ISLAND.

I am very glad that Mrs. Lillie is telling another story, as I liked "Nan" very much. We had a great deal of fun getting up tableaux. One of them was Mand Muller, and we arranged the scenery very prettily. I will tell you how we did it. The boys went into the woods and cut off some branches, and then we got a cloth horse and fixed them on it; we got some hay from the stable for the floor; then we took a wooden tub and almost covered it with rocks. We obtained a piece of pipe and put it through the branches, and while the tableau was going on some one stood behind and poured water through it into the tub, and Mand Muller was kneeling beside it, getting the water for the Judge, rake in hand. It was the prettiest of all the tableaux. For the horse scenery we got another cloth horse, and draped it with curtains, and pulled it before the other. The tableaux were a great success. We had ten of them. I am afraid that if I write any more my letter will be longer than "Mildred's Bargain" in a volume by itself! EDITOR.

You must have taken a great deal of trouble with your arrangements, but it was worth while, since your entertainment was so successful. Who took the part of the pretty maiden? Was it our Edith? And did the picture prompt any of the children to read Whittier's beautiful ballad—one of the daintiest and tenderest of all the dear poet's songs?

"Maud Miller, on a summer's day,
Raked the meadow, sweet with hay,
Beneath her hot hat glowed the wealth
Of simple beauty and rustic health...."

"The Judge rode slowly down the lane,
Smoothing his horse's chestnut mane.

"He drew his bridle in the shade
Of the apple-trees, to greet the maid,

"And ask a draught from the spring that flowed
Through the meadow, across the road.

"She stooped where the cool spring bubbled up,
And filled for him her small tin cup."

I would like to have you read it all, but I have not room to quote any more. "Mildred's Bargain," and other stories by Mrs. Lillie, are published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers in a bijou of a volume, and the price is one dollar. There are no brighter nor better books for girls than those which this favorite author has written.

BARNESBORO, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am nine years old, and through the kindness of my aunt May, who lives in Hartford, Connecticut, I have had YOUNG PEOPLE to read for three years. When I commenced taking it I had to have it sent to me, but now, so far advanced in my studies that I can read most of them without help. I am just through with a three months' school term without a single absence, and I was the only girl in my spelling-class, my teacher gave me a bright silver quarter the last day for having the most head marks. I feel a little proud of this, and it is so wonderful that I can't help telling you. I want to tell it to hundreds of little boys and girls, some of them thousands of miles away. Papa says that children have more privileges now than grown persons when he was a boy. At 14 I think it about time we did have a chance; and, dear YOUNG PEOPLE, I am glad that you have championed the rights of us little boys and girls. Give little boys a chance!

Little hands will soon be strong
For the work that they must do,
Little lips will sing their song
When these words are duly sung.
So, you big folks, if we're small,
On our toes you need not dance;
There is room enough for all—
Give little boys and girls a chance!

MYRON L. D.

This is a happy world for the children, and so it was for me when I was a child. Though I do not have this exquisite HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, I had its grandfather, Merry's Museum, which perhaps your papa may remember. And though I did not, like you, my boy, receive a prize for head marks, I often wore the silver medal home at night for having been good, and once I know, when quite a wee thing, I went "up head" for spelling a very bad word. It was m-e-a-s-u-r-e-s, and oh! how proud I felt, for there were boys in our class, Myron, as well as girls. Have you both girls and boys in yours?

TIMOTHY, VERMONT.

Would you like a letter from a little boy in Vermont? I have no pets except one cat, whose name is Polar Bear. I liked "Raising the Pearl" very much. I think Jimmy Brown's were very good stories. We are building a nice new school-house, and I expect to go to school in it in September. I go to Sabbath-school. I have two brothers; my oldest brother is going to college, and my youngest brother to the seminary. I am seven years old. My mother is writing for me.

LAURIE R. H.

Is Polar Bear a white cat? I hope the new school-house is very pleasant, and that Laurie has a teacher whom he loves.

REIFTSBACH, GERMANY.

I did not write you from Italy. In San Remo, on the coast of the Mediterranean, we had a lovely little villa that faced the sea, and at sunset and sunrise we could see the island of Corsica. After a stormy day we went to the harbor and watched the great waves that would break on the stones at the foot of the wall. Although we went from Dresden in February to San Remo, we found strange flowers, such as lemons, oranges, and tangerines, and the tall palm-trees seemed to smile down upon the lovely country and the gay Italians.

We hated to leave Italy, but we had to part and go to Germany. From San Remo we went to Genoa, and staid there a few days; it is an interesting city, with many queer little narrow streets. From there we went to Milan, in that splendid Cathedral we saw the festival of the "Nail and the Cross." It was crowded with laughing and joking people, who made places for us to see the procession, and talked to us all the time.

From Milan we went to Lucerne. We saw the "Lion of Lucerne," which is cut in the solid rock in memory of the Swiss Guards who defended Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette. The city shops have many little copies for sale. We rowed on the lake, and saw William Tell's chapel, and then went up the light in a tilted car, with such a funny little engine to block it up. There were clouds all around us at first, and it was such a funny sensation. We could see high-snow-topped mountains and glaciers around us when the clouds were gone. Then I asked a man to make sketches of every queer thing we saw.

Then we went to Baden-Baden. We bathed in the lovely Friedrich's Bath, which is the best in the world. Then we went to Heildelberg, and saw that old castle which is so fine. Tom made a good sketch of it. At last we came to Kreuznach.

I had another Wiggle. My last, I suppose, was not good enough to put in; perhaps this is not too. I like the Wiggles so much! We have had last year's YOUNG PEOPLE bound, and it is very interesting to read them again. I think it was wonderful how Americans could have such very fine pictures and have the MAGAZINE so cheap; that America must have made a great advance in it. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE to bed with me, and read it early in the morning. Tom takes one volume, and I the other.

KATIE R.

You must not be discouraged because your Wiggles do not appear. So many of our clever boys and girls are trying their skill with the pencil that a selection has to be very carefully made from the great number of Wiggles submitted. Our artists endeavor to be just to everybody. You may be sure that I shall always print your letters when you send such delightful descriptions of what you see on your journeys here and there in Europe.

ST. ANDREWS, SCOTLAND.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—We are three girls who want to make exchanges. Do you have a paper for inserting them? If so, could you please tell us how much? We have only begun to take in your paper lately. "In Honor Bound" is a very nice story. We live in Scotland, by the way, we all like sea-bathing. I think you will answer our letter soon, please, and tell us to whom we ought to address the exchanges?

THREE OF YOUR READERS.

There is no charge for exchanges. Please address your letter simply to Messrs. Harper & Brothers.

WELDON, IOWA.

I am a little girl eleven years old. In the spring we had a pretty bad time. We had begun to tear up our house to come out here (for we lived in New Jersey then), when mamma and my sister and I were taken sick with diphtheria. Papa had a place here, and so he had to come when we got over the worst of it. He brought my two big sisters and my brother along with

HER PARASOL.

"I haven't any parasol."
"The little lady said."
"But I will take an autumn leaf,
To hold above my head.

"And no one gave me a bonquet;
But little do I care;
When golden-rod and asters bright
Are blooming everywhere."

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

ORAN, ALBERTA, AFRICA.

I am a little American boy ten years old. I am out here with my two aunts, one uncle, and my grandmother. Papa sent me here because he thought it would be good for my health, and I could learn the French. There are very curious things to be seen here. I can't describe them to you, for I am afraid my letter will be too long. Papa sends me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE and M. Verhulst, and I like them both very much. If I know much when I come back, I am going to have a pony. Good-by. Your faithful reader,
PERCY H. M.

Well, dear, I hope you may speak and write French well enough to earn the pony by the time you go home. A word here to some of my readers who, like Percy, are afraid to describe what they see around them because they think it will make their letters too long. A letter is never too long if it tells us about scenes and people which we want to hear of, about queer customs, strange animals, or anything different from our everyday lives. A bright boy in Algeria ought to see a great many things about which it would please American children to read. So Percy may write another letter if he chooses.

SALEM, NORTH CAROLINA.

I want to tell the readers of the Post-office Box about a trip I took among the Sauratown Mountains, in the western part of this State. We camped out at night, and from the time I left Salem to the time I came home again I did not see a house of any kind. We staid nearly a week. The first night we camped out on a large grass-plot by the side of the road. There were nine boys in the party. The larger boys, including myself, slept in the hack and baggage-wagon, or on the ground. The ladies, with the girls and smaller boys, slept in the tent.

The next day we passed through Danbury, and after a while passed by Piedmont Springs. We were going to a place called the Cascades, where we were to spend the night. The Cascades is a beautiful place. The water falls about the height of fifty feet, and the rocks on either side rise one hundred feet or more in the air. At the bottom of the fall is a clear pool perhaps fifty feet in diameter. We did not camp right at the Cascades, but up on a hill. I wish I could send you a picture of the place, but I can't. We made this point our head-quarters, and from here would make trips to the various points of interest around us, and always come back to the camp to spend the night.

One day we went up on More's Knob. The view is beautiful. We could see the Dan River winding around in the valley far below us. There once was a government observatory on the Knob, but it was blown off I believe. We were going to Hanging Rock, but were so tired from our trip to More's Knob that we gave it up. We spent three nights at the Cascades, and did not want to leave the place. However, before dinner on him. When we got well enough my uncle came small compared with the one we used to live in. We have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE three years, and we think it is a splendid paper. I do not go to school now; it is vacation. I take music lessons, and I will have to close now and go and practice. Good-by. — SUSIE H. V. L.

LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

How beautiful is the lake? How gently its waters shake! As they move, and I will sing this song, "How beautiful is the lake?" The daisies grow along the shores. The men dip gently with their oars. And as they slowly move along They seem to sing this little song, "How beautiful is the lake?"

The thinking cow-bells now are heard, As it seems to sing this old song, "How beautiful is the lake?" The farmer home is going now, And leaves at rest his spade and plough; The mountains all the shores along Echo back this same old song, "How beautiful is the lake?"

HELENE HAWES (aged 10).

Helene's uama tells me that these pretty lines were written by her daughter, without the slightest help, while passing the lake in the cars on a summer jaunt. I think they are very good indeed for so young a writer.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA.

I am eight years old. My younger brother, who is five—his name is Cecil—tried one of Mary E. C.'s receipts for sponge ginger cake, and although he is a boy he had success. I have no pets to tell you about except my little baby brother, who, I think, is the sweetest in the world. He is very lively, so I composed a piece of poetry to him:

With his little legs free As they can be, He soon will be ready To climb up a tree.

Our largest and finest hotel, the Kimball House, burned down this morning. — HARRY A. A.

PERVILLE, MISSOURI.

We live on a farm on the edge of the town. I have three brothers and two sisters, and we have three pet kittens. My oldest brother is married. My two younger brothers and I have five ducks and a rooster and hen apiece. Last spring while I was dragging a log it rolled on my leg and broke it; I had to be in bed for two months before I could walk on again. This is well now. Vacation will soon be over. I hope that this letter will be printed, for I want to surprise my sister and my cousins. — ANNA H. C.

You had a good opportunity to practice patience while lying in bed so long. I hope YOUNG PEOPLE helped to pass away some of the hours.

HARLEM, NEW YORK.

I am a little boy twelve years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for a long time, and like it very much. I have two sisters. One of them is at Newport, and she writes home that she is having a splendid time. I have a little gray kitten, and a very tame canary, which will hop on my finger and peck it. Sometimes the kitten tries to jump at my face. This is a good letter, and I hope it will be printed, as I would like very much to see it in the Post-office Box. I must close now, so good-by. — C. F. W.

Keep a sharp eye on that kitty.

LOVE HURON, NEW JERSEY.

I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE for over two years, and I like it very much. I am a little girl ten years of age, and am spending the summer here; I live in New York. I had two goldfishes, but they were killed. I have a bird named Dick. I like the new story by Mrs. Lillie very much. I think Jimmy Brown's stories are very funny. I have tried some of the receipts for cake among the receipts for Little Housekeepers, and found them very nice indeed. — FLORENCE N. R.

I have almost broken my heart over the sad fate of my goldfishes at least a half-dozen times. Mine have never been killed, but always sooner or later—generally sooner—the poor things die, no matter how gently they are cared for. We have a bird at our house named Dick, and he has just come out in a beautiful coat of new feathers, in which he holds up his head bravely, as if he wanted to say, "Look at my fall suit!"

TWIN BRIDGES, MOUNTAIN TERRITORY.

I am not a subscriber, but my sister, who is younger than I, takes YOUNG PEOPLE. I have two brothers and one sister. My oldest brother has gone to the Geysers, or National Park. We have a good many pets—four kittens, a lamb, and eight chickens. We are among the Rocky Mountain ans. People here often go up to some of the canons and camp out. My brother has a pony by the name of Jimmy, which we ride often. He is very gentle. I will have to close now. Good-by. — KATIE C.

Was the pony named after our friend Jimmy Brown?

BEYROUT, SYRIA.

My father takes HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for me, and I like the stories in it very much, especially "Raising the Pearl." I am just nine years old. I used to live in New York, but my home is now in Beyrout. I notice a great difference between America and Syria. There are no roads, but no sidewalks, no railways, staves, or street cars, but there are some carriages, and many donkeys, mules, and camels, which carry heavy loads and stones. The native women wear head veils over their faces in the streets, and look as if they were playing ghosts, with white sheets all over them; while the men wear turbans, and long tunics, and the women wear long baggy trousers, slippers of red or yellow nocco turned down at the heel. Their songs would draw a great crowd, and the singers would be thought crazy in the United States. Long after my arrival here my experiences were as new as if I were in another world. I hardly knew whether to be pleased or sorry, but the people here, though so far away from America. I have an Aleppo cat, which differs from the American cats in having long, fine, silky fur; it is affectionate, and usually goes out and strays about in the cold last winter, but it died, so I do not care to have any more birds till I know how to keep them well and strong. — FIELDING T. K.

This is a model letter. Fielding has contrived to make it as vivid as a picture. I hope he will write again soon.

BLATKEVILLE, WISCONSIN.

I am a little girl eight years old. I take YOUNG PEOPLE, and like to read it very much. I have a little sister seven years old, and we have very nice times playing together. We have six cats, four cats and two birds. We had a nice little dog, but he died, and I am very sorry. There are a great many trees around here, and in the spring many birds build their nests. One day I saw a spring bird make its nest in an evergreen in front of our house. One evening we were watching it, and it was going toward its nest with a worm in its mouth. It did not know where its nest was, so it kept flying from tree to tree, and it was about twenty minutes before it gave the worm to its young. I send five cents for the doll pattern.

George received her pattern for ZAZO. It was very cunning of the bird to try to guard her nest, and she did so through a desire to protect her little ones. She did not know how friendly your little birds were.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

We are three sisters, having no brother. Helen's coming out has been very splendid, except for a Christmas gift. We like Mrs. Hay's stories as well as we do the grand pictures Mr. Hays used to paint, some of which hang in our parlor; we also like Mrs. Lillie's, Mr. White's, and Mr. Otis's stories. We visit New York every September, and we are hoping to see Harper's building, as well as St. Mary's and the little Cot patient. Please cast our love to the boys for next time. I also have two watch dolls, which were brought us from Paris by a friend, dressed in the French peasant costumes; we never saw any others in this country, and they are so odd. Helen would like to be a Little Housekeeper. — HELEN W., GERTRUDE, and SARAH ALMY G.

LEMON-NOG.—Beat one egg very light, sweeten, add juice of one lemon, then fill a tumbler with ice and water, and toss back and forth until quite light. — HILDEGARD W.

The Postmistress thinks it would be fair to have a tie in the next. Sister Catherine will let us know the decision when it has been made. Here is a reader who votes on the other side:

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I SAW your special in the Post-office Box from St. Mary's Free Hospital, saying that they wished the children to take a vote to see whether the next child in Young People's Cot should be a boy or a girl. I am in favor of its being a girl. — ALBERT R. K.

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

I enjoy YOUNG PEOPLE very much. My aunt says it is a great help to her these summer holidays, and she has three of us. My brother is older than I am, and my sister younger; I am nine years old. I began a patchwork quilt the day I was five; it is not quite done yet, but I have given it to my music every birthday and every Christmas since it was begun. We have a canary-bird named Caro. Often other birds have come in the window to see him. You ought to hear how he scolds when they are too social, and eat his seed. We have, too, a beautiful big white cat named Tom; he is more afraid of a rat than anything else in this world. — NOLIE D. T.

Your cat ought to have been the one to wear the bell. You know the plan the rats once made to fasten a bell on the neck of the cat. It failed because none were bold enough thus to ornament Piss.

SEBASTIEN, TEXAS.

I am a little girl five years old. I have never been to any school except Sunday-school; I can not write myself, but my cousin is writing for me. I telling her what to say. My sister Mary and I take YOUNG PEOPLE. I like to hear her read the letters in the Post-office Box and some of the tales, but some of them are so long that I get tired before she finishes. I wish you would print this; it is the first I have written. — AGNES M.

You little darling! If you were here, I would like to give you a kiss. Your first letter is a very sweet one.

I. D. T. wants somebody who knows how the game of Lotto is played to kindly send him directions to our Post-office Box.—LUBY V. R.; We will try to gratify you, if we can.—R. E.; Your idea of a literary club is excellent, but you must not let it interfere with your studies, or the professors will frown.—JOSEPH S.; I would like to see those horses, and I hope you will write and tell me whether Fan, Bill, or Nancy is your favorite. —EMMA L. B.; I am sorry to disappoint you again, but you must write after school has begun, and tell me how you like it this term. —HANNA WOOD; I prefer a bay in Young People's Cot.—MILIE F. and JULIE Z.; Your pencil-writing was so faint that I could not read it. Use black ink, please, another time.

THE FIRST BATTLE-FIELD OF THE REVOLUTION.

THE PURSE AND RINGS PUZZLE.

CUT two pieces of leather as shown in the diagrams, only about twice the size.

In the first piece cut four slits (shown by the four short lines in the diagram). To the edges of the leather at the extremities of the straight dotted line attach securely pieces of round elastic, forming loops, as shown. Each piece of elastic, when doubled, should be slightly shorter than the length of the dotted line. At the back of the same piece of leather attach another loop of elastic. In the diagram the part of the loop at the back of the leather is shown by dotted lines, the end of the loop appearing above the leather. Where the circle is, sew a small metal ring, as shown. The ring must be of such size that it can be pushed through the slit just above it when the flap is folded down along the dotted line.

To the upper corners of the other piece of leather (A A) fasten pieces of round elastic, with a ring at the end of each, as shown at B, the elastic on the left to be first threaded through the ring on the elastic to the right (see diagram). To the edges of the leather sew four rings, as shown. All the rings are to be of the same size as the one previously used. And to the centre of this piece of leather fix another elastic, threaded through the ring at the bottom, as shown, and having a ring tied to the end of the elastic.

Then stitch the edges of the two pieces of leather together, and turn over the flap of the first piece so as to form a purse.

Push the rings through the slits 1, 2, 3, as shown in the diagram, and thread the elastic through the rings in the following manner: Pass the loop C through rings 1, 2, and 3, through ring 4, and over ring 5, then pull the loop back through ring 4, and pass it over rings 4 and 5. Pass loop D through rings 3, 2, and 1, through ring 4, and over ring 5, and then pull the loop back through ring 4. Pass loop E through rings 6 and 7, and over ring 8: loop E should be short enough to lie flat when drawn back through ring 7.

The purse is now closed, and is ready for presentation to any one who is desirous of opening it.

To open the purse, reverse the operations above described.

THE CHILDREN OF CHARLES I.

BY ELIOT MCCORMICK.

ONE who goes to Turin and visits the gallery there will be likely to linger some time before the picture of three odd, old-fashioned children and their dog. This famous painting, a reproduction of which will be found on the preceding page, the guide-book will tell him—if he does not know it already—is the work of the great artist Vandyck, and represents the family of King Charles I. He will be surprised, perhaps, to learn that the quaint figure at the left, looking like a little old woman, with a lace cap on its head, and a long scarlet froek, is Charles, the Prince of Wales, while the even funnier little object on the right, whose froek is blue silk embroidered with silver lace, is James, the Duke of York. Hardly any one would suppose them to be boys. The Princess Mary, however, who stands in the middle, beautifully dressed in white satin, is not to be mistaken.

Vandyck painted two more portraits of the same children, and with them their other little sisters and a baby brother, but this one is the earliest, as it is also the quaintest, of the three. The dog which Charles caresses, and the ball in the hand of "Baby Stuart," tell the story of their happy childhood. No children, indeed, could have been happier than those of King Charles at their home in Hampton Court. A great oak-tree in the park is pointed out now as the place where they used to play; we read of their merry games of hide-and-seek; and the visitor at Oxford is shown a silver staff on which the King used to measure, as fathers do now, their height from year to year.

But this did not last long. When Charles was eleven, Mary ten, and James between seven and eight, the civil war broke out, and the children were separated one from another. Charles and James remained with their father in England, while Mary, who had already been married to the little Prince of Orange, was taken by her mother to Holland. Here she was placed with the Prince's mother until she and the Prince, who was only a year older than herself, should have grown up. The marriage fortunately turned out a happy one, though the Prince died when he was only twenty-four years old, leaving Mary with a little baby boy, whose rights she had to guard against its ambitious grandmother and a crowd of scheming politicians. The boy, though he was feeble and sickly at his birth, and though his mother did not live to see his glory, grew up to be the great William III. of England.

While Mary was being educated in Holland both Charles and James—though the latter was but nine years old—were fighting by their father's side. Whatever hardships the King went through they shared, until finally, after four years, the King's cause became hopeless, and Charles was hurried away to the coast, and thence escaped to France. James at the same time was captured by the Parliamentary army and forwarded to London, where he remained for a year in captivity, with his younger sister, the Princess Elizabeth, and the little Henry, Duke of Gloucester, at St. James's Palace.

Finally an opportunity offered for him to escape. He was in the habit of playing hide-and-seek with his brother and sister every night after supper in the garden. One evening, when it was his turn to hide, he ran to his room, hurriedly changed his clothes, locked in his sister's favorite spaniel lest it should follow and so betray him, and stole through the garden door, of which he had secreted the key, to the lane outside, where a coach was in waiting. He was quickly driven to a friendly house, where a suit of girl's clothes was provided. Having dressed himself in these, he went on board a ship that was bound for Rotterdam.

The boat set sail, and, passing through a squadron of Parliamentary vessels at the mouth of the Thames, reached Holland in safety. Here his sister Mary received him with joy, and the three children were once more united.

They never saw their father or their little sister Elizabeth again. The King was shortly afterward beheaded at Whitehall, while Elizabeth died in captivity at Carisbrooke Castle. Charles, as every one knows, became King at the restoration in 1660. He was succeeded by James; and, by an odd coincidence, it was the son of Mary that took the English throne, and reigned jointly with his wife, who was James's daughter, when James himself ran away.

GOLDEN-ROD.

BY AGNES CARR.

"SEPTEMBER'S a King,"
 Dame Nature once said,
 As she gazed o'er the fruit-scented land.
 "His crown is the harvest,
 The orchard his realm,
 And he gives with a right royal hand."
 "Then grant me a sceptre,"
 September implored,
 "To be my insignia of rank—
 A rod of pure gold
 To wave o'er the land,
 And knight every hill-side and bank."
 "I will," quoth kind Nature;
 And drew forth a spray
 That was kess by the Midas sun-god,
 And his magical touch
 Burst in rich yellow bloom
 A graceful and fair golden-rod.

So September brings ever
 His feather-tipped wands
 To border each road-side with gold,
 And tell the glad world
 That the Harvest King reigns,
 And scatters his bounties untold.

A DEED OF DARKNESS,

BY MRS. W. J. HAYS.

"DESDY! Desdy! What's dat chile gone, I wonder!" were the words which two bright-eyed little girls heard as they passed the low kitchen window of Mrs. Tatnall's pretty cottage, where roses and honeysuckles climbed in such profusion.

The girls were on their way to the church picnic, and were as pretty and gay as white muslins and pink ribbons could make them. They stopped for a moment and looked longingly at the beautiful flowers of the Tatnall garden.

"I wish we had some," said Mabel Morgan. "Our roses are all eaten up by bugs."

"An' why don' yer jist walk in an' ask Miss Tatnall for some?" said the same soft voice which just now had been calling "Desdy."

The girls looked up with a startled expression. There stood Aunt Chloe, her broad face beaming, her bright turban shaking, and her black hands white with flour she was kneading into bread.

"Jist cum along, honey. If Miss Tatnall's not aroun' I'll let yer take all de roses yer kin carry; an' if yer see Desdy, jist sen' her here to me. Don' know what's de matter wid dat chile; she's kantankeous to-day."

The girls looked at each other in a confused way, and shook their heads, declining the proffered favor; but Aunt Chloe insisted, repeating that "dere was such a lot of roses dey ought to be picked, an' Miss Tatnall nebber be-grudged flowers to nobody."

Thus urged, Mabel Morgan seized the scissors which Aunt Chloe showed them hanging on a peg, and soon had her hands full of the coveted blossoms; but Madge Taylor could not be prevailed on to take any. Her bright face was clouded, and she looked about impatiently as Mabel lingered in the garden, exclaiming at the beauty of each particular flower.

"Oh, come, Mabel!" she said; "we shall be late. One would think you had never seen a rose before."

"Nor have I ever seen or smelled any more delicious," said Mabel, hanging up the scissors, and giving Aunt Chloe a pleasant smile and "Thank you." As she did so she paused in a listening attitude, and asked:

"What is that sound?"

"I don't hear nuthin', honey," responded Aunt Chloe, giving a parting pat to her nice round loaves as she placed them in the pan to rise.

"But I do," said Mabel. "It is some one crying."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Madge. "What a goose you are, Mabel! You are always hearing something nobody else does. Do come along; we shall be late, and have no fun at all. Come; I'm going." So saying, she tripped off in a quick fashion, which Mabel thought a little rude.

"Don't yer stan' there now an' lose your fun, honey," said Aunt Chloe.

But Mabel did not move; she was quite sure now that she heard some one sobbing, and she begged Aunt Chloe to see what was the matter.

Muttering and grumbling in a queer way to herself, she came out of the kitchen, and followed the gravel-path to an arbor near, Mabel following her. The sounds grew louder as they approached, but in another moment ceased altogether.

"What's all dis goin' on out yere?" said the old woman, entering the arbor, and lifting from the bench a limp and dejected little object, down whose dark cheeks streamed a flood of tears. There was no answer, only a smothered sob and a convulsive heaving of a pair of small shoulders.

"Desdemona," said the old woman, with severity, "tell me what's de matter. 'Clare to goodness you's gib me a fright about nuthin'."

"Oh, I can't go to de picnic!" burst out in a tone of woe from the despairing Desdemona.

"An' why not, I'd like ter know?" said Aunt Chloe, indignantly.

"They won't have me—they said so. They said it warn't a picnic for enlld pussants—twas for white folks."

"White trash!" muttered Aunt Chloe. "I'd like to know of we ain't Tatualls, one of de fust families of Georgy, an' hain't you larned your catechism sence you was knee-high to a grasshopper? What 'ud Miss Tatuall say to see you lookin' like dis? Why, I nubber heard de like—but I nubber did think much of de abolitionists."

Here Mabel, seeing Aunt Chloe's rising wrath, took Desdy by the hand, and said, very kindly, "Don't you mind what anybody has said, Desdy. Just get ready as quick as you can, and I'll wait for you."

To tell the truth, Mabel felt not a little guilty. She knew that Madge Taylor had openly discussed the indignity of Desdy's sharing the pleasure of the picnic, and she, Mabel herself, had felt that it would be a great condescension if any of the girls asked Desdy; but now, seeing the child's sorrow, and knowing what a good girl she really was, and, above all, having accepted the roses, she was really ashamed of her foolish prejudice.

"Come, you must hurry; I can see the wagons filling up, and it is quite a long ride to the woods," she repeated.

Thus encouraged, and urged by Aunt Chloe, whose family pride was wounded at the thought of her granddaughter being slighted, Desdy dried her eyes, and ran in the house.

While Desdy braided her woolly locks and donned her best cambie gown, Mabel had to listen to Aunt Chloe's indignation. She knew she deserved the reproaches as well as the rest of her companions, so she submitted in silence.

"I tallus tote Miss Tatuall dat Yankee-land wuz no place fur her nor fur us; but when Marse Tatuall died she had to come Norf, so we comed wid her; but dis yer towu's used to only de sassy sort o' niggers—not our disrespectable sort at all. Fur my part, I wonder Miss Tatuall puts up wid all de airs I see—it's de mos' ridiculous, risticratic, bombastical village ever wuz. But here comes Desdy in her best frock. She looks scrumptious, don't she, Miss Mabel? I reckon her cambrie's as good as anybody's, ef ole Aunt Chloe did make it."

"Of course it is," said Mabel, who was glad to be off, and seizing Desdy by the hand, away she scampered.

They were indeed late. The wagons were nearly full, and many were the words of surprise and disdain which Mabel heard as she and Desdy crowded into the vacant space. But Mabel was a brave girl. She was not astonished to see the contemptuous glances bestowed on her for having brought Desdy, and she felt she deserved some punishment; so she bore the glances, and even the nudges and knocks which some were rude enough to give, with calmness. As for Desdy, the contrast between her position now and a short time before was quite enough to make her indifferent to either nudges or knocks. It was sufficient happiness to be sitting in an open wagon full of gayly attired children with bright banners and flags and flowers, the sun shining, the birds singing, the bushes full of blossoms, and the joy of having on her best clothes.

The wagons stopped at a farm-house, where all were given a drink of milk, and then they were allowed to scatter as it pleased them. The house was surrounded by a thick grove and wide fields, in one of which a tent had been put up, a flag hoisted, and a band stationed.

In the excitement of the moment Mabel wandered off with her favorite friends, and forgot all about Desdemona, who happily was pleased with everything she saw, and did not notice that little by little all had gone and left her entirely alone.

The day was indeed beautiful, but the heat was intense, and as a light breeze sprang up and a few clouds appeared, every one was so glad of the relief that they were slow to see the signs of a coming shower.

Madge Taylor and Mabel Morgan, with several of their most intimate friends, were sitting under a branching oak (which offered delightful shelter from the glare of the sun) making wreaths for their hats, when one of the girls started up, declaring she felt a drop of rain. They all raced off at this, leaving Madge and Mabel alone.

"I would rather get wet than run in all this heat," said Madge; "besides, now we can have our lunch by ourselves instead of with the others, which I confess I prefer," and she drew out a dainty basket from beneath its leafy covering.

"I have mine too," said Mabel; "but it seems sort of selfish to be eating here all alone. Oh, I wonder if poor little Desdy will get any lunch? I know she forgot to bring anything, she came in such a hurry."

Madge nibbled a sandwich, and said, languidly, "How ridiculous in you to think of that girl, Mabel! You know well enough nobody wanted her to come."

"Yes, I know it; and I am sorry I was so unkind. I'm going to hunt her up, and give her something to eat this very minute."

In another moment she was gone. Madge flattered herself how superior she was to silly Mabel, and how cool and refreshing it was to sit quietly under this big tree and enjoy her luncheon, when a sharp vivid flash of lightning made her spring upon her feet and clap her hands over her ears to keep out the deafening peal of thunder. Cool, complacent, and superior, Madge was a coward in a thunder-storm. In an instant she had dropped her sandwich, and burst into tears, crying, "Oh, what shall I do?—oh, what shall I do? How cruel in everybody to leave me here all alone!"

Flash after flash, peal after peal followed in quick succession. Too frightened to run, or even to think, she stood with clasped hands, the very statue of terror, her eyes closed, her face pallid, and her breath coming in quick short gasps.

Suddenly she felt herself grasped, by what or whom she knew not. Perhaps this was the way people felt who were killed by lightning; perhaps her hour had come. The grasp tightened, and somebody dragged her from under the tree out into the pelting rain—none too soon—for in another moment there came such a blinding glare and resounding crash that she was thrown upon her face in the long wet grass.

How long she lay there she knew not. It seemed hours. She dared not move; her garments clung to her, heavy with rain; her limbs seemed to be made of iron, and yet she was conscious that voices were calling, and that the sun was again shining.

At last somebody raised her. A friendly voice addressed her: "Are you hurt, Madge?"

She sat up and looked about her. "No—I—don't think so," she replied; and then she saw a little limp figure lying quietly beside her, not moving, still with the stillness of death.

A little while later Madge suddenly opened her eyes, and seeing her mother beside her with an anxious look on her face, she inquired,

"What is the matter?"

"You fainted, dear; that is all."

"Did I? And where am I now?"

"At Mrs. Tatnall's. We brought you here because it was nearer than our home."

The voice was Mrs. Taylor's, and Madge was lying on a lounge in Mrs. Tatnall's best bedroom. She was confused by the strangeness of all around her, but gradually memory brought back the frightful storm and the strange incidents which followed.

"Mother," she whispered, "who was killed?"

"No one, my child."

"Oh yes, mother; some one was lying dead in the field there beside me."

"No, Madge. When you can bear it, I will tell you all. Swallow these drops now."

Madge obeyed, but, taking her mother's hand, begged to be told what had happened. After a little persuasion the mother consented.

"The storm came with so much suddenness that no one was prepared for it. Mabel Morgan was some distance off, looking for Mrs. Tatnall's Desdy, when she saw her rush under the tree where she had left you and drag you out from it. The next moment the tree was struck, and poor little Desdy was found insensible beside you. She has rallied, however, and the doctor thinks she will recover."

"Oh, mother, did she do that?" exclaimed Madge. "I felt some one grasp me, but I was too frightened to open my eyes."

"She saw your danger none too soon, my child. Humanly speaking, you owe your life to her."

"Oh, mother! mother! and I was one who would have kept her away from the picnic—because—because her skin was not as white as mine. Oh, mother, will I ever be forgiven?"

The mother whispered words of solace to her unhappy daughter, who, however, could not receive them, and it was long before her self-reproach could be calmed.

A few weeks after this Mrs. Tatnall was sitting on the piazza under her roses and honeysuckles; beside her, propped by pillows, was a little invalid. Her face was not white, but it had the wan, weak look of illness. The afternoon sun was sinking behind the trees, and making long shadows on the grass, when they heard the latch of the garden gate, and saw two girls advancing slowly. One carried some neat parcels and a basket of fruit, the other had some brightly bound books in her hand, and as Aunt Chloe leaned out of her window they beckoned her to approach.

"Why, how d'ye do, Mabel and Madge?" said Mrs. Tatnall. "You look as if you had come from the express office. Desdy's ever so much better this afternoon."

"We are glad to hear it. And how's Aunt Chloe?"

"Well, tank de Lord, now dat Desdy's goin' on all right. Why, 'tain't Christmas, chillens; dere's no snow on de groun'. What's de meanin' ob all dis?" said the old woman, eying the bundles which the girls were piling up before the astonished and delighted Desdy.

"Oh, we couldn't wait for Christmas, Aunt Chloe; it is so far off that we thought we'd have two of them, and so Desdy must open the parcels, and see if she likes what's inside."

"Like! why, de chile 'll be clar spoilt; sickness is bad enough for spilen chillen, but sich doin's as dis is 'nuff to turn any kin' of a head c'ar roun'. Can't hab no sich goin's on, nebber nohow."

Nevertheless Aunt Chloe was pleased, for besides books, and a paint-box, and a work-basket with a real silver tumbler, there was a pretty cashmere dress and white muslin for aprons, and besides all, an invitation for Mrs. Tatnall to bring Desdy to the sea-shore, where Madge and her mother were going.

A NAMELESS HERO.

BY E. M. TRAQUAIR.

THIS is the song of a nameless man.
 Listen awhile till the deed is told
 Of one who ventured his life to save
 Another's, but not for fame or gold.

Winter had been both hard and long;
 Spring set in, and the brooklets ran,
 Swamping the meadows and breaking the ice
 Into mighty blocks. Then the floods began.

Red and roaring, the rushing stream
 On its heaving bosom the ice blocks bore;
 Stemmed at length by a bridge of night,
 It foamed and crashed with a sullen roar.

Crashed and dashed on the piers of stone,
 They yield at last to the fearful strain;
 The centre arch, with the keeper's house
 And helpless inmates alone remain.

Fiercer and fiercer roars the flood,
 Wilder the wind in the stormy sky.
 The keeper springs to the rocking roof:
 "Mercy, have mercy, great God on high!
 "Help for my helpless wife and child!"
 They heard him loud o'er the torrent's roar;
 Help, alas! there is none to bring;
 No boat could live if it left the shore.

Whose steed comes galloping hot with haste,
 And stops by the river raging wild?
 Count Alfen, who offers red gold to him
 Who'll save the keeper with wife and child.

Ears, a thousand, the offer heard.
 Hearts, a thousand, with grief are sore;
 They look at the ice, the flood, and the sky,
 But never a boatman leaves the shore.

"Boatmen, then, are ye cowards all?
 And must they perish within our sight?"
 "Try it yourself, Lord Count," they cried.
 "Alas!" said he, "for my strength is slight."

Out from the crowd a wagoner steps.
 A boat is launched with the speed of thought;
 'Twill save but one with his mighty weight,
 But his arm is strong, and he cares for naught.

Thrice he guides her with giant strength,
 Thrice hath he brought her safe to shore;
 Scarce had the last foot touched its planks
 When with awful crash the arch fell o'er.

Who was this valiant man of men?
 A simple laborer, brave and bold;
 "Grand was the deed," I hear you say,
 "But still he did it for goods and gold."

Listen, then. "Gallant the deed you've done,
 And well," said the Count, "have you earned the prize."
 Frankly and modestly answered then
 The valiant man with the fearless eyes.

"My life, Lord Count, is not for gold,
 Your money all to the keeper give;
 Lost in the flood is his little all,
 Yet he and his wife and child must live."

With a careless smile he turned and went,
 This man with the frank and the fearless eye;
 We sing of his fame, but what was his name
 Is known alone to the Lord on high.

FUN THAT MAY KILL.

WE want all the boys who are in the habit of smoking cigarettes, or who are beginning to learn how to smoke them, to pay attention while we tell them of a sad event that recently took place in one of our Eastern cities.

Among the number of bright boys who had set out to become business men was a lad fifteen years of age, employed in a lawyer's office. During his leisure hours and on Sundays he was in the habit of smoking cigarettes, the smoke of which he inhaled. From this he passed to chewing tobacco, and it is said that when he was not smoking a cigarette he always had tobacco in his mouth, and occasionally combined the two. His parents endeavored to break him of the habit, but all they could say and do had no effect. His health soon began to fail rapidly, and his family, who were not aware that tobacco would have such injurious effects, fancied that his weakness was caused by the close confinement which he had to undergo at his place of business.

He soon became so ill that he could not sleep at night, and his appetite began to fail. His countenance was very sallow, and he had severe headaches. Finally his mother took him to see a physician, who, on examining him, thought that he was suffering from the want of the right kind of food, and prescribed tonics and things that are nourishing and strengthening.

But instead of improving in health the poor lad constantly grew worse, and was soon confined to his bed. The doctor then learned that the boy had been addicted to the excessive use of tobacco in every form, and he came to the conclusion that his patient was suffering from nicotine poisoning. Nothing that could be done had any effect in restoring the suffering boy. He lingered for about a week, when congestion of the lungs set in, and the heart began to fail in its functions. This was the beginning of the end. Within twenty-four hours he was dead, killed by the foolish habit he had formed of smoking cigarettes and chewing tobacco.

It would seem as if such a story as this would be all the warning a boy could ever want against cigarette smoking. But while we are on the subject we want to tell our boy readers something more about this foolish habit, and what makes it so dangerous and destructive to those who practice it.

A gentleman who writes a good deal for YOUNG PEOPLE, on making inquiries of one of the largest manufacturers of cigarettes in this city, was informed that the annual average of cigarettes consumed in this country amounts to not less than a thousand millions.

Now perhaps this statement in itself is not so very wonderful, when we think of the number of people in this country of ours; but take it in connection with the fact that the consumption of tobacco and cigars has not decreased in that time, and one naturally asks how it is that such an increase can be had in one form of smokers' articles without a falling off in the other forms of the material.

PULLING FINGERS.

A gentleman who has two large retail tobacco stores, on being asked the reason of this increased demand, said that so far as his experience could be relied upon it was due mainly to the fact that they were consumed largely by boys who took their lessons in smoking by the use of these miniature cigars.

Now let us see if we can not find out a few facts about the materials that go to make up these cigarettes which are so universally used:

Of course the cigarette is made of tobacco rolled in what is called rice-paper; that every one thinks he knows. Each manufacturer of cigarettes says that his particular house uses none but the best Turkish, Virginia, or Havana tobacco; but that other manufacturers are perhaps dishonest enough to use cheap Maryland or Western leaves, while they also put in all kinds of material, such as old cigar stubs, and odds and ends of all kinds.

It is quite impossible to say that such material is used; but there is a very odd kind of a fact to be taken into consideration, which may have some connection with the charges some people make against cigarette manufacturers.

Five years ago there were but few cigarettes made in this country, and at that time the ends of cigars which were thrown into the street were considered worthless, unless it was to some of the newsboys and boot-blacks who were willing to put a great deal of dirt in their mouths for the sake of a smoke. Three years ago the demand for American-made cigarettes began to increase, and then the ends of cigars that had been thrown away had such a value that the Italian immigrants in this city began to gather them from the street, and to-day there are on Crosby and Mott streets alone, as has been found from personal inquiry, over a hundred men who make a living by gathering this refuse tobacco. That number may be found on two streets, and it is certainly safe to say there are others in the same business.

Is it not just a trifle odd that as the demand for cigarettes increased, so did that for cigar stubs? A member of a large cigarette-manufacturing company said to the writer: "You have heard of the new alkaloid from tobacco which a French chemist has just discovered? Well, our chemist was on the point of making that discovery just as it was announced to the world, and I assure you it is one of the most powerful of poisons, being very similar to sulphuric acid."

Every boy knows that rice-paper wouldn't hurt a fly in case he should smoke it; therefore when he buys cigarettes he is always careful to get those which are wrapped in that kind of paper, or at least those which it is said have rice-paper around them. Now let any boy go to a paper manufacturer and ask him the simple question as to whether he or any one else could make paper from rice, and the answer will be that rice has no fibre, consequently paper could not be made from it. The so-called rice-paper is made from rice straw, and it is easy to imagine just how much rice there is in it. The cigarette papers are neither more nor less than a kind of tissue-paper of different degrees of fineness; and that statement came from the same manufacturer who told about the poison.

It is well known that tobacco acts to a certain extent upon the brain as liquor does. Not long ago a gentleman who was anxious to know how this stimulant or narcotic—since it acts on different natures in both ways—might affect the brain of a growing boy, asked one of the leading physicians in this city what his opinion was in regard to the matter. This is what the physician replied:

"I can tell you what you want to know, or I can tell you how to find out, without any of the big words you are afraid of. Smoke one cigarette, then put a clean cambric handkerchief to your mouth, and breathe through it two or three minutes. You will find a yellow deposit, which went into your lungs, and if you have any common-sense you can tell yourself whether it is likely to be injurious." Had this physician known of the story with which this article begins, he could have said to what extent it might be injurious.

"Tobacco does not often kill people, for we know lots of old men who have always used it, and they are as lively as crickets," some bright boy may urge. But if he will study into the matter a little further he will probably find out that these men either did not use tobacco when they were growing boys, but only when they became men, with their minds and bodies developed and hardened to endurance, or that they had strong constitutions, such as we seldom find among our city lads of to-day.

And now, boys, for a last argument, even though it seems a trivial one after the terribly sad story which has been told you. This smoking of cigarettes makes you ridiculous. Grown people think you silly, and laugh at you when they see you trying to be men by this silly caricaturing of what all grown-up smokers themselves pronounce a foolish and senseless habit. See what fun our artist has made of boy smokers, with an absurd apparatus for consuming half a bunch at a time, which he thinks may yet be adopted by boys if this injurious fashion is not checked. He knows what silly fellows you are, and has taken this way of laughing at you and showing you how ridiculous you can make yourselves.

"DICK AND D."*

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

Author of "Mildred's Bargain," "Nan," etc.

CHAPTER X.—(Continued.)

WHERE IS NORRY?

"WELL," said Mr. Gurdle, speaking slowly, and with his head on one side and one eye closed, "if you'll swear you won't go again what I have to say to you once you're there; if you'll work, say, all the week for me; well—I'll think of it."

Dick wrung his hands again. His lively imagination began to picture all kinds of misery and ill treatment that Norry might be suffering. He knew that the fact of his being separated from himself was enough to cause the blind boy any amount of pain, and to be among strangers who were not kind to him would be a terrible experience to the poor lad. Dick exclaimed, eagerly:

"Oh, I'll work; yes, yes, indeed, Mr. Gurdle! Oh, couldn't you take me now? Oh, Norry will be so frightened without me! Oh, he's blind, he's blind!" cried poor Dick, in a fresh burst of sorrow.

"Well, now, remember. I'm—I'm a sort of keeper of the blind," said Gurdle, grandly; "that is to say, it's sorter my duty to pick up poor blind children an' have 'em taught to earn their living, an' if I'm kind enough to take you to your little brother you'll have to pay me for it in work. Do you hear that?"

"Oh, yes, sir, Mr. Gurdle, anything," repeated Dick. This, then, he thought, was just what his mother had feared. No wonder she had dreaded the "authorities."

Poor Dick, as almost any boy of his age will see, was very unlearned in the ways of the world, good or bad. Poverty, hunger, cold, and terror, were almost all he knew of life, but beyond and over all was that strangely solemn trust in God. Surely the widow had not left her boys wholly unprovided for.

* Begun in No. 190, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE.

Mr. Gurdle rose up with great dignity, and told Dick to put up his few possessions and follow him. The boy lingered no longer than was absolutely needful, we may be sure. The bundle was quickly made up, though with trembling fingers, and so Dick passed out of the attic in Gurdle's keeping.

It seemed to the boy that their journey would never end. Mr. Gurdle conducted him across the Jersey City Ferry, and out in the horse-cars to a suburb, of which Dick could see nothing but occasional lights gleaming in the dark and the rain. Whither they were bound he cared not, so long as it led to Norry, and he was too well accustomed to the lower streets of the city to find the neighborhood strange or startling. At last Mr. Gurdle turned down a sort of alley with houses each side, and opening a door, led Dick up two flights of a rickety staircase. It was dark, but as they were nearly at the top Dick distinguished a tall figure on the landing, and could have been certain that he heard the voice of Mr. Brooks.

"Is that you, Gurdle?" the voice said, and then he seemed to see Gurdle catch hold of the figure, and knew that he whispered something, and that the other stood still while they passed.

This would have added to Dick's terror but for his being so bent upon reaching Norry. When they paused before a door in the top of the house his heart fairly stood still from excitement and dread.

Gurdle put a key into the lock, turned it, pushed Dick in, and then, closing the door upon him, locked it on the outside.

Dick at first thought he was alone, and in a trembling voice said, "Norry, Norry."

To his joy a well-known little voice answered, "Oh, Dicky, Dicky, come, come."

And Dick would have had to be blind and dull indeed had he not been able to grope his way to the place where Norry was sitting on the floor.

For a moment the two brothers could only hold each other tightly for joy, and then in hurried whispers Norry poured forth his story. How that afternoon Gurdle had come and taken him away, saying Dick would come soon, but warning him to make no resistance. "But he beat me, Dick," Norry whispered; "and I know he struck Trusty, he whined so much."

Dick set his teeth together with rage, but what could he do? He felt they were in Gurdle's power, and if he wanted to keep near to Norry he must do this man's bidding.

Norry's next communication frightened him still more.

"Do you know, Dick," Norry whispered, "I am sure I heard that Mr. Brooks's voice. I feel sure I did. They were talking on the ferry-boat, I think. I suppose they didn't think I heard, but I heard him tell Gurdle that the old gent, as he called him, would go to Marplains on the seventeenth, and they said something about whether he'd be sure to have the money up there with him. I tried to hear more, but I couldn't."

"Oh, Norry," Dick said, in an awe-struck whisper, "what could it mean? Could there be any plot against Dr. Field?" But if so, why should they want him and Norry? What could they do? Dick felt almost as if a stupor of terror was coming over him as he sat in the dark, holding Norry's hand in his, and dreading Gurdle's return, yet longing for it, that he might know just what was to become of them. And then he thought of the other Dick, of his cheery laugh, his ready generosity. Oh, if he were but here now! Dick felt as if he could work forever, could he hope to be once more in the comfortable house on Fifth Avenue, and within sight of Master Dick.

Gurdle's heavy step sounded and put all such thoughts to flight. Within five minutes of his return Dick began to understand what was in store for them. As soon as the man had struck a light he came over to where the boys and Trusty were crouching, and administering a violent kick to the poor dog, ordered Dick to get up and make a fire. While the boy was doing so Gurdle told him he meant to stand no nonsense. Dick should do as he was told, or—Norry should suffer for it; and so saying, he took out of his pocket a whip, which he cracked ominously near the poor blind boy.

This was enough for Dick. As his trembling fingers moved he resolved to suffer anything to save Norry, and so he watched his new master with an almost painful eagerness, doing his bidding at the slightest word, and always seeking to keep his cruel thoughts away from the younger boy.

A wretched week of imprisonment, half starvation, and ill usage followed. The boys were kept in the dismal room, locked in when Gurdle was absent, and ill treated when he was with them. When the day came on which he informed them they were to "move on," Dick tried to feel his courage rising. Any change must be for the best.

They started late one chilly afternoon, and apparently Gurdle intended to walk to their destination, for they tramped along the desolate road two miles, the man occasionally urging them on by a push or a blow from his stick. Dick held Norry's hand closely in his. Both boys were weak from hunger and the ill usage of the week, but at least they were together.

At night-fall Gurdle stopped at a low-looking public-house, where the boys were given a piece of bread for supper, and a straw bed in one end of the attic.

What was to be done further neither of them could imagine. Holding Norry's hand in his, Dick tried to "think."

CHAPTER XI

THE ESCAPE.

THE room where Dick and Norry had been given a bed was long and low, with three dormer-windows, full of broken panes of glass; the roof was cross-benched and very much out of repair, and the floor creviced with time and bad usage.

As Dick lay thinking out what to do his eyes fell upon these cracks in the flooring, and once or twice he fancied he heard the murmur of voices from some place below. Norry, holding his hand tightly, had fallen asleep, and softly withdrawing his fingers Dick stole out of bed and over to the part of the floor where he heard the sounds.

Midway in the room a large crack enabled him, by putting his face close to it, to look down into the room below, and there he felt, rather than saw, it seemed to him, the figure of Mr. Brooks.

Brooks was in close conversation with Mr. Gurdle. For a moment Dick could hear nothing, so overpowering was this one fact. Brooks there! and if so, for what purpose? Then some words spoken by the two men seemed to float up to the boy, who listened as though more than his safety depended upon it. He knew that no good could be intended, and he now felt certain that a plot against Dr. Field was in progress.

"Are you sure you've got the boys well under?" Brooks was saying. And Mr. Gurdle answered: "Oh, yes. They won't dare to do anything again, me. You say the fifteenth is the best time? Wot if the old gentleman happens to go to New York?"

Mr. Brooks's voice answered: "I'll see to that. I'll make out how Master Dick is ill, and he has to come home, or—" Here Dick lost all the words of the speaker. Perhaps it was because such a cold terror had seized him that he could not hear, perhaps because the two men plotting a crime had lowered their voices. At all events, he heard no more for a few moments. The next words audible to his strained hearing were, "You see, the boy ain't thought well of as it is."

Dick could not understand just what this meant, yet he felt it had to do with his relations to Dr. Field's family. I can not tell why the boy felt so sure harm was meant toward the people who had been his friends. As he listened there, lying on the floor, for a few moments fairly paralyzed by fear, there came into his mind one strong resolve. Somehow or in some fashion he must reach Marplains before these wicked men got there.

He turned himself over as noiselessly as possible and looked at Norry. The boy lay asleep, with Trusty curled up beside him. He could not leave them; he dared not alarm Norry; yet he could not let Gurdle or Mr. Brooks have any idea of what he intended to do. And where was Marplains? Dick recalled Master Dearing's talk about it. "On the Field and Dearing road," he had said, "twenty miles from New York." Well, the best way would be to escape if they could and walk along the road, asking their way and trusting to reach Marplains in time—in time for and saw that there was a shed under the window, and this encouraged him. They could at least try what would be the result of escaping by this means.

"Norry," he said, touching the boy softly, "wake up; don't make a row."

The blind boy moved uneasily, then sat up and stretched his little hand out to meet his brother's touch. "Listen, Norry. We've got to run away again. Now don't you make any fuss; let me do it all, only mind you don't make any noise."

Norry had grown so used to Dick's managing things that he simply sat up without a word, while Dick moved softly about, gathering up one or two things. Carefully lifting Trusty in his arms, he covered him with an old comforter. Then he took Norry by the hand and went over to the window.

Once out upon the shingle roof, Dick had to explain to Norry that he would place him firmly on one of the pillars of the porch. He must then slide down, after which Dick and Trusty would follow.

"THEY TRAMPED ALONG THE DESOLATE ROAD."

what? He only felt sure that it would be in time to avert something dreadful.

So thinking, Dick stole carefully to the window and looked out. There was the railroad track, two black lines in the snow; trees stood out around them; there seemed to be very few houses and very few lights, but Dick knew if they followed the track they would be safe. But how to get out to it? A little fall of snow from some point startled him. It was from a ledge of the roof, and struck something. Dick peered closer against the pane,

It may have been because the blind child trusted so entirely to Dick that he obeyed all these instructions without a word; at all events, Dick had never found Norry more easily managed. He whispered directions to him, told him what to do, and saw him glide down the pillar. A moment later, and with Trusty in his arms, Dick had easily accomplished the same feat.

The two boys with the dog were once again homeless and alone in the world.

MR. THOMPSON'S ADVENTURE WITH THE BAT.

BY ALLAN FORMAN.

MR. THOMPSON and the rest of the summer boarders were sitting on the piazza of the farm-house one evening early in September, when one of the ladies screamed. With a whirl and a "tweet" a dark object flitted over the heads of the company.

"What was that?" asked Miss Angelina.
 "Only a bird," answered another lady.
 "It was a horrid bat," protested the one who had screamed.

"Isn't a bat a bird?"
 "No; a bat is a mouse."

The discussion waxed warm, and Mr. Thompson prudently withdrew. He sought the seclusion of his own room, and seating himself by the open window, fell to thinking. The young man who boarded at the farm-house says he fell asleep. But Mr. Thompson claims not, and he surely ought to know which way he fell. At all events he had not been sitting there long when he heard a slight whir over his head, and upon glancing up saw the bat darting to and fro.

"What are you after?" asked Mr. Thompson.
 "Mosquitoes," replied the bat in a squeaky voice, not unlike the cry of a mouse.

"You can have them," said Mr. Thompson, generously.
 "Thank you," replied the bat, in a sarcastic tone.
 "Why don't you try to drive me out with your towel, as you did the last time I called?"

Mr. Thompson muttered something under his breath, and then added aloud, "I really did not know what you wanted."

The bat consented to forgive him, and, after a few more wild dashes across the room, it came and settled itself on the window-sill near Mr. Thompson.

"So you live upon mosquitoes?"

"Not entirely. We eat gnats, moths, flies, and in fact almost any small insect which comes in our way."

"Then you don't bite people and suck their blood while they are asleep?" asked Mr. Thompson, with a vague recollection of having once heard something of the kind.

The bat laughed. "I guess you refer to the vampire-bats of Brazil," it said. "They sometimes bleed a horse or cow to death, but they rarely attack human beings."

Mr. Thompson shuddered.

"What about that story of your getting fast in ladies' hair?"

"That is all nonsense too," answered the bat. "We never do anything of the kind: on the contrary, we can tell by the feeling of the air when we are near any obstacle, and we always avoid it. That has been proved by the great naturalist Cuvier, who put out the eyes of some bats he caught, and let them loose in a room with a great many strings stretched across it. The bats flew up and down, and over the strings, and never touched one."

"After their eyes were put out?"

"Yes. You know that the atmosphere is in constant motion, like the sea, and the sense of feeling or touch is so delicate in us that we can tell when the air waves are broken by any solid object without touching it."

"Wonderful!" exclaimed Mr. Thompson.

"How would you like to come and see how we live?"

Mr. Thompson says that he don't know how it happened, but he thinks that it must have gone on while he was talking to his strange visitor. At all events, he found himself floating out of the window a full-fledged, or perhaps one should say a full-furred, bat. The spirit of mischief prompted him to dash wildly across the piazza, and he twittered in glee at the alarm of the ladies.

"Look out!" screamed one; "it will get in your hair!"

"Now is my chance," thought Mr. Thompson. "I will get a lock of Miss Angelina's hair without her knowing it is I." Accordingly he dashed over her head, and in passing caught a little piece of her bang in his claws.

"Oh, the horrid thing has hold of my hair!" screamed Miss Angelina, in terror.

"Kill it!" said one. "Pick it off!" cried another. "Hit it!" screamed a third. The whole party were in wild alarm. Finally one of the gentlemen solved the difficulty by cutting off the lock with a pair of scissors, and Mr. Thompson fluttered away, bearing his prize in triumph.

At last they reached an old stone barn. A part of the roof had fallen in, and through this break they dashed. Hanging, head down, by one claw, with a small bat folded in her wings, was a mother bat; beside her, hanging to the wall, was another young one.

"Had your supper?" asked Mr. Thompson's friend, as he hung himself by his heels from a beam not far away.

"No," answered Mrs. Bat.

"Better go and get it. I'll look after the children."

Mrs. Bat twisted herself around, and stuck the young one's heels into a soft place in the mortar. There it hung, head down, a little bunch of hair and India-rubber-like wings. The mother, disengaging herself, fluttered out through the break in the roof.

"How nice it would be," thought Mr. Thompson, "if people could only hang their babies up on the wall when they wanted to go out!"

Presently the mother came back and assumed her place beside her young ones. They bade her "good-by," and left the barn.

"Are the vampires the only large species of your family?" asked Mr. Thompson.

"Oh, my, no!" responded Mr. Bat. "We vary in size from the smallest bat of Europe, which is hardly larger than a young mouse, to the kalorg, or flying fox, of Java and Ceylon, which has a stretch of wings of over six feet. We will take a run over and see them if you like."

"But it is a long fly," objected Mr. Thompson.

"Nonsense," replied the bat; "it is nothing. All you have to do is to wish yourself there, and there you are."

Mr. Thompson kept tight hold of his lock of hair and murmured, "I wish I was in Java." To his surprise, the earth began to revolve rapidly, while he remained stationary in the air.

"You see," explained his companion, "we take advantage of the fact that the earth moves. We'll just keep still, and drop down on Java when it rolls up. The earth revolves on its axis once in twenty-four hours, as you know. All we have to do is to keep still and we can go round the world in a day."

The explanation looked reasonable, and Mr. Thompson was just making up his mind to always adopt this method of travelling in future, and thus avoid the perils and unpleasantness of a sea-voyage, when he began to feel the air grow warmer and to perceive that it was laden with the odor of spices.

"Here we are!" exclaimed his guide, alighting.

They were in a dense forest or jungle of tropical trees. All was quiet and still save the occasional sharp bark of the jackal or the deep roar of a lion in the distance. Suddenly there was a great fluttering, and a crowd of dark bodies appeared through the branches.

"They are coming back from the sugar fields or the fruit orchards," whispered Mr. Thompson's companion. "They go out every night to feed on bananas and sugarcane, or in fact, any kind of fruit, and one flock can do an immense amount of damage in a few hours. They always travel in flocks, sometimes so many together as to obscure the moon."

Mr. Bat paused. All was quiet again, but hanging from every branch was one or more of the kalorgs, looking like a bag hung up by a corner, with a fox's head sticking out of the bottom. They wrapped their leathery wings about themselves like great cloaks, and gazed about with their sharp black eyes in a most comical fashion. One nearest to Mr. Thompson stared at the poor man so fixedly that he thought surely he was discovered, and in his alarm he dropped the precious lock of hair.

His companion saw how frightened he had become, and mercifully whispered that it was time to return. Mr. Thompson was only too delighted with the suggestion, and they fluttered up above the trees, and waited in mid-air while the earth turned under them. But this time the rapid movement of the planet seemed to make Mr. Thompson dizzy. He began to fall just as the ocean was rolling under him. The spray dashed into his face, and the water lapped his feet. He made one despairing leap, and found himself standing beside the window in his own room. The sash was up, and a heavy shower had commenced; his feet, which had been resting on the window sill, were soaked with the cold rain.

Mr. Thompson closed his window, and went to bed. He determined not to say anything about his adventure; but at the breakfast table one of the ladies remarked,

"I am so afraid of bats, and particularly of their getting fast in my hair."

"A bat never gets fast in your hair," said Mr. Thompson, with an air of great wisdom.

"But one did last night," said Miss Angelina. "They had to cut off a piece of my bang."

Mr. Thompson felt anxiously in his pocket.

"I left it in Java," he murmured.

"Left what?" inquired all, in chorus.

Mr. Thompson was at first disinclined to speak on the subject, but finally, by dint of judicious questioning, the whole story came out. He retired in high dudgeon when the young man who boarded at the house suggested that it was nothing but a nightmare.

CANADIAN DAYS
BY EDWARD I. STEVENSON.
III
DELIVERANCE.

FROM the looks of the sky, we are certainly going to have a change of weather," said Cal. "I am afraid there will be a storm, Gabriel."

Gabriel made no reply, and Cal saw that he was sitting a little apart from the rest, and with his back turned to them.

"What are you doing, Gabriel?" Calvert inquired.

His friend seemed to be writing.

"You say that you think a storm threatens us?" asked Gabriel, looking up.

"It looks so," replied Cal.

"And you know as well as I that the White Squall never came—"

"Yes," answered Cal, interrupting him.

"Well, what else? Read that, then," Gabriel returned, holding out a piece of coarse paper torn from something, on which, with a leaden "sinker," were scrawled these words:

"Somewhere on Lake Superior, September —, 187—. We, Clarence Calvert, Job Waller, Felix and Stephen Beaubien, and Gabriel de Zouche, of Prince's Settlement, Ontario, Canada, are to-day Drifting on our Raft White Squall. We Don't Know Where we Are. Can not See in Smoke. Were Burned out of Our Camp two Days ago. We Expect a Storm —"

"Well, what else? And what are you going to do with that thing, at any rate?" said Calvert, quickly, glancing from the scrawled scap of paper to Gabriel's still face. His friend made no answer, but presently took the billet from Calvert's hand, and added to its message.

"Good By All. G. d. Z."

The finished sentence came home to Cal like an arrow. He said no more, but silently watched Gabriel as he took a mink-skin from beside him and rolled the letter within it. Then with a leather shoe-string he drew all the corners of the skin so tightly together, and thonged them so evenly and closely, that water could not easily penetrate to the contents. Gabriel then secured the skin with a stout cord to the butt of a light fishing-rod, and slyly looking around, to be sure that his action would not be noticed by Job and the two others, he hurled rod and skin far out on to the waters. Then his eyes met Calvert's.

The other boy had just put out his hand to clasp his friend's in token of sympathy, when their attention was suddenly attracted by one of the party, who cried out:

"Look there! What can that thing be? It's coming toward us!"

A curious dark object was floating at a considerable distance, and seemed to be advancing through the mists. It loomed up clearly now—a huge, charred tree trunk, on which moved restlessly up and down a dark animal. The boys forgot their anxieties as they recognized a very young black bear balancing himself upon his ark of safety.

"Poor fellow!" said Job: "he has been forced to run from the fire just as we did. Only he has had to swim for it, I dare say, until he paddled up to that pine there."

"It seems cruel to fire at him," spoke Cal's quiet voice from behind the four, "but I must do it." He had remembered that theirarder was fast becoming empty.

The White Squall was fairly abreast of the great floating pine trunk by this time. Its shaggy young passenger was staring mournfully across at the raft. Perhaps he learned his first and last lesson in human kindness as, with Cal's and Gabriel's bullets, he dropped into the water with one cry of pain.

The contents of the bag were beginning to run threateningly low. Calvert, lying awake in the night, thought gloomily of this and the general prospects before him and his companions. He thought on, until, all at once, a light wind began to come in pulls.

"The water is roughening," spoke Job's voice in the darkness. "Do you think the storm is up, Cal?"

"I don't know what to think," responded Calvert, raising himself on his elbow, and gently drawing his hand away from Gabriel's clasp. "There is something curious about this wind."

Strange to say, it continued, that newly risen breeze, but did not swell to angrier strength. It kept on steady, fresh and warm. Soon it seemed to have shifted its quarter entirely, and a thrill of hope trembled within Calvert's heart as he felt it full and gentle, making the wavelets leap before it, and direct from the south—the blessed south.

Before such a breeze must the mist and smoke, the fog and drizzle, fly apace.

The boy could contain himself no longer now. "Fellows! fellows!" he cried out, joyously, "I say! Do you feel this breeze? Well, if it keeps on from where it does now—"

"What of it? What will happen?" exclaimed five voices, eagerly.

"Why, we shall see the sun or the coast line to-morrow!" Cal concluded his sentence with something like a choke in his voice.

Would what he had said come about?

It did. All night long came from the sunny south that blessed wind of hope and rescue to the weary crew of the White Squall. Before it, far overhead, and round about, went rushing back to the north those vast columns of smoke and vapor. With straining eyes the light was watched for, wherein lay either rescue or the cruellest of disappointments. And, and when slowly a struggling white mounted the east (for the first time in three days known as the east); when a pale rosey flush followed it, and deepened into red and purple; when the sun, the old glorious yellow sun, leaped into sight and brought out in plain view on the right of the White Squall a low line of dark coast—ah! do you wonder that all these beautiful things were greeted with ringing cheers from Cal, Gabriel, Job, and the two Beaubiens, until a silence followed in which nobody thought of looking to see if there were tears in his neighbor's eyes—for very good reasons?

This story is done; for with the landing that same afternoon of the crew of the White Squall hadn't it better be?

How Cal and Gabriel piloted the rest of the party safely back to an unburned Canada village called Prince's Settlement, within a two days' tramp of their landing-place; how they were received by the friends and relatives there; how the stories of the escape of the boys and the equally narrow one of the Settlement were compared—why, any one in the village can tell the reader these things if he will go up there next summer.

A few days after their return Cal and Gabriel walked over to Arrowhead Point to find their late camp ashes, and the brush about it burned to the beach. But strangest of all was their finding, late in October, some three or four miles up the coast, a broken fishing-rod lying on the sands. To it was tied securely a draggled mink-skin, containing a damp paper wherein were scrawled a few faint lines, beginning, "Somewhere on Lake Superior, September —, 187—," and ending, "Good By All. G. d. Z."

THE END.

FANCY EMBROIDERY FOR GIRLS.

BY SUSAN HAYES WARD.

AMONG a collection of articles that had been brought from China I once saw a beautiful scarlet cape. It was stiff with embroidery, which seemed at first sight to be very elaborate and difficult; but on examining it I saw that the intricate pattern which went waving and curving all over the garment was all wrought in the simplest of stitches—so simple, in fact, that a mere child might have done it.

First a line was worked in stem stitch, as at the line 1, 2, in Fig. 19, and then stitches were taken each side of the line, giving a feathery effect, as seen in Fig. 20. These stitches should be taken first on the right side of the line, making a long stitch on the upper side of the cloth and a short one below, working from you, and then the stitches should come down on the left side of the line, working toward you, as shown at C and D (Fig. 20). I know of no stitch so easy as this, and none more effective for the amount of work. The petals of the little flowers are made by a single stitch, like a chain stitch (see E, Fig. 20), then the needle is pushed through the cloth and brought out on the under side, thus making a little point to each petal. This is the easiest and prettiest way to work daisy petals.

This design (Fig. 20) would be pretty for a border to a linen apron, worked in two shades of silk, the lines darker than the little feathery rays or flowers. It would also do well as a border for any kind of tea cloth or bureau cover, and could be worked very rapidly.

Girls who say they do not like these "washed-out" colors often ask me for some pretty design to work on maroon felt or cloth. One of the best maroon stripes I have ever made is represented in Fig. 19. It is set with other stripes and colors in an olive portière, but it can very well stand alone. The stripe is a rich maroon. The Chinese feather stitch, 1, 2 and 3, 4, is worked in a lighter shade of maroon or cardinal, and the flowers in a shade so much lighter as to be quite scarlet. The stripe is held in place by black worsted braid, button-holed down in yellow, and ornamented with a line of herring-bone of the same color.

This curtain stripe, of just the width here given, was worked before the days of crewels, in ordinary worsteds, but it can be made finer and smaller, and worked in either crewels or silks. I give the full width, as many of you will be likely to have shades of scarlet and cardinal worsteds on hand. The space from F to G, leaving out the braid, would do well for a border around a maroon felt table cover or across the ends of a table scarf of the same color. It should be worked an inch and a half or two inches from the edge, and it can be done by a girl ten years old as easily as by one of twenty if the lines are only ruled, which can be done with a colored pencil (yellow), or with a piece of chalk.

then add the pounded almonds and the flavoring, and let them simmer very gently over a slow fire for ten minutes, stirring occasionally; at the end of ten minutes add the well-beaten yolks of the eggs, and stir over a quicker fire till the mass becomes firm; take from the fire, and when cool beat in seven yolks of eggs, consisting of six slightly first with oil of sweet almonds; make into small cakes, and spread on sheets of paper; bake in a hot oven.

KNOWTON, QUEBEC.

I am a little girl eight years old. My sister Emily and I have very good times playing together. We invent funny games, and sometimes we draw pictures in the mud with sticks, and sometimes we make rhymes. This is one I made about myself yesterday:

There is a little country girl,
Her name is Bessie C.;
She is a lover of the nightingale
That sings in woods so free.

She's not a pretty little girl,
Though her hair is long and brown,
And her eyes are blue and hazel,
As she runs about and round.

Her nose is short and stubby,
Her lips are thin and white;
She never likes to go to bed
If it's a stormy night.

I believe it is the greatest trial I have, to go to bed when the wind blows. This is one of my sister Emily's rhymes about water. She wants to go to the sea-side very much, and I think that is the reason she likes to write about the water:

Water flowing peacefully
In the little brooks,
Water flowing softly,
How beautiful it looks!

Water roaring noisily
In the great wide sea,
Water roaring loudly,
How lovely it must be!

One day my little sister Sarah was playing with her doll, and she wanted a pin to pin its dress with, so she said, "Pin, pin, where you been?" and I said that, "I have passed one." And all thought it was funny, for she was only two years old.

Papa took us for a ride out to Lake Memphremontag the day we took a walk. We had a little picnic on the lake shore. It is fourteen miles from here, and on the road we passed a very pretty place. It is in the woods, and there was a big high rock, with a little brook tumbling over it, and a clump of trees above it, and lots of moss and ferns around. We met a man leading a tame fox. We thought it was very pretty, but the man said it liked chickens when it had a chance. There was a little brook that ran along the road in one place, and whenever the road turned the brook turned too; it seemed just as if one was made to follow the other. We passed one mountain that had a square rock upon it, and some others that were covered with woods. We came home another way, so as to go to Bolton Spring. The water comes out of a little hollow in the solid rock, and has a very strong taste, and does not like it. Emily took her doll Rosie, and I took Maud; we have thirteen dolls altogether.

I have never been to school, but I like reading very much. The last book I read was the Idle, Wild, World, and I like the part where Ellen was at her aunt Fortune's the best. Now I am reading the Pilgrim's Progress, and have got to where Matthew and Mercy were married. My little brother laughs every time we call him pretty boy. He is only two months old, and we all love him dearly. Mamma is writing this for me, as I can't write, and I hope it will be printed, so I can surprise papa. I send love to the Postmistress.

BESSIE C.

So did I like best that part of Ellen Montgomery's story in which she lived at Aunt Fortune's, and bad that sweet Miss Alice for a friend. Yet I've always felt as if it would do me good to shake Aunt Fortune herself. Do you know that the one of the most provoking things she did was to color Ellen's pretty white stockings, and now the fashion has changed so that if Ellen were living to-day we might not persuade her to wear a white stocking? I like to be told what books my children are reading.

OTTAWA, ONTARIO.

As I have never seen a letter from this place, I thought I would write, so you might know there was a little girl in Ottawa who had named through Young People to love you. I have two pets—a little brother three years old, named Eskine, and a young bird just commencing to sing, which will be a fine bird. I have been to school very little, as I am not very strong. Ottawa is a large lumbering place, and the capital of Canada. We have lived here six years. Our home here was in a large hall, with wide corridors, and would like the pattern of the Nautilus, size twelve inches. My little brother sees me writing, and says, "Ask the lady to come and 'tay for tea some day." I have taken Young People for two years. I would like to join the Little Housekeepers, and I would send a receipt for a pudding that I know is nice.

BESSIE M.

Thank the sweet little boy who wants the lady to come to tea, and tell him she loves him ever so much for his invitation. We have had letters from Ottawa, dear child, but are very much pleased to receive yours. I hope you liked the Nautilus.

St. HELENA, CALIFORNIA.

I am a little boy nine years old. I had Young People for a present on my last birthday. I caught a young rabbit and a young bird, but they both died. I have a new dog four months old that is quite playful. I have a little brother six years old, named Eddie, and a little sister two years old, named Cora.

GRACEY C. B.

Mrs. G. R. B. Chaney's mother, in a line accompanying his letter, commends Young People as the best paper for boys she has ever seen. She says it is a happy idea to let them exchange various articles of interest, containing information with pleasure, and declares that, as a whole, Young People is "just the thing" to enter a home.

BROOKFIELD, NEW JERSEY.

Although my brother Kenneth and I have taken Young People for the first number, this is my first question to the Post-office Box. I saw in Young People No. 39 that Earl V. G. had answered a question of Halle M. G.'s with regard to a quotation. For nearly four months I have searched for the name of the author of the lines,

"Little things on little wings,
Bear little souls to heaven."

So far, however, my search has been unsuccessful, and I thought perhaps Earl V. G. or some other one of the readers of this paper could help me. I have a little friend in New Jersey who sends it to me, and I like it very much. My little sister, nine years old, and my brother, just older than myself, enjoy it equally as well as I do, and the sweet baby Berta looks at the pictures by the hour. I noticed a letter from one of my little school-mates in your paper, and I hope this is not too long to print, as it is the first I have written to you.

ELOISE S.

Another question for the bright eyes which hunt up quotations. The Postmistress hopes somebody may be able to tell Grace from what poem the couplet comes, although she does not very much like the thought expressed. The Little Housekeepers will notice the other request.

CARTERSVILLE, GEORGIA.

I am an unknown friend of yours, but I thought I would write and tell you how I got Young People. I have a little friend in New Jersey who sends it to me, and I like it very much. My little sister, nine years old, and my brother, just older than myself, enjoy it equally as well as I do, and the sweet baby Berta looks at the pictures by the hour. I noticed a letter from one of my little school-mates in your paper, and I hope this is not too long to print, as it is the first I have written to you.

ELOISE S.

We are two of the many readers of Young People, and we love to read the letters in the Post-office Box, and to get and to give letters to our pets, so we want to tell about ours. We have a large white rabbit named Bunny, an iron gray pony named Nellie, and a Maltese cat named Toot, with four dear little kittens. We would like to have this letter put in your nice paper, if the Postmistress thinks it worthy of publication. Hoping it is not too long, we close by sending love and best wishes from

ROSE AND DANNY.

NEW YORK CITY.

We thought we would write to you. We enjoy Young People very much. We call Tuesday "Harper's day," and have the front hall door to see which one of us can get our paper first. Yesterday was our birthday. One of our presents was a bound volume of Young People for 1887; and I was delighted with it. We are glad of Mrs. Little's stories to be printed, for we like them. We are twin sisters, ten years old, and we send this letter from both of us. We have three nephews in England, but we have never seen the youngest one.

AMY B. and ANGIE H.

You forgot to tell me whether, being twins, you are so much alike that people can not tell Amy from Angie. I wonder if I could. I was greatly puzzled by a pair of twin sisters last summer, and when they found it out they thought it very funny.

Dorothy Gray, Lizzie W. R., and Jennie G.: Your stories, which are very well written, shall appear as soon as the Postmistress can make room for them.—Sammy A. will please send his full address to De Eloise L., Box 774, Portsmouth, N. H., and to A. K. Rhodes, Stroudsville, Penn., as these young gentlemen wish to correspond with him. De Bloise was the first boy in the North to write to this boy in the far South. Rachel L.: I am sorry you have so often been disappointed about your letters. I am very glad you passed the examination for the High School successfully, and you may write and tell some of the little sister's cute sayings.—Laura M. B. has written this little song for school-girls:

Ding dong, ding dong,
Rings out the school-hell merrily,
Come on, come on—
You can come now cheerily.

Go along, go along,
The mothers all cry,
Don't you hear the school-hell's song?
Be quick, be spry.

Very cleverly rhymed, my dear. Thanks for favors are due to Fred U. C., Jessie C. D., Edward M., St. Elmo S., Ida E. K., I would like to see your birds, Lewis F. (covers are fifty cents each; you cannot obtain all the numbers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, as some of the early numbers are entirely out of stock, and will not be reprinted), Pauline and Henrietta M. (you will be welcome among the Small Housekeepers, Mmie H., Willie K. C., Kate F. J., M. A., Gerlie and Sadie G., all the way from England the pressed flowers came safely), Mary L. M., Rosa W., Edgar B. P., Arthur G. B., Ralph H. F., Addie G. S., F. B. D., Jessie H., H. B. B., Madeline A., and Lonie S. H. Inquirer: In sending for the Nautilus inclose a 5-cent stamp.

A FLYING PAPER BUTTERFLY.

BY A. W. ROBERTS.

THE success of this toy depends entirely upon the lightness of the materials used in its construction.

The breadth of the wings from the tip to the body is four inches, the breadth of the body a little over one inch, the other parts being in proportion.

The antennæ, or "horns," F F, consist of the very thinnest of tissue-paper (I have found the manifold paper used by reporters to be the best), stretched on arching splints of bamboo or broom-corn whisks, as shown at F F. These horns are inserted in a piece of cork shaped as shown at A. A second and third piece of cork, A and A, similarly shaped, form the upper and lower parts of the body, into which are fastened two straws, B B.

These straws must contain a joint to insure greater strength. The frame-work of the body is now complete.

The large wings, E E, are composed of the same materials as the horns, one splint being used for each wing, as shown at E E. The sides of the wings are glued to the straws B B, after which the paper wings are painted to resemble the markings and colors of a butterfly. Through the two upper corks, A A, passes a wire, which is in the form of a hook, as shown at D. A similar wire hook also passes through the lower cork, to which it is made fast, as shown at D. These hooks are for the purpose of holding the two elastic rubber bands, C, that can be twisted or wound up by means of the movable head, H, which works or revolves on two washers, consisting of two small glass beads, G.

When the rubber bands are twisted up to their fullest capacity the butterfly is thrown up into the air, and the unwinding of the rubber bands acting on the upper hook causes the head cork, H, and the horns, F F, to revolve rapidly, thereby sustaining the butterfly in the air, and causing it to move about with a circular jerking motion.

The cork-work and the frame of the butterfly are covered with tissue-paper, and colored. It is very amusing to watch the flight of this novel insect. When seen a little distance off it is not so very unlike a real butterfly. It is much easier to catch, however, and when once it has reached the ground it must be wound up before it can continue its flight.

ENIGMA.

WITHIN a cavern arched and dark,
Where never yet did daylight gleam,
Concealed from every eye but One,
There bubbles forth a living stream.

Through pipes and conduits manifold
Still on and on the current goes,
But to the self-same source returns,
As endlessly it ebbs and flows.

Life-giving power it brings to all
The structure that it passes through;
No part has either less or more
Than is its own proportion due.

And each remotest corner feels
The wondrous vivifying force;
The lily white and blushing rose
Bloom on the meadow o'er its source.

A wondrous clock-work drives the stream,
Whose pendulum goes on and on,
And ceaseless measures out the time
Till minutes, hours, and days are gone.

When weeks and months have passed to years,
Will come at length its latest day;
The clock will stop, the spring dry up,
And all the structure fall away.

THE KINDNESS OF DOGS.

ALADY has a pug-dog, also a cat, of which the dog was always very jealous, chasing it about whenever it saw it. Not many weeks since the pug astonished its mistress by coming up to her, sitting up and begging, then barking, and running a little distance from her, till it became evident that it wished to persuade her to come with it. It continued to beg and to run on in the same manner till it led her out into the garden, to the foot of an apple-tree, against which the dog raised itself on his hind-legs and barked loudly. On looking up the lady saw the cat with a trap on its foot, evidently in great pain. She got it down and relieved it of the trap. The dog showed the greatest joy, and on the cat being placed on the ground, the dog, which before had never done anything but hunt and worry it, licked it all over and over, and ever since they have been the best of friends.

A dog had a kennel in the yard of a house which was overlooked from one of the windows. A lady saw this dog hiding some of his dinner in a corner behind the kennel, and this performance, she noticed, was repeated for a day or two. On the third day the dog was missing some little time from the yard, but before long it was seen to return, followed by a small half-starved friend, which it took up to the store of hidden food, and stood by, wagging its tail with evident pleasure, while the strange dog consumed it.

"MR. RAMSDELL WAS GIVING THE BABY SOME MILK."

NINA'S BABY.

THERE were Nina and Joe, the children, and Jep and Judy and Bones, the performing dogs, and Mr. Ramsdell, the clown, and Mrs. Ramsdell, the tight-rope walker, all of whom, with the assistance of Jerry, the man-of-all-work, gave entertainments under a canvas tent at any place where they thought they could get an audience of sufficient size to pay expenses.

Of course their real names were not printed on the posters that were hung in every available place in the town where the tent was set up; but each one, even including Jerry, had some high-sounding name that could not by any possibility have been mistaken for Ramsdell.

In addition to being the clown, Mr. Ramsdell lifted heavy weights, tossed cannon-balls, and was juggler and acrobat. In certain acts little Joe and Nina appeared with him. He would hold them on his hands or feet, roll Joe up in a little ball, and spin him around like a top, or carry both of them on his head, one above the other, walking around the ring meanwhile as if he was doing some very simple thing.

Nina exhibited Jep, Judy, and Bones, all of whom would do her bidding, and many were the comical tricks they performed. Mrs. Ramsdell cooked the food, washed the clothes, cared for the children, Mr. Ramsdell, Jerry, and the dogs, and also walked on the tight-rope, looking more like a fairy than a hard-working woman.

Jerry could not perform, but during the entertainment he was dressed in a gorgeous costume, and announced the performers, set the vaulting stand, handed Mrs. Ramsdell her balance-pole, and did such things as were generally necessary, without being particularly entertaining.

The company travelled in a large covered wagon, with the tent and all their belongings snugly packed in, while Mrs. Ramsdell and the children had cozy little holes among the folds of the canvas, where they could sleep as they rode. Mr. Ramsdell and Jerry sat on the front seat, where they urged on the two discouraged-looking horses, which had at times very hard work to draw the heavily laden wagon.

There were days when this sort of travelling was pleasant to all, but during wet or cold weather Nina and Joe would spend a good share of the time wishing that they had a comfortable home, and could go to school like other children.

During the summer the children could play in the woods when the halt on the road was made for dinner, and while the weather was warm the thin and scanty costumes they wore in the ring were not uncomfortable, but when autumn came to paint the green leaves such a variety of brilliant colors everything was changed. The children were obliged to remain inside the wagon all the time they were travelling, and on exhibition days the moment they were through with their duties they were only too glad to crowd around the little stove that was set up in the dressing tent. Even the dogs felt uncomfortable when the weather grew cold, for Mr. Ramsdell kept their shaggy coats trimmed rather too close for comfort.

The season which was nearly ended, and during which Nina and Joe met with such a wonderful adventure that this story is written about it, had been a hard one for the travelling showmen. There had been many more cold, stormy days than there had been warm ones, and the little tin box in which Mr. Ramsdell kept his money had been nearly empty many times, with no prospect that it would be very full that year.

Finally things grew so bad that at one town in which they gave an exhibition Mr. Ramsdell did not receive much more than money enough to pay for the food he was obliged to buy, and it was necessary for the party to travel thirty long miles before they could reach Howden, where they were to give the next performance.

On the morning that they started the roads were so bad that it was decided to travel only during the daytime, rather than attempt to go over the distance in the night, even though a whole day should be lost. Even in broad daylight it was difficult to make much progress, and when noon came, after they had ridden about twelve miles in such deep mud that the horses could not get on much faster than a walk, every one except Mrs. Ramsdell was glad to get out for a while.

The horses, still harnessed to the wagon, were standing by the side of the road, looking much as if they would willingly remain there until the next week, when suddenly a loud noise was heard in the woods close beside them, and out rushed a drove of cattle, evidently very much frightened.

This startled the horses, and in an instant they rushed off up the muddy road as if they were fresh and with no load behind them. The cattle, seeing Mr. Ramsdell and Jerry standing near the edge of the road, as if to bar their passage, turned and ran in the same direction as that taken by the horses, which served to increase their terror.

Without thinking of the children, or, if they did think of them, believing that they could overtake the wagon after a short race, Mr. Ramsdell and Jerry started in pursuit of the runaways, while Mrs. Ramsdell's terrified screams could be heard even after the wagon had disappeared around a bend in the road.

When they were first left alone Nina and Joe did not seem to think that there was any reason for them to be alarmed except for their mother's safety, and Nina said, as she took Joe by the hand:

"The horses won't run very far, Josey; so let's walk right along fast, so that father won't have so far to come back for us."

The two children started along, and Joe insisted on turning their forced walk into a romp by stopping now and then to gather particularly large checkerberry plums or bunchberries.

But when they had walked on for a quarter of an hour, without seeing anything either of their parents or the wagon, Nina grew alarmed, and she insisted that Joe should not stop by the road-side any more, but should walk as fast as possible.

Ten minutes more passed, and both the children were thoroughly frightened, when Joe shouted, "There they are now, or else it's something they have dropped!"

That which he saw was a bundle of some bright-colored material directly in the middle of the road; and while it was so small that there was no chance of either his father or his mother being contained in it, it afforded proof that the frightened horses had kept in the main road instead of dashing into the woods, as Nina had begun to fear.

In a few moments they were standing beside the bundle, and then both saw that it had not fallen from their wagon. It was a reasonably good-sized bundle, covered with a red shawl which they knew had never belonged to their party, and before they had had time to touch it, they heard a strange noise coming apparently from beneath the covering.

"It's something alive!" cried Joe, in alarm. "Let's run!" and before his sister could stop him he was off at full speed.

"Don't be a coward, Josey," cried Nina. "It can't hurt you. Come back."

Joe was finally persuaded to return by seeing that the mysterious bundle had done Nina no harm; and when he got back to her she was just opening the shawl.

"Why, Joe Ramsdell," she cried, excitedly, "it's a real live baby! an' how ever did it get out here alone?"

Joe could not answer the question, but he could and did stand staring at the little thing which his sister had taken in her arms much as if he suspected the baby of some murderous design.

Nina was too much excited by finding the wonderful baby in such a wonderful place to feel any more alarm about her parents; but she followed Joe as he started up the road, singing and talking to the baby to try to persuade it not to wake quite so much noise.

In ten minutes more, during which Nina had coaxed the baby until it had quietly gone to sleep, Joe uttered another loud cry of joy, which was caused this time by seeing the wagon standing by the side of the road, the horses looking quiet and repentant, while Mr. Ramsdell and Jerry were busily engaged mending the harness that had been broken during the mad flight.

"Nina's went an' gone an' found a baby!" cried Joe, as he ran on ahead, eager to be the first to tell the wonderful news; and Nina held her precious bundle high in the air that all might see it.

"That must have been the very thing I saw in the road when we was rummin' so fast after the team," said Mr. Ramsdell, when he and his wife had inspected the prize Nina had found. "I thought it was something we'd lost outer the wagon, an' I'd made up my mind to go back an' look for it after we got the harness mended."

"But where could the dear little thing have come from?" asked Mrs. Ramsdell, as she kissed Nina's baby.

"That's a question I can't answer," replied Mr. Ramsdell, as he looked helplessly at the shawl and its contents. "The only thing that puzzles me is, what are we goin' to do with it now that we have got it?"

"Do with it!" echoed his wife. "Now, Jacob, what can we do with it? You wouldn't be the man to say that we shouldn't take it with us, would you?"

"Of course we've got to take care of it until we can find its parents; but yet I don't see how we're goin' to get along when we're all in the ring."

Mrs. Ramsdell was certain that they could manage to take care of it between them; but Jerry muttered something about the foolishness of taking another to feed when they had hardly sufficient for themselves.

"You oughter be ashamed of sayin' that, Jerry," said Mr. Ramsdell, almost sternly; and perhaps Jerry did feel ashamed, for he worked at the harness with so much energy, that in a few moments everything was ready for another start.

Nina insisted on caring for "her baby," as she called it, and when she was once more in her nest in the wagon her mother gave the tiny little fellow to her with many injunctions as to how she should care for him.

The roads were so bad, and the hour so late when this second start was effected, that Mr. Ramsdell decided not to attempt to reach Howden that night, but to stop at the first good camping-place he should find, hoping that by giving his tired horses a rest they would be able to travel the remaining distance during the next forenoon.

It was not more than five minutes after the party started before Jerry pointed out a small road or lane that led to a thick grove of pine-trees, apparently just such a place as would suit people who were obliged to live in their tent in order to save expense.

"We'll camp right there," said Mr. Ramsdell, as he turned the horses from the main road, "and we must start for Howden early enough in the morning to make sure of being there in time for an afternoon performance."

Nina thought she had never been so happy as when she sat with the baby in her arms, while her mother prepared the dinner, and many were the plans she laid for its future welfare. At night she cuddled the little fellow in her arms to still his crying, for he had drunk all the milk, and with the first light of day Jerry started out in search of some, while Mr. Ramsdell packed the tent into the wagon and otherwise prepared for the journey.

Jerry could not see a house in any direction, but he found a cow, which was probably one of the same herd that had caused the runaway, and he milked her, thinking it no crime to take the milk in view of the baby's necessities.

The tent was set up in Howden sufficiently early for an afternoon's performance, and then came Nina's trouble, for she could not understand how they could all be in the ring at one time, owing to her precious baby's imperative and oft-repeated demands for attention.

But that difficulty was soon settled, for Mrs. Ramsdell decided that the little fellow should be left in charge of whoever was in the dressing-tent, and that when all were in the ring, as would be the case in the last act, Jerry should be intrusted with the care of Nina's baby. Jerry was not very well pleased with this arrangement, but he consented to it, probably because he thought he had but half atoned for his selfish words by getting the milk.

The day was bright, even if it was cold, and the little tent was filled with spectators very shortly after the canvas doors were opened, much to the delight of Mr. Ramsdell, who said, just before the performance began, that he really believed Nina's baby was bringing them good luck.

Mrs. Ramsdell was walking on the tight rope, and Mr. Ramsdell was giving the baby some milk, while Nina and Joe were warning themselves at the little stove preparatory to going out again to join their mother, when Jerry, putting his head into the dressing-tent, exclaimed,

"There's some trouble at the door, for two or three people are there talkin', an' some have come in without payin'."

Before Mr. Ramsdell could reply, or even give the baby to Nina, a gentleman and a lady rushed past Jerry into the dressing-tent, greatly to the surprise of the audience as well as the proprietor of the show; and almost before Nina knew that they were fairly inside, the lady had the baby in her arms, kissing it until there seemed to be every danger that the little thing would be smothered.

Of course Mrs. Ramsdell was astonished, if not alarmed, at the entrance of these strangers, and, after excusing herself to the audience, she hurried into the dressing-tent to learn the cause of the intrusion.

It did not require much time or many words to explain everything, for the baby was Nina's no longer, but was claimed by its mother, Mrs. Dickson, who acted very much for some time after she found it as if she were afraid it might get away from her again.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Dickson and the baby remained in the dressing-tent until the performance was ended, and then the mystery of finding the baby in the road was a mystery no longer.

Mr. Dickson was a farmer who lived about half-way between where the baby was found and Howden. He, with his wife, child, and nurse, were returning home from a visit in a light carriage drawn by a pair of young spirited horses. They were but a short distance in advance of Mr. Ramsdell's wagon when his horses ran away, and the clatter of the heavy team, as well as the cattle that followed, frightened Mr. Dickson's horses so that they too ran away.

The nurse, who was holding the baby, was thrown from her seat at the first shock, and, in order to save herself from being thrown from the carriage, dropped the baby, which was so snugly wrapped in clothing and shawls that it did not receive any injury.

It was not until his horses had run nearly five miles that Mr. Dickson succeeded in stopping them, and he at once drove back, his wife almost frantic with grief and apprehension, to find the child. In the mean time Mr. Ramsdell had pitched his tent in the grove, and when Mr. Dickson returned he could neither find his baby nor any trace of the wagon that had caused the disaster.

All the remainder of that day and until they came into the tent had Mr. and Mrs. Dickson been searching for the showman's wagon, and their joy may be imagined when they found it.

Poor Nina lost her baby, but it brought them good fortune, as her father had suggested, for Mr. Dickson insisted that the showman should come at once to his house; and when they were there arrangements were made for Mr. Ramsdell to close the season, and occupy a little house owned by Mr. Dickson for the winter.

Nina and Joe, for that time at least, had a real house to live in, with an opportunity to go to school, which they had never had before, and all that good fortune came to them through "Nina's baby."

“DICK AND D.”*

CHAPTER XII.

THE RUNAWAYS FIND SHELTER.

AS soon as Dick dared he told Norry what had prompted this movement, and the child was quite willing to trust to his brother’s superior judgment. Ahead of them was a snowy road, shadowed by trees, and yet looking as though it must lead somewhere, since the railroad tracks were there, stretching far ahead of them.

Dick knew that Gurdle would miss them before morning. Perhaps he would only glance in during the night, and not be sure that they had gone; but they could not feel safe for a day or two, and, indeed, not until they were within reach of Dr. Field’s country home, where Dick now took for granted the Doctor must be staying. He had heard from Dearing that the family from time to time passed a few days in Marplains, and he concluded that some such visit was now in progress.

“Hold my hand tight, Norry,” Dick whispered, “’cause there’s a bank near by, and it’s dark, and I’m afraid you’ll slip. Are you cold?”

Norry, although with a little chatter of the teeth, said, “Not so very.” And then he added, “You see, dark don’t matter to me, Dick, does it?”

“No,” the other answered. “I do sometimes think your eyes are better than mine, after all.”

It seemed an endless road. Dick’s chief anxiety was to reach a railway station where he might ask his way, and perhaps get a ride as far as Marplains station; but for two hours the boys trudged on, with no such reward, and then, to Dick’s dismay, Norry declared he could go no further.

The road just at this point was very desolate; the snow lay white on every side; the branches of the trees looked very black and gaunt; only the sky seemed friendly, for there a million stars were shining down upon the two poor boys with their faithful dog.

“You mustn’t sit down, Norry,” Dick said. “Can you get along a little way? I think I see a light somewhere ahead; perhaps we can get there and ask for a place, in a barn or somewhere, to lie down.”

Norry very faintly answered that he would try, and so with lagging steps they went forward again.

The light grew clearer. Dick soon saw that it came from a small cottage on the road-side, and that to the left of it was a sort of half-open, probably disused shed. He encouraged Norry by telling him of this, and in a few moments they were at the entrance of the shed. Just as he had supposed, it was a vacant tumble-down place, but at least it was a shelter, and so open that he thought Gurdle would never think of their concealing themselves within it. He led Norry over to the most comfortable corner, and then took from his bundle an old coat, which made a covering for the child when he lay down with his head on Dick’s knee. For himself and Trusty there must be no sleep. They must watch.

As he sat there Dick saw the light in the cottage window move about; he thought some one must be ill, for he knew it was long after midnight. It gave him a less lonely feeling to see a shadow on the blind, to know that some one was up and awake so near. Oh, if only he dared to go to the house and ask for a better shelter! But this he could not do without explanations which might lead to his recapture, and prevent his being able to warn Dr. Field of his danger.

So he sat still while the morning broke. The sun rose in a glorious fashion over the snowy country, and slowly everything seemed to awake to a new sense of life and brightness. But poor Dick felt none of the day’s sweetness. He was stiff and cold, and with daylight seemed to come only a new sense of terror.

Presently he saw the door of the cottage open, and a young woman with a red shawl over her head came and put down a milk-can. She stood a minute looking up and down the quiet country road, and Dick saw that her face, though plain and weather-beaten, was very kindly in its expression.

In a moment he had decided to speak to her.

He woke Norry, told him to sit still where he was, and with Trusty at his heels he crossed the bit of roadway, and stood timidly in front of the woman.

“Well! why, I never!” she exclaimed. “What d’you want, boy?”

“If you please,” Dick said, “my little brother and I have walked a long way, and we’ve further yet to go—we must go—and I took the liberty of staying in your shed, and I thought perhaps you’d let us have a little breakfast.”

The young woman stared at him a moment, and then said:

“Well, upon my word! You staid over in the shed! Well, I must say you’d oughter feel cold. I don’t know as I can’t give you something or other t’ eat. Where’s your brother?”

Dick ran back to the shed. He returned very quickly holding Norry by the hand.

* Begun in No. 199, HARPER’S YOUNG PEOPLE.

"He's blind," he said, softly.

The woman peered down into the little thin peaceful face. "Why, so he be!" she said, in a much gentler voice, and then she added, "I guess you can come right in."

They were at the back door, and she turned and led the way into a square clean kitchen, where a fire was blazing cheerily, and the kettle was already on. At one side there was a long wooden settle, and she told Dick that Norry had better sit there and get warm.

"And you say you've walked a good way?" she asked, curiously.

"Yes, ma'am," Dick answered. "And we've further to go; we've got an errand in Marplains."

"Marplains!" she echoed. "Why, that's a matter of ten miles."

"Is it, ma'am? Well, we've got to get there—soon as we can."

"Why, he can't walk it," she said, contemptuously, pointing at Norry. "You'll never drag him along."

Dick looked curiously at Norry's drooping figure.

"I'm afraid I'll have to try," he said, in a sad tone.

The young woman made no answer to this, but began bustling about, getting some breakfast for the wanderers. She had some milk boiling in a few minutes, into which she broke up some pieces of stale bread, and never had anything tasted better to the two boys than this simple meal. Norry's face looked decidedly better after he had finished his bowl, and Trusty, who had shared the breakfast, wagged his tail in a most contented fashion.

While they were eating, a voice from upstairs called out, "Nancy!"

And the young woman answered back, "All right, father—one minute. That is my father; he's sick," she explained. "Now I suppose," she added, "I can trust you here while I run up to him?"

Dick assured her that she might do so, and she disappeared for a few moments.

During her absence Dick looked around the comfortable little kitchen, wishing it might be their good luck to spend the day there. He described it to Norry.

There was a nice rag-carpet on the floor, and one or two comfortable wicker-seated arm-chairs. The dresser showed a bright array of tins and china, and the tall clock in one corner seemed to tick with a very home-like sound. Altogether Dick thought Nancy and her father, whoever they were, ought to be very happy; and he wondered why it was that to himself and Norry only glimpses of such peace and quiet could be granted.

Presently Nancy's step was heard, and she came in, looking brighter.

"I've been talking to father about your little brother," she said to Dick, "and he says, if you like, you might leave him here for the day. Father doesn't mind children, and he had a blind brother himself."

Nancy stood looking down very pityingly on the tired little traveller.

"Oh, you are so good!" Dick exclaimed. "But—I would leave him if I thought that, no matter who came and wanted to take him away, you wouldn't let them—just until night. If I wasn't back to-night— But I will be. Oh, can you promise that?"

"Of course I will," Nancy said, in her brisk way. "I can't be made to give him up to any one before night. Now where are you going in Marplains?"

Dick said he wanted to find the house of a Dr. Field.

"I know where he lives," she said. "But I s'pose any one'll show you."

Dick felt that he ought to be off at once, but he waited to see Norry and Trusty very comfortably established on a long chintz sofa, and to re-assure Norry that he would come back without fail. Then he started off, following the railroad track as before.

"HE'S BLIND," HE SAID, SOFTLY."

He walked along a full mile before he reached a railroad station, and there he went in, asking the ticket-master when the trains went on to Marplains.

"Nothing before two o'clock," said the man, rather gruffly.

Dick hesitated. He did not feel quite so sure now as he had done that he could ask for a free ride to Marplains. After a moment he turned away, resolving to walk on. That, at least, he could do, and he was not very tired.

The station was known as Burchell, and was one of the lonely places at which one always wonders that any train ever stops; but, as Dick had seen, it was where Nancy and her father lived, and the remembrance of the warm cozy kitchen he had left took away something of the desolate feeling with which the rough, forlorn place inspired him. He turned his steps resolutely onward, walking at first very briskly; but then there crossed his mind a dreadful fear lest harm should come to Norry in his absence.

Dick stood still. What ought he to do—leave Norry to some possible danger, or go on and give Dr. Field his warning? It was a moment of agonized doubt. Suppose they should even refuse to believe him—should accuse him of being mixed up with Brooks and Gurdle? And, in the end, suppose the result were to be the loss of poor blind Norry? Dick looked around him, up and down the lonely road, wondering wherein lay his real duty; and then it came to him strongly that, commending his brother to God's keeping, he must go on. He must do what he could to save Dr. Field, or any of those dear to him, from danger. So thinking, the boy pressed forward.

TRY AGAIN.

BY THOMAS OAKES CONANT.

MARGY with the flaxen hair
Sat the picture of despair.
"Five times six and eight times seven,
Add results, and by eleven
Multiply—oh no, divide—
And I don't know what beside.
Oh, this horrid, horrid sum!
Right I can not make it come."
So said Margy, with a sigh,
Crying, "'Tis no use to try."

Gray-haired grandma, sitting near,
Heard the sigh and saw the tear.
"Margy darling, hither come;
Let me see thy 'horrid sum.'"
Scanning all the work, she saw
Here a slip and there a flaw.
"Ah, my Margy, plain to see
Why the figures don't agree.
Little maid, thy sore distress
Is the fruit of heedlessness."

"Oh, but, grandma, I have tried Just as hard!" poor Margy cried;
"But the naughty figures go Somehow always wrong, you know."
Then, to her supreme dismay,
Grandma sponged the work away,
And, for Margy's eyes to read,
Wrote, in letters large and plain,
"IF AT FIRST YOU DON'T SUCCEED, TRY, AND TRY, AND TRY AGAIN."

When the wise old saw she read,
"Thank you, grandma dear," she said.
Then with bright and cheerful air
Worked the sum with double care,
And the answer—happy sight!—
Came at last exactly right.
"Now," the little maiden cried,
Laughing, in her girlish pride,
"When my naughty sums go wrong,
'TRY AGAIN' shall be my song."

THE GREEN-COATED SOLDIER.

BY DAVID KER.

MANY a long year ago three or four regiments of Russian soldiers were encamped on a flat sandy plain upon the shore of the Gulf of Finland, not far from a new town which had just been built at the mouth of the river Neva, and called St. Petersburg. The sun was beginning to set, and the men, having finished their marching and exercising, were having a rest after the day's work, or beginning to get ready their supper.

Most of them were strong and sturdy fellows who looked as if they could stand a good deal of hard work, and hard fighting too, before giving in. But they certainly did not wear a very soldier-like appearance, for all that; they moved heavily and clumsily, and handled their muskets as if they had been more used to ploughs and spades than weapons of war.

Awkward though they seemed, however, these very men were to be able, only a few years later, to give King Charles of Sweden (who was then thought to be the best soldier alive) such a beating that neither he nor his army ever meddled with Russia again. But as they were now, they made a poor figure enough; and so, no doubt, thought a big red-haired man in Russian uniform, who, with his arms folded on his broad chest, and a scornful smile on his face, was watching half a dozen of them light a fire.

"Pretty fellows you are to call yourselves soldiers!" cried he, in broken Russian, "when you can hardly tell the butt of a gun from its muzzle, and don't even know how to kindle a fire yet. We manage things better in Silesia, where I was born and bred."

"Well, if your country is so much better than ours, why didn't you stay there?" asked one of the Russian recruits, sulkily.

"Because I was wanted here to make you Russian lubbers into soldiers," answered the Silesian, fiercely; "and a mighty hard job it is."

The recruit muttered something between his teeth, but did not venture to make any direct reply; for this Silesian, Michael Kratsch, was a noted bully, and the strongest man in the regiment, and any one who tried to argue with him generally ended by getting a broken lead for his pains.

While Kratsch was still fuming at finding no one to vent his anger upon, a little drummer-boy, coming past with a can of water much too heavy for his thin arms, stumbled against him by accident. Like lightning Big Michael faced round and dealt the poor little fellow a kick which sent him to the ground, screaming with pain, and caused him to spill every drop of the precious water that had cost so much trouble to bring.

An angry murmur ran through the group of Russians, and the Silesian turned savagely upon them.

"What are you growling at, you dogs? If you have anything to say to me, say it out. You ought to know by this time, I should think, that one honest Silesian is a match for half a dozen such as you."

"Are you quite sure of that?" asked a deep voice behind him.

Every one looked round with a start, for nobody had noticed a soldier staiding near the group, and listening to the Silesian's boastful talk with a smile of quiet amusement.

The new-comer picked up the little drummer-boy very tenderly, refilled his can from a bucket that stood near, and sent him away rejoicing. Then he came slowly up to the tall Silesian and looked him full in the face.

Kratsch eyed the stranger from head to foot, and did not altogether like the look of him. His dress was nothing very grand, to be sure, being simply the plain green coat of a Russian private, so soiled and threadbare that an old-clothes man would scarcely have taken it as a gift. But he was as tall as Big Michael himself, while his huge limbs and branny chest made such a show of strength that most people would have thought it much better to shake hands with him than to fight him.

"So!" said the green-coated man, quietly, "one Silesian is a match for half a dozen Russians, eh? Well, I can see that he's their match at bragging, anyhow!"

The Russians chuckled at this unexpected hit, and one of them laughed outright. Kratsch's face flushed purple with rage, and for a moment he seemed just about to fly at the speaker's throat. But there was something in the stranger's bearing, and in the calm, steadfast glance of his keen black eye, which cowed even the fierce soldier, who drew back with a sullen growl.

"Well," said Greencoat, quietly, "we Russians have a saying that corn doesn't grow by talking. If you are a match, as you say, for any half dozen of us, let us see what you can do."

"Could you throw that stone farther than I can?" asked the Silesian, pointing to a heavy stone at his feet.

"I can better answer that when I have seen you throw it," replied Greencoat, as coolly as ever.

Michael Kratsch threw off his coat, and baring an arm as thick as an ordinary man's knee, hurled the stone seven good yards away.

The Unknown threw, in his turn, so carelessly that he seemed hardly to exert himself at all, yet the stone fell more than a foot beyond Kratsch's mark.

The Russians raised a shout of triumph, and Michael's face grew black as midnight.

"Are you as nimble with your feet as with your hands?" growled he, through his set teeth.

"Try," answered Greencoat, simply.

Kratsch pointed to a broad ditch a little behind them, and taking a short run, shot through the air like an arrow. The ditch was fully fifteen feet wide from bank to bank, yet he alighted several inches beyond it.

"Pretty fair," said the Unknown, smiling; "but I think I can match it."

And so he did, for his leap overpassed Kratsch's by six inches at least. At the sight of the heavy Russian faces grinning from ear to ear over his discomfiture the Silesian's eyes flashed fire.

"You haven't done with me yet," he roared, "smart though you think yourself. Dare you wrestle a fall with me?"

Without a word the stranger threw off his coat and stepped forward.

It was a grand and terrible sight to see the two giants strain their mighty limbs and seize each other with their iron arms, both faces growing suddenly hard and stern as they grappled. Every man among the lookers-on held his breath as that great struggle began.

Thrice did the Silesian make a tremendous effort to throw his enemy with a strength that seemed able to tear up an oak by the roots. But the Russian, though shaken, stubbornly kept his feet, until Kratsch paused, breathless and utterly spent.

Then the watching eyes all round saw the stranger's arms tighten suddenly, and Big Michael's huge broad back bend slowly in. Furiously he struggled against the overmastering clutch, but he had no more chance than an ox in the coils of a boa. At last the Unknown lifted him fairly off his feet, and hurled him backward with such force that he fell with a dull crash against a large stone behind him, and lay stunned and motionless.

Just then was heard a cry of "There he is! there he is!" and several richly dressed men, running up to the spot, bowed reverently to the green-coated soldier.

"We have been looking for your Majesty," said one of them, "to give you these dispatches which a courier has just brought from Moscow."

At the word "Majesty" the Russian recruits all fell on their knees, considerably startled to find that this shabby-coated private was no other than the Czar himself, Peter the Great of Russia.

"Up with you, lads!" cried Peter; "kneel to no one but God. You are Russian soldiers, and I'm your General; that's all."

Then he turned to Kratsch, who lay groaning on the ground, with his left arm broken.

"I'll forgive thee this time, fellow," said the Czar; "but if ever I catch thee ill-treating a child again, look out! As for these soldiers of mine at whom you laugh, within five years they shall be the wonder of all Europe."

And so they were.

WORK FOR GIRLS.

A VERY SIMPLE WAY OF DECORATING CHINA.

NOWADAYS no one likes to see plain white china on breakfast or dinner table. Here is a method by which cups and saucers and plates may be daintily decorated by industrious fingers without the knowledge and practice necessary in china-painting. The process is very simple, and can be easily managed at home with the exception of the firing. We will call it "scratch-work."

Procure a few dishes such as are usually sold for enamel-painting, overglaze colors being used. We will begin by decorating a cup and saucer. Lest the mixing of the colors be too difficult an operation, it is better to purchase them in tubes. Rich tints are the most effective, such as deep pink, blue, orange, or a warm chocolate brown. A preparation of gold will also be needed.

Give the cup and saucer both a good coating of the paint, covering the entire outside, with the exception of the handle. Should the paint prove very slow in drying, it may be placed for a short time in a slightly warm oven. A second coating will often be found necessary. Until fired the surface will present a very rough appearance. When perfectly dry, sketch with a very soft lead-pencil lightly any pattern fancy may dictate.

The saucer will need only a wreath of vine leaves just within the rim. The cup may be made more elaborate by having in addition to the wreath a monogram containing the letters of the one who is to use it. If any difficulty be experienced in sketching the pattern evenly, it can easily be drawn on tissue or tracing paper, and fastened on the china over a piece of transfer-paper. The latter can be quickly made by well rubbing one side of some unglazed note-paper with a cake of ordinary black-lead.

Great care must be taken in handling the articles after the paint has been put on, for warm fingers will often leave an ugly mark; it is best to use a soft cloth of some kind as a protection. With a penknife or other sharp-pointed instrument scrape away the paint from within the lines of the design, thus transforming it into a wreath of white leaves on the rich background. Manage the monogram in the same way.

Now take a small brush, and with a very thin paint of the same color as the background add a slight shading to the leaves and flowers. Then put in the veins in gold. The monogram should have the same mingling of gold and color. Here, of course, everything depends upon the taste and skill of the worker. Any one possessing a slight knowledge of drawing may produce very pretty etchings, using for the purpose a coarse darning-needle. Etchings on medallions of color may even be considered prettier than when the whole article is colored.

When your design is complete the best plan is to consult some dealer in china. He will always be able to direct you as to the best method of dispatching your work to the nearest pottery, where it will be put through the process of firing, and returned to you ready for use.

LITTLE CURLY-HEAD.

THE ONYX-ANTELOPE.

A HARD HEADED, sharp-horned native of Southern Africa is the onyx-antelope. He is also known to students of natural history by the name of onyx-capensis, gemsbok, and South African onyx. Some writers at one time believed him to be none other than the fabled unicorn. He is much larger than the common antelope, measuring nearly four feet at the shoulders, with horns three feet long, very slightly bent, sharp, black, and shining, that serve him as admirable means of defense.

His hair is of a buff-color, with the breast and belly white; black stripes cover his head exactly in the shape of a horse's bridle, giving him the appearance of having a harness on, while his ears are white, tipped with black.

The horns are so tough and hard that the natives of Southern Africa sometimes tip their spears with them, and the Hollanders of the Cape have them polished and headed with silver for walking-sticks; but owing to their extreme length few of them can be used for that purpose. The gemsbok is strong, active, and vigorous, and defends itself boldly when pressed by the hunter by striking violently right and left with its horns.

It is said that even the lion dreads an encounter with it, and never ventures to attack it unless compelled by hunger, while the leopard usually meets with death if it is so daring as to measure strength with the onyx-antelope.

Captain Harris, one of the few hunters who has pursued this animal with any degree of success, relates the following story of his chase after an onyx-antelope.

His party had arrived on the hunting ground about daybreak, and had stopped to admire the long slender horns of a bleaching skull on the ground, when one of the Hottentots pointed to a group of hartebeests some distance away, among which was the long-looked-for game.

"There stood the gemsbok, clad half in mourning, looming up as large as a donkey, and scanning our party most attentively. His long, taper, toasting-fork horns, like a pair of walking-sticks, standing out in bold relief against the blue horizon. . . . I was mounted on my favorite horse, and the Hottentots being unanimously of the opinion with myself that 'Breslar could catch de bok,' my companion made a circuit to intercept him from the jungles, whilst I cantered slowly toward him, looking of course in the opposite direction, affecting most profound ignorance of his princely presence, but treating myself as I drew nearer to an occasional peep from under my cap."

When the Captain had succeeded in getting within from eighty to a hundred yards of the herd, the antelope uttered a shrill cry as of rage, and lowering his head, wheeled about, running with almost incredible swiftness, and not paying the slightest heed to his companions. He started for the thickest jungle, going at a speed which would have made it impossible to overtake him had not the Captain's friend made his appearance from out the jungle just in time to turn the animal in his course. The gemsbok was then obliged to cross between these two lines of enemies.

Disappointed in his plan of taking refuge in the jungle, he dashed aside into a kind of valley, leading his would-be captor over uneven, stony ground, from which the vegetation had lately been burned.

"Without gaining or losing a single inch upon each other, on we clattered, the straight antennae-looking horns of the fugitive laid back along his flanks, his belly almost touching the ground at every stride, and his ample tail sweeping behind him. Now the dust raised by a retreating herd of zebras and ostriches, whose feet rattled over the hard soil, caused a momentary diversion in his favor; and now, regaining my lost ground, we passed together under the sneering noses of three rhinoceroses, that had literally not time to make up their minds what was to be done, before, meteor-like, both pursuer and pursued were far beyond their reach."

Five miles at least of this mad chase had been ridden, and the anxious hunter could see that his game faltered, while the fast-darkening coat of the animal told of the perspiration forced out by the great effort it was making. But the Captain's horse was in nearly as exhausted a condition as the gemsbok, and his rider could hope to force him ahead but a short time longer.

"We continued to leave the ground behind us, clearing stones, ravines, and bushes, without swerving one inch from our arrow-like course. At length the tongue of the quarry was lolling out, and his tail drooping between his tired legs; but although his black list stripe was almost under my bows, he was far fresher than my blowing horse, and I perceived, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that another hundred yards would see me planted. Taking a strong pull upon the bridle, therefore, and cramming in the reeve. I gained a few strides upon the quarry, and, throwing myself from the saddle, let fly both barrels of my rifle."

AN ENCOUNTER BETWEEN AN ONYX-ANTELOPE AND A LEOPARD.

The first ball went so wide of its mark that the only damage done was to knock up the dust several feet behind the gembok; but the second hit him in the hind-leg, thoroughly crippling him.

Captain Harris immediately remounted his horse to continue the pursuit, but the gembok rendered such action unnecessary. Uttering his shrill note of rage, raising his bushy tail, and shaking his head furiously, he prepared for an attack. Lowering his head between his fore-legs until his horns were pointed directly toward the hunter's horse, he darted forward with even more swiftness than he had shown during the flight.

It was a moment when both calmness and steady nerves were necessary, or the hunter's life would have been sacrificed; but Captain Harris was fortunately well supplied with these qualities, and a ball from his repeating rifle pierced the heart of the onyx-antelope.

A NARROW ESCAPE.

BY CLEMENT STRONG.

A FEW years ago I chanced to spend my summer holidays at a small fishing village on the Bristol Channel. Those holidays I shall always remember as among the pleasantest I ever passed in my life.

I had been at the village about a fortnight, and had enjoyed myself to the top of my bent: every day and all day I was as happy as I could possibly wish to be. I made friends with an old fisherman, who used to take me out to the fishing, and allowed me to have that pleasure for nothing, in consideration of my making myself useful to him. In other words, I tugged at the oars when the wind was against us, and hauled on the sheets and halyards when we could work the clumsy old tub under sail. I bailed her out if we shipped water, baited and watched the lines, and often lent a hand to swab her out when the day's work was finished. This might seem hard work to some people, but I considered that I was more than paid by the lappy hours I spent dancing over the blue waters of the Channel, and breathing the fresh sea-air.

One day we had been out as usual, and were slowly beating back to the harbor, when I chanced to make some remark to old Bill, the boatman, about the vast white chalk cliff which rises abruptly on the eastern side of the little town, and is popularly known in the neighborhood as "King George's Cliff." Why it is so called I never quite made out, but probably one of the monarchs of that name either ascended or admired it at some time, or at all events was supposed to have done so.

Imagine a huge, white, and apparently perpendicular cliff, towering straight up from the sea to an enormous height, and dwarfing by comparison the other cliffs which stretch far on either side along the coast. At its base the sea pours foaming over the rocks at high water, and leaves but a narrow strip of shingle when the tide is out. The face of the cliff is of the whitest chalk imaginable, making the shadows thrown by the irregularities of its surface seem all the darker by the contrast.

As I gazed, not without a feeling of awe, at the scene presented by the rays of the setting sun striking the broad face of the cliff, and throwing a rosy hue over its frowning surface, I remarked to my friend Bill, "Did any one ever climb up it, I wonder?"

"Ay," answered Bill; "more than one has managed it, and a pretty tough job they found it. But for one who has got to the top, twenty have never got more than half-way, and have been glad to get down again without broken bones."

"Have there been any accidents, then?" I inquired, as the awful possibility of a fall from such a height occurred to me.

"Oh yes; there have been some ugly falls there before now, and more than one life lost. If you will just jump forward and handle that jib when she goes about, I'll spin you a bit of a yarn about that cliff."

I jumped into the bows as directed, loosed the jib-sheet, shifted it as soon as Bill had yawed her head round, and, having made all fast again, came aft to hear the story. Leaving out the many nautical and other odd terms used by the old man, it ran thus:

About fifteen years ago, when I was much more active than I am now, I happened to be out in my small pleasure-boat with two ladies, who wanted to have a row, as it was a fine day, and the sea as smooth as glass. We had been out about an hour, I should say, and were just pulling in toward the landing-stairs, when one of the ladies, who I judged to be the daughter of the other, suddenly said, "Why, there is somebody right up on the cliff. How ever did he get there?"

I turned round and took a look; and sure enough I could see a black figure more than half-way up to the top, and moving very slowly upward from time to time. Then he seemed to come to a full stop, and remained quite still. The younger lady got out an opera-glass she had brought with her, and directed it toward the figure. In another minute she turned as white as death, and gasped out:

"Oh! what will become of him! It is Fred, my brother!"

"Lend me your glass, miss," said I, "for it strikes me that he is in difficulties, whoever he is."

She handed me the glass at once, saying, "Can you see if he is a young man with a white straw hat?"

A glance convinced me that he had got a straw hat, with one of those India muslin veils tied round it, and also that he was in a position of great danger.

There was not a moment to be lost in giving an alarm, and endeavoring to procure aid, for the young man appeared to be somehow fixed on the face of the cliff, as though he could neither move upward nor downward, and I knew well that the soft and treacherous nature of the chalk rendered it highly dangerous to stay long in any one spot.

Cautioning the ladies to sit still, I seized the sculls, and pulled at racing pace for the shore, and soon ran the boat on to the shingle beach. As luck would have it, there happened to be two of the coast-guard on the beach, who, seeing me pulling so hard, and jumping ashore in such a hurry, ran down to know what the matter was. In few words I told them that a gentleman was up the cliff and in danger, and we at once decided that the only way in which aid could be given would be by lowering a rope from the top, and hauling him up. One of the coast-guard ran to one of the beach huts close by, in which the men store the spare tackle belonging to the big fishing-boats, and he soon returned with the news that there was a set of main-halyards belonging to the Foam, the biggest boat out of the harbor, lying in the hut. In a very short time we had got the rope out, and were carrying it up the steep foot-path that leads from the beach to the top of the cliff.

My word, but that was a hard bit to do! Before we were half-way up my heart was going like a sledge-hammer, and the veins in my forehead felt as if they would burst with every step I took. It is pretty much of a breather at any time, is that path from the beach; but when a man goes up at a run, and helps carry a heavy coil of rope into the bargain, it is about as stiff a job as ever I came across.

Well, when we were about three parts of the way up, one of the coast-guard sings out:

"Hold on a minute, mates. Let us get a breath before we go on."

With that we all pulled up, and stood gasping for breath, when a lady's voice close behind us cried:

"Go on! go on! There is not a moment to be lost!"

Sure enough it was the young lady who had been in my boat, and who had run up after us all the way. She was only a slim, slight little thing, and how ever she managed to keep up with us I can't think; but there she stood, wringing her hands, and begging us to go on, in a way that went to my heart.

So off we started again, and toiled upward; not quite so quick as before, maybe, but still upward and onward.

It was a dreadful climb, but at last we reached the top. Then we seemed to get new energy and life, and we ran toward the point which projects furthest to seaward, and under which we knew the lad was, or had been.

This extreme end reached, we all flung ourselves full length on the turf, and craned our necks over to try and see if he was still there.

At first I thought he was gone, and a sickening feeling came over me as I realized the truly fearful nature of a slip down such a precipice.

But in another moment I was reassured by a voice proceeding from immediately below me.

"Hello! Is any one up there?"

"Ay, ay, sir," I sang out. "It is all right if you can hold on for a few minutes."

"Well, look sharp, and lower a rope, will you?" cried the voice. "I can't budge hand or foot, and the chalk is beginning to give way."

As I directed my eyes to the spot whence the sound proceeded, I saw the flutter of something white, and which turned out to be the loose end of the veil he had twisted round his hat, twenty or thirty feet below us. The young lady saw it too, and cried out:

"Fifty pounds to the man who goes down and brings him up!"

Well, it might have been the money, or it might not, but I did not take long to offer to have a try. So we made a big bight in the end of the rope, and put a knot or two above that, and over I went; and if my heart had beat fast coming up that hill, I can swear it went pretty near standing still when I found myself hanging on to that rope, and darning on nothing, so to speak.

It was the most awful sensation I ever experienced.

For one moment a sick, giddy feeling came over me, and I felt an almost irresistible impulse to let go my hold and fall headlong to the rocks below. But that passed off pretty soon, and as the two men above let me gently down, I began to wonder how ever they would manage to haul up the double weight when I had got hold of the lad.

This had not occurred to us in the hurry of the moment, and I had gone over without thinking much about how I was to get back.

Just then the lad below called out,

"Look sharp, or I shall be gone!" and there seemed almost a wail of despair in the words.

In another moment I was beside him, and had sung out to the men above to cease lowering. His position was indeed a perilous one. He had succeeded in getting up so far as that by scooping out footsteps in the chalk with a big clasp-knife which was secured to his wrist by a cord. But when he got to where I found him he had managed to place himself in such a position that he could not leave go with either hand, and consequently could not cut another step. Having cut the last hole too far from the one preceding it, he was stretched out on the face of the cliff with his hands in the holes he had made, and his toes resting on a projecting stone. If that stone had given way he would have been left hanging on by his hands only, and you may imagine how long he could stay like that.

As I looked round for something to hold on to while he was being pulled up, my eye fell on a good-sized bit of stone that projected some two feet outward. This was big enough for me to claw on to for five minutes, but the question remained as to whether it would bear my weight. I swung myself toward it, and was soon satisfied that it would hold me safely. Having managed with some difficulty to get astride the stone with my back to the cliff, I lowered the rope until the lad below me could get his foot into the bight at the end. As soon as he felt his foot secure he let go the cliff and grasped the rope, and was soon swinging where I had been a moment before.

Then I shouted up to the men to haul on the rope, and the rescued lad was dragged slowly up past me, and I was alone.

I suppose I could not have spent five minutes on that stone, but it seemed a lifetime. Every faculty was sharpened, and every feeling intensified by the situation I was in. The ticking of my old silver watch sounded as loud as a church clock, and the cry of the sea-birds far below came up as shrilly as though they were close to my ear. Then a small stone, detached by the friction of the rope above, fell past me and bounded out of sight, and I seemed to see myself going headlong after it until I was smashed to atoms on the cruel rocks on the beach.

Just then, luckily for me, something touched me on the shoulder. Turning my head, I saw that it was the empty bight of the rope which was being let down for me. I soon had my foot in it, and in two minutes more I was scrambling over the top of the cliff, safe once more.

The first thing that struck me as I clambered over on to the grass was that the young lady was in a dead faint, her head supported by the lad we had just rescued. She had held up bravely while the danger lasted, but now that it was over she had naturally given way a bit.

But my attention was soon diverted from her by one of the men who had hauled us up, and who now advanced with the rope in his hand, saying:

"Look here, Bill. One strand gone, and another going. Another minute, mate, and you would have never handled an oar again."

At first I scarcely understood his meaning; then, as I looked at the portion of the rope he was pointing to, I began to realize the peril I had been in. The rope had cut on some sharp stone, and was more than half through. Thus when I was being finally hauled up I was really in far greater danger than at any time before. However, as it did hold on until I was landed, it did not much matter; but I never look at that cliff without thinking about the time I was so near coming down it with a run, and when there was only a half-broken rope between me and a fall on those sharp rocks. The family came down very handsomely when it was all over. In fact, I bought this boat with the fifty pounds I earned over the job. But I wouldn't do it again for fifty pounds—no, nor fifty thousand, for that matter.

A TALK ABOUT COLLECTING COINS.

BY WILLIAM C. PRIME.

IT is a good thing for a young person to give time and thought to making a collection of interesting objects. But if you collect merely for the sake of owning the objects, or because you like to have things which other people would be glad to have, or if you take pride and pleasure in your collection only because it contains specimens which are very rare and difficult to find, you are making a mistake, and losing the good of it.

Bear in mind always that each object in your collection is like the page of a book, that it can tell a story, can relate facts which are worth your knowing. Get from each specimen in your collection all the story it can tell you. Talk to it, and ask it questions, and get all the help you can from books to understand what it would say to you if it could speak and tell its story. In this way you will find that your cabinet or your little box of objects is a source of great interest, and every separate object will seem to you as precious as every other.

If you have not thought of coins as books, let me show you what I mean, and how you should treat your collection of coins, if you are making one.

We will suppose you have just begun to gather coins, and have not yet any very definite idea of what kind of a collection you will make, but you have a few coins of your own country to begin with. Take an American quarter-dollar in your hand, and see how much you can tell your friends about it. Among the very first questions you must answer are these: What is a coin? why were coins first made? when were they first made? why are they made of certain metals? why do they always or so often have on them devices, heads of men, eagles, images of Liberty, and other figures?

Now this American quarter-dollar should answer all these questions, so that when you look at it you will read at a glance the history of the art of coinage. In the very oldest ages of which we know anything men were in the habit of using seals with which to stamp devices in soft clay or wax. It has always been the custom among civilized people to use a seal in making important contracts. A man's seal represented the man. If the seal was affixed to a promise, it was evidence of the personal promise of the owner of the seal.

The seal was usually made of stone or metal, on which the engraver cut whatever the owner selected as his peculiar device, which was to be known always as his. Kings used seals to certify that decrees and grants were indeed their acts. You will readily imagine how it came about that certain devices were adopted by kings, and by cities and governments, to be engraved on their seals.

Now it is only about twenty-seven hundred years since coin was first known. Before that date men traded one thing for another. But when the things were not of equal value, the balance must be made up of something which all men would be willing to take. Gold and silver have in all ages been metals which men were thus willing to take, and if a man does not want to keep gold and silver he can always find plenty of men who want it, and will give him for it something which he wants. You may do well to remember that when you buy a pair of mittens for a quarter-dollar the merchant buys the quarter-dollar from you. He sells you mittens because he wants to buy just so much silver for them.

Men are always ready to buy gold and silver, and the price of gold and silver, like the price of grain and cotton, varies according to whether they are scarce or plenty. They are much more plenty in our days than they were in ancient times. In those days an ounce of gold would be easily exchanged for a vastly larger quantity of grain or wool, food or clothing, than now.

Men then weighed out the gold or silver when they traded. It was sometimes beaten or melted, and cast into rings, as a convenient form of carrying, but in a trade between men they always used the scales and weighed the metal.

About eight hundred years before Christ, when commerce had become established on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea, some people began to realize that it would be very convenient to have gold and silver in lumps of certain weight, which men could use in trade without the bother of weighing them. We do not know certainly when or where this idea was first put into actual use, but the oldest coins we have found are either those of Miletus, a city of Asia Minor, or those of Sardis, another city in Asia Minor.

It is probable that the wide-awake merchants of Miletus invented coinage. What they wanted was precious metal in pieces of uniform weight, with a certificate on each piece that could be accepted. Naturally the government certificate would be most generally accepted, and the certificate could be put on like the stamp of a seal on wax or clay. So a seal-engraver was employed to engrave a seal in iron or bronze or some hard substance (Fig. 1), and it was probably in iron that he did it.

The device engraved was a lion's head. It was cut in the iron so that a lump of metal could be dropped in it, and then with a punch hammered in until it took the impression of the lion's head. This was a very rude process. The metal then used was a mixture of gold and silver, which we call electrum. The coin was not round nor regular in shape. It looked like a rude lump of metal, with the lion's head on one side, and the rough dent made by the punch on the other side.

But it served its purpose, and soon all around the Eastern Mediterranean people knew these pieces of electrum, and accepted them as so much precious metal, because they bore the seal stamp of Miletus. This city and many others were then what we call autonomous; that is, they were self-governing, independent cities. Others soon copied the new custom or invention, and made coins with their seal stamps. Ægina stamped the coins with her emblem, the tortoise. Here is a drachma (Fig. 2), a silver coin of Ægina, probably the first silver coin ever made. Agrigentum stamped coins with the crab; Metapontum with a sheaf of wheat; Athens with an owl; Bœotia with a shield; and just so, and for the same reason, the United States stamped your quarter-dollar with an eagle. The stamp is the certificate of the government that this is silver of the weight and fineness which the law says shall constitute a quarter-dollar.

FIG. 4.

FIG. 2.

The value of the coin always and everywhere consists in the quantity and quality of the metal. A dollar is only a name; the government says by statute that it shall consist of so many grains and pennyweights of gold or of silver of a specified degree of fineness. The government may and sometimes does change the statute, and increases or lessens the weight or the standard fineness of metal making its coins. But the weight and quality of the metal always make the value, and in large transactions in gold it is still and always will be customary to weigh the coin.

In Eastern countries the natives commonly weigh even single gold coins before taking them in trade. Your quarter dollar has perhaps a milled edge. That is to prevent dishonest persons from cutting or filing silver off from it and reducing its weight.

The art, which was at first rude, improved rapidly, and very beautiful coins were made, especially in Greek cities. In old days, however, men did not carry coins around in their pockets as much as we do, and they were not so apt to be rubbed and worn. This, of course, decreases the weight and value. In our time coins are made with designs in low relief, and engraved so that heavy parts of a design stand up and protect the lighter lines from rubbing. But in old coins we find the designs standing out in high relief.

Here is a silver coin of Mithridates, King of Pontus (Fig. 3), about B.C. 89, which will show you the style of many fine ancient coins; and another of Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt (Fig. 4), which will give you as good an idea of that celebrated lady's face as you can possibly have.

No ancient coins were struck with a metal collar around them to make them perfectly round. That is a modern invention, as well as the milled edge. We often find ancient counterfeit coins. There have been bad men in all times.

These are a few of the facts in the history of coin-making which every coin of every nation and place should suggest to your mind when you look at it. And you can now easily see how much more a coin may tell you. Every distinct coin has a different story to tell you. A cent of 1881 tells something quite different from a cent of 1871 or 1861. I advise you therefore to form a very intimate acquaintance with each separate coin in your collection, and consult it till you know all it can tell you.

It seems to me that you ought to feel ashamed to show any one a coin in your collection about which you have not at least fairly tried to learn all that can be told. If some one has given you a denarius of the Emperor Tiberius, you ought at least to learn who and what he was, when and where he was Emperor, and connect the coin in your mind with some of the important events in the history of the world which occurred in his time. There would perhaps be on one side of the coin a head of the Emperor, and on the other a figure of some deity of the Romans. You should try to learn what the deity was, and be able to describe the coin and explain it to your friends.

There is ample scope for the young numismatist in collecting coins of his own country and attaching to them events and persons in history. Here is a copper coin (Fig. 5) which perhaps you have in your collection. It was the first issue of the Mint of the United States, by resolution of Congress, July 6, 1787. I do not know of any evidence that Franklin had anything to do with its design, but from the motto, which sounds like some of his sayings, it has gotten with some persons the name Franklin copper. It is a first-rate coin for you to study, because it tells of the prosperity of your country, of the condition of the people, and their arts, and their character. Nor will the words that are on it, and the pictures or designs, fail to repay your study. In fact, I don't know any coin which offers a better beginning for the young American numismatist.

I wish my little correspondents to try their skill in writing a letter of two hundred words, or about twenty lines, which shall contain the following words: sunae, cheerful, chestnut, ivy, willow, reckless, drooping, you will succeed best in weaving the words prettily into an Indian summer letter to the Post-office Box. Please write with black ink on one side only of the paper. Do you know that I was quite dismayed the other day when one of my girl friends showed me a letter she had written with white ink on chocolate-colored paper? It was very dazzling, but very hard to read, and as the great object, after all, in writing, is to write so that your letter may be easily and quickly understood by the person to whom you send it, I advised her to copy it in another style. She laughed merrily, and said she would never—no, never—write to the Post-office Box on fanciful paper with fanciful ink, or even with a pencil, but always just as I beg you to do, my girls and boys, plainly and carefully, with Ink as black as the wing of a crow.

On paper like cream or white as snow.

The following letter tells its own beautiful story of a sweet thought gracefully carried into action:

BANGOR, MAINE.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I send you this afternoon the donation of my Sunday-school class in St. John's church for my People's Day. The card and banner are given by Harry French; the bowl and plate by the following: Frank Gould, Joe Smith, Howell Leavitt, Maria Leavitt, Edith Smith, Bertha Mason, and my little cousins. They all wish to express their sympathy for the little helpless occupant of the Cot, and now that a beginning is once made, think they will like to subscribe to cheer the little one. I think HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE often in class, so you will please acknowledge the receipt of this in print, each donor will feel delighted, and fully repaid for any self-denial that he or she may have practiced. With kindest regards, F. E. F.

BANGOR, MAINE.

I am a little girl twelve years old. I take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and like to read it very much. I thought I would write you a letter to-day, as school will begin next week, and then I shall not have so much time. We have had a long vacation, and I have had a jolly time with my sister and cousins. Now my sister Alice has gone with one of my aunts to Southern California to be with my papa, who is staying there because he can't travel. They got to San Diego a week ago to-night, and that is the place where papa is. My sister kept a journal as she rode along in the cars. I hope she will send it to me to read. My little dog, who is a jolly little yip-yip baby. I wish I could remember her. I have got lots of dollsies. The prettiest is Pansy; she is a large dolly, with beautiful hair and pretty blue eyes. My little name is Edith Campbell. We have a little birdie visiting us now, and his name is Ned; he sings very sweetly. This is a beautiful day here at Bangor, and now I must close and go out to play with my friends. EDITH.

GRACE.

FARMINGTON, MINNESOTA.

I am a little girl eight years old. My grandpa had a Manx kitten once. Manx cats come from the Isle of Man, without any tails, and never have any. We come in to the country in the summer. There are a great many birds here. Among them is the butcher-bird, which lives on the ground. It killed three of grandpa's birds. They were in a cage hanging outside the house, and it pulled their heads right off with its bill. It has a long bill, and a long tail. Its color is French gray, with black stripes on its head, and black wings. A few moments ago we found a nest of four little downy birds, all the same color. I like my YOUNG PEOPLE very much. I have a baby sister, and a brother six years old, and a pet kitten named Dot. JENNY G. W.

St. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

Although YOUNG PEOPLE is taken in the name of my younger sister, I enjoy the stories and lovely pictures quite as much as she does. I think the Post-office Box is especially interesting, and we have tried several of the receipts. I am very fond of cooking, and to-day I made a bread-and-butter pudding, substituting sliced peaches for the raisins, and as "the proof of the pudding is in the eating," it must have been good, for every one was helped twice.

I read lately in a paper a way to preserve flowers by dipping them into a weak solution of gum-arabic, which forms a coating over them, and so excludes the air. Perhaps some of your readers may like to try it. I am afraid my letter is too long, but I would like to send a receipt for dried roses, which we like very much:

DROP BISCUIT.—one quart of flour, two teaspoonsful of baking-powder, and a pinch of salt; milk enough to make a batter as thick as can be stirred with a spoon; drop from the spoon on a pan, and bake quickly. MISLIE C. W.

LULU AND THE RABBIT.

A dear little rabbit once lived in the clover. So happy and careless he roamed the field over. Till the farm boys came there, and poor Bunny they spoiled.

"See there, boys! a rabbit! let's catch him!" they cried.

Oh! the horror and fear in that poor little breast. As panting he speeds toward his sheltering nest. But so closely they follow, they follow so fast. Too weary to struggle, he's captured at last.

Now little maid Lulu was passing that way, And, pleading, she said, "Let me have him, I pray."

In her apron they laid him, and said, "Take him home." And would make you a cage when our day's work is done."

But the shy, frightened eyes and the fast-beating heart Moved Lulu to pity and to take Bunny's part: "No, no, I won't keep you a prisoner," she said; "Go back to your home, and be happy instead."

So, kissing him softly and stroking him over, She set him down free in the tangle of clover. The daisy's white nodded her pretty crowned head, The daisy's white blossom suited up from its bed,

While the posies and grasses, all tangled and sweet, Were clasping and kissing the little bare feet. And the breezes that lifted each bonny brown curl Whispered sweetly and softly, "Well done, little girl!"

TOLSON, MICHIGAN.

This true story, so daintily told in rhyme, is about a little letter of the Post-office Box. We are glad that Lulu was so kind to the poor frightened rabbit. So you would have seen, Jessie, Mary, Daisy, and Susie, would you not?

A BEAUTIFUL INCIDENT.

A very pretty little incident came to my notice to-day, which occurred in a country place of our State. There lives the notable fox of two flocks of pets, and, as a consequence, they became much attached to him. Some time since his father sold his farm and stock, preparatory to changing his place of residence. A flock of sheep was bought by a neighbor, and driven to its new owner's field. By some mischance a fence was broken down, and some sheep belonging to another neighbor, whom we will call Mr. Smith, became mixed with those that had belonged to Ralph's father. Mr. Smith, not a very scrupulous man, in separating the flocks claimed a number that did not belong to him. There seemed no way of proving his wrong-doing, and a lawsuit followed. When little Ralph was subpoenaed to give evidence he went into court in the morning, and the names he had given them when his father's property, every sheep came to him, while Mr. Smith's, frightened by his voice, ran as far away as they could, and a pretty symbol of the good shepherd, whose sheep know him. E. W.

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND.

The Post-office Box affords me a great deal of pleasure, and I think it is very interesting and instructing to read how boys and girls live and enjoy themselves in the different parts of the country. Some time ago I went to Hesse-cassel in Germany, and staid there four years. Cassel is my mother's birth-place, and all her relations live there. It is a beautiful little city, with the Wilhelmshausen in the west, and the little river Fulda flowing through it. In the Wilhelmshausen Mountains is a beautiful chateau, in which the Elector of Hesse had resided, one of the noblest and most interesting of the soldiers to England. And in that same chateau Napoleon III. was kept a prisoner during the late Franco-Prussian war. While we were in Cassel, we had a grand dinner given to the Emperor and all the princes as they were driving from the railroad station to the chateau after the first day's exercises. Crowds lined both sides of the street, and the cheering as the Emperor drove past was tremendous. A great many American and English boys and girls are at school in Hesse. I would like to tell you more about the Wilhelmshausen Mountains, and about the long walks we took in them and in the country about Cassel, but will defer it until a future time. A. C.

"LA GRANGE," PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have been intending to write to you for a long time, but have always deferred it, thinking you have enough correspondents already. I love to write letters and to get them, and surely you must too, or you wouldn't be Postmistress. Isn't it lots of fun to get so many letters from strange boys and girls who never heard of them before? I have only one pet, a darling big cat. We are all fond of cats, and always have one or two in the family. Mine was named Jack, but I got him when I was ten years old the 21st of last May. Isn't that old for a cat? My aunt has a lovely yellow one, Daffy, that shakes hands, and sits up, and then jumps right over her shoulder. When he was a kitten he had lovely blue eyes, but they are brown now.

I have been staying at my grandmother's for the last month with my sisters. There is a lovely dog named Tarry, who is a special favorite. Indeed, he is so fond of us he won't go to his real home. I had a kitten too, named Maher-shah-shah-bah, but I guess the name was too much for him, for he ran away.

I want to tell you, dear Postmistress, about a song my sisters and I composed a little while ago. We had been sitting at the piano singing, and A., my eldest sister, played the tune of "Marching through Georgia." None of us knew the words, so we thought we would make some up to suit ourselves. So we did it, singing it as we went along, and though nothing like some one could write a song of it. Just try it, humming it to "Marching through Georgia." Of course it is rather silly, after the style of "Over the Garden Wall," but I hope you don't despise some of silly things we do. We are so much pleased with HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, having taken from the beginning, and intending to keep on taking it as long as possible. We are so glad to see that you are so well. I obtained a lovely book, Red Folks, by publishing an exchange in its columns. So we all wish it long life and prosperity. With love I will close. BESSIE H. S.

This is the song:

APPLE DUMPLINGS.

I stepped inside the garden gate one glorious morn in May;

Nature had outdone herself in making such a day.

Lilacs, roses, hyacinths, gave forth their fragrance gay;

Besides, I smelled apple-dumplings.

(Chorus.)

Dumplings, dumplings—sugar, dough, and spice—
Dumplings, dumplings, everything is nice.

Lilacs, roses, hyacinths, gave forth their fragrance gay;

Besides, I smelled apple-dumplings.

Coming up the garden path, I neared the kitchen door,
Caught a glimpse of golden curls I oft had seen

Cook had gone to take a walk, and Mabel had the floor.

And she was making apple-dumplings.

(Chorus—Dumplings, etc., repeating last two lines of second stanza instead of first.)

Round her daintily waist an apron large and brown
Apples tart and rosy-cheeked in basket by her side.

I longed to kiss the rolling-pin that by her hand
For she was making apple-dumplings.

(Chorus—Dumplings, etc., last line of third stanza.)

The verses for which I have made room are very creditable to Miss Bessie, particularly as apple-dumplings are not so poetical as apple blossoms. The last two stanzas were not exactly adapted to the Post-office Box, although a little nonsense now and then makes life very pleasant.

JACKSONVILLE, MISSISSIPPI.

It is going to be two years that we have taken YOUNG PEOPLE, and we like it very much. I have one brother and two sisters, and we all like "Raising the Pearl," "Nan," and "Toby Tyler." I guess I will not try to name the stories, for they are all good, and I could not say much, but I never saw one from here. I read Sammy A.'s letter, and thought I lived far enough North to answer him. We have had some heavy storms here. I have only a few birds, but they are so dark we could not see the time without going up close to the clock, and in the winter it snows until you can only see a few rods before you.

I live on the shore of the beautiful Lake Elysian. It is seven miles in length, and one and a half in width in the widest place. There is an island of seven acres in it, and people come and stay and fish there are some quite large ones—nothing like yours, Saunmy—but buffalo, black, and rock bass, pickerel, and some salmon put in by the government, and several other kinds not eatable. We have a nice thing called a muskrat, and skating in winter. My brother shot eight wild-ducks last Saturday at three shots; he is fourteen, and I am nine. I was chopping some large brush for my papa and mamma, and cut my foot with an axe—the left one, on the inside. The cut is two and a half inches long, but it is doing well. I can not step on it yet. I started to write cable-grams for my papa and mamma, but I could not. Then my sister said she would write it for me. My grandpa and grandma live with us; they are very old. Grandpa is eighty-five, and has been blind for nearly six years, and cut my foot with a bit. Grandma is eighty, but quite smart. Please answer this, Saunmy. WILLIE W. NAVAGE.

MORNING'S MINES, PENNSYLVANIA.

SAMMY A.—I saw your letter, and thought I would answer it by telling you something about the coal mines in this region. A mine is started in the side of a hill, and goes in horizontally, instead of perpendicularly, and by means of the rails. The men heading goes in generally about 100 feet before turning a heading; those turning to the right are called rights, and those to the left lefts. There are usually about twenty headings, which turn off the same as the headings. In each of these rooms there are generally two men, or a man and his family, or boys in a room, and driven by an engine or by mules from the shafts to the mines, and then another team of mules takes them to the side track inside, and from there they are hauled by sledges to the surface. At each heading there is a trap-door kept by a boy called a trapper, whose business it is to open and shut the door for the drivers, and to keep the drivers from running into each other heading to the top.

In these mines we have a good deal of pretty peacock coal and slate with impressions of ferns on them. If you will send me your full address, I will send you some.

There is also a great deal of fanning done here with lumber for 100 houses, which are to be built in the new town of Peale (named after Senator Peale). A new railroad crosses this county, and the tunnel, which is not finished yet, goes through the Allegheny Mountains, and is about three-quarters of a mile long, in near Peale, which is fifteen miles from here. WILLIAM B. CRITCHAN.

One thing impressed me when I read this letter, and that was how important the duty of the trapper boys. These little fellows to their work out of sight. Very likely their faces and hands are grimy, and they often get very tired, but upon their faithfulness depend the lives of many others. Both these Willies have written the right kind of letters in reply to our friend Saunmy.

HELSINKI, FINLAND.

I have five sisters and one brother older than myself. My brother is in Dakota; he has taken up a claim. We have three horses; one of them is a trotter, and has won several races. We have a dog, the name of Tom and Dick; they are hounds. I have one cat; his name is Tom too. My papa is postmaster. I am twelve years old, and I like to stay out of doors most all of the time. I will send a receipt for.

MOLASSES CANDY.—A cup of molasses, half a cup of sugar, butter the size of an egg, and a teaspoonful of vinegar; the candy will have to be stirred all the time, or it will burn; when cool enough to handle, pull it; then cut into disks, and leave to harden. EDITH VAN V.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

I am a little boy who takes YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it the best of anything. I have always been sick ever since I can remember, and have had to take medicine. I have no pets except a kitty; I call it Trot. I have a great many carpenter's tools. I made a bean-shooter. I have been at school a very little. I study at home when I am able. I liked "Raising the Pearl." I hope you will print this. CLYDE B.

How glad I shall be one of these boys to hear that Clyde is well and strong!

LAS VEGAS HOT SPRINGS, NEW MEXICO.

I live in Lawrence, Kansas, but am here during the summer. We camp a mile and a half from the Hot Springs. I have been down there seven times. We camp on a high bank, with the stream below us. There are many trees and flowers. One day I climbed to the top of a mountain twelve hundred feet high. When we first came there there were no flowers, because there had been no rain, but now there are plenty. We had a party of rocks, ferns, and moss here that are very pretty. I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE for three years, and like it very much. I have been to Colorado and New Mexico many times before this. We were here last summer. My father is Professor of the Natural History Department in the University of Kansas. He comes here to collect insects, and brings us with him. I have fifty-nine of the receipts in YOUNG PEOPLE copied down. I am going to try some of them when I get home. I can't try them out here, because our little sheet-iron stove won't bake well. I am eleven years old. We have venison every day; we have so much sometimes that we have to give lots of it away. Sometimes we have had carp horned toads in a box, but now we have only three. We have great camp fires every evening. I have ridden down to the Hot Springs twice in a barrow. I can walk much faster than a burro can carry me, but I like to ride them very much. I have a lovely little baby brother, and is eight months old, and can sit up alone and creep on all fours and make noise. He has curly, brown, wavy hair. He has very curly hair. I have two sisters and a brother besides the baby. MARY M. S.

MALDEN, WISCONSIN.

I am a boy eleven years old. We have very cold winters and pleasant summers. I have lots of fun in the winter, skating, coasting, and snow-balling. I go bathing in summer. Last week I destroyed three wasps' nests, and didn't get stung once. I read Sammy's letter, and thought I would answer it. I hope my letter will be printed. BERT B.

It is HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE has now come to be one of the most attractive and excellently edited juvenile periodicals of the day.—Independent, N. Y.

HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is the best weekly for children in America.—southwestern Christian Advocate.

The grand success of this beautiful and instructive illustrated weekly for young readers is the best proof that it fills a needed place. No magazine of its kind has ever come into such boundless popularity in so short a time.—Chicago Lake Ocean.

The illustrations form a whole art gallery in themselves, and a gallery that contains some gems worthy of preservation by the people of the most cultivated taste in pictures.—Brooklyn Times.

In its weekly instalments it has been the delight of innumerable boys and girls in this New World of ours, for YOUNG PEOPLE is read from Hudson Bay to the Isthmus of Panama. In a literary sense, the material found in it is excellent, and the information given on innumerable subjects is always conveyed in a sensible and intelligible manner.—N. Times.

We know of no book better calculated to interest and instruct the young than the fifty-two numbers of this popular illustrated weekly. It contains a vast amount of good reading of the most varied character. * * * All that the artist's skill can accomplish in the way of illustration has been done, and the best talent of the country has contributed to its text.—New England Journal of Education, Boston.

In its special field there is nothing that can be compared with it.—Hartford Evening Post.

There is entertainment enough in its eight hundred and odd pages of stories, sketches, poems, puzzles and pictures to fill up the evenings of a whole winter. It is good, wholesome entertainment, too, and will both amuse and interest the juveniles.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Its wealth of stories, sketches, poetry, pictures, puzzles, and correspondence form a collection of intellectual treasures the possession of which will make any boy or girl in the land "as happy as a king," and which, by reason of its moderate price, is within the reach of all who wish to have it at their command.—Baltimore Gazette.

If we had a dozen children and could only buy one Christmas gift to be divided among them, our choice would certainly fall on this book that has so many beautiful pictures and quaint stories pressed between its handsome covers, for it will give delight to the boy or girl in the land "as happy as a king," and which, by reason of its moderate price, is within the reach of all who wish to have it at their command.—New Orleans Picayune.

THE FAIRIES' PALETTE.

BY MEL R. COLQUITT.

SEE the fairies' palette,
With as many brilliant dyes
As ever were seen in the rainbow
Flushing fair summer skies!

When fairy artists need a tint
Of any gorgeous hue,
They dip their tiny brushes
In flowers wet with dew.

In the stainless daisy,
With its royal crown of light,
They find a golden yellow
And a lovely creamy white.

In the sweet wood-violet,
With its purple and its blue,
They find rich kingly colors
Of many a splendid hue.

They borrow from the restless bee,
That busy thieving rover,
Pale pink and crimson, lilac too,
Stolen from the meadow clover.

They mix their paints of blooms and dew
As they chat and paint together;
The daintiest brush they have is made
Of the saucy jay-bird's feather.

And when at last comes "hanging-day,"
Wee critics stand around,
And give their sage opinions
In learned words profound.

The tiny pictures all are hung
In the gallery of dreams,
Where happy children view them
By the light of soft moonbeams.

WHO CAN FIND THEM?

A LETTER CONTAINING TWENTY-FOUR HIDDEN BIRDS.

DEAR MOTHER.—On returning from walking, Fisher and I came into the yard with rush and hurry, and only lacked a small number of inches of knocking Rob into a deep gully which is being prepared for a drain. He fell, but escaped unhurt, with a few rents in his clothes. Mr. Crowell called us to his desk, and said we must crave not only Rob's pardon, but his, for such awkward carelessness. Then he called the boys for the social hour. He said, "What is wanted to-night?"

And the boys said, "A story."

He told of a trip he once took for a fur company. It was in a very cold climate, and they felt Jack Frost's nip every time they went out. Once, in a severe storm of snow, late at night, in gales of wind sufficient to blind them, they were nearly lost. Richard Parr, otter-hunter, and guide to the party, had with him his wife, who was an Indian. Mrs. Parr owned afterward it was the hardest time to find her way she ever saw. They finally found the paths, wallowing in snow near to their waists. In camp they found a supper ready, first a soup made from a vegetable called oca, new milk brought from a distant farm in a large can. A rye pudding smoking hot completed the meal. He added a short sketch of his tour amongst the Scotch islands, first the Hebrides, next Shetland, and last Orkney Isles.

Thank you for sending the horse-ship. Poor Willie Gay has not been well, and he rides my pony often. Don't worry about my clothes; these will do very well. When you sent my fork you forgot my spoon. Bill White has a jolly one.

Your loving son,

FRED.

AN ADOPTED FAMILY.

THIS is a portrait group of a family that lived and flourished under the shelter of an old barn in far-off bonnie Scotland.

During one of the warm summer months the mother hen laid a dozen or more of round white eggs in a cozy nest in one corner of the barn. Then she went to work and sat upon them day and night, after the manner of hens, expecting that in the course of three or four weeks she would have a brood of downy chickens to run about with and scratch up food for.

But the weeks went by, and day followed day without any chickens appearing. There was not even a peep within the shell, and no tiny active little bill undertook to peck its way out into the great world. The poor mother hen was heart-broken, and grew thinner and thinner, until the good farmer began to think she would die of her disappointment.

One day she was roaming about the barn, very lonely and miserable, when she discovered an old peck measure, and inside it eight little kittens not more than a few days old. In a moment she concluded to adopt them in place of the chickens she had longed for, and spreading out her wings she crouched down over the kittens, warming them deliciously with her soft feathers. Never was there a happier hen. "Cluck-cluck-cluck—cluck-cluck—cluck-cluck-cluck!" she sang, and nestled closer and closer to her strange little brood.

But her happiness lasted only a short time. Puss, the real mother of the kittens, who had been off on a hunting expedition, came back with a mouse in her mouth, and saw the new state of affairs. Oh, but she was angry! With a growl and a hiss she flew at the poor hen, and drove her clear away to the other end of the barn. Then she took each little kitten by the back of the neck and carried it carefully up into the loft. Presently she found a warm corner for her children. She arranged a bed of soft straw, and soon they were almost as comfortable as they had been in their peck measure.

But the poor hen! She was more sorrowful now than ever, and soon she found her way up into the loft, and looked jealously at Puss and her family. What happened between them we never shall know, but it seems as if there must have been a long conversation. The hen told her troubles to Puss, and Puss must have felt sorry for her, and, like all good little mothers, she must have wanted to do what she could to help her friend's trouble. At all events, they came to an arrangement. The little kittens were to have two mothers.

The hen could not feed the kittens. That Puss must do. But as soon as their own mother gave them a warm meal of milk, then the hen would take them in charge, and cuddle them up under her wings for a nap, while Puss went off to hunt up a living for herself. In this way the two took turns in caring for the little ones, and never were there any kittens who had more attention, or a better time. Indeed, it would sometimes seem as if they preferred their hen to their own mother, so attentive were they to her. Even when they grew up to be quite large cats they would go about with her when she was scratching up a dinner, and so contented was she with her foster-children that she never again undertook to set upon a nestful of stupid eggs that wouldn't hatch into chickens.

MISS TREADWELL'S GUEST.

BY MARY DENSEL.

MISS HANNAH TREADWELL'S house was a lonely-looking dwelling. The front blinds were always closed. The front door had never been opened since old Dr. Treadwell's funeral, three years ago.

Very few people called on Miss Hannah. No one ever "ran in" to spend an afternoon. No one was ever invited to bring her knitting and stay to tea.

So no wonder that all the village was excited when one morning in August there was evidently a stir in the Treadwell mansion. Not only were the parlor blinds thrown open, but Mehitable, the rheumatic servant, was seen wrestling with the parlor windows, which refused to move an inch until they were pried open with a screw-driver. Then Miss Hannah herself appeared, walking down to the gate, and shading her eyes as she gazed up the street in the direction from which the Otisville stage would come, bringing its passengers from the railway, five miles distant.

And, sure enough, here was the stage, and perched on the top a girl about fifteen years old.

Rumble! rumble! rumble! The coach drew up at Miss Treadwell's gate. The girl climbed nimbly down.

"Here I am, Cousin Hannah. Mamma says I may stay three whole months. She and papa have started for the West. You were so good to offer to take me in!"

Miss Treadwell bent down to kiss her visitor. "I am sure it was kind in you to come to an old woman like me, my dear," she said.

"Kind! Why, I was crazy to get here. I shall have a perfectly beautiful time. Who lives in the next house, Cousin Hannah? A girl, I hope; for mamma said I might go to school, and the girl in the next house will introduce me to everybody, I'm sure."

Chattering, laughing, the new-comer went up the walk, followed by the stage-driver, who was carrying her trunk.

"Come from New York, she did," explained the same stage-driver, as he flung down the mail-bag at the post-office door.

"She came from New York," repeated Rose Moore; "and they say she's going to school at the Classical Institute."

"With the rest of us?" asked Lily Meadows, to whom Rose spoke.

"With the rest of us!" answered Rose, and there was a sharp ring to her voice.

Lily noticed it at once. Lily always noticed Rose's tones, and brought her own into harmony. So, "It won't be very pleasant having a stranger at school," said she.

"Of course it won't. We've all been so intimate. And think of the airs this New-Yorker will give herself! Why, the driver said her trunk almost broke his back. 'Twas as big as a small cottage."

"What heaps of clothes she must have!" exclaimed Lily, quite awe-stricken.

"I've no idea her clothes are any better than ours," cried Rose, giving a twitch to her orange-plumed hat.

The truth is, that hat was at the bottom of it all. It was new, and Rose had been counting on the sensation it would cause at the "Classical Institute." Moreover, Rose had always been chief among the Otisville girls. And now here was this small person from the great metropolis, with unknown glories in the way of clothes, and probably a multitude of charms to match. Was Rose to be put one side by foreign dresses and manners? Perish the thought!

So it came to pass that when Alice Dill, all ready to clasp hands with new friends, presented herself at the "Classical Institute," Rose scanned her with a critical eye.

"I'll put on my very best dress, Cousin Hannah," Alice had said that morning. "I do so want the girls to like me, and perhaps if I look pretty they'll be more apt to."

"I do so want the girls to like me!"

So it was that she made her own unhappiness.

Was it not a pity that the little gray gown was so very stylish? Far better had the fashionable New York milliner given her the plainest hat rather than that jaunty gray turban, with its lovely crimson-tipped wing.

"I do so want the girls to like me!"

There the little stranger stood, casting wistful glances, almost on tip-toe in her eagerness to make friends. And Rose saw her. Oh yes, Rose took in the whole situation, together with the graceful gown and the coquettish hat.

"She's from New York. It's not likely she'll have much in common with us," she whispered here and there.

Lily took her cue.

"From New York," she echoed. "Of course she'll look down on us country girls."

Such a tiny flame of envy and spite, but how it spread through the "Classical Institute!"

It reached Miss Treadwell's next-door neighbor, the girl on whom Alice Dill had especially set her hopes, Katinka Starns.

Katinka had on a new dress, green with yellow polka dots, and how very queer it did look when compared with that gray gown from New York. So Katinka joined Rose and Lily.

Alice walked home alone at noon, and it was a very downcast face that looked over to Miss Treadwell's at the dinner table.

"Nobody spoke to me," said a voice half choked with tears.

"Maybe they were bashful, and waited for you to speak first," suggested Cousin Hannah.

Alice brightened. "Why, perhaps they did."

So off she started afresh, full of cheer.

Rose was at the school room door.

"How do you do," said Alice.

"How do you do," answered Rose, and then she turned away.

The group of girls standing by began to giggle. The blood surged up into Alice's face. She crept away to her seat.

At recess she followed the rest into the yard, and stood in a corner, heavy at heart. Still hoping for a word from some one, a quick smile welcomed any eye which might glance that way, but it faded again when no one responded. So Alice tried to content herself by watching a game of "Hop Scotch." She gazed in open-eyed wonder, for she had never seen anything so droll in her life as the performance of one very lean and lank young woman, who went hopping hither and thither like a distracted stork. When at last she gave a sudden plunge, and fell flat with a crash, Alice forgot herself, and laughed outright. Rose heard her.

"You see, Katinka," said she, "I told you she would make fun of our games."

So Alice was left even more severely alone, excepting for two or three of the very youngest children, who smiled back at her when she offered to teach them "jack-stones."

"Don't you want to learn too?" she shyly asked Katinka.

But Katinka caught Rose's eye, and answered, "No, thank you."

"I know how to do gymnastics too," pleaded Alice. "They're great fun. We had some bars and a trapeze at home. My brother Will said I was a regular monkey at swinging. He used to make me jump and catch the trapeze when it was in full motion."

"We don't do such things here," said Rose, coldly. Not knowing what on earth a trapeze might be, Rose was the more convinced that the city girl was "putting on airs."

So Alice was thrown on the mercy of the younger scholars, and, little by little, it was taken for granted that she preferred the society of "the infants."

She was lonely at school, lonely also in the big, gloomy house, where Miss Hannah, in spite of her good-will, did not at all understand the needs of a young girl. Too shy to court the friendships which had been refused her, the sunny face grew sad. And this was the life which Alice had thought would be so delightful!

By degrees any real hostility died out. Who could be actively unkind to so harmless an enemy? She was merely left alone.

"For, though I don't object to her," said Rose, "I see no reason that we should bother ourselves over her. She doesn't belong to us. She likes the 'babes'; let her stay with them."

So it came to pass that Alice was not invited to join a select picnic to "The Pines" one warm Saturday in September. Sitting solitary on Miss Hannah's door-steps, she saw Rose, Lily, and Katinka go by with their baskets. She guessed only too well what a merry time they would have, but she did not know that, finding the mosquitoes had also chosen "The Pines" for their revels, they had sauntered back as far as the Otisville Inn, and taken possession of the big stage-coach which stood under the shed.

Here they ate their lunch, and when the driver appeared they begged him to take them with him to the train and back.

"We've lost half our fun," they pleaded. "Come, now, Mr. Larkin, do give us a ride."

The good-natured driver agreed, and quickly harnessing his horses, stepped into the inn to get a last bundle.

"Here's a jolly good time," exclaimed Rose, holding up a tin pail, and drumming briskly on the bottom.

The forward horse pricked up his ears.

"Tum-ti-tum! tum-ti-tum!" rattled the pail inside.

Toby's head went an inch higher.

A shrill voice set up a song. The clatter on the pail grew louder.

"Ah!" quoth Toby. "Let's off and away."

Down the yard started the horses. The driver, at the window, saw them passing the gate.

"Whoa!" he shouted, rushing wildly after them.

It was too late. The horses turned a sharp corner, and took the road at a smart trot.

Rose, stretching her head out of the coach, screamed loudly. A small boy by the road-side threw up his hat.

The horses swerved to the right—to the left. They tossed their manes. The trot became a canter, the canter a gallop, the gallop a run.

Inside the stage cowered the girls, too terrified to think of jumping. Only Rose kept her head out the window, shrieking, "Whoa! whoa! Save us! save us! Whoa! whoa!"

They were nearing Miss Treadwell's house. There on the door-step sat Alice Dill. Rose saw her. It flashed into her mind how she had seen her on the same spot two hours ago, and had said,

"We don't want her."

It seemed like a dream, but she saw Alice spring from her seat, and dash into the road.

"Save us! save us!" screamed Rose. Then she fell back into Katinka's arms.

How she did it Alice could never tell. She only knew that her two hands grasped the trunk-rest of the coach, and with a tremendous jump she was on the shelf.

A strap was swinging from the top of the stage. Alice clutched it, and clambered to the roof.

The horses were running, but running steadily. The country road was smooth.

Alice crept along. She reached the driver's box. She was repeating a little prayer with all her might.

"The reins! the reins! Give me the reins. Amen!"

She balanced herself with one arm. She reached forward. It was one chance in a hundred. Ah! there were the reins twisted around the whip-socket. Alice's fingers closed upon them. She planted her feet. She tightened her hold. Her eyes almost started out of her head. Her teeth were locked. Her breath came in quick gasps.

But just before her was Beadley's Mount, the steepest hill in all the country round. The horses tried to veer into a side road, but a sharp jerk on the reins drew them back.

Up the mount they plunged. Twenty yards, and the run had become a gallop; forty yards, the gallop was a canter; sixty yards, the canter was a trot; eighty yards, the trot was but a walk. The leader's head drooped. Slower and slower grew the pace.

The top was gained, and the horses stood still, panting, trembling, their sides heaving, the foam on their bits and on their quivering haunches. Oh, blessed earthquake which, in ages past, upheaved Beadley's Mount!

On the box, white and stiff, her hands glued to the reins, sat the New York girl as motionless as a stone.

Rose, Lily, and Katinka crept out of the coach. They stretched out their arms to Alice; they called her name, but she did not answer. Then they saw her droop and sink down.

The next three weeks were terrible to Rose, to Lily, to Katinka. They haunted Miss Treadwell's yard, but they might not see the fever-stricken Alice.

"And, oh, Rose," cried Katinka, with a burst of tears, "they say she is out of her head, and she keeps repeating, 'Push the trapeze, Will. I can catch like a monkey.' And then she cries out, 'The reins!—give me the reins! Amen!' Rose, Rose, she'll die, and we have killed her."

But no. Alice did not die. She even went back in time to the "Classical Institute."

And did she stand in a corner now? Did she vainly ask for love and friendship?

Ah! what happiness the blessed October brought! It was Rose who called each morning to walk to school with Alice. It was Lily who gladly taught her games. It was Katinka who could never do enough for her.

Indeed, had it not been for Katinka, I should not have heard a word concerning the misery of September.

"To think how mean we were!" cried Katinka, with blushes of shame—"to think of it! Only to think of it!"

But Alice forgot it all in her joy.

"Those dear Otisville girls!" she always said. "They were so very kind to me."

DREAM-BAGS.*

BY KIRK MUNROE.

OVER the ocean far and wide
 The good ship sails—a thing of pride
 To the sailor boy, who trends her deck
 As happy and careless as though no wreck
 Had ever been known on the ocean wide,
 Nor ships been lost in the swelling tide.
 A low and aloft he's busy all day,
 Till the sun has finished his golden way;
 And at four bells, struck with a hearty will,
 The boatswain's call, with its whistle shrill,
 Is, "Tumble up for dream-bags."

Then he to the hammock netting springs,
 And down below his dream-bag swings
 'Mid shining rows of cannon grim,
 Which are but well-tried friends to him.
 Then comes an hour of well-earned rest,
 Of song and story and merry jest,
 And the sailor boy watches his guiding star,
 That shines like a beacon light steady and far.
 Till two bells strike in the evening still;
 And the boatswain's call, with its whistle shrill,
 Is, "Tumble into dream-bags."

Then all night long, in peaceful sleep,
 Rocked by billows whose steady sweep
 Marks time to the tune the sea-bee sings,
 The sailor boy safe in his dream-bag swings.
 He has visions of many a daring deed,
 Of home, and the mother whose gentle creed
 Is still his steadiest, surest guide
 Through tempest and wreck and all beside—
 Till four bells strike in the morning chill,
 And the boatswain's call, with its whistle shrill,
 Is, "Tumble out of dream-bags."

A VILLAIN THAT LURKS IN THE WOODS.

BY H. H. KANE, M.D.

THOSE of our readers who are so fortunate as to be in the country during the months of September and October will find them the pleasantest months in the year. There is just enough of the frost of winter in the cool air to redden the cheeks, set the blood tingling through the veins, cause the eyes to sparkle, and make life seem even better worth living than ever before.

What pleasure it is to wander in the woods and meadows, gather the late flowers, poke and pry into the trees with hollow trunks, watch wild-eyed rabbits, startled by your voice or step, dart rapidly from brush or thicket, and to gather the leaves that nature has so quickly and beautifully painted in such brilliant colors!

But there is a danger that lurks in these pleasant meadows and fragrant woods. Not wild animals such as dash out from the jungles of India or jump upon you from the trees, but a villain that is apt to lull every suspicion you might otherwise have of his evil intentions, for, like many other dangerous villains, he is handsomely dressed, and not only does not look as if he would do you any harm, but, on the contrary, resembles things that you know to be good, and of which you feel no fear.

Nearly every boy or girl who has wandered in the cool shady wood paths, or by the side of brooks and ponds, has seen him every summer and autumn, either standing alone or leaning up against a stone wall or broken fence. Children who meet him should pass him by at once, not stopping for a moment to take any of the handsome flowers or eat any of the tempting fruit he offers. Many children that have done so have been made very sick by it, and some poor little unfortunates have been killed.

For this dangerous villain is a plant, and this handsome and dangerous plant is known by the hard Latin name Atropa belladonna, or, more commonly, deadly nightshade. Our illustration is a very good picture of it. It stands about three feet high, has a thick fleshy stem with branches, and is usually found in damp or cool places, such as woods, ravines, the edges of swamps, or against stone walls or ruins.

It is very handsome when in full bloom, and is very apt to attract the attention of children, who, from the beauty of its flowers or the tempting look of its fruit, often pluck the former and eat the latter, always a dangerous and sometimes a fatal proceeding. The flowers, which usually appear in June and July, are large, bell-like in shape, and of a dull reddish color. They usually hang downward by a narrow and seemingly frail stem. The leaves of the plant are oval, pointed, of a dusky green color on top and a paler green underneath. They hang in pairs, and are nearly of the same size.

The berries, which are the most dangerous, owing to the likelihood that the little ones may gather and eat them, are, when ripe, often mistaken for "wild cherries" both from their shape and color. At first green, they grow red, and when fully ripe are of a deep purplish-red color. At first somewhat ovate (egg-shaped), and having a shallow furrow on either side, they grow round as they grow ripe, which ripening usually takes place in September.

As no cherries, wild or domesticated (grown at home and cared for), are ever to be found as late as September, or on such a bush, the child who bears this in mind is not likely to make the serious mistake that so many have already made. Then, too, the taste, though sweetish, is not like that of a cherry, and the seeds are very different.

In the belladonna berry the capsule (stone) is found comparatively soft, and to consist of two compartments, or sacs, filled with small seeds.

Children who have eaten these poisonous berries become very sick and vomit. The pupils of their eyes enlarge very much, their throats and stomachs burn, their faces flush, and their bodies get as red as those of boiled lobsters. Indeed, they look just as if they had an attack of scarlet fever. They grow very weak, and soon begin to be delirious; that is to say, they talk, laugh, sing, cry, scream, tear the bed-clothes, toss and roll, and grow perfectly wild, while a hot fever rages. Sometimes convulsions (fits) follow, until at last, worn out with pain and suffering, they find rest and peace in death.

This is why it is so very important that every boy and girl who wanders in the fields and woods should learn to know this handsome and terribly dangerous villain who lurks in the cool and shady places, and that so temptingly offers them his gaudy flowers and purple, death-dealing fruit. And from him, too, they may at the same time learn the much-worn, but very useful adage, that appearances are but too often deceptive, and that some of the most wicked and dangerous men and things in this life are often the most pleasant to look upon, the most entertaining in their speech, and the most tempting in the promised pleasures they hold forth.

TOM FAIRWEATHER IN ZANZIBAR

BY LIEUTENANT E. W. STURDY.

WHEN, at home, Tom Fairweather had sung of how "The spicy breezes blow soft o'er Ceylon's isle,"

there had always been a jumble in his mind of Aladdin's wonderful lamp and roc's eggs and these same spicy breezes aforesaid as all included in the one series of marvellous tales. But when the good ship Neptune steamed into Zanzibar Harbor, Tom became aware that there existed in fact breezes spice-laden and fragrant.

A soft wind was blowing over the groves of spice trees lining the shores, robbing them of their perfume, which it wafted abroad, the strong essence of cloves being especially distinct.

Tom, from the deck of the Neptune (I have never told you before, young people, that his father's ship was the Neptune, but I now make the name formally known to you), gazed with pleased eyes on the brilliant coloring of the shores between which the ship's course lay. Rows of spice trees were broken here and there by groups of stately palms, and by the rich dark green foliage of the mango, these trees crowning the higher land, against which they grew in gradual ascent. Lower down large plains were planted with sugar-cane, mixed with patches of grain and with wonderful groves of cocoa nut. Where the water-line met the sand of the shore it shone like a silver girdle in the sunlight, dividing the kingdoms of land and water.

A ZANZIBAR BOY

Perhaps he would not have noticed all these points, or, at all events, would not have been aware that he was doing so, had it not been that he was standing at the back of Mr. Jollytarre's chair, who, as they approached Zanzibar, was making a rapid sketch of the scene in water-colors. Observation is a good habit, which does not always come naturally to young people, but it is often quickened by trying to make a sketch yourself, or watching some friend sketch a charming landscape or a striking building.

THE CITY OF ZANZIBAR.

"How do you think I've hit it off, Tom?" asked the Lieutenant, holding his sketch off at arm's-length. "It's hard to do justice to the coloring, you see. There's all that varied foliage on the highlands, then that square of yellow grain, and that bit of sugar-cane. That water is too blue. I'll wash in more white. Is that better?"

"It's splendid!" cried Tom, enthusiastically. "It couldn't be more like it you had photographed it."

"I'm glad you like it," said Mr. Jollytarre, putting back his picture in his portfolio. Then he waved his hand ahead. "But there's a scene that defies me, Tom. Did you ever see anything like that?"

Tom looked ahead too, and beheld a fairy city rising above the horizon, apparently miles away. Near by were large white houses with flat roofs and plenty of windows—an every-day affair enough; but there was an extraordinary unreality about the city in the distance. Tom rubbed his eyes. "Am I dreaming?" he asked. "That place we are coming to doesn't look like anything I ever saw before."

"It's the mirage."

"Mirage?"

"Yes; the most uncanny atmospheric effects are produced by mirage. Fairy-land could not be stranger than this one, could it?"

"Look at those tremendously tall ships lying in the harbor."

"And those 'airy fairy' palaces built without foundations."

"And those banners, Mr. Jollytarre, how they come and go, change and disappear! But how real those arches look! And do you see those terraces? It is impossible that they are a delusion."

"Nevertheless, that is what they are, 'the unsubstantial fabric of a dream,' and so are those gardens. You need never say that you have not seen castles in the air. I don't believe any boy ever had a better sight of them."

The Neptune went on her course, and the wonderful vision gradually dissolved upon a nearer approach. The tall phantom ships shrunk into something not a third so tall and stately. The trailing gigantic banners resolved themselves into the consular flags of America, England, France, and Germany. The lovely arches and graceful terraces became, on nearer approach, groups of houses, which looked like palaces at a distance, but were more like pig-sties on a close acquaintance.

"We are not more than thirty miles from the mainland of Africa, are we?" asked Tom, having gradually realized the scene.

"About that. The sovereignty of Zanzibar comprises these islands, of which the three largest are Pemba, Zanzibar, and Momfa. Besides, there is a territory on the mainland extending from about ten degrees south latitude to about two degrees south latitude, not to speak of a chain of trading stations, more or less obedient to the Sultan, extending inland almost a thousand miles. It was from Zanzibar that Stanley started when he made his journey across Africa."

"Of what race are the inhabitants?" asked Tom.

"Arabs for the most part, whose language is not Arabic but Swahili. There are natives of India, who, as a rule, are Mohammedans, although some profess Hindooism. However, the bulk of the population of Zanzibar are negroes; some imported, some native, some slaves, some free. England takes very decided measures to break up the traffic in slaves. They have had many men-of-war stationed in these waters to capture the dows in which the Arabs carry their slaves from one port to another. The dows sail very fast, and it is not always easy to catch them."

The next day when Tom went on shore he had an opportunity of seeing the slave-market, but the two hundred and fifty slaves he saw huddled together only served to disgust him, and when he was told by his father that on the day after the officers were to dine with the Sultan, he was not quite sure whether he would like to go or not.

His father said: "You had better go along, Tom, for the Sultan has travelled, and picked up a great many European customs. He is fond of entertaining, and will no doubt give us a very good dinner."

"Yes," added Mr. Jollytarre; "you will have no end of fun, as the English say, and this will go far ahead of anything you have seen in the lands of Sultans."

So the next evening, before leaving the ship, Tom was in quite an expectant state, especially as, looking toward the shore, he could see the plaza in front of the Sultan's palace brilliantly lighted by many party-colored lanterns.

On reaching the shore the party was met by officers of the palace, accompanied by a troop of slaves, the latter carrying lanterns slung on poles, which they held aloft to light the way.

It was a curious and very pretty sight. The officers of the ship and the palace walked together, and ahead and on either side slaves were bearing their huge paper lanterns. As they wound their way through the narrow streets it reminded Tom of the torch-light processions he had seen at home.

Arriving near the palace, they found crowds of natives assembled to see the Americans. At the foot of the stairway the Sultan himself received his guests with that Eastern hospitality which carries with it a gentle dignity not to be misunderstood. Going up one flight, they found themselves on a balcony surrounding an inner court, and at the moment of their appearance a fine band struck up the "Star-spangled Banner."

Curiously enough, neither the Sultan nor any of his suite could speak English, and it is needless to say that the Americans could not speak Swahili, but they all wandered through the various rooms, looking at the novel arrangements of furniture, and expressing themselves in a pantomimic way, until they were given to understand that dinner awaited them.

On one side of the balcony the table was laid, and a beautiful effect was given by colored lights and shining crystal. The first thing that attracted our young friend's attention was the menu, printed on tinted paper with letters of blue and gold.

Tom glanced it over, and turning to Mr. Jollytarre, by whose side he had managed to sit, he said:

"Goodness! what a lot of courses! There are twenty-five of them. And do just notice the names of the ices. Here is ice-cream à la General Grant, water-ice à la John Sherman, and ice pudding à la Ben Butler. What a funny idea! What does it mean?"

"I fancy," replied his friend, "that the Sultan wishes to tickle our palates with patriotic allusions. But, Tom, be careful not to show your feelings too plainly in your face. As our hosts do not speak English, you can talk freely, but do so in a quiet way."

At each plate were two decanters, one filled with sherry, and the other with lemonade. Huge dishes of cracked ice were placed at intervals. Noticing the absence of any wine, Tom asked the reason.

"The Koran, which is their Bible, forbids the use of wine," he was told.

"Then do they never drink wine?"

"Never in public," said Jollytarre. "I can't answer for their private practices."

Dinner in the mean time was going on. It needed but the soup to show that the cooking was in the hands of French artists, and but a few courses to convince Tom and his friends that they were in for a long sitting, for, beginning with the soup, every dish named on the menu was served separately. Tom, whose naturally healthy appetite was quickened by the good things placed before him, turned at last with a sigh, and said:

"It is of no use: I'll have to only pretend to eat, if I am to taste of the Ben Butler ice pudding."

He ate sparingly then, and listened to the fine music from the court-yard below. Finally, after two hours of dining, and he had tried the wonderful ice pudding, all rose from the table, and walked to a front room, or suite of rooms, facing the plaza.

The Sultan and Captain Fairweather stepped to a little balcony, which was a signal evidently to some one below, for immediately there was a blaze of fire-works.

The plaza was the scene of a most brilliant display, and the crowds of natives gave forth a shout that was deafening. Rockets flew in every direction, Roman candles shot out blazing stars, and beautiful views in fire appeared from the darkness. It was beautiful and unexpected. The older ones were as pleased as Tom, while the Sultan was evidently gratified with the success of his entertainment.

But the time came to thank the Sultan with expressive gestures and depart.

As they passed through the door leading from the reception-room, an officer stood with a huge bottle of attar of roses, and taking the handkerchief from each guest, fairly saturated it with that most valuable perfume. Tom said afterward that he thought his room on board would smell of attar of roses until he reached home. They returned to their boats with the same ceremony as they had walked to the palace, slaves, and lanterns, and all. Tom, lying back in the boat, remarked, sleepily:

"He is the best Sultan yet."

CHAPTER XIII.

NORRY GROWS CONFIDENTIAL.

WHILE Dick was plodding along the country road, Norry and the dog were having a very cozy time of it.

Nancy Barlow, for that was her name, made the little boy very comfortable, and as she did her morning work chatted pleasantly with him. She took up her father's breakfast, and then sat down to eat her own, and Norry liked to hear the sort of cheerful clatter she made. Before noon he felt on very friendly terms with his hostess, and had already given her the outlines of his history.

"And who does your brother feel afraid will get hold of you?" Nancy asked, with a kind, pitying look, which would have comforted Norry could he have seen it.

Norry told her in his childish way about Gurdle, and of Dick's idea that an attempt was to be made upon Dr. Field's house.

"Well, I never!" said Nancy. "I'd like to catch him coming round here. Now, Norry," she added, "s'pose you come up and sit with father for a little, while I just run next door. I want to see some one."

Norry, in his usual obedient way, allowed himself to be conducted upstairs to the large airy room where the sick man lay in bed, propped up by many pillows. Nancy put the little boy and Trusty on the foot of the bed, and then went down-stairs again. In a few moments, with her shawl over her head, she had run out and down the road to the next house. There was a carpenter's shop attached to it, and inside a young man was busily at work, whistling "Nancy Lee."

"Here I be," said Nancy Barlow, looking in with a laugh. "I want to talk to you a bit, Joel. Can you stop work?"

"Of course I can, seeing who asks me to," the young man answered, heartily. "Come in and sit down, Nancy."

He cleared a bench of some shavings, and Nancy, doing as she was bid, told the young man Dick and Norry's story. "I'd like to know!" was his comment. "Well, now, I wonder where we could get track of the old 'coon."

"This child, you see, is blind," Nancy said, with great energy. "But he knows that his brother overheard the men plotting for the seventeenth, that's to-morrow night, and he knows it's a Dr. Field, of Marplains."

"Dr. Field!" exclaimed Joel. "Why, I know him very well. At least I know his grandson, Dick Dearing, over to Barnabas. I minded his boat last summer. Well, I wonder if I hadn't best go up to Marplains myself."

"Oh, Joel!" said Nancy, "how good you always are!"

Joel's plain kind face turned very red, but he looked well pleased, and then he and Nancy hastened to plan the next move.

"The boy's gone on," she said; "like's not, as he's walking, he hasn't got there. But it'll be a good thing for you to go too. Can you spare the time, sure, Joel?"

Joel cast a look of regret at his work. "Oh yes," he said, brightly. "I don't see as it would be right not to go, Nancy; we can't turn our back on duty the Lord sends."

Nancy stood a minute watching Joel put up his tools, and then she went back to her own house, thinking what a comfort it would be if she had just such a brother. In a few minutes Joel, on his way to Marplains, looked in at the kitchen door, nodding good-by to Nancy, and casting a glance full of pity upon Norry's little figure.

Could Dick have seen him just then he would have felt very well satisfied. The warmth and good cheer of Nancy's kitchen had already comforted the blind boy, filling him with a grateful sense of unusual happiness in his surroundings. Norry did not know when he had been so happy, and the climax of the day's comfort seemed reached when, about two o'clock, a fine plateful of stew and roast potatoes was put before him, and Nancy, stooping down to give the boy a quick kiss on his forehead, told him that Trusty was having a "splendid bone" on the hearth. Oh, if only Dick and "Master Dick" could have been there!

CHAPTER XIV.

JOEL TELLS HIS STORY.

"BARBARA, what are you doing?"

"Only looking out of the window, aunt—watching for Cousin Maud."

"Well, watching won't bring her any quicker. Why don't you take your book?"

"I'm tired reading, and I like to look out of the window."

"Well, you are the oddest child!"

Mrs. Thomason seemed more contented after she had said this. At all events, she made no further attempts to bring Barbara from the window.

The room was the library at the Cedars, Dr. Field's country house, and for an hour while Mrs. Thomason dozed over the fire, little Barbara had sat perched in the window, looking out across the leafless gardens to the strip of country road along which she expected momentarily to see Cousin Maud appearing in the pony-carriage.

The family had spent a fortnight at the Cedars, and were to return to New York the following day, the seventeenth, with the exception of the Doctor, who was to spend that night alone at Marplains. Barbara was not sorry to go back to town, for the Cedars, without Dick, was rather lonely for the little girl.

It was a large, old-fashioned gray stone mansion, with a wide hall in the centre, and a beautiful staircase with a window on the first landing. Everything in it was the perfection of comfort and warmth and brightness, but to Barbara on this day it seemed very lonely. If only Cousin Maud would come! Just as the little girl had said this to herself for the twentieth time, she saw the ponies' heads, then the carriage with Cousin Maud in it, come briskly up the road. But Maud was not alone. A tall young man was sitting beside her whom Barbara had never seen.

Maud let herself in by the side entrance, and Barbara, who had run out into the hall, saw at once that she was looking very anxious and excited. The strange man followed her closely.

"Oh, Cousin Maud!" the little girl had just time to exclaim, when her cousin said, quickly, but in a low tone:

"Barbara, don't say anything about this gentleman's being here. He has come to see grandpapa on business."

Barbara stared a moment. Then she heard Maud say, "Come this way, if you please, sir," to the man, as she led him down the hall toward Dr. Field's study.

The Doctor's quiet voice said, "Come in," and leaving ly obliged to you, sir. Dear! dear! what had better be done?" He looked appealingly at Maud, who, as usual, had thought of prompt measures.

"Why, I think we ought to try and find the boy, grandpapa—don't you? That awful man Gurdle may have got him again. And Brooks; he is in town, isn't he, and you were expecting him here to-morrow?"

"Yes," said the Doctor, who was by this time fully roused to the importance of the occasion. "I can hardly believe it of him. Still, we must act on it."

They discussed the question a few minutes longer, all deciding that great caution would be necessary. It now seemed plain that Brooks had supplied Gurdle with the information that on the following night the Doctor would be the only member of the family at Marplains, and that he would have a large sum of money in his room. Brooks, of course, could admit the robbers, but it remained a mystery what use the Devine boys were to be put to. And where was Dick all these hours? The Doctor's tender heart began to assert itself in pity for the poor orphan of whom he had been so ready to believe evil, and Maud would have rushed off herself in pursuit of him had not Joel suggested a better plan. He offered to go at once, following the road carefully, and making inquiries on every side. Then he suggested that perhaps he might have the loan of a horse and wagon to aid him in his search.

The Doctor readily consented to this, and Maud hastened to see about some refreshment for their unexpected guest. A long time afterward Joel Potter used to describe the beautiful dining room at the Cedars, where Miss Field herself waited on him, giving him such a delicious lunch, such a fragrant cup of tea, and all off such beautiful dishes.

While he ate, Maud heard all about Nancy and her father, and how good he was sure she was to her little blind guest.

"She's allays been the best girl anywheres around our way," Joel said, with enthusiasm, "and she keeps things goin' for the old man out of 'most nothing."

Miss Maud was greatly interested, and declared that, when this strange affair was settled, Joel should bring Nancy to the Cedars to spend a long day.

"Well, ma'am," Joel said, standing up, "it's getting pretty dark, and I guess I'd better be starting."

It was indeed quite dark by this time—so much so that, as Joel was about to get into the wagon the Doctor had ordered, he did not at first see that a horse and buggy had dashed up the drive, and that a boyish figure had sprung out, and now stood on the door-step. Maud had not as yet closed the door, and as she stood peering out into the gloomy evening she suddenly saw the round rosy face of Dick Dearing, and heard him exclaim,

"Oh, Cousin Maud! Such a jolly row as there's been! Where's grandpa? I've such a lot to tell him."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

"THIS IS A MOST EXTRAORDINARY STORY."

Barbara still silent with amazement, Cousin Maud and the stranger disappeared behind the door.

Dr. Field was busy over his books, as usual, but he saw at once that Maud had something important to say, as she came swiftly toward him.

"Grandpapa," she said at once, "I met this gentleman on the road coming here. His name is Mr. Joel Potter, and he has come to tell you something very important."

And then Nancy's messenger—for it was he—stepped forward and told his story.

Dr. Field listened in profound amazement, looking from Joel's honest, blushing face to Maud's sweet, earnest countenance, evidently not at once taking in just what it all meant. Finally Maud asked,

"But the boy, grandpapa, poor little Dick—he has not been here?"

He answered quickly: "No, no; the boy has never appeared. This is a most extraordinary story. I am great-

NOTES FOR THE YOUNG HUNTER.

BY WILL WOODMAN

I.—THE GUN.

A GUN! Where is there a boy who can not conjure up more delightful fancies at the thought of a gun than ever magician, though it were Merlin himself, could do with his wand? There is something, it must be confessed, in the noise it can make, more yet in its destroying power, but the main thing is the masterful feeling a boy has when he holds in his hands a weapon which seems to overcome both time and space.

And no doubt it has always been so since the first gun was invented, crude and unfaithful as that machine must have been. To go no further back than when I was a boy, I know I was fairly beside myself with joy when, after what seemed to me ages of longing and wistful eying on my part, my grandfather, with great deliberation and respect, took down his old flint-lock rifle from over the great fire-place, and called me to him. My heart beat a tattoo on my ribs when he said:

"My boy, do you think you can take aim with that?"

"Could I? Well, it was pretty heavy, but there was no such thing as failing when I knew possession depended upon accomplishing it."

"Very well done, indeed!" exclaimed he, as I raised the old gun to my shoulder and squinted with delight along the barrel.

And why should I not have done it well? Had I not passed many an hour practicing the same manoeuvre with a crowbar, in the expectation of some day being put to this very test? Then he taught me how to load, and how to prime, and how to do a great many more things besides, which boys nowadays have no need to know, for happily flint-locks and muzzle-loaders have seen their day.

After a while I was promoted from a flint-lock rifle to a musket that used caps, and then for the first time I used shot instead of a bullet. Goodness! how the shot did scatter! I verily believe I could have stood only ten paces away, and yet have scattered over the whole of the barn door. Next came my beloved double-barrelled shotgun. I bought it with money earned by selling muskrat skins, captured after many a chilly night's watching by the mill-dam.

I thought then that no gun could ever be made to equal it, and I am sure now that no other gun can possibly give me the same pleasure that this one did. However, I gave up using it some time ago, though I take as good care of it as ever I did, and it occupies the place of honor on my rack. Now I have a modern breech-loader; and as I write I find myself keeping one eye on it most of the time, for word has come, just as it used to when I was a boy, that the shooting season is here.

Do I need to tell you how the word came? I think not. You and I have glanced out of the window and seen the shocks of corn, looking for all the world like an Indian village sprung into sudden life. We have seen the lazy summer glide away, and the timid autumn, blushing to the very tips of her leaves, steal rustling forward. The stars have begun to sparkle with a crisper light, and merry Jack Frost has used his brown paint on the seed clover and the wheat-grass.

Oh! we know the signs—you and I. Did I not see you this very morning tap on the old hickory-tree, and then look up at the well-known hole to see Master Squirrel's bright eyes peer out? And did you not deceive even wily old Father Partridge with your well-whistled call of "Bob White! Bob, Bob White"? I know the delight with which you listened to his cautious, half-broken answer.

You and I may call ourselves sportsmen, I fancy; for, since you know the signs and rejoice in them, it is because you respect them. I am sure you would not kill a bird or any kind of game out of season, because you know that to do so would be to obtain for yourself an animal unfit for food, and that the act would be one of heartless cruelty, for the reason that it would be depriving a family of little ones of needed support. In season the little ones can provide for themselves, because, as Paddy would say, they are not little at all any more, but big.

Have you a gun? If you have, do you respect it? If you do respect it, it will be a faithful servant; but if you do not, you may expect to have it miss fire or fire too soon, you may look for distressing accidents from it, and you will never love it as every true sportsman does love his gun.

A gun is a perfectly safe weapon in the hands of a careful boy who will follow a few simple rules. It should always be remembered that the only safe end of a gun, loaded or unloaded, is the butt, and that the muzzle end should never be pointed at anything which it is not intended to shoot. Sometimes even the butt end is not quite pleasant to be at, as the Irishman found who shot a heavily loaded musket at a squirrel.

"Bedad, me foine frind," said he, as he saw the little fellow clamber spryly up a tree, while he measured his length on the ground; "yez wouldn't beshkippin' so lively if o'd had yez at this ind o' me gun!"

The gun should always be carried with the muzzle pointing downward, at an angle of about forty-five degrees to the body. It should never be used as a cane or to aid in climbing a fence. It will be much safer, in fact, not to have the gun in the hands at all when climbing. Never help a companion up a steep place, or any other place, by letting him take one end of your gun while you hold the other end. In short, always bear in mind that the only use for a gun is to shoot with, and that to put it to any other use is to invite accident.

While the gun is in use it should be wiped night and morning, inside and out, with porpoise-oil, sperm-oil, or vaseline, and then should be rubbed dry with a piece of cotton flannel. If by the sea-shore, where the air is laden with moisture, this precaution is particularly necessary. When the gun is put away for the season, it should be still more carefully cleaned and rubbed with oil, and then wiped dry before putting in the case. Never leave the gun smeared with oil, and by no means follow a common but bad practice of plugging the barrels with cotton saturated with oil.

The best oil for use on a gun is sperm-oil which has been treated in the following simple manner: fill a cup with the oil, and drop about a spoonful of melted lead into it. This will remove all acid from the oil.

It may be well to say here that there is such a thing as a good, cheap gun. Good single-barrelled breech-loading guns, varying from $12 to $20 apiece, are known as Forehand & Wadsworth, Henry Richards, Stevens, Phoenix, and American Semi-Hammerless. Double-barrelled guns—Le Fauchaux, Bonebill, Northcote, Colt, Remington, and Parker. These guns can be bought for from $15 to $50 each.

THE CAPTAIN'S LESSON.

A STORY OF THE SOUTHERN SEAS.

BY DAVID KER.

"LAND on the weather bow!" shouted the lookout at the foremast-head of the Vrouw Katerina.

"That must be St. Helena at last," chuckled the Captain to himself. "Good! Now we'll land two passengers at once!"

When Captain Matthias Evertsen chuckled in that way, it always meant mischief to somebody; and you would have said, looking at his short thickset figure, and hard, coarse, low-browed face, that he could be a very ugly customer if he liked.

Like all the Dutch captains of that time, he was a first-rate seaman, and as brave as a lion; but, like far too many of them, he could be terribly cruel to any one who offended him, which was only too easily done.

Two hundred years ago, when a voyage to the East Indies and back often took twenty months or more, the captain of a merchantman in the Eastern seas could do pretty much what he liked. To drag a man under the keel of a ship, or keep him in irons for three days or so without food, was the commonest thing possible. It was a common saying in those days that there was no law beyond the Line; and when a captain murdered two or three of his crew, or when a crew mutinied and murdered their captain, no one at home troubled himself much about it.

When Evertsen spoke of landing two passengers, any one who had heard him would have wondered what he meant. The only passenger aboard, an old Dutch merchant from Java, had just died, and it was natural enough to wish to bury him on land; but who could the other passenger be? We shall see presently.

Larger and larger, darker and darker, loomed out against the bright evening sky the huge black cliffs of the lonely islet, one day to be world-famous as the last prison of Napoleon. But at that time it was still uninhabited, and a drearier or a more desolate spot could scarcely have been found upon the face of the earth.

At length, just as the sea was all ablaze with the glory of the sunset, the ship anchored close inshore, and Captain Evertsen, ordering his boat to be got ready, went below, and putting his head into a dark, narrow hatch between-decks, called out, with one of his ugly chuckles:

"Now, Van Doorp, my boy, rouse up, and get ready to go ashore."

A big, sullen-looking man, whose swollen and blood-stained forehead showed that he must have "offended" the Captain in some way, rose sulkily at the call.

Meanwhile the boat had been lowered, and the Dutch merchant's coffin put into it. Van Doorp was then ordered in likewise, and the boat pulled for the shore.

"Now, my lads," cried the Captain, "quick, and put Mr. Van Doorp and his friend ashore. He'll have a whole island to himself, and the other gentleman will be nice quiet company."

Even the rough seamen stood aghast at this refinement of cruelty, which doomed a living man to perish by inches, with a corpse for his only companion. The unfortunate sailor knew his commander too well to plead for mercy; but as the boat began to recede from the shore he sprang upon a rock, and shouted:

"You won't get rid of me so easily, Captain. Mark my words: I'll come back and haunt you for this."

Evertsen answered only with a scornful laugh. A few moments later he was on his own deck once more, and the fatal island was soon lost in the fast-falling shadows of night, while the Vrouw Katerina sped on her course.

But although the Captain laughed at poor Van Doorp's threat, it troubled him nevertheless. Like most cruel and ignorant men, he was very superstitious, and believed in ghosts, witches, spectre ships, mermaids, lucky and unlucky days, and other such absurdities, as firmly as he did in the ship's compass. It was long before he could get to sleep that night, and when he did it was only to dream that he was being chased through the water by a shark with a coffin-shaped body and a head like Van Doorp's. Then the dream changed, and it seemed as if the ship itself had turned into a coffin, on the other end of which Van Doorp was standing with a loaded pistol, bidding him jump overboard or be shot. About daybreak he awoke to find the vessel becalmed, the cliffs of St. Helena still visible, and his crew shaking their heads and muttering:

"It's a bad lookout to be becalmed here—eh, Hans?"

"True, Peter; we're in a bad way now."

"You're right, mates: no luck can come to the old craft, with a dead man's curse following her."

This sudden calm, following so close upon his own evil deed, seemed to the troubled Captain a direct judgment from Heaven. All day he wandered about the deck, restless and miserable, watching for some sign of a breeze, but not a ripple was to be seen on the smooth surface.

As night fell, a pale phosphoric light began to spread over the sea, till far as eye could reach it was all like one sheet of fire. Every spar of the ship stood out clearly, and the faces of the crew looked quite ghostly in the unearthly glare. The Captain, too ill at ease to go to bed, was moodily pacing the deck, when a cry of horror from his men made him turn round, and he beheld a strange and terrible sight.

Right in the centre of this spectral light the strangest kind of a small craft was floating toward the vessel. It was rowed with two broken pieces of wood by a figure which, as it came nearer, was recognized by every one as that of Van Doorp. The crew screamed and ran back like children, while the cruel Captain fell on his knees. His strange dream came back to him. Nearer and nearer came the ghostly voyager, till he was heard to shout:

"Ship ahoy! Heave us a rope, will you?"

Now among the crew was a reckless Zealander, a special-crony of Van Doorp, to whom this voice sounded so life-like that he began to hope his old chum might not be dead, after all. He threw out a rope, and the next moment the coffin passenger had scrambled up and leaped down on deck.

The thump of his feet upon the planking was so heavy and unghostly that even the terrified Captain felt at once that no spirit could ever have made a sound like that. He started up, and seizing hold of Van Doorp with both hands (as if to make sure that he was really there), gasped out,

"Tell me this moment—are you alive or dead?"

"Alive, to be sure," answered the sailor, laughing.

"No thanks to you, though. When I found the old craft still in sight this morning, I thought I might as well give myself one more chance; so I turned Myneer Kloots out of his coffin, made paddles out of the two halves of the lid, and here I am."

"Here's a dollar for you, my lad," said the Captain, drawing a long breath. "Go forward and take your old berth again, and after this I'll never punish any man without good reason, and then only in a proper way."

And Captain Evertsen kept his word.

TURTLES.

A COMPOSITION BY A YOUNG CONTRIBUTOR.

THE turtle is one of the most ingenious of compound animals. In order to make a turtle you take a snake, a tobacco box, and four claws like those of a crab, only you must slit up the ends with the scissors, so that they will look something like the teeth of a comb. Now cut a hole through each end of the tobacco box and draw the snake through it, so that his head will appear at one end of it and his tail at the other. Then stick the four claws on the sides of the box, two on each side, and you will have a very nice-looking turtle. Of course it won't run, or eat, or do anything, because it won't have the regular turtle's works inside of it, but it will look like a turtle.

This is not the way that real turtles are made, for they are hatched out all complete, and with their works in perfect order, from eggs. Turtles' eggs are made with soft shells like India rubber, and they are never sat upon. Long ago the turtle found out that eggs could be hatched by burying them in the sand. Since that time all turtles leave their eggs in the sand to be hatched by the heat of the sun, and thus save themselves a great deal of trouble, and give themselves time to improve their minds.

The turtle has a great deal of mind, though he may not look as if he had. There is a very old story about a turtle that ran a race with a hare, and beat him. The hare could run so much faster than the turtle that he stopped on the way to rest, feeling perfectly sure that he could not be beaten. Meanwhile the turtle kept on, and so reached the winning-post before his rival. It is only fair to say that there are those who doubt this story, and say that the turtle climbed up behind a farmer's wagon, and so won the race unfairly; and when you remember that the turtle is about one-half snake, it is impossible to feel much confidence in his honesty.

Turtles are frequently found with their initials and the date of their birth on their backs. These initials and dates are not put on by the turtles themselves, and they are not very trustworthy. Any one who has a sharp knife and who catches a turtle can cut letters and figures on his back without hurting him. This is very often done, and the result is that a vast number of turtles ornamented in this way are now wandering about the country. Probably some thousands have "G. W. 1775" cut on their backs, and people who find them imagine that the turtles are more than a hundred years old, and were once ornamented by George Washington. But George Washington was too busy in 1775 to meddle with the backs of turtles. He was more interested in seeing the backs of British soldiers.

Boys sometimes make turtles run races. Turtles can run over smooth ground very nicely, but they can not jump fences very well. It is of no use to encourage turtles to run with a whip, for the moment you frighten a turtle he draws in his head, tail, and claws, shuts up his box, and locks it on the inside. Then he goes to sleep, and is often very much surprised when he wakes up and finds himself put away in a table drawer or in some one else's box.

Turtles have for a long time been kept as pets by ladies in France. The turtle is a very inoffensive pet. He seldom keeps the neighbors awake by barking at night, or by singing on the back fence like ill-bred cats. He never tears the curtains, and never gets on the dining table, or steals milk and meat out of the kitchen. All he requires in order to be comfortable is a few flies, and as there are a great many spare flies in all dwelling-houses, he catches as many as he cares to eat.

In this country the turtle has lately become quite a fashionable pet, and is often dressed in gay clothes and introduced into the very best society. Not long ago some young ladies in Bordentown, New Jersey, who have pet turtles, got up a "turtle party." It was quite a brilliant affair. Considerable time and expense had been lavished upon the turtles to make them appear well and attractive for the occasion. One aristocratic Miss Turtle, called Venus, was not able to attend, although her party dress was made and in readiness for the occasion. Two of the turtles were dressed in the most elaborate style, one having on a magnificent white silk dress, with train profusely trimmed with gold embroidery. Another belle wore a dress of white plush, trimmed with blue satin and lace, the train being looped with white daisies. Some of these turtles have "Jerseys," but none were worn on this occasion.

It is doubtful whether a turtle takes much pleasure in fine clothes and rich suppers. An animal that has been accustomed ever since he was born to wear nothing but a warm, durable, water-proof tobacco box, and has always seen the most eminent turtles of his acquaintance dressed in the same style, may very likely think that silk and satin clothes are inconvenient and ugly. The turtle probably thinks that it is all very well for men to wear clothes, since they are unfortunate enough to be born without serviceable coats of tortoise-shell; but he can not see why he should trouble himself to wear clothes. As for dinners, every sensible turtle prefers plain flies, since the latter are cheap and wholesome, to any of the dishes which his human friends set before him.

Treated rationally, the turtle is a quiet and pleasant pet. He seldom shows any affection for his owner, but on the other hand he never bites like a vicious dog, or uses bad language like a depraved cat. Turtles live an immense length of time, and one turtle will last a person for a lifetime, especially if his shell is polished occasionally, and he is not allowed to eat wasps under the impression that they are a new and delicious style of fly.

TWO OPINIONS.

(Ye first opinion.)

A noisy chattering Magpie once.
 A talking gabbling hairbrained dunce.
 Came by where a sign-post stood.
 He nodded his head with a modish air.
 And said "good day" for he was n't aware.
 That the sign-post pointing its finger there.
 Was only a block of wood.

Quoth he "An exceedingly sultry day.
 'Tis more like June than the first of May."
 The post said never a word.
 "I've just dropped over from Lincolnshire.
 My home is in the Cathedral Spire -
 The air is cooler and purer the higher.
 You get as you v'e doubtless heard"

So on he chattered with never a stop.
 And on and on till you'd think he would drop.
 (The post was dumb as your hat.)
 But so as the pie could say his say.
 He did n't care whether it spoke all day.
 For thus he observed as he walked away -
 "An intelligent creature that."

(Ye second opinion.)

Now once when the sky was pouring rain.
 The Magpie chanced to come by again.
 And there stood the post in the wet.
 "Helloa," said the Magpie, "What you here.
 Pray tell me I beg is there sheltering near -
 A terrible day for this time of the year.
 'T would make a Saint Anthony fret."

"I beg your pardon - I did n't quite hear."
 (Then louder) "I say is there sheltering near"
 But the post was as dumb as Death.
 "What can't you answer a question pray.
 You will not - No - Then I'll say good day."
 And flirting his tail he walked away.
 "You'r a fool." (his under his breath.)

FEEDING PUSSEY.

I like to feed my pussy,
I like to see her eat;
If she would only use a spoon,
Oh, wouldn't it be sweet?

She is so very cunning,
And thinks so much of me;
She always wants her breakfast
When I am there to see.

Now, pussy, little pussy,
You must behave yourself,
Or else I'll set the bread and milk
Upon the closet shelf.

She purrs so low and softly,
She is so dear and sweet,
I'll let her have her basin now,
And all she wants to eat.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

MADISON, FLORIDA.

Peek and I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE for a long time. We exchange it with a friend on another periodical, so that we have the benefit of two papers. We commenced school last week, and we find it hard work to get back to study after such a pleasant vacation. We had cousins (both boys and girls) from Georgia visiting us this summer, and we enjoyed ourselves much in going from house to house of our many relatives. We enjoyed best of all to attend the skating rink and the library. We have nice skates, and can skim along the floor easily and gracefully. One of our aunts has a large house with wide verandas all around, where we can skate splendidly.

The weather will soon be pleasant, for October generally has blue skies, with hazy clouds passing in and fro, as if trying to lessen the glare of Old Sol. The nights are lovely, with so many stars, each one endeavoring to outshine its neighbor. I have heard that the moonlight nights of Florida surpassed those of Italy. Beauty is the name of our spitz dog. Peek has a cat, and sister has the sweetest singing canary.

There will not be many oranges this season in our part of the state, but in Southern Florida there is a full crop. The caterpillar has injured the cotton crop, but there are plenty of corn and potatoes. Truck farming is all the go now. There were quantities of all kinds of vegetables, fruits and melons shipped from here this year; but such perishable fruit as figs can not be shipped profitably, and we have so many of them. I sent a box to Jacksonville, and sold them to a firm which makes them up in marmalade. We sent the money to a florist, and got mamma some geraniums, fuchsias, and begonias, and we assisted her to plant them in pots, and put them in the front piazza, where they will bloom all the winter, and where we can obtain both no-hole bouquets when we go out. With ever so many good wishes for the success of YOUNG PEOPLE, I will conclude.

FISCALES, VIRGINIA.

I promised you a long time ago that if I saw my first letter in print I would write and tell you how we camped out in the mountains. We started early one Tuesday morning in September, and went ten miles over a mountain ridge to a broad and lovely stream, which affords the best of bass fishing, bathing, and other amusements. We staid three days, and every night we built an immense fire out of the logs which had drifted down the creek during floods, and we all stretched up on rugs and lay round the fire to sleep. It was beautiful to see the water rippling in the starlight, and the bright blaze of our fire in the quiet night. Our party consisted of six—my father, my sisters Helen and Florence, an English friend, a little school-fellow of mine named Mac, and myself. Our little dog Fritz, which I told you about before, accompanied us. Our whole party together caught the new trout which we thought very good sport. We children spent half our time washing, bathing, and sailing on old rafts down the creek. We cooked Mac's, and made coffee, and ate our supper sitting round the fire.

We are a family of doctors. My father and two brothers are doctors, and I am going to be one when I grow up. I like you so. I love you very much, and my mother takes your BAZAR and MONTHLY. Mamma. We have forty-eight turkeys, but we can not raise chickens because a Hattie, the negroes steal them all; and we have our turkey-houses. I will send her full name and address to 3521 Flammilton street, this city. I will write to her.

A very kind uncle and aunt took me to the Isles of Shoals for nearly a week this summer. They are several islands off the coast of New Hampshire, just rocky islands, with not a tree on them. We were on Star Island, at the top (which is the largest), and the island was so small that I could walk all around it. We had such a nice time climbing over the rocks, finding the sea-weed, and watching the ocean. One day we went to Londerm's Island to gather shells (there were none on Star Island), and another day we took a lovely sail. One afternoon it rained, and the next day the waves were just gray, and we were on the rocks to see them, and the spray dashed up ever so high! I wish you could have seen it, but perhaps you have. All of the rocks were bleached very white by the salt water. I was sorry to leave there, although we were going to my uncle's lovely house in Massachusetts.

Some of the receipts are so nice that I will try a few. I think I have no pet except my little sisters, but I want to get a kitten. I am a little more than eleven years old. My cousin lives in Kentucky, and I hope she will write me like the paper, and write too. With lots of love,

WEST PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

Twice I have begun a letter to you, but I never finished either. I think that HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is the nicest paper I have ever seen, the stories are all so good, but I like Lucy C. Lillie's best. I think that "Dick and D" is very interesting, and "Sam" is very good. I have just read Lizzie N. P.'s letter, and if she will send her full name and address to 3521 Flammilton street, this city, I will write to her.

I have a little friend whom I love dearly, and who lives quite near me in this lovely city. She is one of dear YOUNG PEOPLE'S subscribers, and a long time ago she wrote a letter, which you published. Ever since I read her letter, I have thought that I would like to write one. I am only a little girl ten years old, but I don't see why little girls may not write letters just as well as young ladies, if they don't do it all the time. I am sure I could find enough to say for I could tell about my school, my pet bird, my dolls, and the nice times I have with my playmates, and oh! just lots of things that I know big folks would never think of. I guess I will tell you about my bird; its name is Willie, and it is a little brown singer. A lady gave it to me two years ago. Sometimes we get it out of the cage, and it is so much fun to see it hop around. Sometimes it will fly on our heads, and peck at our hair. School has begun again, and I am in Room No. 5. I will be so glad when I can go into No. 10. I have written quite a long letter now. I will tell you my name: it is

ROOFTON, NEW JERSEY.

I thought I would write to you, and see my letter published, but I thought it would be better if my round like a shadow. My cousin Clare is staying here, and we have a paper named "The Rover." Yesterday we went to the kitchen to make cake, but it was all burned to a cinder. I think Jimmy Brown's stories are splendid. I wish HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE came every day. I like "Dick and D." I am seven years old, almost eight. I have a little sister named Burnie—her real name is Bertha. I have a microscope, and I killed a black and white bee, and pulled out its sting; it looked dreadful. I should not have done that. I have written quite a long letter now. I will tell you my name: it is

MARGIE R. A.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA.

Having never written to you before, I have decided to do so to-day. To-day is my birthday, and I am having a very nice time. I have made two your receipts for sponge-cake, and made two very nice ones, which we all enjoyed after dinner, and I wish that I could send you some. I see that all the others were almost alike. I have one will write about nine, though I have but one, and that one is a baby sister three weeks old, but quite large for her age, and strong also. I have three sisters besides the one I have just written to you, one is ill, but will be well very soon, I hope, and then we can all play with her. We all look forward with much pleasure to the day when your paper will come, but the whole paper is just as nice a paper as can be had.

MARY B.

DAYTON, OHIO.

I would like to tell the young people of one of my pets which I am very fond of. It is a little robin parrot, and her name is Darling. She is a beauty, and will salute any child who calls with, "How do you do, darling? you are a pretty darling, my pet." She also will call you "darling, my love." I like her very much, and when I am out of the room or in the yard, she will call, "Oh, Miss Love! oh, Miss Love! come here!" She also says, "Good-by," and there are many other things which she says very often, as he usually gives her a nut or a raisin, of which she is very fond. If he enters the room and says no attention to her, she will immediately salute him in a sweet voice, as "Why, Charley, how do you do?" and laugh in such a glad way, until he gives her a nut; then she will hold it in her claw and begin to chink, cluck, as she usually were at that time. She will also sing like a chick like a hen, and sings in the peculiar way that a hen does when she is hunting a nest. She moves like a cat, cries like a baby, and, best of all, she will sing like a bird. She will sit on the side in such a sweet way and hum a tune until she goes to sleep. It is the tune that is used to quiet our other little darling to rest at night. He is a little more than three years old and will next month, and he lives at our house with his mamma. My bird has learned many of her cute ways from him, especially the call of "Miss Love, my love." I have a very nice cat, and she will sit with me. She knows nothing of the old worn-out sentences of "Pretty Polly" and "Polly wants a cracker," instead she says, "Pretty Darling, my love." Darling will sit on my lap, and when quite a task to keep her from learning those sentences, but I have succeeded so far.

And now, hoping that I have not wearied you, I will close this letter. I have many plans for the Post-office Box. I should like to join the Housekeepers' Club. When I received No. 16, it was on Saturday, and as I had not tried to make cake for more than a year, I immediately went to the kitchen to try Nina R.'s grandma's cake. I followed the receipt carefully, and it made two delicious cakes, and I carried one of them to my grandma for her birthday. She pronounced it very nice. Please thank Nina R. for it. Much love to you, dear Postmistress. Good-by.

SADIE E. L.

SULLY'S ISLAND, SOUTH CAROLINA.

My two little sisters and myself have been taking YOUNG PEOPLE for two years, and we enjoy reading it ever so much. We are all spending the summer on this island, which is off the coast, and we are having a very nice time. We go on the beach every afternoon; it is a splendid beach, and some people say one of the best they have ever seen. I enjoy sitting on the beach and looking at the water and at the sunset, which is always beautiful; but we shall all be glad enough when the time comes to go back to Charleston, which is our home. I am writing this with my left hand, because my right is paralyzed. I must close now; so good-by.

ELLA C. M. S.

Many girls write less plainly with their right hand than you have written with your left.

BOOKVILLE, NEW BRUNSWICK.

I sit down to write you a letter. I am nine years old. I live out in the country, but belong to St. John. I have a beautiful doll, which my papa brought from France. I have been across the Atlantic to England and Scotland. I think the story of "Prince Lazybones" was very nice; also I like "Dick and D"; I hope it will not be so short as "Prince Lazybones" was.

ETHEL M.

CLERMONT, NEW YORK.

We are two cousins who have taken HARPER'S Young People for a long time, and we both think it is very interesting. We have wanted to write for some time, but were afraid it would not be printed. The seven little cousins who wrote you a letter from Pittsfield, Massachusetts, are our cousins. Don't you think they had a terrible experience? They told us all about it when they came to our house to visit after the accident. We are staying in a lovely country place this summer. We have a dear shepherd dog here, and he is a beautiful fellow; we call him Shep. We have just been reading the story of "Captain Kidd's Money," and will you please tell us if there really was any money buried. Please print this, as it is a surprise to our unmasms. With love to the Postmistress, we are MOLLY T. L. and ELsie D.

Captain Kidd buried silver, gold, jewels, and other treasures, to the value of $40,000 sterling. A large part of it was in 1699. The rest of the treasure was a pirate these articles were discovered. There are no grounds for the belief that he ever hid away any other money than this.

EL DORADO, KANSAS.

This is my first letter, but I have wanted to write you sooner, only I was afraid I could not write well enough. I will tell you how I came to take HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. One evening I was reading about a papa and mamma, and when I got through papa said that I read so nicely that he would get me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and I was so glad! I have taken the paper for a year. I like it very much.

I like El Dorado. We have lived in Kansas very long. We have a nice large yard, and two hamocks. I have two pets—a canary-bird and an antelope. The antelope's name is "Icy" lover, because it likes clover so well; the bird's name is Dickie. I am eight years old. If you should ever come to Kansas, I would like to see you. Please send me the largest-size dolls' pattern. My mamma's skirt and I are going to make our dolls a dress alike. The five cents is for the pattern. Your friend, HATTIE K. T.

If I ever go to Kansas, you may look for me, little Hattie, for I would like to see you. I hope you found the pattern easy, and that the dolls are delighted with it.

Bertie R., who writes the next letter, has been quite a traveller, and the Postmistress keeps among her treasures a little bit of edelweiss which he once sent her from the Alps. Now, however, he is at home, and very busy with slates, pencils, books, and exercises:

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

I am ten years old, and am going to school now, and studying German, but I don't like school; I like travelling in Europe best. I have crossed the ocean eight times. The last time was last November, and it was awfully stormy, and so rough mamma was afraid, but I wasn't. The steamship got on one head and kept on rolling out, and we just couldn't eat soup it spilled so; even the big folks let it spill, only the captain didn't spill his. Mamma said that was because he knew just what direction the ship was going to tumble next, and could balance his plate in his hands. I am going to be a doctor, like my papa, only I won't go out nights, as papa did. I hope you will print this; won't you, please? Good-by.

BERTIE R.

ANAPOLIS, MARYLAND.

I am a constant reader of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, and think it is delightful reading. I will be nine on the 11th of December, and my mamma is only boy. I have plenty of toys, and good books to read. Mamma tells me that Santa Claus will bring me a watch for a Christmas present. Now I wish you would please tell me how to make a Santa Claus. The boys tell me there is none, and papa and mamma give me evasive answers when I question them about him. I write you now more for fear my letter may be too long.

BERTIE C. II.

Let me tell you, Bertie, that I am still so much of a child that I believe in good old Santa Claus, and I advise you not to listen to the boys, nor even to ask your parents too many questions, but just look forward hopefully to the day when you are to have a watch. I hope you will treat it better than I do mine, for I often forget to wind it up, and so neglect astonishes it so that it comes to a full stop. Have you ever climbed to the top of the state-house in your beautiful old town, and looked down from there on the gardens, with their thick hedges of box so nicely clipped, and the green fields, and the moss-grown walls? As I remember that view, it is one well worth gazing at.

GHERMANTOWN, PHILADELPHIA.

I am a little girl twelve years old, and people say I am very large for my age. I have a canary-bird; its name is Dick. When I go away for the summer one of our girls takes care of it. I have four sisters and two brothers. My little brother is very sweet, and he is three years old; her birthday comes on the 29th of February. I wish Sydney Dayre would write again. I liked the story of "Pearl" very much.

EVA S. C.

MOUNT WASHINGTON, MARYLAND.

I am a little girl nine years old. My sister Bessie wrote to you and told you we were going to have a goat. We have him now, a tall one with long horns; he looks like a deer. We have a nice little carriage, something like a village cart; two of us can get in together. We have splendid games with him, but try not to drive him too long nor too fast. I have a lovely little bird, and when I put my finger in the cage he hops on it and pecks at it; he does not hurt much, though.

BARTIE D.

FURSA, ILLINOIS.

I am a girl twelve years old, and have taken HARPER'S Young People ever since it was published. I am thankful to say that I live in a fine city in the country. I do pity city girls who have no fields to play in and no woods to stroll in on pleasant afternoons. I go to school every day, and I like it very much. I have seven big brothers, Dick, Dandy, Sally, Billie, Queen, Mary, and Jimmie. Two dogs, named Jack and Nick, and six cats. I have five brothers and sisters, named Fred, Elsie, Bertie, Johnnie, and Jessamine. The latter are twins, six years old; they were born on Washington's Birthday.

ORIE M. B.

NEW YORK CITY.

My sister Addie and I have taken YOUNG PEOPLE for three years, and like it very much. We think that "Nan" was a lovely story, and hope Mrs. Lillie will write a sequel to it. My sister has a letter in the Post office box from Dr. Mary's Free Hospital saying they wished the children to take a vote to see whether the next child was to be a girl or a boy. We are both in favor of its being a boy.

ADDIE and CLARA E.

NEWBURY, VERMONT.

I am a little girl eleven years old. I have a brother nine years old, and a sister seven. I write you in a double, but as I can't write very well she has a great many clothes. I wash and iron all her dresses and under-clothes. I am making a crazy cushion for grandpapa's sister, and am very fond of playing with paper dolls; we cut them out of fashion papers, and make dresses for them.

EFFIE II.

Maud S. B.: I will try to have some very easy puzzles for you soon.—L. B.: Play out doors, run, climb, and get all the fresh air you can. You will not get a cold, but as I can't write very well I used to like those things myself.—Lucy S. A.: I am putting together some receipts for candy.—Lizzie N. P.: is invited to write to Blanche P. S., 55 Oak Street, Baltimore, Maryland. And now I think Lizzie will have as many correspondents as she can attend to without neglecting other duties.—Lester J. P.: It was a great pleasure to meet the President, I am sure.—Susie T.: Sadie, or whoever receives your gift, will be pleased. Write to her care, at Newbury, Vermont.—Bessie W. H., Bessie A. S., Mary P. N., Mary E. H., Ulysses S. N., and May H. will please accept thanks for their letters, which have been read with interest.

A NEW SERIAL.

In our next number we shall publish the first chapter of a new serial story, entitled

THE LOST CITY:

OR,

The Boy Explorers in Central Asia.

By DAVID KER.

Mr. Ker's name has long been familiar to our readers, who have enjoyed his thrilling tales of adventure in all parts of the world. They will welcome a long story from his pen. He is a great traveller, the distant lands of Asia, the forests of Africa, and the lonely islands of the Pacific being as familiar to him as are the streets of their own city or village to the boys and girls who read his stories. In "The Lost City" he carries his readers into the strange and exciting districts of Afghanistan. His boy heroes are there during the terrible days that preceded the late war between Afghanistan and England at the time of the massacre of Major Cavagnar and his faithful band of associates.

The author describes with care the novel and interesting characteristics of this far-distant and almost unknown country. The story abounds in adventure, and the scenes and incidents are as varied and thrilling as the land is strange and the people singular.

NUTTING.

A VERY SELF-WILLED HORSE.

THERE is an old nursery rhyme which teaches that kindness and patience are the best methods to pursue in the case of a "donkey that wouldn't go." An English gentleman relates that he had a horse that "wouldn't go," but when he came to try the patience remedy, he found that the horse had a larger supply of that virtue than he himself possessed, which, as will presently be seen, was considerable.

The English gentleman's horse was a confirmed "balker." One Saturday afternoon, when he was returning home in his dog-cart, the horse balked, as it had often done before, and its master thought that this time he would try what calmness and patience would do. Accordingly he sat still in the dog-cart, and addressed the animal in soothing tones and kindly words; but to no purpose. It was exactly ten minutes past four on Saturday afternoon when the horse stopped in the middle of the road.

The afternoon wore away, the sun sank below the horizon, darkness settled down over the landscape, and yet the man and horse remained to fight out the battle between obstinacy and patience. Through the long night they staid there, the whip remaining quietly in the socket, and when the sun arose after his voyage around the world he found the coastest still going on.

At six o'clock in the morning the owner bade his groom fetch a cart-rope and tie it to the horse's fore-leg; but when the groom did so, and pulled with all his might, the only result was that the horse stood with his fore-leg stuck out as if he were a bronze statue. At seven o'clock the horse became perfectly furious, seizing the shaft with his teeth, and shaking it, kicking and stamping with rage the while. At half past seven the groom tried to tempt him with a measure of oats, but the angry beast would have none of it, notwithstanding that it was twenty hours since he had had a mouthful of food or a drop of water.

Then his master had to confess himself beaten in the trial of patience, and having procured some tough shoots of ground-ash, he applied them to Mr. Horse's back so vigorously that that self-willed quadruped was obliged to confess himself beaten so far as his hide was concerned. It was then twenty minutes before eight on Sunday morning, the coastest having lasted fifteen hours and a half, during which the horse did not budge an inch, nor his owner stir from his seat in the carriage.

This is probably the most remarkable exhibition of obstinacy on the one side and of patience on the other that was ever known, and the story as told here is exactly true.

ENIGMA.

BY E. M. TRAUQUAIR.

STRANGERS twenty-one, they tell,
On a time came here to dwell.
Like each other there was none;
Whole and perfect every one.
Yet, though fairly formed were they,
Was not one a word could say
So, to tell us what they thought,
Five interpreters they brought—
These were learned folks, in sooth
Spoke the first with open mouth;
Second like a baby cried:
Long-drawn sounds the third one tried;
Like a wagoner I knew
Called the fourth; the fifth like you,
And with their wondrous arts and skill,
The noise they made is lasting still.

HOW I TAMED MY CANARY.

BY EDITH JANE EVANS.

HE was brought to me from Malta, and when he came I put him in a nice clean cage, with pure water and seed. I did everything for him myself, and fed him on canary-seed. The hemp-seed, of which he is very fond, I gave him from my finger and thumb or my lips. After he got to know me I put my hand in his cage, with a nice fresh bit of groundsel or a few hemp-seeds on it.

The first two or three days he would not come on it, but by degrees he became tamer, and then he came. Then I took to letting him out in the room when there was no fire, and putting a nice bit of groundsel on my shoulder. I waited to see if he would come to it, but he would not. I tried again the next day, and after doing it every day for some time he came on. He is very tame now, and I let him out in the room every day, and he will fly from his cage across the room to my shoulder.

THE LOST CITY;

OR, THE BOY EXPLORERS IN CENTRAL ASIA.

BY DAVID KER.

CHAPTER I

ACROSS THE TARTAR STEPPES.

LOOK out, boys! over we go again!"
 Crash! went the left wheel as he spoke, the wagon

"OVER WE GO AGAIN!"

topped over, and out into the ankle-deep dust flew two men and two boys, amid a kind of water-fall of bags, boxes, water-melons, revolvers, biscuits, flasks, and wisps of hay, all mingled together.

The spot where this "spill" occurred looked like what it was—one of the most desolate and barbaric regions on the face of the earth. The rising sun had already thrown a broad gleam of light upon the huge rounded slopes that rose on every side like the domes of a mosque, from which the morning mists were rolling off slowly and sullenly, as the smoke rising from a battle-field. But a floating depth of purple shadow still hovered over the endless level of the great plain below, clothed with the short yellowish grass of the Central Asian steppes, and a silence deep and solemn as the stillness of a newly created world brooded on earth and sky.

The only sound that broke this universal hush was the muffled roar of a water-fall in the shadowy depths of the gorge which the travellers had been skirting, following as best they might the windings of one of those break-neck bridle-paths which pass for roads in Central Asia. On the brow of an overhanging cliff, just above the scene of the disaster, rose the low round tower and massive boundary wall of a genuine Eastern hill fortress, in the shadow of whose pointed archway a dozen gaunt, swarthy Cossacks, in white frocks and red goat-skin pants, lay sleeping side by side.

The first of the overturned travellers to regain his feet was a small, wiry, black-haired lad of sixteen, in a white forage cap, linen jacket, and knee-high boots embroidered with green thread. His dark face wore the keen, self-reliant look of one used to find himself in difficult situations, and to get out of them by his own unaided courage and shrewdness. He chuckled as he helped up his comrade, a tall, good-looking young fellow with light curly hair, who was looking ruefully at the handful of broken glass that he had just drawn from his watch pocket.

"Never mind, Ernest my boy; you're lucky to get through any journey in this country without breaking your neck as well as your watch glass. Ain't that so, Bill?"

A grunt prefaced the reply of Bill—a big, square-built, powerful man, whose scarred cheek and slight limp would have shown that he had "smelled powder," even if his hard, brick-red face, short thick mustache, and stiff military brightness of bearing, had not stamped him unmistakably as an English soldier.

"That's just the way with you Yankees, Mr. Tom; you'll talk again a place fast enough yourselves, but let anybody else say a word, and you're down on 'em directly. Now I'll be bound we shall have you praisin' up this here country to-morrow again, just as if it wasn't the most good-for-nothing hole that a man ever clapped eyes on. When it ain't roastin' you black, it's a-blowin' dust fit to put your eyes out; and when it ain't doin' that, it's rainin'." The very thunder, 'stead of an honest round-mouthed peal like our own, makes a nasty jabbering row, as if it was a-bryin' to talk French; and the whole place is so precious flat that if you was to put your hat down and stand on it, you could see twenty miles round."

"Bravo, Bill!" cried Ernest; "you remind me of Colonel Campbell's story of the soldier who fell asleep on the march in India, and tumbling over a fallen tree as he was tramping on with his eyes shut, sang out, 'I say, boys, ain't this a precious country, where a man can't have a quiet nap for half an hour without breaking his head!'"

While they were speaking, the Tartar driver (who, having luckily fallen on his head, had naturally escaped unhurt) had rummaged out of the chaos a hatchet, a rope, and a strong piece of wood, indispensable articles upon any wagon journey either in Asiatic or European Russia. The fourth inside passenger, a tall, handsome, white-robed Afghan, who was looking as dignified and solemn as if he had not been sprawling head over heels a moment before, now stepped forward to assist in righting the wagon. The wheel was soon in its place again, and away they went.*

"Cheer up, Bill!" laughed Ernest Clairmont; "your troubles will soon be over now. Tashkent'st just over the hill, isn't it, Tom?"

Sure enough, a few minutes later they crowned the highest ridge, and rattled down curve after curve of rough gravelly road into the great plain of Tashkent. The city itself was still hidden by a mass of dark glossy leaves, but the increasing number of laden carts and donkeys, sun-burned horsemen, striding camels strung out in single file, and white-turbaned, blue-robed natives trudging bare-foot through the dust, with their little wallets at their backs, showed that it could not be far off.

Suddenly a huge tunnel-like archway yawned before them, in the cool shadow of which several bearded, swarthy fellows were munching lepeskki (wheaten cakes) and slices of water-melon, while high overhead towered a massive rampart of sun-dried clay, standing out white and bare in the blistering sunshine.

"Tashkent!" shouted Tom Hilton, imitating the voice of a railway conductor; "all tickets ready, please!"

They rattled up and down three or four narrow, straggling, dirty streets, all exactly alike, scurried past General Kauffman's beautiful little park, with its toy water-falls, trim shrubberies, and steep central ridge, crowned with the pavilion set apart for the military band, and pulled up at length before a small door in a high mud wall. It opened at their first knock, and a long, lean, sallow Cossack greeted Tom with a military salute and a joyful grin.

"Gday otetz moi, Vaska?" (where's my father, Basil?) asked Tom, shaking hands with him heartily.

"Vot on prikhitod, Phoma Yakovitch" (here he comes, Thomas son of James), answered the Cossack, pointing to a fine-looking man in the uniform of a Russian Colonel of Engineers, but with America clearly written in every line of his firm, intelligent face and tall sinewy figure, who came striding across the smooth greensward to meet them.

"Welcome home, lads!" cried Colonel Hilton (for he it was), holding out a hand to each; "I've got all ready for you inside. Ernest, my dear boy, I'm very glad to have you back again; you know your father was my oldest friend."

"And as brave an officer and as kind a gentleman as you'd find in the whole British army," broke in Bill Barlow. "I was beside him, you know, colonel, when them Afghan blackguards knocked him over; and he says to you, says he, 'Jim, be a father to my boy,' and you says to him, says you, 'I will, Harry, so help me God!' And so you have, colonel; and I'd like to see the man as dare deny it."

"Now, boys," said the Colonel, when our heroes had done full justice to the good breakfast spread for them in a tent in the garden, "I'm sorry I can't go around with you to-day, for I've got about a dozen Russian officers coming to see me on business, one after the other; so, Tom, you'll have to pilot Ernest about the town yourself. I dare say you'll be able to show him something worth seeing."

The prophecy was soon fulfilled. To the untraveller English boy, fresh from his Rugby school life, and the joggert civilization of England, everything that he saw in this outlandish region seemed wonderful beyond belief; camels walking about the streets just like horses at home; Afghan chiefs swaggering about with a whole arsenal of pistols and daggers in their red silken sashes; bravery Sarts,

* The Tartars are very handy in repairing accidents of this kind. I once lost a wheel in a night journey through the Khanate of Khokand, and within ten minutes we were going as fast as ever.

† The capital of Russian Turkestan. Its name signifies "Stone Village."—D. K.

with bulging skins of water poised on their bare brown shoulders; full-sized melons going at three cents each, and magnificent grapes at one cent a pound; sheets of wheaten bread, large enough for a man to lie down upon, being rolled up and carried off; women wrapped in gauze bed-curtains so closely as to leave nothing visible but their eyes; gaunt, wild-eyed Turkomans in sheep-skin caps, looking covetously at the embroidered uniforms of the Russian officers; and swartly Jews, in long dark robes, high, black, funnel-shaped hats, and broad yellow girdles.

Even the wagon that carried them was a sufficient curiosity in itself, consisting merely of one huge beam on which they sat astride. They had quite enough to do to hold on while this queer conveyance bumped and jolted along the uneven streets, now plunging into a rut almost as deep as a ditch, now rattling down a steep incline, now flying around a sharp corner with such a jerk that they seemed to be shooting bodily off into space, while their Tartar hackman, with a glow of excitement on his greenish, narrow-eyed, beardless face, flourished his whip and screamed like a madman.

But Ernest's delight rose higher still when, quitting their conveyance, they tramped across the bridge spanning the deep narrow gully which separates the old town from the new. To him the neat stores and smart public buildings, the spacious squares and leafy boulevards of the "Russian quarter," seemed quite commonplace compared with the straggling, ditch-like, rubbish-choked streets, the flat-roofed, mud-walled hovels, the swarm of gay-colored robes and monkey-like faces that filled the "Tartar town." And when they at length came upon a real mosque with real domes and minarets, and a wide-paved court-yard before it (enclosing a small tank, beside which a dozen gayly dressed Mohammedans were smoking, or drinking "brick-tea," with mutton fat in it instead of milk), his exultation knew no bounds.

But his attention was suddenly attracted by mingled outcries close at hand, and the rising of a thick cloud of smoke, reddened with flame, above the roofs of the surrounding houses.

"I say!" cried he, starting, "that must be a fire!"
 "To be sure it is," answered Tom, coolly; "we have one here almost every day. Come along and look at it."

A few steps round the corner brought them to the spot. A pile of grass spread to dry on the flat roof of a house, according to Central Asian custom, had caught fire, and was sending up a blaze which but for the perfect stillness of the air would speedily have run along the whole street, every roof being covered with heaps of grass as dry as tinder.

Even as it was, a single spark might at any moment kindle a general conflagration, and Tom's quick eye saw at once that there was not an instant to lose.

"Come along, Ernest," cried he; "let's pull down that next heap before it catches. Here goes!"

So saying, he vaulted like an acrobat upon the shoulders of a big native who stood close to the wall, and before the astounded man had time to open his mouth, scrambled off him on to the projecting corner of the roof, where he was seen the next moment flinging down huge armfuls of grass on the heads of the crowd.

But before Ernest could follow, a heave of the throng pushed him close to a tall man in a rich robe of crimson silk, with a dark, high-boned Persian face, who was forcing his way through the press as if he were some great man, letting fall his heavy whip, just as Ernest reached him, on the bare shoulders of a poor old Tartar cripple, who screamed with pain.

"Leave the poor fellow alone!" shouted Clairmont, springing forward; "don't you see he's a cripple?"

For all answer the Persian struck at Clairmont himself; but this was an unlucky move. Ernest seized the uplifted arm with one hand, while he planted the other (little dreaming what that blow was one day to cost him) so full in his enemy's lean, wolfish face as to send the latter reeling against the wall.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE LITTLE MUSICIAN.

HOW many of the readers of YOUNG PEOPLE ever think of the great results that may flow from one little act of kindness?

More than fifty years ago the famous singer Madame Malibran was sitting in her room in one of the great hotels of London. She was very tired, for she had just been holding a large reception, during which some of the greatest people in England had visited her. Word was brought her that a little lad wished to speak with her. In spite of her fatigue she gave orders that he should be admitted.

A little flaxen-haired fellow of some ten years timidly entered the room, and taking a roll of paper from his pocket, said: "Madame, everybody tells me that you are so good, so very good, to the poor. I do not come to beg, madame, though we are so poor that my dear mamma, who is very ill, has to do without both food and medicine. I thought if you would sing my little song at one of your concerts perhaps somebody would buy it, and I could get the wine and medicine the doctor has ordered."

Tears stood in his eyes as he made his request, and as Madame Malibran took the manuscript and rapidly hummed the lines over, they rolled slowly down his cheeks.

"Did you write this music, a little child like you?"

"Yes, madame."

The lady took from her purse a coin and a card and pressed them into the boy's hand.

"Run home as quickly as you can," she said, "and get for your mother all she needs, and this evening come to my concert, to which the ticket will admit you."

Pierre did as he was told, and when evening came he went to the theatre, presented his ticket, and was taken to a seat away down near the stage. The lights, the warmth, and the bright colors, to say nothing of the crowd of handsomely dressed gentlemen and ladies, bewildered and dazzled him, and he could only think, "Oh, if mamma were but here, I should be so happy!"

Presently he glanced at the platform, and there stood his lovely lady. She began to sing, and little Pierre's heart throbbed as if it would burst as the familiar notes of his own little song fell upon his ear. Its simple melody touched the audience too, and it was sung again, and at its close the house rang with applause.

How the rest of the concert passed Pierre never knew. He staid until it was all over, and then hurried home and told his wonderful news.

Several days after, Madame Malibran called upon Pierre's mother and told her that a London publisher had offered three hundred pounds for the song, which offer she had accepted, and pouring into the astonished woman's lap a pile of notes and gold, said,

"Madame, your son will one day be a great composer. Thank God for the gift He has given him."

Pierre and his sick mother mingled their tears and thanks to one who seemed to them like an angel sent from heaven. With the money thus obtained Pierre was enabled to pursue his musical studies, and in after-years verified the great singer's prediction, and became one of the most talented composers of his day.

What might little Pierre's fate have been if a cruel servant had sent him away from the great singer's door, or if Madame Malibran had refused to listen to his timid little appeal?

PYGMALION AND GALATEA.

PYGMALION, in the story-book,
Desired no greater bliss
Than waking up his statue fair
By giving it a kiss.
I wonder could it happen now
If I should give her—this.

Oh dear! I've been and done it now—
She's tumbled on the floor.
I wonder if she hurt herself;
I guess she hurt me more.
Girls always do make such a fuss,
That kissing is a bore.

HOW PHOEBE KEPT THE LIGHT-HOUSE.

BY SOPHIE SWETT.

THE Plum-Pudding was a rocky island two miles out of Podunquit Harbor; in fact, it was nothing but a rock, although some scanty herbage and a few stunted pine-trees clung to its sides. It was shaped exactly like a plump, round Christmas pudding that has risen well in its pan, and the rock was curiously mottled, so that it did look, if one had a lively imagination, like a pudding besprinkled with plums.

All around the Plum-Pudding, concealed by the water, were ledges of rock, as if the pudding had spilled over from its pan, and these were very dangerous to mariners, so a light-house had been built on the tip-top of the Plum-Pudding, where its light could be seen for miles and miles around.

Saul Rundlett and his little daughter Phoebe kept the Plum-Pudding light-house. Saul had been a sailor for half his life, but two or three narrow escapes from ship-wreck had convinced him that it was desirable to have something solid beneath one's feet, and he had with considerable difficulty—for there had been suspicions that Saul was not quite "steady" enough for a light-house keeper—obtained the position on Plum-Pudding rock.

Phoebe was born there, and, her mother dying when she was very small, had grown up there almost as wild and untrained as the sea-gulls that built their nests in the crevices of the rocks. Quite as untrained she might have been if it had not been for Aunt Huldah Maria, who lived on Mouse Island. Mouse Island was only half a mile from the Plum-Pudding. Like the Plum-Pudding, it was named for its shape, but it required a greater effort of the imagination to see the mouse than the plum-pudding; it looked more like a mouse made of a handkerchief than like the genuine animal. But it had a veritable mouse's tail, a long narrow strip of land extending out into the water, and on this strip most of the inhabitants lived, the other part of the island being rocky and barren. Aunt Huldah Maria lived on the very tip of the mouse's tail, in a queer little house that was made of the hull of an old ship—the very ship of which her husband had been mate when he sailed on his last voyage.

There was a school on Mouse Island for six months in the year, and Phoebe went to it—sometimes; she could not go regularly, because—well, although it is very sad it must be told—because it was not always safe to leave her father in charge of the light-house. He had been "steady" ever since he assumed the position of light-house keeper, fifteen years before, until the last year. Even after that long period of successful resistance his old enemy, the love of drink, had fallen upon him and conquered him. And nobody knew it but Phoebe.

Captain Saul, as everybody called him, had always been in the habit of going to Jim Bowling's shop, at Podunquit Harbor, which was a sort of sailors' "saug-harbor," to smoke his pipe and spin yarns with his old cronies, but he never drank anything there. And it was only within the last year that he had brought anything home from the Harbor to drink. Now he did it often; indeed, it was seldom that he came home without it, and all by himself he would have a drinking bout, growing merry at first and singing old sea-songs and cracking jokes, and poor little Phoebe, who did not know the cause, would think his mood was delightful, and wish he would always seem as happy; but soon he began to drink more heavily, and would pass from the merry stage into the cross and irritable one, and then become stupid, sleepy, utterly helpless. And besides her grief and humiliation Phoebe was constantly anxious lest her father should lose his situation. They had no money, and where in the wide world could they find another home if they had to leave the Plum-Pudding!

This was the sorrow and care that had changed Phoebe's face from a round and rosy and dimpled little one so that it was now pinched and wan, and had a care-worn look that was sad to see.

There were several men who wanted Captain Saul's position at the light-house, and would be glad to report anything that they could discover to injure him. Every day Phoebe expected that the blow would fall, and they would be obliged to leave their home.

Aunt Huldah Maria knew that something was the matter at the light-house, but what it was she could not discover. Phoebe's dead mother was her only sister, and she had never approved of her marrying Captain Saul. She did not like Captain Saul, and Phoebe knew it very well. Aunt Huldah Maria was too busy with her household cares to go often to the light-house, but she watched and questioned Phoebe very narrowly whenever she had an opportunity.

"That child has an old head on her shoulders, and she would go to the stake to save her father!" Aunt Huldah Maria declared. "But there's something wrong over to the Plum-Pudding, and it's my belief that before the year is out Leander Judkins will get the place. He's watching Saul as a cat watches a mouse, and if Saul has taken to his old ways, la, sakes! what can that child do to save the place for him?"

There was to be a great merry-making on Mouse Island. Phœbe's oldest cousin, Maria Cordilly, was to marry Jed Collins, who was soon to sail as mate of the Flying Scud, the finest ship that ever hailed from Podunquit Harbor. All the relatives from far and near were to be there, to say nothing of everybody on Mouse Island, and half Podunquit Harbor. Aunt Huldah Maria's oven was full of goodies day and night for two weeks beforehand, and the fiddler from Podunquit Harbor was engaged. Mouse Island had never known such festivity before.

But when Phœbe said she "didn't think she should come; she would rather stay at home and let her father come," there was a terrible outcry. All the children under twelve began to scream as loud as their lungs would allow, and Maria Cordilly said she "didn't care to have any wedding at all if Phœbe wasn't coming to it." Aunt Huldah Maria said "Phœbe should come, or she would know the reason why." And that was just what Phœbe didn't want—that Aunt Huldah Maria should "know the reason why." So she said, if she possibly could, she would come.

She tried to persuade her father not to go to Podunquit Harbor for two or three days before the wedding, but on the very day he had an errand that could not be delayed, he said. He came back only just in time for Phœbe to get off to be at Aunt Huldah Maria's as early as she had promised; but he seemed very kind and affectionate, and told her "not to worry," he would "take good care of the light." Phœbe had looked in the sail-boat in which her father went to Podunquit Harbor, and found no bottle or jug rolled up in the sail, as she sometimes did. And her father had come down to push her boat off, and kissed her, which had become quite unusual, and said "it was a great pity if the mate couldn't go off on a little lark when the captain was left behind to take care of the ship." He always called the light-house a ship, and Phœbe had been the mate ever since she was five years old.

Aunt Huldah Maria rejoiced, even in the midst of her labors as hostess, at Phœbe's bright face. Perhaps the child had only been overworked or a little ailing, and there was not so much trouble at the Plum-Pudding as she had fancied.

But even while the fiddler was playing his most entrancing strains and the wedding cake was being passed in most generous slices, Phœbe heard a whisper that made her heart stand still.

David Judkins, the son of the man who wanted her father's place, was talking to another young man.

"It isn't such a very thick fog, and I never saw a fog so thick that you couldn't see some sign of the Plum-Pudding light from Mouse Island. And if it can't be seen to-night it isn't on account of the fog, but because the light isn't there."

"And the Advance is up in the harbor," said the other. "Captain Saul is at the end of his light-house-keeping if you are right."

"We might skirmish round a little and see," said

David Judkins. "It would be a pity for the officers not to find it out, you know."

The two young men went out. Phœbe knew well where they were going. The Advance was the government steamer, whose office was to supply the light houses and see that they were kept in proper condition. David Judkins was going to give warning that there was no light on the Plum-Pudding.

Phœbe slipped out of the house unobserved. The fog had come so suddenly that it seemed like magic. A dense gray mist seemed to have swallowed up the world. Only very brilliant rays of light could penetrate that fog, but the Plum-Pudding light was the finest on the coast. Phœbe's practical eye searched anxiously in the direction of the Plum-Pudding. But she looked in vain; there was thick darkness everywhere. The lamp on the Plum-Pudding was not lighted.

Phœbe listened, and heard the steady plash of retreating oars. David Judkins and his friend were rowing vigorously to Podunquit Harbor.

She ran down to the shore to the place where her row-boat was fastened. The tide had gone out, and left it so far from the water that it was almost impossible for her to get it off. But by dint of pushing and tugging she pushed it into the water at last. She got in, and rowed swiftly out into the thick darkness. She had not her compass,

"SHE PUSHED IT INTO THE WATER AT LAST."

which she usually carried in her pocket, and if she had, it was too dark to see it without a match. Could she find her way to the island?

Phœbe rowed swiftly in the direction where the Plum-Pudding ought to be. Presently she felt that she had gone far enough. But where was the island? Why did she not get there? Surely it was time. She was becoming confused. The bow of her boat seemed to be pointed toward the open sea. Had she been rowing out to sea instead of toward the Plum-Pudding? And then suddenly it seemed to her that she was going back toward Mouse Island.

Stout-hearted as she was, Phœbe felt her courage failing. She let the oars slip from her hands into the bottom of the boat, and uttered a faint cry of distress. It was so faint a cry that only the sea-gulls could have heard it, but an answer seemed to come; the sharp, shrill sound of a horn. It could be nothing but the great horn of the light-house, although it seemed to come from the direction of Podunquit Harbor. The sound was repeated; it was the light-house horn! Phœbe rowed with might and main, and very soon a dark shape loomed before her through the darkness, and her boat grazed the rocks of the Plum-Pudding. It was at the very steepest part of the rocks, but Phœbe could not delay to row to the landing. Up she scrambled, never heeding that her clothes were torn, and her hands scratched and bleeding.

It was difficult to find her way to the light-house in the thick darkness, and now there came no sound to guide her. Never before in Phœbe's lifetime had night found that light-house with darkened windows. And what had that horn meant? A terrible fear lest something worse than she had thought of had happened to her father made Phœbe's steps falter upon the very threshold. She pushed the door open, but only to find that the living-room, where her father always sat, was empty. Phœbe seized a light which was burning on the table and ran up the light-house stairs. At the top she almost stumbled over her father, lying in a heap, the great horn fallen from his hands, his red face and heavy breathing showing his sad condition.

Phœbe sprang to the lamp. The great dazzling light flashed out. There was a few moments of perfect silence, and then there came a shout from the water below. Phœbe seized the great horn and blew a blast, in answer.

"Light ahoy!" shouted a voice again.

Phœbe seized her father's arm and shook him with all her strength. He opened his eyes, and tried with her help to stand upon his feet.

"Put your head out of the window, and shout 'ahoy'! Oh, try your best to do it, father!" begged Phœbe.

He did try, but it was only a stammering whisper that came. Phœbe lowered her voice to the gruffest bass notes of which it was capable, and shouted "ahoy!" herself.

"All right!" shouted the voices below. "We thought there was no light! The fog is so thick that we could not see it ten rods away! Never saw such a fog even in this place! Advance will be here to-morrow with supplies."

"Ay, ay, sir!" shouted Phœbe, still in gruffest tones.

And then, to her great relief, she heard the sound of re-treating oars.

Then she helped her father down-stairs to his bed.

She did not go to bed herself, because she knew that her aunt would discover her absence, and send somebody in search of her, and it was not long before her cousin Augustus Algernon appeared.

"Tell Aunt Huldah Maria that I wanted to come home," was all that Phœbe would say.

"I don't see how you found your way," said Augustus Algernon. "The fog is so thick that I couldn't see a glimpse of the light till I got half-way over. Folks over on the island thought it wasn't lighted. But they may be sure you never could have got here without any compass if it hadn't been."

The next morning Captain Saul came to Phœbe and laid his hand upon her head.

"I tried to light the lamp, Phœbe; I didn't think I'd got so far that I couldn't, and I blew the horn twice; that was all I could do," he said.

"I might never have got here but for that, father," said Phœbe, taking his other hand in hers. She did not reproach him; she never thought of doing that.

"It was the mate that saved the ship last night," continued Captain Saul, in a voice that trembled, "but with God's help the captain will never be off duty again! He'll never dowse his peak and let that black pirate aboard again!" pointing to a bottle which Phœbe had seen many times before; "if not for his own sake, for the sake of his little gal he swears that before the Lord."

If you should see how plump and rosy Phœbe has grown you would know that Captain Saul had kept his word.

Aunt Huldah Maria had her suspicions about the doings of that night, but she never expressed them. And there are no signs that Leander Judkins will ever keep the light-house. The fog that was "so thick you couldn't see the Plum-Pudding light ten rods away" is still famous.

GOLDFINCHES, AND HOW TO TRAIN THEM.

THE goldfinch is one of the most interesting of bird pets. It is a native of Europe, but large numbers are brought to this country, and may be purchased from any bird-fancier. It is constantly in motion, and its song, though not powerful, is remarkably sweet. Besides this, it is a hardy little creature, is easily tamed, and soon becomes accustomed to the hand that feeds it.

The favorite food of the goldfinch when wild is thistle seed, but he may be fed on the ordinary seeds used for birds, and, as a special treat, the seed-pods of the common groundsel may be given to him. As a cage-bird the goldfinch stands in the first rank. He should have a roomy habitation wherein he can disport himself, and, if properly managed, be allowed to fly out now and then to stretch his wings. In a very little while he will display no alarm, but will hop about the table in search of any food which may take his fancy.

A goldfinch may be trained to a variety of tricks. Among others, he will pull up a little bucket of water from a tiny well, or draw up a slope to within his reach a small cart containing seed.

These interesting performances may be taught as follows: The little cart which runs upon the inclined strip of wood has a string attached to it, and the little water-bucket is in like manner suspended from the perch, and rests in the miniature well below. To teach the tricks quickly there should be another and a longer string fastened to the cart, and held by a person some distance off and out of sight. When the bird is disposed to eat, the cart should be steadily drawn up toward him, and when he has taken a few seeds it should be lowered away a little, whereupon he will try with his feet to hold the string, and to pull up the cart a little higher, until at last he will use his beak and feet together, and become master of the trick. With the water-bucket a similar course is taken, but where one does not wish to devote so much time to the teaching, the little cart can be fastened at first within reach, containing but a few seeds. Then it can be moved a little farther off, a few more grains being put in, and so on. The task is thus left mainly to the bird, who moves the cart nearer and nearer, until he has accustomed himself to draw it up.

Some persons keep goldfinches on perches chained to one of the supports by the leg. This is cruelty, and can not be approved of. It is not unusual to see this bird upon a perch fixed to a board to which the little seed cart is drawn from an incline near by; but we consider this a bad arrangement, because the little fellow has what is commonly called a brace around his body, which is so fixed that he is able only to hop down from the perch to the board to come to the string by which he pulls up his tiny cart; and in addition to this, the brace must produce considerable irritation. The same object can be accomplished, as already described, within a cage where the bird has freedom of action.

The goldfinch, in a natural state, builds one of the most graceful and beautiful nests known. It is generally constructed on the fork of some high branch, and is swayed hither and thither by the wind, or the bird's motions, so that the young birds are accustomed to the rocking and swinging. It matters not to our little friend whether he is on his head or his heels. When in search of food he clings to the thistle stems, pecking away at the downy seeds till disturbed or satisfied, and then darts off with a merry twitter. To imitate the natural motion of the branches there should be a swing in every cage which the weight of the bird will move, so as to produce the swaying motion.

THE GRIZZLY CUBS OF EEL RIVER.

BY ARTHUR LINDSLEY.

It was just about the middle of November. Three of us, John Wilson, Harry Edwards, and myself, were camped on a beautiful clear and rapid stream which forms one of the upper sources of Sweetwater Creek. We had been hunting for the previous two months through that wild Northwest region, and finding here grass and water in abundance, with an amount of game equal to anything that could be asked, we remained day after day without breaking camp, wandering off in the morning wherever our fancy led us, and returning to our pleasant camping-ground at night. We made use of this resting-time, as it might be called, for the purpose of more fully preparing and drying the many skins of animals and birds which we had been continually collecting. We left, therefore, much material at our camp each morning when we went out, well secured, it is true, from the inroads of wolves or coyotes, but without a thought of any human being coming near it.

We were surprised, therefore, though not unpleasantly so, to find, one evening on our return, a visitor at the camp ground, cooking his supper as quietly as though he had built that camp-fire for his own special service. The outspoken heartiness of the plains soon made us acquainted with each other. Our new-comer introduced himself as an old trapper by the name of Jake, and it was not till several days later that we learned by accident that his full name was Jacob L. Sanford. He had been hunting and trapping in the mountains more than twenty years, and was just the man we were rejoiced to see, for his experience went back to the days before the mining excitement reached that region and brought in such crowds as to render game comparatively scarce. His stories were, of course, to us full of interest. We were, for instance, wide awake on the subject of bears, for up to the present time no bear had fallen to our lot, neither had we even seen the traces of one. It was in answer to a question from Harry that our new friend exclaimed:

"Bears! well, I should say I had seen 'em. Why, Cap, when I fust come into these here mountains you had to keep your eye peeled for bears, I can tell you, and it wasn't black bears nor cinnamonos neither; them's playthings. But old Ephraim himself was around, might turn up in 'most any thicket, and it was no part of his business to get out of the way. He left that for you to do. A grizzly as big as an old butler bull is a sight more apt to hunt than to be hunted. And if he will only let you alone, it is a good plan for you to let him alone."

I took from my portfolio a drawing of an old bear and cubs such as you see in the picture, and asked him what he thought of it. It took his attention at once.

"Well, now, that is poopy. I reckon the fellow that drew them two cubs must have seen the little critters playing; else he'd have never got 'em in the shape he has. That picture 'minds me of a pair of cubs I had once, and the way they used to play with one another. These fellows here might be about four months old or so. Mine wasn't hardly four days when I got 'em, and a skeery time I had of it, sure enough. Maybe I had better tell you the story."

"Yes, yes, Jake, the story, the story. Roll out your yarn."

"Well, you see, I was hunting away over in California then. I was all through the Sierra Nevada and Coast Range for four year and better, and this time that I am going to tell you I had my camp away to the head waters of Eel River, on the back of the Iron Mountain, about thirty miles north of Clear Lake. Elk was plenty through all that range, and elk meat paid so well in Frisco market that I made quite a business of shooting them. One morning I struck the trail of a little band, and started off to follow it out, being pretty sure to get one shot, and probably two, whenever I could come up with them. They had been moving along lively, and by the time it was noon I could not see that the trail was any fresher than when I first struck it. That was nothing, though; I knew they must stop to feed, and I could follow the trail if it took me a month. But a little after noon, in crossing an arroyo, I saw in the soft ground a sign that drew me off quick from following the elk any further just then. It was the tracks of a grizzly, and a bigger grizzly at that than I had ever set my eyes on. Some of the tracks was where there was mud, and showed so plain that I could measure them, and that hind foot covered fourteen inches every time it went down. The tracks were not very fresh, but I knew I could follow them, and I was off on the trail right sharp."

"But stop, Jake; look here. You told us a few minutes ago that it was always a good plan to let grizzlies alone. Seems to me preaching and practice ought to go together."

"Well, there, boys—there you have got me, sure. I did say so, and what I said was true, every word of it, and I should not have done right not to say it. Meddling with grizzlies is dangerous business. Let 'em alone every time. That is my advice to you, but somehow I never do it myself, and like as not I will get caught for it one of these days. I am such a fool that I should start right off after one to-morrow if I knew where he was. And so I put out on that trail as I told you. It led up toward the mountain, and then off around and into a big cañon that comes down alongside of the northwest spur. There is a heavy growth of spruce all through the lower part of the cañon, and I lost the trail and found it again, and lost it and found it again a dozen times, until, with about an hour of sun up it was gone completely, and I was beginning to think what a fool I was to be hanging round a thick cañon like that, so near night, and so many grizzly signs about. All at once I came out of the spruce thicket into an opening by the side of the high rocks, and there in a snug corner lay two little cubs, no bigger than small puppies, fast asleep."

"I did not stop even to think. I snatched them both up, put them into my bag, jammed them down tight to prevent their making any noise, and started just as fast as I could run to get to the lower edge of the thicket and the cañon. I knew that their mother would be after me as soon as she came back, and I knew that it was certain death for her to get hold of me. But I knew too that them cubs was worth a lot of money, and I was bound to have it though I had to fight. The fight I cared nothing about if I could only get into a good place for it, and that I was sure of as soon as I was beyond the spruce.

in toward the ledge, and when I was within twenty yards of it I dropped the two cubs out of my bag, leaped behind the nearest rock, and there I stood with my rifle cocked, waiting for her. I had not long, of course, to wait; but it was long enough for me to get my breath and be ready.

"When she broke cover, and I could fairly see her, I thought that she looked larger and heavier than any buffalo bull on all the plains, and I am not sure but that I was right. She was running only by scent, but she was going at her full speed. She did not see her cubs till she was within a few yards of them. She gave a kind of yell, bounded to them, smelled at them for not more than a second, and then looked up for me. That was the chance I was waiting for, and of course I took it. As her head came up to a level, my ball went plum centre through her right eye, and her brain, and on down her neck, as I found it afterward. There was one less grizzly left in the world to hurt people.

"The first thing I did was to pick up my cubs, and put them back in the bag, and tie them tight. Then I had time to look at the old one, and of all grizzlies I have never seen the like of that big brute. I had no way to tell, but I have always thought she must have weighed nigh upon eighteen hundred pounds. Perhaps not, but that was the way she looked to me.

"It was too late to do anything about skinning her that night, so I camped where I was. It took me all the next day and the day after that to skin her and get her skin and meat and cubs down to my camp on the river. But I did get 'em down, and I made a better thing of it than I should have done to follow up the elk. I sent the meat down to the Bay, and it brought me $36. I kept the cubs till they were about six months old, and then I took them down myself, and each one brought me a Waas-Molitor slug. Pretty good, wasn't it?"

"Brought you a what? Waas—something?"

"Oh, I forgot that you never saw any of such things. In the old times in Frisco they had fifty-dollar coins, and those with the stamp of Waas & Molitor were just as good as United States money. Six sided they were, not round."

"Two slugs; that made $196 for that one afternoon's work! Pretty fair doing, Jake; though I do not know about standing the rush of that old bear for it. I am quite inclined to think your advice is better than your example. I shall let grizzlies alone."

"WELL, NOW, THAT IS POOTY!"

"When I came out into the open ground the sun was just under, and I looked around in a hurry. Along the middle of the valley all was clear, but toward the side were loose rocks and ledges. I turned in so as to be within about fifty yards of the rocks, and then kept on. I had not gone two hundred yards when I heard the old bear coming. And she was a-coming now, you may guess; she was just tearing through the brush, with a sort of snort or howl that was enough to make your hair stand on end.

"Before she was out where she could see me I sprang

THE BABY KNIGHT.—SEE PAGE 794.

THE KNIGHTHOOD OF A BABY PRINCE.

BY ELIOT McCORMICK.

CENTURIES ago, when countries were at war all the time, and nearly every man was a soldier, the bravest and most distinguished officers were called knights. These would go into battle, forming the body-guard of the King, or attended by their followers and servants, while in time of peace they would meet one another in tournaments, or mock fights, or travel around the country in search of adventures.

In those days adventures were not hard to find. The country swarmed with robber bands, who fell upon villages and unprotected castles, and took noble ladies and helpless children captive; so that, even when there was no war, the knight's sword had no chance of becoming rusty. It was a rude and lawless life, and in some things the knight was rude and lawless himself, but his vow of knighthood bound him to respect the innocent and helpless, to defend the Christian faith, and to do all in his power to bring wrong-doers to justice.

One of the most celebrated knights was known as the Chevalier Bayard, and the charge which his mother gave him when he received his sword will show what the true knight was expected to be: "Serve God," she said, "and He will aid thee: be sweet and courteous to every gentleman in divesting thyself of all pride. Be not a flatterer or talebearer, for this kind of people come not to great perfection; be loyal in word and in deed; keep thy word, be helpful to the poor and orphan, and God will reward it to thee." One may be a knight nowadays if he will only follow this good advice.

Generally the knights were associated together in brotherhoods or orders, some of which have lasted to this day, though they do not any longer serve the purpose for which they were intended. Thus the Order of the Garter in England has survived for over five hundred years, while that of the Golden Fleece in Spain and Austria is very nearly as old. It was to the latter that Charles the Fifth, the Emperor of Germany, belonged, and the picture on the preceding page shows him receiving the sword-stroke, or accolade, as the ceremony of making a knight was called, when he was only three months old. In the picture, it is true, he looks older than that; one would hardly think that so young a baby could sit up so straight and look so dignified and wise; nevertheless, he was born on the 24th of February, 1500, and it was the 11th of June in the same year when he was knighted.

Over his shoulders one sees the collar of the order, and hanging from it the fleece or sheep-skin of gold which was chosen by the knights as their symbol, because Bruges, where the order was founded, was the centre of the wool trade in Flanders. Below him, in the foreground, appear the knights of the order. At one side stand his mother, the poor crazy Joanna of Castile, and Margaret of York, the sister of Edward IV. of England, while on the other Baldwin of Lonnoy gives the little baby prince his accolade. It has always been thought remarkable that the little Duke of Cumberland, son of George II. of England, should have been knighted when he was four years old, but Charles V. began his knightly career even before he had left his nurse's arms.

As it turned out, the career was a long and eventful one. No royal child was ever born to a richer inheritance than the little Charles. His father was Philip, Archduke of Austria, who was the son of Maximilian, Emperor of Germany, and Maria, daughter of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy; while his mother, Joanna, was the daughter of the great Spanish King and Queen, Ferdinand and Isabella. The latter you will remember as the patron of Columbus, through whose generosity he was able to make the great voyage that resulted in the discovery of America.

At the death of his grandfather, Ferdinand, when he was only sixteen, he became King of Spain; and three years later, when his other grandfather, Maximilian, also died, he was elected Emperor of Germany. This was the highest distinction in the world at that time. Before he was twenty years old Charles's dominions spread over the Spanish Peninsula, the Netherlands, Germany, the West Indies, and so much of the American continent as had yet been discovered. The sun never set, it is said, upon his realms. No man on earth was so powerful as he; few, indeed, so powerful have ever lived.

Nearly all his lifetime was spent in war. The countries which he governed were so widely separated, and included so many different people, that in one part or another revolution was going on most of the time; while, if things were quiet at home, his constant enemy, Francis I. of France, might always be depended on to keep him fighting. Between his own people, whether in Spain, Flanders, or Germany, the French, and the Turks, Charles was kept all the time busy, though he found opportunity, meanwhile, to govern his empire in a wise and vigorous way, and to oppose with as much vigor, but with less wisdom, the new German reformer, Martin Luther.

It is interesting to remember at this time, when people are celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of Luther's birth, that between him and the Emperor Charles there was a perpetual conflict. Charles could not be anything else but a Catholic; and when he heard how boldly Luther had nailed his confession of faith to the church door at Wittenberg, and what a stir the brave act was making throughout Germany, he began to be alarmed for the safety of the Romish Church.

He was barely twenty-one years old at that time, but he felt himself the defender of the faith, and accordingly summoned Luther to appear before the Diet or Congress of German states, which was to meet at Worms. Fortunately for Luther, Charles was young, and milder in temper than he was in later life. Years afterward he reproached himself with having neglected his duty, for the sake of his word, in allowing Luther to get away free.

One of the bravest and best things that Charles ever did was the capture of the fortress of Goletta, in Tunis. This was held by the Moorish pirate Barbarossa, who had submitted to the Sultan Solyman, and had received command of the Ottoman fleet. In the fort were three hundred Christian prisoners, suffering all the terrible hardships which the Moors were accustomed to inflict on their captives, and probably never expecting again to be free. Charles, however, by a bold rush captured the fort, knocked off their chains, and allowed them to turn the guns of the fortress upon their former masters, which we may believe they willingly did.

Toward the end of his life his wars were less successful, and although Luther had died, Protestantism still lived and thrived. All his efforts had not succeeded in killing it, and at length he had found himself unwillingly obliged to recognize it as the religion of a great part of his subjects. Age and sickness, too, came upon him, and when he was fifty-six years old, and had reigned forty years, he concluded to resign his crown to his son, Philip II., and retire himself to a monastery.

In the same room where the little baby, so many years before, had received the stroke of knighthood, the great monarch now laid down his power. Perhaps there were some there who remembered the earlier scene, and recalled all the important events that had happened between, and thought mournfully how little royalty and wealth and power add to the enjoyment of life, and how soon, at any rate, all these things must pass away. Charles lived two years after that, and died in the monastery, having taken an odd fancy, three weeks before his death, to celebrate his own funeral rites.

CHAPTER XV.

AN UNEXPECTED MEETING.

AND meanwhile where was our friend Dick Devine?

As soon as he had decided that at all risks his duty lay in going on to the Doctor's house, a new courage seemed to inspire him, and for half an hour he walked briskly, determined not to lose hope.

But a strange, weary feeling seemed to creep over the boy's limbs. As he walked a dull pain in his head half blinded him from time to time; sometimes the level landscape looked blurred; there was a ringing in his ears; and at last the poor boy was compelled to sit down on the road-side and rest. Dick never knew how long he sat there, holding his throbbing head in his hands, and trying in a dull fashion to rouse himself and go on. Over and again he repented to himself, "I must go on—I must go on, for Master Dick's sake;" and at last, when the afternoon shadows were lengthening, the poor lad staggered to his feet and pressed onward again.

But this time to walk fast was beyond his power; to walk at all was well-nigh impossible, but his strong will and resolution kept him up. Slowly and very wearily he crept along the road, with just enough instinctive sense to keep to the railroad track, which, as he knew, must lead him to Marplains station.

The day closed in early, for it was one of those chill springs when the snow has lasted beyond its time, and the bleakness of the country looks unnatural. Had Dick felt like himself he would have noticed how lonely the country was, how few houses there were, and how dark and cold the night was going to be; but though a shiver ran through his tired frame from time to time, he took no heed of all these things; a fever seemed to be in his brain, and his eyes, fixed always on the road before him, refused to look right or left.

Another halt he had to make. This time he sat down near to a tall iron gateway above which a lamp was swinging.

In a very feeble, absent way the boy turned and looked in through the gate. The action was not curious, but just in the mechanical way sick people move and think. He saw that within the gate there was a lawn, and a short carriage drive, beyond which there twinkled the lights of a long, irregularly built brick house.

The poor wanderer watched the lighted windows for a few moments vaguely, wondering who lived there, and whether it might be well to go to the door and ask them for a glass of water, and to show him the way to Marplains. He was conscious of a burning thirst, and surely no one could refuse him a drink from the well. After a moment's further thought the boy crept to his feet and slowly staggered up the dark avenue toward the house.

As he neared it he became conscious that the blinds in the lower windows had not been drawn, and that some of them were so near the ground that he could look in upon the rooms quite easily. From a longing to be near some one, to see some human being, the boy approached one of the windows, and pressed his white, haggard face against the pane.

What he saw was a long room with desks and forms, and about the stove a group of boys, who seemed to be enjoying themselves greatly, for smiles were on every face.

The weary little watcher outside feasted his eyes on this sight for a moment, and then, suddenly putting up his hands, he clutched wildly at the window, and uttered a cry that was half joy, half despair. Out of the group one boy had suddenly turned toward him, and, feeling that the ground was slipping from beneath his feet, Devine recognized his own "Master Dick." Unconsciously his weary footsteps had brought him to the gateway of Dearing's school, Barnabas Academy.

"What's that noise?" Dearing said, suddenly.

"I saw a face looking in here," Packer exclaimed. "It was a great big red face with whiskers." Packer's imaginative faculty rarely deserted him.

"It's gone now," Dick Dearing said, going over to the window. Then, as he leaned out, he suddenly exclaimed, "I say, fellows, here's a go! There's somebody fallen down out there."

"In a fit?" suggested Packer.

"I don't know. Some one had better call Mr. Mason." Dick had no sooner said the words than he darted off to the teacher's room, there hurriedly explaining what he had seen.

Mr. Mason was a very energetic young man. Giving Dearing permission to follow him, he had made his way around the house to the place where, having taken one long agonized look at Master Dick, poor Devine had fallen to the ground unconscious.

Mr. Mason had brought a lantern with him. As they approached the prostrate figure he turned its rays full upon the poor lad's face, and then another cry burst upon the air. Dearing was down on his knees in a moment, crying out: "It's Dick Devine! Oh, it's my Dick Devine! Oh, call Dr. Filliper! I knew he'd come back."

In a few minutes a very general confusion prevailed. Dr. Filliper appeared, and with him his kind-hearted wife, to whom Dearing poured forth the story, mingled with reproaches and fears that poor Devine had been found too late.

No sound reached the lad's ears. He seemed entirely unconscious, and all voices were hushed. Dearing and one of the servants carried the boy into the Doctor's part of the house, where he was laid on a lounge in one of the quietest rooms. The poor lad's ragged, travel-worn garments, his worn face, with its look of want and fever, smote the boys around him with a pity touched with awe, for might it not well be that he had been led there just to die?

The boys gathered outside the door, hushed into unusual stillness, while Dr. Filliper and his wife got the wanderer into bed. Then Dick Dearing appeared, and in a low voice said he was to be allowed to drive with Mr. Mason over to the Cedars, three miles beyond, and fetch his grandfather to see Dick Devine.

"He has begun to talk," Dearing said, in an awe-struck whisper; "and it's all about my grandfather, and how he must get to him to-night."

The boys were deeply impressed. Even Packer forbore to jest or indulge in any antic, and Will Thomason had the grace to say in Dearing's ear:

"I'm sorry I made fun of him. If he gets well I'll give him my old suit—if mother 'll let me."

And it was for this reason that Dick Dearing made his sudden appearance at the Cedars.

CHAPTER XVI.

DICK DEVINE IS VERY ILL.

DICK opened his eyes wearily, and looked about him. Where was he? What did all this mean? Could it be that this was heaven?

The thoughts floated past his mind, scarcely disturbing him. In a few moments he closed his eyes, and then, wearily as before, opened them again.

He was lying on a bed that seemed softer than any-

"HE WAS LAID ON A LOUNGE IN ONE OF THE QUIETEST ROOMS"

thing he had ever dreamed of touching. Dainty linen, soft blankets, and a white counterpane were over him. He was in a large old-fashioned room, furnished in chintz, and with pictures on the wall, and a big wood fire blazing on the hearth. Near his bed was a table, and on it were ranged some medicine bottles and a clean tumbler. Before the fire, in an easy chair, a young lady was sitting, with some wool-work in her hands. Dick looked at her intently, thinking, perhaps, that she could solve the mystery. Her face was turned so that he could see its profile—the pleasant lines of the brow and mouth and chin that he seemed to remember somewhere, long ago; but, where? Then suddenly, in a weak voice, he said,

"It's Cousin Maud."

The young lady, who was Miss Field, turned quickly a very pleasant face, and came up to the boy's side, putting a cool hand on his brow.

"Are you better, Dick?" she inquired, gently.

"Have I been sick?" the boy said, wearily. How hard it seemed to talk!

"Yes, indeed!" Miss Field said; "you've been in this bed a whole week. Don't you remember coming here?"

"No, ma'am," the boy said, looking at her with earnest eyes. "Where is it?"

"It's Barnabas Academy. You fainted outside the house one night when you were going to Dr. Field's, and then we brought you in here. Now you're going to get well, but you mustn't talk any more for a while."

Maud put a spoonful of something very nice to his lips, and how delightful it seemed just to lie still on the soft bed in that dreamy quiet fashion! Slowly his thoughts shaped themselves into memories of what had happened. He recalled the dreadful weeks with Gurdle—his flight and its purpose—then he said:

"Where's Norry, ma'am, please?"

"He's very well," said Maud, cheerily. "He is staying just now at Nancy Barlow's. She begged to keep him. He was so happy there."

"Oh yes," said Dick, contentedly; "I remember." In a few moments he said, "Didn't I see Master Dick here, ma'am—in a window?"

"Yes; and as soon as you are a little better you shall see him again. Now try to sleep, Dick."

And Dick did fall into a very peaceful slumber, from which he awoke much better, and it seemed to the lad as though days and nights of delicious quiet and contentment passed dreamily by. Sometimes he knew Dr. Field came to see him; sometimes a kind elderly lady, whom Miss Maud called Mrs. Filliper. He had delicious cooling drinks, and white grapes, and occasionally Miss Maud read aloud to him in her sweet, happy voice.

The book which Maud read to him somehow made the boy understand how and why all this goodness had come into his life. He could not say how it was he felt it, but the old, old story of our Saviour's coming down to earth fell upon his ears as part of the message of peace and sweet contentment that seemed to have been brought him from some other world. As Maud read Dick would look wistfully at her, thinking he knew why her face with its plain features was so sweet and comforting;

why he liked to have her morning and night kneel down helping him to say his simple prayers. They had a great many quiet talks, sometimes about the stories in the New Testament, sometimes about what Dick would do when he got well. It was during this time that Miss Maud fell to calling her little patient "D."—just to distinguish him from Dick Dearing, and always afterward the boy was known by that initial, which I think people now suppose was a regularly given name.

WEE MAGGIE'S SHOPPING.

BY LILLIE E. BARR.

WEE Maggie came into the room,
She came in skipping, hopping;
"See all the lovely things I got While I was out a-shopping."

"Come here and let me see them, dear,"
Said pretty Jenny Linnet;
"I'll make a picture of them all,
And surely put you in it."

"This basketful of cat and dog
We'll place upon the top there;
To guard the nest and eggs so blue
We will say is doggie's care."

"And here's a boy that cried for cake,
And laughed because he got it;
And here's a lady called Miss Kate,
Right on this lovely pocket."

"And here's a crab that goes sideways,
With claws so fierce and strong;
Who knows but that this fine guitar
Will tame him with a song?"

"This basket with the scarlet how
Upon the purple palette,
We'll put it just yourself below,
To please dear Dolly Smallet."

"Behold this turtle with sweet face
Upon his brown hack painted;
We'll put him in this corner here,
And play that he has fainted,

"Because this wicked Polly bird
Here on this lovely bracket
Has called him 'Soup, green turtle Soup,'
And vowed his shell to crack it."

"Here is Fanny Flora Francis
Georgiana Ella Brown;
She's as black as her umbrella,
And the pet of Blackville town."

"How very grand that kitty is!
Now is she plotting treason,
Or is she mad as mad can be,
Without a rhyme or reason?"

"Ah, see these two poor Princes here,
Child captives in the Tower!
I wonder why they were not saved
From wicked Richard's power."

"Right in the middle goes this plaque;
That's you and dolly on it—
The sweetest girl in all the world,
From hoots to feathered bonnet."

WHEN nuts in the hollow
And nuts on for gathering,
Are ready for gathering,
Off with a will,
Follow your leader with whoop and halloo,
For the breezes are crisp and the sky is blue.

CHARLES CITY COUNTY, VIRGINIA.

I am a clergyman's daughter, and one of seven children. We came from Maryland to this State some two and a half years ago. I have three sisters and three brothers. All of us are Marylanders except mother and baby brother, who are Virginians. In this county were born two of the Presidents of the United States, viz. Harrison and Tyler. The name of the birth-place of the former is Berkeley, that of the latter is Greenway. President Tyler lived a number of years at Sherwood Forest, which is quite near us. His widow has but recently left there to reside in Richmond. One of his sons still lives there. My little brother Lloyd has a big white cat, which was a kitten. My dear friend Tyler when they was a little kitten. Lloyd named him "Tippecanoe and-Tyler too," but calls him Tippy. Our present home is near James River, on one bank of which I have seen the ruins of the little church in which Pocahontas was baptized.

This is a rather lonely place. Last spring a deer pursued by dogs ran through our yard. Not long after that a flock of wild turkeys came to our gate, and had a battle with our tame ones, in which the latter were the victors. The time allowed by law for killing wild turkeys is just expired, and is in the month of October. Some are kind of reed-bird in the marshes. Sometimes they are shot, but they are generally knocked down with paddles on wet marshes. This is a very interesting sight, and suddenly appearing in great numbers early in September, and then as suddenly disappearing about the first heavy frost. No one ever sees them come or go, and no young are ever seen. Colors are people here believe that "they turn to frogs." They are so fat that they require no butter or lard in cooking, and are delicious.

Among us we have a good many pets, Baby Reznald being the dearest of all; but my letter is so long that I can tell you of only one. When we left Maryland a friend gave me a pretty young child, which I named "Samie T." for the kind donor. This hen is now a great-great-grandmother, and looks young and well.

A kind friend in Philadelphia has been sending us "Young People" for nearly two years, thus giving us much pleasure week by week.

ETHEL E.

Thank you for this charming letter.

OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA.

I have written two letters before this, but as they have not been printed, I am going to write again. I guess you get tired of letters, don't you? The last time I wrote to you I was living in the country, but now I live in Oakland, I will be here until after Christmas. I like Oakland very much, but I shall be glad to get back to my home once more and see all my friends. I go to school ever in California, Mrs. Postmistress? I think if you ever came a woman would never want to go back, and maybe I would see you some time. Wouldn't it be nice?

I have two cousins living here, a little boy and girl. The little girl's name is Doty. She is two years old, and I think she is very sweet. My little sister Julia wants to know if she may write to you. She is seven years old, and she loves to read in your paper. I like "Prince Lazeboues" and "Dick and D." very much, only I don't like to know who D. is; it must be the other D. I am going to the circus next Thursday. Would you please print my letter, Mrs. Postmistress? I hope it is not too long, for I want so much to see how it looks in the Post Office Box.

DAYTON W.

FAIRBURY, IOWA.

MY DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I have written you one letter, but think it must have been addressed wrong, so I thought I would try again. I like Young People very much, and can hardly wait for the next issue to come. I like to go to a little school, and am learning to read pretty well, so that by-and-by I shall read for myself. I am seven years old, and have a list of thirty names of children with my papa to Cleveland (which is only an hour's ride from Fairsville) the other day, and he bought me a bicycle. It has a seat on behind for sister, and we strap her in. It can be taken where she does not ride. I ride to school on it.

I am going to my grandpa's by-and-by. There is a creek behind the house where I can fish, and I have some consins there, and we do have such good times! Grandpa has some white rabbits for baby and me, and grandma says they are good to eat. We have some blue-bantam chickens, a cunning little black dog named Gyp, a cat, and two funny little kitties. I thought "Raising the Pearl" was splendid. Wasn't Tommie Tucker naughty, though? Mamma had written this for me. I can write some, but not very well yet. Good-by. PERCY S.

Do you know, Percy dear, that this little letter has had to wait for its turn so very long that I fear you have thought me a very unkind Postmistress? Sometimes I fancy the little letters look up reproachfully when they have been kept here in the box a long while, waiting for fresh air and light, and the wings to fly; which they get when they types print them nicely in our paper. Now, dear, you must write again, and tell me whether you and sister still enjoy riding on the bicycle. I am always pleased when I hear of plays and toys which the brother and sister may share together.

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

I am a girl thirteen years old, who likes to read the Post-Office Box very much. I live in a white frame house, surrounded by a large yard consisting of two or three acres. We have a great many apple, pear, and cherry trees besides maple trees. In the lane which is in front of our house there is a large tree which I call my cotton tree; it has an arm-chair and bed, horses, and a great deal of my summer vacation, with a friend who lives near me. H. N.

Quite a remarkable tree. I think you will have to explain about the horses, the bed, and the chair, for I do not understand how they can all exist in a tree.

The brown leaves are flying;

The red and the gold

Make lovely October

A joy to behold.

We trip with gay footsteps

To school and to play,

And merrily live through

Each beautiful day.

OSK BORO, NORTH CAROLINA.

I am a boy twelve years old, and am going to school at Oak Ridge Institute, North Carolina. I think it is an excellent school. There are in attendance this term about one hundred and fifty students. I do not live at Oak Ridge, but live at home. My father manufactures wagons. This is the first time I have written for the Post-Office Box. I have been taking Young People one month, and think it is the best paper I have read at the school. When I get home next summer I intend to make a boat like the one I saw in your paper. We have two literary societies and a military department connected with it. I belong to one of the societies. Will you be so kind as to send me a subject for debate? ROBBIE S. N.

"Which, upon the whole, was the swifter, the hare or the tortoise?" Tell me which side in the discussion tortoise takes. Most of our boys consider Young People the best paper in the world.

NAPA VALLEY, CALIFORNIA.

I am a little girl twelve years old. I think I can out weigh any girl who takes Young People; I weigh 135 pounds. Do you think that is very much? I am a farm girl, there are 300 acres in my father's farm. I never lived in the city, I have quite a good many pets. I had a dog that was over twelve years old, but he is dead now. I had a white rabbit, a white pig, and a white pig. My sister and I have a pony named Prince. Sister and I ride him to school. We have one mile to go. My sister is four years older than myself. She has a large white rabbit; and we also have four cats and one kitten. I think Young People is the nicest paper I ever saw; I wish it would come twice a week instead of once. I am taking my lessons. Mamma has over one hundred little chickens and thirty turkeys. JENNIE E.

What a pretty sight it must be to see so many chicks crowding together to be fed! I suppose you help mamma in the care of them.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

My little brother takes Young People, and I read the stories to him. We both like the paper very, very much. I enjoy reading our Post-office Box, and hope I may see this letter among the others to come.

I spent my vacation at a place near the Catskill Mountains. The house stood on a high hill from which we had an excellent view of the Hudson. We went on top of the mountain one day. We started at 5.30 A.M., and reached home at 7 o'clock in the evening. I stood on the rock on which Rip Van Winkle is said to have slept so many years, and passed his house. They self confessed door is a jutting of Rip, which looks as though it had often been washed by the rain and wind. In this picture he is just awaking from his long sleep, and under his hat he is holding a rummer, "that corky fagon!" What excuse shall I make to Dame Van Winkle? I admired the beautiful scenery on the mountains, and should like very much to go there again. EMIE.

Let me whisper a secret to Harry,

Who can't find his hat to-day;

You will never lose things, little Harry,

If you're careful to put them away.

FERRISBURGH, VIRGINIA.

I thought I would write you a letter for the first time. I live up on a mountain, and we can see the Blue-Ridge Mountains very plainly. Most of the boys and girls tell about their pets, but I have none here. We used to live in Cincinnati, Ohio, and I had a cat and a dog then. My cat had no name, but my dog had enough for both; its name was Tippecanoe and Tyler too. I have taken Young People since the first time I came here, and like it better than any other paper I have seen. Mamma and papa like it too. I haven't any brothers or sisters, like some children; and I think it must be very nice to have a lot of children in the house. I wish Little N. P. would write to me, and I would answer her gladly. I think "Dick and D." is ever so nice. MAMIE S.

RUMBERVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.

I have two little kittens, and they are just lovely! My sister is going to teach school in our school-house this fall, and my two cousins, about my age, are staying at our house, going to school, and we thought it would be nice to have correspondents about thirteen or fourteen years old from a different place. I think "Nan" was a splendid story, and I think we will like the new serial quite as well by the way it starts off. We have two canary-birds, and they are both singers. Dear Postmistress, it is my bed-time, and I must get up bright and early to-morrow morning to get in the house. I wish Little N. P. would write to me, and I would use it, please say "Care of George Landon." J. P. L., L. S. T., and L. L. F.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

I am a little girl seven years old, I have five brothers and one sister. My grandpa sends Young People to my brother. I like the Jimmy Brown stories best of all. I want very much to go to school this fall, and my little N. P. will let me. I like to read very much, and usually I don't get enough books. My sister is writing this for me. Now good-by. RAY C. S.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

Some children have pets. I have one, a large kitten named Tibbit, and my sister has one named Muff. I expect to go to St. John in October if mamma will let me. I have many books, and many dolls of all kinds, and most of them can stand up. I am going to send a verse called

A PRETTY STORY.

Now all of you give heed unto
A tale I shall relate
Of Fanny, Madge, and little Tom,
A cat, and a green gate.

Fanny had a basketful
Of what I can not say;
But she had the prettiest story
While pussy meowed at play.

Madge and Tom came on behind,
With doll and whip so gay.
The gate was green, the cat was black,
And bright the lovely day.

But when they reached the garden gate—
Now what I say is true—
The story's gone from the poor head,
And so good-by to you. ETHEL II.

MOUNT CLEMENS, MICHIGAN.

I am a little girl eight years old. I have not many pets—only two lambs and a dear little brother. I like all the stories of Young People, but Jimmy Brown's stories are the funniest. This is my first letter. JULIA W.

ALAMEDA, CALIFORNIA.

I am a little girl nine years old. I live in San Francisco, and go to school. I like Young People very much. I am sick now, and am stopping with my grandpa and grandpa in Alameda. My grandpa is a member of the Young People, and my little sister six years old, several pretty little songs. My sister sings alto, and I sing soprano. Grandpa calls us Kellogg and Cary. If we ever come out here we will send you our good-by. MAMIE A.

NEWARK, NEW JERSEY.

I am a little girl seven years old. My brother takes Young People, and I like it very much. I love very much to try to be a good girl. Last term I got a certificate, and I stood No. 1. My any took it, and she had it framed. Mamma was wondering when she saw it, and like me to be good. I have a little kitten which I call Tiny; it is a poor little kitty; it is not a bit pretty, but it is a good kitty. When I grow up I am going to be a teacher, and I want to tell you how I can make us learn to draw, or to make us laugh?

Can any one try? ANNIE L.

Any one may try to draw a Wizzle. They are meant to amuse you, and also to help you in learning to draw. Look carefully over the last published page of Wizzles, and you will understand how the children try to find out the artist's idea. We will be glad to have you send some of your efforts.

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

My name is Caroline Frances, but they call me
Jim. I wrote for a boy in the Cot, because Bubber is a boy, and I am a tomboy. I want to tell you something I pulled out of two of my little teeth my own self, and two new ones are coming;
they were like little grains of white rice, and I swear to you, if you want to see them, I will show you. They would not hurt me, so I put it under my pillow, and a fairy came and put a piece of money in its place.

I am only six, and can't write anything but my name, which I will sign at the end. Bubber is writing this for me. Bubber and Nonie had parties once on their birthdays, but I haven't had one yet. When I was six, it was the mumps. But I had a cake with six candles; when I was five, it was the whooping-cough, and when I was four,
I was in the country, and berries had made me sick. I hope I shall be well when I am seven; then I will have a party, and invite you. We feel very sociable with you.

Your little friend, CARRIE T.

I add a postscript to ask you to beg Mrs. Lillie not to let anything happen to Norry. We were so sad when Dick came home and Norry wasn't there.

Is Sadie well now? How did she come to be put in the Cot? Please tell me in what paper it told about her. I wrote for a boy.

Can you look beautiful in their sailor suits?
I think you are right kind to worry with us children so. NONIE T.

I have already voted for a boy.
We told Carrie that if all the children who read YOUNG PEOPLE sent you their pictures and their letters, you would have to find a hall for the pictures, and call it the Rogues' Gallery, and you could give a street with the teeth.

This is the last you will hear from the three little T's until next summer. Next week we will be as busy as bees, for school begins on Monday.
But we will still read YOUNG PEOPLE, and think of the Postmistress. FREDIE T.

The three little T's

May write when they please,

And Carrie her picture may send;

And I hope, when she's seven,

The party 'll be given.

And believe me, dear children, your friend,
Sadie was getting well when last I heard.
Young People's Cot was described in No. 186.

BREIGSVILLE, WISCONSIN.

I am a little girl eleven years old. I have a brother eight years old named Willie. We got YOUNG PEOPLE last Christmas. I liked "Raising the Pearl" very much. We have got two cats named Whitey and Maltie. Whitey is pure white, and Maltie is Maltese. I feed the chickens, and hunt the eggs. I am very much interested in Lillie has begun another story. ROBEY E. E.

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.

I am a little Brooklyn girl. My uncle keeps a bookstore, and he wishes every child to read in the city would read YOUNG PEOPLE. My brother and I dearly love the paper to come.
We have a little kitten, and her name is Minnie.
The paper is full of play. We have two chickens too; they jump up in grandma's grape-vine, and have eaten all the grapes. I am nine years old, and my brother is six. LOUISE M.

FORESTVILLE, LOUISIANA.

I am a little girl eleven years of age. I have a pet hen and two cats; their names are Tom, Lulu, and Gray. I have a little sister, and she ins is cat named Tortoise—because it looks like the shell of a tortoise—and two chickens. I have three brothers and two sisters. My youngest sister and myself feed the poultry; mamma sometimes helps us feed them, and we enjoy having her do so very much. Saturday night is a happy night with me, because it brings YOUNG PEOPLE for me to read. B. M. T.

SARAS, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am ten and a half years old. I have a little dog and white chicks, and I like to read. My she is very playful. I have a little baby brother Philip who is five weeks old. I think the Nautilus is a very pretty suit for a dolly, and I inclose five cents for a pattern. "Raising the

"Pearl" is a splendid story, and I like Jimmy Brown's and Mr. Thompson's stories very much.
Not long ago I went to Cambridge. We went to Harvard colleges. As it was vacation, most of the buildings were then closed; but we went into the Library, and the Library and Memorial Hall in the Library there is a piece of the old Washington elm carved to represent a book, with the elm on the front. In Memorial Hall there are many old portraits, and some very beautiful modern windows. There are many fine buildings, some of them having a very pretty clinging vine growing upon them. Will some one tell me the name of the vine? I think it is a species of ivy.
LOTTIE C. P.

Will some little correspondent who lives in Cambridge satisfy Lottie about the vine?

FOKES BARRICKS, CAPE BRETON.

I have never seen a letter from Baldeck, so I thought I would write one. A kind gentleman has been sending me HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE for over a year. I like the reading very much.
I am seven years old. I am reading in the Fourth Book Reader. I never want to stop reading it for three months. Last winter the school-house was burned down. My brother woke me up to see it burning, and when I saw it I almost cried.
I can not write very well, so my sister is writing for me. I have only one pet—a big black dog.
His name is Bud. I ride him round the fields like a pony. Last summer I cut down a little tree and tied it to his tail, and ploughed a small piece; and then I got a little horse, and he was five, and I harrowed it. I have no little sister or brother to play with. Will you please print this?
I want to surprise ma and pa. GEORGE W.

WYOMING, INDIA.

We are five little girls who talk YOUNG PEOPLE
YOUNG PEOPLE, and like it very much. We think Mrs. Lillie's stories are the best, especially "In Honor Bound." We have ponies, and have lots of fun riding them. We all go to the same school, and are in the same classes. After school we go to some little girl's house, and play with our dolls. We are writing to you, and to the Postmistress, at the noon recess, and as it is getting late, and we are afraid the bell will ring, we must close. For it would displease our teacher for us to be late. RYONA M.,

BARBARO.

I am a little girl eleven and a half years old. I live on a farm, and have a great many pets. I have two dogs. One is a water-spaniel, and his name is Brnce. He is a very intelligent dog, but he surprised me the other day. He was chasing a weasel that had climbed a tree; he was so excited that he followed it about ten feet into the tree, and sat down on a branch to bark at it. He did not get the weasel. Please print this, as I want my auntie in Idaho to read it, for she knows Bruce. LIZZIE J. F.

LA PORTE, INDIANA.

I am a boy twelve years old, and I have no pets except two rabbits named Billy and Fanny. I got them last summer when they were only two weeks old. The first pair I had I bought a week before I thought this. The way I came by the ones I have now was this: I was going to get a boy to build them a coop—I can not do it myself, being lame, and liked his rabbits so well that I traded mine off to him for them, and gave him ten cents to hoot, although mine were a month the oldest. FRED ST. V. A.

Well, that was a fair exchange, and I hope both boys were pleased with it.

NEW YORK CITY.

I wrote a letter to YOUNG PEOPLE before, but not finding it in my paper, I thought I would again. I am employed by a firm on Broadway, and like my place so well that I thought it best not to go back to school, but I am going to evening school if I can go any. My letter was Dentey, Colorado, and he sent me a collection of ores. PHILIP C.

Be prompt, punctual, and respectful, and you will continue to please your employers. Go to evening school by all means.

SPRING VALLEY, MISSOURI.

I wrote to you once before, but my letter was not published, so I thought I would write again.
We have eighteen little chicks. It is pretty cold for chicks, but we keep them in the hen-house, so I hope they won't freeze, their mother is two days. One is a little one; her name is Ninie. My other one is a big one; her name is Eva.
I like to read the Post-office Box very much. I think "Raising the Pearl" was the best of all.

LOTTO.

Lotto is played with a set of cards with numbers on them from 1 to 100, and counters to correspond to them. A dealer is chosen, who deals the cards to all the players except himself.

The counters are placed in a box or something like that. The dealer then takes one out, and calls out the number. The player who has the number on his card immediately places his fingers on the number, and calls out, "Here." Whoever calls out first takes the counter, and places it on the number. Then the game continues, and whoever has five counters in a row wins the game.
CHAMFON.

I am delighted with, but can not make room for, letters from the children whose names follow: Rosa J., Jennie M. A., Bettie F. Y., Willie
H., Blanche E. P., Ida Floresta G., Annie E., Harry
A. H., Henrietta C., Elsie V., Lizzie B., Pear H., Arthur E., Dick C., and Ronald M. Do not be discouraged, little ones, but write again when you have time. AMANDA P.

RECIPTS FOR LITTLE HOUSEKEEPERS.

WHITE POUND-CAKE.—The whites of sixteen

PRIZE STORIES.

BY GEORGE B. BARTLETT.

THE number of players is limited only by the size of the room. The host must prepare in advance five simple gifts, such as boxes of paper, books, inkstands, paper-weights, etc., each one of which must be neatly tied up in a separate package, and then marked No. 1 to No. 5, inclusive, by one of the players who is ignorant of their contents.

Each player is then furnished with a pencil and three sheets of large paper, and all write the name of some one of the persons present on a small slip of paper. These ballots are collected in a hat and counted by the host, who announces the vote by saying, "You have made a choice of Miss — as editor." The player thus chosen takes her seat at the head of the table, and selects three pictures from any book or magazine, of as varied subjects as possible, and places them in full sight of all the contestants.

The editor then takes out her watch, with the remark, "We will now devote an hour to preparing a story suggested by the scenes and persons in these illustrations, each one of which must be alluded to in the narrative, although any one of the three may be chosen as the chief subject. Any one who has not completed the task at the expiration of the time will not be considered as a competitor for the prizes which you see before you."

All then write as rapidly as they can without making mistakes; for no one is allowed to reject his first idea and to begin again. It will be best for each to carefully study up his subjects and to see what combinations suggest themselves before committing them to paper, as time will thus be gained. Each one will, of course, follow out his own idea, and write either a humorous or serious sketch, in prose or verse, as his fancy may dictate.

When all have worked steadily for three-quarters of an hour, the editor must give notice that all contributions must be handed in within fifteen minutes. Ten minutes later, notice is again given that now five minutes only remain; and the fun and excitement increase until the hour is spent, and the papers are all folded up and laid before each player on the table. Each marks a number in pencil on the outside of her paper, the editor being No. 1, and the next player on the right No. 2, and so on. The papers are then all collected in a basket, shaken together, and passed around, each player drawing out one, which he looks over, in order that he may read it fluently when his turn comes. The editor reads first, and afterward each player in turn reads the one which was drawn by him.

At the conclusion of the reading of each piece any comment or good-natured criticism is permitted, as, of course, only one of the players knows the author of the article. If two or more persons call out, "Fragment!" all players vote upon the question by holding up their right hands, and the majority thus decides whether it shall be so considered, and thrown out.

Finally all proceed to decide upon the merits of the completed articles. This is done by ballot, and any player is permitted to vote for his own article if he considers it better than any of the others. To designate his favorite piece each one writes the name of the person who chanced to read it, and who still has it in his possession.

These ballots are collected by the editor, who only votes in case of a tie, when she decides the question in accordance with her judgment. She also counts the votes, and then announces the result. The article which has the most votes is entitled to prize No. 1, and so on in regular succession. But in case a less number of articles than five fail to secure any votes, the second ballot is thrown for the prizes which are left.

BOB'S BABY.

BY GEORGE CARY EGGLESTON.

FOR the first time in his life little Bob Bland found himself living on an island, and yet he always had lived precisely where he was still living. He had been born there, and had spent every day of his ten years in that home on the bank of the Ohio River. But now the river was "on the rampage." A great flood had come, and the water was far above the banks. The river—which is usually about three-quarters of a mile wide—had now spread out over all the lowlands, and stretched from the hills on one side to those on the other, a distance in some places of five miles or more. All the towns were flooded, and all the farms under water. Where the ground was low, nothing could be seen of the farm-houses except the tops of their chimneys; where it was higher, only the lower stories were filled with water, and the people were still living on the second floors, at the risk of being swept away.

Bob's home stood on the bank of the river, but the ground at that point was a long narrow ridge, above the level of the water; and so the house was still high and dry, though the water covered half of the front yard. Back of the house the land was lower, and while the house was out of water, the fields back of it were flooded. The ridge on which the house stood was now a long, narrow island, with two or three miles of river in front and a mile of river behind it. That is how it came about that little Bob Bland found himself living on an island for the first time in his life, though he had never changed his home.

The river was a grand sight, though a terrible one. The great mass of water swirled along at a speed of five miles an hour, carrying with it all kinds of floating things. Great trees uprooted in the woodlands, hay-stacks from the farms, rafts of logs from the saw-mills, millions of fence rails, hundreds of gates, barn doors, house roofs, and now and then whole houses, were swept along in a confused mass of rubbish on the breast of the swollen stream.

It was a grand thing just to watch the never-ending tide of floating things as they passed by, and little Bob could not keep his eyes off the river. He had passed the whole morning on the upper end of the island, watching the farm hands as they worked, with skiffs, catching and bringing ashore everything of value that they saw floating past. They had brought ashore several flat-boat oars, many fine pieces of timber, two skiffs, and other things of value; but it was noon now, and the men had gone to dinner.

Bob did not want any dinner. He wanted to watch the river, and so he staid where he was, nearly half a mile from the house. He perched himself on the top rail of a fence, so that he might see further out over the stream, and many times he saw things floating by which he would have liked to bring ashore.

There was a steamboat's yawl, for one thing, and it tempted him greatly, for such a boat is worth about a hundred dollars, and it passed so near the shore that Bob was sure he might have caught it if he had dared go out alone in a skiff. But that was against his orders and his promise. He was only a little ten-year-old boy, and although he knew how to row a little, it would never do for him to go out alone upon such a flood, and all that mass of drift. Even the men had to be very cautious when they went out, or their skiffs would have been crushed like so many egg-shells between the heavy trees and saw-logs. So Bob had been strictly ordered to stay on shore, and had promised to do so. He watched the yawl as it floated past him, wishing and wishing that he might get it; but wishing did not bring it ashore, and so it was swept along, and passed out of sight.

When Bob could see it no longer he turned to look up the river again. Presently he saw something coming which puzzled him. It looked at first like a dark block of wood with spots of red and white on top. He stood up on top of the fence to get a better look as the thing came nearer. It now began to look like an open box about eighteen inches wide and three feet long, with some red and white spotted thing lying inside. It came nearer and nearer, while Bob strained his eyes to make it out.

As the thing came just in front of the place where he stood he spoke.

"I declare," he said, "I do believe— No it can't be—but it looks like—"

Just then, if you had been watching him, you would have thought that Master Bob Bland had gone crazy. He leaped to the ground as suddenly as if he had been shot. His cap fell off, but he did not stop to pick it up. He ran to the nearest skiff, cast it loose, jumped in, and in another moment was out in the stream rowing "like mad" through the drift.

Never in his life before had Bob Bland disobeyed his mother or broken a promise, but now he was doing both at the risk of his life, for he had seen something in that box which made him forget all about orders and promises and danger to himself.

The box was a cradle, and Bob had seen that there was a live baby in it!

Quick as he had been, the rapid-current had carried the cradle past the head of the island before Bob had made the first stroke with his oars. It was fifty yards ahead of him, and Bob knew that it would not be easy to overtake it. It would have been easy enough, of course, if there had been no other drift, but in such a mass of rubbish the cradle was a mere speck, easily lost sight of. Besides, Bob had to sit with his back toward it in rowing, and so he had to stop every few minutes to stand up and look for the cradle. He had to row slowly, too, and make his way carefully in a zigzag course, to avoid the heavy timbers; but little by little he gained on the cradle.

At last he came within a few yards of it, and saw the pretty little sunny-haired baby lying there wide awake, and looking at him with its big blue eyes. But there was a great uprooted tree floating between the skiff and the cradle. Bob saw that he must row around this tree before he could get to the baby. He would not have minded this much if the tree had been floating quietly, but it was not. The swirling currents were turning it over and twisting it about, so that its long branches were threshing the water in a very wild fashion, and, as Bob could see, some of them struck very near the cradle. What if one should strike it! Bob shuddered as he thought of losing the baby in that way after coming so near it, for it had a strong hold upon his heart, now that he had seen it close at hand. Bob's own little baby sister, with golden hair and large blue eyes, had been very dear to him until God had taken her away. That was only a few months before this time, and the boy's heart was still aching for the little loved one whom he had lost. He longed for her every day, and was very lonely without her. Sometimes he dreamed that she had come back again, and when he woke to find that it was only a dream he found it very hard to keep back his tears, though he was as sturdy and manly a little fellow as anybody ever saw.

Bob had a very tender love for all babies for the sake of the one baby whom he had loved and lost, and that was why he forgot all about his promise, and rowed out alone upon the river when he saw that a baby was in danger there. He wanted to save it at any risk, merely because it was a baby, but now that he saw it near at hand, and saw how closely like his baby sister it was, he forgot that it was a little stranger. To him those big blue eyes, those round rosy cheeks, and that fair hair were the eyes and cheeks and hair of his own little lost baby. From that moment Bob was wild with eagerness to get to the cradle before any harm should come to it. To him it was not a strange baby at all, but his baby that was in danger, and Bob would have risked anything to save it.

The drift was very thick around the skiff now, but little by little Bob made his way around the tree, and at last reached the cradle. The baby cowered as he lifted her out, and Bob shouted, "Hurrah!"

Then he looked eagerly at the little one's face, and felt her hair, saying:

"I don't know how it can be, but anyway this is my baby, sure enough. They'll all say it can't be, and I suppose it can't, as a matter of fact, but it's so, for all that. Just look at her eyes and hair and nose! Don't I know my own baby sister when I see her? Well, let 'em say this is some other baby if they like, but I know better. It's my baby, and I'll stick to it."

And Bob believed it was his own baby come back to him again. He couldn't understand it, but, for that matter, he couldn't understand a great many other things that were true; so he just made up his mind that this was true, and didn't try to understand it.

He took the bed and quilts out of the cradle and placed them in the skiff. Then he laid the baby down and took the oars again.

As he looked up he saw that the swift current had carried the skiff far past the island on which the house stood, and now the nearest shore was nearly two miles away.

He was frightened when he saw this, of course. He knew that it would take him a long time to row to the shore, and that there was great danger of getting the skiff upset or crushed on the way. If that should happen, his baby would be drowned, after all, and Bob could not bear to think of that. He didn't think about himself at all, but his baby must be saved!

He set out for the shore, rowing carefully, and keeping clear of every dangerous piece of drift. It was very slow work. Sometimes he had to back for a good distance, in order to get around heavy timbers which blocked his way; sometimes such timbers would surround him on every side, penning the skiff in. When that happened he had to wait as patiently as he could until the timbers drifted apart again, leaving an opening for him to row through.

The current was carrying him further and further down the river all this time, and when at last he reached the shore, Bob knew that he was several miles from home. He was tired out, and so he tied the boat and sat down to think.

Now that the baby was saved, Bob had time to remember that his father and mother must believe that he was lost. It was nearly night, and the last that anybody had seen of him was at noon. Bob knew that he must have been missed when the men came back from dinner, and it troubled him dreadfully to think how much his mother and father were suffering in their anxiety about him. Thinking of this, Bob saw that he must hurry homeward as fast as he could. His first plan was to take the baby in his arms and walk up the shore; but he remembered that the house was on an island now, a long way from the shore, and that when he should get opposite the place he would need a boat in order to reach it. It was clear that he must take the skiff with him, and he knew he could row along near shore, as the current was not very strong there, and there was not much drift inshore.

He was very tired, of course, and hungry, for he had eaten nothing since breakfast; but when he thought of his mother's anxiety he would not wait to rest.

It was hard work rowing, and the poor baby was fretting with hunger, which worried little Bob a great deal. In his eagerness to get home he thought the skiff moved like a snail, and began to fear that he never would get there at all. But there were a good many eddies near shore, and as the water in an eddy runs up-stream, these helped him along.

Night came on, and Bob was sure that it must be midnight at least when he found himself at the gate of the hill pasture. This gate was at the upper end of the island, and so at that point he left the shore and rowed toward the house.

He saw lights at the house, and thought that everybody must be spending the night looking for him. He rowed on, therefore, with all his might, though his legs and arms and back ached as if they had been beaten black and blue. There was not much drift and very little current on this side of the island, and Bob got on pretty rapidly, though it seemed to him that he was whole hours in making the crossing from the hill pasture to the home island.

At last he landed, and taking the baby in his arms, ran to the house. There was a light in the sitting-room, and to his surprise, when he entered, he found his mother quietly sewing.

"Oh, mamma!" he cried, "just see! our baby has come back, just as I dreamed, you know, that time I cried when I waked up. At least it didn't just come back, but I caught it and brought it back, you know, out there where I was sitting on the fence. I forgot about my promise, and I'll take any punishment—"

But Bob was out of breath by the time he had got this far in his effort to tell a long story all at once, and his mother could not make head or tail of his jumble of words. But she saw the baby, and saw that the poor little thing was hungry and cold. Without waiting to hear Bob's story, she took it in her arms, and spent the next half-hour in warming and feeding it and soothing it to sleep.

She too saw the strange likeness it bore to her lost little one as she sat holding it in her arms, and tears of gentle gladness trickled down her cheeks. Her faith was not so child-like as Bob's, and she knew that this was not her own baby; but in her heart she felt as if her dead had come back to her, and the feeling comforted her as nothing else in the world could have done.

When Bob found that his mother was too much taken up with the baby to listen to him, and saw that for some reason she had not been uneasy about his absence, he wondered why she had sat up sewing all night—for he was sure it must be nearly morning now. He looked at the clock, and to his surprise found that it was not yet ten o'clock.

"Well," said he to himself, "I don't understand it, unless it's all a dream again. Oh, I hope it isn't! for then I shall wake up and find the baby gone again."

He was very hungry, whether awake or dreaming, and so, while his mother attended to the baby, he went to the kitchen, where the tired girl gave him some supper. In talking with her he began to understand things a little better. It seemed that when his father left the dinner table that day he said he was going to row over to a neighbor's in a skiff to help save some cattle and other things that were in danger there, and in starting from the house he said to his wife:

"If I find Bob up at the landing, I'll take him along. We may be away all night if I find much to do over at Donald's, but Bob will enjoy the adventure."

Not finding Bob at once, and being in some haste, Mr. Bland went without him; but Bob's mother had thought all the time that her boy was with his father, and so there had been no alarm about him at all.

"But where did you get the baby, Bob?" the mother asked, when Bob went back into the sitting-room after eating his supper.

Then he told the story of his adventure, saying at the end: "I'll take any punishment you think right, mamma, but please don't make me say I'm sorry, for I ain't, and never shall be. I didn't mean to disobey you or to break my promise, but I ain't a bit sorry I did, 'cause if I hadn't our baby would have died again."

The fond mother was glad enough to forgive the disobedience, saying:

"You obeyed a higher command than mine, Bob, and did your duty like a man. If you had lost your life in trying to save the baby, I should have been very sorry, but I shouldn't have blamed you, my child. But what makes you say the baby would have 'died again'? You know this isn't really our own baby, though she looks so much like her."

"Now, mamma," said Bob, "please don't say that. Don't try to explain it, for I know that's our baby, and no mistake. Just you look and see. I thought it all out when I first took her out of the cradle. I don't understand how it is, but it's so. Maybe it's a miracle. Anyhow, that's my baby, and I never will believe any other way."

And so it came about that everybody called the child "Bob's Baby." Bob always called her so, and she, when she grew a little older and began to talk, refused to speak of herself as "I" or "me," but called herself "Bob's Baby" always.

Nobody ever came to claim her, and the careful inquiries that were made along the river failed to find anybody who had lost a baby. But as many whole families had been drowned, it was not hard to guess what had become of the little one's people. She remained Bob's baby, therefore, and is "Bob's Baby" still. Bob loves her even more than he did "before she died," as he says, for he is still firm in the belief that this is his own little sister, and says, in answer to all doubts,

"Maybe it's a miracle, but, anyhow, it's so."

IN A HOUSE-BOAT.

A Journal.

BY DINAH MULOCK CRAIK,

AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

HAD long heard of the house-boat, and had once seen it (as you see it now, my readers, in a sketch done by a girl little older than many of you, but already a notable English artist). It lies, summer after summer, moored in a tiny bay on our river Thames, and twice it had been offered to me for a week's occupation by its kindly owner, but I never was able to go. When at last I found I could go I was as ready to "jump for joy"—had that feat been possible at my age—as any of you young people.

To live in a house-boat on the broad river, with a safe barricade of water between you and the outside world, to fish out of your parlor door, and if you wanted to wash your hands, to let down your jug from your bedroom window;

THE HOUSE BOAT.

THE LAZY MOWER.

moreover, to have unlimited sunrises and sunsets, to sleep with the "lap-lap" of a flowing stream in your ears, to waken with the songs of birds from the trees of the shore—what could be more delightful? Nothing—except perhaps "camping out" under the stars, which might be a trifle damp and uncomfortable.

No dampness here. More than comfort—actual beauty. When I went down to look at it in early spring, and the kind owner showed it with pride—pardonable pride—I found the house-boat adorned with Walter Crane's drawings and William Morris's furniture, perfectly "aesthetic" in its decorations, and as convenient as a well-appointed yacht. Also there was "a feeling" about it as if the possessor loved it, and loved to make people happy in it. There were mottoes from Shakspeare, Shelley, Keats, Milton, in every room, and pictures on every wall, besides the perpetual pictures outside—a gallery of ever-changing loveliness.

I came home enthusiastic, and immediately set about choosing "a lot of girls," as many as the boat would hold, to share it.

Only girls. Any elderly person—except the inevitable one, myself—would, we agreed, have spoiled all. I did not choose my girls for outside things, though some of them were pretty enough, too; but for good temper, good sense, and a cheerful spirit, determined to make the best of everything, and face the worst if necessary. These were the qualities I looked for, and found.

I shall not paint their portraits, except to mention that three out of the six were Katherines. We had therefore to distinguish them as Kitty, Kath, and Katie, the latter being our little maid-of-all-work, our coachman's daughter. The other three girls were: the artist—whose name, Margery May, is public property—and two girls, specially mine, whom I shall designate as "Meum and Tuum." All were between fifteen and twenty-five—happy age!—and all still walked "in maiden meditation, fancy-free." So we had not a man among us, except our sole male protector, Katie's father, and our long faithful servant. Him I shall call "Adam," after Shakspeare's Adam in As You Like It, whom he resembles in everything but age.

Six girls afloat! And very much afloat they were, swimming like ducks—no, let us say swans—on a sea of sunshiny happiness. As we drove from our last railway station, through the little town—the last town, too—our open omnibus, filled with bright-faced girls, seemed quite to interest the inhabitants. And when we reached the actual country, that lovely Thames Valley, which all English artists know, the ringing laughter at every small joke startled the still July afternoon, and made the birds dart fluttering out of the hedge-rows. Such hedge-rows!—full of wild brier-roses, pink and deep red honeysuckle, traveller's-joy, and dozens of other flowers useless to name, as they may not grow in America. But our English girls love them, our English fields would be nothing without them.

"There it is! There is the house-boat!" cried Kitty, who had seen it before, having been with me when we explored it domestically.

"Hurrah! we have nearly reached it—our 'appy 'ome!" exclaimed Mumm and Tumm, standing up in the carriage together. Two of the Katherines followed their example; indeed, we should have been considered a most ill-behaved party, only fortunately there was no one to see us except one laborer, lazily sitting on a mowing-machine which was slowly cutting down all the pride of the flowery meadow through which we drove to the river-side.

There she lay, the Pinafore, and beside her the Bib, a little boat, which was to be our sole link with the outside world. In it sat the owner, who had patiently awaited us there these two hours, and whose portrait I should like to paint if only to show you a bachelor—an old bachelor you young girls would call him—who has neither grown selfish nor cynical, who knows how to use his money without abusing it, and who does use a good part of it in making other people happy.

The Pinafore is his hobby. He had it built on the top of a barge, under his own direction, and from his own design. It consists of a saloon at one end, a combination kitchen and dining room at the other, and four cabins between, with two berths in each. A real little house, and well might we call it our happy home—for a week.

Our host showed us all out there it once more, pointed out every possible arrangement for our comfort, partook of a hasty cup of tea, and then drove back in our empty omnibus Londonward, deeply pitied by us whom he left behind in his little paradise.

The first meal!—its liveliness was only equalled by the quickness with which it disappeared. And then came several important questions.

"Business before pleasure," said the stern mother. "Choose your room-mates, girls, and then arrange your rooms. It is the fashion on board the Pinafore to do everything for yourselves. When all is ready we will take a row and watch the sunset, then come back to bed."

This last would have been a pleasant business if some of them had had to "turn in" to beds of their own making.

"Ma'am," said Katie, who was beside me when I peeped into one cabin, "hadn't I better do the rooms? the young ladies do not quite understand about it. I will have all ready by the time you come back."

Katie, the best of little house-maids, was heartily thanked, and her offer accepted. "But, girls, remember, it is to be the first and last time. After-to-night you must learn to do your own rooms yourselves."

So we threw overboard the practical for the poetical, and, like Hiawatha, went sailing "toward the sunset" in dreamy, lazy delight.

What a sunset it was! Everything seemed full of rich summer life, from the stately pair of swans sailing about with their six gray cygnets after them, to the water-hen sitting among the reeds, the willow-wren singing in among the bushes, and the water-rat darting into his hole as we passed. All was beauty, all was peace, and

OUR NEW DOG.

BY JIMMY BROWN.

I'VE had another dog. That makes three dogs that I've had, and I haven't been allowed to keep any of them. Grown-up folks don't seem to care how much a boy wants society. Perhaps if they were better acquainted with dogs they'd understand boys better than they do.

About a month ago there were lots of burglars in our town, and father said he believed he'd have to get a dog. Mr. Withers told father he'd get a dog for him, and the next day he brought the most beautiful Siberian blood-hound you ever saw.

"HOW THAT DOG DID PULL!"

The first night we had him we chained him up in the yard, and the neighbors threw things at him all night. Nobody in our house got a wink of sleep, for the dog never stopped barking except just long enough to yell when something hit him. There was morn'a scuffleful of big lumps of coal in the yard in the morning, besides seven old boots, two chunks of wood, and a bushel of broken crockery.

Father said that the house was the proper place for the dog at night; so the next night we left him in the front hall. He didn't bark any all night, but he got tired of staying in the front hall, and wandered all over the house. I suppose he felt lonesome, for he came into my room, and got on to the bed, and nearly suffocated me. I woke up dreaming that I was in a melon patch, and had to eat three hundred green water-melons or be sent to jail, and it was a great comfort when I woke up and found it was only the dog. He knocked the water picher over with his tail in the morning, and then thought he saw a cat under my bed, and made such an awful noise that father came up, and told me I ought to be ashamed to disturb the whole family so early in the morning. After that the dog was locked up in the kitchen at night, and father had to come down early and let him out, because the cook didn't dare to go into the kitchen.

We let him run loose in the yard in the daytime, until he had an accident with Mr. Martin. We'd all been out to take tea and spend the evening with the Wilkinsons, and when we got home about nine o'clock, there was Mr. Martin standing on the piazza, with the dog holding on to his cork leg. Mr. Martin had come to the house to make a call at about seven o'clock, and as soon as he stepped on the piazza the dog caught him by the leg without saying a word. Every once in a while the dog would let go just long enough to spit out a few pieces of cork and take a fresh hold, but Mr. Martin didn't dare to stir for fear he would take hold of the other leg, which of course would have hurt more than the cork one. Mr. Martin was a good deal tired and discouraged, and couldn't be made to understand that the dog thought he was a burglar, and tried to do his duty, as we should all try to do.

The way I came to lose the dog was this: Aunt Eliza came to see us last week, and brought her little boy Harry with her. Harry is six years old, and he isn't so bad as he might be, considering his age. The second day after they came Harry and I were in Tom McGinnis's yard, when Tom said he knew where there was a woodchuck down in the pasture, and suppose we go and hunt him. So I told Harry to go home and get the dog, and bring him down to the pasture where Tom said the woodchuck lived. I told him to untie the dog—for we had kept him tied up since his accident with Mr. Martin—and to keep tight hold of the rope, so that the dog couldn't get away from him. Harry said he'd tie the rope around his waist, and then the dog couldn't possibly pull it away from him, and Tom and I both said it was a good plan.

Well, we waited for that boy and the dog till six o'clock, and they never came. When I got home everybody wanted to know what had become of Harry. He was gone and the dog was gone, and nobody knew where they were, and Aunt Eliza was crying, and said she knew that horrid dog had eaten her boy up. Father and I and Mr. Travers had to go and hunt for Harry. We hunted all over the town, and at last a man told us that he had seen a boy and a dog going on a run across Deacon Smith's corn field. So we went through the corn field and found their track, for they had broken down the corn just as if a wagon had driven through it. When we came to the fence on the other side of the field we found Harry on one side of the fence and the dog on the other. Harry had tied the dog's rope round his waist, and couldn't untie it again, and the dog had run away with him. When they came to the fence the dog had squeezed through a hole that was too small for Harry, and wouldn't come back again. So they were both caught in a trap. How that dog did pull! Harry was almost cut in two, for the dog kept pulling at the rope all the time with all his might.

When we got home Aunt Eliza said that either she or that brute must leave, and father gave the dog away to the butcher. He was the most elegant dog I ever had, and I don't suppose I shall ever have another.

"HE'S WEEPING FOR ME."

(What little Hilda Traquair, aged four, said to her mother.)

BY E. M. TRAQUAIR.

MOTHER dear, open the window high:
Let me look out at the bright blue sky:
Floating across it the cloudlets white
Are hiding the sunbeams out of sight.

There is the home of God, you say,
Who made the night and the fair sweet day,
And looks at us all with a Father's love,
Although His house is so high above.

Now there comes rain, and I want to know
Why drops from heaven should fall below,
You say God sends them down from the skies:
Rain-drops are tears, then, from God's own eyes.

Why is He crying, sweet mother dear?
'Tis only the naughty need shed a tear:
And God is so good! Oh, then it must be Because I was naughty He's weeping for me.

CHAPTER II.

WHERE IS IT?

REGAINING his feet with a howl of fury, the Persian drew his long khaujar (dagger). But just then the two combatants were driven apart by a sudden movement of the crowd, as it opened to make way for a dozen sallow, hard-faced, white-frocked Russian soldiers, who came tramping steadily on, headed by a tall officer in uniform, in whom Ernest recognized Colonel Hilton himself.

"Come down out of that!" shouted the Colonel, as one of the bunches of grass flung from the roof by his energetic son hit him full in the face. "Come down, you young monkey, and don't go burying your own father before he's dead!"

"Is that you, father?" cried Tom. "Stand clear below, boys; I'm coming."

He leaped from the roof as he spoke, but the Russian grenadiers, with whom he seemed to be a prime favorite, caught him in their arms with a loud cheer, just as Ernest elbowed his way through the crowd to join them. The Persian had vanished; but Ernest afterward remembered, with good reason, that his enemy's last glance rested not on him, but on Colonel Hilton, with a glare of mingled rage, fear, and hatred worthy of a wounded tiger.

The Colonel's party were not long in making their presence felt. While one of the soldiers clambered on to the flaming roof, and tore down the blazing grass with his bare hands as unconcerned as if he were only tossing hay, the rest formed a chain to the tank at the entrance of the street, and passing buckets nimbly from hand to hand, soon put an end to the fire. In less than a quarter of an hour all was over, and the Colonel, having dismissed his men, had leisure to hear Ernest's story, over which he looked very grave indeed.

"You couldn't well have done anything but what you did, my boy; but I'm sorry you have quarrelled with that fellow, Kara Georg, for he's the most spiteful rascal I know. He owes me a grudge for a lesson I gave him some years ago, and he's one that'll stick at nothing to get square with anybody that he's got a spite against. Unluckily, he's very useful to the Russian government as a spy, and is always being sent on secret missions into Afghanistan; so, as he can't be got rid of, you'd better take care and not get in his way again, for he'd drink no more of cutting your throat than of slicing a melon."

"So I shall, most certainly," said Ernest, rather startled at this specimen of the ways of his new home.

"And now, boys," resumed the Colonel, "before I go on to the citadel, which was what I was doing when I met you, we'd better have something to eat. The Great Bazar's close by, and there we can get a real Tartar lunch."

A few minutes later, after fighting their way through a jumble of dust, dirt, camels, donkeys, prowling dogs, horrible smells, black-browed Bokhariots, long-nosed Persians, pudding-faced Tartars, baboon-like Sarts, and fet, yellow-bearded Russian merchants, they found themselves in a long, narrow, dirty passage, roofed with tattered matting, and flanked on either side by queer little narrow-mouthed stores, very much like overgrown rat-traps, and crammed with goods of every kind, from Russian tar-nuts to Persian carpets and Chinese slippers.

Through this chaos the Colonel clef his way without a halt, turning a deaf ear to the screaming salutations of the native tradesmen, till he reached a large empty booth, in one corner of which a queer little half-clad Tartar, brown and shrivelled as an over-fried sausage, was stooping over a round black opening in the ground, very much like a tiny coal-hole.

"Sotnya pilmenn!" (a measure of dumplings), cried the Colonel, stepping in.

The Tartar replied by fishing up from his "coal-hole" (which was really a native oven) a copper pan filled with tiny balls of greasy dough, not much bigger than a good-sized marble. These he emptied into a wooden bowl, poured over them a brimming ladleful of melted fat, and then, handing to each of his three customers, who had squatted themselves upon a sheet of gray felt at the back of the booth, a sharp-pointed chip of wood like a monster tooth-pick, signed to them to begin eating.

Ernest, rather puzzled how to do so, watched his two companions, and seeing that they were spearing the dumplings with their chips, and swallowing them after first dipping them in the hot grease, he followed their example.

"Chopped meat and onions, seemingly," remarked he, after his first mouthful, "and not bad stuff either. I wonder what meat it is?"

"Better not be too curious about that, Ernie," said Tom Hilton, with a grin; "it don't do to ask what things are made of in this country. You remember what the Highland gamekeeper said of his master's shooting: 'The more said, the less the better.'"

The novelty of making a real Tartar meal out of the same dish with two other people made Ernest eat pretty heartily, but he was somewhat startled to hear that he and his companions had eaten thirty-six dumplings among them, and still more so to see that the total cost of the entertainment was only thirty kopecks (twenty cents).

"Living's cheap here, it seems," laughed he. "If I ever lose all my money, which isn't very likely while you have the charge of it, father, I shall come and settle in Tashkent."

"You might do worse," answered his adopted father; "but I dare say you'll have queerer fare than this when you go soldiering in India, as I suppose you will some day, since your own father wished it. Well, boys, I must be off now; but I'll be home about five o'clock, and we'll have a snug evening all to ourselves."

But that evening was destined to be more eventful than he imagined. They were still sitting over their after-dinner coffee in the Colonel's cozy little parlor, and Ernest was wondering to see, in the heart of this region of mosques, turbans, and camels, photographic albums, copies of the Graphic and the New York Herald, prints from the Illustrated London News, and engravings from the pictures of Frith and Landseer, when suddenly a shrill, chirping voice was heard outside the door, at the first sound of which Colonel Hilton sprang up and hurried out.

"Ha, Pavel Petrovitch!" (Paul son of Peter) "is this really you? Why, your last letter was dated from Moscow, and I never thought of seeing you again this year. Come in, come in; I'm very glad to see you."

The next moment the Colonel re-entered with a little man in a brown coat, whom he introduced as Professor Makaroff.

Ernest started as if he had been shot. Having seen this famous explorer's name celebrated in every leading English journal for exploits as daring as those of Stanley or Colonel Gordon, he had pictured to himself a grim, bearded, sun-browned giant, with a revolver at every button-hole. The man he now saw was a thin, pale-faced, quiet little fellow, with a voice like the piping of a canary, and no sign of a weapon anywhere about him.

"I see you're wondering why I've come," said the Professor, when the first greetings were over. "The fact is, our Imperial Geographical Society has offered a reward for the discovery of the lost city of Margilian, over the existence of which you and I used to fight so last year, and I'm now hoping to settle our dispute once for all by finding the place myself."

"Have you any fresh information on the subject, then?" asked the Colonel, beginning to feel interested.

"I have indeed. A few weeks ago Hadji Murad (that Bokhariot trader, you remember, with whom I travelled along the border of Thibet in '75) sent me word that one of his Tartars had just come in from the Tien Shan,* telling of a very strange story. He had got lost among the mountains, and wandered about for two days, until his food was spent, and his strength almost gone, when all at once he espied a passage among the rocks, cut as smooth and even as a railway. He followed it for more than a verst (two thirds of a mile), and suddenly found himself in a vast open space, right in front of a great stone temple with a row of tall pillars, around which lay the ruins of many other buildings. But just then a huge shadowy figure rose from the brow of the cliff overhead, and waved one hand as if warning him back, while with the other hand he pushed over a great rock that almost crushed the poor Tartar, who fled in terror, and was picked up half fainting by a party of Khokandese merchants at the foot of a precipice."

"And you really believe all that?" asked Hilton, with a sly smile.

"I believe it so much that I telegraphed Murad to offer the man a thousand rubles" (8750) "to guide me to the spot, but it seems he's so frightened that no money can tempt him to venture again."

"Or, in other words, he don't care to hunt for a place which never existed except in his own romancing stories."

"Gently, gently, friend. With the exception of the shadowy giant (who was probably a dust-cloud raised by a falling stone), his tale exactly fits my theory. It is well known that the turning-point of Alexander the Great's march upon China was the present site of Khodjent, and that he left there a colony of his soldiers. What is more natural than that, finding themselves within too easy range of the natives on that smooth plain, they should have retreated into the mountains, and built another city there? That they must have done so is proved by the existence of the modern town of Marghilan, which stands on the border of the very district where I suppose the lost city to be.

* Celestial Mountains—the range between Western China and Asiatic Russia.

Marghilan is obviously a corruption of Margilian, and thus it follows—"

And so on for another half hour.

"I say, Ernie," whispered Tom, "wouldn't it be gay if we could hunt out the place ourselves, and get there before the Professor?"

The suggestion haunted Ernest that night even in his sleep. He dreamed that he was a special correspondent with the army of Alexander the Great, taking notes with the point of an Egyptian obelisk, which kept breaking off at every other word. Alexander pointed to a distant tree, and bade him pick a better pencil from those which grew on it. But as he approached, the tree changed into his Persian enemy of the morning, who seized and hurled him into the Oxus with such a tremendous splash that he awoke, and found that he had fallen out of bed into his cold bath.

"COME DOWN, YOU YOUNG MONKEY!"

THE CATAPULT.

THE CATAPULT AND THE RIFLE.

BY ARTHUR LINDSLEY.

“WHAT are these men doing, Uncle George? They seem as though they were pulling at something with all their might.”

“Yes, that is exactly what Mr. Poynter designed to have you understand from his picture. They are pulling in earnest, trying to draw down that great beam which you see above their heads. It is held at the other end by a very powerful spring, which makes it so difficult for them to draw it. Their object is to bring it down quite to the ground and fasten it there for a moment with a bolt or bar, until the ropes can be taken away. Then the bar will be pulled away suddenly, and the spring will throw the beam up with terrible force, so as to strike the beam or dart which you see balanced, and pointed out through the opening in the wall. It is a catapult.”

“But what is a catapult, Uncle George? What is it for? What good does it do? I am sure I never saw anything like it.”

“No; you never saw anything like it, Frank; neither can I tell you what a catapult is, for there is no catapult. It is many, many hundred years since one has been used. By-the-way, can you tell what that picture is intended to represent, how long ago it was that those people lived, and worked their catapult, and bent their bows as you see them?”

“No, sir; I see nothing by which I can even guess.”

“I will show you one thing which may guide us, and I think enable us to come at the date correctly. Look at the upright beam forming the frame of the catapult. There are letters cut in the wood. Can you make them out?”

“Yes, Uncle George, very easily. D-E-L-E-N-D-A E-S-T-C-A-R-T-H-A-G-O. That is curious; it makes no sense that I can see.”

“Probably, Frank, the man who cut the inscription was not much of a scholar. He made his letters just as his space on the beam gave him room, without dividing them into words. What he meant was, Delenda est Carthago. Does that help you out of the difficulty?”

“Why, no, sir; I can not say that it does. I know that those words mean, ‘Carthage must be destroyed,’ and so I suppose it must have something to do with ancient Carthage, but I can not tell anything more than that.”

“Then you do not know who originated that expression?”

“No, sir; I have often seen it, but I never thought of asking from what it came. I suppose I ought to have done so.”

“I will explain it to you then, Frank, and you can remember it for all time to come. That drawing shows a party of Roman soldiers engaged in an attack on Carthage during the third Punic war, and the date is therefore between the years 149 and 146 B.C. The letters cut on the post tell us this very plainly, for they owe their origin simply to Cato, the famous Roman censor, senator, and statesman, and he never used the expression until the year 150 B.C., so far as the records inform us. He had before that time felt great fear and hatred of Carthage as a rival power, but having in that year crossed the Mediterranean and seen the city for himself, his fear was so much increased that from that time onward he used every exertion within his power to promote war between the two cities, and destroy Carthage. It would seem that his age (for he was then eighty-three years old) might have given him more moderation and less narrowness of view, but it did not, for it is stated that every speech which he made in the senate during the succeeding year he closed with the sentence: "Ceterum censeo Carthaginem esse delendam!"—"However, I vote that Carthage be destroyed."

"And did he destroy it, Uncle George?"

"His influence was so great that the third Punic war was undertaken without any sort of even reasonable pretext for it—as unjust a war as was ever waged. It ended in three years with the total destruction of Carthage; but the iron-hearted old man did not live to see it, for he died in the first year of the war, 149 B.C. He is often called Cato the Wise, but he scarcely seems to me to merit any praise for the spirit he showed in this matter. The expression which he used so often became one of common quotation in Rome, and has come down to us in the form delenda est Carthago, being used with reference to any object which it was deemed necessary to destroy or put out of the way."

"I see now, Uncle George, Cato originated the expression in 150; the war began in 149 and ended in 146, and this picture must represent a battle of that date, as you said. The S.P.Q.R., meaning Senatus Populusque Romanus (Senate and People of Rome), which is inscribed just below the other words, was put almost everywhere by the Romans. And I can see that these men look like Roman soldiers."

"Yes, all that is true, Frank. At the time of the last Punic war catapults had been in use about two hundred and fifty years, without much change, doubtless, in their construction. They were planned and built first during the siege of Syracuse, in the reign of the tyrant King Dionysius the elder. There was nothing absolutely new in the principle of their construction; it was only their great size that gave them peculiar character. They were, in fact, similar to huge cross-bows. Men were in the habit of using bows for the purpose of throwing arrows to kill their enemies or the beasts of prey which they hunted. In the same way the Romans employed their catapults to throw great stones for the purpose of battering walls and buildings. The name ballista was frequently given to them. Josephus says that at the siege of Jerusalem large numbers of them were in use, and did great execution."

"How large were they, Uncle George? What could they really do?"

"They were made of such size as to throw in some instances a beam of wood, armed with iron, six feet long, and weighing sixty pounds, to a distance of four hundred yards—that is, nearly a quarter of a mile—and, of course, a mass of rock in proportion. But now when you ask me what they could do, I can best illustrate it to you by showing you what modern weapons can do in comparison. This catapult in the picture, I have no doubt, is correctly drawn, and it appears to be one of great size and strength. It is evidently quite near to the wall, or whatever it may be designed to attack. It consists, in the first place, of a huge building.

"Look at those immense timbers, which are necessary to afford sufficient strength for the engine and its terrible blows, and at the same time to give shelter to the men who worked it, as well as to the others whom you see using their bows, and endeavoring to kill the enemy above them by shooting through loop-holes provided for that purpose. And, by-the-way, it is through one of these loop-holes that the arrow has entered which you see; men were often killed in that way. You can readily see how clumsy all this was, what a great amount of labor and of weight it involved, how many men were needed to move it and to do the work.

"And when it is all accomplished, with so much difficulty and so much delay, what will be the result? It will throw that one huge dart, and that dart may kill one of the enemy if it should chance to hit him, of which there is very great doubt, because it goes almost entirely at random. That little slender arrow that comes whizzing in there through the loop-hole will kill the man whom it strikes as surely as the heavy dart of the catapult. It is true, the great dart, if it should plunge into a crowd of men, might by its weight do more, and destroy several, but that would seldom occur."

"And I should think it would take a long time to get it ready to throw one of its darts."

"Yes, a long time. In fact, but few could be thrown in the course of a day. A rifle-ball does all that the catapult dart could do in single cases; it kills its man with terrible certainty. Now let us think what one of our modern cannon can do with shot or shell, both in distance and in weight."

"Yes, Uncle George, I have just been reading an account of General Gillmore's Swamp Angel in his attack on Charleston. It threw its shells four miles, and they destroyed houses when they burst at that distance."

"That is a fair illustration, Frank. The smallest field-piece ever used now throws a shot having more power than the missile from a Roman ballista; but when one of the most improved of our present styles of cannon drives its shot weighing a ton through an iron plate sixteen inches in thickness, with such force as to break and shatter the heavy beams used to support it, its power becomes almost too terrible to think of. And all this fearful power is held in the elastic vapor contained in a small quantity of black gunpowder. It is very true, Frank, that in respect to war we have learned much more than the Romans knew."

PICKEREL-FISHING.

FISHING for pickerel is a pleasant amusement, and boys are usually fond of it, one reason being that it does not demand as much skill or as delicate tackle as trout. The articles necessary for the sport are comparatively inexpensive, and some of them may be easily made.

It is not necessary that a special rod should be used for pickerel-fishing, as a good stiff bottom rod with upright rings will answer every purpose. Of course it should be twelve feet in length at least, of not less than four joints, be fitted with "counters" to prevent the joints sticking fast in case they get damp, and have a short, stout top joint fitted with a pretty large ring at the end for live-bait fishing.

Long rods are best made of East India cane, as they are light, strong, and pretty supple. A good, cheap rod is one of stout, straight-grained, well-seasoned ash, with a strong lance-wood top. Hickory and greenheart combined make a splendid pickerel rod. It is scarcely necessary to say that they should always be provided with winch fittings. A spear is often handy.

Don't throw your money away on "fancy" lines, but obtain from a score to sixty yards of medium brown hemp water-cord, and rub it well with white wax. Plaited line is, of course, preferable to twisted.

The trace for spinning should be of medium strong gimp, from two to three feet in length, and fitted with three or four swivels, one of the buckle pattern at the end, so that the loop of the spinning tackle may be easily attached. A trace of hardly more than one foot in length, with two or three swivels, one buckle, and a barrel lead very near to the loop, will answer very well for live-baiting. It is well to have a detachable lead for spinning traces. One is easily made by running a piece of soft wire through an ordinary penny barrel lead, and twisting it (the wire) into the form of a little spiral at each end, through which you can slip your line or trace.

Artificial baits are often very useful, but there are so many varieties of them, and they are so different, that it would be almost impossible for a young fisherman to select the best. Don't be persuaded into purchasing a big, frightful, glaring contrivance—or a little one either—with hooks ten times too large, but get an old-fashioned spoon bait, copper on the convex side and silver on the concave, price about forty cents. Take off the top triangle, leaving only the one at the bottom of the spoon. The spoon spins much better without the top hook, and a fish is hooked quite as well as with it. See that your bait spins well, and that it is kept clear of all obstructions in the shape of weeds, grass, and leaves.

Be guided by your own judgment with regard to what distance you should fish from the bank. Keep your bait in mid-water if possible, spin it in front of and between weed beds, and avoid shallows where you can see the bottom very plainly. A fairly cloudy day, with a rolling breeze ruffling the surface of the water into miniature wavelets, is the best for pickerel-fishing. From the middle of May to December, and from December to the middle of February, pickerel are usually in season.

Live-baiting, or sinking and roving, is a very good method of capturing pickerel, and can not be beaten for ponds, lakes, and broad expanses of water. Two or three floats should be used—one of cork, about the size of a hen's egg, painted white and green, and one or two much smaller ones, fixed about two feet above the principal float. If two small ones are used, they should be twenty-four inches apart. The best hook is a combination of three hooks, two large ones and a small one fastened about half-way up the shanks of the other two, but pointing in a contrary direction, like the lower part of the capital letter Y, which altogether shows the direction in which each hook points.

In putting the tackle together the following directions may be serviceable: After having fixed your rod together and drawn a portion of the reel line through the rings, fix your floats upon the ends of the latter, the uppermost one last; then attach your trace to the loop at the end of the line, afterward your hook to the buckle swivel, and next your bait to the small hook. Of course, before doing this, you should select a good stretch of water opposite some weed or rush bed, or trees overhanging or growing out of the water.

Having got ready and adjusted your floats to the depth of the water—your bait should be kept in mid-water if less than eight feet in depth, but not more than four feet below the surface on any account—cast your bait—not far, if possible, from the weeds or other growth, but mind you don't cast too near, or you may get fast in something stronger than a pickerel.

If you don't get a run in half an hour, examine your bait to see whether it is all right. If your floats drift near to the bank, draw in your line, and make a fresh cast. As soon as you get a run—which is usually notified by the big float beginning to bob up, down, and about very violently, and finally disappearing—do not strike, but allow the pickerel time to get the bait well down its throat—say about thirty seconds—and then, if necessary, strike him gently, for it may have hooked itself, and a good jerk might tear the hook out. When the fish is fast, draw him in carefully. A gudgeon or a small sucker are the best baits. Hook your live bait just in front of the first fin on the top of the back.

“DICK AND D.”

BY LUCY C. LILLIE.

Author of “Mildred's Bargain,” “Nan,” etc.

CHAPTER XVII. THE CONCLUSION.

TIME drifted on, bringing Dick Devine to a day when he was pronounced well enough to be dressed, and allowed to sit up in the big arm-chair and receive visitors.

Maud had arranged to have Dick Dearing and Norry and Nancy Barlow all come together, thinking a general talk less likely to excite him, and punctually at eleven o'clock a tap sounded on his door, and there they were!

But could this very clean, well-dressed boy be Norry? Dick felt his heart thump with delight and gratitude and joyfulness, and when Norry clasped him round the neck, and Master Dick said, “How do, old fellow?” and Nancy said, “Well, I never!” Dick had to let two or three tears of joy trickle down his cheeks.

Then Miss Maud placed chairs for the visitors, and took Nancy's bonnet and shawl, and Norry's new cap, which had a gilt band to it that he liked to feel, and a happier party you could not have wished to see.

Before long Dearing asked Maud if he might not tell Dick all that had happened—the sequel to his flight and Joel Potter's errand. Permission being granted, Dick told the story.

As soon as they knew that Dick Devine was safely cared for at Barnabas, Dr. Field, Joel, and Miss Maud had taken counsel as to what had better be done.

Joel thought he knew the tavern where Gurdle and his poor captives had remained that memorable night, and he suggested taking a constable and going there himself. This was agreed to, and then Dr. Field telegraphed to New York to have Brooks watched.

Joel's visit to the tavern did not prove very successful, for Gurdle had disappeared, and the landlord either would not or could not give any account of him; but a detective was commissioned to find him, and then Dr. Field decided to carry out his original plan of sending the family back to town, and to put Brooks off his guard by awaiting him as agreed upon. To further this plan, none of the servants were told of Dick Devine's escape and his present whereabouts, so that Mr. Brooks, unconscious of the trap set for him, appeared at the Cedars on the afternoon of the seventeenth, dignified and pompous as usual.

Dr. Field had provided himself with help in case of need. Four policemen were within call, and with no appearance of caution the Doctor retired at his usual hour.

Now, as it turned out later, Brooks had heard nothing of Dick's flight from Gurdle, and so he imagined everything would go on as smoothly as possible.

About one o'clock the Doctor, keenly on the watch, heard a stealthy step down the hall. As the sound died away he opened the door of his room, and crept downstairs. There in the dining-room he saw Brooks carefully removing the fastenings of one of the windows.

It took but a moment for the Doctor to give his signal, and his men rushed in. Brooks was taken before he knew what had happened; and as burglars' tools were found on his person, his excuses proved of no avail.

As soon as he saw there were no means of escape he tried to obtain mercy by giving all the information he could about Gurdle, and admitted that their plan had been to make use of the Devine boys in getting into the house, and, if necessary, let any blame rest upon them.

The only good result of Brooks's confession was that by this means Gurdle was tracked and arrested, and Dearing,

"HE SEEMED TO FEEL WHAT HE MIGHT DO."

in concluding his story, told of their being sentenced to prison, other facts having come to light about Brooks, which made the Doctor all the readier to give him up to justice.

It may easily be imagined with what interest Dick's story was listened to; how they all expressed delight, and how Norry, leaning back in his chair, allowed his face to assume an expression of such smiling content that it became quite wonderful to see.

Dick Dearing did not on that occasion mention the various plans he had formed for "D.'s" future good, and indeed Dr. Field, while very anxious to see to the future of the two boys, would not allow himself to form any plan without great care and reflection, and he thought it would be better to test Devine in certain ways before allowing his own Dick to have his wish, and bring up Devine like his brother.

But all that week Devine's life seemed so beautiful and happy and prosperous that he could hardly believe it was really all for him. To begin with, the boys of the school were allowed to give him a treat, and he sat out in the garden one sunny morning and was made a hero of, all of which homage, I must say to his credit, was received with much simplicity. The lad's heart was deep, his principles high, and his character well worth leading to noble uses, but he knew himself to be ignorant and unused to the ways of the boys about him. He was thrilled with happiness and gratitude, but he was very quiet over it all.

Packer seemed to have an idea that he would be able to afford the Barnabas boys something very striking and tragic in the way of recitals. He looked upon him as one of the boys he had read of in cheap literature who did improbable, daring, thrilling things; but after a few days, seeing Devine's entire freedom from a sense of the heroic, he confided to his special audience that "he knew what was up—Devine was going to die"; he "was one of your saints"; and for some days he watched eagerly, hoping Devine would utter some "last sayings" which he, Packer, could repeat as one who knew him, and had listened.

But alas for Packer, and happily for Devine, his spirits revived as strength came back, and with the other Dick he grew merry and jovial—a fact which I think will puzzle Packer to his dying day. He still has the story of Dick Devine's appearance at the window to relate, but somehow a feeling of contempt had grown among the Barnabas boys for Packer's horrors, and I have heard that he did not long remain a pupil.

One very happy day Maud came down in a carriage and took Dick Devine up to the Cedars, and there were waiting Nancy and Joel and Norry, and they all dined together in the kitchen, and afterward Devine was sent for to the Doctor's study.

How kind his face looked! Devine, as he went in timidly, felt a sense of awe for the dear old gentleman sitting at his desk, but Miss Maud was there, and smiled upon him when the Doctor said,

"Dick, I want to talk a little with you about what you'd like to do."

Dick sat down as he was bidden, and his face grew rosy, but very happy.

"I've been thinking it all over," said the Doctor, "and my idea is this: Suppose you come to our house, and I give you two or three hours a day for schooling, and after that you can work—do anything that is needed. You shall have wages, and if you show any special aptitude for a trade, we can see that you have time to learn it."

At first Dick was about to give expression to wild delight; then he said, in a low tone:

"But, sir, Norry—"

"I know," the Doctor answered, quickly; "I have thought of that. I know your dread of institutions, but I think I can take you to one you will like for him just for a few hours every day. Nancy is very willing and glad to board him, and at this school they only teach the blind. They find out whether they can be cured, and if not, they teach them to be happy and useful. I think he might go there to-day."

Need I say how Dick Devine felt? It was decided not to take Norry with them. Dick went with the Doctor in his own chaise, and I am sure much of his dread of giving Norry over to the authorities faded when he saw the school of which Dr. Field had spoken.

It was just like a home—a rather small comfortable house—presided over by a blind gentleman and his bright, cheerful young wife. She explained that only in certain things did she need to be "eyes" for her husband. He best knew how to teach the blind, and above all how to teach them music. So Norry's dearest delight might be accomplished!

It seemed that evening as if every one had so much to say there was no time for anything. And what happy chatter it was! If Nancy said "Well, I never!" once, she said it fifty times, and Norry listened to all that was said of his future with smiles that seemed to wrinkle all his face.

I wish I could tell you of all the events of the next few weeks. Mrs. Thomason melted so far toward the poor boys as to say perhaps something might be done with them, and you may be sure Dick Dearing contrived to crush any symptoms of ridicule on the part of Thomason and Packer.

Dick Devine, or "D.," as they continue to call him, looks back to that time now with a strange and wondering sense of how much was done to help him.

He entered Dr. Field's service, and there worked well, studying and receiving a good education, though he will never be a brilliant scholar.

But there came one summer when the rosy, bright-eyed Dick Dearing fell ill, and the Doctor sent him abroad with little Barbara and Miss Maud, and who fitter to go with them as a nurse for Dearing—a general factotum—than Dick Devine? And while they were on that journey the lad seemed to discover wherein lay his one talent. Perhaps it was all the wonders in art which he saw so suddenly, perhaps it was that he had come to think of life in wider ways, but one day in a sculptor's studio he seemed to feel what he might do.

Dearing was so anxious for his namesake "to have a chance" that it was easily arranged to send him back to Rome. He had no fears about Norry. Nancy was now Joel's wife, and the boy lived between their home and the school, and though he will never see, he has been taught to lead a useful life. His music will always be his mainstay and dependence, for among the blind this art is not uncommonly developed.

Somebody told me not long ago that, going into a sculptor's room in Rome, he was struck by the power and earnestness of one pupil, and on asking his name was told it was Richard Devine. "But we always call him 'D.,'" and at that moment a tall young fellow sauntered into the room, and going up to this "D.," watched his work with one hand affectionately on his shoulder.

"You must come to the hotel as soon as you can," this last comer remarked, in a low tone. "Grandfather and my cousin Maud and Barbara are there, and we're going to talk about your work."

My friend told me that as the two went out of the studio he remarked how curious their bond seemed; for Dick Dearing in some way, to Devine's mind, must always seem "Master Dick," the gayly laughing, mischievous boy he first saw sitting on the kitchen table, and as for Devine, his new name of "D." was so lovingly given that it seems almost like a title of his own.

THE END.

THE JACK HORNER.

Here is a pretty costume for a boy. Old the jacket and kilt might be of olive green, and the waistcoat of bright scarlet cloth. Any two colors that combine well might be used. There should be a row of very bright buttons down the front of the vest and on the pockets, should there not, little manna?

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

DEPTON, PENNSYLVANIA.

Last night we saw a great glow in the sky, and were told it was the Upper Lehigh Breaker on fire. No. 1 Breaker was utterly destroyed by fire, and my uncle Alick saw it burn down. It was set on fire by an engine on the Central Railroad of New Jersey. This is the second time this has occurred. They had just stopped work at half past five because the breaker was full of coal. They had a force of men termed the Fire Brigade, and they passed buckets of water one to another. A coal breaker is a huge building, and very valuable. I wrote you this summer about one of ours being blown down by a tornado.

E. B. C., JEN.

HONG-KONG, CHINA.

I am a little girl six years old. I have a little brother two years old. We live in Hong-Kong. I am learning to play on the piano, and I can paint flowers from nature in water colors. I have a doll, Daisy, with joints. My doll Lily was two inches taller than my brother when Santa Claus brought her to me. The last piece I learned to play was "The Joyful Bells." I have no pets, but we have an Australian cow which gives ten bottles of milk a day. I want to tell Youse People that I had a big party, and I played the piano for music. I ought to have said, in the other place that I have two brothers, but one is in heaven, and I never saw him. PATTY.

This dear child printed her letter in beautiful capitals. How much taller is the little brother than the doll by this time, PATTY?

ANNAPOLIS, MICHIGAN.

I am six and a half years old. This is the second year I have taken Youse People. My papa gave it to me for a Christmas present a year ago last Christmas. I like it so well I get very anxious for it to come. I have a shepherd dog that is very mischievous. He will take care of my little baby sister when she walks in the yard. Sister is almost two years old, and is just as cunning as she can be. She has four dolls. She wants me to play with her, and dress her dolls, and take them to ride in the doll car. Baby's name is Florence. Mamma is writing this for me. Good-by.

MARY D. H.

RANDOLPH, WISCONSIN.

To-day is my birthday. I am a little girl seven years old. I am so happy with my presents. I got a nice set ring from papa, a one dollar bill from mamma, and a nice red scrap-book from my sister Eva. She is the only sister I have. She is a big girl, but she plays with me, and reads HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE to me. I've only just commenced to take it. I like it very much. I have one brother, he plays croquet with me. I amuse myself with my pets. I have a large black dog; his name is Dick. He is really papa's limiting dog, but I claim him. He has been to Iowa with papa hunting prairie chickens. I also have a cat, and her name is Katsy. I had a brood of Plymouth Rock chickens this summer. They were so tame that they would come and eat out of my hands. Papa and mamma have gone fishing too.

CORA BLANCKE R.

I am glad you had so very happy a birthday. I think you have a kind older sister.

ROCHESTER, NEW YORK.

I am a little boy nine years old. I have taken Youse People a long time, and think it is the most interesting paper published. I have had a great many pets, but I have not got any now. I live in a beautiful park called Arnold Park. My cousin Frank reads my paper every day. I enjoy it very much. I think the story "Raising the Pearl" was just splendid. I wrote once before, but my letter was not published. I do hope this one will be, as I want mamma to see it in my paper. I have been away this summer, and had a lovely time. I intend to have some kind of pet very soon. Will the Postmistress tell me what she thinks will be nice for a little boy my age? School opens on Monday, and then I will have to give my time to my books.

WOODWORTH C.

Your mamma will advise you very much better than I can as to the selection of a pet. Very much depends upon the place where you live, how much room you can spare for the pet's accommodation, and how much time your parents are willing to let you spend with it. Most little fellows of your age are very happy indeed if they have a pair of their own, and I presume you would be the same.

A VISIT AT UNCLE STEPHEN'S.

My name is Robbie Burns. Mamma says I was named after a great poet. I was eight years old the second day of last April. You see I missed only one day of being an April-frog. I have no brothers to play with, and one uncle, Little Bluebeard, calls her because she looks just like a pretty flower. How I do wish she had been a boy instead of a girl! Girls are pretty to look at, but not much account to play games with. When I get so restless that I mamma don't know what to do with me, she packs up my clothes, and sends me to my uncle Stephen. I wonder if there is another Robbie in the whole world who has got an uncle as I have. When I was a very little fellow my sabbath-school teacher asked me who the first man was. Never stopping to think I sang out as loud as I could, My Bluebeard called her, but my teacher cried because she laughed. But I can laugh at it myself now that I am such a big boy.

My uncle Stephen lives on a fruit farm twelve miles out of town, and has more peaches, pears, and grapes than a half-dozen boys could eat in as many years, it seems to me. Mamma sends all my old clothes when I go to the farm, and it just keeps my uncle busy. I can tell you, putting on patches. But I can't help it. I can no more help climbing trees than the squirrels, and everybody knows these rough country fences are rather crooked on top.

How I wish all the poor little children who live in the great cities could have a romp on the lawn in front of uncle's house. It is so green and cool. I like to put my ear down to the ground, and think I hear the fairies, but I know it is only the grasshoppers. I am altogether too old to believe much in fairies; they will do very well for girls.

When I get tired of play it is so nice to get into the hammock, and swing under the tall beech-trees. It seems to me if I could only climb to the top of one of them I would be quite as near from heaven. A brown thrush has built her nest in the topmost branches of the very tallest of these trees, and every night I can hear the young bird singing to himself to sleep. Sometimes when it is very warm, the birds are naughty, and quarrel, and the old mother-bird gives them a good scolding. I suppose there are so many in that nest, I would eat the others so very, and those that have to sleep in the middle don't like it very well. I know I don't, for I tried it once in my own bed, and was almost smothered.

The first thing I do in the morning is to feed the chickens, and at night I give Bessie a pair of new milk. I suppose you would like to know who Bessie is. She is the prettiest cow in the whole little calf in the country, and Old Whiteface is her brother. Bess seems to understand every word I say, and she has a lot of fun of turning her head on one side and looking so funny out of her soft brown eyes. She is full of fun, too, and often runs off with the pail on her nose. Pretty Bess I would not sell you for the world!

There is an old speckled hen that my auntie gave me. She has twelve red chickens, and they look so much alike that I have hard work to tell them apart. One has more black on his head than the rest, so I named him John, because he is so headstrong that I don't get on with him. I made up my mind whether I shall sell my chickens when they are grown or not. I think if I do I will make quite a fortune. Auntie says she is sure I can get forty cents a pair, and my chickens are good and fat. Only think how many marbles and fire-crackers I could buy with that amount of money!

On the next farm live two splendid boys, and we have fun together. We caught a mud-turtle one day, and put him in a tub of water, but when we went to look for him at night Mr. Mud-turtle had given us a slip, and gone off to the creek, a half-mile away.

The old turkey gobbler picked out my squirrel's eyes. He was so tame and cunning I called him Pet. I got Pet tied up that night. I don't know whether it was because he suffered so much with his eyes, or because I gave him too much candy. I felt just like having a good cry, but I didn't, but I was so mad that I would do anything beautiful anyway. The boys and myself found a good-sized cigar-box, and auntie lined it for us with soft white Canton flannel. We gathered our hats full of wild roses, and made a lovely wreath, and twined it all around the box. After I made an address we all sang a hymn, and then marched in a procession to a fine cedar-tree down under the hill where we buried all that was left of my little play-doll.

If you like what I have written, some time I will tell you more, but I can not stop without first telling the boys who take Little Youse People if they want to have a grand good time they must visit my uncle Stephen. ROBBIE B.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS.—I hope your house-keepers will forgive me for saying that, judging from the letter which you sent me, they don't cook and eat. But I remember the letter which started the idea, and one or two letters since, in which certain little people said they "hated" washing and dish-washing things. I want to help these dish-washers a little by telling them what a wise teacher of mine told me. She taught drawing. One day she was washing dishes, and thinking about drawing and artists. Soon she thought, "What is an art? How could I make sweeping or washing dishes an art? Then I thought of those beautiful old lines:

"Who sweeps a room as for God's laws Makes that and the action fine."

So I began to see that an art was simply the doing of any work in the best way in the shortest possible time. I tried it in sweeping, sweeping carefully, thoroughly, cobwebs and all things, while glancing at the clock. Then I tried it in dish-washing; I tried to wash and polish the dishes perfectly, but as fast as I could, and I soon liked to do it. "Try it, Little Housekeepers, and see how bright and pleasant your work will soon be. If we sweep a room as though we were doing it for God, we will not neglect the corners, nor shall we waste time. Yours heartily, JEAN.

We are always very glad when the older young ladies write to us, and Jean's advice is so good and so well expressed that I think some busy mothers will thank her for it, as well as some helpful little housekeeping children.

A correspondent kindly answers the inquiry of Grace II. D., in No. 294, as follows:

"The quotation, 'Little Youse People,' is from a poem of Dr. Rev. F. W. Faber, D.D. It occurs in this connection:

"Hearts good and true have wishes few,
In narrow circles bounded,
And hope that lives on what God gives
Is Christian hope well founded."

"Small things are best; grief and unrest
To rank and wealth are given;
But little things in little things
Bear little souls to heaven."

CANTON, MICHIGAN.

I am a little boy nine years old. I have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE two years, and I like it very much, and I enjoy reading the letters so well I thought I would have my mamma write me one, and will you please put it in the paper. I have a little dog, and his name is Willard. We have got two pets. One is a little dog; he is black and white. But on my other pet we think the most of; she is a poor blind horse, and her name is Broom. We are very kind to her, because she can not see. Good-by. ELWIN P.

COVINGDALE FARM, TORONTO COUNTY, CANADA.

I want to write and tell how much I liked the story "Thimble's Last Hunt." Mamma read it to Don and I, and we liked it so very much. I thought sure I was going to cry when Thimble died. I think that is the sweetest story I have ever heard, and have asked mamma to put the paper with it in away for me. I take good care of them all, but this one I want put right away in the trunk. We will have taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a few months, but we are so pleased with it that we are to have it all the time now—so says mamma.

LITTLE ANN AND PETS, only my sweet little pet sister. Don't you think that is nicer than cats, chickens, dogs, and rabbits? Well, mamma says I must not write too much, or you will not print it, and then I will feel taken HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE a kiss too. He is just six years old, and I am nearly eight. VIRGIE B.

Yes, dear, I think a little sister is the very, very sweetest of pets.

CLINTON, LOUISIANA.

As I have never seen any letters from Clinton, I thought I would write one. I would like to join the Little Housekeepers. I send a receipt for my postage stamps. I am twelve years old, and I am the oldest girl of the family. I have two sisters and three brothers, one of whom is older than me. I go to school at Stillman Institute, and am in the Scholastic Class. I have French, Latin, and music, besides my other studies. I have read Paul and Virginia in French, and also one book of Cesar. I live on a farm five miles from Clinton, and we are going to have a gold badge for it. I enjoy HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE very much, but I like the letters best, because I know they are true. I wish LIZZIE and P. could come and see me when she visits America. We live one mile from Comet Creek, and we have a boat in it. I fell out of it once, and got very wet. We have a top sail boat, and we sail breezes every night, although we are 450 miles from the bay. The young men of Clinton gave a Calico Ball on the 4th of September, and it was quite a success. I am afraid my letter will tire you, so I will close by saying my address is AMANDA PIPES, East Feliciana Parish.

And I would like to hear from LIZZIE, if she chooses to write.

HOMER, MICHIGAN.

We are three brothers, nine, eleven, and thirteen years old, and have taken Young People ever since the first number, and think it is splendid. Papa has taken the "big HARPER'S," as we call it, for nine years. We have no pets except our horses Fan and Nell, a lot of bantams, and a cat named Topsy, and she is George's, and he calls it Topsy Tyler. We liked that story very much.

Carl wants a goat awfully. We expect our uncle here next week to take Harry to Kentucky for a visit. We shall go to school every day, and I think he will be a telegraph operator. We are having our third railroad built through this place, and we watched it from the very first. The iron was laid just here in our town. We had a celebration, and gave the railroad men a dinner the day they got here, and everybody had a good time. When they reached Pulaski we took the iron train did not come back, but the Hooker boys are expected, so George and Carl walked there a distance of nine miles. We were four hours going, and as soon as we ate our dinner we got on the train and came home very tired, indeed, but so glad we had celebrated.

HARRY, GEORGE, and CARL B.

PORTSMOUTH, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

I am a little girl nine years old. I have no pets, but my brother has a dog named Sam, and my other named Carlo; he is very cunning; he has a little cart that he drags all around. I like "Dick and D." very much. MABEL V.

BROOKS, NEW YORK.

I am a little girl nine years old. I like HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE so much that I can hardly wait for it to come. I would like to join the Little Housekeepers. Mamma says I may try some of the receipts this winter, and I will let you know how I get along. Please, dear Postmistress, print this letter, as it is the very first one I have written. MARY D. M.

LA CUYNE, KANSAS.

I thought I would write you a little letter. I am a little girl nine years old. I go to school; and my second name is Emma. I have written you a little three-year-old brother Willie, a bird named Brownie, a dog named Shepherd, a white hen, and thirteen chickens. MAUDE S.

These three little girls of nine May call themselves pets of mine.

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

We are two little cousins. We live on the same square, and are always together. We take Young People, and like it very much. We think "Nan" is splendid, and wish there was a sequel to it. We each have a little cooking-stove, and are very fond of cooking on it. We have a very nice receipt for making ginger-snaps; we make them very often. We would like to join the cooking club, and will send you some receipts if you would like to have them. We study arithmetic, geography, spelling, history, grammar, elocution, and French; we also take music and drawing lessons. We would like to have NANCY B.'s receipt for buns; please tell her to send it soon.

KITTY H. and LUDY S.

We have given several receipts for ginger-snaps, but you may send yours.

BERRYVALE, CALIFORNIA.

I have taken Young People ever since it was published, and I like it very much. I live in Siskiyou County, at the foot of Mount Shasta, which is 14,000 feet high. The head of the Sacramento River rises in our pasture, and flows into the sea there; a great lot of water comes rushing out of a hill. I go to school, but we don't have very many scholars. My father takes all of Harper's periodicals, and of course, a good many new books; my sister takes St. Nicholas. I liked "Nan" better than any of the continued stories which have appeared in Young People. I like Jimmy Brown's stories too. P. IVY S.

NEWPORT, RHODE ISLAND.

I am a little girl fourteen years old, and as I never saw a letter from Newport, I will tell you about it. I have a house with a garden, and it has two rooms and a hall in it. The rooms are very pretty, and we—my sister and I—are furnishing it very nicely. We have no pets, so we had the house written to you before, but the letter was not published, so please print this one. I take Young People, and like it very much. My sister takes St. Nicholas. She has written me a letter, and she says she is in No. 2, and she saw the little children sitting on the steps and singing. She also saw the infants that their mothers had left for the day in cradles under the stars in the Park, and she says she had written too long a letter, so good by, dear Post-office Box. FLORENCE E. P.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA.

I am a little Southern girl, and live away down here in the sunny South. I am glad to see that the author of that beautiful story "Nan" has written another one for your charming paper, which, judging from so much of us I have read, promises to be very nice indeed.

I like the illustrations in your paper very much, especially "Old Thor and his Chargers," "The Jewish Mahlon," and "A Little Seagull's Owl." Little "Desdy" is just like hundreds of little darlings in New Orleans.

My uncle, Mr. George Cable, is on his way to New York, and will, I suppose, be there by the time this letter reaches you. I hope that he will come to see you.

We have a night-blooming cress, a fine species of the genus Androsace. I have seen nothing more lovely than the flower of this plant, which is something like a water-lily, and is snowy white. It is suspended from a large waxy leaf by a red stem, and is inches long, and then turns up so that one may look straight into the flower, which opens to the size of a large saucer. It blooms only one night; the outside of the flower is pink. It seems very strange in the South, where there is not rare flower, which every one admires and is so anxious to see, should bloom in wild profusion in the impenetrable forests of South America, where no one can see, and which no one writes of.

You said you liked to be told what books your children are reading. I am reading Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico, and find it very interesting indeed. My little brother and I send Wiggles.

HELEN C.

Well do I remember the first time I made the acquaintance of the book you are reading. It carried me into an enchanted realm. Did you ever read a beautiful poem by Mary Howitt, beginning,

"God might have made the earth bring forth Enough for great and small,
The oak-tree and the cedar-tree,
And ne'er a flower at all."

I think flowers are lovely proofs of the Maker's goodness, and since He plants them where no human eyes see their splendor, we may be sure that He cares for them Himself.

Blauche E. P.: I hope the humming-bird still thrives on his dainty diet—P. W., Maud S. H., and T. S.: You must have felt sorry for the gophers, although they were such pests—J. B. B., Cora M. M., Ida L., John V., Belmont H., Jennie P., Johnnie B., Milton S. P., Wattie M. H., May B., Maggie M., Chatty D., Zua, and Ruby have all written very pleasant letters.—Will somebody tell Hattie V. a pretty way to use and preserve her collection of advertising cards. She does not wish to make either a screen or a scrap-book. Write for postage stamps in the Post-office box, not to Hattie, if you please—Katie Warner, Laird, Frontier County, Nebraska, would like to hear from the person who sent her a copy of The Swiss Family Robinson, bound in yellowish-brown and black. The name and address were not sent with the book, and Katie is therefore unable to return a proper exchange.—P. Albert B.: Bajazet is a striking name for your beautiful colt. I suppose he steps out bravely.—Timothy C.: I think you are the owner of a lumpy family, with your cat, little dog, three quails, and a chipmunk.—Evelyn N.: I am glad you like "Dick and D." So do I.

THE KITTEN'S PARTY.

BY CHARA BROUGHTON.

I GAVE my pussy a party,
And asked all the kittens I knew:
Rose and Minnie and Sweetheart
(Their mistresses all came too),

Lily and Snow-white and Daisy
(I can't name them all, I'm sure),
And Irish Ben's little Vixen—
For we must "remember the poor."

But Rose, that "lady-like" kitten,
Drank up all the milk on the sly;
And Vixen scratched Pet on her little Pink nose till she made her cry.

Well, that I might have expected
From such a neglected child.
But they all fell to squalling and fighting,
Till I thought I should just go wild.

Bridget she stormed and scolded
Till she nearly lost her breath,
Then drove them all out with a broomstick:
I'm mortified 'most to death.

But never mind, Pet, my darling;
Jump up on your mistress's knee,
And we'll have a party together—
Yes, just little you and me.

THINK OF A NUMBER.

TELL your neighbor to think of any number he likes, but not to tell you what it is. Tell him then to double it. When he has done that let him add an even number to it, which you yourself must give him. After doing this he must halve the whole, then from what is left take away the number he first thought of. When he shall arrive so far, if his calculations have all been made correctly, you will be able to give him the exact remainder, which will simply be the half of the even number you told him to add to his own.

THE GLOW-WORM AND THE FLY.

AN artist, while painting in a forest one sunny afternoon, was attracted by an unusually sharp huzzing amongst the dry leaves at his feet. On inquiring into its cause he discovered a glow-worm dragging to its den an unfortunate blue-bottle, which was securely gripped in its captor's jaws.

The fly managed to wriggle about for a time, and during the struggles the flashings from the glow-worm's "lamp" were frequent, and ceased only when the fly was slain. The glow-worm conveyed its prey to the den, and then returning, hid behind a leaf, in wait for another victim. Meanwhile a black ant, availing itself of the glow-worm's absence from home, took the liberty of carrying off the dead fly.

When the glow-worm perceived the ant making off with the dinner which at some trouble it had provided for itself, it became quite excited, and though it had not the courage to attack the ant, its light flashed unceasingly. The artist put an end to its distress by "flicking" the ant away, whereupon the glow-worm once more carried off the fly in triumphant fashion.

CHAPTER III.

A TURCOMAN DINNER PARTY IN THE DESERT.

ERNEST CLAIRMONT, Afghanistan, to Robert Hawkins, Rugby, sendeth greeting, this twenty-sixth day of August, 1879.

"DEAR BOB,—We're in Afghanistan at last, and a funny place it is. By this time you'll have got my last letter, telling how Tom Hilton met me at Orenburg (the border town of Russia, you know), and how we went together across the desert past the Aral Lake, and up the Jaxartes to Tashkent. It's not the Jaxartes now, though, for the natives call it 'Syr-Daria,' or Clean River, I suppose because it's the dirtiest river I ever set eyes on.

"Little enough did I ever think, old fellow, when you and I used to grind over Alexander's crossing of the Jaxartes and the Oxus, that I should cross them myself some day; but I've seen queerer things than that since I started. What do you think of our coming to a bit of desert where all the people were living in holes under the earth? To see their heads popping up out of the ground like rabbits to look at us was the most comical sight you can imagine.

"We ought to be in Cabool the day after to-morrow, and then I'll have a chance of seeing what an Afghan capital is like. It's great fun going about in these out-of-the-way places, and seeing for one's self all the queer people that one used to read about and see pictures of at home. You remember how we thought (Gibbon was stretching it, rather, when he said that the Tartars had no beards. Well, it's as true as can be; I was in among a whole camp of them the other day, and there wasn't a single beard among the lot!)

"At first I felt just as if I'd been making friends with a herd of monkeys; for really, with their long arms and low foreheads, and small narrow eyes, and heads as round as skittle-balls, and flat noses and big mouths (to say nothing of their greasy cloaks of camel's-hair or sheep-skin), they might have gone right into a menagerie just as they were. But they received us very civilly, and gave me some kumys (fermented mare's milk), which tasted something like ginger-beer. Tom says it's sold in New York now, and that the people there take it as medicine. And then the old khan—who must have been made chief of the tribe on the strength of his being the ugliest man in it—kindly invited me to sit down upon a newly flayed sheep-skin with the bloody side uppermost. Out of respect for my white cotton trousers, I declined with thanks," as the editor of the Rugby Messenger did with my first poem.

"But all this while I am forgetting to tell you what brings us here. The Russians are sending an envoy to persuade the new Ameer of Afghanistan, Yakooob Khan, into doing something they want, and Colonel Hilton's going with him to back him up and see fair play. We've got another passenger, too, who's the best fun of all—that jolly old Russian Professor, who is hunting for the Lost City, and who thinks Cabool a likely point for his start in search of it, especially as he expects to get a guide there who knows the whole country by heart.

"Talking of Afghans, they must be a queer lot if they're all like those we've seen. Every man you meet looks as if he were pining for a chance of cutting your throat; and when I asked the Colonel what was the meaning of a lot of small round towers of dried mud, with one little hole in the side, which were dotted all over the plains, he told me they were for the people of the country to creep into whenever they saw robbers coming."

"However, our Afghan groom, Sikander (Alexander), is as good a fellow as ever stepped; and it's great fun to hear him and old Bill Barlow arguing about the Afghan war. Bill, being an English soldier, is all for drill and precision, and thinks it too bad that the Afghans didn't come fairly out and fight in regular orders of battle, like men.' Then Sikander laughs, and asks what's the sense of coming out and getting shot, when you can hit your man from behind a rock or a tree without showing yourself at all. Then old Bill grunts that that's work for weasels, not for men; and so they go on by the hour. The other night I found Bill trying to explain to Sikander what a railway was like, and setting up a row of stones to represent the train. The Afghan listened very attentively till it came to the laying of the rails, and then he said the English magicians must be very foolish to trouble about laying down a road for their enchanted cars, when they could just as easily make them fly through the air; after which Bill gave him up as a bad job. However, they're always capital friends, for all that.

"And now for the best part of my story. While we were crossing the steppes before we got down to the Oxus we had an extra long march one day to reach a little stream beside which we meant to camp for the night, for in Central Asia, I can tell you, the first thing you think of is to keep within reach of water. It was late in the evening before we got to it, but as we came over a low swell of land that overlooked it, what should we see below but a dozen fires twinkling through the dusk. We also heard a sound of men talking, and horses neighing, and camels snorting and screeching, as if there were a regular camp there.

"We were rather taken aback, as you may suppose, but we hadn't long to think over it. The moment we were seen on the brow of the slope there was a great bustle and shouting in the camp, and up jumped from beside the nearest fire some twenty wild-looking fellows with long guns in their hands, whose dark faces, and gleaming eyes, and sharp white teeth, with the red glare of the fire upon them, made as grim a show as any 'brave of the Delawares' in Fenimore Cooper.

"Another moment, and we would all have been firing and hacking away at each other without knowing why, for every stranger is an enemy in the desert. But in the very nick of time the Colonel snatched a lance from one of our Cossacks, tied a white scarf to it, and rode forward single-handed to meet them.

"'Aman us?' (is it peace?) he called out, as soon as he was near enough to be heard.

"'Insh' Allah, aman us!' (please God, it is peace), answered the foremost fellow, and the Colonel went up and shook hands with him. They talked together for a minute or two, and then back came the Colonel, bringing the whole crowd along with him. There was another little talk, and then they bade us welcome, and told us (as it's the correct thing to do here) that all they had was ours, though I don't much think they'd have approved of it if we'd taken 'em at their word.

"It seems they were a band of Turcomans on the lookout for fresh pasture for their beasts, and they had camped here only a few hours before we came up; so when they saw us they thought we were another party coming to drive them away. But everything was soon explained, and in half an hour we had our tents pitched and our horses picketed right in the middle of their camp; and the last thing I heard before I fell asleep was a Turcoman sentinel howling out an endless native song, while his voice sounded just like a dog shut out on a cold night.

"The next morning I wanted to go out and look about me, but the Colonel stopped me, saying that we must stay in the tent till they came to invite us out, or they wouldn't think anything of us at all. And so it proved; for suddenly the tent flap was lifted, and there stood two tall, fine-looking Turcomans in high caps of black sheep-skin, one with a wheaten cake in his hands, and the other with an earthen jar of milk.

"'Peace be with you, my lords,' said the foremost. 'Thus saith Hadji Yussuf (Pilgrim Joseph), Chief of the Black Turcomans: Let the messenger of the great Czar, and the other Oorooso (Russian) princes, be pleased to light up with their presence the tent of a Turcoman warrior.'

"The messenger of the great Czar may not cross any threshold save that of the Ameer himself," answered the Colonel, quite majestically, "but the ears of the Russian princes are open to the fair words of Hadji Yussuf. Let the chief of many warriors send us camels, that our feet may not soil his threshold with the desert sand."

"So saying he dipped a piece of the cake in the milk and swallowed it, after which the worthy savages retired, looking very much impressed. In about half an hour they came back with two camels, and the Colonel and Professor Makaroff mounted one, while Tom and I got upon the other, lying at opposite ends of a big wooden tray girthed on the beast's back. When it first started I felt as if I were being rolled about in my berth by a squall in the Bay of Biscay; but I very soon got used to it.

"We found the chief a grand old fellow with a long white beard sitting cross-legged on a carpet in a big tent of gray felt. We all kicked off our shoes on going in, and the Colonel laid his sabre at the chief's feet to show that he meant no harm. The old gentleman received us very politely, and ordered in several huge wooden bowls of tea. One sip was enough for me, for what with salt instead of sugar, and rancid mutton fat instead of milk, it was the nastiest stuff I ever tasted.

* This is true also of Southern Afghanistan, where I passed more than a dozen of these towers within a few miles.—D. K.

"Then the old fellow drew up the tent flap, and told us to seat ourselves in the doorway. We had hardly sat down when there came a yell that made us all jump, and a dozen horsemen came tearing out from among the tents as if flying for their lives, with twenty more in full cry after them, firing their rifles and yelling like mad. Suddenly the hunted men wheeled round and came back upon their pursuers like a thunder-bolt; and in a moment they were all mixed up together in a whirl of dust and smoke, stabbing, hacking, slashing, and pounding with the butt-ends of their pieces, the spear-heads glittering, the swords flashing, and the very horses kicking and biting most ferociously. I began to feel for my revolver, thinking the camp was attacked; but Tom whispered to me that it was only a sham fight, got up to entertain us.

"But the show of the day was the concluding dinner—twelve courses at least, and everybody expected to eat heartily of each. You remember Billy Guttleton eating seventeen jam tarts at a sitting? well, any of these Turcoman fellows would do that just to get up an appetite before the real dinner came on at all. I had to keep my eye on a fellow opposite me, to make sure that he wasn't stuffing it all into a leathern bag inside his clothes, like Jack the Giant-killer.

"First came a kind of soup of milk and bitter herbs, not at all the sort of stuff for a rough day at sea. Then followed little square blocks of roast meat served on wooden skewers, succeeded by a mess of rice and mutton fat thick and heavy enough to choke an elephant, which the old chief scooped out of the bowl with his fingers, and crammed into my mouth. Nine or ten other dishes followed, among which Tom declared that he recognized camel; but I hope he was mistaken, for in this country they only eat such as have died of old age or disease. When I got up to go I felt as if I weighed a thousand pounds; and that night I dreamed I was a balloon, just going to burst from being overfilled with gas.

"But I must break off, for it's getting dark, and here comes Sikander to announce supper. If you ever get this, which I doubt, for the Tartar who carries it may very likely be shot on the way, reply soon, and believe me, yours truly, E. CLAIREMONT."

IN A HOUSE-BOAT.

A Journal.

BY DINAH MULOCK CRAIK,
AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

VERY one of my five girls could handle an oar, some better, some worse; and how they did enjoy their row! The two youngest took turns, and succeeded at least in "catching crabs" with much fun and ease.

On and on, till we were stopped by a lock. The three evils of the Thames are locks, weirs, and lashers. So we turned and let ourselves drift back with the current, now running very fast. Now and then we "hugged" the bank, and gathered thence a huge handful of purple loose-stuff, blue and white bugloss, meadow-sweet, forget-me-not—the Thames is rich in water-flowers. On we floated, over great beds of water-lilies, yellow or white, which grew in a quiet little "back-water," where we nearly got stranded on a shoal and pierced with a snag. But "a miss is as good as a mile," said we, and were more careful another time.

"Look—a private gallows!" exclaimed Tuum, who had a droll, bright way of putting things. "We mustn't go there on any account." But it was only an odd arrangement for catching eels; so we examined it, laughed, and passed on.

The sun had long set, and the moon was setting—the little young moon, like a silver boat—when we re-entered our "happy home" for supper and bed, the second speedily following the first, for various excellent reasons, one being that the supper table was required for Adam's couch. He had his choice whether to sleep on it or under it, and preferred the latter, as being "more like a four-poster." Adam is by nature almost as silent as his horses, but his few remarks, terse, dry, and shrewd, often pass into family proverbs.

So all the Pinafore's crew sank into repose, except one, who has an occasional bad habit of lying awake "till the day break and the shadows flee away." How gloriously it did break, that dawn on the Thames! and how strange were the river sounds, the chirping of birds and the lowing of cattle mingling with other strange noises, afterward discovered to be the tapping of swans' beaks against the barge, and the water-rats carcering about underneath.

These swans, of which our artist has taken some portraits, are the pride and ornament of the Thames. They belong to the Thames Conservancy Corporation, and no one is allowed to molest and destroy them. They sail about like kings and queens, followed by their families, and are petted and fed and admired until they become quite tame. They used to gather round our boat and eat out of the girls' hands; and their motions, always full of grace, were a delight to behold.

Dawn came, and with it the power to face and enjoy another new day.

A holiday is never the worse when there runs through it a stratum—a very thin stratum—of work. So the two working bees, author and artist, decided to be put ashore after breakfast and left under two trees with their several tasks, while the others enjoyed themselves till dinnertime, when we expected friends, who were to row about ten miles to spend the day with us.

Dinner reminds me of our domestic affairs, which, considering that food for eight or ten hungry people does not grow on every bush, were important. Groceries and other stores we brought with us, but bread, milk, butter, fruit, and vegetables we had to get from the inn opposite, which also sent us our meat, ready cooked, it being impossible to roast a joint on board the Pinafore. Fresh-water, too, we had to get from the inn pump, river water not being wholesome for drinking.

Great fun were those endless rows with jugs and cans, for we were all thirsty souls, and all, even Adam, teetotalers. The amount of milk we got through was such that some one suggested it would save trouble to fetch the cow on board. The kindly landlady bade us "gather our fruit for ourselves," so we often brought home a boat-load of well-earned food—potatoes, pease, crisp lettuces pulled up by the roots, and eaten as rabbis eat them, with raspberries and cherries and currants to our hearts' content. It was almost as good as shooting or fishing one's dinner. And, by-the-by, the sight of the fish jumping up round the boat brought the saddest look to Adam's amiable countenance.

"If I had but a rod and line, ma'am, I'd eathe them for dinner." And very nasty they might have been, I thought—river fish generally are; yet politeness would running very fast. Now and then we "hugged" the bank, and gathered thence a huge handful of purple loose-have obliged us to eat them, so perhaps all was for the best.

FEEDING THE SWANS.

After a mirthful day our guests departed, fearing a thunder-storm, which never came, and, to rest their arms, my five girls decided to stretch their legs and take a walk on shore. The said walk became a run finally. "Let's have a run," said the biggest of them and the most beautiful. As she tucked up her skirts she looked a real Atalanta. The second in height, and only a trifle less in grace and activity, did the same; and off they started up what seemed a solitary road, when lo! suddenly appeared two young Oxford men, book in hand! What they thought of the apparition of these two young athletes, and the three other girls behind, all of whom collapsed suddenly into decorum, will never be known; but I doubt if they read much for the next ten minutes.

The run thus stopped, we thought we would go soberly into the village church-yard, where two old men were solemnly making hay of the grass out over the graves. Thence we passed into a quiet wood, and finally came home, hungry as usual, to supper, and so concluded our second day.

No, not concluded. About eleven P.M. happened a most dramatic incident. A sudden and violent bump caused the Pinafore to shake from stem to stern, and woke us all up. Some declared that they heard a voice exclaim, "Hullo, Bill: where are you going to?" and others vowed they heard a great rattling at what we called our "front door." Adam was loudly called, and he and his mistress, in rather hasty toilettes, carefully examined every corner, but all was safe. Then we looked out, in case there had been an accident; but nothing could be seen. The river flowed on, lonely, dark, and still. I entered the cabin, where five maidens all in white stood together in a group not unlike the daughters of Niobe, and took their evidence. However, as the mystery, whatever it was, could not be solved, we all went to bed; and Adam having, with his usual faithfulness, poked into every place that a thief or even a fly could enter, made the brief remark, "Pirates!" and retired again to his table.

The only result of this remarkable occurrence was that about eight next morning, finding a solemn silence instead of the usual tremendous clatter, I went in to look at my girls, and found them all five lying fast asleep, "like tops." As it was a pelting wet morning, with the wind blowing after a fashion which required all one's imagination to make believe that our dwelling was "quite steady," this breaking of my Mede and Persian rule of an eight-o'clock breakfast was less important; but I said, remorselessly, "This must never happen again." Nor did it.

Their laziness lost my girls the great excitement of the day. A sudden outcry from Adam of "The boat! the boat!" revealed the alarming sight of our little Bib, which had got unmoored, drifting away calmly at her own sweet will down-stream. There we were! For a moment Adam looked as if he meant to swim after her; then he changed his mind and halloed with all his strength. Female voices joined the chorus. At first we were in despair, for at that hour and on such a wet morning there was not a soul to be seen at the hotel garden or ferry, whither the pretty Bib was floating, just as if she had gone of her own accord to fetch the letters. A last agonized shout we made, and then we saw a man push out, evidently thinking somebody was drowning. He caught the position, and the boat, which in another minute or two would have drifted past, and brought her back to us in triumph.

After this we settled down, thankful that things were no worse, in spite of a dreary down-pour and a wind that rattled every door and window of our frail dwelling. The girls' countenances fell. "What in the world shall we do?"

Now, though the happiest days of my life are spent among young people, I have always found that a certain amount of law and order is as good for them as for myself, else we get "demoralized." So, instead of hanging about and moaning, wondering when it would clear up, and if it didn't clear up what would become of us, I set everybody to doing something.

Two of the girls cleaned the bedrooms, and exulted over the "dust" they swept away, another wrote home letters, and a fourth gave us delightful music on the harmonium. The artist had, of course, her own proper work, sitting in the shelter of the kitchen doorway, the result of which you see in the picture. And when about eleven the sky cleared and grew into a lovely July day, breezy and bright, with white clouds careering about, we felt we had well earned our happiness.

Still, it was too stormy to row much; so we explored the shore on either side—first the abbey, beside which was the hotel and its garden, and also a farm-yard, with haystacks almost touching the ancient ruins which date from the time of King John.

Then, after the important interval of tea, came a long walk on the opposite bank. There, protected from the wind by three umbrellas, the party sat admiring the view, and themselves making a picture, in which our artist has here immortalized them. And lastly, as if to reward our cheerful patience, the wind sank, and in the clear west, in the midst of a brilliant after-sunset light, sat the crescent moon.

"We must go out again and have another row!"—and so we had, until twilight melted into dark.

BOBBY.

BY MATTHEW WHITE, JUN.

IT was during one of the vacations at our school that my aunt Maria invited me to come and spend a few days with her in New York.

She hadn't seen me since they had stopped calling me "Frankie," and I felt quite proud of her recollecting that I must now be big enough to go about by myself.

And my! but wasn't the house a grand one! There were actually so many pictures that some of them had to be left standing on the floor, besides marble busts and statues staring at you out of corners like ghosts, and any quantity of old china scattered around that Uncle Robert seemed awfully afraid I'd break, just as if each piece was a plate-glass window.

But I tell you I was careful; never sat down in the parlor without first turning my head slowly around to look on all sides of me, as though I was trying to cast a spell over the furniture. Then at the table I always held my cup with both hands, which I know was not a bit elegant, but which made me feel more easy in my mind.

Bobby, who was not quite three years old, was the only child, and it was a wonder to me that the boy hadn't died months before from overpetting. Kittens will, you know, if you maul them too much. But Bobby had managed to grow fat on it somehow, and such a chunky, noisy, fingers-in-everything youngster I never saw.

When I was taken up to the nursery to be introduced to him the first night, I thought it was awfully cute the way he put his arms around my neck to hug me, but when I found that he had pulled out at the same time the first cravat pin I had ever owned, and was sucking on the coral owl as if it had been a lump of taffy, I changed my opinion. After that I never dared wear my watch until after Bobby's bed-time, and as for my hair—well, as I couldn't take that off too and keep it in the bureau drawer till evening, I had to grow used to having my head look like a field of battle all day long.

If I'd been at home I might have been mean enough to have "struck back" at a fellow under my size, but as Aunt Maria and Uncle Robert both kept talking about the great fancy Bobby 'd taken to me, and saying how nice I was with children, I hated to spoil the seemingly peaceful state of affairs.

Now I don't mean to say that Bobby Waterman was a dreadfully wicked child, and likely to come to some bad end; only he was just bubbling over with mischief, and I suppose I acted as a sort of lightning rod to carry it off.

But if Uncle Robert was easy with his small son in everything else, there was one point on which he was very strict, and that was about allowing Bobby in the parlor among his china. Nora, the nurse, had her orders on the subject, and Bobby himself was told nearly every day that he was never to go in the room unless his papa or mamma were with him. The little fellow replied, "Ees, ees," but whether he understood what he was promising or not, it is certain that I regarded the parlor as a kind of oasis in the desert of romps. Whenever every hair in my head ached, and my arms hung limp from overwork as pump-handles, a happy thought would send me bounding off down-stairs to the region of art and rugs, where I was sure of a breathing-spell.

Well, my visit was nearly over, when one evening Uncle Robert came home from his office and announced that at last he had succeeded in arranging for "a day off," and that therefore, if it was clear on the morrow, he would like to take Aunt Maria and "run up" to see his mother. Now, as old Mrs. Waterman lived in a small town about two hours' ride from New York, the "run up" and back again, with time for dinner at the "old home," would require almost a full day.

"So we'd better not take Bobby," decided his mother. "He'll get so tired, and I know Frank here will consider it a great honor to be left in charge."

On hearing this, "Frank here" wished himself anywhere else, but being a guest and a boy, I could not very well announce my own wishes in the matter. It was therefore arranged that the next day should be a grand holiday for the "big folks," for it was the cook's afternoon out, and as a special favor Bridget, the house-maid, was also given leave of absence.

"It's so seldom the two have a chance to go out together," said Aunt Maria, in explanation of her relaxed discipline. "And as your mother, you know, Robert, always has dinner in the middle of the day, I've given orders to have a dish or two added to the children's lunch, so there'll only be a light tea to get for us at seven."

"BUT IF YOU ONLY KNEW," I BEGAN.

The carrying out of this plan would of course result in my losing a dinner, but as nobody seemed to think of that, I resolved not to appear greedy by offering any hints on the subject.

The next day was clear, and my uncle and aunt set out on their trip about nine, leaving me completely at the mercy of my small cousin, while the servants sat half the morning over their breakfast.

And didn't Bobby have a good time, though! I hated to refuse him anything for fear he might set up a howl for "Mam—ma!" and keep on until we had telegraphed for her; so I became in quick succession a dancing bear with the buffalo-robe over my shoulders, a chattering monkey with Aunt Maria's riding-whip trailing out of my pocket for a tail, a braying donkey with Bobby for a rider, and a half-smothered "elephant" with an enormous quilt on top of me to make me "look big."

This series of transformations, with several tussles, rumps, and feats of hair-pulling thrown in, brought us to lunch-time, at which meal I was only able to snatch a mouthful now and then, on account of the wateh I had to keep over Bobby, who insisted on making a "choo-choo car" of his tray, by sliding it half off the table, every chance he got.

"I know what I'll do this afternoon," I reflected, as I hastily swallowed some fancy cakes while "that child" was having his face and hands washed; "I'll take him for a long walk, for I'd rather tramp twenty blocks on two legs than go the length of the room on four."

Indeed, from constant rampaging as a wild beast, the knees of my second-best trousers were now worn nearly through.

When I proposed the Park and the monkey-house to Bobby he of course became at once so eager to start that he nearly dragged me out into the street bare-headed. However, we got off in a state of decency at last. We spent about two hours in the Park, and then, after we had faithfully stared at every cage in the menagerie, turned our faces homeward about half-past three.

"And now, young man," I thought, "I guess you'll be tired enough, when we get back, to take a nap, and give me a chance to finish Jack Hazard before I go away."

Indeed, on the last few blocks Bobby had dragged his feet along in such a shuffling fashion that I felt sure he was thoroughly tired out and sleepy. So when Nora, who had been watching for us with her bonnet on, came rushing down the steps to beg that she might be allowed to run over to Eleventh Avenue and see her brother, who had just been taken with another of his "terrible turns," I said yes at once, confident that my cousin was too sleepy to bother me for at least an hour to come. Besides, was not this to be a "big folks' holiday"?

While listening to Nora I had let go of Bobby's hand, as he seemed to be in a hurry to get in the house, and was slowly going up the steps behind him. When I saw that he had safely reached the top, I stood for about a second watching the nurse sending off toward Eleventh Avenue, like a ship under full sail in a high wind. Then I turned to hurry in after Bobby, when bang came the front door in my face, with that baby on the other side of it!

Before I had time to decide whether the child was tall enough to reach up to the spring-lock to open it again, I heard somebody rapping on a window, and stepping back, I had the horror of beholding Bobby in the parlor laughing out at me in the most tantalizing manner. In vain I shook my fist, shouted promises of "goodies," threats of telling "papa," and orders to try and reach the spring knob by standing on a stool.

Either he could not hear me, did not understand, or was simply obstinate—which latter I think is the most likely. There he stood in that sacred drawing-room, trampling the lace curtains under his feet, soiling the plate-glass with his sticky fingers, and threatening with every movement to topple one of Uncle Robert's favorite busts on his head.

In my desperation I had pulled the door-bell wily, until I recollected that both the girls were out. Nora was already half a block away; but even if I could have called her back, how could she have mended matters?

What should I do? Cold chills ran all over me as I thought of the matches Bobby might strike, with not a soul to blow them out again; of the four pairs of stairs he might tumble down, with nobody to pick him up and rub him with amica at the bottom of them; and there was his father's cherished china!

"Oh, Bobby! Bobby!" I cried, despairingly, "do try and open the door for me." Then, overcome with terror at what might happen to him out of my sight, I shouted, in contradiction of myself, "Oh, no! no! Stay right there where I can see you."

By this time, as might have been expected, quite a crowd had collected around me.

"Why don't you shinny up the basement bars, an' git in by the winder?" suggested a boy with a red oyster-box under his arm.

"But the parlor windows have patent burglar-proof locks on them," I returned, dejectedly.

"Smash in the glass, then," went on the boy, laying down his tray, as if eager to do the smashing himself.

But fear of Uncle Robert's displeasure would not permit me to think of such desperate measures.

Then a policeman came up and wanted to know what all the fuss was about.

"Oh, pshaw!" he muttered, when I tried to explain; "the boy's safe in-doors, so where's the harm? Can't you go off somewheres and make a call till your uncle comes back with his key?"

"But if you only knew," I began, and then stopped, for how could I tell a strange policeman what an awful child my own cousin was? Besides, as I wasn't willing to have anything broken to get at him, what good would it do?

All this while Bobby stood leaning against the broad pane, watching the crowd on the sidewalk with the greatest delight. But now the officer ordered the people to "move on," and in five minutes I was left alone again, my eyes fixed on that small boy in the window.

As there was nobody just then to look at except his half-distracted cousin, Bobby presently, to my horror, turned away and disappeared. Where had he gone? What was he doing? I stood there with my back against a lamp-post, almost fainting from fear, when suddenly there came a changing of bells down the street. The next minute a hose-cart and a hook-and-ladder truck drew up in front of the house, while the engine could be heard puffing away by the fire-plug at the corner.

Then as I saw the firemen rushing up the stoop, and at the same moment caught a glimpse of Bobby smiling down at the "fun" from the sitting-room window, the meaning of it all flashed over me.

He had climbed up on a chair and rung the electric alarm over the mantel-piece!

"Oh, it's all a mistake!" I cried, dashing up the stoop, in terror lest the windows should be smashed in after all. "There isn't any fire," I was going to add, when a bright idea came to me, and reflecting that there might be a blaze very soon if Bobby got hold of the match box, I pointed to his head in the window and called for a ladder.

Whether the men thought the house was really burning up inside or not I don't know, but a ladder was quickly snatched from the truck and placed in position.

"Here, we can't let you climb up," cried somebody, as I sprang forward to plant my foot on the lower round.

And just then there went up a piercing scream of "Oh, Bobby, my child!" and I turned to see Aunt Maria and Uncle Robert fighting their way through the crowd.

Of course I had to talk pretty fast to explain things, and get my uncle to open the door as soon as possible, with Aunt Maria looking straight at me as white as one of the marble busts in the parlor.

But we soon calmed down after we had got the firemen and their traps out of the street, and found Bobby without a scratch on him, and not a piece of china so much as cracked.

"And now tell me how you happened to come back by such an early train?" I asked; to which Aunt Maria replied by saying that she had felt so worried, and finally she had become sure that Bobby had bitten through one of the thin glass tumblers at lunch and swallowed the pieces.

I went home the next morning, and I don't want to visit the Watermans again until Bobby's grown into long pants.

PEEK-A-BOO!

BY ELLA WHEELER.

THE clumsiest thing that a baby can do is to play for the very first time, Peek-a-boo!

It will hide its little pink face in its hands,
Then crow, and show that it understands

What Nurse and Mamma, and Papa too,
Mean when they hide and cry, "Peek-a-boo!"

Oh, what a wonderful thing it is,
When they find that baby can play like this!

And they every one listen, and think it true
That the baby's gurgle means Peek-a-boo!

I wonder if any one ever knew
A baby who never played Peek-a-boo?

'Tis old as the world is, I believe
Cain was taught it by Mother Eve.

For Cain was an innocent babe once, too,
And I am sure he played Peek-a-boo.

And the whole world full of the children of men
Have all of them played that game since then.

And while the sun shines and the skies are blue,
Babies will always play Peek-a-boo.

THE SEALS IN THEIR HOME.

BY ARTHUR LINDSLEY.

"IMPUDENCE personified." That is a capital title for the picture on the next page, and yet we shall then be naming it from the two youngest and least important members of the group. But just look at that pup seal and the young gull that is talking to him in earnest! Did you ever see the like of them? I have, and only a few minutes ago, too. I must tell you how it was.

Right outside my window here, on the grass, was a fine young Newfoundland dog. Susm had brought out his dinner to him, and it took him but a little while to very nearly clear the plate. But there was more than he really wanted, and when at last he had finished there still remained a piece of bread and about half a potato.

While he had been so busy, a great long-legged chicken had been a deeply interested looker-on. He had come gradually nearer and nearer, hoping evidently that something might be left for him. Pedro, while he was eating so busily, had paid no attention to the chicken. Finally he stepped around a little to the side, and came still closer. But just as he was about to reach out his long neck toward the plate, Pedro stood up with a wag of his tail and a laugh in his eye that showed he was ready for fun. The chicken stood a moment, and then thought he would see what impudence would do. He tried to push past the puppy. This was too much for Pedro's dignity, and with a short, sharp bark he bounced at him, and fairly knocked him over. Then, delighted with the joke and his own success, he rolled on the grass, I verily believe to laugh.

But, alas! his laughing was short, for the chicken was up on the instant, made a dash at the plate, seized the piece of potato, and started on the run with his ill-gotten goods, and Pedro after him, hot foot. The Shanghai's legs were long, but the puppy was too quick for him.

In a second or two they were up, and there they stood, just as you see the seal and the gull—mouths wide open, eyes snapping. The dignity and the impudence were comical beyond description. Neither said a word for at least a minute. Then Pedro stooped down and secured the potato, which he swallowed on the instant. The discomfited chicken smoothed his feathers and walked gravely away, eating the piece of bread he had not cared to touch before, while Pedro speedily polished the plate.

But what do you suppose the seal and the gull are quarrelling about? I am sure I can not tell. I imagine it is only because they have happened to meet, and neither one will give way for the other; each one thinks the right of way is his. I have seen them do it time and time again. There they would stand, and scold away at a great rate, until finally one grew tired of it and moved off.

Funny fellows these pup seals are; queer little mortals. I have sat and watched them hours at a time, interested beyond measure in their curious ways. Clumsy and heavy while on the land they are without question, for they do not belong properly to the land; the water is the place for them to enjoy freedom of motion. And yet they are born on the land, and when they enter the water for the first time they move just as clumsily there.

I will remember seeing the thing done. I was on a ledge of rock about ten feet above the level of the sea. Eight or ten of the baby seals were lying scattered about, but their mothers had scuttled off into the water on my approach. I stooped down at once to examine the one nearest me. He was only an hour or two old, and evidently had not yet been into the water.

He did not appear to be afraid of me, but allowed me to take up his flippers and examine them at my leisure, and when I smoothed his back down as I would that of a cat he seemed quite to enjoy the operation, and was inclined to go to sleep under it. But after a time I undertook to open his mouth that I might see his teeth. This he evidently thought was a piece of impertinence on my part; he did not like it, and began to scramble away from me. I tried to quiet him, but he continued to flounder along until he reached the edge of the rock.

But the sea did not strike the foot of the cliff there. There was a fall of nearly ten feet from the spot where the pup lay, with a solid granite ledge to strike at the bottom. I saw that he was about to throw himself off, and feeling sure that the shock must injure him dreadfully, if it did not kill him at once, I shouted out to him: "Hold on there, old fellow! What are you about? That jump will kill you, sure as you are alive."

But either he did not understand English, or he was too self-willed to take advice—both, maybe—for off he went, and I heard him strike the rock below with a thud that was fearful. I ran up to the brink and looked over, fully expecting to see him either stunned or dead. But not a bit of it: there he lay as easy and comfortable as though he had barely turned over in bed. He waited a minute or two, and then he flopped off into the sea.

But when he attempted to swim it was amusing to see his clumsy and ungainly movements. He first gave two or three bounds forward, like his floundering jumps on the rock, and then he stopped, not seeming to know what next to do. But he had no need to wait, for, like a flash, an instructor was at his side. The crowd of old seals was grouped about twenty yards away, and one of them had shot out toward him at the moment that he struck the water. It was no doubt his mother, and the grand, mighty swing with which she swept her way carried her over the twenty yards while his jumps took him along three feet.

What she said to him I do not know, but he kept close at her side, apparently imitating her movements. Every sweep grew less clumsy, and he had not been in the water three minutes before he was ready to quit his mother's side and start off on a dash of his own right out to sea. She watched him as he glided so swiftly along, and then I heard her call out something to him. It sounded like a simple bleating cry, but it probably meant, "All right, my boy; go ahead; I will trust you now;" for she seemed to think no more about him. She joined the crowd of dancing mothers, and left him to himself.

His leaping off and striking the rock below without injury astonished me when I saw it, but I presently found that it was only a common thing with them. They climb up from the water, even where the face of the rocks is almost perpendicular. Their soft flippers, or paws, cling to the rock like suckers. They double up their body and make the hind-flippers fast as far forward as possible, and then, straightening out, they hook on with the fore-flippers away above, and on they go. I have often seen them lying on ledges 150 to 200 feet above the sea, which they had reached in that manner.

But when they wish to descend they do it in a different way. They creep down in part by means of their flippers, but whenever there is opportunity they leap off and strike many feet below, often with really frightful violence. These spotted seals shown in the picture are little fellows, seldom exceeding five feet in length, but the great sea-lions of the Pacific grow to be from thirteen to fifteen feet long, and weigh sometimes 1600 pounds. A lofty leap by one of these great heavy animals is a grand sight. The first time that I ever saw it was on the South Farallon, the main one of the group of rock-islands west of the bay of San Francisco.

The sea-lions were all about me as thick as cattle in a farm-yard, and not a bit more timid. Presently an old bull crept slowly down the face of the rocks near me. At length he reached a spot where there was a perpendicular cliff under him, just thirteen feet high, for I measured it a few minutes later. He looked about a second or two, and then sprang boldly out into the air, and struck the rock on which I stood, bounding up from the blow precisely as a ball bounds. The concussion of three-quarters of a ton, falling from a height of thirteen feet, was frightful, but he was not in the slightest disturbed by it. His next leap was out into the sea, and he at once slid away with a swinging wave and a majestic power that seemed to prove him the father and prince of all propellers.

On all the rocks frequented by the various species of seals birds are also abundant, gulls, murrens, cormorants, puffins, etc., and as the young birds are hatched about the time that the young seals are born, you may constantly see them together, and may witness the comical scene of our two friends here in the foreground of the picture over and over again. The seal never injures the bird, though he is so much the larger and stronger. He often bites at him, and gets bitten on the nose himself for his pains, but he only scolds the harder for a while, and then they both get tired of it and move away.

MOLLY.

BY ELIOT McCORMICK.

IT was noon in Oakridge, and only Molly Grant, with Jane Young, Nellie Phillips, and Willie Clarke, occupied the old red school-house. The teacher and all the other children had gone off to their homes, just across the railroad, to dinner; but Molly and her companions, who were younger than herself, lived at Willowvale, a mile away, and found it more convenient to bring the meal with them and eat it under the shadow of the great trees by which the school was surrounded.

Directly behind the school-house rose the mountain. In front of it, occupying a shelf along the mountain-side, ran the turnpike; while down in the valley below wound the railroad leading from the oil region to New York. About a thousand feet away from the school, on each side, the railroad curved toward the mountain and crossed the turnpike, so that no one could get to the school from either direction without going over the track. Everybody said that it was a bad place for a school-house, but no one proposed moving it. It had been there, indeed, before the railroad was built; and Mr. John Graves, who was chairman of the School Committee, argued that, being there first, it had the best right to the place, and if anything

"YES," SHE SAID, "LET US RUN FOR IT."

was moved, it ought to be the railroad. So it stood, year after year, while the Oakridge children ran a daily risk of being crushed by the passing trains. Between the school-house and the track stretched a piece of woods, while behind and above the house a dense growth of birch, hickory, and oak covered the mountain to its top. Half-way up, a little clearing disclosed the entrance to a deserted iron mine, from which a rough cart track wound down the hill to the turnpike a little way from the school.

"It's awfully hot," Jane had just exclaimed, taking a bite of sandwich, and fanning herself with a mullein leaf at the same time.

"So it is," Nellie assented. "I'm glad we don't have to walk home to dinner."

Molly did not speak. Her quick ear had caught the sound of three warning whistles from up the railroad, and she was wondering what it might mean. Presently they sounded again, though the last one was drowned by the noise of an explosion, as though a cannon had gone off. What had happened? The girls checked their talk, and looked curiously at one another.

"What is it, Molly?" Jane asked.

Molly shook her head and listened. In a moment there was another deafening report, while the noise of the approaching cars was all the time becoming more distinct. Very soon, looking down through the undergrowth, Molly could see the locomotive turning the curve. Behind it rushed what seemed to be a train of fire, pouring out volumes of smoke, and spilling liquid flames at every turn of the wheels.

"Oh, Molly!" the girl cried again, this time in alarm, "do you know what it is?"

Molly drew a quick breath. "It's an oil train," she exclaimed, "on fire."

It was a terrible object. By this time two of the great oil tanks at the rear of the train had caught, and were sending up great tongues of flame toward the sky. In their wake they were leaving a river of burning oil, setting fire to the ties and sleepers, and carrying the flame also to the telegraph poles and fences on either side the track. As the train passed the school-house there was another mighty roar: the top of a third tank blew off, and, crashing through the trees with the force of an enormous cannon-ball, landed directly behind the school-house. At the same moment a volume of fire poured up and lit the very tops of the overhanging trees. Before the children could collect their terrified thoughts the woods skirting the track below them were on fire. Molly had already sprung to her feet.

"We must run away!" she cried. "Don't cry, Willie dear. Jane, take Nellie's hand."

They dropped their lunch and books, and ran out upon the road. A single glance showed Molly that it was no use going toward the upper crossing: the smoke was rolling up more and more densely from that direction; the woods were certainly on fire, and it was not unlikely that one of the oil cars had become detached from the train, and was burning on the track around the curve. This had already happened a little below the school-house. The train had gone on, but the rear car was dropped, and now stood still on the blazing track, puffing clouds of smoke up toward the road, and destroying itself with an angry roar.

"Hurry up!" cried Molly, anxiously, dragging little Willie by the hand as she pushed through the thickening haze. Another report down the track in the direction they were taking made them pause for an instant, but Molly urged them on.

"We mustn't stop," she cried: "in another minute it may be too late!"

The frightened children quickened their steps, and soon came to a spot where they could see the track beyond the turnpike crossing. Here too a glance was enough. The train had stopped on the mountain ledge, about a quarter of a mile ahead, having dropped two more burning cars, one of which stood just where the road crossed, barring travel from either side. It was the noise of this explosion that they had just heard, and now the liberated gases were flaring up in the air higher than the tallest trees, warning them not to approach any nearer.

"Oh, Molly," the little boy cried, while the girls looked up with pale and frightened faces, "we'll all be burned up! What shall we do? How can we get away?"

Molly herself was almost as much frightened, though, for the children's sake, she did not dare to show it. "Wait a minute, dear," she said, softly, "and let me think."

Down the hill toward the railroad, not so far away now as it was at the school-house, she could see the fire creeping up through the dry underbrush. The trees were burning from the top, where they had been lighted by the gas, and from the bottom, where the brush had set fire to the roots or lower branches. Escape in this direction was already cut off, and it would not be long before the advancing flames had reached the place where they now stood. This was the beginning of a mountain fire. Before the next morning there would not be a tree left in Oakridge. What would have become of them? Willie's voice interrupted her anxious thoughts:

"Molly!" the little boy screamed, as a sense of their peril seemed to dawn upon him, "you mustn't let us burn up."

She drew him closer to her side, and looked helplessly from the approaching flames to the mountain behind her. Was there any escape there? They could hardly hope to climb its steep and rugged height faster than the fire could follow them; and even if they should reach the top, how much better would it be?

"I don't know, dear," she faltered, her voice breaking, and the tears coming in her eyes, "what to do."

The other girls began to cry.

"Oh, Molly!" Nellie sobbed, "won't you do something? What will mamma say if we never come home again? Oh!" she screamed, as a burning cinder fell at their feet. "We must go somewhere, Molly! I can't die! I can't be burned up!"

She started to run down the road, when Molly caught hold of her arm.

"You'll surely be burned up, Nellie," she cried, "if you go that way. Don't you see the flames are already across the road?"

"But we can't stand here," cried the child. "Tell us where we can go, Molly."

Molly looked around in despair. As she glanced again up the mountain she caught sight of a projecting shelf of rock and a black hole gaping in its side. "Ah!" she cried, as a sudden thought leaped into her head, "the mine, Nellie! the mine!"

The little girls were quick to catch her idea, and, following her as she pulled Willie over the fence, they made their way as best they could up the hill. At the start it was rough and steep, but a few steps brought them to the cart track, which, though it was overgrown, made the ascent less tiresome, and kept them from losing their way. How long would it be, though, before the fire followed them, or before they met it coming from the opposite direction? Already puffs of smoke blew up through the trees, and falling cinders, which they made haste to stamp out, threatened to set fire to the underbrush in the path. The speed, too, at which they were going would in a little while tire them out. Already Willie was quite exhausted.

"Oh, Molly!" he panted, "I can't walk any further."

She stopped for a moment and looked round. The roar of the flames, fanned by the freshening wind, was every moment growing louder and coming nearer. "You must walk, Willie," she cried. "See! the mine is just up there. It won't be far to go."

But the little fellow, worn out by fatigue and fright, had sunk to the ground. "I'm too tired," he moaned; "I can't walk a bit more."

Molly leaned over and energetically swung him up on her shoulder. She was not a powerful girl, but courage gave her strength. "Molly will carry you," she said; "only don't be frightened, dear. You're not afraid, are you, Nellie?" looking down at the little girl who, with her hand in Jane's, trudged along by her side.

Nellie's face paled as through the forest below them flashed a gleam of fire. "I'm not as afraid as I was," she faltered; "but, oh, Molly, isn't it catching up with us? Hadn't we better run?"

There were tongues of flame creeping along the ground not very far behind them, and the embers fell around faster than they could stamp them out. Molly peered up the road as it wound through the trees ahead. The mine could not be very far off, but the fire was perilously near.

"Yes," she said, "let us run for it. Hold me tight around the neck, Willie dear. Jane, you and Nellie go as fast as you can. Don't wait for me."

In Oakridge that afternoon there was the deepest distress. Before it was really known that any children were left in the school-house the burning cars had blocked up the track, and it was impossible to go to their relief. The smoke from the oil, and from the trees as they began to burn, veiled not only the school-house, but the road, and by-and-by shut out the mountain itself from view. When the fathers of the children came up from Willowvale it was with difficulty that they could be kept from entering the fire themselves.

"It won't do any good," urged the committee-man John Graves, as he grasped Mr. Grant; "you'd never come out of that fire alive if you went in—no more'n you'd come out of a blast-furnace. I never see a fire burn up so sudden. There goes the school-house now!" he cried, as a sudden puff of wind cleared away the smoke and showed them the little red building in flames. "Guess we won't build it there again."

Mr. Grant shuddered. "Where could they have gone?" he cried. "What could they have done?"

The men looked at one another, but no one spoke.

"Well," said John Graves, at length, "there's just one chance for them; if they've taken that they may be all right."

"What is that?" asked Mr. Grant, breathlessly.

Graves looked up the mountain as though he would penetrate the cloud that hung between. "It's the old mine," he said. "If your girl knew about that, and they got up there in time, and they don't suffocate, and the fire burns out before they starve, we may save them yet."

Mr. Grant put his hands to his face. "Ah!" he groaned, "you don't give me much hope."

For a moment Graves did not reply. A bank of clouds coming up from the northwest had caught his attention as it had that of most of the men. "There's going to be a shower!" he exclaimed. "Most likely the explosion fetched it. That makes your chance so much the better, Mr. Grant. The fire'll be put out before sundown, and if they hold out till then you'll find them sure."

In an agony of suspense Mr. Grant waited through that afternoon, watching the fire creep up the mountain until the topmost tree had caught. Then the shower began to fall, and every one gazed with delight while the torrents of rain fought with the flames, and at length put them out. With the storm came a gale of wind that blew the smoke out of every crevice in the mountain. Long before it stopped raining, the search party started out, taking with them ropes, clothes, and restoratives, in case they should find the children injured and needing immediate help. As they toiled up the mountain the rain continued to pour down. In a short time they had reached the clearing, and the mine was in view. What would the next minute disclose?

Mr. Grant rushed ahead, and bending down, entered the narrow opening to the mine. It was dark and smoky, and for the moment he could see nothing. Lighting a match, he peered down the gallery, where he fancied he discovered a figure lying on the ground. With a beating heart he pushed on, followed by the other men, who had by this time lighted a torch. Its glare illuminated the passage, and showed Mr. Grant not merely one but four motionless forms. Were they sleeping—or dead? The foremost, on whose arm rested the little boy, was his Molly. He leaned over, and placed his hand on her forehead. It was warm, and at the touch her blue eyes opened and met his own.

"Papa!" she cried, and in another instant was in his arms.

"My brave little girl!" he exclaimed, hardly able to say anything at all, "are you hurt?"

The others, by this time waked out of their sleep, had scrambled to their feet, and were gazing in bewilderment at their own fathers.

Molly smiled. "Ah," she said, softly, "I thought I was hurt, but now I am all well again."

BITS OF ADVICE.

BY AUNT MARJORIE PRECEPT.

ABOUT BEING THE CAPTAIN.

I HEARD a droll story the other day about a company of little fellows who were formed into a club by their teacher. She had planned a great many delightful things for the club to do. They were to go on excursions, to play base-ball, to have regular military drills, and I don't know what else which boys take pride and pleasure in.

But all the fine plans came to nothing. Can you imagine why? When they met to organize the club every boy wanted to be Captain. Nobody would consent to be in the ranks, and as all could not command, the poor little teacher gave up in despair.

It is very well to be the Captain, boys, but Aunt Marjorie wants you to remember that before one can lead one must always learn to obey orders. The great armies which have conquered in the battles of the world have had splendid soldiers to command them, but they have also had columns of splendid men, who were glad to do just as they were told without the least delay, and without any shirking of duty.

A person who wishes to be Captain must learn, in the first place, to control himself. You know what the Bible says about this, do you not? "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." "He that hath no rule over his own spirit is like a city that is broken down and without walls."

A Captain who flies into a rage or gets into a fright whenever there are difficulties in the way will never be able to manage his forces. Control yourself, and then you may hope to govern others.

You see that though it is quite simple, yet the office of leader has its grave cares. Before you can guide you must know how to follow, and before you rule others you must have yourself in hand.

Then, too, you must learn a great deal, and be quick to see what ought to be done and prompt in ordering it. "King" means the man who "can" do a thing, and when a boy is Rex or King on the play-ground, or at the picnic, or in the school-room, you may make up your mind that he is a lad who can do some things better than his comrades, and of whom the other boys are proud.

NOTES FOR THE YOUNG HUNTER.

BY WILL WOODMAN.

II—DECOYS AND BLINDS

AS the young hunter will soon learn, there are all kinds of ways of shooting game, and, moreover, all kinds of game to shoot; but it is not only how to shoot, when to shoot, and what to shoot that is needed to be known. One must know how to obtain something to shoot.

One of the most common means employed for drawing game is what is called a "decoy." The principle of the decoy is very simple, and will be understood at once by any boy who has ever watched chickens hunting for food. Should some lucky chick wander from the rest and discover a choice grub, the others are quick to notice it, and will immediately rush to share it.

So with snipe, or plovers, or ducks. If in flying over the country they see any of their fellows engaged in feeding anywhere, they naturally want to share, and at once alight.

It is a knowledge of the habits of animals that always makes a good hunter, and enables him to secure game where another will seek in vain.

Remember that, my young hunter, and pay every attention to the ways of the animals you wish to shoot. When you wish to shoot snipe, select a marshy spot, and scatter your decoys about on it in a way to resemble as nearly as possible a small flock of real snipe feeding.

Then take your station in a hiding-place, and wait for your game to come.

Your hiding-place or "blind" may be in a clump of reeds or in the crotch of a low tree sufficiently covered with foliage to hide you. Or, if there should be no natural covert, you may make one, always taking care to imitate nature, which should not be difficult if there are any bushes or reeds anywhere near. You have only to cut these and put them in the ground, or mud, as it may be, in the spot selected for your covert.

As for the decoys, you may buy them if you choose, but I would not give much for a sportsman who could not make them for himself. I have always made my own decoys, and this is how I do it. For snipe I cut a shingle as nearly as possible into the shape of that bird, getting perhaps four or five snipe out of one shingle. I paint the birds the proper color, and provide them with wings, made sometimes of bark and sometimes of old pieces of leather. The feet and legs are represented by a long, thin piece running from the under part of the bird, and will serve the purpose of fixing the decoys in position. A plover decoy is made in the same way.

For a duck decoy I contrive first to shoot a duck. This I skin and stuff—not a difficult task, though it may seem so. For a temporary decoy a dead duck, arranged as shown in the picture, makes the best kind of a decoy. I place it on a wooden float, just buoyant enough to let the decoy rest on the water in the manner of a live duck, and if necessary prop up its head with a light Y-shaped twig.

An anchor line should be fastened at the front end of the float, in order to keep the head of the decoy to the wind, which is the position a live duck always takes. Another important matter in this connection is that you must always take up your position with the wind at your back, as that will bring the duck's face to you either in alighting on the water or in rising from it; for a duck can not or will not do either unless it has the wind in its face. The importance of obtaining a front shot at a duck will be very apparent after you have wasted your ammunition on its back a few times. A true sportsman will never attempt to shoot a duck, or any other bird, for that matter, except on the wing.

One of my most amusing decoys when a boy was a tame hawk, which I would secure in the middle of a field. It was a good study in bird life to see how quickly the smaller birds comprehended that their old enemy was a helpless prisoner. It seemed as if word was passed through the woods, fields, and clouds, for in a short time the little chaps would gather and commence swooping and pecking at the defenseless hawk. Sometimes game birds would come, and then I would reap a harvest; but sometimes only birds not usually eaten would put in an appearance, and then I would have to rescue my pet.

These are only a few of the ways of decoying birds. There are other ways, such, for example, as imitating call notes, which many boys are expert at, and which are quickly learned when the young hunter has his heart in his sport. You all of you know "Bob White," of course. He has given himself the name, and after a little practice you can learn to call him by it, so that he will come quite close to you. The same is true of many other birds which have peculiar calls of their own that may be imitated.

A last word is, never kill merely for the sake of killing. No true sportsman, boys, ever does this. There can be no fun in the wanton destruction of life for any right-minded lad. Shoot only such birds as are fit for the table, or those that have rare plumage, and which it will afford you pleasure to stuff and keep. Let the rest go, and, above all, never aim your gun at a harmless little song-bird.

TOO SELFISH.

"Oh, Jocko, please, Jocko, just only one bite!"
Cries Rover, the beauty, who longs for a mite;
And Pussy so sleek with her soft coat of fur,
Why, haven't you even a morsel for her?

Oh, Jocko's a rogue, or he never would take
And keep for himself such a very large cake.
He's so full of mischief, or else he would know
No well-behaved monkey would ever act so.

Oh, many a time, in both parlor and hall,
Their mistress has taught the sweet lesson to all—
To be happy ourselves we should make others too.
And never be selfish, whatever we do.

TOO SELFISH.

NAUGHTY JIM.

There was one little Jim.

'Tis reported of him,

And must be to his lasting disgrace,

That he never was seen

With hands at all clean.

'Not yet ever clean was his face.

His friends were much hurt

To see so much dirt,

And often they made him quite clean;

But all was in vain.

He got dirty again,

And not at all fit to be seen.

OUR POST-OFFICE BOX.

WITH this number, dear readers of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, Volume IV, reaches its conclusion. What a treasury of beautiful stories, sketches, poems, and pictures it is! As we turn the pages it seems that the artists have never produced more exquisite illustrations, and the favorite authors have never written more brilliant serials and short stories. Then, too, the little paper has been from week to week a perfect magazine of instruction, telling you many wonderful things about nature in a simple and easy style, and giving you a great deal of fascinating historical reading. Very many articles have been written by careful pens about games, pastimes, the care of pets, and the best methods of using tools and making mechanical toys. The little women had their special corners filled with suggestions about needle-work, and adorned with attractive designs, accompanied by plain and easy explanations.

With No. 310, which will be published November 6, HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE will enter upon its fifth year. It is the intention of the publishers to make the new volume, if possible, richer, brighter, and better than any of its predecessors. HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE has steadily advanced in the popular regard from the issue of its first number, simply because neither pains nor expense have been spared to make it the best paper in the whole world for English-speaking children.

The publishers are doing all they can. There is just one thing our little friends and their parents can do to assist the conductors of the paper: tell others how much you like it, and what a pleasant visitor it is in your homes. Its circulation is increasing rapidly, and the larger its subscription list shall be the wider will be the circle of young people who derive pleasure and profit from its pages, and the more effective its healthful influence upon the youth of the country.

Now a word for the Post-office Box. It has now its place in the love of the children, and not only its young correspondents, but their parents and teachers, often hear testimony to the happiness it causes and the good it does. From the far-off slopes of the Pacific, from lonely islands, from busy towns, from the farm-house on the prairie, and the nursery on the avenue, the dear little letters arrive by every mail. The Postmistress reads and considers every one, and feels a personal interest in the writers. The freedom with which they confide in her is an evidence of their affectionate appreciation of her work.

Since a part of a polite education consists in the elegant and straightforward use of the pen, it is not remarkable that teachers in particular look upon the Post-office Box as an invaluable help to them in their efforts to train their pupils in the art of composition.

The Exchange Department is edited with minute and conscientious fidelity. It affords boys and girls an opportunity to add, by exchange with each other, to their cabinets and collections, and also promotes an enthusiastic zeal in the study of Natural Science. The stamps, specimens, and relics which the little possessors send to each other stimulate them to fresh discoveries in the departments of geography and history. If it did nothing else, the Exchange Department would be a boon to boys in giving them one more resource and one more delight at home.

The puzzles and wiggles will continue to be as sprightly as of old, and as entertaining in the future as they have been in the past. Everything will be done to make the paper a welcome guest wherever it shall go.

BETHLA, NEW YORK.

DEAR POSTMISTRESS,—I am not a little girl, but, instead, a teacher of little girls, and of boys too. I wonder how many little girls and boys have a warmer affection for this charming magazine than I have. I love to think of my seeing each week not only to children all over our own dear land, but to little ones in countries across the ocean, and to the far-away islands of the seas. Have some very dear children in my country school, and after my little brother Lewis, for whom I take the paper, has read it, I give it to one of my school-children.

Let me tell the boys and girls of a dear little girl whom I met at the sea-shore in the summer. Her name is Daguy K., and she was born in Stockholm not quite five years ago. One day when her mother had finished her shopping and up and said, "Thank you, dear mamma; it has really done me good." Another time she said, "I can't say my prayer to-night—I can't say, 'Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us,' because I'm mad at Minnie."

I have many little ones for pets, but dearest of them all to me are my little nephews Roswell and Edith, my little niece Maud, and my dear little girl in Plymouth, Michigan, named Myrtle.

A LOVER OF YOUNG PEOPLE.

KEENE, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

ALTHOUGH YOUNG PEOPLE has been taken in our family ever since its first number in the name of our youngest boy, yet we under cover open its leaves with pleasure, and eagerly read its pages, admiring its beautiful engravings, and often, as now, sharpening our wits over some of its puzzles. We prize it highly, from oldest to youngest, and are glad to tell how we have secured our subscribers we can send you for 1884. I saw a little anecdote in our Keene High-School Index, which, if not told to you, may amuse some of your readers.

In one of the Boston schools the teacher was always particular that the scholars in spelling should say double e, and not e, e, double e, and not e. Recently a scholar in a school up at Read the beautiful poem beginning, "Up, up, Lucy! the sun is shining." The teacher was horrified to hear it rendered, "Double up, Lucy! the sun is shining."

I send you a list of the names of the birds we found in Fred's letter to his mother in No. 205. Thanking you all for the interesting and instructive matter in your dear little paper, I remain your admirer.

M. L. P.

Your story makes me think of a tiny girl I used to know, who could not be taken for a long time to say me in the alphabet. She always said double me.

KEACHEE, LOUISIANA.

WE are two little sisters living away down in Louisiana, and we thought we would write and tell you how we like to read HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE. Our uncle, who lives at our home, has taken it to us. We like Jimmy Brown's and Lucy C. Lillie's stories the best. We are so much interested in them that we can't get enough of them for us, as we can not write any more. We are six and seven years old, and have a little brother three years old.

WARTLEY and BEATRICE M.

NEW YORK CITY.

I have taken the paper since it started, and enjoy the splendid stories very much. I wanted to tell you about my trip to Europe summer before last. I am eleven years old, and have been to Europe twice. The first time (I was too young to have a passport) Jack and I, my father and two years old) my family visited England, Ireland, and Scotland, spent three months in Paris, a month in Switzerland, and seven months in the beautiful city of Dresden, Germany, where my sister was born. The second time, we went to England, France, Germany, Switzerland, Norway, Austria, Russia, Poland, Holland, Belgium, and Austria. We have been to the cities of Europe Russia is best visited by Americans. There are many objects of great interest in the cities of Europe. St. Petersburg and Moscow. Any traveler who goes to the former city will find a magnificent structure I have ever seen, but inside smaller ones, all very splendid. The foundations alone cost over a million dollars, so that the cost of the whole can be imagined. Inside there is a row of malachite pillars forty feet high and four in diameter, one of which is solid! One of the attractions of Moscow is the Church of St. Basil, which was erected by John Ivan the Terrible. When it was finished John had the eyes of the Italian architect put out, so that he might not design anything so beautiful again. It is very oddly decorated with dragons, imps, and other hideous objects in all the colors of the rainbow. I saw the famous bell of Moscow, which was broken in the great fire. Twenty-four men were required to hold it by the weight. But I fear you will think my tongue has swung long enough, so I remain ever yours lovingly,

ELIOT W.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

I am eight years old, and go to school. I have begun to take lessons on the piano. I take YOUNG PEOPLE, and like to read it very much. We had a reception for our pastor last night, and had some beautiful roses and carnations. The whole house was full of them. I hope this letter will be printed, because it is my first letter. Now I would tell you about my dear friends, my dear Annie J. and Ethel E. They are nice girls. One lives next door, and has a baby brother; the other lives two doors away, and has a big brother. Good-bye.

EDITH T.

HORNBEVILLE, NEW YORK.

I wrote to you once before, but did not see my letter printed, and was much disappointed, but I thought I would write again. My brother, who is in Iowa, gave the paper to me for a Christmas present, and I have read it ever since. I am in School, and am in Room No. 5. When I grow larger I intend to be a school-teacher. I think Burtie E. ought to be the most delighted boy on earth; it has always been very dear to him to cross the ocean and travel in strange countries. Some other time I will write to you and describe the "Burning Spring," which is at Niagara. I have also read a very nice book, written by C. that Wide, Wide World is a splendid book. I am thirteen years old. I send love to the Postmistress from

GLACE E.

END HARBOR CITY, NEW JERSEY.

I can not tell you how much I love and admire the charming little paper. Among all the publications that we take YOUNG PEOPLE is my favorite. Its pictures are so true and beautiful, its stories so real and interesting, that I think it must elevate and refine the taste of every child with whom it comes in contact. It is doing a good work all over the world. It was given to my mother and I for Christmas, and now we could not do without it.

Rina, aged thirteen, and Harry, aged nine, like me to make up fairy tales for them. I enclose one.

THE WINE OF LIFE.

Many years ago in a far-away country lived a poor but honest man. He had a little child, the midst of a dark and stormy night he had to go to the old blind grandmother, whom he loved dearly. He earned a scanty living by his beautiful wood-carvings, which he sold in a distant city.

The King of the country lived in this city. He had a daughter who was as beautiful as she was good, and was much loved by the people. Her name was Rosina. Jack was once run over in the street, and his right arm broken, by the carriage of the Princess. The lovely Rosina burst into tears, and had him taken to the palace, where he had the best of everything until perfectly well. Meanwhile a woman saw so many plenty of provisions, to care for the old grandmother. All this great kindness Jack had never forgotten.

Some time after he heard that the Princess was ill, and that she would die, and that the king's physician could save her but the wine of life, and that could be found nowhere. When Jack told his grandmother this she sat for some time wrapped in thought, and at last she said to him, "where it is, and because she was so very good to us I will tell you where to find it."

After she told him Jack rose, and taking with him a pair of scissars, all of which the old woman gave him, he started. After a weary walk of many miles he reached a high mountain, to the top of which he had to climb. He had a pair of scissars, thimble, and needle on the ground, and pronounced over them certain words which his grandmother had taught him. Immediately a trap-door opened, and he was asked to tell him what he would give him to let him in. "This," said Jack, holding the thimble over his head, and when the dwarf held up his hands for it Jack dropped it on the ground. It grew larger at once, and covered him up.

Taking with him the needle and scissars, he sprang down into the dark cavern, and followed the wine of life. He had a pair of scissars, a thimble, and a needle on the ground, and when the dragon sprang on him, and the light became dark, the two was most dreadful, until Jack pricked the dragon's tail with his needle, and the dragon will be dead. Jack was very tired, and he had a long journey, and at last was rewarded by seeing before him the end of the cavern.

Before he could reach it, however, a goblin with a bead of flames sprang from the ground,

One dextrous out of Jack's scissors severed his head from his body. There before him, at the end of the cavern, stood a crystal goblet containing the wine of life. He could now take it, as he had killed the bees that guarded it. With it in his hand he retraced his steps, and went at once to the city. Having obtained admission to the palace, he presented it with his own hand to the Princess. As soon as she tasted it she sprang up from her couch, and threw her arms round Jack's neck, declaring that he should be her husband. Soon all was feasting and merry-making, and when Jack and his friends were married, his old grandmother was brought to the palace to live with them. The high mountain, however, had disappeared, and was never seen again.

HELEN J. K.

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS.

I am a little girl eleven years old. Here in Cambridge it is quite cold. I am fond of playing, as you may see; Here is a piece composed by me:

Master Gander had a party,
And invited all his friends,
Even roosters, turkeys, chickens,
And one or two old hens.

Most were in their places
Promptly at nine o'clock,
And at half past nine precisely
The old gander turned the lock.

Master Gander gave a solo,
In a ten piece band of music,
The chickens sang just splendidly,
And the turkeys fairly pranced.

They had for refreshments
Worms, bugs, and slugs;
The company ate heartily,
And especially of bugs.

When the time for going came,
The little ones did cry,
But their mother told them
Dry their tears and bid the rest good-by.

They say they're going to have another one,
And I don't doubt it, for I have
If I go and see the fun,
I'll write you all about it.

Please excuse writing,
If you can.
From your constant reader,

LESLIE J. MAXX.

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT.

I am eight years old. I have three brothers, but no sisters. I live on the prairie, and have two Yonge's Cubs, Little Men, and Little Women lately. We tried the custom of dropping on my brother Arthur's birthday, and they were very nice. We found a mouse down in the well, and made a cage for him, and tamed him; we have opened the door to let him out, but he does not want to go, his pen is so comfortable. The flowers here are very pretty, and sometimes the prairie is almost covered with them.

FRANK L. C.

CHICKAMAUGA, GEORGIA.

I am a little girl twelve years old. My grandma takes Yonge's People for us, and I like it very much. I do not go to school, but I say my lessons to mother. I have two pet kittens and a doll. I have a sister and a brother in Texas, and I get letters from them very often. My sister writes me once that she would like to go across the prairie she could stop and listen to the wolves barking. She has a splendid horse.

BETTY CLYDE P.

I hope she may never have to try the speed of her horse against a pack of wolves. It is a comfort, though, that unless famished they are very great cowards.

BANGOR, MAINE.

I am a little girl twelve years old, and have been sick with diphtheria. I am now sitting up in bed, writing, I am getting along nicely now, and feel well enough to be dressed to-day, but the doctor said not until to-morrow, for fear I might take cold, as it is a cold, windy day. My mamma brought in the Yonge's People that came to-day, and read it to me. She read two letters from Bangor, the first I have ever seen printed from here. I wrote one last Christmas week, but I have a sister Nellie, six years old, and she is again writing. Papa's cousin Will, from Brooklyn, New York, has sent me Yonge's People ever since it was published, and we are all delighted with it. He also has sent Harper's Weekly to papa for a great many years, but he has not.

I have a brother Frank, nineteen years old, who is in a lumber office down-town; he walks down every morning, and we live two miles from the city. I have a sister Nellie, six years old, and she is as sweet as can be. I have a little black kitty named Tippy, Frank has a dog named Rudolph, and a collie has a pet chicken, very tame, named Jessie. I am very sorry to be obliged to leave my school for a while, for I wanted to learn so much this term. I like my teacher very much;

she is also my music-teacher. I take two lessons a week on the piano, and like it very much. I live near Mount Hope, our beautiful cemetery. I would like to write more about other things, but I am tired. My mamma says you must be a docile, patient lady to do so much for little folks. I do hope you will please print this. I had to get mamma to copy it for me. I began to, but my hand trembled so, I could not write, and I got tired. A kiss for the Postmistress.

GRACE L. P.

I am very glad, dear, that you have recovered from that perilous and painful disease, diphtheria. I hope it may never attack you again. This was a long letter for a little conversative to write, and I trust it will make you quite happy to see how it looks in print.

MORRISTOWN, VERMONT.

I am a boy eleven years old, and live among the Green Mountains, not far from Mount Mansfield. All other boys and girls tell me about their pets, and so will I. I have a pair of little steers, a canary-bird and cage, a kitty named Tommy, and a dear little brother named Harry. I go to school almost every day, and study geography, grammar, arithmetic, spelling, reading, and writing. I like my teacher very much. I had a good time sliding down-hill the other day when it snowed so hard, I could fly if any other children girls slid down-hill that day. C. S. S.

We have had no such intently snow in this region yet, but Jack Frost visits you and the other mountaineers earlier.

ASTORIA, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

I like so much to read the letters from other little girls and boys that I thought I would like to write one myself and see it in print. I was eleven years old day before yesterday, and I had to teach a little friend of mine who has been with me every birthday since my first. I am going to school now, and have been at school ever since I was five years old, and never was tardy; and I have just finished my second quarter in my music-book, my new large copy-book with my drawing cards in it. I have a little sister Bessie, six years old, and a little brother Richard, four years old. I hope the negroes won't get all Monty M.'s turkeys. I hope I may always have Yonge's People. I like it so much.

BEATA L. W.

Well, done, my dear! An excellent record; this; Berta has attended school six years, and has not once been late. I should like to shake hands with so honorable a girl. Too few of us remember that the person who is tardy gives others great annoyance, and wastes time that is not his own.

BEVERLY, NEW JERSEY.

I am staying at my grandpa's. I live in Philadelphia. A canary-bird which is tame and a land-turtle that goes about the garden are the pets I like to have. I like to make things to do, some afternoon, it is fun to make paper boats, and to dance. You first get two books; then put a piece of glass—the glass should not be too small—in the books so that it will rise about an inch and a quarter from the table. Then cut a strip out of tissue-paper about half an inch high, rub the glass quickly with a piece of silk for a minute, and then stop; they will all jump up on the glass and dance. After they all fall on the table, rub the glass again.

Alice S. M.

Cedar Falls, Iowa.

I am a little boy ten years old. I have no brothers or sisters like many others that have written to Harper's Young People. My father's name is Sam; he is a setter. My papa likes to go out hunting, and takes Sam along. Papa shoots ducks and prairie-chickens, and Sam brings them and brings them to him. I have some little chickens. My papa is an editor. I like to go down to the office and fold papers on publication day. I go to school. I like my teacher. I was in New York last summer, and was going to call on the Postmistress of HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE, but did not have time, because I went to so many places, but was sorry I could not. I visited most of the summer in the mountains on the coast, and went in bathing. We went to Central Park. We came home by way of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington over the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. I like nice things. I think HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE is a very nice paper, and think "Raising the Pearl" is a good story, and I would like to have been with those boys.

BERTIE H. L.

LANDAU, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

I live away out in the country, among the New Hampshire hills. I have thought a great many things that I would like to write to you, but I did not know where to direct a letter. I have taken Yonge's People two years, and like it very much. My playmate, Carrie II., takes the Youth's Companion, and we exchange; but I like my paper best, because we were to read it together, and know where to go. For pets I have two cats, a cow, sixteen chickens, and a horse that I can drive. I have a three-year-old brother named Charlie. I have never written before. I should like one of those doll's patterns. Please tell me how to send. Shall I send the price in money or stamps?

JENNIE L. C.

Send a five-cent stamp in a letter, asking for the Nautlius. Give your name and Post-office address in full.

MOUNT PLEASANT, NORTH CAROLINA.

I am ten years old, and I like Yonge's People very much. I like Jimmy Brown's stories, and "Raising the Pearl" best of all. I have no pets except a pig named Harney. This is the first letter I have ever written, and as I have never seen one from this place, I thought I would write one, which I hope the kind Postmistress will insert. I have two brothers and one sister, JONAS B. F.

A pig is a droll pet, but doubtless a well-behaved one. I wonder if, like the celebrated learned pig, yours could be taught his A B C's.

Thanks for kind letters to E. G. and Miss Fannie A. P., who have each inclosed a budget of missives from their pupils. A selection from these will appear hereafter.—The Indian-sunnet letters are coming rapidly, and some of them are very good.—A. H. THE ORPHAN.

My father and mother are dead,
Nor friend nor relation I know;
And now the cold earth is his bed,
And daisies will over them grow.

I cast my eyes up to the sky;
I wept, though I said not a word;
Yet God was not deaf to my cry,
The Friend of the Fatherless heard.

WASHING AND DRESSING.

Ah! why will my dear little girl be so cross,
And cry, and look sulky, and pout?
To lose her sweet smile is a terrible loss;
I can't even kiss her without.

I'll finish so soon if you only won't cry,
But pay me for all with a kiss;
That's right—take the towel and wipe your bright eye;
I know you'll be good after this.

GREEDY RICHARD.

"I think I want some pies this morning,"
Said Dick, stretching himself and yawning;
So down he threw his slate and books,
And sauntered to the pastry-cook's.

And there he cast his greedy eyes
Round on the jellies and the pies,
So to select, with anxious care,
The very nicest that was there.

THE NEW CLOTHES.

He strutted proudly through the street,
With looks both vain and pert;
A sweep-boy passed, whom not to meet,
He slipped—into the dirt.

The sooty lad, whose heart was kind,
To help him quickly ran,
And grasped his arm, with, "Never mind,
You're up, my little man."

THE GOOD-NATURED GIRLS.

Two good little children,
Named Mary and Ann,
Both happily live,
As good girls always can;
And though they are not Either sullen or mute,
They seldom or never
Are heard to dispute.

THE PARTY.

They dance, they play, and sweetly sing,
In every sport each one partakes;
And now the servants sweetmeats bring,
With nuts and jellies, fruit and cakes.

"Miss Fanny's maid for her is come."
"Oh dear, how soon!" the children cry.
They press, but Fanny will go home,
And bids her little friends good-by.

THE DAISIES.

We'll take the daisies, white and red,
Because mamma has often said
That we may gather them instead.

And much I hope we always may
Our very dear mamma obey,
And mind whatever she may say.

FOR A NAUGHTY LITTLE GIRL.

My sweet little girl should be cheerful and mild;

She must not be fretful, and cry,
Oh, why is she naughty? Remember, my pet,
That all will be well by-and-by.

THE VILLAGE GREEN.

Ox the cheerful village green,
Skirted round with houses small,
All the boys and girls are seen,
Playing there with hoop and ball.

Rich array and mansions proud,
Gilded toys and costly fare,
Would not make this little crowd
Half so happy as they are.

FAVORITE BOOKS FOR HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

BY HELEN S. CONANT.

HOW many of the little readers of YOUNG PEOPLE have begun to think and plan about Christmas?

Christmas! it is ever so long before Christmas! shout thousands of merry voices. Only two months, dear boys and girls, and that is a very short time in which to prepare for the sweet holiday season.

It does not seem much like Christmas now, to be sure, for that is the season of skating and coasting to happy little folks, and of bleak snow-storms and sharp biting winds to thousands of poor children who have no home and no shelter, while to-day the grass is still green, and the beautiful Indian summer infolds meadows and fields and woods in its warm purple mantle of soft sunshine.

It is always a bad plan to put off attending to things until the last moment, for if you work in a hurry you can not work well, and something is sure to be left undone.

That is why, now in these pleasant autumn days, I ask all the readers of YOUNG PEOPLE to sit down and have a long chat about Christmas.

There are a great many things you wish to do to make Christmas a day of real happiness for yourselves and others. Boys and girls always wonder what Santa Claus will bring, and every one is hoping that some specially desired gift will drop from the hands of the jolly old saint as he gallops over the chimney-top. Some of you who are very little print tiny letters, and hide them where this lover of good children is sure to find them; but among the older ones it comes to be understood that for some mysterious reason mamma knows more about the contents of the reindeer sledge than any one else, and it is to her they confide their wishes and hopes; and somehow things placed in mamma's hands always come out right. But it is time now for you to think about the little requests which will guide mamma in her interview with Santa Claus.

Then, besides yourselves, there are many others you must think about—brothers, sisters, and a whole army of poor children who probably will never know the good saint of Christmas if you do not bring him to them.

There is no happiness more beautiful than that reflected upon us from the bright faces of others, and it is especially sweet when we ourselves have been the means of making those faces bright. If you do not know this by experience, try it, and you will find you never had so much pleasure in your life before. Christmas is a nice time to begin to work for happiness in this way.

You will all hope for a great many toys and other trinkets. This is perfectly right, for boys and girls, especially the little ones, must have dolls and playthings of all kinds. But stop a moment and think which of your last Christmas gifts you now prize the most. The dolls are headless and cast aside, the playthings are broken or you are tired playing with them; but I do not believe one of you is tired of reading and re-reading your books, and therefore I am going to tell you about some of the beautiful books which Messrs. Harper & Brothers have prepared for their youthful readers, that you may think them over and make your choice before Christmas.

Here is the bound volume of YOUNG PEOPLE for 1883. What a wealth of amusement lies between its pretty green covers! There are hundreds of beautiful pictures of child life which the best artists and engravers have prepared with special care; there are poems—pretty childish jingles, which you can teach to the sweet baby sister or brother, and spirited verses just such as boys and girls need for speaking in school; delightful stories; descriptions of games and mechanical contrivances for boys; thrilling tales of adventures by land and sea, by James Payn and other authors; and instructive articles, accounts of events in history, descriptions of birds and beasts, and creatures that live under water; short biographies of celebrated artists and musicians—so many things to interest and instruct little readers that it is impossible to describe them all.

This volume contains Mrs. Lillie's delightful story of "Nan." And the same author, who must love children very much to write so beautifully about them, tells in "Dick and D." of the bitter trials of two poor orphan boys, and how they at last found friends and a comfortable home. Then, too, in this volume is the "Raising the Pearl," a fascinating story of adventure, by James Otis, about three boys who raised a sunken yacht, and, with their friend Captain Sammy and the "pirate" Tommy Tucker, took a voyage in her through the Florida lakes and rivers.

Little piano students will find here pretty simple melodies written especially for tiny fingers. And then there is the charming Post-office Box, which gives weekly news from the little folks all over the world, telling of their studies, their pets, their sports, and their troubles in their own sweet childish words.

This beautiful volume of YOUNG PEOPLE is as attractive a present as could be selected for a whole family of youthful readers, as each one, from the little household pet to the boys and girls already too old for dolls and playthings, is sure to find in it amusement and instruction.

It would be a suitable and appropriate gift for the children's ward in a hospital. You who have loving parents to care for you, and to bring fruit and flowers and pretty things to your bedside when you are sick, should remember those homeless little ones who are dependent upon charity—your charity, because I trust you are not among those who leave kind deeds for others to do. The tender hands and hearts that care for sick children in our great hospitals can not always find time to amuse each little one who is convalescent; and think what a nice thing it would be if a volume of YOUNG PEOPLE was ready to place in the hands of a feeble child, who must have weary days of waiting before health returns.

If your Christmas allowance will not permit you to send the volume, then take a subscription for the new year, and every week you will send a bright bit of sunshine where it is needed.

A year's subscription to YOUNG PEOPLE is a beautiful present to any child. If you do not have the pretty little paper, tell mamma that it would be a very nice thing for Santa Claus to bring you; and if it is already your weekly visitor, show it to your little friends, and tell them it is the prettiest Christmas present they can choose. The new volume will be prettier and more interesting, if possible, than the one now closing, for the very best writers and the very best artists are hard at work hunting up beautiful things to make little boys and girls happy. Now, when they are working so hard for you, you must show your appreciation, and please them by getting as many new subscribers for the paper as you can.

You all know Margaret Eytling, for she has written ever so many pretty stories and poems which have been printed in YOUNG PEOPLE. You can not imagine until you see it what a lovely book she has prepared for your Christmas stocking. It is called The Ball of the Vegetables, and Other Stories, in Prose and Verse, and Messrs. Harper & Brothers have published it. It is printed on cream-colored paper, and in large type that will not hurt your eyes. There are a large number of beautiful illustrations, and seventy delightful stories and poems. The handsome cover will make your eyes dance, especially when you look at it closely, and see King Pumpkin and Queen Squash seated on their throne, watching the merry revels of their guests at the ball. It is one of the prettiest new story-books, and besides overflowing with amusement, contains a good many things that will set you to thinking.

Here is another new book, with a beautifully illuminated cover, upon which a rampant elephant defiantly waves his trunk at a band of native hunters who are pelting him with spears. It is The Boy Travellers in Central Africa, by Thomas W. Knox. The boys, Frank and Fred, and their companion and mentor, Dr. Bronson, are old friends of many readers, who have journeyed with them through the wonderful countries of the far East. In this volume, which ends their wanderings and brings them home in safety, they traverse the wild countries of Africa with camels and a caravan of their own. They follow the routes of Livingstone, Baker, and other eminent travellers, they study the habits of the elephant, the hippopotamus, the rhinoceros, and other beasts in the swamps and rivers where these creatures make their home, and see and learn many strange things about the inhabitants of this remote region. This magnificent book is profusely illustrated, and contains two maps which give the most recent discoveries in the vast continent of Africa.

Colonel Knox has a delightful way of giving information, and the descriptions of strange countries, given in the series of which African adventure forms the fifth volume, are drawn mostly from the personal observation of the author. A more fascinating account of boyish travel has never been written. In the first volume the boys, together with their kind friend, leave home, via San Francisco and the Pacific Ocean, for Japan and China, where they ascend the volcano of Fusi-yama, visit the Great Wall of China, and study the habits and customs of those two wonderful countries. In Part Second they continue their travels through Siam and Java, and visit some curious islands of the Malay Archipelago. Part Third takes our young travellers through Ceylon, India, Burma, where they visit the scenes where Dr. Judson and other missionaries lived and labored among the heathen, and the Philippine Islands. And in Part Fourth the boys make an extensive tour of Egypt and the Holy Land. They pass through the wonderful Suez Canal, and explore the sacred localities about Jerusalem and in other portions of Palestine. Each volume of this splendid library of travel for youthful readers is beautifully bound, and has a vast number of fascinating pictures. The volumes are sold separately, and should be found in the library of every boy and girl.

There are two more delightful books which Colonel Knox has prepared expressly for the boys of America. They are called The Young Nimrods; or, Hunting Adventures on Land and Sea. One volume is devoted to the sports of North America, and the other tells about adventures around the world. No boy could choose a present which would give him more real pleasure than one or both of these pretty books. They contain accurate descriptions of wild beasts and the manner of hunting them, and are overflowing with sparkling anecdotes of wild-woods adventures. They are both beautifully bound, and have pictures on nearly every page.

Perhaps there is not an intelligent American boy who does not know about the great traveller Mr. Du Chaillu, and his wonderful adventures in Africa, of which country he was one of the earliest explorers, but all may not know that he has prepared five small illustrated volumes of thrilling African adventure especially for boys and girls. Each volume is sold separately, or they may be bought all five together in a pretty, neat case. You can find the titles of these books on another page of the Christmas Supplement of YOUNG PEOPLE, but you can never imagine, until you read the books, the wonderful stories they contain of adventures in great African jungles, of encounters with savages and wild beasts, of strange birds and insects, and other curious things found in the wilderness of Africa.

Another beautiful book for boys and girls is What Mr. Darwin Saw. Mr. Darwin was a distinguished naturalist. About fifty years ago he sailed round the world in the ship Beagle, and on his return he wrote about the geography, the inhabitants, and the natural history of all the strange countries he visited. This volume, which Messrs. Harper & Brothers publish expressly for children, contains extracts from Mr. Darwin's large work, about all kinds of things interesting to little readers. There are maps and charts on which you can trace the route followed by Mr. Darwin in his travels round the world, and pictures of many curious things which he saw.

Wolf's Wild Animals is a large and very handsome book, containing twenty beautiful full-page engravings from drawings made by Mr. Wolf, an artist who loved all wild creatures. There is an interesting description of each picture, with anecdotes of the birds and beasts represented.

The study of history, especially of our own country, is of the greatest importance, but how often boys and girls find the subject wearisome because they do not have books written in an interesting style, such as young folks enjoy! There are four beautiful books of history written by Mr. Charles Carleton Coffin, and if you begin to read any one of them you will never stop until you reach the end of the last page, for no story-book was ever more fascinating. Grown-up people like to read them too. And it is no wonder, for they tell about things of the greatest interest, are full of sparkling anecdotes, and contain a large number of nice pictures. One of these books is called The Story of Liberty. Just stop a moment, American boys and girls, and think what that means. Do you know all the sacrifice and all the suffering which the blessed liberty you enjoy has cost the world? If you read this book, you will learn about some of it. It tells how one of the first great struggles for liberty took place in England more than six hundred and fifty years ago, when the people forced King John to sign the Magna Charta, which was the foundation of free government; and it gives the history of Luther and other great men who have fought for truth and right in different countries. The three other books by Mr. Coffin tell the story of our own United States of America. One is Old Times in the Colonies. It describes the landing of the Pilgrims, the dreadful Indian wars, and the struggles of our brave forefathers before the time of the Revolution. Another volume is The Boys of '76, and is a most fascinating history of the battles of the great Revolutionary war. The last of Mr. Coffin's books is called Building the Nation, and tells how the people went to work after the Revolution to make a Constitution and organize a republican government. It brings United States history down through the war of 1812 and the Mexican war to the time when the troubles between the North and the South began.

A pretty book, which must not escape your notice, is Games and Songs of American Children, collected by Mr. Newell. It tells about a great many games, and gives the music of "Water, Water, Wild Flower," and other little tunes which children like to sing. New Games for Parlor and Lawn is also a very nice book, which gives many directions for winter evening sports.

For young readers who love poetry there is a lovely book called Our Children's Songs, in which may be found poems by the best authors for very little folks, and for older ones too. Young Folks' Centennial Rhymes, by Will Carleton, is also a pretty book of poetry, with some spirited ballads on Revolutionary incidents—just the thing for speaking in school.

There are many pretty story-books, all handsomely bound and illustrated. A very beautiful one, with charming pictures by Alfred Fredericks, is The Catskill Fairies, by Miss Johnson, which tells about all the wonderful things that happened to Job while he was asleep all alone at grandpa's during a terrible snow-storm.

Some lovely fairy stories are The Little Lame Prince and The Adventures of a Brownie, by Miss Mulock; and The Princess Idleways, by Mrs. Hays, a delightful story of a little girl who learned the secret of finding her own happiness in that of others.

A fascinating story for boys is The Four Macnicals, by the celebrated author William Black, in which four Scotch boys fight their way from poverty to comfort by perseverance and honesty.

If you like a very funny story which will make you laugh, get Diddle, Dumps, and Tot, and read about some children who lived on a Southern plantation, with queer little darkeys for playmates, and had all kinds of childish fun and trouble.

Then there are all the stories many of you have enjoyed in YOUNG PEOPLE, "Toby Tyler," "Mr. Stubbs's Brother," "The Moral Pirates," and many others, all bound in pretty volumes, just the size for your little hands to hold easily.

Now think carefully about all these pretty books you have read about, and consult with mamma before you make a selection. And while you are thinking about yourselves, do not forget your little friends, and always be sure to remember poor children, who are also Christ's dear little ones, and consider that they too need books and pretty things as well as food and warm clothing. Keep all this in mind, and do not neglect to act as well as think. Then you will be ready for what YOUNG PEOPLE wishes you all most heartily, a very Merry Christmas.

JACOB ABBOTT AS A STORY-TELLER.

BY MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

MY first impression of Jacob Abbott's charm as a storyteller takes me back to a winter's day in my childhood. My mother and I were visiting at a house where there were few books to interest a small woman of ten.

On this particular day there lay invitingly on the centre table a new book in a bright red binding. Of course I picked it up, read a page, and then another and another, never pausing, except when called to meals, until I had finished the volume. The book was the life of King Charles the First, told in the vivid fashion which made it a succession of pictures. After that I read all the historical biographies of Mr. Abbott with eager delight, and there were few of the two hundred volumes which came from the author's busy pen into which sooner or later I did not dip. I believe the last one I read was Gentle Measures in the Management of the Young, which naughty children should buy and bestow on their parents.

Many of Mr. Abbott's books have had an almost fabulous circulation. Some of them have been translated into several languages besides our own. His stories are pleasing because they are so natural. The boys and girls in the Rollo and Lucy books are just such boys and girls as we see every day. The pleasures and temptations and troubles they meet come to every child at home or in school. The author's aim is always to combine amusement with instruction, and while entertaining his readers, he contrives to give them a great deal of practical advice full of common-sense.

In the series known as "Harper's Story-Books," he shows young people how to conduct themselves when on a journey, how to read to advantage, how to manage little brothers and sisters, how to play together without quarrelling, how to use tools, and how to draw pictures of what they wish to remember. His directions descend to all sorts of little details. For instance, Stanley, a boy of ten, is reading a beautiful new book, of which he is very choice. Dorie, his little sister, insists on looking at the book, but her brother is not willing to trust it to her, even for a few moments. He holds it high above his head, and refuses either to let her hold it in her own hands or to allow her the privilege of seeing it in his. By-and-by, when he is not on guard, the naughty Miss Dorie comes behind him and snatches it away. In the struggle to regain it, Stanley tumbles the leaves, and finally marches off to his father to complain of Dorie's rudeness. The father listens patiently, tells Dorie that she was wrong to take what belonged to another without the other's consent, and explains to Stanley that by yielding a little, and being gentle and persuasive, he could have avoided much of the fuss. Then he takes the tumbled book, and says, "I will dampen the leaves over steam, put it under the press, and make it as good as new again."

In a story entitled The Three Gold Dollars Mr. Abbott follows the fortunes of an orphan boy who leaves his home in the country to look for work in New York. Poor Robin has about seventy-eight cents in silver, and with this money, which he has been a long time saving, he proposes to go to the great city. A kind-hearted boy who knows him lends him three gold dollars, which for safety the two lads sew into a little band of muslin, and fasten securely around Robin's arm.

Robin was a boy who could think and act quickly. On the way to New York he lent a helping hand to a teamster in difficulty, and was repaid by a ride and a dinner. He rescued a boy who had broken through the ice while skating by bringing a board from a fence and placing it so that the boy could catch it and be drawn out of the pond. The boy's mother gave him a night's lodging and a good supper and breakfast. In the city he met with some strange and exciting adventures, and finally made for himself a friend in the person of a lady whose house he saved from two fierce robbers.

The plan of the robbers was to unfasten the sky-light, let a small boy down into the garret, and then wait for him to unlash the scuttle. Robin, a harmless little fellow from the country, without money or work, seemed just the boy they needed. However, he was not so stupid as they thought. So soon as he was safe in the garret he alarmed the family, and the men were arrested. From this time the little fellow's course was smooth, and his new friends helped him until he had received a good education. These examples give you an idea of Mr. Abbott's method.

He makes a great point of obedience to authority, showing children that they never can be fit to govern others until they learn to obey their parents and teachers promptly.

There is one story about a boy named Jasper, whose mother had spoiled him by foolish indulgence. This child is sent on a visit to his grandfather, who teaches him that manly boys obey orders as a matter of course, just as soldiers mind the commanding officer on the instant.

One of the best books Mr. Abbott ever wrote was The Young Christian. It is not, as some of you may imagine, a grave and dry book of sermons. If your pastor or some dear friend should gather a number of young people about him, and talk to them of life and duty, of this world and the next, of faults and how to overcome them, and these talks should be printed in a volume, the result would be not unlike this series of charming conversations.

Mr. Abbott's works are on various topics. They tell about different countries and ways of living, about battles by land and sea, about scientific pursuits and experiments, and about great discoverers and inventors. In fact, they form a complete library, in which you may read of great men and beautiful women, may stroll through galleries of art, visit historic spots, or wander at your ease around the old farm. A set of them will entertain the children of a household through a series of years, for they can not be exhausted at one reading, as merely amusing books often are. They are delightful volumes for reading aloud to a listening group.
